SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to welcome you to the Second Session of the 28th Parliament of Canada and to present, on behalf of the Government, various matters which it wishes to lay before you.

Before doing so, may I say that, notwithstanding some unresolved problems which affect our collectivity, and notwithstanding the fears of people of little faith, it was encouraging to find, in the course of recent visits which my wife and I have made to Canadians in all ten Provinces and in the Arctic Islands, that their sense of identity, and of the potential which Canada offers to them and to their children, is strong and healthy.

I was also pleased to make a goodwill tour of the four Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean: Jamaica, Guyana, Barbados and Trinidad and Tobago. These visits abroad were made on the advice of the Government and with the encouragement of Her Majesty.

May I say, too, that Her Majesty's interest in Canada, and in Canadians and their affairs, will bring the Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh to Manitoba and to the Northwest Territories in July of next year to join in the celebration of their centennials.

Canada is a fortunate country, blessed by nature and spared by war, but we are not immune from the effects of conflicts in other parts of the globe. Our world has become so compact, so interdependent, that all humanity is wounded by an outbreak of violence in any corner of the earth. Whether it be in Vietnam, Nigeria, or the Middle East, suffering in any part of the world disturbs the whole international community and affects Canada as a responsible member of that community.

Although we must be aware of the effects of these upheavals on our own country, we are even more concerned about the damage inflicted on the prospects for world peace and the spread of misery and deprivation. The means at our disposal for bringing these conflicts to an end are necessarily limited, but the Government is making full use of its opportunities to help reduce international tension.

We will continue to be an active member of the United Nations. After a quarter of a century of radical changes in its functions and membership, the U.N. needs to be revitalised and strengthened. Canada is presenting its proposals for reform to the present session of the General Assembly.

As weapons become more destructive and weapons' testing more dangerous, the Government is assigning a higher priority to its efforts in the field of arms control. One barrier to a ban on underground nuclear tests has been the difficulty of verifying that it is being observed. As a practical step towards such a ban, Canada has proposed an international exchange of seismic information.

As long as differences between peoples are permitted to degenerate into hatred and violence, we cannot remain unmoved by appeals for help from the victims of wars. At the International Red Cross Conference last month, the Canadian Government gained acceptance of a principle which it has long supported whereby the Red Cross will be permitted to provide relief during civil wars to civilians on both sides.

In addition to our work in international organizations, we are intensifying our direct contacts with many of the governments and peoples of Latin America, Africa and Asia. At this session you will be asked to consider a bill to create a Canadian International Development Research Centre which will bring together Canadian and foreign experts on the problems of developing economies.

A disturbing element in many countries of the world has been the rising tide of unrest, particularly among young people. It has expressed itself in many ways, in public debate, in peaceful protest and sometimes in violence. Our profound disapproval of the excesses must not blind us to deeply felt and legitimate aspirations. Many citizens in our own country believe that they are entitled to assume greater responsibility for the destiny of our society. Such demands, insofar as they do not conflict with the general welfare, are the expression of a truly democratic ideal. They must be satisfied if our society is to attain its goals of peace and justice.

The Government believes that the time has come to extend the franchise in federal elections and it will therefore recommend to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of the House of Commons that the voting age be lowered to eighteen.

Changes will be proposed in the legislation governing the Northern Territories which will improve the representational character of their Councils.

If the rights and interests of individuals and groups are to be safeguarded, they must be accurately reflected in the political structure of this country and in its basic blueprint, the Constitution.

The Government therefore attaches the greatest importance to the revision of the Constitution and to the progress achieved by the Constitutional Conference. The last meeting of the Conference provided an opportunity for particularly productive discussions, and the Government is determined to spare no effort to ensure the success of this vital task.

History, geography and economics have placed certain of our citizens at a disadvantage. Under legislation enacted during the last session of Parliament, the Government is establishing programs to reduce these inequalities.

The Official Languages Act, which provides for the use of French and English in federal government institutions wherever the composition of the population justifies it, will permit the exercise of essential language rights within a society which recognizes and welcomes a rich diversity of race, religion and cultural traditions.

This resolve to achieve linguistic equality will have its counterpart in social and economic life. During the last session, Parliament enacted legislation which will enable the Government, with the co-operation of the Provinces, to set up programs to reduce regional disparities in employment opportunities and average incomes. In fact, despite the general cutback in its expenditures, the Government, recognizing the overriding urgency of these programs, has decided to allocate an increasing proportion of its revenues to them.

The necessity for raising the level of employment of Canadians of Indian descent and other less favoured citizens will also receive special attention.

Changes in the patterns of need in our society call for a more equitable social policy which will offer assistance and security to people unable to work or to provide for themselves and their families. A white paper on social security will be presented together with a proposal concerning the reorganization of the unemployment insurance program.

Satisfactory relations between labour and management are of critical importance to our social and economic progress. The Government is devoting greater attention to the problems and possibilities of industrial relations and will be putting forward for your consideration amendments to the legislation governing collective bargaining in the industries within federal jurisdiction.

There are many obstacles to be overcome if we are to achieve our economic goals, but inflation is undoubtedly the most serious and the most difficult to control. If we fail to control it, the consequences could rapidly prove disastrous, especially—but not only—for those whose incomes are already low.

In recent months the Government has urged both the public and the private sectors to adopt special measures to combat the dangers of inflation. These measures, which the Government has itself adopted, must be applied by all if further restraints are to be avoided.

You will also be called upon to study proposals for tax reform aimed at a fairer distribution of the tax burden combined with favourable conditions for growth in the national economy. The structure of our tax system must be adapted to reflect more accurately the true circumstances of individual Canadians and of business organizations in our modern society.

One of Canada's most valuable assets is undeniably the richness and variety of her material resources. In some cases, production has increased substantially and outstripped demand; grain is one of the commodities of which reserves have piled up, causing financial hardship to a good many farmers.

Increasing production of grain in many countries has contributed to a decline in our international grain trade and in world grain prices. This reduction of markets and prices has been of utmost concern to the Government, which intends to continue its search for new outlets for Canadian grain and its efforts to improve international co-operation and to re-establish orderly marketing. In addition, you will be asked to consider amendments to the Canada Grain Act which are intended to make our products more competitive in world markets.

The competitive position of Canadian fisheries must also be strengthened, not only through new licensing and marketing arrangements, but also by extending Canada's exclusive fishing zones.

Our resources are immense, but they are not inexhaustible. Although we must encourage their development, we must also conserve them and regulate their use. Water is among the most precious of these resources. The evidence of past failure to rehabilitate our water resources is there for all to see—befouled water, despoiled beaches, rotting marine vegetation, and diminished fishing. The Government has made known its views on this serious problem, and has begun urgent discussions with the Provinces. Upon their completion, the Government will introduce legislation which will enable it, in co-operation with the Provinces, to improve and preserve our water resources. Thus may we assure ourselves of their continuing benefit for our own domestic use, industrial expansion, and recreation.

While the Atlantic and the Pacific retain their traditional importance for Canada, the Arctic Ocean and its coastal regions may soon enter a period of rapid economic development. Much of this development will undoubtedly occur on the islands of the Canadian archipelago, or in the adjoining continental shelf whose resources, under international law, we have the exclusive right to explore and exploit. With resource development, and the benefits it entails, may come grave danger to the balance of plant and animal life on land and in the sea, which is particularly precarious in the harsh polar regions. While encouraging such development, we must fulfil our responsibility to preserve these areas, as yet undespoiled and essentially in a state of nature. The Government will introduce legislation setting out the measures necessary to prevent pollution in the Arctic Seas. It is also considering other methods of protecting Canada's ocean coasts.

Through the United Nations and its agencies Canada is seeking to establish a system to combat the pollution of international waters which threatens so many forms of life on this planet.

Our aim is a strong and productive country soundly equipped to face the future; but we are equally concerned with the individual Canadian, his rights and his interests. The Government regards national progress and individual fulfilment as indivisible components of its mandate.

The size, complexity and fallibility of the structures that technology imposes on modern societies are often in conflict with the protection and development of individual values. The workings of both private and public institutions may endanger the individual's free expression of his unique personality. He must therefore be protected from anything that jeopardizes his rights or limits his personal development.

To this end, Criminal Code amendments will be submitted to you that would regulate wire-tapping and other invasions of the individual's privacy, and reform the present law governing detention before trial. Bills will be submitted to make federal tribunals more accessible and responsive, and to ensure fair treatment in expropriation cases. There will also be a bill to create a national law reform commission, whose task will be the improvement and modernization of the law and its administration at the federal level.

You will also be asked to review the large body of legislation applying to companies and financial institutions. To enhance the position of the consumer in the market place, the Government will ask you to augment our body of consumer protection. There will be proposals dealing with consumer credit, packaging and labelling, identification of the fibre content of textile products and motor vehicle safety.

In the field of housing, despite the difficulties of inflation, the objective is to construct one million new housing units in five years. The Government will play its part in achieving that objective while emphasizing measures to satisfy the needs of low income families. This and related programs will stimulate social progress, employment, economic growth and urban improvement. They are a recognition of the need for every citizen to live in healthy and pleasant surroundings.

I have mentioned some of the important subjects of legislation which you will be asked to consider at this session. You will also be invited to discuss a number of aspects of long range national policy.

In addition to solving her immediate problems, Canada must be prepared to face the coming challenges of the post industrial era. This calls for a systematic appraisal of Canadian society and of the basic principles that are to guide it. During the past twelve months, the Government has begun this lengthy task. During this session a number of reports and white papers will be presented as part of a comprehensive revision of Government policy. You will thus be invited to examine the Government's findings concerning external affairs, defence, tax reform, citizenship, social security, information, and postal service.

In these documents the Government will define its goals and the means by which it proposes to achieve them, but it believes there is also a need for informed public discussion before bills are drafted in their final form, and before any far-reaching measures are taken.

A more intensive consideration of national policies by Parliament is in keeping with the spirit of the recent reforms in the rules of the House of Commons. These new rules will demonstrate that Parliamentary traditions can adapt to the changed circumstances of contemporary life while continuing to respect the fundamental principles of popular representation.

They are evidence of our common desire to modernize our institutions so that they will satisfy the needs and aspirations of our citizens, and thus enable us to work together in harmony and with renewed energy to ensure the progress and greatness of Canada.

Members of the House of Commons:

During this session, you will be asked to grant the necessary funds for the services and expenditures authorized by Parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The Prime Minister will lay before you today a list of bills that will be submitted to you during the session.

May Divine Providence enlighten your deliberations.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 3 p.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. JACK CULLEN AND SECONDED BY MR. GILLES MARCEAU

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia): Mr. Speaker, I count it a signal honour to have been called upon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his associates in the cabinet to move the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. All the constituents of the Sarnia riding, whatever political persuasion, share this honour. I hope, in a vicarious way, my constituents can feel the sense of privilege which is mine today.

On the 8th day of May, 1967, Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General, in beginning the Speech from the Throne at that time, stated in part as follows:

As my words are being broadcast throughout Canada, I should like to begin on a personal note. I want to say that I am deeply conscious of the possibilities for good for Canada of my new office and duty—that which brings me here today to open the centennial session of parliament.

He continued:

May I renew my pledge at the ceremony of installation, that my sole purpose and effort will be to merit the confidence which has been reposed in me by Her Majesty our Queen, on the advice of her Canadian ministers and by the countless Canadians from every region who have so freely offered their good wishes.

We have every good reason, Mr. Speaker, to be proud of the manner in which His Excellency, the Governor General has performed his duties in that high office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cullen: It is fitting and proper that during the moving of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne we should publicly acknowledge the deep sense of dedication which he has so obviously brought to that position.

In his comments in 1967, the Governor General established a guideline for those of us who serve as members of parliament and I think we should all consider his comment and his dedication to this proposition, namely:

. . . the possibilities for good for Canada of my new office and duty . . .

Some in this House may have to be reminded from time to time that we are here for the good of Canada and that is our prime responsibility. No one is asked to lose sight of the fact that we are politicians and that we have obligations to our respective parties nor that we, as individuals, are accountable to our constituents. But, in the final analysis, Canada and the betterment of Canada must come first.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cullen: We in this House have an awesome responsibility and it far outweighs the immediate responsibility imposed upon the Prime Minister and his cabinet to deal with present day legislation. We, and I mean all members of this House, have an obligation to make the House of Commons more relevant, to establish to the satisfaction of the citizens of Canada that the government has the single, most important role to play in the development of our country. Our legislation, our conduct, our rules and our dedication all receive the daily scrutiny of the press, radio and television. The legislation of the present Liberal government receives the criticism, constructive and, unfortunately, sometimes otherwise, of the opposition parties. In the various committees of the House this legislation is reviewed, criticized, amended and reported back to the House. This legislation is then subject to amendment and these amendments are debated. There are many safeguards before proposed legislation becomes law and this is as it should be.

It is difficult however to explain to the citizen of Canada who is not familiar with these procedures the necessity for taking time and having safeguards. But that self-same citizen has a good point. I think we must be careful in the House of Commons that we do not take too much time. We must look at the program of legislative proposals, establish the priorities, and then calculate the time which is available to us if we are to ensure that this legislative program will be adopted within the time available.

Rule changes were of course a must and all parties agreed. We could not agree on all of the rule changes and so the government, quite properly, had to accept responsibility for Rules 75A, 75B and 75C, in the hope that they will serve to expedite the business of this House. I am not so naïve as to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the business of this House can be expedited by the initiative of the governing party alone. I recognize we require co-operation from the opposition parties, no matter what the rules state. The thing that does concern me, however, and I can assure Your Honour it also concerns the people of Canada, is whether we in this House have not become too conservative, with a small "c", about the passage of legislation and whether we are not taking too much time rather than too little with our legislation. When we spend too much time and have too many speakers, do the speeches themselves lose their significance?

I am not looking to make this House of Commons a sausage factory or a rubber stamp office for government legislation, but I would like to see debates on important legislation hold the attention of this House, of the various media of publicity, and of the ci'izens of our country. I would like to see this House of Commons filled with members during the debating period. On one or two occasions in the past year, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has used the phrase "the cut and thrust of debate". Mr. Speaker, some of the debates in this chamber have been carried on with old, rusty swords—and some of the swords were not even taken out of the scabbards. The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) gave a first class address on the need of a merchant marine in Canada, but very few even of his own party members were present during that debate, albeit it took place during the private members' hour. The emptying of the press gallery after the question period should surely tell us something.

Consider this. When constituents come to the House of Commons during the afternoon, some members explain apologetically that their colleagues are not present in the house because they are attending committee meetings, or are busy back in their constituencies. Then, when they get into the gallery, these visitors look down to see members who are present reading their newspapers and paying little or no attention to the man who is speaking at the time. How do we convince the press, how do we convince the people of Canada, how do we convince ourselves that this House has any real significance when it cannot hold the attention of the very members who compose it?

The Sarnia Observer in an editorial on July 22 entitled "Weaker by the Week" stated:

The real threat to parliament isn't the possible danger of cutting off productive and informative debate on a measure, but the steady erosion of prestige by tiresome speeches, lack of decorum, obstructionism and poor attendance in the House. The House of Commons is its own worst enemy and every time it aids its own weaknesses it chips away a little more of its own fabric.

That situation, Mr. Speaker, has got to change. I hope it will change—if not in this session, then in subsequent sessions. To be a member of this House is a rare privilege and new members are as conscious of this fact as are their colleagues who have served here for many years. We new members are convinced that the parliamentary form of government is best for Canada. But excellent as it is, it is not sacrosanct; it can be improved, albeit slowly. We have to make changes if the House of Commons is to continue to be relevant to the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, a few families speak French in my riding. Generally speaking, this is rather rare in southwestern Ontario.

Those voters speak English as well, which makes communication with them easier for me.

However, like many English-speaking Canadians, I wish to learn French, to show in as positive a way as possible that I accept the accomplished fact that we live in a bilingual country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cullen: Thanks to the encouragement and the valuable help of the Quebec caucus, of my colleagues, and the members of the Progressive Conservative, New Democratic and Créditiste parties, I hope, as other students do, that we will become increasingly bilingual.

Several persons have asked the members of English-speaking ridings why they wasted their time learning French, two sessions a week in the case of total immersion courses—the weeks of total immersion in Saint Jean, in Hull or in Ottawa—and this even during the holidays.

Mr. Speaker, we believe that English-speaking members have the duty to spread this idea of bilingualism in Canada.

We reject those who try to divide us, especially at a time when English-speaking Canadians are becoming aware of their responsibilities in recognizing a bilingual Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cullen: That is how we co-operate. It may not be much, but we feel that it will be of benefit to the country as a whole.

I apologize to my teachers for my errors in vocabulary, pronunciation and my halting delivery. However, and that is what counts most, I thank them for giving me the opportunity of taking a step forward.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, this is a time of great affluence in our society and, surprisingly enough, times of affluence create as many problems as arise in any other period. The dangerous psychology of our times has been characterized by one writer as "the revolution of rising expectations". So, the man with one car wants, and expects, two; the man with the television set looks to the time when he will possess a colour set; the family which lives in an apartment is looking forward to owning its own home. And the psychology of the period gives these people every encouragement to expect that these ambitions will be realized. Those who are in positions of power within corporations, those who can decide upon prices and dividends to be paid upon shares, as well as those members of unions which have the strength to bargain collectively, share in the affluent society and this feeds their "revolution of rising expectations. But we in this House have a special obligation to look after those who do not belong to unions, those who do not have the power of the corporate structure behind them but who yet must live in today's affluent society.

That is why this government, along with every member of this House, has a genuine concern for the aged, for pensioners living on a fixed and all too inadequate income, for the government's own retired civil servants who deserve better than they are getting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cullen: We must look, also, to the position of the veterans who lost many years when they could have been gainfully employed; to the veterans' widows and to those veterans who, though they returned, returned less capable of looking after their own needs than would have been the case had they not volunteered to serve their country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cullen: This has become almost a trite phrase but it bears repetition: government has an obligation to help those least able to help themselves. Government also has an obligation to fight pollution, to help find and construct housing, to protect the unwary consumer and to be constantly alert to the need for changes in the Criminal Code so as better to reflect the kind of protection required by present day society.

Government also has an obligation to recognize regional disparity in this country—and we acknowledge the need to cope with that problem. Our proposed Indian policy establishes guidelines for debate, negotiation, compromise and decision. We recognize the sores of national disunity and we must find a panacea for this sickness. We are all disturbed to find "la belle province" becoming "the bellicose province". Each ministry has its own obligation to meet the needs of the people of Canada. Some of the measures necessary will be popular and some will be unpopular but ultimate responsibility rests with the ministry to initiate the kind of legislation which in its opinion best copes with the situation facing Canada.

In English, and in somewhat halting French, I have endeavoured to express some points of view which I feel we in this House should be pondering. We have a new session before us, a throne speech outlining the government's proposals, a program welcoming—yes, demanding—scrutiny and constructive criticism by opposition parties. With the government's lead, with the opposition's criticism and assistance, and with conduct becoming this chamber, we can do that which is good for Canada.

I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau):

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Hon. Roland Michener, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, the best time, the richest, the most promising, is the present.

[Mr. Cullen.]

These words probably were spoken before, but I can say that for me today, their meaning and scope goes beyond any description.

Does this mean that I misunderstand the meaning of the mandate that was entrusted to me? Not at all!

[English]

As a matter of fact, I am quite positive that I will succeed in giving you the impression that I have passed the illusion stage and that the opportunity given to me by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to second the motion for an Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne is not based on my personal merit but instead on the great importance of this part of the country that I represent and in which I am so proud to live.

[Translation]

The history of this part of Canada has been written by Mgr. Victor Tremblay and I hope you will allow me to mention distinctive features, since it is of the utmost importance to know one's country well and to make it well known to those by whom we want it to be loved.

This vast region is made up of four areas: Abitibi, North Shore, Saguenay and Lac St. Jean, which are complementary and form a region of their own, with its distinct character, and an interesting section of Canada as a whole.

The word "Saguenay", meaning "gushing water", is the oldest and most genuine in the Canadian toponymy.

[English]

The name Canada, according to history, appears to have been adopted just a few days after the name Saguenay. It is significant and interesting to note that the "Canada" designated at that time was the small area of the country which is today the city of Quebec and its surroundings.

[Translation]

The Saguenay region is part of the massif known as the Canadian Shield which is made up of rocks derived from the most ancient structures of the earth's crust.

Its history spreads over more than four centuries; it starts with that of our Canadian homeland of which it is one of the forgotten pearls.

It was discovered at the same time as Canada and was first a settlers' land, but, in view of its enormous water resources, which today produce nearly 12 million horse-power, and its vast forest, big industry has settled there.

Logging operations are one of the biggest industries in the Saguenay, and this has been so for 130 years. Its main production is pulp and paper, with an annual output of 735,000 tons.

Metallurgical operations began in the area with the building of the Arvida plants in 1926.

[English]

I feel the famous Saguenay blueberries are particularly noteworthy. Some say that two of those berries are enough to make a pie. Don't believe it! I know that a single one is more than enough.

We have a population of approximately 360,000 people. The greatest part of it is of French-Canadian origin and of Catholic faith; it numbers more than 5,500 Indians. Needless to say, our people have their qualities and their shortcomings: and among those one can mention their honesty, their frankness, their sense of duty, their generosity and their sense of beauty.

Mr. Speaker, I should like here, if I may, to express my regard and my friendship for all the electors of the constituency of Lapointe whom I represent here, and who possess more than anyone the precious qualities I have just mentioned. Believe me, I feel it is a privilege to live among citizens so prominent and so aware of their responsibilities.

In my constituency, which comprises namely Arvida, the aluminum city, and the county town of Jonquière-Kénogami, pilot projects and achievements in the educational and cultural fields have always found a fertile environment, for the people are dynamic, alert and creative.

Five years ago, 30 English-speaking and 30 French-speaking Canadians set up a country-wide, nonpolitical and independent organization—a Canada Committee—whose aim is to promote Canadian unity. Its members are very active in my region.

We also have a memorial centre which was built during centennial year and which is in fact a well patronized regional cultural centre. The federal government shared the construction costs and I hope it will participate in the centre's development because, even if our constitution puts education under provincial jurisdiction, culture has a much wider scope and does not know any provincial boundary. The federal parliament should be involved in this field as it is responsible for protecting and assisting the two main linguistic communities.

The Saguenay has its anthem which was composed in 1938, the words having been set to the music of "Silver Threads Amongst the Gold".

The Saguenay finally has its flag representing its four main resources.

Its vast forest, a source of economic activity, is represented by the colour green, symbol of its age.

The agricultural sector is represented by the colour yellow, symbol of the land which carries and produces life.

Grey stands for industry and trade.

The people, a strong and energetic breed, are represented, no doubt through a coincidence, by the colour red.

The feast-day of the Saguenay falls on June 11.

My majestic and adopted country—that is, my constituency of Lapointe—is not free from serious problems which, even though they exist elsewhere, do not reach such dramatic proportions.

Unemployment now stands at the alarming level of 14 per cent. Since the labour market cannot absorb the ever increasing number of those who want to join it, qualified workers must leave the area if they do not want to graduate as jobless or become dissenters who protest against an affluent society which denies them the right to earn a decent living.

Dairy production makes up an important part of our farming industry. Government policy in that field is therefore likely to have a deep impact and I am far from snapping my fingers at the criticisms voiced recently by several farmers.

Needless to specify that farmers have the right to live as everybody else and do not have to bear alone the economic problems caused by the marketing of their products.

Although I realize how complex those problems are, I nonetheless stress the necessity of finding prompt and effective solutions.

As practical suggestions, in the name of my constituents, I urgently ask:

1. That the Saguenay region be selected as one of the poles of growth essential to any planning. It is obviously essential and urgent to set up an economic substructure in my region.

I take the liberty at this stage of mentioning all the hopes which were raised by the establishment of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and of expressing on behalf of the people, the confidence placed in its head, the Hon. Jean Marchand, whose competence has been recognized for some time now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marceau: 2. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, subsidies ought to be granted to transportation companies, so as to make it possible for the products of our area to compete on the outside market.

3. Finally, one of the hopes of my people, in order to get over the serious economic difficulties they are facing, is to see our northern natural resources being developed and it is essential that access roads be built at once to James Bay with a view to developing the forest, mining and power resources available to us.

Such a project has been developed under the name of the "Vermilion Crescent" and it deserves the encouragement of the federal government through every means available.

In order to settle our economic problems, a body known as the Regional Economic Council has been set up in our area which is a valuable intermediary. I do think that through consultations with that agency, the government will be able to find quick and efficient solutions.

As I remember an expression which I heard somewhere: "man misses an opportunity rather than lack for one", I would feel remiss in my duty if I did not take now the opportunity to clear up a misinterpretation of the attitude and the behaviour of the people in my area.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier once said:

> Freedom would soon be but an idle word, were it to leave without any control those who wield power. Endless vigilance is the price of freedom. A nation eager to preserve its freedom should be Argus-eyed and always on the alert. Should it be caught off guard or weaken, every second of idleness will cost it a bit of its rights".

The people in the Saguenay area remember those famous words which serve them as a constant reminder. They are ready to fight and resort to all reasonable and legal means in order to preserve their freedom and identity.

Indeed as Rev. Lionel Groulx, the famous historian, said a long time ago:

> If French-speaking Canadians owe their country some special cultural duty or service, it is clear that it is neither as half-English nor as half-French that they will be of any use, except by admitting but one attitude on their part, that is to be fully themselves.

It is only normal to expect to find, in an area of this country inhabited by forward-looking French-speaking Canadians, a real and sincere alertness and awareness from those who are ready to co-operate, provided they are considered as first-class citizens.

It is undeniable that our people will no longer be satisfied with promises or even with efforts that will not give actual results.

While recognizing, of course, that there are extremists, I assert with certainty that they are not the majority and I say that many of them do not act in bad faith but are insufficiently informed, and the representatives of the people are very often to blame for that.

Besides, it is not for me to judge individuals since they are entitled to their personal opinions in so far as they do not conflict with the public interest.

In that part of the country where I live, 500 miles from Ottawa, there is a sound nationalist, that is not the kind which seeks to destroy and will not co-operate, but the kind which is much more preferable, the one that is identified with the conscious and constant effort of a consistant group which is irrevocably decided to assert its own identity and to make, as such, a real contribution to the whole of Canada.

In short, the spirit which inhabits my fellow-citizens as well as the great majority of French-speaking Canadians is that of an enthusiastic participation, but as equal partners, to the building of a Canada that could be the living and permanent representation of the two founding peoples.

Mr. Speaker, the people to whom I belong have achieved a degree of maturity that will enable them to make a choice inspired by reason and common sense and to check the emotional feelings that might cloud their judgment and jeopardize their safety and welfare.

It is obvious that the French-speaking Canadians of today are much nearer to reality while fully aware of the sacrifices made necessary by this new understanding. While ready to do their best in order to avoid splitting up and dividing Canada, they are also, more than ever, prepared to insure their survival and their fulfilment, whatever the price may be, were they to fail in securing, once and for all equal status and the acknowledgment of their rights, not only in theory but also in practice.

I would feel guilty, at this particular time, if I did not acknowledge the tremendous work done by our very active Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to insure the equality and justice rightly claimed by the French-speaking Canadians, though not at the expense of the English-speaking Canadians who are entitled, not only as a majority group but also as individuals, to our respect, our consideration for the priceless contribution they have made to the building and the preservation of our country.

[English]

May I also mention the co-operation of the ministers and of my colleagues in the Liberal party. Their attitude since the 1968 election has made a special contribution to the improvement of the relations between French speaking and English speaking Canadians. We must note that in Ottawa today French speaking Canadians are not strangers but citizens capable of playing a leading role in the conduct of the affairs of our vast country.

[Translation]

Moreover, I would not be true to my belief if I did not admit that several members of the opposition have given me a pleasant surprise because they seem so well-disposed towards the French-speaking Canadians to whom, so far, they were too often satisfied to ask simply: "What do the French Canadians want?"

To recognize the existence of others is already a promising start and augurs well for the future but this is not enough to insure the stability and unity of our country. We must reach, as fast as possible, the following stage which is that of genuine co-operation as equal partners.

Indeed, even if it is pleasant to admit that the general atmosphere which has prevailed in Ottawa for a year permits us to entertain serious hopes of maintaining our country in its present limits, all the people of good will must maintain their dialogue not only at the government level but also at the individual level.

This is certainly a challenge which can be taken up only by those who are courageous, dynamic and who really love their Canadian fatherland. Even if it is conceited and even impolite to quote oneself as an example, I do not hesitate to say that my constituents of Lapointe have done it successfully.

I shall certainly astonish quite a few people by disclosing that about 20 per cent of my constituents are not French-speaking; nonetheless, in no other place in Canada perhaps, are the relations better and the mood nicer and more serene, for while each group has preserved its own personality, we have all recognized the relevance of dialogue, co-operation, and respect for individual rights.

I would now like to point out the valuable contribution in that field of such companies as Price Brothers and Aluminum of Canada, who have succeeded in integrating and adapting themselves to our regional environment, where they play a prominent role.

Inspired by what seems to be the great majority of my constituents of Lapointe, and strongly urging people who are still hesitating, I unequivocally declare myself at one with those who are trying to bring about national unity, whatever the linguistic group to which they belong; I would be ashamed, indeed, to be among those who through cowardice, indifference or laziness, have accepted an office with the ulterior motive of working against the interests they are supposed to serve.

The goal of prime importance which is to preserve national unity while safeguarding the diversity of our country, should not be the exclusive concern of parliamentarians. We shall not be able to achieve it without the vigorous and considered participation of all Canadians, regardless of their origin.

I am particularly happy at this time to find that the throne speech mentions the government's intention to give the franchise to the young people of 18 years of age.

At a time when all good wills and all energies are needed, when young people are required to take their responsibilities and play a positive role in the future of our country, to live and behave like citizens, they should not be deprived any longer of the right to express concretely their approval or their rejection of their rulers, simply because a number of them are not completely reliable.

Since I had the honour to be co-chairman with my colleague for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) of a committee on the constitution, I shall take the liberty, before ending this statement, of setting forth briefly a few general principles on the problems raised at present by the Canadian constitution as I see them.

In principle, I am in favour of amending the constitution, provided that such amendments bring about a renewal and an adjustment of our federalism which is now less effective after being a hundred years in operation.

Canada needs strong federal and provincial governments which must all co-operate constantly.

The range of action of governments nowadays is so wide and problems are so numerous that there is no contradiction is using those words.

I think that the main reason justifying this balance is that personal freedom will likely be best preserved if neither level of government is able to arrogate itself any preponderant power over the citizen.

There must be a fair balance between those powers given to the federal government and those given to the provincial governments, keeping in mind that Confederation was made by the provinces and that anything that might weaken them or unduly increase the powers of the federal government would only worsen the situation and make impractical a new constitution containing any one of these trends.

Having been tested on this continent and increasingly accepted throughout the world at large, federalism, when jurisdictions are adequately distributed, seems to be the system which might ensure the greatest stability, a better co-ordination and a higher standard of living for a group of citizens who want to build up a country as huge as ours, while safeguarding their linguistic and cultural diversity.

We may well find ourselves writing a new page of Canadian history during this session.

[Translation]

I hope that we shall work together during this session, that it will be remembered as a decisive step towards the unity and prosperity of all Canadians through open and sincere co-operation by every representative of the people.

In order to refresh the memory of my colleagues, I would like to repeat the words spoken in 1905 by a famous conservative, the Honourable Thomas Chapais:

If need be, let us not fear to widen the scope of our political horizon. Let us always put our country before our party, our traditions before our alliances, our principles before our ambitions.

I just remembered the precious advice given one day by an English humourist to the Speaker:

[English]

Stand up to be seen, speak up to be heard, but sit down to be appreciated.

I conclude by saying, rather than singing, in order not to awaken those who might be dozing, the moving words taken from the refrain of a song that is too little known:

[Translation]

Canada has a heart bigger than its vast expanse.
Canada has a heart beyond its twenty million faces.
Canada is the heart of its town and country people.
The heart of Canada will win the world.

Mr. Speaker, it is therefore with great pleasure that I second the motion of my hon. friend, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

On motion of Mr. Stanfield, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale), the House adjourned at 3:50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF MOTIONS TO AMEND CUSTOMS TARIFF, EXCISE TAX AND INCOME TAX ACTS

Hon. H. E. Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Section 1 of Standing Order No. 60 I wish to lay on the table of the House copies in English and French of a notice of ways and means motion proposing amendments to the Customs Tariff and a consequential amendment to the Excise Tax Act. The notice of motion is substantially the same as that required for Bill C-212 of the last session which was given first reading by the House on June 27. Bill C-212 was based on the notice of motion in the budget speech of June 3.

[Translation]

I should like to table, pursuant to the same standing order, copies in French and in English of a notice of motion of ways and means to amend the Income Tax Act.

[English]

This notice of motion is the same as the one given on June 3 in connection with the budget speech and which was followed by first reading of Bill C-211.

Finally, I would like to ask the consent of the House to permit the material that I am now tabling to be printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings and to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of motions see appendix.]

DESIGNATION OF ORDER OF THE DAY TO DEBATE WAYS AND MEANS MOTIONS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 60(2) I should like to ask that an order of the day be designated for the consideration of the ways and means motions tabled this day.

Mr. Baldwin: Why not for next session too in case you don't get around to it?

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

ORDER OF REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR CONSENT TO INTRODUCE MOTION

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the House will recall the statement made by my colleague the Secretary of State in respect of the Company of Young Canadians. In view of the fact it has not been possible to give notice, I would like to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion for the purpose of establishing an order of reference for the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. The motion would be in the following terms:

> That the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts be empowered to consider and make a final report to the House, not later than December 5th, 1969, upon the legislative framework, organization, and operations of the Company of Young Canadians, and that, for the purpose of its inquiry, the committee be empowered to retain the services of counsel and to adjourn from place to place within Canada, and that the clerks, counsel, and the necessary supporting staff be authorized to accompany the committee.

As I indicated, unanimous consent would be necessary under the rules to introduce the motion at this time. I believe the context of the committee motion has been discussed in the various corners of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister have leave to introduce the motion at this time?

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, we do not desire to withhold consent, but I should like to say something when the motion is before the house. I think it would also be helpful if the minister had copies. I have seen a copy in the hands of a member for about two minutes, having looked over his shoulder, but I should like to have a copy of the motion if the minister has an extra one available.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Do I have unanimous consent?

Mr. Speaker: If there is agreement the motion will be put to the house and, of course, it will be open to hon. members to debate the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Company of Young Canadians

MOTION OF REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts be empowered to consider and make a final report to the House, not later than December 5th, 1969, upon the legislative framework, organization, and operations of the Company of Young Canadians, and that, for the purpose of its inquiry, the committee be empowered to retain the services of counsel and to adjourn from place to place within Canada, and that the clerk, counsel, and the necessary supporting staff be authorized to accompany the committee.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, normally we would have no objection and, as a matter of fact, would welcome terms of reference to a committee of the House to look into the legislative framework, the organization and operations of the Company of Young Canadians. For some time we have felt there is a need for an evaluation of the work of this organization and an examination of the Act, which is lacking in clarification on a number of points, as well as the need for a restructuring of the organization itself. Consequently we cannot object to the motion on those grounds.

However, I do wish to express my misgivings because the motion naturally is closely associated in the public mind with the statement made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) last Wednesday when he spoke of the fact that unsubstantiated charges of subversion had been made against the Company of Young Canadians. The public naturally will assume that the main task this committee will have before it will be to deal with the charges that have been made. The fact that in the motion before the House the committee is to be empowered to retain the services of counsel only strengthens my misgivings in that regard. If the committee is to look into the structure and legal framework of this organization and evaluate its work, then of course we will be very pleased to support it. But I do think we should express our fears that in the light of the statement of the Secretary of State and in the light of the fact that the committee is to be empowered to retain counsel there is every probability that the inquiry could escalate into a witch hunt.

If Mr. Saulnier, one of the persons who made these charges of subversion, is called and names names, those names will appear in the public press, and the person so named will have the right to appear before the committee. If Mr. Anthony Malcolm, the vice-president of the Quebec section of the Liberal Federation of Canada, is called to substantiate his charges that there are some 27 persons guilty of subversion, 18 of whom were or are members of the Company of Young Canadians, and certainly if he makes these charges before the committee, then the persons so named will be entitled to appear before the committee, and the House of Commons could find itself conducting a kangaroo court.

I am sure every member of the House is concerned about the question of subversion. There are two ways to deal with subversion. One is that if there is sufficient evidence that a person has been guilty of an illegal act he should be charged in the courts. If the person has not been guilty of an illegal act but has conducted himself in a manner unbecoming to an organization supported by public funds, he should be disciplined. If there is no provision under the Act for the executive director to discipline him, the government should ask the House to amend the Act to give the executive director adequate power. But I think a word of caution is necessary. We must remind ourselves that the House of Commons is neither a court of law nor an administrative tribunal. So far as our members on that committee are concerned they will do everything possible to try to see that a House of Commons committee is not used to do things which could more properly be done elsewhere.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) that the motion just introduced is in English only, not in French. Since it is generally agreed that all federal services should be bilingual, I think that the President of the Privy Council should have had his motion translated so we could read it in French.

As for the motion itself, I believe that most Canadians will be glad to see how promptly the government is prepared to appoint the committee due to report by December 5th on the activities and operations of the Company of Young Canadians.

Everyone knows about the charges that have been made, especially by Mr. Saulnier of Montreal and I think it is time the nation and, above all, that the Canadian Parliament be made aware of those dealings if they are indeed objectionable. We should be told of the charges laid down so that we may see if there are grounds for them in order not to finance subversion with the Canadian taxpayers' money.

It is high time for the Parliament to take a firm stand and I was pleased by the recent statement of the Secretary of State of Canada (Mr. Pelletier) and by that of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to the effect that subversion and terrorism must be ended, especially in the province of Quebec; the Ralliement Créditiste supports unconditionally the setting up in the earliest future of that committee which will report to us by December 5 next.

[English]

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, just before you put the motion there are one or two observations I should like to make. May I say first of all that I certainly support the reference of this matter to the committee, but I am afraid that it may entail great expense and another call on the taxpayers' money. I think that at the early stage of this investigation it is unnecessary to hire counsel. Counsel from the Department of Justice should be sufficient, at least to start with.

I also believe that the committee should not be given the authority to adjourn from place to place. I think it would be much more in line with the drive toward economy of the present government to subpoena the witnesses who are to be heard and have them come to Ottawa. Then all the meetings would be held here and Members of Parliament could attend those meetings as well as attend the House.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to what has been said regarding the establishment of this committee, and I make special reference to the observations of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales). Certainly the members of this party are always concerned about the amount of money that is to be charged to the taxpayers. On the other hand, I believe that at this stage the right to appoint counsel should be included. Whether or not counsel will be used will be largely determined, I believe, by the course the proceedings will take. I should like to say as an illustration that we will have an opportunity later this session to debate the report made last session by the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments, and that without the valuable assistance which counsel was able to provide to that committee it would have been impossible not only to put the report together as well and effectively as it was done but to buttress it with the precedents, citations and supporting evidence upon which it is founded.

I have never discovered any inability on the part of members of the house to put questions, and when the committee meets there is no doubt that the members of the committee will launch a searching inquiry. If matters come to light which may reflect on individuals, then I think the committee should be able to use the power which will hopefully be given to its members and engage counsel as and when it becomes necessary. I make that point, Mr. Speaker, to indicate the position that we take.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF BRIGADIER GENERAL ALBERT GUERISSE

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, before oral questions are called perhaps I might have the indulgence of the House to point out the presence in Your Honour's gallery of Brigadier General Albert Guerisse, Surgeon General of the armed forces of Belgium.

General Guerisse is well known to Canadians under his wartime code name of Pat O'Leary, when he was among the most outstanding leaders of the underground resistance movement in occupied Europe. As a prisoner in the infamous Dachau concentration camp his activities in the latter stages of the war resulted in saving the lives of many thousands of the prisoners in that camp.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—EFFECT ON WEST COAST PORTS—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister what action, if any, his government intends to take in connection with the strike that has paralysed all five seaports on the west coast?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to defer to the Minister of Labour. He is working on a solution to the strike now, and I have nothing to report.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the crippling effect the strike is having on the economy of British Columbia, involving the lay-off of over 2,000 people in the logging and mining industries, has the government considered any timetable with regard to the various alternatives before it? For example, has the government given consideration to legislation? If so, can the Prime Minister indicate to us what, if any, deadline the government has with regard to possible alternative actions, including actions at present being taken or resorted to by the Minister of Labour?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we are not anxious to introduce legislation to take away the right to strike from any labour movement when it has been given that right by Parliament. Therefore I have no comment to make.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the tie-up of 25 ships and the fact that the only problems remaining are non-wage, is it possible for the Prime Minister or whoever is reporting today on behalf of the Minister of Labour to state whether or not top officials from the office of the Minister of Labour have been sent to the west coast to try to bring the parties together in order to resolve this situation which, as I have said, does not involve wages?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we know this, the Minister of Labour knows it, and the House knows that he has been actively involved in finding a solution to this strike. He has found a way of moving wheat. He has not decided it is opportune for the House of Commons or the government at this stage to embark upon strike or lockout-breaking operations. This has been the position of the government and it remains the position of the government.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEEL PRICE INCREASES—INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that I am informed the Steel Company of Canada has just announced an increase of 6 per cent to 7 per cent in the price of steel, does the Prime Minister intend to have an investigation made of this increase either through the Prices and Incomes Commission or in some other way, particularly having regard to the fact that steel prices are usually the bellwether of the whole cost of living index?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The House knows, Mr. Speaker, that the government has no constitutional jurisdiction to fix wages. The problem of inflation is being acted upon by the government in many ways. The question of investigating price and wage increases has been referred to the Prices and Incomes Commission and it is part of their mandate to investigate such things as the hon. member mentions.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister made a Freudian slip when he said that the government had no authority to investigate wages. I am asking about prices and the relationship of those prices to increased productivity. Could I ask the Prime Minister if he can assure the House and the country that the Prices and Incomes Commission will be instructed to make an immediate investigation to see whether or not the price increase announced by the Steel Company of Canada is justifiable, and whether a report will be made to Parliament at an early date?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we set up the commission under its own authority so that it would not be answerable to the government for each of its actions. It has initiatives of its own and it has indicated that it will investigate the causes of inflation and, if necessary, will link a particular increase to both the wage and price structure. In this particular case the government does not intend to give specific instructions to the commission.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER SALES—CONTRACT WITH RUSSIA

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Has the government entered into any other contract for the sale to other countries of the surplus wheat from the West?

I should also like the minister to tell us, if possible, whether he has persuaded Russia to respect her undertakings of a few years ago concerning contracts signed with Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this question gives me the opportunity to say that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt, minister without portfolio, is now responsible to the House for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, could the minister responsible answer the question?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there have been announcements over recent months about specific sales of grain. There was an exchange in the House Wednesday concerning negotiations with the Soviet Union on the old and new agreements. The remark I made then was that it is not good practice to comment on discussions or negotiations which are, or are about to be, under way, so I have no comment to make about this matter.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the Minister without Portfolio.

The minister is probably not in a position to give us any details, because it would undoubtedly not be in the public interest, but can he give us some hope that the matter will be definitely settled?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the hon. member of my great and continuing optimism about this and all other subjects that I deal with.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

NORTHERN SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA—ASSISTANCE TO GROWERS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the very aggravated situation in northern Saskatchewan and northern Alberta because of weather conditions there, has the minister anything to offer to the House by way of some form of relief for those people with regard to last year's crop other than what is contained in the pot of political pablum disguised as a Throne Speech?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, it is at least one of the brighter facets of having a surplus of grain that those farmers who have not been able to harvest this year's crop are not as handicapped in filling quotas, with grain on hand from previous years, as they have sometimes been.

TRADE

SOVIET UNION—NEGOTIATIONS TO EXPAND

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question either to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or to the Minister without Portfolio. Is there under way any study or negotiations that will lead to some expansion of trade with the Soviet Union on a permanent basis so that the kinds of sales which have been made will continue on a regular and rational basis?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, the commercial agreement with the Soviet Union came to an end before the wheat contract itself came to legal termination last July, I believe. Our position is that we wish to clear the ground and come to the conclusion on the wheat aspects of our relations with the Soviet Union and then enter into negotiation on the renewal of the commercial agreement itself.

Mr. Gleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. My question to the minister really was whether negotiations are being conducted of a kind that will lead to a real expansion in trade between our two countries?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, my answer was quite clear when I said that we want to get the wheat aspect behind us before we become involved in further commercial negotiations with the U.S.S.R.

RATE OF INCREASE OF EXPORTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As Canada's export trade has been expanding at half the rate experienced by Great Britain, the United States and Japan and at one-third the rate experienced by the ten principal industrial countries of Europe, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House and country what steps he and his department plan to take to bring our rate of increase of exports at least up to the level of our principal industrial competitors?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will send copies of my recent speeches to the hon. member, for example, on the inauguration of the Export Development Corporation.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have read the minister's speeches and there is nothing in them to indicate that any steps at all are to be taken to increase our trade in any way whatsoever.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ACCIDENT ABOARD DESTROYER ESCORT "KOOTENAY"

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in the unavoidable absence of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence about yesterday's tragic accident aboard the Canadian Forces destroyer escort Kootenay. Before I ask my question perhaps I might be permitted to express to the next of kin of those who lost their lives and to the survivors who were injured the sympathy of the House generally and especially the sympathy of the subcommittee which visited this vessel just before it sailed. My question is: Has the minister anything further to report on this unfortunate accident? Specifically, what action has been taken to prevent any possibility of the recurrence of similar accidents on destroyer escorts?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first may I join with the hon. member in expressing our deep sorrow to the families affected by the accident. This unfortunate accident brings home to all of us the hazards and dangers which servicemen in the performance of their duties must face. This is not always appreciated. An investigation is under way into the accident. So far we do not have all the facts. I am told that it was a boiler room explosion. These accidents are likely to happen if something goes wrong, although we do not know exactly what went wrong. There is no further information on the matter except that the next of kin are preparing to be flown to the scene. We have had one request from next of kin that one victim of the accident be buried at sea. We have had no expression of requirements from other next of kin.

INDUSTRY

COPPER SHORTAGE—ACTION TO ASSIST CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the shortage of copper being experienced by the Canadian fabricating industry, can the minister say when he will take steps which on April 1 of this year he said he would take in this eventuality?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is some confusion in this matter which I should like to rectify if I may. In April last I tried to prevent the drain of copper from Canada, as a result of the higher price available for it on the London Metal Exchange.

I asked Canadian producers to take care of their usual Canadian clients at the North American price. I more or less froze the situation at that time, and this action is still very much valid.

The present situation is different. Because a strike is taking place I am now asked by some people to force Canadian companies not affected by the strike to drop their usual foreign clients and to sell copper here in Canada on a temporary basis, presumably, at prices lower than those they are obtaining now in foreign markets at a time when copper is available in Canada at the higher price.

So this is an entirely different situation, and I do not think the reference to my April 1 statement in the present circumstances is justified.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Whether or not the minister likes the reference to his April 1 statement, will he, in view of the serious situation and the unemployment being created by this condition, look into it further and make a statement to the House next week?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, this is a most difficult situation. I sympathize with the employees of Canadian copper user companies as well as the Companies. The Companies have to pay the higher prices. At the same time I must try, I think, to preserve the reputation of Canada as a dependable exporter. I am weighing the advantages and disadvantages of both sides of the dilemma, but in the present situation I think we had better not mess around with present patterns of distribution of copper. I am not saying, however, that there will not come a time, if the strike does not end, when the Canadian government will not have to intervene in the way that is being suggested at present by some. Let us hope the strike will end soon.

Mr. Desmond Code (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is he giving consideration to amending the copper export regulations so that Canadian scrap copper will be retained in Canada to help to relieve the shortage of copper which is causing the lay-off of thousands of Canadian workmen?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know I have a very wide range of responsibilities but I do not think copper is one of them.

LABOUR RELATIONS

SUDBURY, ONT.—REQUEST FOR INTERVENTION IN NICKEL STRIKE

Mr. Gaétan J. Serre (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Does the Minister intend to make representations to the competent authorities in order to settle that strike which has been going on in Sudbury for more than three months?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think that the answer given by the Prime Minister a few minutes ago about the strikes on the Western Coast also applies in this case.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMUNIST CHINA—OPPORTUNITY TO DEBATE RECOGNITION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the House will have the opportunity to have a debate on the recognition of Communist China in the first part of this session.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly have no objection if the opposition would like to raise this matter on one of their allotted days.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since this matter could be very important, does the minister not think that the government might be persuaded to add one of its own days to the debate so that we can have two days to discuss the matter?

Mr. Sharp: Of course, Mr. Speaker, the matter could also be debated during the present debate.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CHURCHILL, MAN.—OUTLINE OF DEPARTMENTAL EMPLOYMENT REQUIREMENTS

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. However, since the same question would also be of interest to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, perhaps I might direct it to both ministers. Would they consider making available to the residents of Churchill, Manitoba, as quickly as possible a comprehensive outline of their departmental employment requirements at Churchill for the next year or two? I ask this because the United States has seriously curtailed its research projects at Churchill.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the implications of the conditions that have arisen at Churchill. As the hon. member knows, we foresaw some of them. We have had discussions with the former government of Manitoba as well as with the present government. The acting premier of Manitoba is coming here next week and we will go into the situation further at that time. I am happy to tell the House that both the previous and the present governments of Manitoba have accepted a share of responsibility with respect to Churchill, which is very encouraging indeed. We will work something out, and I hope that subsequently we shall be able to make a statement that will clarify the situation about which my hon. friend is concerned.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF BOARD

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Bearing in mind the latest figures for traffic accidents in Canada which, according to the latest release, show that 5,000 Canadians are killed every 12 months and 150,000 injured, what consideration is being given by the minister to implementing the decision of his predecessor to set up a public board to concern itself with all matters affecting traffic safety?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the government is of course, as much concerned as my hon. friend about the carnage on the highways. There will be a bill introduced very shortly having to do with auto safety. I had one federal-provincial conference with the ministers concerned in the ten provinces and will be having another in a few weeks. If it appears that a board of some kind on a permanent basis offers the best solution to this problem, we will be happy to consider its implementation.

POLLUTION

HARMAC PULP MILL—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. What action has the minister taken with regard to the massive pollution of the waters adjacent to the Harmac Pulp Mill in British Columbia by the spillage of chemicals which took place last Tuesday night?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we have our fisheries protection officers on the spot. We are assessing what damage is being done to the fisheries. We are in close touch with the company involved.

Mr. Hogarth: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister please inform the house whether this mill is still operating while these investigations are taking place?

Mr. Davis: The mill is still operating, but the spill in question has been brought to an end.

JET AIRCRAFT—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister prepared to introduce legislation during this session to outlaw the unnecessary and dangerously increasing form of air pollution caused by jet aircraft? I ask this question because the Ontario Minister of Energy and Resources has asked the federal government to take action to outlaw pollution caused by jet aircraft, particularly at the Toronto international airport, and also because seven United States airlines are now proving they have the technical capacity to remove such air pollution—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should not support his question by a speech.

[Mr. Mather.]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member laid so much groundwork I am not sure I got the point. In any event, I want to say we are having discussions with the airlines. Whether we have the federal competence to deal with this matter I do not know, but we are certainly prepared to take steps to whatever extent we can to alleviate this admitted problem.

UNITED NATIONS

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF INFORMATION CENTRE

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of today being United Nation's day and also in view of the fact Canada is the only one of more than 50 senior members of the United Nations which does not have a United Nations information centre, will the minister inform the house whether the establishment of such a centre might be in his plans, particularly in view of the increased emphasis on international development on a multilaterial basis by the United Nations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a suggestion I will be very happy to take into consideration. As the hon. member knows, it is one of the principal aims of the present government to renew the United Nations and the confidence of the world in it, but it is not simply a matter of establishing an information centre. I believe some fundamental reforms have to made in the United Nations itself before there will be the necessary degree of confidence.

SHIPBUILDING

EXTENSION TO OTHER VESSELS OF STEEL SHIP CONSTRUCTION SUBSIDY

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is with respect to the reply he gave me on Wednesday at page 11725 of Hansard concerning the progress of the Robertson inquiry. I believe the minister was a little too enthusiastic and optimistic in the excitement of the commencement of parliament. Would he like to rephrase his answer now? Will he make a determination to do something about shipbuilding?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I apologize. I was indeed too optimistic. May I explain that a committee was formed. We are paying for the chairman of the committee. We are providing staff support to the committee, the members of which are the leaders of the shipbuilding industry.

Good will and good intentions do not bring about an instant solution. The committee soon realized the extreme complexity of the situation. They are now asking me to provide consultant services, $100,000 worth. I have agreed to that because of the importance of the matter. This is now before Treasury Board. They have also asked that the vice-chairman be paid. I am not as sympathetic here as I was on the matter of consultant services.

VIOLENT DEMONSTRATIONS

MONTREAL—ADEQUACY OF FEDERAL PREVENTIVE MEASURES

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister in connection with a statement made yesterday by the president of the Montreal Executive Council to the effect that the protective measures offered by the federal authorities in the Montreal region are insufficient at the present time. Could the right hon. Prime Minister say if it is true that the protection offered by the federal government is inadequate in Montreal in emergencies such as those that happened recently, and what corrective measures the government intends to take?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would need to see the exact content of the statement made by the Executive Council Chairman of Montreal. As far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, we find, on the contrary, that the support given by the Federal Government in such circumstances is very much to the point, and during the events that occurred in recent weeks, when the Royal Mounted Police and even some Canadian Army units have entered into action to support the civilian authorities as soon as the request had been made, prove that point.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question addressed to the Minister of National Defence.

Did the Executive Council of Montreal inform the minister or request his assistance when the troubles developed in Montreal?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): A request was made for assistance, Mr. Speaker, but it did not come from the Executive Council Chairman, but from the Attorney General of the Province as is required by law.

[English]

CPR SHOPS, MONTREAL—LAY-OFFS OF SKILLED EMPLOYEES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has his attention been brought to the large scale lay-offs of skilled employees in the CPR shops in Montreal? If so, will the minister indicate whether something can be done to alleviate the difficulties?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): The answer to the first part is no, Mr. Speaker, but I will be glad to follow up on the request.

FISHERIES

SEALS—AGREEMENT WITH OTHER COUNTRIES RESPECTING KILLING

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the recent announcement by the minister which brought to a halt for the coming season the killing of harp seals within Canadian territorial waters, I ask the minister whether, so the purpose will not be negated, any action has been taken or any decision reached with other countries with respect to an agreement regarding offshore Canadian waters so that his policy will not be killed by other countries?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, our recent announcement to ban the killing of very young baby white coat seals did not ban the killing of older seals in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. In respect to international relations, we have had several meetings with the other country principally involved, Norway, and we are still endeavouring to establish a quota in international waters in the north Atlantic. In the meantime, pending the establishment of such a quota the hunt will continue as it has always done in those international waters.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): In view of the impact this measure will have on the inshore fishermen on the south coast of Newfoundland as well as fishermen of the Magdalen Islands, Prince Edward Island and the Gaspé Peninsula, has the minister reached a decision on what action will be taken to ease the economic hardship his new measure will impose upon these inshore fishermen?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there will be economic hardship in that the total number of seals will be the same and the value of the pelts of the older seals may be as much as twice as great as that of the price of the pelts of the white coats which have been killed traditionally in these areas.

MILK—ALLEGED FAILURE TO PAY SUBSIDY TO CERTAIN PRODUCERS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Many farmers from the province of Quebec complain that they did not receive any subsidy for the production of milk since last June. Could the minister tell the house why such payments were withheld from farmers?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there has been no refusal to make these payments to the farmers who are entitled to receive them. If the hon. member will provide me with the name and, preferably, the account number of any producer who was entitled to but did not receive his subsidy, I will look into it.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

INTEREST RATES—REPRESENTATIONS TO COMMITTEE BY LABOUR

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. member for Gatineau in his capacity as chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Will the hon. member advise the House whether the committee, in its deliberations and investigation into interest rates, will obtain the testimony of representatives of labour groups?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would not think that the question as asked is in order. Questions dealing with the actual discussion and debate in a committee cannot be asked in this way at this time.

[Mr. Crouse.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—PLANNED WITHDRAWAL FROM INTERNATIONAL CONTROL COMMISSION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Have any countries objected to Canada's plan to withdraw from the International Control Commission in Viet Nam, and is the government's decision in this regard based upon the belief that our participation in the commission does not do anything toward advancing peace in that country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I ought to begin by making it clear that we are not withdrawing from the International Control Commission. We are, however, considering withdrawing personnel from two of the missions, in Vientiane and Phnom Penh, but they will be serviced from the commission in Viet Nam. There may indeed be some personnel left in those posts, but not from External Affairs.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether or not this withdrawal is being carried out in agreement with similar policies of other members of the I.C.C.?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the withdrawal of personnel from these two posts is being made through consultation, but I hardly expect that there would be full agreement.

SHIPBUILDING

SUGGESTED AWARDING OF CONTRACT TO SECOND LOWEST TENDERER

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): I should like to address this question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that all shipbuilding yards in Canada are facing difficulty because they do not have work, and since the government is going to award a contract for the building of two ferries, would the Prime Minister consider giving the second lowest tenderer the job of building one of these ferries in order to help out over a very difficult period?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce did indicate that this whole subject was under review and that he was assisting the interested parties in conducting this review in the best possible way for Canadians. I cannot add anything to that at this time.

HOUSING

PROVISION OF MORE MONEY BY FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of housing. What steps has the minister taken, either persuasive or legislative, in regard to financial institutions contributing more money to the housing field to relieve the housing crisis?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that the way the question is phrased is an invitation to the minister to give a statement which normally should be made on motions. Perhaps the question should be rephrased.

Mr. Gilbert: Then I will rephrase my question and ask the minister whether he has made any representations to the financial institutions to contribute more money to the housing field to meet the housing crisis?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, we are in almost weekly communication with representatives of the lending institutions. I might say that they have performed fairly well this year and that we will be reaching housing starts somewhat in excess of 200,000. We are in constant discussion with the lending institutions as to their plans for next year.

Mr. Gilbert: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What steps has the minister taken to reduce high interest rates, and is he considering interest subsidies and rent supplements to meet the present situation?

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister agree to make a statement on motions concerning urban renewal?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will give that consideration.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STEPS TO PREVENT IMPORT OF U.S. DIETETIC FOODS CONTAINING CYCLAMATE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I ask this question in view of the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare on the phasing out of the use of cyclamate in diet foods in Canada. What steps is the minister now taking to ensure that United States produced dietetic food products containing cyclamate, which are to be banned in the United States by February, will not be allowed to flood our market prior to the Canadian dead line?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I confess that I was not involved myself in this matter. I will ascertain whether I should have been. I will find out whose ministerial responsibility it is—I presume it comes mainly under Health and Welfare—ascertain what is being done and report to the House.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF TRANSPORT CONTROLLER

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt. In view of the renewed difficulty being experienced at many prairie points in obtaining boxcars for grain shipments, and in view of the fact that the new block system of grain movement is still only in the early stages of introduction, is consideration being given to the appointment of a transport controller to deal with some of the current difficulties?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): No, Mr. Speaker. The block system is proving to work very efficiently indeed. It is now hoped that the blocks will be completely in effect throughout Alberta and Saskatchewan by the end of December and in the rest of the region before the opening of the navigation season. In view of this circumstance I think good progress is in fact being made in this area of transportation.

Mr. Burton: A supplementary question. Although the block system does have some merit, it still will not deal with some of the difficulties that are being experienced. Could the minister enlighten the House as to other measures that are being considered in order to deal with the problem of grain movement?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it seems that I may have—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that he is asking for a general statement that ought to be made on motions.

Mr. Burton: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POWER

MINAS BASIN—COMPLETION OF STUDY

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when he expects the Minas Basin power feasibility study to be completed and possibly made available to the public?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have no immediate information in that regard, but I will take the question as notice and inform the hon. member as soon as possible.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INUVIK—PROVISION OF ELECTRIC, SEWER AND WATER SERVICES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I should like to address my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Why have the Indian and Eskimo people living in the northern part of Inuvik, a townsite which was constructed to serve these people, been denied electric, sewer and water services while the federal civil servants living in the other half of the town have long enjoyed these services?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member just said is not accurate. Many Indians and Eskimos may avail themselves of services in Inuvik. Unforunately, some of these people are not receiving them, because there is a population explosion in the Northwest Territories, due to the good management and the development of that region.

[English]

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question. Since the minister has tried to indicate that very few have been denied, why has the loan of $2 million which has been applied for by the town not been granted by the federal government? This is the $2 million that is required to provide these sewer, water and electric services.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this. I shall inquire and be pleased to reply to the hon. member next week.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister tell the House whether there are any white people living in Inuvik who do not have the opportunity to use the light, water and sewer services?

Mr. Chrétien: I do not know, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF FISHING BASE AT ST. PIERRE—INQUIRY AS TO CONSULTATIONS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Have any consultations been held between officials of France and Canada over the announced intention of France to set up a large Common Market fishing base at St. Pierre, in view of the impact that such a move would have on the Atlantic Economy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if such discussions have taken place I am unaware of them, but I will make inquiries.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question. I would appreciate a report as soon as possible. Since these ships would be operating from a French base—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY AS TO ABANDONING OF INCENTIVE PROGRAMS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the statement made two days ago that the interdepartmental review of industrial incentives is now complete, can the minister say whether existing programs promoting industrial research and development will be abandoned and, if so, which ones?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker; we are just improving upon them. This review is now the object of a recommendation to Treasury Board, and in due course I will make the necessary announcement.

NAVIGATION

MACKENZIE RIVER—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Public Works consider making a statement in the House concerning the state of navigation on the Mackenzie River, the difficulties experienced by the Northern Transportation Company in moving the ever-increasing volume of freight, and the fact that moneys are being denied for the necessary dredging to clear the river?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member probably knows, we have been pre-occupied with this problem recently. I would not mind making a statement on it. We intend to do major dredging of the river. We have a difficult situation there because of the filling of the dam on the Peace River. In addition, we have had the misfortune of a year when precipitation has been low. The result is that the water in the Mackenzie River is—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that this statement should be made on motions.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PATROLLING OF ARCTIC WATERS

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether the Canadian government is having regular patrols made of Canadian Arctic waters and, if not, why not?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, that is a very difficult question. We do not make a regular patrol, but to demonstrate why not would involve making a long speech.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Jack Cullen for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think I can speak on behalf of all members of the opposition when I say it is pleasant to be back on Parliament hill and once again become somebody, having been dismissed as nobody when we were last here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: You may not manage.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) upon his address to the House yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: If I may presume to say so, he spoke well and effectively, so effectively indeed that when he was speaking about things the government ought to consider very seriously he seemed to drive the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) from the House. Perhaps that was purely coincidental.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) most sincerely on the way he has put forward his point of view.

Some of his ideas on the course that this administration should follow deserve serious consideration. Although far from supporting all he has said, I still realize, as he does, that he represents, for his party and for his constituency, an asset of which they can justly be proud.

[English]

I should like to congratulate the two new Ministers without Portfolio, both from Ontario, who have been appointed by the government and also the two new parliamentary secretaries. I wish them every success. I think it is sufficient to say that in all cases the promotions were well-deserved. However, I must point out again that there are as yet no parliamentary secretaries from New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta.

The country expected, or was led to expect a more extensive shuffle in the cabinet than actually took place—at least judging from newspaper stories which appeared to be rather inspired at the time. They predicted something more drastic. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) apparently could not bring himself to do this. May I just say to those who lost out this time, speaking from long experience both in the opposition and government, everybody cannot win all the time.

I must also extend a rather rueful congratulation to the government for having discovered the National Parole Board. The Parole Board has for some ten years or more escaped being touched by political patronage. Suddenly somebody, apparently of the East Block entourage, decided that the Parole Board would be just the place to put a couple of retired Liberal warhorses at $23,000 per annum each.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in criticizing the Speech from the Throne, I do not want to exaggerate. I want to be fair and I want to admit that there was one thing new. In each of the preceding 101 years of Canadian nationhood under the leadership of both parties the speech referred to His or Her Majesty's government. The speech we are now discussing refers simply to the government. This is, of course, a much more elegant method of expression and obviously establishes a very special identity for Canada. At least, it spares Her Majesty the embarrassment of association with a Speech from the Throne which reveals so little commitment to helping the ordinary people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: The Canadian people as well as the members of this house could be forgiven if, after the first reading of the throne speech, they regard it as some sort of a clever put-off. But what is most alarming to me is that the government itself takes the document seriously as a Speech from the Throne, and that it actually believes this empty speech is an adequate way for Canada to enter the decade of the 1970's.

There is sort of a special literary quality to the Speech from the Throne. It reads as though it were written by a committee at a cocktail party, such a genteel cocktail party that it recognized the need for establishing a national committee on law reform but was content to consider the question of poverty in Canada at some future date.

The government, sir, is running this country as though it were a private club with a very exclusive membership. If you are poor you do not count. If you are an Indian you are shipped off to the provinces to be looked after. If you are unilingual you run an elevator. If you want to stop the slaughter in Biafra or maintain an effective role in NATO you are not sophisticated enough for the tight little Canada this government foresees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: From the first days of this administration, I have been alarmed most by the apparent determination of the influential members of the cabinet to try to fit the people and the problems of Canada into a predetermined mould and to ignore or ridicule those uncomfortable realities which do not fit the preconception. Professor Abraham Rotstein put it very succinctly in the October issue of the Canadian Forum. I would like to quote him:

> The Prime Minister's anti-nationalism is well known, but not so apparent is the classical liberalism out of which this derives and how that shapes his basic outlook. A man of many sides claiming a pragmatic approach to politics, he is the most deeply ideological of Canadian prime ministers. This surfaces rarely, but when it does in an unguarded moment of candour, the statement may be a revelation (even after the P.R. types have rushed in to set the statement 'in context'). The most famous of his personal cris de cœur is the query to the western farmers, 'Why should I sell your wheat?' It is the perfect embodiment of the ethos of the market economy —it expresses the P.M.'s personal sense of the rightness of things economic. It is worth reflecting on how "deep-seated a commitment it would require to wash out even momentarily, seventy-fire years of the history of the Canadian West—the wheat pools, the battle around the Winnipeg grain exchange and finally the Canadian Wheat Board itself!
> The new policy toward Canadian Indians provides a second case. The attempt to have Canadian Indians 'sink or swim' in five years is reminiscent only of the Poor Law Reform Act of 1834—the pivotal legislation for the creation of a free labour market in England's emergent laissez-faire economy. To be told further, as we have been, that one section of Canadian society cannot form treaties with another section, is to wash out in an instant, another two hundred years of Canadian history. The valuable civil rights legislation of the last session of Parliament, in itself a great achievement, rounds out the picture. The cast of mind is unmistakably that of classical liberalism. Despite the P.M.'s personal motto—la raison avant la passion—he himself expresses the triumph of the ideological passion, not only over reason but over history as well. This stance is his personal privilege, but in the circumstances it is also the country's burden."

The former minister of transport, now the member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), established in our minds a similar fear when he remarked on the inability of the influential members of the cabinet to understand the real problems of the Canadian people. The throne speech confirms that fear because it is largely irrelevant to those millions of Canadians who, for one reason or another, need the help of Ottawa. It is largely irrelevant to those millions more whose prosperity and progress depend upon the leadership of the federal government in meeting the economic and environmental hazards of a new decade.

We will be hearing from the Prime Minister no doubt this afternoon, and I hope he will take the opportunity to fill in some of these gaps and reassure us by bringing forward programs that were not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne dealing with the very real and genuine problems of our people.

There are so many respects in which needs must be met. As a high priority we must adjust, ought to adjust, the old age security and other pensions to relate them more realistically to the increase in the cost of living. A 2 per cent ceiling on the cost of living adjustment is absurd when inflation has been more than 4 per cent for the past several years. We are talking here about people who are unable to help themselves. Surely, it is wrong for us to expect them to bear the burden of inflation or bear the burden of governmental anti-inflationary policies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Of course action should be taken in respect of the serious situation relating to public service pensioners whom the government seems to shuffle to the bottom of the pile year after year. I was led to believe we would see some action taken in connection with a federal minimum wage. There is no mention of this in the Speech from the Throne. I hope the Prime Minister will be prepared to correct this situation. The government ought to recognize fully the urban fact of Canada. A way must be worked out with the provinces so that the cities can be involved fully in the discussions because clearly their responsibilities become more demanding each year and they become more responsible each year for the living environment of an increasing number of Canadians. We, ourselves, put forward at least a dozen specific recommendations in connection with housing, but the government seems to prefer to stand still. Urban renewal, important to the renovation and the whole environment of our cities, has for the most part been put in a deep freeze and yet the Speech from the Throne seems to contemplate this situation with great confidence.

Surely, the government of Canada should give an example to the Canadian Council of Resource Ministers in working out a strategy in respect of every aspect of our renewable and unrenewable resources and in working out a development plan for the various regions of the country so that the provinces and municipalities can proceed with them. The members of my party suggested something similar to a meeting of the Council of Resource Ministers, a meeting in connection with human resources.

There seemed to be a great deal of complacency in the Speech from the Throne with regard to the educational opportunities and the financial abilities of the proper authorities to support an adequate opportunity for education for young Canadians today. Whatever became of the excellent concept behind the Department of Manpower, which seems to be starving from lack of attention and interest on the part of the cabinet as a whole? What indication is there in the Speech from the Throne with regard to the recognition of the importance of establishing priorities in this country?

There is an urgent need for the setting up of a central agency to co-ordinate and lead the fight against all forms of pollution. The water act by itself is quite inadequate. We ought to have a real attack on the problems of our various industries rather than the sort of gesture contained in the Speech from the Throne toward agriculture. This is not the sort of thing the people involved in these industries expected. For example, it seems to be more and more widely accepted that unless a young man inherits a farm it is now very difficult for him to get into agriculture or farming in a viable way. Is this an acceptable situation to this government? Surely, it is not beyond the ability of this government to propose measures, in co-operation with the provinces, which would enable those interested in agriculture, and those qualified to do so, to get into agriculture in a viable way rather than be faced with the present situation in which it seems to be impossible for them to do so unless they should inherit a viable farm.

There are literally dozens of opportunities for federal interest and action and dozens of areas where action is needed. I hope the Prime Minister will take the opportunity this afternoon to fill some of the very great gaps which exist in the Speech from the Throne, because as it reads it is so cold that it is bound to be a keen disappointment to parliamentarians on all sides of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: It amounts to a notice that we have been summoned here to process a good deal of legislation but will not be asked at this session to confront many of the most urgent problems facing the people of Canada. But if the throne speech is a disappointment to parliamentarians on all sides of the House, it is an even keener disappointment to those Canadians who voted for the government in the belief that it had some commitment to social justice and that it wanted to change lives as well as change laws.

• (12:20 p.m.)

The government has exhibited the same cold detachment when groups or regions in special need have sought help from it. Pensioners have received neither help nor encouragement; farmers trapped by an emergency have been treated to rather special lectures delivered on a tour, and persons seeking housing have been told that there is no crisis, while the 20 per cent of our population who live below the poverty line have still apparently made no impression upon this comfortable cabinet of Canada.

A correspondent of the Montreal Star, Mr. W. A. Wilson, wrote the following on September 27:

> No member of Mr. Trudeau's cabinet could legitimately make a speech today outlining the social philosophy of the government for the simple reason that it has none. As time has gone by, this has become starkly clear and, with all that is good about the present administration, it is a shortcoming that we are likely to find overwhelming long before the next three years are over...

The government has made a great show of consultation. They have heard many people. It would be interesting to find someone to whom they have actually listened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: It would be interesting to find someone in the government caucus to whom the government has listened, not to mention the majority of the members of the cabinet.

There are a goodly number of young men on the government benches—I am referring particularly to those elected for the first time during the last session—who came to this house with a sense of commitment, wishing to be involved with the real problems of the people and wishing to get things moving. I wonder how those men feel today. The apologists of the government, and there are not as many as there were, argue that this is all part of a plan, a master strategy which devotes the first three years to planning and restraint and then bursts forth with a bright new image in 1972.

Mr. Baldwin: Like Napoleon retreating from Moscow.

Mr. Stanfield: Instead of a new image we need new action from the government, and this would certainly be something new. According to the apologists, it is all a matter of timing worked out by those omnipotent computers, just like the timing of the white paper on taxation which has been mistimed so often.

If the government is deliberately doing very little now so that it can come on strong in an election year, it is not worthy of office. The mandate of the government is for four years, not to sit tight and discuss things for three.

We needed a throne speech that would provide an agenda for action, and I hope the Prime Minister will give us his agenda for action this afternoon, in case we are misinterpreting the throne speech in some way. I hope he will give us a statement of priorities, a strong expression of the concerns of the federal government. Instead, it seems to be clear that the government intends to lead the house in discussion in the forthcoming year, according to the following statement:

> ...a systematic appraisal of Canadian society and of the basic principles that are to guide it.

How very elevating, but what a sour taste it must leave in the mouths of the poor, the underprivileged, the aged and the unemployed who have been waiting for the just society for 18 months and through two speeches from the throne. How sour a taste it must leave to be reassured now that the government is properly engaged in making sure that their telephones are not tapped. How disillusioning it must be to those, especially the young, who have been waiting for positive leadership and waiting for the government to develop the country physically and to develop our human resources.

There is not a word about over-all national development of our young and growing country. Of course, there is one statement in the Speech from the Throne, at page 10, to the effect that our resources are immense but they are not inexhaustible. The same might be said much more appropriately about the patience of the Canadian people. There is not a word expressing concern for the opportunity of Canadians to achieve an adequate education or attempt to ensure that financial resources are available to them. There is not a word regarding training opportunities for individual development. Instead, the following statement appears in the Speech from the Throne:

> The government regard national progress and individual fulfillment as indivisible components of its mandate.

That statement should certainly blow the minds of the electors at the shopping centres in the next election.

Mr. Hees: To the barricades!

Mr. Stanfield: What a disappointment it must be to those who were inspired 18 months ago by the rhetoric regarding a new international commitment.

I am sorry that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) is not in his seat now because I would like to speak quite frankly about this matter. The statements on international affairs are so weak that they must have been written by the minister himself. I should like to quote the following statement from page 3 of the Speech from the Throne: "we will continue to be an active member of the United Nations".

Some hon. Members: Hooray!

Mr. Stanfield: Who would have thought that the government's review of foreign policy would enable them to progress so far that they could make such a pregnant statement.

There is mention in the Speech from the Throne of the Canadian International Development Research Centre which was also mentioned in the last Speech from the Throne. Last year we could not get any clear idea about this project. All that was clear was that the government did not have a clear idea as to what it meant. I hope the idea is at least a little clearer in the minds of the government and that they will take an early opportunity to tell us about it. This is fine as far as it goes, but who are we trying to kid? What have we done recently of which we can be so proud? Now, we are going to tell other countries how to do it and how to go about it. We would be better received if, first of all, we developed a meaningful international development program of our own. Then, perhaps we could look other countries in the eye when we lecture them.

Mr. Hees: Such as France.

Mr. Stanfield: What recognition is there of the crisis in our cities? I have visited, as have others, areas in this country and parts of our cities that have been designated for urban renewal for years. For example, sections of the city of Toronto have been frozen for years and that city has been trying time after time to get a renewal development project accepted. What must be their reaction to the freeze in which urban renewal has been placed? What must be their reaction if they read the Speech from the Throne and saw that there was no real commitment in this area on the part of the government? What happened when the Prime Minister travelled in northern Ontario and was met by delegations asking to discuss their problems and the possible role of the federal government in solving them? A correspondent of the Toronto Star was present.

• (12:30 p.m.)

He wrote on September 30:

> A group of slightly nervous shipbuilding employees approached Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau in a Fort William hotel lobby at the week-end with a brief that said their jobs are being wiped out. Trudeau's—

Pardon the lack of proper respect to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, but I am just quoting this as it reads.

> Trudeau's jocular response as a former labour lawyer was:
> "Oh, I used to write briefs like this."
> The men were not particularly amused.
> Like people in communities across Northern Ontario visited by the Prime Minister at the week-end they were getting the old Trudeau cold shower treatment.
> When people brought him their problems, he turned them aside with grace and charm and usually gave them an engaging lecture on the philosophy of government.
> They found a leader who gave the impression of having tried everything and who had a healthy scepticism about the possibilities of changing anything very much...
> For a man who, according to his words in Geraldton, came to power to solve the generation gap, he offered what sounded suspiciously like a circumscribed old man's vision of the role of government.

I am afraid, Sir, this is what the throne speech reflects to me.

Last year when someone pointed out that there was nothing in the Speech from the Throne, the excuse was given that there were a great many left-overs from the previous year with which we had to deal. This year the government put out two excuses in advance for lack of content in the speech. The first was that there were still last year's left-overs, and in fact some left over from the previous year, and the second excuse was that the government were not in a position to make any new plans until they got the economy under control.

Under control, indeed! Under control after the way they have mismanaged it for years?

In 1965, and again in 1967, the government encouraged inflation. In 1968 they allowed it to get out of control. When he brought down his budget a year ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) thought inflation was almost under control. Certainly, he assumed the rate of increase would be far less than it turned out to be.

I notice the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) in his place in the House. It is almost two years since his department was introduced as the loyal watchdog for the Canadian consumers. As the watchdog has aged we have noticed, with some sadness, that it has no teeth and a very short leash.

What is happening today is what I tried to warn the House and the government against in the first speech that I made as a member of this House, and what I have warned against several times since then. They are trying to fight inflation by resorting to the deliberate creation of unemployment. May I again quote the distinguished correspondent of the Montreal Star, Mr. Wilson:

> Mr. Trudeau is deeply conscious that inflation hurts people. His greatest present need is to answer, as honestly as possible, two related questions: whose inflation pains he is seeking to ease, those of the strong or the weak? Deliberately caused unemployment is an economic weapon that falls upon the weak. It may be necessary to view the government organization as a plant that periodically requires trimming. It is then necessary to recognize that the secateurs are slicing through human flesh and blood.

Let there be no doubt this winter where the responsibility lies for high unemployment. The government is encouraging unemployment because they allowed inflation to run away for two or three years, because they were unwilling to try for voluntary guidelines in prices and incomes until very late in the day. Indeed, there is no sign today that the members of the government are giving the Prices and Incomes Commission any adequate support. In fact, the government seems to be leaving that commission to sink or swim on its own. Indeed, I have seen no effort on the part of the government to try to mobilize the Canadian people to support in every way possible the efforts of the Prices and Incomes Commission to reach some agreement on restraint, and certainly there is not the slightest indication in the Speech from the Throne, or in the government's policies, that they are prepared in any way to temper the winds of austerity to the shorn lamb.

The poor people of this country are those presently affected by this kind of program. Surely, we have not reached the point in this country where we have to leave them to bear the brunt without coming to their assistance, and at the same time be able to maintain an effectively vigorous fight against inflation?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Some of the members of the government are now behaving as if they discovered inflation. They say they have discovered the need to fight against inflation. Let me emphasize again, as forcefully as I can how the government ignored inflation for so long. All I ask them to do now is to support the program of the Prices and Incomes Commission, and to bring some succour to those poor people in Canada, those unfortunates affected adversely by the government's programs and who are unable to help themselves. Surely, this is not beyond the capacity of the government or beyond the capacity of the country.

Now, I would like to turn to another aspect of the just society. Last week the Prime Minister launched an attack on separatists in Quebec, upon governments in Quebec, and upon the C.B.C. for, unwittingly at least, aiding the cause of separatism. Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister stresses the need for national understanding and the need for rallying the country in the cause of federalism, I am with him. I am sure all members of my party are with him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: When he is fighting separatism in any part of Canada we are with him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: When he is discouraging violence in any part of Canada we are with him and we will support him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: When he emphasizes the probable economic damage to Quebec that is done by violence and an incipient threat of separatism, or at least by a good deal of talk about it, I agree with him. I think it is quite proper for him to bring this as forcefully as he can to the attention of any part of Canada that may be involved in this sort of thing—

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Where is the "but"?

Mr. Stanfield: I am surprised to find such cynicism on the part of the amiable minister across the way. I am sorry if it embarrasses the government to have me praise the Prime Minister. Our purpose is to be helpful on this question, on the great question of the constitution and the great question of our ability to live satisfactorily together in Canada.

Some members of the government, including the Prime Minister, may feel they do not need our help, and that we have nothing to contribute. But I do assure him that we are here to help, and he may need our help. I would suggest that he move promptly to establish the all-party parliamentary committee on this subject that we have recommended, on the ground that he would find it a help to him in his work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, there were one or two aspects of the Prime Minister's comments last week that disturbed me very greatly. Some would be satisfied to say that the Prime Minister attacked separatism, and we should leave it at that. In effect we should forget about the rest of what he said. Let us chalk it up to over-kill, or something like that, which one columnist defines as the Prime Minister's tendency to make dramatic utterances which are mere melodrama.

But with great respect, and I want to be very earnest about this, the Prime Minister of Canada cannot have the luxury of indulging in verbal over-kill. That would be just too dangerous. So, if the Prime Minister of Canada wants to try to defeat the present government of Quebec and elect a Liberal government in its place, that is up to him. I do not quarrel with that. Likewise, if he intends to try to throw Messrs. Drapeau and Saulnier out of Montreal City Hall, that too is up to him. The national leader of the Liberal party may do what he can to change the government at Quebec City and Montreal City Hall. But it is quite another thing for him to try to suggest that those governments are linked in some way with encouraging lawlessness directed against the federal government.

• (12:40 p.m.)

I quote the Prime Minister:

> It is obvious in any society, that all the members of a given society are inter-dependent, that some of its members cannot, on the one hand, encourage lawlessness at the federal level and, on the other hand, preach respect for law and order on the provincial or municipal levels.

Who are the people who "preach respect for law and order on the provincial or municipal levels"? I presume they are the provincial and municipal authorities.

The Prime Minister's statement clearly suggests that he thinks people in positions of responsibility in Quebec City and Montreal "preach respect for law and order on the provincial or municipal level" and then "encourage lawlessness" at the federal level. What else can it mean? Why is it in the speech at all if it does not mean that?

There is no other explanation for these statements than an attempt, subtly or not so subtly, to tar people at both the provincial and Montreal City level with accusations of encouraging lawlesness directed at the federal government. I think that is going much too far.

May I refer to what the Prime Minister said about Radio Canada? The Prime Minister has evidently decided there may be something to the reports to the effect that separatists on the staff of Radio Canada are using the network to disseminate separatist propaganda.

Now, where was he? Why did he remain silent when his colleague the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier)—and the President of the CBC—gave quite different assurances to Parliament and the parliamentary committee? I could read into the record a series of replies given by the Secretary of State dating back at least to October 16, 1968. On each and every occasion the Secretary of State did his very best to assure all of us that such fears were unfounded. When Miss LaMarsh quoted Mr. Ouimet on alleged separatist control of Radio Canada, the Secretary of State said on January 15, 1969:

> I do not think there are grounds for such an accusation, and I believe it would be quite hard to prove it.

It would be interesting to know where the Secretary of State stands today. Has he changed his mind or does he continue to support the position taken by the President of the CBC?

On February 18, 1969, the President of the CBC made the following statement to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts:

> The corporation is doing everything that it is reasonable and proper for it to do to maintain a proper degree of self-discipline within the corporation on this point. It is this objective that Mr. Picard and I, and the management of the corporation, with the backing and support of our board of directors have set for ourselves so far as the abuse of the facilities of the corporation are concerned by persons employed by the CBC who, regardless of their political affiliations, try to make unfair use of the position in which they find themselves.

Some of us have difficulty in accepting those assurances. The Prime Minister, certainly, was silent despite the assurances of the Secretary of State. At his press conference on October 15 the Prime Minister did not exactly endorse the statement of Dr. Davidson and Mr. Picard when he said:

> You know, we often complain that the CBC, especially the French network, is full of separatists and I daresay it is probably true judging by the results of it.

On Sunday night he gave a pat on the back to Messrs. Picard and Davidson and said they were doing a tremendous job. But he went on to make what to me was a very alarming statement on what would happen if they did not succeed:

> We will assume our responsibilities as a government. We will close the shop. Don't think that we won't do it. If need be we can produce programs—

The people of Canada do not want their television or radio programs slanted toward separatism. There is no doubt about that. There is, and there has been, real concern about this. Neither do they want a state radio-tv network operated directly by the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Nor do they like to hear threats from their Prime Minister, or anybody else speaking for the government, such as the statement, "If need be, we can produce programs."

Who? The Secretary of State? The Prime Minister? Or the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), with his experience in broadcasting in his native province of Newfoundland? Are they going to run the network and produce the programs?

Some hon. Members: They tried that before.

Mr. Stanfield: My hon. friends can laugh about it, but it is a very serious matter.

What is meant by this talk about a government trusteeship to run the network? The Prime Minister said, if he will excuse my French:

• (12:50 p.m.)

> That is possible, yes, indeed. I cannot offer a definite date, but that is possible.

[English]

A government trusteeship! The present managers of the CBC are in the nature of trustees—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Stanfield: —and they are responsible not to this government, but to this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Of course employees who would use the CBC to disseminate propaganda, including separatist propaganda—perhaps particularly separatist propaganda—should be fired. There is no question about that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: But in all candour, let me say that we are not going to allow the right hon. gentleman and his political colleagues to decide who is deserving of being fired.

If there is going to be any firing, surely it is going to be done by due process, in a way that will make sure the innocent are protected and that the firing will be done by the responsible management. Let us cut out any incipient McCarthyism around here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: We may be concerned about the CBC. A lot of people are concerned about it in this area of separatism and the undue attention given to the separatists. But we are not so hysterical that we are going to turn the CBC over to the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues to run or to control the programming.

We are already too well aware, those of us in opposition, of the tendency of the Prime Minister to caricature all of his opponents as extremists of one kind or another, to characterize them as "nobodies". We are not going to let him instal some kind of trusteeship which would make this network his own personal preserve or the preserve of his party.

The concern I wish to express is that we proceed, as we have always tried to proceed in this parliamentary democracy, with a regard for the protection of the innocent and with respect for due process. My concern is not diluted a bit—in fact it is strengthened—by the serious allegations made yesterday by Mr. Malcolm when he charged that subversive elements financed from abroad have infiltrated the Parti Quebecois and the CYC. It is said that Mr. Malcolm listed the names of 27 alleged subversives in a speech that sounded like a police file. I do not know where Mr. Malcolm got his information, but it only intensifies my concern with respect to these charges to the effect that there has been serious infiltration. It also intensifies my concern in seeing that we proceed properly in this matter, but with due process.

When he appeared on the television program "Format Trente" on Monday night the Prime Minister was asked if he could document some of his assertions with regard to Radio Canada. It would have been easy to document them; instead, he contented himself with saying these words, and I ask you to excuse my French, Mr. Speaker.

Considering the nearly frantic approval I was given yesterday when I made this small, rather tame accusation, I would be tempted to say...

I was the first to be amazed at the indignation expressed by that crowd of 3,000 people for the CBC programs...

[English]

In other words, "the crowd cheered; therefore I must be right." How far are we, sir, from sheer demagoguery? It is easier to excuse one outburst that may have been the result of atmosphere at a friendly dinner; but these statements began at a press conference on October 15, were continued in a speech on October 19, and elaborated upon in a television interview on October 20. Sir, we will certainly support proper efforts to ensure that separatists do not have influence in the CBC. But we will not support the Prime Minister in the threats he is making.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Without trying to match the Prime Minister for melodrama, I say that the whole performance should provide food for thought for those who are concerned, about ensuring that the authority of government is always exercised responsibly. The Prime Minister always has been a strong believer in the necessity for countervailing forces. No doubt one of these days very soon he will go out and try to redress the balance by making a militant speech about civil liberties. It will be a very gullible audience indeed that does not weigh his words against the illiberalism of some of his comments last week.

Sir, we must ensure that federalism in this country is worthy of victory. That must be our aim. A country like Canada needs strong, active and responsible government. That is why the country was created in the first place. That is the only way we will unite it now and keep it strong against the grave and difficult new problems beginning to unfold as well as the old problems with which we have been left.

Although the constitution is important, it is only part of the package. Equally critical is the determination of members of cabinet to give leadership by using the powers that already belong to the national government. The government does not lack the power to lead; it simply lacks the will. There is a lot that is wrong with the present government. But the single most serious fault is that deep down its members do not want to confront the real problems of the Canadian people. We cannot afford that attitude in Canada. There are too many problems, old and new, which can be met effectively only by strong federal leadership.

The traditional disparities in the country continue and grow ever more acute. They will be beaten only when the Government of Canada decides that we can no longer put up with whole groups of Canadians being trapped in poverty and with whole regions slipping farther behind adequate standards. On grounds of compassion and economics we must take these serious problems seriously; because if we do not they will create a new source of disunity and a new kind of crisis.

The authorities of Canadian cities where most new problems can be found cannot solve them on their own, especially with such limited resources. Problems raised by pollution, drugs, housing and transportation have such disastrous national repercussions that they threaten the survival of the country. There is a clear-cut national responsibility for a certain level of government to take these matters in hand and do so without delay. That is the essence of leadership.

The government of Canada must take direct interest in the country's economic growth; everything else depends on that. Our economy will not prosper on its own. There should be some agreement between the governments and private enterprise on the kind of development which we should seek and on the best programs to be carried out.

The national government alone can give that kind of fair and comprehensive leadership.

[English]

There are many forces, sir, that would tear this country apart. Some of them almost have. Our party is here to co-operate with the government in keeping this country together and in strengthening it. We will support measures brought forward that will attack directly the problems of the country and of the people. But there is after all only one force that can hold Canada together and keep it strong. This national government is the one thing all Canadians share. It is the one force that can be effective in making the country effective. If it fails to anticipate new problems or to solve old problems, this country will be weak. There must be a genuine commitment for leadership from Ottawa and there is not one indication of that in the Speech from the Throne. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the following amendment to the address:

but we regret that the Speech from the Throne indicates it is the intention of the government to stall action for another year on policies to improve the living standards of large numbers of our people.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in congratulating most sincerely the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is always a pleasure to be able to draw to the attention of the people of Canada the high standard of their representatives in this place, a standard which is by no means confined to any single quarter in this House.

Both the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) belong to that large group of young and active members of this House who were first elected in 1968. They and their colleagues in all parties have brought with them a degree of freshness and vitality that has enhanced interest in parliament on the part of the electorate and in so doing has raised the stature of this institution. We are proud of today's performances and so, justifiably, should be the constituents of these two members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: These gentlemen are both lawyers. While both are newcomers to this place, each has a long record of distinguished service in community affairs which stood them well in the last election and which serves as a solid base for their contributions to this House. Both have displayed competence and diligence in their parliamentary activities and I am confident that hon. members will agree with me when I add that their contributions yesterday will serve as a fine introduction to this debate.

I wish as well, Mr. Speaker, to offer a word of congratulation to the Leader of the Opposition for his speech. He will excuse me, I know, if I do not praise his efforts with the same enthusiasm I have employed for the two members who preceded him. Nor will he expect me to follow his lead and invite this House and the country into a mood of deep despondency about every aspect of Canadian life, excluding perhaps the weather. I do thank the hon. gentleman, however, for his stated recognition that all parties come to parliament pledged to work in the best interests of the country. I hope that he will find that all of his criticisms have been commented upon before the conclusion of this debate. A number of ministers have indicated that they intend to participate during the coming days, which will permit hon. members opposite to receive detailed answers to the many questions which they will be raising.

The task of the opposition is to criticize and newspaper reports of remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition and some of his lieutenants reveal that their intention this session is to raise criticism to a new level. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that they were not referring to the noise level. I hope, too, that by criticism they mean a vigorous and searching inquiry of government activities and policies; an inquiry measured more in terms of depth than length. Possibly some of these news reports were unclear, but I have been left with the impression that the House of Commons might look forward to a struggle of the proportions of the Hundred Years War, perhaps fought in the night with knives.

However, after listening to the Leader of the Opposition this morning, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should change the simile. It is apparent that the Leader of the Opposition shares the traditional conservative view of government—that it should operate similar to a patron in a shooting gallery, firing away automatically as each target pops up, never giving a moment's thought to the mechanism which causes the targets to jump.

We intend, Mr. Speaker, to identify the root causes of the problems of poverty, of inflation and the like and aim at them. We make no apology that we are not shooting at random. If this is novel to hon. members opposite, I am not surprised. It is not evidence, however, of any lack of compassion or interest in human beings. The record of the Liberal party is proof of that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and myself have had the opportunity to visit, this summer, several areas of Canada and to get acquainted, on the spot, with the problems of the people who live there. I am convinced that as a result, we are both better equipped to assess these problems and the advisability of the solutions which we intend to bring about. In fact, since the house adjourned, all hon. members went back to their respective ridings and have been able to travel all over Canada. We all have had new opportunities to realize the greatness of our country, the pride of our national spirit and the scope of our achievements. In short, we have been in a position to further discover the Canadian fact. We came back with the conviction that we are the citizens of a country which is not simply a northern extension of a foreign state, nor an historic accident, nor the result of the casual gathering of people of various origins. Quite the contrary, we constitute an homogeneous community, with a dynamic, a social organization and a future of its own.

During these last weeks, again we have seen and observed with pride the struggle of the Canadian people against a severe climate and a stubborn soil so as to become the masters of the riches promised to people who are at once industrious and perseverant.

On the other hand, we have noticed with an increasing concern some results of that struggle: the ruthless destruction of a landscape and the useless pollution of air and water. We were all able to assess the price that our society pays for the urban and industrial expansion which, too often, destroys the soul of our land, even though it increases our material welfare. Once again, we realize that an industrial growth, uncontrolled, is a source of danger.

Mr. Speaker, we are all determined, I am sure, to tolerate no longer the human sacrifices of comfort, health and efficiency which are forced upon us by an environment overcome by noise, noxious fumes and industrial waste.

We have all noticed, also, with great interest, the advantages and the benefits enjoyed in the economic field by a very great number of our fellow-citizens. But this could only emphasize in our opinion the sad situation of thousands of other Canadians who, because of circumstances over which they have no control, have to face serious financial difficulties. Those difficulties are numerous and manifold.

Here we have the Maritime fisherman, whose income has been scanty for so long that he could never get but a minimum of essential goods. There, we have the Prairie farmer whose competence and courage made him exceptionally successful and who could buy considerable amounts of land and machines; but he now is threatened with a total loss, because a sudden decrease of his income prevents him from meeting his financial commitments. Elsewhere again, the townsman who lives in a slum, unable to break out of the vicious circle in which he is kept by unemployment, illness and lack of education.

We cannot, nay, we must never give these people the impression that we regard programs, studies or laws as ends in themselves. Such measures have only a meaning if they bring relief to the people in want.

We must not think for instance that the very fact of living in a city allows to hope for economic miracles and that we can solve the problems of the farmers and of the fishermen simply by directing them towards different occupations in the urban centres.

It is beyond doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the population shift from the farms will go on at a constant rate, but this is no reason to agree with those who claim that rural life can no more profit to the country at large, nor to the citizens who have chosen this way of life. And that goes far beyond the simple question of economical effectiveness, even if that question remains extremely important. Thus, we should ask ourselves how we are going to meet the employment and other needs of men who, as landowners, were for many generations independent and self-sufficient people. We must also know what steps are being taken in cities in order to instil into the young people who came from rural areas an awareness of their responsibilities and usefulness, which they often acquired naturally in their native environment.

Lastly, it seems reasonable to ask ourselves whether we were not partially the cause of the present restlessness of the young people, by forcing upon them a social system that seems devoid of stimulants for the individual.

Thomas Huxley once said that the feeling of uselessness is the heaviest burden to be endured by our system.

No Canadian should be considered as a useless person; all citizens should have, on the economical and social plan, the opportunity of a full and fruitful life. Is that what we are offering them when we ask those farmers, who are also pedologists, botanists, mechanics, meteorologists and dealers, to leave their homes in order to settle down in areas where there is no demand for their particular skills? The Canadian farmers, by their sense of responsibility and their dignity, always represented one of the constitutive forces of this country. It would be unfair to under-estimate the contribution these men have made to our society. In some areas of Canada, the necessary transition should be brought about with great care. The federal government commits itself to do so and to respect, in this matter, the rights of all the citizens concerned. A legislation to improve the present situation of the wheat producers will be referred to Parliament for consideration in the course of the present session. Furthermore, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) will soon explain the various steps which have been and are now taken to prevent the return of such conditions.

In the course of last summer, Mr. Speaker, we have heard, again both with admiration and concern, young Canadians express criticism over the deficiencies of the social system we are offering them: this criticism had to do with the difficulties facing our native people; with a number of laws the enforcement of which is wronging those who are weak and ignorant; with an international community that accepts killing and destroying as the normal course of event and lastly, with parliamentary and government institutions that do not answer the needs of the Canadians as efficiently as they should. This criticism was not just made random, in a disorderly way; often it was voiced—and we welcome the fact—by political bodies the role of which is precisely, in a democratic society, to provide for the necessary changes. Every member of the house should take at heart to ensure the fruitful participation of our young people in the political life of our country.

[English]

This summer, too, we have all watched, even while accepting the optimistic forecasts of Canada's economic future, the debilitating effects of an inflation which has taken root in all western countries and which no government individually has so far been able adequately to control. All hon. members have returned here with the determination to ease these problems and in so doing illustrate once again the important role which parliament plays in the life of Canada.

The leaders of the opposition parties have had much to say about the government's alleged failure to act in controlling spending. They have also had much to say every time we have acted. This kind of inconsistent, automatic criticism prompts me to remind them that the credibility gap is not a phenomenon peculiar only to other countries.

In addition to these activities which we have witnessed, Mr. Speaker, there have been some aspects of Canadian life which we have felt more than seen. Of these, the most evident, and undoubtedly the most important, is the spirit of tolerance and goodwill that is an invaluable Canadian characteristic. Canadians take for granted what so many persons elsewhere seek and envy: human relationships that, by and large, accept without question differences in colour or origin or language.

I stated on July 1 that we seldom reflect how fortunate we are in this country that there is a notable absence of bigotry and prejudice. Events of the past few weeks, however, have demonstrated that we cannot afford to assume smugly that these hateful characteristics are strangers to Canada and are always absent. Nevertheless, if all Canadians are not yet able to live in dignity, by far the greater number of those who are not able to do so suffer from indifference—not from hate; from neglect, not from prejudice. Not here do we find repression clothed in the guise of liberty, or violence tolerated in the name of law and order. This spirit of tolerance is our greatest gift, Mr. Speaker; we must cherish it and never take it for granted. Against it we can judge our stature as a country and as a people.

But tolerance is of benefit only if it remains a positive force. It is evil if it becomes an excuse for inaction or lack of care. Canadians must never become tolerant of poverty, of lawlessness, of suffering. Through their representatives in this place they must continue to make known their desire to share in the task of eliminating these evils, and we here must not flag in our attempts to find solutions.

Our primary responsibility, Mr. Speaker, is to the people of Canada. But the efforts of Parliament to produce a better life must not be confined for the benefit solely of Canadians. In comparison with the daily lives of the great majority of humanity, Canadians are immensely fortunate, whether measured in terms of political rights, in terms of freedom from the fear of violence, or in terms of standard of living. By contrast, two thirds of mankind live in a state of perpetual misery and struggle, with per capita annual incomes measured in hundreds, not thousands, of dollars.

The world is now too small to permit such disparities to continue. Unless these differences are eliminated, the pressures on the rich nations will become so intense as to force them either to share in equal measure or to make decisions of frightening moral consequence. By the year 2000 the population of the world will be 7.5 billion, twice what it is today, and 80 per cent of these people will be living in the developing countries. There is no rational or moral justification for a lack of response now by Canada and other developed nations to their undeniable needs. In these respects we should be familiar with the alarming observation of Chateaubriand who wrote of a similar, but infinitely smaller, problem in Europe a century and a half ago. He stated:

Try to convince the poor man, once he has learned to read and ceased to believe, once he has become as well informed as yourself, try to convince him that he must submit to every sort of privation, while his neighbour possesses a thousand times what he needs; in the last result you would have to kill him.

These are sobering and frightening thoughts. They explain the decision of Canada, at this time of austerity in most governmental programs, to increase the value of our foreign economic assistance budget and to create, after extensive planning and consultation with other countries, an International Development Research Centre which will be charged with the responsibility of improving the qualitative effect of Canadian and other aid projects. The Centre is an exciting concept; a recognition that accelerated economic growth is a complex task, and is deeply interrelated with problems of social development. I am sure all hon. members will agree that it is fitting that Canada, long among the most active of contributors to foreign aid—and this year the host to the 20th annual meeting of the Colombo Plan countries—should take a lead in this important respect. It must continue to be the responsibility of all of us here to ensure that Canadians will understand the need, and support increasing expenditures, for developmental programs. In these respects, we share the pride of all the world in the important task performed so well for the World Bank by that distinguished Canadian, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson. His commission and its report have brought honour to him and to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: The breathtaking exploits which took man to the moon this summer emphasize the lack of success which has greeted efforts to overcome the much less exciting, but nevertheless much more difficult and important, task of resolving human differences on this planet. The tragic conflict in Nigeria continues, notwithstanding the efforts of African states and many countries outside of that continent to assist in its resolution. Canada makes no claim to possession of superior wisdom in matters of this kind; it bows to none, however, in its desire to relieve suffering and attain peace. In our efforts to lighten the humanitarian burden, Canadian officials in a number of countries have conducted and are conducting investigations, offering suggestions, advancing proposals; my personal representative has visited Africa twice to talk with Nigerian and other leaders and been to both London and Washington in this same pursuit; the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has been untiring in his travels and discussions—both he and I have held talks with the Secretary General of the United Nations. Canada has not been successful in bringing the war to a conclusion, and this the government regrets. Nor does it make any of us here less sad to know that several African leaders, including one who has recognized Biafra, have stated publicly that there is little if anything that Canada can usefully do in these respects—in addition to what it is doing—at this time while both sides remain intransigent in their basic attitudes and while the overwhelming majority of African states insist that this is a problem for Africans, not outsiders to solve.

The humanitarian consequences of this tragedy, however, are a burden for all mankind, not just Africa. Every child that starves in any part of Nigeria is a matter for the conscience of us all. Canada has been in the forefront in supplying food and relief materials to the International Committee of the Red Cross for distribution to civilians throughout Nigeria, on both sides of the fighting lines. Canadian government contributions amount to some $3 million; we are prepared to make further funds available when once the delivery blockage is removed. If it is not quickly removed, we shall take other appropriate steps.

While struggling to bring some relief to the suffering peoples in Nigeria, Canada has at the same time been active in its attempts to avoid future situations where political differences might be employed to prevent adequate relief efforts. Canada proposed, and then co-sponsored with Norway, three important measures to this end at the 21st International Red Cross Conference in Istanbul in September. A declaration of principles for international humanitarian relief to civilian populations in disaster situations was unanimously adopted. Two other resolutions were overwhelmingly carried. These are designed to produce international legal principles which will be supplementary to those now in effect in the four General Red Cross Conventions of 1949. They are intended to remove any doubts about responsibility for humanitarian assistance to victims of armed conflicts, whether these conflicts are of an international or a civil character. This was an important initiative, welcomed on all sides. It is another example of the quiet, persistent and often effective way in which Canada, through its skilled representatives abroad, discharges its responsibilities in the international community.

In still another variation of threats to innocent persons, this country will within a period of days have completed the formalities precedent to ratifying the Tokyo Conventions concerning hi-jacking of aircraft. Canada is also the co-sponsor of a resolution now before the United Nations concerning acts of piracy in the air.

The need for constant attention to man's foolishness in the name of pride, of honour, of vanity, must not be underestimated, Mr. Speaker. War, as the newspapers attest every day, is no stranger to this planet. In Nigeria, in the Middle East, in Viet Nam, it flickers and flares. Elsewhere, persons suffer and die as a result of military activities which are not described formally as "war". In southern Africa, and many other parts of the world, personal activities are restricted and human freedoms are confined by military and paramilitary activities. Any of these incidents, or others similar to them, could burst from their confines without notice, and envelop us all.

No single international activity, therefore, rates higher priority in the opinion of this government than the pursuit of effective arms control and arms limitation agreements. Canada refuses to submit without protest to the present nuclear hegemony. It is deeply concerned at the failure of the important nuclear powers, the U.S.S.R., the U.S.A., China and France, so far to ratify the non-proliferation treaty, article VI of which binds parties to negotiate in good faith on measures leading to the cessation of the nuclear arms race, to nuclear disarmament, and to general and complete disarmament. At the same time that ratification is delayed, the development of multiple warhead rockets continues in two of these countries, a development that could make satellite inspection and verification of arms control agreements impossible. The world now stands at a crossroads which, if passed unwisely, could lead to the destruction of mankind. Canada pleads with both the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. quickly to begin their strategic arms limitation talks.

In the course of negotiations at the United Nations 26 nation disarmament conference are two conventions, one intended to prevent the nuclearization of the seabed, and the other to control chemical and biological means of warfare. In these negotiations Canada is deeply and energetically involved, represented by some of its most talented public servants. We are at the same time examining very carefully our own activities in research areas to ensure that we are not in any way contributing in an unintended fashion to a situation which all mankind properly regards as abhorrent. Canada is seeking in these studies and in these negotiations, as the world has sought and attained in other environments and for other purposes, international régimes for the protection and the advantage of all countries.

The threat to the human race is so real that we must not permit false reasoning to hinder us in our endeavours. If the application of out-of-date military strategies to alliances with old and trusted friends might lead not to the desired deterrent effect but instead to provocation and to obstacles to détente, then these strategies must be re-examined. In these instances it is the strategy, not the alliance, that worries Canada and we will not hesitate to suggest correctives with the same vigour that we contributed to the establishment of the alliance.

Membership in a community, Mr. Speaker, imposes—and properly—certain limitations on the activities of all members. For this reason, while not lowering our guard or abandoning our proper interests, Canada must not appear to live by double standards. We cannot, at the same time that we are urging other countries to adhere to régimes designed for the orderly conduct of international activities, pursue policies inconsistent with that order simply because to do so in a given instance appears to be to our brief advantage. Law, be it municipal or international, is composed of restraints. If wisely construed they contribute to the freedom and the well-being of individuals and of states. Neither states nor individuals should feel free to pick and choose, to accept or reject, the laws that may for the moment be attractive to them.

It is in this mood that the government is studying its claims to the waters lying off the islands of the Arctic archipelago. To close off those waters and to deny passage to all foreign vessels in the name of Canadian sovereignty, as some commentators have suggested, would be as senseless as placing barriers across the entrances to Halifax and Vancouver harbours. We would certainly prove by those acts that we were masters in our own house, but at immense cost economically by denying shipping of importance to Canada. On the other hand, if we were to act in some misguided spirit of international philanthropy by declaring that all comers were welcome without let or hindrance, we would be acting in default of Canada's obligations not just to Canadians but to all the world.

In the Canadian Arctic are found the breeding grounds, sometimes the only breeding grounds, of many species of migratory birds. Bylot Island is the site of the nesting ground of the total population of the Greater Snow Goose. It is the site as well of the nesting colonies of some six million sea birds. Along 12 miles of the coast of Somerset Island are the nesting grounds of four million birds. Large numbers of air breathing mammals—whales, seals, walrus—inhabit the waters lying throughout the Canadian archipelago. The existence of these and other animals and birds is dependent upon an uncontaminated environment; an environment which only Canada can take the lead in protecting. The beneficiaries of this natural life are not only Canadians; they are all the peoples of the world.

For those reasons, I say in this place, Mr. Speaker, that Canada regards herself as responsible to all mankind for the peculiar ecological balance that now exists so precariously in the water, ice and land areas of the Arctic archipelago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: We do not doubt for a moment that the rest of the world would find us at fault, and hold us liable, should we fail to ensure adequate protection of that environment from pollution or artificial deterioration. Canada will not permit this to happen, Mr. Speaker. It will not permit this to happen either in the name of freedom of the seas, or in the interests of economic development. We have viewed with dismay the abuse elsewhere of both these laudable principles and are determined not to bow in the Arctic to the pressures of any state. In saying this, we are aware of the difficulties faced in the past by other countries in controlling water pollution and marine destruction within their own jurisdictions.

Part of the heritage of this country, a part that is of increasing importance and value to us, is the purity of our water, the freshness of our air, and the extent of our living resources. For ourselves and for the world we must jealously guard these benefits. To do so is not chauvinism, it is an act of sanity in an increasingly irresponsible world. Canada will propose a policy of use of the Arctic waters which will be designed for environmental preservation. This will not be an intolerable interference with the activities of others; it will not be a restriction upon progress. This legislation we regard, and invite the world to regard, as a contribution to the long-term and sustained development of resources for economic and social progress.

We also invite the international community to join with us and support our initiative for a new concept, an international legal régime designed to ensure to human beings the right to live in a wholesome natural environment. In pursuit of this concept I shall be holding discussions shortly about this and other matters with the Secretary General of the United Nations. A combination of an international régime, and the exercise by the Canadian government of its own authority in the Canadian Arctic, will go some considerable distance to ensure that irreparable harm will not occur as a result of negligent or intentional conduct.

Canadian activities in the northern reaches of this continent have been far-flung but pronounced for many years, to the exclusion of the activities of any other government. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police patrols and administers justice in these regions on land and ice, in the air and in the water. The Canadian Armed Forces carry out continuous surveillance activities; Canadian postal services, health services and communications networks criss-cross these territories to serve those who live and work there. Among these persons are the Canadian Eskimos, who pursue their food and conduct their activities over the icy wastes without heed to whether that ice is supported by land or by water. In all these activities, and in others, ranging from geophysical explorations to the distribution of family allowance cheques, Arctic North America has, for 450 years, progressively become the Canadian Arctic.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members know that there is not now, nor is it conceivable that there will ever be, from any source, challenges to Canadian sovereignty on the mainland, in the islands, in the minerals lying in the continental shelf below the Arctic waters, or in our territorial seas. This happy situation is the result of quiet, consistent policies in the past on the part of all Canadian governments. The present government pledges to be equally consistent. Those policies will reflect Canada's proper interest not only in the preservation of the ecological balance which I have already mentioned, but as well in the economic development of the north, the security of Canada, and in our stature and reputation in the world community.

• (2:40 p.m.)

May I say again, Mr. Speaker, that the government is highly interested in what it considers to be the two most valuable assets of Canada: its human resources and its natural resources. The government faces every problem in terms of the administration and development of those resources. Our actions as well as our failings, during this mandate, will, I hope, be assessed in that light. I invite the hon. members to study the present legislative program in the same spirit.

I extend that invitation because I realize that daily decisions concerning immediate problems may often seem unpopular. It is inevitable, that, in a country as huge as Canada, with such varied interests as ours, Canadians should not always agree on what conclusions are reached, solutions are proposed or priorities are established. Nevertheless, those conclusions, those solutions and those priorities will always, this I promise, be in harmony, over the long term, with certain principles.

First of all, we will never sacrifice, in the name of progress, a clean and healthy environment to industrial or commercial development.

Secondly, we will never allow, in the name of efficiency or social welfare, an omnipresent government to substitute itself to the right to privacy or to any other individual freedom.

Thirdly, we will not allow, in the name of freedom of speech, sectarianism to replace tolerance; violence, dialogue; discrimination, moderation.

Mr. Speaker, these principles should hardly give rise to a debate in the house. They are so self-evident that they are not likely to arouse interest. Paradoxically, however, it is precisely for this reason that they require constant attention on our part.

Clean environment, respect for privacy, tolerant attitudes, these are things that Canadians have long taken for granted as being a natural aspect of the happiness of living here. And yet, we run the risk of squandering our wealth if we do not take care of it. Often unknown to ourselves, we yield before the temptation of abuse. I would like to sum up what the government plans to do in order to goad the conscience of our citizens in these areas and what measures are needed to correct the habits of the past.

We intend to tackle the problem of environment, not only in the Northern regions but everywhere in Canada, by directing our efforts mainly to the two major sources of pollution: urbanization and the invasion of modern technology.

Urbanization is not by itself prejudicial to the environment, but inadequate planning and mismanagement may lead, in this respect, to disastrous results, such as unhealthy habitat, in particular. This government is fully aware of the costs and burdens that society bears at the present time for not having, in the past, succeeded in gradually solving the problems inherent to urban expansion. We pledge to remove these difficulties and to find solutions to these problems. The proposed amendments to the National Housing Act are another step in this direction.

The accelerated growth of our cities is not a transitory phenomenon, likely to disappear in due time. We must not rely on that. On the other hand, there is no reason either to despair. Cities could very well offer an agreeable environment where work, pleasure and life itself could be satisfying. Why should Canadian cities, like those of some countries, be associated with the paralysing fear that the only mention of the word "city" never fails to inspire, because it has become synonymous with slums, noise, disease, crime and lack of educational and recreational facilities? It is our firm determination that Canadian cities get healthier and fully foster human activities.

The same technology that has produced real miracles in the field of communication and transport, as well as in the advance of applied sciences, remains however the most formidable enemy of a safe biosphere. It is no longer possible from now on to escape the unhealthy consequences of a defective destruction of industrial and domestic wastage and the incomplete combustion of residual products. Nature has shown an astonishing capacity for adjustment and reproduction which is not however unlimited. During the course of evolution, many forms of life have disappeared, because they were unable to adjust to survival conditions or to find a proper environment. Their capacity for adjustment was too slow to lead to a biological transformation in accordance with current requirements. The ingenuity and the pre-eminence of man gave rise however to the illusion that he can remain invulnerable to the effect of those natural laws. However, nothing indicates that mankind can elude the risk of extinction.

Indeed, he has too often used the resources provided by his intelligence and his instinct not so much to accept the challenges confronting him as to challenge his own survival. In so doing he threatens not only his own species but also the whole life on our planet.

The present government is firmly determined that no such acts of madness will be allowed to go on indefinitely, at least in Canada. Together with the aforesaid legislation concerning the protection of the Arctic regions, we shall, in the course of this session, introduce a new bill on Canadian waters to prevent pollution of lakes and rivers, as well as a bill governing the operation of appliances that emit radiations. As we have already indicated this year, a study is being conducted at the present time on the risks involved in car and truck exhaust fumes and on means to correct the situation.

All these measures tend to develop the environment where Canadians work and live. Even if such an environment became idyllic, there still would remain a very important task to perform, a task that will never be completed: guarantee to every citizen a life protected against any undue intervention. The growing influence of large undertakings, of big unions, of a powerful government and of large cities will leave us no respite in that connection. Unemployment is an insult to human dignity, and so is an impersonal welfare system. It is also an indignity to provide insufficient protection to our citizens against criminal activities. Every Canadian should feel proud of himself in the presence of his children and his neighbours and he should be able to rely on every level of the government in this respect. Canadian society does not have an overflow of skills; we cannot therefore afford to waste the smallest contribution that each individual can bring to the country. Our history books are unfortunately teeming with cases where, through misunderstandings brave men have seen their designs fall through, simply because they were thought to be non-conformists and because they refused to share in the ideas and beliefs of the community. We cannot accept a perpetuation of social conditions which push some frustrated and powerless men towards the marginal areas of the law, and sometimes even beyond. Our human resources in this country are not so rich that we can say to anyone that we have no answer to his needs and no solution to his problems.

In short, Mr. Speaker, in this time of research and of change, we must see to it that technological progress does not crush the individual. Our country has traditions of individual liberties and deeds which do not allow us to forget that the denial of one single person's rights denies the rights of each and everyone of us. The action that the government has taken, and that it will take during this session in the legal field, answer to the rightful demands from all the people who feel concerned by the matter. The huge report of the Ouimet Commission on the penal reform is being carefully studied. The minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has had lengthy discussions with the respresentatives of the legal world about the amendments he intended to bring to the Criminal Code as regards bail and electronic eavesdropping.

A bill to institute a committee for the reform of the law will be introduced during this session, so that the federal acts, and the scope of their provisions, should constantly be subjected to the scrutiny and analysis of legal authorities.

• (2:50 p.m.)

[English]

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, these innovations and reforms in the area of criminal law are in some cases overdue. Many of them are in response to demands which have been voiced in an inarticulate but nevertheless sincere fashion by Canadians, young and old, in all walks of life. All of them reflect governmental sensitivity to, and an attempt to understand and rectify, the underlying social causes of crime and disorder. Not surprisingly, their very novelty makes them offensive to some. But their existence on the statute books of Canada is proof that this country is responsive to the needs for social change and is committed to an atmosphere of freedom. It is important that this be understood by every one in Canada, Mr. Speaker.

Canadians should know that this government will control and restrict within its competence any state activity which interferes unduly with individual liberty. We continue to believe that a constitutionally entrenched charter of human rights of the sort proposed last year will serve as a solid base of human values. In these areas of civil liberties no government in the world is more sympathetic nor more active.

I say this, Mr. Speaker, to emphasize that there is no need anywhere in Canada for misguided or misinformed zealots to resort to acts of violence in the belief that only in this fashion can they accomplish change. There may be some places in the world where the law is so inflexible and so insensitive as to prompt such beliefs. But Canada is not the place. Those who would defy the law and ignore the opportunities available to them to right their wrongs and satisfy their complaints will receive no hearing from this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: I say to them that the law enforcement agencies in this country are instruments of government. They are responsible to government and answerable for their activities. This being so I emphasize that unlawful acts of violence perpetrated for any reason will be regarded by this government as without excuse and not to be condoned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: This government has no intention of bending before any real or pretended backlash to so-called "soft" criminal laws. We are not prepared to back into an authoritarian era because of the activities of a small number of criminally inclined persons. But under no circumstances are we going to permit these same persons to assume that this society will tolerate their criminal activities.

We intend to ensure that the laws parliament passes are worthy of respect, and intend to use our powers to ensure that those laws are respected.

Lest these self-styled Robin Hoods, revolutionaries and romantics have any doubts about the results of their activities let them be told that anarchy is a two-way street; that in a jungle community there is no dispensation for the property or the lives of hoodlums and thugs, or of so-called activists parading in the guise of taxi drivers or students; none either for their loved ones, or for any other member of the community. In the absence of respect for the law, we all stand naked and vulnerable.

I am told that centuries ago this point was vividly, if cruelly, made known to their subjects by some wise rulers in ancient Persia. As a dramatic illustration of the advantages of order, periods of anarchy were on occasion permitted.

Those who disrespect legal processes expose themselves to still another danger, the danger that law abiding elements in society will, out of anger for those incidents and out of fear for their own safety, harden their attitudes and refuse to accommodate any changes or remedy any shortcomings. The former Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Ramsey Clark, explained this reaction, in American terms, in these words:

> Fear may have been a good instinct for cavemen; it may have kept them alive. But in our time, it's terribly dangerous. When you're afraid, you lose all compassion for other people. Fear deprives you of the very concern that is essential to remove the cause of that fear. Frightened, you fail to fulfil the obligations of a compassionate and just people—to educate and employ and house and give help to the poor. Finally, fear deprives you of any concern for justice itself. Frightened, you want to shoot looters, to arrest without cause, to hold without bail, to force confessions.

Mr. Speaker, I ask those persons who make bombs, who deny the peaceful exchange of ideas, who are unwilling to accept the decisions of authorized arbitrators, if these are the results they seek, and if they consciously desire society to descend this spiral to destruction?

We in this House, as representatives of political parties, bear a heavy responsibility in these respects. We must not relinquish the burden which rests on our parties to offer to all Canadians acceptable vehicles for their political activities. If we do not provide proof of the vitality of the democratic process we shall have failed our responsibilities and proved to the critics that the system is indeed at fault.

I wish to add on behalf of the Liberal party, Mr. Speaker, that we accept that challenge; that we intend, in the future as in the past, to be the voice of change; that we shall not foresake our role as advocate of the great main-stream of Canadians; that we intend to listen, to understand, to respond, and to lead.

This Canada of ours is a bold experiment, an experiment that must continue on orderly lines as it has in the past. But order is not stagnation. Orderly change need not lead to any less imaginative or desirable results than would the plans of those who press for precipitate reform.

Bold plans are no less bold because they are thoughtfully conceived. Broad change is no less broad because it is carefully designed.

Orderly change will permit us to retain our sense of direction, our unity, and our diversity. Our unity must be of commitment to a better Canada, a Canada in which all the diversities which give us strength flourish for our betterment, a Canada in which the dignity and worth of every individual are perfected, where each person is given an equality of opportunity which is real, unfettered by disease or ignorance or poverty, a Canada which exists as a free country in a world where freedom and peace are the norm, and not an elusive target.

I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that every member of this house shares these goals. Our differences are only in the means of attaining them, in assessment of priority, in judgment of the rate of achievement. This institution of parliament is designed to resolve those differences. I look forward, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure do the leaders of all the Opposition parties, and all hon. members, to a productive and effective session, one which will bring deserved repute to this House and will contribute to our common goal of a better Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) on their very commendable speeches in moving and seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Theirs was not an easy task, because it is somewhat difficult to make bricks without straw. One of my colleagues has described the Speech from the Throne by saying it ought to be called the spare ribs speech—a lot of bones and not much meat.

Mr. Mackasey: Like a lot of the ham we are having right now.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Now we are getting from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) the boloney he usually slices so thickly.

Mr. Baldwin: This is a meatless Friday.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The Speech from the Throne, like the Prime Minister's speech this afternoon, is filled with pious hopes and good intentions. No one can quarrel with the sentiments of high public morality which have just been outlined by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). However, I think the Canadian people will be disappointed in the Speech from the Throne and in the speech to which we have just listened, because for over a year they have been expecting that the government would outline its blueprint for the just society, and most people believe that the just society means more than legal justice.

Of course we want legislation which will control wire-tapping, will deal with detention before bail and see that every person has fair and equal treatment before the law. Those are things that members of this party have been advocating for years. It is regrettable that a Liberal government which has been in office for over six years is only now getting around to dealing with those problems. A just society involves more than legal justice. Surely a just society also means social justice and economic justice. However, the Speech from the Throne and the Prime Minister's speech this afternoon were extremely vague and evasive about what the government intends to do in order to provide greater social equality and greater economic opportunity for the people of this country.

In the whole Speech from the Throne there is not a word about unemployment. The Prime Minister said that there is indignity in a man being out of work. There certainly is. There is not only indignity; there is want for him and his family. What is there in the Speech from the Throne that offers any hope that unemployment will diminish rather than continue to increase? Neither is there a word in the Speech from the Throne about the acceleration in the take-over of the Canadian economy by foreign investors, particularly American investors, which is one of the most pressing problems facing this country. The Speech from the Throne is silent in this regard, and the Prime Minister has not said anything on the subject. What happened to the Canada Development Corporation, which has been at the masthead of every Speech from the Throne brought down by the Liberal party since 1963?

An hon. Member: They did not even bother with it this time.

Another hon. Member: It fell overboard.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): This time it has gone with the wind. The Speech from the Throne says that the most pressing problem facing this country is inflation. I think most Canadians would agree with that. It says that the government has taken certain measures to combat inflation, which it hopes other sectors of the economy will emulate. I say, Heaven forbid! The first point I want to make in these remarks, Mr. Speaker, is that the policies followed by the government to combat inflation have been a ghastly, colossal failure.

The government's solutions to the problem have been four-fold: First, to create further unemployment; second, to cut back government expenditures; third, to fire civil servants; fourth, to impose a program of income restraint on pensioners, veterans and welfare recipients. This means, of course, that those who have been hardest hit by inflation are to be the first victims of the government's efforts to combat inflation. These efforts have not only failed to cure our economic ills, but they could conceivably trigger a serious economic recession this winter with unemployment reaching anywhere from 6 per cent to 9 per cent of the labour force.

The government has accepted the theory that the best way to combat inflation is to create more unemployment. This is an extension of the policy contained in the June budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). It is simply a carry-on of the policy of his predecessor, namely, that the government should create additional slack in the economy. Unemployment has been rising steadily since 1965. It now stands at 5 per cent of the labour force, on a seasonally adjusted basis. The September unemployment rate is the highest since 1963. The government's policies, far from resolving our economic difficulties, will cause further suffering and hardship while at the same time having little or no effect on rising living costs.

The Economic Council of Canada, in its Sixth Annual Review, warned the government of the dangerous course it is pursuing in these words:

> Further fiscal and monetary restraint conceivably could result simply in higher rates of unemployment and economic slack, with no more than marginal effects on current rates of increase in prices and costs.

The Council points out that since 1967 the Canadian economy has been operating with a significant margin of economic slack, as shown by the present high level of 5 per cent unemployment, seasonally adjusted. The Council also said:

> With unemployment in the range of 4 per cent to 5 per cent... it is difficult to argue that excessive general demand pressure has contributed to inflationary conditions.

However, the government continues with an anti-inflationary policy based entirely on this false premise. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the government is using the wrong economic tool to do the wrong thing at the wrong time. Fiscal policy may be a powerful tool in controlling employment, but it is limited as a technique for controlling prices. Reduced federal spending means lower aggregate demand, lower output and lower employment. In seeking an answer to inflation the government is flirting with an economic recession. This inept cure could be worse than the disease. The first casualties in the war against inflation are the very people who are hardest hit.

One must agree with the Economic Council's contention that much of Canada's inflation is imported from the United States as a result of the Viet Nam war. Therefore, restrictive measures will do little to suppress demand; they will have the effect of causing further unemployment without doing much to attain price stability. Economic indicators already show a slackening in United States economic activity. Paul McCracken, Chairman of the United States Council of Economic Advisers, foresees anti-inflationary pressures taking hold late this year or early in 1970.

There is a distinct possibility that the Canadian government's austerity program could result in an economic over-kill that would cause a slowdown of our long-term economic growth, which is so essential to increased production and full employment. There are some indications that this is already happening. The latest Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures show that in the second quarter of this year there was a drop in output of one-fifth of one per cent, compared with the 1.8 per cent increase in the first quarter of 1969 and the 2.7 per cent increase in the last quarter of 1968. Industrial production for August shows a decline of 1.6 per cent when compared with the figures for the previous month.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the government's policy of creating slack in the economy is based on the erroneous theory that inflation in this country is the result of too much money chasing too few goods. There is certainly no lack of goods, and very large sections of the Canadian people are certainly not embarrassed with too much money. The government may have in mind our corporations whose profits in 1968 increased by 20 per cent. But for the old age pensioners, the veterans, the farmers and the fishermen of this country, an abundance of money has certainly not been a problem.

Inflation in this country has been aggravated by an unequal distribution of income and a misallocation of our resources. Far from rectifying the situation, the government's program of restraint will only widen the gap between various income groups, accentuate the unjust distribution of income and impose an unacceptable degree of suffering on that section of the Canadian people least able to bear it.

Second, I suggest that the government's policies to combat inflation are not only a colossal failure but are grossly unfair. The burden of the fight against inflation has been placed entirely on the public sector, while the private sector remains completely unrestricted.

In its attempt to contain inflation the government is cutting back on essential community services. Funds for public housing, urban renewal, winter works, pollution control, drug control and research, salmon spawning projects and hospital construction have been severely restricted. At the same time the commercial sector of our economy has increased its capital expenditures for this year, over 1968, by more than $281 million. Expenditures in this area amounted to almost $1.5 billion last year. A substantial portion of this amount was spent on the construction of prestige office buildings, chain stores, movie theatres and hotels. We maintain that if restraints are needed, surely it would be more sensible to space out postponable private investment and give priority to essential community services such as schools, hospitals, housing, urban renewal and pollution control facilities. The government keeps talking about establishing priorities, but restraints have been imposed without any regard for the social priorities and the needs of the Canadian people.

For example, when medicare is being introduced, hospital construction grants are being discontinued. Health resource grants have been frozen at a ridiculously low figure while supermarkets, prestige office buildings and gas stations proliferate. Apparently the government is prepared to allow the private sector to use our available resources on the basis of profitability, while essential public services are restricted in the name of austerity. The cities of Canada are being extremely hard hit by the government's decision to cut federal expenditures. The growing urban crisis has been left to smoulder and wreak its inevitable havoc in individual despair and social tension. The Economic Council of Canada warned the government of a major housing crisis and urged it to take action in these words:

> ... major new initiatives to cope with the problems in the housing industry are urgently needed if Canadians are to be well housed in the future at reasonable prices.

In spite of this warning, the minister responsible for housing announces that he has no further funds for public housing or urban renewal this year. It is increasingly evident that the free play of market forces cannot solve the housing problems of the low income and middle income families. For these groups the government's decision to freeze public funds for housing means higher rent, poor accommodation and too large a share of their income being expended in obtaining shelter.

Nothing illustrates the governments' schizophrenia better than the announcement of the minister responsible for pollution control, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang), to the effect that the municipalities should apply to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for assistance. At the same time the minister responsible for Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Andras), indicates that no money is available and advises the municipalities not to send in their applications this year.

Mr. Gilbert: Shame.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): While the private sector continues to operate on a "business as usual" basis, the government's austerity program is hurting the economy and creating hardship for whole sections of the Canadian people. Allow me to cite one or two examples, Mr. Speaker. The fisheries services are being cut at a time when the fishing industry faces a crisis. The salmon catch in British Columbia has this year been only a little better than half that of last year. This situation calls for the hiring of more biologists and the expansion of our biological stations. Instead, these are being severely curtailed. The situation is further aggravated by the government's new licensing program. Under phase 1 of this program 1,000 vessels from the B.C. salmon fleet were eliminated last year, and 2,500 vessels will be eliminated this year. The Minister of Fisheries is quoted in the Vancouver Sun of September 4, 1969, as saying:

> We are moving towards a commercial salmon fleet manned by professional fishermen.

I suggest that if the minister's policies are continued we will be moving toward the day when most of the salmon fleet will be owned by the fish-handling companies and the independent commercial fisherman will be out of business. Consider the problem of western Canada, which is facing its greatest economic crisis since the 1930's. The sole contribution of the government to solve this crisis has been to increase the amount of money which the farmer can borrow on his farm-stored grain. The government's austerity program has left the prairie farmers in a distressing condition and the prairie economy in a state of disarray. However, no group has suffered more from the effect of rising prices than the old age pensioners and the recipients of veterans allowances. The old age pensioners have an increase this year of $1.58 a month, which is supposed to represent 2 per cent of their income, but in the meantime the cost of living has risen by 5 per cent. The recipients of veterans allowance have received no increase at all. The government continues to evade its responsibilities with respect to this group. The government's austerity program means that these groups, who have suffered so much already from rising living costs, can expect no help whatsoever as long as the government maintains its austerity program at their expense.

The government has over the years talked about a war on poverty. This is the war that never began. It is a war which poverty is winning by default. Almost two-fifths of our population live below the line of deprivation, and one-fifth are below the poverty line. The plight of our Indian, Eskimo and Metis people cries out for compassionate and humanitarian policies. The conditions on some of our Indian reserves beggar description; they are a national disgrace. The government uses its austerity program as an excuse for doing nothing. Even worse, it uses inflation as a cover for imposing reactionary programs that are reminiscent of Herbert Hoover.

The government will have great difficulty in persuading the Canadian people that it cannot cope with the problems of poverty, because it did not have difficulty finding $17 million with which to refit the Bonaventure before it went into mothballs. The government had no difficulty finding $49 million for the hydrofoil, and $80 million for the automobile industry. Now we read that Union Station in Ottawa, which is to be demolished in a few years, is to have $600,000 spent on it. My guess is that it will probably be over $1 million. It is being renovated for federal-provincial conferences. Is this the government's idea of social priorities? Is this how the Prime Minister puts into effect all the fine, moral precepts which he enunciated this afternoon? Emerson once said, "What you are speaks so loudly I can't hear what you say".

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, our civil servants have been made the villains and the scapegoats of the government's fight against inflation. No intelligent person will object to staff reductions on the basis of efficiency. However, the present cuts in staff mean that the civil service has been largely overstaffed, or essential services are being cut. The government should tell us which is the reason. The government's treatment of civil servants makes a mockery of collective bargaining. In essence, the government has said that any increase in salaries must be compensated by a reduction in staff.

At a meeting at Mount Gabriel Lodge in June of 1968, between Treasury Board officials, deputy ministers, heads of crown corporations, etc., guidelines were established for civil service collective bargaining, and they have been rigorously applied. We in this party contend that if there are to be government guidelines, they ought to apply to both public and private sectors and to all forms of income such as profit, rent, interest, capital gains and dividend payments. They should not be imposed solely upon the wages and salaries of civil servants.

It is doubtful whether any employer in Canada would treat his employees more callously than has the federal government. This is particularly true of the provision that the first to be fired are those 60 years of age and over. If private employers take a leaf out of the government's book there will be troubled days ahead for Canada. There have been some significant omissions in the government's policy of cutting staff. For instance, the Prime Minister's office staff is twice as large as that of his predecessor and costs $350,000 a year, compared with $150,000 a year for Mr. Pearson and $50,000 a year for the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was Prime Minister of Canada. The number of elite advisers to the government has reached the astronomical figure of 117, at a cost of $1.5 million.

The Prime Minister has now added two more Ministers without Portfolio, making a total of five Ministers without Portfolio. I do not know why we need more Ministers without Portfolio, unless it is to give regional representation, a reward for services rendered or the Prime Minister feels that some of the ministers he has are not capable of doing the job they have had assigned to them. This is the largest cabinet in Canadian history. No one would object to that if they were doing anything worth while, but when the government is cutting staff and reducing essential public services these additions to the cabinet make a farce of the government's appeals to the public for austerity.

Before I go on with my next point, Mr. Speaker, I want to move an amendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

> That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:
> "who are suffering from rising unemployment, lower prices for primary products, and the curtailment of essential public services brought on by the government's misguided anti-inflation policies."

I will now turn to what we in this party believe to be the realistic and effective measures which must be taken in order to cope with the problem of inflation. We say, first, that Canada must attain a greater measure of economic independence. Much of our inflation has come from the United States and arises from the war in Viet Nam. Mr. Smith, the Chairman of the Economic Council, made that clear in his evidence before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Professor Watkins, who wrote the report on foreign ownership for the government, put it much more succinctly when he said that not only have we lost the capacity to create economic growth in Canada, but the capacity of the Canadian government to create jobs and to control inflation is negligible. The Prime Minister's statement that we have only a 15 per cent marginal economy indicates the extent to which we are dominated and controlled by economic decisions made in the United States.

It is increasingly apparent that Canada must have a greater measure of economic independence if we are to pursue policies which will promote economic growth, provide full employment and assure a larger measure of price stability. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the take-over of Canadian industry by United States corporations is accelerating at an alarming rate. In July, 1969, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs reported the following figures in connection with foreign take-overs in Canada: In 1963 there were 43 take-overs; in 1964 there were 96; in 1965 there were 83; in 1966 there were 87; in 1967 there were 90, and in 1968 there were 174. We contend that immediate action is required to reverse this trend, one that is eroding Canada's economic independence and preventing us from having the manoeuvrability which is so essential if we are to have a greater measure of control over our economic affairs.

We suggest there are a number of steps to be taken in this direction. First, we think that Canada should move toward establishing a floating exchange rate. This would give us a greater degree of flexibility in pursuing a monetary policy that is more appropriate to our needs. Second, we contend that there should be full disclosure by all large companies, both public and private, of the real source of ownership. Third, there should be legislation to prohibit foreign ownership in key sectors of our economy, as has already been done in the case of banks and the news media. There should be stronger anti-American combines legislation to inhibit foreign mergers, and there should be a take-over tax to restrain the absorption of Canadian businesses by foreign investors. Fourth, we believe we must establish a Canadian commercial corporation, as recommended by the Watkins Commission, to ensure that the goods produced in Canada can be sold on world markets without running afoul of the Trading with the Enemy Act in the United States.

Fifth, we must establish a Canada development corporation, publicly owned and controlled, for the purpose of directing Canadian capital into the development and expansion of Canadian industries.

The second measure we must take, in addition to getting greater Canadian economic independence, is the revision of Canada's tax structure so as to tax all forms of income on a basis of equity. The Carter Report, which was brought down in 1966, has not been acted upon. The government has repeatedly promised a white paper; we are still waiting for it. The latest date offered us is November 7.

I suggest that the Canadian people are prepared to support vital and essential public services provided the cost is borne fairly and equitably by all sections of the population. The Canadian people will not condone having an unfair share of the tax burden fall upon the middle income and lower income groups, while privileged sectors of the economy are allowed to evade their full responsibilities, as has been shown to be the case by the Carter Report.

Third, the government must step up its program to eliminate poverty and to remove regional economic disparity. A start has been made by the government in its program for regional economic development. I am glad to see from the Speech from the Throne that this is one program to which they propose to grant more money. This program, however, must be supplemented by other programs to help those who are below the poverty line, particularly the old age pensioners, veterans and other low income groups. To this end we will be pressing for the establishment of a guaranteed annual income, which in the long run is the only final solution.

Fourth, we believe that special programs must be set afoot to deal with the plight of the Indians, the Eskimos and the Metis. Canada has the productive capacity to create the wealth necessary to help the underprivileged. The economic slack from which we are suffering today represents the loss of several billion dollars a year in potential wealth production. This is why economic growth and full employment are so essential to a prosperous and united Canada. We also believe that housing, urban renewal and pollution control must be given high priority. Improving the environment of Canadians is the major task confronting this government, and a sufficiently large share of our national output must be directed to this end. Fifth, the government must tackle the problem of administered prices. Today at least two-thirds of our prices are no longer responsive to the law of supply and demand but are under the control of monopolies and quasi-monopolies which set their own prices with little regard to the marketplace.

We had a very good example today of how much the government is concerned with this problem. The Steel Company of Canada announced a 6 per cent increase in steel prices. When I asked the Prime Minister about it, he said, "We have no authority to look into wages". We are not talking about wages; we are talking about prices. Is the Prime Minister implying that the increase in the price of steel is due to the increase in wages? This is why we want an investigation.

Mr. William Mahoney, the Canadian director of the United Steel Workers of America, contends that wage increases can be completely met out of the improvement in productivity in the steel industry. I contend that if the government were doing its job it would immediately investigate this increase in the price of steel. If the contention of the steelworkers is correct, namely, that their increased wages can be met completely out of increased productivity, this government has the obligation to require the steel industry to roll prices back to their former figure.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we maintain that Canada must take a much more independent stand on foreign affairs. Our increasing economic dependency on the United States has unfortunately led to political dependency and acquiescence. Let me give some examples. First of all, the ABM system. On March 19 last, as reported at page 6853 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

> If, Mr. Speaker, after receiving all the information, we are led to the view that the ABM system constitutes escalation and is conducive to greater peril for mankind, then we shall condemn it. We shall tell the United States that we disapprove. If, on the other hand, we are convinced that the ABM system is necessary though regrettable as a move by the United States, then we shall have to decide whether or not we shall participate in the operation of that system.

The ABM system was hotly debated in Congress. It was finally passed in the Senate by a majority of only one, and was made law by the President of the United States. But during all that discussion the Prime Minister was silent. The proximity to the Canadian border of two of these bases can affect the lives of Canadian citizens. The escalation of the nuclear arms race could affect the survival of the human race, yet the Prime Minister remains silent. It is all very well for the Prime Minister to speak today in glowing terms of the survival of mankind. The time to speak out was when the whole question of the ABM system was being debated. The Prime Minister said that if the government disagreed with the system, we would condemn it and tell the United States government we disapproved of it. What has the government done? Has it condemned it? Has the government approved it, or is it merely remaining silent and acquiescing?

Another example arises directly out of the ABM system, namely, the nuclear tests at Amchitka in the Aleutians. These tests were announced many months ago but not until September 19 did the government get around to sending a note to Washington. When it did, it was such a mealy-mouthed statement that there was little hope anybody would pay any attention to it.

Two more tests of much greater magnitude are planned. What action does the government propose to take? I suggest to the Prime Minister that after all his fine words today and his expressions of hope for the abolition of nuclear armaments, he has a responsibility to tell this house, the country and the United States the stand we are going to take in respect of the two further increased magnitude tests which will be taking place at Amchitka—and to do so before the installations are in place or preparations even begin.

Another example of our acquiescence in respect of international policies concerns the question of sovereignty over Arctic waters. The discovery of large reservoirs of oil in the Arctic means that this area is now up for grabs, and that countries which looked upon it as a few thousand acres of snow and ice have now become very interested in the area. Canada is in danger of losing its sovereignty and ownership of those Arctic waters by default and by its failure to assert its basic rights. There can be no doubt about our rights.

Mr. Ivan Head, who is one of the Prime Minister's advisers, wrote of our Arctic waters a few years ago:

> —surrounded on all sides by Canadian territory they possess the character of Canadian waters.

Maxwell Cohen, dean of the law school at McGill University, points out that on the basis of the Norwegian fisheries case, decided by the International Court of Justice in 1951, Canada has a just claim to the Arctic waters as being internal waters, though subject to peaceful navigation rights from one part of the high seas to the other. Dean Cohen further points out that since 1958 the world has generally accepted the right of a coastal state to have exclusive jurisdiction over the continental shelf that extends seaward—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I thank the house for its kindness and I shall not trespass on hon. member's patience much longer. I am just about finished. Dean Cohen has pointed out that since 1958 the world has generally accepted the right of a coastal state to have exclusive jurisdiction over the continental shelf that extends seaward from the mainland to an average depth of 600 feet.

Canadians have no desire to deny peaceful passage through the Arctic waters. However, any mishap to oil tankers passing through these waters could create serious pollution problems. If we are to be the victims of any mishap, surely we are entitled to exercise proper control of these waters. To do this Canada should assert its sovereignty, lest its silence be construed as indifference.

The Prime Minister said this afternoon that legislation would be introduced in respect of the pollution of Arctic waters. We will know better, when we see the legislation, how far Canada intends to extend its sovereignty. The fact remains that a few weeks ago the Manhattan sailed through these waters with instructions from Washington not to fly the Canadian flag. This indicates that our great neighbour to the south is questioning Canada's jurisdiction in that area. It is time the government and this House of Commons—indeed this entire parliament—made its position clear not only to the Canadian people but to the nations of the world. Let me close by saying that the failure of the government to deal vigorously with some of the most pressing social and economic problems facing the Canadian people requires most vigorous action by the parties in opposition.

We listened this afternoon to the very eloquent statements made by the Prime Minister as he delineated the plight of people in various sections of Canada; but we listened in vain for any concrete or specific programs which the government has in mind to improve the conditions of the people for whom the Prime Minister shed such eloquent tears.

A Liberal government has been in office since April, 1963. They are not neophytes. The present administration has been in office since June, 1968. It has had ample time for the studies, white papers, royal commissions, interdepartmental committees and all the paraphernalia that is used to avoid having to make a decision. I say that unless the government comes up with much more specific programs and policies than we have seen to date, it will be the task of this party and the other parties in opposition to try to push the government out of its lethargy and prod it out of its self-satisfied apathy.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my first words will certainly be to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne (Mr. Cullen and Mr. Marceau). I was not here, in the house when they made their speeches but I read them this morning and, under the circumstances, I think that these hon. members have done a tremendous job while omitting to talk about the Speech from the Throne. It was rather difficult for them because the Speech did not have much substance. We can say that the government has some good intentions but that we have often witnessed in the past governments with good intentions.

That did not prevent, for instance, the seconder, the hon. member for Lapointe, from describing the beauties of his area—and I congratulate him for his sincerity—he is right. The Saguenay region is one of the most beautiful areas in Canada. He said, as evidenced on Page 9 of yesterday's Hansard and I quote:

> The people, a strong and energetic breed are represented, no doubt through a coincidence, by the colour red.

A little further on, the hon. member said:

> Unemployment now stands at the alarming level of 14 per cent. Since the labour market cannot absorb the ever increasing number of those who want to join it, qualified workers must leave the area if they do not want to graduate as jobless or become dissenters who protest against an affluent society which denies them the right to earn a decent living.

Mr. Speaker, it is well spoken and I hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will read again this part and will apply the necessary measures to alleviate this situation which prevails not only in the Saguenay area but in various other areas of the country.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Before coming to the heart of the matter, I would be remiss in my duties if I did not say that I am delighted—since the Prime Minister is in the house—with the firm stand which he has taken for some time now on the terrorists and the CBC. In fact, practically every night the national news of the CBC present Mr. Lemieux of Montreal, a professional agitator who has recently grown two tufts of hair. He looks like an African chimpanzee but he is on television almost every other day.

In the Canadian population there are quite a few sound elements which should be invited by the CBC to say what can be done to unify our country and to make people understand the advantages of a unity respecting everybody's rights. It seems to me that the CBC can still gain some ground and make some wise decisions in this field.

The right hon. Prime Minister said indeed that he trusted the new CBC board. We want to trust them also. However, we believe that if it is true that separatists are invited by the CBC to state their opinions, others should be invited too and this is exactly what CBC does not want to admit.

Mr. Speaker, this does not mean that Ottawa politicians only should be invited to speak on the CBC network.

The right hon. Prime Minister said, in a recent conference, that if its administrators cannot manage to straighten out the CBC, the government would "close shop". Ages ago I said that if the administration of the CBC or the parliament could not handle it, then it should be sold to private interests. Indeed, channel 10 in Montreal creates less trouble than channel 2 of the CBC.

The right hon. Prime Minister attacked the terrorists here in the house. I, too, have repeatedly spoken against them. That does not mean that all separatists are terrorists, nor that all terrorists are separatists. There is quite a difference between the two. One can find, amongst the terrorists, hoodlums who infiltrate organizations, especially with a view to provoking unrest, hand to hand fights, street fighting brawls or destruction, the like of which we witnessed in Montreal on October 7th last.

Mr. Speaker, certain things deserve serious examination. However, that does not necessarily excuse those who spread terror in the city of Montreal, or who would attempt to do so elsewhere. Laws are required to bring them into line; if they are not happy with living in freedom in Canada, then let them bear the yoke in Cuba or Moscow, it matters little but let them go elsewhere. In Canada, we do not want yokes and, especially, not the yoke of terrorism. We do not want that under any circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, after yesterday's afternoon sitting, I was able to hear, on the CBC news bulletin, the Right Hon. Prime Minister say, in reply to the journalists' questions, that during this session more white papers would be dealt with than legislation.

The last session was that of the just society and the fight against poverty. These matters are not dealt with in the last Speech from the Throne. This must mean that the government has achieved its objective, that of setting up a just society. It seems Canada no longer has any poor. This year, we must then prepare for next year's session and put white papers before parliament. We can then call this session that of the white papers.

A white paper on unsold grain in western Canada, on unsold fish in British Columbia and in the Maritime provinces, on water and air pollution, on consumers' credit, on the reorganization of the fiscal policy, so as to take away from those who have in order to give a little more to those who have not, by means of endless red tape, that may cost as much as the difference between what is given to the poor and what is taken away from the rich.

When things go wrong in Canada, we blame others, not ourselves. The fault lies with the Nigerians, the Biafrans, the United Nations, which are paralyzed, with the arms race, for too much money is being spent on arms. So the National Defence Department's budget is being reduced—the minister knows it—in order to improve the situation.

Yet, things remain unchanged. The fault lies with the countries that do not buy our wheat anymore. Seven or eight years ago, the government used to say to the western farmers: Come on, hurry up, produce more wheat! Six or seven years later, the same government says: Do not produce any more wheat, we cannot sell it, because our former customers have become producers.

The Prime Minister is showered with wheat when he visits Saskatchewan. Because no markets can be found for our Canadian wheat, ministers are being sent around the world to find new markets, but without much success. It is quite a problem! What would be the solution? The Prime Minister does not suggest any. He is still looking for it.

There have been no sittings of the house for the past three months. Three months ago, the Prime Minister told us he needed that time to examine the problem because the opposition would not do it. It took the Prime Minister three months to study it. He grasps well whatever he studies but he found no answer. Maybe is it because he does not understand that well when he is studying or because he simply does not want to see the answer likely to solve the problem? The answer, I shall deal with later.

If things are going the wrong way in Canada it is because of the contesting youth, it is because of the constitution, it is because of inflation. The more we talk about fighting inflation the more it seems to prevail. It is hardly mentioned in the Speech of the Throne. Everybody is aware, however, of the steady growth of inflation in every area in Canada. We find fault in everything except in ourselves.

Mr. Speaker, when Parliament adjourned, on July 25, I said to the house, as appears from the Hansard, page 11632:

> Mr. Speaker, in the public interest, I believe it is urgent that we talk, for instance, about the underdeveloped areas, the producers, the farmers, the overall agricultural policy in Canada, the social security structure that should be amended...

...indeed, there is something in this structure that does not work, right now. There are poor people lacking the social welfare they need while others, who have no right to it, are getting it. A number of scandals were brought out into the light, in the province of Quebec, and it appeared that Ottawa had paid 50 p. 100 of all the amounts of moneys stolen from the coffers of the Quebec government, right into the very department of the social security or social welfare of that province. Cases are now pending, at the courts. We shall make no comment right now, but will deal with that matter in due time.

—old age pensions, pensions to veterans and retired people.

Those are matters that should be discussed at the earliest possible date. The government has now been asked for three, four or even five years to consider answers in order to help these retired people. I can hear the minister answering: "The opposition is asking us to spend more money."

But the government has less and less money. And the Treasury will run dry because precisely the government allows financial sharks to increase their interest rates.

This is the primary cause due to the fact that the government is now at grips with that very financial system.

The government will be supplied by financial sources on which it has to pay accrued interest. If it borrows $1 million or $1 billion—

...on a 20-year basis...

—it will have to pay back—

more than $2 billion when the loan will fall due.

And to pay off the second billion, it would have to borrow again, because this is how the system works.

And as I was saying then, the government seemed to recognize its priority needs.

Evidently, the government intends to introduce legislations concerning underprivileged areas, farmers, unemployment insurance, pensions, social security. However, it fails to introduce the main measure, the most important, that which I suggested when I said:

—the members of the Ralliement créditiste maintain that the first thing to settle in Canada is the monetary system.

It should be settle not according to the will of the hon. member for Temiscamingue or that of the prime minister of Canada, but by means of a credit control commission that will grant the necessary credit to finance economic development, in Canada and in the province.

The government should introduce in the house a precise, clear and lucid legislative program applying to the Canadian monetary system, where can be traced back inflation, the subject the prime minister has dealt with so often these last months.

He dealt with it and we are sinking deeper and deeper into inflation which enables the rich to get richer and the poor to get poorer. This is the system in which we operate and as long as that system controls the destiny of our nation, we will be in the same mess. Whether it be under the government of this Prime Minister or of a future one, we always end up in a dead end. A solution is impossible to find. Such is the situation in which we find ourselves.

The Prime Minister replied, as reported on page 11632 of Hansard of July 25, 1969, that the hon. member for Témiscamingue, the leader of the Ralliement créditiste did not surprise him, and I quote:

He was never in power and he will never be. He does not know what is a government.

Did the Prime Minister know in 1942 what a government was when he was campaigning for the CCF party in the North-West of Quebec? Does the Prime Minister remember when he came to Rouyn with Mrs. Thérèse Casgrain to speak about the CCF? Did the Prime Minister know what a government is all about, before being elected as a Liberal member?

Mr. Trudeau: Don't talk about my private life.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to hear the Prime Minister tell me not to talk about his private life because if I had to choose between his private life, when he was a supporter of the CCF party and his public life, now that he is a Liberal, I wonder sometimes if I would not choose to support him in his private life rather than in his political life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister became a Liberal in 1965, was he aware at that time of what is understood by government. In 1962 and 1963, when the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada wrote at that time that Liberals were fools, did he know what a government really is like?

He stated in the house on July 25th that I did not know about it. Still I was seated here, in 1946, and not on the other side; on this side. It allows us to see what a government can do. We noticed that since the Liberals took office in 1963, the situation has deteriorated and the present economic conditions in Canada have become awful.

And that is not simply true of our province of Quebec as we often hear it said. Let us go in the Maritimes, in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick. Everybody is faced with a production problem.

Earlier, I was talking about western wheat, but, Mr. Speaker, in Quebec, we have a milk surplus and an overproduction of lumber. In the Lake St. John area, there was a surplus of blueberries this year. Then, you go to New Brunswick—

Mr. Drury: Only one.

Mr. Caouette: That is true, the minister is right and in fact, the hon. member for Lapointe mentioned that according to an old saying, two berries were enough to make a pie in the Lake St. John area. But he told us yesterday that a single one was enough. We have the proof of it: the hon. member for Lapointe is here.

Some hon. Members: Ha! Ha!

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, New Brunswick is faced with an over-production of potatoes and southern Ontario with an overproduction of corn.

Our mining areas are in an appalling state of stagnation. In western Canada, it is the wheat. There, students at the Winnipeg University, pay their schooling expenses with barley, I think. That solution has been devised because there is no money.

The right hon. Prime Minister said further that although I have never been in power or been a minister:

A very long time ago, no doubt,

when the member,

was still a child he stated his political theory and economic philosophy. Everything boils down to the monetary system. He found the truth, several years ago. He thinks he can stop thinking, studying and examining because he has the answer to everything: the reform of the monetary system.

The right hon. Prime Minister used those terms, Mr. Speaker.

If there is too much pollution it is because of the monetary system.

There is some truth in that. The right hon. Prime Minister was not entirely wrong. He was jesting, at times, but what is lacking in order to fight pollution in the Canadian waters? Ask the authorities of the province of Quebec! It is not the means of halting pollution that is lacking. It is indeed the money to do it.

We hear the Prime Minister of Quebec blaming the Prime Minister of Canada, and the Prime Minister of Canada answering the Prime Minister of Quebec.

Recently a Frenchman ending on a "Ski" came to Quebec to interpret the constitution, and I congratulate once again the right hon. Prime Minister upon the attitude which he took at that time, when he said that it does not belong to guys from France nor from England to interpret the Canadian constitution anywhere in Canada. Let Canadians do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: Why did the Frenchman from France, the French Secretary of State who came to tell the Quebecers what to do, not tell the Michelin Compagnie of France to come and settle in the province of Quebec, instead of going to Nova Scotia if he is so anxious to organize cultural and commercial exchanges between Quebec and France? This shows a lack of sincerity.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, to return to the problem, it is a financial problem.

The city of Montreal was recently faced with a gory revolt. The army had to be called, as well as the provincial police, and the municipal authorities said quite frankly that if their protection system was not too efficient it was because of a lack of funds. There would be no shortage of policemen if there was enough money to pay them.

And I wonder why the right hon. Prime Minister whom I believe to be a very intelligent man cannot understand that the monetary problem is the basic problem in the whole economic and social structure of Canada. This does not mean that money is a deity we should worship; it is a means of exchange that should be put to our service. That's what money is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: The leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas) said earlier that we fail to build hospitals and roads because we lack money. We never worry about the material, the skill, the engineers, the contractors and the rest of it, for we know that we have them. We know that we have no money. That is why the right hon. Prime Minister is trying hard to tell us: "Practice restraint." We tell the municipalities and the provinces: "Do not spend."

In Ottawa, we are going to stop spending, up will go the number of unemployed in Canada; a feeling of insecurity is settling in every area, not only in those I mentioned earlier but everywhere, for such is the situation in the country.

What is going on in the lake St. John area, in the Abitibi area? Two thirds of Canada are considered nowadays as designated areas. And the Prime Minister thinks it hilarious whenever we talk of monetary reform.

This year for instance, everybody shows compassion for the fate of our young people. Poor young people, we must help them!

According to the speech from the throne, it is the Prime Minister's intention to propose a legislation in order that the voting age be lowered to 18, as if that were to feed the young who are hungry. The Prime Minister knows that thousands of young people coming out of multipurpose schools, CEGEPs and universities this year were unsuccessful in their search of employment.

Mr. Speaker, is it not pitiful to see in 1969 a 17, 18 or 19 year-old boy, who has to ask his father, who may be a miner in the Noranda mine, an employee of the Canadian Vickers in Montreal, or of Canadair or of a Winnipeg or Toronto industry, to lend him 25¢, 50¢ or $1 so that he may go to see a movie or buy cigarettes, even if we are told that cigarettes cause cancer?

Mr. Speaker, we know such is the position in which our young people find themselves at the present time and then we are surprised whenever they rebel and question the doings of their elders. We are surprised to see them brutalize somewhat a society into which they cannot integrate.

In that case, Mr. Speaker, should we sincerely blame the young people who wish to form an integral part of the Canadian society? Should we not blame rather their elders, the people in power, who prevent young people from being a part of that society through a lack of responsibility or of legislation at all administrative levels, whether it be municipal, provincial or federal.

Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Prime Minister continued, saying:

If housing is in a bad way, the monetary system is to blame. Canadian participation abroad also depends on the monetary system.

There are fewer problems there. The necessary funds are usually found for foreign aid. But when it comes to helping our own country, they cannot be found.

Here, I say what I have always said: I am in favour of foreign aid to the greatest possible extent, but if we can, as people, as a government, as a parliament, grant loans without interest, for periods of 50 and 60 years to such countries as India, South America, and other under-developed countries in the world, why can the parliament, the government not legislate to allow interest-free loans to be granted to our provinces, our municipalities, our school boards, for terms as long as those? If those loans are a good thing for foreigners, they should also be of help to the provinces, the municipalities, the school boards; they should provide for work in exactly the same way as they do in foreign countries.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was a bit sharp, when he said speaking of the Creditiste members and I quote:

• (4:20 p.m.)

—and for that, of course, they must talk. And in order to do so they must, of course, be in the house. Give them holidays and they vanish out of the picture. They become nobodies—they are just nil.

And at that point, the Liberals cheered.

—They are here, Mr. Speaker, to be seen and to be heard.

However, the Prime Minister should admit that if we are here to be seen and to be heard, it is not thanks to him or to the Liberals who did everything, who contrived every means possible to get rid of us. We have not disappeared. We even came back in greater numbers than before. Why? Because we do not make ourselves heard only in parliament. If the Prime Minister does not know it, he will learn it very soon. We meet people elsewhere; we live with them, year round, holidays or no holidays. We mind our business, as Canon Groulx used to say, and I quote:

Mind your business, but do mind them!

That is exactly what the members of our party are doing here. We are not here simply to try to replace others, but to make concrete and logical suggestions to the government.

The Prime Minister should look at us and take us seriously, instead of blabbing nonsense about us without acknowledging the tremendous work we do. He said, and I quote:

They need a forum and there is none except in the house. They do not want to go in their constituencies, because the people there do not want to see them. They have heard the same things over and over again for too many years. Well, they are welcome to stay in Ottawa if they like.

In the circumstances, the prime minister should have known from experience. He said, and I quote:

They have heard the same things over and over again for too many years.

The same things, that is precisely what we have been hearing, here, in the house, for seven years. We are told of poverty prevailing in this or that area of the country, of our products that cannot be sold. Now, we even hear about paying the farmers so much per acre as a premium for not growing wheat. We shall soon be thinking of paying the potato growers for not growing potatoes. Then, we shall live in a well-balanced and fully just society: one where payments will encourage curtailment of production and where the number of Canadian unemployed will be maintained and increased.

Mr. Speaker, such speeches as the Speech from the Throne we have heard will not settle the problem.

At the beginning of the speech for instance, the government makes known its intention to take certain measures regarding our international relations and I quote:

—the means at our disposal for bringing these conflicts to an end are necessarily limited, but the government is making full use of its opportunities—

While the government is making full use of those means, the world crisis is getting worse. There is less and less understanding between countries.

A little further, in its Speech from the Throne, the government expresses the hope to extend franchise to the eighteen year olds who actually need the right to live rather than the right to vote. If we could give our young generation the possibility of earning an honest and honourable living, there would be less tragedies such as the ones we have to face now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but under the standing orders, the time allotted to him has expired. Unless he obtains the unanimous consent of the hon. members he cannot go on.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I will not take undue advantage of the broadmindness shown by the hon. members who have allowed me to carry on. It will only take me a few more minutes.

I did have quite a lot to say, but I must be brief.

I come back immediately to the franchise at 18 years of age. We are in favour of it. I would like to draw the attention of the Prime Minister in this connection. As far as 1946, when I was first elected, I asked in this house that the franchise be extended to the 18 year-old, explaining that if our young people were old enough to be enlisted at 18 in the Canadian Army, they were old enough to vote, decide their future and what is to be done in Canada. Since then, exactly 23 years have elapsed. Therefore the Prime Minister is 23 years late on that matter.

Mr. Speaker, we can also read in the Speech from the Throne, the following and I quote:

History, geography and economics ... have placed certain of our citizens at a disadvantage.

I said a few words about it a moment ago.

History, geography and economics appear to have taken such an importance that they involve every region of Canada. But in that chapter, this government states that it will take measures concerning the designated areas that suffer from serious disadvantages in the volume of employment and average income, that it will introduce legislation in order to help them. But, it does not say in what way and does not refer to any specific program. You may send fifty-year old chaps back to school to retrain them but to retrain western farmers or New Brunswick potato growers is rather difficult. On the contrary, we should produce what we can produce and, as I said earlier, help under-developed countries as much as possible, without affecting for all that the normal development of our Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker, a little farther, further reference is made to inflation, implying that the government had fought it efficiently by levying a new tax and reducing expenditures. Only, this resulted in an increased number of unemployed in Canada, more especially in the province of Quebec, where the unemployment rate reaches about 40 to 42 per cent of the total number of jobless in Canada.

Should we hold only the federal government responsible for this situation? No. Authroities in Quebec should also take their responsibilities in that area, because some works fall under provincial jurisdiction but cannot be done by the province. Why? Because it says: Ottawa is encroaching upon the taxation field. Ottawa is responsible for the things we do not have.

But all the while Ottawa is being run down, no legislation is adopted in the province of Quebec, so much so that everyone is getting annoyed with this situation. For example, while in Quebec they keep saying that Ottawa is not giving them what belongs to them, at every official opening in the province, a federal member of parliament or a federal minister is invited, but they are afraid to let him address the public because he is from Ottawa, as if French Canadian members of the House of Commons were not French Canadians from Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I am as good a French-Canadian patriot as any nationalist of the province of Quebec and here in Ottawa. I am proud to represent a Quebec riding, with dignity I hope, as a French-Canadian and as a Canadian. This is not yet understood in Quebec. There is some reluctance, it is believed in Quebec that Ottawa is removed from all that.

Mr. Speaker, the other day, the Prime Minister was right when he said that Canada's address is Ottawa. It is, for all those who have business to do in Canada, whether it is in New Brunswick, in Quebec, in Nova Scotia. This does not prevent the provinces from having rights and from taking their responsibilities. The constitution now gives them those rights; they only have to use them and enforce them. That is all there is to do.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne also states, and I quote:

> The structure of our tax system must be adapted to reflect more accurately the true circumstances of individual Canadians and of business organizations in our modern society.

The Prime Minister just said: Take some money from those who earn more and give it to those who earn less, in order to balance the system.

We are against taking money from those who do have some, so as to avoid stifling personal initiative and to help the private sector. Do not take from the individual his sources of income, because his drive will disappear, and with the disappearance of ambition, out goes progress.

With the huge output we produce each year in Canada, which total salaries and profits cannot buy because they are insufficient, we say that a national dividend should be distributed to each and every Canadian citizen in order to have this purchasing power counterbalance our huge national output. Then, Mr. Speaker, without harming anyone, we would strike an almost perfect economic balance.

There will be no perfection, of course, but near-perfect equilibrium in the purchasing power of consumers, without taking anything away from anybody, because we are against socialist policies which consist in taking from those who have and hand it to those who have not, as they say in English.

[English]

Take away from the "haves" to give to the "have nots". Ultimately we will have all kinds of "have nots" and no more "haves" in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that is exactly where we are going with such a socialist policy. We believe that the government will introduce concrete legislation during this session and we shall study it objectively. We are not here merely to say no, no, no to the government and the Prime Minister.

If the Prime Minister does something which makes sense, I am the first one to congratulate him. A moment ago I did so sincerely and openly because I like to see a man who takes a stand and has the courage to say what he thinks.

There is a song often heard in Quebec: "Say what you think, do as you say, but be yourself in the world of today." I agree with the song because it really means something: "Say what you think, do as you say." The Prime Minister usually says what he thinks but, sometimes, he forgets to do as he says. I should like to see him do as he says, and be himself in this world of today.

I believe it would then be possible to provide Canada, this country of ours, with a sound and progressive administration, to reactivate our economy so that every social class in Canada may share in it.

Any association exists for the benefit of its members. The members, here, are the Canadian people. We represent here those people and we must give the whole population a share in Canada's enormous wealth. Our role as members of Parliament is to pass legislation, to set everything in motion and to give every Canadian economic security and individual freedom.

[English]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I move that this debate be now adjourned.

[Translation]

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

My hon. friend from Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) dubbed me a blueberry. Perhaps this is the best compliment that was ever paid to me. However, I should like to point out that to be truly a blueberry, you must have a blue belly. I doubt I can go that far.

[English]

On motion of Mr. Hees the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Olson the house adjourned at 4.35 p.m., pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, October 27, 1969

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

USE OF ABRIDGED ORDER PAPER, DISTRIBUTION OF DAILY PUBLICATIONS

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will recall that during the last session an abridged version of the order paper was produced on an experimental basis. The primary purpose of the experiment was to reduce the very high cost of the printing of parliamentary publications without reducing the information provided to hon. members. After consultations with the house leaders of the various parties it appears that hon. members would agree that the abridged version of the order paper only should be published for a further experimental period. Should the short version prove unsatisfactory the regular version would be reintroduced.

Hon. members noticed, I am sure, the great volume of Hansards, order papers and other papers which accumulated under their desks in the past session. Following consultations with the several house leaders it has been agreed that the filing of such papers under members' desks could be discontinued. It is therefore proposed that the day-to-day papers and publications will continue to be placed on hon. members' desks but that those papers will be removed at the close of each day. An adequate supply of back issues in both languages will be maintained in both lobbies. The ordinary distribution to members' offices will continue as in the past.

[Translation]

I hope that hon. members will find such arrangements acceptable. I shall be pleased to receive suggestions and they will be given due consideration.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

ASSERTION OF CONTROL OVER ARCTIC WATERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's statement last Friday about pollution control and international agreements, is it the position of his government that Canada now exercises and intends to assert full sovereign control over all the waters of the Canadian Arctic and particularly over the waters between the islands of the Arctic?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I can say yes, Mr. Speaker. This government does take the position that it exercises sovereignty over all the waters of the Canadian Arctic.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the Prime Minister received the recommendation from the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development that the government take action as quickly as possible to declare Canada's sovereignty over these waters, which, incidentally, was a unanimous recommendation?

Mr. Trudeau: I have not received this communication yet but I will look into it.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the right hon. gentleman take some time in the next two or three weeks and possibly table a map showing what in his opinion is the Canadian Arctic and the related seas?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, I could take some time to consider it, and in the meantime, if the hon. member would draw some lines on a map, they might help me.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a further supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In order to avoid any possibility of misunderstanding, am I to take it from what the Prime Minister said that Canada does claim jurisdiction and sovereign control over all the waters between the islands in the Canadian Arctic?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition is talking about the Canadian Arctic, then I repeat, yes, we do exercise jurisdiction and we intend to exercise our sovereignty over that part of the world.

Mr. Stanfield: In order to avoid any misunderstanding, would the Prime Minister directly answer my question whether or not the government of Canada claims jurisdiction and is going to exercise jurisdiction over all the waters between the islands of the Canadian Arctic, for example, all the waters in the Canadian archipelago—the waters between the islands?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the answer once again is that the waters which Canada claims as its own will be the object of the exercise of sovereignty by the Canadian government, but I am not prepared to state at this particular time where the lines will be drawn.

Mr. Stanfield: As a further supplementary question, am I to take it then that the Prime Minister has not yet made any statement with regard to Canada's claim over the waters between the islands and, if so, how does Canada propose to exercise pollution control with respect to the waters between the islands?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is asking me to anticipate the bill which we have said we will introduce in this session of Parliament. That bill will indicate how we intend to exercise control over pollution of these waters.

Mr. Stanfield: One further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the bill also indicate the areas and define the waters over which Canada intends to exercise pollution control?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I repeated during the debate on the Speech from the Throne that if there are any constructive suggestions from the Opposition, if they could indicate where in their opinion the lines might be drawn, this might permit us, before introducing the bill, to alter our projected drawings.

LABOUR RELATIONS

LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRESS TOWARD SETTLEMENT

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. In view of the increasing impact on the British Columbia economy resulting from the waterfront dispute in Vancouver, with an additional 2,400 employees being laid off today by one company in the forest industry, can the minister bring the house up to date and report on any progress made in his or departmental officials' discussions over the weekend with both parties to the dispute?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday afternoon I met with representatives of the union's negotiating team and last night I met with the representatives of the BCMEA, the management organization. I shall have a further meeting today with the BCMEA. We have succeeded in clarifying the particular points in the proposed collective agreement to which the unions felt they had objection. I do not think the difficulties are insurmountable, and if progress were to continue today as rapidly as it did yesterday this strike could very well come to an end.

I am very pleased to answer the hon. member, who is so knowledgeable about labour aims, and I am sure he would be the last one in this House not to recognize that this strike could be settled tonight if the union were to ratify the agreement which their negotiators thought desirable. If the hon. member is suggesting that I should bring in restrictive legislation, perhaps he could help me draft it, but in the meantime I am trying to settle the strike in the very near future by collective agreement.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the minister suggested that I am recommending restrictive legislation because he knows I am not. That was a statement he made, not an answer to my question. As a supplementary question may I ask whether in the discussions he held with the union negotiating committee and the employers the point was raised that as the result of a subsequent dispute there might be a further hold-up caused by the threat of dispatchers to place picket lines around the port if they are not recognized as a collective bargaining unit?

Mr. Mackasey: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

HARBOURS

INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF PORT IN NEW QUEBEC

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question which arises from the huge mining developments now contemplated for the northern part of New Quebec and which follows up earlier questions.

Would the Prime Minister tell us whether talks have been held or are now going on with the Quebec government, in connection with the building of harbour facilities at Wakeham Bay, in the Bay of Ungava, or elsewhere in the Hudson Strait, in order to guarantee to those mining companies that they will be sure to ship their ore?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of such talks, but I shall inquire, probably of the Minister of Public Works who must know something about it, since harbours are involved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FRANCE—COMPLAINT RESPECTING ACTION OF CANADIAN EMBASSY OFFICIAL

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He is not here, although this is Monday, but I presume there is an acting minister. Can the minister advise if the government of Canada has received through official channels complaints from the French government that the senior counsellor at our Paris embassy interfered improperly with the conduct of the recent French national elections in an effort to force a French official to visit Ottawa as well as Quebec? If so, what has been Canadian response and attitude thereto?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have been notified of this claim and my reaction is that it is preposterous. Nevertheless, I am asking that a report be made to me about the details.

Mr. Macquarrie: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister giving consideration to any discussions or conversations which might seek to forestall a further cooling off in the relations between France and Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Am I giving further consideration to conversations which might help to forestall a further cooling off? Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what is intended by the question, but we are in the process of discussing with the French government the procedure that French ministers will be expected to follow in the future when visiting Canada.

NIGERIA-BIAFRA—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASED CONTRIBUTION TO INTERNATIONAL RED CROSS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance attached to the International Red Cross in the Speech from the Throne in respect of the Nigerian-Biafran situation and in view of the announcement by that agency of a cut-back in aid to the victims of the Nigerian-Biafran war because of financial difficulties, is the government considering an increase in its contribution to that agency?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Did I understand the hon. member to say, Mr. Speaker, that the International Red Cross said they were cutting back aid? I am afraid I did not understand.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that was the basis of my question.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, this assumes that they have ceased to believe that they can find a working arrangement for flying relief to the Biafran population and—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In order to clarify the matter, may I put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As I understood it, the announcement was that the cut-back was being made because of a shortage of funds; hence my question, is the government considering increasing its contribution to make up for this shortage?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we believe that the International Red Cross is now in the process of trying to establish procedures whereby it will be able to fly further relief into Biafra, and the government is prepared to continue its support if these endeavours are successful. I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated that if these efforts are not successful, if we cannot get authority from Colonel Ojukwu for the Red Cross to fly by day and if arrangements cannot be made for flights to be made safely at night, then we shall have to look at other arrangements. But these are hypothetical questions. We still hope that either Colonel Ojukwu will let daylight flights take place in order that the starving population may be relieved or that, alternatively, they will be given safe conduct for flights at night.

FEED GRAIN FREIGHT ASSISTANCE—RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION AS TO RATE

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the urgent protest by the Nova Scotia Federation of Agriculture over the Minister of Agriculture's recently announced reduction of feed grain freight assistance rates to eastern Canada, is he now reconsidering that decision?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker. I should like to make clear the announcement we made last week. There is not to be a reduction in the over-all amount. In fact, there is to be—with approval of this House—an increase in the amount of over-all feed grain assistance. Because of the substantially increased volume, if we are to stay within the limit of the estimates passed by the House, we have to reduce the rates somewhat.

Mr. Danforth: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister knows that between 75 per cent and 80 per cent of all feed grain used in Nova Scotia is imported from western Canada, does he not feel that as a result of this policy we run the risk not only of discouraging western export to the east but also of undermining the competitive position of western farmers at this very grave period in agriculture?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the supplementary is argumentative.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When will the Minister of Agriculture inform the public of the extent to which feed grain assistance will be reduced?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I believe that has already been done by the Feed Freight Assistance Board. However, I will check to make sure that the exact amounts have been made public so that changes in each zone will be known. I believe, however, that this has already been done.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS FOR HAMILTON SEWAGE CONTROL SYSTEM

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the government reconsidering as a matter of policy the refusal of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to lend funds for a sewage control system for Hamilton?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe this matter is now under consideration but I am not aware of the final decision of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Aiken: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I direct to the Prime Minister, about the funds that are being made available for municipal loans to be used for sewage treatment plants. In its cut-back of funds generally being made available, is the government reconsidering its policy with respect to municipal sewage treatment plants?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think this question might properly be addressed to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing who is responsible for that aspect of the matter.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, may I clarify the question. As a result of a general policy statement I take it that the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing does not have the necessary funds from the government. All I am asking the Prime Minister is—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might ask his supplementary. I think it might be easier to consider the matter that way. I do not think we should hear an explanation from the hon. member.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is: Is a general review of policy being made with regard to making more funds available for municipal sewage treatment plants?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, a general policy review is being conducted on the whole question of housing.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEEL PRICE INCREASES—INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the announcement by the Prime Minister last Friday that the government does not intend to give specific powers to the Prices and Incomes Commission to deal with the particular case of the steel industry, has the government requested—not instructed—the Prices and Incomes Commission to investigate the steel price increase in order to ascertain if it is justified? Also, has the minister or any other member of the government made representations to the steel industry requesting that the increase be justified?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have had discussions with the members of the Prices and Incomes Commission from time to time, yes.

Mr. Benjamin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not doubt that ministers have had discussions with members of the commission. But did those ministers request the commission to investigate this matter? Also, is the government considering ordering the steel industry to roll back its prices in the light of information now available?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, as to the first part of the question, the Prime Minister made the government's position clear on Friday. As to the second part, I think it would be more properly answered by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I ask the minister whether he is taking enough interest in this question to know whether in fact the Prices and Incomes Commission is conducting an investigation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the question in this form is unacceptable. The Leader of the Opposition has asked if the minister in fact has taken enough interest, and in this way the question is not acceptable.

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps I might rephrase my question. With proper respect for the minister, I ask him if he knows whether the Prices and Incomes Commission is in fact conducting such an investigation?

Mr. Basford: With proper respect to the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Speaker, some discussions have been held. I do not think the commission has yet made a decision on this matter.

CONSTRUCTION OF PLACE RADIO-CANADA

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Could he inform the house as to the present stage of the construction of the new C.B.C. buildings?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Insofar as I know, Mr. Speaker, the work is proceeding according to plan.

PUBLIC SERVICE

METHOD OF REDUCTION OF PERSONNEL

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I wish to address my question to the Prime Minister. The government has made it clear it intends to carry out its reduction of the civil service by 25,000 partly by attrition and partly by dismissals but has not indicated the proportion of each. Because of the great uncertainty in the civil service about this matter, will the Prime Minister now indicate approximately what proportion of the 25,000 people will involve dismissals?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I did that, Mr. Speaker, early in August. I made it clear that the total figure of 25,000 was a reduction of the establishment figure for next year compared with that of last year. With respect to that 25,000, we gave instructions to departments to apply the guidelines. It is up to each minister to say how the guidelines apply in his department and how much program cutting or personnel cutting he will have to undertake. I indicated also that it was my assessment it might mean between 4,000 and 6,000 layoffs, the rest being either posts which are not filled or which become vacant as a result of attrition. The figure of 4,000 to 6,000 was an outside figure. Since then I believe officials of the Treasury Board have indicated it might be lower.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. As it is the government's intention to cut down wherever possible on civil servants, and particularly in the Department of External Affairs, has the government given consideration to having the task of envoy to the Vatican performed by our present ambassador to Italy who lives in the same city as the Vatican, as the Prime Minister well knows, can be in constant touch and would be able to carry out this task very well?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is unusual for any country to be represented at the Vatican by its ambassador in Rome. My understanding is that if we are going to have a double accreditation the Vatican prefers to have some other ambassador from elsewhere rather than the ambassador in Rome. This matter has been considered and we decided on balance that it was important enough to have an ambassador at the Vatican.

Mr. Hees: A further supplementary. As the Prime Minister has always prided himself on being a man of intuition, is the fact it has not been done before the reason for not doing it now?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

BABY FOODS—PROTECTION AGAINST HARMFUL SUBSTANCES

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In the light of evidence that certain baby foods may contain substances likely to cause brain damage, what steps, if any, has the minister taken to investigate the properties of baby foods produced in Canada and to ensure that any harmful substances are omitted from the preparation of such foods?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I can advise the hon. member that the Food and Drug Directorate in Canada has been conducting studies on baby foods for three years. We have not come up with any evidence at all to suggest that any harm of the nature the hon. member suggests is caused to babies or human beings generally. I also add, in view of alarm over this matter as well as about cyclamates the other day, that the Food and Drug Directorate is reviewing the over-all policy with respect to food additives generally to decide whether there should be more positive criteria to ensure that they have some tangible effect rather than just not do any harm.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister satisfied in view of recent experience that his forces and staff in connection with this kind of investigation are adequate for the purpose of protecting the Canadian people?

Mr. Munro: I am advised that the Food and Drug Directorate indicated earlier they need a substantial increase in staff and this is one of the areas where the government has not taken action to drastically reduce the manpower allocation. In fact, the Food and Drug Directorate are now hiring additional people.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Later:]

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps I might return to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker, and ask him whether he meant to indicate that the staff of the Food and Drug Directorate had, in fact, been increased, or whether it had simply not been decreased? If he meant to indicate that there had been an increase, can he tell us the extent of the increase which has been authorized?

Mr. Munro: Yes. The number of positions has been increased compared with the previous level. I cannot give the Leader of the Opposition the exact figure now, but I believe it is somewhere between 150 and 200 positions.

PROPOSED U.S. NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister inform the house of the Canadian position toward the further proposed United States nuclear tests on Amchitka Island in the Aleutians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not informed of that—I am sorry, the further tests?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There are two more coming.

Mr. Trudeau: In a couple of years' time. If it is the Aleutian Islands, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, I misunderstood. If that is the question, I understand that the preceding test will be a subject of lengthy assessment by the United States government and there are a couple of more years to go before they contemplate proceeding with their next test. Anything can happen between now and two years hence.

Mr. Baldwin: You might not be around to protest.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Does the Canadian government intend to make our position known to the United States before they decide whether to go ahead with these tests?

Mr. Trudeau: We did make our position known before the last test, and I think, it is a fair assumption that, when we know about the results of that one, we will make our position known again prior to any future tests.

POST OFFICE

LETTER CARRIER SERVICE—INQUIRY AS TO MORATORIUM ON EXPANSION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is for the Postmaster General. Has the hon. gentleman imposed a moratorium on the expansion of house to house delivery in our rapidly growing urban communities? If so, for what reason and how long will the moratorium continue?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Because of the guidelines and the financial restrictions laid on the department we are not extending letter carrier service to new areas, but within areas which are now provided with letter carrier service there will be a continuing increase in services.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary. Is this a part of the improved services under the recent increase in postal rates?

POSITION OF HARBOURS BOARD EMPLOYEES AS A RESULT OF LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. He is not here but in view of the importance of the matter I would ask whoever is replying for him to answer the following question. In view of the urgency of the situation which is affecting some 65 Harbours Board employees in Vancouver and many others in British Columbia, has any decision been reached to assist them in view of the lay-offs occasioned by the waterfront dispute? Federal employees are not now entitled to unemployment insurance, welfare or government salary.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There will be somebody to answer for the Department of Transport tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FUTURE ACTIVITIES—POSITION OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Last Wednesday I asked him two questions with regard to the Prices and Incomes Commission. Your Honour suggested that the answers would be better incorporated in a statement on motions. I now ask the minister if he is prepared to make a statement on motions shortly with regard to the future activities of the Prices and Incomes Commission and the position of the chairman?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I do not see why a statement should be necessary. There is no question as to the position of the chairman; he is the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission and he will from time to time be making statements as to the work of the commission. I am not sure that I understood the question fully.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Perhaps the minister would read the questions as I phrased them last Wednesday. He would then be in a better position to judge them, as would Your Honour.

HOCKEY CANADA

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ACTIVITIES

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the uncertainty and concern of sports commentators and Canadian hockey fans about the operation of Hockey Canada and, indeed, the very fate of Canada's national hockey team, will the minister take the earliest possible opportunity to make a complete and detailed statement to the House concerning the activities of our national hockey representatives in future months?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am advised that a complete statement will be made by Hockey Canada in Winnipeg on November 18 setting out their approach and their plans for development so far as hockey generally throughout Canada is concerned. The announcement will also include the names of many of the personnel who will be serving our national team. I think the hon. member will be pleased, indeed, when he sees it.

MANPOWER

SOUTHERN ALBERTA—EMPLOYMENT OF INDIANS IN SUGAR BEET FIELDS—REPORTED DEPLORABLE CONDITIONS

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): My question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Will the minister investigate reports that his department has been encouraging Indians from northern Saskatchewan to move to southern Alberta to work in sugar beet fields under deplorable conditions—and I emphasize the words "deplorable conditions"?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I shall be happy to investigate the situation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—POSITION OF EXTRADITION APPLICATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): In view of statements in the press and over the radio during the weekend to the effect that the Canadian government considers its application to the United States government for the extradition of Hal Banks to be a closed book, will the minister assure the House that this is not the case?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): The last time the hon. gentleman asked me a question about that gentleman was on May 15. I informed the house then that inquiries were being made at my request by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, of the Secretary of State's department in Washington to ascertain the position of the State Department on this matter. In September the State Department indicated to the Canadian ambassador in Washington that the Department of the Secretary of State of the United States did not intend to reopen the Banks matter or to take any initiative in respect of it. The department did indicate that while it was open to the Canadian government to start all over again in an attempt to obtain a new extradition order from the courts, there was no suggestion that such an application would meet with success.

Indeed, it was pointed out by the legal adviser to the State Department that since, apparently, there were no new matters of fact and no new questions of law bearing on the extraditability of Mr. Banks the courts might well decide, on an application for habeas corpus, that the case should be put to rest. This advice accords with the view, which I have related to the House, of our own adviser in New York, counselor Richard Kuh, who had represented the Ontario attorney general at the earlier extradition proceedings, that the matter could not be reopened before the courts and was exhausted. This being so—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I assume the minister is reaching a conclusion to the statement he has been making. He appreciates, I am sure, that according to the rules a statement of this kind should be made on motions and should not be made to the House by way of an answer to a question.

Mr. Hees: Perhaps I could ask a supplementary question that will give the minister another kick-off. Is it not true that the negative attitude now being adopted by the United States government is due precisely to the fact that the Canadian government let it be known in United States quarters that it would be most happy if the Hal Banks case could be quietly dropped because it would be very embarrassing to the Canadian government if he were to come back here and tell his story?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's supplementary is obviously argumentative and cannot be considered as a kick-off for a further statement by the minister.

Mr. Hees: It was a statement of fact.

SOCIAL SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WILLARD REPORT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the government considered tabling the Willard report or reports, if there are several, in order that parliament as a whole might participate in the decision-making with respect to any changes in our social welfare and social security program?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker. The government has not arrived at a decision as to tabling or not tabling the Willard report. I would point out to the hon. member, however, that the Speech from the Throne does refer to a white paper on social security which will be brought before parliament in the course of the next few months.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the possible tabling of the Willard report still under consideration by the government?

Mr. Munro: It is under consideration, but no decision has been reached.

FLOODS

APPROVAL OF DAMAGE CLAIM SUBMITTED BY SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works or whoever may be answering for his department. Can the minister tell us whether the federal government has approved the flood damage claim submitted by the province of Saskatchewan and, if so, did it allocate the full $3,500,000 claimed by the province? May I direct my question to the Prime Minister? Has Treasury Board approved this flood damage claim?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I heard the supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, but I did not know to what it was supplementary.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF COST OF HEALTH SERVICES UNDER MEDICARE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister use the good offices of his department, which was established to protect consumers, to investigate the reason most Canadians are paying more for their health services under the national medicare plan while receiving less protection?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I am not sure that the allegations contained in the question are not true at all. It seems to me that because of the action taken by this government we have exceedingly good medical care in Canada.

MANPOWER

RETRAINING AND UPGRADING PROGRAMS—REPORTED SERIOUS DROPOUT RATE

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): My question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister have any plans, such as the provision of improved counselling, to overcome what is reported to be a serious dropout rate among students enrolled in manpower retraining and upgrading programs?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the hon. member would not agree that his question asks for the kind of information which ought to be given to the House, if the minister agrees, by way of a statement on motions.

Mr. Rose: Might I rephrase my question, then, and ask the minister whether he will investigate this particular problem?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I will be happy to do so. I would say in a preliminary way, however, that I do not believe the dropout rate is as reported by the hon. member. As a matter of fact, the record is extremely good.

The Address—Mr. Hees

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Friday, October 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Jack Cullen for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stanfield (p. 34), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands) (p. 47).

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before we proceed with the order of the day called by the Clerk I must say that a little earlier I saw the hon. member for Comox-Alberni rising. I assume he wished to ask a question. In view of the fact that we have now moved on to the orders of the day, perhaps he would wait until tomorrow; I shall make sure he is recognized in good time tomorrow.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commence by doing what those who have preceded me in the debate have wisely and fairly done. I should like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address. I think each did a very excellent job in bringing his views to the attention of the House, and I sincerely add my congratulations to those that have already been expressed.

I was particularly interested in what the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) had to say when he devoted a great deal of his time to his ideas for speeding up the processes of parliament in order that we might be better able to handle the very large work load which is being piled higher and higher on parliament each year. All of us in this House, I think, would agree with what he said. Certainly I agree, and I spoke in this regard in the House last July 14.

At that time I outlined three steps which I suggested could be taken to speed up greatly the processes and the business of the House. This would cut down the time required by parliament to handle its business by no less than two-thirds. It would not in any way interfere with the democratic process of parliament or the rights of any member to express himself fully in the House.

After I concluded my speech on that occasion several Liberal members rose to speak. They agreed with what I had said. In fact, I do not know of anyone in parliament or any member of the press who disagreed with what I said or the suggestions I put forward, their practicability or their effectiveness.

Therefore it seems strange to me that a government which found it necessary to introduce the guillotine measure has shown no interest whatsoever in these measures.

The hon. member for Sarnia will get an answer when he talks to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about his ideas. He will find out that the Prime Minister is simply not interested in speeding up the processes of parliament. The Prime Minister wants to control parliament. He wants to computerize parliament by putting legislation in at one end and having it come out on a certain date at the other end, exactly as he put it in, without being interfered with in any way by parliament. That is not the parliamentary process. This will be perhaps one of the first but not the last disappointments or disillusionments to be experienced by the hon. member for Sarnia in respect of both his Prime Minister and the government under which he serves.

On Friday we were treated to the Prime Minister's speech during which he took some time to describe the conditions endured by people in various parts of the country who are living today in poverty. However, there was not one word in his speech about any specific policy the government proposes to bring forward to deal with this very serious matter. In fact, his speech and the throne speech simply deal with this matter in pious platitudes of hope and general intent.

Let me remind the Prime Minister that the poor people of this country cannot eat pious platitudes; they cannot clothe themselves with pious platitudes and they cannot shelter themselves from the cold, the rain and the wind with pious platitudes. What they want is a cessation of task forces and cabinet committees such as those which have been sitting now for a year and a half without producing any visible results.

As a member of a former government I sat on many cabinet committees, and set up task forces. I have never known of a cabinet committee or a task force which, if properly set up and instructed by a minister, could not produce specific and good solutions well within a year. These task forces and cabinet committees are simply blinds covering inaction and the fact that this government does not know where it is going or where it intended to go when it promised on the hustings to produce a just society. The government had no idea how it would do this and today it still has no idea how it will do it.

Why is it that the Prime Minister and the government are adopting a negative attitude toward this very important matter of poverty which the Prime Minister agreed was a national disgrace? The answer was given by no less a person than the former deputy Prime Minister, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), when he resigned a few months ago. He said very specifically that the Prime Minister was not interested in the ordinary problems facing the poor and less fortunate people of this country. He told us that the Prime Minister was really interested only in questions such as constitutional law, a subject he taught at the University of Montreal. This is a very important question, but I say to him that the people of this country cannot wait for the completion of his philosophical discussions before he attempts to deal with the practical problems now faced by the less fortunate people in Canada.

These are the people of Canada the Prime Minister said he was going to help when he created his just society. Let me invite the Prime Minister and the government to create this just society and bring the task forces and cabinet committees to a conclusion. Let them produce specific policies and then announce those policies to the House and to the country. Let us get on with the job of creating a just society and stop just talking about it.

We must not be too harsh on the Prime Minister about his speech because it was a rather gentle and platitudinous one which accomplished one very important thing. I should like to compliment him for that. It is well known that there are a number of members of the Prime Minister's party who suffer from insomnia. As the Prime Minister spoke, we on this side of the house could see that those gentlemen were gradually overcoming their malady. A strange silence and peace descended on the House like a blanket. Members of the press gallery quietly left, and parliament slept.

Mr. Trudeau: Look at them now.

Mr. Hees: When parliament opened a year ago I spoke during the debate about this matter of poverty. That was on September 20th. The situation had been outlined by the Economic Council of Canada in its report published the previous month. At that time I asked the government to increase the federal minimum wage to compensate for the 13 per cent increase in the cost of living which had taken place since the federal minimum wage was last increased in July, 1965, some three and a half years ago. I suggested this as a first step toward overcoming what the council had described and the Prime Minister had agreed was a national disgrace.

During the past year the people of Canada have been treated to a number of very interesting performances on television. In each case the principal actor was that self-styled Babe Ruth of the bargaining table, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). He really is an awfully nice fellow, but he has succumbed to that which even athletes and other people suffer when they start to believe their own press notices. Unfortunately the minister has started to believe the great number of press releases he instructs his publicity people to issue on every possible occasion. It is nothing new for Canadians to see him before the television cameras.

On several of these occasions we heard the Minister of Labour announce that he was pleased to have been able to serve the strong and powerful unions which were in a position to cause the government great embarrassment through work stoppages. In any event he was pleased to have been able to assist them in coming to an agreement with their employers, and to announce increase in wages and fringe benefits of between 8 per cent to 11 per cent a year. This is just twice the increase that has taken place in the past year or so in the cost of living. During that same period and during the previous three years this government has done absolutely nothing to ease the situation of those living in poverty. In fact, during the past year the cost of living has gone up by another 5 per cent, making the situation of these unfortunate people that much worse.

• (12 Noon)

The Minister of Labour in Toronto recently said to certain press men—and it was published in the press—that he believed the minimum wage should be either $1.50 or $1.75 an hour. But have we seen any indication by this government that it intends to increase the minimum wage to any such figures? The answer is no. This wage has been increased for four and half years. Why? Simply because the people living on minimum wages today in all parts of Canada are, because of their lack of education, lack of health and lack of training, unorganized. They are not strong; they are not able to bring pressure to bear upon industry or the government and embarrass the government by a work stoppage. So the government pays absolutely no attention whatsover to them. It has allowed their cost of living to go up by no less than 18 per cent during the past four and half years with no indication whatever that it intends to increase the minumum wage at this or any other time. It has become painfully obvious that the just society exists only for the strong, the well organized and those able to embarrass the government with a serious work stoppage.

As the government obviously has no intention of laying before parliament at this or any other session in the future a plan for ameliorating the very serious situation which faces those who live in poverty today, I intend at this time to present to parliament a plan which I think will be both practical and effective. First of all, let us ask ourselves, what is poverty and where it is to be found? We learn from the report of the Economic Council, which has become accepted as the authoritative study on this subject, that there are certain income levels which the council claims must be attained by the following categories of our citizens if those poeple are to live above the poverty level. These are the categories: single, with no dependants; single, with one or two dependants; married, with no children; married, with one, two, three, four or five children.

According to the report, the majority of the nearly five million people in Canada who live in poverty today work for the minimum wages set by the federal and provincial governments for the industries which come under their particular jurisdictions. These minimum wages vary between $1 and $1.30 an hour. The federal minimum wage today is $1.25 an hour. As I said earlier, this was raised last in July, 1965. At that time it raised the recipient's wages just above the poverty line. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics tells us that, in the intervening four and a half years, the cost of living has increased 18 per cent and has gone up by 5 per cent during the last 12 months. Therefore I believe it is obvious to everyone that if people receiving the federal minimum wage are to be able to provide a living for themselves and their families above the poverty level, we must raise that minimum wage now by at least 25 per cent.

Now let us have a look at such a raise from the viewpoint of the income standards set by the Economic Council of Canada. The Economic Council takes as its average family one with two dependent children, and says that if such a family is to live just above the poverty line it must receive an income of at least $3,500 a year. If a man receiving the federal minimum wage works a standard 40-hour week he earns $50 a week, and if he works for the full year he earns $2,600 in that year. Because he has two dependent children he receives an additional $200 in family allowances during the year, which brings the total up to $2,800. Therefore, for this family to live above the poverty line, it is obvious that the breadwinner must earn an additional $700 during the year, or an increase of 25 per cent. Therefore I believe the first step in combating poverty in this country is for the federal government to raise the federal minimum wage by a minimum of 25 per cent.

The second step should be to call a federal-provincial conference to persuade the provinces to follow the lead given by the federal government. I believe that if the Prime Minister would point out the need for following the federal lead, both clearly and forcibly, and if the conference is given full television, press and radio coverage, the provincial premiers would find it very difficult, if not impossible, to refuse to follow the federal government's lead and would raise their minimum wages by a similar percentage. I think they would find it difficult, if not impossible, not to take this action whereby they would allow the people living under their jurisdictions, and working for minimum wages, to emerge above the poverty line.

I believe it is important that we realize that raising minimum wages would not increase federal or provincial expenditures by one penny, and therefore would not require any increase in taxes. It would simply require that employers who are paying poverty wages should pay a living wage which would enable their employees to live above the poverty line.

The third step in this fight against poverty, I believe, should be for the federal government to amend its present social security legislation, which discourages a recipient of social security from working at a part-time job to augment his or her assistance by reducing the payment by the amount the person earns from a part-time job. Those who receive pensions and other forms of assistance are kept from living in absolute want and privation by these pensions and assistance, but they are required to live below the poverty line because they are not allowed to supplement their pension or assistance by working at a part-time job.

The majority of those who receive social security benefits because of age, mental or physical disability, or inability to find a full-time job, are able to work at a part-time job, and most of these people are anxious to do so.

For this reason, I believe our social security legislation must be amended at this session to allow the recipients to earn the difference between their pension or allowance and the poverty level set by the Economic Council for their particular category. Once this poverty level has been reached, I believe the assistance can then be cut back at an increased rate as their income rises above the poverty line.

Many of those who receive social security because of age, disability, or some other reason, are unable to do even part-time work and will always be completely dependent upon the assistance they receive. These people really need help. The assistance we make available to them should be sufficient to enable them to live above the poverty line.

To make this possible, I believe our social security structure must be overhauled right away so that those who now are receiving an adequate income, and therefore do not need social security, should cease to receive it. In this way those who really need social security may receive adequate payments which would enable them to live above the poverty line. This would not require the imposition of the means test but could be done, both easily and painlessly, through income tax returns. Such a social security overhaul is long overdue, and should be started by the government without further delay.

As a great deal of our social security legislation is within provincial jurisdiction, there is a great need to amend provincial legislation to permit part-time work to increase the income of those receiving social security at least to the poverty level. This matter should be discussed at the federal-provincial conference on poverty which the government should call, and the provinces should be urged to follow the lead of the federal government. Once again, I am convinced that a strong and logical presentation by the Prime Minister, together with full publicity by press, radio and television at the conference, will persuade the premiers that it makes good sense to amend their present social security legislation to permit those able to do part-time work to do so and thereby lift themselves out of the poverty cycle.

Finally, I would like to suggest some steps for the government to take to enable our farmers, our businessmen and our other producers to expand their production, and thereby increase the national income and make more good jobs available for our people, which is the only real social security. I believe that this can best be done by offering tax incentives to induce our producers to increase both their productivity and the industrial research which they either are, or should be, carrying out. I believe that this is the most effective way to enable our producers to lower their costs and turn out more new, attractive and lower priced products which will sell more readily against foreign competition both in the export market and here in Canada.

Such tax incentives, which we all know are only paid after the desired results have been obtained, will pay for themselves many times over in the form of more income taxes, because there will be more people working and paying income tax rather than living on social security. There will be more commodity taxes because more commodities will be sold and more people will be paying commodity taxes, and there will be more corporation taxes because there will be more production and more corporation profits to tax.

May I say in conclusion that I believe that if the government will take the steps I have outlined, we can go a long way toward lifting our people out of the poverty in which so many of them have been forced to live for so long.

Mr. Gordon Sullivan (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, let me first extend my congratulations on the presentation of the throne speech which indicates we can expect a most interesting and, I hope, productive session. As indicated in the legislative outline, we shall again be considering format changes which will significantly influence the conduct of business in this House. Among the proposed changes I hope we shall find that members will be given the right to file speeches for the record without orally delivering them in the House. There is ample precedence for this step as this practice is now followed by, among others, the British House of Commons. There is an obvious saving in time and the purpose of the member as well as the official record are well served.

It is safe to say that every member of this House sought and accepted election with a view to serving his country by effectively representing his constituents. We came here believing that we could make a contribution. We came here believing that a parliament selected by the people should govern this country. We came here with the approval of the people. We came here not only prepared to listen to our constituents but expecting to find a forum wherein our constituents through us could and would be heard.

While casting about for ways and means to make this contribution we, first year members, have made some remarkable discoveries. All too often parliament does not govern this country. All too often members, regardless of their dedication, are expected to be seen but not heard. We are asked to listen to the nation but we are seldom asked to tell anyone what we have heard. The fault lies with the members of this House.

Under the present system—and this is true no matter what party is in power—a backbench member of the government, because of the party discipline, is expected to vote with his party regardless of his researched opinion. His integrity may well have to be compromised. Only in exceptional circumstances is this practice not followed. It is true that under the present system there is ample opportunity for discussion and consultation. However, after this consultation and discussion, if a government member cannot agree with the government's proposal he is nevertheless expected to vote in favour of that proposal. Why? Because of party discipline. It is absolutely necessary that there be party discipline for the party to operate under our system; our system is completely dependent upon party discipline.

I suggest, first, that there is the possibility that under our present system a cabinet minister could become a captive of the civil service. There is a further possibility that the civil servants, not being responsible to the people or to Members of Parliament, could formulate the policies which could result in the adoption of these policies by the government.

I suggest also that much of the talent in this House is being wasted under our present committee system. For some reason, almost unbelievable in the modern concept of efficiency, members are assigned to a large number of committees dealing with very complex and diverse subject matters and are expected to absorb enough to make a meaningful contribution at the committee level. I submit that we cannot even read, never mind research, all the evidence before all the committees upon which we are asked to serve. The result does not even reach the level of knowing a little bit about a lot of things; it stops somewhere near the area of being quite thoroughly confused about nearly everything. Some members have avoided this particular trap by concentrating on one or two subjects or committees and merely giving lip service to the balance of their committee assignments.

Systems are allowed to develop, but if they do not serve the intended purpose those operating within the system must bear the responsibility for the deficiencies or shortcomings. There is an old homily that says: "Grant us the courage to change those things which can be changed, the strength to accept those things which cannot be changed, and wisdom enough to tell the difference." I take those words as good advice and most applicable to any discussion of rules changes or governmental reform as it applies to this House.

As a new member of the House, and as a government backbencher, I have come to appreciate the effort made by the government to include all the members of all parties in the decision-making process. As I see the cumbersome nature of this process, even the improved model, it is easy to understand the frustration of earlier parliamentarians, the sometimes annoyance of present members, and the impatience of those we represent.

This House has occasionally taken steps to improve its methods of conducting business, legislative or otherwise, and has even made motions toward striking a more presentable listening pose for the benefit of our constituents. Such change is admirable, and is indeed necessary if this institution is to remain a viable force or even a reasonable influence within a rapidly changing society. It is ironical, therefore, that each step, no matter how timorous, is greeted with bleats of delight by the reformers on the one hand, and with charges of creeping republicanism on the other.

During the last federal campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) summed up participation with these words:

> No man alone and no party, even a majority party, can solve these problems if it does not constantly have recourse to the people, if it does not constantly involve the people, not always in the solution of these problems, but in the examination of them.

This recourse to the people is the basic, in fact, the only justifiable reason for even having an elected Member of Parliament. Recourse to the people is the aim and the purpose of better research facilities, regional desks and expanded committee involvement. As two students of political science, Mr. Ian McConachie and Miss Susan Jones, have said, "The ultimate goal is government which is not only responsible but responsive." The steps taken by the present government have assisted us toward this goal but the steps already taken are, I hope, only a beginning.

There can be no true recourse to the people until such time as each member of this House is better able to reflect the views and positions of his own constituents. This can only become a fact when each member of this House can, in conscience, submerge his concern over the fall of the government and turn his mind directly to the issue at hand and its effect on his people. He must be allowed to bring his acquired insights back here and be heard.

Consideration must be given to a form of government where the executive branch presents its legislative program statute by statute; then after full discussion on all possible amendments the matter is voted upon and, if the proposal brought in by the executive branch is not passed, the government should not fall. I am one who believes that the executive branch is not always correct. I am one who believes in a system that permits the elected Members of Parliament to have the obligation to assume the responsibility of forming their own opinion in the last analysis and of voting accordingly. Surely this is what the electors in our constituencies want us to do.

I propose that there should be a fixed term of government. I propose that election to the office of Prime Minister should come by popular vote. In my opinion we should establish an executive branch of government which is independent of the legislative branch and not responsible to it.

In my opinion the legislative branch should not be under the discipline of the executive branch of any government. We have already come close to acknowledging the existence of an executive branch but we just refuse to accept the responsibility of control. Call it galloping republicanism if you will, but if it might mean more effective or more representative government it should not be rejected simply because it is new to us here in Canada.

I know there are difficulties and disadvantages to such a system but these, to my mind, are outweighed by the greater flexibility afforded by such a change. For example, government by department or government by the civil service would be greatly curtailed and the temptation to dictate, which must sometimes be very real, would be eliminated. The power and the control would be diffused not only throughout the government side but throughout this House.

As a further example the Prime Minister, as head of the executive branch of such a government, could select his subaltern executives from either within the membership of the House or beyond, if he should so desire. There are many circumstances under which a Prime Minister could reach to those who could not or would not dedicate themselves to a political career and invite these special talents to head government departments without joining the civil service.

I suggest that the public and this House would be better served if the need to give lip service were eliminated and members were assigned to one committee only and thereby given an opportunity to become expert in this assigned or selected field. The result would be smaller committees, more thorough examination of proposals and views at the committee stage, and a more direct contribution to resulting legislation. The great advantage would be the emergence of Members of Parliament who are at least equally expert as the civil servants upon whom we now must depend so heavily.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that some of the changes I have described could be made through legislation which will come before us during this new session. Other changes will require further consideration, but such consideration should take on a greater air of urgency at the hands of the existing standing committees.

I would like to make it clear that in my proposals there would be no change in the status of Her Majesty the Queen in relation to the people of Canada, and that we remain firmly committed as members of the Commonwealth.

Change is always fraught with some difficulty and can seldom even be described as comfortable, but it is necessary. It is especially necessary if we ever hope to have the members of this House speak for the people and really "tell it the way it is."

No matter how much some of those who have been members of this House for a long period of years would like to cling to an out-of-date system, these proposals will bring the people more in touch with legislation, would be a truer form of democracy and, in my opinion, a more satisfactory form of democracy for Canada. This must be our prime consideration. As the member from Sarnia in his speech said so well, "Canada must come first."

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my congratulations to those offered by other hon. members to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. It was apparent to all of us that they had a great awareness of the current problems facing the country. I also wish to congratulate the hon. member who preceded me. I must say I am in sympathy with a great many of the views he expressed. I believe we should do more thinking along the lines he suggested.

The Speech from the Throne espoused many laudable aims. It would be difficult for anyone to disagree with many portions of it, and if its intentions are carried out with integrity and fairness this Canada of our's will be a better place in which to live.

However, so many of the urgent issues of the day were omitted from the Speech from the Throne that it is very difficult to speak to that document and still remain relevant to the state of the nation as it really exists. Take, for instance, the tremendous national problem of Canada's agricultural industry. I speak now of the whole industry from coast to coast and not just of western wheat production. All that is to be found in the Speech from the Throne on this problem is a suggestion that a crisis indeed does exist in relation to wheat sales, and that Parliament will be asked to consider some amendments to the Canada Grain Act. This is equivalent to tackling a blazing barn with a cup of water. What Canadians have a right to expect from the government is recognition that one of this nation's great resource industries is in desperate need of fundamental overhaul and that speedy and comprehensive action must be forthcoming or there will be a disaster.

If anyone doubts that I speak only for the western farmer let him consult the potato grower in the Maritimes, the dairy farmer in Ontario and Quebec or the mixed farmer in British Columbia. And if anyone doubts the national aspect of wheat production on the prairies let him consider the market where the agricultural machinery manufacturer of central Canada sells his product, where the automobile manufacturer of central Canada sells his cars, where the appliance maker, the tool marker, the steel fabricator and all the other makers of goods and services, largely concentrated elsewhere in Canada than the west, sell their products. Let him ask the railway worker, the trucker, the elevator worker, the longshoreman and the seaman, not to mention the broker, the clerk and all the service businesses attached to those involved in moving grain across this country, how they are affected.

As an example I have here a few figures on recent sales of farm machinery in the west and the lay-offs among skilled Ontario workers that the cut-back in these sales has brought. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics' figures indicate that sales of farm equipment in 1968 declined 14 per cent from those of 1967. Figures for the first five months of 1969 show that sales of new farm equipment in the prairie provinces declined a further 17.2 per cent from 1968.

I have here a request by the Saskatchewan Implement Dealers Association in relation to the situation in the west that I would like to read:

> The seriousness of the western situation is illustrated by a recent request from the Saskatchewan Implement Dealers Association that farm equipment manufacturers set up moratoriums on the interest payments dealers must make to manufacturers for new farm equipment.
> The association says that, if dealers are required to pay interest ranging from 10 per cent to 14 per cent on new machinery in their lots, 50 per cent of its 450 members will be forced out of business this year.
> The dealers receive farm machinery from the manufacturers on a past-due note and assume money from machinery sales in the summer can be used to pay off the note when it falls due.
> But this year, with new machinery sales in Saskatchewan down 30 per cent to 50 per cent, the dealers must pay interest for machines they still have not sold.
> "The present cash shortage of farms and the resulting reduction in new farm machinery sales will create a marked and serious decline in the number of farm equipment dealers," Richard Jensen, president of the association, says.
> Leo King, secretary-manager of the association, says if manufacturers do not suspend the required interest payments the dealers will ask the provincial government to pass legislation setting up moratoriums.

If this service is to be continued in the west, help must soon be forthcoming. Machine sales figures do not tell the whole story inasmuch as dealers, besides increased inventories, are carrying two or three times as much in overdue accounts as they ever have before. This applies not only to machine dealers but to all businessmen operating in agricultural areas at this time.

The figures for International Harvester show that profits were down in 1968 from 1967 by something like 30 per cent in the western farm equipment area. Average employment in the International Harvester plant in Ontario was down by 1,000 in 1968 from 1967 and the cuts are liable to be much worse when the 1969 figures are complete. Last week Massey-Ferguson laid off 250 men. The Cockshutt division of the White Motor Company has closed its combine plant for three months with a lay-off of 450 men. This is all in the industrial heart of Canada, right here in Ontario. During the summer Massey-Ferguson extended the vacation period for something like a month, affecting 1,200 employees, because of slow sales. The only reason the disastrous agricultural situation has not had a more adverse effect on our whole national industrial complex is the nullifying effect of our industry in many areas producing to near capacity for the U.S. military machine. But this situation will not continue too much longer.

The problem of wheat production was brushed aside with a few lines in the Speech from the Throne. The government has been well aware of the situation for more than a year and a half. It has sent out task forces, had surveys made and even had the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) take a first-hand look at the situation. So far the only action has been criticism and advice—criticism of the farmer for growing so much of a product no longer in high demand and advice to diversify.

This may be the answer, but to carry it out will require massive government assistance, expert technical advice and a follow-through by way of helping to establish new markets. It will require massive financial assistance to carry out the necessary capital expenditures involved in this change. A grain-producing plant cannot lightly or easily be switched to producing another crop any more than a plant manufacturing tanks can be cheaply or easily retooled to produce motor cars, tractors or brassieres.

The Canadian farmer and the Canadian agricultural community deserve much better from this government than a supercilious nod, and this, I say, is all that the Speech from the Throne gave in this area of agriculture.

An hon. Member: It was uplifting.

Mr. Downey: The Speech from the Throne acknowledged that pollution is a problem and that something must be done. But the implication this government has always left when talking about pollution is that industry is the principal offender. My suggestion to the government is that it should set an example in pullution control, as it claims to have done in austerity, by attending to its own backyard before pointing a finger at its neighbours. One has but to go to the national park at Banff to see an example of this attitude of "Don't do as I do, do as I say." There an establishment directly under the control of the federal government continues to dump raw sewage into the Bow River. What sort of basis is that for discussions with provincial administrations designed to make a co-ordinated attack on pollution?

It was interesting to hear that the government sets so much store by the new Department of Regional Economic Expansion and that the sky is the limit there. Austerity is not to be applied to that department's budget. This is all very fine if the public moneys to be spent on overcoming regional disparity are spent fairly and equitably. But I become suspicious when I see that my riding in central Alberta is excluded from the designated area and the Liberal riding that happens to be represented by the Minister of Agriculture is included. So far as the need for new industry and regional economic expansion is concerned, both ridings are identical. Decisions such as this tend to cast some doubt on the integrity of the whole program.

Even greater doubt arises from the announced priorities within the area designated for expansion. As I recall it, these priorities list Quebec, the Maritimes and Manitoba in that order, with the rest trailing a poor fourth. I suggest to the government that they should take another long look at the area designated, with a view to expanding it to take in areas that stand in equal need of industrial assistance. They could well expand to include areas that lie beyond the immediate area of the large, booming metropolitan areas.

The list of issues barely mentioned or passed over completely in the government's legislative program as outlined in the Speech from the Throne is almost endless. For example, consider the question of pensions. So far the government has paid only lip service to the multiple recommendations contained in the Woods Report. It is true that they have done something for the Hong Kong veterans, but they have made only a token gesture or no gesture at all in other important areas. The old age pensioners and retired federal public servants have been ignored and left to be crushed between their pitifully low fixed incomes and the steadily rising cost of living. It seems to me that the time is long past for some method of providing an automatic supplement to enable the fixed incomes of old and retired people to meet the bare necessities of life in a supposedly affluent society. Present automatic increases being considered in this area are hardly realistic. I have heard our society described as both affluent and just, but there seems to be evidence that the contrary is true.

The newspapers have been filled with stories about the Company of Young Canadians being a hotbed of seditious activity and about their having links with subversive and terrorist organizations round the world. The front pages have been covered with headlines about the French network of the CBC being controlled by separatists. Indeed, the Prime Minister himself was pictured throwing down the gauntlet to separatists and advising the English element in Quebec to get out, compete, and not allow themselves to be stepped on. Yet there is no hint of these problems in the Speech from the Throne.

I must confess that I was puzzled by the Prime Minister's advice to English speaking Quebeckers. When he said "compete", he did not say how. Should they make larger bombs? Should they take to the streets with bigger and better riots and overturn statues in Quebec? What did the Prime Minister mean when he said "compete"? After all, in a society of violence one can only compete by resorting to even greater violence.

As to the Company of Young Canadians, my solution to the problem is quite simple: abolish the outfit. This would be, to my mind, an admirable economy measure as well as a step toward restoring tranquility in areas of trouble.

The Prime Minister has indicated that he will no longer tolerate violence and lawlessness in this country. This matter must surely be of great concern to him as we cannot help but note that the forces of crime and anarchy in this country have blossomed well during his time in office. That charge, however, is true not only of Canada. The lawmakers of this nation have been so obsessed with human rights that we have ended up with a definite trend that supports the criminal element instead of supporting a victimized society. Our police have their hands tied in this legal jungle. Crime is one of the largest businesses in the country today. Criminals have the money to hire the best brains and to develop and use the best systems devised by education and science. We send our law enforcement agencies against them with one hand tied behind their backs. Our law enforcement agencies cannot use the latest and best techniques because that might infringe on somebody's rights. There is even talk in some areas of the country of taking away the guns from our policemen. Our police are not supposed to shoot until they are shot at. They are supposed to take verbal abuse, sticks, stones and the like, and if some rioters lose a little blood our police may be hauled into our courts and the hue and cry of police brutality goes up.

What a mockery we are making of our law enforcement agencies. To be a policeman today you have to be either a damned fool or damned dedicated. From a practical standpoint the rioter and looter have more rights than has the storekeeper, whose rights are infringed upon. The murderer or criminal who beats and robs honest citizens has more rights than has the policeman who might injure the criminal in the course of subduing him and taking him to the station.

In this vast penal hotel system that we have in Canada, with its central heating, television, recreation and balanced diets, it is more of a penalty to be on the outside and have to put up with taxes, pollution, traffic jams and bill collectors. It is more of a penalty to be on the outside looking in. I see that now we are considering letting the girls in with the boys in our penitentiaries. After a few years our criminals will be beating down the doors to get into one of these educational paradises of crime. What we need in this country are shorter and fewer prison sentences but much more access to the bullwhip and the rock pile, and a few hangings thrown in. I do not think that would be too much. Dignity of the individual seems to apply only to criminals. For the law-abiding citizen or the policeman, there is little dignity in the rapes, beatings and murders that we see in this country today.

Another subject much in the national news is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Many Canadians appear to be perennially unhappy with the performance of this tax-eating monster. Instead of closing down one of its services, reducing its funds or firing employees, why not put it to some national purpose?

Everyone by now is familiar with the crowded universities of this country where bodies of students ranging from 10,000 to 20,000 no longer permit personal attention in teaching. We seem to see nothing except a mass production technique. A body goes in one end with a high school certificate and comes out of the other with a degree. It seems to me that the CBC could be utilized to provide lectures every bit as personal as those now available in most of our universities. The corporation could be converted into a single, huge, national university at least for instructional purposes. This step might help to solve the grave problems of overcrowding, student financing and expensive facilities, and bring into the national educational net many fine young brains now unable, for one reason or another, to acquire a higher education.

Another matter which I was disappointed to see omitted in the Speech from the Throne deserves to be mentioned. I am speaking of our national oil policy which, of course, is in serious danger. May I now read some comments made by the president of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada who, in an address on October 11, 1969, said:

Refinery expansion in Ontario has not kept pace with growing needs in that province, imports are now coming in from further east and will grow in volume simply because no refining capacity is under construction. A proposed 100,000 barrels daily refinery for the Toronto-Hamilton area, dedicated to Canadian oil, can't yet start because of local opposition to zoning for a $100,000,000 plant. The plant, when finally site is approved, will take two years to build. It would apparently have no federal or provincial tax concessions to help it compete.

Yet, in Quebec and the Maritimes, massive refinery construction has begun or has been given clearance that would raise capacity by several hundred thousand barrels daily, far in excess of needs of the Canadian markets served by overseas oil. Result will inevitably be new harsh pressures on markets for oil produced in Canada. All of these refineries have been given either provincial or federal tax benefits, or grants in aid. One, on which construction has started in Newfoundland, was recently granted by federal Order in Council a 100 per cent capital cost allowance which gives it substantial advantage over other refineries.

I have no quarrel with government assistance to upgrade the economies of less favoured regions in Canada—but can the concept of aid justify excessive construction of one type of manufacturing plant, to be subsidized by all Canadians whose local benefits will be far less than the burden they will impose on the over-all economy, reducing markets for Canadian production, and increasing the foreign exchange burden of oil imports?

An even more serious defect in present Canadian oil policy is the ignoring of the vital question, security of supply. Canada, in effect, assumes that foreign oil will always be available, at low cost and in adequate quantity, even if emergencies occur; at least until such time as domestic oil from the Atlantic basin or the far north becomes available, hopefully in a few years. The assumption is dangerous, for it fails to take into account the trends of oil supply and demand affecting the major sources of eastern Canada's emergency supplies; and the rising insecurity of oil originating in the Arab nations of the Middle East and Africa.

Again I say we must review the entire matter of oil policy in the coming year.

Mr. Mahoney: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not too sure this is a proper point of order but will the hon. member consent to identify the document from which he was just quoting and give its author?

Mr. Downey: Carl O. Nickle. This is a speech by Mr. Nickle.

Mr. Mahoney: Could the hon. member give us the date, time and place or something that we might—

Mr. Downey: I do not have the date, sir.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is a recent speech. It is a good one.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I might rule it is not a point of order. It is a question, and the hon. member does not have to reply to it.

Mr. Downey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will endeavour to find this out for the hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. Bell: It is by one of your predecessors who sat in your seat.

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, it is a great seat.

Mr. Downey: I have very little further to say on the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker. I have attempted to outline but a few of the major problems that I feel need consideration in the coming year. I only hope that the pious hopes held out in the throne speech will indeed be realized in the coming year.

Mr. Barney Danson (York North): It is a pleasure to rise in this throne speech debate, Mr. Speaker, and particularly to follow my respected colleague from Battle River. His address was most interesting. If his party ever takes power in the lifetime of the hon. member I look forward to seeing him serve in either the role of Solicitor General or Minister of Justice. I think the prison system would then be quite consistent with the philosophies he expressed and we would see a return to the rack and dipping in icy water. Otherwise I think the hon. member has made some very interesting points which have been well received by the House.

In rising I also wish to compliment my colleagues, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen),—my seatmate, and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) for their fine addresses in this throne speech debate.

As a Liberal I speak with particular pride about the Speech from the Throne and the subsequent speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in this debate. It was not full of pious platitudes, as the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) suggested, but was a very specific speech and dealt with very specific policies for action and action now during this session. In reply to the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey), may I say I think they are articulated with a degree of clarity and courage that is rare. The leader of my party, the Prime Minister, is known for laying it on the line clearly as he sees it. He speaks as clearly in this House as he has done on television and as he did when in Vancouver and Montreal. He is reaching the people with his clarity and good sense. He has also brought to us some genuine new forms of participatory democracy. I refer to the practice of introducing so many white papers or policy papers which give the public and the members of this House an opportunity for discussion and for thought.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker? I will be delighted to continue after lunch.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Danson: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, before I was so politely interrupted just before lunch, the policy of the government in presenting white papers and policy papers represents a departure which I believe has considerable merit. It is very disturbing. It is disturbing to us as members of the house and it is disturbing to the public because it has a tendency to make us think. It disturbs us. We shall be getting a lot of mail from people who are upset, and those of us who serve on committees will be holding long hearings and listening to the views of interested parties and groups from across the country. It is an interesting process. When we realize what is really happening I think we shall be pleased, indeed, because the whole nation is being allowed to participate in the legislation which is finally passed by this house. I am not quite sure it is good politics, since it upsets people so, but I am convinced it is darned good government and very good for democracy.

We shall see this borne out most clearly, I think, when we come to consider the white paper on tax reform which is to come before the committee upon which I sit. No one really likes to see tax changes. They affect us all in one way or another; we all tend to think that the right taxes are those which the other fellow pays. Nevertheless, we must all carry our burden in this respect, and, realizing this, we fear a change; we prefer the devil we know to the devil we don't know. But if we really believe in this country of ours, if we really want to see a united Canada, as we say, if we really want to cure regional disparities, to do something about pollution and so on, we had better be prepared to put our money where our mouth is, in a fair and equitable way. I hope and believe that this is what the proposed reforms outlined in the white paper on the tax structure will do.

I enjoyed listening to the speeches of the leaders of the opposition parties in the house on Friday. It was entertaining, indeed though a little sad, too. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is a good man, a responsible man and a man respected greatly by everyone in this house—no more so than by myself. He criticized our priorities, as he should, and as do we on this side of the house. But decisions have to be made; everything cannot be done at once, and there is so much to be done. He criticized our policy in relation to inflation, but as far as I can see he proposed no viable alternatives. The leader of the New Democratic party also criticized us on this score. I must say I did not stay for the whole of the speech made by the leader of the Creditistes (Mr. Caouette). I believed I had heard it before—that I could go back through Hansard and find it all set out there as reported in earlier years. It was something like a manifesto from Marx—Groucho Marx. The leader of the New Democratic party dealt with inflation, and talked about the slack in our economy. When I heard his proposals, his solutions, I realized that he had been caught with his slacks down. He listed government expenditures which were supposed to be contributing to inflation but I noticed that only one of them had been incurred by the 28th parliament.

He listed a number of solutions, such as increased pensions, guaranteed incomes and expenditure to remove regional disparities—which we are presently making—but all of these proposals really do not affect the challenge presently facing us; I really do not believe they have any bearing on inflation whatever. Then, of course, he talked about anti-ballistic missiles, because they come in everywhere, and he once again outlined proposals for dealing with the effects of foreign ownership. In this regard, I find myself in agreement with some of the points he made. He went on to make mention of the advantages of a floating exchange rate, but before long he floated off across the horizon where I was disinclined to follow him. He quoted the sixth report of the Economic Council, criticizing the government for not following its recommendations, but he made no reference to the testimony given before the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs by Professor Neufeld of the University of Toronto or by Governor Rasminsky of the Bank of Canada who put forward proposals inconsistent with those contained in the economic review—proposals which are consistent with government policy. And government policy in this regard seems to be taking effect at the present time.

I do not think even the N.D.P. members of the committee, with all their simplicity, would accept the simplistic distortions presented in this House on Friday. I am fairly sure they are embarrassed as a matter of fact, because this is the sort of irresponsible fudging of issues that misleads the uninformed they pretend to represent so ably.

The leader of the N.D.P. did, however, mention the increases in the price of steel. His party feels it is all right to raise wages but that these increases should not be reflected in prices. They say that wage increases should be absorbed by productivity increases, not realizing or not admitting that productivity comes not only from dedicated and skilled workers but from skilled management and from profits which are intelligently re-invested in most efficient plants to keep abreast of new technology.

Labour groups regrettably have refused to co-operate with the Prices and Incomes Commission. To date they have been stalling about appearing before the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, which is studying interest rates and inflation. I do hope they will appear before our sittings are ended.

For some reason I fear their leaders, with all their easy criticisms and pat answers, are afraid to be exposed to their own membership —the hard-working union members—who, I am sure, are just as anxious to reduce inflation as any other group in this country. There is absolutely no value to a steel worker's pay increase when it results in a further inflationary spiral which negates the increase won after hard weeks on the picket line. Furthermore, an inflationary spiral of this type hits the very vulnerable, unorganized worker and, worse still, the defenseless pensioner, the unemployed, the handicapped and the aged whom the hon. members of the N.D.P. self-righteously pretend to champion and for whom they almost drown us in crocodile tears. This is irresponsibility, I suggest, of the most cruel type.

As a concerned Canadian, I am fearful about the chain reaction the announced steel price increases can produce. The steel industry in Canada is one of the best managed and most productive in our economy. It pays high wages, as high or higher than those south of the border; it is competitive even on the export markets, is as technically advanced as that anywhere, is profitable and pays dividends. It is also largely Canadian owned, which is an interesting fact. Its decisions are reached in Canada, in its own self-interest, which is also Canadian self-interest. Its research and production facilities are oriented toward our resources and our markets and are eminently successful.

It is because of this success that I appeal to all segments of the steel industry to pause and to continue to show responsibility in the national interest. There is now talk about further increases in the prices of cars, always a direct consequence of steel price increases. Even the Ontario Hydro is using increased steel costs as an excuse to raise electric rates because of the large quantities of steel used in thermal plants. The results of this increase will undoubtedly spread to other sectors of the consumer durables field which has had a remarkable record of price stability over the past decade. Other manufacturers will follow suit.

It is critical to the success of our increasingly effective anti-inflation policies that the line be held, and held firmly. I appeal to the steel companies to take a position of unprecedented leadership at this time and rescind or moderate their announced increases, at least until the present measures in our fight against inflation begin to have a greater moderating effect on our economy. Then, hopefully, they will be less necessary. This will not be easy, but easy measures will not cure our present problems.

If some increases appear to be unavoidable I would urge the steel companies to sit down with government and labour, perhaps with the Prices and Incomes Commission, to negotiate any essential increases. This course will call for a degree of courage and responsibility of the very highest order, but if no one has anything to hide or fear, they could do themselves and all Canadians a great service indeed. Such an initiative could be the key factor, in addition to continuing government restraint, in breaking the back of the cancerous inflation psychology.

This action could also immediately and firmly establish the Prices and Incomes Commission as a truly effective instrument that could attack other areas of danger, most importantly the exploding services sector of our economy which now accounts for some 70 per cent of our gross national product. This is an area that is difficult to nail down and one to which we have been paying all too little attention.

As I mentioned before, there is disagreement sometimes about our priorities, and even disagreement within our party. In many cases I do not agree, but if we waited for unanimous agreement nothing would be accomplished. Nevertheless, from my orientation, I do not believe we are giving sufficient priority to the question of urban problems, a neglect that could well come back to haunt us. Canada is now 70 per cent urban, and in the 1980's it is predicted it will be 80 per cent urban. By the end of the century, it will be 90 per cent urban. In the urban area of greater metropolitan Toronto, from which I come, we have some 10 per cent of the population and almost 10 per cent of the membership of this house, with some 17 per cent of the membership in our party which sits over here. This is only one of the great urban areas of our nation.

My constituency of York North is especially affected. It sits on the northern edge of Toronto, although some of it is projected into the Metro area. We cannot isolate ourselves from Toronto anymore than the general Toronto region can isolate itself from other regions of the country. What happens in Cape Breton, Rimouski, the Indian Lake area of Manitoba, the Arctic or Roberts Bank is our concern. We are blessed in our region. We have expansion going on daily that would create headlines anywhere else. This hardly ruffles the surface. It is almost routine. I have in mind a 4,000 man increase in employment in one aircraft plant, of which most people in the area are not even aware, which puts additional pressure on the economy of our region. There was a $32 million development in one corner of my riding about which I read in the local suburban newspaper. So, we enjoy success and prosperity beyond measure. This prosperity results only because we are part of Canada and it will not be sustained if all regions of Canada are not prosperous. By the same token, we have very serious problems just as the wheat farmer in the west and the fisherman in Newfoundland have. If they are not prosperous we are not prosperous. Their concern has become our concern.

We can learn from problems in the United States. We can learn about those problems we might anticipate in our own urban centres. We are not immune to them. We have seen indications of these problems in one of our largest metropolitan areas. These problems are accelerating. They must be anticipated and handled. There are economic and social pressures. Living in the biggest city in the country is not necessarily, for me, living in the best. Our region is big enough, with a viable economy and all the important things that make it possible to have a good life, but it could be so much better. It will grow of its own volition without force feeding. We in the Toronto region have a responsibility. Without being parochial we will fight for that which effects us. We ask for your support in fighting these problems we think we must be solved now.

We are delighted with the appointment of a new cabinet member from our part of the country. He is a man with integrity and ability, a man of whom we are indeed proud. We from the greater Toronto area will be diligent in looking after the interests of our region and we ask for your support in this regard. We will not be parochial but we have a responsibility which we intend to assert, and we are asking for the support of our cabinet ministers in this regard to an extent not heretofore forthcoming.

The talk of expanding the metro region of Toronto to the townships of Markham and Vaughan, the largest geographic section of my constituency which as I said is on the northern fringe, could be the thin edge of the wedge in the formation of an uncontrolled megolopolis. It would expand the metropolitan Toronto region or the municipality of Metro Toronto from 240 square miles to 700 square miles, and by the end of the century it is predicted the population increase will be from the current figure in excess of 2 million to something in excess of 5 million people. This situation is not really very far away. What will happen to the towns in this constituency of mine like Markham, Unionville, Richmond Hill, Woodbridge and Thornhill which have their own identity and their own community spirit. In addition, they are semi-rural in their surroundings. What of the villages of Maple and Gormley? I am concerned because we might end up with solid concrete right from Lake Ontario to Lake Simcoe and then we would be faced with problems of transportation and pollution such as we never thought possible. However, these problems are predictable and they will put pressures on the economy of this region which will add to the inflationary pressures.

I suggest that the cost of planning and for the services necessary will be insignificant compared to the cost of neglecting this planning. The cost is incalculable in human terms but I think it is really quite calculable in economic terms. The long term economic and social advantages I believe can at least be equated with the regional economic expansion program, so we must weigh these priorities. The priority at the moment is in terms of regional economic expansion. This, I think, is an excellent program but I hope it does not mean we have to exclude attention to our urban areas. If the sixth review of the Economic Council, to which I referred earlier, tells us anything it tells us that we have much going for us in this country, that our potential is so great, our incomes will increase 50 per cent, I believe, by 1985 and we will have a 30 per cent increase in our standard of living. The Economic Council said all these things are ours "if", and then it listed a lot of things which really in essence boils down to, if we are not stupid, and there are no guarantees of that.

Neglect of urban areas and of the urban fact could be considered stupid. I think we must watch this possibility and deal with it soon. So far as answers are concerned, I do not have the answers. Nothing is certain. I have suggestions, I have viewpoints and I have ideas. The experts in this field have proposals. We cannot be certain of anything but we can be certain that if we wait for absolute assured success, nothing will be done. If we do nothing, chaos is certain. The problems have been greatly aggravated by the neglect of the provinces' rightful responsibility in this field. This brings us back to our constitutional problems. There is a lack of communication between the federal level and the great urban municipalities of this country. In our province of Ontario, the government refuses to bring the Metro Toronto region and the municipal governments into consultations respecting matters directly affecting them. We are making decisions affecting airports around Toronto without consulting the metropolitan Toronto authorities. The provincial government will not let us get through to them.

In the provincial government, there is a minister of everything. He is the minister of just about anything one could name. He has announced a harbour city on Toronto island without consulting the Toronto people. Sure, he comes from Toronto or thereabouts, but this is arrogance of the worst kind. I think this must stop because we cannot accept it. I suggest that we seriously consider establishing a national institute of urban planning or perhaps urban and transportation planning because I think the two are closely interrelated. There is in the United States a committee, the national committee of urban growth and development, which serves this purpose. Such an institute could be associated with our universities, which could have excellent schools of urban and transportation studies. We would have the benefit of expertise there which would not be readily available to the government. Also, we would be training the people in universities to man the urban mechanisms that would be developed as a result. At the federal level, I could envisage Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation being represented as well as the Department of Transport, the Canadian Transport Commission or possibly the Department of Communications which would be vital.

Then, there are the concerns of provincial bodies such as housing, transport and the municipal boards. Most important, the urban centres themselves would be represented, the major urban centres per se, and the Canadian Council of Mayors and Municipalities. They should be part of the participating groups within such an institute. We are facing an awakening in our municipalities with the introduction of political parties into municipal politics. It is rather interesting that, for the first time, our party has selected as a mayoralty candidate a young man, a professor of political science of the University of Toronto, who everybody thought was a quiet academic from nowhere. He has come forth with the most thoughtful proposals that have ever been put forth in a municipal election in the history of our city. I think the voters of Toronto are beginning to wake up and realize that intelligent people and intelligent proposals are not excluded from municipal government and that there will be responsibility with a responsible party which will have a program. There is some hope now that action will be taken instead of everybody running off like scorpions, doing their own thing. You try to keep away from them and they try to keep away from you, but if you get near them they bite you.

With a responsible, well-led municipal political party I think we can make great strides in our large urban areas. As I said, the problems are certain. Many of them are actually predictable. We have the opportunity and the responsibility, I believe, to plan and anticipate. "Anticipate" is my favourite word. I believe in participatory democracy but I like anticipatory democracy better. In this way we can make decisions for future generations and many decisions for sane development of our urban centres. But if we fail, and if we hesitate or if we are shortsighted or, worse still, blind, future generations could well look back on us not as the just society but as the irresponsible society.

There are other priorities, but there is a long range priority about which I should like to speak which would divide our energies in two directions. One is to the senior citizens, the older people of this country, the people who are vulnerable and have no one speaking for them. There certainly are exceptions in this House. I do not say that anyone is unconcerned, but really the fear people face in their old age is something that cannot be imagined, except by many of us who have lived with it in one form or another. This problem will affect us.

I think we should establish a system in which we make certain there is security and dignity in old age. We do this for very selfish reasons. The most selfish reason is that there is nothing in it for us; it is just a good thing to do and makes us feel good. This is a sign of maturity. They do this much better than we do in what we consider to be less sophisticated societies. Another reason for action in this area is that with some degree of luck, we, too, will be old. I do not mean that the future should be looked after to such an extent that we just live for today and discourage savings to supplement whatever we do as a society for our senior citizens. However, our system should mean that we do not have to fear living with children in a garret or in homes for the aged which are undesirable. Fortunately, many of these homes for the aged are becoming more desirable but as yet there are not enough of them. We should look to the present and future, and direct our energies to those things which are productive, so that we use our productive years productively.

We in this House have really awesome responsibilities to the people of this country. We may make mistakes. We will not solve all the problems, and when we solve some there will be new ones that we did not dream existed. In making mistakes, we will be criticized by the new generation but the members of the new generation will make their share of mistakes, too. However, they know a great deal more than we did at the same age and they are picking out our mistakes a lot more easily. We will not do everything, but we must not be guilty of not trying.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): It is with pleasure that I rise to participate in the throne speech debate. My first words will be to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau). They both spoke well and in a spirit of sincerity and frankness which does credit to the constituencies which elected them to this house.

I also wish to congratulate the two new ministers without portfolio and the two new parliamentary secretaries. There is no question about the fact that the appointments were made to well deserving members but, quite frankly, there are mounting doubts among many Canadians about the over-all capacity of this cabinet to deal with Canada's problems.

I have read and re-read the throne speech searching for the key which will open the door to the fulfillment of the promise of a just society, but I have searched in vain. The throne speech reminds me somewhat of the eye of a tornado which is almost still, almost without motion, while the destructive gale force winds whirl ever faster and faster until they form a cone between heaven and earth which destroys everything that comes in its path.

By its inaction and indecision, this government is permitting the winds of division and inflation to destroy our economy. These are not my views alone; they are endorsed in very brief words in today's editorial in the Financial Times which read as follows:

...the objectives of the legislative program are reasonably clear, but there is still a good deal of mystery surrounding the means.

I cannot understand the apathy of this government. Its pious platitudes about the state of the nation, as indicated in the throne speech, show that the present Liberal cabinet is living in an ivory tower, insulated by their smugness and protected by their own appointed army of executive and special assistants from the economic problems facing Canadians. It was these economic problems that brought mass violence and riots to the city of Montreal, and these economic problems which brought us a summer of strikes in our major mining and industrial complexes, strikes which have continued into the fall. All the while, the vast numbers of self-employed Canadians have suffered grimly, and quietly tried to carry on, but at the same time wondering: "How long, O Lord, how long will my tax burdens keep increasing?"

We find the following words in the throne speech:

There are many obstacles to be overcome if we are to achieve our economic goals, but inflation is undoubtedly the most serious and the most difficult to control. If we fail to control it, the consequences could rapidly prove disastrous especially, but not only, for those whose incomes are already low.

Why did you not do something about inflation while there was still time? I remind the Liberal government that they have been in power since 1963 and the Governor of the Bank of Canada, in each of his annual reviews, warned them each year that inflation must be stopped. However, each year the response was the same and the warnings have been ignored. In 1963, following the election, it was a Liberal program called "60 days of decision" which aided inflation, followed a little later by a program entitled "let us get the economy rolling again" while the economic signs at that time indicated that what the government should have been doing was putting on the brakes. But there was an election to be won in 1965, so the Liberal attitude seemed to be not to worry about the state of the economy. Following their return to office, we soon learned about the new method of ending strikes which was called "the Pearson formula or 30 per cent". This formula was unnecessary and inflationary and it set the pattern for all future demands.

When our currency was devalued in 1962 to 92.5 per cent in relation to the U.S. dollar, in an effort to stimulate and increase our exports, it was to be a temporary measure. This move brought considerable economic benefits to Canada but the Liberal government of the day dissipated the advantages through government extravagance, and the present government is still doing this. Again, these are not only my views.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I advise him to direct his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Crouse: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. These are not my views alone. They are endorsed again in today's Financial Times in the following words:

There can be no doubt about the contribution of former government wastefulness to the present inflationary problem. The rolling of the money presses caused by government over-spending was central in getting the economy into the mess it is in now.

The strains which the free-spending policies of the past created should be sufficient proof that governments at all levels can no longer afford to waste a penny...

...the past few years have shown that, if the economy is to be kept under control, governments must choose their priorities with the knowledge that there is a strict ceiling on the amounts they can spend.

The trouble with this government is that they say one thing while they do another.

Let me return to the throne speech, and to the following words in it:

In recent months the government has urged both the public and the private sectors to adopt special measures to combat the dangers of inflation. These measures, which the government has itself adopted, must be applied by all if further restraints are to be avoided.

What hypocrisy and what arrogance! The government asks the public to follow its example, but I say: heaven forbid, or we will be in national bankruptcy and West Germany or the United States, which have the strongest currencies, will buy up this country.

How can the government dare say that it has adopted special measures to combat inflation when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) recently appointed two new cabinet ministers and two new parliamentary secretaries, making this the largest cabinet in Canada's history? The record of appointments of extra staff for the Prime Minister and the cabinet is shocking and scandalous to all Canadians.

When the Conservative party was in office, the leader of that party had three executive aides, whose services cost less than $50,000. When Mr. Pearson was prime minister, he had seven executive aides whose services cost $128,000. The present Prime Minister has a staff of 17 aides whose services cost more than $360,000 at the last count.

If you take the government telephone directory—I have one here—and look at the ministerial departments listed in it, you will see that the increase is almost in the same proportion. I will select the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), who happens to be in his seat today, and point out that if one were to check the records one would find that minister has a total of nine executive or special assistants or secretaries. In addition, the minister has a deputy minister, who in effect is his assistant. We find that the deputy minister of the Department of Agriculture has a total of 12 exectuve assistants, secretaries and coordinators, including two assistant deputy ministers.

We find that our newest Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, has already mastered the art of internal structuring or empire building. Along with the minister, we find eight secretaries, executive assistants or special assistants. In the deputy minister's office, we find a staff of three. There are eight people in the office of the custodian, seven in information and public relations, and 28 in financial and administrative services. The list seems endless. May I point out that these are only the people at the top. This is only an example of a department which never even existed prior to 1968.

There seems to be no set salary pattern for special or executive assistants with the range running from $10,000 for a special assistant in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to $15,000 for an executive assistant in the Department of Agriculture, to $33,000 for a principal secretary under contract to the Prime Minister's office. The sad truth is that many of these people make no worth-while contribution to Canada's development. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is a waste of the taxpayer's money and its operations are a farce and a delusion. It is a department whose pronouncements are all bark but no bite. This department is like the meringue on a lemon pie. It is all fluff and no substance—and what a lemon!

The Prices and Incomes Commission is no better. The Canadian Labour Congress and the Confederation of National Trade Unions recently in a joint statement refused to co-operate with the inflationary controls suggested by the commission. What are you in government going to do about it? You ask the working man to adopt voluntary restraint in his wage demands, but if you will go and talk to him he will bluntly ask you, "When are you going to stop pork-barrelling the federal pay roll"?

This is a question I cannot answer. I have served in this House for more than 12 years and I have never been able to learn under whose authority all these special and executive assistants are appointed, what their qualifications are for employment, what is their requirement or on what grounds their salaries are established.

When the workingman asks me who authorized the expensive and unnecessary redecorating of ministerial offices, which cost in the aggregate hundreds of thousands of dollars, I cannot answer. As an elected member of parliament I have never been asked if I approved of this type of expenditure. But these are questions that must be answered by someone, for the biggest problem faced by the government is that they are no longer credible in the eyes of the majority of Canadians. The average Canadian has no faith in their policies. He no longer believes them.

As a result of this lack of credibility, interest rates on loans are now at their highest point in Canadian history, and they are going higher. As a government, hon. members opposite are offering to double my money if I lend it to them for nine years, compounded at 8 per cent, which in effect implies that today's dollar in nine years will be worth only 50 cents. This will be the case if the government does not do better in the years ahead than it did last year.

Trust companies are now offering 9 per cent on five year guaranteed investment certificates; strikes are continuing; labour is asking for still higher wages. On the very day that a request for restraint was made in the Speech from the Throne, the Steel Company of Canada advanced the price of steel by 6 per cent. This will increase the cost of every new object made with steel in Canada. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it should soon be evident, even to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that his government's war on inflation is going badly. The fact it is going badly is understandable when one reads in the throne speech that one of Canada's most valuable assets is undeniably the richness and variety of her material resources. I disagree with that statement because I believe that one of Canada's most valuable assets is undeniably the full employment of her human resources.

The government obviously do not believe this fact since their policies are aimed at slowing down the economy through increased unemployment. According to figures released by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics they are achieving their goal, for the September unemployment rate in Canada reached the highest level for any September since 1963 at 5 per cent of the labour force.

It has always been my understanding that it is our labour force, through its productivity, which increases our gross national product and which makes more goods available. The present policies of the government, namely, high interest rates and high taxation necessitated by a top-heavy bureaucracy, tend to increase prices and also increase unemployment. I ask them this question: Did you never stop and ask yourselves how will increased unemployment and lower production decrease prices? If this thesis is correct, all we have to do is shut down our factories, have everyone unemployed and we will have reached Utopia. What nonsense!

What does the Economic Council of Canada, in its sixth annual review, say about this problem? At page 162 the report reads:

> Unacceptably high rates of increase in prices and costs are diluting many of the hard won gains achieved by Canadians since the beginning of the 1960's. Governments in North America have made it clear that they regard the central task of economic policy in 1969 to be the gradual moderation of current rates of price and cost advance without precipitating excessive increases in unemployment. They have good reason for their concern. The costs of continued inflation in North America are large. They are reflected in hardships for the elderly and the retired, and others on fixed or slow growing incomes, and they may ultimately be reflected in an impairment of the country's competitive position. They are also reflected in the functioning of the capital markets, in the disenchantment of investors with fixed income securities, in continuing high rates of interest and in the financing difficulties faced by governments and some business enterprises.

If our sea captains in Nova Scotia were in charge of our ship of state, and were faced with this logic stated by the Economic Council of Canada, I feel certain they would say: "We have our ship on the wrong course. If we continue we will pile up on the rocks of bankruptcy and disunity. Let us try another tack; let us change direction."

Obviously, the present Liberal government are not ready to adopt this type of common sense approach to our problems. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I tell them that they say they are adopting restraints and cutting costs, but they have not even sharpened the knife. With almost one-third of all the Liberals elected in 1968 either in the cabinet or appointed as parliamentary secretaries they have won their war on poverty. The workingman sees what is going on, and he realizes that through his productivity he must pay the bill. But he cannot always increase his productivity and his wages, and as the demands in the form of higher taxes on his meagre earnings increase, he finds himself with less and less to cover the needs of his wife and family.

We had a strike in one of the major industries in my constituency this summer, and I had an opportunity to talk to some of the men seeking higher wages. Quite frankly, there was little or no animosity toward their employer. When I asked why they went on strike they replied that it was a union decision to secure more wages. And then they said something else. They said political parties are unions of men who, when elected, have the authority to make increased demands on all the workers in order to secure the funds for the payment of running the country and for their pet projects. Their logic was simple and elementary. This is what we call grass roots logic, Mr. Speaker. They stated it in the following terms: "As long as the government of this country makes increasing demands on the wages of the workingman, in the form of increased taxes, we will be forced to strike or make increasing demands upon our employers for more wages".

Obviously the government do not know what to do but when they learn to act, at a time when the economy is in danger of destruction through inflation, with something of the sense of urgency that was developed when dealing with the threat of recession, then and only then will the economy of Canada make progress in an orderly fashion. However, we will get nowhere just as long as they continue to lay the blame for their mistakes on the ordinary citizen who carries a lunch pail, on the independent farmer and fisherman. He is struggling valiantly to keep up his end, struggling to make both ends meet, but members of the government must do their part.

To the government I say, if you do not know where to begin why not start by cutting down on ministerial staffs? I do not mean the type of heartless and cruel reduction of civil servants announced the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis). These civil servants won their positions through open competition and they carry out the necessary work of research and inspection as well as the implementation of the regulations laid down by the department. When I suggest cutting down I am thinking of the fat padding that has grown around all the departments, from the top to the bottom.

Why not terminate the work of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism which has spent some $9 million of our tax dollars since 1963, and which has $750,000 earmarked for expenditure this year? Surely, all Canadians are now aware of the French fact and all Canadians, given a fair share of economic opportunities, are prepared to work together for the over-all good of the nation.

At the present time why do we need a Royal Commission on Farm Machinery, a Royal Commission on Pilotage, and a Royal Commission on the Status of Women with a chairman, six commissioners, and at least 12 secretaries, assistant secretaries, executive secretaries, administrative secretaries and research co-ordinators? During the last election campaign I advocated the abolition of this last named commission, and I was applauded by all the women with whom I spoke. Here is a commission that costs us over $500,000 a year, which adds to our cost of living, and which is unnecessary because most men, especially married men, are aware of the status of women. We love, honour and revere them as our wives and the mothers of our children.

The closing down of this commission would not create any unemployment problem because most of the commissioners, including the chairman, are married, with husbands quite capable of providing for their support. If you must have the status of women investigated why not turn the job over to the Senate where we have a group of the most highly paid, highly intelligent, privileged and underworked people in Canada? Surely, the ladies in the Senate, assisted by their male colleagues, could finish this study without any additional cost to Canadians.

[Mr. Crouse.]

Why not cut down on the budget of the CBC which this year exceeds $166 million? I do not advocate the abolition of the CBC but I notice, when travelling in Europe, where the population is more dense than in Canada, European hotels of top rating do not have a television set in every room. If you do not mind the expression, Mr. Speaker, in Canada we have become a bit bug-eyed over T.V.; we have been carried away with the enthusiasm shown by our state sponsored, state paid programmers, and as a result T.V. is now like the old five ring circus. You cannot watch everything that is going on but you must still pay the full price of admission.

Quite frankly, when talking with the working men and women in my riding, they tell me that they cannot sit up all night and watch television. They cannot sit up after eleven o'clock at night and go to work next day. With the exception of Saturday night, many have suggested that TV stations could cut off their programs at ten o'clock, whilst others said eleven o'clock would be acceptable. I do not advocate these hours as a permanent move, but it would be interesting to know what savings could be effected by cutting down on the hours of programming, at least until the present inflationary spiral is brought under control. One hundred and sixty-six million dollars a year is a lot of tax dollars no matter how you count them.

The Throne Speech states that the competitive position of Canadian fisheries must be strengthened, not only through licensing and marketing arrangements, but also by extending Canada's exclusive fishing zones. You can rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that I will watch this legislation with interest, for no government in Canadian history has dealt more harshly with our east coast fishermen.

The fishing and marine industries in the Atlantic provinces seem to be the prime target of the austerity measures of this government. You have taken away the salt assistance for our salt cod industry, calling it a bandaid measure. You have taken away the fishing bounty in the amount of $160,000 as paid to some 11,000 east coast fishermen, a payment to which they are entitled as a result of a treaty that goes back to 1871, between Canada and the United States. You are curtailling the assistance required for maintenance of our small ports from which our inshore fishermen still carry on fishing operations. You have taken a total of $120,000 in research funds from St. Francis Xavier University in Nova Scotia and from Memorial University in St. John's, Newfoundland. The subsidy for the construction of wooden ships has been removed, resulting in some shipyards closing down while others have reduced their work force by 90 per cent in the last two years. You have taken away the inshore sealing rights.

This action of cutting down the subsidy for wooden ships has stopped the modernization of the wooden fishing fleet. If this course is continued, the present fleet could become obsolete within a few years. How can you justify paying a 35 per cent subsidy on a steel hull without paying the same amount for a wooden hull? Is this the just society as applied to our wooden shipbuilders? The 35 per cent subsidy should be paid on wooden ships as well as steel, since the fishing equipment installed in these ships is identical.

Having removed practically all the fishermen's bandaids, what are you planning to offer them in return? Surely, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), when he was studying for his black belt—I am sorry he is not in his seat—learned that if you wish to push someone forward you first act as if you wish to push him backward. This brings opposing forces into play on your behalf making the push forward a simple matter. Surely, our fishermen have been pushed backward far enough and the time is ripe to offer them some incentives to go forward. The record will show that the market value of the fish landed in Nova Scotia this year exceeds $100 million and it is reasonable to assume that at least 10 per cent of this amount will find its way back into the tax coffers of the nation in one way or another. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that 70 per cent of this money is new wealth, as that is the percentage of the catch exported to the United States. This amount must certainly help to meet the balance of payments on imports. I would therefore suggest that you give some of the money that you are taking from the fishing industry back to that industry.

In my native province $1 million a year in subsidy funds for wooden ships would enable Nova Scotia to maintain a fleet competitive with the highly subsidized fleets of other countries operating in the Grand Banks area. However, if you plan to cut out subsidies altogether, we will watch with interest to see if this same policy applies to the CBC and the National Arts Centre. Surely, if our productive industries must stand or fall on their own efforts, the same rule of thumb must apply to entertainment fields. Having provided a $47 million Arts Centre for our national arts there would really be no justification for an annual subsidy toward entertainment in excess of $2½ million, which I notice is the amount listed in the estimates for 1969-70.

Since our fishermen will need new ships, I would suggest that the government provide an incentive for their construction by permitting the cost of any new ship to be written off as an investment allowance, without payment of taxes on earnings, over a three-year period. I would point out also that any nation that has cut out assistance to the fishing industry, such as the United States and Sweden, has noted a decline in the over-all catch landed by that industry.

Since the men engaged in the fishing industry are exposed to many hardships—and young men today are not training to become fishermen—I suggest that they be placed in a special category for income tax purposes. This could take one of two forms. At present, if a citizen is over 70 years of age, he may claim a $500 age exemption on payment of his income tax. I suggest that fishermen should also be permitted this exemption. Alternatively, in view of the fact that their fishing operations are depleting our fishing resources, a fact which has been brought to our attention by scientists, a fisherman's income should be treated in the same manner as taxable income from some Canadian corporations for which a 15 to 20 per cent depletion allowance is acceptable to the government. I believe this special recognition would encourage more men to become fishermen. It would constitute a recognition of the hazards and uncertainties associated with the occupation, while assisting in the future growth and expansion of this important east coast industry.

Speaking as a member of parliament from Atlantic Canada, I believe that improvement in the transportation links between our area and central Canada could go a long way toward solving problems of regional disparity. We had hoped, through area incentives, that Atlantic Canada would have something extra to offer when seeking new industries, but this cabinet has changed all that. This same provision has been extended to a wide area of Canadian territory, taking away our special advantages and enabling the richer provinces to further widen the economic gap between us. However, maritimers are immune to adversity by now and almost numb from the beating given us by some of your programs. However, we still keep fighting, we still keep trying.

Since our railroad system is not the shortest route to Montreal, and we have not had any serious disagreements with the Americans in recent years, I should like to propose that the present government take a real step forward by advocating to the government of the United States a joint construction program on a corridor road through Maine. This road, linking the trans-Canada highway of the maritimes with Sherbrooke and Montreal, would cover some 180 miles of American territory but it would shorten the route between our area and central Canada and enable us to deliver our products more quickly. I realize the responsibility for constructing this road would rest solely with the United States but surely, with the new oil finds on the northern slopes in Alaska and the need for the rights-of-way for pipe lines through Canadian territory, some suitable agreement could be reached between our government and the government of the United States. In this way the needs and aspirations of our citizens could be met and we would be able to ensure the "progress and greatness of Canada", in the words of the Speech from the Throne. In Atlantic Canada we are still waiting for some sign of the Prime Minister's just society. In my view, a new transportation link between Atlantic Canada and the vast markets in central Canada would go a long way toward making the just society a reality in our area.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, before embarking on the main part of my comments I am tempted, and will yield to the temptation, to comment upon some of the matters raised in the Speech from the Throne. First, I was struck by the lack of attention in the speech to the critical problem of Canadian economic independence. It seems to me that only when the Government of Canada, and the nation as a whole, have greater control of the ownership of this economy will we be able to really do a job of directing our economy and controlling inflation. To my mind, the casual reference in the speech to farm marketing and income is most outrageous and I shall have more to say about that later. The much talked of Canada Development Corporation, which previous Liberal governments put forward, however weak and anemic it might have been, has again been shelved. The Liberals either are not concerned about this or are so completely enmeshed in the webb of outside corporations which own an ever increasing share of Canada that this government has been frozen into inaction.

[Mr. Crouse.]

The speech also forecasts extensive reform of our taxation system. We shall have to see what this entails. I suggest that the main needs are these: We must have a better redistribution of the tax load, a capital gains tax, a tightening of depreciation and incentive allowances for the mining and resource industries and the provision of higher exemptions and increased tax allowances for families with children. The speech also mentioned that the voting age in this country will be lowered. Mr. Speaker, in Saskatchewan we did that 25 years ago; our response to this measure therefore is automatic. As in so many other things, this Liberal government is 25 years behind the times.

On the matter of housing the speech seems to indicate that the government plans for the future more of what we have had in the past. If that assumption is right, then the Liberals again have missed the point. What we need is not just more houses, but houses at prices which more people can afford, with mortgages carrying interest rates which any of us can afford. Also, on the subject of inflation, unless moves to control inflation include more vigorous action with respect to the corporate sector of our economy, the results of action taken will continue to be disappointing. I suggest two moves the government can make. I suggest the control of profits through taxation, and greater influence by government on how corporations spend and re-invest profits accumulated in Canada. I shall have more to say about that in a few minutes, Mr. Speaker.

While the fight against inflation has been mentioned, we have heard about this government's expenditures on ministerial offices. Reference has been made to the Prime Minister's staff and to the renovation of ministers' offices. There are to be larger ministerial staffs and all kinds of expenses are to be undertaken which show that this government is as arrogant as other Liberal governments have been. Something that was drawn to my attention a few weeks ago illustrates how arrogant this government is. You know, Mr. Speaker, many great things, some of them quite justifiable, have been said about the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). It now appears that his worth can be measured. His worth is equal to four ounces and $6.50. Why do I say that? On September 22 the minister made a speech to the annual convention of the Canadian Airline Employees' Association. On Thursday, September 25 the text of the speech arrived at the editorial office of the Regina Leader Post. The speech weighed four ounces and had cost $6.50 to send by air express. I should like to know if the Minister of Labour makes a practice of sending copies of his speeches to all newspapers and radio and television stations in Canada? I should like to know that, because I do not think the action taken was proper. I do not suppose the minister sent the speech, but I should like to know what idiot in his office authorized $6.50 of the taxpayer's money to be spent on sending a four ounce speech by air express.

As I said, I was shocked to see that the Speech from the Throne made such casual reference to problems of farm marketing and income. Two paragraphs in the speech referred to the subject. Finally, after being prodded for many months, the government has made an admission. The Speech from the Throne reads in part as follows:

> One of Canada's most valuable assets is undeniably the richness and variety of her material resources. In some cases, production has increased substantially and outstripped demand; grain is one of the commodities of which reserves have piled up,—

Everybody else in Canada knows that, and now the government has admitted it.

In the throne speech the government indicates that it will amend the Canada Grain Act. In my opinion this action is long overdue since very likely it will improve our position on world markets. Yet there is not one word in the speech about strengthening and enlarging the Canadian Wheat Board, and there is not one proposal about farm incomes and the marketing of farm products.

The throne speech also mentions the agricultural crisis through which we are going. We already know that. My party, members of the official opposition and of the Creditiste group, have advanced many proposals during the last year; farm organizations have come up with all kinds of specific proposals, yet the government has not chosen to act on any of them. Few members of the government seemed to listen to proposals made about farm incomes in western Canada. Members of the official opposition recommended a system of acreage payments, as did spokesmen for farm organizations. Our party recommended the implementation of deficiency payments, as did members of farm organizations. Almost all in this house were unanimous in recommending a two-price system for wheat in conjunction with these payments, yet the government took no action. The government has not said why the adoption of the recommended course of action would not be appropriate.

In my opinion, the government's policy, as outlined in the Speech from the Throne, will be to take advantage of the farm crisis, to cause further tens of thousands of farmers to be eliminated from the agricultural industry. That suits the government's purposes. It suits the government not to help farmers with their cash income problem because it wants to speed up the process under which the number of farms is reduced. A small further reduction in the number of people farming is probably inevitable; but surely this process can be carried out over a long term and in a more civilized and humane manner. Too many viable, economic farm units will fall victims to the grand design of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and the government of Canada which seeks to eliminate more farms from the agricultural industry. The government has not as yet properly researched the social and financial loss accruing to the entire community as a result of the further drastic reduction in farm population. I submit that this cost to the community far exceeds any cost that might be involved in maintaining the present number of people on farm units.

I wish to say a few words about the Canadian Wheat Board. I congratulate the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) for Saskatoon-Humboldt on his appointment. I was under the impression that he held his present job last year. He acted, I thought, in his present capacity in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) who was ill and who has now returned to work. In any event, I congratulate him. The conditions under which the Canadian Wheat Board can operate are the same as they were one year ago. We still face the mess we faced one year ago with respect to the need for box cars, the fair allocation of cars and the delivery of grain to the elevator of the farmer's choice. May I say in reference to the allocation of railway equipment that the DBS figure for carloadings of wheat and other grains on western lines in an 11 week period from August 1, the beginning of the crop year, to the 14th of this October shows that some 2,700 fewer cars were loaded in this period compared to a year ago and almost 7,000 fewer than loaded in the same period in 1967.

A week ago, Mr. Speaker, I met with representatives from the eight wheat pool committees in rural Saskatchewan. Each of them submitted reports to me on the situation in their particular area. Each of them confirmed that they are in a worse position than they were a year ago. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) also met with some wheat pool committees in an area close to that which I represent. I am certain he can report receiving the same kind of information from those committees.

The reports were unanimous in pointing out these areas were still on the unit quota and had not yet delivered 400 bushels per farmer. Some still had not delivered the extra one bushel they are entitled to deliver as a result of their inability to complete the five bushel quota a year ago. All of them reported the desperate financial position of every farmer. All of them felt that cash advances were just another loan that partially postponed the problem and made the day of reckoning all the more horrible to contemplate.

I am going to put on the record a policy statement adopted by my party in the province of Saskatchewan. I am immodest enough to claim some part in the authorship of this statement because there have been speeches made by other spokesmen, from both the federal and provincial Liberal governments in Saskatchewan, laying blame on the Canadian Wheat Board for the position we are in regarding our export markets. I would like to submit that the blame for the situation the western farmer is in rests solely and completely upon the federal Liberal government, aided and abetted by their counterparts in Saskatchewan. Their attempts to shift blame on to the Canadian Wheat Board must not be allowed to succeed.

The Wheat Board can only operate within the limits of federal government policy. The policies of the present government have served to effectively handcuff the Board and prevent it from doing the best possible job for western farmers. These policies also serve to perpetuate the operations of the private grain trade, at the expense of western farmers, and at the same time to undermine the principle of orderly marketing through a central public agency.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

For example, the fact that the Wheat Board must deal through foreign, privately owned grain traders cannot be in the best interests of western farmers or the Canadian nation as a whole and serves as a stricture on Canadian sales in world markets. The turning of a blind eye to provincial and interprovincial trafficking in grain at firesale prices is further evidence of the Liberal government's failure to act in the interests of farmers.

My party, Mr. Speaker, reaffirms its support for the Canadian Wheat Board. Our provincial council calls for an even further enlarging of the responsibilities and activities of the Board, backed by the government of the whole nation. If Liberal governments really do believe in, and support, the Canadian Wheat Board, and the principle of orderly marketing through a public agency, it is time they put their action where their mouth is.

We call on the government to act immediately to, one; bring flax, rye, rapeseed and feed grains under the complete jurisdiction of the Board; two, authorize and pay for the expansion of the facilities and operation of the Board into market and product research, sales offices and staff in importing countries; three, empower the Board to have complete control and direction of grain handling including all transportation facilities needed for the grain movement.

The mess in the railway industry in particular, that part designated to handle our grain and grain products, is as bad as ever and still continues after many years. We have previously suggested the appointment of a controller. This did not seem to suit the government. We now suggest the entire responsibility and authority necessary for the movement of railway equipment for the transportation of grain be placed in the hands of, and under the direction of, the Canadian Wheat Board. As a fourth point, we urge that the government authorize the Board to establish its own grain brokerage agency in order to bypass domestic and foreign private grain trade speculators and, fifth, embody in Wheat Board legislation the principle of the right of farmers to deliver their grain to the elevator of their choice.

This principle has been expounded and pleaded for by political parties, farm organizations and individual farmers since the days of the Bracken Commission—perhaps even before that. There have been some attempts, on paper or in theory, to implement it. When one sees shipping point after shipping point at which the farmers' own elevator companies are outrageously discriminated against in the allocation of railway equipment, resulting in the percentage of their market dropping from 65 and 75 per cent to 40 and 45 per cent, one finds an indication this government is more interested in the survival of the private grain trade which has been a parasite on the back of western farmers since Canada began.

A sixth point we would like to make is that there should be provision for added farmer representation on the Board. In addition to these six points I have mentioned, and there are many more I could go into which would strengthen and widen the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board, there is a further measure I think many people in this country feel the government should take. We call on the government to institute a system of guaranteed prices based on costs of production and at the same time give the Canadian Wheat Board the freedom to sell in the export market at the most advantageous prices. Whenever those export prices are below the guaranteed price, the national treasury should make up the difference.

Reference was made last Friday by the leader of my party, and by the two previous speakers, to inflation, the steel industry and steel prices. I would like now to dwell a bit on this point if I may. The government's concern for inflation is somewhat justified. All of us must have some concern for it, but when that concern develops into a pre-occupation that goes to the lengths of perpetrating hardships on hundreds of thousands of Canadians while privileged corporations and individuals go merrily on their way, then this or any other government is guilty of the grossest of governmental malpractice.

This government, in the classic old line party so-called free enterprise style, is waging war on inflation by attacking the very people who have in no way contributed to inflation and in fact are the first victims of it. This government forgot about the old age pensioner, old age assistance recipients, veterans on pension, retired R.C.M.P., civil service pensioners, fishermen, unorganized workers and small businessmen. Surely, these are not the people who caused or who are contributing to inflation. Surely, the government's failure to act in their interest is a backwards attack on inflation. The government, in its cutbacks, is hurting its own employees and striking at sections of the economy which are already depressed. According to the DBS summary of quarterly corporation profits after taxes in 1968 and 1969, the category of "other non-manufacturing corporations" is among the lowest. This category, Mr. Speaker, covers agriculture, construction, forestry and fishing. In the fourth quarter of 1968, that section of our economy showed an accumulated loss of $18 million, showed no profits in the first quarter of 1969 and $10 million profit in the second quarter of 1969, which is $2 million less than the same period a year ago.

These are the very industries which are already in a depressed condition and which are, therefore, not contributing to inflation. They have been further harmed as a result of government policy. Failure to place capital into the hands of farmers, fishermen and homebuilders does not, I contend, represent intelligent action to contain inflation. These are areas in which any assitance provided by government would not, in my view, have contributed to inflation; rather it would have helped these vital industries at least to hold their own in the inflationary spiral. Failure to provide adequate increases in pensions for veterans, the aged and those already retired is certainly not the way in which to fight inflation, because it further harms those who are already hurt most by rising prices. Improved pensions for veterans and widows could not be considered inflationary were the government at the same time to take firm measures in those areas where inflation is really being caused. Let me illustrate. In the Speech from the Throne on October 23 the government states it has urged both the public and the private sectors to adopt special measures against inflation. The very next day the Steel Company of Canada thumbs its corporate nose at the government and announces a 6 to 7 per cent increase in steel prices.

For months Government spokesmen lectured, preached and pleaded with the private sector to exercise restraint. Where did it get them? After all the talk about the example the national government was trying to set, what effect has been visible in the private sector? As far as I can see, none, or none that is readily apparent. The fact that the action taken by the Steel Company of Canada was happily followed by the rest of the steel industry proves the private sector is either unconvinced that the action so far taken by the government will have any real effect in the fight against inflation or that they fully intend to act in their own selfish corporate interest—the country and the public interest be damned.

Apologists for the steel industry, who include some hon. members in the old parties on both sides of this House, will frantically point a finger at wage increases as justification for the increase in steel prices. As has been the case on previous occasions it is certain that most of the cost of wage increases, and, probably, all of the cost, will be more than offset by increases in productivity. When the final figures are published I bet the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs a new hat that this will prove to be is the case. Let me quote from a letter addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) by Mr. William Mahoney, the Canadian director of the United Steelworkers union. This letter is dated October 22. It deals with this question of steel price increases, and states, in part:

> We want to make it very clear that, in the opinion of the United Steelworkers of America, the settlement terms just approved by our members do not justify any increase in prices. The wage increases and benefit improvements outlined in that settlement can be completely met out of the improvement in productivity achieved by our members over the period of the previous collective agreement.
> Government and industry figures on the productivity of our members employed by the basic steel industry were recently analyzed by our union. We sent the details to you, to members of your government, to members of the House and to editors of all major Canadian publications well in advance of this year's negotiations. Figures for the first six months of this year which were not available at that time, confirm that our members' productivity has continued to grow.
> We want to emphasize that despite the fact that our members earned their wage increases and benefit improvements in advance it was still necessary for them to go through negotiations, government conciliation, government mediation and finally, go without pay for over eighty days before they could secure those wage increases and benefit improvements. Furthermore, unlike the steel industry, our members will not get special tax treatment, enabling them to use their income loss this year to offset higher earnings in other years.

The letter goes on:

> In contrast, the steel industry can simply announce price increases after a unilateral management decision.
> This is a dramatic example of the basic imbalance between government treatment of wage income and government treatment of investor income in Canada. This is the imbalance which must be corrected before your recently-appointed Prices and Incomes Commission can be accepted in good faith by Canadian workers. This is also a dramatic opportunity for your government to correct the imbalance.
> We suggest that your government ask the industry to withhold any increase in steel prices until such time as the steel companies can justify such price increases to their customers and to the general public before an appropriate government-appointed Board of Enquiry or the Prices and Incomes Commission itself.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

This letter underlines more forcibly than I can, the need for these corporations, particularly those associated with basic industry, to justify the price increases they place on their products. Incidentally, this time I have not heard the steel industry using the old chestnut that wage increases have brought about these increases in price. The only justification the industry has put forward so far, to my knowledge, is that many of the products to which these increases apply have not been increased in price for two and a half years.

Upon examination, this becomes the most spurious excuse of all. There sure as hell was no justification for an increase during the last two and a half years. If one looks at the profits made by the Steel Company of Canada one finds that in 1964 they amounted to $43,630,000, in 1965 to $45,454,000 and in 1966 to $42,774,000. Now, we come to the period in which the industry says it did not raise its prices. In 1967 the profits were $46,733,000 and in 1968 they were no less than $67,971,000. By the way, these are profits after taxation—net profits. I maintain that having made a profit in 1968 amounting to almost $68 million the government and the country could more properly have expected a price decrease of 6 per cent rather than an increase; the Steel Company of Canada would still be doing extremely well. The ratio of net profit to shareholder's equity in this company was 10.5 per cent in 1967. This was not bad, you will say. Well, in 1968 it had risen to 14.1 per cent. How's that for a fat return? Surely, it is more than can be considered fair and reasonable by comparison with what the big majority of Canadians received as a result of salary and pension increases. And, as we know, farm income actually dropped.

I would point out that corporations such as the Steel Company of Canada are virtually immune to inflationary pressures; they are little affected by tight money and high interest rates. From their large reserves of retained profits they can easily lend themselves the necessary money for plant improvement and expansion at zero per cent. They are also—obviously—not obliged to respond to anti-inflationary measures which the government calls upon itself or upon the private sector to take. The tragedy is that the multiplier effect of an increase in steel prices, as the products pass through the hands of the manufacturer, the wholesaler and the retailer, will mean that the consumer must pay many times more than the 6 per cent increase I have mentioned. The increase in the basic price will provide a neat cover for automobile, truck and farm machinery manufacturers, enabling them to add an even greater increase to the price of their products, since it opens a beautiful opportunity to make bigger and better profits which can all be blamed on higher steel prices. At the end of the line is the victimized consumer and the private enterprise government which has egg on its face for allowing aid and comfort to privileged friends. Meanwhile, inflation rolls merrily along.

Surely, this is one area in which the government should require restraint. Surely, the government ought now to force a roll-back of an unjustifiable steel price increase. Will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs act, or has he just been talking a good fight? It is apparent, or at least its is to most of us, that the minister is still talking a good fight. Will the Prices and Incomes Commission act or is it, too, just a paper tiger?

Let us look a little further into this whole area of the private sector to find out whether it has shown any restraint. Again, let us look at corporate profits. In the quarterly summary of corporate profits after tax published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, we find figures that are most illuminating. The very industries which are the largest contributors to increased prices and the rising cost of living, as well as to inflation, are the ones which show the greatest gains in profits.

The food and beverage industry, in the first six months of 1969, showed a net profit after taxes of $115 million. That is $27 million more than it showed for the first six months a year ago. The textile industry showed a profit of $45 million in the first six months or $20 million more than a year ago.

The chemical and chemical products industry, our friendly polluters, showed a profit of $82 million in the first six months, $8 million more than a year ago. The wholesale trades—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Benjamin: May I have a moment to conclude?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benjamin: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I so enjoyed hearing what I was saying I forgot to watch the clock.

May I close by saying that the government has attacked inflation from the wrong end, as, is usual for Liberals. Until such time as the government exercise some control—and this will not be obtained through voluntary action—over the size of profits made by the private sector and in the direction of investment made by this sector, they will not in fact be able to do very much about inflation.

I find the Throne Speech sadly lacking in measures of this nature. It provides promise that in the future we will have more of what we had in the past year. I, for one could not support such a speech.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I read with great attention the traditional Speech from the Throne which depicts existing conditions and sets in uncertain terms the government's attitude towards the present economic situation.

A rather lengthy list of new bills has also been tabled and I presume that more details can be expected during this session concerning what the government intends to do about measures taken to reduce unemployment, that social ailment whose ravages must be restricted by every means at our disposal.

In agriculture, the government will have to define its position in order to boost the morale of farmers who are still faced with nearly insoluble problems which will force a great many of them to sell their land or declare bankruptcy.

Many other problems will require definite legislation and I wish that we may be able during this session to pass practical legislative measures in the interest of the population which expects from the government more comprehension and action than useless debate.

I have listened with interest to those who have participated in the debate until now. The mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne have performed very well considering the circumstances. The representatives of the various parties all deserve congratulations. I do not doubt that each one of them has expounded his point of view according to his convictions.

I hope it will be recognized that many problems could find a solution if everyone made an effort to understand the ideas expressed by the members of the various parties and to ascertain as wisely as possible to what extent each one really works for the welfare of the country, rather than to promote the interests of one's own party.

In this century of materialism, it is too often forgotten that ideas are at the root of any improvement, however small.

The author of the best editorial for 1968, according to the Canadian Association of French Weeklies, which comprises 107 newspapers, simply headlined his article with these two words: "Good Idea."

He was speaking with much common sense, and I would like to quote parts of that article:

> Ideas are as invisible and airy as electricity. Yet, it has been possible to pick up the electric fluid with wires and aerials. Why should it not be possible to pick up the "intellectual fluid" by more sophisticated means like silence, study and meditation. Let us open our mind still more to new ideas. Let us find them in the jumble of thoughts that beset our mind at every moment.

He ends his article on these words:

> Do not tell me that an idea is worthless. There is something good in every idea; there are only men not willing to take advantage of ideas. Any idea as a whole can bring forth a better one. The needle was invented before the sewing machine. Any idea is the road to a sure development.

I hope the ideas expressed during this session will not be misconstrued nor wrongly implemented, in order to lead to a better understanding of the causes of the difficulties experienced by Canadians. We must also wish that we will find through the exchange of good ideas practical solutions to the numerous economic problems of today.

If we consider long enough the principle that production is aimed at consumption, we shall realize easily that the purpose of production is not reached, and we shall be more prepared to look for the causes of this in the distribution system.

Several economists contend that amortization is now part of the purchasing power. However, it is very difficult to assess its lag and to determine its influence and scope on the immediate availability in terms of purchasing power in the hands of consumers. One or two factors of this kind are enough to reverse the position of recognized experts.

[Mr. Dionne.]

Besides, daily evidence shows us that the purchasing power available to consumers is undoubtedly inadequate.

I have before me an article published in Le Devoir in October 1962, following a television broadcast of October 4 during which two different theories had been explained by members of parliament on the problem of wealth distribution. Mr. P. H. Lavallée, an engineer, called the readers' attention to an idea originating with Major C. H. Douglas, also an engineer and the founder of Social Credit, who explored this field through differential calculus (in which time is considered as an operator. One may well wonder whether his position is not closer to reality.

Mr. Lavallée stated, and I quote:

> Where experimental science is concerned, when a system cannot be based on facts, one uses an hypothesis. On the latter one builds a theory which must bring one to the solution one is seeking.
> For example, Copernicus Galileo assumed that the earth could rotate around the sun, as the result of which many astronomical problems were solved. Christopher Columbus assumed that the earth was round, and we know what happened. On the other hand, Pasteur went on from the hypothesis (current then) of the infinitesimal. Modern atomic science is based wholly on a hypothesis—that of the structure of the atom. When a hypothesis is inconsistent with the facts, only once, it is rejected and a new one is used.

As for the problem which interests us at the present time, it is fair to proceed in the same way.

Let us state a first hypothesis: The purchasing power provided by production is sufficient to dispose of the latter. How can we explain then that in a normal period, we are often faced with overproduction or rather acute sub-consumption? Great numbers of people would like, in vain, to buy the goods which pack warehouses. There is also unemployment. In short, we are faced with the problem of abundance.

How can we explain that this uneasiness diminishes or disappears in wartime or when the economy is in full progress or, even, when the trade balance of a country is favourable?

Second hypothesis: Production alone cannot finance consumption. If we still want to balance our economy, we must make up for a shortage of purchasing lower. The supplement could take different forms.

Having said what happens in wartime:

(1) With regard to the wages of soldiers and workers employed in war factories (unsold production which cannot be bought);

(2) Massive capitalization for important projects;

(3) Favourable trade balance. Realizing that the last two methods are not sufficient to fill the gap between prices and buying power, Mr. Lavallée adds that another method must be used, and I quote:

• (3:40 p.m.)

The distribution of additional purchasing power to the citizens of the country so as to sell the whole production.

It is always argued that this measure will lead to inflation as if there was no middle term nor any middle course between a chronic shortage of purchasing power and inflation.

If the issue of additional funds is strictly and scientifically controlled, there should not be more inflation than when the Aluminum Company took the decision to invest several hundred million dollars at Kitimat or when the Iron Ore and Quebec Cartier Mining decided to sink more than half a million dollars in Labrador; nor when the St. Lawrence Seaway or the Dew line were built; no more than when it was decided to pay family allowances or old age pensions. But it might be possible to find there a means to balance and stabilize the economy.

Considering the remarks I have just made, the classic economists' position does not seem to me to be unassailable, and I am wondering if the second hypothesis has not at least as many chances to be valid as the first one.

It seemed desirable to me to submit this idea at the beginning of the session and I think I have used wisely the time allotted to me, by promoting the concept of the distribution of abundance rather than praise the government on its achievements or criticize it for what it failed to do.

I shall undoubtedly have an opportunity to take part in the debates on some of the bills we will have to consider during this session. However, I am convinced that if we could direct the legislative work towards this idea of a more equitable distribution of goods, most Canadians would be satisfied with the administration of their country and would be better prepared to respect the government's authority that needs to be strengthened.

Before closing, I should like to say that the Speech from the Throne mentions the government's resolve to achieve linguistic equality. The Official Languages Act constitutes a pressing invitation to all the provinces to take that course which will help save Canadian unity.

This legislation may prove to be interesting training for citizens of good will and most Canadians belong to that category. There is no provision in the act which compels Canadians to speak English and French. But it recognizes existing facts. This gesture has an important symbolic value which should help bring about true bilingualism at the federal level.

Canada is a federation of ten provinces and constitutes a country. In matters of general interest we must act as Canadians and not only as residents of a province.

English is known throughout the world as the commercial language and French as the diplomatic one. Therefore, there is some advantage in having both official languages on an equal footing in Canada and in having them in use in all parts of the country where conditions permit.

The development of interprovincial co-operation could become easier and greatly help to achieve the desired goal; makes a new Canada that will recognize in fact the equality of the two founding peoples.

I would urge all those who are not yet won over to read a speech given by Mr. Douglas How, editor in chief of the Reader's Digest, on October 16, 1963, at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel, about "The Canadians that we could be".

On the first page Mr. How states, and I quote:

What French Canada is asking for would, in a large measure, correspond to what we, English-speaking Canadians, consider necessary in Canada.

And later on he adds:

Through and in spite of this resistance we have created the Canada of today. In making its inventory, English Canada would do well to remember that the miracle of the survival of French Canada played a leading part in the survival of Canada as an independent state.

On the other hand, it would not be a bad thing for French Canada to remember that such a miracle was only possible on account of English Canada. We needed one another. What remains to be seen is whether we can convince one another to maintain that kind of co-operation.

Otherwise, should this country break up, we will have to conclude that we were not strong enough to make the best of our opportunities and to take up the challenges inherent in them. Therefore the tragedy then would not consist in such a division, which would be but the logical result of a matter of fact. The tragedy would consist in not having been able to become what we could have been. Such is the essence of our history, of the present crisis, of our future. We can overcome such a difficulty and add to our size. But if we do not overcome it, we run the risk of losing ground—and even worse.

Mr. Speaker, I am confident that Canadians will be able, at the right time, to come to decisions that will enable everyone to live in harmony and to make of this country what it should be, namely a united Canada working in harmony towards her destiny.

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of representing the people of the Winnipeg South Centre constituency, in this parliament of which so much is expected. To me, it is a great honour as well as a great task.

[English]

As we come into our one hundredth year in Manitoba, which is a province that has featured both languages so strongly in its history, I think it is only fitting that I should try, in my own small way to accept that fact by struggling slightly to begin my speech in French.

An hon. Member: Why not continue in French?

Mr. Osler: I would love to be able to do so. I guarantee that six or seven years from now I shall be able to do so.

Some hon. members may have noticed on the front of my car a distinctive looking licence plate bearing the number 100 and saying "Manitoba—The First 'In' Province". This is a sort of gimmick adopted by the province of Manitoba this year to draw attention to the fact that on July 15, 1970 we will be celebrating the hundredth anniversary of our entry into confederation. Although we were not a party to the original negotiations which resulted in the Dominion of Canada, we joined the dominion three years and 15 days after it had been born. So, we were the first "in" province, as my licence plate declares to all and sundry, and we are very proud of it.

It was in Manitoba that the separate thrusts of English and French penetration of this continent collided, and in Winnipeg, where the Red and Assiniboine rivers meet, where these two peoples resolved, after an initial clash, to bed down together and, with the native Indians of the area, build a distinctive little colony of their own. It was here that the good faith of the new Canadian confederation was first put to the test.

As the centennial of Manitoba draws near, the name of Louis Riel looms large in my home town. Like myself, he was a member of parliament. He was elected to this House three times but he was never allowed to take his seat. Yet, he retains a claim to a place in history, for it was he who insisted that the colony of Assiniboia must only join Canada on negotiated terms acceptable to the people who lived in it. He was not a French Canadian; he was a French speaking citizen of the Northwest. Just as W. L. McKenzie and Joseph Papineau had insisted some 30 years before in Ontario and Quebec, he insisted on representation by population for the west.

Probably Riel should be considered Manitoba's Father of Confederation. He was not its sole founder—I do not think it is right to call him the founder of Manitoba as some people want to do today—although assuredly he was one of the founders. Others would include Chief Henry Prince, who signed the first treaty between Canada and the Indians of the Northwest—it was treaty number one signed in 1871—and who spoke for his people as their elected delegate in the troubles of 1869 and 1870 in which Riel first featured. He was descended from Chief Peguis, who in turn negotiated and signed the original treaty with Lord Selkirk in 1819.

The Earl of Selkirk was another person whom we should consider as another founder of Manitoba. He established the first permanent settlement in the Northwest by bringing Irish and Scottish dispossessed crofters to this land and setting them up on the banks of the river.

Then, there was Alexander K. Isbister, a native of the Red River region, a man of mixed blood, who headed a delegation to the British government in 1846. His efforts resulted ultimately in some measure of local representation on the Hudson Bay Company's governing board.

Then, we have Louis Riel senior, the father of the man who was more famous, who helped to establish free trade and break the Hudson Bay Company's monopoly in the entire Northwest.

Then, we have a Nova Scotian, Adams George Archibald, the first Manitoba lieutenant governor. By his insistence on "keeping his cool" on all questions and by his determined fairness to all factions he guided Manitoba through its first difficult years and set the pattern for tolerance and justice of which we are all so rightly proud. After Archibald there were many others, many natural leaders who emerged from the countless immigrants who flooded into our land and made it what it is today. So, I suggest that Riel is our Father of Confederation, and many more people share my view regarding his claim to be founder of Manitoba.

What has all this to do with us here and now? I suggest that if we want to know where we are going, we must sometimes pause to look backwards to see where we have been. It is useful also to note that although Manitoba's boundaries have expanded greatly since it came to confederation as the postage stamp province, and its population now exceeds one million people, we still consider ourselves to be a region, or part of a region, distinct and unique from all the others.

Confederation is attractive to us now, as the idea of Canada was attractive one hundred years ago, only to the degree that it allows us to contribute in our own way to Canada as a whole. We came in voluntarily one hundred years ago and we remain in the confederation voluntarily as the beginning of our second century looms ahead; but now, as then, we have our own distinctive ideas about how some of Canada's remaining problems should be solved.

In the Speech from the Throne I noted many subjects of interest to us all. We are all interested in the reform of the United Nations; we are all interested in the idea of a Canadian international development research centre; we are all interested in helping our Indian and Eskimo peoples to help themselves; we are all interested in the subjects of social security, amendments to collective bargaining laws, the enforcement of measures to fight inflation, the fight against pollution, further amendments to the Criminal Code, consumer protection laws, etc.

But there are some items that to me will test the government's seriousness of intent in so far as regional equality is concerned. I commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for his continued efforts to revise our constitution and for his statement that the federal constitution must always provide for the integrity of the regions or provinces making up the state. I am intrigued by his suggestion that the four Senate divisions of Canada might be used as the basis for developing a consensus on certain matters. In this connection, it is interesting to note that Sir Alexander T. Galt, one of the more able Fathers of Confederation, wanted a Senate in which some approach to federal equality between the various sections of the country would be secured, and felt very firmly that we should have an upper house elected on a territorial basis to give some weight to the legitimate differences of opinion between regions which would otherwise be swamped in a legislative assembly elected on the basis of population.

It is good to see that the federal government proposes to increase funds to reduce regional disparities, and it will be interesting indeed to discover whether the white paper on taxation aimed at achieving a fairer distribution of the tax burden has any features in it that might provide a sort of built-in compensation for those of us who live in parts of the country that appear to offer less glamorous opportunities than the central provinces. It is gratifying to see that we will have amendments to the Canada Grains Act. While no one can hope to sell a commodity such as grain as easily as it used to be sold in the good old days, it is only common sense to bring our system of grading and marketing into line with the systems that prevail among our competitors.

In housing, and particularly in urban renewal, I hope to see some formula adopted that is not a simple freeze. Just as the government intends to emphasize measures to help low income families in housing, I hope they will consider measures to help in a special way low income regions to catch up with the more affluent parts of this country.

This is not a land where all can be centralized; it is too vast, too complex and too diverse for that. The glory of Canada will be found in the quality of the lives of the people living in all sorts of places, in all sorts of styles. We are not enamoured of the melting pot theory, thank God. We should rejoice as much in the achievement of Didi Woolgar, who runs an art shop of quality on the ground floor of a Yellowknife hotel, as we do about the National Arts Centre across from Parliament Hill. Perhaps we should rejoice more over Didi's achievement, and others like her, than over the ones that are so finished and final.

My fellow members from Winnipeg—of whom I see one across the House right now—will no doubt remember, as I do, the seeds that have grown into our own magnificent centennial hall and the cultural achievements of Winnipeg. When I was a boy the people of Winnipeg heard concerts in the old Grace Church and the old Board of Trade building, where the performers had to compete with the noise from shunting engines in the Canadian National yards nearby. What was developed in these unlikely places were art indigenous to the skills of our own peoples, so that what we have today in Winnipeg is founded firmly and is not imposed upon our people from on high. This is as it should be because the exciting truth is we are a "becoming" nation and we must build for ourselves as we go along, and seek our own solutions.

We hear a lot about the search for a Canadian identity. Professional panelists make their livings searching vainly for this elusive thing before the beady eyes of television cameras—in colour, yet! They search in vain, for the thing they look for is already there, had they only the wit to see it.

Not long ago I attended the marriage of two young friends of mine. The bridegroom's heritage was Scots-in-Canada for 170 years, plus French-in-Canada for 300; the bride's people had been living in Canada since long before the middle of the nineteenth century. Why search for an identity here? Why look for things that all 20 million of us should now be taking for granted, and working as hard as we know how to improve?

There are some among us who dissent loudly and clearly about many things they think are wrong with this country today. Thank God they have the right to do so, so long as they respect the rights of others in the process. Things can be improved;they ought to be improved; they must be improved. But as we go about this process of improving the quality of life in Canada today let us remember the monument to Jacques Cartier on Gaspe's rugged coast, and also the memorial to the bush pilots of Canada that stands on the summit of a harsh peninsula jutting out into Great Slave Lake beside one of the most isolated capital cities in the world. For more than 400 years men have been striving to make of this a great country. We must continue to do the same.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to congratulate the two government members, from Sarnia and Lapointe, who moved and seconded the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Maybe I should add that I regret they are not present in the House to hear my congratulations.

There are many shortcomings and inadequacies in the Speech from the Throne upon which I might touch. Generally speaking, it was a sorry document, long on ringing phrases but woefully short of hope for the average Canadian. If this speech presents, as some commentators friendly to the government have said it does, the skeleton of the long awaited just society, then God help Canada because the bones are the bones of a monster.

The speech is studded with references to the individual, his rights, his privileges, his protection. It fairly breathes concern for the individual Canadian.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Hear, hear.

Mr. McIntosh: Unfortunately, Mr. Minister, it fails to inform us how this concern will be translated into action. There was passing reference, too, to the bogey of inflation. But again any suggestion of action on the part of the government was exceedingly vague. All in all, the speech was most notable for what it did not say, for the areas that were untouched, for the problems by-passed or ignored. Whether this was intentional or not, we are not at this time prepared to say.

I have in mind one particular group of Canadians who, apparently, were entirely overlooked. This is the large number of solid Canadian citizens forced to subsist on fixed incomes. Forgetting them is crime enough, but to emphasize their chief enemy, inflation, without giving any hope of remedial action, is unforgiveable.

Pensioners, particularly retired federal public servants, are a ghost army that must haunt any government with a conscience, but one which the present government has obviously deliberately excluded from the fabric of the so-called just society. I believe they constitute a spectre that will torment the government in the months ahead.

These retired persons do not enjoy the general benefits that flow from rising incomes and improved living standards. They are the helpless targets of inflation. With fixed incomes and diminishing purchasing power, they suffer most. Some of them have some measure of flexibility, through personal initiative, to try to off-set the ravages of inflation. Others are dependent upon pension plans or superannuation schemes, provincial or private, that are more modern, more effective and more humane than is the federal system. It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to confine what I have to say to the plight of the superannuated public servants of Canada.

For a long time now, through their chosen bargaining agents, public servants have sought to have superannuation included as a bargainable point during collective bargaining sessions. They have described the present system as inadequate and antiquated and feel, rightly I believe, that they should be allowed to contribute their ideas to modernizing it and making it adequate to the times. In an excellent brief presented to a joint committee of parliament in January, 1967, the Professional Institute of the Public Service made this point strongly. They hold this view even more emphatically today in the prevailing economic atmosphere.

Some of the figures advanced in support of their case before that committee bear repetition today. For instance, experience indicates that federal public servants who retire at age 65 live, on the average, for another 14 years. Those who retire at 60 live for 17 more years. About 20 per cent of public servants live 20 and more years following retirement. In view of the advances continually being made in health and medicine, this period of life may be expected to increase, not decrease.

In 1949 a pension of $150 a month was considered reasonable, if not princely. Today, 20 years later, it barely pays the rent. Many of the 20 per cent of pensioners who retired in the 1949 era are still eking out an existence on pensions too often well below even the $150 figure. Surely, Mr. Speaker, social justice and common decency demand that the real value of the pension, in terms of current purchasing power, should be maintained for these public servants. They should not be penalized by society for having been born 20 years too soon nor, I believe, should their career of service to the country be set so cheap as to condemn them to degradation and want.

What justification can there be for denying them all the benefits of all the advances achieved since their retirement? As a good employer, and as the exemplar of the rights and protection of the individual within a just society, the government should ensure that their retirement benefits are automatically adjusted to the increased costs of Canadian life.

The old system of adjusting government pensions has obviously failed to meet the need. We should now consider some means of making post-retirement adjustments that will achieve the objective of the superannuation plan, which is to provide retired public servants with a standard of living related to the standard enjoyed prior to retirement. Whatever means we choose to accomplish this, it cannot be of the periodic review type where action can come only after need has far outstripped the remedy. To help reach this desirable objective, those most intimately concerned with it, the public servants covered by superannuation, must have a voice. That is why I claim superannuation must be negotiable at the bargaining table.

In a number of other countries pensions are a proper topic for negotiation. The federal civil service retirement system of the United States has a cost of living increase formula linking pensions with the consumer price index. Our aim must be to provide the same justice to Canadian public servants, to ensure that there is automatic adjustment to meet changed economic conditions. I realize that such a formula would entail additional cost, but this cost does not necessarily have to be an additional burden on general government expenditure.

I was pleased, Mr. Speaker, that I was in the House this afternoon to listen to the hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson) when he tried to explain the reason that this session of parliament might be called the "white paper session". He said that we in the opposition criticized but offered no alternatives, and he also implied that our suggestions would create additional expenditures. I had intended to deal at length with some of the statements he made, but I was pleased to note that immediately after he sat down the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) rose to his feet and answered all the statements that I had intended to answer.

I was amazed when I heard the statement, which has been made several times during the course of this debate, that the cost of the present Prime Minister's staff is twice that of his predecessors, $350,000 a year compared with $150,000 a year for Mr. Pearson and $50,000 a year for the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). The number of elite advisers to the government has reached the astronomical figure of 117, at a cost of $1.5 million.

These are some of the things, Mr. Speaker, for which we criticize this government. It is not our position to tell them how to run their business. We offered alternatives to the general public in 1968 that were not accepted. The solutions offered by the present government were accepted, and what does the public of Canada find today? They find the government has no answers, that they want a session full of white papers by means of which they can study today's problems. What have they been doing for the last 18 months? They were supposed to know the solutions. The Liberals told the people of Canada that they knew what the solutions were before they took office. All opposition parties, and quite rightly so, criticized them for the inaction that will become apparent during the next 12 months, the term of this session. They say now they do not know what the answers are but will study the problems. I would say that those members of the general public of Canada who put their cross on the ballot for the present government will long remember, and one wonders whether they will do it again.

I want to say that the problem I am dealing with at the present time does not entail expenditures for the present government or the public of Canada. There appears to be sufficient earning power within the fund itself to offset any additional cost. This additional cost could be offset to a large extent, if not entirely, if the government were to bring the superannuation account into the economic world of today. Civil servants have advocated this course since 1967 when they presented their last brief.

The government should credit the superannuation account with interest at rates somewhat closer to those prevailing elsewhere throughout the economy. Private employers can invest pension funds in a manner calculated to offset increased payments and adjustments. The government cannot. But it could increase the superannuation account interest rate from 4 per cent to a more realistic figure. As things now stand, public servants are forced to lend money to the federal government through superannuation payment deductions at a rate of 4 per cent. In view of conditions prevailing outside this captive fund, this is little short of highway robbery and, I am certain, would not be condoned in any other joint venture unless one party had dictatorial control over the fund, such as the government has over the superannuation account.

Even the latest issue of Canada Savings Bonds yields 8 per cent at maturity and interest rates on other investments sold in the open market are even higher. Today, reference has been made to outside groups which are paying 9 per cent on borrowed money. Savings accounts in chartered banks constitute a far better investment bet today than does the federal superannuation account, yet public servants have no choice. It is this to which I object. Civil servants have no voice or control over this account.

Funds are borrowed from the Canada Pension Fund at rates approaching 7 per cent—last year it was 6.92 per cent—and the unemployment insurance fund sells bonds at comparable rates. Yet the superannuation fund, fed by a compulsory flow from a captive army of public servants, yields a pitiable 4 per cent. The province of Ontario pays 6 per cent on a comparable fund. Why can the federal government not do the same thing?

In the 11 years to 1968, the superannuation account increased nearly three times to close to $3 billion. This was $3 billion which the federal government had at its disposal at the bargain rate of 4 per cent—$3 billion that, in effect, public servants were forced to lend to the government. They had no alternative. They were forced to lend this money to the government which, in its wisdom, saw fit to pay them 4 per cent when the government would have had to pay at least 8 per cent, according to the last bond issue, to borrow money from the general public. What made the phenomenal growth of the fund possible was the fact that in every one of the 11 years contributions exceeded payments—certainly an indication that these payments did not keep abreast of the rising cost of living. In 11 years the account earned over $648 million dollars in interest, at 4 per cent. Had a rate similar to Ontario's 6 per cent been effective there would have been $324 million more in earnings available to meet pension adjustment payments. In other words, 50 per cent more would have been put into that fund if the federal government had paid the same rate of interest on their superannuation fund as the province of Ontario.

The account paid out $509 million over 11 years, while taking in $531 million over the same period, without touching any of the original investment. What would $324 million additional have meant to retired public servants in those years if it had been paid out as an adjustment on the cost of living? In other words, taking these figures roughly, if there had been an adjustment clause in this account, civil servants on pension would have enjoyed at least a 50 per cent higher standard of living.

The superannuation account consists of public servants' own money, but it is at the disposal of the government, and entirely controlled as to earning power and use by the government. Little wonder that public servants today are crying out for some voice in the handling of their own fund. On the face of these figures I have quoted, the government may have been smart in its own, narrow field of financing but it has been guilty of gross mismanagement of the fund in the interests of its contributors and in neglecting the best of interests of public servants. The least we can do now is to adjust the superannuation account interest rate to something like the government's long-term bond yield.

We must act to make sure that provisions are made for automatic adjustment of the pensions of retired public servants to the cost of living. In order to arrive at an acceptable and fair method of doing this, the superannuation system of the federal government should be made negotiable between employees and their employer.

There is a wider field of possibilities lying beyond this basic need, Mr. Speaker. They are possibilities that any government genuinely interested in people and professing concern, such as this government does, for the individual Canadian in a just society would be wise to explore. For instance, there is the question of making funds available from the superannuation account for housing loans to public servants. There is the urgent question of improvement in widows' pensions. There is the question of control of the fund by joint committee of representatives of the employer and employees, and the possibility of investment beyond the present narrow confines imposed by the present Act.

I think this House should be given the opportunity of overhauling the Public Service Superannuation Act thoroughly, if not in all its particulars then, certainly, in a few specific instances. I am not interested at the moment in trying to apportion blame for the past "victimization" of Canada's public servants, but I do believe that they have been victimized by the arbitrary nature of the legislation and the operation of the supperannuation account exclusively by the government. Let us now have a little participatory democracy. Let us allow the public servants of Canada to have a little say in how their money is handled and how their retirement position can be improved. I would ask that the Prime Minister give meaning to some of the words he uttered in this House on Friday when he stated that his government's primary responsibility is to the people of Canada. The figures offered by some other members of this House have shown him how the cost of operating his office has risen since 1963 from $50,000 a year to $350,000 a year. I wish he would give the same consideration to the Public Servants who have served this country well and whose costs have also increased, although not in the same proportion. I think in this regard he should practice what he preaches.

Referring to another group in our society, the Prime Minister said this on Friday:

> There is no need anywhere in Canada for misguided or misinformed zealots to resort to acts of violence in the belief that only in this fashion can they accomplish change.

He went on to say:

> Those who would defy the law and ignore the opportunities available to them to right their wrongs and satisfy their complaints will receive no hearing from this government.

I ask the Prime Minister, the members of the cabinet and, in particular, the minister present, what opportunities will be given to our public servants to right their wrongs and satisfy their complaints in connection with their superannuation fund. I hope there is some plan of action. If there is any substance to the Prime Minister's speech, and if he is genuinely concerned with unrest and discontent among certain groups in our society, I suggest this is one area where he can immediately demonstrate that there are other means that can accomplish change, right wrongs and satisfy complaints. This is one area where one word from the Prime Minister will rectify this injustice.

Many of us in the opposition are only too well aware that it is unwise to listen to what the Prime Minister says. We are much better informed if we watch what he does. I am sure that many thousands of Canadians who once had faith in the just society will be watching for immediate action to be taken by this government on this issue.

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to give my modest appreciation of the Speech from the Throne and to indicate what I believe to be the views of my constituents as regards the policies expressed therein.

While listening to His Excellency the Governor General last Thursday, we could, once more, observe that the ultimate goal sought by the government is always to provide more happiness to every Canadian citizen. In fact, the government, the Liberal party, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) give more and more importance to the respect due to the human being. Their primary concern is the welfare, security and liberty of each citizen, and they have expressed that concern with remarkable clarity and vigour in the Speech from the Throne.

During the first session, before beginning to carry out its program of justice, the government thought it advisable to revitalize its proposed legislation and to improve its working tools, particularly, the parliamentary procedure. Although it was not an easy thing to do, and of limited interest to the general public, this has nevertheless been completed.

All the legislation passed during the first session as well as the preliminary work done to prepare this new session, have been summarized in a Speech from the Throne of a new type. We consider this speech as a most happy initiative taken by the government, an initiative that deserves to be praised.

All the realizations listed in this speech, whether the Official Languages Act, the reorganization of the government, the measures to control inflation and to protect the consumer, to name only a few of them, are for the government the assurance of a successful session to come.

Now, it is generally anticipated that because of the austerity program which is going to prevail for an indefinite length of time in order to reduce the threat of inflation, the government will insist on a certain stability of the administrative structures, on simplifying the administration to ensure greater efficiency within the federal departments, services and programs. This concern for efficiency seems to be, at present, the government's top priority. We can but approve because it is wise nowadays to be very cautious before launching any large scale undertaking.

There is, however, a very happy exception to this austerity program, namely the projects of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion whose budget is to be increased, which would make this department the main weapon in the fight against social, economic and regional disparities. We are delighted, my constituents and myself, that the Rimouski constituency, which I have the honour to represent in the house, is in the pilot regional development area of the Lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé peninsula. This is why we have set our hopes on the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Marchand), in charge of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which he heads with efficiency and in a masterly way.

That is why the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) surprises me a little, as it must surprise many among us. As I read it, it says that the government intends to stall action to eliminate what I would summarize by the word "poverty" in some areas of our country.

It seems to me that this priority, as spelt out in the Speech from the Throne, is an answer to the question of the Leader of the Opposition.

Some members of the opposition along with those who are against the government and the Liberal party may criticize the Speech from the Throne, saying that, like all government programs, it is insignificant and does not contain anything spectacular to draw public attention and prompt editorialists or radio and television commentators to engage in written or oral analyses. Yet, it was not so long ago when major statements were made and, rightly or wrongly, they were described as shattering. About two months ago, the Prime Minister explained his position on austerity and efficiency measures taken by the government to streamline administrative structures and fight inflation. He also explained, on October 19, the attitude that the government might take in connection with the management of certain Crown corporations, for instance the C.B.C.

Following those statements, I believe that the majority of Canadians approved the Prime Minister, while admiring his qualities of true leader, and especially his great frankness, and, particularly, that integrity of mind peculiar to him.

The Speech from the Throne is nothing but a preamble, a foreword characterized by its brevity and its clarity. Some will perhaps say that it is not complete, that it gives a very vague idea of what the legislation program of this session will be.

I think it is the opposite considering the list of the titles of the bills that the Prime Minister tabled in the house before the moving of the Address in reply. According to me, the list is the practical complement of the legislative program outlined in the Speech from the Throne. Indeed, is it not an appropriate answer to the questions some could ask? Is it not the concrete expression of our program of activities for this new session? Does not each title of those bills relate to Canadian priorities?

During the parliamentary recess—although the word conveys the wrong impression because members from all parties undoubtedly saw to their duties during that period while members of the Cabinet continued to govern the country—some people have been working, judging from the list of bills and the impending publication of White Papers on most important matters, such as fiscal reform, social security and foreign affairs.

This indicates that White Papers will be increasingly used to inform Canadians in advance on priority questions of interest to them and to invite them to make their views known. Anyone can see that there are priorities in Canada and that the government has undertaken to determine them quite accurately.

As for reforms concerning individual rights, we have noted the proposal for lowering the voting age to 18. If it is implemented, it will hopefully result in encouraging more people to take an interest in federal politics.

We have also noted the government's desire to amend again the Criminal Code in order to restrict the use of wire-tapping and other eavesdropping devices for a better protection of the rights and privacy of the individual.

The government is still concerned with the problems that interest the people to the highest degree, like housing. This seems to be the third priority set by the government. As a matter of fact, in spite of the threats posed by inflation, and the need for an austerity program, the government has set as its objective to build in a five-year span one million houses and dwellings likely to meet the needs of low-income families.

With the same principles underlying its programs, it plans to protect the consumers even further, to undertake an in-depth reform of the unemployment insurance scheme, to improve labor-management legislation and to check water pollution.

If it cares for the problems confronting the people, the government does not care less for those where the people are less directly involved, as, for instance, the revamping of the Constitution which is one of its priority projects.

Far from forgetting this problem of the Constitution, the government is giving it greater importance and will spare no effort to make this important revision successful. Therefore we have here a fourth priority.

We also see that the government remains mindful of international politics, to take stock on these questions, to put things in order. The session has scarcely started, but we will all have many opportunities to come back on the plans outlined in the Speech from the Throne.

At this point, I am pleased to join my colleagues who have approved and congratulated the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Both have discharged their duties with much thoroughness and grace. The hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) stated brilliantly his views and those of his fellow-citizens concerning Canada's main problems, our role as members of parliament and the question of poverty in our affluent society.

On the other hand we noted very enthusiastically that the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) recalled to us the importance of the Saguenay, his region. Talking with much spirit and verve he described the region and told us of its history in a very colourful style.

These two members have certainly done justice, not only to their constituents but also to all of us who sit in this house. That is why, falling in stop with several other hon. members, I wholeheartedly, support and congratulate them.

Many people in Canada where very much interested in the Speech from the Throne, and so were, I am sure, my constituents. The citizens of my area, Mr. Speaker, cannot but develop a keen interest in our activities and welcome the program announced in the Speech from the Throne, mainly because of the priorities stated in it, namely, those related to the budget and to the projects of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. However, I am sure that they have their own views on these programs to which they will contribute constructive criticism.

A few months ago, the citizens of the pilot area of the Lower St. Lawrence, the Gaspé Peninsula and the Magdalen Islands to which belons the population of the Rimouski riding I have the great honour of representing, decided to engage into an era of planning. In the meantime, the latter was high lighted by two historical dates; May 1967, in the course of which was set up at Chandler, the Regional council for the development of Eastern Quebec and May 1968, during which the representatives of both the Quebec government and the government of Canada, signed at Rimouski the general agreement on Canada-Quebec co-operation, an agreement which has to do with the first five-year plan of the expansion program drafted by a non-profit corporation, the Eastern Quebec Development Board.

My fellow-citizens in the pilot area were happy to see, in 1967, the setting up of a body which would become their spokesman with the Eastern Quebec Regional Development Board and in that capacity a valuable interlocuter, ready to accept their representations; but all the happier in 1968 when the federal-provincial agreement was signed which provided for some $260 million to be spent over a five-year period on developing their economy and thus improving their lot.

Since then, that is in the last 17 months or so, under the terms of that agreement, things have been done, steps have been taken in various fields such as agriculture, fishing, forestry, tourism, urban development, transportation; the national park at Forillon is not the least of those measures. In fact, it represents quite an accomplishment in which all will rejoice when the time comes to really develop tourism in that huge area of Canada.

I must, however, take this opportunity to say that the local people and the Regional Development Council have been quite concerned with regard to the setting up, the improvement of the infrastructure of the services and other instruments essential to the industrialization of the pilot area; and I believe that they are becoming increasingly concerned, and rightly so. The chairman of the Regional Development Council has stated repeatedly that the development project for eastern Quebec would be a complete failure unless everything was done to ensure the growth of existing viable industries and to promote the establishment of new industries capable of creating new employment, social and economic staibility and progress.

I believe that those words were both sensible and timely. My fellow-citizens know that it is incumbent on them, first of all, to see to it that such words are constantly translated into action, both by them and by the government. That is when they rely more and more on the assignment given the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and his officials, on their vitality and vigilance.

The traditional tasks and undertakings should no more be financed through the special appropriations provided under some agreement. Nor for our own good and that of the country, should the role of the pilot area and its people be that of a Guinea-pig only. It should evolve normally, all the experiments should be carried out within the pilot area and the local citizens should be allowed to share in them. Speaking about the necessary infrastructure of industrialization one normally implies urbanization, housing policy and services as well as functional industrial parks, adequate seaports, railway and air services and industrial promotion.

Recently, some joint intermunicipal urbanization boards were established, in order to urbanize specific areas selected by the Eastern Quebec Development Board. In my opinion, the first commission, or one of the first to have been established in the area, is the one covering Rimouski-Mont-Joli-Prince in the constituency which I represent, the most highly populated community in the area.

This commission has quite a heavy task to perform, and it is agreed that it will be unable to discharge it without the financial assistance of the government.

As for functional and modern industrial parks equipped with all the necessary facilities and sidings, it is obvious that it is in the first place a municipal and provincial responsibility, but following newly adopted legislation, the federal government has a great responsibility in that field, whence the importance of the most perfect accord in that regard between the three levels of government.

A federal-provincial committee on transport was recently formed to determine the necessity and ways of improving the transportation system, in order to answer the needs that will arise when other programs of the plan are carried out. It aims at preparing a program for the establishment of an integrated transportation system and at judging the impact other programs of the plan had on communication networks.

It has been said recently that this territory has numerous harbor facilities and even excessive equipment in that field, without a rational utilization. Let us hope that the study of the commission will rationalize those structures. People in my riding are somewhat worried about this and are greatly interested in the commission's work. We all hope we will keep intact what we have acquired in nearly a century.

We want a rational improvement of what we have and here I refer especially to the Port of Rimouski—wharves of Pointe-au-Père and Rimouski East—which until now has been the most profitable one in the area. That modern seaport is a multi-purpose one. It may serve industry as well as agriculture. I refer here to the transportation of goods in general and to the ferry services. Year round navigation is relatively easy in our area, in the lower St-Lawrence, along the coasts, where ice is broken easily during winter time.

Seaports in industrial and urban areas must be kept in working order at all times and ready to play their part fully, especially in the industrial field.

Air services are also important. The existence however of a regional airport in the pilot area—the Mont-Joli airport—should not bring about the closing down of local airports already existing but provide for their continuation for the benefit of local transports in the Gaspé peninsula, in the lower St. Lawrence and on the north shore. The Rimouski airport should in this field remain the local airport.

The difficulties faced by farmers in my constituency are not too different in principle from those faced by the farmers in Canada as a whole, except that farmers in our area have to put up with the various options resulting from the intensive development of our territory.

First, there is their low income, a very hard problem to solve. Our farmers are worrying more and more about agricultural or semi-agricultural concerns, too small to be economical, about the unsteadiness of price yield and hence of the agricultural income, about regional disparities which seem to be increasing. Perhaps their greatest problem is the increase of the production cost, which goes hand in hand with the reduction of the selling price.

The marketing problems, the continuing decline of our rural communities, the problems raised by our markets and our international exchanges our frequent surpluses in farm products affect them also to the highest degree.

We should help them find other skills; it might be in this area that a better use of our agricultural research is most necessary for them. They too produce or can produce more than the demand requires. Finally, in spite of the praise-worthy effort in that direction for the past few years, they would have an increasing need for retraining. In fact, they would have an increasing need for means of improving their knowledge of the agricultural technology and their general training.

While a systematic effort was being made in order to reorganize our farmers in their main specialty, the dairy industry, and while it was decided to increase their production to such a level that their operation would become economical, the government at the same time had to legislate on the production quotas at the national level. However, it would have been very useful to our farmers to enjoy then a regional quota. That would have been logical and reasonable, I think even in the framework of a national policy, in view of the fact that those farmers lived in a pilot area recognized by the government.

In any event we can indeed say and think that the government has a very well thought out agricultural policy. However, because of the very serious problems of the agricultural class, it will ensure that next year, following the report that must be presented shortly by the Commission of Agricultural Planning, be a year of careful examination of the status of the farmer.

Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. Unless there is unanimous consent of the house, the hon. member cannot continue his speech.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will use this time to end my speech as soon as possible by summing it up.

It is obvious that by referring to the wishes and the opinions of my constituents, I could have presented a much longer list of problems.

I confined myself to territorial planning and, especially, in the end, to agriculture. My constituents, I know, are interested in all the problems that are discussed in this house, that is, parliamentary procedure, the role of the members, international politics, in short, in all the problems concerning the well-being of all our fellow-citizens.

Before ending my remarks, I wish to say that I am proud of the people in my area because they wish above all to play their part in this vast country of ours. They understand, as we all do, that parliament is first and foremost the expression of their freedom, the freedom of the people expressed through the mouth of their member, that the government organizes and must organize itself in order to become more efficient and more dynamic, and that all the people of Canada must live in brotherhood and unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (4:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate in the hush of expectancy in this great chamber with a large and attentive audience. I am pleased to note that in the last five minutes five more members on the government side have come in, increasing their total membership in the House by 50 per cent. I congratulate them on their perspicacity, as mentioned by the Minister of Manpower, and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen), who is here at this particular time.

Let me also congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. As my friend the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) said, I am sorry that the mover was not a sufficiently powerful advocate to persuade more of his fellow members to pay attention to what he said. I hope, however, they will read, inwardly digest and take some encouragement from his remarks.

I want to congratulate the seconder. I had the pleasure of serving with him on what I considered to be a very important committee which dealt with statutory instruments. I am satisfied that his committee made a very momentous advance in dealing with parliamentary traditions in this House. It brought forward a revolutionary document. This is something for which I and some other members have been working for a number of years. I was very happy that my advocacy, coupled with certain pressures a year ago, was effective and I was successful in persuading the government to set up this committee. I am firmly of the opinion that it will have a very considerable impact on the workings of this parliament.

I believe that far into the future, beyond that time when the impact of many bills to be placed before us and considered will have diminished, the effect of this committee's work, in the sense that it brings a real measure of participatory democracy to the people of this country, will continue. This will assist members of this house in dealing with these tremendous problems which face all of us in western democracies. More than 90 per cent of the measures which affect the people in a democracy are those that are not seen in the form of legislation but rather in the form of orders-in-council and regulations. I do not intend to use this occasion to establish my position in this debate. As was indicated by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), we will have an opportunity to do so later on.

I should also like to congratulate the two hon. members who have become Ministers without Portfolio. This increases the number of cabinet members to 30. In passing, I note that it is of some interest that this matter of inflation has finally reached the cabinet.

Let me also congratulate the three hon. members who have been promoted to the position of parliamentary secretary. They have now taken one step closer to the real position of power. I am sure they will distinguish themselves in the particular areas of responsibility to which they have been assigned.

It is my intention to say something about this matter of the Speech from the Throne and this debate. In view of the fact that we are at this time enjoying a parliamentary siesta, hon. members are not here in large numbers. In my opinion, this should continue to be a very important debate. Hon. members in all parts of the house have now returned from their constituencies. They should be bringing here the sense of the urgency they felt in respect of certain problems during the course of their peregrinations.

It has been my experience in the almost 12 years I have been here that this is the time when problems should be put to the house in order that, through the processes of democracy, solutions can ultimately emerge on to the legislative assembly line. If, as a result of discussions with the people at home, an hon. member has an idea he feels should be ventilated in this House, it is during the throne speech debate that he has the first opportunity to do so.

While I do not expect all ministers and government backbenchers—nor for that matter all the opposition members—to be here, I think this is a time and place when members should be present in much larger numbers, particularly government members, to take heed of what is being said. Some hon. members on the government side have suggested that the backbenchers, particularly those on the opposition side, are not offering any constructive suggestions. I suggest to these hon. members that they read between the four corners of the debate on the Speech from the Throne, where they will find suggestions advanced from time to time as a means to alleviate some of the distress which hangs over this country and as a means to deal with some of the problems which we all know exist. There is a multitude of proposals, all of which cannot, of course, be accepted by the government but which could be considered, properly refined and some of them used. If this is not to be the case, we might well consider doing something else with the time now being used in the Throne Speech debate.

Let us think of something important. For example, I have on the order paper a proposal that some means should be found by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to deal with private members' bills. I think probably the most flagrant hypocrisy we have in this house is that members public bills are advanced year after year, debated for a time limit of one hour and then sent back into the limbo from which they emerged. In my view it should be the practice here, as it is in the United Kingdom, Australia and most democracies, that for a limited number of such bills there should be an opportunity to test the feeling of the House. A vote should be taken on some of them—I do not suggest on all of them—so that we can evaluate the efforts of hon. members who have laboured, made an intensive study of an idea and brought forward a private member's public bill. They should have the right, at least during the course of a parliament, to have their bills put to the question in the House. This does not, of course, mean that the government must accept them. The government may not be ready for them. Some bills may involve a point of view that is repugnant to the philosophy of the government—if one can find a government which has a philosophy—or they may involve the expenditure of money which the government may feel is not within its scope at the time. But at least the government would be put on the spot and would have to take a stand. I would have to use the Whip to call in its members to vote against bills which some government members have introduced.

If we cannot make better use of the time spent on this type of debate, I suggest this as an alternative. I say, in answer to those members on the government side who have been critical of the opposition for not offering constructive suggestions, that they should read well what has been said by opposition members during the debate on the Speech from the Throne; they should read the amendments which opposition members have put forward from time to time during the course of the debate, and they should read the private members resolutions which are advanced. If this were done, I believe there would be all kinds of opportunity for the government to consider useful and attractice means to deal with the problems of our country.

There have been suggestions that the Speech from the Throne is part of a carefully planned scheme of this government. In order to erase any doubt as to my position may I say that I agree wholeheartedly with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in his description of the speech from the Throne as nothing but a stalling device. The apologists for the government, those who attempt to rationalize its position and the plodding, pedestrian passage of this government, turning the Prime Minister from a go-go dancer to an exponent of the Hesitation Waltz during the course of 18 months, have their explanation for this. I understand those members of the press who are in reality really an extension of the Liberal propaganda machine which have a duty to do and have performed it well within the limits of their ability. They have rushed with loud whinnies of explanation into a rationalization of this conduct. What has dumbfounded me is the less irresponsible part of the media which has bought this doctrine.

What is this three year doctrine or plan? The first year it was to carry out the mandate of the Pearson administration, follow the program and put into effect all the pieces of chewed-up legislation which were not completed. My answer to that is simple; I could say "nuts". I shall go further, however, and deal with it. I tell the people that 14 members of the present cabinet were members of the previous administration, and I believe, 24 members of the cabinet were supporters of the previous administration. The programs, policies and legislation advanced by the previous administration must have had their support; they must have supported them both in and out of the House. It is quite irrational for them now to say with an appearance of reluctance that they were compelled to do this. Even if you do not accept that point of view, in June, 1968, an election was held and the Prime Minister secured what he had asked for, namely, a majority government; the first majority government in this House for ten years. Since the Prime Minister had this mandate there was no necessity for him to carry out any part of the program of the previous administration if he did not believe in it, if his supporters on the government benches did not believe in it and if his ministers did not believe in it.

I suggest there were many other things which should have had priority, and there was no reason at all for the Prime Minister, his followers and the people in this cabinet—the professional procrastinators who follow along with him—not to go ahead and deal with the problems and priorities which now have come into focus. That was the first year. In the second year, what do they say? The second year is the year of white papers, the year in which they will bring forward suggestions and set wheels in motion through the machinery of government to find out what the people are thinking. We do not have very much time left to deal with some of the very serious and difficult problems which we face. I am an advocate of the use of white papers. There is a time and a place for submitting to the legislative examination of hon. members of this House ideas which at a later date can be incorporated into the policies and financial programs necessary to make life better for the people of this country. But there must be a time element involved. A period of at least two years must be involved in this process. A white paper must be submitted at least two years before the legislation is required obviously, the white papers of this year may become the legislation of next year, and that will be the last year of the three-year program. The third year will be the year of legislation. Then we will be ready for an election, when the legislation is still fresh on the statute books and not yet brought into effect to a degree where it could have any apparent benefit to the people.

This is not the way in which a responsible, democratic government should be acting. It is more in the line of a classical Liberal pattern of deceit, delay and confusion. There are those who say that the Prime Minister is not really a Liberal. I say he is, and I think he and the Liberal party deserve each other. I make the point that there is no doubt that the right hon. Prime Minister is a Liberal. It is rather a question of the date of the Liberalism which he follows. Some of my friends suggest he is a Mackenzie King Liberal; others take him back as far as Gladstone. But I think you have to go back a little farther than that. I would go back to the time of Genghis Khan and fit him into those times.

It would be bad enough if all this procrastination, delay and confusion took place in normal times, but these are not normal times. Today we have face serious, difficult problems such as inflation. It is just called inflation if you are in the carriage trade, but if you are of the class of people who are really hurt by it—the class of people to whom our amendment is addressed—inflation means a rise in the cost of living, a rise in the price of milk and bread and an increase in the cost of renting accommodation. All these are problems which bear very seriously upon men and women of below average income. They are the ones who are the sufferers. They are the people who are being hurt desperately and to whom inflation is not something which you can absorb, not something you can pass along to customers and to people with whom you deal. They are the people to whom inflation is, in fact, a major tragedy. This, of course, compelled our party to move the type of amendment we did.

There is also the problem of welfare and social adjustment, the problems of housing, of transportation and of the urban sprawl which has now confronted us. These problems compelled the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) to part company with his leader and the cabinet. He did not think that the position being taken by them could in any sense provide reasonable and rational solutions. There is the problem of industrial unrest. There is the problem of unemployment, and social problems such as the use of drugs, pollution and civil disorder. There are also problems connected with our native peoples, problems of regional disparity and those of agriculture.

I could speak for some time on the problem which affects my constituency and all parts of northern Alberta and northern Saskatchewan, that is, regions afflicted by the inability last year to market the grain which the farmers produced and the difficulty of harvesting this year because of incredibly bad weather. In many cases less than 25 per cent of the crop was harvested. The government was unable to offer any reasonable suggestion which would be of benefit to these farmers.

There will be other opportunities to speak about this problem in the House, but I take the time now to indicate to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), to the Prime Minister and to the Minister without Portfolio charged with the responsibility of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang), that I and members of this party will not rest until the government has done something to solve the problem. Each day these matters will be brought to the attention of the government, and it will either act or stand exposed to the people of Canada in all the nakedness of their legislative program.

These problems exist. They exist, of course, in many other countries in the western world, but I think they are aggravated here because we have a federal system. A federal system is brought into existence because of geographic and economic diversities in the country. It is therefore essential to have a central government and regional governments. But the federal government structure and the problems which exist in that structure are exaggerated in Canada because of ethnic, cultural and linguistic distinctions.

It is not good enough, as this government would have us believe, to delay and to stall for three years. In three years it will be too late. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that many of the problems which four years before loomed a little more than a cloud on the horizon have now become a great storm hovering over us. In 1972 they will have dissipated their energy and destruction over the whole country. I very much fear that if the government intends, because of the three year plan, to delay taking serious action in regard to some of the problems I have indicated, the people of this country should take heed of the consequences.

There is the question of our national unity. The other day the Prime Minister made a speech which he has followed on one or two occasions. He has been praised by some members of the press and by other people. He has been praised by his own party. I go along with him when he says that there should be no place in democracy for violence, that there should be no place in our system of working out our problems amongst ourselves, in complete, for taking to the streets with bombs and devastation. However, unfortunately, when people have been denied for so long many of the things to which they consider they are entitled, they resort to the power of protest. We have seen this in the United States, in France and in Germany, and we are beginning to see it in Canada. So while I agree with what the Prime Minister said in this respect, I do not think that this alone is enough. There will be protest, and people will take to the streets; there will be demonstrations until the problems which cause the demonstrations and protest have been, if not eliminated, at least the subject of meaningful attention and a reasonable attempt has been made to deal with them.

There is talk of separatism in the province of Quebec. All of us deplore separatism, whether it is in Quebec, British Columbia, Alberta or any part of this country. We all believe that we have made in the northern part of the North American continent a rather unique attempt to bring people from various countries together with our two founding peoples and with the native population. We have attempted to work out a means of living together in peace and harmony with a common national interest. It is difficult, even under the best of circumstances, when these distinctions exist. Last May I was in Strasbourg attending meetings of the Council of Europe. I was fascinated by what I was told by my colleagues, by officers of the commission and the Court of Human Rights. I was told by the registrar of a case which had been dealt with by the commission and then tried in the court which dealt with the problems of language rights in Belgium. When you have these racial and cultural distinctions in a country you are bound to have problems, and I do not think you will ever completely eliminate them.

Added to these problems are those of economic disparity, of unemployment, of the inability of people to find housing and all the concurrent difficulties which crowd into great urban metropolitan areas such as we have in Toronto and Montreal. When we consider the difficulties in connection with the process of education and these are added to the other problems which face us, we realize it will take a great deal of hard work and effort to reach solutions. The effort must be made in a way that will convince the people who have these problems that they are known, that their problems are being attended to, or at least that a serious effort is being made to do so. I do not think the Prime Minister's speech affected one person in the province of Quebec who believed that the way for Quebec lay in separatism. That is not the way to do it. The way to deal with it is in this House and in the council chambers of the cabinet. If the Prime Minister thinks otherwise, then I think he is completely wrong. Deal with the serious economic problems and you have dealt with separation.

Oftentimes the Prime Minister and the government remind me of a doctor sauntering along a lane to attend a patient, exchanging philosophical quips with the people on each side of him, and by the time he gets to the man's house he finds the patient is dead. I fear this will be the situation here. It is all very well to take a tough line; it is all very well to talk as the Prime Minister talked, but by itself it is not enough. Quite sincerely I urge the Prime Minister, the members of his cabinet, and other supporters of the Prime Minister and the government to ensure that before this session is over we get away from some of the trivia on the order paper. I am not saying they are parts of a legislative program which are not needed—probably all of them are needed—but there is the question of urgencies and priorities.

There is the question of the cost of living. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) has at least five bills to introduce, including a uniform packaging and labelling bill. What will we have from that? Will we have the minister on a television program telling housewives how to order goods, stressing to new mothers the virtues of standard size Flush-a-Bye disposable diaper? Is this the legislative program with regard to consumer problems? Something more than that is needed, Mr. Speaker. These problems require a concerted effort. Time has stolen from the federal government the opportunity to act. Time will not permit this government, this parliament and the provincial legislatures to work out in a calm, deliberate way methods of changing the constitution whereby we will have a better division of powers so that each sector will in its own tidy way be able to deal with the problems. There will have to be concerted action. This means that the government and 11 legislatures will have to say, "We must accept a concerted, pragmatic attack on specific issues." This involves a measure of harmony amongst the legislatures and the government which does not exist today.

When the Prime Minister goes to Montreal and makes a political speech at a political dinner, savagely attacking the government of Quebec and the administration of the city of Montreal, when the president of the Liberal party goes to the province of Nova Scotia and makes a scurrilous attack on the government of that province, when the federal government before the end of the last session successfully forces down the throats of provinces such as Alberta and Ontario a type of medicare program which was not acceptable to them, and when the federal government fails to deal with the problems of agriculture in western Canada, how can there exist the harmony necessary for all the government officials involved to sit down and say, "These problems are urgent and essential. We must get together. We must forget the constitution. We must in a constructive way attack the problems of pollution, the problems of inflation and the problems of the large cities"?

This is the only way progress can be made, but I suggest the government has not established the necessary climate or mood. Time is running out. Time is not on our side. Therefore, I urge the government and its supporters to understand the priorities and urgencies exist today; that these problems confront the people of Canada and they must be dealt with now—they cannot wait the expiration of the three-year plan.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I should like to congratulate very warmly my hon. colleagues from Sarnia and Lapointe (Messrs. Cullen and Marceau) for moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

It is fortunate, Mr. Speaker, that at the opening of a new session, the hon. members may discourse as they like on important subjects of the Canadian life and draw the attention of the house ot the existing or eventual problems that the members will have to face or, again, who know some regions with which they are very familiar.

I suggest that the eight appointed days for the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne are intended to draw the attention of all citizens on certain problems, as I mentioned a moment ago, and to receive suggestions with respect to means of improving the laws in order to remove some disparities that are, in my view, social injustices.

The democracy in which we live makes available to us this important dialogue technique and those who took advantage of it have reaped great benefits.

Bearing this in mind, Mr Speaker, I shall try once more today to draw the attention of all the members in this house and of the government upon the problems of an urban area which lies at the feet of the national capital, that is the Hull area. As a representative of this region, if, in this house, I have already dealt many times with its economic stagnation, it is for the simple reason that nobody seems able to understand that our problem is due to our being near Ottawa and far from Quebec.

Everybody knows that Hull is in a particular situation owing to its geographic position and its demographic composition. While we have repeated many times in this house that the Ontario-Quebec border excludes the city of Hull from the direct scope of federal authority, nobody will question the fact that Hull and its surroundings are part of a whole commonly known as the national capital area.

That is the cause of all the economic and social stagnation affecting our region since the establishment of the capital of Canada. As I said earlier, at a short distance from the capital, there is a flourishing city, a town proud of its origins, caught between two giants, the federal and provincial governments who have decided lately to wage a long-drawn constitutional war against each other.

The people who are faced with all the normal problems of a region, in addition to those coming under federal-provincial jurisdiction, incur the odium of all the fruitless quarrels that divide politicians and governments. This has prompted some fools in the province of Quebec recently to compare the city of Hull to that of Strasburg and to say that, in an independent Quebec, Hull, like Strasburg would lie at the border of another country, that is, of Canada.

Is it possible to be so narrow-minded, Mr. Speaker, as to dare mislead such an intelligent people with such a ludicrous hoax? One has only to study the history of Strasburg to realize that the population of Hull will never agree to play such a part.

I repeat that the problems which face our region are due to our proximity to Ottawa and to our distance from Quebec. Since the outbreak of this sham fight and exchange of letters, Quebec is reported to be very sensitive on the matter of territorial integrity, especially in our district located near the national capital. But while saying that territorial integrity must be preserved, this territory being in the province of Quebec but also in the national capital area, Quebec has never done anything to promote its development. Rather, they have tried to pick quarrels, and to discourage investors. Thus, no benefit is derived from the natural resources to be found in abundance in our region. Instead, a great many administrative structures, for which Quebec has great fondness, have been created, which, essentially, only contribute to weigh down the normal process of regional government. Through all such structures an attempt is made to solve the problem fully.

The entire problem stems from there, but it is actually only last May that the federal government announced its intention to invest large sums of money in the centre of Hull. This will promote an extraordinary economic development on the Quebec side.

It is then that ministers and high officials of the Quebec government first came to Hull in swarms as large as on the occasion of the St. Jean-Baptiste parade, in order to calm down the dissatisfaction which keeps increasing in our region. But I think that we touched the sore spot by announcing that on April 1, 1970 will be erected the first of several federal buildings in Hull. It will be built in the section which we designated as the centre of Hull. But the city of Hull and its surroundings have never been known to the rest of Quebec.

I quote at random a few examples which struck me and which I have taken down for the information of the house.

When the Quebec Professional Golfers Association held its annual tournament two years ago at the Rivermead Club, Montreal's Le Devoir, which is an extremely serious newspaper, wrote this in its sports page: Hull, Ontario.

I thought that maybe this was a mistake, but some time later a Quebec minister came to Hull and congratulated the new mayor on having defeated Miss Whitton who was then running for the Ottawa mayorship. This shows you how well people know our region.

And, on top of that, during federal-provincial conferences, the Quebec delegates and the ministers have rented luxury suites in Ottawa hotels, even though they are so proud of their province. Why did they not spend their money in Hull, in the province of Quebec, since they brag about Quebec's know-how?

More recently, in the daily column of my good friend Henri Laperrière, of the newspaper Le Droit, it was reported that a Quebec minister of Agriculture—who once sat on the other side of the house—sent him an invitation written in English only. Quebec knows how to do things. Perhaps he thought that because the newspaper Le Droit is located in Ottawa, it must be an English paper.

That is how well our region is known. And that is why we are today the victims of those useless disputes over federal and provincial jurisdictions. In the province of Quebec, they court the English-speaking people in their presence, but back home, they crucify them.

In France, they act as Quebecers to show that they are independent and do not represent Canada.

In the United States they hoist the Canadian flag to make Americans believe that they are Canadians so that they can obtain capital investments, but once they return to Quebec they crucify Canada.

It is a hide-and-seek game, a drawing-room war, a match of hanky-panky and literary contests. It is in this context that our region lives and it is in this light that we have come to be known nearly everywhere in Quebec.

I would also like to say a word about the transportation system with which we must be satisfied. In fact, people from our region must pay double fare to get to work, as 50 per cent of them are employed in Ottawa.

We also suffer from various disparities, precisely because we do not enjoy the same jurisdictions on the Ontario side as in Quebec although we belong to the same economic region.

• (5:40 p.m.)

In the province of Quebec, the laws are different, which prevents many Ontarians, who are nevertheless living in the same area, to come and settle on the Quebec side. I mean the Estate Tax Act.

Outside the problem of transportation, many others prevent us from making the strides that we should have made as residents of a same area.

I believe it is the responsibility of the National Capital Commission to develop the whole district of the National Capital both on the Ontario and the Quebec sides.

If we are to establish a separate corporation to develop the district on the Quebec side in order to preserve the integrity of the territory, we will create administrative problems that will engulf us in useless debate.

In my opinion, it belongs to the National Capital Commission to develop the district, following consultations with the interested governments, and I mean the municipal authorities. In my opinion, we do not need other administrative structures to develop the district on the Quebec side.

The National Capital Commission has already been most useful, and it can still be useful if the province of Quebec is not in a position to develop the Hull district. If they lack funds as we believe it to be the case—they should rent the Hull area just as they did the area of Forillon in the Gaspé Peninsula to establish a national park.

I think that the people of Hull are tired of all those sterile discussions and that they want to live, at last, not as second-class citizens, but as equal partners like the citizens of Ottawa.

People are unhappy with the disparity in the sales tax, the transportation utilities and the estate tax between Hull and Ottawa. There is also the psychological factor which prevents people from coming to live with us because, in the province of Quebec, the unemployment rate is 7.2 per cent as compared with 3.1 per cent in Ontario and 4.9 per cent for Canada as a whole.

As to the possibility for our students to undertake university studies, it is limited to enrol at the University of Ottawa. Even there, the doors are not wide open. When vocational college graduates from the Hull area want to enter university in Quebec City or Montreal, they are told simply that there is no room except for students from the Quebec City or Montreal area. Vocational college graduates have no choice other than attending the University of Ottawa.

This is why ministers are mistaken when they tour our region to say it is their responsibility to develop the Quebec side, in the best interest of the province and the region. When they fail to include the Ottawa area in that region, they forget that it is one and the same economic region which cannot be cut off by a boundary, even an interprovincial boundary.

This is where I think the federal government should intervene, because the boundary is interprovincial. The government is duty bound to implement projects prepared earlier for developing the Hull area.

Today, we have to cope with technological evolution. Right now, at this very moment, there are huge traffic tie-ups at the entrances of Highways 8 and 11 leading to downtown Hull. Conditions are similar on the approaches to the Cartier-Macdonald and Chaudière bridges simply because no traffic is allowed on the Champlain bridge which has been used for 40 years. It is just like someone who would wait to buy a new suit because the one he is wearing is falling apart. It is normal that bridges be closed for repairs but, meantime, there are bottlenecks and motorists grow impatient.

I hope that such conditions will never be seen again, particularly if we keep in mind the magnificent tourist attractions of which our region is so proud.

I need not comment on the ski centers: Vorlage, Edelweiss, Camp Fortune, Mount St. Marie, which require better roads of access so that they may contribute to the development of Western Quebec.

In the name of the integrity of the land the federal government and the National Capital Commission are prevented from building roads. At the time the Gatineau Park was developed, we had to ask the City of Hull to expropriate on behalf of the federal government in order to prevent the Quebec government from objecting. That is the way it goes, but it is certainly no way to encourage progress and development.

In my opinion, Quebec should wake up to the truth. Hull's situation is a case of long term agony for the Quebecers who live in an area they are so proud of. They should allow the federal government to service the land in order to improve the everyday life of the people of that area.

Mr. Speaker, the subject of bilingualism was brought up together with a lot of other things but in Quebec they are adamant in their efforts to have us accept a kind of unilingualism. Representations are made everywhere and, in my opinion, Quebec will find itself turned into a ghetto with, perhaps, civil revolution as the outcome.

Some people are not quite mature enough to realize that bilingualism is the key to a fantastic economic power. Good ideas have nothing to do with the language in which they are conveyed. Travel broadens the mind and after a while we start to wonder why we should hesitate to learn a language other than French or English since we feel the need to learn several languages.

The economic power of bilingualism opens doors in many more places than one would imagine. In Canada, we should take advantage of the fact that the national trade is split up in a proportion of 73 per cent for the English-speaking sector and 27 per cent for the French-speaking.

If a business in the English sector did not have French on its labels, it would lose 27 per cent of its market; on the other hand, if a business in the French sector does not have English on its labels, it runs the risk of losing 73 per cent of the Canadian market.

The Canadian market is a fantastic training ground for doing business in a language other than one's own. In addition, Canada is the only country endowed with that advantage, that of having the economic power of bilingualism, which gives it access to French-speaking and English-speaking countries throughout the world without the burden of adaptation.

The United States, the United Kingdom and France do not have that advantage.

Our education, our products, our domestic markets give us this opportunity; we should therefore take full advantage of it on international markets.

At the present time we cannot benefit fully from the exceptional power of bilingualism for various reasons; I shall not go into them now. A country must have a balanced economy throughout the land. Canada has two cultures but it must have only one economy. In a speech one of my friends made recently, he said: It is easier to build a united Canada through economy than through culture. The flag of a nation represents its culture. To fly a flag, we need a mast to represent the economy of the country.

You can easily fly two flags on the same mast but it is impossible, without tearing it up, to fly the same flag on two masts.

The key characteristic of money is that it can serve as a vehicle for understanding; to have money is less important than to know how to use it.

Trade is the common denominator of all social and political factors, of traditions, religions, cultures and languages. It is that which makes a political society.

I think that we will never make a good French Canadian out of an English Canadian just as we will not make a good English Canadian out of a French Canadian. But with both of them it is possible however, to make a very good team. Besides, we could perhaps remove from our heritage the Anglo-Saxon subtleties and the whims of Jean-Baptiste. We would then discover a common interest: the building of Canada. In my opinion, what we lacked, here, is national pride. We do not have a patriotic soul.

When we visit our country from one constituency to another we can only be moved by contemplating these vast territories, these fantastic national resources which are only waiting for man to put them to use. We must farm the land because this country which we love so much, we did not make people love it enough.

This is the reason why, for a few years, and despite dissensions, as we remember, we managed to endow Canada with a flag. We have got one, but we did not have time—the members of parliament being very busy as well as the governments—to generate among all Canadians, whatever their mother tongue, a national pride by showing them the beauties of the country. In my opinion, if the Canadians, between themselves, held diverging views, it is perhaps because their country was very big or because the means of transportation were lacking. Indeed, who could devote ten days to tour Canada?

Today, in the jet age, we shall know and appreciate one another much better. This is where lies, I think the whole problem of today's Canada.

With regard to economic disparities, we must be careful that our country does not get bogged down through division, whether the province of Quebec or other provinces are the cause of the splitting up because those upon whom will rest the responsibility for that division could say, as is mentioned in the Bible: "Let his blood fall upon us and upon our children." I think that in Quebec at the present time we are a little dazzled by a sort of progress which may not have been experienced for some years, thanks to men who were energetic at the beginning of the sixties but who ran out of breath because they had probably progressed too far. I still believe that Quebec will rise up again with dynamic men who will ring together again all those who want this province to remain within Confederation and who will continue to further the development of this great country of ours.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Pilon: May we call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being six o'clock p.m. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 6(1).

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Isabelle.]

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I very much welcome the opportunity provided by this debate to make some brief remarks about the current economic situation and particularly about the problem of inflation.

We in Canada have lived through the longest period of prosperity in Canadian history, beginning in 1962 and running for almost ten years. We as a government want this period of inflation—of prosperity, rather—to continue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell: I hope the press gets that.

Mr. Benson: Only if the period of prosperity continues can we do the things for the poor and the needy of this country that ought to be done. I would indicate briefly to hon. members that over the past ten years we have made a great deal of progress in the area of social development in this country. We have brought into being the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, a guaranteed income for people beyond the age of 65; we have seen the implementation of medicare, and a retraining program second to none in the world has been established. I hope that we in Canada can see this development continue.

I have said before, and I repeat, that the number one problem we face in this country today is the persistent upward spiral in prices, costs and incomes. Other than this we have a prosperous and viable economy. However, unless and until we bring this spiral of inflation under effective control all the aspirations of this house toward a better life for all Canadians, all our hopes for continuous high employment, for a rising standard of living and social justice for the poor and the depressed in our country will come to naught. If rapid inflation persists, we face instead a loss of confidence in the real value of money, a serious rundown in the economy, the erosion of export markets, rising unemployment, a heavier burden upon the poor and widening divisions within our country. This is why, as I said in my budget speech, the number one task in economic policy today must be to deploy all available forces, public and private, more aggressively than ever in the battle against constantly rising prices.

I must confess to being puzzled by the position of the opposition parties. They frequently profess a great concern about this problem, particularly, and rightly so, about the effect of rapidly rising prices upon people who must live on fixed and low incomes. Yet in their participation in the debate on Friday last it seems to me that their main demand was for the government to give up the fight, or to rapidly boost expenditures in each of several dozen directions at once. Nothing at this moment could be better calculated to worsen the situation in the most desperate way.

It is important to put the matter in its true perspective. There should be no need to elaborate upon all the destructive ramifications of the kind of price increases we have been experiencing for more than three years, but it is essential to understand fully the real nature of the present situation; to understand why, despite the deployment of strong anti-inflationary policies, the situation has persisted for so long and in so acute a form. I do not think we can look at it in the light of the conventional analysis of a recurring cyclical turndown and upturn of business, production and employment.

Mr. Stanfield: Who does?

Mr. Benson: There is, I suggest, a major new development today. It arises from the unprecedented success we have experienced in maintaining high levels of employment and incomes throughout the post-war period, particularly over the past decade. For the first time in history we have managed to sustain an almost uninterrupted expansion of the national economy for a period of almost ten years. It is the very strength and vigour of this long economic upswing which has given such intensity and persistence to current inflationary pressures. Too many Canadians, unaware or forgetful of the principles upon which our market economy must operate, have come to expect that continuously rising incomes for everybody are now to be had as a matter of right rather than as a just reward of economic discipline, production and effort on their part.

There is another relatively new dimension to our current situation. Destructive inflation is not just a Canadian problem; rather, it is almost global in scale. In nearly every country with which we trade the rise in prices has been close to or even worse than our own. The consequences are obvious. International competitiveness is not able to exert its customary restraining influence. Instead, with some notable exceptions such as wheat, the prices of many of the goods we sell abroad have also been advancing. So too, with the prices of many of our imports. With a quarter of our total output flowing into exports, and an almost equal proportion of imports, we are inevitably caught up to some degree in world-wide inflationary pressures.

This is not to say for one moment that we are helpless in the face of such pressure. Quite the contrary. Even if we cannot insulate ourselves from the influences of other countries, especially the United States, there is much we can do on our own account. The fact is that the sharpest rates of increase in prices, especially in recent months, have taken place in just those things for which the domestic economy is mainly responsible. This is true of most domestic services, ranging from medical fees and hospital costs to transportation services and haircuts. It is true of urban land values and housing; it is true of construction; it applies in many public services. We can and must do a better job of restraining prices and costs in all these and similar areas, and to the extent we are successful in achieving a better price performance than our trading partners we will reap rich rewards in the growth of real production and real incomes.

The broad outline of the government's policies to achieve this objective is quite clear. We have given first attention to what is called the setting of the big levers of monetary and fiscal policy. Here we have had the closest co-ordination and harmonization of policy between the government and the Central Bank. We have agreed upon the broad and interlocking strategy required in each field, with the details of program and application left to the appropriate authority. In this connection may I bring to the attention of the house the remarks on monetary policy given by the Governor of the Bank to a business conference in Toronto only last Thursday.

As for fiscal policy, the crucial decisions were taken in my first budget a year ago. At that time we adopted the tax measures necessary to assure a balance in the public accounts budget during the current fiscal year, given a normal growth of production at acceptable levels of prices. That action represented a successful shift in fiscal policy in the face of continued inflationary pressure. Last June, with further evidence of a potential overheating of the economy and renewed price pressures, we concentrated upon controlling expenditures and budgeted for a restraining surplus. In fact, as price and income increases have tended to advance more rapidly than hoped for, the federal budget is now exerting an automatic stabilizing influence and I now expect that the surplus will be significantly larger than I had forecast in my budget last year.

We are holding, and must hold, to this course notwithstanding the many appeals and urgings that we should increase government spending on many worth-while and desirable programs. I can assure hon. members opposite that there is scarcely a single item of desirable, increased spending they have mentioned which has not been argued even more forcefully and persuasively by one or more members on this side or by my cabinet colleagues. We should like very much to do the easy and popular thing—to spend freely on higher pensions, increased allowances, more subsidies for farmers and fishermen, further aid to the poor, more housing, beautifying cities, overcoming pollution, higher salaries for everyone, and so on. Believe me, over the past several years this government has done a great deal to increase expenditures on social benefits to the Canadian public. Nothing could be simpler than to spend freely on these things, and nothing would be more irresponsible. Nothing would be more damaging to the real, longer term interests of all the people these things are intended to serve. We must reject the politically expedient, short-term response and opt for a responsible fiscal policy which will contribute to the real economic health of our country and to the genuine interests and welfare of all Canadians.

We have sought, as well, to supplement fiscal policy by stimulating and encouraging the idea of voluntary restraint. There is no question that if the organized economic interest groups in our society—business, labour, professional associations, landlords, other governments—were to take a strong stand in favour of even a modest degree of restraint, and to act upon it, we would roll back the forces of inflation in very short order. The government has worked for over two years to put this idea across, and the Prices and Incomes Commission was expressly designed to help in this work. I think we have made some progress. Certainly there is a wider understanding of the issues involved, of the gains to be won by voluntary restraint, than ever before in our country. There is much more to be done, and notwithstanding a temporary setback I am confident that the work of the commission will yield valuable results. In all of this it is absolutely vital that the government itself should show the way—and this, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made crystal clear last August, we are determined to do.

A third part of the framework of government policy against inflation concerns the regional aspect. Difficult disparities obviously complicate the task of containing inflation and maintaining high levels of employment. Monetary policy, by its very nature, must apply on a country-wide basis. There is no way, within an integrated national economy enjoying the free movement of people, goods, services and capital among all its regions, to provide for broad monetary restraint in some regions and monetary ease in others. The Central Bank, however, has always followed a policy of asking the chartered banks to keep in mind the needs of the slower growing regions whenever they find it necessary to restrict their lending and I have completely supported them in this effort.

Fiscal policy is somewhat more flexible. Even here, however, there are important limitations. The national government cannot lightly take up tax measures which seem to discriminate in favour of the taxpayers of one region or province as against those in another. As for expenditure, when total demands so far outrun revenues, as in our case, we have a clear duty to be sure that funds are provided only for genuinely worth-while projects and programs, even in lagging regions. There is no justification for simple make-work palliatives. This is all the more important because increased expenditure in the lagging regions works its way rapidly throughout the economy. Soon it adds to the intensity of demand in other regions such as southern Ontario, one of the main areas of inflationary pressure in the country.

In spite of these problems, we embarked in the last budget on certain selective measures geared to the regional aspect of the inflationary problem. Both the acceleration of the Kennedy Round tariff cuts and the temporary deferral of capital cost allowance on certain types of building in rapid-growth provinces had this purpose. Over the longer term, however, we place major reliance upon the expanding program of regional development. This is one of our highest priorities, and increasing funds are being allocated to it. There is as well the very large and rapidly increasing equalization grants paid to the lower income provinces.

Perhaps I might note one aspect of the new equalization system which has assumed added significance under current inflationary conditions. The strong growth of tax revenues in the most rapidly expanding provinces also brings about a substantial increase in federal equalization grants to the less expansive provinces. These latter are thus able to finance a growth in provincial expenditure and employment-creating works even when higher spending on direct federal programs may be held back. In this fiscal year, for example, we now estimate that equalization grants to the less affluent provinces have grown by $144 million, a 25 per cent gain over the last fiscal year.

Nevertheless, regional unemployment remains as one of the most stubborn and intractable problems we must face. Reference was made last Friday to the national problem, with the rate of unemployment averaging about 5 per cent for the country as a whole. In fact, for all the provinces from Ontario to the west the rate averages out at only 3.4 per cent, well within the target range of so-called full employment. But in Quebec and eastward the unemployment rate is averaging about 8 per cent. I am satisfied that the solution to this deep-seated problem certainly does not lie in allowing inflation to rage unchecked. That would only worsen the problem. It is mainly the economically weaker regions of the country which must carry an undue share of the burden of higher costs and prices since they lack the power to win proportionate gains in income. This disparity and inequity can only be overcome by pinpointing our development effort even more selectively to accelerate basic economic growth in these regions, and this is the aim of our government.

Here the fourth part of our framework of current policies is particularly relevant. These are the policies and programs concerned with the supply or production aspects of the economy. Perhaps the broadest and most important are the expanding programs for improving manpower skills and mobility, programs on which we are spending a tremendous amount of money in this country, probably proportionately more than any other country in the world. In this regard, the steady expansion of the Department of Manpower is given a high priority, and as mentioned in the Throne Speech, new proposals for unemployment insurance will help reinforce these efforts. Similarly we have the rapid growth of our aid to the provinces for university, professional and technical education which we deem to be of great importance in our country.

I should mention as well the notable example of the very substantial government support being given to the financing of housing. Here we fully expect to again hit the target of 200,000 housing starts this year, this in the face of record high interest rates and continued extreme pressures in mortgage and financial markets. Unfortunately, even though the rate of residential building is very high, costs have continued to mount, particularly in certain centres of the country. This has certainly been one of the most unfortunate effects of the excessive rates of wage settlements which have taken place in the construction industry in several major cities across the country this year.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would permit a question. I do not wish to interrupt him and could wait until he has finished. The minister speaks of the economy being overheated. Is he suggesting the inflation is due to excessive demand? Could he clarify his view with regard to this?

Mr. Benson: I think I made it quite clear in what I have been saying to date. In the economy one could not say there is necessarily excessive demand, but there is a cost-price pressure at the bottom which is pushing up inflation in the economy. It would be very nice to find a simple solution to the inflation problem in the country such as the hon. member suggested last week; that is, that we adjust government spending upwards and put more pressure on the economy by creating excessive demands.

Mr. Speaker, if I may continue, it is unfortunately true that although everyone professes to be alarmed about inflation, there are important members and groups in the community who are not really deeply concerned. I would say this often includes members in the opposition. They are mainly the people who are able to exercise their economic power to stay ahead of the game. Even if their costs rise they are able to wrest proportionate and frequently greater increases in prices or incomes from the rest of the community; and if and when the crisis develops and their position is threatened, they would be the first to come running to the government seeking help.

This is partly why, despite all our efforts, the upward spiral of prices, costs, wages and other incomes has not yet been effectively checked. I am the first to acknowledge this fact. Even though anti-inflationary policies have been deployed since early this year, the fires are still burning strongly in our economy. Until very recently the pace of price and wage hikes has been tending to accelerate rather than to slow down. Obviously it takes time for measures of restraint, either in the form of higher taxes or curtailed spending, to work their way through and affect the private spending decisions of individuals and business firms. There is also a large element of so-called cost-push inflation, higher costs of materials, services and wages, built into the economy going back over two or three years. I have already mentioned the impact of international inflation. All of these factors, taken together with the influence of the long economic upswing, have combined to create the great problem of deep-seated inflationary expectations. This is the expectation of people who believe that inflation will go on forever and they should get whatever they can out of it. I should like to assure the House that it is the intention of the government that this shall not happen, and it will not happen for the benefit of the little people in our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benson: The Governor of the Bank of Canada, in the speech I mentioned—

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, would the minister allow a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would point out that the minister has the floor and it is his decision.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to answer my hon. friend's question as soon as I finish the few more words I have to say.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada, in the speech I mentioned, has put it this way:

> I do not believe that one can explain either the insistence of lenders on receiving such high interest rates or the willigness of borrowers to pay them without reference to the strong expectations of continued inflation that have developed. Borrowers have been reluctant to postpone expenditures for fear of incurring higher costs later, and lenders have sought to protect themselves against the impact of rising prices by refusing to lend except at high rates. Inflationary expectations have unhappily become a central feature in our economic situation, and it is a central task of economic policy to try to eliminate the causes of these expectations.

I have to say it is on this last crucial issue that I think the Economic Council of Canada has in part missed the point in their most recent annual review. I have read that document with care and I do not think that either the analysis or views of the Council are nearly so far removed from my own as has been quite loosely suggested.

It seems to me that our differences turn out to be essentially matters of degree and not of basic principle. The Council is concerned about the dangers of excessive fiscal restraint and they focus upon the so-called lags, or the delay in the impact of policies upon the actual level of economic activity. There is, however, a further lag which the government cannot ignore. To borrow a familiar term, this is one of credibility. Governments may be slow to recognize emerging economic trends and to act upon them, but under present conditions people may also be slow to believe that the government means what it says about checking inflation. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. We cannot be sure of breaking the cycle of inflationary expectations and actual price increases until there is clear and positive evidence of a slow down in the rate of inflation in our country.

This is why we cannot afford now to ease up on the fiscal and other brakes. Indeed, I have been receiving many letters from across the whole country urging more drastic measures of control, particularly an all-out freeze on prices and wages. Most of these letters come from little people, pensioners, low wage earners, farmers and fishermen, housewives struggling to balance their household budgets; from all those, in short, who lack the economic power to bargain their incomes up as fast as prices increase. There is no doubt in their minds as to the need for all-out controls over both prices and the wage gains and fee increases they see being won by organized labour and professional groups. This is what these correspondents are asking for, rather than higher government spending and taxes in our country as proposed by members of the opposition.

I do not, of course, believe that we should resort to blanket controls except under conditions of the gravest crisis and only after other efforts have proven fruitless. Apart from the need to secure some constitutional accord with the provinces to make controls legal, it is clear that the web of directives and controls urged by the New Democratic Party in place of fiscal and voluntary restraint would rapidly entangle the entire economy and produce stagnation, unemployment and inequity within our country. Let there be no mistake—if we are to control prices, there is no alternative but to control wages at the same time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benson: Direct and indirect labour costs account for nearly three-quarters of the total production costs in our country. If we are to control the investment of capital, as suggested by the N.D.P., we will delay or in many cases put a stop to many major projects, with a consequent sharp fall in production and a drastic increase in unemployment, especially in the areas of Canada where higher employment is necessary. If we are to control output and production, as suggested by the N.D.P., the inevitable consequences are arbitrary judgments, gross inequities, rationing, and for the first time in Canada since the war, a black market. Worst of all, the state will have to move into every factory, every store, every office, every trade union and every household. Perhaps this is the kind of communist control that the N.D.P. wants for our society, but I do not believe that we need it. We can move along to the objectives that we want to accomplish without adopting drastic measures such as the ones which have been adopted in Cuba and China.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: Don't forget rule 75C.

Mr. Benson: From what I have said, Mr. Speaker, I hope it will be evident that we have no intention of easing up or giving up on the war against inflation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benson: I know that the truth bothers the N.D.P. It always has and probably always will.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Benson: We will control inflation in this country. It is merely a matter of deciding whether we must impose further monetary, fiscal and other controls to accomplish this objective or whether the people within the economy—encouraged by hon. members opposite, I hope—will take the voluntary steps that are necessary so that we can move forward in this country without having the inflation which we have at the present time.

Mr. Baldwin: You said this two years ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the minister but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there agreement to allow the minister to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: This is too good to waste.

Mr. Benson: I can only say it is better than anything I heard last Friday.

Mr. Baldwin: You were not even here last Friday.

Mr. Benson: I was here and I listened, although not with interest, to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

Mr. Baldwin: Your peerless leader is not going to like that.

Mr. Benson: Neither do we contemplate the opposite extreme, that of hog-tying the economy and the people of Canada in a tangle of bureaucratic, arbitrary decrees as to the prices they should charge, the wages they should seek or the investments they should make in our country. Our approach will continue to be the one we have been following steadily for many months, using broad fiscal and monetary policies to keep the economy from excessive overheating, stimulating longer-run regional growth and employment, and emphasizing our interest in the regions that need developing in our country, the high unemployment regions east of Ontario. We will continue our efforts to add to the productivity and efficiency of the economy and to seek a broader understanding as well as the co-operation of the entire community in voluntary restraint. These are the policies which will do the job for the greatest good of the greatest number of people in our country. In due course they will bring our enormously productive economy back to a firm basis for continued growth and expansion. When that prospect is firmly in sight—and we are reviewing the situation on a daily basis—we will be the first to initiate a relaxation of restraint. No one is more anxious than the government to carry forward all the new programs and good things for the people of Canada which we believe lie within our potential grasp, and indeed they will be carried out under this government.

Some hon. Members : Hear, hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am prepared to recognize the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), but I understand the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) has a question.

Mr. Skoberg: The minister suggested he would be prepared to entertain a question. I should like to ask him whether he considers that voluntary restraint will accomplish a wage and price control, and if he does, what part of our society will be disadvantaged under these conditions?

Mr. Benson: I never said that voluntary restraints would accomplish wage and price controls, unless all segments of the society agree upon them. My hon. friend has seen what happened recently in the Prices and Incomes Commission with respect to voluntary restraints. May I say at this point that there does not appear to be an immediate prospect of their being undertaken. But I would also say to my hon. friend that imposing wages and price controls, even if we had the power to do so in this country, would not achieve the objectives easily or without a great deal of disruption in our economy. I think the people of Canada would accomplish the objectives we desire if they would restrict their demands for increased income, be it profits or wages, in relation to the increases in productivity within the economy.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister be good enough to answer one further question? I believe it is implicit in what he said that the aged have suffered more in comparison with those who have been able to take advantage of inflationary opportunities. Is it his opinion that it is necessary to hold the aged in that inferior position, for example by maintaining the 2 per cent ceiling on adjustments with regard to the cost of living? Is he of the opinion that this is essential to an adequate fight against inflation in Canada?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I will simply say that for the first time in Canada's history a federal government, a Liberal government, recognized that inflation would affect the older people in our country. We instituted a guaranteed income for older people in this country. We started it at $105 per month, with a maximum of 2 per cent added for increases in the cost of living, and we were the first government in the history of Canada to do this. I would also like to say that this figure of $105 is $60 above what was provided by the previous Conservative government.

We believe in helping the older people in this country, and we do not believe that the poor people, the underprivileged people, should suffer because of inflation. That is why we want to beat inflation. If hon. members opposite would stop encouraging the government to spend more money, thus increasing inflation, it would help us in our battle against inflation so that we may accomplish the ends we have in mind.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That was a mini speech.

Mr. Benson: Next question?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson).

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with my colleagues in congratulating the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) for moving and seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. In particular I commend the seconder of the Address in Reply because I believe he has proven himself a worthy replacement for his predecessor the hon. separatist gentleman who is now deputy leader of the Parti Quebecois, and if the good of the nation requires his leadership in that constituency I trust he will have continued success.

I was a little concerned that the hon. member for Sarnia devoted much of his speech to criticizing this institution of which we are members. Even from watching the functioning of this House during the last couple of days it seems to me that what the hon. member ought to be doing is preaching more to his own caucus and less to the House. I am sure he must understand that the real strength and heartbeat of democracy radiates from this institution; therefore, we must all work together to improve its performance and efficiency. We must never lose sight of the fact that it is here that we have an opportunity to speak on behalf of those we represent, and to express opinions that are as diverse as is the nature of our country.

I also wish to congratulate the two new members of the cabinet on their appointment to office, the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) and the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury), but must point out that this raises the size of the Canadian cabinet to the highest it has ever been in history. I only hope their contribution might be equal to the size of the cabinet. However, I find it difficult to understand the policy of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in constantly increasing the numbers of those who assist him, whether in cabinet or in his office. One of the things which the Prime Minister has missed in his appeal for a new approach to things is the reform of the cabinet itself, which now is certainly a top-heavy organization. If the cabinet is to continue in the old pattern of things, it will not assure the kind of efficiency that the Prime Minister wants from his government.

The most impressive thing about the Speech from the Throne was the lacklustre approach it took to our problems. The public have shown an obvious lack of enthusiasm for it, even as the attitude of this House indicates to-day. I have noticed this from reading comments in the press and from contacts I have had within the past few days with various people across the nation. It is true that its positive emphasis is placed on strengthening Canadian unity, but on the other hand it promises little to meet the present day problems of Canada.

Tonight we listened attentively to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). It was interesting to note that he continually condemned the opposition for lack of a program as an alternative to that proposed by the government. It is the responsibility of the government to propose policies that will correct the problems we face. It is all right for the Minister of Finance to try to lay blame on the opposition, but I point out that when the votes were counted in the last election and the Prime Minister received the support of the majority of representatives in this House, he immediately assumed the responsibility for initiating programs and policies necessary to strengthen the country. The responsibility of the opposition is to criticize and to effect constructive improvements to these policies and programs.

It is just not enough for the Minister of Finance to take the low-keyed approach that he took tonight, saying that our greatest problem is inflation and that the government must control it. There are scores of other problems pressing upon us which, unless they are solved, will result in it not mattering whether or not we succeed with the problem of inflation. What we need, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) stated so well, is a Throne Speech that will be an agenda for action on the one hand and at the same time will be a strong expression of federal government concern regarding the nation's problems, particularly those in relation to national unity.

The Speech from the Throne made an appeal to young people by referring to a proposal to drop the voting age to 18 years. However, it is of interest to note that this recommendation is to be studied by a standing committee. In fact, much of the Speech from the Throne disturbed me because from its tone it seemed that instead of a Prime Minister speaking to his people we heard the voice of one who sounded more like a president.

The approach taken by the Prime Minister during the parliamentary recess indicated that this institution is not held in the same respect and regard by him as that held by his predecessors. The Speech from the Throne is actually a speech from our monarch, but for the first time this Speech from the Throne failed to speak of the cabinet or the government as Her cabinet or Her ministers. The only mention of the monarch in it was with reference to her pending visit to Manitoba.

I only hope that the Prime Minister will take the advice of His Highness Prince Philip when he said that if the Canadian people decide the monarchy is no longer an acceptable and useful institution in Canadian life, it would be up to them to do something about it, but it should be done openly. If it is the intention of the Prime Minister to eliminate the role of the monarch in our system of government, I think he owes it to the Canadian people to come out and say so, instead of letting it gradually slip away in the hope that they will let it go by without too much comment or criticism.

Coming back, Mr. Speaker, to the lowering of the voting age, during the last ten years it has been my impression that the young people of Canada have not really been demanding that the voting age be lowered. In fact, there is very little pressure from the young people on this subject. I think it is a good thing to encourage young people to participate directly in the process of government.

However, I do not think there is going to be any radical change in voting patterns, because in the three western provinces which have taken the lead in this there has been no evidence of any basic change in the pattern of voting.

What our young people are really looking for, particularly from the right hon. gentleman who is our Prime Minister, is leadership that will inspire them for the years ahead when they replace us, with the knowledge that what is being done now is preserving and strengthening the nation of which we are all a part. I find it very difficult to accept the lukewarm, passive approach to the basic problems as expressed in the Speech from the Throne. I would remind the government that on every side there are problems facing us that must be dealt with. It is not good enough to say that we are going to call a federal-provincial conference some time in the future, or that there is going to be a white paper on this or that. It is essential that the government give some indication of how it intends to solve these problems.

We are told that by 1980, 80 per cent of the people of Canada will be living in metropolitan or urban communities. This illustrates the tremendous need for adjustment in the area of transportation alone. Something will have to be done that is far different, far more impressive than that which is being offered at the present time.

The Speech from the Throne mentioned that the housing target for the next five years is one billion new homes in Canada. That is a notable target and we would all accept it. But how can we reach a target of one billion new homes with interest rates as they are at the present time? In fact, it is impossible to expect that people will be able to purchase the homes they need, and should have, if the interest paid over an amortization period of 20 to 25 years is two or three times the value of the home itself. What has been said about that? Nothing.

It is one thing for the Prime Minister to say that it is an international problem and refer to monetary policies—and in this he must include the inflated cost of money—but it is not good enough simply to say that this is a situation which affects the whole world while we in Canada do nothing about it.

The Minister of Finance has stated, quite correctly, that we have had a sustained and continuing period of affluence and economic expansion over the last few years, but does that necessarily mean inflation is inevitable? He also mentioned that with the exception of wheat our exports have increased in price during the past year. I suppose he would imply that this meets the increased cost of production. But let him not talk that way to the farmers of this country. They know it is not just wheat that is involved. As they face the problem of inflation, probably more acutely than any other group in the country, they know it is not just wheat that has gone down in price. All grains and cereals—even beef, at its present high level—are still below what they were in price a few years ago.

The crisis that today faces Canada's farming industry demands more immediate and determined action than we have seen up to the present time. In fact, with a good deal of the western harvest already under snow and with little hope of its being taken off this fall, the crises that have developed in the west during the last few months have become more acute. I would like to think that the Speech from the Throne carried some word of encouragement for the farmers, but there was nothing in it.

I say to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and those involved with policies relating to the sale of agricultural produce that we are not just facing a depression in western Canada today—we are in it already. A situation that has been difficult will inevitably become more difficult. This situation will not go away by itself. There is nothing in the Speech from the Throne for western farmers or eastern farmers, either.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that there is no easy solution to this problem but I do not accept the criticism from the government benches that we on the opposition side are just out to destroy or oppose those positive things they might suggest. Neither do we wish to encourage or incite the government to spend vast sums of money which are not readily available. Nevertheless, the problems are there.

The Speech from the Throne said something about the pollution of air and water. We know this is a tremendous problem, but it is no solution to say that in the future there will be a white paper on this matter, or that a federal-provincial conference will be called. It is imperative that some indication be given on how this problem will be dealt with by the federal government.

As I gauge the reaction of the Canadian people to the Speech from the Throne there is not very much optimism for the future as it relates to the hard facts of life, and particularly to the economy. We are told that the white paper on tax reform will be available in about ten days, but unless it contains positive proposals to encourage the development of our own resources and to expand the productivity of this nation we are only talking to the wind. This is an area where the responsibility of government falls directly upon the Prime Minister and his cabinet. The Minister of Finance should talk more about what inflation actually is and how imperative it is that the productivity of this nation be speeded up to catch up with the tremendous overhead that the cost of government represents in this country. Today, with inflation pressing in on us, we are paying for the sins of governmental policy of the last five years. The cost of governing has gone up much faster than the increase in the growth of productivity. We have heard the CBC mentioned as an example. I would remind the House that last year the total expenditure of the CBC was more than $196 million.

It would seem that there are ways in which this type of expenditure can be reduced. I am opposed to the abolition of the CBC, but we cannot afford the type of luxury involved in this tremendous expenditure of public funds. Similar charges could be repeated over and over again as one looks at policies of government expenditure and investment that have been carried on during the past five years. We need policies that will encourage the growth and development of this country and give us time to catch up with the growth of overhead costs incurred in financing the government of the country. That brings me to a point on which I wish to spend a few minutes. It concerns a policy that was implemented during the summer recess. It has been talked about but not really discussed in depth, and was touched on in the closing weeks of the previous session. I am speaking of the industrial incentive program announced in August.

The government has expressed concern over regional disparities in Canada. Unemployment, wages and costs, standards of community service, and consequently standards of living vary considerably in different regions of the country. In fact, as one crosses the breadth of Canada one sees that the differences between our regions divide us more from one another than do the differences that exist between us and our U.S. neighbour from north to south. It is this factor that makes the governing of our country so difficult for any government. The federal government has recognized the problem that exists and has designated certain regions of Canada. In fact, there is one of these areas in every province, because all provinces have areas which the government considers to be most in need of stimulus and improvement. The government will grant substantial funds for capital investment to any manufacturing industry located in one of these designated regions. It will also make a grant for new jobs that are created.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the incentive program can not be expected to be a significant stimulus for new industries to establish in an area in which they otherwise would not have become established. As explained by government spokesmen, the incentive program is intended to be an incentive to industries which are planning to establish new plants, or to diversify into manufacturing new products, to locate in a designated area instead of some other area. It is therefore just as important for us to know where such industries will be attracted from as to define the areas to which they are to be induced to move. In other words, the program is a "have and have not" program in that every community is either labelled as one into which industry is to be encouraged to locate or as one from which industry should be diverted. Obviously, the economic health of the various regions of Canada ranges all the way from white to black through every shade of gray; and this black or white approach will in my opinion create serious discriminatory and inequitable situations.

In my constituency we do not expect any program of industrial incentives. For the most part the economic health of industries in central Alberta is good. I am concerned about the type of policy that will be developed in this incentive program, under which communities that are not in the hot or incentive areas will be forced to cool off. Indeed, the incentive program will draw industries away from the areas which are developing and place them in areas where it is to the manufacturer's benefit to locate.

I think it is accepted by all that the major urban centres of population, areas which are known as the hot areas of the country, are natural magnets for industry. They have built-in markets, transportation systems, pools of skilled labour and ancillary specialized services. On the other hand, labour is more expensive, more unionized and less stable; land taxes are usually higher, as is the cost of living. Pollution, zoning and other restrictions are often more severe. Nevertheless, some industries are still able to locate outside metropolitan areas. Some are obliged to do so because of the nature of the industry. These are the "fall out" industries and they are the only industries that will move from one place to another if encouraged to do so by the incentive program. We are not, therefore, really talking about the over-all industrial picture of Canada; we are talking about a small proportion of industry which might be affected by this incentive program. You cannot describe such industry with any black or white label.

The smaller cities are fiercely competitive for these fall out industries, and it does not seem unreasonable to assume that the industrial location incentive plan will receive the most careful consideration of all fall-out industries. I would have thought, however, that the government could have come up with an incentive program that is not tax supported. Incentives in the form of concessions could have been given. Those incentives could have taken the form of tax allowances to encourage industries to locate in areas according to need.

I submit that for the government to say a certain area must be classified as an incentive area is the wrong way to approach the problem. The net result will be that we will worsen the situation and make it more difficult for areas, which at present are able to carry on by themselves, to carry on in future because under the new incentive program they will be discriminated against. I would have thought the government could have introduced a program which would have placed a premium on new industries being established in the "cool off" areas so as to balance the incentive of the hot areas. There could be direct and positive assistance other than direct subsidies to industries which wish to locate in areas not covered by the over-all incentive program as outlined by present governmental policy.

It seems to me that in trying to encourage industry to locate in various areas of the country we must develop a national viewpoint as opposed to a merely regional viewpoint. It is therefore obvious that the present type of program will make it increasingly difficult for those areas outside the incentive program, and which are not part of the industrial and urbanized hot areas, to compete with those areas which are to be given incentive assistance.

[Mr. Thompson.]

We have heard examples of the type of program the government ought to consider, and it would do well to listen to suggestions coming from this side of the house. It should not condemn our suggestions as being frivolous and merely aimed at bringing about increased expenditures in an attempt to solve our problems.

Mr. Stanfield: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thompson: We face many other problems in Canada. We commend the Prime Minister for his attitude toward some of the problems which affect national unity. National unity does not depend on just cultural or political differences. It does not just depend on the solution of language difficulties. National unity will come about when the over-all economic and social development of this country is dealt with in an equitable way so that we may develop our tremendous reserve of resources, physical and human. At the same time there must be the type of government that will suit our needs. Our government must work for the national good. Canadians must not be burdened down with bureaucracy and the high cost associated with it. Essential projects must not be discarded because of government policies.

As we look at the coming months, at the legislation on the order paper and at the problems that involve us all, we can only hope that this session will be profitable. I encourage hon. members on the government side to study the proposals put forward by the Prime Minister in the Speech from the Throne and then to stand according to their convictions. Unless we come to grips with the basic problems affecting the over-all welfare of our country we shall not meet our responsibilities as we ought to meet them.

It is to this end, Mr. Speaker, that we extend congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Speech from the Throne and to the new cabinet members. We trust this session of parliament will be worth while as far as the developing and unifying of our nation is concerned.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaétan J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to join with previous speakers and congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the throne speech, the honourable members for Sarnia and Lapointe (Messrs. Cullen and Marceau).

They certainly did a good job and I am pleased to see once again that the present government is made up of qualified men.

I would also like to pay tribute to three great men who sat in this house before me: senator Hurtubise and Léoda Gauthier, both deceased, and judge Odias Godin who sat in the house between 1958 and 1965 and who is present in the house this evening.

Mr. Speaker, these three remarkable men have left their mark not only on my region but throughout the country.

In the next few minutes, I shall try to give my impression on the contents of the throne speech. Then, I shall do my best to draw the attention of the house to problems peculiar to my riding of Nickel Belt and to Northern Ontario. Finally, I intend to inform the government about representations by the people whom I have the honour and pleasure of representing.

Mr. Speaker, I would not forgive myself if I failed to congratulate the right honourable Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for his sense of realism, his clearsightedness, his devotion and his courage since he came to power. Under his leadership, the government of this country is achieving gradually the just society which it proposed to establish.

Indeed, his philosophy of the just society emerges with a greater clarity and vigour in the speech from the throne. When reading carefully that document which sets forth a program much more personal, concrete and specific for this second session, one realizes that it contains a sound philosophy for the country, a philosophy designed to show a growing difference towards the individual, to define the public weal above all in relation to the improvement in the well-being, the security and the freedom of each individual.

Last year, after having succeeded in laying the foundations of a just society through the reform of parliamentary procedure, the government now proposes, in this second session, to really set itself to work by introducing bills designed to do justice to Canadian citizens.

One has only to review some of the most important legislative measures which will be proposed in the second session to realize that the government is firmly determined to pay more attention to our people who are in less fortunate conditions than the rest of the country.

Like my constituents, I am pleased that the government is establishing programs to reduce economic regional disparity and to further protect the rights of individuals and minorities.

Here are a few examples: it will give special attention to the necessity of employment surveys among Canadians of Indian descent. It intends to vote an increased budget for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which becomes the main instrument in the fight against social and economic disparities. Some of the measures are the guarantee of liguistic rights and programs of assistance for minorities; a tax reform aimed at establishing a new formula for a fairer distribution of the tax burden; a complete revision of the policy on social security; amendments to the legislation governing labor-management relations; new Criminal Code amendments to provide better protection of individuals' rights; and special attention to housing problems.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that despite the threat of inflation the government's objective is to construct, over a period of five years, one million new housing units to meet the needs of low-income families.

The government will also propose measures to eradicate water pollution, a revision of the legislation regarding consumer goods in order to give consumers a better protection and a thorough reform of the unemployment insurance plan to make benefits available to a greater number of unemployed.

Under the heading of reforms affecting the rights of individuals, I am very happy to find that the government intends to lower the voting age to 18. The young people from my riding know that I have been working for a long time towards that goal. Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who entertain doubts and misgivings about the ability of the younger generation to take those new responsibilities.

On the contrary, I have always had great confidence in youth. Since I am one of the youngest members of this house, and a professor, I can say from personal experience that today's youth is much more mature and better informed about politics than previous generations and, in many cases, in a much better position to exercise its right to vote than a certain class of adults.

I say: Let us have no fear of giving responsibilities to our young people. They will protest less and bring a most valuable contribution to their environment and to our country.

In my riding, there are already a significant number of young people of 16, 17 and 18 years of age who are very actively engaged in politics and who could teach a great deal to their elders. They are undoubtedly a great source of inspiration in their own circle.

I am convinced that this change of attitude in the federal policy will encourage a growing number of young people to take more interest in State affairs.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the population of the Nickel Belt constituency, the large constituency, which I have the honour to represent in this house, looks favourably upon the new measures considered by the government at the beginning of this second session, and I am sure my constituents are ready to support it. However, it is not all beer and skittles in Nickel Belt and Northern Ontario. We have to face a lot of specific problems that go back a long way; some of them are becoming so acute that they call for immediate action from the governments.

The most serious problem in my region is unquestionably air and water pollution. This problem has been rampant for several years and the situation is getting worse and worse instead of getting better.

Last Friday the Toronto Telegram published an article entitled: Sudbury: devastation total. The disastrous situation in which my region is plunged is fairly well analysed there. My constituents are getting very impatient at the government inaction about it. They do not intend to remain passive any longer. They are well determined to take the necessary steps and invite the government to act immediately. The continuing effort of a citizen committee from Sudbury and the area, under the skilful leadership of Mr. Paul Falkowski, deserves certainly to be pointed out here.

Mr. Speaker, either according to tradition or to the constitution, it has always been recognized that pollution was a provincial field of jurisdiction. However, since it has become apparent that the provincial government has been unable to find solutions to control pollution, my fellow-citizens as well as myself are urging the federal government to intervene.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Serré: Since this problem is quite extensive in the Sudbury area, a research centre to help the corporations to find some means to control pollution should be established as soon as possible.

[Mr. Serré.]

My constituents will certainly be more reassured if they note that the federal government is now determined to take the initiative by introducing during this second session a new bill aimed at preventing water pollution.

The housing crisis is quite acute in my constituency as the result of a lack of funds. The government will have to give its immediate attention to that problem by finding means to provide funds at more reasonable rates of interest to people with low incomes.

I strongly hope that the government will seriously consider the possibility of withdrawing the 11 per cent tax on building materials, at least for individuals who wish to build their own homes. I especially hope that the provincial authorities will stop blaming Ottawa and that they will assume their responsibilities in that field by providing the municipalities with the water, sewage and planning services they need.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Serré: I can hardly understand that such a corporation as the CBC which is entirely subsidized by the citizens is left so free to broadcast what it likes without having to answer for it to the people. I suggest that this situation is completely abnormal, and that we, as the elected representatives of the people, should be able to exercise greater control. My constituents are stirred up, and rightfully so, because of certain programs that have a very bad influence on the people of this country.

The sole effect of many programs is to lower the moral standards. There are, of course, many good programs, but more effort should be put, I think, into attempting to present a greater number of educational and cultural ones.

The people of northern Ontario were very happy to learn of the introduction by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion of a program of subsidies to secondary industries. It will surely help to reduce the poverty and unemployment that exist presently in many sectors of my district and in the whole of northern Ontario.

I believe, however, that this new program, like similar ones in the past, is of benefit only to certain selected groups and to certain more-favoured sectors, at the expense of the poor and of the less-favoured regions. For that reason, I have invited the municipal authorities in my riding to take it upon themselves to establish the structures liable to attract industries to their localities. Many municipalities have already responded and have created industrial committees, and for this I congratulate them.

I am sure they will receive all the necessary co-operation from the various government agencies. I have already repeatedly stressed in the house the need for secondary industries in northern Ontario. There is no need for me to belabour the point now. May I simply enumerate the types of industries that more than any others would be of benefit to the economy of my region.

Plants for machine assembling and construction of mining equipment could be established, a local slaughtering house with an inspector on permanent duty in order to encourage the raising of cattle, a local warehouse for agricultural products, increased assistance to the farmers who are now forced to leave their farms on account of lack of facilities, in order to allow them to compete with the other centres of the province and the country.

Special attention should be given to the tourist industry. It is known that in northern Ontario natural resources and scenic beauties are diverse and plentiful. For example, I hope that the federal government will consider the possibility of developing a national park in that part of my constituency which is called French River. As is well known, this region has a rich historical past. It was the road followed in days of yore by Champlain, the first missionaries and the first settlers who developed northern Ontario.

Many other types of industries could prosper in my constituency. In order to ensure a proper development of this vast region, I feel that a socio-economical study should be undertaken by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Such a study would promote a better coordination of local efforts and better planning.

My French-speaking compatriots in Ontario are greatly pleased by the determination of the present government in its efforts to ensure linguistic equality in the federal government's agencies, and wherever it is warranted by the population breakdown.

Franco-Ontarians are following very closely the efforts of the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) who is devising an assistance program for French-speaking minorities, aiming not only at ensuring their survival but mainly at enabling them to develop fully within the Francophone and Canadian frameworks.

Having conducted for several years their struggle for survival, and their fight is certainly bearing fruit, if we consider that nearly three quarters of a million French-speaking Canadians live in Ontario, the biggest concentration being in the Nickel Belt area, in northern Ontario, my French-speaking compatriots now see more reason for hope in the new policy of the federal government and in the change of attitude of the provincial government who has just granted French secondary schools to the French-speaking population.

Such commendable initiatives certainly deserve our admiration and all our gratitude.

However, now that we are guaranteed linguistic equality under the law, we must not stop there. The French-speaking people of Ontario recognize, as does the Secretary of State, indeed, that bilingualism will be short-lived if it is not founded on cultural bases which immerge us in tradition and provide us with a sense of evolution.

At the priority level, we need, therefore, some cultural stimulation. The French-speaking people in Ontario have at their disposal few French cultural services and the existing ones are often inferior to the valuable English cultural services or less interesting.

Prompted by a strong desire for perfection and self-achievement, in order to participate on an equal footing with their English-speaking fellow-citizens, in the building of a united country, my constituents, like myself, urgently demand that the federal government designate as a bilingual district the Sudbury area; that subsidies be granted to various social and cultural services, that the C.B.C. establish as soon as possible in Sudbury a French television station with a local production centre responsible for Ontario public affairs and the development of local talents.

They also ask that additional financial assistance be granted to French newspapers. Special attention should, for instance, be given to the only French weekly in the Sudbury region, Le Voyageur, a local undertaking which certainly deserves recognition; but which is having a hard time to subsist due to lack of money. They want additional grants for the Laurentienne University of Sudbury to promote cultural activities and retraining courses to be made more easily available to the French population by providing French courses in Sudbury.

I already know, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of State and the government will find the necessary means to comply with those legitimate requests from my fellow-citizens of northern Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to represent a most diversified population. The Nickel Belt riding and the Sudbury region are populated with men and women of all possible nationalities, with the most varied cultural background. The valuable cultural contribution from all these various ethnic groups, and I have particularly in mind the Ukrainians, the Italians, the Germans and the Finnish people, to mention just a few, is certainly the greatest resource of my region. The extraordinary thing is that despite this mosaic of races, religions, languages and cultures, we have learned to live together, growing and mutually enriching each other in perfect harmony.

We have really achieved unity in diversity. That is why I don't hesitate to offer my region as a model for the whole country. I would even go as far as to assert that the future of Confederation will be decided in Northern Ontario. In that sense we are perhaps twenty years ahead of the other parts of the country. Indeed my region already gives a true picture of what Canada could be tomorrow.

Now I would like to challenge certain extremists of the province of Quebec, including Mr. Lévesque, who have no faith in the country's future and I would like to invite them to climb down from their ivory tower and to spend some time in my region. They would certainly find it a beneficial source of inspiration.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I want to move to a more progressive and effective session. I hope my constituents will continue to give me their support, their recommendations and their most valuable suggestions so that with them, together with all members on all sides of the house, we can work for the common good of our great country, Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being 9.45 o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 3 of Standing Order 38, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question necessary to dispose of the amendment to the amendment now before the House.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment. All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Call in the members.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Douglas) which was negatived on the following division:

The house met at 11 a.m.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—VOLUNTARY RESTRAINTS—INQUIRY AS TO OTHER MEASURES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the comment of the Minister of Finance last evening that he saw very little chance of success at the present time of a program of voluntary price and wage restraints, and thereby seemed to pull the rug from under the Prices and Incomes Commission's program, is it the intention of the government to ask the commission to consider some other approach to the problem of inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I did not hear the comment, but of course the Prices and Incomes Commission is considering all approaches. They did not put all their hopes in the proposed December conference but are considering other techniques. Therefore, we remain optimistic and, I must say, very determined to continue the fight against inflation by every means available to the government.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the comment of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs yesterday in connection with the steel price increase that if management and unions do not exercise voluntary restraint as urged by the government, "then we will have to use less voluntary measures", to use his own words, is the government considering less voluntary measures and, in particular, is it considering seeking a constitutional amendment to enable the government to resort to either full scale or partial wage control methods?

Mr. Trudeau: Among the less voluntary measures we include, of course, fiscal and monetary policies, but the matter of price control is something that the government is considering. I appreciate the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition about the constitutional difficulty. We are also considering it. If necessary, we will discuss the problem with the provinces to see whether, if needed, price and wage controls can be introduced.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and in view of the scorn poured last night by the Minister of Finance upon compulsory price and wage controls, whom are we to listen to, whom are we to regard as speaking for the government in connection with anti-inflationary measures—the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Trudeau: Both, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Trudeau: —and the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: The conclusion is not very difficult to draw that we are keeping all options open. Of course we would hesitate and regret to embark upon a course of wage and price controls and income controls because of the constitutional difficulties, arising out of the federal structure of Canada, but we are not closing off that option. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs indicated, and I repeat what the Minister of Finance is indicating, that we are hoping other alternatives will be workable ones.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct another supplementary question to the Prime Minister. As the Governor of the Bank of Canada, in answer to a question put to him at a meeting of the Finance Committee last spring, said that the government two years ago should have imposed consumer credit restrictions if it had the power to do so, may I ask whether the government is appealing to the provinces for the power to bring in consumer credit restrictions?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we are considering the cost of consumer credit restrictions, and we are even in the process of determining whether we would be able to adopt this course without recourse to or co-operation from the provinces. This is a constitutional point which is not quite clear. As the hon. member knows, it may be possible that the federal government could act on its own and, if so, we would envisage that. Otherwise, if necessary we would discuss it with the provinces, as we would other aspects of income and price control.

Mr. Hees: I wish to ask one final supplementary question just to make this absolutely clear. If the government finds out it can impose consumer credit controls without the consent of the provinces, is it the intention of the government to impose these controls?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question as asked is hypothetical. The hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. Hees: My question got the Prime Minister off the hook.

INTEREST RATES—CONTROL OF INCREASES

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister tell us whether or not it is the intention of the government to allow interest rates to rise without restraint?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the question as I was being prodded by other members across the way.

Mr. Hees: The Prime Minister was feeling a little ashamed for not answering my straightforward question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Skoberg: I will rephrase my question. I do not believe the Prime Minister heard it. Is it the intention of the government to allow interest rates to rise without restraint?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, interest rates would be part of the whole approach which would cover controls on incomes, wages, prices and so on. I repeat that we are not anxious to get to the stage where constitutionally, either alone or in conjunction with the provinces—or by prodding the provinces—we would have to embark on these various areas of direct governmental control and interference with the operations of the market, but I repeat that if necessary we are determined to take all necessary measures available to the government to break the back of inflation.

[Mr. Hees.]

CHARGEX CARDS—CONSIDERATION OF WITHDRAWAL

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary to the right hon. Prime Minister. Is the government giving consideration to an attempt to persuade the major chartered banks to withdraw their Chargex cards which have been distributed so widely, particularly in view of the great increase in credit which has been extended by these cards?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the suggestion is one for their consideration, Mr. Speaker, but I have been given to understand that voluntary restraint has been exercised by the banks themselves on their advertising and publicity in this area. If this is not the case, then perhaps we might discuss it with them.

PENSIONS

RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Last Wednesday when I asked the Prime Minister a question about certain pensions, including the pensions of retired civil servants, he suggested to me that I should wait until I had seen the Speech from the Throne. Since there is nothing in the Speech from the Throne about the pensions of retired civil servants, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board if the government will soon be in a position to announce an increase in these pensions?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that in the not too distant future it would be possible as a consequence of the progress in the general review to make a statement in respect of the pensions of superannuates.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Is the government giving favourable consideration to making such increases? A statement is of no help unless there are increases.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, perhaps even more than the hon. gentleman I would like to see the current inequities rectified. There are difficulties in the way, but intensive discussions are now going on with a view to achieving the best possible solution.

NATIONAL PARKS

MONT ST. MAGLOIRE, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): I should like to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Could he tell us whether negotiations are now being carried out with the government of the province of Quebec concerning the establishment of a national park in the Bellechasse constituency, more specifically at Mont St-Magloire?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that this question should be put on the order paper. If the hon. member believes that it is urgent to study or discuss it, he could notify me and it would be deferred as a matter to be debated at the time of adjournment.

GRAIN

OILSEEDS—MOVEMENT TO OVERSEAS MARKETS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt who answers for the Wheat Board. Can the minister assure the House that the Wheat Board is able to have the oilseed crop, mainly rapeseed and flax, moved through the pipe line to overseas markets, inasmuch as this year they seem to be one of the bright spots in the grain situation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the minister can assure the House that everything is being done that is necessary by the Wheat Board to expedite the movement of the crop to the markets as these markets open up.

Mr. Ritchie: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Have any sales of flax been lost to date because of failure to have this grain in a forward position?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the appropriate amounts of flax and rapeseed have been in a position to meet sales, so the answer is obviously no.

STABILIZATION OF PRICES BY INTERNATIONAL GRAINS COUNCIL

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister report to the House what, if any, progress is being made at the International Grains Council level with respect to the stabilization of grain prices? I do know that negotiations have been going on, and during the summer recess there has been a lot of concern about price stabilization.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member says, there have been meetings, in Washington, in Brussels, and in Buenos Aires. The result of these meetings has been a strengthening of prices and also the development of a monitoring system between the major exporters which I think is reflected in the improved grain situation at this time.

INITIAL PRICE ON DEFERRED DELIVERIES

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt. In view of the fact that prairie farmers who were prevented from delivering the full five-bushel quota last July are now beginning to deliver on their deferred delivery authorizations and are shocked to discover that they are receiving an initial price 20 cents lower than last July, what, if anything, is being planned to correct this discrimination?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member mentioned, the deferred delivery applications have now been processed or processing is being completed. The wheat delivered on the deferred delivery permits goes into this year's wheat pool. Under the law there is only one initial price at time of delivery for the whole of that pool; therefore it is true that those concerned with that delivery receive this year's initial price. It is, of course, also true, given some hardening of price as referred to by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, that people receiving the lower initial price would be in a position to receive some compensation by way of final payment.

Mr. Baldwin: Don't hold your breath.

INDUSTRY

POTASH—AGREEMENT BETWEEN SASKATCHEWAN AND STATE OF NEW MEXICO

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Could he kindly advise the House if there were any consultations between the government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan before that province entered into an agreement with the government of the State of New Mexico regarding production quotas, North American floor prices and other conditions in relation to potash production?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I answered this question when the House resumed sitting after the summer recess. I said that on a number of occasions either I or my officials have cautioned the Premier of Saskatchewan against an arrangement that would be dangerous from the point of view of legality, economic desirability and so on. But it is difficult for us to judge this matter before we know what the final arrangement will be. We are keeping in touch with the premier on this subject.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister not take into consideration the fact that the Governor of New Mexico and the Premier of Saskatchewan are between them, setting a floor price for potash all across Canada and that a foreign government is agreeing with a provincial government to fix prices within Canada's domestic market?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will be interested to know that the Premier of Saskatchewan has said that he is not doing anything—I mean with respect to proration—that is not being done now by the government of Alberta, with regard to oil.

HOUSING

SENIOR CITIZENS PROJECTS—ROLLING BACK OF INTEREST RATES

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing. Is the government taking steps to roll back interest rates on moneys supplied to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to be used for senior citizen housing projects? Will those rates be stabilized at levels not higher than they were last June?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I missed part of the question but I am afraid I am not quite sure of its import. Would the hon. gentleman elaborate on what he is driving at? Is he referring to section 16 loans?

Mr. Barnett: Yes, Mr. Speaker. May I rephrase my question and be more specific. Is the government, under the limited dividend section of the act, taking steps to roll back interest rates applicable to senior citizen housing projects to a level not higher than the 6⅞ per cent charged last June? Also, will the rate be stabilized at that level?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, interest rates under section 16 and section 35 loans must reflect the cost of money to the government. This has been the standard practice in the past. I am afraid I cannot encourage the hon. gentleman by saying that these interest rates will go below a rate that is slightly above the government's borrowing rate.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary to the Prime Minister. In view of the answer just given, would he consider the idea of subsidizing the interest rate applicable to projects that entail the building of senior citizen homes and the like?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have considered the matter. We feel at this time that our best approach is to make an over-all attack on inflation, and this is what we are doing.

DRUGS

SUGGESTED EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM IN SCHOOLS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister about the subject of drug use, because it is now becoming a grave national problem. I had hoped to see the Minister of Justice here. Would the Prime Minister be prepared to have his government consult with provincial Attorneys General and Ministers of Education so as to encourage the setting up of an educational program in elementary schools, high schools and universities in order that the youth of Canada will be informed and become more knowledgeable about the use of drugs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we share the hon. member's concern about the need to have information disseminated on this important matter. That is why we have set up a commission under Dean Le Dain. We are not considering any specific action along the lines the hon. member has suggested until that commission has reported.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that the commission is now investigating this question. But since many high school students and young people in our universities are being charged with possession of marijuana and trafficking in the drug, and many of them cannot afford bail and therefore remain incarcerated, will the government not consider measures to make the law uniform and to make certain that sentences meted out in this country do not vary from province to province? I ask this question because this matter is within federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, sentencing is not within federal jurisdiction, unless the hon. member is suggesting that we embark on the unusual course of setting a fixed sentence from which a judge cannot depart and over which he has no discretion.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister must be aware that in some cases young people are charged under the Narcotic Control Act, in which case they are liable to sentences of 7 to 14 years, while in other cases they are charged under the Food and Drugs Act where the sentence called for is much less.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member asking a supplementary question?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I had to give a preamble in order that the Prime Minister will be filled in on the law. In view of the fact they can be charged under various acts, is the government prepared to make the law uniform so that the youth of this nation will know what they are likely to be charged with?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this too hinges very much on the report of the Le Dain Commission on the recent situation. He is the Dean of the Osgoode Hall Law School. He is looking into all aspects of the problem. There are sociologists and psychiatrists, I believe, on the commission. We expect to have a complete report. I must say the government does share the concern of the hon. member about this area of the law. We have already, in the past session, announced some steps to correct shortcomings, but we do not find the matter is sufficiently dealt with at this time. That is why we set up the Le Dain Commission.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker —

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we might allow the hon. member for Compton to ask his question and then we might go to the hon. member for Edmonton West on his question of privilege.

[Translation]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO AWARDING OF CONTRACT TO CANADIAN STEEL CAR

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Would he say to this house if he is aware that the Canadian Steel Car was awarded a $10 million contract by CNR and that this contract will be entirely carried out at Hamilton, Ontario?

Would the minister tell this house why Montreal did not receive a part of this important contract?

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member makes reference to a contract or a situation which requires no immediate action, I think it might be advisable that the question should be put on the order paper or discussed at the time of adjournment tonight.

[English]

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMBERT (EDMONTON WEST)— DELIVERY OF "HANSARD"

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is a personal one but it affects all members of the House. In the past we received Hansard promptly by 9.30 or 9.45 a.m. For some unexplained reason we have not been getting that type of service since the resumption of the session. In fact, last Friday's Hansard was not delivered to our boxes until approximately 9.45 a.m. on Monday. In light of the new system of clearing the space below our desks, which I may say is most inconvenient, I think some explanation should be furnished as to why there is this apparent delay or change in procedure.

Mr. Speaker: I might indicate to the hon. member that I have made inquiries about the situation. I am told this has happened before at the start of a session. There are organizational difficulties at the printing bureau. It is hoped that by the start of next week that department of government will have become fully operational and will supply Hansard as it has done in previous sessions before eleven o'clock each morning.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

YUGOSLAVIA—PROVISION OF MEDICAL AND OTHER SUPPLIES FOLLOWING EARTHQUAKE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Has the government made any inquiries following the earthquake disaster in Yugoslavia as to the extent of requirements for medical and other supplies in that country? Is the Canadian government prepared to contribute any such supplies as may be required?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will have to take that up with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker; the department will supply answers to any oral questions asked about this matter.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

WEST GERMANY—REVALUATION OF DEUTSCHMARK—ALLOWANCES TO SERVICE PERSONNEL

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the revaluation of the deutschmark, does the government intend to increase allowances to Canadian service personnel in Germany to restore their effective purchasing power in the local economy?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): The director of pay services is looking into this matter to determine to what extent and in what areas in particular the servicemen will be affected by the revaluation. We have not yet reached any conclusions.

Mr. Mahoney: A supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Speaker. When the franc was devalued did the government not reduce allowances paid to foreign service personnel in France to compensate for their increased purchasing power?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative.

ADHERENCE TO GENEVA CONVENTION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Is Canada's adherence to the Geneva Convention of 1925, which outlawed chemical and biological warfare, still in effect?

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): I believe this technical question should be directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker. As far as I am concerned, I can say we are not involved in chemical or biological warfare except in its defensive aspects for the purpose of providing our servicemen with the proper equipment to defend themselves and protect the population.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE CONCERNING RESTRICTIONS ON CATCHES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Speaker. Having regard to the decreasing population of cod, whitefish and herring off our coast, is the minister giving any consideration to convening an international conference to discuss restrictions on the catching of fish off the continental shelf?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): We have been in touch with other countries through the usual channels and have expressed our concern about the decline in the Atlantic fish population. However, we are not considering an exceptional conference for this purpose.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Since the minister has planned to meet with the captains of large vessels fishing off the Labrador coast to discuss the development of fishing resources closer to home, may I ask what talks, if any, will be held with the numerous owners of smaller vessels who have suffered equally this year?

Mr. Davis: We are going to meet with all the skippers.

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF SALT FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Can the Minister of Fisheries tell the House whether the government proposes to bring in legislation this session setting up a salt fish marketing board? If so, will it be brought in before Christmas?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): I certainly hope legislation along those lines can be brought in as soon as possible.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the government's declared intention on many occasions to bring down legislation to incorporate a Canada development corporation, will a bill to incorporate such a body be introduced in the present session?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Precisely because this has been mentioned in two or three Speeches from the Throne, I believe, and because parliament has not so far found time to act upon it, I do not wish to make any further commitment. But I hope to see further action.

Mr. Baldwin: Or further inaction.

Mr. Trudeau: Or further inaction.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

SUGGESTED LEASE OF HULL REGION FROM QUEBEC

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister.

Due to the inertia and bad faith of the Quebec government concerning the development of its territory in the Hull area, is it the intention of the federal government to come to the rescue of the citizens of Hull who are victims of federal-provincial conflicts, by renting the Hull area on a long term basis for the purpose of building roads and new buildings?

CHEESE—DATE OF MEETING WITH ONTARIO AND QUEBEC PRODUCERS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister decided on a date when he will meet with the cheese producers of Ontario and Quebec, such a meeting having been requested in a joint letter from the producers on September 12?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I will check to see whether a mutually convenient date has been determined.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question. I brought this matter to the personal attention of the minister by telephone some weeks ago. Has he really not had a chance to consider this important request?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FARM MACHINERY—INQUIRY AS TO BARBER COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister advise us when we may expect the Barber Commission report on the price of farm machinery?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I am not sure I can give the hon. member a precise date when we shall receive the final report of the Barber Commission. We did receive an interim report as long ago as last March covering certain aspects of this inquiry, and in the last few days we have received a further interim report. This is now in the hands of the translators and printers, and we hope it can be tabled in the House soon—at any rate, as soon as it is ready.

POLICY RESPECTING BURIAL OF DECEASED SERVICEMEN

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the government giving sympathetic consideration to relaxing, at least in peacetime, the longstanding policy which requires that servicemen who lose their lives at sea or while serving abroad should be buried at sea or in the country in which the casualty occurred? I ask the minister whether consideration cannot be given to this question, particularly in the light of the policy followed by the United States, whose fallen war dead are brought back to the United States for interment?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): As the hon. member has indicated, it has been a longstanding policy that Commonwealth servicemen who die overseas should be buried in a military cemetery especially set aside for that purpose. This policy has been reviewed from time to time but it is still in existence. I instructed my departmental officials some time ago to review the policy once more to determine whether there was not some way in which we could accommodate the wishes of those who would prefer, in peacetime, to have their dead buried in Canada.

There are a good many implications here. This involves a Commonwealth agreement. It would also imply the setting up of a special branch at National Defence headquarters to administer the suggested arrangement. As I say, we are examining all these aspects but a conclusion has not yet been reached.

INQUIRY AS TO FINAL REPORT OF TASK FORCE

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Has a definite date been set for the presentation to the government of the final report of the task force on agriculture?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I have received an undertaking from the task force on agriculture that a report will be presented by the end of this year.

POSITION OF HARBOURS BOARD EMPLOYEES AS A RESULT OF LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I ask the Minister of Transport whether he is in a position to answer the question I raised yesterday, namely, what financial provision is being made for the employees of the Harbours Board who have been laid off as a result of the dispute on the Vancouver waterfront?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for having drawn this matter to my attention. Of 50 men laid off, approximately 12 were not eligible for unemployment insurance. This was an obvious inequity and the Harbours Board is arranging to compensate these 12 men to the same level as if they were receiving unemployment insurance.

HOUSING

SEWAGE SYSTEMS—AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS FOR HAMILTON PLANT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. The Minister of Energy and Resources for Ontario has indicated there will be no federal assistance forthcoming in connection with the construction of a sewage plant at Hamilton, whereas the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated in a statement yesterday that discussions were still proceeding in this connection. Will the minister kindly advise us which of these statements is correct and whether, in fact, an effort is being made by the government to review its entire policy with respect to grants to municipalities?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): The statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare is accurate. Sewage treatment loans to Hamilton and to other municipalities are being studied and are subject to negotiation and review. We have this year extended some $50 million in sewage treatment loans; this represents a very high percentage increase compared with anything done earlier.

At any given time the government must acknowledge some limitation on the resources available for even good programs such as the one mentioned by the hon. member. Right now we are seeking the advice of provincial ministers as to their needs in this and other housing areas. When we have the benefit of the collective results of their suggestions I shall be going to the Treasury Board and to the Department of Finance for our capital budget for next year. I certainly hope all members of the House bear in mind their wish to see these projects furthered when I place my estimates before them. There is no freeze on sewage treatment loans. The budget for this year has been subscribed and we shall be dealing with future applications including Hamilton's, as soon as the new budget is available.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I take it from the minister's answer that I would be correct in saying that the city of Hamilton has not been refused?

Mr. Andras: That is correct, Mr. Speaker, there has been no refusal. We will be negotiating with the city of Hamilton in light of the ideas of the responsible minister of the province of Ontario on whether any particular priority will be applied to this community in that province.

URBAN RENEWAL—INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF FREEZE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing whether he can inform the House how long the freeze on urban renewal is to continue?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, another hon. member asked me the other day to make a statement on motions on this matter, and I intend to do so at the earliest opportunity. If the Leader of the Opposition will be patient I will try to do so during the next few days.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

QUEBEC—ASSIST ENGLISH RESIDENTS TO LEARN FRENCH

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether his government is willing to grant the tax exemption requested by the premier to allow the Anglophones of the province of Quebec to learn French?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I presume the hon. member is talking about the Quebec premier. There are other premiers in the country.

I think the Secretary of State will soon answer the question. The hon. member probably knows that in the first weeks of November, the education ministers of the provinces will be meeting with the Secretary of State who, at this occasion, hopes to state the government policy in that matter.

INDUSTRY

ELECTRICAL EQUIPMENT—SASKATCHEWAN PLAN TO PAY WITH GRAIN

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Had he or any member of his department any consultation with the Premier of Saskatchewan before the premier introduced the plan to purchase heavy electrical machinery and pay for same with grain?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have talked to the premier of Saskatchewan about this, and so has the Minister without Portfolio. I have now written to him outlining some of the disadvantages to other industrial sections of the wheat bartering system.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question. Did the minister impress upon the premier the very discriminatory effect of this program and how disastrous it would be to Canadian manufacturers of heavy electrical equipment?

Mr. Pepin: As I said that is part of my letter, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

NORTHERN PRAIRIES—SUGGESTED ASSISTANCE TO OFFSET POOR CROPS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the difficult harvest that the farmers of the northern prairies are having for the second year—in some operations less than half of the crops have been harvested—does the minister have any specific plan for an immediate injection of cash in any form into this economy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there has been a very substantial injection of cash into the economy through the cash advances system. I am sure that the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatchewan could advise how much has been advanced, but it is a significant amount.

Mr. Yewchuk: A supplementary question. Do I take that answer to mean that the act will be amended in order to allow advance payments on grain that is still in swath and standing in the fields?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member cannot take my answer as meaning that.

INITIAL PRICE ON DEFERRED DELIVERIES

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board and arises out of his answer to a question about payments on deferred delivery grain. The excuse he gave was that the government could do nothing about an additional payment because this would be contrary to the Act. How, then, does he relate his answer to the action taken by the government in allowing deferred deliveries?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is argumentative.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—PROGRESS OF STUDY

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Since the minister will be making a very important visit to the Maritimes this week in regard to matters connected with transportation, would he like to pave the way by telling us what progress he is making with the study on Atlantic transportation?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that this information should be given by way of a statement on motions.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

SHIP CONSTRUCTION—INQUIRY AS TO DIRECT LOAN PROGRAM

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. When does the minister propose to bring in his program of direct loans to fishermen to enable them to build vessels for fishing?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, a program of that type is under consideration, but I am unable to announce when it is likely to become effective.

HOUSING

MANITOBA—DECISION RESPECTING URBAN RENEWAL PROJECTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister in charge of housing. Is the minister yet in a position to state the government's decision with respect to the four urban renewal projects discussed with him by a delegation from Manitoba on September 13?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the delegation at the time, we are prepared to consider and we suggested that the delegation accept our meeting a commitment in regard to a certain portion of one of the schemes. There is no further information that I can give the hon. member in regard to the four schemes presented by the Hon. Mr. Green at the time, though I hope to be in touch with him some time before the end of the year.

FLOODS

APPROVAL OF DAMAGE CLAIM SUBMITTED BY SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Has the Treasury Board approved the flood damage claim submitted in September by the province of Saskatchewan?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I am not aware of that, Mr. Speaker. I will make inquiries.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES AND YUKON—DEVELOPMENT OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Will the hon. gentleman be making an announcement soon with respect to the development of government in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon territory, an announcement that has been pending since 1966?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I shall be visiting Yellowknife and Whitehorse early next month and I shall make statements on those matters.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INUVIK—PROVISION OF ELECTRIC, SEWER AND WATER SERVICES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): While I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer questions asked by the hon. members for Prince Edward-Hastings and Winnipeg-North on Friday, about the situation at Inuvik. As far as the two million dollar loan requested by the municipality is concerned, the decision rests with the government of the Northwest Territories. Mr. Hodgson, the commissioner, went to Inuvik a few weeks ago to discuss this problem.

With regard to housing in this region, unfortunately there are Whites and Métis who are in the same situation as the Eskimos and the Indians.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister received any notice of the request of the municipality of Churchill to leave the province of Manitoba and become part of the Northwest Territories, apparently alarmed at what it sees going on at the present time in the city of Winnipeg?

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I was very interested in his statement, but it was very hard to make out whether or not the $2 million loan—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

• (11:50 a.m.)

The House resumed, from Monday, October 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Jack Cullen for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stanfield (p. 34).

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are two sentences in the Speech from the Throne which state a principle with which I am in very strong agreement. I would be very happy if I could be convinced that the government also believes in this principle to the point of acting on it. The sentences are to be found at page 3 of Hansard for October 23, 1969, where the throne speech is reprinted. These are the sentences:

> In addition to solving her immediate problems, Canada must be prepared to face the coming challenges of the post industrial era. This calls for a systematic appraisal of Canadian society and of the basic principles that are to guide it.

As I understand those sentences, they say to us that we must solve our immediate problems but that we must solve them on the basis of principles that will be good in the years and the decades that lie ahead. I thoroughly and very strongly agree. One of the chief complaints my colleagues and I level at the present government is that it is not using methods to solve today's problems that will suffice in the years that lie ahead. Surely we are all agreed that the major problem facing us in Canada is poverty. Formerly we used the phrase "poverty in the midst of plenty". I think what is disturbing our society today is poverty in the midst of affluence. Anyone who would presume to understand and explain all the troubles which beset our day and generation, particularly by any simple answer, would be foolish. I think it is fair to say, however, that one of the reasons there is so much unrest and unhappiness, and one of the reasons there is so much resort to violence and other ways to try to correct things, is that far too many people are poor in the midst of a society and in the midst of an age in which they are given pictures of the kind of life they could enjoy but which they are completely denied.

Poverty in the midst of affluence is sapping the spirit of far too many of our people. In a moment or two, I shall document the statement I now make, that one of the main things that is wrong today is that the gap between the poor and the rich has widened immeasurably. It has become far too wide for our society to hold together. One thing we must do is narrow that gap. We must really take steps to bring up the standard of living of those in the lower brackets rather than just go on adding to the number of those who enjoy being part of a wage or salary élite. In other words, I insist that an attack on poverty, an attack that is determined to get rid of it, an attack that it is determined to take us into the kind of day when we will not be forever talking about the poor, about the needy and about welfare cases, is what our government, our parliament and our country should be carrying out.

It is my contention that this government is talking about poverty and talking about its concern for the poor, the pensioners and so on, but really is not applying itself to this problem, to use its own concept in the Speech from the Throne, by following principles that will be any good ten, 20 or 30 years from now. As I see it, our society in this age of affluence, and this age of technological capacities that are beyond our imagination, will hold together only if people enjoy as a matter of right their share of the standard of living we are able to produce. The phrase "guaranteed annual income" is one that is kicked around. The idea that people should enjoy a standard of living as of right is one that is becoming more and more part of the language of those who talk about these problems. But the government still talks about doing things for the needy and the poor when its job should be to create the kind of society and economy in which there are no poor.

The government says it is concerned about these matters and is showing its concern by an all-out war on inflation. Last night we listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) as he beat his breast and told us how the government is fighting inflation. Why, says the minister, are we fighting inflation; it is because we want to protect the pensions of the pensioners and the position of the poor. If I were to use the sophisticated language my friend the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) sometimes uses I would just say "nuts". This is not a war on inflation that is designed to protect the poor or the pensioners because prices are still going up; the cost of living is rising faster than the pensions, and the pensioners and others who are on fixed incomes are losing their standard of living and will continue to lose it no matter what this government does. The government is using the old age pensioners and those on fixed incomes as an excuse for the kind of campaign that will keep inflation within bounds for the benefit of those at the upper levels.

As the Minister of Finance said last night, those who are strong, those who are in the upper brackets, feel somehow they will keep up with it. As a matter of fact, some people gain because of inflation. All those people do not want is for it to get out of hand. So, we have this talk of needing to protect the pensioners to give us a so-called program against inflation which is really just a case of trying to protect those at the top of the scale.

I congratulate the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for joining some of the rest of us in complaining about the 2 per cent ceiling on the increase made in the old age pension and in the Canada Pension Plan benefit in any one year. Some of us have been complaining about this since it was brought into effect in 1966. But the Leader of the Opposition is perfectly right when he puts to the Minister of Finance a question which the Minister of Finance will not answer, namely, "Is this what you have to do; do you have to depress the position of the old age pensioners in order to fight inflation?"

The position of the pensioners is not improved by having the worth of their pensions devaluated. All it does is make it possible for those who are strong, organizations like the steel companies, to strengthen their position. But those at the bottom end of the stick are not covered at all. The government says—and we heard it again last night from the Minister of Finance—that this government has done so much for the old age pensioners. He started to tell us how there was an increase from $55 to $65 and to $75 and that now those on the guaranteed income supplement are up to $105 or $109 a month. This all sounds very good. But may I point out that the gap—and this is the important thing in social terms—between the pensions of our old age pensioners and our retired civil servants, on the one hand, and those of us, on the other hand, who are on incomes that we can bargain for, or the gap between pensioners and those working, has become so much wider that this increase the government talks about really does not mean anything at all.

• (12 noon)

Let me mention a case. It will not be very popular within these walls but I shall mention it anyway. The Minister of Finance likes to talk about the pension having gone up. Yes, it has. Twenty years ago it was $40 a month. Now, if one is receiving the GIS he can get about $109 a month, an increase of $69. That sounds good. But in that same period when the pension was $40 a month—and I refer to ourselves because we are typical of what has happened in Canadian society—we were receiving a total income of $6,000 a year. We are now getting a total of $18,000. I point out that it is not just a matter of proportions, of one having gone up two and a half times and the other having gone up three times, but it is a matter of a greatly widened gap. The gap then was between $480 a year and $6,000; now the gap is between about $1,000 and $18,000. So, let the minister not stand there and beat his breast and tell us of the wonderful things the government has done for old age pensioners. In relative terms, in terms of the gap between them and society generally, the picture for them has become far worse.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I have on my desk a copy of a book called "Taxation Statistics", the 1969 edition, as published by the Department of National Revenue. As hon. members know, we get this book every year. It is full of figures which most of us have difficulty comprehending, and I am included in that group. But I am interested in a table on page 147 of this volume which is entitled, "Yearly Distribution of Taxable Returns by Income". It gives a certain amount of information for the years from 1946 to 1967. It tells how many people were reporting incomes in certain brackets for each of those years. Although those with incomes so low they are not reported are not included, I find that in 1946 there were one and a half million people reporting incomes of under $2,000, and 21 years later one and a half million is still the number of persons reporting incomes of under $3,000. So the position of those at the bottom of the income ladder has improved. In 21 years it has improved from $2,000 a year to $3,000 a year, but at the other end of the scale I find that whereas in 1946 there were only 20,000 taxpayers reporting incomes of over $10,000 a year, there are now 500,000 reporting such incomes.

I know that a case could be made on the other side by those of the chamber of commerce mentality who might say: "Look how we have improved things". That is fine. I am glad to know there are many more people receiving incomes on which they can enjoy the good and just life, and all the other kinds of lives of which mention is made. But while we have moved people of the middle and upper income brackets up to incomes that are in the stratosphere, we have still a million and a half of our people who report their incomes down at $3,000 a year or less. I submit that $3,000 a year in 1967 is less than was $2,000 in 1946.

The point I am making by these figures, and I make it in terms of relating old age pensions to other incomes, is that we have allowed the gap to widen in this country in the last 20 years. Perhaps the thing has been happening since the beginning of time, but that is no reason for us not to stop it. So long as that situation continues to exist, I say our society is in danger of falling apart and that many of the things that happen today, many of the attempts to change things in ways that are not orthodox, many of the revolts and much of the unhappiness, are due to the fact that people live in the kind of age in which they learn over radio and television, as well as in feature magazines, of an affluent and luxurious life that is available but they cannot get anywhere near it because they are still in this depressed condition down at the bottom of the ladder.

It is very much like the picture in world terms. We have done much in the last couple of decades in terms of external aid. We have given tremendous sums of money in one way or another to the developing countries, and the living standards in the developing countries have been raised. However, at the same time we have raised our own average standards in North American and in the western world to such an extent that the gap between those in the developing countries and ourselves is wider than ever. I submit that that fact is one that challenges the world, and that unless something is done about it we are in for trouble. That is another subject that some of us talk about on other occasions. I believe that our government is terribly remiss in not yet having gone up even to the 1 per cent of our gross national product for external aid to which it is committed. I think it should be at least 2 per cent. But at this particular time I am talking about Canada. I think that the most serious problem facing us is the one that I have been trying to delineate, namely that we are allowing the gap between the poor and the wealthy to get wider than ever, that this is unfair to the poor and the needy and that it is dangerous so far as our society as a whole is concerned.

I know that it is very popular to talk about these things and to say that we must do something for the poor, but this is what bothers me about it. We keep on talking about doing things for the poor, but we still leave them out there, a different group who shall always be with us. Even if someone tries to quote the Bible at me, I do not agree that they need always be with us. In my view, what we have to do is to narrow this gap even if it means getting over the notion that it can be done without affecting the rest of us. This is what most people want to do. I think the hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson) made an allusion to this yesterday, and I congratulate him on it. He said that we want to help the poor but we do not want it to cost us anything. I think there are ways in which we could bring the lower income people up to a certain level without having to cut into the incomes of those in the middle and upper brackets. I think that increasing employment, producing more goods and services—particularly the goods and services that the needy and the pensioners require—is one way to do it. However, I want to say categorically, even if I am speaking only for myself, that if we have only so much money to spend, if we have to follow this government line with which I do not agree, then we will have to re-allocate some of that money. We will have to impose higher taxes on high salaries and incomes, and on corporate wealth, so that we can increase the pensions of our old age pensioners and retired civil servants, so that we can give a better break to our war veterans, particularly those on the war veterans allowance.

Having made that reference, may I say that one of the things in the Woods report which pleased me in principle as well as because of the people who are affected—and incidentally this is something that the government has accepted in its white paper—is the recommendation that in the case of all Hong Kong veterans who can demonstrate any disability whatsoever, a 50 per cent disability pension will be awarded, which has the consequence of a full widow's pension when any of those veterans die. Actually, we learned in the Veterans Affairs Committee that this provision will cover just about all living Hong Kong veterans. I believe there are only about eight who have not established some disability and the whereabouts of some of them are beyond discovery. In spirit, therefore, what that report recommends is that those men who served in Hong Kong shall be treated as veterans virtually because they were there. Virtually because they went through the experience of those years as prisoners, they should be regarded as deserving of a 50 per cent disability pension, and their widows of a full widow's pension as a matter of right. It is a kind of guaranteed income.

I like the idea, and we will have to come to the day when we do this across the board; when we stop talking about giving money to people because they are poor, because they can meet a means or a needs test. We will have to reach the point where we say to people, "You are people; you are citizens; you are human beings. You are here as part of this modern industrial society, or post-industrial society, that can produce all kinds of wealth, and therefore you are entitled to a standard of living that is a reasonable minimum—yes, whether or not you do anything at all for it." I think this is implied in those two sentences I read at the start of my speech in which the government says that we have to make "a systematic appraisal of Canadian society and of the basic principles that are to guide it."

We will not build a new Canada or a just society for the year 2000 if in the year 2000 we are still saying, "We will give you a pension or an allowance if you are poor, if you can demonstrate that you need it." We won't hold this society together that long in that way. We will hold it together only if we achieve that equality among Canadians that says, "Because you are here, because you are Canadian, you have rights."

That is the reason that I make no apology whatsoever, even on the morning after that intemperate speech which we heard last night from the Minister of Finance, and even in the light of the things said in this House earlier this morning, for saying that what should be done right now by the government is to increase a number of these pensions about which some of us talk frequently.

The old age security pension should go up not just $1.58 a month in January; it should go up to $125 or $150 a month. The retired civil servants should have their pensions increased. In that connection, I welcome the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) and the speeches that have been made from time to time by other members of the House. These pensions should be raised in the order of 50 per cent or 60 per cent, without any question. I think that the principle which is to apply to the Hong Kong veterans might also apply to all World War I veterans still living, and their widows. Let us get away from these tests that can be applied. Let us say to people, "You belong to certain groups and you have rights." The day will come when everybody who is a Canadian has certain rights, particularly the right to a guaranteed standard of living, regardless of all other considerations.

I also think, Mr. Speaker, that something should be done about the case of those provinces which have not yet moved over to the Canada Assistance Plan where people are still on old age assistance, or in receipt of the blind person's allowance or the disabled person's allowance. Those allowances should be increased. We left them behind when we last increased the old age security pension. Previously, when we used to increase the old age security pension we used to increase those other pensions as well. Now, we have brought these disability pensions up to $75 a month, but there is no guaranteed income supplement for these people.

All of these categories should receive pension increases right now. For the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance to say, "We cannot afford to do this because we have an austerity program and we have to fight inflation" is, I think, sheer nonsense. In fact, I think I am entitled to use the word hypocrisy, because it does not solve the problems of pensioners at all to carry on this phony war against inflation. Their position is getting worse by the month and by the week.

In my view we could afford pension increases on the basis of increased employment. I think that is the way to do it. But if the government is not prepared for that and does not have the wit to devise policies that will result in increased employment, and if it says, "We have only so much money to go around," then I say do not ask the pensioners to bear the brunt of the fight against inflation.

If members of the government say they feel for pensioners, then let the government help them out right now. If that means increasing taxes at the higher income levels I am for it. If that means cutting out some of the wasteful, extravagant expenditures such as those on the Prime Minister's staff, then I am for that, too. In fact, I am sure that all governmental expenditures, as with expenditures of society as a whole, have all kinds of fat at the top, with all kinds of affluence being enjoyed by do-gooders who are concerned about the poor provided this concern does not cost them a cent, provided it does not mean a lessening of their privileged position.

I do not think this is the kind of society that will hold together, the kind of society that is satisfied to leave one and a half million people in the position that they report incomes of less than $3,000 a year, while we go on trying to put as many people as we can into a wage and salary élite. To me this is extremely important, not just because of the needs that these people face right now, but it is extremely important if we are to hold our society together.

So, Mr. Speaker, I say that I welcome this declaration of principle that the government has given us in the Speech from the Throne, its assertion that we have to solve today's problems in the light of basic principles that will guide us in the years that lie ahead. But I ask this question: Does anybody in this House of Commons think we are going to guide our society ten or 20 years from now on the basis of means tests and needs tests, on the basis of keeping thousands, perhaps millions of our people down in lower brackets while others are away up in the stratosphere?

Surely, the only principle that is going to hold our economy, our society and our people together is one which makes the declaration that we are all Canadians and we are all entitled to a certain share of the wealth we are able to produce. That means a guaranteed minimum income below which no one will be allowed to fall. That means people enjoying and having that income as a matter of right. It means getting away from the day when the best the government can do is to say to people, "We will help out and fight battles for you if you are poor." Let us stop using that language. Let us not divide ourselves between the rich and the poor. Let us all be humans. Let us all be Canadians. Let us devise policies that will make things better for Canadians now, and better for Canadians in the future.

A clear demonstration that the government believes in the two sentences that I quoted at the beginning of my remarks would be given if the government would say, "All right; right now, as a matter of right we will say to the old age pensioners, we will say to the retired civil servants, we will say to the veterans on the veterans allowance, we will say to other pensioners, 'Even though there is an austerity situation, even though there are problems you have rights. We are going to accord those rights to you by increasing your pensions, and we believe that having done so things will be better both for you and for the country as a whole.' "

If the government would respond to the plea that some of us in this House have been making across the years, and give the pension increases we have been urging, it would be a better day for our older people now, and a much better day for all our people in the Canada of the future.

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. members for Sarnia and Lapointe (Messrs. Cullen and Marceau). They performed admirably, speaking with remarkable ease in either of the two official languages.

I have great admiration for them in that respect. As for myself, I am not outstanding in that field, but I hope that someday I shall be able to speak a second language. Unfortunately, I have little time for practice now because the riding I have the honour of representing includes 90,000 people.

On the other hand, it is obvious that the four members from Prince Edward Island who represent 105,000 constituents are in a better position than I to become bilingual, if they devote their spare time to study.

Mr. Speaker, let us leave for a moment the individual ridings to consider the country as a whole. The Speech from the Throne of Thursday last contains many amendments to the just society proposed a year ago, and the numerous questions we shall have to deal with this year are evidence that last year's legislation has to be done again.

Although we intend to deal with all questions and to amend several laws, we may rightly question the results, in view of the fact that Canadians are still squeezed between a large national output, on the one hand, and accumulated surpluses as well as inadequate purchasing power, on the other hand. In order to divert people's attention, economists contradict themselves publicly about the causes of poverty in an affluent society.

Those quite knowledgeable men, and others who are less knowledgeable as well, take pleasure in classifying objectives of economic behaviour, as they say so well, in the hope of palliating structural and regional disparities and distortions. Everything is allowed to cover up the real truth and to hide from the people the true reasons for the period of unrest we are going through.

For instance, we refer to the chronic period of unemployment Canada has been experiencing for a few years as the cyclic and seasonal fluctuations of employment.

While financing charges and various taxes push upwards the prices of commodities and services essential to our survival, the people responsible for those increases tell us of plans to stabilize prices at a reasonable level.

While computers take the place of accountants and clerical workers, while machines take over from the workers in the plants, we still unfortunately find within the Canadian administration some dreamers who say that full employment is still possible.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) tries his hand at changing the meaning of words to justify his inaction with regard to the real issues and to be able to launch a mixed attack on problems that do not exist. In my opinion, the most misused word in Canada, the word that does for everything, is "inflation".

Here, I would like to refer to page 2 of Hansard, for October 23, where the following can be found:

> There are many obstacles to be overcome if we are to achieve our economic goals, but inflation is undoubtedly the most serious and the most difficult to control.

Mr. Speaker, the word "inflation" was really representative of the situation that prevailed during the war and the following years.

In fact, as most workers were then paid to destroy or to make articles intended for destruction, what was bound to happen happened. At one time there was more money in the citizens' pockets. The purchasing power was stronger, higher than the value of the products for sale. That was inflation.

Today it is different. Inflation may be the problem of the authors of the Speech from the Throne, that is the problem of a few Canadians earning $30,000 or more a year. It is certainly not the case of most Canadians.

Following the proliferation of and increase in taxes of all kinds, it is strange to hear the government make statements like the one we find in the Speech from the Throne of October 23, and I quote:

> In recent months, the government has urged both the public and the private sectors to adopt special measures to combat the dangers of inflation.

Mr. Speaker, it is easy enough to forget that taxes add to the price of goods, but we must admit that the Canadian government must have a lot of nerve to inform us of its strategy which consists in uniting all possible forces, both public and private, to fight inflation more vigorously than ever.

Mr. Speaker, can we ask 75 per cent of the families in the province of Quebec whose income is lower than $4,000 per year, the businessmen who are going bankrupt, the farmers who are forced to auction live-stock, goods and implements, the industries which are folding up, the great number of people on relief, the unemployed, to wage war against inflation?

[Mr. Godin.]

What about the 85 per cent of the Canadian population in that fight? What can they do to prevent prices from increasing?

Unfortunately, this government too often makes us believe that it does not even know why prices have gone up. I think it is time that we show some logic for, as I have already said, the Canadian problem is not one of inflation, but of plenty.

A manpower retraining program was recently launched. Small armament contracts were awarded. Subsidies were paid for winter works. Certain advantages are now given to so-called designated areas, and yet, the economic unrest is only worsening. Some ministers, some hon. members and some economists handsomely rewarded seem unaware of that, and the Canadian population is conscious of that fact and is justifiably concerned.

That is the first thing that needs to be done, and I agree with these words written by a responsible economist in the publication Ensemble on May 15, 1969:

> Mr. Alfred Rouleau, president of the Co-operation Council, stated that poverty created more poverty, that the poor no longer accepted to be deprived of essentials and that the mass media tempted them to lead an easy life while they lacked bare necessities.
> In Quebec, about 450,000 people (children included) receive public assistance and have a yearly income varying between $1,500 to $2,000, or $35 to $45 per week. Those are the people who live in the slums of our cities or on our unproductive farms. Add to them the low-income workers and farmers and you have one Quebecer out of five living in poverty.
> At first a minimum guaranteed income should be ensured to those who are not able to work and employment should be ensured to those who can work.
> In Canada, according to professor Henripin, two thirds of the poor would disappear thanks to a substantial increase in family allowances and above all thanks to the increase in the allowances according to the number and the age of the children.

Mr. Speaker, if we want to go further, an adequate policy based on our national production would allow us not to eliminate two thirds of the poor, mais to improve the lot of all the poor in our country.

Everyone must be able to make use of the advantages of progress because our society will be soundly established only if it can ensure to each and everyone of its members not only a sufficient use of the present goods but also of all those which a truly social organization is in a position to offer them. It is only when everyone's livelihood is properly assured that certain classes may begin to live in luxury and abundance.

The abuse of the right "to use and abuse" the advantages of social production is almost a spoliation and no words are strong enough to brand those responsible for it: the exploiters, the dishonest administrators.

Humanity has the right to live. This is the basic principle. To make it possible a proper distribution of wealth is necessary.

Goods are so plentiful in the world that the temporal needs so conducive to the practice of virtue should be honestly enjoyed by each and everyone of us. In the face of the affluence of goods produced by machines which replace him, man thus deprived of the means of earning his living has but a choice between hardship and affluence.

Pensions, allowances should result from gratuitous rights to a share of the production. Not from the outcome of the work of those who labour to earn their livelihood but only from the social capital made up of the social factors of production technology, and the machines of which we are all the joint heirs.

Mr. Speaker, in the third edition of Warning Democracy published in 1935, Major C. H. Douglas, had this to say about finance and industry:

> If we consider the fact that the production of goods of all kinds per unit of mechanized worker used, and if we consider also that such energy in the last 100 years has increased by 3,000 to 4,000 per cent, three things can happen. Each and everyone of us must consume 30 to 40 times more than before and further increase his consumption as soon as the energy allows an increase in the production; or we must get rid, through exports or otherwise, of our production surpluses or else we must admit that the so-called unemployment problem is a result of the progress of applied science to industry and that we must modify thoroughly our distribution system.

Jacques Maritain wrote in his book entitled Humanisme intégral, and I quote:

> The law of usus communis tends to state that, at least and first for what concerns the primary needs, the material and spiritual needs of the human being, it is advisable that people get for nothing as many things as possible.

Mr. Speaker, we consider that the family represents the vital cell of society and that the real aim of the economic activities is to ensure, from the point of view of the real human good, the resources that are necessary to family life.

Besides, if we consider that all men have an equal right to use the earthly goods, and that with regard to the primary material needs of the human being, it is advisable that people get for nothing as many things as possible on the basis of social justice.

We consider that the fruits of production today come mainly from a social capital that has accumulated for several generations, and that the fruits of the social capital should be distributed in a social way to each and every member of society as heir of this social and cultural heritage. We hold the opinion that the guarantee of a vital minimum that would cover the primary needs in food, clothing and housing is perfectly workable today, in view of the economic conditions of production and of the production capacity in Canada.

Thanks to the advent of automation, of cybernetics and the utilization of new production techniques, we consider that the productive work of man is becoming less and less necessary and is replaced by machines in factories where automation is taking over.

Since American economists and sociologists have already stated, in an open letter addressed to President Johnson, that the first condition to avoid economic and social disorder in the present state of production which frees man from work without succeeding to reemploy him usefully is to ensure unequivocally to every individual and to every family a minimum income that would be guaranteed as a right, may I be allowed to move, seconded by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe), the following subamendment:

> ... that the amendment be amended by replacing the words "of large numbers of our people" by the following: "of all Canadians by the introduction of a plan of a guaranteed minimum income."

Mr. Speaker, since the guaranteed income does not exist in Canada, the members of the Ralliement créditiste recommend that an annual income be guaranteed through the payment of a national dividend, that could represent one fifth of the gross national revenue, which amounted in 1969 to $67 billion. That would provide for security without the need to increase taxes.

I move this subamendment today because people have been talking about it for over 30 years. More recently, namely in September 1964, the Labour Gazette published the following statement from an economist, Mr. Theobald, delivered at the meeting of the 51st annual conference of the International Association of Personnel in Employment Security (IAPES) and I quote:

> The effects of cybernetics revolution will be so far-reaching and so rapid that it will be impossible to provide for full employment. In other words, the efficiency of machines will keep on increasing at such a rate that employers in the public as well as in the private sectors will find it more economical to own or rent machines than to hire workers.

At the same meeting, a guest speaker, Mr. Gilles Endicott had this to say, and I quote:

Automation is compelling us to change the basic notion that there is no salary without corresponding labour. While it may seem altogether revolutionary and contrary to the Calvinist ethics on the subject, we have to accept the principle that revenue is not necessarily related to labour.

More recently, Mr. Speaker, one could read in the Thursday, September 11 issue of Le Devoir, and I quote:

The New Democrats have rushed into print in the last few days briefs that are to be used as background material for discussions at the convention which will be held in Winnipeg, at the end of October.

This week, they published, under the signature of economist Marion Bryden, another brief on the possibility of establishing a guaranteed annual income scheme.

Further on, there is an article by Pierre-C. O'Neil, from which I quote:

Marion Bryden gives an account of the conclusions arrived at by the subcommittee of the revision committee on the NDP policies with regard to a guaranteed annual income.

The committee reaches a compromise between the negative income tax, the guaranteed minimum income and what it calls a "demogrant", that is a payment made to all citizens, every month, which would vary according to the area, the age of the individual and other factors.

Mr. Speaker, here also is an excerpt from the magazine Sept-Jours dated March 29, 1969. I quote:

The Leader of the Opposition in the Commons, Mr. Robert Stanfield, also committed his party, during the last federal elections, to the concept of a guaranteed minimum income for every citizen.

But the highlight of all those discussions comes from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), and again I quote from the magazine Sept Jours:

The federal Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. John Munro, takes great care not to commit the government in this regard; however, he does say that, as far as he is concerned, a guaranteed minimum income is probably the normal outcome of the evolution of the Canadian social security and welfare programs.

Mr. Speaker, again I say that I moved the subamendment today thinking of the 13 million Canadians who have no income and yet have to pay all sorts of taxes levied by the governments at every level.

In closing, I trust that all the hon. members who want our country to progress will give me their support.

[Mr. Godin.]

[English]

Mr. Hyl. Chappell (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, may I first add my words of praise to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne for the high standard which they set for this debate and congratulate those who have spoken since for maintaining that high standard. I hope I do not deviate from it.

I wish to speak about democracy, the need for discipline in democracy, and what we, the members, may be able to do about it.

Many important issues have been raised in the Speech from the Throne and the speeches which followed. Pollution, poverty, housing, drugs, and the cost of living are without doubt important and must be debated and dealt with in a climate of urgency. But related to each specific problem and overriding them all is our guilty realization that the average citizen feels that he is voiceless, that democracy is too remote that individuals are almost meaningless. Today people are immediately informed of the issues which we discuss here, but real participation for the vast majority never comes. This will not do.

During the last decade, we have seen upheaval everywhere. Objection and protest have often descended into violence. This lawlessness has run through labour, university students and other groups. Threats and selfish force are on the increase. Just recently we had a glimpse of chaos in Montreal.

These groups which resort to violence have one thing in common—the theory that by demonstration and destructive activity their demands will be recognized. At the moment their number is relatively small, but make no mistake, they are organized and will continue their vicious tearing at the fabric of society until stopped. Taking their lead from tactics employed by some of the large international unions they would have what they want regardless of the cost to others or even the nation. Their lawlessness and disrespect for others, often to the extent of real cruelty, is a bayonet pointed at democracy.

The strength of the protesting groups lies not so much in their physical ability to destroy as in the atmosphere that they create—namely, that they are full of ideals and are the only ones to act on them, that it is honourable to believe that the end justifies the means and that those who do not act violently for some cause are indifferent and slothful and therefore evil. They have taken advantage of democracy's freedom of speech and freedom of protest, and by adding violence they get news coverage. They have become "the read abouts", the "listened to's" and their protests and activities have become the concern of the nation. Do the leftouts join them or some equally violent opposing group, or do they make themselves heard through direct contact with us?

The ordinary law abiding citizen is coming to believe that demonstration with violence is the only way to make his argument effective. Too many are saying it is the only way to get things done. They are beginning to feel that anything short of this results in being ignored and left out of effective participation. In some parts of the country, they think that their members are far away in Ottawa and might just as well be on the moon.

Violence and disrespect for the dignity of others has always been the birthplace of dictatorship and communism. Democracy as we know it is on the brink of extinction unless we can immediately throw up barriers of effective discipline through the marshalling of moral strength. Laws are really the accepted standard of behaviour for a community, ordinarily enforced by a minimum of personnel, but this balance is upset if organized groups, determined to put their own interests above law and society, are allowed to flourish. Once we arrive at the stage where auxiliary police and troops are required, we know that democracy is embattled.

The discipline which we must produce is not more police or troops but united opinion, of people knowing they are united, and so with sufficient power and moral authority to smother out the fires of these vandals who would destroy our society.

We cannot pretend that 264 members, no matter how hard working and willing, and we are, can alone overcome what in one decade has become a sickness in the western world, but we must attack it by every means possible. One form of machinery is immediately available, the elected representatives from each riding. We must play a greater role and become recognized as knowledgeable spokesmen for this non-belligerent majority.

We call ourselves representatives of the people but are we effectively understanding and dealing with the feelings of resentment of the vast majority who are not heard, partly because of the racket of the noisy few and partly because of our failure to transmit to them what government is doing and receive from them their attitudes toward the proposals? Even ten years ago, most people were content to simply pay taxes and keep quiet, but today's informed public insists upon explanation and participation. Our choice is, do they do it through our leadership or by joining a protest group?

Some hon. members of the House may shy away from what is after all an enormous and pervasive problem, but just because it is so big and there are seemingly more immediate and great issues to which the leaders have addressed themselves, let us not refuse to face it. Time looks over his shoulder and questions our delay.

We must start somewhere to reproduce the sense of contact once felt between the member and his constituency. We no longer have ridings of 5,000 to 10,000 where each member knows his constituents by their first names, and the riding and its problems intimately. We now have ridings with diverse and conflicting problems, many of them international with local connotations. It is not possible to handle these as we did in the past.

The greatness of the democratic system is that we, the government, belong to the people. Increasingly in this day of paternalism and automation people resign themselves to the fact that they belong to us and in their resentment, some would cast aside the system and revert to more barbaric codes. It is up to us to reassert the basic greatness of the system by drawing more from the roots of the system and this must include being in and part of the riding at least one day a week. We have an obligation to go to the people. They have an obligation to come to us. We must hear from them. I want to hear from them and I know other hon. members do also. We recognize some protest is not only good, but necessary. However, we have been hearing the whines of a small minority, composed in part of a few half-baked post-graduate university students who are rapidly becoming professional agitators at our expense, and ridiculous demands from a few irresponsible labour organizers. They consist of a greedy, selfish, little minority. Now, let us hear the deep voice of the majority.

After a five day week in Ottawa, we have Saturdays and Sundays for our families and our ridings. A week end is not enough time to perform the service required, but to make it worse, while in Ottawa we are not nearly as effective as we could be because we do not have proper facilities.

By today's business standards our offices and facilities are archaic. If they were made as efficient as modern business or industry.

we could immediately become 400 per cent more effective in communicating with our ridings. It has always amazed me that democracy will spend so many millions of dollars to elect us and to keep us here, then blunt our efficiency and stifle our activity by failure to supply facilities and services commensurate with the job to be done. We do not ask these services for ourselves, but for the people we serve.

If we spent more time in our ridings we could let our constituents know that government, through their representative, is being brought to them and that they do have a voice, that they are not cut off and removed from the issues which are daily presented to them by television and press. Is it not much better that a member spend more time in his riding taking an active part in the discussion of national and local issues rather than always sitting in the House listening to what are sometimes dull and repetitive speeches, and voting like a puppet? On many occasions our votes could be registered by proxy.

Let us start with the realization that we should be in our ridings at least one day a week. It would not be our day, but their day. And better the same day for all of us, so that all of the people know that on that day government is in the ridings. If on that day we spoke to several classes of high school students and community groups we could, in a relatively short while, promote a feeling of participation and belonging, more respect for the law and government, and perhaps slow the pendulum of destructive force and, with luck, start it back.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I have sown some seeds that may grow to a new relationship between the members and the people.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, we have already done a pretty good morning's work and I wonder whether we might call it one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address you and the multitude of members of all parties who are poised to hear my few words, may I begin with congratulations to the mover and seconder. I listened to them with great interest. To the seconder I should say that in the Tracadie district of Hillsborough we do not grow blueberries so large that one or two would make a pie; we need a dozen or so and thereby, perhaps, enhance a variety of flavor in a blueberry pie which even the Saguenay might envy.

Thus far I have enjoyed this debate. I think there have been some very interesting speeches. But I was amazed to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) last night show his lack of appreciation for what occurred on Friday. Surely, he forgets that his own leader made the longest speech of the day. Should word get to his leader that he thought so little of all the speeches, then the angry spot might glow on Caesar's brow and the Minister of Finance might not be so comfortable thereafter.

It would, of course, be unusual if a member of the opposition stood up and said that the Speech from the Throne was the greatest, and I am not going to say that. It is platitudinous. But so have many of its predecessors been platitudinous. There are some things that I missed in the speech. For example, I waited expectantly to hear something about the Canada Development Corporation, but there was not a word. Methinks it might be necessary to appoint some kind of task force to find it again. I wonder where the former minister of finance is at the present time? Nor did I hear the suggestion that we work again at the harmonic elements of our national anthem. This, too, has been done before. The expression "the government" which was used in 1967 instead of "my government", has returned. The change from the pronoun to the article I do not understand. If it is meaningful, I should like to know what it means. If it means nothing, then why bother with these literary changes?

I notice that the Speech from the Throne tells us that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will announce items of legislation. Does this mean that the throne is being narrowed and the Prime Minister's perch being heightened? Probably it does. I remember that a Speech from the Throne indicated that we were heading for 60 days of decision. At that time frenetic activity was forecast. The founder of my party was a man of another type. They referred to him as "old tomorrow". I suggest this government is not even "old tomorrow" or "old next year". Perhaps in the next three years we might get something done.

The "just society" has in fact become the "just wait society". Meanwhile, we shall be showered with studies, overwhelmed with white papers and deluged with reports. Never has so much study of so many issues been done with so little result. I wonder what statistician would be able to enumerate the number of reports and white papers that are already yellowing with age within the cupboards of ministers or, perhaps, on top of or under the regional desks.

If the government would like to do some studying, I would commend to them two kinds of documents for study and consequent action. These would be the many reports that the Auditor General of Canada and the public accounts committee of this house have made. If the government will follow the recommendations and suggestions contained therein, they will have a more efficient and economic government, something to which they have claimed allegiance.

Do we really need to look further into the question of poverty to be sure of its existence and its prevalence? Is it lack of information that deterred the government from taking measures to grapple with the deep-seated economic difficulties facing the Atlantic area? It is not lack of information, sir, but lack of will. Indeed, while the phrase "regional disparity" has been discovered and lip service paid to it, the government itself to this very day does, and continues to do, things which increase that disparity and make more acute the economic difficulties of the Atlantic region.

I need point only to the city of Charlottetown in the heart of my constituency where, at the present time, the government of Canada is diminishing its operations, thus creating unemployment, cutting back the effectiveness of its governmental role and contributing to a shrinkage of the economy. Can we study our problems out of existence? I fear that the promise of a remote report is no substitute for immediate action. Studied indifference is still indifference, and to this indifference the people of Canada will not pay great tribute.

It is painful to see such a relaxed attitude in the face of so many challenges which cry out for stirring action. We live in the age of the image-makers, the hidden and perhaps well-paid persuaders. Yet, we are led to believe that the image so dominates the actuality that the people of Canada will like this approach. I have actually read in the press that this is the smartest form of government, that you can consolidate anything you are going to deliver if you deliver it in three years' time. The hope that the people of Canada will go for this yellow-light document pays little respect to their intelligence or comprehension. Do we think that the people of an intelligent, enlightened country like Canada will applaud do-nothingness for three years and then when presented with—it will not be a just society; it will have to be updated—another form of panacea for the distant future will say "aye, aye, this is it". Surely, after three years of do-nothingness a great reservoir of good will will not be built up for those seeking a public mandate.

We have reached the ultimate in the ad man's technique. I read not long ago that the efficiency of the present government was marked by the fact the cabinet was now functioning under a committee system. I have never been in a cabinet, and probably never will be, but I do know that in Sir Robert Borden's memoirs he devotes a substantial portion of a chapter to writing on the division of labour in his cabinet under the committee system. To some people all that is necessary is to say such and such a thing is new to get someone to believe this is indeed the case.

While we are concerned about lack of activity, about studied indifference and about building a wall of reports between human need and governmental action, there are one or two fronts on which the government seems positively electric with activity.

An hon. Member: Patronage.

Mr. Macquarrie: My colleague says "patronage". I am limited to 30 minutes, so cannot discuss that!

The last session ended and this one began with a zeroing-in on the Company of Young Canadians. The throne speech referred to the "rising tide of unrest, particularly among young people". The government is now to adopt a policy long since adopted by several provinces, including the province of Prince Edward Island, to extend the voting age to 18. This is right and good. But in what they are doing they are showing contempt for the committee system and the committee of which I was a member last year. The usual procedure is that committees recommend to the House. Now, the government tells the committee what to do. The vote at age 18 is good. I could not help but be very enthusiastic about this since I was early in my advocacy of this suggestion. I wonder if it is enough. It will help. But is it an adequate response to the problems which the Speech from the Throne very rightly sets out?

I was concerned when the Company of Young Canadians was brought into the discussion at the last session. There were quotations and references to acts of subversion. I agree profoundly with the leader of the New Democratic party who asks, in effect, what has happened to due process of law and where are the courts. If there are subversives in a group, it is the courts which should be in action and the matter should now be sub judice. I am not at all happy at the suggestion, that when any official casts doubt on any governmental organization young or old, we are then immediately moved into a three-pronged, two-pronged or one-pronged inquiry in respect of that organization. There may be in the Company of Young Canadians a lot of people who lack wisdom. A lot of old Canadians lack wisdom. They may make mistakes, but if they do criminal acts it is the courts which should deal with them.

What puzzles me is that here is a group of people containing only 174 volunteers, I am told, all across Canada. I may be an incredulous person, but I cannot believe that these 174 young people constitute such a threat to the 20 million people of Canada or to our political system that everything has to stop and priority has to be given to an investigation of this group. I say this because I am convinced, while there may be members of that organization who are not helpful and who are not carrying out their mandate, there are fine young people doing good jobs among the Indians and elsewhere. Does it help them to have the blanket of investigation thrown over them? The implication of the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) is that if an investigation is not enough perhaps a trusteeship is what we will have. "Trusteeship" is one of the operative words of late.

Some of the Prime Minister's recent speeches have won him plaudits in the press outside Quebec. This has given him maximum exposure on the English network of the CBC. I do not think that portion of the CBC is likely to be threatened with trusteeship. I have seen the Prime Minister on television about 11 hours over the last few weeks. It will be safe for a while. Some of the goals and values which the Prime Minister spoke about in his now famous Montreal speech before his own party are goals and values which are universally commended. Even those of us who are nobodies when we are 50 yards away from him cherish the unity of Canada and the preservation of the federal structure. He has no monopoly on this. Nor is he alone in realizing that, while Canadian federalism is a precious value it is also a frail fabric and requires constant support and much harmony and continued good will. We all know this.

So there is much approval for the Prime Minister's posture and his positive utterances in Montreal a week ago Sunday. It made excellent television, although as I watched the Prime Minister of Canada and the leader of the Parti Quebecois I thought that a stranger in our midst might well ask who was the moderate. But the value of the Prime Minister's performance cannot be measured by the intensity of the oratorical lightning or the volume of the forensic thunder. The final judgment will be on whether or not he has aided the forces of unity or by the vigour of his attack and the extreme nature of his suggestions has unwittingly, unknowingly and regrettably I am sure aided the cause which he sought to diminish. This is the question to which the answer has not yet come in. Might he not be enhancing the separatist cause by giving it such prominence? I wonder, I wonder.

I speak of separatism as the cause espoused by a lawful party in the province of Quebec. We have had in Canada many separatists. Joseph Howe was one. He came to Ottawa as a cabinet minister. Mr. Fielding was a separatist and came to Ottawa under Laurier. Mr. Riel was certainly a separatist and we have a stamp coming out next year commemorating him. But terrorism and separatism are not the same thing. On the question of the terrorists who would destroy our social values, the Prime Minister is right in his every utterance. As our leader said on Friday, all of us in this party are with him in his attitude and expressed firmness in respect thereto.

I think that those who advocate separatism are wrong. Their ideas are wrong for Quebec as well as for the rest of the country, and because Quebec is a part of my country I presume the right to say that they are wrong. No portion of the country can do other than suffer economically, spiritually and in every other way if the creation of our forefathers should be destroyed and if the act of faith which built a united Canada should prove not sufficiently strong for the stresses and strains of the 1960s and 1970s. But while they are wrong, they are not illegal, and the distinction between the separatists and the terrorists must be clearly made. We have had terror and we have had violence while Mr. Lévesque was still a Liberal and before the Union Nationale took power and long before the Company of Young Canadians was formed.

Surely, we have sufficient faith in the political processes of democracy to meet those who would divide this country in the marketplace of ideas, and surely it is our task and duty to show the values of confederation and, something which is still more important and sometimes a bit difficult to do, to make an effort to make the values greater and more attractive. I pass no judgment, but I wonder if the slashing and the threatening is in fact the best answer. It is easy to say "we will starve out Radio-Canada and, if necessary, put it under trusteeship", and that was said; I have checked the record. These are very serious dangers. Do we have to kill the patient to root out the tumor? As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) pointed out on Friday in a most able speech—which was not adequately reported, may I say since it is fashionable now to criticize the press. A government operating the broadcasting service is the last thing this country needs in this image-making age.

There are plenty of weapons at the disposal of the government for public enlightenment or propaganda. We do not want the media turned over to the government. That is a great danger which was foreseen many years ago and which was guarded against in free states with eternal vigilance. It is regrettable that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) often seems a little too ready to slip into the excesses of threat and suggestion which of themselves are dangerous to the harmony and unity of the country, even though in the days following he tends to back off, especially if he has to face someone like the president of the CBC who stands his ground. But the explanatory notes do not always catch up with the basic text which in the first place captured the national attention. It is not for me to pass judgment upon the Prime Minister, although I am coming close to it, but I would say that after the tumult, the excitement and the hurrahs of the party faithful die down, there is time for reflection as to whether this kind of sortie here, attack there and onslaught elsewhere is in fact the best kind of national leadership for this troubled country at this time.

I read an interesting editorial in the Brandon Sun entitled "Steady, There...". It reads in part as follows:

> Prime Minister Trudeau, who keeps counselling Canadians to moderation in all things, should take a bit of his own advice. The Prime Minister has thrown rather serious charges at the French language CBC, he has rebuked the French government in the strongest possible terms, and he has apparently taken rather seriously the charges that the Company of Young Canadians was involved in disturbances arising out of the Montreal police strike.
> As Robert Stanfield pointed out, neither State Secretary Gerard Pelletier nor CBC President George Davidson had given any indication that an investigation of the French CBC was necessary.

Then, I go on to the final paragraph which reads:

> Mr. Trudeau, like all politicians, must feel tempted occasionally to come out against sin. He did it over the weekend, blasting separatists and the French government. Maybe it's out of his system now.

I suppose there are those who suggest that the government is hoping through its actions to build up a reservoir of good will which perhaps will put its sister party in power in the province of Quebec and return it to power here three years hence.

In this connection I should like to read here an item on the Australian election. I read it not to make a comment on the Australian election, because I do not know the prime minister there, but because it is written by a very able and outstanding commentator who wrote the following after the near defeat of the government of Prime Minister Gorton. I think this is the kind of thing that our Prime Minister might want to hear, and perhaps officials of one of his regional desks might clip it out and hand it to him. It reads as follows:

> ...the Sydney Morning Herald said it was due to Prime Minister John G. Gorton's "slightly arrogant, impulsive one-mand-band style of leadership".

Australia is a long, long way from Canada but I wonder if human nature is all that different, and I wonder if an intelligent electorate is so different that the same result might not be vouchsafed here.

Before I sit down I would like to say a word about the subamendment which was presented to the house a short while ago. I am one of those who takes these votes very seriously. I remember some years ago when a certain great national party voted in this place for funny money because apparently they wanted to vote against us. This is not my philosophy. I am very interested in rationalizing, making more efficient and compassionate, our welfare structure. All of us should be. We are betraying our mandate if we are not.

Assurances against the ravages of grinding poverty are a responsibility of the modern state, but to go on record as advocating a guaranteed minimum income in this manner might escalate, and indeed distort, the expectations of many Canadians. I believe that a thoughtful approach must include a recognition of the important place of incentives in any reformed welfare system. So, for this reason, I cannot support the subamendment. It is not often that I suggest that I carry the judgment of my colleagues on matters of policy. I do not want to burden them with that responsibility. But it is conceivable that in this case I will not be a voice crying in the wilderness or the lone voice of truth in a great and truthful party. While I cannot support the subamendment, I appreciate its presentation in this general debate and I look forward with interest to a further elucidation from the members of the party which presented it. They will probably bring forward some ideas, short of unusual currency variations, which might further inspire us all in our concern for this important matter.

So I feel that it is only right and proper, since we should all take seriously propositions, motions and amendments that are presented to this house, to indicate at this early stage that I must part company with the members of the Ralliement Créditiste who, in my judgment, are not always wrong but have a fairly good average in that field.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, one of the intentions announced in the Throne Speech is the allocation of greater funds for regional development. These are expenditures much to be welcomed. I am sure most hon. members have had an opportunity to observe for themselves the disparities which exist between various regions of the country, and even in pockets within the same region. The government is to be commended for its continuing attempts to bring equal opportunity to all citizens, no matter where they may live. Concern about regional economic disparities is not new in Canada. It has occupied the attention of previous governments, and this government is placing increasing emphasis on the problem. Some of our developmental programs are almost a decade old. The time has arrived for an evaluation of their effectiveness. In some cases a basic reshaping of organization structure may be desirable.

I understand and accept that it will take many years to bring certain regions to an acceptable social and economic level. In many cases, the time required will be several generations. Those who expect immediate and permanent results expect the impossible. I do not suggest that we search to see if the desired ends of regional development are being attained. It may be too early to make an accurate assessment on this point. However, certain basic patterns are emerging from our various developmental programs. We can see these trends and we can project them. It is important that we make these observations and projections now to ensure that the ends of the regional development program are met in the shortest possible time.

We have had experience with various programs in the province of Alberta. Several of these are located in my riding and I shall concern myself chiefly with them. However, I should say that from discussions I have had with other hon. members, from having served on the Standing Committee on Regional Development during the last session of parliament and from my own research, my conclusions can apply to regional development programs throughout Canada.

I wish to deal first with the ARDA program. It is one of our oldest plans for regional development. It was conceived by a previous government. Large sums of money have been allocated to it and many people who should have been assisted under the program held high hopes for it. The avowed ends of the program are good. It promised an eventual end to rural poverty. In this day, when we are blinded by the magnitude of the problems of urban Canada, the first picture which becomes obscure is that of the poor farm family. ARDA promised eventual relief for such families, through programs designed to rehabilitate and re-establish certain rural people into effective employment and income opportunities.

ARDA activities in the constituency of Rocky Mountain are taking place in the area known as Census Division 14. The main current project is entitled "The Rural Development Program in Census Division 14." As with other ARDA programs, it is a joint federal-provincial program, with provincial employees providing the necessary administration.

The first ARDA activity in Census Division 14 started in 1963. Local people were encouraged to get involved. ARDA planners stated that all projects would be started only by local initiative and that eventually local residents would handle their own plans and devise their own solutions to problems. Many people became interested and did become involved. Many ideas and potential solutions to problems were offered. However, few have been implemented.

The high hopes have turned to frustrations. People no longer wish to be involved; they are disillusioned and dissatisfied. Even those persons who were originally the staunchest supporters of ARDA are now among its most vocal detractors. Today, many people in the ARDA area consider ARDA a giant hoax that has been perpetrated in order to provide employment for a few planners and sociologists. Under these circumstances, when such suspicion exists, the prospect of successful implementation of plans, regardless of their origin, is, to say the least, remote.

There are three reasons for the lack of success of ARDA, wherever such lack of success is evident. The first and most basic of these reasons is insufficient concern for people. ARDA planners often seem to be planning for the sake of planning. They do not plan in order to help people. The individual is lost in the concept of a plan.

The second reason is the failure of ARDA planners to respond to the voiced and demonstrated needs of people, of groups, of communities. The felt needs, when made known to ARDA officials, have been largely ignored.

The third cause of ARDA ineffectiveness is the rapidity with which ARDA officials seek escape from criticism under the shelter which any federal-provincial cost sharing program inevitably provides. Let me describe some of the situations which give me cause to be critical of the operation of a program which, if properly administered, would not or should not attract criticism.

The first of the disquieting cases which has been brought to my attention involves a farm couple, both of whom are nearing 60 years of age. For nine years they had lived on, and operated, a small farm. They believed that if they could clear a small additional acreage they could thereafter maintain themselves in comfort by operating a small dairy herd. An application was made to ARDA for assistance with the clearing costs, but ARDA officials decided that, rather than provide funds for clearing, the small farm which the couple owned would be purchased and they would be relocated on a more suitable site. If that were impossible, then the couple were to be placed on a scheme described as early retirement.

ARDA paid $5,200 for the small farm, and after a portion of this amount was used to clear debts against the title there was appreciably less than the purchase price left in the hands of the farmer. Having now found themselves without a farm, and with only a few thousand dollars, the couple again contacted ARDA. It was then that they were told that the early retirment plan was nothing other than welfare payments. In addition, they were told that ARDA would not relocate them on another farm because they were considered too old to be starting a business. Nevertheless, the couple tried for some time to get established in other areas, but lack of resources prevented them from doing so. What I have described is certainly a case in which ARDA, rather than improving the social and economic situation of the couple involved, has contributed to a worsening of it.

In another instance, a young farmer who held a well-paying job in addition to farming a small farm was encouraged to enlarge his farm holdings. He was assured by ARDA officers that the enlarged farm would be economical and that he would be able to support his family adequately from it, and from it alone. Having received this assurance, and having been advised that ARDA would assist in procuring the additional farm land he required, he left his outside employment to devote all his efforts to establishing his farm on a better basis. Six months later ARDA officers advised him that, having reconsidered his plans, they would not now assist him in enlarging his operation as they thought it economically unfeasible. There is no reason for me to detail further the resulting implications for this farmer.

In neither of the foregoing cases was any thought given to the people involved, their needs or their feelings. There are many other such instances which I could describe. One other case deserves mention.

Some time ago the federal government committed the sum of $378,000 to assist in land clearing operations in Census Division 14. The provincial government was to match this amount. More than two years ago ARDA officials started taking applications from farmers who wished assistance to clear land.

These farmers were encouraged to commence the clearing they desired. Many farmers applied for the assistance, paid the $25 application fee and were told to begin clearing. Hundreds of acres were opened as a result. However, when the time came to pay for the clearing no funds were forthcoming. Farmers were told by ARDA officials that minor details still had to be cleared up, and that Ottawa was blocking progress.

Every opportunity was seized to place the blame on the federal government which, in fact, had nothing to do with the problem. However, because ARDA officials could hide behind the jurisdictional shield they could avoid pressure from the affected individuals. After many months of waiting, some land-clearing contractors finally took legal action against a number of farmers for the amounts owing for land clearing, and because farmers were primarily responsible to the clearing contractors many farmers had their existence threatened through seizure proceedings.

Lately Alberta ARDA officials have placed a veil of secrecy around the land clearing program and although I am told that the clearing which had been completed has now been paid for, I have not been able to find evidence of this. Perhaps I should not say that there is no evidence. The farmers who had made applications for assistance have now been approached and are being asked to pay an additional application fee of $25 because, so it is said, the $25 they paid two years ago when applications were first taken was only a deposit.

The land clearing program is to be one of the chief ARDA efforts at improving the condition of agriculture in Census Division 14. It is a program which, in fact, could help many farmers. However, many who could be helped will actually not receive any benefit because the planners who conceived of the land clearing program failed to recognize all the aspects of the scheme, and now having hardened their thoughts on it refuse, in typical bureaucratic fashion, to respond to the sound suggestions for improvement made by the people who will be affected. In order to receive assistance in land clearing, a farmer must provide a small portion of the cost himself. Although this portion is small, to the farmer whom the plan is intended to benefit, it represents in many cases all the capital resources that he can muster. The result is that, having brought more land into a useable state, the farmer cannot use it because he has expended all his capital and does not have any available to invest in the livestock or machinery which may be necessary to make economic use of the new land.

Many persons have suggested that in order for the land clearing program to be fully effective it should go hand in hand with another program to assist farmers, through provision of credit or otherwise where necessary, for the purchase of livestock or machinery or whatever may be necessary, to put the newly cleared land into full productive use. It is pointed out that if new grazing land is cleared, it is of little value if the owner does not have the capital to purchase the cattle to graze on it. However, in spite of such obviously sound suggestions, ARDA officials refuse to budge from their own concepts of the plan.

The local people who still maintain hope for the success of ARDA are doing all in their power to make it work. The advisory council, composed of people from all walks of life and from throughout the ARDA area, are always looking for ways in which permanent social and economic benefits can be brought to the individual and the community through ARDA. However, of late everything is being stalled by what is being described by ARDA officials as a lack of money. Mr. Speaker, this is hard to believe when one realizes that almost $7 million has been committed in this ARDA area and very little of it has yet been spent. Furthermore, no government cut-backs in ARDA spending have been or are likely to be made. The only conclusion at which one can arrive is that bureaucratic inefficiency, tardiness and reluctance on the part of some planners to accept ideas other than their own, are being covered up by allegations that no money is being provided for the ARDA projects.

One other situation causes me concern. In our regional development programs we tend to emphasize what we have done rather than what remains to be done. We have accomplished nothing compared to what remains before us. However, even more disturbing are attempts to hold out as evidence of a successful program, accomplishments in which ARDA was but slightly instrumental. Several days ago I met an acquaintance of some years who is a successful farmer within the ARDA area. He previously farmed a relatively small holding and held other fulltime employment. About two years ago a large corporation purchased his small farm for a proposed pulp mill. As a result, he obtained sufficient capital to be able to acquire a new and larger farm elsewhere. He chose an area within Census Division 14 and approached ARDA for assistance in assembling the necessary land. ARDA provided this assistance but it was hardly crucial. The individual involved could very well have made all the necessary arrangements, financial and otherwise, on his own. Now, however, this farm is a show place for ARDA. It includes a new, modern house and other necessary farm buildings. Anyone, such as visiting parliamentarians, who wishes to see what ARDA has accomplished is directed by ARDA officials to this farm.

Not very far away on another farm is a large billboard proclaiming the ARDA program in the area. It is very conspicuously placed near a large tract of newly cleared land, creating the impression that ARDA is responsible for this progress. There is no sign to rectify this false impression, pointing out that the owner's own resources provided the new land. False fronts may be necessary in the motion picture industry, but they have no part to play in the war on poverty. We must concentrate every effort on doing all that yet remains undone. Energy must not be dissipated in congratulating ourselves on our few achievements, real or imagined.

With that caution, let me now turn to an ARDA program which has proven worth while. I do so simply to support a later argument. Between Calgary and Banff is situated the reserve of the Stoney Indians. It is a magnificent setting, a broad, flat expanse of land lying at the foot of the Rockies. The Trans-Canada highway bisects it. By all measures, it is an ideal locale for a large tourist-recreational development. Some of the Indian leaders saw this possibility and with the aid of ARDA funds, a consulting firm was employed to study the feasibility and devise a plan for a major tourist development. The plan is now complete. It envisages a development which will result in a bright future for the Indian people on this reserve. The residents of the Stoney reserve look forward hopefully to the day when the plans can be implemented. It is to be hoped that ARDA will make substantial funds available for this project, just as it did for the initial study.

The point which I believe emerges in the difference between the expenditure of ARDA funds in the Stoney Indian situation and the expenditure of funds in Census Division 14 is that in the former case ARDA simply provided funds but was not involved in the administration. I might note that even in Census Division 14 there are a number of ARDA programs which are producing tangible results. One of these is a retraining program. In this case ARDA is simply paying the cost of retraining individuals to enable them to obtain better employment. Again, the administrative involvement of ARDA in this program is minimal.

It is my belief, Mr. Speaker, if the money we spend on ARDA is to be put to the best use and is to result in benefits to the people whom it is intended to benefit, then the administrative participation of ARDA in these programs, both at the federal and provincial level, must be kept to a minimum. Arrangements must be worked out which will prevent the "buck passing" which now exists, and the ideas and suggestions of the people affected must be implemented by the people themselves.

There is one other phase of our regional development plan which gives me concern, Mr. Speaker. This is the type of development provided for under the Regional Development Incentive Act and which was previously provided for under the ARDA program. It is intended to increase employment opportunities in areas of the country which lack such opportunities. Generally, these are areas where unemployment is high and the average earnings are low. It is hoped that by encouraging industry to locate in these areas the income levels will gradually be raised so that eventually the disparity between such a region and its wealthier neighbours will be erased, or at least narrowed. It is now becoming clear that this is not always the case, and that in fact in many cases the establishment of industry in a designated area or region results in the solidifying or enlargement of the economic gap.

Let me explain, Mr. Speaker, how I arrive at this conclusion. When an industry, with the aid of taxpayers' money, establishes in a slow growth area the wage scales in the area are generally low. Many industries take advantage of this, as they can because of the high rate of unemployment and the scarcity of jobs, by paying wages only slightly above the local level but very much below the national average for the particular industry. Indeed, I know of cases in which the difference being paid to an employee doing the same work is in excess of one dollar per hour. That is, an employee in a plant in a designated area may be receiving $1.60 or $1.65 per hour, whereas an employee of the same firm doing the same job in a plant located in a wealthier region may be getting $2.60 or $2.80 an hour. Even productivity is not the catch in some of these cases because it can be shown that the plants within the designated areas are equally or more productive than their counterparts elsewhere.

The undeniable conclusion is that many industries have taken advantage of the incentives being provided to locate in slow growth areas and are now doing their best to maintain the lowest possible wage scales. The result is that disparities are not being corrected. In some cases a study of wage settlements show that some employees of industry in designated areas are earning less now, in terms of constant dollars, than they were three or four years ago. Wage increases in some of these plants have been, on an average, only 10 cents an hour, whereas in many cases employees in the same industry elsewhere have received over the same period increases of between 60 cents and $1.00 per hour. The result is that disparities have become greater.

We must begin to realize that industry is accepting incentives and tax concessions but is not always accepting the responsibility of maintaining and providing adequate economic situations for its employees. Often an industry which has been encouraged to come to an area by incentives is the largest employer in the area. Because of this, it has a captive labour force and thereby is able to keep wages to a minimum.

We must take a serious look at some of the situations we have seen developing. I recognize the jurisdictional difficulties in dealing with industrial matters within the provinces. However, it must be our role to point out to industries accepting incentives that they must play a role in the battle against regional disparities by adopting a positive position rather than taking advantage of the situation to increase profits while preserving an inequitable wage structure.

One further situation which I believe deserves comment is the shortage of housing in communities which have attracted industries through one or other of the incentive programs. I have within my riding one industry which was established under such a program and it has given indication that it must close its operation because there is insufficient or inadequate housing for its employees. While I recognize that housing cannot properly come within the scope of the regional development plan, some avenue must be sought through which those communities which would benefit under the plan do not lose such benefits. At the same time, we must make certain that taxpayers do not lose the value of funds expended on the incentive program through the closing of industries as a result of lack of adequate housing.

I believe the programs of this government are right, Mr. Speaker. They are designed to strike at the problems which this country faces. However, we must always guard against the possibility that in the implementation of policies sight is lost of their purpose.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I have no wish to repeat criticisms already made about the position of the government, as revealed in the Speech from the Throne. To many westerners, the speech was notably lacking in concern for their part of Canada, empty of expressions of confidence in this country's tremendous potential and excessively pre-occupied with matters to which I, as a member of parliament and taxpayer, would not assign top priority.

It is now obvious that, having been in office for one year and a half, this administration is either incapable of recognizing today's major problem or disinterested in tacking it. I believe, together with many other Canadians, that the great problem facing our country right now is how we are to obtain the means to support our apparently insatiable appetite for so-called free services. The problem of Canadians is this: how are they to tailor their tastes to suit their purses. Over the past six or seven years, we have allowed the old emphasis on progressive national expansion and development to die away and have replaced it with a sick obsession. We are obsessed with refinements of the complete welfare state.

However desirable certain social welfare measures may be—and I am thinking of measures like the universal pension plan, hospitalization as well as medicare—they are always and inevitably exceedingly expensive. Not only is their initial cost tremendous, but they follow a historical pattern of rapid escalation in cost. The result is that a plan that was supportable when initiated in one year, becomes an intolerable financial burden through rapidly rising costs in the next year.

It seems to me that the path of wisdom and financial responsibility lies in undertaking only that which you are reasonably certain you can pay for without being driven either into bankruptcy or into the position of carrying a crippling load of debt. The average Canadian family no doubt wants a car; perhaps it wants a second car, a new colour TV set, and so on. Perhaps the wife wants a fur coat and the husband new golf clubs. The children may want assorted expensive luxuries. But I am convinced that the average Canadian family, while it may want all these things desperately, will only commit itself to buying them when it has the means at hand. Today, when some member of the family wants a special item, the wife goes out to work to acquire the means of buying it or the husband may moonlight with the same aim in mind. One way or another, through exercising personal decision and initiative, the family decides that if it wants something badly enough it must take steps to acquire more means with which to buy the desired object. My chief criticism of the Pearson government, and the government that has succeeded it, is that they bought everything in sight without taking the precaution of increasing their means. We have been guilty of self indulgence. We went for every brightly packaged scheme the federal government offered, without bothering to remember that not one of them was free and that they were all possible only through vast outlays of tax money.

There are only two or three ways of getting more tax money of which I know: you either raise rates on the existing tax base, which means that you invent new and ever more burdensome taxes, or you do what is most sensible, expand your tax base. The latter point is the one upon which Canada ought to have been concentrating. That is the meaning and purpose of national development. We Canadians must develop our economy so that it will yield more taxes without taxation becoming more burdensome. The great fault of this government lies in its having all but given up a positive policy of national development in favour of firefighting, emergency economic measures.

Canadians want and need greater and more expensive educational facilities and greatly improved health facilities. Canadians want to overcome and need to overcome poverty. These are all estimable desires and are no doubt necessary. But, and it is a big but, all these aims are very expensive of attainment and all must be paid for by public funds.

We see today what unnecessary friction and dispute can be caused when vastly expensive schemes grow beyond the point where it is feasible to cut them back or control them. The provinces are charged with the administration of these schemes. Their tax revenue is inadequate and they seek more from the federal government. The federal government must retain the lion's share of its tax revenues for its own particular purposes. The federal government and the provinces wrangle; they argue and exchange bitter reproaches. Even those creatures of the provinces, the municipalities, get into the act because they are at the bottom of the heap and more hard pressed for tax revenue than any level of government. Such an atmosphere makes cooperative endeavours all but impossible and as a result of such bitterness and frustration, regionalism and separatism flourish. The nation as a whole suffers. In Canada today, we must aim at putting ourselves in the position of having our cake and eating it, too. We should develop this nation to the point where it will yield sufficient tax money to carry any tax supported project the majority of Canadians may desire.

But to do this we need leadership at the federal heart of the country. We need to be given a national purpose, with national goals and a national direction. Today, such leadership is clearly lacking. Canadians are gradually retreating into their regional shells, being suspicious of their fellows, sensitive to imagined slights and ready to magnify any grievance. This atmosphere of suspicion, distrust and inertia is the great sin of this government. It has set party advantage and personal enthusiasms above the national good. It operates on a basis of personal and political expediency. This government is guilty on many counts, but on none so clearly as on the count of neglecting Canada's agricultural industry. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this neglect has reached a point where it has become a very real threat to a part of the national economy that cannot be allowed to die without dealing the whole national economy a devastating blow.

We in this chamber are familiar with the crisis in grain sales. The government has known about it in intimate detail for more than 18 months. The government has been strangely languid in its approach to this problem. However, it did pay sufficient attention to it to set up various task forces, study groups and councils to look into it. In fact, it is this crisis to which the west owes the distinction of a visit from our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It is true this visit was a mixed success but it was free of the hysterical excitement that was a feature of his election campaign trail. Nevertheless he came and, if he failed to conquer, at least he saw for himself.

Unfortunately, the result of all this attention has been precisely zero. The western grain producer has been deluged with advice, laved in criticism, lectured and ignored. He is still waiting for some practical and sensible government action that will give him the hope he needs to enable him to hang on and tough it out. It is a strange attitude for a national government of a country whose agricultural community accounts for about $1 in every $8 of foreign trade and pays about $1 in every $10 of income tax.

If the social planners who appear to dominate this government regard the agricultural community as passé and something that should be allowed to die out, surely their colleagues among the economists of government—and this government must have some of those around—can see that agriculture and the agricultural community is vital to Canada, both socially and economically. They must realize the number of industrial jobs in central Canada directly dependent upon western grain production. They must know of the railway workers, the dock workers, the brokerage firms and dozens of service businesses who depend in large part for their prosperity upon the health and progress of agriculture.

Yet all we find in the throne speech is a promise to bring in the Canada Grain Act for amendment at some time, as though this would, by itself, in the twinkling of an eye, rectify everything. What is needed is far more than mere tinkering with the Canada Grain Act. The industry must be examined, as a whole and in all its parts.

The evolution of grain production in Canada is a story of tremendous technological and scientific development at the level of production on the farm within an old, inflexible and unchanging framework of storage, distribution and marketing. The western grain producer long ago graduated from horse-drawn equipment to modern machines but the handling, transportation and marketing line upon which his economic success depends remains in the days of the horse and buggy. Grain handling has become a question of grain storage. This is where the plug is in the line and until we can devise ways of speeding up the evacuation and sale of grain, the farmer will continue to bear the brunt of slack times.

Just today the minister who answers for the Wheat Board stated that the rapeseed and flax crops would be speeded to market. This is one of the few bright spots in the grain economy at this time. As the result of a failure of the crop in Europe, the minister was able to assure the House that the delivery of the rapeseed and flax to the ocean ports would be on time.

A couple of weeks ago, according to some western newspapers, some doubts were expressed by the trade as to whether this could be accomplished. There is some evidence that some small sales of flax may have been missed by not having the grain at the port from which it would be shipped. In addition, on the west coast there is the problem of loading ships with grain for shipment to China.

The Richardson Weekly Grain Market Letter of October 23, 1969, sets out the terms of the settlement which avoided the holding up of grain shipments to China. It states:

> This will not interfere with wheat shipments to China as they provide their own boats, but exporters are having a great deal of difficulty chartering suitable ocean freight for other destinations because of the low repute in which the port of Vancouver is held by vessel owners.

Another way in which the grain industry in western Canada must be helped is to ensure that the port handling facilities can deliver on time. The elevator operators could not care less if the grain moves. They receive a steady income. The railways and the shipping interests can scramble for other business. Only the farmer is tied to the grain and when it does not move, he does not get paid.

As I mentioned previously, Mr. Speaker, this Speech from the Throne is an uninspiring document reflecting an uninspiring government. I notice that mention is again made in it to the necessity of emphasizing the government's bilingual and bicultural program. I will not thresh old straw. Everything that could be said about this program was said at the time of the debate on the official languages bill. I will simply recall my warning given at that time that this program, couched in the uncompromising terms in which it is and backed with untimely and ill-considered vigour, will do more to disunite than unite Canadians.

Already it has strained our slim reserve of good will. One need only look at the sort of thing that happened in the tiny town of Willow Bunch in Saskatchewan to realize that the picture of the relationship of ethnic groups within our multi-ethnic society is not either as simple or as easy to resolve as the Prime Minister and his colleagues would have us believe.

In closing, I should like merely to reiterate my belief that the nation's business has been set by this government on the wrong course. We should be looking outward, not continually inward. We should be pressing expansion of Canadian society and Canada's economy in every way possible, not hobbling it with regulations and inhibiting it with non-essential expenditures.

We are still young. Let us avoid being brainwashed into believeing we are prematurely old. Let us behave like a young and vigorous nation with boundless horizons before us, not like a nation that has passed its prime and seeks only to eke out an existence.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the question of Arctic sovereignty. I intend to speak generally of the north, particularly the high Arctic, and of pollution, which is a matter closely associated with the question of sovereignty before us today, pollution of water, land and air. These are matters of concern to all men. I must apologise to the House for sounding like a northern raven when I speak; I am afraid I have a cold. I am sorry that my hon. friends in the New Democratic party have not found a cure for colds. They have found a cure for all other ills known to man, so I do not know why they have overlooked the common cold.

Mr. Thomson: We are working on it.

Mr. St. Pierre: Thank you. I should like to consider, in the time available to me, several aspects of the affairs of the north and I intend later in my remarks to make two specific recommendations for immediate government action in this regard. First, though, I wish to take the opportunity to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau). The hon. member for Lapointe discussed blueberries in his area. One blueberry makes a pie, he tells us. I recognized there the remark of a truly honest man. He would do very well in Coast Chilcotin, because we have similar ideas. Whatever we may say, we always adhere to the truth.

I recall one man from Coast Chilcotin who visited Ontario on one occasion and spoke at great length about the height of the mountains, the growth of the timber and the expanse of the lakes in the country from which he came. After some little while his host drove him to Niagara Falls. "I suppose you have something like that in Coast Chilcotin, too?" he asked. As I say, the man from Coast Chilcotin was a very honest man. He thought for a long time before replying: "No, we don't have anything like that. But we have plumbers who can fix it." Always be honest, Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Lapointe.

Before dealing with questions affecting the Arctic I should also like to make a few general comments upon the Speech from the Throne. Last year, when I first spoke in this House, I complained about the careless spending habits of governments in recent years. I said this one had yet to prove itself. I suppose it has still to prove itself, and will be doing so for its whole term of office, however long that may be. But it does seem only fair to congratulate this government on having the political courage to trim its spending to its income.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) told the House yesterday that he expects to keep spending well below government income in the present fiscal year. This is not easily done. It is not easy for a government to trim 25,000 jobs from the civil service lists. But it needed to be done. I am one who feels that the duty of government is to govern, however unpleasant the decisions it must make may sometimes be. I sense that this government is showing the necessary courage and forethought.

I should also like to make a few observations on another aspect of government, one with which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) dealt during the last election campaign. He spoke of the necessity of the federal representatives retrieving some of the power of decision-making which had fallen into the hands of the bureaucracy. As a general observation in this respect I must say that the Prime Minister and his government still have a long way to go. In the long run this government and this parliament may be judged by the degree of success they achieve in taking the power to make decisions back from the mandarins. It is my personal feeling that the remedy may lie not in the green chamber, where debates frequently tend to be set pieces and highly partisan, but in the all-party parliamentary committees; it is these committees which may provide the instrument for operation against the overweening arrogance of some sections of the bureaucracy.

Now, let me turn to the north. The north is at this moment awakening from a long sleep and we shall not be able to order it back to sleep. Things are happening there which offer great opportunities for Canada, as well as great responsibilities and considerable danger. We cannot wish them away. We cannot say: it is too soon, we are not ready to develop the Arctic; give us 20 years to prepare for this expansion. I believe Arctic affairs entered upon a new era with the discovery of the Prudhoe Bay oilfields in Alaska. No one knows the full extent of this deposit. It amounts to at least ten billion barrels and there are probably fifty billion barrels in the reserve. Indeed, there may be 300 billion barrels, which would amount to more than all the oil ever discovered in the continental United States.

What about Canada's share? The government is involved with private industry in the Panarctic Syndicate. At the Arctic symposium held in Montreal in March of this year, one authority estimated Canadian Arctic reserves at no less than 50 to 100 billion barrels of oil and 300 to 500 trillion cubic feet of gas. To quote Mr. R. A. Hemstock of Imperial Oil Limited, the oil industry generally will then become involved in operations of the following order: the drilling of between 700 and 1,400 exploratory wells and of between 6,000 and 12,000 development wells the construction of 4,000 miles of access road, 4,000 miles of trunk road and 8,000 miles of gathering lines in addition to camps, towns, airfields and support facilities for a working population of 10,000. All this in an environment which was once considered so hostile to man that we more or less wrote it off as uninhabitable. In some of the areas now under exploration even the ingenious Eskimo cannot survive. So far, Panarctic Development has completed two wells. It is significant that in sinking the second well they hit hydrocarbons, a gas deposit. Those who travelled to the Sabine Peninsula with the standing committee concerned with northern development two months ago are not likely to forget the sight of that gas well blazing out over the desolate tundra of the Arctic.

Here, I might digress for just a moment. It is interesting that most of this Panarctic exploration is concentrated at Melville Island. In 1820 when Edward Parry wintered his ships at the southern end of this island he built a small handcart and led a group of sailors to the north shore. In his journal, written at the time, he noted that when the iron wheels of the cart struck the shale in some areas the shale gave off the smell of petroleum. This was in 1820. It has taken us a long time to put down the first drill.

There is another interesting feature connected with this exploration by Parry. No European visited the island again for 30 years, in fact, until the search for Sir John Franklin in the 1850's. And there, 30 years later, when McLintock visited the island, the marks of Parry's little handcart were still discernible in the soil. Here, too, there is a lesson for us: the Arctic ecology is very frail.

The United States government is showing an awareness of this fact. The permit for the construction of the pipeline from Prudhoe Bay to the southern terminus on the southern coast of Alaska must contain some of the most stringent regulations ever established in this field. I have the document here and I shall read just a few of these conditions. The company has to post a $5 million bond from which any environmental damage would be made good as far as possible. Any areas disturbed must be repaired as far as practicable. The company must file a detailed contingency plan for controlling oil spills and pipe line leaks. The government may require the realignment or modification of pipelines to meet unforeseen environmental conditions. The pipeline may have to be re-routed around areas with unstable soil conditions. Great care must be taken to avoid melting the permafrost. Passages for fish must be provided in all cases where a pipeline crosses a stream; it must be buried underground, not laid on the stream bed. Construction may be halted to protect key wildlife areas during seasonal nesting activities and fish migration.

There is more, but clearly the United States government is showing an awareness of the dangers of development in the north and Alaska. This is one of the dimensions of the problem which we Canadians will have to consider, and consider very soon. It could affect our own territory very shortly, particularly if, in addition to the Alaskan pipeline, we see a pipeline coming down the Mackenzie to bring Prudhoe Bay oil, and hopefully Canadian oil, to the markets in the centre of the continent.

There are other methods of moving oil which are under consideration. There might be a pipeline across barren land to the port of Churchill on Hudson Bay. Canada's Herschel Island might become a sea port for Prudhoe Bay crude. But what has caught our attention most of all during the past year has been the Manhattan project.

I am not going to go into the details because I think hon. members are quite familiar with them. An amount of $39 million has been spent by a consortium of oil companies, headed by Humble Oil, to see whether a specially strengthened United States supertanker could smash its way through the barrier of ice that lies in the Northwest Passage. A subcommittee of our own Standing Committee on Northern Development went north in August to meet the Manhattan and to welcome the initiative taken. As the record shows, we pointedly welcomed them to Canadian waters, with the accent on "Canadian" waters.

At the moment the Manhattan voyage appears to have been a partial success only. The hope and expectation was that this heavily strengthened ship could smash the ice barrier in McClure Strait. The plans of Humble Oil were gigantic in scope. If this experiment were successful, then by the second quarter of next year, 1970, the company expected to let contracts for 250,000 ton supertankers. Their long range goal was to have two of these tankers a week pass through the Northwest Passage, 52 weeks a year.

To what extent their enthusiasm has been moderated by the experience in the north, I cannot say. However, we must note that the Manhattan did not succeed in forcing her way through the polar pack ice in the McClure Strait. In fact, she behaved pretty much in the manner that our own coast guard people predicted; she became beset, and the John A. Macdonald, a Canadian icebreaker, had to free the vessel. She then sailed south through the Prince of Wales channel and, to the surprise of nobody, got through in that way to the opposite side of the archipelago. But it has been an exploit and will add very considerably to scientific knowledge of ice conditions. Again, we should congratulate the spirit of enterprise of those concerned, and we look forward to the time when this valuable information about ice will become available to us.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, since Canada's attention, as so often, has focussed on the deeds of people of other nations, I do not suppose that many Canadians noticed that it was a Canadian ship the Chesley A. Crosbie, which this year scored another notable first in the north by sailing to within 500 miles of the geographic north pole. This is the farthest that any commercial vessel has penetrated north of the North American continent.

The shipment of dry cargo is one matter. Quite another is the shipment of oil. It is this continuing Manhattan project—it is continuing as far as we know—which also poses, in addition to the great opportunity provided if the project is successful, a major danger to the Canadian Arctic. Many ships have been lost in the Arctic, invariably in the same manner. They become beset by the ice. They are nipped by the ice and, when released by the movement of the ice away from the sides of the ship, they sink.

To lose a tanker containing a quarter of a million tons of pollutant in the form of crude oil in the Arctic would be a disaster greater than any man-made disaster of this kind the world has ever seen. But what I wish particularly to draw to the attention of both the members of the government and members in all parts of the house is that we really do not know how bad the situation would be since there has been a complete lack of research into the subject.

The waters of the passage range in temperature from 27 to 31 degrees Fahrenheit. A little closer to the continental shelf the temperature is between 33 and 35 degrees. However, we do not know what will be the action of crude oil spilled into water of this temperature.

It is suggested that oil spilling out into water of this temperature would probably form a gelatinous mass. When it reached the shoreline, where it might be exposed to temperatures of 50 below, it might turn into a hard plastic. The only information that I have been able to find as to its behaviour is that this pollution might last for decades, and possibly for centuries. Most crudes contain poisons, some of which are as lethal as DDT.

I did say, Mr. Speaker, that I had two subjects to which I intended to draw the government's attention and urge immediate action, and this is one of them. I suggest that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources should immediately institute a full program of research in Arctic waters using Prudhoe Bay crude oil to provide us with a body of fact. Since we are the nation most immediately concerned in this matter, ours is the government which should initiate such studies.

This is not a question that we should turn over to other nations or leave to the investigation of private companies. The government should ascertain as early as possible precisely what is the result when crude oil, and especially Arctic crude oil, is spilt in sub-freezing temperatures.

My second point is associated with the first one, and I will make it now. What is the potential of our Arctic fisheries resource? We have known for years that there are a great many species of mammals and fish in the Arctic waters. Many Eskimos have formed co-operatives and are canning some of these sea foods for sale in the south. But how great is this particular resource? Is it over exploited or, as is more probable, under exploited? Might there not be room for considerable expansion of this industry?

I questioned the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) about this in the fisheries committee last year, and his answer was to the effect that, as far as he knew, Canada had never surveyed the fisheries resources of the Arctic. We simply do not know how extensive are these resources in Canada's third ocean. I suggest to the minister that now is the time to make this discovery, and to do so not simply for the immediate benefit that an extension of Eskimo fishing operations would bring. It may be that in this regard Canada will become engaged in debate in the United Nations or elsewhere. Our people will want to speak of the value of our marine resources in the Arctic, and our case will scarcely be strengthened if we have to admit publicly that we really do not know what they are. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, these two departments of government can and should be undertaking this valuable service with all possible speed.

These are just a couple of aspects of Canada's great duty to protect this area of our country, and this, of course, inseparably involves sovereignty. The waters within the archipelago are Canadian waters, and we must make this clear to the world community.

I suggest there are two things we must make clear. First, we must make clear that we welcome commercial shipping in these waters, as we have always welcomed such shipping in Canadian waters. It would be intolerable if it were suggested that this country close the passage to the shipping of the world, assuming that such passage were made possible by modern day technology.

[Mr. St. Pierre.]

But simultaneously we must point out that this nation will decide what constitutes innocent passage and that we will close the passage to vessels likely to cause intolerable damage to the waters or land of Canada. Perhaps in the United Nations we shall see developed a new régime for oil shipments on the world's oceans. I hope so. It is needed. The Prime Minister has indicated that his government will press for this and I think we should welcome the Prime Minister's statement. However, the possibility of such a development does not relieve the government of its clear responsibility to give its prime attention to Canada's sovereign seas. The prime duty of this or any other government is to act first in what it conceives to be Canada's national interest. Of course, we must have among us who will say, nay. I note in an edition of a Toronto paper for December 16 that the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) is reported as suggesting Canada should declare these waters to be hers. He is quoted as saying:

> Our legal experts tell us we wouldn't have a chance before the International Court at The Hague.

When he refers to "our legal experts" I wonder whether he is speaking perhaps of the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson who, on October 21 at a NATO meeting in Washington, said:

> Permanent ice should be assimiliated with permanent land. The government would be well advised to do the utmost to ensure that Canada has control in the Arctic, especially since it is possible that nuclear weapons will be deployed there.

Or perhaps he was speaking of Dean George Curtis who, on behalf of the Canadian government, made extensive investigations in respect of our land sovereignty in the early fifties at the time the DEW line was being started. When speaking before the Canadian Bar Association in Ottawa he said that Canada had a very strong case for drawing base lines around the tips of these islands and declaring them to be Canadian waters. I could go on to deal with the remarks of Dean Cohen and others who have spoken on this subject. There is no certainty in these matters. There is never any certainty in matters of international law or in any legal matter. I am satisfied, however, that our position is very, very strong.

There is not time for me to review the many theories on international law, but they are numerous. There is the hinterland theory from the Greenland case. There is the Norwegian system which permits the drawing of base lines around the Arctic archipelago. There are the rights of exploration, discovery and continuous and effective occupation. Neither is the case of Indonesia comparable with our Arctic archipelago, although we are told the United States leans toward that view. Indonesia is an ocean archipelago. In our case, the Arctic is an extension of the continental land mass. International shipping has moved for a thousand years through the Indonesian islands. International shipping has never moved through the Canadian Arctic without the Canadian government's knowledge and, frequently, with Canadian government assistance as indeed was the case when the John A. Macdonald accompanied the Manhattan.

It is suggested that the United States government would hail us before the international court. They would seem to be in a rather poor position to do so because the United States subscribes to The Hague court with a proviso, the Connolly amendment. I am sure if they chose to take this stand it would not take this parliament long to pass its own reservation, its own Connolly amendment. It is suggested that the United States government might favour using another nation to serve as its running dog in this situation. But what nation? Norway? Hardly, in view of the fact that it has a base line system. What nation then—Japan, Peru? Perhaps. I am convinced it is not only in the Canadian national interest particularly but in the interest of the United States government and all governments that Canada should control these waters. The best and only sure control is to make it clear to the world that they are ours.

The Prime Minister has spoken of a three-pronged action—legislation to establish conservation regulations in northern Canada, a statement on Canadian sovereignty and, finally, the inducement of the United Nations to act. Like many members on both sides of this House I eagerly await the details, but since in the last session I was critical of what I considered to be government inaction or even indifference I now wish to express a feeling of gratification at the considerable progress shown to date. I think it is also most gratifying that members of this House, and Canadians generally, are showing keen interest in our vast northern territories.

In closing, I should like to quote from the journals of Warburton Pike, a sportsman who spent much time on the barren lands at the turn of the century. One of the quotations is this:

> A dweller in cities is too wrapped up in the works of man to have much respect left for the works of God, and to him the loneliness of forest and mountain, lake and river, must ever appear but a weary desolation.

Probably this feeling pervades in much of Canada although, as I say, there have been some encouraging signs of genuine interest by Canadians in the vast northern reaches of our land. The second quotation I believe in some sense might answer those who say that the Arctic is far away; it is cold, inhospitable and really what value can it have. I suppose the answer is that beauty is in the eye of the beholder. Pike had an Indian guide named Saltatha who was approached by a missionary priest. This is Saltatha's answer to the priest:

> My father, you have spoken well; you have told me that Heaven is very beautiful; tell me now one thing more. Is it more beautiful than the country of the musk-ox in summer, where sometimes the mist blows over the lakes, and sometimes the water is blue, and the loons cry very often? That is beautiful; and if Heaven is still more beautiful, my heart will be glad, and I shall be content to rest there till I am very old.

I thank hon. members for their courteous attention, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (3:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all warmly congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau), with whom I am better acquainted.

While listening last night to the laudatory comments on their speeches, I understood that there certainly will be a most valuable pool of candidates at the next convention for the leadership of the liberal party. There is no doubt in my mind about that.

I would also take this opportunity to congratulate my leader for his excellent speech a few days ago. I have read carefully the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and I am under the clear impression that it is full of good intentions.

Of course we would have preferred to find in it very concrete and valuable information. We get the answer that details will be given in the white papers which will be presented during the session. So we shall continue to hope for a few months.

At the beginning of my remarks I would like to take the opportunity to congratulate the Prime Minister for his recent decision to appoint an ambassador to the Vatican. Indeed I have long realized the justification for such a move.

I have heard or read the speeches of other members whom I would like to congratulate for having expressed their views and presented to the house the needs of their constituents. Some parts of the Speech from the Throne deal more particularly with my area or constituency and I wish to make a few comments about them.

Firstly, I would have liked, as so many others in Canada, to see my constituency included in the designated area program. I thought I had made sufficient representations to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who was co-operative and provided me with a very interesting file. Indeed, following thorough studies and information given me about my constituency, I had thought that would be enough to warrant the designation of my constituency.

Of course some arguments were put forward to me, such as the economic consequences of the vicinity of the city of Montreal. Indeed, that city is 40 miles away. Those consequences were valid while Expo was on, but today, they are not. As for the international airport which could be beneficial to my constituency, I am quite sure that we will only feel the advantages of that project, in three, four or five years.

Until such difficult years are upon us, I would have liked the reasons for our representations to be considered as valid. I still hope that, through further representations, the government and the minister will agree to come back on their decision and to grant to my region this advantage that other regions already possess.

There is something also about housing. The matter was discussed throughout the last session. I am convinced that the measures referred to in this house last year will not be sufficient to give the building industry the push it needs.

Last year, it was suggested to facilitate loans and to set easier terms for repayment. I think that, as long as this loathed 11 per cent sales tax on building material is maintained, the problem is not seriously faced.

This tax is very heavy today for those who want to build a house of their own. Moreover, as long as no serious thought is given to granting loans for housing at a rate of 5 to 6 per cent to workers who earn $10,000 or less a year, the government can dream up a number of measures, publish fine White papers in which it offers ever more attractive loan and repayment facilities that may extend over a period of 40 years, without however giving to those who earn from $5,000 to $10,000 a year the opportunity to own their own house.

I am also wondering if the government is taking these considerations seriously, since I raised the matter last year. Furthermore, other hon. members spoke about it last night and the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) referred to it.

Therefore, I do not see how on a short term basis it is possible to get the construction industry going again. We should think more of the pride that the worker takes in owning his own house. He very often becomes quite another man in the community. To own one's home is at the same time being able to take part in the social activities of his parish or of his riding. That could help the worker to become more useful to society.

I think the government should examine the possibility of granting loans for housing at 5 or 6 per cent interest and, if necessary, of making up the difference between those interest rates and the prevailing rates. Since the building industry affects a large percentage of Canadian workers, a higher employment rate would bring more taxes to the government.

Last year, I had hoped, when we debated a non confidence motion on unemployment, that the people drawing unemployment insurance benefits would become more productive.

Though regretfully I must recognize that this system is now spoiling a generation. It is unthinkable to continue to increase unemployment insurance benefits and to leave those people unemployed when municipalities are in a precarious financial situation with insufficient funds. It seems to me that the government should intervene and that such a proposal could be studied by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). Municipalities could avail themselves of the services of those men who would get a weekly pay without having to spend a cent.

Very often municipalities—in my region as elsewhere—have work to be done. Their main concern is always the same: the budget.

• (3:50 p.m.)

I wonder if it would not be a commendable and profitable gesture for our country to allow our municipalities to put those men to work at no cost at all. Those who would be inclined to refuse work would not deserve to be paid and we know very well that most of those who collect unemployment insurance benefits and welfare allowances are able-bodied and willing to work.

In so doing, we would help our municipalities carry out some projects. In fact, there are in my area several rivers which are an eyesore because their banks are poorly maintained. We could fix them up, perhaps not as well as those of the Rideau canal, so that tourists might be tempted to visit our municipalities a little more often. That would also represent an extra asset for the municipality.

I think this is a suggestion that should be taken into consideration by the government, in order to make a high percentage of our workers more active than they are now, because if the government claims that it is better to pay them for doing nothing, I still think most members would nevertheless wish that such action be taken. I dare hope they will support me in this.

The throne speech also dealt with reforms in the welfare system. I imagine that there are many things to be done. We are told that the forthcoming white paper will bring us the answer. I think every member of my party, including myself would like nothing better than to discuss this matter thoroughly and to undertake sweeping changes.

I must not forget to mention the importance in my constituency of the tobacco industry.

Tobacco growing is a feature of my constituency where are to be found 90 per cent of the cigarette tobacco producers in the province. Many things have been said on the subject of tobacco. The producers in my region are really worried and rightly so. I was informed after the sale of tobacco last Friday that so far prices have declined from 2¢ to 3¢ a pound, due to the fact that companies feel uneasy following the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) last year.

The Committee has met several times and some people have acknowledged the danger created by smoking while others have tried to prove the opposite. One thing is certain, we know a lot of people who never smoked as well as smokers who died of cancer. Of course 80 per cent of the people who die of cancer are smokers, as 95 per cent of the Canadian people smoke.

However, the leaders of the Tobacco Growers Association assure me that they are definitely prepared to negotiate, to discuss and even to help the government, in every instance where an improvement could be made. In my opinion, the goodwill shown by the tobacco producers deserves a special consideration from the government.

What has particularly surprised me is the attitude of the government as a whole in this regard. During a trip which I made in New Brunswick with the committee on agriculture, the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Lévesque, assured us that he could count on further appropriations to improve the soil for tobacco growing and to extend the lands. I congratulate him on his efforts to promote that interesting industry, which moreover does nothing but benefit the Department of National Revenue.

However, the Minister of National Health and Welfare goes to great lengths to frighten people by telling them that tobacco may produce cancer, and I fail to understand the attitude of the government because it is prepared to allocate additional funds to improve tobacco farming while at the same time advising people to quit smoking.

I wonder what is the opinion of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Côté) about this, especially when earnings of the tobacco industry are reported close to $500 million. Of course, it is a noble gesture for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to stand up for public health. I would agree with him if an attack could be launched against abuses that may lead to cancer.

Tobacco is not necessarily the only form of abuse. It is the case also of alcoholic beverages and so on. It is surprising to note that people singled out one industry which after all represents several millions of dollars. Everyone knows that the Tobacco Producers' Association is prepared to negotiate with the government and to co-operate with it in every way.

Therefore, I urge the government to show a more responsible attitude. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) must agree to continue the promotion of the product, if justified, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare must come to an agreement with the Minister of Agriculture; finally, the Minister of National Revenue must tell us what the Canadian tobacco industry is worth in terms of dollars.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that an important industry in my riding will no longer be harassed. If, unfortunately, tomorrow morning tobacco should no longer be in use in Canada, I would want the government to find a solution for all the producers in my area and for those in Ontario who are in greater number.

I hope that the government will accept to deal with this question a little more seriously than it did last year. Co-operation must exist between the Departments of Agriculture, National Revenue and National Health and Welfare.

I will take the liberty to give my opinion after spending one year in the house. As many other hon. members, I probably had to listen to some lengthy and sterile debates in order to bring about changes in our procedure, some of which were excellent. We even limited some debates which had not made me sick anyway.

Goodwill should also accompany those reforms and those measures. As an individual, before coming to parliament, I heard all sorts of observations. The people often seemed to have lost confidence in their elected, because of protracted debates and representative flippant speeches.

In addition, some members reneged on some of their commitments. It is always easy to make promises on platforms, but once in the house it is at times difficult to work objectively. Sometimes, it is difficult for some members to support good legislative measures.

I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that in the coming session, the Canadian parliament will regain the confidence of the electorate. I should like parliament to be more practical and especially more objective. I hope that we will all work together in this house as administrators and not as politicians.

What I said publicly I shall repeat here in this house: We must work with objectivity and uphold the truth more often. We will need a lot of courage. I cannot accept that we should limit ourselves to politics in this house. I feel that there is room for politics during election campaigns. So much the worse for those who overdo it, so much the worse for those who deal especially in the political outbidding.

I dare hope and believe that some day we will see, in Canadian parliament, a courageous and serious opposition that can support the good measures which the government introduces. I also hope that the government will respect and accept the suggestions of the opposition that could improve the proposed legislation.

[Mr. La Salle.]

If in all fairness, we took that stand, we would make good the promises that we made during the electoral campaign. It is perhaps the great fault of parliament of lacking objectivity at the right moment. Therefore, I venture to think that it will be possible to show such objectivity not only in the interest of the members but also of society.

I wonder if one can go as far as to say that the interest of society must come before that of the party. Personally, I would be inclined to think so and I am ready to devote my time to safeguard, first, the interest of society through a political party which grants me the right to speak in order to defend the aspirations of my constituents.

When I speak about objectivity I do not mean that we must abstain from saying what must be said in this house.

In this speech from the throne, many problems are mentioned. There is one perhaps that was not brought up, through lack of courage or fear of causing disunity in the country. The problem facing Canada is that of Quebec. Perhaps it would be easier not to mention it in order to avoid more or less laudatory remarks, but this would also show a lack of frankness and of courage. There is between Quebec and Ottawa a link which could not be defined during the last session, even with the great promise of a just society.

What is a just society? This concept may be difficult to define, but I think that attempts are made every day to find its true meaning.

The problem of Quebec is surely quite as important as any other. Indeed, it is a constitutional problem which was hardly mentioned in the speech from the throne. We wonder if the time has not come to concern ourselves with the status of Quebec within confederation. We should put to work to the committee appointed to set up the basis of a new constitution. I believe the time has come to settle the matter with objectivity and to discuss it in all good faith here in this house, as well as with our colleagues from the other provinces. People should no longer be led to believe that here, in Quebec, there is only a minority eager to have a new constitution which will define, once and for all, the place of Quebec and its aspirations, as well as the guarantees of its fulfilment within the Canadian nation.

No one dares acknowledge that Quebec is in a particular situation. At least, no one seems to be willing to raise the subject in the house lest it should hurt the feelings of certain members. Some venture to say that there is in Quebec a group of independentists or "pequists".

It has often been alleged, in press conferences, for instance, in order to reassure the rest of the country, that they were nothing but a few people of no importance at all. I truly believe that what they call in Quebec the third provincial party is something quite serious. This is likely to be a matter of wonder for some, of concern for others.

We have three parties in Quebec and that hostility which might have been due to the question of the new constitution has been with us for the past ten years. One may reproach Quebec—and the federal government through its prime minister, for whom I have much respect, often did so—for not knowing where it is going as far as the constitution is concerned.

The Quebec government, through all its premiers has quite often stated its position on the constitutional question since 1960.

Quite recently, working papers on the constitutional question were made public. Moreover, the Quebec government had the opportunity of expressing its views very clearly on educational radio, pollution, mining rights, international relations and medicare.

Then, why would a storm burst so often on the question which has been asked on numerous occasions during the years 1960-62: what does Quebec want?

Attacking some personalities in the Quebec government, ministers or public servants, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did a few days ago in Montreal, on the pretence that these ministers or public servants are alone responsible for all the federal-provincial problems, is, I think, a major mistake. Such a mistake is all the more serious as it was committed by the Prime Minister of Canada himself, a man whom I would have expected to be better informed and less prejudiced.

We must not forget that the re-exoneration of the present federal system is not done by a few people only but rather by a major section of the population, and this remains a continuing concern for Quebecers, no matter who is in power in Quebec city.

The constitution has been challenged for several years now and it is pure stubbornness to refuse to face the facts and to think that only a few people in Quebec want a reform in depth of the constitution.

Of course many observers think that the present government won the elections in the rest of the country by implying that it was necessary "to put Quebec in its place".

The only question I ask the government is: "What really is Quebec's place within Confederation?"

A few days ago dangerous words perhaps were said in Montreal in a flight of oratory. Quebec as it is today has been described in somber and tragic colours and everybody has been condemned indiscriminately. The attack on the legally constituted authorities in Quebec and in the City of Montreal has worried more people than it has reassured.

Much publicity was given to those who want to divide Canada while, in the same breath, it was being said that those people represented a very small minority of the population. If such is the case, why does the Prime Minister give so much attention to the matter? On the other hand, if this group is really large, one has the right to ask whose fault it is.

Quebec as it is today definitely refuses to accept the interpretation that is being given to the Canadian constitution. That may be annoying to the government and it has proclaimed throughout English Canada that it would control Quebec and would put it in its place. I suggest that the matter must be discussed in this house, in the most objective manner possible, because Quebec refuses to yield in spite of those comments.

Under such circumstances, I understand the impatience of the federal government as well as that of the provincial government and the citizens of that province.

Allow me to say a few words about the Quebec-France agreements.

The Canadian government is acting today as if it were sorry to have agreed in 1965 to the establishment of direct relations between Quebec and France. Did it perhaps feel then that those France-Quebec agreements would be of no consequence?

We realize today that those agreements have become quite important, precisely because they meet the needs of Quebecers.

The government of Canada is worried about that. It would like to take over the whole matter, while the agreement concluded with France in 1965 aimed precisely at easier and more direct relations between Quebec and France.

The government of Quebec has been accused of picking quarrels over protocol. I wonder how to characterize the attitude of the present government which would like any French minister or official who intends to visit Quebec to go and bow in Ottawa, even when it is not necessary.

I am very anxious to get explanations about this. Could there be one law for one's friends and another for one's foes? I would like to know.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, before closing, I should like to ask again for the drafting of a new constitution in which would be enshrined the guarantees needed if the citizens of Quebec are to prosper. I therefore demand that a special debate be held on this subject during this session and that a free vote be taken then.

I rely, of course, on the support of Quebec members to give a clear and faithful explanation of the particular situation prevailing in the province of Quebec and of Quebec's special needs. Being assured of their good faith—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must point out to him that his time is over, unless the house agrees to let him go on—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues for having granted me two more minutes. This is all the time I need to round up my speech.

I therefore request that we hold a special debate in this house, Mr. Speaker, not only for the benefit of Quebec but also for the benefit of the whole of Canada. I feel that we should have the courage and sincerity to discuss quite openly with our colleagues from the other provinces the importance of this constitution in the interest of Canada and of Quebec. To refuse this debate which would be bound to enlighten the minds of Quebecers as well as of Canadians, would be to agree with those who already imagine that Quebec's sovereignty would be a solution to the problems of that province. I hope that those remarks will be of a kind to produce positive and favourable results.

I said that I was relying on the support of the hon. members from the province of Quebec who understand better than anyone here in this House the importance of defining, once and for all, the role of the province of Quebec in Canada.

[Mr. La Salle.]

In my opinion, it would be beneficial to the province of Quebec to remain part of Canada. I am one of those who believe that Canada will also benefit by it. The province of Quebec will then remain one of the fair provinces of this country. However, one would need courage and objectivity to study that question and to define it precisely, for the matter of a new constitution has been discussed for ten years. We are growing impatient, and the present situation, for those who dream of the independence of the province of Quebec, is perhaps the result of that too long awaited reply which never comes from the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, I have made those remarks, imbued with great objectivity—at least that is my opinion—in the belief that I was serving not only my province, but also my country.

[English]

Mr. David Weatherhead (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to take part in this debate today, and along with previous speakers I should like to add my congratulations to my friends and colleagues, the hon. members for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and Lapointe (Mr. Marceau), upon their excellent speeches in moving and seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

The two main problems in my riding of Scarborough West and in most of the country are the high cost of living and a high level of taxation. I was, therefore, happy to hear the government reiterate in the Speech from the Throne its determination to continue unabated its fight against inflation. We all know how the burden of inflation falls most heavily on those who depend on low and fairly fixed incomes, particularly pensioners, wage earners with weak bargaining powers, persons on welfare, as well as others who are unable to increase their incomes.

The new Prices and Incomes Commission appointed by our government a few months ago has been busy meeting with representatives of labour unions, business organizations as well as the federal and provincial governments to try to work out a scheme of voluntary restraints involving about 5 per cent for wage increases and 2 per cent for price increases. I certainly approve, as an example of restraint in spending, the federal government's recently announced policy, the aim of which is that there will be 25,000 fewer public service employees, mostly as a result of normal retirement, resignations, etc.; that the armed forces will be cut from about 98,000 to between 80,000 and 85,000 men and that some bases around the country will be closed. The defence spending cuts will keep defence expenditures within a $1.8 billion ceiling, which represents about 17 per cent of our total expenditures.

Spokesmen for organized labour stated last week that wage restraints would not be acceptable. It is natural that they would be very reluctant to agree to wage restraints until they see some evidence first of a moderation in prices, rents, interest rates and other costs.

It does appear from what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said in the House last night that the monetary and fiscal policies of the government are beginning to have the desired effect of reducing inflation. However, the inflation psychology is still in evidence and it is certainly to be hoped that a broad form of voluntary restraint of wage and price expectations in all segments of the public will come about. There is no question that wage controls—and you could not have one without the other—are inherently very distasteful and extremely difficult to enforce. However, if the ever increasing cost of living is not soon checked, I believe our federal government will have to consider seriously commencing consultations with the provinces—which have the constitutional jurisdiction over price and wage controls, except in wartime—to decide on the best way of implementing such controls.

With respect to high taxes, the public has a difficult time differentiating between the taxes levied by the different levels of government. In metropolitan Toronto, our municipal taxes for municipal and school purposes are a heavy burden on the homeowner of modest means. Here, our Provincial Liberal party is advocating that 80 per cent of education taxes should be paid from general provincial revenues. Such a policy would reduce school taxes in Scarborough by about two thirds. The 5 per cent provincial sales tax affects people on modest incomes much more than it affects those with higher incomes. On the federal level, the freezing of expenditures in most government departments, as well as the reduction in the public service and the armed forces above mentioned, will reduce the amount of income and other taxes that would otherwise be needed. However, it is expected the white paper on tax reform, to be released on November 7, will contain many proposals which will make our federal tax laws more fair and equitable. We are all waiting eagerly for this report.

The Speech from the Throne also mentioned the issuing of a government white paper on social security in the next few months. In this regard, the future of family allowances has been speculated upon. In my second report to my constituents last June one of the queries in the attached questionnaire concerned family allowances. A great number of constituents replied, and 30 per cent were in favour of cutting off family allowances to those families earning more than $7,500; 30 per cent wanted to leave the allowances as they are now; 20 per cent wanted to abolish them completely and 20 per cent wanted them increased or had other comments. Since some $600 million is spent annually on this program, it is natural and wise that it be reviewed. However, as a father of five small children, I know how my wife looks forward to her monthly family allowance cheque; and from the heavy correspondence on the subject that I received from the riding I firmly believe that most of the moneys now being paid as family allowances are being spent wisely by the mothers concerned for food, clothing and school supplies for their children. At this time I would, therefore, be very reluctant to see any substantial change in family allowances unless new government policies adequately compensate families of modest means in particular.

We have heard much in recent months about various guaranteed income schemes, and I certainly hope that the white paper on social security will make particular recommendations with regard to this. I must confess that a year or two ago it seemed to me that a guaranteed income plan would only be possible at some distant date. However, I now believe that Canada cannot afford to wait long for such a plan. It is absolutely essential that we should provide a sufficiently high minimum to give every Canadian the opportunity of a decent standard of living, along with the maximum incentives to encourage recipients to seek work and training.

A year old experiment in New Jersey with negative income tax using 400 families appears to have been successful and is an improvement over their current welfare system. The experiment will continue for three years and eventually involve 1,000 families. Under that plan, a family of four is receiving $3,000 from the government if it earns no income at all; $2,500 from the government if it earns $1,000, for a total income of $3,500;

$2,000 from the government if it earns $2,000, for a total income of $4,000 etc., until the point is reached where it will receive no additional moneys from the government at all if it makes $6,000 a year or more.

The recent plan of President Nixon is somewhat more modest. It gives a maximum payment of $1,600 to a family, with aid ceasing after the family's total earnings reach $3,920 a year. As a result of the New Jersey experiment, it is estimated that the cost of a similar plan for Canada will run at between $1.5 billion and $2 billion above our current welfare programs. This is certainly a great deal of money; it is about the total cost of our annual defence spending. A more modest plan would cost less and a considerable amount of money could come from greatly reduced federal government spending on family allowances and Canada assistance plans, which now total about $1 billion.

Accordingly, I believe that as soon as our fight against inflation is won, which one way or another should be fairly soon, we should immediately proceed with a guaranteed income plan that combines maximum incentives to work with obtaining retraining, an adequate income base being guaranteed by the government. At the same time, the proposals of the white paper on social security will give us the opportunity to re-arrange and rationalize our many diverse and overlapping welfare programs. Many of these programs could be eliminated or partly replaced by a new guaranteed income scheme. However, there still would be some Canadians, because of physical or mental handicaps, that would require additional welfare over any guaranteed income base, and so it is not realistic at all to state that a guaranteed income plan would replace all of our current welfare programs.

A guaranteed income plan, no matter how good, will not in itself eradicate poverty. The hundreds of millions of dollars the federal government gives to the provinces toward post-secondary education, its student loan policy which give the opportunities of higher education to almost all who can benefit from same, combined with the excellent occupational retraining and manpower mobility programs of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, are additional requirements. The new incentive programs of our Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the underdeveloped areas of our country are also very necessary. However, these various federal policies, combined with a guaranteed income plan, would go a long way toward the discontinuance of the poverty cycle in these underdeveloped areas and among the disadvantaged groups of peoples, including the urban poor in Canada, where it now exists.

The plan indicated by the federal government to transform its unemployment insurance system into a more broadly based income maintenance program, and to add nearly one million Canadians to those eligible for benefits, would supplement and possibly supplant some of the guaranteed income plan ideas. Out of a labour force of 8.1 million, some 6 million are now covered by unemployment insurance and the proposed new coverage would increase the coverage to 7 million. Some 200,000 to 600,000 receive benefits every month.

At present, only workers earning up to $7,800 are covered and are required to pay weekly contributions. Under the new plan, it is understood that the ceiling will be raised to include employees receiving much higher incomes, perhaps all salaried persons no matter how high their pay. As the Toronto Daily Star said in their lead editorial yesterday:

> This means in effect a new tax on the well-to-do for the benefit of the poor. Contributions from higher income specialists and executives who are rarely out of work or in need of help will swell the unemployment insurance fund for the benefit of lower paid workers for whom unemployment is a real threat.

The added revenue obtained in this way would make it possible to increase the now too low benefits paid to those who are out of work and would also make it possible to extend the maximum period for which benefits can be received beyond the present period of 52 weeks. The apparently proposed addition of sickness and maternity leave benefits would also be most welcome.

While a general guaranteed income plan will have to wait until the fight against inflation has been won, I can see no reason why the old age security and guaranteed income supplement to our senior citizens cannot at least be increased annually at the same rate as the cost of living. I do not think I am being inconsistent in advocating this while agreeing with anti-inflationary measures in general. The Throne Speech reiterated the necessity of increased government spending in regional development programs and those dealing with our Indians and Eskimos. I believe increased pensions to our senior citizens are of equal urgency.

Certainly, we should not overlook the fact that by bringing down the qualifying age over the last five years from 70 to 65 as of January 1, 1970, our government has benefited a great number of our senior citizens. Of course, the Canada Pension Plan is greatly benefiting more and more of those people reaching 65. The old age security pension of $79.58 as of next January 1 is received by some 1,600,000 Canadians and some 780,000 of them receive additional moneys through the guaranteed income supplement which in January will give our senior citizens a maximum of $111.41 a month. However, at present, the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement can only be increased 2 per cent a year, while the increase in the cost of living recently has been considerably greater. Accordingly, I believe that as a minimum the necessary legislation should be amended to allow an annual increase in these pensions of at least the same percentage as the annual increase in the cost of living.

A general guaranteed annual income plan discussed earlier would particularly benefit our senior citizens and this is one of the reasons I believe it should not be long delayed. However, if the dangers of inflation prevent it from being initiated soon, I would think that the present amounts of the old age security and guaranteed income supplements paid to our senior citizens should be reconsidered. An increase in our old age security pension of $10 across the board to the 1,600,000 receiving same would mean $190 million more that would have to be paid from the federal treasury.

While this might have some advantages politically, it would be giving considerable money, in total, to those of our senior citizens who are fairly well off, and who would not really need it. Such an across the board increase of, say, $10 would also make little appreciable difference to those who depend entirely on the old age security and guaranteed income supplement. Accordingly, I believe that along with automatic, annual increases in both the old age security and guaranteed income supplement to completely cover annual increases in the cost of living, the government should increase the maximum of the guaranteed income supplement by $25 a month.

Such an increase in the guaranteed income supplement would cost the federal treasury between $120 million and $150 million a year, but it would be received by approximately a half million senior citizens who are in most need, those who have really no other income. However, it was these people 65 years and over and those approaching that age who did so much to build and develop our great land, who made sacrifices in the two wars, went through the depression and had so much to do with our post-1945 economic expansion. I firmly believe that we have an obligation to more adequately take care of them.

I believe also that the federal government, in its capacity as an employer, has a special obligation to increase the pensions of its retired civil servants, particularly those who have been retired for a number of years and who are trying to keep body and soul together on pitifully small pensions. These people directly worked for the good of our country over long and difficult years. Our government would not only be giving them well-deserved help by increasing their pensions, but would be leading the way, by example, in persuading the provincial and municipal governments as well as private businesses to do the same for their retired employees.

During the summer recess I had the privilege, as a member of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, of taking part for three weeks in the hearings on the government's white paper on the report of the Woods Commission on the Canadian Pension Commission. There are about 950,000 veterans in Canada, of whom about 166,000, including widows, receive disability benefits under the Canadian Pension Act. Of the 148 recommendations of the Woods Commission, the government in its white paper accepted all but 30 in whole or in part. A new and more independent appeal division, the granting of basic 50 per cent minimum pensions to all Hong Kong veterans who have any disability at all, additional payments to the multiple disabled, a broader "benefit of doubt" clause with respect to evidence of disability presented by veterans, are some of the proposals contained in this white paper.

While we have held 23 meetings and heard 57 witnesses from the Department of Veterans Affairs, the commission and all the major national veterans' associations, we intend to hear considerable more evidence before preparing a report or reports. I have been very impressed with the high calibre of these witnesses and their devotion to the needs of their former comrades. I am sure I can speak for every member of our committee when I say that our minds are still open and we will carefully consider all the evidence and representations before preparing our final reports.

There are very important items in the Speech from the Throne which I shall not have time to discuss in any detail this afternoon. Perhaps a few can be mentioned, however. Water pollution is a subject of increasing concern across the country and though much of the constitutional responsibility for its control lies with the provinces, the proposed Canada water act which would designate as a water quality management area any body of water in which there is a significant national interest and provide fines of up to $5,000 for every offence, will help co-ordinate the fight against water pollution in this country.

In the course of my speech during the budget debate last June I discussed in considerable detail the need for the federal government to continue to take an active interest in policies designed to promote new housing in our large urban areas. I personally praised the many amendments to the National Housing Act which we passed last spring. These, together with the amendments to the regulations, should help considerably in this regard. I was happy to read in the Speech from the Throne of the government's commitment to seeing that one million new housing units are built in the course of the next five years and that particular attention is to be paid to satisfying the housing needs of low income families. Latest figures show that we are presently ahead of last year's pace in housing starts and there is every indication that these will total more than the required 200,000 for 1969 by the end of the year.

The discovery of an enormous oil field near Prudhoe Bay in Alaska and, more particularly, the voyage of the United States Manhattan through the islands of the Canadian Arctic have brought home to us the tremendous potential of our Arctic resources. Some concern has been expressed as to whether we have been exercising our sovereignty over these territories. However, both the Speech from the Throne and the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during this debate last Friday show clearly that there is absolutely no question as to our sovereign rights, not only over the islands of the Arctic archipelago but over the continental shelf which lies under the water between them. The Prime Minister also made it clear that the government is determined to take every step necessary to protect the natural environment of the Arctic waters from pollution by foreign ships.

[Mr. Weatherhead.]

Nor have I had the time in which to discuss new consumer protection legislation dealing with packaging and labelling standards, the identification of fibre-content in textiles and compulsory safety requirements for autos, including exhaust controls. Similarly, the subject of imminent new legislation having to do with wire-tapping, bail and the Expropriation Act reforms might have been discussed in some detail—and these are only a few of the many important matters dealt with in the Speech from the Throne.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the government on proposing the reduction of the voting age to 18 years. I had the privilege last year of being invited to many of the schools in my riding to discuss issues with the students, and of playing host to many classes from our schools when they visited Ottawa to see parliament in action. I found the students well-informed, inquisitive and intelligent, with a real concern about the problems and injustices in the world. Decreasing the voting age to 18 will mean that some 1,200,000 more young people will be entitled to vote. Classes in civics, political science and related subjects in high school will now become more meaningful and from the age of 18 our young people will, from now on, exert a significant influence on Canadian governments and policies. I am certain this influence will be very beneficial to our federal parliament and to the country as a whole.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): I wish to join those who have offered congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address. They did a good job with the meagre material with which they had to work. It must have been difficult to arouse much enthusiasm for some of the platitudes which are larded throughout the speech. The lead editorial in the Ottawa Journal of Friday, October 24, expresses this very well under the heading: "A smug speech Trudeau gave Michener". I quote:

> Poor Mr. Michener will not have felt very comfortable uttering some of the yawn-like statements on the state of the nation which Mr. Trudeau put in his hands to read from the Throne.
> "Notwithstanding the fears of people of little faith it was encouraging to find in Canadians in all ten provinces and in the Arctic islands that their sense of identity and of the potential which Canada offers to them and to their children is strong and healthy."
> So all who are disturbed about disunity and disparity and disruption of purpose are merely "people of little faith?" They might gain more faith if this government and all governments and politicians showed more concern and determination to deal with the clouds we all see over this country.

Who are these people of little faith? Would they be the unemployed, those who cannot find work even in the affluent society we hear so much about? Would they be those who cannot find decent housing, those who have been waiting so long for this government to provide a housing program not just for the rich but for those who cannot afford down payments and who cannot pay high mortgage rates? Or would they be the civil servants who are being made the scapegoats for this government's so-called war on inflation? The President of the Canadian Labour Congress, in a recent statement in Ottawa, dealt with this aspect very well. I quote from this statement:

The federal government's action in firing civil servants is one of the most brutal and callous decisions ever taken by a government. These civil servants and their families are being needlessly sacrificed to satisfy a government policy of austerity, a policy which at best is highly questionable at this time.

We already have a high unemployment rate in Canada and this latest move by the government will only serve to aggravate our unemployment problem. If the government felt that it was really necessary to reduce the size of the public service, it could have adopted other means of accomplishing this without resorting to outright dismissals. It could, for example, have depended entirely on the normal attrition process of not filling positions as they become vacant. Instead it has chosen a policy which can only lead to the demoralization of the entire public service. The long established principle of security of tenure has been destroyed. The government, instead of displaying exemplary conduct as one of the biggest employers in Canada, has selected a course of action which can only tarnish its image in the eyes of prospective employees who will think twice before joining the public service.

This is not a situation which is peculiar to Ottawa or to one region of the country. I find when talking with civil servants in my area that there is a general disillusionment with the service. There is a real breakdown in morale because no one knows when the next cuts will come, no one knows whose job will be declared redundant. Where is the encouragement or the inducement to join the civil service as a career? In my own city of Moncton, as is the case all over the Atlantic area, lay-offs have been announced in government departments and many loyal workers with as long as 25 years service, including veterans of the second world war, have felt the weight of the government's axe.

I would be the first to agree that inefficiency and waste should be eliminated from the civil service. But this process should be carried out selectively, not with the axe but, rather, by judicious use of the pruning knife. Cut out the fat, but don't destroy the lean in the process. Does it not constitute a confusion of purposes for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), on one hand, to recognize that the Atlantic area is one of regional disparity where special measures must be taken to create new jobs, while, on the other hand, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) contributes to unemployment by throwing people out of work?

Where are these people going to find other jobs, Mr. Speaker? Do you fight inflation simply by throwing people out of work? How do you explain to these people that they must make sacrifices when the government itself is making no effort to cut back? How can you explain this move to such people when they know that there has been no cutback in the staff of the office of the Prime Minister? His office costs have jumped to $350,000, compared with $150,000 when his predecessor was in office. His advisers now number 117, at a cost of $1.5 million. It is pretty hard to go to a civil servant who has suddenly been laid off, who has received no compensation other than one week's pay for each year of service, and explain to him why he has been laid off when he knows at the same time that the government has made no effort at all to cut back its own staff.

The editorial in the Ottawa Journal on Friday, October 24, to which I referred previously, continues in this way:

The Government has come belatedly and inefficiently to the fight against inflation. It was only in August Trudeau announced it was now time to "cut the fat" from Government operations, though Louis Rasminsky and most every other authority in the land had been urging economy for a dozen years. A few days after announcing the fat would now be cut, the Government stated it would spend $600,000 to renovate Ottawa's old station to make nice party rooms for Government conferences—a building that is to be torn down in five or six years anyway.

To tell the Governor General to imply to the country on behalf of the Queen that the Government has done its duty against inflation and now it is up to the public—is to tell Canadians they are fools.

When the cabinet originally announced its decision to eliminate some 25,000 jobs from the federal civil service, it assured us that this would be done without too much dislocation of employees since most of them would be eliminated through the normal process of attrition, resignation and so on. I, personally was assured by senior officials of various departments that every effort would be made to place redundant employees in other jobs that would become available through retirement. This procedure was understandable and acceptable, but within a few weeks the Prime Minister announced that he was ordering a freeze on hiring in the civil service. Even though there were vacancies in certain departments, these vacancies would not be filled.

This is in direct contradiction to the original policy statement of the government and can lead only to hardship and the destruction of morale in the public service. We now have the anomalous situation in the federal civil service where certain departments that are short staffed have openings, where there are qualified people laid off in other departments—clerk 4's, accountant 3's, whatever they may be—who can fill those jobs, but because of the Prime Minister's directive these people cannot be placed.

On October 17 the gravity of the situation in the Atlantic area became so evident that it prompted me to send the following telegram to the Prime Minister and to the President of the Treasury Board:

> Announced layoffs in Moncton office of supply and services plus rumored layoffs in other government departments and agencies in the Atlantic area are causing great anxiety in the civil service and are a direct contradiction of stated policy that this is an area of regional disparity entitled to special consideration. This action will increase the disparity between Atlantic region and the rest of Canada and is compounded by recently announced freeze on civil service hiring which makes mockery of assurances that these people will be absorbed by other departments. I therefore urge that you honour previous commitments by immediately suspending freeze on hiring in Atlantic area until all affected persons are either absorbed by other federal departments or until the Department of Regional Economic Expansion initiates long awaited policies to provide them with other employment. The gravity of the situation transcends sectional and political considerations and demands that we present a united front. I am sending a copy of this telegram to all Atlantic M.P.'s requesting that they meet in Ottawa within the next two weeks and present the Atlantic case to your government.

Copies of this telegram went out to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) and to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), but I regret to say that up to the present day the only acknowledgement has been from the secretary to the Prime Minister. This is another indication to me of the complete disregard that this government has for the problems of the Atlantic region. Although they pay lip service to them time after time, when we ask for action we are completely ignored.

I might say that many of my own colleagues replied to invitation indicated their appreciation of the problem and promised their support. I am now appealing to all Atlantic M.P.'s to present a united front to see whether we can get the action our area deserves.

The Speech from the Throne contains this paragraph, as reported at page 2 of Hansard for October 23:

> History, geography and economics have placed certain of our citizens at a disadvantage.

We in the Atlantic area do not need to be told that.

> Under legislation enacted during the last session of Parliament, the Government is establishing programmes to reduce these inequalities.

I think all members will agree with that and will say "Amen". But we have heard that said so often over the years. We are always given promises for the future. The Atlantic area has been studied and restudied. There have been white papers, commissions, surveys of all types, to the point where we must now be the most analysed people in the world. White papers and studies are fine, Mr. Speaker, but unless they are followed up with proper, comprehensive action, they are nothing but a waste of money.

All members of the house from the Atlantic region welcomed the formation of the new Department of Regional Economic Expansion. While it was not everything we desired, we did feel that at long last here was a department that would co-ordinate all of the various programs in that area, with the object of formulating a competely new concept of regional development which would bring our area up to some sort of parity with the rest of Canada.

I welcomed the report tabled in the house yesterday by the minister, his first report. While there is not a great deal in the report, I want to congratulate him on assisting in the establishment of the first new industry to be set up in this area. However, we need a great deal more action than this if we are to reduce the disparity that exists between the Atlantic area and the rest of Canada.

I also agree with the concept of growth centres. I think this is a much better approach than the old scattergun approach of granting assistance whenever it was requested. However, before growth areas can attract new industry they must have the infrastructure—a word I do not like but which seems to be a common term nowadays—to encourage industry to settle. I prefer to call this requirement social capital or social overhead. In other words, in order to attract new industry to a growth centre you must provide the roads, the transportation facilities, the land banks for housing the workers who will come into the area, sewage facilities and those municipal services that the municipality concerned probably cannot afford to finance on its own.

This is the area in which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should be doing more than it has been. It is all right to attract industry or attempt to attract it. However, the first thing industry will ascertain is whether the area has housing for its workers, whether it has proper transportation facilities so it can ship out of the area and whether there are proper facilities for pollution control and so on. I urge the minister and the officials of his department to speed up action on these problems. I know several municipalities are ready with development plans but, as always, are hampered by lack of funds. One of the most pressing problems in the city of Moncton is the nine level railroad crossings in the city proper. Over the years it has been recognized there must be a complete relocation of tracks in the area to free land for industrial purposes and to eliminate most of the transportation problems. The city has gone ahead on its own and, indeed, in the last week has developed an excellent study through the co-operation of consultants. I appeal to the minister and the officials of his department to give this proposal serious consideration when it is presented to them.

The people of the maritimes for months and years have been hammering at the fact that they must have a completely new and comprehensive transportation policy for the region. We were all quite encouraged in June when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) made the statement in the House, in presenting his new bill, that he would collaborate with the premiers of the provinces in the appointment of a committee to discuss this whole problem and come up with a comprehensive policy on transportation. I, for one, was greatly disturbed, as I believe were all members of the Commons transportation committee, when the minister's statement that he was again suspending the freeze on freight rates appeared in the press. I suggest to the minister that this was a breach of faith with the people in the Atlantic area. They were given verbal assurance in this House that changes would not be made in the existing structure until such time as the new committee came up with an over-all program. This has caused a great deal of concern in the area. I should like to read from a recent editorial which appeared in the Saint John Telegraph Journal:

> Just within the last week it was learned that the railways proposed to cancel less-than-carload freight service into the region November 3, leaving only the substantially higher express rates for small shipments. Then the Federal Transport Minister said he had asked the railways to defer the action.
> But he promptly threw another uncertainty into the situation by announcing that a federal-provincial committee was studying the idea of eliminating general transportation subsidies within the Maritime Freight Rates Act territory—a 20 per cent federal subsidy on the cost of moving goods from point to point within the Atlantic Provinces and eastern Quebec—in favour of using the funds in a concentrated way to assist a limited number of commodity groups or selected geographical areas within the region. That leaves everyone wondering whose costs go up 20 per cent and whose go down.
> We need a new transportation policy, without a doubt. The rest of Canada got a new deal in March, 1967, and this region was promised one at that time.
> But we also need a reasonably stable situation now and until that new deal is worked out. The present bewilderment harms existing business and hampers development.

I confirm this editorial statement. Shippers in the region are now at a complete loss to know what rates to expect on certain commodities. They do not expect lower rates; they know they will go up. There is complete confusion there now because the shippers do not know what transportation costs will be involved. in connection with the merchandise they have to move. This to me would seem to be another typical example of the way this government has operated over the past year. With all their talk of participatory democracy, consultation with the people, the fact that they will sound out all shades of opinion to get theses and antitheses and arrive at syntheses —all good phrases—they will show a complete disregard for the wishes of the people and certainly show a complete lack of co-operation with the provincial authorities. Lubor J. Zink, in the Toronto Telegram for October 22, 1969 under the heading "PM shows contempt for democracy" said:

> It is the product of the contradiction in Mr. Trudeau's theory and practice of government.

In theory, he postulates "participatory democracy", i.e., direct and presumably constant involvement of the electorate in the process of Government...

In practice, however Mr. Trudeau negates what he preaches.

His method of Government shows contempt for any form of democracy; it is secretive and authoritarian.

Far from going to the streets, he does not even go to Parliament with his decision-making process.

A very good example of the way this government completely ignores parliament is the recent action of the Minister of Transport in appointing his Atlantic transportation committee without notifying the House or consulting it. He at least might have had the courtesy to tell us who the appointees were and who the members of the committee were. The press report stated that the committee had met in Halifax and had taken certain action. I think, however, that the Minister of Transport at least should have had the courtesy to let us know what was being done. The article continues:

His policies are hatched behind closed doors by anonymous task forces, in secret conclaves with hand picked technocrats, and they are announced as Prime-Ministerial edicts.

Where Parliamentary approval is still necessary, even after Mr. Trudeau's emasculation of representative democracy, his decisions are presented to the Commons by a docile Cabinet as Government policy, and rammed through by the docile Grit majority.

To expedite the rubber-stamping process, and make it foolproof, Mr. Trudeau wound up his institutional retooling period by putting the muzzle of Rule 75C on the Commons last July.

How accurate a description that is of the method by which this cabinet operates! There are many examples of this complete disregard for parliament and the committee system. The mover of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne made a statement that co-operation among the parties is necessary to get things done. I say to him I am glad there is one member on the government side who recognizes there must be co-operation by the opposition parties if there is to be hope of getting legislation through. But to get co-operation one must deserve it, one must earn it.

How can the government earn co-operation from this side of the House if it ignores completely the niceties of parliament, ignores the work of the committees, and if decisions are taken by the cabinet while the committee is still discussing policies. There are many examples of this. This type of thing happened so often in connection with the work of the transportation committee that now the members of that committee know their work does not mean anything. It happened in respect of the agricultural committee and the committee on external affairs. Co-operation cannot be obtained unless it is earned. In closing I should like to quote again from the Ottawa Journal of October 22, 15 months after the election. This editorial was written before the Speech from the Throne was delivered, when great things were expected. We have heard so often that this was to be the session of action in which so much new legislation would be introduced. This was to be the Trudeau year. Mr. Pearson was left behind. The Journal, together with other papers, naturally expected great things. This is what it wrote:

Fifteen months after the election, the glowing Liberal campaign speeches of 1968 are overdue promises to pay on which the government must make good or face the disappointment and scorn of the electorate.

This government is obviously again postponing action which should be taken and they are doing nothing to relieve the hard-core problems of unemployment, under-employment, inflation, lack of housing and pollution. Therefore, I most heartily support the amendment put forth by my leader.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, following the time-honoured custom of extending congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, I wish to join those who preceded me in congratulating the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) for their exceptionally interesting contributions which dealt in part with the history and natural aspirations of their respective constituents. I also wish to take this opportunity to extend my personal congratulations to the two new Ministers without Portfolio and to the two new parliamentary secretaries. In these appointments the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has recognized ability, hard work and dedication.

The Throne Speech reflects the sincere desire of the government to give the people of Canada the best government possible in the times in which we live. The Ottawa Citizen of Friday, October 24, 1969, summed up the real intent of government concern on subjects of primary importance to every Canadian such as peace, poverty, youth, individual rights, consumer rights, pollution, grain marketing, the underdeveloped world, inflation, tax reforms, housing, etc. It is a program aimed at achieving economic and social goals, a program which has never been found in any previous Throne Speech since I have been a member of this House.

In the matter of peace, I doubt whether there is a country in the western world that is more concerned with peace than Canada, and it has been the traditional concern of Liberal governments to promote international friendships as an ideal for peace. The evidence for everyone to see was our action in sending a peace force to the Gaza Strip during the Suez crisis in 1955, action which won for Mr. Pearson the Nobel Peace Prize when he was Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs, and more recently in sending the Canadian peace force to Cyprus. The action we took at that time was generally considered to have averted a possible war.

In the matter of poverty, the war on poverty is not an empty phrase but is a serious attempt which shows that the government means business. This is evidenced in its policies which are designed to achieve a just objective. Perhaps it is not irrelevant to point out that a Senate committee under the chairmanship of my good friend Senator Croll is about to hold across the country hearings on the question of poverty in the various regions of Canada, with the end result being arriving at recommendations to be made to the government on how best to deal with this internal problem which all of us, regardless of party, would like to see solved. I should like to remind hon. members that it was Senator Croll who first suggested the supplementary income benefit of $30 per month to pensioners, who need only fill out a simple income tax form in order to qualify; and this additional benefit is now pegged to the cost of living.

Speaking about poverty, the question of a guaranteed income for all Canadians will have to be examined and studied. The concept of an all-embracing welfare plan which would guarantee a minimum income is a very attractive package if and when we can afford it. Personally, I am not against it; nor is any member of the government. I believe the idea should not be shelved in a remote pigeonhole, but rather should be studied by a competent committee of economists who are removed from political influence. Such a committee could serve the government well in an advisory capacity.

On the subject of youth, I believe that the proposal to amend the Canada Elections Act to lower the age of voters to 18, as mentioned in the Throne Speech, is welcomed. Various reasons can be advanced for lowering the voting age. First of all, I think it is the logical development of a process which has been going on for a long time, especially since the last world war when youths of 18 were entrusted with technical and often dangerous assignments. As everyone knows, originally the right to vote was greatly restricted by one means or another and for many years it was considered the privilege of a few. The age of 21 was presumably selected because it was considered an age at which a person reached maturity; but because conditions have changed greatly over the years, the Prime Minister has wisely decided in this matter, as in other fields, that the time has come to break new ground and lower the voting age to 18. This move is in line with his intention to channel the enthusiasm and energy of our young people into the mainstream of Canadian political life, instead of letting them loose to agitate authority and take part in irresponsible and often subversive activities.

When speaking of youth one cannot ignore the criticisms leveled at some of the activities of the Company of Young Canadians. I have personally received several communications from my constituents complaining about certain activities of the members of the Company located in Thunder Bay. The concept of the Company of Young Canadians and its objectives are worth preserving, notwithstanding the adverse publicity with regard to the activities of a few unqualified people who are probably unfit to serve in this noble experiment.

The Company should not be disbanded, but I would certainly dismiss anyone with subversive motives whenever those motives are brought to light. I believe it is a sound decision of the minister to have the activities of the Company investigated by a parliamentary committee. The minister has promised a thorough investigation and whatever action may be necessary to attract capable and qualified young men and women to make their just contribution to the betterment of Canada.

The inflationary trend of consumer prices in recent years has affected not only Canadians but the people of every country in the western world. Long ago the government took steps to meet the problem, which is not one of easy and immediate solution. As soon as the Prime Minister took office, sensing the concern of the nation about the spiralling cost of living he lost no time in appointing a full-time minister in charge of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. With characteristic zeal and drive the new minister began his difficult task of controlling unscrupulous credit and advertising practices. I am confident that his dynamic and serious dedication will bring beneficial results. I am sure that the protective legislation envisaged in the Throne Speech will be translated into measures beneficial to all concerned. In the meantime, I should like to mention that anyone wishing to offer a suggestion about goods and services should write to Consumer, Box 99, Ottawa. This is part of the service furnished by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Now I wish to say a word about pollution. The Speech from the Throne stated:

> Through the United Nations and its agencies Canada is seeking to establish a system to combat pollution of international waters which threatens so many forms of life on this planet.

With public concern over pollution growing steadily, more and more thought is being devoted to the organization of pollution control and to the roles that the various governments must play, because it is not just a federal responsibility; it is also a provincial and municipal responsibility. It is also an international problem. The late John F. Kennedy had the problem of pollution in mind when he said:

> The race between education and erosion, between wisdom and waste, has not run its course ... Each generation must deal anew with the raiders, with the scramble to use public resources for private profit and with the tendency to prefer short-run profits to long-run necessities. The nation's battle to preserve the common estate is far from won ... The crisis may be quiet but it is urgent.

For several years an International Joint Commission has been studying pollution in the Great Lakes and as a result it is expected that some action will be forthcoming in the near future. Recently statements have been made blaming the pulp and paper industry for polluting our waters. It is my understanding that the industry has been concerned with the problem; indeed, some companies have spent considerable sums of money on efforts to control water pollution. The Great Lakes Paper Company of Fort William has taken a lead in the installation of controls in the district of Thunder Bay and it is to be hoped that its experiments will soon bear fruit. The Logger, a publication dealing with the woods industry, recently reported:

> The Ontario Paper Company Limited will spend $5,000,000 on a three-stage pollution abatement program over the next two years, Company President Robert M. Schmon announced.

However, I would hesitate to advocate measures so strict that they would force plants to close down. I think that in this matter, as with other problems, patience and discretion must provide the guiding line to the achievement of an eventually satisfactory solution. The Department of National Health and Welfare has conducted an extensive program on the evaluation and control of air pollution, the result of which will in all probability be the enactment of a national clean air act. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce, in a policy statement on pollution at its last annual meeting, made the following recommendations:

> 1. That the federal government co-operate fully with the provinces and the United States in investigating existing pollution control legislation and in developing truly effective measures for environmental pollution control.
> 2. That since tax incentives are allowed industry regarding expenses incurred to prevent water pollution, suitable incentives relating to air and/or land pollution be accorded industry.

I fully endorse the Chamber's proposal as one of the best means of meeting the problem of pollution. In recent months a great deal has been said about a capital gains tax. The Carter Commission on Taxation, whose recommendations after nearly three years still have to have practical effect, did a great deal to create endless discussion on the pros and cons of a capital gains tax. Canada is a growing country, it needs a constant supply of development capital. The Carter Report recommended a capital gains tax. It specifically mentioned its value as a deterrent to land speculators who in recent years have made huge profits on the demand for building sites. In that area a capital gains tax would be justified. However, other factors must be considered before we can apply such a tax equitably. The tax structure would have to be devised in a way that would not prevent a shortage of development capital. Perhaps a limited capital gains tax could be devised which would meet present day conditions.

The arguments of NDP members against the effects of American investment in Canada are typical of that party's attitude toward the United States, an attitude which is consistently hostile regardless of the benefits to Canada which American capital has brought by creating jobs for Canadians. Mr. Earl McLaughlin, Chairman and President of the Royal Bank of Canada, is reported to have said in a speech recently that the reason we have so much American investment is that investors have faith in a prosperous, growing Canadian economy. He emphasized that Canada's future prosperity and growth depend on a continuing inflow of investment capital from abroad.

Does foreign investment mean foreign control? Mr. McLaughlin does not believe so. Investment by Americans, Englishmen, Frenchmen, Italians or Germans is not made by their governments; these people are not arms of their respective governments, and Canadian companies owned or controlled by foreign investors are good corporate citizens and must conform to Canadian laws. The business behaviour problem of foreign investment is a false problem and the fear of foreign domination from this source is a groundless one; it is as irrational or neurotic as the fear of foreign debt.

Mr. Speaker, press reports to the effect that the reserve forces of Canada will be reorganized consistent with the announced proposed changes in national defence policy, and that such reorganization will see a strength reduction of 50 per cent in the militia nationally, with the possibility of larger reductions in Ontario, have sparked a sizeable body of public opinion against such a move. I have received several letters and a brief from members of the Senate and honorary appointees of Thunder Bay militia units, the Lake Superior Scottish Regiment and the Lakehead Service Battalion, urging the maintenance of our militia without curtailment.

It has been pointed out that the militia units suffered under a series of post-war reorganizations and curtailments, culminating in the major changes of 1965 which reduced six units to two in Thunder Bay and restricted them in the Port Arthur armoury. Few other than local residents realize that in essence geographical and transportation reasons confined the militia to the city of Port Arthur as far as the area of Thunder Bay was concerned. With the formal amalgamation of the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur taking place on January 1, 1970, the units will be in a much better position to service the whole community and additional enrolment may be expected.

From the standpoint of economy, I understand that the savings involved in the reduction would be insignificant. What is more important is that the 400 or more young people who have enrolled in the militia at the Lakehead have added materially to our safety and protection which the very presence of the uniformed force affords in case of need. The militia also provides a valuable place for many young men to profit by their experience; it is helping them to develop healthy citizenship. I express the hope that before any action is taken to curtail this valuable means of citizen protection in cases of emergency, the matter will be re-examined.

Having taken an active interest in immigration ever since my election to the House of Commons, I should like to reiterate what I have been saying for years, namely, that every effort should be made to ensure a continuing flow of immigrants to Canada as a consistent policy. The flow of immigrants in 1966, 1967 and 1968 reached a respectable number. This year, however, the flow appears to be tapering off at an alarming rate. As a matter of fact, it began to drop in 1968.

Some time ago a Toronto industrialist, himself an immigrant, called for the large-scale immigration of unskilled workers in the fields of mining and agriculture. He said that both fields were starved of workers, which meant lower productivity and higher cost. Yet the very area in which this successful businessman observed the greatest need had the sharpest drop in the 1968, and worse, still, 1969 immigration figures.

I know that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) is very much concerned with the need for filling up our empty spaces by following an aggressive policy of immigration that is consistent with our economy. Speaking in Vancouver a few months ago he stated that since 1950 more than 27,000 business ventures had been started in Canada by immigrants. They have involved almost $355 million in working capital—and these are only the new immigrant-headed firms that are known to the government. There are probably a great many more. Those 27,000 new businesses have provided employment directly for 82,300 workers since 1950, many of whom are also immigrants. Indirectly, of course, the new ventures have created many more jobs. The immigration figure for 1967 was 222,876. In 1968 it fell to 183,974, a drop of 38,902. For the first quarter of this year the figures show a 14 per cent drop in comparison with the same period in 1968.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to your attention a question which for years has been the concern of not only my constituency but the entire region of northwestern Ontario. I refer to the discriminatory freight rates which have had an adverse effect on established industries and are a deterrent to prospective industries. The problem of transportation has not just to be viewed from the point of view of benefit to southern Ontario. Freight rates to northern and northwestern Ontario are unrealistic, and I urge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to give consideration to having this matter referred to the Parliamentary Committee on Transport and Communications for a thorough review of every aspect on the situation.

On September 27 last, during a visit of the Prime Minister to the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur—which was part of a successful tour of northern and northwestern Ontario—the mayor of the new city of Thunder Bay asked that the announcement of the advent of the new city which will come into existence on January 1, 1970, be made in parliament. Such an announcement would stimulate and inspire the more than 100,000 citizens to strive to make their new city one of the best in the country. The mayor also suggested that the new city, rich in Indian history and lore, should be considered a suitable area for the establishment of a research centre on Indian affairs. I am very happy to endorse both proposals and I hope that the Prime Minister, whose visit to my constituency was one of the highlights in the community, generating enthusiasm and affection, will give favourable consideration to both suggestions.

Mr. Speaker, the Throne Speech has revealed a carefully planned program designed to give Canadians legislation to fit the times. The Prime Minister is to be commended for his determination to listen not only to his professional advisers but for seeking the views of the people in the streets of the nation. This, I believe, has helped translate the suggestions made to him informally by both young and old into the policies outlined in the Speech from the Throne.

• (5:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in my turn, I wish to congratulate the mover of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. He took that opportunity to make a very objective review of the economic and social situation in our country and of the main problems with which we have to grapple. He made very accurate comments on our parliamentary system and I support them generally, save as concerns Standing Order 75c, which is quite normal.

I share his view that our first goal should be Canada's development, but I may add that such an objective should include the security and liberty of every Canadian.

My congratulations are also meant for the seconder of the motion, who did very well. He had enough courage to say how high the unemployment rate is in this area of the country. He spoke briefly of the problem of the dairy industry and said that he is far from brushing aside criticisms from farmers against the government dairy policy for 1969-70.

In the Speech from the Throne of the first session we expected the government to talk about agricultural policy.

In last year's Speech from the Throne I had hoped for the announcement of a new farm policy, mainly for changes designed to solve the very serious problem now confronting Canada's industrial milk producers.

I was greatly disappointed in the last session with the way the industrial milk was dealt with. I had hoped that hon. members would have the opportunity to discuss that policy before its application so as to be able to suggest the necessary changes. But alas there again I was greatly disappointed.

On March 31, 1969, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) made known at the very last minute the government dairy policy for 1969-70. It is unfortunate that things are done that way.

The producers were always hoping that we would have the opportunity to discuss this matter in the house, due to the almost general dissatisfaction of the dairy producers caused by a policy that penalizes a number of farm labourers.

Reducing the subsidy from $1.33 to $1.25 per hundredweight resulted in a considerable loss of revenue for the manufactured milk producers. The tax increase on exports to 26 cents per hundredweight, as well as the additional tax of 52 cents per hundredweight on surplus production set by the quota, compared with that of 1968, contributed also to the drop in the farmers' revenues, thus creating more acute problems.

In any event, we have been told, rightly maybe, that the reduction of the subsidy and the lowering of the quota, as compared with 1968, were due to a more plentiful production, which resulted in a surplus.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the excess production that we may have, in Canada, is possibly due, I admit, to an increase in production. But another factor has contributed also to this surplus: it is the importation of 188 million pounds of coloured spread and of 47 million pounds of dairy products of all kinds.

These dairy products and this spread have been put on the Canadian market and as the income of the Canadian people has a tendency to decrease, especially the workers' income, I understand why the consumers are inclined to buy cheaper products.

In last year's report, the Economic Council of Canada stated that one Canadian family out of five lives in dire poverty. It would be possible to dispose of a greater quantity of dairy products if the revenue of those who really need them were increased. The amendment moved by my colleague from Portneuf (Mr. Godin), asking the government for a guaranteed minimum income for all Canadians, would bring about an improvement.

I would also invite the government to seriously consider the briefs which have been presented to the standing committee on agriculture by the C.F.U. and the Federated Cooperative of Quebec, when the committee toured the eastern provinces and Ontario.

Those suggestions will probably be examined by the committee, but since time is running short, I would ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) for an early publication of the committee report, in order to find a solution retroactive to April 1, 1969.

It will perhaps be objected that we can only eat our fill. Right, but I will answer that we can only buy according to our purchasing power and when there is only one wage-earner in a family and there are seven, eight or ten months to feed, it is not surprising that the available purchasing power is insufficient.

This is another reason why it would be necessary in Canada to increase indirectly the income of our Canadian families without it having any effect on prices. There are in the country 13 million persons without any income who are dependent on 8 million workers whose income is made up of salaries and profits. One part of the world does not know how to dispose of its production, while the other is destitute. This phenomenon exists in Canada as in other countries.

He had the opportunity to find out during October what Mr. Pearson, former prime Minister of Canada, was asking not only of the Canadian government, but also of other governments, because of the mission that has been entrusted to him. He asked them to investigate the assistance given to the poor countries by the rich ones. In his report, we find the following phrase "Transfer of resources between rich and poor countries".

Canada has an abundance of resources, an abundance of products. I believe that we could afford to increase our assistance to the countries that are really in need. This would be a humanitarian deed which, at the same time, would be of service to Canadian agricultural workers.

My attention was drawn to an article published in L'Action of October 20, 1969. At some function at the United Nations, a former CBC announcer stated, and I quote:

"the real cause of the Nigerian conflict lies in millions of barrels of oil."

and I believe that is right, and I quote further:

"Let us have the courage to admit that no economic interest is worth two million people."

added Mr. Burke who had been invited to speak at the events that took place to celebrate United Nations Day.

The Prince, with head bowed, followed the proceedings in front of a large picture showing a famished Biafran child.

"I ask you to note the expression—

I hope that he was not addressing his question to the Prince but to his audience.

—on the child's face, this could be your own child, this could be you."

In view of the present situation, I suggest that responsible politicians generally want to tackle the problems facing humanity: poverty and surpluses.

The income of manufactured milk producers has declined in 1969, and we are now coming back to the reasoning of a former federal minister of agriculture who said, in 1965, something extraordinary, as reported in an article entitled "Quebec farmers complain for nothing". I quote:

"Farmers from Quebec and elsewhere are complaining with a full stomach", Mr. Harry Hayes, Minister of Agriculture, indicated yesterday at a press conference. "Those who speak of stagnation are talking through their hats", he categorically stated. The minister applied his remarks both to the dairy industry and to agriculture in general. "A Quebec farmer would need, he contended, six dairy cows and two hogs only to net an annual income of $2,400."

Mr. Speaker, the government took the necessary measures to improve the lot of dairy producers and farmers in general. They refused to believe that statement from the minister.

In 1967 also, representations were made by our farm organizations. The situation improved again, and in 1968, it was still much better. I take pleasure in repeating this, because it is true, and I do this to encourage farmers and producers to improve their milk and their herds, in order to meet governments' requirements.

However in 1969 the disaster begins. So I ask myself the following question: Do we really intend to go back to what the minister said in 1965?

In any event it is necessary to face things squarely and to examine the situation seriously. We must recognize that if the province of Quebec has produced the greater volume of industrial milk, losses have been greater there also. Not only have millions of dollars not found their way into the farmers' pockets, but because of the decrease in subsidies, fines and taxes on exports, their income has decreased.

Thus indirectly, without noticing it, the government is supplying with arguments those who are in favour of separatism in Quebec.

Some will say, and rightly so, even if I do not share that opinion, that the federal government is to blame. If we have fewer millions in the province of Quebec, it is again because of the policy worked out in Ottawa, and we are right in wanting to secede.

Mr. Speaker, I know these arguments have a false ring and must be turned down, but, in any event, we have to face the facts.

We sometimes hear too: Those darn farmers, they are never satisfied. The more they get, the more they ask for, and subsidies will have to be cut. If some day they want to get rid of that policy, its phasing out must start now.

Mr. Speaker, the subsidies granted by the government for manufactured milk benefit first and most of all the Canadian consumer. We, manufactured milk producers do not care whether the price of the product is paid entirely by the consumer or if part of it is absorbed by the consumer and the government. The fact remains that the product has its value and the producers are entitled to be paid for it: this is where the farmers' income comes from.

Because of this policy which should be changed without delay, a great number of farmers have left the farm. There have been auctions by the hundreds. One only has to travel across the eastern provinces to realize the number of farm hands who have left the trade and are now unemployed or exist on welfare.

A very small number have succeeded in landing jobs in industry, in rural centres or in towns, and that has contributed to increase the plague of unemployment. It is for this reason that I urge the government to implement its program of economic expansion and industrial development of rural centres.

In order to decentralize industry, it is not enough to talk about it. Action is called for. And I have found only recently that there are responsible men with drive and the ability to run industries, provided they are permitted to breathe, so that their undertaking may prove successful.

The high interest rate, credit restrictions, in short, all kinds of annoyances contribute to discourage those who have initiative and who wish to do something.

In a parish of my constituency, at Saint-François, a man had one day the tremendous idea of launching a small industry way out in the country. I went to see it last Saturday and was amazed to realize how this man, whose sons are interested in the expansion of their family undertaking, was successful in building up something fantastic and creating an industry which Americans come to visit and where they place orders. This concern provides employment for our Canadians and, at the same time, a market for Canadian products. There are 65 families earning a living in that industry.

Last summer, the director—this is not even a company—decided to enlarge the plant. After applying to the Economic Development Board in order to obtain benefits offered by the government to those who need them, he received a letter which left him with the hope that he might benefit from grants made in such circumstances. I hope that the problem will be settled but, at any rate, the deal fell through and that man, who could still expand his industry considerably, simply decided to cut the expansion short and even, if it were possible, to sell his business, perhaps to some Americans.

As members of parliament, we ought to take our responsibilities and to see to it that such measures are really beneficial to rural centres, so that small businesses may develop and provide more jobs for our workers who have given up agriculture and have now to be retrained.

I have before me a table which is an answer to a question I put on the order paper, about the subsidies granted under Bill C-129, in 1968. This is the answer that was given to me: In the province of Quebec, the subsidies granted were of the order of $54 million and the amounts paid out totalled $8 million.

Unfortunately, out of the $8 million, $4.5 million were absorbed by two large corporations and the balance was distributed among small industries.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest we should encourage the development of large corporations, but we should not forget small industries. Besides, we should endeavour to reach an early decision, in order to enable those who have any initiative left, to do something for the development of Canada.

Lately, I read in a newspaper that the Manitoba premier is also his way and wants his province to benefit from industrial development. He is probably using the same arguments as we are. Here is what he said in Montreal:

> By keeping for myself the Department of Industry and Commerce, I hope I can give the assurance that we shall keep on encouraging private business to come and settle in our province and to take advantage of the numerous opportunities for investments that are to be found there.

I think that if it is good for the people there to work in this way, it would be equally advisable to do the same in our province and it is high time that this opportunity be given to all those who have initiative and the courage to undertake something and to make a success of it despite the obstacles.

In the Quebec area, one shipyard employed 2,000 workers. I attended a meeting organized by the C.N.T.U., on September 30, in order to meet responsible people in the area, at the municipal as well as the provincial and federal levels. I was surprised to hear that the Lauzon shipyard has jobs for only 800 people. The situation affects some workers in my riding who are now unemployed since they earned their living at the shipyard.

I would like to draw the government's attention to the fact that in 1880, Canada had 7,300 freighters. We then held the fourth place among the countries of the world. In 1969, we had dropped to the twenty-first, because we have only four ships.

If we do not have any ship nor merchant marine, I understand that we do not need any shipyard. However, we should ask ourselves the following question: Do we have the necessary streams for shipping? Do we have goods to be shipped? Do we have workers to build those ships? Do we have shipyards? Have we all what is required to accomplish something? To that, I will answer yes. We can take advantage of the magnificent St. Lawrence river and the Great Lakes. We have access to the seas. Ore, wood, commodities, etc. must be shipped. If it is profitable to ship all those goods in foreign bottoms, it seems that they could be shipped in Canadian bottoms. It would also enable our workers to do their best, because we have specialized workers in those fields.

What is missing to realize all that? The answer is always the same: money! People say that the Créditistes always see a dollar sign. It is true and it must be said. I mentioned all sorts of necessary things, but where is the dollar sign to make all these things work.

I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government—I do not confine myself to criticism, for what is good. I take pleasure in doing so.

They want to tackle the problem of water pollution. It is an excessively serious one. People may not realize it, but those who care for the future, for the health of mankind, have made studies and in their reports have recommended that the governments, at all levels, take the necessary action in order to check this plague.

Unfortunately, farmers are contributing indirectly, and without knowing it, to water pollution, through the use of various fertilizers and chemicals which are carried everywhere by the streams, the rivers, the Great Lakes.

I therefore invite the government to do a little more research on chemical products in order to find a non-chemical way of activating plant production.

I realize that my time is running out. Unless the Chair allows me to finish my speech, and this is why I hurry, I should like to draw the attention of the house to another problem which is crucial in my region: retraining courses for adults.

Every week, I receive numerous phone calls and letters from individuals who are refused by Canada Manpower Centres and are told: We have no room for you, all places rented have been taken and we cannot accommodate any more students.

Mr. Speaker, I am asking the responsible minister to inquire while there is still time—it is still only October—to see if it would not be possible to rent student places in greater number in order to meet the requirements of the people who are not too lazy yet to refuse to go to school. They want to do something. It may perhaps not be 200 per cent beneficial, but at least they should be given the opportunity to believe that they are useful and to become useful in the future, because as we develop industry we will require their services.

I have read in the Speech from the Throne that the government intends to reform taxation. A study is contemplated in order to assess taxes in a more equitable manner, and I am for it. I would wish that that study will take two factors into account. Indeed there is an area where, in Canada as elsewhere, it is necessary to unite two things to implement a project. I am thinking of labour and capital. When it comes to taxing labour, it is always more heavily taxed than capital and the proof is in the 1969-70 budget. Indeed labour is taxed at the rate of $4,190 million and capital, that is the big corporations, is taxed at the rate of $2,210 million, a difference of $1,980 million.

When the time comes to reward labour and capital, invariably capital is put ahead of labour. Here is proof. According to a table published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for the year 1968, personal savings of workers amounted to $4 billion while those of large corporations totalled $8 billion.

In my opinion, it is imperative to study the situation and attempt to find a solution in order to distribute the fiscal load more evenly.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude my remarks by saying that there are in Canada very intelligent people capable of great discoveries and great accomplishments in all fields. They are highly qualified managers because they are with it people, people who can do things and initiate reforms. But when it comes to the monetary system, they give up because it is sacrosanct. Nobody wants to touch it, nobody wants to fix it.

Those who claim that major Douglas' proposals for adapting the monetary system to modern realities are illogical, are sometimes people who would have us forget our real economic problems. Their claims serve as a drug to make us forget the great problems of the day.

To my mind, problems should not be glossed over, truth hidden, and the people asked to deprive themselves, to tighten their belt, when we know not what to do with our production, the wealth accumulated by men for men. According to me, this is truly a drug. It is a drug because it is unrealistic.

I therefore support the amendment moved to provide a guaranteed minimum income for all Canadians, because that is physically possible. It will certainly not be likely to make lazy people out of them, no more than those who are wealthy have become lazy. It has been proved that when one is lucky enough to have the money required to undertake something, one works night and day. We are not lazy people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respectfully offer you my compliments at the outset of this new session. The way you continue to carry out your important functions entitles you to the esteem and the admiration of all hon. members.

I am pleased to congratulate again in this house the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) as well as my good friend the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau). They admirably carried out their important task and their well informed comments are an indication no doubt of the high quality of the debates which will take place in this august chamber.

Mr. Speaker, I would have a great many subjects to discuss today. Some members of the opposition might find it strange that I do not praise the Speech from the Throne but I want to reassure them immediately because I do not dissociate myself from it in any way. This afternoon I had to tape a radio program and my constituents will know Sunday the support I give to the new legislation proposed in the Speech from the Throne.

During the 30 minutes available to me, I will deal in some detail with some of the problems which confront the potato growers in my area. I hope that these comments will seem to my city colleagues mainly, like a refreshing breeze since last year they were compelled to listen to endless debates on wheat, which no doubt will continue for some time yet.

I am going to deal now with potatoes, which is a matter of concern for me and of great interest to a lot of my constituents.

Mr. Speaker, a few weeks before parliament resumed, I had the opportunity to work at harvesting potatoes in my constituency. At that time, schools are closed for two weeks, not only to allow schoolboys and schoolgirls to earn some money in order to buy decent winter clothes, thus alleviating the burden of the family bread-winner, but also because there is a shortage of manpower at harvest time. In spite of the machinery they have now they still have to hire people to work in the fields. Everybody is engaged in the harvesting of potatoes. It is the main concern of the majority of the people for about a month, from September 15 to October 15.

The growing and processing of potatoes, together with the paper and pulp industry are the basis, the structure of the economy in my area.

The slightest fluctuation on the potato market are immediately reflected, on the Sunday collection in rural areas as well as on the volume of business of furniture and car dealers.

The potato industry is a precarious one. Some influences beyond the control of producers are more often than not detrimental to them.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Of course, there is some appearance of a certain prosperity which seems to impress the people visiting our area; however, in many cases, the buildings conceal serious financial problems affecting farmers.

True, Mr. Speaker, the quality of a product is the first factor that influences a buyer. I dealt with the matter in the course of the first session and I do not intend to bring it up again. Nevertheless, I must say that quality control is subject to rules and regulations made by the federal Department of Agriculture and to their enforcement. In that respect, the accredited fruit, vegetable and potato inspectors responsible for controlling the quality before a product appears on the interprovincial market or the export market, are faced with some difficulties.

Evidently, our potato shippers apprecaite legal restraints no more than our other citizens. Yet, most of them accept such restraints because they result in a product of better quality and, needless to say, in better prices.

But, to be fair, a legal restraint must apply equally to all.

And yet, in the potato industry, as in others, some people sit on the fence, so to speak, in respect of what the law does and does not allow. Thus, some shippers always manage to evade the rules and, consequently, the inspector and the inspection, by means of subtle wiles.

It is a well known fact that 15, 20 or 30 years after the enactment of a law, a person of average intelligence succeeds in finding ways to evade it. It is also admitted that successive amendments to a law, amendments to provide for exceptions, weaken its intrinsic value and make it so flexible that precedents make its implementation impossible.

What precisely makes it difficult to control the quality of table potatoes or of seed-potatoes for export is first of all that a few shippers do not comply with inspection regulations or fail to honour the confidence placed in them by some rules; secondly, the rules now in effect open the door wide to abuses and thirdly, the government austerity program prevents the inspectors from working overtime so that they cannot claim any additional travel expenses in the course of their regular duties.

I already mentioned human weakness as regards potato shippers. I now want to refer to the weakness of the legislation and rules on marketing. Here is what happens to potatoes shipped to another province, Quebec or Ontario, which are our main domestic markets. The law provides that any shipment ought to be inspected before crossing a provincial border. Normally, shipment and inspection take place before six o'clock in the evening during regular working hours.

Sometimes it is absolutely necessary to load a truck rather late in the evening to meet certain terms of a sales contract. I said "in the evening". It is then impossible to have an inspector due to the austerity program because higher officers have instructed their subordinates not to make any inspection after 5 or 6 o'clock. If they do so, they are not paid any travelling expenses or extra salary.

Inspectors are therefore staying home and some shippers, aware of the difficulty they would have in designating the quality of their potato shipment, take advantage of that to contravene the regulations which encourage them to do so. The shipper can, as a matter of fact, obtain a permit, a release at the inspector's home and then get an authorization from the weighing officer of the highways department to proceed to Quebec.

Of course, potatoes are always subject to an inspection at the point of delivery, be it Gaspé, Montreal, Ottawa or London. However, potatoes are so seldon inspected at the point of delivery, that there might as well not be any inspection. If inspections were stricter, surely, some shipments would be confiscated, but we never hear about any such thing. Thus, low grade potatoes finally reach the large markets, to the prejudice of conscientious growers and the reputation of our product.

I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) is aware of this practice. I think he would agree with me that the absence of a strict control in the long run can only work against the good standing of our potatoes and give New Brunswick producers a poorer competitive position.

I ignore what is being done in Prince Edward Island or in other provinces in this respect. It remains, however, that most farmers graciously accept compulsory inspection. It is the best guarantee that their product will meet the highest government standards. Our farmers work hard to assure the fine quality of potatoes. They invest annually in the industry they cherish thousands of dollars to buy certified seeds. They take infinite care to control all kinds of contagious diseases.

The harvest is still quite an expensive operation nowadays and as the cost of farm machinery is not decreasing, as we know, profits are finally never guaranteed.

The potato market has experienced disturbing fluctuations during the past four years. This year, we are regaining confidence, because of crop failure in other countries and because apparently, it was not as good as it is usually here.

All this to say that awkward regulations and dishonest shippers can jeopardize the good reputation of New Brunswick potatoes in the province of Quebec and in Ontario as well.

[Mr. Corbin.]

It is necessary to pass more stringent regulations, to abolish those which have become obsolete, or else completely do away with regulations. But then, I think that would mean flirting with disaster.

Nobody, not even the shippers of bad quality potatoes, will lose. On the contrary, all shippers will benefit from the good reputation of a Canada No. 1 product from New Brunswick, and they will get higher prices as an extra bonus.

Another factor which makes it possible to avoid inspection is the allocation by the Department of Agriculture of warehouse numbers. A registered warehouse can ship table potatoes to another province, without inspection at the shipping point, but subject to inspection at the point of delivery. The original aim of this regulation was good, but there is so much abuse—some shippers take this as an excuse to ship goods of inferior quality—that the system of registered warehouses has lost some of its shine, if not all its value.

I do not invent these things and I insist in bringing them to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture.

I had several talks recently with farmers, shippers and federal government inspectors in my region; they all agree that the release permits and the system of registered warehouses must be investigated immediately so as to render justice to farmers and shippers who are careful to abide by all the provisions stipulated in the act in order to market top quality products, something which entails considerable expenses.

Those permits should be cancelled and then the inspectors should be given the tools that they need to do their work properly and completely. They should be paid for their overtime and reimbursed for the expenses incurred by them while carrying out their duties, whether in the day-time, at night or on Saturdays.

A small number of farmers or of potato shippers have obviously no right to endanger the potato market by their dealings or their violations of the regulations. The government has a moral obligation, as long as this act remains in force, to see that it is strictly enforced.

I am under the impression that the Minister of Agriculture is not aware of those problems, perhaps because his high officials themselves are not. If they are, it seems to me that they do not see the disastrous effects of the austerity program, having regard to the quality control program related to potato shipments in a designated area of the Maritimes, which means a lot.

I would not be telling the whole truth if I were to put all the blame on the farmers of my region. I know, from reliable sources, that some Quebec buyers very often buy in our region potato shipments which are never subject to federal inspection.

Naturally, this is mostly done at night. It could also take place during the day as there are never enough inspectors to meet the requirements at certain times.

In this regard I would hardly accept that the following proposal come under the austerity program: that the number of part-time and seasonal inspectors be materially increased to meet the present demand. In normal times, a permanent inspection team would be enough, but when important export contracts are negotiated, there are not enough inspectors to perform the task. Inspection, which also offers the farmer an opportunity to learn, is carried out too quickly in order to look after everyone.

Please note that I am not criticizing the principle nor questioning the merits of the austerity program itself. I am rather in favour of it. I simply question whether this is the right time to apply it to the potato inspection service which is quite essential.

Mr. Speaker, the government and the Minister of Agriculture gave a hand to potato growers last year for the third year in a row. That measure was greatly appreciated and the $600,000 subsidy granted under that program gave some hope to an industry which was beginning to feel the pressures of an overproduction that kept increasing from year to year.

Last year, in the house, we heard a great deal about the problems of wheat producers. I am quite sympathetic to their requests for governmental assistance, believe, me, because there was really a problem there. The assistance program is still and will remain in effect for some time.

The conditions in which New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island potato growers find themselves are strikingly similar to those of western wheat farmers, except that potato growers are far less numerous. The cultivated area is much smaller and the total value of a potato crop will never be comparable to the wheat harvest of a crop year.

We should not for all that consider as less important the potato industry, which constitutes the basis of farm activities in the Maritimes provinces and represents, in 1969, a total of many million dollars.

On the national level, the potato's importance is very small but as far as we are concerned in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, things are quite different. And the big difference is that the potato, unlike wheat, is a highly perishable product.

I wonder if the potato grower in the Maritimes, or in Canada, realizes that the potato market is over-saturated, year after year, and that as a result prices barely cover spring investments.

What the potato grower lacks most when planting time comes is a rough idea of the total number of acres that will be planted in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario and even out west. Planning should be done in this regard, at the national level.

We also feel the effects of the lack of planning of our neighbours in Maine and other states in the western U.S.A., where huge quantities of potatoes are grown.

None of us have a sure way of forecasting, with any degree of accuracy, what the coming crop will be. Of course, it is difficult to predict, but not impossible. In addition, the first crop forecasts of the federal government are often inaccurate, and when they are revised, more often than not towards the end of December, there is a sudden dip in the price of potatoes on the market.

This means that a better way should be found of assessing the crop, as soon as it comes up, in the fall, so that action might be taken more rapidly and, especially, more accurately, so that the industry will not be dealt an awful blow at the peak of the sales season.

For many years, and even today, the market price the grower gets for his potatoes depends on many factors which often have nothing at all to do with logic.

There is much speculation in that field, and it is true that fortunes have been made or lost through speculation alone.

Still, it seems to me, as it does to an increasing number of potato growers, that the market price should not depend solely on speculation, but should rest to a greater extent on a logical system.

[English]

I will give you one example of the highly speculative nature of potato marketing as quoted in the latest issue of Fraser's Potato Newsletter, subtitled "Prince Edward Island's only Publication for Potato People", published by Harry Fraser Hazelbrook in Prince Edward Island. It is a good publication. This passage in particular speaks for itself:

> Ontario's potato crop is nearly all under cover, we understand and, as we predicted in earlier letters, it was a very light crop. One prominent Alliston area grower contacted us this week and advised that the Maritimes could have the eastern Canada potato market tied up this winter, if Maritime growers would only realize their commanding position. This is not an independent opinion either as the Ontario Fruit and Vegetable Growers Association's weekly potato information letter has counselled Ontario growers to "sit back and hold potatoes and let the Maritimes supply the cheap product until they are sold out, then let's move in and take the market".

To say the least, such a state of affairs could be considered by us to be completely unsatisfactory. However, in my opinion it points out quite clearly the need for some kind of controlling body, preferably national in scope, to rationalize the marketing of potatoes throughout the nation, and especially to meet head-on the increasingly severe competition from U.S. producers and European surpluses which slowly but surely are invading some of our more stable and traditional South American markets.

The federal government cannot enter the field of provincial jurisdiction by setting up what would amount to a national potato marketing board without the provinces' consent and co-operation. On the other hand, it would be as a first step the role of the federal government to show leadership in the field by pointing out to the provinces the urgent need for the establishment of such a body and the danger of the collapse of the potato industry generally if yearly surpluses are allowed to continue much longer. I do not know why the application of gentle pressure on the provinces would not lead them to agree to the formation of such a national body, giving it powers with teeth in order to check the degeneration of what was once a flourishing industry.

It is true that the traditional marketing of potatoes is rapidly being overtaken by the marketing of processed products. An announcement was made this summer that McCain Foods of New Brunswick would establish a $5 million potato processing plant in my native city of Grand Falls in my riding. The news was heartily welcomed. It was also announced that the plant would be the first industrial venture to be considered for subsidy under the new Regional Development Incentives Act. I am confident that under this new act, at least one more processing plant will be established in my riding, thus creating many hundreds of jobs. However, we must realize there is also the danger of the potato market becoming a monopoly of a few. Time does not allow me to develop this idea further but, believe me, it is a matter of growing concern to potato growers throughout New Brunswick.

The processing of potatoes is solving some of our marketing problems, but it will certainly not be the ultimate solution. The traditional way of marketing through brokers may be with us for some time yet, but I am sure it could benefit from more rationalized methods of meeting competition and pricing. I hope our government will take some leadership in this field before potato producers find themselves in a situation similar to that of the western wheat grower.

• (8:30 p.m.)

I hope that the present potato selling campaign will have excellent results. Everybody was pleased, for example, with an export contract for 600 wagons of potatoes intended for Chile but first drought had to strike Chile so that we could profit by it.

Potato growing as well as wheat growing cannot and must not rely on agricultural disasters in other countries. I can assure you that the potato grower of my area, at least, is the last man to wish that his activity be subsidized, to the tune of millions of dollars, by the federal government. He would rather leave his farm than accept this.

However, it would be unfortunate to be driven to that because the best potatoes in the world are grown in my constituency.

I am convinced that a little imagination, goodwill and a lot of co-operation between the provinces and the federal government can promote this market on a more solid basis. This is my present wish.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my time is expired but I ask for the indulgence of the house so that I can finish my speech which will last perhaps three more minutes.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon member's time has expired and I gather he is seeking the consent of the House to continue beyond his allotted time. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Corbin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion I would like to quote from a publication of the now defunct Atlantic Development Board, entitled "The Competitive Position of Maritime Agriculture," published earlier this year in Ottawa. This is a remarkable study of great value. In connection with potato production it is stated very plainly that not only can potato production in the Maritime be sustained at its present level, but there is also room for expansion. I quote:

> The potential for expansion for potato production in the Maritimes is related primarily to increases in demand in areas outside the Maritime region. For Maritime producers this increase could come from three sources: population increase in central Canada, a larger share of the domestic market and increased exports. New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have virtually the entire seed export market for Canada and if their quality can be maintained their advantage will likely continue. Table stock exports and exports of processed products from Canada also originate mainly in the Maritimes. Maritime producers and processors should be able to capture a large proportion of any export expansion in these products. All of these aspects of the potato market (seed exports, domestic and export table stock markets, and domestic and export markets for processed potatoes) need further study and analysis before the potential for expansion in Maritime potato production can be fully and satisfactorily appraised.

So there it is. Who will tie the bell around the cat's neck, Mr. Speaker? May I humbly suggest that further investigation in this field be carried out by the ADC., the successor of the ADB. I would like to see a more aggressive and permanent sales and promotion campaign undertaken in all countries of our traditional South American market. However, it must be undertaken early in the year. I am under the impression that we missed the boat last year in this respect. So far this year things have improved somewhat.

Potatoes should receive at least a tenth of the attention now accorded wheat in respect of negotiating trade agreements with foreign countries. Canada is but a midget in potato production compared with many European countries, but Europeans know that we have one advantage over their produce—that is quality. With quality we can compete favourably with any country in the world for foreign markets. Right now I believe our handicap is insufficient effort in regard to promotion. If the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) can convince me otherwise, so much the better. However, other countries have shipping advantages that we do not have, as well as lower shipping costs and greater proximity to foreign markets. This enables them to more easily dump their yearly surpluses.

No wind is a favourable wind to the sailor who cannot decide which port he is making for. So I say here and now, let this government establish goals. To the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who in my opinion is one of the best captains that boat ever had, I say: Head out for these ports with a full cargo of Canada No. 1 table or seed potatoes. If they originate from New Brunswick so much the better.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I can think of no better way of starting my speech tonight than to refer to the Canadian Commission for UNESCO and an article in its bulletin entitled "Man and his Environment." I believe all of us in the House will agree that we have men, women and children in this country and that we do have an environment. The problem we have not yet solved is how to have a society in which men, women and children can live in a proper environment, with dignity and in tune with the times in which we live. The article to which I referred said that the experts had called attention "to the present fact and future danger of serious pollution, degradation, or outright destruction of the natural environment of which man is a part."

I am sure all of us were pleased that the Throne Speech said pollution control legislation would be introduced in this House. Only time will tell whether that legislation will have teeth. I am also sure we agree that all areas of Canada are polluted. Speaking of my own area, the various streams in the Moose Jaw region have been polluted by people who have made use of natural resources. I wish the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) from Saskatoon-Humboldt were in the House tonight. During the summer he visited the west and spoke at a number of Liberal meetings which were not open to the general public. He told the people there that some of their pollution problems would have to be solved by themselves. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that people as individuals do not pollute our streams. Manufacturing plants must bear the prime responsibility for such pollution and should be held responsible for correcting the situation. I quote further from the article "Man and his Environment".

> The positive aspects of man's control of his environment will be explored to determine the most effective way to achieve a design for living that would encourage the pursuit of beauty and enhance dignity in human relationships.

Some time ago I received from one of my constituents a letter about pollution. I am sure many hon. members remember the television program "The Way It Is", which dealt with a number of cases of pollution. My constituent dealt with the matter much more succinctly than I possibly could. Referring to logging in Algonquin Park, he wrote:

> —I wish to stress that all men of vision must condemn this practice. Surely it is the duty of all such men to constantly maintain vigil to see that the few unspoiled areas preserved in our national and provincial parks be passed on unimpaired to future generations of Canadians. Surely a country blessed with the resources of Canada need not infringe on the few wilderness areas set aside for non-commercial roles. Surely the practice of proper timber resource management ... of commercial forest areas should ensure that all future generations of Canadians will be guaranteed the enjoyment of exploring and enjoying the unimpaired beauty of Canada's national and provincial parks.

He continues a little later, referring to the type of strip mining going on in the Kootenays—and I am sure the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) is well aware of the situation there:

> ... to restore such strip mining areas to a degree as will eliminate the occurrence of acid mine drainage from polluting our rivers and as well enable reforestation of the area thus avoiding undue erosion as well as making the area of some future value ...

Mr. Speaker, the only purpose in raising this matter now is to assure the minister responsible for pollution control that he will have the utmost support if he will put teeth in the legislation he brings before the House. Unfortunately, I believe it will be a watered-down version, a "voluntary" type legislation, which means very little in this day and age. When the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) was in the west recently he mentioned that the municipalities should be asked to initiate programs supporting the legislation. I have brought this statement to the attention of the municipalities that I have visited recently and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the minister responsible for the legislation will be deluged with letters and information which he will find very useful if he is really concerned about the problem.

[Mr. Skoberg].

I now turn to something in a more serious vein—and I am not suggesting that pollution is not most serious. As one person out in the west said recently, he has two concerns: one is immediate cash in his pocket and the other is survival. He was talking about pollution of our atmosphere and the pollution of our general economic climate. Recently there has come to light the proposed dismissal and firing of many civil servants. The leader of my party has already dealt with this matter. I am sure that we in this House agree that responsible government needs an efficient staff of civil servants. I would like to quote from a speech made some time ago—before I was born, in fact. Lord Dufferin, speaking to the Agricultural and Arts Association in Toronto on September 24, 1878, had this to say, and I think the same holds true today:

> The civil service of the country, though not the animating spirit, is the living mechanism through which the body politic moves and breathes and has its being. Upon it depends the rapid and economical conduct of every branch of your affairs and there is nothing about which a nation should be so particular as to secure in such a service independence, zeal, patriotism and integrity.

This government has unilaterally, with very little consideration and very little negotiation with the Public Service Alliance of Canada, implemented changes which should have been brought about by attrition. I supported the comments made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) in this House when he endorsed the Freedman Commission Report which stated that no changes should be made without prior negotiation. It has been suggested that the Prime Minister's magical figure of 10 per cent could be taken care of by attrition in two years' time. This would look after his austerity program. I would ask that the House, and particularly the government, give serious consideration to the matter of attrition, which has of late been accepted in all responsible management and labour negotiations. If the government deliberately releases some senior civil servants it is quite likely that others will leave of their own accord. We will then have the brain drain we hear so much about. This is a deplorable situation.

In the last two days I have had the opportunity to attend the International Labour Organization conference now in session at the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa. I shall also attend it tomorrow. I am sure we all agree with some of the conventions passed at ILO conferences throughout the years, although they cannot be ratified by the government of Canada because of the provisions of the British North America Act. When we realize that the various provincial governments also have to agree to these conventions, we know why it is difficult to actively participate in the ILO and why very few of the conventions have been passed.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that once again we are getting into a situation where the government of Canada is reversing its stand. Instead of trying to achieve a strong central government, the trend is to decentralize and give the provinces much more power. It has been said that we in Canada believe in strong central government, whereas in the United States of America the states have strong central power. It seems that the United States is trying to achieve a strong central government with less power in the states, whereas Canada is deliberately moving in the direction of more power vested in the provinces and less power to the federal government.

Speaking now for myself and not for my party, Mr. Speaker, I say that the people of Canada are fed up with our educational system wherein people moving through mobility programs from province to province results in children being educated under a number of different educational programs. The armed forces are in the situation where their children may have to experience different educational programs because the individual provinces cannot get together and adopt a uniform system of education. This situation, again, exists because of the British North America Act. If a government is not prepared to accept responsibility, nothing is easier than to blame everything on the B.N.A. Act rather than trying to make the necessary changes to the act.

Of one thing I am positive, Mr. Speaker—that the people of Canada from coast to coast believe in one nation. Sometimes it seems that the government is trying to divide this country by saying that the provinces must be given unilateral authority in certain affairs. I do not believe this authority should be given to them. This may be another situation wherein many legal brains in the country are making a fortune at the expense of the individual, and I say that with due deference, Mr. Speaker.

I would now like to turn to a situation that has come to light in the House and this is in regard to Phillips Cables Limited. This matter has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) on many, many occasions. It is a great disservice for the government to suggest that the company has to look after itself and find its own markets for copper; and it seems ridiculous that Phillips should have to buy Canadian copper through a British firm, the London Metal Exchange, when the copper never leaves Canada, just to comply with the regulations. I know that many people in this House and many editorial writers regard our party as one that believes in the nationalization of all industry. Many in our party believe that if we have regulations to control industry it does not matter whether that industry is foreign or Canadian owned. Phillips Cables represent a Canadian industry that could go out of business today because the government is not prepared to pass regulations which would enable it to operate most successfully.

The government is not prepared to pass regulations which would ensure that the Phillips Cables Limited have adequate supplies of copper to keep it in business. I am expressing not only the point of view of labour but that of management when I say this. This government will stand forever condemned if Phillips Cables are forced out of business because they cannot obtain enough copper. The government cannot use the excuse that the strike is causing difficulty. Many years ago this company attempted to obtain copper from another company which will not now deliver to it. The company had to pay more for copper coming via the London exchange even though the copper was coming from Canada.

I am also disturbed about the freeze applied to non-competitive freight rates in the Atlantic region. In a news article emanating from the Department of Agriculture, the minister said—and I hope he is listening—that beyond doubt the adjustments being made will also correct some inequitable situations which now exist between rate zones, and that specific changes in rates will be announced later by the Canadian Livestock Feed Board. The import of those words is that once again those who are most concerned about the matter will be left in a state of confusion. The news release dated October 16 went on to say:

> The increase in demand for Western feed grains has been due primarily to poorer oat and corn crops in Ontario and a more attractive price relationship for feed grains for Western Canada compared to U.S. corn than has prevailed in the past.

I ask the minister, whom are we really trying to protect? Are we protecting our own growers, or United States corn growers? If we are trying to protect our own producers, that is fair enough; but the press release seems to indicate that the minister is interested only in helping United States corn growers.

I now wish to speak about a subject I am fairly familiar with, that of railways. I am very concerned about the safety of railway operations. In the past I have tried, unsuccessfully, to have the Minister of Transport initiate public hearings into various mishaps that have occurred on railways, but nothing has happened. The mishaps are still occurring; people are still being maimed and killed and nothing is being done about it. I read from a circular letter addressed to all CNR section foremen of the Saskatchewan area, which says in part:

> As you are no doubt aware, the increasing number of derailments account track conditions is a matter of grave concern throughout the Railway industry as a whole. This concern is becoming more apparent, not only in the United States, but in Canada as well.
> The incidence of derailments at switches has recently shown a sharp increase and would suggest that switch maintenance is being overlooked due to the pressure of other work.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the number of maintenance-of-way employees has been drastically reduced in this country to the point where it is no longer possible for them to adequately patrol railway tracks. Nevertheless, these employees are held responsible for derailments. Inevitably, derailments cause injury and death, but when these matters are brought before the Canadian Transport Commission they are hushed up and not made public. The accidents which are occurring are not being given the publicity they deserve. The government is obligated to make sure that railways operate safely. When you have an air line accident involving an aircraft there is a full public inquiry and the results of the inquiry are made available to everybody. There ought to be the same sort of inquiry into any Railway derailment. Unfortunately, the results of such inquiries often are not made public. You should see the type of inquisition that is carried on, Mr. Speaker. Instead of putting the blame where it belongs, our authorities often blame the employees themselves.

I now wish to speak about agriculture. When I was out west recently I spoke to a man about our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), who had returned from Europe in a very optimistic mood. The man commented on the minister's optimism by saying it is like a Baptist Minister at a hanging—always optimistic. I hope the minister's optimism is justified and that we shall have new markets for our products. No one in this house will downgrade the efforts the minister has been making to help agriculture. Nevertheless, I believe if one examines the record one will see that planning in our agricultural economy is nonexistent. I received from the minister on October 17, 1969, a letter on the subject of agriculture. Unfortunately, it contains no suggestion from the department as to how farmers in any area can diversify their production. In the last year or two, and particularly last year, we heard a great deal about diversification. It is the latest political catchword. Unfortunately, the people in agriculture often do not know how to diversify or what crops they should grow. When they ask the government how to diversify, the government does not answer, because it does not know. That is understandable. No one really knows what the catchword "diversification" means. It is simply a political cliché that has appeared in the press, in the minister's statements and those of many others.

If this government is really concerned about agriculture, let it come out with a policy statement. It should make papers submitted to agricultural conferences and congresses available to those engaged in agriculture so they would know what to do. The minister has said that as soon as one of these documents is translated he will make it available to us all. I tell him that in many parts of Canada where they speak English they do not have to wait for a translation. I am sure the people of those areas would welcome receiving from the minister any papers he has on the subject. Our agricultural community must be given direction.

In my trip out west last month I heard people say that to some extent the government must be brutal; it must designate certain areas as being suitable for certain crops. Many thousands of acres are used to grow crops which are unsuitable for the area. Whether the government likes the idea or not, the people engaged in agriculture must be governed by certain regulations.

At this point may I make some suggestions about on-farm stored grain. I am sure the minister realizes that in western Canada many millions of bushels of grain are stored in what are colloquially known as Trudeau bins. These are temporary structures. I have the feeling that unless the government takes immediate action in this area, it will prove to be a very temporary government. The elevators charge one cent per bushel per month for grain to be stored. I think handling charge is 3-3/4 cents. Farmers who must build bins to store grain ought to be entitled to at least one cent per month per bushel for their on-farm stored grain. Surely that is not asking too much. This is done in other parts of the world. Once again I ask whether the government will let our agriculture drift, or will it give it guidance? I ask the minister to consider seriously paying storage costs to farmers for on-farm stored grain. In this way many farmers in western Canada who have built storage facilities could be reimbursed for their outlays and storage costs.

Another matter I wish to mention is cash advances for those who are renting land. At present these people are not entitled to cash advances. I realize that my remarks do not interest those in the potato growing business. Cash advances are made only to those farmers who own land. Even though an individual may own land, if he also rents land from someone else he will not be paid one nickel in cash advances not even on the land he owns.

Surely it would not be too much to ask the government to pass a regulation which would permit the individual producer to at least borrow money on his own land. With the idea machines and the electronic devices we have today, surely this could be done. Under the present circumstances people renting land are in a very invidious position; they are discriminated against. Under the present regulations nothing can be done to solve this problem.

The Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) was asked a question by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). It appears at page 17 of Hansard for October 24. He was asked what assistance the people in the Peace River country were going to receive. The answer was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, it is at least one of the brighter facets of having a surplus of grain that those farmers who have not been able to harvest this year's crop are not as handicapped in filling quotas, with grain on hand from previous years, as they have sometimes been.

Surely no one with practical knowledge of the subject would allow such an answer to appear in Hansard or even make such a statement, when the individuals primarily affected do not have a surplus of grain on hand. It is a disgrace to this House that a minister should make such a statement. It again points out the fact that the whole bureaucracy of our government is composed of people who have no practical knowledge of the field with which they are dealing. The people of Canada, not only those engaged in agriculture but those in every other field of endeavour, are increasingly finding this to be true. It is time we tried to find people with practical knowledge, experience and education to fill these positions and deal with the very serious situations which exist.

I now wish to relate a recent experience. There was a serious hail storm. No. 2 northern grain was being purchased at 50 cents a bushel. The minister was well aware of this. At the same time this year's feed grain and No. 1 and No. 2 northern were being purchased for 35 cents a bushel. Barley was being purchased at 25 cents a bushel for large feed lots. The people operating large feed lots are naturally in the cattle business.

This leads me to the last question that I wish to ask the minister. Why does he not put all feed grains under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board? There does not seem to be any justification saying this cannot be done. Feed grains must be put under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board if we are to expect an orderly marketing of our grain. To suggest this cannot be done is, in effect, saying, "I don't care; the people in the cattle business are being well looked after." If we are concerned about only one industry, to the detriment of those growing grain, it is time we found out why we have this policy.

Another point I wish to raise is the land bank concept, which receives considerable attention in the United States, although I do not necessarily agree with many of their policies. If we are to recognize agriculture as one of the basic industries in Canada, we must have land available which can be put into production on a year's notice. Why do we not invent a land bank concept of preserving the land and paying the farmer for the land that is to be put into production? There seems to be money available to large corporations, the writing off of taxes, etc., but the principal concern about the agricultural economy is forgotten. This is a matter we ought to be considering.

With regard to the Canadian Wheat Board, Mr. Speaker, too many people in responsible positions in Canada are deliberately trying to undermine the Wheat Board. I strongly believe that the Canadian Wheat Board can do the job, if given the proper tools. Too often in the past this government and its cabinet have not given the Canadian Wheat Board the tools with which to do the job. I am sure those who remember the loss of a barley sale a year or two ago realize that if the Canadian Wheat Board had been in a bargaining position it may not have occurred. What disturbs me is that international brokerage firms are involved in the marketing and manipulation of our grain. I wonder how many other countries allow international brokerage firms to handle their sales of grain. How many countries are ahead of us in so far as the brochure for trying to sell Canada's grain is concerned?

The Canadian Wheat Board, if given the authority, could handle the complete transaction, but we must ensure that we back them up. There are too many people—there is one in particular in Saskatchewan—who in the press deliberately condemn the Canadian Wheat Board. I can only think this is being done in order to get back to the old hatchet system of the open market and to do away with the Wheat Board. In this way more people would become millionaires.

I am sure the minister has looked fully into the situation at the port of Churchill. I am certain this matter has been dealt with in this House. Many hon. members know Mr. Gray, the Secretary-Treasurer of the Hudson Bay Route Association, and agree that we should extend the insurance which is provided there. Mr. Gray made a very forceful point with regard to the handling of rapeseed and flax. He indicated that we could increase the sale of these grains through Churchill if the port was allowed a more open season. There is no ice at this time at the port of Churchill, yet the season is closed. This question should be looked into. I hope this has already been done.

In today's mail I received a press report from the Calgary Herald dated October 11, 1969. I hope the minister will interrupt and correct me if it is wrong.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired, unless unanimous consent is given for him to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Skoberg: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and members of the House. This press report states:

> ... United Grain Growers Limited in Lethbridge in November, it may be possible to have the delegates inspect a project which has been kicked around in UGG board meetings for some time ... this is the potential purchase of the federal government inland terminal elevator for the purpose of integrating it into the UGG elevator system ... UGG has bought the federal inland terminal elevator at Moose Jaw ...

I wonder if the minister would interrupt me at this time and say whether that is correct? It would be most interesting to know if it is. If it is correct, it has been kept a deep, dark secret until this time. I had not heard of this, and I come from the Moose Jaw area. There has been no indication of this purchase. The minister is nodding his head. I am glad to know it is not correct.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He was shaking it!

Mr. Skoberg: Which way? I would like to say in closing that we all realize the name of the game is "change". All members of the House are prepared to accept changes which will benefit the people of this nation. If changes are proposed by the government at this time, they will have no problem getting their legislation through the House so long as it is to our betterment and improves the conditions which now exist.

Many people in this country are living on fixed incomes. This is degrading, to say the least. Pensions should be increased. There is no purpose in my speaking about that subject because it was very forcefully dealt with this morning by my colleague. If we are to have faith in a government that is telling us they believe in a society that is just for everyone, that government should bring in legislation which will do just that.

I was most displeased last night to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) telling everyone that carrying out certain ideas expressed by members of the New Democratic Party would mean the state moving into every factory, every office, every trade union and every household. He was at pains to point out what a terrible situation would be created. Mr. Speaker, it is not possible to have a flourishing economy unless it is planned. No one can tell me that the people of this nation, those who are doing without essentials at this very moment, those who are subjected to interest rates which scalp them, would reject action which is in their interest. The minister must realize that the people do matter and that this is a nation to be proud of—one nation, if only the government would do something about it.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, it is customary during the debate on the Speech from the Throne to extend congratulations to all those who have been recognized in a special way since parliament last met—those who have been promoted within the cabinet and so forth—and also to extend congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address. This has been done already by many speakers in the course of the debate and all I intend to add to this traditional aspect of our proceedings is that I heartily endorse those sentiments.

This is not the first debate on the Address in which I have taken part. As a matter of fact, as I look across to my right at the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) I am reminded that it is about 19 years since we were first exposed to the mysteries of this Parliament of Canada; since we arrived on Parliament Hill to conquer new worlds and change the destiny of the nation. I am sure that is the sentiment of a good many members when they first arrive in parliament.

Looking back over that period of Canadian history one realizes that there have been many changes. Some have been for the better and others have been for the worse. I note that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his contribution to the debate on Friday last summed up his remarks by saying, in effect, that it was the government's intention to direct the processes of change in such a way as to ensure they would redound to the general good of Canada. I have the exact words before me as reported on page 43 of Hansard. The Prime Minister said:

> We intend in the future as in the past to be the voice of change; we shall not forsake our role as advocate of the great mainstream of Canadians and we intend to listen, to understand, to respond and to lead.

Over the past 19 years I have heard many speeches, as you can well imagine, Mr. Speaker, and I have learned to take many of the sentiments expressed in this chamber with the proverbial grain of salt. I have become somewhat less idealistic than I was when I first came here, and I have concluded that the best way to interpret the earnest of the desire of any administration is not necessarily to draw conclusions from the words which are spoken but to watch the policies of the particular administration or political leader concerned for proof of action in the best interests of Canada.

Tonight I want to deal briefly with some of the changes which have taken place in recent years and which I feel are not in the best interests of this institution of parliament nor in the best interests of the unfolding development of Canada as a nation from sea to sea. I like the sentiment expressed by the Prime Minister in some exalted words at the conclusion of his speech. He said this institution of parliament was designed to resolve differences to which he had referred, and I agree heartily with that proposition. Unfortunately, fundamental changes are taking place in this institution, changes which I feel go in a direction completely opposite to the sentiment expressed by the Prime Minister in his contribution to the debate the other afternoon. Maybe in considering this question of change we have arrived at a point where the change is so fundamental that it is almost as profound as during a period such as the Reformation, which changed the basic perspectives of the society of that time.

Values are changing in the world in which we live today. As the old preacher in the book "Green Pastures" expressed it: "Everything not nailed down am coming loose." We are faced with all the problems generated by a fundamental change in values in the direction of relativism of the new morality, and of tensions created by the advent of the permissive society which are having such a disastrous influence on our basic social institutions, be they the family, the institutions of education or even those of parliamentary democracy. It is the virus of this profound change—perhaps I should use the word "poison"—which is biting deep into the body politic. As has been forcibly brought to our attention, this is reflected particularly in the younger generation of Canadians who were born into the nuclear age, who have been programmed into the computer age and who, more recently, were skyrocketed into the space age. In these circumstances it is not hard to understand why there is confusion, as is made manifest in some of the activities which have come to public attention, to the attention of the government and to the attention of all members of the House in recent weeks. I quote, for example, what has occurred with respect to the government's charges against the Company of Young Canadians, the group which was established by legislative decree of this House just a few years ago to be a vehicle whereby young Canadians could participate on a voluntary basis in giving guidance amid the profound social changes which have been affecting Canada so seriously.

I could refer also to the disturbances in our universities which have become the occasion of almost daily headlines in our newspapers and which certainly have been reported prominently by that great public organ of information the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which has itself been facing certain difficulties as a result of the deep-seated process of change which has been going on.

The Prime Minister has responded to these indices of confusion and disorganization in Canadian society and, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said so effectively the other day, has engaged in verbal over-kill in order to make the point that he wanted to make at that time. The situation could be expressed in another way: He was, perhaps, using a baseball bat to kill a flea. In other words, Mr. Speaker, his was a sudden, almost emotional, response to a very delicate situation.

Since the statements of the Queen's first minister in Canada have a profound influence right across the country in view of the prestige of that office, if we are not careful, Mr. Speaker, this sort of thing could result in incipient McCarthyism and witch-hunting which, of course, is not a reasonable approach to the problem of reflecting serious social change. Indeed, it has now reached the point where it is attempting to tear at the very foundations of national unity.

One problem in this House of Commons that does not change from year to year is the basic consideration given to policies that are enunciated and brought forward by government, supported by this parliament, which are designed to bring together Canadians of all ethnic origins from sea to sea in what we like to refer to as national unity. The problem of national unity in a country like Canada becomes more difficult to deal with in periods of rapid change, and we are passing through such a period at the present time.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

In another statement that the Prime Minister made recently he said he had solved the problem of national unity, and that in another five years he would perhaps be able to move off the political stage. Having listened to hon. members from all parts of Canada in the course of this debate outlining the economic problem that are facing various sections of the country, it would seem to me that a statement of that kind indicates that the right hon. gentleman is very much out of tune with the prevailing mood and spirit of the nation. Never was there a time when there was more restlessness and confusion in the Canadian body politic.

In recent years that there has been a tendency to concentrate upon the issues that separate us rather than upon those that bring us together. The Prime Minister has this exasperating habit of heading in two opposite directions at the same time, and this makes it very difficult for the Canadian people, who are part of the Canadian mosaic, to understand exactly where the Prime Minister is going. It is almost like riding into the eye of a hurricane. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the problem of national unity becomes increasingly difficult during periods of social change. It therefore behooves all of us, in our observations on the subject, to underline and support some of the fundamental institutions which have been the unifying forces in Canada since the beginning of this nation.

For example, I do not think it is helpful at this time constantly to downgrade and erode such a fundamental institution as the monarchy. I do not want to dwell on this theme at any great length, but even in the official references in the documents of Canada we have had it underscored that the role of the monarchy as a symbolic, unifying force in this nation has been downgraded and eroded. The Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), in a speech that he made during a visit to London last summer, indicated that Canada will inevitably become a republic. Well, now, that is his belief and his sentiment. For myself I do not think there is anything inevitable about a process of that kind. Actually, the institution of constitutional monarchy has been one of the main sources and symbols of Canadian unity down through the years. Indeed, it has made possible our movement forward as a nation in the midst of all kinds of divisive and centrifugal forces in the Canadian body politic.

Another very important example of this technique of moving in two ways at the same time, of downgrading an institution merely because it is traditional and of long standing, is this: At the other end of the scale we find spokesmen for the government, from the Prime Minister down, moving toward a policy of narrow nationalism in recent announcements of changes in defence policy. In the sort of world in which we live, one in which the impact of change is even more profound on the international scene than on the domestic scene, this has caused a spirit of pessimism to prevail at the United Nations. It has also caused the former Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, to state that the affluent nations must be more generous in their support of the underdeveloped nations. I think that any institution that has achieved progress in bringing together a consort of nations as a meaningful international body should be supported with increased enthusiasm by the government of Canada. Regrettably, government spokesmen in recent months have seen fit to downgrade NATO.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization was moulded from the challenge of international Communism which arose in the latter 1950's. We in Canada gave until recent times our wholehearted support to this organization. It was regarded, in the first instance, as a co-operative form of military defence on the part of Atlantic nations against the threat of external subversive influences. But it was more than a military force; it was also the nucleus of a political entity.

It was devoutly hoped it would become the nucleus of a significant political force which might even move forward to become the pioneering experiment in some form of international federalism. Many members of this House have had the opportunity to attend NATO Parliamentary Association meetings. There has always been there great enthusiasm and support for the ultimate objectives of the NATO Parliamentary Association becoming a useful forum that would see the North Atlantic communities grow closer together in the beginning of a new total international co-operation which is urgently needed in the sort of jungle situation which prevails in the dealings between governments at the present time. If we downgrade our military contribution to NATO it means that our voice in the political deliberations of that important body will be equally downgraded.

I was overseas this summer for a couple of weeks and was shocked to see the rapid decrease, almost to the vanishing point, of the prestige of Canada in such countries as West Germany, the United Kingdom, Belgium and all the other countries which are playing a vital role in the promotion of the NATO ideal both military and political. We have unilaterally, without consultation with members of this House and certainly ignoring the recommendations of the comprehensive study made by the External Affairs Committee, withdrawn our strong support for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

This is just one example. Many others could be quoted. Perhaps the main criticism I should like to make is that much of this has been done without parliamentary approval. In fact, there has been a move in the opposite direction. Many of the announcements are made outside this House when parliament is in recess. It would almost appear to be a deliberate device to avoid criticism. Unfortunately, the Prime Minister's version of participatory democracy seems to be to appeal directly to public opinion rather than the slower and more difficult process of parliamentary discussion. I believe that one thing in this process of change which has brought about so much confusion in the nation has been the tendency of the government to an increasing extent to downgrade the principle of responsible government which is absolutely essential if parliament is to continue to play the unifying role that the Prime Minister mentioned in his speech when he said this institution of parliament is designed to resolve the differences that are wracking the Canadian community at the moment.

These topics have been referred to many times. I could talk about the roster system whereby ministers show their lack of respect for the principle of responsibility by indicating they feel there are more important duties to attend to in their ministerial responsibilities than listening to hon. members in this House. The tendency of ministers to make statements outside the chamber undercuts the elected representatives on the government and opposition sides of the House. There would appear to be a tendency to govern through the mass media. In this way there is instant communication with instant solutions for all the problems which change almost as quickly as the kaleidoscopic images on television. There would appear to be the assumption of a presidential role without the checks and balances of the presidential system. Announcements are made at press conferences rather than in this chamber, particularly on the eve of the opening of parliament. The distinguished parliamentary correspondent, Charles Lynch, refered to this in a recent article when he said:

> In their press conferences, few American presidents have ever covered ground as sweeping as Mr. Trudeau did yesterday—telling off France, Quebec separatists, the Company of Young Canadians in rapid-fire order, plus recognizing the Vatican.
> He enlarged his cabinet—already the largest in Canadian history—by adding a wheat minister and an assistant finance minister, and said the cabinet might grow even bigger.

The growth of the power of the executive is one of the disturbing features I have noticed take place surreptitiously and constantly in the 19 years I have been in this chamber. If the Prime Minister, when he refers to the process of change and the necessity of consulting the institution of parliament in resolving differences, really means this there must be more than words; there must be action. This action must be vastly different from the action and the attitude which has prevailed in the executive branch of this government since it assumed office just over a year ago.

Parliament is no longer the sounding board of the process of government in Canada. Some people say that parliament is dead, that this House is dead and that there is no interest and no confrontation in debate across the chamber. It is suggested that as a consequence members stay away in droves. The high court of public opinion, the raison d'être of this institution, tends to become a legislative treadmill. There is nothing that reveals the real intent of this government in the House of Commons more clearly than its insistence on Bill C-75 in the dogdays of the past session last July.

Another problem that relates very closely to this whole difficulty of maintaining national unity in a situation of growing diversity is the necessity to deal with the continuing problems, in fact the growing problems, of regional disparity. Important as parliament is as a sounding board of public opinion, we will not really come to grips with the problems of Canadian nationhood until we deal in concrete terms with specific economic problems.

One of the few specifics mentioned by the Prime Minister during that confused election of 1968 was the necessity of dealing with regional disparity and bringing about a more equitable economic situation in the various parts of Canada. Unfortunately, in the changing circumstances the poor have become poorer and the rich have become richer. I am referring not only to individuals but to the underdeveloped parts of Canada. There is lack of diversification in the economy because of the tendency for political power as well as economic development to concentrate in the two big central provinces. I believe it should be mentioned that at the present time there are movements both in the far eastern part of Canada and in western Canada. Discussions are going on with a view to making a united appeal to Ottawa to break up the core of economic power in the golden triangle to which reference is often made.

On looking at the Speech from the Throne I agree with other hon. members who have referred to its lack of specific policies and its generalities in dealing with the great economic issues of Canada. It almost seems that the present government, as was said by the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent in reference to the lack of interest of governments over the years in the development of the north, is dealing with the problems of the extremities of Canada, both east and west, in a state of absentmindedness. It appears as if the present government regards east and west as colonies to be placated but not to be provided with the economic programs that are needed if we are to really deal with one of the major difficulties of national unity, that is, regional disparity.

I could point out many examples of this kind, but in view of the shortness of time I would just mention in passing—I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) dealt with the subject the other day—that an important event is to be celebrated both in Manitoba and in the Northwest Territories next year when both these parts of Canada will be celebrating their centennial. This underlines the fact that when Manitoba was first carved out of the Northwest Territories in 1870 and when the Northwest Territories as a whole became a part of the Canadian federation, a new dimension was added to the Canadian community which has added a positive and dynamic force to what we in western Canada call the Canadian mosaic. What has happened in western Canada is that a spirit of Canadianism that has been derived from peoples who have come in search of the freedom and opportunities of the new world has produced a mosaic that is as colourful as the Canadian maple leaf in autumn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Unless unanimous consent is given to allow him to continue, he will not be able to do so.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you for your generosity, Mr. Speaker, and also I thank hon. members. I would like to have dealt with specific problems, such as the problem of the agricultural community in western Canada. Many western spokesmen have brought this difficulty to the attention of the House, and if the Prime Minister and his ministers are really listening, I am sure they will have the basis of policies which if applied to solving the difficulty will make a major contribution in dealing with what has become a major economic crisis.

The crisis has now been recognized in the appointment of a special minister to deal with wheat. I am sure that we will see some solutions coming out of this particular corner of the cabinet. The minister is a westerner; he understands the difficulties and certainly he has had enough advice to enable him to deal with them.

There is only one further contribution that I would like to make in offering advice, that is to underscore the fact that salesmanship is the real solution to the problem of wheat which has become a glut rather than a benefit to the Canadian economy generally. The farmers have already put forward a suggestion which were it adopted by the government would, I am sure, accelerate the sale of the surplus grain that is piling up in the Trudeau bins as the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) referred to them, and it would not cost the public treasury a penny.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has already been approached about this matter. The farmers want to set up a farmer-financed sales agency to get out and sell grain aggressively so as to get beyond the international cartels that have no particular interest in selling Canadian wheat. They would finance it out of a small deduction from each bushel of grain. It would be something similar to the United States export marketing agency which has recently been set up to deal with their similar problem of surplus agricultural products.

I will not transgress further on the time of the House, but by way of summary I will go back to my opening remarks and say that I agree heartily with the Prime Minister when he says that the fundamental problems of Canada today have been aggravated, if not precipitated, by the processes of change that are striking at the very foundation not only of Canadian society but of the world community. Change can be either positive or negative. It does not necessarily bring about a renaissance in national and international life. There must be positive leadership and there must be concrete programs if a just society is to be established in fact as well as in name. It must be based not on words but on action. This is the major criticism of the Speech from the Throne and it is the major criticism of the government. The words are fine, the music is pleasant, but we seem to be dancing in circles. Let us match action with policies and programs to deal with some of the fundamental difficulties to which I have referred briefly and to which reference has been made by other hon. members. Especially let us stop the erosion of the institution of parliament so that members, instead of becoming ciphers and nonentities or, as the Prime Minister himself said in the final days of the last acrimonious session, absolutely useless in dealing with the affairs of the nation can contribute to this much publicized just society.

I say to the Prime Minister: Give us a chance. Listen to the advice. I am sure that we shall meet in a positive way the challenge of change rather than create greater disunity and division in the Canadian nation, which has been the case during the first few months of this administration's life.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have the pleasure of closing off this enjoyable day. First I want to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I expected those hon. members to make laudatory remarks. People will read their remarks and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has taken notice of them.

Of course, they expect to be lauded and complimented. I have listened to all the other speeches, especially those from backbenchers, and I found them very interesting. Indeed, I thought that some of them under the guise of flattery were rather critical of the government, I think that is a good thing. From my experience I would like to tell backbenchers that if they are going to be critical of the government the safest place to do it is right here in the House of Commons. Do not do it in the press because then your criticism will get down to the ministers and to the Prime Minister and you will be chastised. Do not do it in letters to your constituents. Do it here in this House where you are absolutely safe. Certainly there are ministers who attend in this house but they very seldom pay attention to speakers; they are busy writing letters so the backbencher can say what he likes. Further, all the members of the Press Gallery leave the chamber right after the question period. For most of the rest of the time there is only one gentleman sitting in the Press Gallery. This has been my experience over seven years. There are two sitting there now, and that is rather usual. I strongly suspect that one of the gentlemen to whom I refer is not even a reporter; I suspect he is a hired man put there to make it appear that the press is represented in this House.

As the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) said, it is sad that this House is no longer an effective House, an effective organ. It is a fact that the parliamentary system does not completely suit this form of government or this country. Most of the time we talk at each other rather than to each other; then the parliamentary secretaries talk to the ministers, the ministers talk to the deputy ministers, the deputy ministers to the establishment, and the establishment talks to God. Nobody really cares what we are saying here. Therefore I repeat my advice to new members. In the seven years that I have been critical of the government not once have I been chastised for being critical of it here in this chamber.

When I approached the bar of the other place to hear the Speech from the Throne I of course could not hear very well because there was no loud speaker system. However, I did catch a couple of words with which I was very pleased.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That was on Wednesday. The loudspeaker was working on Thursday.

Mr. Otto: Anyway, the words I thought I heard were that we were going to have a Canadian research centre or corporation. This has been talked about for many years. It is something we should have, to advise our government. We should have a comprehensive research organization which will at least diagnose our problems carefully and accurately and provide a base upon which the government can act. Unfortunately, when I read the Speech from the Throne I saw it referred to a Canadian international research centre which is to give advice on our contributions to the newly developing nations. Of course, that will be a good thing also. I have no criticism of it, because in many cases aid given by both the United States and Canada has not necessarily been used to the best advantage.

I recall that some years ago in Turkey I saw a brand new road that had been built with American money, a road which sort of went from corner to corner. It started nowhere and ended nowhere, but certainly took in a great number of zigzags. When I inquired why it served no particular purpose I found that certain members of the government had houses or land in various places and the road went through each of those places. Indeed, a great deal of Canadian money has also gone the wrong way. Therefore if this proposed centre is a good one it will serve a useful purpose. However, it seems to me that we in Canada need such an organization—a "think tank" as it was once called. Last year the Prime Minister said he was in favour of such an organization. I think the quicker it is established the better it will be.

I jotted down some of the points that I thought should concern a Canadian research centre if such is formed. It should not merely be concerned with research for marketing or for government. It should be a composite research project. At present we have research branches in various departments of government. This is something quite new; there were none eight years ago. But these branches do not talk to each other. The agricultural research branch feeds advice to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), and other branches advise the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). Each one is on a different tack. We cannot function in this day and age without a composite basis, a carefully packaged research concept that will encompass all departments and work in conjunction with them. This is not something new.

In 1951 the Japanese government formed the Japanese Trade Research Organization for Japanese industry, commonly known as Jetro.

I recall that one of the first reports compiled for it was commissioned from a Canadian company, Gruneau Marketing Research. It dealt with cameras and how the Japanese could introduce cameras that would capture half of the world market. This is only 1969 but already Japanese cameras, that is high-priced cameras, command half of the world market. I recall another example in connection with Jetro. It concerned luggage. I saw a report which indicated not only the type of luggage that Canadians liked but also its shape, the type of plating—whether nickel or brass—who bought most of the luggage sold in Canada, what clubs they belonged to, what religious denominations they professed, and how they would accept Japanese salesmen. We do not have this effective type of research. What we have are research organizations in the various departments, without any common purpose.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it being ten o'clock this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 2(2).

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ORAL QUESTIONS

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEEL PRICE INCREASES—CONSULTATION WITH GOVERNMENT—PRICES AND INCOME COMMISSION STUDY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Did the Steel Company of Canada consult the government of Canada before making the recent announcement of price increases on its products?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that in 1967 the then Minister of Finance told the House that the Steel Company of Canada had consulted the government before the increase which took place at that time, has the government on this occasion protested the lack of consultation by the Steel Company of Canada before the recent price increases?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In the light of existing jurisprudence on this question, would the right hon. and learned gentleman not agree with me that there must be joint action with the provinces and that the assertion of the Prime Minister when he rushed out of the House to say on television that the federal government was considering taking sole action sounded suspiciously like the mouse that roars?

An hon. Member: The mouse wants to roar. Better let him.

Mr. Speaker: I have to rule that the hon. member's question is suspiciously irregular. It cannot be received at this time because it is asked in an argumentative manner.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that in 1967 the government of Canada requested that price increases be deferred for six months, was there any reason why the government did not ask the Steel Company of Canada to defer the recent price increases for the same period of time?

Mr. Benson: Immediately preceding the price increase there was a prolonged strike in the steel industry resulting in a large wage settlement. I understand that the Prices and Incomes Commission is going to look into the matter in an attempt to find whether or not there was justification for the increase in prices and wages. I should like to congratulate them for their action in this regard.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the failure of the government to request deferment of the price increase, even though deferment was agreed to in 1967, can the minister state the significance of the investigation announced by the Prices and Incomes Commission in relation to the government's anti-inflationary policy?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the reason the government did not ask for a price deferment on this occasion was that we did not have the facts and we have not got the right to command these facts from either labour or industry. The Prices and Incomes Commission, as I presumed they would, are looking into the situation. When the facts are reported this House will have the opportunity of looking at them and deciding whether or not the actions of labour and management in this case are inflationary or were justified, and I would hope we would have a great deal more knowledge of the facts than we have at present—

An hon. Member: You mean more increases.

Mr. Benson: —to wage the fight in this matter.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Since the Prices and Incomes Commission is now studying this matter, will the government make it known to that commission that it would welcome an early recommendation on which the government can act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the things that the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and I have been saying are an indication that we hope there will be an early report on this matter. If it appears that there will be no early report, then we shall have to consider other ways of making the facts known.

While I am on my feet answering a question, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will allow me to correct the misinterpretation inherent in the question asked by the hon. member for Peace River. He quoted me as having said that the federal government would suggest the control of prices and incomes. I said that that is something we are considering; that if a constitutional amendment is needed we will discuss it with the provinces.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. So that the Prime Minister's answer will be clear, may I ask if he wants only a report from the Prices and Incomes Commission or does he want a recommendation on which the government can act? That was my question.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Finance said, we want to know the facts. It will be up to the commission to present them in any way it wants to, either by way of report or by recommendation. I repeat, it is an independent commission and we cannot dictate to it its terms of reference in a case like this. After having obtained the facts from the commission we shall have to consider what action to take. Alternatively, if we fail to ascertain the facts because of delay, we shall have to consider alternative means of action.

Mr. Stanfield: May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Will he not request a deferment of these price increases until the commission has conducted its investigation. Even though the commission may have announced that it will make no findings of fact, will the minister not request it to do so? In view of the experience of 1967 will the government, in place of this morning's sloppy announcement, not request a deferment of price increases until a meaningful investigation has been conducted by the Prices and Incomes Commission so that some action may be taken?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I regret my hon. friend's derogatory comment about the Prices and Incomes Commission which I think is doing a pretty good job. It has been trying to do something about controlling inflation.

Mr. Hees: Answer the question.

Mr. Benson: I will answer the question if my hon. friend will permit me to and stop interrupting. Of course we can ask people to defer potential price increases; perhaps we could ask labour to defer its wage increases. However, we have the power to force neither of these things, and anything we say in this regard would be merely an expression of pious hopes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benson: I hope the Prices and Incomes Commission will in a very short period of time determine the facts in these particular circumstances. Then we, both as a government and as a parliament, will have the right to look at them and decide whether these increases are inflationary in the circumstances. Some people in the House may prefer to express an opinion about who is to blame when they have the facts and not express opinions before they know anything about them.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Would the Prime Minister be more specific about this fundamental matter and tell us whether he or his government has appointed, officially or unofficially, a group of experts who would determine if the federal government is empowered by the Canadian constitution to control prices and wages without encroaching upon provincial powers?

Mr. Trudeau: This general matter has been referred for consideration to the Department of Justice which, as the hon. member knows, acts as an adviser to the government on constitutional and legal matters.

Mr. Fortin: I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker.

Do the terms of reference of the task force provide for this particular aspect of the question, that is the federal government authority in this instance, to be examined?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is the same question. We have asked the Department of Justice for an opinion and their counsels always answer as fast as they can.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answers the Prime Minister has given to other hon. members, will he advise us whether his law officers have advised the government that it is unconstitutional for the federal government to control prices at this time in the light of the inflation crisis?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we will receive the advice of the law officers of the Crown and we will decide to act upon it as we see fit.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary. My question was clear. Have the law officers advised the government whether it is constitutional or unconstitutional? Does the Prime Minister have that advice at this time?

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps some time in the past it might have been done, Mr. Speaker, though I am not aware of it. On this specific issue, we have referred the question to the Department of Justice in recent weeks. There has been no advice yet on that particular point.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, since the government's intention to control prices and wages reveals its failure to stem inflation, can the Prime Minister tell us if he intends to check inflation by bringing before parliament other measures than price and wage controls?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat what I said to the hon. member for Peace River. These questions imply that we have announced measures which we did not announce. We did not say we had failed and were going to control prices and wages. We said—and that is the position of the Minister of Finance and mine—that we would not close any doors before the urgency of fighting inflation. We feel that all means accessible to the federal government will be considered and used if necessary.

I believe the hon. member for Peace River is asking questions mainly because he is looking for an opportunity to be facetious. I find it unfortunate that he should spread inaccurate information through his questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

INFLATION—INCREASE IN GENERAL WHOLESALE INDEX—ADEQUACY OF BUDGET MEASURES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics has just announced that the general wholesale index has increased by four-tenths of one per cent during the month of September, which is a rate of 5 per cent a year. Does the government intend to introduce any new initiatives at this time to counteract the steady rise in the cost of living and inflation in view of the proved inadequacy of the measures introduced in the last budget?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the adequacy or inadequacy of the measures introduced in the last budget is yet to be determined. I would like to assure my hon. friend from Prince Edward-Hastings that this government intends to overcome the inflationary problem in Canada. It intends to take all the steps necessary and it will not close any doors with respect to actions that might be necessary in the future. However, I would like to say to my hon. friend that there is an indication, both here and in the United States, that the steps taken by our government and by the government of that country are having effect. I hope that more stringent measures are not necessary or that a prolongation of tight monetary and fiscal policies in Canada will have to go on too long. But it would be much easier, as I said the other night, to slow down the rate of inflation in Canada if we had the co-operation of all the people of Canada, including members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Does the government consider that the present rate of increase of inflation amounting to 5 per cent a year indicates that it has been successful in curbing inflation? Does the minister not agree that the two measures he introduced in the budget have completely failed, as everybody connected with them says every day of the week?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking for an expression of opinion and I am afraid he is out of order.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether the research project announced by the Prices and Incomes Commission this morning is an example of the tough line he and the Prime Minister were talking about.

Mr. Benson: I am astounded that the Leader of the Opposition, who pressed so hard for the establishment of an independent prices and incomes commission, should stand up in the House of Commons a few months later, when they are trying to do their job, and criticize them.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Has the minister not noticed that his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, has stated categorically that the measures introduced in the budget are altogether inadequate to curb inflation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The supplementary is argumentative and is no more acceptable under our rules than the previous question asked by the hon. member.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, could I ask whether the Basford who said that was the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, or was it some other Basford?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is getting even more out of order.

INFLATION—INCREASE IN PRICE OF HOUSEHOLD DETERGENTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker. I note he is not here today but I am sure I can direct it to the Minister of Finance who will, I know, take an interest in this subject. Has the minister made representations to the soap companies or to the Prices and Incomes Commission concerning the apparently shocking rise during the last six months of more than 50 per cent in the price of household detergents? I ask this question because I have evidence beside me which shows that the price of household detergent has risen from $1.39 early last May to $2.13 this October. It is right here.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind the hon. member that questions are for the purpose of seeking information and not for giving information to the House. In the second place, it is not in accordance with the rules to use exhibits either in the statement of a question or in answering questions. Having said this, I would add that the first part of the question is in order and that the minister may reply.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Having heard the hon. member's soapbox oratory, I will undertake to pass on his question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I ask the hon. member to submit the information in his possession to my colleague.

Mr. Nesbitt: I apologize to Your Honour if I have in any way offended the House by producing what you have referred to as an exhibit, but I assure Your Honour that it was only for the purpose of quoting the prices accurately as they appear on soap boxes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

TRANSPORT

TRUCKING—EXAMINATIONS OF COMPANIES' RECORDS BY INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. To the knowledge of the government, is the United States Interstate Commerce Commission sending enforcement officers into Canada to examine the records of Canadian truckers? If so, is this being done with the consent and approval of the Canadian government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This is not being done to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. I will gladly look into the question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHANGES IN CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC ESTABLISHMENTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the uncertainties which seem to exist regarding cuts or changes in our diplomatic postings, and in view of reports that this question is under the personal control of the Prime Minister, will the right hon. gentleman make a statement at an early date telling us which embassies are to be continued or cut back, and what changes are to be made?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I shall not be making a statement, but the Secretary of State for External Affairs will make one. This is within his departmental prerogative and he will make a statement as soon as he comes back from Victoria.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State. Has the minister or the government appointed a commissioner to administer the languages bill which was passed by the House on July 7, I believe, some four months ago? If not, when may we expect such appointment?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, my answer to the hon. member is that under the legislative measure that has been adopted and that has come into effect on September 7, I believe, that appointment will in fact be made by way of a resolution of the two houses. It is the government's intention to move this resolution as soon as possible following the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the provisions of that Act take precedence over any provincial languages bill that may be in force?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is obviously seeking the expression of a legal opinion, or the interpretation of a statute by the minister. This is not in accordance with the rules.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS, OTTAWA—CONSTRUCTION VIS-À-VIS DEFERMENT POLICY

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister tell the House how he is able to reconcile the calling for tenders for the new external affairs building to be constructed in Ottawa with his commitment to defer construction of government buildings in those areas where in his June budget he applied deferred depreciation on the construction of commercial buildings?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question asked is clearly argumentative.

OIL

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS BY PANARCTIC OILS LIMITED

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the recent report that Panarctic Oils Limited has practically exhausted its development funds and is expected to ask both the government, which has a 45 per cent interest in the company, and the industry brokers for another $10 million by the end of the year, I would ask the Minister of Finance whether any request for additional funds has come from Panarctic Oils Limited and, if so, what has been the government's decision in this matter?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no such request has come to my notice at this point.

FISHERIES

OPERATIONS OF SOVIET TRAWLERS NEAR CAPE SMOKY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs or for the Minister of Fisheries, both of whom should be in the house according to the roster. Since they are absent I will direct my question to whoever is responsible for one or other of those departments. Has the government made any representations to the Soviet embassy concerning the operations of 40 or more Russian trawlers within our so-called 12-mile limit near Cape Smoky, Cape Breton, thus causing hardship to the inshore fishermen of this area?

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the activities of the Russian fleet have been observed, but there is no evidence that they have come within the so-called 12-mile limit. We are keeping the fleet under close surveillance. If it does come within our boundary, no doubt those responsible will be arrested and the Minister of Finance will be aided in his problem of finding additional revenue.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INVESTIGATION OF SEPARATISM IN RADIO-CANADA BY CRTC

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to pursue the last subject but I will decline to do so. I direct my question to the Secretary of State. Has the hon. gentleman ever directed the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to investigate separatism in Radio-Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CONTROL OF USE OF PESTICIDES

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can he advise the House what steps are being taken by the Department of National Health and Welfare to control the sale and use of pesticides, this being a mounting problem that is now confronting the public?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that in view of the way the question is asked it should be answered by a statement on motions. If the hon. member feels it should be answered today, perhaps this might be done at the time of adjournment tomorrow.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSULTATION WITH CONTRACTORS AS TO FORM OF TENDERING

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In view of concern expressed by many contractors who are bidding for government jobs, I should like to know whether any negotiations are being conducted by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Contractors Association in regard to acceptable forms of tendering and the types of contracts to be used by the concerned parties?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am wondering whether this is a matter that should be placed on the order paper. If I am wrong and there is urgency to the matter, then the question can be considered at the time of adjournment.

NAVIGATION

MACKENZIE RIVER—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. The other day I asked him whether he would make a statement on Mackenzie River navigation and he said he would. I wonder whether the minister could give us any indication when we might expect this statement? This problem is causing a great deal of concern in western Canada.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think I would prefer to make it some time early next week.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Before doing so, would the minister be good enough to examine the private member's public bill that I have placed on the order paper dealing with this issue?

Mr. Laing: I will, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC WORKS

CONSTRUCTION OF DAM ON SHUSWAP RIVER

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the government given any consideration to the construction of a dam on the Shuswap River, as requested by the Salmon Arm Ratepayers Association when it appeared before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry?

Mr. Speaker: Order. In my view this question should be placed on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL PARKS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—INQUIRY AS TO SECOND PARK

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It is similar to the question he answered the other day from the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. Is the minister able to advise whether negotiations or discussions are under way with the province of Prince Edward Island regarding the establishment of a second national park in that most scenic province?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister advise the House when the second national park for Saskatchewan, which was promised in 1965, will be developed?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remember that during the course of the last session the House reached a general consensus that questions regarding national parks throughout the country should normally be placed on the order paper unless there was a matter of urgency concerning a particular park, at which time verbal questions might be allowed. I suspect that unless we return to that practice we will have questions every day about the many proposed and existing national parks throughout the country. I suggest to the hon. member that any question that is supplementary to the original question should be placed on the order paper.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DELAY IN ISSUING RETROACTIVE PAY CHEQUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the many complaints that we are receiving from public servants about the delay in issuing their retroactive pay cheques, some of the delays extending over many months, can the minister indicate the date by which all outstanding retroactive pay cheques will be received by the public servants concerned?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Central Pay Office has been under a very heavy workload recently. This has been brought about by the fact that there have been so many new collective agreements. However, steps have been taken within the department to improve the situation. We have added 60 additional employees, and my objective is that the pay office will be current by the end of November.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether he will indicate that recent discussions have been held with the province of Newfoundland regarding a program of development for that province, and whether this program will be announced in November as suggested by a friend of the Minister of Transport, the Premier of Newfoundland?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are having continuous discussions with all the provinces and we hope that in the near future we will be in a position to announce the programs which will come into effect on April 1st next.

[English]

Mr. Lundrigan: Will the minister indicate whether this record will be renewed during the current year because we heard the same thing just over a year ago now? I think the record must be stuck; it sounds like it.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

REDUCED RATES FOR OLD AGE PENSIONERS AND OTHERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, has the Secretary of State initiated a policy to reduce the rates for old age pensioners and similar groups in respect of programs at the National Arts Centre in order that they may enjoy performances there?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this matter does not concern the minister but the directors of the National Arts Centre. As far as the department is concerned, it has often expressed over the last year its desire to democratize culture as much as possible and to put subsidized cultural events within easy reach of the people across the country.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, will the Secretary of State indicate whether any such privileges are afforded to certain groups in Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: I cannot answer the question from memory, Mr. Speaker, but I will be very pleased to get the information.

COMMUNICATIONS

SOUTHERN LABRADOR—REQUEST FOR TEMPORARY REINSTATEMENT OF DOT SERVICE

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the target date of Bell Canada for improved telephone service in southern Labrador has been set ahead to January, 1970, and in view of the fact that the Department of Transport withdrew its radio, telephone and telegram service from that area on August 1 of this year to coincide with the inauguration of the improved Bell Canada service which did not materialize, will the Minister of Transport arrange for the radio, telephone and telegram service of the Department of Transport to be reinstated and maintained until such time as Bell Canada has completed its installation in 1970 and is capable of providing reasonable communications in that area?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made a representation. To the extent that what he has said is a question, it should be placed on the order paper.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

YUGOSLAVIA—PROVISION OF MEDICAL AND OTHER SUPPLIES FOLLOWING EARTHQUAKE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, will the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs or his Parliamentary Secretary answer the question I asked yesterday regarding the earthquake disaster in Yugoslavia, and indicate whether the Canadian government has shown a willingness to supply urgently required medical and other supplies which may be needed?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I do not have a report in this regard but one will be made tomorrow.

NATIONAL PARKS

JASPER—BY-ELECTION RESULTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether he is aware of the result of a by-election in an area including the townsite of Jasper, and does he feel this is an endorsement of the parks policy in our mountain national parks?

FISHERIES

SALMON FISHING LICENCES—POSITION OF INDIANS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to whoever is answering today for the Minister of Fisheries. Would the minister agree to a reference of the whole question of the proposal regarding salmon fishing licences on the west coast to the Standing Committee on Fisheries?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I will bring this matter to the minister's attention. He is in British Columbia today.

Mr. Barnett: I should like to ask a supplementary question on this same subject, and I direct it to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the very serious impact on the Indian people of British Columbia as a result of the proposal by the Minister of Fisheries, does the minister support the idea of referring the whole proposal on salmon fishing licences to the committee on fisheries for consideration and report?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and myself have regular discussions concerning what we can do in order to assist Indians as regards fishing, and our relations are excellent. I am ready to consider the hon. member's suggestion.

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF SALT FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Fisheries or the Parliamentary Secretary. Is the minister meeting today with representatives of the salt fish trade and can he assure the house that such discussions will in no way impede the introduction of the legislation to set up a salt fish marketing corporation?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): He is not meeting with them, Mr. Speaker; he is in British Columbia. He intends to meet with these people in the next two weeks.

LABOUR RELATIONS

LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—EFFECT ON EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice. It concerns the west coast longshoremen's strike. I have a telegram in my hand from Sherritt Gordon Mines advising me that five outgoing ships and two incoming ships are held up as a result of this strike. The company feels that unless strong and definite government action is taken soon there will be a very serious loss to Canadian industry. Will the minister get in touch with the Minister of Labour to see what can be done is this regard?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I know of no one who is in closer touch than the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the minister is looking into the situation regarding the west coast strike. Both sides have been asked to resume negotiations at two o'clock tomorrow, and this will be done.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

FUTURE OF FAIREY OF CANADA PLANT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion indicate whether his departmental officials have entered into or are at present holding discussions with officials of Fairey of Canada and/or Grumman Aircraft about the future of the Fairey of Canada plant?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Not that I am aware of, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Forrestall: In view of the fact that the future of 400 or 500 families is very much in doubt and very uncertain, will the minister find out whether negotiations are taking place with a view to putting some money into an oceanographic study in this area?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I will do that with pleasure.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, may I take Your Honour's suggestion of yesterday and invite the Minister of Transport to make a brief statement on Atlantic province transportation matters, hopefully this afternoon during the throne speech debate? I ask him to do so because I know he is sincerely interested in this aspect of transportation and because there is some uncertainty about certain aspects of future legislation.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do what I can in response to the hon. member's request.

Mr. Bell: We could even arrange for the minister to make two speeches.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister to indicate to the House what response he made to the premiers of Atlantic Canada and other people concerned with transportation in respect of the re-introduction of a freeze on freight rates in maritime Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): The response, Mr. Speaker, was the one apparent at the time legislation was introduced earlier this year to establish a federal-provincial committee to determine how best to use this money. The committee has met twice, or at least once, and has reported considerable progress. It appears that the members are quite pleased.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister indicate to the House whether his government has any other such plans to assist Atlantic Canada in respect of regional disparity?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will recognize that his question is of such a scope that it would require an answer by way of a statement normally made on motions.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister consider the area as one eligible for foreign aid in view of the failure of the government to come up with a reasonable solution?

[Mr. Forrestall.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NEWFOUNDLAND—REVIVAL OF PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister advise the house if a decision of the Canadian Transport Commission was necessary to revive the CNR passenger service in Newfoundland in order to accommodate delegates to the Liberal leadership convention which will be held in St. John's this coming weekend?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question seeks either a political or legal interpretation of the facts. In both instances he is out of order.

SPORTS

PAN-AMERICAN GAMES—INQUIRY AS TO FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO WINNIPEG

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Is he yet in a position to answer questions I asked him during the last session and about which I wrote him during the recess concerning the possibility of the federal government assisting Winnipeg with its deficit respecting the Pan-American games which, after all, were a centennial event for Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): If I have not answered my hon. friend's letter yet, I apologize sincerely and will make sure that the answer goes out very shortly.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, October 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Jack Cullen for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stanfield (p. 34) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Godin (p. 175).

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, last night I made some introductory remarks about subjects covered by the Throne Speech. I am rather glad I made those remarks last night rather than today because I see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) sitting here today. Just before last night's adjournment I began speaking about a Canadian Research Corporation. I was very pleased to hear this afternoon the introduction of a bill with respect to the International Development Research Centre of Canada. In other words, the government is not wasting much time in putting forward legislation for the establishment of a centre which they feel is necessary. That is to say that after all these years there is some doubt as to whether all the money we put into external aid has been properly used, and I think the government has acknowledged that we can no longer afford to fly by the seat of our pants in this respect; therefore, a centre is being formed to ensure that any money we contribute to external aid is properly used. The conclusion to be drawn from this is that although we recognize the necessity of setting up a research centre to give us advice with regard to the external aid program, we do not seem to appreciate the urgency of establishing in Canada a research centre for ourselves. But we spend a great deal of money and we run large business corporations in Canada by instinct and by assumption rather than on the advice which such a research centre could give us.

I mentioned last night a research organization which is being used by the Japanese government; it is called the Japanese Trade Export Trade Organization. Today I would like to illustrate Canada's needs at present as compared with what we have done in the past. For example, when the St. Lawrence Seaway was being planned—in fact, when it was being built—Japanese and other manufacturers in the shipbuilding industry had already on the books of their companies the projected construction of giant transports which within the next ten years will make the St. Lawrence useless. We spent a fortune on the construction of the Seaway and nobody bothered to check what was going on in the world of transport. This lack of planning will cost us a great deal of money because the St. Lawrence canal system will have to be enlarged in order to accommodate the new transports and the new cargo-loading ships which will be built in the future.

Mr. Forrestall: Send them to Halifax.

Mr. Otto: Of course, it would require a great deal of research into whether those ports can be used efficiently. I will give another example of what we are doing by instinct or by assumption. Let us consider the assumption which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) made when he put forward the resolution with respect to deferred depreciation. The idea was that this would stop commercial construction. Any capable research organization would have advised the government that this would not be so; that indeed this type of legislation will be ineffective. I can speak of other ideas which are assumed by all of us to be accurate today, such as the one that any fiscal measures of restraint imposed by the government will be extremely effective in controlling inflation. Of course, the assumption is based on the supposition that any government policy with respect to the tightening of credit will immediately bring a reaction. The assumption is carried further and it is assumed that if credit is more costly, businessmen will have to pay more for the use of money and they will then say to labour: We cannot pay you $3 an hour; you must accept $2.50. Of course, this is nonsense; it does not happen these days.

There is more than one guiding principle in the minds of businessmen. The government can do what it likes; business works on different principles entirely which are not necessarily in accord with the government's fiscal measures. The consumer also has his own ideas as to when he will buy and when he will not buy. Research for a projection of this type can be carried out efficiently, with the purpose of advising the government as to the likelihood of any reaction to proposed legislation. For example, let us consider labour. I have heard it said many times, even today, that something must be done to solve the problem of labour-management disputes. Questions have been asked as to whether there is such a thing as a labour-management dispute because so long as the businessman and the entrepreneur can make alternative investments and so long as we function under the profit system he must make a profit. Large and very efficient organizations have already stated their doubt as to the existence of such a thing as a labour-management dispute. They should be called, more accurately, labour-consumer disputes, but of course government departments continue to function with old ideas and concepts.

The essential need for a composite research organization lies in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is difficult to imagine the department having an expert staff projecting our export sales, to which countries we will sell certain products, what they will buy, and so on. I will give an example. Some years ago I was informed by the department of trade and commerce that a wonderful place in which to dispose of a great deal of refrigeration and air conditioning equipment was South America. The company in which I have an active interest put a great deal of money into this export market with almost no results because, first, the German export people are well entrenched there and, second, our department of trade and commerce did not know where the approaches should be made. Indeed, they did not even know what type of equipment the South Americans wanted. They did not even inform us that in South America a knowledge of Spanish or Portugese is mandatory. I am referring to 1961. Furthermore, they did not tell us that unless one had a good contact with the clergy one's chances of selling there were almost nil.

A proper type of research organization can do a great deal of work. It can produce the facts and figures that should be presented to all departments. If we are to develop our export trade to South America we must know what products we can sell there and at what price, what credit we should give, how long its term should be and how much we should import from that area. At present the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has only a small internal research organization which by and large tells the minister or the deputy minister what he wants to hear and not what he should hear. And so we go merrily on our way with trade, agriculture and welfare; no department has a really good diagnosis of the ills involved in these matters.

It has been pointed out that we have the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I am not saying that statistical research is not important; of course it is, but statistics are useless unless they are applied. What is necessary is the proper application of statistics, of good research and of knowledge available at the beck and call of every department of government and private industry.

Therefore, I suggest to the government that from now on if we are to move at all in any field we must have research into every phase of it, preferably through a central agency where we can have the equivalent of the Rand Corporation in the United States from whom private industry can obtain information. Our research people should be employed in this area instead of scooting off to other countries. In this way the government itself, the greatest business, the greatest spender, could have accurate information with respect to a project, could receive a projection of what a dollar spent would bring in, and could be assured whether certain ideas and projects were sound and acceptable.

Our great failing at present is that we embark upon many new projects merely on instinct and not on a basis of knowledge. In today's business world good, accurate diagnosis is essential. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, although I am pleased to note that we are going to apply research to our external aid program, I am very disappointed that we will not have in Canada and agency such as was promised last year by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that is, a research agency which will serve the Canadian government and the Canadian people.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for allowing me to speak at this time.

I would very much have liked to see in the house the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) as well as other cabinet members, in addition to the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) and my good friend the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) who are not affected by what I want to say this afternoon, because I want to speak mainly about finance. There are large holes on the government side, and many empty seats in each row. But, the absence of the ministers will not be taken as an indication of their concern for the present economic situation, because if it were, there would be very little hope left for the Prime Minister's policy and the concerns he expressed yesterday would not mean anything, nor would the remarks made by the Minister of Finance.

[English]

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) on his admirable presentation of the traditional Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. This is always a difficult task, even for more seasoned members. In this particular case one wonders whether one could have applied the description of déja vu to the speech of the hon. member, because he came into this chamber a relatively short time after the Speech from the Throne was delivered in the other place and delivered to us a fully prepared, textual speech. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, this is a practice that I do not commend to hon. members. It is far better that hon. members should make their speeches in a spontaneous fashion even though without such polished grammar.

As I have said on previous occasions, hon. members have merited the support of their constituents, not on the basis of textual speeches but on the basis of having appeared on platforms with other candidates and there speaking what was in their hearts and minds. Therefore, let us do away with all these long-winded textual addresses which are made when someone piles a number of Hansards on his desk, places a written speech on top and reads from it. When that happens we do not know whether they are the hon. member's words or the words of someone else.

[Translation]

It is proper, on the other hand, to congratulate the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) who gave us a speech of his own and who, thank God, has nothing in common with his predecessor here. We are happy to have this new member represent the Lapointe constituency. I congratulate the mover and the seconder for their performance in delivering the traditional speeches.

[English]

I wish I could say the same thing for the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) because, again, as a seasoned member of this house I object to ministers coming in here with completely textual speeches from which they will not depart. This is only acceptable in the House if one is reading statistics, if a quotation is being read or if a very closely reasoned argument is being followed and one must refer to a text. I cannot say that the minister's speech was a closely reasoned argument, and there were very few statistics in it. I believe ministers should deliver good, oral speeches without relying upon executive assistants or on speeches put together by departmental staffs.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did not reply to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in any way. The Prime Minister, too, read us a textual speech in which he dealt philosophically with certain matters, but frankly there was no joining of debate. However, I think the Minister of Finance started a debate on the question of inflation, a debate which I hope to continue. Inflation is with us and it is a most important subject. The Minister of Finance devoted his entire speech to a justification of government policy and attitude with respect to inflation. I am not going to criticize all of his speech because I say thank goodness the government is finally concerned with inflation. But having heard the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) it reminds me of what is said about a convert to some new form of religion, namely, that the convert is far more vocal and far more ardent in support of his new-found philosophy than is the long-time practitioner.

During the summer recess the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs inquired into the subject of high interest rates. That committee was meeting right up to the opening of this session, and I hope it will return to its work fairly soon. I am sure the committee will not be able to arrive at any positive solution, any cure-all formula, but I think it will agree with the proposition put forward by my leader, and to some extent by the Minister of Finance and other members, that the problem of inflation will be better solved, and this in a more equitable and acceptable manner, if it is done on a voluntary basis.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was right yesterday when he said the government hopes that the back of inflation can be broken by voluntary means. To this extent I wish the government well in its fight. Although I think it is going about this problem in the wrong way, I also think that everybody in Canada must support the government in its ultimate aim to beat inflation. I do not care whether this involves the person on a low pension, or the highest income earner in the land; inflation is a most insidious enemy and we must all fight it. Each one of us must be concerned and we must not leave the fight to the other fellow. I think it is rather cheap for the Minister of Finance to say that the opposition is responsible for all sorts of demands to spend more money. Maybe he should put his money where his mouth is, as the saying goes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What demands? We can show that there are also demands on the government side, legitimate demands. We are concerned with the non-working poor and the working poor. We are concerned that something be done about welfare. Is that saying that the government should embark on some grandiose scheme of spending? Not at all. The whole welfare scheme should be reconsidered. I will come to that a little later in my speech.

The Prime Minister asserts that there will be a rigorous examination of priorities. Mr.

Speaker, I wish he could speak to his predecessor who some years ago, when asked about the establishment of government priorities pooh-poohed the idea and said this would not be discussed with the provinces. I wish to God it had been discussed back in 1965 and 1966 in so far as handling inflation in Canada is concerned. If it had been, we would be much better off.

Let us first of all establish that inflation in Canada is not the entire responsibility of Canadians. I should like to read from the Sixth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada, page 163, which explains the difficulty that we as Canadians have in rebutting inflationary influences, particularly those from the United States. Neither of these countries can isolate the other. When Professor John K. Galbraith appeared before the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs the other day he exhorted Canada to take steps to combat inflation because this would assist the United States to do the same. I doubt that it would, although it might be of some help. But the influence is rather the other way. The two countries are so inextricably linked by trade that it is impossible to say that problems of inflation in the United States can be isolated from those in Canada, and vice versa.

Yesterday and on previous occasions the Minister of Finance indulged in some back room nit-picking when he criticized the Economic Council of Canada for the statements appearing in the following paragraph of its review:

> In Canada, it is difficult to maintain that current inflation is a reflection of excessive demand pressures, for the Canadian economy has been operating with at least a moderate over-all margin of slack since 1967. On the other hand, in the United States the problem of price and cost inflation has been very much one of excessive demand aggravated by the impact on the economy of the war in Vietnam. Until some easing of price and cost increases takes place in the United States, Canadian policies to deal with domestic price and cost problems will be handicapped. Further fiscal and monetary restraint could conceivably result simply in higher rates of unemployment and economic slack with no more than marginal effects on current rates of increase in prices and costs. Moreover, tighter restraint in Canada this year is likely to have its main impact on the economy next year. And if excess demand pressures in the United States are brought under control by the latter part of 1969, the principal result of stringent demand policy restraints in Canada this year might well be seriously mistimed to push the economy into a poor economic performance.

There have been complaints about this paragraph, but I would have held the Economic Council of Canada lax if it had not posted this warning against embarking on harsh monetary and fiscal measures to contain inflation just because the results will not be immediately apparent. The causes are deep-rooted and remedies may taken one, two or three years, by which time conditions will have changed. According to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics there has been a disquieting decline in real domestic products—here I am not speaking of the gross national product—which would indicate that there could conceivably be some unwonted softening in certain sectors of the economy covering manufacturing and service industries, resulting in turn to a diminution of credit. It was quite correct that the Economic Council of Canada should point this out. As the minister indicated, Mr. Speaker, the government is also faced with a credibility problem. It certainly is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is the self-same minister who stood up in this House on Monday afternoon and said, "We will defeat inflation." It is the self-same man who, as President of the Treasury Board, in the spring of 1968 told the House that as a result of the changes in taxation—that is, the increase in taxation in the 1967 budget and the cut-backs in expenditures that were put into force by the government after its defeat on the tax bill—"I guarantee that we will balance the budget for this year." What happened? We had a deficit of over $700 million.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That was his guarantee. At that time I said that when the minister dies they will probably find tattooed on his chest the words, "I guarantee to balance the budget." Now I think we will add a second line, "We will defeat inflation."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have as much faith in the credibility of his statement as I had in the one he made in 1968. In saying that I do not mean that I wish the government to lose the fight against inflation, because we are all in it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): So let no one say that we are trying to subvert the government in its attempt to fight inflation.

• (3:20 p.m.)

If we want to see how bad inflation is, let us consider interest rates. The long term government rate as of last week was 7.77 per cent, 1 per cent higher than last year. On 91-day bills it was 7.63 per cent, and on 182-day bills, 7.72 per cent. Both these rates are about 2.25 per cent higher than last year. That is what the Canadian saving public thinks of the government's fight against inflation. It has discounted those intentions, so far as interest rates are concerned, by a further 2 per cent. That, Mr. Speaker, is a measure of the government's credibility.

The cost of living increases. At the end of September, 1969, the Consumer Price Index stood at 126.6. At the end of September, 1968, it was 121.1. It is up, not by four points but by about 4.5 per cent. On the same date in 1967 the index stood at 116.6. Is it any wonder that our pensioners, low salaried people and those who are not in economic power groups are complaining, when in the last couple of years we have seen a ten point spread in the Consumer Price Index?

The wholesale price index was 283.4 at the end of August, as against 271.6 for the same date in 1968, representing an increase of 4.3 per cent. Those who are interested in the Canadian public and housing have only to look at the DBS Weekly report of Friday, October 24, to see the index on building materials. Taking 1961 as 100, the total index for residential building materials as of September, 1969, was 138.9. In other words, building materials have increased 38.9 per cent since 1961. Since last year they have increased by a total of 4.3 per cent. For non-residential materials the index over the last year went up by 4.9 per cent. I am speaking of building materials only. If one adds to that index the astronomical increases of labour costs that go into building construction, one can see what has been happening.

Just consider the wage settlements of those who can shield themselves from inflation by being members of economic power groups. Consider the building strikes in the city and how they have been settled. Look at the rate increases provided for the next two or three years in Toronto. While the steel strike in Hamilton was being settled, carpenters of that city settled for a wage rate that will take them to over $7 per hour in 1971. Is there not any sense in this regard? Can it not be understood that all this is self-defeating?

The government has placed a great deal of reliance on voluntary restraints. This afternoon the Minister of Finance tried to twit the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) about the statement the Prices and Incomes Commission made today with regard to the investigation into the steel price. He suggested that the opposition was not sincere in its concern about what has happened. The Leader of the Opposition and all members on the Conservative side of the House have asked for some form of voluntary restraint. Nevertheless, the events of the last week have shown that the pious exhortations of the Prices and Incomes Commission that business, management, labour and government should enter into voluntary restraints were rejected out of hand by the CLC and the CNTU.

We then asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs what will happen now, because this rejection is a torpedoing of the Commission. I think all members of the House are legitimately concerned about what will happen if the Prices and Incomes Commission, the vehicle selected by the government to fight inflation, must be rescued after being torpedoed on its first attempt at being effective; because that will not be the last time the commissions efforts may be thwarted. Yesterday the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said, "The increase of 6 per cent in the steel price will be looked into", as though there would be some form of examination to see if prices could be justified. Let me read in part what the Prices and Incomes Commission said about this in its first press release:

> While the Commission is still engaged in seeking a set of commitments from private groups and government, it is, therefore, not in a position at this time to render a judgment on what is, or is not, justified in a particular case.
> What the Commission can do, however, is to examine particular situations in order to bring the facts before the public, not for the purpose of condemning the parties concerned, but as a way of illustrating the kind of wage and price behaviour which has become very widespread in recent years.
> This is what we intend to do in the case of the steel industry.
> No one should think of this investigation as a trial leading to a verdict.

The public, Mr. Speaker, has been misled by the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, by his attitude and demand for an investigation, has led the public into thinking that the Steel Co. of Canada and other, similar companies will have to justify their price increases, and if they cannot justify them great pressure will be brought to bear for those prices to be rolled back. Nothing like that will happen. The Prices and Incomes Commission says it cannot do it. Our dealing with inflation through this commission will take far longer than anyone can possibly foresee. I am disappointed to see the government's selected vehicle being backed too pusillanimously. That is a big word, Mr. Speaker, but the problem is big, too.

There is before this House an amendment put forward by the Créditistes. I cannot speak about their motives for moving it, nor do I intend to. So far as our party is concerned, that subamendment as it stands cannot be supported. In his speech the Leader of the Opposition laid great emphasis on the absolute necessity for a comprehensive review of our whole program of welfare. We must ask ourselves: Is it doing the job of eradicating poverty as a social blight, not only the poverty of those who do not work but the grinding poverty of the working poor? Incidentally, the people in both these groups are about the most helpless victims of inflation.

At our party's conference at Niagara we came to this unanimous conclusion:

> Poverty exists in many forms, in many different environments and for many reasons. It is more than an economic problem. The strategy of anti-poverty, therefore, must be flexible so that it can be adapted effectively.
> Poverty must be fought in many different ways; public welfare is but one weapon in this fight.
> We are concerned that the terminology—"guaranteed annual income"—does not adequately describe these principles because it fails to recognize the central place of incentives in a reformed welfare system.

When addressing the closing session of that conference the Leader of the Opposition said as follows:

> I am particularly pleased by your commitment to break Canadians free of the poverty which imprisons too many of our citizens. The inadequacy of the present system is clear. You have given definite direction to me and to the caucus, to develop a new and more adequate program, with an emphasis on incentives.
> That necessarily implies a fundamental change in the Canadian approach to welfare—to include provision for the working poor, as well as the non-working poor.
> The consensus you expressed gives me a mandate to proceed, along with caucus, in developing the kind of program I have been discussing for 18 months.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for this party to support the amendment to our amendment. There are many other items of which I could speak at this time when dealing with inflation, but I come back to the simple theme that all members of this house must unite in the determination to defeat inflation. We may differ in our methods. For example, I cannot accept the proposals put forward by the Canadian Labour Congress, the Confederation of National Trade Unions and the New Democratic Party that there should be a Prices Review Board but that wages should be a non-negotiable item outside the examination of any such board. This makes a joke of the whole question; therefore, we cannot accept it.

I much prefer voluntary restraints because I believe that we in Canada have an inflation psychosis based upon expectations. Many people are tied to major labour contracts which have annual escalations going forward two or three years. Our public servants at the federal, provincial and municipal levels have similar contracts. Everyone is asking: Can I pay for it next year because I am going to get an increase of so many cents an hour or so many dollars a month; it is guaranteed under my working agreement.

There is this expectation of inflation—it is better to spend now because it will cost more later. After all, the president of the Trust Companies Association of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired, unless he has the consent of the House to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of the House. I shall not detain you too long.

The president of the Trust Companies Association of Canada, an association whose members have the lion's share of the money that goes into the mortgage market, indicated in his evidence before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs that one of the fiscal measures adopted by the Minister of Finance, namely, the deferral of the capital cost allowance, had not appreciably retarded construction. Why is that? It is due to the expectation of inflation, that by deferral of one year it will cost that much more to construct the building and therefore it is much better to proceed with it this year and perhaps stretch out the capital cost allowance that would have been available this year to next year or the year after. It will never be lost, but the cost next year will be that much more; therefore, it is better to go ahead now.

I doubt whether there has been much effect this year. There might be a little more next year. When experts tell us these things, we doubt the effectiveness of certain measures that have been adopted by the government. If the government can show us a program that is credible in its performance with regard to a program of defeating inflation, it will have the support of this House. Up to the moment they have not done that. Therefore, we want to see the level of government expenditures. We want to see how credible they can be with regard to a number of the measures they have taken. On that basis, Mr. Speaker, I ask hon. members to support the motion of the opposition which condemns the actions the government has taken so far in this connection.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I join hon. members who have complimented the mover and seconder of this motion. Some hon. members know I had the honour of performing that task at the opening of the centennial session. I am very well aware that it is an honour which remains a highlight in the career of any parliamentarian. I think it is safe to say that many members of this House share the concern of the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) when he spoke about the fact that there is perhaps a growing irrelevancy with regard to the public attitude toward parliament.

As a comparatively new member of this House I am forced to the conclusion, albeit reluctantly, that this perhaps is no longer where the action is, in the strict sense of the word. From the point of view of the public, to use a familiar expression, they are off doing their own thing and leaving it to us to mind the store. In other words, it seems that the kind of discussions we have had during this debate and some of the speeches we have heard indicate that we have an almost total involvement with the present and we are not doing enough thinking about the future.

Not enough consideration is being given to goals and objectives for Canada. As a result we are not really tuned in with those we are trying to serve. This is quite an understandable situation. I do not think any of us could disagree that there is an enormous amount of truth in an old expression, if I may paraphrase it, which says that matters that are of immediate concern more or less force you to move aside the crises. In other words, we seem to be always preoccupied and concerned with today and do not really get enough opportunity to talk about tomorrow.

The business of running the store, as I call it, is rather important to Canadians. It is very important that we apply our best talents and maximum capabilities to the business of managing the affairs of the nation. I am trying to say—and I would like to emphasize it—that this is not the totality of our job in the House; that in fact what the Canadian public is looking for as much as good management of the here and now is leadership with regard to the definition of goals for the future. They are looking for the clarifying of national purpose, and some indication from us that we have the ability to look far enough ahead to try and shape the structure of this country and to anticipate what the situation will be 5, 10 or 20 years from now. I suggest that is part of our responsibility that perhaps we are not coming to grips with sufficiently at the present time. With the greatest respect to the opposition, I agree that if I were in their place I would probably do precisely what they have done because it is the conventional wisdom to adopt that attitude. But I do not believe that much of what we heard from hon. gentlemen opposite has been of too much value in coming to grips with the immediate problems. It certainly has not helped us to define the goals, objectives and purposes to which I have referred.

We have had a steady and rather good recitation of rather obvious social and economic inadequacies. These are as well known to us as they are to hon. members opposite. They are certainly well known to those people within the Canadian public who are affected by the inadequacies. The opposition has simply said: This is wrong, this is wrong and this is wrong. What is the government going to do about it? With great respect, I say there have not been many concise and explicit indications of what the opposition parties would do under these circumstances. If I can paraphrase a familiar expression relating to another Conservative, when they suggest that there are instant solutions, in their hearts they know they are wrong.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) must surely know better than most that this is so. Despite what the previous speaker said, it is a fact—I am sure it is of concern to hon. members opposite—that the Niagara Conference did not arrive at an agreed and precise program for dealing with poverty, one that was capable of instant implementation. That conference revealed what surely could have been expected in advance, namely, that there is a wide range of thinking on the subject that there are differences of opinion as to the approach which should be taken. There is no concensus among members opposite or, for that matter, among members of the party to which I belong, as to the precise mechanism which can be employed in order to lick the problem of poverty. Therefore, I suggest it is wrong to pretend that there are instant solutions.

Similarly, the Leader of the Opposition and many other hon. members from eastern Canada recognize that there are no simple answers in the field of economic development; that it is not enough for one's heart to be in the right place. We have witnessed many demonstrations of this, none more revealing than the experience with the heavy water plant at Glace Bay. Can anyone question the fact that the New Democratic Party has no instant solutions? It is apparent at this very moment in Winnipeg that a classic confrontation is taking place between various elements in that party over the question of foreign domination. The leader of the NDP, speaking in this House not more than two or three days ago, criticized the government for being too soft on foreign ownership. But his former colleague in this House, now the distinguished premier of Manitoba, having been faced with the realities of office says he is not one who wants to threaten foreign capital; that far from being any kind of a menace he is a small "1" liberal. In fact, he is wooing that kind of capital.

It is very easy simply to lambaste the government and assume that the shortest route to power lies not in the direct articulation of alternative policies, which are then open to questioning, but rather in a continuous assault on the actions and policies of the government. This is fair ball, of course, and nobody argues about that. It is a perfectly legitimate function of the opposition to adopt such a role. Nevertheless, it is an inadequate role and if it never rises from that level surely what will happen is that eventually—and I am being presumptuous enough to risk giving a little advice to the opposition—the public will realize, as it has done repeatedly over the years, that no alternative is being offered and that those who are merely ridiculing what is being attempted are not worthy of public support.

Let me now say something that is of great concern to me personally in this connection. I refer to fishery problems in Newfoundland. I give hon. members opposite full credit for having as much concern as I do for the needs of this area. A year ago there was in this House a tremendous discussion on fishery matters. The kind of discussion that took place was all too familiar. Nearly 500 years ago when John Cabot sailed into Newfoundland waters for the first time he reported that the cod were so numerous that one could catch them in a bucket weighted with stones. I suspect that if hon. members opposite from Newfoundland had been around at that time—and I confess there are occasions when I almost believe they were—the first thing they would have done would be to demand that we give Cabot a subsidy. At the very least they would have suggested that in some way or another we should reduce the price of baskets and of stones.

This has been the conventional, traditional approach ever since. In fact, what happened a year ago illustrates what I have in mind. Because the fishing industry was in very bad shape there were persistent and numerous demands for additional millions of dollars to be poured into the sinkhole of fishing subsidies. To his credit, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) resisted that demand. He took what was obviously a more difficult path in seeking to get at the root cause of the problem. As a result of that forward-planning a special price support program was introduced in order to assist the fresh fish industry which since then has experienced a pronounced strengthening of markets. This situation has almost completely reversed the prospects of many of the fresh fish plants in the sense that while they were near bankruptcy a year ago, a great many of them have a chance to make a reasonable profit this year.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Jamieson: If the hon. member would not mind waiting until I am through, I will answer all questions then.

There are, of course, serious problems still facing the industry but we have made what I believe to be the most significant progress in 20 years in terms of the outlook for fresh frozen fish. This year we shall be introducing the concept of a salt cod marketing and development corporation. All this is an illustration of the fact that an orderly approach to the solutions of these problems does work.

Another thing this demonstrates—and it should be of interest to all hon. members—is that by obtaining greater co-operation from those whose lives are being affected by various government decisions and the like, this process works even better. It has been my experience that if we talk to the fishermen, for example, it is pointless to expect them in the first instance to do anything other than look for an immediate solution to their difficulties. But when they are invited to talk over the subject they are far more capable than most, in the majority of cases, of appreciating what are the root causes of their difficulties and of accepting recommendations which in many instances were initiated by themselves or by their representatives.

In order to conduct this process, in order to involve fishermen, farmers, students or any other group in our society, it is necessary for them to be in possession of the facts. It seems to me that we in this House must devise a better program to provide a more plentiful flow of information, and more meaningful information to the people. Over the years—and I am not attributing responsibility for this to any one government or party—a tremendous amount of unnecessary secrecy has developed in connection with the business of government. It seems to me, we have done this: Somewhere, way back, we started from the assumption that everything was secret and that only the minimum information possible should be released. Surely a far better and more democratic approach would be to proceed on the assumption that everything is open, and only to withhold information from the general public when this is clearly necessary on the grounds of public interest or for security reasons.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Let us begin today.

Mr. Jamieson: It is the intention of the government this session to examine the whole question of information policy to see whether we can find some means by which we can meet some of the legitimate objections which are now raised, both by members opposite and by members of the general public, by removing unnecessary restrictions on the flow of information to the Canadian people. I would assume that one of the considerations which has always caused governments to move warily in this field is concern about the possible charge of propagandizing. However, I do not believe it is beyond the competence of this House to devise a system of safeguards to prevent that kind of thing happening. In any event, the government is prepared to try, and I hope we should receive the wholehearted co-operation of all parties, not only because a freer flow of information would result but because it would help to eliminate a greater amount of the mumbo-jumbo which accompanies the information that does reach the general public. Much of it is unintelligible, confused and complex.

I realize more than most that it is terribly important not only that we make more information available but that it be better information in the sense of its understandability. Of course, the mere provision of information in this way is not of itself any assurance that we will achieve a more viable democracy or a greater degree of the participation that I think we all agree is desirable. A good deal will depend on the public; an enormous amount will depend on our mass media.

Hon. members know of my own background and profession; therefore, I think I can say with perhaps a little more confidence than most that I understand the problems of the ladies and gentlemen who occupy our press gallery and of those throughout the country who are charged with responsibility for the media. They have a tremendously complex job to do. Despite the fact that there is sometimes a general level of irritation among people in public life, on balance I am prepared to defend the proposition that Canadians are served better by their mass media, taken in the round, than people in most other countries. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I know from personal associations and friendships that there still is within our whole media complex a good deal of inadequacy. No one recognizes this more than most responsible members of the media and those who are charged with the responsibility for their direction.

I am not sure how one approaches this problem, because the pressures on the media are enormous. In the first instance, there is now an incredible flow of news and information. As I said a moment ago, despite the fact that there is not as much information of importance as there should be from government sources, there is an almost limitless amount of information pouring out from all manner of sources.

Mr. Baldwin: Does the minister agree that there is a tendency to give capsule news?

Mr. Jamieson: There is, Mr. Speaker, and I was about to come to that. In the second place, there is a broad spectrum of issues with which the media may deal. Thirdly, and in answer to the comment of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), there is public anxiety to get virtually all their news in capsule form. This has led to a tendency to compact news almost out of recognition in many respects. In addition, perhaps more importantly and in direct answer to the hon. member's question, there has been the growth of what has come to be called interpretative or personal journalism.

So we have a situation where the media do not report what the hon. member for Peace River said, but what somebody thought he said; or, even twice removed from the fact, what they thought he meant. Not content with that, the media go on to say that what they thought the hon. member meant does not really make sense, and then the bulk of the comment becomes what the writer concerned really feels is the truth about the subject.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, this is one of the problems. Having practised this intricate art with as much skill as most, I suspect, I do know all the pitfalls. Basically, I think the problem arises not so much from any personal desire on the part of the commentator, columnist, or whoever it is, to do this kind of thing as from the necessity to respond to what is a very fundamental and basic public demand these days for capsule views, for instant opinion and the like.

I think it is perfectly legitimate for us in this house to say that since the media have very carefully safeguarded their right over the years to be recognized as the so-called fourth estate, as an integral part of the democratic or parliamentary process, so is it perfectly legitimate for them to comment in any way that they choose and to report in any way that they choose upon the activities of this honourable House, any members of it or on the government of the day. No one is questioning that right. But I do suggest, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps this is now becoming something of a one-way street and that we ought to ask a little more often than we do whether there is not also a contrary right on the part of members of the House and those to whom and about whom I have spoken to make known when in fact the media are wrong. In other words, is it appropriate for us simply to endure, to a degree in silence, distortion or an obvious and demonstrable error of fact? I do not think it is necessary for us to do this, and it is very unhealthy when it occurs.

Furthermore, lest this be construed as some kind of suggestion of a new imposition on the media, I know from my own experience that the great majority of responsible journalists would welcome this kind of confrontation. I suggest that within this general challenge to inform Canadians in better manner than has been the case up till now, we collectively and as individual members must find the mechanism and the time to reply to obvious and glaring mistakes which occur in even the best regulated families in the journalistic field. I think that what I am trying to achieve goes even beyond, first, the provision of information and, second, the ability of the public to have total access to this information.

The third and perhaps key point in the whole communications process that enables us to do the second part of the job that I discussed at the beginning of my remarks, namely, to try to define goals and objectives and give the Canadian public some form of leadership, is to enable them to use this information in an effective way; for example, to have the widest possible choice of media. This is the basic protection that we can have in this complex field. It will only work if the public is prepared to examine different points of view through whatever media they receive their information, and to add the still essential ingredient of personal judgment. If they do that, and if they examine the whole perspective of opinion they will probably discover, for example, that the truth lies somewhere between Douglas Fisher and Lubor Zink.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, once this occurs and once there is an interested and discerning public, we must ask whether it too will achieve what we are trying to achieve by way of participation and understanding. I do not believe that it will unless we can also in some way exert influence on all media, and on those who make use of the media, to correct what is now a glaring imbalance in our sense of values nationally.

I think that our market oriented economy, however useful it has been in providing us with a very amazing array of consumer goods and with affluence, has in fact generated a new kind of discerment—not a very deep-rooted kind of discernment of that—among the Canadian public. The media have been much more successful in selling the marketplace than in selling ideas. What people are really being challenged to do far more today than at any previous time is to make a value judgment, for example, between car A and car B, or between the whole range of consumer goods to which I have referred. The result of this enormous impact by the media is that value judgments in regard to those things which might be described as being for the common good are not being made.

For example, Mr. Speaker, one of the interesting things about the television phenomenon—I do not know whether any hon. members have thought about this when viewing different programs—is that television has generated a new kind of social consciousness. That has become perfectly obvious. This it has done rather quickly. A program that is pointing up the neglect of our Indians will probably be accompanied by advertisements, in full colour, for red convertible loans. The program that tells us about the threats and dangers of pollution also has within it advertised invitations to get away from it all, to fly the skies with United to sunny Hawaii and forget the whole stinking business.

An hon. Member: Why not Air Canada?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, let us say Air Canada. The point made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is a quite legitimate one and also raises another of those tension points in the whole question of what is the proper and adequate role of various government agencies in these matters. I hope he will not divert me from my central theme because I should like to talk to him about that.

• (4:00 p.m.)

The fact is that in this kind of a complex, whatever the benefits of a market-oriented society—and I shall not go into that question today—there is no doubt that people have been far more successful in selling goods than they have been in selling ideas. One of the challenges we face is how to make a value judgment in respect of programs to correct situations and what is actually needed. It is our intention to declare our feelings to the public on these matters of concern. I came across a quotation from the German writer Dahrendorf who said this about the public attitude today:

> Ours is a world of highly individual values which puts the experienced happiness of the individual in first place and increasingly lets the so-called whole slip from sight.

In other words, this is a re-affirmation of the new suggestion being made to people to do their own thing. If that is so, is it really going to make very much difference in the long run if in fact we solve the inflation problem or do any of the other things which have been pre-occupying many of our members and about which the opposition has been criticizing the government for its lack of action?

What I am really saying, without getting too philosophical about it, is this: it is not enough to ask how we are going to solve inflation. What we really have to ask is: To what end are we solving inflation? If you do not have some answers in that connection it is surely evident that the frustrations that have been building up within the Canadian society, and which are symptomatic of much of the world today, will not be any less simply because we have reduced the price of sheet steel by $6 per ton or knocked $100 off the price of an automobile.

These things are important in themselves, of course, but as the history of the post-war world surely demonstrates, what has really happened is that we have increased our affluence enormously and moved ahead economically and socially at a rate unprecedented in Canadian history, but at this moment in time human frustration and uncertainty is greater than it ever was.

So I say we must look for these goals and objectives, and we have to find a way through which we can bring a greater degree of public participation into being. I want to re-emphasize that we are trying to make the information available. We are trying, through the use of white papers rather than legislation, in the first instance, to lay matters before the public on an alternative kind of basis by saying: This is the way we are proposing to move, but we want to hear from you whether it is the right way to move. We might say: This is one choice, here is another—and lay out before the public a whole range of choices. This is what I am hoping to do within the Department of Transport regarding the big issues with which we are engaged.

We within the department are not the repository of all wisdom. It is not the case that we know, better than everyone else with whom we have to deal, what is the best solution. Through these techniques we in the government are trying objectively to achieve a greater degree of involvement. We can only do this together.

I do not believe that on this point any kind of partisan base is likely to cause any friction among us. I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on this point. We can, surely, be united in attempting to define the goals to which I have referred. We must ask ourselves, in the first instance, what kind of Canada we want and then move to a definition of a broad purpose that will give Canadians a real sense of involvement and some justification in answering the question: What does it mean to be a Canadian?

This is all terribly nebulous and there is tremendous danger, when one speaks like this, of being guilty of empty rhetoric. But these questions have to be asked.

I came across another quote the other day which members may be interested in hearing. It is so ancient that it could in fact be depressing and at the same time give us cause for encouragement because it indicates that in spite of how bad things appear to be, apparently they are not particularly new. This was a critic writing about the failings of Peloponesian policy making. He said:

> Each member presses its own ends which generally results in no action at all. They devote more time to the prosecution of their own purposes than to the consideration of the general welfare. Each supposes that no harm will come of his own neglect, that it is the business of another to do this or that. And so, as each separately entertains the same illusion, the common cause imperceptibly decays.

Without our knowledge, is this imperceptible decay on the way? I suggest that perhaps it is unless we acquire a better sense of balance. I have suggested that we need this within the country. I have tried to point out some of the reasons for the present situation. I think we need combative politics and partisan politics, but I suggest there are issues which override these considerations. It is my hope that we will be big enough to deal with them. If we are, for that reason we will be remembered. If we are not, we will be remembered for simply having done the storekeeping and nothing else. In fact, there is then a good question as to whether we will be remembered at all.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is my duty this afternoon to rise and participate in this Throne Speech debate at the opening of the second session of the 28th Parliament of Canada. Before moving to the topic I have decided to discuss, I wish to associate myself with my colleagues in the House in extending my sincere congratulations to the mover and seconder to the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. While I do not agree with every detail of the comments of these gentlemen, they did give very forthright and commendable addresses and I am sure their constituents will be very proud of them.

I should like also to express my congratulations to the two new ministers and the new parliamentary secretaries. In passing, let me comment on the fact that we in the west are a little concerned about the allocation of some responsibility. I have in mind the removal of the responsibility for the Wheat Board from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and the allocation of that responsibility to the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang). This hon. gentleman is in my estimation a very competent and able individual with a commendable academic career.

These appointments involve qualified men, but none of them have had any experience in dealing with the problems facing western agriculture. When the move was made it was surprising that the responsibility was not transferred directly to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) who is a practicing farmer and a man steeped in western tradition. Surely he understands and appreciates more fully the conditions and problems of agriculture in the west. We now have four ministers dealing with problems in respect of the wheat board. This is perhaps a case of having too many cooks spoiling the broth. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is still involved with problems of wheat sales. The new Minister without Portfolio is charged with responsibility for the Wheat Board. We also have the minister who has just spoken, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) who is interested in moving grain. The Minister of Agriculture would naturally be interested in the welfare of the agricultural industry. At times I am sure we will be confused about where to place responsibility in respect of certain agricultural difficulties.

I should like to make a few remarks on a topic which is of concern to this nation and which significantly underlines the inadequacy of the Speech from the Throne that the government has presented. I intend to focus my remarks on the plight and the challenge of western Canada's wheat economy. This topic has profoundly affected and shaped the temper and consciousness of the house. This is appropriate. The western agriculture industry has been a cornerstone in the quality of life which Canadians have aspired to achieve from the inception of this nation.

The wheat farmer has been a historic and consistent ally of our national development. Often a sector of our society deserves simple applause. However, I have expressed these sentiments with regard to western Canada because I wish to deal with their problems which call for the sympathy and constructive imagination of all. First, we are in the first quarter of a new crop year and a review of the western panorama is most appropriate at this time. I would like to report a few simple facts, and I ask this house to endeavour to appreciate their human and social meaning.

The essential facts in the 1968-69 crop year were that our wheat and wheat flour exports fell to 304.3 million bushels. In context, this means that our sales level now only equals that of exactly one decade ago. Our sales are down 187 million bushels from the high of 591.6 million bushels in 1963-64. Further, a bitter companion of this truth is that the average price paid to farmers, per bushel, is now approximately $1.50 compared with $1.85 per bushel only a year ago. The direct economic result of this calamity is clear from DBS statistics which I quote as follows:

Farm Cash Receipts.

Preliminary estimates indicate that, during the first six months of 1969, farmers total cash receipts from farming operations in all provinces except Newfoundland, reached $1,903.1 million, about 10 per cent below the revised value of $2,134.6 million realized during the first half of 1968. Included in these estimates are cash receipts from the sale of farm products, Canadian Wheat Board participation payments on previous years' grain crops, net cash advances on farm-stored grains in western Canada, deficiency payments made by the Agricultural Stabilization Board and supplementary payments to dairy producers. No deduction was made for the cost incurred by farmers in the production of the commodities sold. Estimates of the expenses incurred in farming operations together with total farm income are published annually in the DBS publication "Farm Net Income".

I will not bore the house further with these statistics. They can be found in DBS catalogue number 21-202. Further, DBS statistics of September 26th state the following, which is of specific relevance to western Canada:

Reflecting the decline in the Canadian Wheat Board participation payments and receipts from the sale of wheat, farm cash receipts in the prairie provinces dropped appreciatively. This was most noticeable in Saskatchewan where receipts fell from $512.1 million in 1968 to $308.3 million this year, a decline of 39.8 per cent. For Alberta and Manitoba, the decline was 20.8 per cent and 13.6 per cent respectively. Cash receipts were higher in all other provinces with the highest percentage increase being exhibited by Nova Scotia with a gain of 17.4 per cent.

This is confirmed in newspaper headlines in western Canada. I have here a number of clippings with headlines such as: "Wheat Economy Deep in Crisis", "Outlook Said Dismal for Export of Wheat", "Agriculture Importance on Decline" and "Few Options Open for Farmers". A simple and very human reality follows which affects the lives of every citizen in the linchpin provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Whole communities and thousands of families are anticipating bankruptcy. The inadequate quota of five bushels per acre, at inadequate prices, means that western farmers are now $65 million in debt to the federal treasury in the 1967-68 cash advances. There is no need to speak of this any further, but there is a need, indeed an obligation—and considering the present government, a challenge—to argue that the crisis of western Canada requires new, bold and successful national responses.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has spoken with some eloquence and with a rare kind of passion about order and unity in our society. I am here to help in my way. However, I warn the Prime Minister and his government that the bedrock foundation of social and political harmony is composed little, if at all, of statutes or rhetoric. For instance, lowering the voting age and legislation on wiretapping is not an answer to western agricultural problems. Frankly, the west will not be a place of genteel and high-minded dialogue that is forgotten while her economy is casually being undermined. A cavalier and shoddy attitude has been the hallmark of this government's approach to western Canada, and what is more important, this seems likely to continue unless the government deserts its oriental fatalism and finds an élan for constructive reform in agriculture. These are my conclusions about the present government, but I do not state them for political advantage. There are no meaningful points to be scored on past behaviour. I am most concerned about the behaviour of the government next year. It is here that I look for reform.

There may well be an economic catastrophe if no change is made. As a citizen and as a politician I do not welcome such a catastrophe. Inadequate sales and falling prices are a cause of trouble. This inadequacy continues to plague us in the House, and it is caused by the fatalism of this government. One has only to quote the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) when he announced on September 25 the sale of 86.2 million bushels of wheat to the People's Republic of China in the following manner:

This sale to China is very gratifying. But I must caution the farmers, and the public, against being overly optimistic about export volume this year. Exporting and importing countries in the northern hemisphere have had good wheat crops. Thus we have no reason to believe at this time that our exports will be much larger than last year.

Further, the Canada Grains Council stated the following on September 28:

The decline of the Canadian share of wheat exports started in 1968, extended into 1969 and under present conditions the horizon appears dim.

If all this were an unalterable truth, I suppose I could accept the implied invitation of the government and rally around the flag to teach the west something about accepting one's fate with a generous and forgiving heart. However, I disagree that we should take such a pessimistic stance. Furthermore, I say most emphatically that the single most damnable and divisive act of this government has been its withdrawn approach and defeatism with regard to the future of western Canadian agriculture. I would like to give a clear example. The Winnipeg Free Press of September 5 reported the following:

Agriculture Importance on Decline—Olson Makes Known Results of Government's Sponsored Studies. Agriculture will decline in importance in the Canadian economy in the next ten years, studies made by three federal department economists show. Their findings were released Friday by Agriculture Minister H. A. Bud Olson.

I have here a copy of the press release. I am sorry that the name of the Minister of Agriculture is associated with the pessimistic and fatalistic tone of this report. It says:

1. In 1966, about 10 per cent of the population lived on farms. By 1980 this will drop to 6 per cent.
2. In 1967, about 5 per cent of Canada's gross national product came from agriculture. In 1980 this will be about 3 per cent.
3. The agriculture and labour force will decline from 559,000 (7.6 per cent) in 1967 to about 386,000 (4 per cent) by 1980.

I emphasize the point that despite the mechanization of our farms and the reduction of our farm population, the volume of our agricultural products has increased, and the fact is that exportable agricultural products are the second largest source of income of Canada. Therefore, we in western Canada are unable to understand the mentality of this government which associates itself with the very pessimistic views of some of its economists. It seems to me that this study is largely a waste of time and is harmful to the necessary recovery of western agriculture. To publicize a hypothetical project which generates in a responsible press a headline such as "Agriculture Importance on Decline" is immensely damaging to western Canada.

The minister has not released a series of guidelines for action, but a projection of withdrawal. Is this an invitation for Canadians to ignore the present plight of western Canada and its future contribution to the Canadian economy? Considering that the government has only one constructive legislative proposal to make in response to the plight of western farmers, it is an understatement to suggest that the Minister of Agriculture could have better employed his experts. Are the forecasts of these studies of much importance? Do we have to live within them? Is it right that the minister should popularize them? The assumptions underlying this report are probably complete. However, to be credible they must remain considerably static. I cannot accept, for example, that production and marketing policies must remain the same and that our share of international markets will not change and can be predetermined.

I do not agree that it is good enough for long-term planners or cabinet ministers to advertise the proposition that if trends continue and a particular share of the market is obtained, sales volume will be at a predictable and predetermined level. Shares of market and markets are not predetermined but are established by competitive positions, the price and services packages and by promotion efforts in other marketing instruments. In today's world it is not good enough to share developed markets. Such assumptions do not pre-occupy energetic governments. Aggressive and modern selling practices could not have been part of the assumptions of these projections. We do not have aggressive or modern selling practices. Compared with our largest competitor, the United States, we spend very little on such a basic task as marketing research. To conclude this point, there is no proper case to be made that we cannot achieve prosperity for the population of western Canada. The pessimists have not a complete case, and considering the dictates of history and immediate experience our assumptions should be optimistic. Our resilience, technology and energy argue the point.

Mr. Speaker, I have said this because I want to be constructive. However, I have had to assert that the positive is appropriate, that optimism is required, because the government would wish it otherwise. Since this House recessed this summer my party colleagues and many others sat down together for three days at Regina and for three days at Niagara Falls to assess the extent of the western agricultural crisis and what policies should be developed by the federal government. Some of our conclusions I would like to quote, and of one I would like to speak. The Regina conference on western agriculture stated as follows on the question of future markets and the demand for western products:

We reject the pessimistic view of the present government and the federal task force on agriculture on the future of cereal sales for the next decade.

We do not disagree that there will be a static position for future markets of high grade wheats, but we say most emphatically that the future demand for lower grades of wheat for both domestic and feed grains consumption have not been fully exploited.

Today wheat surpluses in the world are only sufficient to cover one year's total demand. This means if there is to be a drought or a crop failure in any part of the world the world cereal picture would shift from one of surplus to deficit in a very short time.

In the meantime, western agriculture is suffering from an income gap which is having serious effects upon the economy of the whole nation. Since we should expect future increases of demands for cereal grains to make our present surplus a real asset, the nation should assist in carrying the costs of this reserve.

Because of the growing opportunities for low grade and new cereals immediate programs should be applied to assist proper adjustment.

We see the future demand for livestock products from western Canada as being good. However, we must warn that a rapid shift from wheat to cattle could mean a disaster to the stable growth of that industry.

The government, in the Speech from the Throne, offers amendments to only one agricultural act. We recommend much more. I quote the Niagara Falls conclusions as follows:

It was felt that a Canadian grain-selling agency was necessary to give grain the type of aggressive salesmanship necessary in international markets.

Until now the Wheat Board, in co-operation with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has been depending on international commission houses, of which there are a number of multi-million dollar concerns spread over the world, to handle the actual mechanical transactions involved in international sales. All they are interested in is getting a quarter per cent or a half per cent of the selling price arranged for each commodity. I think we are on the right track when we advocate the establishment of a Canadian grains selling agency. Dealing with the International Grains Agreement at the Niagara conference, we stated:

The repudiation of the International Wheat Agreement and the creation of the International Grains Agreement has meant that the five major wheat exporters have essentially lost equal bargaining power with consumers in establishing price levels of sales that would be tolerable to their own producers. The exporters' responsibility is still to seek export prices compatible to the production costs and fair returns for their own producers. But our acceptance of the International Grains Agreement has made this very difficult for those five major producers.

We condemn the government for repudiating the International Wheat Agreement which was, unlike the present International Grains Agreement, an institution which could protect the interests of the Canadian producer. Furthermore, this government took this step without consulting the Canadian wheat producers themselves.

So now we recommend:

1. We should now make it our immediate and priority aim to re-establish an unanimity among these five major producers to once again establish international prices tolerable to their own wheat producers.

2. We should try to establish with Russia and other in and out exporters of wheat a working agreement on these basic prices which are to be established again by the five major producers.

3. We should develop within these international agreements greater flexibility so that lower quality grains can more properly contribute to the incomes of western farmers.

4. We ask that during the next meeting of the five major producers before the next International Grains Agreement conference to establish new price dimensions, the costs of goods and services of the farmer due to inflation be considered as a factor when those new prices are established.

We also took a look at the growth of the cattle industry and we had this suggestion to make:

In co-operation with the provinces we would promote a moderate and steady expansion of the beef industry in all parts of Canada by:

(1) encouraging better use of pasture in conjunction with water and grain,

(2) establishing and developing co-operative and private feed lots, and

(3) encouraging conversion of high yield, low quality wheatland into pasture and forage to allow for expansion of beef-cow numbers.

Dealing with the role of food aid in international development we had this to say:

Our position is that Canada should meet all requests for food by the World Food Program. We are disappointed that governments have failed to supply areas of extreme crisis such as the Gaza Strip and Biafra. If multilateral agencies are unable to act then our government should stand willing to work a bilateral agreement in relieving distress.

The essence of using food in international development is to give highest priority to the development of food supplies in the newly developing nations. Realizing this objective will require decades to achieve, Canada should take the lead in persuading other nations to build up inventories of strategic food items. This should be undertaken within multilateral agencies such as the World Food Program or F.A.O.

Dealing with the subject of floor prices we stated:

We recommend that the Agriculture Prices Stabilization Act be brought up to date by bringing into play the increased knowledge that we have of production efficiency levels in the products covered by the legislation.

The subject of acreage payments was discussed and we said:

> Acreage payments are like cash advances; not final answers to the farmer's fundamental problem. However, they should be considered as a proven technique of bridging the income gap while allowing maximum freedom for the farmer to choose the diversification program most suitable to his own needs.

On the matter of transportation we said:

> We recommend that in view of problems consistently arising in the movement of cereal grain in western Canada, which bring hardship, inconvenience, and financial loss to individual farmers, an over-all co-ordinating authority be established to direct the movement of cereal grains.

Storage has been a major problem this fall for farmers in western Canada. It is hard to estimate the cost to farmers in their efforts to borrow money to provide storage to protect the grain they have taken off their land this year. On the question of storage we stated:

> We recommend that the money spent by the federal treasury on the Temporary Wheat Reserve Act for grain storage be divided between commercial storage and farm storage on the basis of six cents per bushel per year.

These tasks must now be pursued by the government if it is to claim it has done what was possible, what was required. But more specifically, I appeal to the government to establish a manly, practical and essential understanding with our greatest competitor, the United States. The history of the present crisis calls for this action as a basis of recovery. I think this puts the finger on the crux of one of our biggest problems. We have a great deal of unsold grain in western Canada and have lost markets because of the temporary lapse of the International Grains Agreement. When our officials returned from the Kennedy Round talks in Geneva we in western Canada were met by the headlines in the Regina Leader to the effect that the Americans had dumped wheat into the Japanese market at 22 cents a bushel below the floor price. I can understand the reaction of our competitor countries such as Argentina, France and Australia. When they saw a major nation such as the United States taking advantage of the lapse in the wheat agreement, they immediately did the same.

However, Canada remained honest for another 18 months, but last April the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) advised the House that he had instructed the Wheat Board to start cutting prices in world markets. This sent a shudder through western members who felt it was the last straw. It was exactly what our friends across the line wanted us to do, and within two weeks they were pointing the finger at us. Canada and France were named the culprits, when actually it was our neighbours to the south who started the ball rolling.

I would make a suggestion and draw on my experience of a few years ago when I had occasion to deal with similar matters. Perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) or the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) with responsibility for the Canadian Wheat Board should make a private visit to the United States and talk to their counterparts behind closed doors with no radio, press or television coverage. We are not anti-American, but I think we should be pro-Canadian. Perhaps before the next conference they would be able to reach a decision on what should be the floor price under the International Grains Agreement. If $1.95½ is not a realistic floor price—and I have talked to many farmers who feel that possibly it is an excessive price—perhaps something more realistic, say $1.75, could be set as the floor price and we could start from there.

Importers know that Canada grows the best wheat in the world. Under the old wheat agreement we have for 18 years satisfied our customers because of our reputation as honest brokers who bargain fairly and who produce good quality grain. If we set a good example to the exporting and importing nations of the world we should get our fair share of world markets. As I stated earlier, Mr. Speaker, this is not party policy; it is a suggestion of my own which I think is practical and I think our friends to the south would respect us for it. Again, I appeal to the government to establish a manly understanding with out greatest competitor, the United States.

This present crisis had much of its origin in 1966. The federal government has had the responsibility since then to develop policies to meet the common crisis, but it has failed. In 1966 the United States made a number of changes in her wheat policy which adversely affected Canadian growers. They were obvious at the time but our government did not act. The United States wheat acreage allotment was increased by about 30 per cent, a modified two-price system was introduced using domestic milling certificates and aggressive selling in commercial markets supplanted much of the earlier emphasis on food aid. As a result in 1967-68 the United States was the only major exporter to increase wheat exports while total world exports declined by about 15 per cent. Because of our indecisive response to the new challenges our wheat exports declined by almost 40 per cent.

In closing I should like to say this, Mr. Speaker. In the short term, government policy has probably averted a cash shortage which could have been ruinous to a viable industry. An assessment of marketing difficulties and opportunities must now be rigorously and frankly undertaken. This economic area must harmonize supply and demand for two reasons. First, the kind of assistance the farmer is now receiving in terms of cash advances can only be repaid by sufficient acreage quotas in the future, otherwise western agriculture will become hideously indebted to the federal treasury; secondly, the wheat economy cannot, and historically should not become a burden to the financial capacity of the government. If we are to make any progress in meeting the hurtful and chronic poverty of agriculture in the regionally depressed areas of eastern Canada and the maritimes, western agriculture must again become a contributing cornerstone of our economy.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, every so often in this debate in which the House is engaged I find myself thinking of it as a state of the nation debate. In other words, in the traditions of this parliament we come back from the far corners of our big country and give to those members of the House and the government who take time to listen some report of the state of the nation, as it were, in our particular corner of it. In the last hour or so we have heard something about the problem of marketing wheat from the member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam) and we have heard about the problem of marketing fresh and salt codfish in Newfoundland from the Minister of Transport. But I suppose some of the matters on which I shall speak this afternoon will not have come to the particular attention of either of those hon. members.

I found it quite interesting that in the spirit of this debate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) spoke to us as a member from the Province of Newfoundland rather than in his capacity as the Minister of Transport. I think his speech could give us some food for thought. He gave us a picture of the true tradition of debate in reply to the Speech from the Throne, where one can be reasonably expansive about one's own viewpoint, at the same time recognizing that other members have something to contribute to the progress of public life in this country.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, as I listened to him I wished that his colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), who appears to be in a rather panicky and near hysterical state these days, had been in the House to absorb something of the spirit and the approach taken by the Minister of Transport. When I listened to the Minister of Finance on Monday I began to feel that the state of the nation must be much worse, at least from his point of view, than I had found it during the time I spent in my own constituency. I wonder if the minister has read his remarks in Hansard. He seemed to be almost hysterical and in a trigger-happy mood. I should like to draw some of his remarks to the attention of the House. He was referring to capital investment policies, priorities, and proposals of the NDP for controls in our economy in terms which reminded me, a member from British Columbia, of the tone of voice adopted by the Premier of British Columbia in the provincial election of not too long ago when, on being panicky about his prospects of returning to power, the Premier pulled out all the stops and pushed all the political panic-buttons. When referring to the NDP proposals the Minister of Finance said, as reported on page 147 of Hansard:

> —the inevitable consequences are arbitrary judgments, gross inequities, rationing, and for the first time in Canada since the war, a black market. Worst of all, the state will have to move into every factory, every store, every office, every trade union and every household. Perhaps this is the kind of communist control that the NDP wants for our society—

In his election campaign the Premier of British Columbia talked of the heavy hand of the Marxist socialist state, but I did not expect that the Minister of Finance, when discussing the seriousness of the state of the nation and what can be done to overcome inflation, would display such shattered nerves. Considering some of the remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the question period, about the imposition of certain controls if certain voluntary measures do not work out, I am inclined to think that the Minister of Finance is more worried about his colleagues in cabinet. Perhaps by his remarks he was lashing out at those colleagues indirectly, since he could not lash out directly. I am afraid that the minister has been speaking about imagined comments emanating from our party, because remarks he has attributed to members of this group bear no resemblance to statements made by our spokesmen inside or outside this chamber.

As the Minister of Transport said, in each session the Canadian parliament deals with the immediate crisis that lies before us. I agree that at the same time we must try to look ahead. Having been in the chamber somewhat longer than the minister has been, I think I can say that in each session of parliament we look at the future of our country and try to determine in which direction we ought to move. Commenting on the radio the other day on the particular characteristic of this session, I said that this may become known as the session of the great inflation debate. It will be a watershed in our attempt to come to grips with the realities of inflation.

Earlier in his Monday night speech the Minister of Finance spoke of the great problem of our deep-seated inflationary expectations, meaning no doubt the expectations of people who believe that inflation will go on forever. They want all they can get out of it. The minister said this:

> I should like to assure the House that it is the intention of the government that this shall not happen, and it will not happen for the benefit of the little people in our country.

Some people in this House have for many years been trying to say that the little people of Canada are endangered by inflation. This session may become a watershed inasmuch as for the first time in my experience a Minister of Finance in this chamber appears to be taking inflation seriously enough to do something about it.

In the period since the end of the second world war—and during the war we had some controls—a certain trend has been followed in our economy. That trend, with the exception of one or two brief periods of so called recession, was one of inflation. During most of this period there has been sitting on the treasury benches a government that calls itself Liberal. We had a Liberal government after the war which deliberately turned its back on any kind of orderly control in our society. It abandoned all wartime controls almost overnight, encouraged the formation of an inflationary price spiral and ignored the pleadings of the labour leaders of the country who asked the government not to abandon controls completely. They said that if the government was prepared to take this course they were prepared to recommend to the constituent unions of the labour congresses that they hold down the lid on demands for wage increases unless those wage increases could be tied to increases in productivity.

Today when a Liberal Minister of Finance says, "I should like to assure the House that it is the intention of the government that this shall not happen", meaning that the inflationary spiral shall not go on forever, no one should be surprised if some members in this chamber display skepticism. Never before has a Liberal Minister of Finance taken seriously suggestions that inflation poses a danger to the little people of Canada.

Year after year we have seen the real purchasing power of our people eroded. We have seen the government refusing to take action which will prevent our little people from falling farther and farther behind so far as incomes are concerned. Their incomes have fallen behind those enjoyed by other groups within the economy. I hope the panic the minister has evidenced will cause sober thinking in government circles and that government members mean what they say when they talk about measures to halt the spiral of inflation. After all, that is what some of us have been talking about for a long time. If the minister is really serious, I for one do not mind if he waxes slightly hysterical and makes wild and inaccurate observations about this party's position. It is worth paying that price if our Minister of Finance is prepared to seriously tackle the question of inflation. Nevertheless, when one remembers the situation the minister has left our little people in, the old age pensioners and others who seek housing, one begins to wonder how much of what he says he means. Only yesterday I asked the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing a question about the roll-back of interest rates affecting projects under section 16 of the National Housing Act. The situation I was alluding to is not unique to Port Alberni, but I did that because of the fact that the housing society in Port Alberni, the Alberni Valley Senior Citizen's Homes, had developed a project to meet the growing need for accommodation for senior citizens. They had taken all the necessary initiatives and had raised locally the money necessary to engage architects to draw the sketch plans for a new high-rise hostel-type development for senior citizens.

This project was to meet the real demand—not more than the real demand—for this type of accommodation in the community. They had received the necessary preliminary approval from the authorities of the province of British Columbia. They had reached the stage where they could proceed to the working drawings and they anticipated early construction. They suddenly discovered all their plans were thrown out of calculation because the government of Canada was not prepared to check the impact of inflation upon the little people, the senior citizens, who would live in this low-income housing development.

Appeals and inquiries were directed to the Minister of Finance by the Alberni Valley Senior Citizen's Homes organization, supplemented by representations from the city of Port Alberni and the Port Alberni and District Labour Council. These representations pointed out to the Minister of Finance that they will have to abandon this project. So far the Minister of Finance has not acknowledged these representations. That is why I had to stand in this House at the beginning of the session to find out whether the government had any intention of doing something about the problem which would enable this local organization to follow through with its own initiative in trying to prevent the impact of inflation upon the little people, to use the words of the Minister of Finance. This initiative was a second stage. It is a follow-up of a project which came into being a number of years ago. I had to probe to find out whether the government is going to make it possible for these people to do something about stemming the tide of inflation and its impact on the little people. I was told by the Prime Minister that the government is not going to do anything to make it possible for the project to proceed.

The Prime Minister stated that the government will not consider granting a subsidy on the interest rates which would have enabled this project and others like it across the country to proceed. They will not take that minor step to stem the impact of inflation on the little people, that is, grant a reduction of 1 per cent to the effective interest rate that had been charged earlier this year.

If we are to talk about stemming inflation, the government must start to take some initiatives which are within its means. It is not necessary to go into the realm of price controls and all the other fearful things the minister is worrying about to deal with this kind of problem. This is one of the minor things that can be done without putting any strain on the financial structure of the government. To have stemmed the tide and held it in this particular area would have meant a simple supplement. This is a method which the government could have used but which the Prime Minister says they will not use. They could have supplemented a very small part of the total commitment of this year for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In other words, it would have stemmed the tide while some of the other measures the government is talking about are taking effect.

Perhaps by the time next year's appropriations are required by CMHC for this purpose there will be a fall-back of interest rates. But why penalize certain groups when most of the funds have been appropriated at a lower interest rate? Why penalize groups who have developed their projects in good faith, believing they could proceed according to plan, by refusing to hold the ceiling on interest rates in this very special field which has always operated within the framework of the Liberal government's national housing policy at less than the standard commercial rates for housing?

While I am pleased to see that the Minister of Finance is taking the problem of inflation more seriously than other Liberal Ministers of Finance in my experience have done and I believe the facts as they have been laid before us bear this out, I have some skepticism as to how effective the ideas and proposals of the federal government will be in this connection. This is why I find it difficult to take too seriously the bland words of the Minister of Finance when he states he will see that inflation does not happen.

There are many matters with which one could deal in this debate. At the beginning of my remarks I referred to it as being a state of the nation debate. It represents the fundamental contrast between our system and that of the United States. In our parliament it is the private members who come back from across the country and tell the government about the state of the nation. This is in contrast to the United States Congressional system, where the state of the nation speech is delivered by the head of the executive branch.

I understand that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) is involved in an important and necessary conference in Victoria. I had hoped to raise at this time certain matters which are of real concern in British Columbia and which come within the realm of his activity. As the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) is in the House today I shall deal with certain matters which I trust are somewhat dear to his heart and defer my remarks on the other subject to another occasion.

The minister will be happy to know that the Alberni Valley Times of the city of Port Alberni published a speech the minister delivered to the Saskatchewan Liberal Women's Federation in Regina, Saskatchewan, on October 2. The editor's comment states:

> The Times reprints it because of the local interest in the matter of the new federal Indian policy.

The minister's words do get around the country. Even when he is speaking to such an august body as the Saskatchewan Liberal Women's Association in Regina we learn of it on Vancouver Island. When I read this speech I recalled some of the observations and questions in the House earlier this year when the minister announced his new Indian policy. My colleagues and I indicated at the time that we felt the minister was very sincere in his desire to move forward in this area of his responsibilities. It was obvious to me from the somewhat defensive attitude which the minister exhibited during this particular speech that he felt some of his proposals had met with unfair criticism. He kept on saying the statement did not mean this, it did not mean that, and so on. I do not have time in which to read the entire speech into the record; the minister can do that himself, if he so wishes when he makes his contribution to the debate.

No doubt it is true that the minister's proposals have indeed met with unfair criticism from some quarters, or what is perhaps even worse, that they have not been properly understood. I have myself been critical of some of the proposals but in the main, my criticism has been concerned with what was left out of the policy rather than to what was embodied in it. In fact, I believe the minister will find that my hon. friend from Skeena (Mr. Howard) and myself agree that many of the propositions advanced in the policy statement are propositions which many of the Indians in our area endorse. I refer to equal treatment of Indians in the field of education, welfare and so on.

What has disturbed me most deeply is the omission from this policy statement of any recognition of the basic rights of Indians arising from aboriginal claims. If I understood the minister's answers to me last session correctly, he maintains that because these claims are not substantiated by written documents they are unrealistic and non-negotiable. In my view, if the minister continues to act on this assumption he will defeat his own basic ends and we shall never solve the Indian problem, at least as far as the Indians of British Columbia are concerned. The Parliament of Canada thought it had put an end to the British Columbia land question in 1927. It may have thought so. Parliament may have thought the issue was dead, but it will not lie down.

Having referred to the speech the minister made in Regina, a speech in which he quite properly defended his position, I should like to draw attention to an article which was published in the Vancouver Sun of Wednesday, September 3. This sets out what is being done in another situation, one in which the background is in many ways similar. It is an article about the situation in the State of Alaska where, as in British Columbia, treaties with regard to land were not made with the Indian people.

Apparently the United States and the State of Alaska do not intend to sweep the whole thing under the rug and say that because no agreement exists the claims of the Indians are unrealistic. This article states:

> Congress has before it four proposed solutions—three put forward by the parties involved in the dispute: the state, the federal government and the natives, as represented by the Alaska Federation of Natives. The form of the settlement has been more or less agreed upon by everyone concerned.

I shall not read all the details but here are the main points. It says, first, that there should be a land grant. Discussion is going on about how many million acres should go to the Indian people of Alaska. Second, all parties concerned agree there should be a federal monetary settlement for lands taken in the past and for the final wiping out of all claims. The administration, the state and the natives have all settled on the figure of $500 million although they disagree about how rapidly it should be paid. Third, it has been agreed that the money should go into development corporations in which all natives would hold shares. The article goes on to say that the exact nature of these proposed corporations has not been worked out. The major disagreement yet to be resolved concerns something else: the natives want a 2 per cent royalty on revenues from state and federal lands.

I think this is something which the government should consider. I should like to see this whole question examined thoroughly by the government or by a committee. What, in the opinion of the government, is the difference between the land question in British Columbia and the land question in Alaska? In both cases no treaties were made. In both cases people of European descent encroached on land which the native people had occupied. Apparently in the United States there is recognition that the native claims should be dealt with. The Government of Canada, however, refuses to recognize that such claims have any substance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired—unless, of course, there is unanimous consent to his continuing. Is that agreed?

An hon. Member: Go on.

Mr. Barnett: I am content to let the matter rest there, Mr. Speaker. I can pursue it again if necessary. There will be other opportunities.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Cullen) and the seconder (Mr. Marceau) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Those hon. members thus had one of their first opportunities to express their views in the house and, above all, to point out to a certain extent the needs of their respective constituencies.

I wish to call the attention of the house to two problems that I consider extremely serious and which were not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne.

On several occasions, since 1967, I have addressed oral or written questions to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) concerning fraudulent bankruptcies in Canada.

If you refer to the official documents tabled in the house, you can see that a revision of the legislation on bankruptcy was promised. Mention of it was made in the Speech from the Throne and in the legislation introduced for this purpose. Up to now nothing in the government attitude leads us to expect an early inquiry into or revision of the Bankruptcy Act.

This problem is worsening from day to day. In the province of Quebec alone during the first three months of 1968 $32 million were lost in fraudulent bankruptcies and the figures we have for this year are even more alarming.

This loss of $32 million in three months represents an average of $11 million a month for the province of Quebec alone. This means also a loss of about half a million dollars a day because of really fraudulent bankruptcies. These figures spread fear and shock in industrial and trade circles, but it seems that during the last three years the federal government did not carry out its promises.

According to The Gazette of Friday, October 3, 1969, one of the officers in charge of fraudulent bankruptcies in Montreal claimed, and I quote:

• (5:10 p.m.)

[English]

Fraudulent bankruptcies in Quebec have accounted for a record-breaking $32,000,000 in commercial losses in the first three months of 1969, a Montreal Police Department expert said yesterday.

"The illicit trade has grown to such proportions in recent years that I'm convinced the revenue obtained in fraudulent bankruptcies is used to finance organized crime projects," Lieutenant Leo Talbot told the conference . . .

Lt. Talbot said he finds it difficult to explain why efforts to contain this type of crime have not been more intense.

[Translation]

Our police forces are wondering how it is that the federal government has done nothing in the last two years, at least, to carry out its promise to introduce a new measure in respect of the Bankruptcy Act.

In spite of the promises made in the house, nothing in the bills tabled last week by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gives us any hope that such a review will be undertaken.

Although I cannot discuss it at length during the time allotted me, I want to raise another problem which is extremely important, in my view. It deals with another sphere of the economy and has to do specifically with our young people.

It is about the drug problem which is as frightening, if not more, as that of bankruptcies. In the newspaper La Presse, on May 14, 1969, this is what one could read:

North Americans consume 25 tons of aspirin daily.

Each year, Canada imports legally 33 tons of barbituric powder, that is an average of 7.4 tablets per Canadian.

Canadians buy legally each year 71 million tons of stimulating amphetamins.

—These facts have been revealed by Mr. Keith Kincaid, a journalist who has done research in this field and published the article from which I just read an extract.

I go on with the quotation.

It is obvious that Canadians live with chemical products intended to make them forget their worries, ease tension, bring sleep, improve their dispositions, fiight weariness and stimulate energy.

It is somewhat frightening to see how many doctors prescribe drugs they hardly know, combine incompatible products which could have a dangerous effect . . .

Dr. S. J. Holmes, psychiatrist from Toronto, explains this as the symptom of a sickness deeply rooted in socio-economic conditions which produce dissatisfaction, conflict and tension.

On May 22, 1969, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) addressed a convention of the American Pharmacists Association in the following terms:

Speaking about the increasing use of marijuana and other hallucinogenic drugs in a first speech before the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, I said I was worried about the alarming way the number of marijuana users was growing. I quoted the figures that were available then: 54 cases in 1964; twice as many in 1965; more than 400 in 1966; almost 1600 in 1967. We now have the 1968 total,—

At the present time, according to the statistics provided by experts in that field, about 20 per cent of the student population are addicts and use all kinds of drugs.

In my opinion, this is an extremely serious problem. Our youth take large amounts of drugs and barbiturates. The federal government in its Speech from the Throne does not even mention it. Another Montreal newspaper reported the following and I quote:

Adiction to heroin costs $1 billion to the community. The traffic and consumption of heroin throughout Canada costs about $1 billion per year to society as stated this wekend by Dr. Houssein Moghadam of the School of Hygiene at the University of Toronto.

I could continue to quote statistics and comments to give you some idea of the importance of this problem.

One piece of news made a particular impression on us last year. As a matter of fact, there appeared in the newspapers—and the federal government did nothing about the matter—the following news item:

Sixty million dollars worth of drugs are seized: Scotland Yard implicates the Defence Department and the RCMP exonerates the number one suspect.

A certain quantity of chemical products used to manufacture LSD, which would have netted sixty million dollars on the black market; a technician of the CBC in Toronto poisons himself with cyanide while being questioned by the police.

The first concrete fact rests in the revelations made this morning by a Scotland Yard spokesman, who stated that this famous British police department has broken up a vast international drug ring which literally flooded with LSD the west Coast of Canada and the United States...

The ring, by selling this product on the black market, would have made $60 million...if Scotland Yard had not intervened...

...But a Yard spokesman had just said yesterday morning again, that documents and letters found in the home of Kussner, in Toronto, had made it possible to arrest two men in London, then to dismantle the ring. The Yard spokesman had then revealed that documents had been seized with the LSD, indicating that the drug was sent to Canada for refining...in a laboratory of the Canadian Department of National Defence, before being put on the market in Vancouver and the United States.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

Mr. Speaker, following that report, nobody here, not even a committee of the house, succeeded in getting to the bottom of the charges made by a very important Scotland Yard detective.

Everybody knows that the problem of drugs in Canada is getting worse and worse. As a matter of fact, a Montreal school now buys for $5,000 worth of barbiturates or drugs of all kinds every week.

The situation is getting more and more serious. Our young people show an ever stronger tendency to use the most harmful drugs. They go from marijuana to hashish, methadrin, LSD and, finally, heroin. The situation keeps deteriorating, and exemplary convictions only will put an end to that mad craze.

Since the beginning of 1968, only 200 pounds of marijuana which sells retail for $1,600 a pound have been seized.

At the present time, Montreal is flooded with barbiturates. Hashish has become popular and for the first time heroin has appeared on the market.

According to certain newspapers, 1,000 barbiturate addicts would be waiting for admission at the Joliette hospital.

Some time ago, Detective Sergeant Jacques Durocher gave examples of trips and the noxious effects caused by the use of this drug in our society, particularly among the young people on whom depends the future of Canada. These are his words:

—Under the influence of LSD, they think they are traffic lights; they plunge amidst the stream of cars at peak hours trying to stop them. In certain cases they have caused crashes in which people were injured;

He further states:

A youth thought he was the Iron Man. Totally gone on a "trip", he lay down on a bed and plunged a kitchen knife into his heart. He was 17.

• (5:20 p.m.)

In my constituency, a young 19 year-old man attending a technical school in the Eastern Townships took his life 12 hours after having taken a dose of barbiturate.

I could give hundreds of such cases.

I could even mention the case of a 27 year-old intern, who went into the operating room chuck-full of LSD 25. In his "hallucinatory" state, he forgot three surgical instruments in the abdomen of the "female patient", and while at it, removed the ovaries, the gall-bladder, the pancreas, and threw everything through the window.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this seems exaggerated, but it is true.

These facts are alarming for our society and I think that the government should have taken special notice of it and put an end to the harm caused at present by that drug. As one knows, it is very easy nowadays for anybody who wants to use drugs to get them from recognized agencies, and especially from physicians.

Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude my remarks by commenting on the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) and seconded by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) and dealing with a guaranteed minimum income for each Canadian.

For several days, this house has been discussing the fight against inflation. I wonder where the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the government experts found their definition of the word inflation, in their efforts to fight it. Surely, we should know what it is before we fight it. The best way to find the right definition is to look in the Larousse or Quillet dictionaries, both give exactly the same definition.

At page 543 of the Larousse dictionary, the word inflation is defined as follows:

> Economic imbalance characterized by a general increase in prices—

Up to this point, I think that we all agree, but the definition indicates also the cause of this evil and I continue:

> —and which stems from the excessive purchasing power of the body of the consumers (individuals, corporations and governments) in relation to the quantity of goods and services available to them.

This means that inflation implies that there is too much money in circulation. Is it that the minister now intends to fight inflation on the basis of this definition and that we all agree with the Larousse definition? Of course not, the minister does not care about the definition. On the contrary, I think that in Canada, at the present time, there is not much money in circulation.

One look at the statistics of the federal, provincial and municipal governments and the school boards, at the needs of the Canadian people, at our production and at the unemployed, the families who need that production, to conclude that the problem in Canada is not one of production, because the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) tell us that the production should be increased. The Minister of Finance, on the other hand, tells us that we should produce less.

Thus, restraint on one hand and increase of the productivity on the other. We, the members of the Ralliement créditiste, say that our problem is one of distribution and all the newspaper articles which tell us of the problems of our municipalities are capable of giving quite another definition which leads us to believe that we do not live in a period of inflation.

On September 17, 1969, the newspaper L'Action said about the city of Montreal, and I quote:

> The population of Montreal has only tripled since 1900, but the city's budget has increased a hundredfold.
> In the meantime, interest charges on the debt have increased sixfold, from $13,400,000 to 1948-49 to $77,100,000 in 1968-69.

The city of Montreal pays at the present time more than $85 million per year, in interest charges only, and the largest city in my constituency, that of Granby, showed in 1957 a debt of $2,750,000—

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 30, 1969

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACQUARRIE—METHOD OF PUBLICIZING POLICY STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise on what for me is a rare exercise, namely a question of privilege involving a matter which impinges upon or could impinge upon the privileges and effectiveness of all hon. members of this House, and I intend to make a motion for referral of the subject matter to one of the standing committees of the House.

I have in my hand a document from the Department of Communications addressed to the news editors of the radio stations in Canada, which reads as follows:

Radio stations will soon be able to obtain, by simply dialing a telephone number, policy statements of national importance made in the House, at a press conference or in a speech, by the Minister of Communications, Eric Kierans.

The system will allow radio stations anywhere in Canada, where there is a telephone service, to get a recorded statement (60 to 90 seconds) preceded by a service message by dialing a government number in their area.

An hon. Member: His master's voice.

Mr. Macquarrie: The document continues:

The statement can then be recorded by the stations for use in their news broadcasts or saved for public affairs programming.

We will let you know soon the number you must call.

This is over the name of Frank Howard, Director of Information Services, Communications Department.

An hon. Member: 1984.

Mr. Macquarrie: This, sir, is a serious matter. The relationship of Parliament to the media is one of great significance at the present time. There are queries whether or not television should be in the House, on the doorstep of the House, or in neither place. This is a time when we see a great proliferation of information officers in the departments of the members of the executive.

This is a matter of especial importance in that it involves the particular minister who has a special role and powers in reference to broadcasting in this country because, by Order in Council P.C. 1968-1305, those powers regarding licensing which once were vested in the Minister of Transport have now been vested in the Minister of Communications. So it is not a far stretch of the imagination to envisage that the news editors of the radio stations across the country, having dialed the number, may in certain respects expect to hear "his master's voice", as the old expression has it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macquarrie: This matter, Mr. Speaker, should be investigated. If this is a proper relationship of a member of the House of Commons to the media, it should not be the exclusive property of the ministers or a particular minister. If it is an improper relationship with the media, if it embodies the concept, even remotely, of managed news, then it should be thoroughly investigated by the proper committee of this House and the practice curtailed forthwith. It may indeed be a proper performance or it may be a highly improper performance. But this relationship is of such significance in these days when we are told that the media is the message, that the situation could be very serious if the minister and the media are the same. I therefore propose to move the following motion:

• (11:10 a.m.)

That the conduct of the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications, as evidenced by a letter distributed from his office and relating to the availability of statements made by him or on his behalf to the radio stations of Canada be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt very much whether it would be in the interest of the House to enlarge the debate on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Hillsborough. I have studied the notice which I received from the hon. member in accordance with the requirements of the rules. I have looked into the precedents and I am now in a position to indicate to the House whether I consider that there is a prima facie case of privilege, since this has to be determined before the motion can be put in a formal way to the House.

It may be useful at the beginning of the session for me to stress once again, as I have tried to do in the past sessions, the very nature of parliamentary privilege. Privilege has been defined as the sum of the fundamental rights enjoyed by each House of Parliament collectively and by members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions, and which exceed those possessed by other bodies or individuals. In the seventeenth edition of May's Parliamentary Practice at page 43 we find the following:

> When any of these rights and immunities, both of the Members, individually, and of the assembly in its collective capacity, which are known by the general name of privileges, are disregarded or attacked by any individual or authority, the offence is called a breach of privilege, and is punishable under the law of Parliament.

Parliamentary privilege as a separate part of the common law includes the following special rights and immunities available to Members of Parliament:

> —freedom of speech, in the sense of immunity against suits in defamation; freedom from arrest in certain very limited circumstances; exemption from court duty as a witness or as a juror; protection against undue influence, and reflection on Members.
> There are also the collective privileges of the House dealing with the control of its proceedings and publications; the calling and protection of witnesses; reflections and indignities affecting the House as a body or as an institution; the right to set up its own rules, and the traditional privileges claimed by the Speaker on behalf of the House at the opening of Parliament.

I stress the essence of the definition of privilege itself so that hon. members will realize that it is only in very extreme circumstances that there can come to the House a legitimate case of privilege on the basis of the real and accepted and traditional definition of parliamentary privilege.

The question has often been raised whether parliamentary privilege imposes on ministers an obligation to deliver ministerial statements and to make announcements and communications to the public through the House of Commons or to make these announcements or statements in the House rather than outside the chamber. The question has been asked whether hon. members are entitled, as part of their parliamentary privilege, to receive such information ahead of the general public. I can find no precedent to justify this suggestion. Hon. members will remember that there was an interesting and somewhat protracted debate on a question of privilege raised in the last session by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). The arguments which were advanced at the time were studied closely and the precedents were discussed in a ruling of the Chair reported at page 869 of Votes and Proceedings of March 31, 1969. The precedents which were quoted at that time are in my view applicable to the circumstances outlined by the hon. member for Hillsborough. There may be, in such circumstances, a question of propriety or a question of courtesy. There may be a grievance. But in my view there cannot be a question of privilege. In the circumstances I regret that I cannot put the hon. member's motion to the House.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF SUBJECT OF INTEREST RATES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I understand there have been consultations with representatives of the other parties in order to move with unanimous consent a reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. The purpose of the reference is to give the committee an opportunity to consider the present level of interest rates in Canada in relation to rates in other countries and to economic conditions in Canada and elsewhere.

With unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin):

> That the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be empowered to consider the present level of interest rates in Canada and their relation both to rates in other countries and to economic conditions in Canada and elsewhere;
> And that the evidence adduced by the committee in its study of the aforementioned matter during the first session of the twenty-eighth parliament be referred to the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to present this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF PUBLIC BILLS

Mr. Speaker: The House will note that on today's order paper there are listed many public bills for introduction by private members. It would be difficult at this time for the Chair to review the provisions of each of those bills. May I therefore suggest to the House that we adopt the procedure which was agreed upon by the House in several recent sessions, namely, that we proceed to the introduction and first reading of these bills so that each may be scrutinized between now and the time appointed for their second reading in order to determine whether there be any defect therein with respect to the practices and usages of the House.

Therefore, in order to save the time of the House, taking into consideration that perhaps more than two hours would be required to introduce each of these measures separately, it is suggested that by unanimous consent all the bills listed for introduction on today's order paper be deemed to have been introduced, given first reading and ordered to be printed and allowed to stand for second reading at the next sitting of the House, subject, of course, to a subsequent examination as to the regularity of each bill.

To be more specific I should mention that some five bills appear at first blush to have the earmarks of money bills and therefore could be ruled out of order. Hon. members who are sponsoring these bills may want to give some thought to arguing the procedural point when they are brought before the House for second reading. These bills are:

An Act respecting the Canadian Heritage Foundation Act;

An Act relating to Indian Lands in the province of British Columbia;

An Act to amend the National Housing Act, 1954 (Municipal Water and Soil Pollution Projects);

An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (Housewives' contributions and benefits):

An Act to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

These bills will have to be studied carefully before a definite opinion is given. The Chair will take into account, of course, all the procedural arguments that may be submitted to the House.

It is agreed that we proceed as has been suggested?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—NATURE OF VOLUNTARY RESTRAINT GUIDELINES AND OTHER MEASURES—STEEL INQUIRY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of his various statements urging proper restraint upon the private sector of the economy. Has the government or the Prices and Incomes Commission yet decided on any guidelines as to what constitutes a proper exercise of restraint in present circumstances? If so, has any such information been conveyed, or will it be conveyed, to management and labour in addition to the general and proper exhortations in favour of restraint?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, of course, Mr. Speaker. The Prices and Incomes Commission has been consulting with management and labour for some time past, indicating to them ways in which restraints could be properly exercised and suggesting that the idea of a moratorium on increases in prices and incomes should be considered for the period of the next year. Details have been made known widely by the chairman and members of the commission. As I understand it, they have slated a meeting for December in which these suggested restraints will be brought back in the form of pledges by the various sectors of the economy.

Mr. Stanfield: If I understood the Prime Minister correctly, he indicated that the Prices and Incomes Commission has been conveying to certain parts, at least, of the private sector guidelines which would constitute an acceptable measure of restraint. Is it the intention of the Prices and Incomes Commission or of the government to make public the guidelines which are being suggested by the commission?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is a tactical consideration which the commission itself will have to determine. It is my understanding that its intention was to seek some form of voluntary agreement from as many areas of the economy as possible before making such statements public, or at least before announcing them. The reason, of course, is that it is important to get agreement from the various parties before stating that agreement had been reached, before creating expectations that perhaps could not be fulfilled.

The newspapers have been full of news about these matters. We know that some companies have agreed, that some sectors of industry have agreed and that some sectors of the labour movement have not agreed. But as far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, the commission is still proceeding with its work. I do not think the commission takes the position that it has had final answers yet to its proposals; it is still hopeful that there might be some kind of voluntary restraint. We are waiting, along with the Leader of the Opposition, for some statement from the commission as to the next step it is going to take.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister in a position to indicate whether or not the Prices and Incomes Commission indicated any guidelines as to restraint in connection with the steel industry?

Mr. Trudeau: I am unable to say, Mr. Speaker. If within recent weeks the commission has had any specific meetings with the steel industry or, for that matter, with any other particular industry, then I have had no report of these individual meetings. Like the hon. member, I have read certain statements in the newspapers attributed to companies and unions in regard to suggestions made by the commission. However, I do not have a list, nor have I requested such, of all the parties who have been interviewed or approached by members of the commission.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question. As I read the comments in the press made by industry and labour regarding the proposals of the Prices and Incomes Commission, they related to general agreements on guidelines. Is the Prime Minister going further and suggesting that the Prices and Incomes Commission has submitted specific guidelines to particular sectors of the economy?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I do not know exactly whom the members of the commission saw, and I do not know exactly what they said. I have not asked them for a report on the matter, nor do I think it proper to do so at this time. As I say, Mr. Speaker, I know as much as the hon. member. I should add that I know as much as I have read in the newspapers, which is perhaps not very much.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to put this question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but in his absence may I put it to the Prime Minister. In view of the suggestion made by the Steelworkers Union that the Prices and Incomes Commission might be asked to hold its inquiry into the price increases in steel in public, may I ask whether the government will use its good offices to impress upon the Prices and Incomes Commission the desirability of acting on this suggestion?

Mr. Paul Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the commission is an independent body, and it is not for the government to tell the commission what to do at this time; at least, I do not think it is. Would the hon. member repeat the second part of his question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I repeat and clarify the question. I recognize that this body is an independent one. That is why I asked the minister or the Prime Minister whether the government would use its good offices to impress this suggestion on the Prices and Incomes Commission. After all, this sort of thing has been done before, so why not do it again?

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I cannot do this. The minister is in Washington at the moment engaging in very important meetings. He will return at the beginning of next week, and I will put this question to him as soon as he returns to his office.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the Prime Minister himself not act on this matter?

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister which relates to what he said on these matters at the dinner given for the tripartite conference last night. Have the Departments of Finance and Industry, Trade and Commerce been instructed to prepare tax and tariff measures in order to fight inflation?

Mr. Trudeau: They have not been so instructed, Mr. Speaker, but the government is giving consideration to alternative ways of fighting inflation, as several ministers have stated in past days.

Mr. Hees: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in respect of what the Prime Minister said last night about inflation fighting options which the government has open to it. Will he now or at the first opportunity on motions outline to the House just what are these inflation fighting options?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the textbooks on economics contain various options, four of which I mentioned last night. I do not intend to implement them until the measures in which we still believe have shown themselves to be without result. The question will be answered if we have to resort to further measures.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will request his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, to make a statement to the House when he returns in order to indicate to the house precisely what action the Prices and Incomes Commission has taken to propose specific restraints, forms of restraints and degrees of restraints to particular sectors of the economy? Would the appropriate minister indicate to the House just what has been done, if anything, in this area?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will raise the question with him. Let me repeat the answer just given by the Parliamentary Secretary. This is an independent commission and we do not want to be in the position of calling the commission in at every turn to give them instructions or ask them for reports.

[Mr. Langlois.]

As the minister said a few days ago, the opposition supported us and, indeed, urged us on in appointing this commission. We have faith in the men who form the commission. I think it is proper from time to time for contacts to take place between the commission and the minister, but I am sure the opposition would be first to object if we appeared to be directing the operations of the commission on a day to day or, indeed, a week to week basis.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, first of all may I say on a question of privilege that I never pressed the government for the appointment of this independent commission or study group, as I call it from time to time. May I ask the Prime Minister in a non-argumentative way whether he would agree that there is intense public interest and that it is very much in the public interest that we have as much information as possible in this House and throughout the country regarding what proposals or steps are taken by this commission in order that we may formulate our own views as to what is required?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, I would agree with that, Mr. Speaker, but this involves a matter of knowing how soon and how frequently the Leader of the Opposition thinks the commission should be reporting to the minister and to Parliament. We do not think it should be on a weekly basis.

Mr. Hees: I have a further supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POST OFFICE

GRANTING OF SPECIAL RATES TO NEWSPAPERS IN DESIGNATED AREAS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): I should like to direct my question to the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications.

As the postal rates in force since last year resulted in the disappearance of several Canadian papers and since many local weeklies are presently experiencing financial difficulties, could the minister tell us whether it is true that his department is considering granting privileges by means of special rates in the so-called designated areas?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): No, Mr. Speaker, we have no intention of altering our decision. However, we wish to discuss the problem with a group of owners of weeklies I will be meeting within a few days.

[English]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we will return to the hon. member in a few minutes. We might now move to another subject for a few minutes and then call again on the hon. member. We will return to him for the purpose of allowing him to ask a further supplementary.

INTEREST RATES ON FARM MORTGAGES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Following your admonition, Mr. Speaker, I turn to another subject. This question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, and I think it is very urgent and important.

In view of the fact that the interest rate on government farm mortgages has recently been fixed at 8¾ per cent by Order in Council, would the minister very shortly make a statement on motions to reconcile this action with the provisions of Section 42 of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which provides for a limit of 5 per cent when there has been compliance with that act?

[Translation]

Mr. Florian Côté (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am taking the hon. member's question into consideration. I will hand it over to the minister when he is in the house.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, in the event that this view is sustained, will the minister advise the Farm Credit Corporation and the other institutions lending money under government legislation and also ensure that all farm mortgage debtors are acquainted with their position whether in relation to government or other farm mortgages?

GRAIN

NORTHERN ALBERTA—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Hunboldt I will direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the continuing adverse weather conditions in northern Alberta and the Alberta government's announced intention to help farmers with snowed-under crops, is the federal government taking any initiatives, similar to those taken in 1959, to provide some form of assistance to offset the dire circumstances resulting from the shortage of cash, because cash advances cannot be acquired on unharvested grain, and to meet the shortage of feed and feed requirements during the ensuing winter?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board asked me to say that he and the Minister of Agriculture are considering such measures.

Mr. Mazankowski: Will the minister be prepared to make a statement in the house within the next ten days?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister will want to ask the hon. member to repeat his question when he is ready to answer it.

POLLUTION

RECOMMENDATION AGAINST USE OF PHOSPHORUS IN DETERGENTS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the report on pollution recently submitted by the International Joint Commission which recommended that the use of phosphorus by the detergent industry in its products should be stopped within the next two years, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or his Parliamentary Secretary whether the department has taken any steps to implement this very urgent and important recommendation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I will look into that, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether the Minister of Justice has requested the Post Office Department to issue a special stamp featuring Hal Banks to commemorate and express the jubilation of the government on the so-called closing of this famous case?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

USE OF RETIRED JUDGES TO DISPOSE OF DOCKETS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the large numbers of Canadians held, while awaiting trial, in various jails during the July and August summer vacation when there is little activity in the courts, would the minister consider calling on retired judges, who are experienced, to assist the courts to clean up these dockets during the summer vacation? Many of these people are unable to get bail or cannot afford it.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): That is a very good idea, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that the administration of justice is constitutionally the responsibility of the provincial Attorneys General. This is something I would like to talk to them about.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that many of these people being incarcerated are young men and women charged under the Narcotic Control Act, which is a direct responsibility of the minister's department, will he contact these very special Crown prosecutors across the nation to see whether these people can be released on bail? Many of them are high school and university students.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will take that into consideration, Mr. Speaker.

REVISION OF DAIRY POLICY

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the fact that more than 13,000 dairy producers have been forced to give up dairy production, could the Parliamentary Secretary tell us if the government's dairy policy will be reviewed this year?

Mr. Florian Côté (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the dairy policy is reviewed and considered every month by the Advisory Board of the Canadian Dairy Commission which is made up of nine persons, most of them farmers. Every month that problem is studied.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture?

I wish to ask him whether, during these discussions, the Quebec Dairy Producers Union is officially consulted about the development of this dairy policy?

Mr. Côté (Richelieu): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Union is invited to the discussions almost every month.

[English]

ATOMIC ENERGY

SHORTAGE OF HEAVY WATER

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but in his absence perhaps I could direct it to the Prime Minister. Has the government been able to find any solution to the problem of the critical shortage of heavy water in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Does the question not concern the government of Nova Scotia, Mr. Speaker? Is the hon. member referring to the problems of Deuterium Company of Canada?

Mr. Noble: I believe the plant at Chalk River will have to slow down unless a supply of heavy water can be obtained.

POLLUTION

CANCELLATION OF FORESTRY RESEARCH BRANCH PROJECT

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Has the minister's department cancelled a research project in the entomology section of the forestry research branch which might have provided an alternative to the use of chemical sprays, and has this been done as a result of the government's budgetary restrictions?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest this is a question which might well be placed on the order paper. If it is urgent it could be considered at the time of adjournment this evening.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, without in any way suggesting that Your Honour is wrong in ruling me out of order I should like to say that this is an urgent matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If it is urgent the hon. members knows that the matter can be considered in a few hours at the time of adjournment later today.

Mr. Aiken: May I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the supplementary might be included in the question the hon. member will ask this evening.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I do not very often argue about these things but, on a point of order, may I point out that every day we speak in this House about pollution and here is a research project that is being cancelled which might have provided an over-all alternative—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I cannot allow the hon. member on a point of order and on the ground of urgency to discuss the ruling that the question is out of order. This is the reason we instituted the rule which provides an opportunity to an hon. member to raise a matter at the time of adjournment. The hon. member says the matter is one of urgency. It may very well be one of extreme urgency. The Speaker has to make a rather quick decision on these matters and because he is often wrong in his assessment hon. members come back later in the day and put their questions in a more formal way at the time of adjournment. I hope at that time the hon. member will receive a detailed and satisfactory reply from the minister. I shall request the Clerk to put the hon. member's question at the top of the list to be considered before others later today.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

DATE OF BANNING OF DDT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thought I was at the top of tonight's list.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): You were, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has a firm date been set for the banning of DDT in Canada, and have the necessary arrangements been made to put this ban into effect?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe the government will be in a position to make a statement on this matter during the early part of next week.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister consult with his colleague the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry to see whether some alternative to the use of DDT might be developed?

Mr. Munro: These discussions have been under way for some time between all the departments involved.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether any departments of the government are using DDT in various programs in provinces where the use of DDT is now illegal?

Mr. Munro: Not to my knowledge.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

YUGOSLAVIA—PROVISION OF MEDICAL AND OTHER SUPPLIES FOLLOWING EARTHQUAKE

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

Canada did receive requests for help from two countries struck by disasters caused by natural forces, that is from Yugoslavia where there was an earthquake and from Tunisia where there were floods. For Yugoslavia, Canada gave $15,000 to the International Red Cross through the Canadian Red Cross which also donated $23,000.

For Tunisia, Canada gave $15,000 to the International Red Cross through the Canadian Red Cross which gave an additional $15,000. In addition, the CIDA has granted a sum of $15,000 for the purchase of equipment which will be sent in Tunisia.

We are waiting for an official request for food from the Tunisian government and we intend to consider it favourably. It will be, of course, a shipment of wheat or flour.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

GRANT FOR FRIENDSHIP CENTRES

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. I understand that officials of the Secretary of State's department submitted a presentation to cabinet several months ago requesting an increase in the federal grant to the Indian and Métis friendship centres. Can the Secretary of State say whether this presentation has been dealt with by cabinet—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt whether the question as asked is in order. The hon. member is referring to a communication in the form of a document between members of the cabinet. I have serious doubt whether in that form the question is acceptable.

Mr. Simpson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State's department some months ago advised the provincial authorities that a decision was being awaited on this matter. They are now anxious to know whether or not cabinet has dealt with it.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, we have actually received such a suggestion and it is now under consideration.

[English]

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, the minister says they have received this request. Has the minister's department or the minister submitted a proposal to cabinet in this respect?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I feel, as you yourself seemed to indicate a moment ago, that internal communications within the government should not be made the object of questions or answers in the house.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Secretary of State for speaking in support of the Chair's decision.

[English]

I must reiterate my view that the question as asked at the present time is quite in order but not the supplementary.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RAID ON OFFICE OF FREDERICTON "GLEANER"

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Have the details of an apparently discriminatory raid on the Fredericton Gleaner, carried out recently by officials of the Combines Investigation Branch, been reported to the minister, and can he give the House any information on this very serious and damaging action?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I should like to thank the hon. member for having sent notice of his question across the aisle. I am not aware of the particular facts alleged by the hon. member. I might say to him that the administration under the Combines Investigation Act is within the responsibility of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and no longer falls within the purview of the Department of Justice. The Director of Investigation and Research may well have been acting under his own statutory power. I will draw this situation to the attention of my colleague and ask him to contact the hon. member.

Mr. Flemming: Will the minister consult with his colleague to ascertain whether similar investigations were made and similar actions taken in other parts of Canada in connection with the same type of matter?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, sir.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF SALT FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Can he assure the House that his discussions with members of the salt fish trades will in no way impede or slow down the progress of the proposed legislation to establish a salt cod marketing corporation, and can he also report to the House on the meetings that have taken place in Ottawa in the last few days between officials of his department and representatives of the salt fish trades?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I think I can give the hon. member that assurance. Also, in approximately ten days' time I will be discussing this matter with the fishermen of Newfoundland as well as the trade there.

SALMON FISHING LICENCES—POSITION OF INDIANS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Can he answer today the question I posed yesterday on whether he would agree to a referral for investigation and report to the Standing Committee on Fisheries of the whole question of the proposal regarding salmon fishing licences on the west coast? The minister should be in a good position to answer this question since he has just returned from our fair province.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I would be only too glad to refer to the Standing Committee on Fisheries the matter to which the hon. member has referred.

LEGISLATION TO PROTECT INSHORE FISHERY

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Can he indicate when he will be introducing his promised legislation to close the Gulf of St. Lawrence, especially along the great northern peninsula of Newfoundland, to foreign draggers in order to protect the inshore fishing industry in that area?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that legislation to do that could be introduced in the current session.

OPERATIONS OF SOVIET TRAWLERS NEAR LOUISBOURG

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of reports that a large Russian fleet, numbering 90 to 100 ships, is operating some four miles off the coast near Louisbourg, Nova Scotia, would the minister inform the House what types of fish these ships are catching and what steps he is taking to protect our inshore fisheries resources?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, all of the fishing vessels operating off the coast in that area have been under close surveillance by the Canadian authorities and I am informed that there are no foreign vessels within 12 miles of our coast. There may be some Canadian vessels operating in the area.

TRADE

DECLINE IN BALANCE—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the serious decline in Canada's foreign trade balance as revealed by figures issued during the last few weeks, what steps, if any, has the minister taken or is prepared to take in order to correct this situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that this question should be answered by way of a statement on motions.

Mr. Harkness: Then, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he will make a statement on motions dealing with this very serious problem?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, at the moment there are many things being done. For example, the strengthening of the Export Development Corporation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The only question which has been allowed is whether the minister will make a statement on motions. He may seek the consent of the House for the purpose of returning to motions so that he can make a statement. That course is available to him.

Mr. Pepin: I was just going to point out that the question was asked of me two days ago by a colleague of the hon. member, and that I am writing a letter to him in order to put all the steps down on paper. The hon. member who will receive the letter will probably want to, or want me to publish it because it will be so interesting.

Mr. Harkness: That was a different question.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

BILINGUAL DISTRICTS—PRIORITY FOR CERTAIN AREAS

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State a question relating to the implementation of the official languages bill.

Could he tell the house whether the Bilingual Districts Advisory Board has begun or will soon begin its study and whether those areas where there is a large concentration of both linguistic groups will be dealt with first?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the Bilingual Districts Advisory Board is being established. As regards its decision as to whether districts with a larger or a smaller concentration should be dealt with first, I think it is up to the Board itself to make its own decisions.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State.

Concerning this important problem of bilingualism, I should like to ask him if his policy provides for the labelling of all products in both official languages?

Mr. Speaker: I think this supplementary question should be put on the order paper.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STEPS TO PREVENT IMPORT OF U.S. DIETETIC FOODS CONTAINING CYCLAMATE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the other day I directed a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with respect to dietetic foods containing cyclamates which may perhaps flood the Canadian market as a result of the restrictions being placed on them in the United States. At that time the minister did not know whether this matter came within the purview of his department. Perhaps he has a statement to make today?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I believe most of it falls under the purview of the Department of National Health and Welfare and some aspects of it under the Department of National Revenue. I understand that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has already publicly said a number of things about the matter, and I wonder if he wants to say more about it at this time.

[Later:]

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West and is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that certain artificial sweeteners, the cyclamates, have been banned from Canadian use because of their possible relationship to cancer of the bladder in certain rats, can the minister give the House and the country his assurance that other artificial sweeteners have been sufficiently studied to ensure their safety to the Canadian public?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I believe I can give that assurance, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I wish to pose a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can he assure the country and the House that in the future, rather than depending on the leadership of American research to come to particular conclusions regarding hazardous foods, this government will take the lead in that regard?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that about 80 per cent of the research in this whole area all over the world is conducted in the United States. As a result surely one would expect they are going to come up with findings of this nature more than any other country, and certainly more than a country with a population of only 20 million. However, our people will be continuing their constant liaison with the United States researchers and will react to and assess their findings as quickly as possible. Of course in the meantime we are doing research ourselves. In comparison with countries of a similar size we have come up with many more findings in regard to unsafe products, and undoubtedly we will continue to do so in the future.

REVISION OF DAIRY POLICY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, to follow up the question the hon. member for Lotbinière put to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, could the latter tell us whether, as a result of the constant reviewing by the government of its dairy policy, changes have been made and, if so, what were those changes and was the manufactured milk producers union told about them?

Mr. Florian Côté (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Lotbinière asked me that question, I think he wanted to know mostly if there was some co-operation between the government and the producers association. It so happens that, yesterday I met spokesmen from the manufactured milk producers association of the province of Quebec. I asked them if they were satisfied with the close contact they kept with the Canadian Dairy Commission and they replied that they were kept well informed by the Commission.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

I do not quite understand the Parliamentary Secretary's reply as it seems to contradict his own statement—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member could ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Fortin: Could the Parliamentary Secretary inquire from the Canadian Dairy Commission and its officials who have, according to him, regular meetings with the representatives of the Quebec Dairy Producers Union, how many meetings were held, what changes were made and whether the people concerned were informed?

Mr. Côté (Richelieu): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

ARGENTIA, NFLD.—LAY-OFFS AT U.S. NAVAL BASE

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that the recently announced lay-offs of a large number of civilians at the U.S. naval base at Argentia could have a disastrous effect on the economy of the area can the minister say whether present manpower programs will be adequate to meet the seriousness of the situation or will new programs and expenditures be required?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have been in touch with this situation for some time. My department is aware and is making available all the programs that are now in existence. At the present time we do not have any particular new programs to be administered by this department to meet that situation, but it seems to me that our present programs and services will be very helpful.

Mr. Carter: A supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Mr. Speaker. What steps are being planned by his department to help alleviate the serious economic situation facing people in that area as a result of the lay-offs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking the minister to give the House a statement of a general nature which, I suggest to the hon. member, should normally be made by way of a statement on motions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FOREIGN AID—INCLUSION OF RESEARCH CENTRE BUDGET IN CONTRIBUTION

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement made in Victoria, B.C. by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that Canada will be increasing its foreign aid expenditures, could the Prime Minister inform the House if the budget for the proposed foreign aid research centre will be considered part of the Canadian contribution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harding: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. How will the increased amount of overseas foreign aid be administered, particularly in Southeast Asia and Latin America, in view of the drastic cuts proposed in embassy staffs in those areas?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think that the question as asked is in order at this time.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S. RESPECTING CLOSING OF BASES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he indicate to the House the result of negotiations with the United States government regarding the economic disadvantage to Canada of the phase-out of many bases in this country as a result of the cut-backs in overseas expenditure by that government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will read the question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lundrigan: There seems to be some confusion opposite, Mr. Speaker, as to who will field the question but I will direct it to the Prime Minister who seems to be ready to handle it.

Mr. Trudeau: I am always quite ready to handle questions but I was talking to one of my colleagues and did not hear the question.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr Speaker, that just reflects the lack of sensitivity toward problems in this House, but I will direct the question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether negotiations have taken place with the United States government regarding the planned phase-out of many bases in Canada and throughout the world, and the economic disadvantage caused by this? In other words, have we already had discussions and are we able to predict the effect of this phase-out on the nation over a long period of time?

Mr. Trudeau: As regards United States discussions with other nations, I do not know which minister could answer that, but as regards discussions with Canada concerning bases in Canada I will ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to report.

Mr. Lundrigan: A further supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask him or any other member of his cabinet who has responsibility whether they could get together on this matter and make a statement to the House at an early opportunity?

ADDRESS DEBATE

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, October 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Jack Cullen for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

[Translation]

• (12:10 p.m.)

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, for some time now people have been asking what is the best way to conduct Canada's foreign relations with countries where such relations often involve the provinces' interests or internal jurisdiction. This situation is not unique. Given the evolution of international exchanges since the war ended, all federal countries are faced with this problem. In the light of our practical and daily experience of external relations, I would like to make my contribution to the serious consideration required of Canada and of others.

For instance, much has been said about an "external sovereignty" for the provinces proportionate to the extension of their internal, exclusive or shared, fields of jurisdiction. That theory may sound attractive at first sight. Yet, it raises important questions in our mind, namely: Is it legally sound? Is it based on a justifiable interpretation of our constitution? Is it acceptable to the international community? Can the least serious observer of the international scene or anyone more or less familiar with the daily practice of external affairs reasonably think that, if implemented, that theory would bring about an effective and consistent policy?

Now, I would not want, at this stage, to bore the house with a tedious report on Canada's constitutional evolution in relation to external affairs. Everybody is familiar with the process by which Canada gained its independence. Everybody knows that after those fifty years of evolution the responsibility for Canadian external affairs was handed from the British crown to the Canadian government. That evolution was confirmed by the 1947 Letters patent which are an integral part of our constitution.

However, I should like to take this opportunity to clarify certain so-called legal arguments which we consider groundless and which are brought up time and again.

It is quite often argued that the Letters patent argument is nullified by that of the Privy Council decision of 1937.

According to some people, the judgment rendered in the matter of the labour agreements of 1937 would permit the provinces to establish direct and separate relations with foreign countries, and even to sign international agreements in fields within their jurisdiction.

I seriously wonder about the amount of legal knowledge of the people who can reach such conclusions. It should be time, 32 years after the judgment, to know what it really is. In fact, all the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council said in 1937 is this: in matters which, under the British North America Act fall under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, the federal parliament cannot avail itself of the right to legislate by claiming that it is necessary to apply a treaty signed by Canada. On the other hand, the Privy Council has never questioned the exclusive right of the federal government to sign treaties and consequently to assume responsibility for Canada's international relations. No interference with the internal legislative jurisdiction of the provinces of Canada? Very well! But, on the other hand, no provincial interference with the ultimate and exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government in foreign affairs.

At times, it is argued that there are various federal constitutions in the world, that no two of them are alike and that Canada, therefore, can do as it pleases with its own. People forget to say one thing though: although different in other respects, all are virtually identical as concerns foreign affairs. In other words, power in external matters is always vested, one way or the other, in the central authority. Of course, there are some federal states, to wit, Switzerland, the United States, the Federal Republic of West Germany and the USSR, where constitutional usage apparently allows the member states to conclude some kinds of agreements with foreign states. There again, people forget to mention that a most cursory study of these constitutions shows that, in each instance, this power of the member states must be exercised under the federal jurisdiction or through the federal government. Furthermore, every expert in comparative constitutional law could draw attention to the fact that even the powers of this nature that federated states may exercise are being used less frequently at the international level.

Some people claim that international life has changed and that we must fall into step. They say: "In view of the nature of external relations which have greatly evolved since the end of the war, and involve not only war and peace or trade, but more and more culture, technology or education, a new kind of internatioonal law is developing which enables the federated states to enter the field of international relations."

It is a wonderful theory which shows but one weakness: it is not in line with practice. International exchanges have grown, it is true—and that over the last 50 years—but the whole range of these exchanges remains in the hands of sovereign states and this, more and more clearly. You need only to know a little about reality and the principles of international law. Treaties contain less and less federal clauses and sovereignty transfer or sharing. The last instance is the following: As recently as last April—that is not even six months ago—the United Nations Conference on the Law of Treaties, held in Vienna, rejected with an overwhelming majority, a recommendation which would have seemed to recognize, without clearly stating the conditions, the right for the members of a federal state to conclude treaties. This draft was used as an argument by the Quebec government in its White Paper as supposedly irrefutable evidence of the tendency shown by the members of a federal state to negotiate at the international level.

That draft was definitely rejected, for the simple reason that it did not take into account the conditions that I have mentioned and did not expressly reaffirm the exclusive right of the federal state to interpret its own constitution for the guidance of other states. The Conference concluded that the adoption of such a clause would be tantamount to an invitation to foreign states to give their own interpretation of the constitution of the federal states, and this would constitute undue interference into the internal affairs of such states. The Conference therefore strongly reaffirmed the well-established principle that in a federal country, the central government alone can interpret its constitution for the guidance of foreign States. Therefore, whatever may be alleged, international law has evolved and continues to do so, but in a direction that clearly does not favour the system, which, furthermore, is non-existent, which proclaims the external sovereignty of the provinces.

As international relations are extended to new areas, they are established between governments of sovereign states. This legal fact simply reflects the fundamental requirements of any consistent international activity. I shall come back to this later.

All those considerations of a legal nature must be stated. They are the prerequisites essential to any discussion. However, I am first of all a practical politician. I would also like to examine the theory of the external sovereignty of the provinces in the light of a daily and practical experience of external relations. As a system conceived in the abstract, this intellectual concept may seem plausible. It has a defect though, and a major one; it is absolutely irreconcilable with the facts of international life. From a practical viewpoint, the international community simply cannot accept this theory. For those who have a thorough knowledge of the workings of international relations, this formula seems a dangerous, ineffective, inconsistent and chaotic one. Let me explain.

The concept of sovereignty has become much clearer in recent years. It is high time we realized that even if there are still some protectorates, the notion of entity with various degrees of international character has practically disappeared, both in theory and in practice. There seems to be, at the present time, hardly any reason to expect that the international community will willingly revert to the antiquated concepts of semi- or partially sovereign entities, especially if such entities claimed the right to a distinct representation in the U.N. or its associate institutions.

The U.N., for example, is based on the principle of "one state", "one vote", and this without any distinction between unitary and federal states.

Federal states, as such, have no greater powers there than unitary states.

Could you imagine, for instance, that Canada having ten or eleven seats within the U.N.'s specialized agencies, and therefore hold 10 per cent of the votes, whereas countries such as France or England would be restricted to a single vote? Why, then, could India not amend her constitution so as to have 20, 50 or 100 votes? What a deal for federal countries! Do you think the international community would play the game?

Let us take U.N.E.S.C.O. as a more specific case. If international law or the international community were to endorse the principle of extending internal juridictions at the international level, that institution would gain hundreds of members overnight. Can one seriously believe that it could operate in that manner?

In fact, for practical reasons, the international community is simply not willing to be broken up by admitting within its organizations the Canadian provinces as sovereign or partially sovereign entities.

In broader terms, since we are talking about the evolution of international realities, is there in our world a more pressing need than for dialogue, co-operation, cohesion? We live in a world of minorities. From a global point of view, there are no majorities, neither religious, nor political, nor linguistic. Christians, Moslems, Buddhists, all are minorities. Whites, Blacks, Yellows: so many minorities. No ideology, no language, no culture worth more than the others.

What we need in this divided world is not separatists' bombs but forms of agreement, such as federalism, which unite diversities without levelling them. Federalism, concerted action between communities: the hope of Europe building up, of Africa wanting to transcend tribalism, of Asia where a single country may be home to 50 cultures, in short, the hope of the world. We are too modest sometimes. Experiments in federalism and bilingualism which continue, increase and multiply every day here draw the admiration of many nations and some even try to imitate them.

President Senghor eloquently reminded us of this recently when he said, and I quote:

> Bilingualism is one step ahead of unilingualism, just as the man with two legs walks more steadily than he who has only one.

• (12:20 p.m.)

More basically, French and English bring us additional resources. This is not to say that we reject francophonia today. On the contrary, we cling to it and welcome our English-speaking brothers. This is why Canada can, in this area of culture, which is man's own, serve as an example.

Bilingualism, federalism are promising formulas which are nowhere else as alive and deep-rooted as in Canada, and which can help us attain even greater achievements. That is what the realities of our world require of us: to strengthen our federalism, instead of breaking it up in half a score of foreign policies.

Let us see where would actually lead us the theory of those who want to share sovereignty in external matters among the federal government and the ten provincial governments. Let us carry this working hypothesis to its practical consequences. It is not enough to make constitutional diagrams at cabinet meetings; we must ascertain where they would lead us.

In actual fact, it is not possible to separate the various aspects of international life into air-tight compartments, because they are inextricably bound together. Whenever countries negotiate with one another, it is not possible to single out one aspect—for instance, education, culture, co-operation—among the other aspects of the relations between the countries concerned. One may distinguish between the traditional external policy and the more recent aspects of international relations, that is to say the technical, cultural or social aspects. But in fact those fields are a tightly knit network. What is accomplished at an intergovernmental conference on education may be related in many regards to other fields, such as co-operation within French-speaking countries or some other group, external aid policy, bilateral relations with the countries concerned, economic and trade problems, cultural or social international co-operation.

Political problems crop up time and again in so-called "technical" organizations and conferences. One should not be naive. One only has to observe the great powers to realize that their policies on culture, co-operation, exchange of technical data, social problems, are closely connected with many other political and economic aspects of international life.

Moreover, any foreign policy requires rationalization, compatibility and consistency. Canada's foreign policy must take into account a large variety of Canadian interests as well as the domestic and foreign implications. It is therefore essential to have a central agency for defining and coordinating our policies before submitting them to other countries. But we cannot have eleven such agencies.

Some might say: The solution is probably two centres: Ottawa and Quebec. Come now. If the country granted such treatment to one province, would not the other provinces demand the same? Two operation centres—one can easily witness it these days—that is already impossible. But in that case, we would have not two centres but ten or eleven.

Any external policy must also be clear and efficient. In foreign policy as in other fields, the "principle of non-contradiction" should prevail. If ten or eleven voices from Canada are heard abroad, there will follow a multitude of views and representations which will, to a large degree, neutralize each other. Our influence would be that much reduced in international circles. There would then be little need to pay any attention to us.

Now, one difficult but essential thing at the present time, is indeed, to carry weight. In the face of the super-powers, Europe realizes the scope and the urgency of the problem, although it has not yet devised its solution. For a medium-sized power, it would amount almost to political suicide to squander its means of action in many important fields in a host of representations and initiatives. Ten provinces working separately in foreign countries, even if they did not mutually neutralize their action, would not have the same power or the same influence as a Canada putting all its energies behind unified representations.

A balkanized policy would be terribly vulnerable. Foreign countries would prove to possess superhuman virtue if they did not exploit in their own interests the marvelous possibilities for manoeuvering that a fragmented presence of Canada abroad would offer them in many important fields. It would be possible for them to play provincial interests against each other, to attract customers, to use Canada in all freedom and in good conscience, in short, with our permission. We only have to remind ourselves of recent events that occurred at home to support this assertion. The most serious thing in all this whole matter is this: should it be applied, the thesis of the external sovereignty of the provinces would threaten the internal life of Canada. The sharing of external sovereignties would permit in aeternum intrusions in the constitutional and, therefore, in the internal life of Canada. The future of Canada would thus be decided, not by means of rational constitutional debates, before public opinion and in the light of all the problems, but through the changing and divergent interests of the international community. We would thereby have a constitution forever made abroad. Could Canada survive? It would have instead very good chances of disintegrating without the electorate having wanted it.

It is high time that the people of Quebec realise that, even though they do not want to be separatists, the supporters of this thesis follow a policy the consequences of which might well ring the death knell of Canada. Those who pursue this aim should declare themselves and those who are opposed to it should say so.

It seems obvious to me that the provinces will have enough common sense to act within the Canadian context, avoiding to adopt those political programs which would threaten to disrupt Canada's foreign policy and Canada itself. But should they for all that resign themselves to playing no role in our external relations, to disappearing totally from the world stage? Is it Ottawa's policy to crowd them out of its external relations? Is it necessary to sacrifice the provinces and their interests on the altar of national unity? Not in the least.

What the provinces want, I think, is in short to see their aspirations and interests reflected in Canada's foreign policy and, should the occasion arise, to participate in the presentation and diffusion of that policy aboard, to be included in the activities of international conferences and agencies, to get proper recognition for their role and contribution to the Canadian common effort, whether it be in education, culture or technical and social cooperation. For this, there is no need for them to call for a disastrous distribution of the external sovereignty.

Canadian federalism offers them all necessary means. Within the present constitution, the federal government has been working on a flexible formula of co-operation with the provinces. This is no pious concession from the federal government, but a necessity imposed by a sincerely applied federalism. Some areas of consultation and co-operation have already been defined. The federal formula contains possibilities which allow for increased provincial participation in the Canadian effort abroad. Instead of wasting precious energies in disagreements abroad, it would be much more profitable if the provinces worked with the Canadian government to extend and better define the ways of consultation and co-operation.

• (12:30 p.m.)

Let us talk plainly. What is that formula?

For some time already, the federal government has made a point of consulting the provinces on various questions concerning the drafting and implementation of treaties. It is then possible to attune the interests of the federal and provincial governments and to comply with the wishes expressed by the provinces as to treaties, the substance of which comes under their legislative jurisdiction.

Consultation may assume various forms. It may take the form of direct discussions between federal and provincial authorities; such discussions may begin before or during the negotiations on a proposed treaty, should questions related to the implementation of such a treaty require a federal-provincial co-operation.

On the other hand, various measures, such as master agreements, were already taken or will be later on by the federal government, to bring into force at the international level, agreements concerning provinces.

A number of international organizations, whose activities relate to questions that come partially under provincial jurisdiction, were established, especially after the war. All those organizations share a common basic objective, namely the drafting of international agreements, when general conferences are held. It is thus important that there should be close consultations with the provinces, in order to facilitate the ratification and implementation by Canada of the said conventions. Therefore, federal authorities have often consulted provincial authorities in the past few years, as to the contents of such agreements and the possibility of implementing them.

One of the most convenient means to implement this co-operation policy is to strengthen the provincial participation within the delegations sent by Canada to international conferences, in the activities of which the provinces show a special interest. This is what we have done for instance in the case of U.N.E.S.C.O., where provincial ministers of Education have been invited to participate in general conferences. Moreover, in the past provincial officials have been included in Canadian delegations. Such a system is perfectly adequate for the promotion of provincial interests, provided, of course, that we want to make use of it. This implies that the provinces in foreign countries make no desperate attempt to dissociate themselves from Canadian representatives. As if it were shameful to be a Canadian. As if it were ineffective to put forward, in one package, the interests of all.

Foreign aid is an integral part of the Canadian foreign policy and the federal authority is responsible for their co-ordination. On the other hand, considering the fields where Canadian foreign aid is concentrated, it is obvious that the efficiency of the programs depends mostly on the co-operation of the provinces. This is true, of course, of the federal programs but even more of the provincial ones.

Thanks to an extensive network of consultations between federal and provincial authorities, the provinces have been able to contribute generously to the Canadian effort towards foreign aid both by recruiting teaching personnel and counsellors to serve abroad and by offering educational facilities and training in Canada.

In addition to their participation in federal programs, some provinces set up their own programs to assist developing countries. The federal government welcomes such provincial contributions. The only aim, in this regard, of the federal government is to see that the Canadian contribution is maintained and consistently developed as a whole, without breaking up the Canadian sovereignty abroad. Therefore, it is necessary to work together so that Canadian co-operation constitutes a whole that must be co-ordinated by the Canadian government, and in which the provincial contribution gets also the credit it deserves.

This formula, this process of consultation has the following merits: they are compatible with a viable federalism, they ensure the existence of a proper dialogue between Canada and the provinces in the fields of concern to them, in order to define a Canadian policy and to open the door to a provincial presence and action abroad, within a Canadian presence. This is a policy that is both constructive and consistent with the Canadian context. That is the policy of the federal government.

The constitution, and the very flexible way in which it is applied, guarantees the provinces representation, through and with the central government, in the field of external affairs. The system we have just outlined doubtless needs to be improved and developed. However, such improvements must be defined in Canada and by Canadians. Those matters are too complex and too important to us to be fought over abroad.

We are willing to talk with those who hold divergent opinions. We do not doubt their good faith. But that dialogue must take place in Canada, in a rational way, by means of agreements between governments, and constitutional discussions. We must find solutions that respect not only the rules of international law and modern day realities, but above all the great principles of efficient and viable federalism. Our success—for, we will succeed—will serve equitably the interests of the provinces, the central government, the whole Canadian people; it will not fail either to give the divided world a great example and cause for hope.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, there are many subjects on which one could comment during this debate on the Speech from the Throne. I wish to confine myself briefly to three. One concerns the Unemployment Insurance Commission, another has to do with transport and, last, there is the question of the cost of living.

Turning to the unemployment insurance matter, for years we have been promised amendments to the relevant Act and improvements in the administration and in the commission. I notice that this year a brief reference is made to this subject in the Speech from the Throne. I can only hope that adequate and proper changes will be made in the Act, in the regulations and in the way in which the commission administers its responsibility. Unfortunately, the record of adminstration is a very bad one in the opinion of most people. The commission appears to be much more concerned to make administration easier for those within its own organization than it is about properly serving the working people of Canada, as it is supposed to do.

There is one recent example I could cite. The commission withdrew all its offices from the heavily industrialized area of southwestern Ontario—presumably the situation is the same in the comparable part of Quebec—and concentrated them in one place, namely, London, Ontario. When there are complaints from workers—and there are a good many, as all hon. members know—working people are obliged to take a day off work, if they have work, so as to run up to London and explain their problems. All this means a good deal of inconvenience and expenditure. It is only one example of what has been happening. I propose to deal with others when the subject comes before the House.

The latest thing we hear is that the commission intends to move its office to Belleville—not even to Toronto. People who work between Oshawa and Windsor will have to traipse to Belleville every time they encounter difficulties in connection with their claims. I have heard of stupid administration, Mr. Speaker, but this seems to be one of the stupidest things I have heard yet.

In addition, the attitude of the commission itself needs to be changed. It has a long record of inflexibility, bordering sometimes on arrogance. In a recent case with which I have been concerned the Umpire made certain recommendations and suggestions to the commission. The commission decided to disregard them. When things get to the point at which a government commission pays scant attention to the recommendations and suggestions resulting from its own appeal procedures, things have reached a pretty pass and re-organization is needed. When the subject is brought before the House I intend, along with some of my colleagues, to bring these matters to your attention, Mr. Speaker, in greater detail.

I turn now to the subject of transport. When the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) spoke in the debate yesterday his eloquence flowed like the Hamilton River in his province. His transplanted blarney was equally effective. In the course of his speech he suggested that the opposition never had anything constructive to propose. Well, I shall make a little suggestion now. Incidentally, the government never pays any attention to suggestions coming from this side of the House anyway. Certainly, this has been our experience as members of the Standing Committee on Transport. Even when unanimous recommendations were made, not only did the government disregard them but it did not even have the common politeness to wait until we had completed our recommendations before it went ahead to do something else. As hon. members know, last session the committee paid a visit to the Atlantic provinces to study the transport situation there and make recommendations. The government reached a decision concerning the Prince Edward Island causeway while we were still in the process of drawing up our report. So much for the minister's statement about suggestions from the opposition side, even when they are made by a standing committee of this House upon which, of course, even government members are represented. No attention is paid to them, anyway.

Nevertheless, I should like to bring one matter to the attention of the minister. It concerns highway policy. Since the earliest days of Canada's development the federal government has assumed the responsibility of promoting east-west transportation in an effort to promote the east-west flow of trade. In the discussions leading up to confederation, the building of railways for this purpose was a major concern. At the Quebec Conference, where the plans for confederation were discussed, two resolutions were passed on the subject:

1. The general government shall secure, without delay, the completion of the Intercolonial Railway from Rivière-du-Loup through New Brunswick to Truro, in Nova Scotia.

2. The Communications with the North-West Territory and the improvements required for the development of the trade of the great west with the seaboard, are regarded by this conference as subjects of the highest importance to the federated provinces, and shall be prosecuted at the earliest possible period that the state of the finances will permit.

• (12:40 p.m.)

As the great historian of transportation in Canada, George Glazebrook, has written:

The movement toward a single British country in North America, as approached from the political point of view, coincide in time with the recognition, from the economic point of view, of the end of the continental projects (to build north-south railway links)...It was ..the combination of these two groups of motives that gave enough strength to the union movement to carry it to completion.

After confederation of the original four provinces, the construction of railways to the west formed an important part of the agreements leading to the joining of the territories between Ontario and the Pacific coast. Railways were not the only type of transportation route which received federal support for their development. Water routes as well were encouraged. Canal construction and the widening and deepening of river beds formed a part of the federal effort in this area.

Later in Canada's development air transportation received federal aid in the form of airfield construction, airport construction and the provision of detailed weather forecasts. Here the chief recipient has been Air Canada. Road transport has also been aided by the federal government. Even before the turn of the century—it is important to note this, Mr. Speaker—the federal government constructed roads in pioneer areas; for example, between Port Arthur and Fort Garry. According to Glazebrook:

After the gold discoveries in 1896 the Dominion Government undertook a program of road building in the Yukon Territory, and by 1913 there were some five hundred miles of good wagon roads radiating from Dawson and Whitehorse.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Since motor traffic had become more common before World War I, in 1919 the federal government passed the Canada Highways Act which authorized the expenditure of up to $20 million on the construction and improvement of highways.

Between 1949 and 1968 the federal government allocated millions of dollars of federal funds for these purposes under the trans-Canada highway program. Together with the roads to resources program introduced by the Conservative government, but unfortunately abandoned by the subsequent Liberal government, these efforts constituted a wise and far-sighted attempt to improve Canada's transportation infrastructure.

The federal government has thus clearly recognized its responsibility to provide efficient transportation routes across Canada. But it has fallen behind in the scope of its efforts. As the Economic Council of Canada reported at page 40 of its sixth annual review published this year, public expenditures on transportation have grown somewhat more slowly than other major areas of government spending like health and education. The gap is felt particularly in the area of highway transportation. In the same report the Economic Council noted that the "intercity movement of both goods and passengers has been rising more rapidly than national output, with increasing shares of the total carried by automobiles, airlines and pipelines."

Of these three types of transport, automobile transport, including transport by trucks, is obviously the most flexible in the carrying of goods, and can be expected to increase its share of non-passenger traffic the most. Pipelines are restricted to carrying liquids, or solids which can be floated or suspended in a liquid. Because air transport costs so much, such carriage can generally be expected to be confined to the transport of goods which are extremely light, those which are so expensive that transport is a minor part of the final cost, and those which require great speed for their movement, such as mail or perishable goods.

In its report for the year 1967 the Economic Council of Canada noted the trend toward a great expansion of motor traffic. It said this at page 200:

Between 1945 and 1965, the rate of growth in the motor vehicle population of Canada was 7.9 per cent annually, more than twice the growth rate of the human population. After modifying the trend for such factors as low ownership ratios in 1945 and the explosion of demand after wartime restrictions, it appears that population growth and a declining ratio of persons to vehicles could lead to a 60 per cent further rise by 1980. This would suggest almost 11 million vehicles for Canada in 1980, a ratio of 2.3 persons per vehicle or approximately the ratio predicted for the United States in 1970.

Ontario provides a good example of what this means in terms of highway needs. In southern Ontario, for example, we have a vast urbanized area that extends almost without break from Windsor to Oshawa. This area is perhaps the most prolific manufacturing area in Canada. Trucking, which is the mode of transportation best adapted to moving manufactured goods into the heart of the market area and to moving goods to a great variety of distribution centres, is obviously of tremendous importance to the economy of the area.

Yet there are great needs in the field of highway construction, even in this relatively rich province, and there is a lack of funds to fill these needs. One of the greatest needs is for an expanded system of bypasses around urban centres both large and small. Every time a truck has to pass through the centre of an urban area, its progress is slowed down. This means delay in the manufacturing process if it is carrying partly processed goods, and delay in distribution to the consumer if it is carrying finished goods. It also means a higher final price for the goods being delivered, since insurance rates for trucks travelling through urban areas are higher. This situation becomes aggravated in a city like London, Ontario. I might mention that in my own city of Woodstock there is often a procession of 50 or 60 trucks an hour along the main street, to say nothing of the inconvenience this causes to people in the area.

Clearly, then, it is in the interest of the greatest possible efficiency and competitiveness of Canadian industry that adequate highway facilities be provided. In the face of obviously inadequate provincial financial resources, the federal government must step in and fulfil its traditional role of assuring an efficient route for Canadian trade.

The last item I wish to raise is the shocking rise in the cost of living. The cost of living is the major problem facing Canada at the present time. I note with some regret that there was only passing reference to this very important matter in the throne speech, as a matter of fact just two small paragraphs. This in itself cannot help but create apprehension among the business and labour communities, indeed among everyone, that the government is really not paying much attention to the problem.

During the course of this debate many speakers have drawn a great deal of attention to this question, so much so that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has apparently been moved to get off his stern and to make references in speeches outside the House to the possibility of price controls, and only last evening to the possibility of imposing some form of taxation on businesses and labour unions in order to force them to bend to the government's will.

We are very glad that the Prime Minister has at last decided to pay attention to this very important matter. We are also glad that he realizes that it is important. Whether the methods he has in mind or to which he refers, such as price controls and taxation, are feasible, we know not. Many of us think that probably—and I say probably—they are not feasible because of constitutional problems. We often wonder whether the Prime Minister really means what he says when he talks of methods of price control and taxation to enforce the will of the government, or whether he is not trying to promote another of his famous dialogues. However, we will wait and see just what he does mean.

The stage for this very severe inflation which we are now experiencing was set with the notorious settlement that was made under the auspices of the then Minister of Labour and which granted a 35 per cent wage increase to the seaway workers. This was followed, of course, by appropriate and similar wage increases for the dockworkers in Montreal and the Expo workers. Since then things have steadily worsened. We have a situation where big labour is blaming big business and big business is blaming big labour for spiralling prices.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, in the opinion of most people the credibility gap between the general public, on the one hand, and big labour and big business on the other hand, is a gap no longer—it is a gulf or chasm. Both big business and big labour, in the press and through other media such as television, have been trying to explain that not they but the other guy is to blame for this problem. The Canadian public is getting increasingly suspicious of this sort of activity.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the rising cost of living has reached an acute stage. For a number of years previous to this year the increase has averaged about 4 per cent a year. This itself is bad enough, but this year shows every indication of a rise much greater than 5 per cent. Only recently the rising cost of living was greatly stimulated by the notorious steel strike settlement in Hamilton, to say nothing of other wage increases which have nothing to do with labour problems.

• (12:50 p.m.)

A matter I referred to in this House yesterday is the rising cost of detergents, one of the most commonly used household articles. The increase is over 50 per cent in a little over five months and there does not seem to be any explanation forthcoming. Only today the distributors of coffee announced that there is to be a 4 cent per pound increase in the price of coffee. I should like to know what, if anything, the government proposes to do about these things.

The burden falls on that large group of Canadians who have the least amount of money and are the least able to take care of themselves. I refer to those on fixed incomes and the primary producers such as the farmers who are not well organized. It is true that inflation is harmful to people employed in industry and shareholders, but it is not nearly as heavy a burden for them as for those who are not organized and able to protect themselves like people in big business and large unions. Pensioners of all kinds suffer more heavily. They are the ones who are made to bear the burden of the government's inflationary policies.

Why should the sick, the blind, the elderly and others be made to bear almost the full burden of the government's folly? I do not know why, but it seems quite unreasonable that this is so, and by no stretch of the imagination can this be regarded as proper or humane.

It is true that the government has attempted to do something. It set up a prices and incomes commission in an attempt to persuade business and labour to follow certain guidelines. This has not been very successful. Just the other day the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, Donald MacDonald said that labour would not have anything to do with voluntary restrictions on wages, and went so far as to suggest that the government should institute price controls but not wage controls. No one can take such a statement very seriously.

A year or so ago the government instituted the Kennedy Round on tariff reductions. These have not been passed on to the consumer except on rare occasions. Again the government has been able to do nothing about increases in prices.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

The government has tried to stop commercial building in cities over 50,000 population in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. It has attempted to do this by withholding the capital cost allowance of 5 per cent. This has had no effect because building costs are steadily going up at a rate of 12 per cent per year, and builders know they are much farther ahead to build anyway in spite of the government withholding this 5 per cent. This is another government plan which has fallen to pieces.

In the last three budgets we have had tax increases. These were proposed to slow down inflation but they have had no effect at all.

These are the four things the government has attempted. We cannot say it has not tried, but everything it has done is either wrong or ineffective. The public demands action in respect of the steady and rapid rise in the cost of living. The public demands action now. If it does nothing else, the government should at least ease the burden of its inflationary policies which falls almost completely on those who are least able to afford the increase. I have in mind the aged, those on pensions and the primary producers. If nothing else, surely the government could do something to shift the burden a little from those who are least able to support it.

Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert):

> That the following be added to the address: "but we regret that the government ignores the fact that the high level of the cost of living at the present time falls with tragic and increasing severity on pensioners and others who can least afford it."

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carried.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Baldwin: Call it one o'clock. We want to get the government's answer on this.

Mr. Harries: May I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker: (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Harries).

Mr. Hu Harries (Edmonton-Strathcona): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a pleasure to take part in this debate today. Along with previous speakers, I should like to extend my congratulations to my friends and colleagues the hon. members for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and Lapointe (Mr. Marceau). Their speeches in moving and seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne were excellent.

It is usual for a new member to make extended reference to his constituency. I shall forego that pleasure on the basis that those of you who have been fortunate enough to know Edmonton-Strathcona would find my description, no matter how eloquent, frail and inadequate in comparison with the real thing. For those hon. members who do not know Edmonton, I can only extend a warm invitation to them to stop awhile and enjoy an essential part of a vigorous and pleasant Canada.

Unlike some hon. members, I find myself enthusiastic about the program outlined in the Speech from the Throne. It does not bristle with promises but clearly indicates a continued dedication by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government to establish a sound and economic base for a united and expanding Canada. In the face of the obvious political expertise that surrounds me in this House, I shall refrain from all but a brief reference to the political area and spend my allotted time on one more familiar to me, namely the economic.

My comments on the efforts of this government to establish a sound political base for a united Canada can be very brief. As a Canadian and as a westerner I think their efforts are meeting with unqualified success. The Prime Minister is restoring the faith of the people of my constituency, my city and my province, in the federal government and in a united Canada. There has been, I believe, a magnificent change in but 12 short months. On the political level, this government is establishing a reputation for forthrightness and careful progress that has not been a characteristic of federalism in our part of the country.

On the economic side, the Speech from the Throne conveyed an attitude and an approach that all members must find encouraging for our future progress. We are in an era of great economic change in Canada. If I may, I should like to sketch an idea or two which I think may reflect our future economic configuration. Canada, as is well known, was built up as a resource-based economy. At that time the appropriate policy for us to pursue necessarily centred about free trade in which we could exchange the raw materials of a bountiful nature for finished goods. Our policy centred about convertibility of currency, so that we could participate in the international flow of investment funds that were absolutely critical to a small and developing nation such as ours. Our policies at that time also appropriately encouraged immigration and the import of talent that was necessary both to get the production job done and create a consumer market and stable population base.

During that period of our development, the role of the government was subsidiary to the enterprise generated in the country. As was pointed out in an earlier speech today the government undertook a development role in those areas, especially in transportation, where such a development role was necessary and appropriate. The stories of the development of our transcontinental railroads, the development both early and late of the St. Lawrence Seaway, and latterly the government's activities through the Northern Transportation Company in the western Arctic and the development of a national airline, Air Canada, thrust the government into the position of being subsidiary to, but a very important part of, the growing Canada we were building.

Following World War II there was some shift in the resource development, but it was not of nearly the magnitude that is sometimes supposed. We still remained essentially dedicated to the development of resources for export, iron ore, power for the production of aluminum, the mining of nickel, the production of pulp and paper, the development, processing and export of petroleum products, and natural gas. The results of these efforts was to increase substantially the economic activity of Canada but they did not significantly alter the basic thrust which was as a resource-centred activity.

This concentration upon resources has created regional problems of increasing intensity, and at the same time as this resource development was taking place non-resource activity tended to cluster in a relatively few areas. This trend is, of course, still going on and is giving rise to the urban problems that have heretofore been referred to in this House.

There can be no question in my mind, Sir, that regional economic development is properly a fundamental part of the program of this government. Surely, the objective must be to create, wherever possible, equality of opportunity. But as we look down the road there arises the question as to the adequacy of our present development and economic growth concepts.

For very obvious reasons, there has been a strong tendency for us to follow the economic pattern of the United States. In some ways it may not be inaccurate to accuse us of attempting to create a miniature American economy; but with the advances that have taken place in technology and with the increasing sophistication of many of our production processes it is not possible for us to create a viable economy based upon the pattern of American development.

The fact of the matter is that if we miniaturize our economy to a 10 per cent level, which would be in accord with the relationship in the population between the two countries, we find that a 10 per cent input will not give a 10 per cent output. As a matter of fact, because of the economies of scale, it is more accurate to suggest that a 10 per cent input would give about a 5 per cent output. Therefore, it seems reasonable to suggest that as we look forward to developing a viable Canadian economy, we do so having in mind the fact that we must specialize and in this way achieve the standard of living levels that are appropriate to a country with the aspirations and the resources that we have.

I think it is instructive to look for a moment at the Japanese steel industry. The steel industry in Japan is not based upon the location in Japan of resource materials; in fact, quite to the contrary. In a very few years in excess of 12 million tons of coal will be moving from the western part of Canada, Alberta and British Columbia in particular, to Japan for use in their steel industry. That coal or coke will be used in conjunction with iron ore that is mined in Peru and in Australia, and to a limited extent on the west coast of Canada and maybe in Alaska. This will be combined with other imported materials and the finished product will be exported back to those countries that have provided the raw materials.

One might ask why such an economic process is possible, why is it possible for the Japanese economy to import these raw materials, process them, and return the product to us at an obvious advantage to their economic situation. We used to seek answers for these kinds of questions in the labour rates that applied, in the idea that the standard of living in these far off countries was so inferior to ours that these people just worked for nothing and hence were able to accomplish this transfer of resources. This argument no longer applies, if in fact it had any validity years ago.

Rather, the explanation lies in the ability of the Japanese economy to use large scale processes, huge blast furnaces, magnificent rolling mills and other processing equipment to convert these raw materials to finished products at an exceptionally low per unit rate. This low per unit rate results simply from the technology, and this vast production is distributed worldwide on an incremental cost basis because the domestic market is largely saved for the capital goods manufacturers of Japan.

In other words, what is happening is that they have a low unit cost which enables them, combined with the domestic disappearance of the product, to export at a lower rate cost than any other producer. We never hear of steel being exported from the United States into Japan. The reverse has been true in such a volume as to make it desirable, from an over-all trade standpoint, for the Japanese voluntarily to restrict their exports of steel to the United States. There are other kinds of industries which demonstrate this same kind of phenomenon.

Surely, in Canada where we have many of the resources that are necessary for this sort of industrial output, where we are much closer to the larger markets of the world, to the United States and to Europe, and when we have many advantages that a country like Japan lacks, we should be able to do these conversion activities ourselves and thus provide employment and an economic growth pattern second to none. It is not related to anything but known technology and the clear requirement that we do away with miniaturized production processes in favour of a high degree of specialization in activities where we have a clear advantage, and steel is certainly one of them.

An example of the kind of thing that can happen and produce these sorts of economies is to be found in the agreement that Canada negotiated with the United States with respect to automobile production. But there is one essential difference. In the automobile industry we are in a situation of operating branch plants which, while integrated as part of the over-all United States automobile economy, are nevertheless subject to such decisions as might be made on a national basis by the United States which clearly has its first responsibility to its own citizens. This is an ever-present possibility and suggests, I believe, the major advantage of developing this kind of economic thrust within our own competence and control.

It seems to me, if this concept is a valid one, that the government ought to provide the same kind of leadership and the same kind of economic contribution as it provided during the development of what some historians have referred to as our resource-based economy. Surely, the money we invested in transportation in the earlier part of our economic life could now be withdrawn and used as a capital fund to provide the sort of assistance to large-scale development and consultation that was provided in earlier times to transportation. Here, I refer particularly to the metals industry and the chemicals industry, both of which lend themselves particularly to large-scale international development but I stress that such industries should be developed, sponsored and, as it were, controlled by Canadians in the interests of a viable national economy

In these days it seems unrealistic to talk about government expenditures without at the same time indicating possible sources of funds for such expenditures. I suggest that we withdraw from those enterprises which we finance on a development basis the funds that are now not necessary for the continued activity of those agencies and, in particular, I would direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to Air Canada. Surely, Air Canada ought to be owned by the people of Canada on the basis that they choose to invest in a national airline, not on the basis that their investment is made a compulsory part of citizenship, as it is today. There is no reason that I am aware of why Air Canada would not function in the national interest, would not function just as well and just as effectively, if it were owned by the people of Canada through a corporation of the ordinary joint stock variety. The same thing might be said in respect of Polymer Corporation. I am aware that Polymer in particular makes a fine contribution to the funds needed by government, but surely this is not a reason for maintaining an investment that was started on a development basis when the continued existence of that investment denies us the opportunity for further expansion which is absolutely critical to our development.

Air Canada faces a period of growth in which large sums will be necessary, but these capital sums are not different in kind or in volume from those required by other airlines in the world, some government-owned and some privately-owned. In Canada, we have an investment industry with people competent to handle this kind of problem. We also have people anxious to invest in Canadian enterprises and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that their money should no longer be tied up when there are other projects, for which no additional funds are available, which could find a use for it.

The same argument can successfully be made with regard to Canadian National. This is a good railway company which over the years has been burdened with a lot of unproductive lines and an unwieldy capital structure. To continue to operate Canadian National in the same manner that it has operated since 1921 is, I believe, to commit the same error repeatedly. I hope that as the development program of this government unfolds it will find accommodation for this kind of concept.

As a western member, I feel that I should make some particular reference to agriculture because we in the west realize that agriculture represents a fundamental part of our economy, a part in which each of us, even though we be urban dwellers, has a very substantial interest. I think it is correct to suggest that our agriculture policy ought properly to re-examine its direction and scope so that there may be a realignment consistent with what is happening in the industrial sector.

As you know so well, Mr. Speaker, agriculture has been based largely on a specialized export pattern. We have for years assumed, in connection with our grain, beef, hogs and so on down the line, that the low-cost producer will ultimately prevail in the world's markets. This may have been a reasonable assumption at one time but it is patently wrong today. As one farmer said, under present conditions the only time farmers are rich is when they die. This is very true because the economic basis for the agricultural export industry has been destroyed. It has been destroyed in the United States, and in the common market countries as well, because politically in those countries the agricultural segment of the economy has not been left to fend for itself on a free international market. As one drives through the eastern part of France, and sees the technology employed in grain production there, one wonders how there can be any question of France exporting barley competitively with the large-scale, efficient processes employed in parts of our country. One wonders until one realizes that, politically, people in France are considered an important part of the economy and under no circumstances are the economics of free trade going to prevail. This is no different from the situation in most other countries. If this principle is not going to prevail elsewhere, surely it is folly to suppose it can prevail in Canada.

I do not think it makes sense, Mr. Speaker, to permit Canadian agriculture to function on an external basis when virtually all the rest of the economy is functioning on an internal basis. This creates poverty and, in my view, conditions quite out of sympathy with, and inappropriate to, the kind of productivity that we can enjoy in Canada.

It is interesting to look at the gross agricultural statistics and to see that in a recent year we exported about $1.3 billion worth of agricultural products while we imported almost $1 billion worth. I am not suggesting that in the rarified atmosphere of cities like Calgary you can grow grapefruit, but I am suggesting that there is a balance in our agriculture that must be struck if proper emphasis is to be placed upon the relationship between agriculture and the rest of the economy. This, essentially, is a closed environment. There must be, I believe, a massive redirection of agricultural effort and this will require not only transfer incentives but also bridge funds, as well as a basic re-alignment of our thinking with respect to the position of agriculture in the Canadian economy. I am sure this can be done and am hopeful, sir, that it will be done with reasonable dispatch; because, as we move forward with an economic program that looks to improvement in all regions of Canada, it seems to me that this must be one of the priorities.

In closing, may I say that this Speech from the Throne in my opinion continues the sound, progressive steps to a united and growing Canada first promised by the Prime Minister in June, 1968.

[Mr. Harries.]

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia): Will the hon. member permit a question. Is it his opinion that the government should sell its equity in Polymer Corporation and utilize the funds or the capital obtained from the sale, or does he think that the government should dispose of a 51 per cent interest and retain a 49 per cent interest in the corporation. Has he thought about this?

Mr. Harries: I believe that the government should sell its equity in Polymer Corporation and that Polymer Corporation should be a normal, joint stock company in Canada. It should be listed on some lively stock exchange like the one at Vancouver. It seems to me that the government should provide the seed stock; but I do not think we should continue to involve ourselves in an enterprise when it is as obviously successful as is Polymer Corporation.

Mr. McIntosh: The hon. member supports free enterprise.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to congratulate the hon. members for Sarnia and Lapointe (Messrs. Cullen and Marceau) on their remarks at the beginning of the debate.

[English]

I am speaking after the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Harries) has spoken, Mr. Speaker. It is easy to tell what part of Canada a member comes from by the remarks he makes. One can easily tell that the hon. member is from an urban constituency. Air Canada service does not seem to concern him at all, his attitude being that if Air Canada does not provide a service, some other airline will. His attitude no doubt is the same towards the Canadian National. But those from other parts of Canada, as I shall demonstrate in a moment, have a different attitude.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Comeau: Like many hon. members of parliament, I hear many expressions of goodwill on matters which the government feels are of top priority, such as the lowering of the voting age, concern about the economic and social life of Canada, the extension of Canada's fishing zones, and so on. It is apparent from the Throne Speech that one of the government's priorities is in the field of pollution, which is important. The government will present a series of white papers.

May I speak about the lowering of the voting age? I believe my speeches in the past to the young people have indicated that I am in favour of such a move. I strongly believe that such a move should be associated with programs in our schools devoted to educating our young people in our system of government and the workings of parliament in general, so that our young men and women may at least have an idea about budgets, for example, as well as the way governments influence or change society as a result of passing certain laws, rules and regulations. I fully understand that education lies within the jurisdiction of the provinces and that the provinces control and establish our educational programs. However, I believe that in Canada we should co-ordinate many of our efforts in education by providing similar standards for education in all provinces. As a matter of fact, there is a motion in my name on the order paper to that effect.

The federal government should encourage the provinces to make their civic construction programs much more patriotic ones. We must make our young people aware of what Canada is all about.

What concerns me most in the Speech from the Throne is the idea of providing a better social and economic life for all Canadians. There is a reference in the speech to the fact that the government will provide additional funds to curb regional disparities. Incidentally, I am pleased to see the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) here this afternoon. I am in favour of increasing funds and expenditures, if we can cure the disparities existing in Canada. But who will do all this? There is a reference in the speech to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I still read the minister's speeches which tell us just what that department will do for us all. We all want to give the department a chance to get on with this work, but I think the department ought to act immediately.

When the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was first set up, we were told that this department's activities would result in more employment in designated areas, the idea being that designated areas would prosper and grow along with other parts of Canada. We were told that other departments of government would not interfere with the activities of this department. I say that other departments are interfering when we find that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has had to cut back in certain areas because of the government's austerity program. I was under the impression that nothing could be done by other departments in matters relating to designated areas unless the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion consented. But what do we see happening?

The Postmaster General is trying desperately to close post offices in the designated areas. Yesterday I received a list indicating that 48 post offices have been or are about to be closed in my little constituency of South Western Nova.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Comeau: How can you talk about growth and prosperity when you start removing postal services? Have you ever heard of post offices being closed in Toronto?

An hon. Member: Or Montreal?

Another hon. Member: Or Calgary?

Mr. Comeau: Or Edmonton? The Postmaster General wants to save money, and that is very commendable.

An hon. Member: Cut down on the Prime Minister's personal staff.

Mr. Comeau: The Postmaster General says that three conditions must be met before a post office is closed. His basic criterion, nevertheless, is, "If it does not pay, it is out". When the Prime Minister says, "Cut out something" he does that. He takes the corner of his desk and he cuts it off.

An hon. Member: Start your cutting with the CBC.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Comeau: The minister does not have just one post office to look after, he is responsible for all the post offices in Canada. Some areas are doing all right and some are not doing so well. It is the government's responsibility to provide these services. The reason for having a government is to provide these services to the people, including those in the less prosperous areas. These services are paid for by all the taxpayers of Canada, not just by those in the large industrial centres.

If the minister wants to save money, that is fine, but surely there is money being wasted by his department in Ottawa which could be saved. New post offices are still being built. I was in an area last week where new post offices were being built to replace old and rickety buildings. The minister has increased his staff, as have other ministers. The only reason the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) is cutting some of these services is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) instructed him to do so. The minister cannot cut these services in the urban areas because too many people would be affected, therefore it is the people in the rural areas who must suffer. The policies of the minister are affecting only the rural parts of Canada, those areas under the jurisdiction of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion should investigate the type of service being supplied by the Post Office Department.

Yesterday we heard from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). We did not hear anything about transportation, but we did hear from the minister. What is his department doing to improve services in the designated areas? In the Maritimes, and other designated areas, freight rates have increased during the past year. The CNR is removing railway stations. The member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Harries) is in favour of this. He does not want the CNR, but in some sections of Canada there is nothing else. The services between Toronto and Montreal are profitable, and make up for the losses in areas such as the area I represent. The services in the large industrial centres are improving, but in the rural areas of Canada they are deteriorating.

It is not possible to promote growth and prosperity in designated areas in Canada by cutting back transportation and post office services. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion should ensure that the Minister of Transport follows the policy of the government to reduce the disparity between the regions. When the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was formed we were told this sort of thing would not happen, that the ministers would co-operate with each other.

In my area, the department recently removed a lightship. This may appear minor, but it was providing protection for the fishermen as well as employment.

What is happening to the air services in the designated areas of Canada? There are rumours that Air Canada will phase out many rural airfields. Is Air Canada not operating at a profit? I am under the impression it is. A government agency should provide services to all parts of Canada. If the department can provide comparable services by regional carriers or other methods, that is fine, but I doubt very much that this can be done.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion should also ascertain what the Department of Public Works is doing.

Mr. Crouse: Nothing!

Mr. Comeau: I am not the only member who comes from a fishing village. It is impossible to obtain $2,000 to have a small amount of dredging done in a small harbour. It is impossible.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Comeau: Last week the fishermen in my constituency had to dredge their own canal. It is impossible to get $1,000, $2,000, $3,000 or $4,000 to repair a small wharf. These people are not asking for the moon. They are not asking for half a million dollars, all they are asking for is $2,000 or $3,000. A lot of money is being spent to staff the minister's office and other things.

An hon. Member: The Arts Centre.

Mr. Comeau: I mentioned the Arts Centre before. I would be repeating myself for the tenth time if I mentioned it again. The government is hiring staff all the time—the highest paid ones of course; the lowest paid ones are being fired.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Comeau: I was under the impression that the austerity measures would not affect the designated areas. However, the government is reducing the services being provided to rural Canada in order that they might balance their budget or fight the so-called inflation. I do not argue the fact that inflation is a problem, but I do not see how it will help Canada to cut off services in the slow growth areas.

When the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was set up, the Prime Minister stated there would be designated areas in the Maritime provinces, some sections of the west and Ontario. It is not good enough to simply apply the axe, without considering the effect that course will have on the social and economic standards of some sections of Canada. It is not good enough for a government to stop growth and development in the already underdeveloped areas of Canada simply to balance the budget. This government has no feeling for the people, Mr. Speaker. It has no feeling for minorities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Comeau: The bill to give effect to bilingualism has been passed, but you can't eat that. It makes me sick when the government says, we have no money for little dredging jobs; we have no money for little post offices; we have no money for this and no money for that. There is all kinds of money, and the government knows it, but they have no feeling for the poor.

Yesterday the Minister of Transport stated we must adopt long-term policies. I agree with this, but the long-term policies of the government seem to mean that everybody should be moved to the urban areas. This will create ghettos or, as somebody suggested to me yesterday, anthills. We read in the newspapers criticisms to the effect that Maritimers who move to Toronto do not know how to live. We Maritimers are being criticized every day. I saw an article last week setting out the conditions it is alleged we cannot accept, yet the policies of this government drive us to the highly industrialized, heavily populated centres of Canada. When the services are removed the people have no choice, they have to move.

The industries also have no choice but to settle in urban Canada. How can industry be expected to settle in sections of Canada which have no services such as post offices, trains or Air Canada? More problems are being created by these people moving to the urban areas. We heard again today about the government's concern regarding urbanization. Everyone is talking about urbanization. There are many problems in urban Canada. People do not wish to spend one hour driving one mile to work. They do not want to pay $10,000 or $15,000 for a lot 30 by 100 feet when there is plenty of land available in Canada, nor do they want to live in a $250 a month, three bedroom apartment with seven children.

Do not talk to me about long-term policies if the only thing you can do is move people from rural Canada to urban Canada. I predict that in 20 years time the government will want to change this whole policy; there will be such a mess in our cities that they will want to drive people back to the rural parts of Canada.

The present administration does not seem to be concerned about the quality of the life of Canadians. Rural people are not really poor as we know the poor in the cities. Basically, they enjoy a good life. They work peacefully, do a little hunting, a little fishing. The quality of life in the rural parts of Canada is probably far superior to the quality of life in most of the urban centres, and in these circumstances some hon. members may wonder what I am complaining about. What I am saying is this: for goodness sake do not take away all the services needed by those who prefer to stay in the countryside. Let them enjoy things. Do not make it inevitable that they must move to the urban centres. If you want to change the nature of these services, then provide alternatives. It is not good enough simply to cut back. We have enough highly-paid civil servants to come up with better policies than we have produced so far.

What are the priorities now envisaged? I did not see anything in the Speech from the Throne of much concern to those living on welfare. The speech did mention something about building new houses, but we should not forget that a great many of our people simply cannot afford to buy them. Interest rates today are so high that few people can afford to borrow. No one can apply successfully for a housing loan unless he makes $8,000 a year. The effectiveness of the welfare system is basic to meeting the needs of the working poor, as well as others. These people are caught in the system and I hope we can prevent this situation. To do so may, indeed, be the objective of the government; I hope so. Perhaps I should not be too critical. Maybe the government knows what it is doing. But, Mr. Speaker, every government we have had since 1867 gave the impression of knowing what it was doing. And still there is poverty. There should be no need for a man to write to me today and say: I have 14 children, I am on welfare; they can take away their God-darned welfare if they wish; provide me with a job. This kind of thing makes me mad. Many of us come here with certain objectives in mind, a certain amount of initiative and a desire to do things for the people who are caught up in the system. I would say the present government is not helping matters. Canada is rich, and all parts of it could be developed if we were to stop and think for a little while and start being less political.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): On rising to make my contribution to the debate on the address I should like, first of all, to make a few comments on the speech itself, then to touch on a matter of great concern to my constituents in Vancouver East and, finally, to speak briefly on a situation in Canada which, as I see it, is most serious and urgent.

May I say right away that there does not appear to be a great deal of difference between the various speeches from the Throne which I have heard over the years. I say this from the point of view of one who has had some experience with such matters, counting both the provincial legislature and this House of Commons. This, the second session of the twenty-eighth Parliament of Canada, is my thirty-ninth session, counting time spent in both legislative bodies, so I have listened to 39 speeches from the throne.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, the one we are now considering does not differ substantially from the majority of those I have heard in the past, inasmuch as to a considerable extent it is based on wishful thinking, generalities and platitudes. Nevertheless, I have never felt it was the sole responsibility of a member of the opposition merely to criticize and condemn the government, so I should like, initially, to commend the government for offering an indication that at least some consideration is being given to long term planning.

One of the great shortcomings evident in our parliamentary history is a failure to recognize and accept the need for long-term planning. There is, in my opinion, a definite indication now that this is in the mind of the cabinet, and this is why I commend hon. gentlemen on the front benches opposite even though, if my analysis is correct, it may take up to ten years to bring some of their projects to fruition. Having said this, I must express my keen disappointment that the Speech from the Throne failed to indicate that any consideration is being given by this government to bringing forth constructive policies and legislation to meet the urgent and difficult problems facing certain groups of people in this country. I refer particularly to hundreds of thousands who are living on fixed incomes and whose needs are apparently to be completely ignored.

A great many of the speakers preceding me have mentioned the plight of our senior citizens and others. I wish to draw attention to the situation facing our veterans. Before doing so, may I express the opinion that it is a disgrace that we should hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), as we have in the last few days, pounding their collective breasts, if I may use that expression, and boasting of the fact that this year we shall have a balanced budget for the first time in many years. A balanced budget is all to the good, but a balanced budget which is achieved by sacrificing hundreds of thousands of needy people is a disgrace to those who boast about it.

Mention has been made of senior citizens and others. I cannot understand why nothing has been said so far about the needs of the veterans and the widows of veterans. Our veterans waited three years for the Woods report, and over a year for the white paper that was published. No action has been taken on either. When the white paper was published, a white paper that I think I am safe in saying was basically a fait accompli as far as government decision was concerned, it gave no indication of any recognition of the need of our veterans. As far as we can gather there is no indication whatever in the white paper of an increase in the basic pensions of the veterans of this country.

The answer we are given is that veterans pensions are part of the over-all task force study of the entire social security legislation of our country. Even the term "welfare legislation" has been used to describe these payments. Any government that takes the view that rightful payments to veterans is welfare is adopting a disgraceful position and is unworthy of the support of the people of this country. Such a government is letting down those men and women who, in two world wars and in Korea, offered their lives in this country's time of need. I say that these payments to our veterans are a right not welfare.

I sincerely hope that the government is going to have a change of mind and heart. Although this matter is not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and is completely ignored in the white paper, I hope action will be taken during this session to increase the basic pension of the veterans of Canada. Certainly, this would mean a great deal in my own riding where there are thousands of veterans. For example, I have six veterans organizations in my constituency of Vancouver East.

Mention of the white paper brings me to another matter that I think should receive serious consideration by the government. I appreciate that the throne speech makes clear that in this session we are going to be swamped with a series of white papers. Although I agree with this, as I said a few moments ago a white paper is really a fait accompli as far as decisions of government, policy-making and the introduction of legislation are concerned.

Both opposition and government members have a responsibility to ascertain whether any decision, policy or legislation put forward by the government is the correct one. It is most difficult to arrive at a conclusion in this regard when all one has before one is a white paper. The government has behind it all of the reports made by departmental and interdepartmental committees, as well as the reports of various task forces.

I think that both the government and parliament would be far more responsible if there were made available, as far as practicable, in addition to government white papers, the reports upon which the government has reached decisions. Because it is possible, Mr. Speaker, for the government to reach a wrong decision on the evidence submitted. The government may be making a decision or formulating a policy that is based on party and political expendiency instead of on the information supplied.

I fully realize that there are undoubtedly some documents that must be treated as completely confidential; that fact I recognize. Nevertheless, I hope that the Prime Minister will seriously consider making it government policy that members of all parties be allowed to receive the basic information upon which the government has reached a particular conclusion. If such a course were followed, parliamentary democracy would have a truer meaning.

Having said that white papers were really a fait accompli, may I in all sincerity make a suggestion to the government? I agree with the government's policy of placing a greater workload on, and giving greater responsibilities to, our committees. I think that is a good move. However, Mr. Speaker, I say it is sheer nonsense and a waste of the taxpayers' money to give terms of reference to a committee and ask the committee to make recommendations thereon when in fact the government has already made up its mind what it is going to do. Such a course is absolute hypocrisy, and it happens far too often.

Let me give the house a couple of illustrations. I have the privilege of being a member of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. This committee received terms of reference from the government which included a study of NATO policy. The committee spent months studying NATO policy because the government wanted a decision. At great expense, every member of that committee was sent overseas to visit numerous countries in about 14 days. Within one day of returning to Ottawa the committee had to write its report. Yet the government had already made up its mind what it was going to do about NATO and what our NATO policy was to be. I ask, why waste weeks and weeks of many members' time and thousands of dollars in expenses if the government had already made up its mind?

Even more ridiculous, Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference also included a study of maritime command, its existing structure and policies. The committee was asked to look to the future and to bring in a report. During the recess a sub-committee of the standing committee returned to Ottawa, travelled to Halifax, spent four days there, received a mountain of information about maritime command and policy, A.S.W. and so on. Yet, within half an hour of the committee's return to Ottawa the government announced its maritime command policy over the radio and this included the scrapping, sale or mothballing of our only aircraft carrier, Bonaventure.

This sort of thing makes a farce of our committees and illustrates the arrogance and stupidity of the government in connection with some phases of committee work. I believe in the committee structure, in increasing the workload of committees and in the acceptance of new responsibilities; but let not the committees be the government's vehicle for face saving and whitewashing. If the government has made up its mind about a certain policy, then let it have the guts to say so, because the members of the House of Commons have plenty of other work to do.

A great deal has been said about the government's austerity program under which in the next year our Civil Service is to be cut by some 25,000. I should like to express the hope that this policy is not static and there can be some variation. If there is not, some rather ridiculous situations can and will develop. I understand the rule is that if a position becomes vacant, an employee resigns or is fired, that position cannot be filled. Let me give you an illustration of what not only can occur but is occurring.

On the Atlantic coast we have a fisheries headquarters. They have two large ships, one the Cyngus and the other the Chebucto. Recently, the Cyngus went in to drydock to have a new engine installed, so the crew was fired. The Cyngus is now on its trials, but where did it get its crew? The Chebucto is going in for its annual overhaul, so the crew was taken from the Chebucto and put on the Cyngus. When the Chebucto comes back into service, what will be the situation?

An hon. Member: The other one will go back in for overhaul.

Mr. Winch: Unless there is some variation of these regulations, we are going to witness one of the most remarkable miracles of the world. We are going to see two of our largest fisheries ships on the Atlantic, one with a crew and the other a ghost ship without a crew. That will really be something! I am not talking about something that is hypothetical. Instructions have not yet been given to the fisheries department in Halifax which would permit the hiring of a second crew. I just bring this forward as an illustration of the need for flexibility. All across Canada, departmental heads and federal employees do not know where they stand or what they can do. For the sake of morale, as well as efficiency, this matter should be corrected as speedily as possible.

There are many other matters one might raise but, as everyone knows, our time is limited during the throne speech debate. Let me refer to a matter which concerns me considerably, and I hope it is of concern to every member of this house. We are elected as representatives of a party on the basis of our party's platform, program and policies. It has always been my belief that in this House of Commons we have to consider ourselves as 263 men and one woman who make up the board of directors of this nation of Canada with a population of 22,000,000. We have the power to make laws, rescind laws, change laws, alter laws, tax for money and spend it. For this reason, political expediency and party politics in the last analysis, if not in the first, should not play a major part or have priority in our decisions. In many of our decisions, if we accept responsibility, we have to take the lead and perhaps express views which may be unpopular. They may not be vote-catching, but I suggest we have a responsibility not to play politics and not make speeches or decisions on the basis of whether or not they are parochial and might affect our constituencies, provinces or certain groups. We must not make them necessarily on the basis of whether or not they are popular. That is my very definite opinion.

In my estimation, we face very serious and urgent situations and conditions throughout Canada. We, as members of the House of Commons, cannot ignore these matters if we accept our responsibility. Much as I regret having to say so, it is my personal belief that there is a sense of irresponsibility permeating our Canadian way of life and our way of thinking. It is time something was said about this. Regretfully also, I must say that there seems to be an attitude, individually and collectively, that something is wrong but that it is the other fellow's fault. We feel that something should be done about these problems so long as it does not affect us. Too often we feel that we should let George do it. As long as we allow that situation to continue, we will be in serious trouble.

This feeling is permeating almost every phase of Canadian life. We see it in the field of education. Certainly, students require changes and new policies. Certainly, they should be represented on the governing bodies of the institutions of higher education. We must, however, make it clear, with a stern voice and a stern hand, that a small minority cannot and shall not have the right to exercise mob rule in the name of democracy. We can no longer allow the destruction by violence and by fire of our schools and universities. If I may refer to a very small group of professors, I may say if they do not want to teach then let them stay at home. With reference to a small minority of students, I say if they do not like the way things are going democracy does not demand that they learn about modern living, technology and so on. The students have rights. Changes are needed but we must make it clear that our schools, elementary and otherwise, exist for the education of those who want to learn. They are paid for by the taxpayers of this nation.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said a great deal about the fact that unless we have voluntary co-operation to end inflation, then stern measures may have to be taken. We may reach that point, but let me suggest that co-operation is better than compulsion. If we do have a need for compulsion, let it be as acceptable as possible. The government can only accomplish this by proving its sincerity, by not discriminating or placing the blame on one sector. The co-operation of labour is a basic requirement and the way to obtain that co-operation is by showing, through government policy and action, that we take the same view toward profits and prices as we take toward wages.

This co-operation cannot be obtained by suggesting you have a government policy, then spending almost $13 million on the refit of the Bonaventure, $1.2 million on an annual overhaul and then saying you are going to scrap that ship. You do not obtain co-operation by passing an order in council, as the government did last January, whereby you forgive the Ford Motor Company of Canada $75 million owing to the federal treasury because that company could not meet all the requirements of an order in council made some five years before. This is a company which last year had a net profit seven times greater than it had in 1964. In the first nine months of this year it has a net profit of $51 million compared to $36 million in nine months last year. This is also a company which has $150 million in depreciation reserves, and retained earnings of $302 million. You do not obtain this co-operation when you ignore the basic, urgent issues of today such as urban renewal or urban redevelopment.

I say that if by government policy and government action you mean the curbing of prices and the control of profits then undoubtedly, not perhaps, you will receive the co-operation of labour. I see my time is almost up. There was another matter about which I desired to speak, but in conformity with the rules I will come to a conclusion based on a worry, a fear, of mine concerning the actions and the thinking of some Canadians. We must be outspoken, responsible members of parliament so that we can bring about understanding and co-operation between all sectors of the Canadian economy. This is a "must".

I made a statement a few years ago for which I was damned, condemned and criticized. I shall repeat it, however, here in the House of Commons today. The world does not owe Canada a living. We must earn it. To do that all of us, not only in this House but all 22 million Canadian citizens, must recognize the realities of today. If we do not then I—and I am not a prophet of gloom nor doom—would say we face disastrous consequences in the immediate future.

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, before adding my comments to those already made in this debate, I wish to compliment the hon. members for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) for their excellent contribution to this debate on Thursday last. I think it only natural that their constituents should be justifiably proud of their outstanding performance as we in this House are proud.

While it is true that the Speech from the Throne contained references to many subjects of great importance to the people of Canada, one observation was of particular significance to me as the representative in this House of the constituency of Sault Ste. Marie. It reads as follows:

> Satisfactory relations between labour and management are of critical importance to our social and economic progress. The government is devoting greater attention to the problems and possibilities of industrial relations and will be putting forward for your consideration amendments to the legislation governing collective bargaining in the industries within federal jurisdiction.

The city of Sault Ste. Marie has been paralyzed by a steel strike since August 1. In a city of some 75,000 people, which relies practically exclusively on one industry for its economic existence, the shut-down of that industry, whether by strike or lock-out, can be disastrous. We who live in the city are of course aware that, from time to time, the very nature of industrial disputes makes such shut-downs necessary. However, I cannot help but feel that the present shut-down could have been avoided if the laws pertaining to labour relations were more realistic. I, of course, realize that the dispute in Sault Ste. Marie falls within the jurisdiction of the provincial government, and that the parties to the dispute are governed by the provisions of the Ontario Labour Relations Act. Nevertheless, it is my hope that we in this House will enact federal legislation in this field which will be a model for the provinces, which will be so advanced that the provincial legislatures will have no alternative but to follow our lead. In other words, we should endeavour to be leaders, not followers, and if our efforts are successful perhaps—just perhaps—we might end up with labour laws which are more or less uniform from coast to coast, a result which is so desirable that the mere thought of its attainment should give us the courage to forge ahead and legislate in a field where up until now even the angels have dared to tread but lightly.

Needless to say there is not sufficient time available to discuss all of the provisions one would like to find in such labour legislation.

However, there are four specific submissions which I should like to make.

First, unions should, by statute, be made accountable as legal entities, capable of suing and, subject to certain conditions, of being sued, thus placing them in the same position before the law as all other corporate and private citizens.

Second, where industrial conversion resulting from technological change which is subject to management control is likely to lead to significant labour displacement during the term of a collective agreement the union should, by statute, be given the right to negotiate the method for dealing most justly with those employees who will be displaced. In cases where there is no agreement as to whether the expected displacement is significant, and in cases where there is not agreement as to the method of dealing with those employees who will be displaced, the issues in dispute should be submitted to binding arbitration. In any event, the law should require the employer to give at least six months' notice in writing to the employees who will be displaced, to their union and to the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

Third, unions should be required by law to conduct strike votes, ratification votes and any votes to extend or continue strikes, by way of secret ballot.

Mr. Peters: Why?

Mr. Murphy: I will come to that in a moment.

Fourth, the legal remedy known as the "ex parte injunction" should be abolished by requiring any party who seeks to obtain an injunction, which would have the effect of restraining the activities of any person or persons engaged in a legal strike, to give notice of his intention to apply for such an injunction to the party or parties who would be affected by it.

There are many arguments, Mr. Speaker, pro and con with reference to the question of union accountability. On occasion, the issue has become an emotional one. Nevertheless, I firmly believe that if we view the issue coolly and objectively, we would inevitably be led to conclude that there is no logical reason for retaining the present status of unions which places them in some fuzzy, grey, legal limbo wherein the law purports to govern organizations which are not recognized as legal entities. I strongly suspect that governments have perpetuated this legal fiction only because they have lacked the courage to take steps which might offend the labour movement and the tens of thousands of votes it represents. However, I hope this government has the intestinal and departmental fortitude to face this issue squarely and thereby concern itself with the interests of Canadians generally and not just the special interests of select groups in our country.

I said earlier I honestly feel that the present work stoppage in Sault Ste. Marie need never have occurred. I would like to explain why I hold that belief. On July 31 this year the collective agreement between Algoma Steel Corporation and Local 2251 of the United Steelworkers of America expired. Although negotiations for a new contract had been going on for some time, no agreement had been reached at that time. However, both parties were willing and prepared to continue bargaining, and no legal strike could take place until August 27. But at midnight, on July 31, approximately 38 insurgent dissident members of the local decided to institute an illegal or wildcat strike, and these men proceeded to picket all points of entry to the steel plant.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Regular members of the local who presented themselves for work were harassed and threatened. Some of these men braved the harassment and crossed the picket line. Others, as it turned out for good reason, turned back and returned home. I asked a number of those who turned back at the picket line why they and their co-workers allowed themselves to be pushed around by as few as 38 radicals. The answer was invariably the same, "Murph, you have a wife and kids. If you were told you would end up in hospital with a busted head, or that your family was in danger, what the hell would you do"?

Mr. Peters: That is a lot of crap, and you know it.

Mr. Murphy: Just listen, Buddy. Hon. members might think that such remarks were nothing more than idle threats but, Mr. Speaker, when you consider that a similar wildcat strike at the same plant only a year earlier had erupted into violence, resulting in extensive property damage and bodily injuries, then you may understand that the fear felt by many on this occasion was real.

Further evidence of the fact that the illegal picketers were not engaging in idle chit chat was discovered by the men who had crossed the line. When they came off shift they found that tires on their cars had been slashed, and car windows broken. Needless to say, they did not again attempt to cross that picket line.

Despite the earnest efforts of the officials of Local 2251 to persuade the members of their local to disregard the wildcat picketing and return to work, operations within the steel works were affected to the point that company officials found it necessary to shut down operations. I am told that the cost of shutting down a steel mill the size of Algoma is approximately one quarter of a million non-productive dollars, and that the cost of re-opening such a mill is the same. Faced with a possible legal strike on August 28, the company officials decided not to re-open the plant, despite the fact that the illegal picketing ended within a few days. It naturally followed that the union members voted for a legal strike on August 28.

During all this time, that is, from August 1 to August 28, the members of the United Steel Workers of America in Hamilton were striking the Steel Company of Canada. I believe it is generally agreed that Algoma Steel and the Sault Ste. Marie steel workers were prepared to accept any reasonable settlement which might ultimately be reached in the dispute in Hamilton. It is for this reason I believe that if it were not for the illegal activities of a handful of union members there would have been no work stoppage in Sault Ste. Marie, some 10,000 men in the steel industry and associated industries would have continued to work and take home pay cheques to their families, and the merchants and other businessmen who serve the steel workers would not now be standing idly behind their windows staring blankly at empty streets. I can think of no better example of the vicious effectiveness of an illegal wildcat strike, and I believe my proposal to make unions legally responsible for the illegal actions of their members to be an effective and just antidote for this type of social poison.

Naturally in cases involving illegal strikes, liability should be limited to those cases in which union officers fail to demonstrate that they did all they reasonably could to prevent the work stoppage or to persuade the defaulting employees to return to work. In Sault Ste. Marie the union officials did try to persuade their members to return to work. Their persuasion did not succeed. However, if the rank and file members of the union realized that their failure to honour their contract might result in costly court actions, which might lead to damage awards running into the hundreds of thousands of dollars, and that the payment of these penalties would be extracted from their pay cheques by way of increased union dues, then I believe that some 38 hotheads would have a difficult time keeping 6,500 workers from doing their job.

There are many other benefits which would flow from the establishment of a union as a legal entity, and some of the benefits would accrue to the rank and file union members. But I say this, Mr. Speaker, that if the enactment of a law which has the effect of making a union legally responsible prevents the occurrence of just one illegal strike, which could produce the havoc and economic hardship which resulted from such a strike in Sault Ste. Marie, then it is time we enacted that law.

In this respect I wish to quote from a decision rendered a number of years ago by the late Mr. Justice Brandeis, a very honoured and respected member of the United States Supreme Court:

> This practical immunity of unions from legal liability is deemed by many labour leaders a great advantage. To me it appears to be just the reverse. It tends to make officers and members reckless and lawless, and thereby to alienate public sympathy and bring failure upon their efforts. It creates on the part of employers also a bitter antagonism, not so much on account of lawless acts as from a deep-rooted sense of injustice, arising from the feeling that while the employer is subject to law the union holds a position of legal irresponsibility...
> The unions should take the position squarely that they are amenable to law, prepared to take the consequences if they transgress, and thus show that they are in full sympathy with the spirit of our people, whose political system rests upon the proposition that this is a government of law, and not of men.

The second proposal I outlined earlier had to do with industrial conversion or change, resulting from technological advances, which has the effect of causing labour displacement. As the Woods report on labour relations astutely observes, the term "industrial conversion" embraces all major changes that may have a permanent disruptive effect on the employment relationship. Technological change, or automation, is only one of the forces which may lead to such disruption. Other forces include resource depletion, product obsolescence, and domestic and foreign market shifts.

While it is true that an employer may have little or no control over other causes of industrial conversion, it is equally true that the same employer does have control over industrial conversion by way of automation. It is in this area that I feel the employer should, by law, be required to negotiate with the union on matters pertaining to retraining, relocation, income maintenance, severance pay, early retirement and similar types of assistance that will provide some type of relief for those employees who will be dislocated as a result of automation. And I believe that such negotiation should be made mandatory, even though the changes to be made are to take effect at a time when a collective agreement is in force, whether or not such agreement has provided for the possibility of job-reducing changes.

I agree that automation has a vital role to play if our Canadian economy is to remain dynamic. The Woods task force report properly points out that to society as a whole, change is the key to the increased productivity necessary to meet unsatisfied public needs and desires and, to individual enterprises, change is essential to remain sufficiently competitive to survive. As the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) so aptly put it on Tuesday night, "the name of the game is change."

However, Mr. Speaker, industrial change by way of automation despite its obvious advantages cannot be allowed to run rampant without regard to the hardships to displaced workers which must necessarily follow in its path. The fact that the introduction of an automated manufacturing process will benefit not only his employer but also his fellow workers, and even Canadian society as a whole, provides little comfort to the man whose job has been eliminated by a machine. He will say, as I would if confronted with the same plight, "Good for you, but what about me"?

As representatives of Canadian society, we must answer that man's question. He is afraid, and justifiably so. We must act to allay that fear, and any action we take can be justified on both economic and social grounds. Economically, it makes sense to take steps to prevent the natural resistance to any form of change which can result from such fear. Socially, a truly just society cannot tolerate a situation which permits the majority, who will receive the benefit of change, to demand that the minority bear the burdens of that change.

[Mr. Murphy.]

I am agonizingly aware that the proposal I have made does not provide a complete answer to the haunting question of the displaced worker. My suggestion, if acted upon, would help only those workers who are covered by collective bargaining and collective bargaining covers less than half the labour force. Furthermore, it affords no protection to those workers who find themselves adversely affected by industrial changes resulting from causes other than automation. If one were to suggest answers to the questions which will be asked by these people, it would require much more time than is available to me today.

I am also aware, Mr. Speaker, that the proposal which I now make for alleviation of the hardships resulting from automation is not as extreme as other proposals I once supported. I am sure I will be reminded of that fact by my good friends who are members of United Steel Workers Local 2251 in Sault Ste. Marie. I once endorsed the position taken in the Freedman report with reference to this issue. My change in position has been the result of three separate influential factors.

First, the alarming increase in the number of strikes and the resultant irreparable damage to the economy of our country has caused me to have second thoughts about any proposal which would provide even more opportunities for strikes. I can see no justification for providing ways and means of disrupting the economic stability which we have come to expect once a collective agreement has been signed. It would be tantamount to providing warring nations with an endless supply of arms to do so.

Secondly, I have come to realize that collective bargaining, despite its many virtues, cannot by itself create jobs and this function should not be demanded of it. At best it provides a means for preserving obsolete jobs by sanctioning unnecessary work practices, or it shuffles job holders around by adopting such things as early retirement plans which induce older workers to retire to make room for the younger men entering the labour force. But jobs it does not create, and to think otherwise is to lull oneself into a state of delusion.

Finally, Freedman's proposals in this field became less appealing to me as I became increasingly aware of the economic Council's admonition that Canada must be vitally concerned with improving its industrial efficiency. In order to survive as a nation, we must be able to put new methods and technology to effective use. I cannot see how this could possibly be accomplished by adopting a proposal which threatens our efficiency by providing additional means, not only to attract what little industrial stability we have come to expect, but also additional means to prevent industry from availing itself of the fruits of technological advances.

The third proposal which I urge the government to include in our new labour legislation is that unions be required by law to conduct strike votes, ratification votes and any other votes which have the effect of extending or continuing strikes, by way of secret ballot. Some may contend that by legislating in this field the government would be meddling in the internal affairs of the union—in other words, interfering with the right of the unions to govern themselves. However, when one stops to consider the extent of the power that unions can exercise over present and prospective members, it becomes apparent that the basic rights of union members are the proper subject of legitimate public concern.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Murphy: When I am finished, Mr. Speaker.

The need for some sort of government control becomes even more apparent when we consider how the abuse or negation of basic democratic rights within a union has the potential of adversely affecting Canadian society as a whole. I need go no further than the steel strike at Sault Ste. Marie to find an example to illustrate this point. As I mentioned earlier, under normal conditions I believe the parties to the dispute in the Sault would have been prepared to accept any reasonable settlement that was reached between the parties in Hamilton. The Hamilton dispute was settled in mid-October. After that settlement, hopes were high that the Algoma steel plant in the Sault would be back in operation in short order. As things developed, it became apparent that all differences on monetary items resolved themselves in light of the Hamilton settlement but a non-monetary item involving the status of part-time foremen kept the parties apart. Last Sunday, at a general meeting of the union members called for the purpose of deciding whether to continue the strike until settlement had been reached on this issue, a majority of the members voted for the continuation. According to news reports of that meeting, some members requested that the vote by secret ballot rather than by a show of hands, but their request was refused.

I can think of no more blatant example of the denial of basic democratic rights than that I have just cited. I accept the fact that a union must necessarily be a militant organization—in many respects similar to a country continually in conflict with its neighbour—and as such cannot be expected to abide by all the sometimes sophisticated principles of democracy. However, when unions begin to deny or disregard such basic principles as the right to vote by secret ballot on issues of such grave importance, not only to union members but to society as a whole, then I think it is the time for the government to take action to protect and preserve these rights.

My final proposal, Mr. Speaker, was that the use of the ex parte injunction as a legal weapon in legal labour disputes should be abolished. Thankfully, the vast majority of our citizens believe in, and have great respect for, the law. I believe a good deal of this respect stems from the fact that our system of administering the law is based upon the adversary system which gives the litigants, or disputants, the right to appear before a judge in open court and present their respective cases. All parties have a right to be heard in public before a decision is made. Let us contrast this procedure with that followed when applying for an ex parte injunction. This extraordinary remedy permits a judge, in the privacy of his home, his hotel room or even his club, to issue a court order which can, and usually does, directly affect the activity of some person who does not appear before him—indeed, who does not even know that the judge is asked to make such an order. To make matters worse, the person asking for the injunction does not have to appear before the judge. He is simply required to file affidavits to support his claim and he need not be subjected to cross-examination on the contents of those affidavits before an injunction is issued.

Is it any wonder that ex parte injunction proceedings are held in such contemptuous disrespect by members of the public generally and by members of unions in particular? How can we preserve this archaic and despotic legalistic tool and at the same time pretend to revere that ancient but basic principle of common law, "justice must not only be done, but must be seen to be done." It is trite to say that bad laws breed disrespect for all laws and when the citizens of a country lose respect for the law, can anarchy be far behind?

Recent events in this country should make all of us frighteningly aware of the urgency of enacting laws which command respect and of ridding ourselves of laws which breed contempt. This government can take one small step in this direction if it does away, once and for all, with the availability of the iniquitous ex parte injunction in the legal labour disputes.

I would like to thank the hon. members for giving my remarks such attention, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member resumes his seat—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Peters: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may ask the question at this time.

Mr. Peters: I would like to ask the hon. member, assuming his suggestion were followed and all decisions and votes of a union—and we will agree that they are very large and complex, particularly in an area such as Sault Ste. Marie—were made public, would it not be only fair that the decisions of the other side also be made public?

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Murphy: That is not my understanding, Mr. Speaker. It was not my intention to require a tabulation of the vote to be made public. At Sault Ste. Marie the vote would take place either in the Memorial Gardens or at the gate, wherever most people could gather. How those people vote and who votes would not be made public necessarily. That would be for the union to say. If the union decides to make the tally public, that is fine. That is the way a board of directors of a company operates.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, my first remarks in this debate on the Speech from the Throne will be to compliment the government for its gracious reference to Her Majesty and Her Majesty's forthcoming trip to Manitoba during that province's centennial year in 1970. I notice in the Speech from the Throne that Canada intends to continue to be involved in the United Nations. I commend the government for that. One thing, however, disturbs me. In backing the United Nations, we must become conscious of our place in the whole world picture. The millenium has not yet arrived. We live in a dangerous world and although Canada, like most western nations, looks forward to 1,000 years of peace, no events of the last decade indicate that the millenium is yet here; nor can we hope to see it's arrival in the near future. Let us therefore not become ostrich-like in our approach to the defence of Canada. After all, no purpose is served by talking about the security of the free world or the true welfare of the world in general unless the people of the world are willing to pay the price of freedom. The price is that one must adopt a wide awake attitude, have a strong and stable country at home and be willing, in some cases, to pay the ultimate sacrifice.

I am not one of those who think we can live in a peaceful world where people do not pull their weight in defence matters. It is not good enough to look south of the border for the total defence of North America or the free world. I think the great republic to the south may have been misled at times. Although it is not popular to say so at this time, we owe a great debt of gratitude to the United States. Twice in my lifetime has that nation come to our aid. The aid has been somewhat late, but, nevertheless, they brought us to a victory which was earned at great expense and with the blood of the Armed Forces of the United States. If one must choose between the various types of propaganda emanating from various world centres, let us not listen to that propaganda which speaks only of the destruction of our powerful and friendly neighbour. When I say that our entire defence program should be formed in such a way that it takes into account the great republic to the south, I am sure I speak for the average Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bigg: We cannot take any cheap shortcut to our own security, anyone who imagines that the United States alone can defend the free world is entertaining an empty and dangerous dream. Anyone thinking of the defence of Canada, therefore, must take a realistic approach to this question. Along with other men of good will I, too, want peace; but I hope we are willing to approach this question realistically. I will say no more on the subject at this time.

The Speech from the Throne mentions that the voting age should be lowered to 18 years. That move, I think, is timely and inevitable. Our young people are becoming more educated; we have television and free education across Canada; and it is no longer reasonable for us to say that a man is not mature before he is 21. At 18 our young people will not have the experience of 21 year olds; nevertheless, if our 18 year olds have studied history, politics and civic matters they will be as capable as most people of making up their minds on political matters. If an 18 year old is mature enough to serve in war, I think he is mature enough to vote in peacetime. I shall support the legislation when it comes before the House. Our young people are marrying younger and earning their own living. It seems preposterous to me that a young married person should not have some say about how taxes and the cost of living are to be regulated. I only hope they bring to the polling booths the maturity we can expect as a result of the new leisure time that has been spent in keeping up with world affairs.

Having said that, I tell hon. members that I am not too happy with the Speech from the Throne, because it does not offer solutions to many pressing national problems. I am not a Harvard graduate in economics, but I believe that a certain amount of inflation is built into our present economic system. I think we all agree that expanding prices are the result of an expanding economy. It is only the "runaway inflation" that we are worried about and I am not sure whether the efforts made so far to contain inflation in Canada are adequate. Have we adopted the proper approach in Canada? Our economists and those in charge of fiscal matters have always said, "When there is a depression in the United States there must be one in Canada, and when the economy expands in the United States it must also expand in Canada." I am not sure that this is necessarily true.

Canada is fortunate among the nations of the earth in still having virgin land, enormous natural resources, big rivers of unpolluted waters; vast sources of mineral wealth, oil, and even timber. That being so, I am not at all sure that we are handling inflation the right way. If we were more ready to accept advice from those who have been successful in business, from those who have made a study of the economic problems of the mining or the agricultural industry, we might come to grips with our economic problems in a manner better suited to Canada. I suggest, perhaps, that we are not putting enough of our own, hard-earned money into our own capital investment. On this matter I cannot go along with the NDP which is busy at Winnipeg now. That party is screaming as usual at the United States and dragging red herrings—and I mean red—across the path. It blames the United States for all our problems.

If we need capital investment in this country, there is no reason why it cannot be obtained here. We are one of the richest countries in the world, not only in untamed natural resources but we have a gross national product of $60 billion. There is no reason why Canadians cannot tighten their fiscal belt a little. (We are all over-fed and we certainly over-drink.) If we took a little money and put it into capital investment we could be a bit more like the Japanese. We could obtain our objective, not by cutting wages or lowering the standard of living, but by going back to work with Canadian tools, understanding and monetary self-restraint. When I refer to self-restraint I do not mean cutting back in business, cutting down union hours or holding back union wages. I mean that we should save and invest in our own future.

While I am on the subject, I wish to say it might be very dangerous to put in price and wage controls unless we are certain which sections of the economy will be affected by these controls. It would be fine to have control over those people who have been able to weasel out of the government a 30 per cent raise, but what about the poor devils who did not get a raise? What about the civil servants who are still working for disgraceful wages in a country as rich, prosperous and far-sighted as Canada is supposed to be? It would be a disgrace to peg their wages at present levels and do nothing about the runaway prices of the things they buy.

Some of the people who were screaming about pegging the wages no doubt wanted to have their additional 30 per cent, but leave in the lurch the other fellow who has not got his economy straightened out. We are receiving advice from some people we should listen to the least. This afternoon we heard a very interesting discourse on economics from no less than a doctor of economics at the University of Alberta. He is the type of man who says that members of parliament are overpaid. They would be overpaid if they were in attendance in this house only as often as he! He happens to be a millionaire and he is not talking for other members of parliament. He is certainly not talking for members of the opposition, as he was reported to be in the Edmonton Journal of recent date.

All we ask is that this subject be fully studied. The member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange), who happens to be a member of the government, must use his thumb to get around his riding. This is beneath the dignity of the House of Commons and beneath the dignity of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bigg: It is time we stopped poking fun at each other across the floor of the House or in the press and set up a committee to iron out this question. This committee could sit whether or not parliament is in session. Let us tell the boys in the press gallery, if they are awake, that we do not get $18,000 unearned income. We get $12,000 of very, very hard-earned income in some cases.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bigg: I would like to see any three men in this country, whether they be economists or otherwise, who on $6,000 a year, can pay for me or the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk)—the great district which I once represented which has now been increased by some one-third, making it 100,000 square miles—to travel throughout our ridings in a way comparable to that of any commercial traveller selling popcorn or ladies' corsets. I would gladly hand over my $6,000 to them and welcome them to pay my bills. If there is any money left over they can give it to the members of the press gallery, or donate it to the fund for indigent scribes.

I am not going to say how much a good member is worth. I do not think it would be possible to pay for the kind of representation some constituencies are getting. I do not think some members of parliament should draw their pay cheques at all, but they should speak for themselves and not point the finger at other people. They should not say, "you are robbing the poor, unsuspecting taxpayer". If I were a millionaire I would not worry at all. I do not worry particularly now. I would be a member of parliament without remuneration because I love the work, but I do not want my colleagues to tell me I am ranting and raving for a lot of pay I do not earn. I would like to debate that privately or over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, if it can be arranged, preferably with the member for Edmonton Strathcona.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bigg: At this time, my riding is two-thirds agriculture and one-third urban. The agricultural problems in northern Alberta are very serious this year. When the Standing Committee on Agriculture travels, I hope it does not go from master farmer to master farmer and return with the idea that everybody has a nice a farming arrangement as Mr. Manning or Mr. Douglas. Apparently being premier of a province helps a man to learn how to farm properly.

Most farmers have to put up with weather conditions, and the weather conditions in northern Alberta at the present time are not a good advertisement for that province. These people are in desperate straits and emergency measures are required.

It is not the government's job to sell wheat or any other agriculture product, but it would not do them any harm to look around to find a salesman or two. With regard to sales of wheat, without being partisan about it, I suggest that some of the men who claim to have sold wheat in earlier times should be offered this employment. If they cannot do it, then they should keep quiet. But they should be sought out and offered the job. I think this wheat can be sold, even in the present, world market conditions.

What research is being done? Wheat can be turned into protein products. There is a great need for protein products in the world, particularly in Asia. We should see whether we can produce the right kind of hog to ship to Asia. It is not necessary to have a grade A hog. The people in China would be satisfied with 800 pound hogs. We could ship frozen hogs to the 700 million people of China.

We are making plans to recognize Red China. It might be a good idea if this recognition were, first of all, on the basis of world understanding, keeping human bellies full an and seeing whether we can put pork into the stomachs of the people who need more food. We can forget about the pork barrel at home and think about pork on the table of the Chinese people. I would agree to recognition of Red China, and every other nation, Asiatic or otherwise, on this basis.

I do not think there has been enough government research into agricultural products. In time of war we know we can sell all the unrefined wheat it is possible to grow to the desperate nations of the world. Let us find a way to sell agricultural products, whether or not they are turned into protein products, to the nations of the earth. I know it can be done, should be done and must be done. It is not good enough to say that nothing can be done about agriculture. Something that can be done is to give the small farmers of Canada an acreage payment right now. If such a payment were based on the cost of living at the time we established the first acreage payment in 1959, it would have to be doubled today. Even $400 would help a lot. This plan would not involve any administration costs whatsoever because all that would be needed would be a permit book. If the government wants to waste a lot of money on administration, this can be done but it is not necessary.

One or two Acts respecting agriculture on the statute books could be changed. Instead of waiting until the farmer gets his grain in the bin, money could be lent to him according to the acreage he hopes to get into the bin. Why wait until there is a disaster? Why not allow the man a little credit in order to get the stuff out? I know many farmers in northern Alberta would hire a grain drying machine if they had the cash to do so. They are stymied, although a few hundred dollars would make all the difference between going on relief and being able to carry on.

I have seen news in the papers recently which alarms me. It seems we are not consulted any more in Canada; we are told what is going to be done. Some of the things we are told make my hair stand on end. Take this idea that the government should buy up all the unproductive land in Canada. I do not agree with that. What is unproductive land, anyway, and who is going to decide what constitutes unproductive land? This idea sounds like socialism to me and I do not expect it to come from the great Liberal party; I expect it to come from people who admit being devoted to socialism. It might work, though I do not think it would. But be honest about it. Do members opposite want to socialize land in Canada? If they do, let them say so, and let the electorate vote them in if it approves. Let them not do it behind closed doors and let them not socialize certain areas of land and not others.

Whenever I have been able to approve of legislation—and sometimes I have found approval difficult—it is on the basis that all Canadians were being treated alike. This was the principle on which I acted when it came to voting in connection with the old age pension legislation. I do not like the means test. Spell it right in Hansard—m-e-a-n test. A means test is always a mean test. If the Government of Canada wants to be generous it can afford to be generous to us all. As far as I am concerned, a millionaire has just as much right to an old age pension as anyone else; he probably worked a lot harder than some of the people who are getting it. In my opinion, a means test is far more unfair and unprofitable than any other piece of legislation on the statute books.

We all want to eliminate poverty as far as possible. In the partisan press we have—and maybe there could be no other kind—writers accusing our leader, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), of supporting the idea of a guaranteed income. Well, the only guaranteed income I would vote for—and I speak for myself in this regard—is a guaranteed income in return for guaranteed work. I have never been in favour of a guaranteed income in return for no effort, and I would certainly not favour a guaranteed income for those who spend a great deal more time trying to avoid their civic duty than in trying to do something constructive for themselves or their fellow men. To pay a man a just wage for a good day's work is fair, and will always be fair.

I was disappointed to hear some people trying to say that the trade unions are responsible for most of the trouble in Canada today. That is nonsense. If it were not for the unions a great many people would still be in a condition amounting to near slavery. It is the abuse of union power which has been bad and it is our job here in parliament to see that abuses do not go unchallenged, whether committed by management or by the trade unions. It would be a very good thing in my opinion if management were sometimes to act to prevent a strike by introducing reforms which they know to be long overdue. It would be most refreshing, for example, if management were, some day, to call the staff in and say: Well, we have made a handsome profit this year; we have made a profit of $54 million; how much of that do you think is due to you as employees as a reward for your work and as a means of ensuring against strikes for the next few years?

An hon. Member: Fifty-five million.

Mr. Bigg: This kind of thing is done in England, in firms such as Rowntrees and Frys whose very names are household words and whose products are standards of quality. I have a suspicion that it is not only because they put good chocolate into the candy that they are so successful commercially.

We need more honesty in this country; more honest-to-goodness, straightforward honesty. We need it from all sides of this House. I should like to hear the members of the New Democratic party, for example, tell the unions that they are asking too much. It is most confusing to my farmers out west when they find that the reason they cannot ship their wheat is that some hidebound longshoremen's strike is holding up the movement of grain.

An hon. Member: It is the employers.

Mr. Bigg: It has been the fault of the employers at times, as I am the first to admit. It would certainly put the employers on the spot as far as the farmers are concerned if the longshoremen could tell them why they should have a 30-hour week when those same longshoremen are ready to fight against the making of an acreage payment. It seems that when we hear talk about an acreage payment, we hear only a lone voice from the prairie.

Prairie farmers want me to ask why it is that only the farmer is supposed to get along by competing on the markets of the world while others have their incomes guaranteed. I am sure that when my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition talks about a guaranteed income he is not only thinking about the unemployed and those now receiving relief, but about everybody in Canada including the fishermen who want a fair price for their catch and the farmer who wants a reasonable return for his farm products.

What is the answer to these questions? It is a very complex one. If we want to improve the wheat sales situation it will mean more research; it will mean putting more salesmen on the road. It may mean digging into the taxpayers' pockets so as to give the farmer, one of the hardest working men in Canada, a fair chance to pay for his children's underwear and keep abreast of his taxes.

Only two-thirds of my constituency Mr. Speaker is agricultural in nature. The people in the urban centres are worried about the ever-increasing cost of living in the cities. The newspapers tell us—indeed, they boast about it—that a young man getting married is able to buy an improved lot for $5,000. I hear one hon. member say "That is cheap". Perhaps it is cheap at present prices. Can anyone tell us how this young man will be able to pay the enormous education and other taxes which ride ever higher with the price of that property? The school board would, no doubt, be delighted if he had to pay twice as much for a lot, because in that case they would have double the amount to spend on certain forms and frills of education.

The easy answer to this problem is to say that education is not a federal matter, so we can close our eyes to it. Like the need to organize rapid transportation systems, it is not considered a federal matter. Even pollution, I understand, is not considered to be a federal responsibility. Is the air polluted above a city? Then, it is not a federal responsibility. If it were polluted over a provincial highway, then I suppose it would be a provincial matter; if it were polluted over the Trans Canada Highway, or over an interprovincial waterway, I presume we would come into the picture.

We had better get together. When we are rehashing our constitution we ought to bring it up to date so that we can straighten out these matters. When we turn to our legal brains we are told, in most instances, what we cannot do. We are told we cannot discuss certain matters, or that we cannot deal with pollution or certain aspects of public health without permission from the provinces.

The federal government tells the provinces that no money is available, so they need not keep asking for assistance. This is why our small farmers are leaving their homesteads. It is why pollution is becoming so bad that hope for saving some rivers is being abandoned. The bottleneck is a human one. There is no river in Canada that cannot be cleaned up if we start now.

I ask the government why they do not institute a crash program to combat pollution. According to an article I read last night, Canada hopes to get around to dealing with pollution by about 1981. My throat is sore at the present moment, not because I have been shouting but because of that stinking pulp mill just across the river. The capital city of Canada should be an example to the whole country in the matter of pollution control, yet if you have had pneumonia within the last five years you just can't live here. We cannot even breathe the air in this chamber without calling for medical attention. I am afraid if we have to wait until 1981 neither I nor Canada will be in a condition to benefit much from pollution control. We must get down to brass tacks and talk about pollution now and do something real about it immediately.

The people of Canada are getting fed up with our throwing the constitution in the face of the provinces, whether this be in the matter of urban renewal, the unbearable burden of taxation or the cost of education. I say no problem is too hot to handle if only people would have the guts to handle it. If a problem is too hot to handle, then we have plenty of asbestos in Canada, and I suggest we had better order 265 pairs of gloves for the members of the House of Commons.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada will not mind paying us $18,000 and will even be glad to pay double as long as they get twice as much effective action for their money.

Mr. Jean R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, may I join with my colleagues in congratulating the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) for their excellent presentations in moving and seconding the Throne Speech.

At the start of last session I decided to make my maiden speech during the debate on the official languages bill. I did so because the bill was of such importance to many people both in my riding and throughout the country, and because it has a very special meaning to me as a Canadian of French extraction, born and living outside of Quebec. Due to some very unfortunate circumstances, this debate was put off until very late in the session, resulting in my maiden speech being long delayed. This session I am going to jump the gun and make my debut with this throne speech debate.

When I came to Ottawa it did not take me very long to realize that if I was properly to represent the people of Timmins riding it would be necessary to find solutions to existing problems. But, more than this, it would be of the utmost importance to project our thinking into the future and to make a concerted effort to make that future better than the past. Standing still, preserving the status quo, is not good enough for our generation and it certainly is not good enough for the young people.

If there has been one clear message to the present day politician it must certainly be the complete dissatisfaction of these young people with our present standards and way of life. The message of the young says: "Get with it, Jack! You have ruined the basic structure of the society that we must inherit from you and further develop for ourselves". They say the basic principles of humanity have been so distorted that that distortion seems to have become acceptable and normal. They say the meaning of life has been so badly forgotten that they seek refuge in things beyond natural life itself, such as drugs. They say morals have been so compromised that it is now difficult to say what is right and what is wrong. What was right is now always wrong, and what was wrong is now nearly always right.

Social, political, economic, human and spiritual values seem to be part of such a jungle, and have become of such concern to the young, that they have in most instances lost the ability to temper the theoretical with reality, to adjust these theories with some measure of pragmatism. The communications gap between generations has opened so wide and has become so irreconcilable that the only solution for many is to wipe out this gap by destroying our present society. "Burn it down" is the new solution for all problems! Our young people want to destroy the society which seeks to eliminate them by subjecting them to the pressures of education, the pressures of social standing, yes, even the pressures of a normal, decent standard of living.

Seeing this frightful scene, Mr. Speaker, I decided last fall to try and communicate with our young people. I have been meeting on a regular basis with university students, high school students and other groups from my riding, and while these young people from Timmins seem to have a greater tolerance and understanding than the majority, they nevertheless are deeply concerned and have expressed great anxiety in regard to a large number of problems.

Since our area is rich in mineral and forest resources, they have great concern for the proper exploitation of these resources. They understand that you can regrow a forest, but they also know that minerals extracted from the ground are never replaced. They believe these minerals belong to our citizens, and they cannot understand why these citizens do not derive greater benefits from this exploitation. They wonder why so many of these minerals are extracted and so little are processed at the source; why so many are exported to other countries and so many of our industries are owned by foreign capital. They fear economic domination will bring political domination.

They ask me about the lack of pollution controls. They want an assurance that when our Texas Gulf smelter is completed it will not cause the terrible type of pollution seen in the Sudbury area. They cannot understand the continuing increase in prices and incomes, or disparities in earnings across the country which show a tradesman receiving $1.75 per hour in one region and $4.50 an hour in another region for the same amount of work. They want to know why there is a difference of 50 per cent in earnings for the same work in two industries in the same city, why students are refused jobs because they are not union members and yet are refused membership in the unions. This happens not only to students but people in the workforce as well.

Students ask me why they must pay income tax on their small incomes in view of the high cost of education at university, and why education costs are not deductible expenses for their parents. I certainly hope the white paper of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) will indicate some relief in this area will be given.

Our young people are concerned with our sovereignty in our northern waters. Their sense of pride in Canada and in belonging to this land is much deeper than ours and more significant to them. They have left in the past the prejudices and hatreds of long standing. Their minds are kept open to justice and fair play and their hearts to tolerance and understanding. As a result deep feelings of frustration for Viet Nam and Biafra are aroused in them,—yes, for their Quebec compatriots, too. And how about giving our surplus wheat to the hungry nations, they say.

Our students are concerned for their education, its quality and its purpose. They, more than others, realize the continuing waste of time, energy and talents through years of a learning process which lacks so much in purpose and effectiveness. Educational systems, like governments, seem always to be years behind the people they serve, years behind necessary accomplishments, and this, in spite of the great progress we have made, and in spite of the technological developments. We possess the necessary technicians and equipment, but lack a clear understanding of the basic principles and purposes. How many young people are technically competent and yet completely disoriented and ill-equipped to absorb the emotional shocks and moral challenges which everyday life brings.

Our young people ask me about marijuana laws, liquor laws and sex laws. To the older generation, these are the defending bastions of our moral standards; to our youth they are the hypocritical licences of permissiveness for the older generation. We must have failed terribly, Mr. Speaker, in offering our youth so few worthwhile challenges that many have seen fit to turn to drugs, violence, revolution and anarchy for substitutes.

More generally and fundamentally, they want to know where they fit into our society and, if they do fit in, why it is they cannot participate in the establishment of values, in the decisions concerning society and themselves. Surely, we must have the open minds and the flexibility to allow such a large segment of our citizens to participate in the determination of the concepts and structure of our society and all its segments, especially those that concern the young people themselves and their future.

From fear of being misunderstood, Mr. Speaker, let me say I am perfectly aware that what I am doing is simply repeating the identification of problems by our young people. Solutions are much more difficult to find. Nevertheless, I think these problems are doubtly important because our young people are aware of them and deeply concerned and troubled by them. If we are to move in the right direction, develop the proper principles and concept for the just and desired society, legislate the correct laws, implement these laws in the proper fashion, then of course we must look to our young people and listen to their pleas. We must develop some understanding, for it is their future and their legacy we are building.

While our young people are of paramount importance, Mr. Speaker, this is not to be taken as diminishing the importance of all our other citizens. Their problems are in good measure those of all Canadian regions; inflation, many people on fixed incomes, high cost of living and housing, inadequate social security, programs for the needy, the lack of understanding and humanity in so many of our public service departments.

Our pulp and paper industry in the Iroquois Falls-Ansonville area is a prosperous one. Until the Texas Gulf base metal discovery in 1963, gold mining was the most prominent industry in the area. This industry as you are no doubt aware, Mr. Speaker, is a depressed and diminishing one, and indeed exists only because of emergency gold mining assistance provided by the federal government. Gold mines would have to close their doors if this assistance were not available. The irony of this situation is that the industry is being legislated out of business by government, the price of gold having been pegged at $35 an ounce U.S. since 1934. Since emergency gold mining assistance is due to expire at the end of 1970, my greatest effort in this session will be to influence the government's decision to extend and improve this aid in order to reinforce this industry.

With the discovery of the Texas Gulf base metals deposit, the whole economic picture of our area has now changed. Our economic base has been strengthened, and its stability established. The construction of a smelter next spring with the help of $6½ million in incentives from our regional economic expansion department will again reinforce our economic structure, providing a substantial number of new jobs and acting as a shock absorber to our gold industry. This has changed our residents from pessimists to optimists again, yet many problems still exist and more will appear as a result of the new developments. New employees for the plant will create a serious housing shortage. We are presently looking into this problem. Solutions will have to be found and, of necessity, with this government's help, Mr. Speaker, solutions will be found, not only as a result of the efforts of politicians but also the enthusiasm, initiative and effort of our citizens. Our people are aware that the government cannot solve problems alone, cannot live their lives for them, and so they will accept the challenge. They will meet their responsibilities and they will develop a better Timmins riding for our young people, for all our people, and for Canada. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon), pursuant to Standing Order 40 I might inform the house of the questions to be raised on the debate at the time of adjournment. They are as follows: the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken)—pollution, cancellation of forestry research branch; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—pensions, retired civil servants, inquiry as to increase; the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Deakon)—health and welfare, control of use of pesticides.

ADDRESS DEBATE

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Jack Cullen for an address to His Excellency, the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Nesbitt.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): At the outset I should like to point out that my participation in this debate will not be lengthy. However, there are a few things I should like to get off my chest.

I am distressed about the way parliament is heading, and I am distressed about the undercurrent of dissatisfaction with Parliament running through so many of the speeches which have been delivered during this throne speech debate. I am particularly concerned about the continuing threat in virtually every government backbencher's speech about change in our procedures. I can share their concern for the way things are going, but the suggested solutions put forward by some of them I submit are not the answers to the problems.

The hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) set the tone for this debate and I congratulate him on the able manner in which he carried out his assignment. He is a next door neighbour of mine and a pretty close personal friend. I must say that in his speech he repeated a lot of platitudes, and he particularly stressed making parliament relevant. I know he will not object if I quote what he said, and this appears at page 6 of Hansard for October 23, 1969:

> In the various committees of the house, this legislation is reviewed, criticized, amended and reported back to the house. This legislation is being subject to amendment and these amendments are debated.

Isn't that something! If I may quote further from the hon. member's words appearing at the same page of Hansard, he said:

> I would like to see debates on important legislation hold the attention of this house, of the various media of publicity and the citizens of our country. I would like to see this House of Commons filled with members during the debating period.

To that, I say amen! No one will argue against this proposition, but I submit it might have been more relevant for us to ask why this situation occurs. I have my own ideas on this subject which I hope to elaborate upon a little later.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Later on during the debate the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Sullivan) whom I am delighted to see in the House, came up with a blueprint for a new constitution. As I understood his words, he seemed to favour a congressional style government. He even had specific suggestions concerning the division between the executive and the legislative branches of government. It sounded very much like Washington, D.C. being moved here to Ottawa. Now, lest anyone suggest for one moment I am being critical of either of my friends to whom I have referred, let me say at once such is not the case. I know they are concerned, and rightly so, but I submit the answer to the problem lies not in bewailing the fact and offering no solution, as was the case in respect of the hon. member for Sarnia, nor in abandoning our tried, true and proven systems for those of another country. I took from the speech of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain that that was his suggestion. The congressional system of our neighbours to the south, in my humble opinion, has not been such a howling success that I would be anxious to trade in our model for one of theirs No, Mr. Speaker, the answer is not as drastic as these members would have us believe.

I think the answer can be found much closer to home. All that is required is a little more intestinal fortitude displayed by the backbenchers in this House, particularly the backbenchers on the government side. I will come to that later also. I believe the majority of the new government backbenchers came here with a desire to participate and, even further, a wish to be non-partisan in their approach. After all the new members had every reason to believe that was what they were getting into. They knew their leader had been in different political parties, so they reasoned they could do what they thought should be done. They believed they were not tied. How long did that dream last? It was soon dispelled. Those ideas of being non-partisan, those dreams of statesmanship without party label and those suggestions in the press of forgetting politics and getting on with the nation's business have all been forgotten.

We were told a new era was dawning with the accession to power of a new majority government. The new era was dawning alright, but not the way the new members of parliament had envisioned it. We were told that new emphasis would be placed on the committee system, that committees would be less formal than the committee of the whole used to be and that we would get right down to the facts. We were also told there would be non-partisan examination with the help of experts. I have been a member here since 1963, and this sounded good even to me. Alas, I should have known better, even though the new members could not be expected to. What happened? This quotation, allegedly made by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) when he was writing to his constituents, covers the situation pretty well:

> The government members of the committee have been instructed to make no changes to the bills coming before the committee and to vote exactly as they are told by the government.

This I submit does not square very well with the words of the hon. member for Sarnia who wants to have the House filled, the committees to have a full attendance, everyone to be in his place and everyone set up like chess men. Why? Is there to be an opportunity for debate or are members just to be there to rubber stamp the wishes of a tightly-knit, ever-expanding executive group within the cabinet? The answer to the attendance problem that seems to weigh so heavily on the mind of the member for Sarnia is not to be found in the constitutional change panacea of the member from Hamilton, but in a renewed spirit of intestinal fortitude by government backbenchers who must resist being kicked around by the executive, even though that executive has the prerogative of dispensing favours.

I suggest there never has been a more dismal record of committee reports than those emanating from the last session of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCutcheon: We might take the public accounts committee as an example. I was a member of that body for some period of time. We found out about the buses that had to have a hole cut in the side to get at the spark plugs. Investigation proved that those were pretty good buses after all, but they required a simple and inexpensive modification. We held innumerable hearings regarding the so-called extravagance of the refit of the Bonaventure. We studied the navy's hydrofoil. We learned all about the fire on board and how the costs had escalated just as much and more in building the hydrofoil than they escalated for the Arts Centre. The committee found out what the Auditor General already knew. But the point is, what good has come of this; in what way have the deliberations of that committee assured the people of Canada that these things will not happen again?

In what way have any loose business practices been tightened up? Was anybody reprimanded for wrongdoing? If anyone was, I never heard of it. In other words, no action nor benefit really came out of the hearings and recommendations of the committee—nothing. I recall a member of that committee saying upon returning from visiting the Bonaventure last spring, "I'm sure this time we've got 'em; heads will roll this time". No, he was not a member of the party to which I belong. The only heads I know of that are going to roll probably are those on the Bonaventure if she ever puts to sea again. Anyway, we are going to scrap her after spending $14 million.

The public accounts committee probably is not a good example of lack of action on committee recommendations, because all that ever happens really is that there are some newspaper articles on such things as horses on the payroll, highly escalating costs of naval refits and highly escalating costs of world's fairs and centennial arts centres. But that is about as far as it goes. Lack of results, yes, but I suggest all that comes of it is a studied ignoring of this committee by the government.

Up until now at least, the government has not openly directed or dictated the findings of this committee, but I suspect it will not be long now until this is done. What about the Transport Committee report? In that case the poor chairman of the committee allowed a motion recommending the continuation of the "Newfie Bullet"? What happened to that report? More important, what happened to that chairman? Neither one of them lasted long, and the results of the committee recommendation did not last long either.

Do you remember how that report never quite made it to the House? I have no intention of boring you with the details. It is all in the record of last session. You will recall how the matter was referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, but how many of you recall the earthshaking decision that that august body handed down? In case you don't I would like to read it to you. It is to be found in Votes and Proceedings for February 13, 1969, volume No. 92, at page 695:

> Your committee reports that the reason for the omission—

I am referring to the Newfie Bullet resolution.

> —is that it was never moved and concurred in that the said resolution, adopted by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, be part of its Second Report.

How many of you recall how it was impossible for many days for the government to make a statement in the House regarding our future role in NATO? The reason given was, "We cannot do anything until the Defence Committee reports. They are over in Europe now, travelling from base to base. When they get back here to Canada we will make a statement." The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) mentioned this today.

The committee got first-hand information, and when it returned it reported to this House as follows:

> 1. Canada should continue to play an effective role in the preservation of peace through membership in NATO.
> 2. Canada should continue to maintain forces in Europe as a contribution to the collective defence arrangements of NATO.
> 3. Canada should continue its present roles in Europe until such time as the main items of equipment for its Air Division and Mechanized Brigade require replacement.

Did that report make any impact on government thinking? Not one bit! I quote from Hansard of April 18, 1969, page 7724 where the following announcement appears:

> The Canadian government intends, in consultation with Canada's allies, to take steps to bring about a planned and phased reduction of the size of the Canadian Forces in Europe.

According to the hon. member for Vancouver East, that announcement was made within minutes of the arrival home of the Defence Committee. I cannot vouch for the accuracy of that—

Mr. Winch: I can.

Mr. McCutcheon: He is here and he says he can.

There may be some who think that what I have pointed out does not mean much. Maybe it does not, but it meant enough to a certain Liberal Senator because he resigned from the committee. He could not stand it. Do you remember that?

There are those who will disagree with what I am pointing out, and who will say the government has the right to govern. In this I concur. But having the right to govern and not listening to dissenting opinions are two different things.

I submit that the two or three examples of the ineffectiveness of our committee system that I have given should be sufficient reason to call for a complete re-appraisal of the system. But I predict that instead of that we will be called upon soon to provide for some committee to sit while the House is sitting, to travel from place to place, to hire counsel, and to hire experts to advise it. With a record like our committees have established I, for one, will find it very difficult to agree to any of these requests.

If the committee system is to be continued the power of the committees must be strengthened. Committees as presently constituted are the creatures of the government, under direct supervision and control of the government. Does anyone actually believe that legal counsel hired at, say, $200 a day by these committees is really hired to serve the interests of the Tories, the Socialists or the Creditistes? If you do, then you probably also believe with Charlie Brown in the Great Pumpkin.

No, Mr. Speaker, the answer to attendance and to interest in the goings-on in this place lies in returning some degree of responsibility to the members of the committees and of this House. Ever since I have been here, there has been a steady erosion of the power and rights of the individual member.

I know that the hon members opposite, particularly the new members, will say that my examples of the ineffectiveness of committees are really not relevant. They will say, "If our Liberal party thinks things should be that way, then that's O.K.; that must be right because the cabinet says so. They have given instructions to our committee to do exactly what cabinet wants done. We'll do it and point out to the public that parliament isn't really relevant."

I say to hon. members opposite that if they want this institution to be relevant, as the hon. member for Sarnia suggests, then the authority and the decisions of committees must be strengthened. The private members must say, "No longer will we allow our rights and privileges to be over-ruled by the executive."

If we want the American system of committees, then each party will have to have its own legal counsel and its own expert witnesses. This will not bring an end to the Liberal government's pork-barrelling. It will not end the patronage, but it will cut down the percentage, and at least the Tory, Socialist and Creditiste taxpayers will not be supporting only Grit experts.

Our committee system is nothing more than a joke. The flow is in the wrong direction. Instead of taking opinions from the grassroots to the cabinet, the flow goes the other way. I have offered a couple of examples of what I mean, but in case anyone has any doubt let me close by quoting from the Speech from the Throne:

> The government believes that the time has come to extend the franchise in federal elections and it will therefore recommend to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of the House of Commons that the voting age be lowered to eighteen.

This example clearly shows what I mean about the flow of authority, the flow of recommendations. Gentlemen, it is going in the wrong direction.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Gerald Richard Cobbe (Portage): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to make a few brief comments about my constituency and its problems, which I feel I have an opportunity and obligation to put before the House. First of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) for their contributions to the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. There is always a great deal of controversy about the Speech from the Throne and one wonders where and why it originated. It appears obvious, however, that it was the intention of the government to put forth its program. The job of the government increases tremendously from year to year and it is difficult to set out piece by piece the legislation proposed; therefore, it must be dealt with in generalities. For those who find difficulty in understanding, it is sometimes easier if it is not spelled out in detail, but for those who are sincere in trying to understand the aims of the government for the year ahead it is reasonably simple.

I should like to take this opportunity—my first—to acquaint hon. members with an outline of my constituency because I feel it has certain characteristics which will give some meaning to my later comments. The constituency of Portage in the province of Manitoba is located in the centre, east and west of the province because the province of Manitoba is located almost in the centre of Canada, east and west. We believe we are the tie between eastern and western Canada and that our position is most important to the economy of the country. For instance, the first monument of the dominion land survey was erected on July 10, 1871, on the principal meridian where the west starts, which is located in my constituency. The Trans-Canada Highway and both the main lines of Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway travel through my constituency and the airways travel over it. Therefore, it is almost essential to pass through my constituency when travelling from east to west in this country. The Assiniboine River, a very famous waterway in the early days of transportation, travels right next to the city of Portage la Prairie, which is the largest centre in my constituency and is the city in which I reside.

Strangely enough, when I first came to Ottawa because there was an "e" at the end of my name and my home town was Portage la Prairie, it was automatically concluded that I was of French extraction. My name, constituency and seat number were called out in French. In the early days the French did have a great deal to do with various parts of Manitoba. In fact, Portage la Prairie originated because people travelling by water in that part of the country had to portage the prairie from the Assiniboine River to Lake Manitoba.

To give you an idea of the cosmopolitan make-up of some areas of western Canada, my own constituency consists of 45 per cent British, 13 per cent French, 11 per cent German, 9 per cent Ukrainian, 7 per cent from other European countries and 4 per cent from the Netherlands. This illustrates how much Canada is populated by people from all over the world. As well there are two Indian reserves and 19 Hutterite colonies.

In this area we feel we are capable of looking after ourselves as well as others. In addition to many churches, hospitals, schools, etc., in the constituency of Portage there is the Manitoba School for Mental Retardates, the Manitoba Home for Boys, the Manitoba provincial women's jail, the Manitoba men's jail, the federal government penitentiary of Stoney Mountain and a residence for Indian students, as well as Indian schools. We are capable of looking after ourselves and are only too pleased to have the opportunity of looking after others.

Also very important to our area is a special crop sub-station, a subsidiary of the Morden Experimental Farm, which in the past year has received great praise for their work in establishing new crops. We are also blessed with the Delta water fowl area, one of the best hunting areas in western Canada, where the Delta water fowl research station is located. This was developed through the investment of Americans who vowed to replace every bird taken from our country. It has expanded into a tremendous operation which deals with the problems of raising wildlife and understanding their patterns. During the summer students from all over the United States visit this station to further their studies.

Whilst our climate may not appear attractive to everybody, it does afford a wonderful opportunity to participate in all types of sport, particularly hunting, and we were very proud of having had the opportunity to host part of the Pan-Am baseball games. The basic industry is agriculture, encompassing all kinds of cereal grains, sunflowers and other oil seeds, as well as vegetables and potatoes which are increasing by being sown. Commercial fishing and dairy products have also played a big part in the economy. The establishment of Campbell's Soup in the area has contributed greatly to the increased production of vegetables. Apart from agricultural products our manufacturing complement is very low. However, like many other areas across Canada we look forward to the new program for increasing employment and hope to obtain more industry, particularly of the type concerned with processing our products.

Mr. Speaker, some of the things that must be done to maintain the position of agriculture in our society are of great importance to the people of western Canada. An important one in my estimation is the establishment of a Canadian sales agency. In this regard I think we should seek the involvement of elevator companies who serve the farmers. They are well acquainted with the problems of agriculture and would welcome an opportunity to expand their facilities. In fact, I would suggest that as has been done by other countries, these people should be in a position to establish feed mills abroad which would provide an opportunity for feed grain to be sold in other countries. We should be in a position to provide flour mills so that people requiring flour will use our wheat. The success of some other countries in this venture is evident and I believe we have fallen far behind in efforts to promote our product. It is most essential that a much freer movement of feed grain across our country be established.

We have in our agricultural industry people who are producers, who are businessmen and who know business. They should have the opportunity of showing that this is what they are and they should have the opportunity to sell their products within our country. We have in the past few months been faced with the problem of increased beef prices. We have been criticized for letting beef prices go as high as they have. We have also been critized for beef prices not being high enough. The producer did not benefit nearly as much as one would expect from the prices that resulted.

I feel it is most important that we try to establish some means of stabilizing our meat products. It is not fair that the average producer should be afraid to market his product because tomorrow the price may be much higher. I often wonder what people in other countries around the world think when they want to place an order for Canadian beef. They might want to close an order for delivery three months from now; but what will the price be three months from now? It fluctuates to such an extent that I believe customers find it difficult to feel assured that they will obtain the quality of beef they require at a price they want to pay.

I have some complaints about the methods our beef producers have followed in the past in the raising of suitable cattle. When visiting fairs in my constituency I have seen cattle in the show rings which had so much fat that it was obvious that their producers would not get back the amount they had put in. I have talked to breeders about this and they agree that it is a problem. Only a small percentage of our population performs manual labour. We must remember that at one time the fat on beef was required by people performing manual labour; they needed it. If you follow present trends you will note the amount of fat that people want on their beef and realize that we are raising animals that are not practical.

The problems facing Canadian agriculture today are many and varied and I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you have heard them spoken of many times in the House. But do you realize that when comparing grain prices with production costs the farmer of 1937 was better off than the farmer of 1969? It is true, in my humble opinion, that we need better public relations between the agricultural industry and the rest of the people in our country, and possibly throughout the world. We see a product on the shelf and complain about its price. Do we really know what the producer has obtained for his product? Would you agree that the producer's 3 to 6 cents a dozen on grade A small eggs is reasonable, when you see the price of eggs in the market place?

People do not have the opportunity to understand the difference between what a producer is paid and what we pay for his product. I feel it is most important that people outside agriculture should have a better understanding of the problems facing the people in the industry. One of the current problems facing people in agriculture—and I hope we can relieve their worries—is that of delivery over-quotas for seed grain. Many farmers in western Canada do not have the opportunity to sell enough grain to pay their taxes, let alone meet their operating expenses. These farmers are very intelligent and know what they ought to sow. If they hope to sow a crop next year they will have to look for different kinds of seed. If they are not in a position to purchase it, the industry will be crippled. I hope the department sees fit to continue its present operation in this regard.

I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that all the people in western Canadian agriculture were happy to learn that the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) was given the opportunity to look after the Wheat Board. For too long has the Wheat Board operated under present regulations. It was established some 20 years ago and operated under regulations that were practical then. It is apparent that the regulations the Board works under now are far from satisfactory. Although the people in agriculture are facing hardships, I believe their present troubles will be a distinct advantage. I say that for this reason: never before have so many people been concerned about agricultural problems. I know that this is a difficult way for the people in the industry to get their story across to the rest of the country and to make other people concerned enough so that they will help in the solution of agricultural problems.

The Canadian Grains Council, which was organized last year for the purpose of studying and making recommendations on agricultural problems is, I believe, one vehicle that we shall use to overcome our problems. At its first organizational meeting, 35 different organizations attended, with over 100 people. These people are directly involved in various segments of agriculture.

May I read a couple of paragraphs from a speech by R. C. Brown, vice-president of United Grain Growers Limited, about the Canada Grains Council. He said:

By the very nature of its membership, the Canada Grains Council will have a primary need to adequately communicate within its own ranks and with the public at large. I have been tremendously disturbed by how little Canadians know about the mechanics and economic importance of grain sales. Of all people, grain producers are most in need of information. Comparatively few of them are aware of the separate and distinct roles of Government, the Board of Grain Commissioners, the Canadian Wheat Board and the Agents of the Board in the marketing process.

The need for greatly improved communication however, goes far beyond the forum of the Council and the Canadian public. In the eyes of the customers, actual and potential, the world over, the Canadian grain industry must develop and maintain an image that is bright and attractive. Whatever part price may play in developing market opportunities, quality of product and goodwill must go with it hand in hand. To this end the best communication will be none too good.

That speech refers to my earlier point concerning communication. The problems and benefits of our agriculture must be made known not only to our own people, but to all the world. Moneys spent on research by the federal government in the past have been well spent. It is important that we establish better qualities and grades. It is important that we keep up with the rest of the world, but what have we spent on market research? The answer is 1 per cent. What is the sense of growing or producing something without knowing what our markets will be? It is absolutely ridiculous that people in the agricultural industry should continue to produce, produce and produce without the slightest idea of how, where or if their produce will be sold. It is a distinct responsibility of this government to carry out a complete market research job for the people in the agricultural industry.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear.

Mr. Cobbe: The people in our agricultural industry are capable of producing and they are capable of diversification. They have proved this. But what guidelines do they have? How do they know what to diversify to? How are we to know the potential markets around the world? Are we to keep on producing wheat until it is running out of our ears, as it is now, or are we supposed to give these people some type of guideline? There are people in areas adapted to the growing of barley but the producers cannot afford to grow barley. They do not know how much, if any, barley will be used next year or if they will have the opportunity to sell. This is only one of many varieties of crops that people are capable of producing in abundance. When I refer to these areas, I am talking about producing economically.

The cost-price squeeze has always been a term used when talking about agriculture, but the problem has multplied because people are not producing what they are best suited to produce in their areas. These people should be allowed to produce what they can best produce and in the cheapest way so they have an opportunity to stay in the agricultural industry.

If we do not study the problem and come up with an answer, all other segments of agriculture will suffer from our over-abundance of wheat. People will automatically change to raising beef, pork, fowl and feed grain. What will this do to people already in the industry? There is a tremendous possibility even in the oilseed industry that their total market will be destroyed if we do not come up with a control production, if you want to call it that—control to the extent of how we are able to market.

In my area we have the FRED program. This is a cost-sharing program between the federal and provincial governments. I am very impressed with the amount of money that the federal government has chosen to put into this area in order to increase the productivity and standard of living of these people. The program is partially financed by the federal government with the complete organization and project planning of people in our provincial government, but with the understanding that people in the area will be consulted about what they believe are the best programs. I am disturbed that this is not taking place. I am concerned about cost-sharing programs which the federal government enters into without having some say in how the money is to be spent. There are area boards set up in this area, but it appears they are only for the purpose of keeping the people in the area happy. They make recommendations but very seldom are they listened to. To my knowledge these recommendations are never put into effect. I am concerned about this problem. I feel that if we enter into cost-sharing programs in the future we must have a little more say in exactly what takes place.

I have found that many people in my constituency are concerned about the student loans situation. I am happy to see there is now a bill on the order paper dealing with this subject. The problem they are faced with and which I think deserves some (study) is that there should be consideration given to the number of students that parents have attending universities. At the present time income is the main factor, and income will go only so far when you have three or four children attending university. I hope this question will be considered in the proposed amendments to the act.

In closing my remarks I wish to extend an invitation to all members of the House of Commons—I say this on behalf of all members from the province of Manitoba—to visit our province in the year 1970, our centennial year. This will be one of the biggest celebrations in the history of the province of Manitoba. Extensive plans are being made to host people from across Canada. Many, many events will be taking place and I will make it my duty, as I am sure all other members from the province will make it their duty, to see that you receive a complete calendar of events.

Mr. Dinsdale: We will form a special committee.

Mr. Cobbe: As the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) stated, we will form a special committee. I might say that the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) spends a considerable amount of time in the province of Manitoba. I am sure for the sole purpose of enjoying our centennial year in 1970 and will, and he will be promoting this program. On behalf of all members from Manitoba, please make a special effort to visit us in that province during our centennial year.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in a remark made by one of my colleagues indicating that he had listened to and participated in 39 Speeches from the Throne. While I have not been involved to that extent, I have been involved in enough Throne Speeches to notice a great change taking place in our deliberations under the guise of a Throne Speech. When I first came to this House new members were expected to give a travelogue of their riding. I think this was a worth-while purpose because it gave new members the opportunity of making their maiden speech. It was to the advantage of the member and to those who listened to him.

For example, when speaking of my riding I pointed out that we had a number of agricultural problems and I listed them. I made a remark which was factually correct but not really representative; I stated that in my area we produce an amount of cheese equal to the total Canadian export of cheese. Some people assumed that meant we produced all the cheese that was exported. This was not true, because we did not export any; however, we did produce that amount. This was a surprising fact to many members who had been here for years and did not know there was a large agricultural industry in Timiskaming; in fact, one of the best agricultural industries in Ontario.

In the last few days, Mr. Speaker, we have been listening to a different type of speech. The Throne Speech is changing. The Throne Speech probably started to change when the speech was read in the other place. It is a formality. It started with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), followed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Both these hon. gentlemen referred not only to what was contained in the Speech but also to their own aspirations. The Prime Minister, reading his speech, set a tone which has been followed by many of his hon. friends. This raises a question in my mind. I recall on past occasions being accused of wasting a lot of time during a number of other parliaments in order to accomplish a certain social end which was finally accomplished. People used to call attention to the number of dollars which were lost, as it were, during that filibuster. I was not much impressed, because it seemed to me that if we were not talking, somebody else would be doing so for a purpose which was less worthy. I am sure many hon. members feel the same way about the debate on the Address. However, we should look at this debate in terms of the possibility of modernization.

We have already made changes in the rules and in other parliamentary activities. I am impressed by the number of speakers who have mentioned the committees' changes we have made. They have called attention to the weakness, in fact to the failure, of the committees' system. But they would all agree we have at least examined the structure and been willing to do something about it.

Perhaps we should also take a look at the present procedure. Perhaps we would make it worse, but on the other hand we might make it better. At present it seems to be a hodgepodge. I should be delighted, Mr. Speaker, if you could have the opportunity to give us half an hour's dissertation setting out your impression of the debate, having been obliged to listen to a great deal of it. It has no continuity; it is not relevant to anything, even to the Speech from the Throne. It covers a multitude of subjects; it is sometimes amusing, sometimes heavy and sometimes really dull; and from your point of view, Mr. Speaker, it must seem very long indeed. As I say, I believe we should take another look at this whole procedure.

Originally it had a purpose in allowing new members to make their maiden speeches. I should like to comment on the last speech we heard. I presume it was a maiden speech and I should like to commend the hon. member who made it. It was probably not the best speech ever made in parliament but it certainly evidenced a great deal of sincerity. The hon. member knew what he was talking about, and his speech was his own. Earlier this afternoon we listened to the speech of another Liberal, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Murphy) who gave an address which I am sure was written by the Algoma Steel Corporation board of directors. He could not possibly believe all the tripe he read in that speech. It was like a breath of fresh air to hear the hon. member to whom I referred a few moments ago talk about things with which he was familiar and which he understood.

A few years ago, whenever an hon. member read his speech to the House I made a practice of rising—except, of course, in the case of a maiden speech—to draw the attention of Mr. Speaker to what was happening. I intend to begin doing so again, and Mr. Speaker will have to reach a decision whether to object to the practice of reading speeches or whether to object to my drawing his attention repeatedly to an infringement of our rules, as I intend to do at half-minute intervals if necessary.

It seems to me that in days when speeches are being written by the library staff, by executive secretaries and by outside writers, members of parliament are listening less and less to hon. members to whom they appear to be listening; they are, in fact, listening to the reading of speeches which may have been written by God knows whom. As Your Honour knows, we have a rule which says that members must disclose the authorship of speeches which are read. If they are asked, they must disclose the name of whoever wrote them.

We also have a rule, a very loose rule and one which is not applied strictly in practice, that Mr. Speaker must insist that an hon. member should not read a speech—he may refer to very extensive notes but he should not read the speech in its entirety. I have no objection to an hon. member providing himself with assistance in the development of a speech upon a specific subject. In many cases it makes for a better and more informative speech. But I do object to his reading a speech which someone else has written. If this is to be allowed, why do we not simply make arrangements for such speeches to be tabled, as they are in the United States? A member of one of the legislative chambers there will get up and say: I made a speech in Oregon yesterday and I should like it included in the record. Another member might say: I attended a meeting of a Board of Trade two weeks ago and I should like the speech I made at that time to be included in the record. Indeed, a congressman or a senator might even say: I have a friend who made a pretty good speech in Timbuktu, and I should like it to be included in the record of our proceedings. If this is what we want to do, if we wish merely to compile a record rather than a report of the opinions of members of parliament duly elected, we should establish some system different from the one we are now using.

Despite the opinion I have of certain individual members of this House, I believe that most of those elected to parliament are qualified to represent their constituents and that in most cases they are capable of making a contribution to our work. There are no tombstone candidates here. In fact, I have been very impressed by the calibre of the members who have taken part off-the-cuff in our committee proceedings. To make no bones about it, I have been impressed particularly by some of the backbench Liberals. I have not been so impressed by the way in which they vote, but I have been impressed by their ability while serving on committees. Anything less in the House is detrimental to the conception of democracy.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is the front bench Liberals who bother us.

Mr. Peters: They certainly bother us more than do some of the others. The other day the Prime Minister made a speech in this debate and he read every word of it. It was a lousy speech but it will look very well in print. In my opinion he could have crucified the Leader of the Opposition had he wished to do so, but he did not choose to because he was so impressed by the way the written word was likely to turn out. He did not take the opportunity to play politics, and I think we lost something.

Look around, Mr. Speaker. At this moment there is not a single minister present in the House. Parliament has got to a stage where it does not mean anything. There is one representative of the press in the gallery. He has been there most of the afternoon and if he writes everything he has heard he will not need to come back for a week. I know that the practice of giving speeches to the Press Gallery before they are delivered in the House results in many more press releases. But it does not impress me. It did not impress me in this case, because the Prime Minister was able to use about $130,000 worth of talent in the writing of that speech. If these men cannot do a good job, the right hon. gentleman can fire them and get another team. It is easy for all those people to write a good speech. As for myself, I am interested in what the Prime Minister thinks. I believe he has something to say. He expresses himself often, and he does it well. I like to see his gestures, because they are expressive of his feelings, as are the distinctive idioms he sometimes uses. In this case, as in others, much that is of value is lost when speeches are read.

I am sorry when an hon. member can see only one side of a question. This afternoon the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie was talking about a serious strike. He told us that 39 radicals were preventing approximately 4,000 people from going to work. Well, the plant in question covers between six and eight blocks; it has at least a dozen gates, probably six of which are in use. The hon. member tried to tell us that for every 100 workers there was one who stopped them, threatening them and their families with violence. He implied they were out smashing everyone's doors. All this was supposed to be the work of 39 men. Mr. Speaker, we do not need an army; we should just have a guerilla force. If the fact is that the Algoma Steel Corporation did write his speech, then he as a lawyer should be prepared to defend it and to see that something is done about a situation that should not be allowed to continue. If this be the fact, of course, then obviously anarchy must reign in that particular town.

I am not here to defend labour, but I am always interested in any charge that is made that a secret ballot at a union meeting should have been conducted. I have probably conducted more strike votes at union meetings than any member of this house. As president of a local, any time a member of the union took the floor to demand a secret ballot, I saw that a secret ballot was held. I am sure the same situation exists in every responsible union. If the majority of the membership want a secret ballot, then a secret ballot is held; if the majority do not, then the democratic process comes into operation.

I suggest that to raise the old bogey that the union must have the press in attendance and use disinterested parties to conduct votes is tantamount to my saying to the Rotarians that their membership should hold a secret ballot to decide whether or not they should hold a Christmas parade this year. Democracy just does not work this way. Union decisions must be made by the membership. As I say, if members of a union want a secret ballot, they have only to support the proposition. To give any other impression is to be dishonest.

This raises another problem that concerns the news media. Parliament seems to be becoming less important to the press every day, since the only part of our proceedings to be reported is the question period. The question period creates an odd situation from the point of view of the press. If a particular pressman has any initiative, he can write a speculative story, plant the seed of the story in the mind of a member of parliament and the member can lend it authenticity by putting the question in the house. Then the pressman need only write the story again to produce what almost becomes manufactured news. As soon as the question period is over the house is comparatively deserted.

This brings me to another point that bothers me. It is the change that has taken place in our news media during the last few months or so. I do not have much time to watch television except during a recess, but I do find television to be a tremendous waster of time. For example, both the CTV news and the CBC news seem to consist of a series of little dramatizations which deal with events from coast to coast and across the world. There does not seem to be too much follow-up. These dramatizations do not convey a concise message; rather they are a series of disconnected pictures. Although these pictures are very good and these little vignettes are interesting, what bothers me is that they really fail to deal with the subject under discussion.

Not long ago I watched two programs of topical interest, one dealing with Speed, the other totally divorced from that subject—a program about the heavy water plant in Nova Scotia. The program on Speed left me wondering, as I suspect it left everybody else wondering, why we have allowed some of our young people, for some reason that our sociologists cannot explain to us, to develop for themselves an escape mechanism of which the world has hitherto been ignorant. We all know about hard drugs like opium and heroin. Although opium dens have existed in China for centuries, I have yet to meet a Chinaman who was a real addict. The Chinese buy opium only when they have the money, and then they buy only what they can afford. Although they take a "trip" they are not addicts. They take it once and then leave it alone for the rest of the week.

Other people seem to be unable to do this, and perhaps it is a question of culture. Some people are looking at marijuana in terms of tobacco. Perhaps the tobacco industry is looking at it too, because it is fairly easy to grow. In fact, in some places it is almost a weed. It might be a good substitute for my colleague who does not like tobacco; he might be willing for us to grow marijuana.

Mr. Mather: You don't get lung cancer from it, either.

Mr. Peters: Yes, that is right. This little program that I viewed, and which I understand was seen by most Canadians, showed that we have not done too much experimentation in the matter of Speed. Speed is a drug that is used for staying awake. It helps people like truck drivers and students to concentrate on their work. It is injected into a vein. But according to the program, our hospitals do not know how to treat a person who may be dying of an overdose of Speed, and most hospitals are unable to control its effects. Although this program undoubtedly left about three million Canadians with an understanding of the problem of Speed, we as politicians are not in the least trying to solve that problem. The public is given the impression that Parliament is off in some never-never land, ignoring the problem.

The second program I saw, as I have said, was about the heavy water plant in Nova Scotia. I got the impression that there were a number of honest mistakes made when the plant was built. There was probably a crook involved somewhere, but other people were sincerely trying to find a solution to the problems of Nova Scotia. Unfortunately, they went into the matter with their eyes only half open and without having received proper advice. The people of that province have contributed $100 million toward this plant; yet it is estimated another $50 million is required to make it a success. The alternatives are not very encouraging. The province can give the plant away to somebody in the United States and hope that they can make it a success; they can try and complete the plant themselves, or they can sell it for scrap.

The members of this parliament will have to answer this audience of three million Canadians who saw the program. We will have to tell them that at Chalk River there is a group of people who are capable of deciding whether or not the plant at Glace Bay can be put into production. At the present time we are having to negotiate with Russia for the purchase of heavy water. Surely Canadians have an obligation to help maritimers get themselves out of a difficult position.

The CBC and other networks today are providing the people of Canada with an understanding of the problems facing the country, problems that we in parliament are not prepared to face. Unless we do face these problems the public will become very disillusioned. A few weeks ago I had an opportunity to attend a pseudo-political conference in Timmins held by the Ontario government. In a very broad sense it appeared to me—and I say this kindly—that it was some sort of leadership fight at a time when there was no leadership contest. It developed into a pretty good "beef" session for the people of northern Ontario. About 100 civil servants were in attendance along with many politicians and people from every walk of life. It was a very interesting and very lively three or four days. It will take some time to assess how much wheat and how much chaff will result from this conference and others held in northern Ontario. It was very plain to anyone in attendance that the easiest way to be heard and to gain approval is to oppose Toronto and damn the Ontario government. This raises the other point I want to mention in the few minutes I have left.

• (5:50 p.m.)

We in Northern Ontario are in the same situation as everyone in the northern area of Canada beyond that affluent strip, even though it may be spasmodic in places. I have in mind areas where resources have been removed. In some cases they have been removed to the point that the resources are no longer available. I also have in mind areas where resources are still being developed but where very little processing is taking place. These areas stretch from Newfoundland to Vancouver Island. This is a vast area which in my opinion must be given consideration.

We have watched with interest the Area Development Agency and the Regional Development Incentive Agency which have tried to solve these problems. It was clear at the conference I attended in northern Ontario that governments will not solve these problems simply by making grants. Governments will have to do much more than that. In attendance at that conference were leaders from every municipality, from a great number of companies and from a substantial part of the mining industry. These people represented almost every interested group in Northern Ontario.

There was no suggestion that the federal or provincial government was not making money available for worth-while projects. The difficulty is that we do not know what is worth-while and we do not have people who know. I should like to make a suggestion. Today the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) pointed out that the people in Timmins are very happy because they are now going to have a concentrator plant. We are going to spend $6,500,000 in this regard. I am sure they will be happy, but only 20 or 30 people will be employed We are spending $6,500,000 to create employment for 20 or 30 people. Surely this is of only slight importance in view of the number of people who must be kept happy.

I should like to see the government carry out some research, as it should have done in Nova Scotia before it put in the heavy water plant. If we put in a copper rolling-mill at Kirkland Lake, it would be a huge success. We are drawing copper out of the Kidd Mine at Timmins, out of the McIntyre set-up and out of Texas Gulf. We are going down to Swastika to meet the train from Noranda. Noranda is rolling its copper in the city of Toronto. Surely there is no justification for keeping the rolling-mill in the city of Toronto.

A rolling-mill is a huge project which employs mainly hard-working people. This is not a highly technical operation but it is a source of great employment. Some consideration should be given to building government-sponsored plants of this kind. I should like to see several government sponsored plants built. Let me hasten to satisfy those who believe in free enterprise. I do not care whether the government runs these plants or not; I would be happy to let anyone run them who thought he could make a success of them. The government should decide what projects to sponsore in certain areas after looking at the area generally, rather than one town or community in isolation just because an industrial relations officer suggests there should be a plant there. Surely this is not an unrealistic idea.

The other day a sessional paper was tabled which indicated that only one plant has been established since the Regional Development Incentives Agency was created last August or June, I believe. The regulations were passed by order in council on August 6. Since October 20 there have been 131 applications. One has been rejected, and offers have been made in 13 cases. In only one case was the offer accepted.

In my opinion this raises a problem in respect of how much money one should put into this kind of operation. The company concerned was McCain Foods. Many of us had the opportunity of visiting that plant with the Agricultural Committee. It is a very modern and efficient operation. It produces potato chips and other frozen foods. It is so advanced and efficient that a computer is used to run the frozen food operation. This company is building a new plant which will cost $4,100,000. We are going to put up about 25 per cent of the approved capital cost, plus another $5,000 for each job increase. We are providing for 380 jobs at a cost of $5,000 each. In other words, we are going to put up about $2,800,000 out of a total company expenditure of $4,100,000. We will be paying about 70 per cent of the cost, but we will be providing 380 jobs. This is the kind of criteria most of us are interested in using.

In all fairness to the Development Incentives Agency I should point out that when I asked why this money was being provided to a company that was apparently in a position to handle its own development, it was pointed out that it was easier to provide jobs by creating this incentive because without it the company would move into the United States where the products would be sold exclusively in that country.

One of the things we must consider this session is the development of government plants in areas where slow growth is a chronic problem. We must use the expertise of the Department of Industry and other departments in assessing the feasibility of developing plants in various areas. If no one is available to take over these operations, the government will have to get into the field. I hope such a program can be undertaken this year because it will solve some of the problems that face people who live outside the very affluent, industrial growth areas of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock this sitting stands suspended until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to open my remarks this evening with a quotation from Mr. John Deutsch, principal of Queen's University. It reads as follows:

[English]

In a vast and empty land we Canadians have borrowed technology, know-how, skills and capital from others and have applied these to rich material resources to build a new modern country. It has been successful and much has been accomplished, but, the time has come for a greater contribution from ourselves... If we are to play a more mature and more effective role in building our own future we will have to devote substantially more effort and more resources to research and development.

[Translation]

My intervention tonight is meant to inform hon. members and the public at large about what Canada and particularly the federal government is doing. The latter is, by far, putting the largest effort into research and development, especially in the industrial sector. I would also tell or remind my hon. friends of some recent government decisions which clarify its policy. Do hon. members realize that for the year 1968-69, Canada has spent $962 million for scientific research and development?

The universities' contribution thereto amounted to $280 million, of which $109 million came from the federal treasury, and the industries' contribution to $347 million, including $80 million from the federal government. The cost of the work carried out in the government's own facilities came up to $312 million and various other agencies spent $23 million under that heading. Therefore, $514 millions were provided directly by Ottawa for research and development. I wish to say it again: $514 million out of a total of $962 million for the year 1968-69.

If one studies the progression of expenditures in Canada from 1964-65 to 1968-69, one realizes that they went from $561, to $677, to $765, to $898, to $962 million. The federal government's expenditures in that sector for the same period amounted to $277, $336, $368, $452 and $514 million.

This spending may not be sufficient considering the importance of the matter, but it is obvious that there is progress and marked progress.

I might also mention that during 1968-69 the federal government has provided $123 million for projects connected with scientific research, for instance, collection of scientific data, standardization, scholarships to students and researchers.

What are the federal government's objectives in the field of research and development? The first is to encourage university research in order to ensure that Canada will have adequate scientific personnel resources. The efforts in this field have been rewarding since I am told that in the university as well as in the government sectors we have at the present time a sufficient number of researchers. I am not saying qualitatively, as there is always room for improvement, but quantitatively. It is mainly in the industrial sector that progress is necessary.

So, the federal government gives assistance for the training of researchers by way of grants provided by the National Research Council and the Medical Research Council. It is worth noting that, lately, the idea of greater participation in projects carried out by researchers in various fields, is gaining ground. Not only is this idea in fashion, but it is also a worthwhile one.

I would like to mention three examples of this new trend. Memorial University in Newfoundland received $637,000 for the establishment of an ocean sciences centre; the University of Alberta received $400,000 for the construction of a temperature-controlled hothouse; while the University of Montreal was granted $915,000 for a nuclear physics accelerator.

Such is the first objective of our policy: to train researchers who are so badly needed for the economic development and especially the industrial development of our country.

The government also subsidizes research in its own establishments—that is "in-house", or "in housse" as our French cousins would surely say—to help those various departments to discharge their duties.

I could give several examples, but I will restrict myself to the current research carried out by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in order to learn more about our water ressources and to improve their management. For that purpose, as you may perhaps know, Parliament has approved an outlay of some $24 million for the construction of the Canada Centre for Inland Waters, a building situated in Burlington near Hamilton where specialized research on pollution is carried out.

The Departments of Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry as well as National Health and Welfare also carry out specialized research. Their work is not widely publicized and I for one would ask these researchers to try to keep the public better informed. I am aware that they know each other very well, but it would also be desirable to make the rest of the country more conscious of their efforts.

[English]

The third objective of the government, besides aid to universities and besides in-house research has to do with research done by Crown corporations or by direct funding when a particular objective is either too large to be undertaken by the private sector, or in the case of problems of national significance, when there are long-range implications and overriding reasons, social or economic, for the government to do so.

I might give just two examples of that. First, in the field of space research, our recent decision to support the Telesat telecommunications satellite. An allocation of $25 million has been made for the government's share of the Telesat development in its initial stage. Virtually all the costs, by the way, will be contracted to industry.

Another example has to do with the protection of our northern environment. As you know, we are all becoming more aware of the sensitive nature of the northern terrain. A decision has been taken to conduct a study of possible destructive influences on the northern environment including forests, tundra and permafrost.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has allocated some $3 million for research in various fields to four universities, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Laval and British Columbia, over a ten year period. This is of course only part of the research going on in the Canadian north. I could go on giving examples of federal activity in the field of scientific research and industrial development. Let's have a few more. Through the National Research Council the federal government provides a technical information service. It also provides an industrial engineering advisory service of particular importance to small companies in the less industrialized regions of the country.

It provides support too, in concert with the provinces, for provincial research foundations and councils which perform research and development on a contract basis for small and medium sized companies which cannot afford to have laboratories on their own premises. Five provinces benefit, in varying degrees I must say, from this federal help. One that has benefited most is the Nova Scotia Research Foundation which has been largely financed by the federal government.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I come to the federal government role in assisting industry. Of course, this is of particular importance to me as Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Everyone is familiar with the names of the research and development programs of my Department. Their names give a good indication of the content of the programs. There is the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act, referred to as IRDIA. In other agencies, there is the Industrial Research Assistance program, also known as IRAP, and the Defence Industrial Research program. There is the Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology, referred to as PAIT. There is the Defence Industry Productivity Program, known as DIP. All of these programs, whether they come under my department, the NRC, the Industrial Research Board or the Defence Research Board, made a contribution of $45.2 million last year to research and development in Canadian industry.

This year that amount could reach $72 million. This is a very important contribution to the industrial growth of our country. Some hon. members may ask: What do the public get in return? I wish I had plenty of time to give many examples, Mr. Speaker. Here are a few.

R.C.A. Victor was assisted in part by the PAIT program in successfully developing satellite earth stations for the international market. Sales of the earth stations to date amount to some $21 million, and the total market for such equipment over the next decade is estimated at $450 million. A new device for scanning oilwell log data and translating it into a form suitable for computer processing has been developed under the same PAIT program. It is anticipated by the company concerned, Riley's Reproduction Limited, that the market will amount to $10 million in the first five years, with a substantial part of it being in export business.

Most people have heard about the PT6 series of gas turbine engines. This popular engine, developed by United Aircraft of Canada Ltd. with DIP support, is used in 45 aircraft manufactured throughout the western world. Sales of this engine have reached a total of $153 million. With the potential future sales this total is expected to reach $600 million. I could continue to give success stories in all parts of Canada. There is one in British Columbia. Gluham Products Ltd. was assisted, by PAIT, in developing a new high-speed glue laminating machine which reduces drying time from 16 hours to 30 minutes. A new $500,000 capital facility is now in successful operation. Many of the glued laminated beams used for the construction of the Canadian Pavilion at Osaka were produced on this machine.

Huntec Ltd. of Toronto—I saw their exhibit recently in Tehran at the Asian Fair—have developed a new mineral prospecting system, again with PAIT assistance. The resultig instrument offers both performance and economic advantages over competitive products. A large part of the sales are expected to be in the export market. The point I am making is that these incentives have contributed substantially to the growth of technology the growth of innovation in Canadian industry. I hope I made my case.

I said I would also refer to a number of recent decisions of the government having to do with research and development. I should first mention the formation of the Department of Communications. This department has a communications research centre which has $10.4 million to spend in 1968-69. I have already reminded the House of the Telesat communications satellite, and I have said that an allocation of $25 million has been made by the government as its share of Telesat's development in its initial stage.

As important is the fact that the government, notwithstanding its efforts to limit expenditures, has authorized that for the coming year, 1970-71, the funds allocated for direct assistance to industry in my department can be increased by 10 per cent. This is with a view to achieving a better balance in the expenditures of the government in the three sectors of the economy, namely, industry, government and university. Our three research and development incentive programs, IRDIA, PAIT and DIP, will contribute some $72.8 million to the estimates for 1970-71 as compared with the latest estimate for this year's expenditure of $54.5 million, a figure to which I have already referred.

As a further indication of the activity in research and development I should mention that the government programs I have named coming under my department and other agencies are being reviewed, and some of them will be changed. One of them, the PAIT program, is going to be broadened, in terms of the wider coverage of the innovation process that will be permitted under the proposed amendments. I shall have something more to say about this in a few days. Attention is being given by the department and the minister to rationalization and specialization, especially in Canadian subsidiaries of American firms. We ask the "parents" to better integrate their Canadian operations within their international or North American complex. I have said that what we expect from them is not mini-plants; we want specialized sections, part of the total structure of these international companies.

We try also to encourage more research and development in smaller, generally Canadian companies. We also promote a more active relationship between university and industry. The general impression that I am trying to give is that we as a government and as a department, are becoming much more practical in allocating money for scientific research than we have been in the past. I am not trying to minimize the importance of pure science; I am just trying to boast the importance of applied science. There is no doubt that in a country like ours with limited financial and human resources, realism is of the essence in matters of scientific research of both government and industry. When I say this I am in very good company, and in this connection I would like to quote Mr. Anthony Wedgewood Benn, the British Minister of Technology.

> We have come to the end of those days when any project, sufficiently big and spectacular, could almost automatically expect to win approval and the funds needed. The lobbyists for glamorous programs of scientific research will in future have to prove their merit against the claims of others seeking to solve more mundane but more pressing problems.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I could quote many other people on the same theme. The Fifth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada, for example, says:

> It is the innovation process—beginning when management decides to move from research and development into engineering and all the succeeding stages—which bring new products, processes and services into use, and contributes to growth.

There seems to be a fairly general mood in Canada in favour of practicalism that I believe is reflected in the direction taken by the federal government's scientific research and development policies.

The third point I would like to touch on very lightly, Mr. Speaker, is the public administration aspect of the question of research and development. Senator Lamontagne has said, "We cannot simply promote and stimulate change in science and technology. We must organize it." Of course, I agree with him entirely.

Here again, major changes are taking place in terms of trying to build up the best means of co-ordinating our efforts. As you know, the science secretariat was established in the Privy Council office to advise the cabinet on science policy matters and to assist the administration in the co-ordination of scientific activities within the government. Subsequently the Science Council was formed as an outside advisory group for the purpose of providing immediate and long-range advice to the government.

Further changes have recently taken place. For instance, the director of the science secretariat has been appointed chief science adviser to the cabinet. The Privy Council Committee on Scientific and Industrial Research has become a standing committee of cabinet which sits weekly and reviews all important new proposals and undertakes major assessments of existing programs.

The question of whether we have the best administrative system for our scientific efforts is often asked. What we really have now, Mr. Speaker, is a combination of decentralization and centralization. We have decentralization in the sense that initiative is left most of the time in the hands of the individual departments and agencies concerned. For example, research on meteorology is initiated by the Department of Transport, who should know best what is needed. At the same time, a certain amount of centralization is obviously necessary. This is why I have mentioned the recently created co-ordination media, for example the appointment of a chief science adviser to the cabinet and the fact that we now have a standing committee of cabinet on scientific matters.

But do we have the best system? I do not know. Different countries have different systems. In England they have a Minister of Technology whose authority has been further expanded recently and now controls virtually all scientific and industrial activities. The United States has a very complex system which could be described as a combination of a decentralized system, such as we have, with co-ordination provided in the office of the President through a scientific adviser. Actually their system is not very different from ours.

It seems to me that the need for a certain centralization and a certain decentralization can be defended. We have here again the possibility of using the old Canadian compromise. I repeat, it is for each country to find its own solutions and the way best suited to administering its scientific research and development having regard to a special internal condition. This is what we are attempting to do in Canada, but we will certainly benefit from the coming reports on the study of the Canadian situation made by OECD and the special committee of the Senate led by Senator Lamontagne. I am awaiting these reports with anxious curiosity.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I have given a fair account of the efforts of the government to improve its research and development policy, to develop proper programs for industrial research and development and to provide the organizational framework necessary for the efficient implementation of these policies.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to extend to you my respects and best wishes as we enter this new session of the 28th Parliament. I believe the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply performed their task exceptionally well and I should like to congratulate both hon. members.

I think it is also conventional to congratulate hon. members of this House who since the last sitting have received promotion in their public careers. I offer my best wishes to those of my colleagues on both sides of the House who have been promoted. In particular I think we should congratulate the two new Ministers without Portfolio who in my opinion will serve their country well. Their qualifications are so compelling that to have them in his cabinet the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), a very frugal man, has been willing to make his cabinet the largest in Canadian history.

Mr. Speaker, during this debate we have heard some very attractive speeches from the members of the government. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and the Prime Minister spoke with a sense of great concern; both verbalized about compassion and understanding among men in public life. It is obvious that Rule 75c has at least given the government the security to indulge in higher aspirations than those of last session. As we all know, our last session was strikingly marked by the petulant, authoritative language of bullies.

The Prime Minister and the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply made very good speeches. Nevertheless, their remarks boiled down to little more than humbug, pure hogwash. I feel that I speak for my colleagues on this side of the House when I say that their utterances do not in the least affect the substance of the Speech from the Throne. We all know that the Speech from the Throne is neither a promise of nor an immediate response to the problems of this country. All the flowery phrases of the Prime Minister and his ministers will not in the least alter that fact.

To underline my lack of confidence in the Speech from the Throne I should like to speak of the challenges and problems facing my province. The preamble to the Speech from the Throne was established in full by the Prime Minister during several of his speeches this summer at Liberal fund-raising dinners. In some ways these occasions have received national audiences. Liberal fund-raising dinners have now become the place where the Prime Minister exhibits his rare and Napoleonic courage.

In establishing his attitude toward the Atlantic provinces and other areas of inadequate economic development, the Prime Minister stated at the Liberal Federation of Canada in Montreal on October 19:

• (8:30 p.m.)

> And when we tackle the problem of Canadian unity from the economic point of view, the problem of having rich provinces, rich areas, help the poor, it is Jean Marchand who looks after that.

I can speak very well for my province. Regretfully, I say that in the matter of regional disparities this wonder boy of the Liberal party, this great saviour of eastern Canada wherein regional disparity is obvious, has paid lip service only to the solution of those serious problems facing the Atlantic region and the especially serious problems facing Newfoundland. In the Speech from the Throne we saw little reference to the terrible curse of regional disparity and the need to assist our fishing industry. Indeed, the Speech from the Throne made only the following reference to the fishing industry of eastern Canada:

> The competitive position of Canadian fisheries must also be strengthened, not only through new licensing and marketing arrangements, but also by extending Canada's exclusive fishing zones.

It is obvious that this government is incapable of grappling with the problems now facing the nation; that it has become completely indifferent to regional poverty and that we can expect nothing but lazy paternalism. I hope the House finds my comments provocative, because the province for which I speak, Newfoundland, desperately needs government help. Newfoundlanders want to become full and productive partners in our confederation. We do not ask for special status, but let the word go out tonight that we demand equal status.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carter: Before the Prime Minister charges another task force to go out and find what are the ills of the nation, I am sure that the needs of Canada's "have not" regions are well known to the government and that it knows about our problems and acknowledges the need for solutions to them. The poor people of this country, whether they are in my province or in the slums of Toronto or Hamilton, will say that the Prime Minister is being phony when he implies that the government does not know enough to obliterate their physical plight.

A few simple statistics, Mr. Speaker, argue the case for much more action for Newfoundland. We have now had Liberal governments for nearly a decade in Canada, and they have all committed themselves to developing the quality of life in my province. But I can inform the House that today we have in Newfoundland one doctor for every 1,590 people, while Canada's average ratio is one doctor for every 833 people.

Today a large percentage of our population earn less than $4,000 a year, which again is far below the national average. Newfoundland has the highest unemployment rate in Canada and less opportunity for our people. Indeed, our unemployment rate is more than one-third greater than the national average, and this rate is increasing. The government knows these facts and should be able to imagine the physical and spiritual consequences of this state of affairs for the people of Newfoundland and other "have not" provinces.

If the government is concerned about the inequities existing in the "have not" provinces, one cannot detect it in the Speech from the Throne. The Speech from the Throne seems to lay much greater emphasis on the need for constitutional reform and matters of that nature than on the gut, bread and butter issues facing our people today in the "have not" areas. I notice that in the Speech from the Throne our east coast fishing industry which affects, directly and indirectly, almost 20 per cent of my province's people and is of immense value to the economy of eastern Canada, warrants 26 words in a speech of 2,500 words. That indicates, I believe, this government's indifference to solving the problems facing the people of eastern Canada who happen to be engaged in the noble occupation of fishing. I make no apology for my province's dependence to a very large extent on the fishing industry. Our people have fished for generations, and I pray to God that the people of Newfoundland and eastern Canada will be permitted to pursue their occupation and be successful in it. In the light of the government's indifference toward this industry and toward the solution of the problems facing it, I entertain grave doubts on this score.

For example, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) was completely indifferent to the plight of those Newfoundland fishermen who prosecuted the Labrador fishery this summer. In a release on this matter on October 23 the minister in effect told these men to go on relief, to go on the dole. That was how the minister answered their plea for assistance. The fishermen who prosecuted the Labrador fishery this summer, at great expense and hazard, had failed. These men expose themselves for a long time to the hazards of the sea, and after toiling for several months they were unable to catch enough fish to keep the bodies and souls of their families together for the coming year. They appealed to the Minister of Fisheries for help. What did he say? He said, "We are very sorry. We realize you have problems; we realize you have worked hard for the past two or three months, but I am afraid that in the circumstances we can offer you nothing more than relief—the dole." That was an utter insult to the fishermen of my province.

I am sure I speak for all Newfoundlanders and all decent and reasonable Canadians when I say that these people are deserving a better treatment from their government. In his release of October 23 the minister said, "To keep your bodies and souls together and to keep you from starving, we have decided to give you the dole, to give you relief." What a magnanimous decision that was by the minister! I hope the Prime Minister is proud of his colleague.

We see all sorts of committees going across the country, spending money and making recommendations that are not accepted. I should like to mention one such committee. On a recent junket to the Atlantic provinces by members of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, 15 or 20 members and a number of clerks, secretaries and what-have-you left Ottawa on a chartered DC-9 and flew to Quebec City, Halifax and Fredericton to meet one person in each province. If this represents economy and austerity, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I do not understand those words. The committee went to Quebec City and met one person, the returning officer of that province.

The committee then went to Halifax where we met one person from that province, a former returning officer who has not been in the job for the past five years. From there we went to Fredericton where we met the returning officer, who was not quite familiar with the act. Having spent so much money which should have gone into the pockets of the fishermen, we returned to Ottawa with no more information than we had when we left. This is a crime against the Canadian people, and I am opposed to it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carter: Another example of "government by platitude" took place in the last few weeks in connection with the Minister of Fisheries' (Mr. Davis) so-called ban on the killing of whitecoat seals. I quote a well known journalist from Montreal who has appropriately entitled the article, "It was the Saving of Face for the Minister and not the Saving of Seals". This journalist reported that the ban on the killing of whitecoat seals announced by the Minister of Fisheries might well be a textbook example of power by public opinion.

What has angered the Newfoundland fishermen, and I am sure other fishermen from the Atlantic provinces whose livelihood will be affected by the ban, is that this government acted upon public sentiment which the minister knew was based on misinformation. The irony of the situation is that in the past three or four years a dozen or so veterinary specialists and representatives of animal welfare organizations from Europe and North America inspected the whitecoat hunt at close range and found it generally to be an acceptably humane and legitimate animal-harvesting operation. The government, at the expense of people who augment their incomes by this industry, is content to listen to the whims of the ladies of the SPCA and others and have taken action that will have an adverse effect on the sealing industry of eastern Canada.

I suggest that with the new regulation which requires sealers to shoot rather than club seals, it is quite possible there will be more dead human bodies on the ice than those of seals. It is not a matter of saving the seals, sir. With regard to the new regulation, I suggest a movement should be started to save the sealers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carter: The Minister of Fisheries, who has not one iota of knowledge about the sealing industry, should have spoken to people who have had occasion to spend 8, 10 and 12 hours on the ice. He would then know that to give sealers shotguns and rifles with which to shoot seals is tantamount to telling them to go out and shoot their fellow sealers. I hope the minister takes heed of what I am saying. I contend that if this regulation is imposed on the sealing industry there will be very serious accidents on the ice floes next season. This is a stupid, crazy and nonsensical regulation. I am sure most of us can get very emotional when we think of a big, burly six-foot sealer with a club killing whitecoats, but I prefer to see whitecoats killed than Newfoundland and east coast sealers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carter: The Minister of Fisheries has now become the darling of the international press; therefore, I ask him to reverse his stand on behalf of the baby whitecoats. We all love them. I ask the minister to give serious thought to the inhumane way in which scallops, clams, mussels, and other shellfish are scraped, gouged and torn from the bottom of the sea while they are still alive. I ask him to give serious thought to lobsters being plucked away from their nests and their loved ones at the bottom of the sea and being thrown alive into boiling water. I ask the minister to give very serious thought to that practice because my God, sir, what can be worse than being boiled alive? The poor lobster is plucked from his habitat and plunged into a pot of boiling water while it is still alive.

An hon. Member: Terrible!

Mr. Carter: Lobsters are dragged off in a semi-conscious state, their claws are torn off, their tails are removed and they are then eaten by these terrible people who have no consideration whatever for life.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Carter: If it were not so serious, Mr. Speaker, it would be laughable. The fact remains that regulations being imposed on the sealing industry are based upon the whims of a half dozen people who are more concerned with saving the whitecoats than they are with the slaughter that is going on in Biafra. I am the first to agree that we need conservation in the seal harvest, but we must realize that most Canadian and Norwegian shipping companies and seal hunters will continue to harvest seals in international waters simply because the minister has not been able or has not seen fit to reach an international agreement with respect to the seal hunt. The killing of whitecoats has been banned in a certain section but not far away they are being slaughtered by the Norwegian people. This is because the minister has not reached an agreement whereby this slaughter could be prevented.

In view of the regulation which the minister has imposed on the sealing industry, I seriously ask him to find some way to augment the income of fishermen whose incomes will be affected by the new regulation. I contend that the government should find alternative sources of income for the sealers affected by the new regulation. It is all very well for Lady so-and-so in England and Mr. so-and-so in New Brunswick to start a great outcry against the killing of whitecoats, but we must remember that a large segment of the population of eastern Canada depend upon that industy to augment their incomes and to keep body and soul together during the year.

While I am on the subject of fisheries I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Fisheries to the need for immediate action to establish a salt fish marketing board. As some hon. members may know, Newfoundland fishermen engaged in the salt fish industry continue to sell their fish under the open receipt system. This is a system which encourages exploitation and which would not be acceptable to any other producers in Canada or in North America today. In effect, what happens is that the Newfoundland fishermen cure their fish salt and ship them to exporters who in turn give them an open receipt without any commitment as to price. Then in the fall when the fish is exported, the fish merchants decide upon the amount the fishermen shall receive for their catches. This is the most terrible system one could imagine. It leaves the fishermen open to the worst kind of exploitation by the merchants, the majority of whom have been traditionally noted for their lack of charity and concern for anyone but themselves.

I strongly urge the minister to take the necessary steps to establish a salt fish marketing board in order that the fishermen of eastern Canada may experience a sense of security and know how much they will earn for their summer's toil. What Canadian today, working in industry, on a farm, in an office or with the civil service, would work for three and five months a year without any guarantee being given as to what he will earn? I do not think anyone would do it. I do not know why east coast fishermen should be expected to do it, either. It is most unfair, and the system does not lend itself to the prosecution of this important industry to the best advantage. As I have said, I believe the minister should take immediate steps to establish a salt fish marketing board.

In the light of what has happened this year, especially to the Labrador fishery, I believe it is time the government introduced catch failure insurance for the fishing industry. I feel the fishing economy of the Atlantic provinces needs a sense of security as well as a program which would motivate those engaged in it to prosecute the fisheries to best advantage. I believe the regulations prohibiting the killing of whitecoats and the culling of seals are harmful. I think they will have an adverse effect on the economy of the areas affected. I believe the regulations were passed after complaints from people who did not know what they were talking about. This is borne out by the fact that in recent years a number of scientists and representatives of associations interested in the protection of animals have visited the ice floes without finding anything to complain about in connection with the way seals were being killed. I beg the minister to give serious thought to setting up a salt fish marketing corporation to give our fishermen a sense of security and to create in them a motive for prosecuting this important industry in eastern Canada.

I now turn to housing. I notice that the minister responsible for housing is in the chamber this evening. I contend that the present housing crisis in Canada demands that the government adopt a bold, new approach in the area of housing and urban renewal. For Newfoundland and the other "have not" provinces the situation is compelling. At the present time nothing is being done to assist the average wage-earner in acquiring decent housing. The Speech from the Throne makes reference to the desirability of our citizens being housed in happy and pleasant surroundings. The government has again emphasized its desire to satisfy the needs of low-income families. But it is obvious to all of us that despite this pretence or interest no legislation is, in fact, promised to alleviate the serious housing problems which face Canadians today. In place of concrete proposals or legislation the minister responsible for housing has applied an urban renewal freeze. Instead of undertaking urban renewal schemes in my riding the government has done nothing but make promises and break them. I would mention one urban renewal scheme in my riding where people are not allowed to improve their properties or extend their homes to accommodate larger families because of the requirements of a grandiose plan which is being prepared by the federal government, the provincial government and the municipal government of St. John's.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Carter: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the other members of the House for allowing me to carry on. I think this matter is so important that it should be debated tonight. Many people are suffering in Canada, in my riding and no doubt in other ridings because of the freeze imposed on urban renewal schemes. In my province, 90 per cent of the wage-earners are earning less than $6,000. These people are too well off to avail themselves of direct government assistance for housing or to qualify for subsidized apartments, but they are not sufficiently well off as to qualify for a National Housing Act mortgage with which to buy or build a home. We all know that a person earning $6,000 a year cannot qualify for a full NHA mortgage. In effect, the vast majority of Newfoundlanders, and no doubt people in a similar position in other "have not" provinces, are left to their own resources.

These are the people who in a great many instances are condemned to raising their families in substandard conditions and substandard homes. Our housing policy at the moment is simply: share the wealth among the wealthy. In my opinion this is wrong.

The government's anti-inflationary measures are having a ruinous effect on the "have not" provinces, especially Newfoundland. While inflation is present to an alarming extent in such provinces as Ontario, in my province it is a foreign world.

The "have-not" provinces should not be forced to stall their development because of the prosperity of central Canada. I think someone once said that if one member of the family is sick, the other members should not be forced to take the same medicine.

In conclusion, I should like to enumerate certain facts about this government that is threatening Newfoundland's confidence in confederation. Since the government assumed office and introduced the just society and the end of regional disparity, we have seen the cancellation of the winter works program, the removal of the freeze on freight rates in the Atlantic provinces, the discontinuance of the salt rebate to our fishermen and the abandonment of our rail passenger service. With friends like this in Ottawa, Mr. Speaker, we do not need enemies. The government should assume the development of the Atlantic region not as a responsibility to be undertaken some day; it should regard the removal of embarrassing inequalities as an existing and great challenge within the mandate that this country has given it.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to congratulate the two hon. members who moved and seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I appreciate in particular the remarks of the mover. The only thing that concerns me is that he has not followed his own advice. I have not seen him in the house since he urged all other members to attend regularly. I also want to congratulate the new ministers on their appointments. I wish them every success. I would also take the opportunity of congratulating those defeated Liberal candidates on their appointments to other government positions. Since the adjournment in July I have thought particularly of one from my own home town, a deserving man who put a lot of effort into the cause and has been justly rewarded.

My remarks tonight will be about pollution, that particular kind of pollution that is muddying the minds of the youth of this country.

An hon. Member: You mean political pollution.

Mr. Yewchuk: Political pollution is right. I refer to the pollution of the mind by the use of drugs. Nothing specific was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne about this particular topic, but I think it is one of great importance at a time when a vast number of people are promoting the use of drugs such as marijuana, or "pot", Speed, hash and the rest. There has been an extremely active move afoot to convince young people that these are harmless drugs, that the non-medical use of these drugs only improves their minds and is not as harmful as tobacco or alcohol, which most of us enjoy from time to time. I have heard those who promote the use of marijuana say to adults, "You drink your booze and we'll smoke our pot. Why should you have your pleasure and deny us ours when we think ours is less harmful?"

I have with me tonight a little pamphlet that I obtained from the Committee to Legalize Marijuana. This proposition almost seems credible at first glance. According to this pamphlet the research that is outlined in the appendix has shown that the use of marijuana is not addictive; it does not lead to mental or physical deterioration or alter the basic personality structure; neither does it develop an acquired tolerance. The pamphlet does go on to say, however, that its use may result in minor psychological dependency; that it may result in reduced social productivity.

On the other hand, let me cite the statement made by the Alberta Medical Association that short-term or intermittent use of marijuana is unpredictable in effect. They say there have been many documented reactions, including depression, panic reaction, hallucinations and psychotic episodes of anti-motivational syndrome. A report of the John Howard Society indicates there is some evidence that its continued use for a long period of time can lead to lethargy, self-neglect and failure to look after one's own economic needs in society.

Those who are promoting the use of this drug tell you there is enough evidence to warrant approval of "pot" smoking; that fewer controls are necessary than with tobacco and alcohol. They go on to say that a large number of young people use the drug, knowing from evidence produced by research and from personal experience that it is harmless. I say "Bunk", Mr. Speaker. Not enough evidence has been produced through research. No research is available today to produce conclusive evidence that these are indeed the facts.

As a matter of fact, the evidence presented by the Alberta Medical Association indicates that scientific observation in western countries has not as yet been undertaken in a controlled and scientifically valid manner. Therefore, to contend that marijuana is harmless is absolutely unwarranted. There is definite evidence of its toxicity, and after careful perusal of much of the published evidence by the World Health Organization and other authorities it appears they are of the opinion that the long-term and chronic use of this drug does produce psychic dependence.

Another danger that should be mentioned is that users of "pot" never know what they are really getting when they buy it. They do not know for certain that the substance they are given really is marijuana, or whether it is laced with something entirely different and more dangerous. Often pushers of this drug are extremely anxious to switch users to something much more harmful, such as the hard drug. But in spite of the dangers that exist, it is estimated that about 300,000 young people in our high schools and colleges still succumb to the use of these substances.

In order to enable us to deal with this problem we must try to determine the cause of young people using this drug. Part of the reason may be the massive propaganda campaign now being waged in this country to the effect that it is harmless and good. But that is not the only reason. When talking with a couple of students, having always thought in my own mind that people who used these drugs tended to have emotional problems, I was surprised to hear them say, "No; I smoke it because I like it". This seems to be true, Mr. Speaker; a certain percentage of these individuals do smoke it because of the effect it produces. Users can experience euphoria, elation, hilarity, relaxation and passivity. In many cases they feel that in fact the drug makes them more sociable and socially aware. In many cases they feel that their sensory thresholds to sound and sight are sharpened and they can enjoy art and music with greater intensity. That is one group.

There is another group which involves individuals with emotional problems. This group falls into three broad categories. The first includes individuals who are experience-seekers; they are simply curious and want to give it a try; they want to experiment. Sometimes they are motivated to do this in order to rebel against their elders. Fortunately, this group is only a short-term use group.

The second group are oblivion seekers. These are the individuals with great emotional problems. They find that a drugged state of mind gives them a pleasant respite from all the strains and stresses that life around them produces. When discussing their reasons for using this drug they go into long harangues about all the injustices of our society and all the difficulties they have in trying to compete with present-day society. Often these individuals also show feelings of inadequacy and incompetency and use the drug simply to try to fill in the void that exists in their own minds about their abilities.

There is a third group called the personality-change seekers. This is the most badly affected group because of a basic personality disorder. They are trying to find an easy way to alter that disorder and they turn to drugs. They most commonly use a variety of drugs, always to no avail. They try combinations of stronger and stronger drugs, eventually winding up in a difficult position because their disappointment and frustration increases when they do not feel better.

A number of young drug users take drugs because of certain stresses that society places on them. It is becoming more and more common for young people to believe that they are expected to participate in sexual relations at a younger age than in the past. I think this is true. Society seems to expect our young people to do this. These young people often are not emotionally or physically prepared for this sort of experience and find themselves greatly disappointed after it. They then develop the idea in their minds that there is something wrong with them physically or that they are inadequate. Therefore, they try to find an easy solution to develop rapid sexual maturity. Of course, this is to no avail.

Some of them blame society for not inspiring them or sufficiently challenging them. Others recognize their own emptiness of character and their flaws and turn to drugs to change that. As I mentioned before, some individuals feel the use of drugs helps them to communicate. Studies of groups of users have been carried out. All that seems to happen is that the smokers describe to each other the feelings that they experience, but in the long run they find their loneliness and other feelings of emotional distress are not resolved. They nevertheless carry on because they receive gratification from the temporary illusion the drug produces.

At one time I had the privilege of living in Vancouver for a year. I have had close association with drug users of various types and I have had the opportunity to witness first-hand the terrible and ravaging destruction of personality incurred by the use of drugs. It is an accepted fact that a large proportion of people using heroin started out using "pot" and progressed to harder drugs in order to get more of the desired effect. There is evidence of this kind of cross-addiction occurring. Many of its users and promoters say that "pot" is less harmful than tobacco or alcohol. I should like to know how many people have progressed from the use of tobacco or alcohol to the use of heroin. I suggest there are not very many. It has been said that 30 per cent to 50 per cent of all young people in our country use "pot", so we should legalize it. There are those who say the penalties are too harsh, so we should legalize its use and bring about less incarceration. That is the kind of philosophy that suggests you throw the baby out with the bathwater.

I should like to reinforce this argument by again referring to the report from the John Howard Society which indicates the actual penalties imposed in Canada on the users of drugs, particularly marijuana. Marijuana, or "pot", is classified as a narcotic and it is an offence to be in possession of it. This is an indictable offence for which a person is liable to 7 years in prison. The fact is that trafficking in a narcotic, or possession for the purpose of trafficking is an offence for which a person is liable to life imprisonment. The importing of "pot" is an indictable offence which carries a minimum sentence of 7 years and possible life imprisonment.

Let me read the statistics as to what is actually being done by the judiciary of our country. In 1967 the disposition of 453 convictions for possession was as follows: there were 242 suspended sentences, 33 suspended sentences and probation supervision, 67 sentenced to under six months in jail, 61 to less than one year, three only sentenced to three years or less than four years, and 47 not stated. In view of this I think the cry that many young people are being given long term prison sentences has no foundation. Only 3 out of 453 were incarcerated for three to four years.

Nevertheless, I am willing to concede that some of the penalties might be too harsh. This is an area at which we should look very seriously in order to bring the legislation more into line with the apparent seriousness of these crimes. I would suggest that less harsh legislation should be enacted, although the harsh legislation that exists is not being applied. Let me challenge those who promote the use and trafficking in "pot" on the basis that its use is not harmful. They do not really know what they are talking about because there is not sufficient evidence from any researcher to indicate without a doubt that its use is harmless in the long run. I conclude my remarks by leaving a message. I should like to associate another slogan with the just society. I say to the youth of Canada, get off the pot.

Mr. Philip G. Givens (York West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with all those who have congratulated the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. They did their job well. I listened with great interest to the views expressed by my good friend the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) and my friend the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) about the questionable value of speeches in this House. I happen to agree with them, but I also have the urge to get on the record. I will succumb to that urge as have other hon. members.

What I wish to place on the record was not contained in the Throne Speech but it deals with a matter I would have included in that Speech had I had anything to do with its preparation.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Our society today is experiencing accelerating change in a world of rapidly shrinking physical dimensions and exploding knowledge; a world of extraordinary technical achievements amidst disturbing social, political and human problems. In short, it is a world of paradox. The city is at the centre of this paradox. It is a symbol of economic success and a reflection of our inability to use this success to create an environment worthy of man's aspirations. It has brought large numbers of people into closer contact and interaction with each other; yet in spite of the extent and variety of this human interaction, the city is a lonely place for many people. Alienation and isolation appear to be more prevalent in today's urban society than in the largely rural society of earlier years.

In this earlier society much of the energy of people was absorbed in the task of feeding themselves. The city is the result of a large-scale emancipation from this task and growing opportunities for man to turn his efforts and ingenuity to producing a growing array of goods and services to satisfy not only his wants but also his whims. But in today's big cities undernourishment, deprivation and poverty still remain as large-scale problems in the midst of affluence. The modern city is also the result of the development and harnessing of vast new sources of energy which give man powers that would have been unimaginable to the people of earlier times; but this is also leading to rapidly escalating problems of pollution.

The paradox has so many dimensions; the beauty of art and museums barely removed from the ugliness and squalor of slums; the magic of music now so readily and widely available through new technology, surrounded by noise and din accentuated by other advances in technology; the growing opportunities which cities afford for constructive human endeavour, against a background of increasingly destructive crime, violence and delinquency; shorter hours of work and more leisure associated with a more hectic pace of life and frequently with the absorption of a great deal of time and effort in getting to work and back home; the advances in the healing arts in our cities and strain on human beings; the surge of new knowledge from our centres of learning, side by side with bewilderment about how to cope effectively with mounting urban problems.

Perhaps it is because the large city is such a recent phenomenon of civilization that we do not yet know how to cope effectively with the range of problems to which it is giving rise. But it is a phenomenon which is now posing urgent challenges that cannot be ignored. We still have lower densities and more options for alternative future growth patterns of our cities than is the case in some other countries. But our cities are growing with dramatic speed, faster than most cities in the United States and very much faster than those in almost any other industrially advanced nation in the world today.

It is true, of course, that cities, and even quite large cities, existed in the past; but because so much of the total effort of earlier societies had to be spent on the production of food, no ancient city or group of cities contain more than a small fraction of the total population, not even the voters that existed when the Canadian constitution, the British North America Act, was fashioned 100 years ago. Twentieth century technology has permitted the removal of limits. In their impact on urban development, these technological advances have been two-edged. On the one hand, they have facilitated an enormous increase in the productivity of farmers and have thereby permitted growing numbers of people to flow to the cities. So powerful have been these forces of technological advance, acting and interacting with many other forces making for growth and change, that they have introduced possibilities for the development of mammoth agglomerations of people into areas which we do not yet know how to describe. Somehow the term "city" no longer seems to be appropriate for some of the largest of these agglomerations. We have begun to talk about "metropolitan areas" or "conurbation", and in each year that passes there seems to be more certainty, and less speculation, that we are moving inexorably toward future patterns of nearly continuous urban areas hundreds of miles in length, linking many once separate cities together. This we now call a megolopolis.

It is especially difficult for many people to recognize the extent and swiftness of Canada's urban growth. Perhaps this is particularly true of people outside of Canada who look from afar at our huge land area and our relatively small total population; who see Canada as a land of large-scale agricultural activity and rich and widely spread natural resource production; who think of Canada in terms of the historical development of the fur trade, the fisheries, the forests and the open grain fields. These people envy from afar the clear brisk waters of innumerable lakes and rivers, the open sky and, above all, space. Even today when they read about Canada in their newspapers they are still likely to find a heavy concentration of attention on new resource and energy projects in remote locations, on tourist attractions and on other things that seem to make Canada a very different place from the urban environment in which they themselves live. Even many Canadians still think about Canada in some of these terms. It is true, of course, that we do have a vast natural heritage. But most Canadians now live in another and very different Canada, in crowded and congested cities, and most Canadians now work in other and very different industries and occupations, mainly in the service industries.

This transformation of Canada from a predominantly rural into a highly urbanized country has taken place within the twentieth century, within the living memory of many Canadians. Canada is now, in fact, one of the most highly urbanized countries in the world. Over the past two decades urban population has grown about half again as fast as that of the United States and at around twice the rate of growth experienced in many of the industrial countries of western Europe. A century ago only about one out of every five Canadians lived in a town or city. It was only about four decades ago that our urban population became larger than our rural population. Today almost three-quarters of our population is urban; and our rural population has actually declined over the past 10 or 15 years. By the end of this century it is estimated that nine out of every ten Canadians will live in an urban area.

Moreover, this growth or urban population has been particularly concentrated in the larger urban centres. Almost half of Canada's population today lives in centres of 100,000 population or more. Over recent years the population growth in these centres has been of the order of 350,000 per year. In other words, each year we have been adding the equivalent of a city of about the size of Calgary or two cities the size of metropolitan Victoria to the over-all population of our larger cities. Each year we have been adding a good deal more than a city the size of Halifax or of London, Ontario.

A large part of the growth of cities is, of course, accounted for by natural population increase; that is, the excess of births over deaths. For the smaller cities outside of larger urban agglomerations this, in fact, constitutes the main source of growth. For example, in the 1950's this was practically the only source of growth of cities of less than 30,000 population in Canada. But the growth of the large urban centres reflects net migration as well as natural population growth; migration from other countries as well as migration from rural areas, from villages and towns and even from other smaller cities. From 1951 to 1961 about half the growth of metropolitan areas with a population of over 100,000 was due to net inflows of people. The comparable figure for metropolitan Toronto in this period was 60 per cent.

In its Fourth Annual Review the Economic Council of Canada drew special attention to the particularly rapid growth of Canada's three largest urban centres, Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. More than one out of every four Canadians lived in these three cities in the mid-1960's and the Council estimated that the relative growth in these centres would continue, so that by 1980 about one out of every three Canadians would be living in these three huge metropolitan areas.

As we enter the 1970s over 5 million people will be living in the metropolitan areas of Toronto and Montreal, that is, about one out of every four Canadians in these two centres alone. It is possible that by the year 2000, when Canada's population may have reached beyond the 35 million mark, nearly one-third of the country's total population could well be found in these two metropolitan areas. In other words, their combined populations could more than double over the next 30 years.

The dramatic scale of Canada's present degree of concentration of population in large urban agglomerations can also be illustrated by the size of metropolitan populations in relation to provincial populations. Today we have 17 metropolitan areas in Canada with populations that are greater than that of Prince Edward Island. Over the past five years Toronto and Montreal have each added about three times the population of Prince Edward Island. Montreal and Toronto are each larger than the four Atlantic provinces put together, and of the ten provinces only Ontario and Quebec have populations exceeding those of Montreal and Toronto.

In spite of the impressive growth of Canada's urban population, especially over the past few decades, there have been strikingly stable features of our cities in the longer run. Perhaps the most outstanding of these is that the broad form of any given city is surprisingly persistent. Bay and King Streets in Toronto, Ste. Catherine in Montreal, Portage and Main in Winnipeg, and Hastings in Vancouver have altered skylines. The nature of the business performed along such streets has changed in many ways, but they are still at the centre and the expanded metropolitan areas have grown out from these centres.

The interplay of economic and social forces has shifted people, organizations and activities from one area of the city to another. But the relatively high value of land and capital near the heart of the city at any point in time makes any large scale abandonment of the city centre virtually impossible. New needs, new technologies and restless human energies have imposed new structures on old locations.

Population pressures have far outgrown the original boundaries. The large metropolitan area of today is essentially an over-lay on the earlier city—in a sense a counterpart, but moving at a greatly accelerated pace—of the ancient cities and towns which were built layer upon layer on the actual physical remains of earlier settlements. The buildings of the modern city no longer crumble into dust; we tear them down and rebuild speedily on their old locations.

The sheer physical task of building our cities for the future is immense. Our larger cities will more than double by the year 2000. This implies that in addition to the replacement and rehabilitation of existing structures we will need to add in these cities about as large a volume of new structures as already now exist in them.

Another paradox about the city is that although it possesses certain stable features it has also become the dynamic frontier of growth and change. For Canadians, whose history has been dominated by the pushing back of land and natural resource frontiers across an immense continent, the concept of the city as a frontier is perhaps still so new as to be difficult to fully comprehend. Yet over the past two decades our cities have not only accounted for almost all of our population growth; they have accounted for a growing proportion of our total output and income.

Employment and output in our primary industries—agriculture, forestry, fishing and mining—have declined relatively and these industries now account for less than 10 per cent of total employment and output in Canada. The most rapidly growing edges in our economy are to be found in our cities. Here is where we are now pushing back new frontiers and moving into unsettled areas—not so much frontiers of territory as frontiers of technology.

Given our vast geography and our rich endowment of natural resources there will always be challenges in this country for those who would seek adventure on our physical frontiers, especially in the north. But the pioneers of today are to be found mainly on the frontiers of discovering, developing and making effective use of our human resources rather than our physical resources. It is in our cities, in which our human resources are so heavily concentrated, that the challenges are perhaps now the greatest; the challenges to the adventurous, the imaginative, the innovative, to seek new opportunities, to meet new needs and to cope with new problems.

As we look to the future it will be in our cities, and especially in our larger cities that most of the growth will take place. Many powerful forces are working in this direction—rising levels of education and skills, increased economies of scale and specialization, advancing technology and knowledge and growing relative demand for services. Moreover, the processes of increased concentration of economic activities and population in the larger urban centres have tended to become self-sustaining. In other words, one of the most potent effects of large urban agglomeration is that it is apparently everywhere tending to encourage still greater agglomeration. The city has always been the focal point for service activities; for commerce and distribution, for banking and finance, for government and education and medical services, for entertainment and cultural activities, for business and personal services. Thus the relative growth in these service industries has acted as a powerful spur to urban growth.

Over the past quarter century employment in the service industries in Canada has surged forward at a tremendous pace, from 40 per cent of all employment at the end of the second world war to about 60 per cent. Indeed, Canada has one of the most heavily service-oriented economies in the world today. Rapid growth and change in our large urban areas are raising rapidly escalating social, economic, political and technological problems. The Economic Council of Canada drew attention to some of these problems in its Fourth Annual Review in the following terms:

> —There has long been widespread concern about the mounting deficiencies of our cities and the heavy backlogs of essential improvements. Shortages and inadequacy of urban housing, traffic and transport problems, air and water pollution, the confused jumble of conflicting land uses, decaying neighbourhoods and monotonous suburbs, urban poverty and social disturbance, steadily rising property tax burdens and the frustrations of municipal administration—these are familiar problems to the average Canadian city dweller today.

Our capacities for dealing with these problems are being tested to the limit. They are posing difficult dilemmas for many of our institutions, not least for municipal governments which were not originally structured to serve such large, swiftly growing and dynamically changing organisms as our modern large cities. Local government structures, powers, administration and areas of jurisdiction need to be modernized to cope with new needs and problems. The complexity of these needs and problems demands a substantial broadening and upgrading in the quality of manpower resources available to such governments for planning and policy purposes.

The widening gap which has emerged between the responsibilities and the revenues of the larger cities must be narrowed either by shifting more responsibilities to higher levels of government or by shifting more financial resources to municipal governments. No matter how this is accomplished, it has become increasingly evident that the scale and importance of the activities of municipal governments must be taken more explicitly into account within a comprehensive fiscal planning framework covering all levels of government.

The latter can perhaps be most effectively done within the context of the revived and strengthened Tax Structure Committee which was discussed at last December's Federal-Provincial Conference of finance ministers and provincial treasurers. This committee, if its work is to be relevant to the real needs of our modern society, must not limit itself merely to federal-provincial tax issues; it must also encompass expenditure issues and explicitly take account of municipal as well as federal and provincial financial issues. In addition, while many of us might well have instinctive reservations about the creation of new institutions, I believe it has become increasingly clear that there is a serious gap in our existing institutional framework in the field of urban affairs—a vacuum that is not being properly filled by any existing institutional machinery.

Given the fact that our urban problems are now nation-wide problems, the time has arrived to consider seriously the establishment of some form of national council on urban affairs—perhaps along the lines proposed at the Federal-Provincial Conference in December, 1967—for the purposes of gathering and disseminating information in the urban field, undertaking needed analysis on a wide range of problems that are common to all of our major cities, focusing attention on the efficient provision of high quality local services that the people of today's cities demand and expect, and helping to lay a basis for much needed advances in our understanding of the urban frontier on which so many of us now live. I would also respectfully suggest that it is high time we established a parliamentary standing committee on environmental, housing and urban affairs. These two ideas I believe to be mutually compatible, consistent and complementary.

The problems of our large cities are no longer merely municipal or local problems. The Canadians whom our provincial and federal governments serve are now predominantly urban Canadians. The national goals of high employment, high growth, stable prices, viable international payments balance and the equitable distribution of rising incomes must now be primarily accomplished within our cities.

As our society has developed and changed it has become increasingly shaped by both the opportunities and the constraints of city life. In this process—especially when this process has been greatly speeded up and compressed, as has been the case in Canada—there are dangers that the new freedoms and wider choices, the cultural and social amenities which urban life can make possible, especially when they are accompanied by impressive advances in material wealth and income, may be undermined and frustrated by impersonal forces that have little regard to man as an individual. For example, the automobile in the large modern city is threatening to become man's master rather than his servant.

As we look to the future development of our cities there is, I believe, a need to put man more consciously and consistently into the centre of the picture. Cities should be for people, not the other way around. To the extent that cities are unique, the physical and environmental problems vary from city to city and the priorities of public and private action will also necessarily be different. But man is the raison d'être of cities and his problems are strikingly similar, city to city right across Canada.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent I move, seconded by Mr. Andras—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the minister to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Davis moved:

That notwithstanding section (4) of Standing Order 38, at 2 o'clock p.m., Friday, October 31, 1969, the question on any amendment or amendments to the motion for an Address in Reply to His Excellency's speech shall be put forthwith.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that this had been agreed to, but at the risk of stating the obvious I hope it is understood that after the vote is taken the debate resumes for the rest of the afternoon. I would not want anyone to think that when we vote, we go home.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to start by congratulating the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens) on his very enlightening remarks. As a member of the opposition and a backbencher occupying a seat almost directly opposite the hon. member, it has always amazed me that a man of his ability has been forgotten by his party for so long. He has my deep sympathy for the circumstances facing him and many other backbenchers in that party. I think the hon. member for York West made an excellent speech and I should like to commend him for his efforts.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, members in this House from the old sod back east, Newfoundland, the rock of the east coast, were paid the greatest compliment they have received since becoming part of Canada. I suppose in the general sense that we came to Ottawa with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), who is also from the rock—

Some hon. Members: He forgets it.

Mr. Lundrigan: Some people forget it and he forgets it, too. But I think we were paid the greatest compliment when he said we were working hard for the fishermen of Newfoundland by coming here demanding things for them. Although he criticized us for doing this, I think we should regard it as a compliment and be very proud of ourselves. An hon. member said a moment ago that the Minister of Transport forgets where he comes from. Perhaps this is a good thing for him because fish do smell and Newfoundland is not the most affluent part of Canada; as a matter of fact, it is the most backward part. If a person really wants to come to Ottawa and central Canada and "make it" in the affluence here and the affluence of the Liberal cabinet, you cannot blame him for disowning the old rock of eastern Canada that is being washed by the heavy seas of the Atlantic ocean.

In many ways it is a disadvantage to profess knowledge of an area so backward, but perhaps we should forgive and forget. Without being sarcastic, it was quite a disappointment yesterday to hear a member for Newfoundland, who was successful in the last election by the skin of his teeth, try to disown other members from that province because they were fighting so hard for the fishermen of Atlantic Canada. It was quite a joke, quite a laugh. He referred to us as the type of people who would have been looking for a subsidy for the rocks in the basket used by John Cabot. We would have been looking for a subsidy for the rocks and the fish at that time, because it was then that the discrimination began against the fishermen of Newfoundland, and it has been continued by many governments ever since.

I wonder if anyone has ever told the people of Canada the story about the fishermen of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and other places. The prices being paid to them today are basically the same prices that were paid 20 years ago. The fish you buy in the supermarket for 79 cents a pound is sold for 18 cents a pound in Newfoundland. Did anyone ever tell parliament that the fresh cod which people buy for 75 cents, 85 cents or $1 a pound is sold for three cents by Atlantic fishermen? We Newfoundland members are ashamed of this. We are supposed to be satisfied with the salt rebate of $300,000 out of $12 billion taken away from the fishermen of Atlantic Canada. We are supposed to be satisfied, too, with the amendment to the Fisheries Improvements Loans Act passed a few months ago. Eighteen loans have been made since that act was passed back in the 1950s, for a total of $23,000.

We are supposed to be satisfied because the Government of Canada purchased 7 million pounds of fish and sent it to Biafra. Did anybody tell the people of Canada how the fish was purchased and why it was so cheap? Has anyone told our people that the government of this country authorized merchants in Atlantic Canada to haggle with the fishermen and offer them the lowest possible price? The government, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) could then say that Canada is a benevolent nation because we sent fish to Biafra. The people of Newfoundland sent that fish to Biafra, and not the Government of Canada.

We have in Labrador about 1,863 fishermen. Of these, 263 are classified as floaters; they are people who go out in schooners and longliners and fish off Labrador. They salt cod on the boats. About 1,500 people are classified as livyers; they live on the Labrador coast, salt their fish ashore and go home in the fall. For the first time since John Cabot, these 1,800 fishermen failed completely. They had catches of 150 quintals of fish in previous years, and last year they had catches of 5 quintals. The fishermen of Newfoudland asked for some sort of disaster fund to be set up, but we are supposed to be satisfied with the dole, and with the welfare and Canada Assistance programs that come so benevolently from Ottawa. What did the Minister of Fisheries say to our fellow fisherment? He said, "Eat cake. Go on the dole."

We are supposed to be satisfied that the Minister of Transport, a Newfoundlander, represents us in the cabinet at the benevolent city of Ottawa. We Newfoundland members do not apologize for the efforts we make in this House on behalf of the people of Newfoundland. We do not apologize to the people of Toronto, central Canada or other parts of Canada for our efforts on behalf of the east coast people. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter) did not apologize for referring to the open receipt, under which our fishermen are paid once a year. How many hon. members would like to be paid once a year? I have heard that there are places in China where people are paid once a year. They are also doing that in Newfoundland with our fishermen. They fish all year and bring in their catches, and finally some benevolent merchant comes along and says, "I will give you 3 cents, or 5 cents, a pound for your fish."

We make no apologies for criticizing the way our country is going. Carpenters in Newfoundland are making $1.50 an hour and carpenters a few miles south of us get $7.50. Where is the justice in that? Our cost of living is the highest in the country. Surely hon. members know that in St. John's we have the highest cost of living in Canada. Our food costs are 6 per cent above those of other, major Canadian cities. For meat, poultry and dairy products we pay as much as 33 per cent more than the pay in Halifax which is only a gunshot away, to use an old Newfoundland expression. We pay $300 or $400 more for a car because it costs about $200 to transport a car to Newfoundland. In this day when we are sending men to the moon and when the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) is to launch a multi-million dollar satellite, many of our people do not have even a telephone. Many of our young people drop out before they reach high school. Many of them will live their lives in one of the great nations of the world and will hardly know how to read or write. It was estimated in 1966 that only 27 per cent of our young children who start in kindergarten will eventually finish grade 11. So I make no apologies for pleading for my province.

We have the greatest fishing resources of any country in the world. Last year, off the Hamilton international banks where our Labrador fishermen failed, one billion pounds of fish was taken by foreign vessels. There was a ratio of 80 to 1 as between the catches of Russian, Norwegian, Portuguese and Spanish boats and our own. But here in Canada we sit on our bottoms while other nations rape our resources. We have great mineral resources and a great people. Even the people of British Columbia are living in comparative affluence at this time. How long must our people stand by before this government is willing to recognize what is happening on our east coast?

Since I wish to continue my remarks another day, may I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

POLLUTION—CANCELLATION OF FORESTRY RESEARCH BRANCH PROJECT

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the question I raised earlier today concerns a very laudable project started by the Forestry Department in 1967. Its objectives were to find alternatives to the present toxic and poisonous insecticidal control of pests. The possibility of using non-toxic plant extracts which mimic the action of insect hormones was to be investigated. In other words, pest control by methods other than chemical sprays was to be researched. In the context of present proposals to ban the use of DDT and other chemical sprays, this was and is an urgent and timely effort.

One of the scientists selected to do the work on insect hormones was Dr. A. Mansingh, who was then employed with the United States Army Laboratories in Massachusetts. Dr. Mansingh was a native of India who had originally come to Canada and wanted to return here. He accepted an appointment from the Public Service Commission early in 1967 as a research chemist in insect physiology. He is apparently well qualified in his field and had two other excellent offers in Canada at that time, which he turned down. He did so in order to come back and engage in what he thought was an important national project.

Dr. Mansingh worked in the systems biology group at Victoria, B.C. His research involved the screening of extracts of Canadian forest trees for hormone mimicking action, the studying of their biochemical effects on the growth, development, reproduction and survival of insects and the feasibility of their field application. This work was started in co-operation with Dr. V. Hach, the senior research chemist of the MacMillan Bloedel Limited research and development department, who provided extracts from the wood and bark of several types of forest trees. The insect hormone research project was transferred to Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, and Dr. Mansingh was scheduled to be transferred to Sault Ste. Marie on August 19 of this year.

Two hours before his departure for Sault Ste. Marie, Dr. Mansingh was informed by his associate director in Victoria that his position had become redundant, and he is being laid off effective November 19, 1969. The reason for this lay-off was outlined in a letter received by Dr. Mansingh dated August 19 which reads as follows:

> The severe budget restriction to the Public Service, which will hold our departmental budget for the fiscal year 1970-71 at the 1969-70 level, has resulted in the curtailment of certain research programs within our branch. The hormone program at the Insect Pathology Research Institute, Sault Ste. Marie, is one program that has been cancelled. Your transfer to Sault Ste. Marie was dependent on your assignment to this work. As a result of this decision to cancel the program, your position is now considered redundant. In keeping with ministerial instructions, this will confirm that your lay-off will take effect three months from today, i.e. November 19, 1969.

I am advised, Mr. Speaker, that the Professional Institute of the Public Service appealed unsuccessfully to the Treasury Board and that Dr. Mansingh presented a grievance under the Public Service Staff Relations Act which was also unsuccessful. Accepting the fact that the public service has been allowed to grow beyond reasonable proportions, surely some reason and moderation should be used in reducing it, and the factors involved made known to those who are laid off.

The following questions arise which I wish to pose to the minister. First, why was a project of this nature dropped at a time when it seemed to become very important? Second, what guidelines have been established for laying off employees as a result of budgetary restrictions? I am told that in spite of the promise made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) there have been no consultations with staff associations on the subject of layoffs. Third, is the job being considered the most important part of the layoff or is it the seniority of the man in the service? Four, is the government aware of the terribly low morale now existing in the public service, particularly in the professional field?

My fifth question is, since many people accept public service positions in preference to industrial and commercial positions only because of the security of tenure, how does the government hope to maintain an interested professional public service in the face of indiscriminate firings that are now taking place? Finally, if the insect pathology research has no value at this time or if Dr. Mansingh was incompetent, neither of which seems to be the case, I ask the minister to spell out exactly why the project was cancelled and this scientist laid off.

That outlines the grievance I have, Mr. Speaker. It may be the matter is not within the minister's knowledge. My intention this morning was merely to ask him to look into the matter. I hope the minister will now be able to at least satisfy these specific questions. If he can do anything to lay down the guidelines under which people are being fired, it will be very helpful to those in the public service.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) for giving me the opportunity to say a word about our priorities and the manner in which individual research programs are assessed. In the Forestry Service priorities for research are determined in close consultation with industry, with the provinces and with the universities. In this particular case the over-all program is administered, or certainly, priorities are determined, by a joint advisory board.

The hon. member asked several questions. He asked why the project had been dropped. The project had been in progress for some years inspired by Dr. Wellington, a much more senior gentleman who left the federal forest service last year and went to work for the University of Toronto. In other words, the project was leaderless. This was one of the main reasons it was dropped. It was dropped, also, because it was rated by this joint committee of representatives of industry and the other interests concerned as being at the bottom of a very long list.

In our economy moves involving capital expenditure we are reducing the effort by something of the order of 5 per cent only. We are not dropping every project. We are certainly not dropping any of the projects which were at the head of the list. The hon. member asked whether this was the most important project, or whether it had seniority. Essentially we were engaged in an assessment of projects and once this project was adjudged to be at the bottom of the list, substantially without direction, without guidance from the man who began it and guided it for a number of years, it was considered one of the least desirable.

The hon. member mentioned morale. The pay in the service today is comparable with the pay anywhere in industry. An individual who leaves the federal forest service today and goes to work in a university or in industry does suffer some dislocation. But there are plenty of opportunities for young Dr. Mansingh who was employed for the first time by the service in 1967 and whose job came to an end this summer. He will not be leaving the service until January 31. I understand he is very competent and that there are plenty of opportunities for him to obtain suitable employment elsewhere.

PENSIONS—RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, October 28, as reported in Hansard at page 160, I addressed a question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) as follows:

> Last Wednesday when I asked the Prime Minister a question about certain pensions, including the pensions of retired civil servants, he suggested to me that I should wait until I had seen the Speech from the Throne. Since there is nothing in the Speech from the Throne about pensions for retired civil servants, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether the government will soon be in a position to announce an increase in these pensions?

The reply of the President of the Treasury board was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I would hope that in the not-too-distant future it will be possible as a consequence of the progress in the general review to make a statement in respect of the pensions of superannuates.

There followed a supplementary question and a further answer which left us just about where we were. So here we are again tonight, the President of the Treasury Board and I, discussing one of our favourite subjects—one of mine in any case. I imagine that he and others probably feel like saying to me: Do we have to do this all over again? have we not had enough questions and late shows and debates and arguments about the pensions of retired civil servants? I wish there was no need to carry it on. I wish the matter could be settled. I wish these people could get their place in the just society and that we could turn to other matters. However, I am afraid it is true that if we did not keep up the battle for these people, they would soon be forgotten. So tonight I appeal again to the President of the Treasury Board in the calm and sober quiet of this adjournment period to give us an assurance that something will soon be done to increase the pensions of our federal superannuates, including all those who are covered by that term.

• (10:10 p.m.)

With the passing of time many of these people who believed that something would be done to improve their position have passed on. As a matter of fact, the rate of deaths among retired civil servants is about 1,500 a year. That means that 2,000 of them have died since the election in June, 1968, and 3,250 have died since May 8, 1967, the date when a report was tabled in parliament urging that something be done to increase their pensions forthwith. The minister knows what was in that report. He probably knows its contents every well now because he has told us a good many times that the matter is being studied.

May I put my appeal to him tonight in these terms. I know that sooner or later something is going to be done; this issue cannot be left unresolved forever. Indeed, I for one will not let it. Some day the question of dealing with these and other pensions by escalating them after retirement is going to be an accepted principle, something that is going to be put into general practice.

I confidently believe that one of the places where this practice will get started as far as the federal government is concerned is with its own retired employees. I am talking now about something more than just a 2 per cent cost of living bonus such as is added to the old age security pension and the Canadian Pension Plan benefit. I am talking about the basic principle of escalating pensions, a principle that we will have to adopt, I believe, across the board.

Because I believe that action is going to be taken some day—indeed, I believe that something may be done during this very session—why not take some interim action on behalf of these people now? To tell these people that they must wait until this grand review of social welfare and social security has taken place is condemning a few more hundred or so of them to die without seeing an increase.

Mr. Speaker, some kind of a plan for escalating pensions is going to come. I suspect that this plan will amount to more than just an ad hoc addition to the pensions that are being paid. I suspect that it will be a plan of escalation that will apply both to those who are now retired and to those who will be retiring in the years that lie ahead. If a plan of some sort is coming, why not give those who are retired now and who are in great need the benefit of it by an interim arrangement? Such an addition could provide an amount no more than the government might have in mind for the future, so that no paying back would be required. But surely in light of the fact that something is going to be done in the months or years that lie ahead, an interim arrangement for those now retired should be made right now.

There are many thousands of these people who feel their position very deeply and sorely. They see not only the cost of living going up and the value of their pensions decreasing; they see people who are retiring now, after doing the jobs that they did 20, 15 years ago or even more recently, retiring on much larger pensions than they receive. They see the much higher salaries that people are getting in those jobs today and they feel that the employer that they served is not being fair to them. I share their view. I express my complete confidence that the government is going to act on this question some day, that these pensions are going to be increased, but please, Mr. President of the Treasury Board, can we not take some interim action now in favour of those who are already retired?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to give an answer to the heartfelt plea of the hon. member who has to some degree both asked the question and provided himself with the answer. I think he is as aware, as I am, that there is an inequality and an inequity and that we all feel something should be done to remedy this situation. I think he is also well aware that the cause of this inequality and what has brought on this situation is that phenomenon known as inflation.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Perhaps a better method of curing the problem is to concentrate one's energies on calling a halt to inflation and putting a stop to future erosion, rather than merely trying to apply a bandage to an existing and what would continue to be a suppurating wound. As he knows, a number of us are doing our best to bring the problem of inflation under control. This calls for restraint and some sacrifice in every sector of our economy. I wish that his new associates who were proclaimed recently in Winnipeg were as enthusiastic about these restraints as perhaps some of the rest of us are.

Perhaps the best approach is to try and bring inflation under control before attempting to relieve or mitigate the symptoms and inequities that inflation brings about. It is difficult but it is one of the hard choices that those who are called upon to govern try to make. We must try to set priorities and determine what should be done first, recognizing that in each course an element of hardship and sacrifice is called for. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is fortunate in not being required to make these choices. Those who are in office do, and have done. We have set our principal target for the moment as the control or restraint of inflation. This does not mean that in the meantime energy, plans and analysis with a view to rectifying some of the injustices that inflation has brought about should not be adjusted either during the process of curing inflation or immediately following its halting.

I assured the hon. member the other day that many of these plans are going forward. I hope, like the hon. member, that we will be able to do something perhaps before we have been entirely successful in dealing with inflation as a whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister but his time has expired.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—CONTROL AND USE OF PESTICIDES

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, on October 29 last I posed a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) regarding pesticide pollutants. With your permission, I wish at this time to elaborate slightly on this question. During the past few months there has been considerable scientific data and information published on the harmful effects of certain pesticides for the purpose of alerting the public to just how toxic some pesticides are and how carelessly they have been used. Notwithstanding this, the pesticide market continues to boom.

For 25 years man has been concocting extravagant assortments of synthetic chemical poisons and distributing them all over the planet. We continue the wide use of pesticides to wage war on endless varieties of bacteria, insects and rodents which continue to plague us. There are certain tangible benefits which can be credited to pesticides, such as the control of malaria, typhus, cholera and other diseases, and there is no doubt that they have contributed to making life more comfortable and nuisance-free. But as the price of this we have been taking unto ourselves some not very calculated risks. It is now well known from evidence adduced that the use of some pesticides such as heptachlor, Aldrin, Toxaphene, DDT and many others has often produced unintended side effects on fish, wildlife and human health.

I refer to a brief submitted by Pollution Probe, an organization formed at the University of Toronto by students, staff and conservationists and presented to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). It refers mainly to the dangerous effects of DDT on wildlife and human life. The four major points from the brief would appear to confirm their opinion. These are the following: First, DDT upsets the organisms in the human ecosystem and threatens the survival of a vast number of species of wildlife. Second, DDT has been linked to behavioural disturbances and inhibitions of learning in humans and animals. Third, DDT has been positively correlated to the incidence of cancer, cirrhosis of the liver and hypertension in humans. Fourth, there are, I am advised, other acceptable alternative pesticides which are now available.

I therefore submit this is a most serious issue today. The public is concerned, I am concerned and the government should be concerned. I should like to know what steps the Department of National Health and Welfare will take to curtail or stringently regulate the sale and use of these harmful pesticides and thereby protect the health of the people of this country.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Deakon) I should like to say that the federal government is definitely concerned about the health and quality of life in our country and indeed in man's total environment. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) has taken, and continues to take, an active interest in the problem of pesticides referred to by the hon. member. In particular, the Department of National Health and Welfare has participated in a review of the pesticide problem undertaken by the Federal Interdepartmental Committee on Pesticides. Furthermore, the pesticide section of the Food and Drug Directorate has reviewed, and is reviewing on a continuing basis, the tolerance levels of pesticide residue in food.

May I assure the hon. member, by referring him to the recent statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that a government statement on pesticides will be made next week.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—PROPOSALS OF PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister could state the position of his government with regard to the accusation made by Russell Bell, director of research for the Canadian Labour Congress, who has made the charge that the Prices and Incomes Commission had no clearly formed ideas to place before the interested parties, that meaningful discussion in these circumstances became virtually impossible and that in these circumstances the leaders of the CLC and the Confederation of National Trade Unions had really no choice but to reject the voluntary guidelines?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will ensure that the commission takes note of this accusation.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, part of the concern of Mr. Bell appears to be in connection with the application of guidelines to other forms of income. Has the government satisfied itself that the proposals being placed before the private sector of the economy by the Prices and Incomes Commission do in fact involve equitable proposals relating to incomes generally? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the obvious importance to all of us of some system of voluntary restraints being adopted and in view of the obvious interest of the government in seeing that every possible chance of success is attained.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think there is some confusion in the mind of the Leader of the Opposition as to the role this commission is to perform. We have taken the position from the outset, and it has been made quite clear to parliament, that the commission has an independent operation of its own. It was set up by the government in order to deal with various sectors of the economy as it best saw fit. It has approached the government with certain representations. I understand we have had discussions with members of the commission on certain proposals for governmental action. We have indeed acted on some of them as we showed in the guidelines exercise last summer and since, but we are not second-guessing the commission.

I repeat what I said yesterday to the Leader of the Opposition. We have not asked the commission to report to us in any detail on what it is doing with either the unions or the management sector of the economy, nor do we think we should. If the Leader of the Opposition thinks that the terms of reference might be altered and that we should have the commission reporting every day to the government or to parliament, perhaps he could make a proposition, which I would be delighted to pursue.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is it the position of the government that it is appropriate for the government of Canada to delegate to an independent commission responsibility for decision-making in an area that has become of very central importance to the successful government of this country?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: I suggest that the question is argumentative, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact the terms of reference seem to contemplate a rather leisurely unhurried examination of the problem, will the Prime Minister consider discussing with the members of the commission their views as to possible changes in the terms of reference in order to give them an opportunity to point up the urgency, seriousness and gravity of the current problems?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that the commission senses the urgency of the problem, as does every member of the opposition. We are engaged in debating the Throne Speech, so let us hear from the opposition their ideas as to how the terms of reference of the commission should be altered.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PENAL REFORM—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): My question is directed to the Solicitor General. Is consideration being given to referring the royal commission report on penal reform to a committee of this House or a special joint committee of both Houses in order that the views of members may be conveyed to the government through a report to parliament?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I had anticipated that that report would be studied by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs when the estimates of the Solicitor Generals department were before the committee. However, I would be glad to take any other suggestion under consideration.

[Later:]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, in view of the Solicitor General's answer to my original question, could I ask the minister whether he would give very serious consideration to re-establishing the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons that was set up two years ago and which, in my estimation, did a wonderful job in studying all questions relating to the penitentiary and penal system?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to take that matter under consideration, but I must add that I was very favourably impressed with the work done by the new Standing Committee of the House on Justice and Legal Affairs during the last session of Parliament on matters coming under the responsibility of the department.

SENTENCES FOR OFFENCES INVOLVING DRUGS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I wish to ask a supplementary question dealing with criminal reform, Mr. Speaker. I direct the minister's attention to the Narcotic Control Act. In view of the fact that in Calgary, and the same thing is happening in other cities, seven young people ranging in ages from 16 to 21 yesterday received sentences totalling 29 years on charges involving marijuana, is it the policy of the government to instruct federal Crown prosecutors to press for sentences up to five years so that this group of young people so incarcerated may be used as a deterrent against the use of drugs in the universities and high schools, and is this not a misuse of the law?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members will recognize that it is quite impossible for anyone to accept the premises that were added to the question asked by the hon. member. I understand that this question was asked yesterday of the Minister of Justice, within whose jurisdiction the matter lies, and that he answered the question yesterday.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question, since the RCMP comes under the minister's jurisdiction. In light of the answer given by the minister, would he at an early date give a full report to the House on the pressing for these sentences imposed on seven young people in Calgary? Is it also the policy of the minister to instruct the RCMP to act as stoolpigeons, to grow beards and mix with students in order to obtain evidence?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, The question of sentencing is one for the courts. I do not propose to seek to instruct anyone as to what a particular sentence in the courts should be. The courts have responsibility for determining the law and making decisions based upon the law. I completely refute, of course, the suggestion that the RCMP act as stoolpigeons. I do not have personal knowledge of the seven cases referred to and the basis of the sentences, but I assume that the court had some reason for the sentences that were imposed.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. The minister denies that the RCMP act in this way, yet he has not taken the trouble to investigate the matter. I am not criticizing the Minister of Justice because his answers yesterday were sympathetic, but the Solicitor General should at least look into the facts before making dogmatic, categorical statements.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt very much whether this is a proper question of privilege.

VIOLENT DISTURBANCES

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AID

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence.

Has the Quebec government asked for co-operation or assistance from the federal government in view of the demonstrations now being held in Quebec and which threaten to destroy our democratic principles and throw us into anarchy?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, at ten o'clock this morning, when I left my office, we had not yet received from the Quebec government any official request for troops to help maintain law and order. I cannot say whether the Quebec government has any intention of asking for the help of the Army.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

Since all Canadians are also concerned about the difficulties Quebecers are now experiencing, does the Prime Minister intend, in his well-known spirit of co-operation and responsibility, to offer the services of his government to put an end to those acts of terrorism and to bring to reason those people who stir up innocent individuals like the students and young people?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think there is no question about that. Indeed, I have talked to the federal, provincial and municipal authorities in this connection. The federal government is ready to co-operate with those authorities, should they request it.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Could he tell the house if the laying off, yesterday, of 50 C.B.C. employees in Montreal is part of the government's political goals to check the inflationary trend by creating more unemployment or if this laying off is part of a policy designed to muzzle political opponents?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member for South Western Nova.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rephrase my question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question has been ruled out of order, and I now recognize the honourable member for South Western Nova. I shall recognize the hon. member later.

Mr. Valade: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member on a point or order.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, under the rules and the practice of the house, in the past when a member asked a question which was ruled out of order he has been allowed to rephrase it so that the minister may answer.

ATOMIC ENERGY

BRUCE NUCLEAR GENERATING PLANT—EFFECT OF FEDERAL SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since new federal safety regulations concerning the proximity of the construction of Ontario's Bruce nuclear generating plant to the federal atomic energy plant now mean a change in location for the Ontario site and the lay-off of many employees, has the government agreed to assist in meeting the cost of this shutdown and lay-off?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The decision of the Atomic Energy Control Board in this regard and the resultant change of site are matters which have only recently come to my attention, and no economic arrangements or arrangements in respect of the workmen affected by this decision have yet been made.

Mr. Comeau: Can the minister tell us when these regulations were passed and explain how it is that the facts were not known before construction began?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to rule that the supplementary is not in order.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reiterate my question to the Prime Minister about the firing of 50 employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation yesterday in Montreal.

Does the government policy aim at reducing the inflationary trend by causing unemployment in federal agencies?

I would also like to ask the Prime Minister whether that is a general policy concerning the C.B.C., which will apply to lower rank employees as well as to high officials of the Corporation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a very complicated question and I shall try to answer the part that concerns the federal government.

The C.B.C. budget has already been established, along with that of other government agencies and departments. In the case of the C.B.C. even more so than for the departments, it is up to the management to determine how the global policy of keeping in check growing expenses is to be implemented.

Mr. Valade: I wish to ask a supplementary question. Could the Prime Minister ask the Secretary of State to make a statement in this house as soon as possible concerning the global policy of the Corporation?

Mr. Trudeau: I cannot see that I should have to ask him to make such a statement, Mr. Speaker. The budgetary estimates will be tabled in the house at the proper time as usual, and the members will be able to ascertain whether we allocate too little or too much money to a department or to the C.B.C.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell us who will be responsible for the laying off of these 50 employees and upon which criteria it will be based?

Mr. Trudeau: We have there a Crown corporation, Mr. Speaker; it is really autonomous as regards its internal administration.

[Mr. Comeau.]

FISHERIES

OPERATIONS OF FOREIGN TRAWLERS

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he is aware that a fleet of East German trawlers is fishing inside our 12-mile limit off the coast of Cape Breton and, if so, what is the department doing about this?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a fleet of 15 large East German trawlers put into a bay on the east coast of Cape Breton island. They came in because of storm conditions. These trawlers were intercepted by our fisheries protection vessel, the Chebucto. They left early this morning and they are now outside our 12-mile zone. They had not been fishing in our exclusive fishing zone but they should not have been there in the first place.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister indicate whether in fact Russian ships and other foreign vessels are in fact fishing off our coast or whether they are involved in any activities which are of any importance to us?

Mr. Trudeau: They are fishing for something.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, most of the reports I personally get on these matters are classified secret.

PUBLIC SERVICE

METHOD OF REDUCTION OF PERSONNEL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether the government has had an opportunity to review its guidelines respecting the laying off of public servants under the current austerity drive, and in light of that review is the government now prepared to drop the guideline in respect of laying off persons who are between the ages of 60 and 65?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I hope to elaborate on this in about an hour's time.

GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—REQUEST FOR MORE BILINGUALISM

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

I have asked his predecessors several times in the past to put more emphasis on publications written in the French language and issued by his department. In view of the poor results so far, may I ask the minister whether or not he intends to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that publications issued by his department are published in French as well as in English.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest to the hon. member that this question should be on the order paper or discussed, if he so desires, at the time of adjournment.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONSOLIDATION OF BASES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he is in a position to tell the house at the present time when he expects to make a definitive statement, probably on motions, in respect of what defence bases the government contemplates being able to keep in operation in Canada?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate my hon. friend's concern about this matter and I am grateful that he has put his question in positive terms. What he wants to know, obviously, is how soon will I be able to announce the bases that will close. I must say that we have been working on this problem continuously, but until final details are known I will have to ask him to be content with the traditional "soon".

SUGGESTED REACTIVATION OF U.S.-CANADA JOINT MINISTERIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence what action the government is taking to implement one of the recommendations of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, its suggestion that it would be a good idea to reactivate the United States-Canada joint ministerial committee which has not met in five years?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe that this question would be more properly directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The arrangements concerning the two departments of defence have not precluded frequent meetings. Actually these meetings take place all the time, and so as far as my department is concerned the communication we have with those on the other side of the border is constant and frequent.

PHASING-OUT OF U.S. BASES IN CANADA

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the defensive Minister of National Defence whether he has had any negotiations with his United States counterpart regarding the phasing-out of United States bases in Canada, and whether he will make available to the House the results of such negotiations.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there were no negotiations as such. We were informed ahead of time of the announcement that was planned by the United States Secretary of Defence. There were no negotiations. I do not think we are in a position to negotiate a thing like that. The base at Argentia, to which I assume the hon. member was referring, was a naval operation for the United States. They have chosen to reduce it and there is nothing we can do about it.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask the minister whether in fact his department will be moving in respect of these bases so that the void created by the phasing-out will be filled in order to protect our own sovereignty and ease the economic imbalance in different parts of Canada?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I believe—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we are now at the stage of debate on this subject. Perhaps we might go on to another subject matter.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, we have just this week had announcements of two phase-outs of United States bases in Canada which affect thousands of people. I think this is a national emergency. We did not use Standing Order 26 to adjourn the House because we thought we would have time to pose these questions.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest we must make some headway during the question period. There is limited time. Many hon. members are waiting to ask questions. This is the reason the Chair must exercise some discretion in giving an opportunity to other members to join the fray and ask questions. If there should be sufficient time, I would certainly return to the hon. member to give him an opportunity to ask supplementary questions.

LABOUR RELATIONS

LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRESS TOWARD SETTLEMENT

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour, who I believe is in British Columbia in connection with the longshoremen's strike, may I direct this question to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister indicate whether any progress is being made in the negotiations leading to a settlement of this very important dispute?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I regret that at this time I am not in a position to make any report. The minister is with the parties. As usual he is optimistic, but there is nothing I can add at the moment.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour has any information to give us on the further progress of the negotiations.

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): No more than the Prime Minister has stated, Mr. Speaker.

OIL

TASK FORCE ON DEVELOPMENT—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On December 20 last the acting minister of that department announced the creation of a government task force to study oil development. Would the minister take an early opportunity on motions to give us a progress report on the work of that task force?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the task force is an interdepartmental task force of officials. It is not customary to make their reports to government public, but I will certainly consider the hon. member's suggestion. I might point out that during this period of negotiations with our friends in the United States with regard to oil policies a great number of the items under consideration are of a highly confidential nature and it would not be in the public interest to have a continuing public dialogue at this time. Certainly, however, I am fully aware of the hon. member's concern in this area and will consider his suggestion.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO TERMINATION OR CURTAILMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS TO WELFARE PROGRAMS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which perhaps I should direct to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance. Is the government planning to terminate or greatly curtail its financial contributions to welfare programs of the provinces?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

BROADCASTING

EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION—INQUIRY AS TO DROPPING OF DRAFT BILL

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the application of the CBC for the use of UHF channel 19 in Toronto for ETV broadcasting, will the government be dropping the draft bill of last session to set up a separate ETV service?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is my understanding that the Secretary of State intends to make a statement on motions on this subject some time next week. If I am wrong in this assumption, I will have to correct myself.

REQUEST FOR TAX REDUCTION IN LIGHT OF SURPLUS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: Surely the hon. member will admit that the question is so wide in scope as to make it impossible for the minister to answer it at this time.

ATOMIC ENERGY

SHORTAGE OF HEAVY WATER

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the government anything to report in respect of overtures made to Russia by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for a supply of heavy water?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I have nothing to report at the present time. The question of heavy water is an extremely important one in respect of our nuclear reactor program. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is assessing the possibilities of the various vendors of heavy water, including Russia, but there is nothing to report at the present time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CLOSING OF MISSIONS IN LATIN AMERICA

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he advise if the announced closing of three more Canadian missions in Latin America is an implementation of the Throne Speech forecast of "intensification of Canadian contact with the government and people of Latin America", or is it an exception to this proclaimed goal?

Mr. Speaker: I have to rule that the question is slightly argumentative in its context.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PLACING OF SERVICEMEN'S GROUP INSURANCE WITH U.S. ACQUIRED CANADIAN COMPANY

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware that the Maritime Life Assurance Company, which obtained the group life insurance coverage for the Canadian Armed Forces with a value of between $1 billion and $2 billion, has been acquired by the John Hancock Mutual Life Assurance Company of Boston, Massachusetts? Will the minister look into this matter and report to the House?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I would be pleased to look into the matter. I have heard such rumours.

Mr. Harding: Since the government is responsible for choosing this company, should not insurance coverage for the Canadian Armed Forces be transferred to a Canadian company?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not a question. It is an argument or a suggestion. The hon. member must assume it has been noted by the minister.

TRADE

NICKEL—REPRESENTATION BY U.K. CONCERNING SHORTAGE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the Canadian government received any official representation from the government of the United Kingdom with regard to the very grave shortage that has arisen in the supply of nickel for British industry, which represents a very major export for Canada, in light of the fact that they are now turning to Russian sources which are expanding their production in order to take care of the Canadian deficiency in regard to supply?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am not aware of any formal representation by the British government. I have seen very important articles in the British press where it is said strongly that importers resent being dependent on the whims of Canadians with regard to their nickel supply. I shall look into the possibility that there has been a formal note from the British government, but I doubt it very much.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the minister be prepared to report back to the House on this matter, particularly in respect of the impact of long-term strikes which would appear to jeopardize Canadian trade seriously?

Mr. Pepin: I might do that publicly in a speech because I am concerned about this as much as anybody in this chamber. These strikes in respect of copper, nickel and steel, have a direct negative effect on our exports at this time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STRIKING OFF STRENGTH OF BLACK WATCH—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister received communications asking him to reconsider his decision to strike off strength the only highland regiment in the Canadian army, the Black Watch, and has he made any further decision in this regard?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, obviously I received some representations concerning that decision which was, I might say, one of the most painful decisions I ever took. But the rationale that was applied with regard to three regiments of the active forces was that we were going back to the traditional position of three infantry regiments, and we chose the ones that had the longest active service—the Royal Canadian Regiment, the Royal 22nd and the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry. We have given assurances to the disbanded regiments that they will not disappear, and I am sure that in the case of the Black Watch in particular there is no problem on that score. They have a very famous reserve unit and I am sure their glorious name will remain in the annals of the Canadian Armed Forces.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I ask the minister again whether he would not reconsider retaining the kilt, as was promised me in the House of Commons when the unification bill was put before the House by the former Minister of National Defence?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, putting the Black Watch in reserve does not eliminate the kilt—far from it. We should not jump to conclusions. The same goes for the pipes. I think I should inform my hon. friend that I am very partial to the pipes and the kilt, so I can reassure him they will not disappear.

WHEAT

POLICY RESPECTING OVER-QUOTA DELIVERIES

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt, but in his absence perhaps it can be answered by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Now that the minister has announced in a press release a reversal in policy with regard to over-quota deliveries of wheat in exchange for flour for the producers' own use, is the government now prepared to advise the Wheat Board to restore over-quota deliveries in exchange for certified and registered seed?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I know about the first matter but not enough about the second. I will bring it to the attention of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board who will want to report, I am sure, at the first occasion.

[Mr. MacEwan.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHANGES IN CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC ESTABLISHMENTS—METHOD OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I admit it is based on the same press report to which reference was made by the hon. member for Hillsborough, but perhaps I might be a little more lucky in getting it accepted. In view of the statement which the Prime Minister made to me on Wednesday of this week that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be making a statement in the House as soon as he comes back from Victoria regarding changes in the arrangements with respect to our diplomatic posts, can the Prime Minister tell us why these sources keep giving out little reports, and whether or not we will soon get a complete statement on the whole picture?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would prefer to ask the hon. member why he keeps on believing in canards and leaks. When the official announcement is made it will be made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I will repeat what I said on Wednesday; he will make a statement when he comes back from Victoria where he is attending the Columbo Plan Conference. As the hon. member knows, he is the minister in charge of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Instead of making that kind of remark, will the Prime Minister find out how it is that the Department of External Affairs manages to get these reports out under the heading of "sources said"?

FISHERIES

CHUM SALMON—BANNING OF FISHING IN JOHNSTONE AND QUEEN CHARLOTTE STRAITS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact that, by prohibiting chum salmon fishing in Johnstone and Queen Charlotte Straits, the minister is responsible for desertion of the crews, possible bankruptcies, and unemployment without any assistance, can he now assure the house that alternative work or assistance is being provided for these men and women?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, this is no new problem. We have always had difficulties, particularly in years when runs of salmon were very low. We are authorizing a maximum take at sea, but we have to reserve a sufficient stock for future years. This is the problem we face at the moment.

HOUSING

BUILDING SOCIETIES—REQUEST FOR FAVOURABLE TAX TREATMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. In view of the tremendous success of building societies in alleviating housing shortages in Great Britain and in light of the announcement that the minister will be meeting with the trade minister of Ontario who has expressed the intention of seeking amendments to federal tax laws to facilitate the establishment of such societies here, will the minister give a clearcut assurance to the House that he will not allow this excellent proposal to be sacrificed to the detriment of Canadians, as is the continual demand for the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials? I ask this question because I understand that the government has the express intention of reaching a target of one million housing units in the next one and a half years, and the minister's answer would be of some help in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to suggest to the hon. member that his question is more a speech than a question and I do not think it can be allowed in this form.

[Later:]

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order. Apparently my question was declared out of order because of superfluous material added to the question. If it pleases Your Honour, I would appreciate it at this time if the minister would give some indication whether the request of the Ontario trade minister will be treated in a favourable light by the minister when the two ministers meet in the course of the next few days?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): A meeting between the trade minister of Ontario, officials of the treasury of Ontario, my colleague, the Minister of Finance, and myself is arranged for next Tuesday. Of course we will be very favourably disposed to any concrete recommendations that may be made by those gentlemen, and we will have a thorough exchange of views on the proposal to which the hon. member alluded as well as on many others. In concrete terms, we will be receptive to good suggestions without committing ourselves at this time to final acceptance or rejection in any particular terms.

Mr. Alexander: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Apparently the minister will be busy in the next few days. However, in view of the advice which he gave to the opposition that he will be making a statement with respect to the policy on urban renewal, I wonder if he can state now that within that statement he will be giving us some clear guidelines regarding the public housing situation?

Mr. Andras: I will include reference to the public housing guidelines in that statement when I make it.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): I wish to ask the minister whether the government has imposed a quota on maritime housing.

Mr. Andras: Not to my knowledge.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF THIRD VOLUME OF COMMISSION REPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister when we may expect the tabling of volume 3 of the report of the Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will inquire, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR RENEWAL OF STANDING COMMITTEE'S TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. May I ask if consideration is being given to a renewal at this session of the terms of reference of the Defence Committee inasmuch as pre-arranged meetings now being held can operate only on a non-official basis until the committee receives its terms of reference?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): I believe I need a few minutes to recover and really understand the question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that he has accepted to be honorary president of National Temperance Week and that such a gesture will enhance the event, could he take this opportunity to ask the responsible minister to review his policy concerning the fight against alcoholism in Canada?

[English]

PRIVILEGE

MR. SIMPSON—OMISSION OF ANSWER FROM "HANSARD"

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday I directed a question to the Secretary of State, followed by a supplementary question in answer to which the Secretary of State rose in his place and very clearly answered in the negative. My question of privilege is that for some reason or other I see that the minister's answer is not recorded in the official record. I thought that possibly on his return to the house he might wish to make some comments on this matter so that I and the people representing the Indian and Métis centres across Canada will know where we stand on the matter.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the part played by Premier Smallwood in the Prime Minister's election as leader of his party a few years ago, will the Prime Minister be showing his gratitude by going down to St. John's tomorrow to give poor old Joe a hand?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, might I be permitted to ask the Solicitor General, as acting house leader for the government, about the nature of the business of the House for next week. In particular, is the government giving any consideration to interrupting the Throne Speech temporarily to bring forward any measures it may have to deal with the current, urgent problem of inflation?

[Mr. Cadieux (Labelle).]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker. We propose to have the Throne Speech dealt with first. As the hon. member knows, there is full opportunity in that debate for hon. members to express their views on the subject of inflation.

Mr. Trudeau: If they have any.

Mr. McIlraith: The proposal for the business to be submitted to the House for consideration after the Throne Speech is concluded covers items Nos. 2, 8, 11, 19, 10, 4 and 5 on today's order paper, but not necessarily in that order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, or perhaps to get a point made clear. We passed a motion last night to the effect that the vote on the amendment now before the House be taken at two o'clock today. I wonder whether we can be informed if Standing Order No. 9 (2) applies or whether there could be an understanding in the House that the bells will ring for only 15 minutes for this vote. As we are calling the vote at two o'clock, I wonder if we could not have an understanding that the bells will start ringing at two o'clock and stop at 2.15.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ADDRESS DEBATE

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Jack Cullen for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session and the amendment of Mr. Nesbitt (p. 292).

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I will wait until the members leave the House, as they are now doing.

I wish to continue, Mr. Speaker, the debate and hopefully will begin where I left off yesterday, when I was referring to something which happened the day before. At that time we members from Newfoundland were given the greatest compliment of our political lives when we were criticized for working on behalf of the people of the east coast of Canada. I suppose not every member of this House shows the same concern or feels the same need to identify with the problems of people right across Canada. What we need in this House are 264 members who really care about the farmers of western Canada, who have a concern for the fishermen and the Indian peoples of our nation, the underprivileged, the under-educated, people in the slum areas, loggers, miners and the unemployed. Every time I see a member stand up in this chamber and indicate his concern for the people of this nation not in a position to help themselves, then I feel we are heading in the right direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lundrigan: In this nation we have something going for us that many nations of the world might envy, but we also have some of the greatest problems facing any nation in the western world.

In view of the roster system, I find it amazing that on one occasion there were only six ministers in the House instead of the 16 who were supposed to be here. This, in spite of the fact there are 28 or 30 ministers in the cabinet. That shows some concern for the people of this nation I must say, when six or seven ministers try to field questions thrown at them by members of the opposition.

I do not worry too much whether a member has a Ph.D., an M.A., or a B.A. or anything else as long as he is really concerned. Many people in Canada are disturbed—and I have to be a bit partisan here—about whether members of parliament feel deep down inside an identification with, and a concern for, the people of this country.

Does the Prime Minister really care? Montreal burns and he is at the National Arts Centre—

Mr. Pepin: Could I ask a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Lundrigan: Oh, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has had his show for today. For goodness sake, let the poor old member for Newfoundland continue.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Lundrigan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just want to ask whether the Prime Minister really cares when he is at the National Arts Centre watching the ballet—perhaps he is even doing a ballet—while in Montreal there is a riotous situation. Montreal burns and the Prime Minister "ballets".

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has not been in the House for a little while. Is he concerned about the hungry children in Canada? And the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) is he concerned about the fishermen of Fogo in Newfoundland who do not even have a wharf? I do not think he loses any sleep over that.

An hon. Member: Yes, he does.

Mr. Lundrigan: What about the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen)? Is he excited and concerned, right deep down in the gut, about the problems in Argentia and Churchill? Do you think he is really concerned about them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lundrigan: Now, let us have a look at the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). I wonder if he frets about the farmers who have retired and the pensioners who live on $109.25 a month? Is he really excited about them? I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is torn apart by the problems of the people in the Gaspé and of course the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) must be snowed under by concern for the snowed-under farmers of northern Alberta. I bet he cannot sleep at night thinking about them. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) must be all torn up over the problems of rural Canada. Has the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) lost any sleep over the plight of the Indians of the Lower Fraser who have to cut the dorsal fin off the salmon before they are allowed to sell it?

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) is not concerned about anything, so we will pass over him. But I bet the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) is worried about the static in CBC productions at Joe Batts Arm in Newfoundland. And I bet the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) sits there worrying about the seals off the Magdalen Islands, whilst the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) gets very excited over the state of homesteading in Vermilion. Is the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) worried about the sale of P.E.I. spuds to Maine or is he at the Liberal leadership convention in Newfoundland today? It is your guess.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on and talk about the other ministers, too, but I have not got the time.

We have sat in this parliament for over one year, and what have we done? We are supposed to be satisfied with what has happened and to bow down to the great gods of the Government of Canada. But what have we done? We spent a great deal of time talking about the Criminal Code amendments. As a result of six or seven weeks of activity in parliament, the homosexuals have it made in Canada. There are lots of red herrings in our path, and they are not all in Red China. We have talked about the language situation in this country and about re-organizing parliament. For almost half of last year, if I may exaggerate a little, we talked about re-organizing parliament. I have not been here for 20 years, as some others have been, but I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of the dullest places in which I have ever been. This place has gone to sleep. I think the Prime Minister has been more than successful. By the time another three years have passed we shall be able to write off parliament, because not even the press will want to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lundrigan: We have in Canada some of the gravest problems facing any nation. Do not talk about separatism in Quebec, Mr. Speaker. There is separatism everywhere in Canada. Even the Premier of Alberta went to British Columbia and talked about the possibility of the union of western Canada. Is there not a possibility that there will be a union of eastern Canada? Everyone in Newfoundland is not happy with the present state of affairs, either. Talk about separatism—we are being torn apart.

We may talk about religious problems, linguistic problems, or this and that. I say that the problems facing Canada are the same as the problems facing most other nations of the world. In my opinion, they are economic problems. I remember a few years ago, when the United States was dumping tractors here, there and everywhere under its foreign aid program, hearing some great world leader say, "Do not talk about ideology and democracy to the hungry peoples of India and Africa. Talk about bread and butter issues." I commend that philosophy to the House.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

We are supposed to be all excited about the just society which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) was to introduce to Atlantic Canada. I remember everyone being all excited when there was special consent in the House of Commons to extend the freight rate freeze. There was to be no debate; it was done by consent. The Minister of Transport, we were told, was a good fellow and everybody was supposed to be happy about what was done. Then, what happened? That same Minister of Transport announced early in September that as of September 23, I believe, the freight rate freeze was to be lifted, thereby increasing the cost of living of all who live in Atlantic Canada. This is what he did.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lundrigan: The Minister of Transport has talked about curing our national transportation problems. He said the government has to remove the bandaid. Well, he removed the bandaid and Atlantic Canada is bleeding to death.

A few years ago the Economic Council of Canada recommended in its Fourth Annual Review that national policies should not be applied uniformly across the nation because of the effect of such policies on slow growth areas. Last year many hon. members in the House reminded the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) that it would be dangerous to apply such policies right across the nation because slow growth areas would suffer. Right now the government has decided to put out the fires of inflation and make sure that everything comes to a standstill in Canada. These policies may benefit the people of Ottawa, Toronto or even Montreal; they may benefit many areas of Canada enjoying a good deal of affluence. But they will not benefit Atlantic Canada. The governments of our Atlantic provinces cannot borrow money left, right and centre. Business people do not like investing in Atlantic Canada. Why do I say that, Mr. Speaker? I am not an economist, but I know a little about psychology and I say that people will not invest money in areas where the return is small. They prefer to invest their money in Toronto and other areas of rapid growth. I say that every time we talk about putting out the fires of inflation and making adjustments on a national scale, we are discriminating against areas of slow growth. The Minister of Finance admitted that he has been responsible for increasing unemployment in Atlantic Canada. Right now, on the basis of a national average, 3.1 per cent of our people are unemployed. We have trouble in obtaining statistics for Newfoundland; but when statistics were available, as they were in August of this year, they showed that over 8 per cent of our people were unemployed. Mr. Speaker, in the middle of the summer 8 per cent of our people were unemployed!

An hon. Member: Last January the figure was 20 per cent.

Mr. Lundrigan: As an hon. member says, last January our unemployment rate was at over 20 per cent. The unemployment rate for the Atlantic region as a whole runs to over 5 per cent. What kind of country is this that permits such a situation? At the same time, we are getting rid of our post offices and seeing certain seasonal employees in our part of the country laid off. Apparently the Department of Forestry refuses to do certain things. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing), while all this is happening, has taken a holiday. Actually, I do not blame the minister, because I do not think he is responsible for his department's activities in this respect. But that is the kind of situation we face, Mr. Speaker.

Perhaps we all lack courage. Many problems face our nation and everyone in this House talks about those problems. Members of my party, members of the group to our left, members on the government side—even the Prime Minister—talk about the problems of our nation. At the same time, we do not seem to have the courage to do much about them. What really concerns me, what really raises my ire, is the way 1,800 Labrador fishermen, who failed in the fishery, were treated. Was it not a queen in Europe who told the people to eat cake when there was no bread? That is what the government said to our fishermen. It told them to eat cake, to go on the dole. Is this the just society?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lundrigan: I see that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) is not here, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that we have about half a million people in Newfoundland and only about 2 million people in the rest of Atlantic Canada, and many of them are leaving for the suburbs of Toronto and other cities. Perhaps they should all move out and create one large suburb somewhere. What bothers me is this: Will the government yield to the great power blocks of central Canada, to the pressures coming from the great population centres? Will it yield to political expendiency? Will it do what will please most voters, at the expense of Atlantic Canada? Will it make decisions that lead to political glory but that do us little good? I do not think the government has the courage to come to grips with the economic troubles facing our nation. This worries me.

I could continue in this vein all day, Mr. Speaker, but I will say this in conclusion. This government must show that it cares for its people. It must show it has deep understanding and some concern. I am not using big words, you will notice. "Care" is a small word, and so is "understanding". If the government does not have the courage to come to grips with Atlantic Canada's economic problems, it will be defeated. That is not very important, Mr. Speaker. The important thing is that if nothing is done our nation may fall apart.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, August 13, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke to the country about actions which the government was taking as a result of a comprehensive review of its expenditure and revenue patterns.

He pointed out that the review had disclosed, in particular, three compelling facts. First, almost without exception, this decade has been characterized by yearly budgetary deficits exceeding $4 billion in total and requiring upwards of $400 million per annum to service.

Second, despite a buoyant economy, increases in taxation and rapidly growing revenues, expenditures have shown a continuing tendency to outstrip revenues. Analysis shows that this phenomenon has resulted mainly from a rapid and larger than anticipated growth in certain large programs which the federal government shares with the provinces. Expenditures for such programs as hospital insurance, the Canada Assistance Plan, post-secondary education, and now Medicare, are projected to grow at a much more rapid rate than the increase in revenues at current tax rates. This means that unless taxes are to be increased further or savings are found elsewhere, the country will be faced with the situation of chronic and growing deficits in our public accounts.

Third, while new programs and activities are being introduced, old programs continue to grow with very little evidence that these were subjected to careful evaluation and scrutiny to see whether they are as relevant today as when they were introduced, or whether they have now served their purpose and should be eliminated or curtailed.

No government and no institution can afford to do at once all of the worth-while things that it would like to do and which it is requested to do. This means that governments must plan to ensure that, within the means available, those things are accomplished that are most urgent and most desirable.

Governments must ensure that their scarce resources are being applied to the most urgent and useful purposes. In light of this background, the government concluded that deficits could not be allowed to continue year in and year out and that, in current economic circumstances, the appropriate manner to remove the prospect of a deficit was by controlling assiduously the expenditure side of the budget.

Some high priority programs, including the shared-cost programs which I have mentioned, will require increased expenditure. But the majority of programs and activities cannot be allowed to increase in expenditure if we are to reach our budgetary objectives without an increase in taxation. The government, therefore, has set as its main guideline for preparation of the 1970-71 estimates the requirement that all programs and activities not referred to for specific treatment in other guidelines, would be frozen at current levels of expenditure.

What does this mean in clear, simple terms? This means that all cost increases, including salary increases, must be absorbed within the limits imposed by the dollar levels reflected in the 1969-70 estimates. This will necessitate painful reductions in operating budgets; the items for travel, advertising, use of consultants, supplies of all kinds and so forth. Far more important, it means a reduction in the size of the public service. Because salaries constitute the largest single item in operating budgets, departments will have to cut their work force in order to live within these dollar limits.

There has been a great deal of speculation about what this will mean, and prophets of gloom and doom have been raising the spectre of thousands of public servants being summarily dismissed from their jobs by a callous and unfeeling government. What are the facts?

Before the beginning of this fiscal year, the government reduced authorized levels in the public service by about 9,000 man-years. The government has since decided that, of the positions that were vacant at the end of July, more than 10,000 will not be filled. For the coming year, the expenditure ceilings resulting from our hold-the-line guideline will mean, as the Prime Minister stated, from 5,000 to 7,000 fewer people on the federal payroll than there were at the end of July. Taken together, these reductions add up to 25,000 jobs, or a 10 per cent decrease from the 1968 authorized size of the public service.

I hasten to emphasize that this does not mean that 25,000 employees will lose their jobs. Nor does it mean that even 5,000 will be laid off. Normal attrition through retirement, resignations and the like amount to about 10 per cent of the work force each year. This has greatly facilitated the adjustments required in the past year and will facilitate those that will have to take place in the coming months. There will be some lay-offs. This is so because the jobs which become vacant through attrition are not necessarily in those programs where reductions will have to be made and the skills required to fill these positions may not be those possessed, even with retraining, by employees in other programs affected by the guideline.

To give an example, if a doctor leaves the public service and is to be replaced, it would be impossible to fill his position by transferring an employee from a program in which there were some cut-backs unless that employee is a doctor. This task of matching surplus employees with vacancies occurring through attrition is one which the Treasury Board, the departments and the Public Service Commission are dealing with, and the completion of which is fundamental to determining how many employees and of what kind will be able to be re-assigned or relocated.

This process is now going forward and the number can only be determined as departments complete adjusting their programs to these guidelines. I might emphasize here that, while the numbers game captures headlines and provides a certain dramatic interest, our main concern is with the individual.

Given the fact that the expenditure guidelines would necessitate a reduction in the size and composition of the public service, and knowing that the effects of the guidelines would vary among departments and among occupational groups, the government announced its decision immediately it was taken in order that departments would have the maximum amount of time to plan adjustments in their programs; that individual employees would be made aware at the earliest possible date; and so that consultations with employee organizations could begin as soon as possible.

Within a few days after the government announcement in August, consultations began with employee organizations to discuss and develop personnel policies that the government should adopt with a view to, firstly, enabling departments and agencies to adjust their use of manpower to the new financial limits and government objectives and, secondly, to deal fairly with the employees directly affected and keep to a minimum the disruption of their employment in the public service.

These consultations took place over a period of several weeks. Many useful proposals were made by the employee organizations and were incorporated into the policies and procedures which are being applied to the handling of manpower adjustments. While it is perhaps to be expected that the employee organizations would have preferred a policy of no lay-offs, I think that it is correct to say that, in the circumstances, they would agree that the policies and procedures adopted go a long way toward dealing fairly and equitably with the employees affected.

I mention these consultations because there have been allegations that the government acted in a unilateral way in deciding upon and issuing these policies and procedures. This simply was not the case. Indeed, consultations are continuing with the employee representatives to monitor the results of implementing the procedures and to ensure that the most effective action is, in fact, being taken.

I think it would be well to elaborate the principal measures which have been adopted and which are beng implemented. Surplus employees are being given first consideration for re-assignment to jobs for which they are qualified as positions become vacant in their own or other departments. The Treasury Board has requested the Public Service Commission to take action to restrict or suspend hirings and promotions in affected occupational groups and levels, as required, to facilitate the re-assignment of surplus employees.

Departments having requirements for new employees must seek them first from among the surplus employees reported to the commission. Re-assignment will be made not only within a department or between departments in a particular location but, if need be, between departments at different locations, although re-assignments will be attempted in such a way as to keep to a minimum changes in employees' jobs, occupations, departments and locations. Relocation expenses will be paid to employees who have to move and departments have been advised how to deal with these situations in detail. I might mention that these arrangements were also arrived at following consultations with employee organizations.

Departments have been directed to identify surplus employees as soon as possible so that there will be maximum time to attempt re-assignment and give maximum notification to the employees affected. Employees will be given at least three months' notice that they are surplus to requirements, and in many cases it will be possible to give longer periods of notice. During this period, every effort will be made to find other jobs for the employees affected.

Departments are keeping employees informed of the progress being made in attempting their re-assignment. If re-assignment is not possible, any lay-offs which take place will be according to the merit principles which govern order of lay-offs and which are set out in the Public Service Employment regulations.

It has been alleged that the government was firing all employees age 60 and over. Nothing could be further from the truth. It did seem, however, to make sense for departments to review the situation in respect of employees in this group, having in mind that there could be less hardship occasioned by the retirement of such an employee than by the lay-off of another employee whose length of service or other circumstances might be less favourable. Departments have been advised to take all factors into account, as well as departmental operational requirements.

It should be clear from what I have said that we cannot yet determine in any precise way how many employees may be separated from the public service. Certainly, it is my sincere hope and expectation that the measures adopted will keep the number to a minimum. Nevertheless, I think we must proceed in the manner that we have begun, because not to do so would be to avoid our responsibility to the public at large for greater efficiency in government departments and agencies and higher productivity from each person on the government payroll.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit a question? In the light of the statement he has just made, can he say whether any employees who are 60 or over but not yet 65 have been given notice of separation? If none has yet been given such notice, are such notices contemplated, or has the review of this whole question softened the government's attitude with respect to public servants nearing the retiring age?

Mr. Drury: I hope I made it clear that a softening of attitude was not needed. The hon. member is aware, I think, that under the superannuation legislation public servants earn the right to a pension payable at the age of 60 or after. Those who are separated from the public service at 60 or over qualify for, and will receive, an immediate pension. Those who are separated from the public service earlier—and I myself am in that category—qualify for a pension payable only when they reach the age of 60. This means that a man separated before he reaches the age of 60 does not qualify for an immediate pension. Obviously, he would suffer greater hardship than the man who gets an immediate pension on separation.

The age 60 group was mentioned in the light of the fact that the immediate pension is payable in respect of these people whereas those who have not reached that age have the right to a deferred pension payable at the age of 60.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the government aware that with respect to any of these people who are 60 or 61 and who had expected to continue until the age of 65, their plans, their complete future, will be at stake? We are terribly aware of the difficulties facing retired civil servants. In view of the fact that a further problem could be created by retiring these people before they expect to be retired, may I express the hope that the government will continue to review these guidelines, especially the one respecting persons over 60?

Mr. Drury: We are fully aware of the consequences of the interruption of a man's career. The situation in this group, the failure to achieve expectations, is the same for those under the age of 60 as it is for those over 60. In this sense, both groups are in a similar situation. We do not assume that merely because a man has reached the age of 60 he has no further problems or that there are no further problems involved in connection with separation. This is not only understood, but I am sure it will be taken into consideration by heads of departments when designating those who are surplus to requirement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Two injustices do not add up to a just society.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Will the minister accept another short question? He referred to the relocation of employees in other departments of the civil service. I am wondering how this can be achieved. As I understand it, a freeze has been placed on the filling of vacancies in the service. If this is the case, how can these people be relocated?

Mr. Drury: The so-called freeze affects the engagement of new staff from outside the public service until such time as those who are within the public service, but for whom there is no requirement in their present occupation, are first considered. As I mentioned, attrition takes place at the rate of about 25,000 employees a year. In fact, some 25,000 people leave the public service each year because of death, retirement, resignation or dismissal. This means that daily there are vacancies occurring in the service. In the past, we have looked both within the public service and outside to fill these vacancies, but for the time being we shall be looking exclusively within the public service to fill these vacancies—looking at the list of employees who have been declared surplus to requirement in their present posts.

• (12:30 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I would like to associate myself with the congratulations that have been extended to the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) on their splendid addresses at the opening of this debate. I think there was a comment in Time magazine, just after the last election, to the effect that there was nothing that the Canadian people like to do more than to elect a conservative in the guise of a reformer. It is in the light of those remarks that I should like to review some of our progress to date, some of the anticipated progress we are going to make as outlined in the Speech from the Throne, and perhaps I should also say something about our lack of progress.

To begin, let me say that I think that remark in the magazine, to a large extent is wrong. We have been a reform government and have passed, and we anticipate passing, progressive legislation. Some of it will probably be the most progressive legislation that this nation has ever seen. We have changed some of the rules of this institution. Putting the emphasis on committee work has given far greater scope to individual members of parliament than they had before to do a more effective job.

We have also changed some aspects of the criminal law which were long overdue for change. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) are to be congratulated on the omnibus bill they presented to the house during the last session.

Some of the decisions that have been made have taken courage. The decision to exchange ambassadors with the Vatican took courage, though I personally do not agree with what was done. The introduction of the bilingualism bill took courage and shows that the government is capable of exercising courage when required to do so.

We have also moved toward a more suitable constitution for the country, another change long overdue. We all look forward to a new constitution within our time. We have a new, progressive Indian policy which will lift these people up and fit them into society to take the rightful position they so much deserve. We are also doing something about regional development. I note from the Speech from the Throne that the government is considering future policy in depth and hopes to meet the coming challenge of the post-industrial era.

After a little dynamite and shotgunning from the back benches, the government has made a declaration of Arctic sovereignty, probably the first nationalistic step that this country has taken in a number of years. So, taken all in all, I think that we have made good progress.

But if I were to give my speech a theme, I should like to say that I do not think we have moved either fast or far enough, and that I am not so sure that we are always moving in the right direction. We know we are living in a rapidly changing society, one that is changing in many ways. The hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens), in his splendid address last night, showed the house how we are changing to an urbanized society from a rural one.

We are also changing in our private lives. We are changing from the static authoritarianism of the past to the humanism of today. No longer will people permit their lives to be controlled by dogmatic and institutionally imposed ethical and moral concepts. The ethical and moral evaluations of modern western man are more and more becoming matters of individual choice, rather than the submissive acceptance of the dictates of religion and government.

Although there are good aspects about this change, there are also bad aspects. Where the good aspects lie are in the fact that man is freer to seek the free expression of his unique personality, the process that psychologists tell us is one of self-realization. The bad aspects result in permissiveness, escapism, alienation from purpose, lack of social responsibility, and refusal to sacrifice for the common good. These evils result in disrespect for authority and for the institutions it represents, of which parliament is one. People are impatient for change.

One bad aspect of humanism is that in many instances people have contempt for law and order and show violence in their expression of dissent. Another bad aspect of humanism is the nihilism and escapism which is symptomized by the common use of drugs in our society today. There is an undue emphasis on pornography and obscenity in the arts and cultural media. It seems that this results in a world in which everybody is out for themselves, and this reflects itself in many of our labour disputes where there is complete contempt for responsibility and the innocent victims of mass strikes.

Politicians at all levels of government must be aware of this changing scene. They must be aware of its good and of its evils. The real challenge that is facing us today as responsible politicians is to be able to recognize the nature of this changing world, to be able to see its true meaning and its essence. In drafting our laws and our legislative programs we must suit the society for which they are designed and provide good government.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that this takes a certain amount of political genius. A reformer in a static society has a relatively easy job to do. But in the volatile boiling pot of the western world, and particularly Canada which is cursed with historical fractionalism, with geographic, ethnic and religious differences and with a residual of authoritarianism, it is a very tough job.

There are one or two aspects of the Speech from the Throne that would lead me to believe that perhaps we have not seen this challenge to which I refer in its proper light. Mention is made of the unrest among our young people, with which we are all concerned. This is a symptom of the transition of which I have spoken. At page 2 of Hansard for October 23 appears this paragraph:

A disturbing element in many countries of the world has been the rising tide of unrest, particularly among young people. It has expressed itself in many ways, in public debate, in peaceful protest and sometimes in violence. Our profound disapproval of the excesses must not blind us to deeply felt and legitimate aspirations. Many citizens in our own country believe that they are entitled to assume greater responsibility for the destiny of our society. Such demands, in so far as they do not conflict with the general welfare, are the expression of a truly democratic ideal. They must be satisfied if our society is to attain its goals of peace and justice.

This is exactly what the activists have been saying. The expression "such demands, in so far as they do not conflict with the general welfare" indicates to me that the government is going to remain the final arbiter of what general welfare is. It is the "establishment" that determines what is general welfare. It appears to me that the inference there is that, unless the young people stay within the framework of those concepts that we have decided shall govern in the future, then reforms and activism are unacceptable.

I do not think this is the way we should look at reform. Neither do I think it is the way we should look at our changing society. After all, what have we done for our young people? Following those euphemistic words in the Speech from the Throne the only provision we made for them was the lowering of the voting age to 18. We must go much further than this, and not only in parliament; we must go further in our political processes. We must encourage our young people to join political parties. Although everyone says we do this, we must make sure we provide the structure that will allow them to voice their requirements. Through their vote they can influence government.

A young person who joins a political party today has a difficult time in getting his views adopted. If he is successful in getting a resolution passed, it is not binding on the government of the day, even if it is his own party that is in power. Modest steps have been taken in our caucus to correct this situation. We are looking forward to reforms that will at last permit elected representatives to have a say in government policy. But that is not enough. We should have our political processes structured from the grass roots to the East Block so these things are acceptable and understood.

[Mr. Hogarth.]

• (12:40 p.m.)

Another passage from the speech is most disconcerting. We have put some emphasis on reforms to the Criminal Law and these are long overdue. The speech outlines what we mean by this in the following sentences:

The size, complexity and fallability of the structures that technology imposes on modern societies are often in conflict with the protection and development of individual values. The workings of both private and public institutions may endanger the individual's free expression of his unique personality. He must therefore be protected from anything that jeopardizes his rights or limits his personal development.

What do we do? It appears that the elephant has given birth to a rabbit. The only reforms we have are amendments to the Criminal Code pertaining to bail and wire tapping. We have an also ran from the Solicitor General's department dealing with pardons, which is really only going to have a psychological effect. We have also a bill from the Senate on hate literature. When you consider what is necessary, you must realize that these reforms are pitifully inadequate. Oddly enough, we use the most altruistic motives but you will note that not one of these amendments is going to cost any money. If we are going to have Criminal Law reform and justice, we must be prepared to meet the cost.

Consider what we should be doing. In 1929 the Juvenile Delinquents Act was passed. It was known early in the game that it was not satisfactory, and it certainly is not satisfactory now. In 1965, four years ago, we had a departmental committee set up which prepared an excellent report after travelling all over Canada discussing these problems with sociologists, lawyers and judges. That report was filed in 1965 but nothing has been done since 1965 about that Act. We should have it before us this session, and it should have been before Parliament at the last one. We wonder what the delay is and why it is not before us.

Let us consider the Ouimet report which we received ten days ago. I was pleased to hear the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) say today, and I note he is in the house, that he is open for suggestions as to what to do with it. That very splendid report should have been automatically referred to a standing committee of this house, or we should have a special committee set up to consider it. The reforms in it are far-reaching and if we do not get at it soon, by the time we do get at it the reforms it suggests will themselves need reforming.

We need a national criminal legal aid scheme. Provincial legal aid should be subsidized and integrated with a national scheme like medicare. It is disgraceful to see accused persons try to defend themselves on serious charges. This is our responsibility. We give the accused the right to a full answer in defence by counsel learned in the law. The accused then asks where his counsel is, and finds he does not have one. We will provide the judge, we will provide the police witnesses and even in federal cases we provide the prosecutors, but we do not provide counsel for the accused.

At the justice committee last year we disciplined ourselves to considering solely what was in the Omnibus Bill. Time and time again it was pointed out to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) that other sections of the Criminal Code should be amended. The wording of the Criminal Code is disgraceful. We were told these amendments would be made during the next session and that there would be a mini-bill. It is not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I think it should be before this house now because these things were drawn to the attention of the Department of Justice and agreed upon in some instances.

We need reform of our laws dealing with the criminally insane. We treat them like pigs. We incarcerate them in isolation and wish that somehow this whole matter would go away because it is not a human problem. We need reform. We need extensive research into psychopathic criminal behaviour, we need research in respect of psychopathic sexual behaviour. What is causing it and what can be done to prevent it? We must find out how we can avoid the terrors of this particular type of criminal activity.

I am surprised that after the rape of Montreal we are not giving some attention to a change in our laws pertaining to riots and disorders. These laws are somewhat archaic if you take a good look at them. I am surprised that we have not got an extension to Section 70 of the Criminal Code so that policemen who have a responsibility must obey that responsibility or get out of the police force. I am surprised that we have not extended that section so we might prevent riots and civil disorders. Our judges are not properly paid. This government is niggardly in respect of judges. They are not being properly paid in comparison with the earnings of men of similar experience in the legal profession.

We should abolish corporal punishment. Why do we not meet these challenges? Why do we not at least put them up for debate? In any event, we need abolition of corporal punishment. There have been bills before parliament for years providing for the abolition of this prehistoric device which never works at the best of times. These are just a few of the fields we should be dealing with in the area of Criminal Law. Like the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) wished to do, I could go on all day.

I am proud of what the Speech from the Throne says, but I am somewhat ashamed by what it does not say and what it should be saying. If we would be reformers we have to give some attention to what is holding things up and what is the missing cog in the machine. I think one hang-up is our failure to examine closely the mechanics by which this institution operates, by which change could rapidly take place and by which there could be action and reaction to public demands within a reasonable period of time instead of years. I think we are constipated by tradition and fear of action; tradition that is meaningless in modern Canada and fear of action which shows a lack of feeling of national destiny.

Some of the rules of this house are quaint. Rule 28 says that any member wishing to speak shall rise uncovered. We stopped wearing hats in the House of Commons years ago. That is just a trivial example of many of the archaic things in those rules. Some of the trappings of the house look as though they came out of the pages of Treasure Island.

We should never have abolished the committee we set up during the last session to consider changes in the rules of this house. It should be a standing committee so that these rules might be constantly under review. It probably could give attention to some of the problems of the house.

One of the greatest obstructions to change in Canada today is the fantastic bureaucracy of the Canadian Civil Service. The Canadian Civil Service taken as a whole, with some notable exceptions, has not had an original idea since Confederation, and that came from an Englishman. The odd thing is that these public servants never get fired. The rarest thing in the Canadian Civil Service is a rolling head. This just does not happen. These Civil servants are either promoted, put somewhere else or drafted into some research station where nobody ever sees them again, but they are still paid. Some of them show true genius—true genius at making excuses and causing delay. We have all had experience with these people at committee meetings when considering a minister's estimates. A civil servant, knowing he is going to get into a little hot water and knowing also that a member has only 10 minutes to ask questions, is very good at taking 10 minutes to give his first two names. You never do really find out who he is.

The real fear, however, and the real blame rests to a great extent on ourselves. We have to take a great deal of the blame. We also are afraid to abandon the baby blankets of the past. We are afraid to attack conventional wisdom. We are afraid of what political effect this is going to have in our ridings. That is what we are afraid of. We are afraid to stand up and make statements that we know might not be acceptable, even though we know they are morally and logically sound. We are terribly afraid of political introspection. We have too much pragmatism and compromise, and not enough principle. Compromise is a political device, not a principle at all. This brings about half-baked programs.

Look at what we did finally with the languages bill last year when we compromised. Section 11(1), as a result of a compromise made by this government with the western Attorneys-General, ended up by providing that in a bilingual district an accused person or a witness, has the right to speak either of these two important languages. However, when the accused is addressing the court or a jury, he has no such right. This is left to the discretion of the court. That was the result of the compromise. You can see what compromise can do to principle.

We act out of sentimentality fostered by public opinion that can be swayed and distorted by false and fraudulent facts promulgated by the mass media. A prize example of this sort of action was the cancellation of the seal hunt. It was so sentimental I am surprised it was not announced by Mickey Mouse or Smokey the Bear, because those of us who went into that problem in depth found there was no cruelty to animals. We found conservation was being practised and we found it was an economic thing for the people to be doing. I wonder if we will cancel all the trapping and killing of animals in Canada. If we were to follow that principle we would be in serious trouble in respect of many of the industries.

We are too parochial. We fail to see this country as a country which in the existential sense is in the process of "becoming". We lack healthy nationalism. Those of us on the back bench who advocated the proclamation of Arctic sovereignty last spring were, as reported in the press, referred to as ultra-nationalists. I am proud to be an ultra-nationalist if this results in the announcements that have been made recently on this subject.

Canadians have dealt for years somewhat harshly with their would-be activists and would-be reformers. We have always been very cautious of them. I was wondering the other day what Louis Riel, one of the great Canadian activists, would think if he were here now. He would say, "Today the scaffold, tomorrow the monument, the day after tomorrow the postage stamp".

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since there has been some little doubt concerning what the procedure would be in connection with the order of the House I would propose at this time, if all parties agree, that the question be put, the yeas and nays taken, and if it should then appear from that a recorded vote would be taken, then the bells should ring once at two o'clock for 15 minutes. Thereafter, the recorded vote should be taken. I say this because there has been some doubt about the procedure and this would have the effect of apprising hon. members of precisely what would be done. There is hardly time for another speech to be made between now and one o'clock. If this is satisfactory, Your Honour might put the question and then after the vote has been taken of course the debate would proceed.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I do not understand what the proposal is. I should like to know upon what I am alleged to be voting. There was an agreement of the house that we would vote at two o'clock. I take it that some modification of that agreement is being proposed.

Mr. Baldwin: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I might make an explanation because the Chair was involved in the discussion. It is simply a proposal to overcome the difficulty about posing the question and to avoid ringing the bells twice. I understand that if there is agreement, the Chair would put the question now and the vote would not take place until 2.15.

Mr. McIlraith: My understanding is that it is simply a proposal to clarify the procedure in such a way that at two o'clock we can ring the bells once for the required 15 minutes and then proceed to the recording of the vote. If that understanding is correct, we are quite agreeable on this side.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed; that was the idea.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If it is agreed, I might put the question at this time. The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt).

All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my view the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will call in the members at two o'clock. It now being one o'clock I leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Thank you for recognizing me, Mr. Speaker. I join my colleagues in congratulating the hon. members for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) for their contributions which set the high tone of this debate. I must also express my appreciation to other hon. members who have spoken thus far. They have spoken sincerely and their speeches have been of high calibre. I congratulate those who have been appointed Parliamentary Secretaries. I wish them luck. I wish the two Ministers without Portfolio from urban ridings in Toronto and Windsor well. I earnestly hope they do not become frustrated because of this government's evident lack of interest in urban progress. I will not repeat what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and others have said so eloquently about the Speech from the Throne, that it is full of pious platitudes. I agree with that. It contains good points, however, one of them being that the government has at last recognized the young people of this country and will give them the opportunity of taking advantage of the franchise. Let it be known, Mr. Speaker, that at the Niagara Conference of October 9, 10 and 11, this party laid down the guidelines on this question. This government has not suddenly thought of this matter. It has been thought of before.

Mr. Winch: It was thought of in Saskatchewan 20 years ago.

Mr. Alexander: I share in the concern of young people who say that they should have the opportunity to run their own affairs. They want to participate in the directing of this country's affairs and to play a significant role. We are privileged and honoured, because in this country we have young people with special talents. I say this with all sincerity, because it was as a result of the vim and vitality of the young people in my constituency that I was elected to the House of Commons. For that I am extremely grateful. Our young people will not remain patient in the face of injustice and will not settle for token measures that only gloss over and do not solve problems. Many of them are disillusioned with "the establishment". I say to them, "You will be part of the establishment once you have the franchise." If they are disappointed with the performance of any elected member, they should kick him out. That is all there is to it. If they do not know how to go about that, they should speak to the seasoned politician—and I consider myself a seasoned politician since I have finished my one year apprenticeship stint in this House. We will show our young people whom they should back and whom they should not back. They should not vote for those who are incapable of giving proper direction to the affairs of this country.

The Speech from the Throne referred to pollution, a matter of high priority. Having read several articles on the subject and having seen several documentaries in the last two or three years, I have concluded that if we do not begin solving the problem of pollution in the next three or four years we may have nothing at all, literally, to worry about in 25 years time. We must show concern not only in respect of water pollution but various forms of pollution that affect the earth, the air and our environment. We have all heard about noise, visual pollution and even mental pollution. We know the problems. To discover them we do not need to conduct a great deal of research or intensive study. I think it would be well if this government were to create a separate ministry responsible for pollution, to co-ordinate and bring under one authority the anti-pollution programs of other departments of government. That way the federal government could set standards. Penalties for infractions of the regulations could also be established. We must keep in mind that provincial governments will have set up their own anti-pollution programs and that local authorities concerned with pollution have introduced specific anti-pollution measures. You know, Mr. Speaker, about 200 agencies are concerned with pollution. Surely, the federal government could step into the picture, give leadership, and co-ordinate the activities of the various bodies in this nation in the fight against pollution. That way we could correlate all the information about pollution that has been gathered, and pass this information on to those interested in the matter.

Although this government may express interest in the subject of pollution, I doubt its sincerity in solving the problem. On the one hand, we have the centre devoted to the study of inland waters at Burlington, where the government will spend millions of dollars on research into pollution; and, on the other hand, we have the case of the City of Hamilton. The city knew what its problem was and decided to call tenders in the early part of 1970 for the completion of a secondary sewage plant, but this government said, "No". I remember asking the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing about this matter, and in a pious-sounding answer he as much as said, "There is no sense in undertaking this project now." I ask, what is of prime importance in our fight against pollution?

Another area that has been dealt with in the Throne Speech is housing. This government has indicated its desire to see one million housing units built within the next five years. This is commendable, but we have been telling this government all along that there has been a housing crisis. This is an area which we should move into quickly, and I will have more to say about that later.

There are other objectives mentioned in the Throne Speech which are admirable such as those with respect to tax reform and the war against inflation. Whether we are proceeding in the right way remains to be seen. What strikes me as being extremely significant is the fact that Anthony Westall, a man whose ability I can appreciate, sums up the speech in this way:

"The Trudeau government remains today without a clear image—Is it progressive or reactionary?—and without a social message for Canadians".

The latter part is extremely important, "without a social message for Canadians". As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, this government is going through a planning stage. This government spent its first year in power clearing up old business, finding the problems and then attempting to slit the throat of the opposition by the imposition of 75c. That was their main, significant contribution during the first year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alexander: The second year, Mr. Speaker, will be taken up with the discussion of solutions; the third year with putting through legislation, and the fourth year with sitting back and gloating over their marvellous contribution. Then, the government will go to the people.

I cannot say anything against planning, Mr. Speaker. Planning is always required. However, there are certain areas in which we must move away from too rigid a stand. There are many areas which this government will now have to take into consideration. They will have to forget they are at the planning stage because they are also at the problem, solution and legislation stages today.

Action is needed, Mr. Speaker, particularly in two areas, unemployment and the complexities of urban growth. This is the great tragedy of that Speech from the Throne. For some reason or other, there was a lack of recognition of these two very important crises in the Canadian economy. If this government promised anything, Mr. Speaker, it promised to govern and create. They were going to create a new Canadian society, but how can you create a new Canadian society without the recognition of the great sprawling urban problems?

A society, just or otherwise, can only develop on a foundation of healthy economic growth and that means job opportunity, decent annual incomes, steady demand, steady production and last, but not least, equality of opportunity to share in national development and prosperity. No society can be termed just that contains within it the regional disparities that we find in Canada. No society can be truly just that can callously write off, for the sake of convenience, primary industries that happen to have fallen on evil days and whole sections of the population who, through no fault of their own, happen to share this state.

From reading the representations of the Economic Council over the years it is seen that the term "full employment" is continually emphasized. This phrase is coupled with a strong affirmation that it is one of the principle keys in Canada's future. It is really ironic. This nation is spending billions of dollars and taking in by revenue billions of dollars, with an export trade the envy of many underdeveloped nations and not a few industrialized nations, with a standard of living, possessed of space, natural resources uncounted and human resources mercifully detached from the problems created by unfriendly neighbours. Yet with all this, with all our achievements, affluence and potential, we must admit to an inability to gainfully employ close to 5 per cent of our people who are able and willing to work.

Surely, the solution to this problem presents challenge enough for the most imaginative and dynamic government. This figure of close to 5 per cent is bad enough, but what is worse is the regional breakdown. Here we find a rate of 7.1 per cent for the Atlantic provinces; 6.8 per cent in Quebec; 3 per cent in Ontario; 3.4 per cent in the Prairies and 5.4 per cent in British Columbia. This is proof positive of the statement of the Economic Council of Canada and I quote:

The level of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces and to a lesser degree Quebec is persistently higher than the national average at all times.

Such a condition points to the need for flexible policies applicable in differing degrees to regional needs, rather than blanket policies which have no regard for regional needs and only accentuate regional disparity. In this regard, we now have the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which will carry on the policy of giving grants to industries to persuade them to establish in certain areas or to stay in areas where they are already established.

What we should have is a very clear picture of how these powers will be applied in this new department and how it will operate. If we were able to spend very large sums of money in the past few years without securing the desired results, let us not repeat that process. If we are going to simply follow the line of least resistance and go where growth already exists, where industries are already established, then where is the case for this department and its calls for correlation?

The hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau), took this government to task, particularly the Minister of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), because there was no liaison between the departments. There is no liaison between that department and the Department of Transport, as well as that of the Postmaster General. The hon. member asked how in heaven's name these slow growth areas are ever to take their place in the main stream of Canadian life when we have ministers who do not even discuss what is going on in terms of relieving the frustrations of the Atlantic provinces.

I am particularly disturbed about the non-recognition of the complexities of urban growth. I was pleased to hear the hon. member for York North (Mr. Givens) deal briefly with this problem in his speech. It made my heart jump for joy, because I thought I was going to hear a blast against this government that would leave nothing to be desired by the hon. member for York West. This former mayor of Toronto stated that if he were on the treasury benches, he would have ensured that the problems of urban growth would have been included in the Speech from the Throne.

In the 1970's this country will have a population of some 25 million. According to the statistics that have been gathered, the population of this country in the 1980's will be centred in 29 cities. We have heard mention of Toronto and Montreal, and we can even throw in Hamilton. In the next 10 or 15 years Ontario will have a population of 10 million. When we think of these facts we see how significant it is that we should be urban oriented. With all due respect to my rural friends, we have to face the realities.

We have to be concerned about the quality of life being experienced in urban centres. We must be concerned about crime, mental disease, depression, frustration, alcoholism and drug usage. A member of our party stated yesterday the only advice he can give to the youth of our nation today is to "get off the pot". Until such time as I can be shown there is some merit in the use of marijuana and until it is acceptable, I am against it. I also say to the youth of this country, "get off the pot".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Alexander.]

Mr. Alexander: Urban growth at this particular time can only mean environmental malaise upon which I have just expanded. This continuing growth in our cities unquestionably will continue to rise, yet the Throne Speech indicates the government has ignored one of the greatest challenges that this country has ever faced, namely to see to it that there was some recognition of this great problem being faced by many Canadians. The lack of the government's indicated intention to tackle the many social and economic problems has created an attitude of deep concern and disappointment in many people throughout this land.

• (2:40 p.m.)

It seems to me the most significant shortcoming of the government, and I say this with all due respect for its wisdom, lies in its continuous refusal to confront head-on the gut issues which face Canada and which, with the passing of each day, weigh more heavily on the minds and purses of Canadians in all walks of life. As I say in my simple language, there has been a complete failure to consider the nitty-gritty issues—the more sophisticated can call them the nutty-gritty issues, or the bread and butter issues. If you are even more sophisticated, like the former minister in charge of housing, you could call them the nuts and bolts. This negative attitude has become one of the more dangerous developments in the hands of this government, whose tendency is to allow nature to take its course and simply to speed up the process. That is not policy, Mr. Speaker. It is greasing the skids toward chaos.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alexander: We need a recognition that the question of urban growth is one of immediate and profound concern to this nation and to the quality of day to day living in Canada. Yet none of the basic issues of daily life in Canada appears to have moved the imagination of our well-dressed Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or of his less colourful retinue of thinkers, theorists and swingers. In these circumstances, the just society is unobtainable, and its promise is an insult to our intelligence. At the most, it continues to exist as an election slogan which has been almost totally rejected by the farmer, the fisherman, the urban dweller and by the four million of us who are living in poverty today. Let me say, in my own language—and it is language which is becoming increasingly acceptable: this government must stop shafting the poor.

After all, what could we expect? It has been said that the Prime Minister promised nothing. Well, this government, in keeping with that statement has, in the minds of many people, done little or nothing in concrete terms to justify the confidence, plaudits and enthusiasm of Canadians.

In considering the subject of urban renewal we cannot ignore the municipalities. This was made clear by the experience of the government in connection with two airports in particular, one on Toronto Island and the other outside Montreal. The 37th annual conference of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities indicated quite clearly that the Municipalities wished to have a voice in all discussions which concerned urban affairs. These people are concerned about transportation; they are concerned about housing; they want to be brought into discussions at levels upon which their experience can be useful. The Federation expressed a desire to participate whenever possible in the manner set forth at the federal-provincial constitutional conference. If we are to make any headway in this field, we must begin to recognize that because of the rate of urban growth and its increasing complexity we shall have to reach down—and I say that with a great deal of respect—to receive wisdom and guidance from the municipalities.

It has been said that pressures for increased expenditures in urban areas are likely to mount rapidly, and it is to be noted that the real property tax, which is still by far the largest source of local revenue, is considerably less responsive to economic growth than are the revenue sources of the federal and provincial governments. As stated by the Economic Council, the gap between municipal expenditure requirements and the revenue derived by municipalities is likely to increase; in the absence of a continuing increase and transfer of revenue from the senior government or further shifts of responsibility to other levels of government it will become increasingly difficult to maintain, let alone to improve, the quality of the urban environment in which the vast majority of Canadians will be living.

It is extremely important that we become aware of what is happening in terms of urban growth. What about urban renewal? I must have asked 30 or 40 questions on this subject since I came here. We have had a succession of ministers—the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Mr. Benson), the former member for Vancouver Centre, Mr. Nicholson, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) and the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing (Mr. Andras). It seems to me they each gave consideration to the proper way of approaching urban housing problems and that the municipalities were given every encouragement to pursue the plans which were on their drawing boards. The city of Hamilton was no exception in this regard. It was understood and accepted that its scheme was a good one. The local authority undertook to carry on and the government indicated it was behind this project. It seems to me, now, Mr. Speaker, that Hamilton was led down the garden path and then kicked over the cliff. Hamilton had a $14 million project going in its project for York Street urban renewal and it was looking for some $5 million from the federal government as its contribution. Then, government spokesmen suddenly announced: It's tough luck but we have only $2,500,000.

Do you know what situation has resulted, Mr. Speaker? When I go to York Street today the people who own the stores, shops and homes which have been expropriated ask me what is happening. I say to them: Blame the government in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alexander: I tell them to blame this government because the present government has not shown any humanitarian feeling. I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) talking about the little people. What does he know about the little people? We find this is a very hard pill to swallow. In my opinion, as a result of the attitude the government has taken, it is not possible to secure the trust, the faith and the co-operation which are expected from municipalities. How can you expect these things when you lead them down the garden path?

An hon. Member: You are talking about John Robarts?

Mr. Alexander: The present minister responsible for housing stated recently:

> Until a more well-defined and logical long term Canadian urban renewal policy can be formulated and enunciated, municipalities with urban renewal schemes presently in preparation, will have to elect either to suspend further study or alternatively to complete their work in the knowledge that additional federal funds for implementation of schemes may or may not be forthcoming.

He made this statement regardless of the fact that some of these programs have been in preparation for some five or six years. The cities need information concerning the guidelines which affect urban renewal. They are interested in knowing why a program which was apparently satisfactory has been cut back. Most of all, they are interested in knowing whether further funds will be forthcoming from the federal government; they demand a statement, in the course of which urban renewal policy will be disclosed.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) asked the minister the other day when he intended to make such a statement. He said he would do so within a few days. Mr. Speaker, I have heard that promise ever since I came here. I asked the minister whether he would deal, in the course of that statement, with the guidelines for public housing. He said, yes, he would probably include that subject. The municipalities are sick and tired of this pussyfooting, this evasion of the issue. I hope that the question I asked the minister this morning about building societies will be given very sympathetic consideration when the province of Ontario moves into this field. If we do not have some sort of means whereby mortgage money is attracted into the housing field, then there just is no way in which the government will complete its one million units within the next five years. I hope the government will lend a sympathetic ear in this regard.

According to the statistics, in the year 1967 there were 164,123 housing starts; in 1968 there were 196,878; and the estimate for 1969 is 190,000. The government's objective of one million new housing units during the next five years is probably based on the report of task force on housing and urban development, page 23, which reads:

> A minimum of one million additional units over the next five years would allow the housing market to keep pace with new demand plus making at least some inroads into the current backlog of overcrowding, obsolescence and general shortage of supply.
> In setting a target of one million additional units by 1973—

—which is what the task force report indicated—

> —it should be stressed that this is a minimum objective—the task force would earnestly hope that actual achievements would run considerably above this.

An hon. Member: We will reach the target.

Mr. Alexander: I suggest you tell your minister to approve building societies, and then you may have a chance. Assuming that an estimate of about 190,000 starts for this year is reasonably accurate, the next four years through 1973 would all have to be exceptional ones, averaging close to 205,000 even to achieve the level the Hellyer task force claims is an absolute minimum. With growing demand paced especially by rapid growth in new family and household formation as the post-war baby boom hits the housing market, the council projected a total increase of about 1¾ million new housing units in the eight years from 1967 to 1975.

I am sure you are about to call time, Mr. Speaker, but may I just have another minute to conclude?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Has the hon. member leave of the house to continue his remarks beyond his allotted time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Alexander: I shall finish shortly, Mr. Speaker. In order to expedite my remarks I shall read the rest of them, even though my hon. friend in the New Democratic party said that members should learn to speak without the aid of typewritten notes. We will achieve this eventually. You have a new breed of politician in the House now, Mr. Speaker, one who is aware of his functions here and the image that he must project in order that Canadians, as I told some young people here today, will respect this house. I am not afraid that this government will reduce this respect, because it is our function to make sure that this respect continues in the age old tradition of grandeur and understanding.

This government is obsessed with abstract things and has no inclination to tackle the many existing emergencies, some of which I have mentioned. Instead we, as parliamentarians, representing the people of Canada, are asked to treat as urgent matters such as abortion, homosexuality and language rights.

All these may have their importance—there can be no doubt about that; but at the same time it seems to me they should have no priority in a country as urgently in need of action in the economic sector as Canada.

The title of one of the latest reports of the Economic Council of Canada is "Challenge of Growth and Change". This is a challenge that for some reason or another has been continually ducked by this government, even though they continually point out the shortcomings in our economy and what should actually be done to alleviate the many serious situations.

In conclusion, what this country needs is a government that is conscious of the realities. We need a government with policies to alleviate problems resulting from urban growth that are becoming more and more intense. We need a government that can produce instant programs, a government whose first concern is the strengthening of Canada's economy, the reaffirmation of our national identity and integrity, and the maintenance of Canadian sovereignty within our territories. In this respect, the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with regard to Arctic pollution should have been a little stronger. Let us state firmly that those waters are ours, and then we will see how the cookie crumbles.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, may I join in the general acclaim of my colleagues, the hon. members from Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and Lapointe (Mr. Marceau), who so ably moved and seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. In offering this congratulation I must immediately disclaim any implication of surprise, or even remarkability. The quality of their efforts was really only of that degree of excellence which we in the back rows on both sides and in the rump opposite have come to expect of our parliamentary contemporaries.

Last year when speaking in the budget debate I remarked that the Company of Young Canadians was a controversial creation of Parliament. Certainly, nothing has occurred in recent months to cause me to amend that assessment. The Company is currently under assault by some of the most influential political figures in Canada. The Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts has now been charged with the responsibility of looking into its operation. In view of the tenor of some of the charges giving rise to this investigation, one might almost expect the national defence committee to have been given this responsibility.

However, I am extremely happy that a subcommittee of that committee, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler), will be visiting Calgary to hear evidence on C.Y.C. activities there. Whatever the situation elsewhere, they will have the opportunity to review a C.Y.C. operation that has worked and worked well; an operation that has, with the very limited means available to it, fulfilled its function of bridging the gap between the mainstream of society and some of its alienated elements, and left behind it a residue of ongoing community leadership. It is an operation which, in short, has achieved the objectives its creators visualized.

There are a number of recently, and perhaps temporarily, unemployed politicians in Calgary who must regret profoundly their assessment that the repercussions of C.Y.C. activity there was a cause, rather than a symptom, of civic malaise.

I had the honour early this month, at the invitation of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs, to attend and participate in a seminar sponsored by the John F. Kennedy Institute for Atlantic Studies at the University of Tilburg in The Netherlands. The subject of the seminar was NATO and security in the seventies. Following this I visited, along with other members of this chamber and the other place, the Council of Europe at Strasbourg; the First Canadian Air Division at Lahr, and the Fourth Canadian Mechanized Brigade Group on manoeuvres in the field near Brunswick, Germany.

I then took part with the parliamentary delegation in the deliberations of the North Atlantic Assembly in Brussels, and with a smaller group representing this Parliament at a meeting in Paris under the auspices of the development aid committee of the Organization for Economic Co-Operation and Development. This latter meeting focussed its attention on the report on development aid entitled "Partners in Development" prepared for the World Bank by a distinguished committee under the chairmanship of our immediate past Prime Minister, the Right Hon. L. B. Pearson.

I should like to pay tribute to the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Gillespie) who headed our delegation to Brussels. The preparation and advance briefing that we received was extremely valuable, and this was carrying on the tradition established last year by the hon. Senator John Aird. I sincerely hope that this tradition of briefing and preparing of delegations, and of establishing a degree of continuity between parliamentary delegations to the more important international assemblies, will be continued.

There is no doubt in my mind, in the mind of any informed European, or in the minds of our troops in Europe, that our soldiers are, man for man, the finest, best trained and most effective military force on that continent. They are professionals. They are capable of fulfilling their assigned task better than any other force, but that capability does not necessarily mean that the assigned task is the right task; and just because it was the right task 15, 10, or even five years ago does not mean it is necessarily the right task now. An uncritical perpetuation of the existing role would be tantamount to closing our eyes to some very fundamental changes in the balance of world power.

There is the greatly increased capacity of the European nations to provide for their own defence in conventional terms. There is the awareness that an incident in the European theatre likely to escalate into any sort of war—the so-called accident—will more likely occur on one of NATO's lightly guarded flanks, Norway, Turkey, the Mediterranean, rather than in the relatively heavily armed centre, Germany where any action would almost immediately bring the aggressors into contact with United States troops and a possible nuclear retaliation. There is the fact that on a global basis the United States and Russia have achieved practical parity in the capacity for mutual obliteration by strategic nuclear weapons. There is the fact of growing Chinese power and ever-increasing ferment in the developing world. There is the evident thrust of Soviet policy to compete with the United States as a global military power. This is implicit in the growing show of Soviet naval strength particularly in the Mediterranean but also in the Indian and Atlantic Oceans. It is implicit in the development of the Antonov 22 long-range, troop transport aircraft, the helicopter carriers now at sea or nearing completion, and the expansion of their marine infantry.

Russia is rapidly equipping itself to perform the same global role of which the United States is presently capable. Once it has this capability, and given de facto strategic nuclear equality with the United States, will Russia be able to avoid involvement in distant trouble spots? Is it not likely that opportunities for involvement will be more numerous than in the past?

Canada's defence policy, with the pre-eminent position given its NATO commitment, was formulated before these fundamental changes in the balance of world power at a time when one could with reasonable certainty postulate that the only real peril to Canada was the fact that a nuclear war between Russia and the United States would necessarily involve us; that the most likely cause of such a war would arise in Europe and that Canada's interests were, therefore, best served by a total commitment to NATO. With changing conditions the only real peril to Canada remains, for the time being at least, the fact that a nuclear war between Russia and the United States will necessarily involve us. But we can no longer safely assume that Europe is the only place where a confrontation leading to that war is likely to occur; indeed, it seems more likely to occur elsewhere.

[Mr. Mahoney.]

The situation which we face justifies the decision to rearrange our defence priorities and it also justifies the reconfiguration—that is the official word, not mine—which will see integrated, highly mobile air transportable troops forming the basic fighting units of our armed forces. But while the transformation of, if you like, reconfiguration may be the right thing to do, it will not be an inexpensive thing to do. Concern must be expressed that the current economy drive could seriously impair and even delay this process at a time when it is vital that it proceed with all due dispatch. Given adequate resources our Canadian armed forces will continue to be, man for man, the free world's most effective military force, filling an even more valuable role than in the past. A second element of our foreign policy, development aid, is receiving increased attention, and indeed has been exempted from the expenditure guidelines which the government has applied to practically all other areas of activity. This attitude of the Canadian government is somewhat unique in the international community today.

The first pages of the Pearson Commission Report are replete with such terms as "feasibility in question", "disillusion and distrust", "volume stagnant", "commitments declining", "spirit of disenchantment", "misconceptions", "criticism of waste" and "frustration and impatience". The report acknowledges that international support for development is now flagging. Recognition of this fact led the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development to call together last week parliamentarians from countries which are members of its Development Aid Committee. This invitation was unprecedented in the history of the OECD which has tended in the past to conduct its affairs quietly and with dignity at the official and ministerial levels, a rather natural reflection of the fact that the OECD is the rich man's club of the global village.

Its member countries account for 61 per cent of the world's industrial production and 65 per cent of world trade, while containing but 20 per cent of its population. They also disburse 90 per cent of its development aid. They called in parliamentarians because they recognize that they are going to have a tough time selling a maintenance, much less an increase, in development aid over the next few years. The Pearson Report enumerates clearly not only what development aid can do but what it cannot and should not be expected to do. At this particular time of disenchantment, a definition of misconceptions is probably as important as a definition of potential.

Development will not guarantee a choice of a particular ideology or value system; nor political stability nor rejection of violence; nor peaceful and responsible international behaviour; nor will it buy dependable friends. So why bother? Of course, there are moral reasons; the feeling that it is right for the "haves" to share with the "have nots". There is the appeal of enlightened self-interest, a somewhat shopworn expression which embraces the concept that improved utilization of the world's resources will benefit the rich as well as the poor. Most important is the fact that we live in a global village; that a war anywhere may affect us all; that pollution in one area may affect the entire world; that pestilence does not stop at national boundaries. In brief, there is no way of knowing where Canada or any other country will be next year, 10 years or 100 years from now, unless we can also know where the world will be. If we want to be secure and prosperous we must try to ensure that the world is secure and prosperous.

One of the more significant phenomena in western Europe today is that of the growing irrelevance of national boundaries. For over a decade young people—and not all of them are still young—have been moving freely from Naples to Oslo and from Munich to Dublin. They recognize themselves as Europeans, not Dutchmen or Danes. This phenomenon is spreading throughout many parts of the world. It has crossed the Atlantic; it has penetrated the iron curtain. There is among the young a conviction that we are a world community and that we must behave like a world community if we are to survive as a civilization. The concept of world community is itself a compelling reason for development aid. Development aid is an act of faith in the future. The poorer nations have made their choice. They intend to develop. The questions are how fast and at what cost. Developed nations can speed their progress and ease their way.

The Pearson Report also tells the story of the first development decade and outlines a strategy for the second. The record of the first is better by far than most of us appreciate. The average rate of increase of gross national product in the developing countries has reached 5 per cent per annum, although the population explosion has held the annual per capita rate to 2½ per cent. Remember, these are gross averages. Some individual countries have done much better than average, others have remained relatively stagnant, while yet others—Indonesia and Uruguay, for example—have actually experienced per capita declines.

However much the western wheat farmer may regret the loss of markets, he must rejoice in the conquest of starvation in many parts of the world as the green revolution gains momentum. However much the textile industry may resent competitive pressures, it must be grateful for the options that are open to its owners and workers in Canada, few of which are open in the developing world.

School enrolment has almost tripled, although the tools and techniques are too often antiquated and the education too often classical rather than technical, with no suitable productive job waiting for the student. Public health conditions have improved immeasurably, resulting directly in lower mortality, higher birth rates and often critical unemployment and underemployment. The results and experience of the first development decade indicate a need for massive research if the second decade is to produce optimum results.

The amount spent on development aid will not be the only, nor even necessarily the most important, criterion in determining its value. Its form can be vital, as can the purposes for which it is spent. Its effectiveness in stimulating economic growth will be the critical measure. It is, therefore, not surprising that this government's decision to create a Canadian International Development Research Centre, announced in the Throne Speech and followed by introduction and first reading of the bill this Wednesday, is greeted with unqualified enthusiasm throughout the world. Only through research can we contemplate the possibility of optimum value in development assistance.

Mr. Speaker, there are strong indications that a very important segment of the American people are becoming preoccupied with their grave domestic problems. There was little doubt in the minds of the United States congressmen attending the North Atlantic Assembly in Brussels that, barring some unforeseen circumstance, substantial numbers of their troops would be returned to the United States from Europe. Most of the Europeans I spoke to regarded this as inevitable, if regrettable. Outspoken United States proponents of development aid hold forth little hope that the United States will increase its program; indeed, many expect further reductions. And yet this is no time for policies to become introverted.

A few days ago I received a letter from a constituent, a CPR employee who had discovered to his dismay that while pension credit would be given to him for time served in either World War I or World War II, no such credit would be granted for Korea. This led me to do a little research. The CPR is technically correct. It may come as a surprise to many—it did to me—that ever since September 2, 1945, when some 500 miles northeast of the smouldering ruins of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Japan surrendered unconditionally to the allies, the world has been at peace. There has not been a war any place in the world for over 24 years. Not a single war has been declared. Mind you, there have been some 50 conflicts since 1945 that could be graced by the appellation "war" had the traditional formalities been observed. Sixteen of these have been fought between sovereign states; others have been anti-colonial uprisings and civil wars, and in about half of these foreign troops have been involved.

The Korean conflict was not a war. It went under the name of a police action even though soldiers of 24 countries were involved. Almost two million soldiers and uncounted civilians were casualties and three years of gigantic military effort was expended. War was never declared and it never ended. The fighting stopped, not with a formal surrender but with an inconclusive armistice that has yet to be ratified. Today, patrols still clash and the Armistice Commission still meets to exchange insults. Wars do not begin and wars do not end any more; they just kind of happen and they are happening at numerous street corners in our global village today—the Middle East, Southeast Asia, Nigeria. There is still the occasional rumble in Korea and the Kashmir.

As citizens of this global village, neither Canadians nor Americans can divorce themselves from what goes on outside our particular block. We must continue to direct our efforts outward and to avail ourselves of every means at our disposal to improve our village. Notwithstanding the seriousness and immediacy of our own domestic problems, we simply cannot afford to become recluse. Development aid may be fairly regarded as the international equivalent of an enlightened domestic social development program, a program to give the less advantaged in a community the opportunity to share equitably in the benefits of living there.

[Mr. Mahoney.]

Nowhere has the most enlightened social program yet devised by man produced conditions which have permitted a community—national, municipal or otherwise—to disband its police force. Nothing in human experience to date indicates that the most enlightened development aid program will justify the entire, or even substantial elimination of armed forces. While we may hope it will, we cannot safely anticipate that result.

I cannot find a better way to sum up my feelings than to repeat one sentence from the Throne Speech:

> Our world has become so compact, so interdependent, that all humanity is wounded by an outbreak of violence in any corner of the earth.

That is a compelling reason for implementing and maintaining an effective development aid program. It is equally a compelling reason for maintaining effective military forces. Acceptance of this fact is a sound base upon which to build foreign and defence policies which could be the models for free and prosperous nations having no ambitions but to live in an increasingly free and increasingly prosperous world.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to speak this afternoon, I cannot help but make a comparison with the last election campaign. At that time, we were making speeches in large and well equipped rooms, but before few listeners. It is somewhat similar to what is happening today, since it is Friday. Everyone wants to get home as soon as possible and I am not blaming anyone for it.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to join those who spoke before me in congratulating quite sincerely the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) who both performed their task with great talent. This proves that their constituents were right to elect them and they can be proud of being represented by them in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, this debate gives me the opportunity to let the government know about the needs and the aspirations of my fellow citizens.

I regard it also as my duty to let the government know what is wrong in my constituency because I think that my task is not limited to the reporting of what is well. Therefore, I want to draw the attention of the government to certain anomalies, and I do it conscious of fulfilling my duty.

• (3:20 p.m.)

One would have to be blind and absolutely unaware of the situation to think that labourers and farmers are not steadily facing increasing hardships, due for the most part to inflation and the relentlessly increasing cost of living.

Everybody eagerly wishes for the government to make up its mind at last to act and take the necessary steps to instore on a sound basis the just society the Liberals so insistently promised during the 1968 election campaing. Pious wishes on the part of the government did not prevent poverty from increasing and affecting an even larger number of our fellow-citizens.

I deem it my duty to inform the government that in the constituency I have the honour to represent in this house, unemployment keeps on increasing. According to the figures I obtained yesterday from the manpower centre in St. Hyacinthe, there would be at least 3,500 unemployed people there. Those people are asking themselves and rightly so: What is the government doing to improve our situation? What steps is it taking to find us a new job, as we are entitled to?

As for the average Canadian, he concludes that practically no efficient measure has yet been taken to cope with the increasing poverty in this country. I cannot but ask this government to get out of the inaction in which it has been mired for some time and to do something for the unemployed. This is a serious problem, which spreads panic and poverty, sometimes dire poverty, in homes that are entitled to more consideration on the part of our governments.

And why, Mr. Speaker, is there so much unemployment in my riding? Mostly because the plants are up against the unfavourable competition of goods imported from countries where the salaries paid the workers are much lower than those the Canadian industries have to pay.

In St. Hyacinthe, quite recently, we lost a couple of plants which had been in operation for almost 100 years. Those two plants laid off hundreds of employees whose work, until then, had enabled them to meet their obligations towards their families and society.

Our textile mills, for instance, were forced to let several hundred workers go because of foreign competition. I do not want to exaggerate but, if my information is correct—and I believe it is—another plant in St. Hyacinthe will fold soon, which is certainly no cause for rejoicing.

It is easy to forecast the very serious consequences of the closing down of a mill, first of all for the people concerned and also for the area in which it is located. When you realize that a town of the size of St. Hyacinthe is losing its industries one after the other, there is reason to be concerned and to worry about what is soon going to happen to some of its citizens.

It is therefore the urgent responsibility of the government to stem the tide and to do its best to save the jobs available in our town for the sake not only of the Canadian industry but above all of the Canadian taxpayers.

I was recently provided with information about the Canadian electronics industry. That industry is faced with difficulties for several reasons, mainly because of competition from foreign products. The Canadian electronics industry provides jobs for approximately 60,000 Canadians. During the year 1968, it exported abroad $300 million worth of merchandise. It is now handicapped and finds it very difficult to meet foreign competition, for excise tax at the rate of 15 per cent has to be paid in addition to the 12 per cent sales tax. Such charges leave it almost helpless to fight those countries that deprive it of its natural market here in Canada.

Moreover, the tariff reduction under the Kennedy Round to become effective in 1972 only came into force last June. The Canadian manufacturers find themselves at a disadvantage because they have to pay higher sales and excise taxes than importers. In the interest of Canadian manufacturers and workers this situation should be corrected as soon as possible.

Some industries would like to settle in the St-Hyacinthe region, but they are not doing so on account of the unfavourable position in which they find themselves due to the fact that this region is considered to be part of the Montreal region. As it is not in a designated area, the city of St. Hyacinthe cannot avail itself of the advantages given to the so-called designated regions. To my knowledge there are at least two very important industries which would have preferred to settle in St. Hyacinthe where serious, skilful and stable manpower is to be found, but because of the drawbacks resulting from the fact that the St. Hyacinthe region is not recognized as a designated area, they went elsewhere.

Believe it or not, but St. Hyacinthe has been included in the Montreal area. In the opinion of those responsible for designating areas, St. Hyacinthe has the same characteristics as Montreal. You can see quite readily that it is a gross error of judgment which is detrimental to the whole population of St. Hyacinthe.

The former Lafontaine administration did all it could to make the central government understand that this matter was worth the serious consideration of the Department of Manpower. In the 1968 electoral campaign, the members of the administration now in power jumped on this anomaly and promised the people that once elected, they would come to Ottawa and have the decision reversed. But now everyone knows that the situation remains the same and that the last representations have been ignored, both by the present government and the previous one.

I therefore urge my friend, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), who represents the Drummond constituency, to say in turn a good word when the cabinet next considers the policy concerning the designated areas. In my opinion, the manner in which the areas are designated is unfair to a certain sector of the population, because the citizens of Drummondville, and those of St. Hyacinthe as well, pay taxes and deserve as much attention as other citizens.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question, and not out of idle curiosity, I assure you.

How many people in the St. Hyacinthe region gravitate toward Montreal for economic reasons?

Does the hon. member know the importance which the Greater Montreal economy has on his own city or his own region?

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I cannot provide figures in that respect. Had I foreseen that the minister would ask the question, I would have come prepared accordingly. But I am sure there are a great many workers in St. Hyacinthe who have to work outside because they cannot find employment in their home town. Naturally, these people would much rather stay in St. Hyacinthe where they have their families, their friends and their homes, instead of having to drive each morning to Sorel, Drummondville or Montreal to earn a living.

That is what is really bothering a large segment of the population in St. Hyacinthe.

[Mr. Ricard.]

I should like to deal briefly with retaining walls. This can seem strange, but I must say, that the Saint-Hyacinthe constituency, under a Liberal government, has always been neglected. However, before 1957, for example, that constituency had always been represented in the house by a Liberal member. Before 1957, there were very few retaining walls built on the shores of the Richelieu river and strangely enough, when they were built, it was most of the time behind the properties of political friends.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Between 1957 and 1963, when the Conservatives were in office, about five or six times as many retaining walls were built as in the 20 years before they came in to power, whether or not John Smith or his neighbour belonged to the party in power. We built retaining walls where they were needed, where waves caused by maritime traffic eroded property.

In 1963, when the Liberal party was returned to office, the old policies were restored and no more, or practically no more retaining walls were built. Meantime, damages are getting worse because the water level is higher and ships continue to damage property, even causing—

Mr. Pepin: By the waves?

Mr. Ricard: Yes. Waves reach the shore, causing erosion. Large pieces of land are sliding into the river, and this at times threatens the buildings on the water front.

Mr. Speaker, it would be necessary to keep on making studies in the parishes of Saint-Denis, Saint-Charles and Saint-Hilaire, in order to determine where such works are needed and to undertake them without delay.

I would also like to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) not to carry out the proposed erection of a metal fence around the parking lot behind the Saint-Hyacinthe post office. That would certainly lessen the beauty of that part of the city, and the population would deeply resent it.

Representations were made to the department by the authorities of Saint-Hyacinthe. I myself wrote to the minister asking him not to carry out his plan and I feel that the decision to cancel this project would be well received by the population.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) to give particular consideration to the parish of Saint-Thomas d'Aquin in view of the increasing volume of mail handled at its post office, because the present facilities are inadequate to meet the requirements.

Local people would be grateful if in the course of next winter the minister would decide to erect a new post office building in that municipality and so improve the service to its population.

I was also very sorry to learn about the department's decision to close down the post office of Saint-Louis-sur-Richelieu. It does not make sense, Mr. Speaker, that a municipality should be deprived of its post office overnight. Any populated area is entitled to postal services.

• (3:40 p.m.)

And if the minister were to decide to close down post offices which show a deficit, I am afraid that several post offices, even in many cities, would also be closed.

I therefore urge the Postmaster General and Communications Minister (Mr. Kierans) to maintain the postal service for the population of Saint-Louis-sur-Richelieu, an agricultural parish in my riding.

Mr. Speaker, it is essential that I inform the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) of the numerous complaints I have received concerning the administration of unemployement insurance, resulting mostly from the transfer of the Saint-Hyacinthe unemployment insurance office.

For a couple of years the citizens of Saint-Hyacinthe have had to go to Longueuil to settle their unemployment insurance matters. In many cases additional expenses and unnecessary delays are the result.

I must add also that some unemployment insurance officers in Longueuil and even elsewhere are a little too zealous and get the claimants tangled up in the tape. Those claimants receive a form and are told to fill it at home and to send it back. If the claimant forgets some detail, even a small one, his form is returned to him for correction. This is a further cause for exasperation to those who are already fed up with being unemployed, without being at the same time continuously humiliated by such things.

I believe that the Minister of Labour, who has a sympathetic understanding of the workers, will give special consideration to such anomalies and inconveniences of which the unemployed are constantly the victims, and that he will put an end to them as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, very briefly indeed, I would like to touch upon a subject of great interest today, and I refer to the problem of Quebec within Canada. We cannot but be aware that Quebec is going through a very difficult period of its history. Many wonder, and rightly so, what will come out of all the protests now being made in Quebec. I am confident that sooner or later, things will calm down and that we will eventually enjoy the peace and quiet which have always prevailed in Quebec.

I wish passionately that we would join our efforts so that the day when we know again the peace and tranquillity we have been used to might come as soon as possible.

I am also one of those who believe sincerely that the place of Quebec is in confederation. Far from considering myself as an expert on the question, nevertheless I base my own observations on what I hear from the man in the street.

It is easy to get people excited, especially when you see which part of the population is being stirred up, but I am earnestly convinced that the population of Quebec wants to remain in confederation and to get the share it deserves.

We have often heard this: "What does Quebec want?"

The answer has been given many times. However, I am wondering if those who were asking this question took the trouble to consider and really understand Quebec's position. To be absolutely frank and sincere, we must recognize the fact that we did not give to a part of the population all the consideration it deserves. As a matter of fact, our English-speaking fellow-members have not given us the attention we were entitled to, and this, in my view, is the root of the troubles we are experiencing.

For too long, this attitude of the conqueror and the conquered has been allowed to prevail across Canada, and it is high time that our English-speaking associates make a superhuman effort—if I may use this expression—in order to preserve unity in this country.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Badanai): Order, please. I regret that the hon. member's time has expired, unless there is unanimous consent for him to continue. Is it agreed that he continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I will certainly not waste the time of the house but I would like to say that it is quite possible for two neighbours to agree. My remarks are made as they come to me. I compare to two neighbours the two entities that make up the people of Quebec. During their life the two neighbours have surely had reasons to disagree; they can even have rather heated discussions. However, if each one wants to be right all the time, to have all the cake there will likely be squabbles and the breach between them will deepen.

The same remark, I believe, applies at the national level. There are certainly differences of opinion between English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians, but instead of withdrawing into ourselves, of constantly harping on the misunderstandings and the disputes of the past, of feeding ceaselessly our own grudges, we should forget the uninspiring things and try to understand one another better, to work together to build a Canada better than the one we have known ourselves, so as to leave that legacy to future generations.

[English]

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to have the opportunity of speaking during this debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Having read or heard the various speeches made by hon. members since the debate began, I wish to say that the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne did themselves proud on the opening day of the session.

• (3:50 p.m.)

There are several items I would like to raise this afternoon, but like other hon. members of the House I feel I must be critical of what is a lack of proper direction by the present administration and a lack of concrete programming policy for the solution of the many problems which face Canada today. Last year we were giving the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government an opportunity to find their feet and outline a program. We hoped that with the start of this new session of parliament we would have something a little more concrete than what we received on opening day.

I point out that we in the opposition should review quite frequently the program and the progress made by the present administration. This brings home to them and the Canadian people the fact which must be crystal clear to an ever-increasing group of Canadians, that all our problems are not being solved. It is not as though this administration has not been in power for a sufficient period of time in which to take action to solve some of our problems. It came into power in April of 1963, although I frankly admit they did not have a majority government until June of 1968, when our present Prime Minister headed the administration. We all recall rather vividly the campaign of 16 months ago when the cry of a "just society" rang from the Atlantic to the Pacific and the people of this nation felt that here was a Moses come to lead us to the promised land.

Many of the major issues which faced us prior to the election in 1968 are far more serious now than they were when this administration took office 16 months ago. The disturbing factor is that solutions to many of the problems have not been offered by the government. I believe it is fair to say that from all appearances this government does not have a program or a solution to many of the major problems facing us. We hear a lot of talk about inflation, which I think is the No. 1 problem facing Canada today. The government tried to solve this problem by cutting back expenditures. This caused more unemployment than we should have in our nation. They have been singularly unsuccessful in reducing the alarming rise in inflation which is facing this nation. In fact, over the past year the rate of increase has accelerated, not decreased. This is an indication the government must be on the wrong track.

The result of the current program by which the government has been attempting to fight the inflationary pressures and trends in this country has meant several things to the Canadian people. I mentioned earlier there was a sharp increase in unemployment. Today it stands at roughly 5 per cent, which is far too high for this time of year. In addition, we find that a very sharp incomes restraint and a reduction in living standards through inflation have placed an additional burden on the backs of pensioners, veterans and welfare recipients. The government has told these people it is not good to increase pensions; they cannot afford to increase the veteran's basic pay because of the inflationary tendencies it would cause.

This government has taken other steps such as releasing many civil servants. One of the most unfortunate cutbacks ever made was the unfair blow dealt to civil servants, especially those in the older age brackets, when the government indicated that people in their 60's would be retired from the service. All that these civil servants have done is grow old; they have reached the age of 60 or a little more. The government decided to take action by retiring them when they could least afford to retire, perhaps at a time when they had accumulated debts which they had to meet out of salaries which they expected to receive over a number of years. I fail to see how this method of dealing with civil servants falls into that of a just society.

I wish to spend a few moments dealing with unemployment. I mentioned earlier that the unemployment rate is now 5 per cent of the labour force, on a seasonally adjusted basis. Forecasts for the coming winter months indicate that it will be an extremely grim time. I do not think there is any doubt that we will see a sharp increase in the unemployment rate all across Canada. There have been forecasts of an unemployment rate amounting to between 7 and 8 per cent, and in some areas which are less favoured economically it is possible that the rate will be 10 per cent. Yet we have received a warning from the Economic Council of Canada over the years that 3 per cent is the limit Canada can afford to carry. The rate has been running much higher than that; in fact, in some instances it has been twice as high. Members on all sides will agree with me that even normal unemployment is wasteful enough because of the tremendous loss of productivity it entails as well as the harmful social effect upon those who suffer from it. Unemployment brought about through the action of the government amounts, in my opinion, to utter stupidity, the more so because it has completely failed in its objective of checking inflation.

Last year the government indicated it was eliminating the winter works program which had been used fairly effectively—at least in my part of the country—by many of the municipalities to ease their winter unemployment rate. We were told at the time that retraining programs would replace the winter works program. In fact, we found that the retraining program covered only a small portion of the unemployed. It was just another example of "too little and too late". Retraining programs are excellent, but more is required; something else must go hand in hand with them. Jobs must be available for those who have acquired new skills, or the retraining is merely a futile and expensive exercise. We have had examples in various parts of the country of cases in which retrained workmen have been unable to obtain jobs.

I should like to deal briefly with the effects of inflation on the incomes and living standards of those receiving fixed incomes. This has always been a problem, one which has upset members in every part of this House. It applies particularly to pensioners of all descriptions, to veterans and to welfare recipients. The government has taken no adequate action to even maintain the purchasing power of these groups over the years. As a result they see their meagre and inadequate purchasing power further declining.

In this age of affluence every Canadian should share in the increasing productivity of the nation. No group, particularly when it includes those who cannot bargain effectively for themselves, should be denied an adequate income. The failure of the government to maintain even the present purchasing power of their fixed incomes is another sure sign that the just society is merely a political phrase used to attract voters at election time. The rapidly rising cost of living over the years has made it imperative that basic pension rates be increased and that a cost of living clause be built into them so as at least to maintain the purchasing power of pensions. Those who helped to build this Canada of ours are surely entitled to share in the ever-increasing prosperity of our nation.

The recent government white paper on veterans pensions must have come as a shock to veterans organizations and to veterans in every part of Canada. As a result of the recommendation of the Woods Committee we had hoped to see adequate increases in basic pensions. This did not materialize. It is another example of the failure of the government to deal adequately with the social needs of this group. Again, the government blames inflation for depriving our veterans of a long awaited improvement in their pension position. I could go on in this vein; there are a host of similar questions which could be raised.

The government has proved altogether inadequate in its handling of the housing situation. I shall not go more deeply into that subject this afternoon because time will not permit. There is one matter I should like to raise in connection with the affairs of my own riding. It concerns air transportation. I raise it this afternoon feeling that in this modern age when air transportation has become so important to every section of our country, effective communication by air is vital to economic and social development.

When one sees air transportation facilities going downhill, and when one finds that air transportation authorities are unable to deal effectively with the situation, I believe the matter must be raised again and again until something is done. I am aware that the Air Transport Committee is looking into the question of air travel in the southern section of British Columbia, but I am not happy about some of the steps it has taken. While airlines on trans-Atlantic routes are reducing their rates we find the commission authorizing increases in my area of up to 30 per cent, even though the service has been cut to a point which is harmful to the needs of those who will use it.

All this makes me wonder what type of planning is going on in the various departments of government. How many letters does one have to write, how many telephone calls does one have to make, how many individuals does one have to visit before it becomes clear that an area has been harmed? The initial planning done by the Air Transport Committee in this connection was poor; it was ineffective and it has hurt the area. I believe a review should be initiated without delay and that a better service should be granted to the area. We are approaching the '70s when air transportation will be one of the keys to economic success, and we cannot afford to see this service go downhill.

I should now like to make a few observations in connection with pollution. I intend to speak somewhat generally, because time will not permit me to cover all the points I should like to raise this afternoon. Members of all parties are extremely interested in pollution. I am very happy to see the newspapers and various news media giving more and more coverage to pollution problems as they arise. Pollution has become one of the major issues facing not only the federal government but all levels of government in Canada. Indeed, it is a major problem facing all nations.

A few years ago we thought that our fresh waters and oceans were so vast that we could not possibly pollute them. We thought our atmosphere was limitless and could not possibly be polluted. We thought our resources of land so extensive that we could not pollute them. We thought the ecology of this world was so varied and diverse that mere man could do little to harm it. We have gone merrily along, ignoring the danger signs, until today we find mankind has imperilled its very existence on this planet. The history of this earth is full of accounts of animal species and civilizations that became extinct because they could not adapt themselves to changing conditions. This is fact. Today the picture is different. We are slowly but surely laying systematic waste to our environment, and unless we make some radical changes, and make them quickly, we will do irreparable harm.

Even people in Canada are becoming pollution conscious. Perhaps a series of world-wide pollution disasters has alerted us to the danger. For example, Mr. Speaker, within the past few months we have learned of the poisoning of the Rhine River. There were stories in the newspapers and on television about the millions of fish that were poisoned. The water supply of millions of people was endangered. The cause was finally traced to two barrels of insecticide that had fallen unnoticed off a river barge two years previously. These barrels had remained on the river bed until they rusted open and brought their death-dealing poisons to all living organisms in the river.

There was a very fine editorial in the Vancouver Province outlining several areas where nations of the world have dumped surplus and obsolete supplies of possibly dangerous pollutants into various parts of our vast oceans. Nations had no previous experience of the damage that could be done to the ecology of the oceans, yet vast supplies of waste material were just dumped.

For example, the United States has dumped thousands of containers of obsolete second world war nerve gas off the New Jersey coast. They do not know how long it will take for these containers to rust through; perhaps it will take a century, maybe two, maybe less. When the containers do rust through, no one knows the result that this injection of poison into the ocean will have ecologically. The British and the French are reported to have dumped chemical warfare agents off their coasts. There is a report that in Sweden a gold mining company prior to the last world war dumped many containers of arsenic into the Baltic Sea. It is estimated there is enough poison in these containers to kill all life in the Baltic. Some day these containers will rust through, the arsenic will seep into the water and mankind will be hard put to finding a solution to a man-made problem that should never have been allowed to arise. More recently we have had the example of poison-gas being dumped off an island in the Pacific by the Japanese, and today conditions on the island are unlivable. Such incidents as these are examples of foolishness on the part of governments that are trying to get rid of what they consider to be obsolete supplies.

In addition to this we pour gas and filth into our air at an astounding rate. Reports from Los Angeles indicate the seriousness of the air pollution problem there. Officials in Los Angeles have announced a program cancelling physical education activity in schools in the area when the smog count reaches a certain level. This level is attained at least 21 times a year. Studies indicate that the children suffer lung damage during heavy physical activity undertaken in such conditions. Smog conditions not as serious as in Los Angeles exist in all major cities in this country, and every year we add to air pollution. An American, Dr. Sternglass, after years of research has claimed that the result of nuclear fallout, even of minor amounts, has been far more devastating than previously expected. His work on infant mortality and its relation to fallout is both revealing and disturbing.

I should like to spend a few minutes on another aspect of pollution, the use of DDT and detergents. In the event that I am unable to complete my remarks on both, I shall deal with the problem of detergents first. A pollution study of the Great Lakes was made in 1965 for the International Joint Commission. The report, which has recently come to hand, indicates that the most serious aspect of detergent pollution is the use of phosphorous in detergents. We are all aware that phosphorous helps nourish the algae which choke the waters of the Great Lakes system. The report points out that 50 to 70 per cent of the phosphorous in this fresh water supply area comes from detergents. The recommendation of the report is that the use of phosphorous by detergent manufacturers should be banned within the next two years. The point that worries me is this. We in Canada have carried out no study or research into this question. I think we should have done so in past years.

We might say that we can rely a great deal on what is done to the south of us because in the United States they are doing far more research than we are. However, in reply to questions asked in this House, various ministers have indicated there is today no danger in the use of DDT as far as Canada is concerned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of saying a few words on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and of congratulating its movers for having had the courage to describe, in their speeches, the present economic unrest throughout our beautiful Canada.

The government was not praised inordinately. Mention was made of the unemployment and poverty in our ridings, of the various economic problems and financial difficulties with which our municipalities, school boards and provinces are grappling. In this regard, the Prime Minister said that the situation was not logical or normal, and that we should work to improve it.

I should like to quote a few words spoken by the Prime Minister, as they appear in Hansard for Friday, October 24, 1969:

> Unemployment is an insult to human dignity, and so is an impersonal welfare system. It is also an indignity to provide insufficient protection to our citizens against criminal activities. Every Canadian should feel proud of himself in the presence of his children and his neighbours and he should be able to rely on every level of the government in this respect. Canadian society does not have an overflow of skills; we cannot therefore afford to waste the smallest contribution that each individual can bring to the country.

One must admit that the present situation is not what it should be.

Our economy is not what it should be. It is stagnating and off balance. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) told us, on Monday, October 27, something that contradicts what was said by the Prime Minister, and the movers (Messrs. Cullen and Marceau) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

It is said that we should upgrade our strength. That we should do more for society, that we should expand our efforts so that our talents do not go astray—this is what the Prime Minister said—and the Minister of Finance wants to stand in the way of all that when he says:

> I have said before and I repeat that the number one problem we face in this country today is the persistent upward spiral in prices, costs and incomes. Other than this, we have a prosperous and viable economy. However, unless and until we bring this spiral of inflation under effective control, all the aspirations of this house toward a better life for all Canadians, all our hopes for continuous high employment, for a rising standard of living and justice for the poor and the depressed in our country, will come to nought.

But why do we experience that spiral of inflation in peace time while we never experienced any in war time? That is what I will try to explain.

How is it that in Russia, a communist country, there is no inflation? In Canada, we cannot balance our economy in order to settle this problem and due to that inflationary spiral, we keep on making many rich people richer and 80 per cent of the people poorer. Twenty per cent of the people are responsible for inflation and I will say at once that our chartered banks have increased their assets by $6,600 million in one year, which is twice the value of the bank notes issued by the Bank of Canada since 1934, that is since its institution 35 years ago.

Never have the banks made such profits, and not only the banks but other lending institutions which lend money at rates ranging from 10 to 20 per cent. Those institutions are the ones which make profits and create inflation, while the cost of inflation is borne by those who are laid flat, that is 80 per cent of the Canadian population. Because of credit restrictions and rising interest rates of every kind, they can no longer carry on. And they are being asked to pay the cost of inflation.

At the hearings of the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, I met the Governor of the Bank of Canada and asked him a question. He was saying that Canadians had been prosperous long enough and that this should cease. But why has prosperity lasted long enough? According to him, Canadians had to tighten their belts to settle the problem of inflation. Then I asked him how come his $50,000 salary had been raised to $75,000? Why had every senior official of the government enjoyed similar increases while the people of Canada had to tighten their belts? The senior officials however loosen theirs. It is quite all right for them to have increases in salaries, increases here, increases there, not to mention expenses paid.

The people have a right to live, for they are the ones who work, who build the country; and not just the executive class.

The government is not producing anything; it is only ensuring the administration and if it is not capable of administering a country that is crammed with riches, where wheat is plentiful, if it cannot succeed in giving the population what they are entitled to, then it might as well resign, because it is a poor manager. That is what we have in parliament and within the Public Service: senior civil servants who are incapable of finding another solution to the problem besides increasing taxes, the cost of living, the interest rates, thus enriching a small part of the population and impoverishing the rest.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

This cannot last much longer. We know of much dissatisfaction in Canada. We witness all sorts of phenomenons that we have never seen in the past. We see deplorable strikes. There is dissatisfaction, riots because the people have not got what they are entitled to.

• (4:30 p.m.)

The people are unfortunately no longer able to get the necessities of life without having to kneel before the big financiers and borrow money bearing an interest rate of 15 or 20 per cent. It is impossible to do anything without incurring debts that cannot be repaid, that remain forever. That is the situation which we must bring to an end.

Although the Canadian economy is still the most flourishing in the world, as the Minister of Finance said, although generally speaking the capitalist economy, that of the free enterprise, is still inferior to that of socialism or communism, I maintain, and I have evidence to prove it, that the Canadian economy, our capitalistic, free enterprise economy, involves certain basic deficiencies like inflation, the rise in the cost of living, interest rates, unemployment, numerous strikes, which are only visible symptoms appearing at certain times and at certain places.

The basic weakness of our economy, the only source of all the ailments afflicting our economy today is the increase in interest rates. This single cause of our numerous economic ailments stems from the very core of Canada's capitalist, free-enterprise economy. It would be very easy to eliminate it. Nothing indeed would be easier than restoring the balance between the various elements which constitute our economy.

Be it in any country of the world, subject to any political regime, be it capitalism, socialism or communism, everywhere on our planet, which is called Earth, there are natural ressources. Indeed, it is easy to see that everywhere people cultivate, work, produce, consume, save, finance.

Everywhere healthy adults must carry the onus of production for all the citizens in the world at large including those who are either too young, too old, too sick or too uneducated to earn a living in a society whose duty is to protect them.

In 1969 here in Canada, with the output of 8 million adult citizens, with their capital and labour we have a gross national product of 72 billion for the benefit of 21 million Canadians, including 13 million people too young, too old, too sick or too uneducated too look after themselves in our capitalistic society of free enterprise.

If we divide $72 billion by 21 million citizens we get an annual per capita product of $3,400, or $17,000 for a family of five. Further computations would give us an amount of $65 per week and per person, or $325 for a family of five. I quote those figures for the benefit of our economists who love to base their estimations on averages.

Such figures are very encouraging and such a high G.N.P. is amply sufficient for the 21 million Canadians to be reasonably well off, while enabling the most qualified and most deserving citizens to maintain their income level and enjoy decent wages.

If our national product is so good, what are we complaining about? Let us not be poetical and vague. I will not beat around the bush. I shall mention our problems and our troubles, but, more particularly, I shall search for their causes and suggest a few solutions. Is this not logical, is this not what we all want?

The problem does not lie in a lack of production, but rather in an imbalance in its distribution. This is the basis of all economic troubles which are undermining our national, family and personal life.

Whether we like it or not, our country has 21 million inhabitants, 8 million of whom are producers as a result of their capital and their work and 13 million of whom have no capital income whatsoever. Those 21 million Canadians have the right to draw on the national product of $72 billion, which we owe to the 8 million producing Canadians who get wages for their work and interests for their capital. In the production of goods and services, there are expenses for wages, labour, and capital interests.

Every time the wages of workers are raised and every time capitalists increase their interest rates, the 8 million producing citizens, as well as the 13 million non producing Canadians automatically have to pay more for goods and services.

Here is the basic weakness of our Canadian economy of the capitalist, free enterprise type. Productive citizens have an income resulting from their work and assets, which constitute for them a purchasing power, while 13 million non-productive citizens, unemployed and witout any income, depend on the productive citizens.

All our economists, politicians, administrators and university teachers have refused to date to analyse this simple matter of the income of the individual, of the citizen in relation with his right to live, and everybody wants to consider only the value of work and capital in terms of production as a source of income giving the right to national production.

Instead of carrying on so much research and so many inquiries into the apparent ills of our economy, poverty, inflation, strikes, unemployment, the cost of living, the increase in interest rates, let us go directly to the heart of the matter. Let us hasten to put some order in the Canadian economy between its various components, and at the same time, we will have resolved all the problems that can be summed up by a lack of balance between the incomes, expenditures and profits of all citizens, families, and corporations that need to be better managed.

Whether we like it or not, whether we realize it or not, with all due respect to Mr. Keynes, there is only one normal administrative formula, whatever the importance of the organization to be administered: it is the formula "Incomes-Expenditures-Profits". One formula for all. Let us not look for any other, because I think nobody will be able to find one.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Every company needs revenues to pay its expenses, make some profit and build a reserve for its development and security. Every private or public company, every community, church, school, university, bank, industry, business or farm needs revenues to its operating and other expenses, make a little profit and provide for its development and security. All accountants are fully aware of that, so long as they deal with their own business or that of their companies, their institutions or the people they are responsible for.

Mr. Speaker, the same formula: "revenues, expenses, profits", the sole capitalist formula, valid everywhere, applies just as well and perhaps even better to the private citizens and their families, to the farmers and the small personal and family enterprises.

Indeed, this same income-expense-profit formula is also needed for the 13 million Canadians who have the right to live in Canada. Even if they do not derive any income from their work or their investments, they all have the right to live in Canada in 1969 on the national production of $72 billion made possible by the 8 million Canadians who are paid for their work and are receiving interest on their capital.

Let us not try to produce any more or to make bigger profits until we have restored national economic equality among people, families, corporations and re-established a balance between incomes, expenses and profits. All have a right to derive some income from the national production which should prove sufficient to cover their expenses and even to get a little profit, build some reserve, security, capital for themselves, their family or the community.

Everybody can see that I am more of a capitalist than a creditiste. I am not asking for credit or for income, but I am asking for money, for capital. I want to make that quite clear. It is easy to see that I am much more of a capitalist than all the members put together.

I am in favour of profit, of higher income and in favour of citizens, but what I want for myself, for businesses, for companies, for municipalities, for provinces or for the country, I also want it in equal proportions for every Canadian citizen, for every Canadian family.

This is what administration is all about. This is the way to run things. This is the stand we should take, how we must develop our human feelings and also, how we must work to balance our economy which is so much out of balance that the more we apply it, the more we unbalance our system, the more we disrupt to our economy.

Here is the basis of our capitalism. The formula which is so good, so promising, so stimulating for all those who are engaged in setting up private or state enterprises, must be as promising and stimulating for every citizen and family which make up the population of Canada.

In the present circumstances, it is essential to realize that it is not a matter of raising or reducing interest rates on capital, of increasing or lowering salaries in proportion to work, but simply of determining whether to balance the national economy among its various constitutive elements.

Poverty, unemployment, recessions, inflation, wars, revolutions, separatism, protest, higher cost of living, higher interest rates, higher taxes, unemployment insurance, old age pensions, allowances, welfare benefits, all those things obviously indicate a lack of balance in the distribution of a overly large national production.

We are so rich that nobody should be without the necessaries and even luxuries in Canada.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

This inward and subconscious feeling of every right-minded citizen seeks to express itself in some way or other through various intellectual, aggressive and even violent means, when the authorities have turned a deaf ear to reasonable arguments and advice.

Let us stop raising interest rates. This is of no consequence at the present time. The inflation will persist until order and balance are restored on the national level among all the components of our national economy, beginning with the individual, the family and all the public and private corporations which make up our Canadian nation.

Is that project not comforting? Is it not the best? Would one rather have a small part of the people experience inflation while most of them would be subject to deflation? Until we decide to throw everything out and to start anew, from scratch, as happened in Russia in 1917, we must apply everywhere and as soon as possible our capitalistic formula: Income —Expenses—Profits, for the benefit of individuals, families and companies.

I would have several things to say, but I shall go on attempting to demonstrate that our economy is far from balanced. Our economy is far from satisfying our citizens.

You only have to use your head to know what it is all about. For example, how is it that a world which seemed almost feverishly prosperous in 1929, capable of offering an affluence of commodities and services, became poverty-stricken in 1930? That apparent change was so fundamental that economic conditions were drastically changed.

Is it reasonable to imagine that, between a certain day of October 1929 and a few months later, the world really went from great riches to dire poverty? Yet, the soil has never refused to bend under the plow and produce.

How is it that after knowing scarce money for ten years, all of a sudden, overnight, the necessary funds were found to wage a war which lasted six years and cost billions of dollars? Many of you are aware of this.

After the war, why did we fail at the same task? We were unable to avoid other recessions and the unemployment they create simply because, once again, we tried to fool around with monetary policies based on a system which creates bank debts. Since confederation, this same bank system has never given other results than the repetition of cycles—prosperity in wartime, recession in peacetime.

The first goal of our Canadian economy must be to increase the standard of living of Canadians, as much as possible, through the full use of our manpower and our natural resources. It is unfairly impossible to try to reach that goal with a banking system under which money, created out of nothing in a proportion of 96 per cent in Canada, is being circulated in the form of an interest-bearing debt, which compels us to reimburse more money that has been issued.

We will never reach that goal with a banking system the prime purpose of which is to make money and by forcing the borrowers to repay both the money loaned and the interests, owing to that ineffable conspiration born of the madness of finance.

This objective can only be reached by creating a banking system and a banking policy that will ensure a constant flow of money or a sufficient purchasing power not only for producing all possible goods in keeping with our human and natural resources, but also for making feasible the distribution of our national production or its equivalent.

I would very much like to know why the governments, Liberal as well as Conservative, have always refused so far to amend the Bank Act and to require Parliament to issue at cost at least part of the currency which the country needs as far as the public sector is concerned. In the past, governments have failed to assume their responsibilities by granting private institutions the exclusive right to issue credit money which is 90 per cent of our economic machinery.

Therefore, money is in short supply while production is potentially high enough to meet normal human needs and if money starts flowing when producers and production facilities are requisitioned by the military, that is because the present monetary system forces decisions on us instead of simply reflecting the free acts of free producers and consumers.

Nobody would dare say that producers and consumers are free today when they have to creep on all fours through the financial system and over the credit restraints, unable to do anything—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with my colleagues in congratulating the movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) that I share his concern for the relevancy of this house. Sometimes we find that Canadians have a hard time understanding why parliament is not more relevant.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is comforting indeed to see members from the province of Quebec, like the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau), express so proudly in this house their satisfaction at being a part of the Canadian Confederation. I believe the separatist element in Quebec has become a political fact and that it is at the political level that it will have to be defeated. That is why I am happy to see members like the hon. member for Lapointe concern themselves with federalism.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the government of my support for the Speech from the Throne. There is one part of it that I support unreservedly, namely where the government expresses its intention of granting franchise to 18-year-old Canadians. I believe all politicians in Canada, at all levels of government, are now anxious to get active participation from all classes of society. Young people have shown these last years that they could get organized so as to take part in the life of the Canadian society. Members in this house or Canadian people as a whole should not judge well-organized participation of young university students from the few acts of violence that may happen sometimes.

Of course the Speech from the Throne does not solve all the immediate problems. It does not bring any direct solution either to the problems of my constituents, but I believe a government should be strong, that it should do some planning and should not be led into quick solutions.

During this debate, the opposition and its leader seemed to talk a lot about the needs of the little man, of the poor, but they offered no solution other than to say that the government should spend more money on social welfare or other programs to solve the problem of poverty.

Mr. Speaker, I am every bit as concerned as the members of the opposition about finding a solution to the problem of poverty in Canada. There are as many poor people in my riding as anywhere else in Canada, but I believe those people trust this government; the poor as well as the others are convinced that what we need is a strong government, one that plans wisely and will, in due course, find solutions to those problems.

In his recent speech, the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau), submitted many problems to the house and drew the attention to many situations that are really disastrous. But he seems to be slightly mixed up. He said, for instance, that the fishermen should cut their own channels. Is the federal government alone to be blamed for that? It is true that it is the federal government's job to deal with the harbours and it is perhaps true that it is the federal government who is in charge of the piers. But must one blame the federal government only if some fishermen, in a given constituency, are badly organized? There are also some in mine.

But it would be unfair to blame the federal government alone. We must take constructive steps together with the provinces, and attempt to solve these problems.

The hon. member was confusing the issue, talking about social welfare, housing, all matters which come under provincial jurisdiction. But he still blamed this government for not finding an immediate solution.

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) has taken part in the debate and I appreciate the fact that he stressed the plight of the Newfoundland fishermen. But he did not offer any solution to the problem and was satisfied to blame the Prime Minister for being at the National Arts Center while Montreal was burning.

I wonder what relation there can be between the Prime Minister's private life and the problems which might exist in the city of Montreal? That is the type of attitude that we sometimes find in the opposition.

When the question of poverty arises in my area, it is often in reference to coastal fishermen, who are at present living under circumstances that are intolerable from many points of view.

First of all, they have no conveniences of any kind; secondly, they are not organized. When decisions are in the offing, when programs are to be announced, it is impossible for the government to find out the views of the fishermen, because they are not organized. I am happy to see that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) is in the house. I hope he will soon give some attention to the creation of organizations for the fishermen in order that they may find some guidance and take part in policy-making both on the federal and the provincial levels, so that such problems may be solved.

I do not think that in 1969, for example, fishermen need to get their boats on the shore without any equipment. It is true their industry is not economically sound but they should not be blamed. It is not their fault if they have been fishing in coastal waters for years. To change the situation, social development programs will be necessary. Fishermen will have to get organized and know where they stand.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, this house stands adjourned until eleven o'clock Monday morning, pursuant to Standing Order 2 (2).

At five o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHANGES IN CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC ESTABLISHMENTS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief announcement concerning forthcoming changes in Canadian representation in certain parts of the world.

In Latin America, we are proposing to close our offices in the Dominican Republic, Ecuador and Uruguay. In each case, our resident mission has been headed by a chargé d'affaires, with the ambassador resident in a neighbouring country. The ambassadors concerned will continue to be accredited to these countries and normal diplomatic relations will be maintained. Visits by the ambassador and his staff to countries without resident representation will be frequent and regular to ensure that official business between Canada and the countries affected is carried on and Canadian trade and other interests furthered effectively. The closing of these missions in Latin America does not affect the government's expressed intention to seek closer ties with that part of the world. We are satisfied that the improvement of communications in the Caribbean and South America will enable us to maintain adequate contact with the countries concerned while permitting redeployment of our resident staff in the interests of greater efficiency.

We propose to close the small office we have maintained in Berlin. Our ambassador in Bonn, who has been head of that mission, will continue to be accredited in that capacity and will, as in the past, make regular visits to Berlin as evidence of Canada's commitment to the security and welfare of that city.

We propose to close our resident High Commission in Nicosia. Our relations with Cyprus and any diplomatic assistance required by our forces there can be provided for effectively through dual accreditation of the Canadian representatives to a neighbouring country. There is no connection between this decision and the question of our continuing participation in the United Nations peacekeeping forces on the island. Canada remains deeply concerned in the search for a solution to the Cyprus dispute and is willing to make whatever contribution it can to the settlement of the problem.

In recent years, the International Control Commissions in Laos and Cambodia have, for a variety of reasons, been unable to perform the functions assigned to them. We have therefore decided that little useful purpose would be served by maintaining our present physical presence in Vientiane and Phnom Penh. Canada remains a member of both commissions and will fulfil its commitments as before. As these commitments are not expected to be onerous, it is intended that the Canadian commissioner in Viet Nam will serve on the other two commissions. In Laos arrangements will also be made to maintain local contact with the other members of the commission. Our aid program in Laos and Cambodia will be run from the Canadian delegation in Saigon.

These actions have been taken with the utmost regret and after long and careful study. They are dictated by the need for economy and do not reflect any lessening of Canada's interest in the areas concerned or suggest that our relations with them have diminished in importance. The governments concerned have been notified.

• (11:10 a.m.)

Further economies in the Department of External Affairs will be effected by substantial reductions in resident staff in other posts and missions, by cutting back on planned capital expenditures, by reductions in the cultural, information and military assistance programs and by continuing to scrutinize administrative expenses carefully, reducing them where possible.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I believe it was on Friday that the Prime Minister rebuked one of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party for listening to canards, paying attention to leaks and so on.

What was a leak on Friday is, in fact, a communiqué on Monday.

I am impressed by the reference to cutbacks in operations in Latin America, recalling very well the loud blowing of trumpets when a certain ministerial group came back from that part of the world some months ago, and noting the reference in the Speech from the Throne to the intensification of Canada's contacts with the government and people of that area. I suppose there is some sort of inverse logic by which one could prove that curtailing the number of posts abroad might improve our contacts with the governments and peoples of foreign countries, but I would find that reasoning highly unflattering if I were a member of the Department of External Affairs. It would now seem to me that the prospect of this government leading Canada into the Organization of American States is very bleak at the present time.

It is not possible at this stage, in the proceedings on motions, to make a value judgment whether the closing of a post in Nicosia is a better move than the opening of one in Mauritius. These are matters which would have to be considered with greater care.

I am not sure I greet with happiness the reference to the International Control Commission. I have often thought there was a lack of faith in that organization and that as the Viet Nam war continued something much more effective might have been done, had there been the will, through the kind of grouping around which the ICC was involved. It strikes me that what we have noted today represents an abandonment of hope that this group can become more effective, that it is withering away and that, in fact, Canada's blessing has been given to this process.

I hope the minister's goals will be realized, but as to that we shall have to live in faith.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, one can readily agree it is a desirable exercise to cut out any fat which can be removed from a department, and one would be readily disposed to consider the suggestions made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs had he gone a little further and told us precisely what he expects to save in terms of dollars and cents. It seems to me that the saving to the Canadian people and to the Canadian treasury as a result of the changes he has announced must be relatively small, even minimal, at a very considerable expense to Canada's role in the world. I hope the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence will take up the question of precisely how much is being saved by these changes.

I cannot find any fault, for example, with the decision to close the little office, as the minister calls it, in Berlin. Obviously the embassy in Bonn can deal with this responsibility. It seems to me, however, that to lessen our representation in Latin America at this time just does not make sense, particularly when we are attempting to improve our relations with Latin American countries.

As for the reference to the International Control Commissions, it occurs to me that at a time when the situation in southeast Asia is becoming more, rather than less, complex with the possible approach of peace, a country such as ours might well be taking on a bigger rather than a smaller role there, particularly when one bears in mind the problems confronting Laos through the presence of North Vietnamese and other military in that country. To eliminate entirely our representation in that part of the world, to say that our commissioner in Saigon will look after the situation while we still remain a member of the ICC, seems doubtful wisdom to me. I think hon. members would have to have proof that these savings were really important and could be substantiated before this kind of cutting down could be accepted with equanimity.

Before I was elected to parliament some years ago I lived in Ottawa for some time, and since I have been elected to parliament I have lived here most of the time. I have always been impressed by the fact that it took the Department of External Affairs at least a quarter of a century to build up a group of foreign service officers of very high calibre that compared favourably with that of any other country in the world. I express very profound doubt whether it is sensible to cut into this group of men and women who have represented Canada to great effect and with great credit. I end as I began, Mr. Speaker, by saying that we would have to be persuaded that the savings really justify this kind of myopic cutting down.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I was sorry to read last week in the French newspapers of the decision taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to close a number of Canadian diplomatic missions throughout the world.

I was somewhat surprised by the procedure but I come to my conclusion that it was perhaps easier to have the press translate a statement than the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

It is regretful to note that we plan to close embassies, especially in Latin America, where the presence of Canada is necessary to fight the subversion and poverty which are prevailing there, at a time when Communism is expanding. In my opinion, it is necessary to maintain good relations there.

Yet, although it claims that it wants to save a few dollars, the same government intends to open some embassies in Communist countries.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are asking ourselves some questions and rightly so I think. We believe that by acting in such a way, the government is leaning to the left and we object to this.

PESTICIDES

DDT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF MEASURES TO CONTROL USE

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, an important objective of this government is the protection and enhancement of man's environment and, in harmony with this objective, the protection of man, crops and livestock from pests. One of the most successful pest control agents, DDT, has now been shown to have detrimental effects on the environment. Therefore I wish to make a statement on this pesticide.

We have studied the current data on the safety of DDT as it relates to human health and to its effects on wildlife, including fish. Our research shows that our environment is now widely contaminated with DDT residues. These residues are mostly at low levels but have concentrated sufficiently in a few populations of birds and fish to cause reproductive failures and the elimination of a few bird populations over large parts of their normal range. DDT applications have also caused direct kills of fish.

There is no evidence that present levels of DDT in the Canadian diet have caused injury to humans. Nevertheless, in the light of the persistence of DDT, its deleterious effects on wildlife, and lack of clearcut evidence about its long-term effects on man, it is prudent to curtail contamination of the environment by it.

Within the Government, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) administers the Pest Control Products Act which regulates pesticides offered for sale to assure that they are effective and safe when used as labelled. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) administers the Food and Drugs Act which has as one of its major objectives the assurance that foods do not contain pesticide residues at levels in excess of those established as safe for lifetime consumption.

• (11:20 a.m.)

[Translation]

The government has taken action in recent years to limit the amount of DDT used by federal agencies.

Hon. members probably know, that two years ago we discontinued the use of DDT in the protection of forests. In 1968 we eliminated the use of DDT in national parks and by 1969 aerial use by the armed forces. We have now completed a year-long review of the overall use pattern of formulations accepted for registration for sale under the Pest Control Products Act. After January 1, 1970, DDT will not be registered for insect and biting fly control in forests, parks, and other outdoor areas except under emergency situations and only after careful consultation between federal and provincial interdepartmental committees.

In addition, whereas in 1969 DDT was registered for the control of insects on 62 food crops, in 1970 registration will be granted under the Pest Control Products Act for use on only 12 agricultural crops. It is estimated that all these actions will reduce the amount of DDT used by at least 90 per cent. The remaining uses of DDT will be retained until practical, safe replacement compounds or other protective measures are available.

The federal government, of course, recognizes and commends the partial controls already implemented by some provinces. It was felt, however, that more comprehensive and unified action was required at this time.

Concomitant with the revised use pattern we are, under the Food and Drugs Act, reducing the tolerance for DDT from seven parts per million to one part per million for 61 common vegetables and fruits such as beans, carrots, corn, lettuce, peas, tomatoes, strawberries, and all citrus fruits. For apples, pears, and celery, the DDT tolerance will be reduced to three and a half parts per million. The only tolerance for DDT that will remain unchanged at seven parts per million is for the fat of the meat of cattle, hogs and sheep. This tolerance will be further reduced or eliminated when practical replacement compounds are available to us and our trading partners. There are no tolerances for DDT in potatoes and no tolerances for any pesticide residues in eggs, fish, milk, butter, cheese, ice cream and other dairy products. Our goal will be to effect further reductions in some of these tolerances and to eliminate others.

Bon appétit, Mr. Speaker!

[English]

Lest you are concerned about the levels of DDT in food, I think you should know that the Food and Agriculture and World Health Organizations of the United Nations, on the advice of expert scientific groups, have declared maximum acceptable daily intakes for humans on the basis of ingestion for a lifetime. For DDT, the recommended maximum daily acceptable intake is 0.7 milligrams. The average Canadian diet contains less than 5 per cent of this amount and food contributes 80 per cent to 90 per cent of the total intake of DDT by the general public.

In concluding this announcement I wish to emphasize that our scientists are world leaders in research toward the minimal but effective use of chemicals in pest control. This government will continue to examine all scientific evidence and intensify its own research program into pesticides, including organo-chlorine and other persistent compounds. The government of Canada will continue to play a leading international role in moves to protect and enhance man's total environment.

To this end, Canada has been an active member of international organizations, the role of which is to develop international standards for pesticides based on sound health and ecological principles and the needs of international trade. Canada will continue and will intensify its work in these organizations.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I welcome in general this move announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). A good many of us, and I think the country generally, have been quite concerned about the effects of DDT upon our environment, our wildlife and eventually upon human health ever since reading that very striking book written by the late Rachel Carson some years ago. I believe a few years ago following that book and other publications a committee of the House conducted an investigation into this subject.

I am a little disturbed, because of the duration of time over which public concern has been expressed, that the government appears to be following rather than leading. I hope one can really place firm reliance upon the assurances given by the Prime Minister concerning the efforts Canadian scientists and the Canadian government are to make in the future with regard to pesticides generally, their safety and environmental effects.

I am also a little surprised by what I take to be the implication in the Prime Minister's announcement that it is only during the past year that the government has been conducting in any sense a full-scale examination of the environmental effects of the use of DDT. It was announced that it had been decided, I think in 1968, not to use DDT in our own forests and parks and in 1969 the aerial use by the armed forces was stopped. But the Prime Minister said that the government has now completed a year long review of the over-all use pattern of formulations acceptable for registration. I may say, if this means what it seems to mean, I am shocked that it is only over the past year the government has been conducting in a serious way an examination of the over-all use.

There have been a number of indications lately of the care with which miracle pesticides and miracle substitutes must be examined, and there has been a growing concern about the way in which we are polluting our environment by, among other methods, using pesticides which have very profound residual effects. So generally I welcome the announcement and hope it means that the government of Canada is really going to take a sustained interest in and conduct an examination of such pesticides and substitutes.

I am a little concerned with regard to what consultation has taken place with farm organizations and what the effect of this announcement will be on agriculture when it has to turn quickly to certain substitutes. I would like to hope there has been some consultation with the provinces which have an interest in the effect on their agricultural industry.

Above all, I do not see any indication in the statement by the Prime Minister that the government has really been placing the emphasis it should have been placing upon the development of substitutes which would have a satisfactory cost effectiveness so far as our farmers are concerned. Certainly there is no mention of consultation with the provinces, particularly the provincial departments of agriculture. I hope that in fact there has been such consultation. In view of the difficulty many forms of agriculture are facing, I hope a really determined effort is being made to develop satisfactory pesticide substitutes with appropriate cost effectiveness.

Having said this, having placed emphasis upon the need for consultation with the provinces, I also note that in the Prime Minister's statement there is no assurance that all departments of the government will comply with bans imposed by the provinces. I express very fervently the hope that all federal departments will in fact comply with general bans on the use of DDT imposed by any province and that the Prime Minister will be prepared to give such an assurance.

However, with these caveats—I do not want to be misunderstood in any sense—I certainly welcome the statement by the Prime Minister and his announcement that these steps are being taken to cut down the use of DDT very substantially. I only hope that the lesson that has been learned will in fact encourage the government and its departments to have a sharper eye in the future for difficulties of this sort, and to give the problem, in co-operation with other countries, its most urgent and effective attention.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, our group certainly welcomes the statement made by the Prime Minister this morning in regard to DDT. However, I feel, as did the previous speaker, that action of this type is long overdue. Frankly, I have been amazed at the lengthy delay in government action on this important matter. It has been the work of the provinces and other groups which have done a vast amount of research into the dangers of pesticides that has really forced the issue so far as the government is concerned.

I can recall asking a question three months ago of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) regarding DDT and its effect on foods so far as Canadians are concerned. We were assured at that time that there was no danger and nothing to worry about. Three months later we find that the government has decided to take action and ban the use of DDT in certain cases.

I think it is only fair to point out that the Prime Minister has indicated that other research is going on into other types of pesticides because there are a number of toxic pesticides that are just as dangerous as DDT. A number of reports—I have a couple on my desk—some of them over a year old, have been prepared by wildlife associations in the United States which point out that a group of very dangerous pesticides, which have been and are being used today in the United States, Canada and other countries in the world, is having a bad effect on our environment. There is no doubt that in some cases the effects certainly are not as bad as those of DDT but they are traceable, and we find that practically all living organisms in every part of the world have some trace of these pesticides in them. It seems to me that Canadian research facilities to study these problems have been inadequate.

As I said, the action taken by the government now is a step forward and our group certainly welcomes it. But may I point out to the Prime Minister and the government that this is just one small phase of the pollution problem. Just a week or two ago we received a report dealing with detergents containing phosphorus. Two years is suggested as the time to be allowed before the production of detergents containing phosphorus must stop. I suggest to the government that this is another phase of pollution which must be tackled without delay. Research must go forward to ensure, when a change is made by these companies in the manufacturing of their various products, that a suitable product is substituted. There are other aspects of pollution with which I will not deal at present, such as pollution of the atmosphere which must not be allowed to continue much longer. Again in this case we have a report prepared by the United Nations dealing with the inherent dangers to mankind unless we move quickly.

I congratulate the government on this initial move, and I urge that a whole series of investigations be made to deal with the series of grave pollution problems at present threatening the very existence of mankind.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, naturally, we cannot but be happy that the government has finally decided to do something about a problem dealing with the protection of the people of this country.

But as the previous speakers, I can only say that the government never leads the way, it is not an innovator although it is quite a good follower sometimes.

Ontario and Quebec having recently taken a stand in that matter, the federal government has finally decided to act.

But, Mr. Speaker, from the way the government is proceeding, it is obvious that it lacks the initiative so urgently needed in the country.

An important objective of my government is the protection and enhancement of man's environment and, in harmony with this objective, the protection of man, crops, and livestock from pests.

House of Commons

From that you might think that the government has always cared about that matter, whereas it is well known that it is taking action at last only under pressure from other governments, that is the provincial governments.

Needless to say, we are not blaming the federal government for taking some action, but we are blaming it for sometimes doing it only when it feels that it cannot do otherwise, when it wishes to be ahead of the others or to take credit for having taken the initiative. That is a perfect example of the way the federal government operates.

However, we congratulate it once again for having taken some action and we also express the wish that it will continue to destroy another form of DDT which is poisoning the whole population and which could be described as follows: deficit, debts, taxes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HOURS OF SITTING, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 7

Hon. H. A. Olson (for the President of the Privy Council) moved:

That, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 6(3), on Friday, November 7, 1969, the sitting shall be suspended at 3.00 o'clock p.m., and resumed at 5.45 o'clock p.m.

• (11:40 a.m.)

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion between the government side and members of the other parties about this motion, and some of the reasons for it have been made apparent to the house leaders. But I suggest with due deference that at this time either the minister or another minister might make a statement indicating the reasons behind the motion so that all hon. members may have an opportunity to understand what is involved and, hopefully, may then feel free to express their approval or disapproval. I think it would be useful if this were done so that all the circumstances would be made known at this time.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I agree there have been consultations and my understanding is that there was general agreement. But I would also agree that there should be a brief statement on the reasons, and perhaps the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) would make it.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has indicated that the government white paper on tax reform will be tabled in the House on Friday, November 7, at 6 p.m., and it is being proposed that for the first time there be an opportunity for all members of the House who desire it to have an advance briefing about the white paper before it is formally tabled in the House. It is therefore proposed that this briefing, which would be on a confidential basis, would take place in the Railway Committee Room and would begin at 3 p.m.

It was thought that it would be useful, because of the great interest on the part of members on both sides of the House in this matter, to give the widest opportunity to members who wish to do so to attend the briefing. The House is therefore being asked to consent to suspend its sitting on Friday, November 7, from 3 p.m. to 5.45 p.m.

If the motion is accepted it is my understanding that at 5.45 p.m. the bells would ring so that the House can then resume, basically for the purpose of having the white paper tabled by the appropriate time. It is also my understanding that once this was done there would be a motion for the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I say that I do not think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) was quite right in saying there was unanimous consent. I indicated that the proposition which the government made was not an unreasonable one but that there were other hon. members who were involved, who were interested, and that the question of the timing might be of concern to them. It was for this reason I suggested that a statement be made now so that these other hon. members might have an opportunity, before the question is put by Your Honour, to indicate their views.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish merely to say on behalf of our party that the statement made by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) is in accordance with the discussions that have taken place among House leaders. We accept the proposition that it might be a good idea to make available to Members of Parliament the same kind of briefing that on occasions like this is made available to members of the press. One of my colleagues suggests that on that basis we might become as well informed as the press. I do not quite know what he means by that.

But, Mr. Speaker, before hon. members accept this gracious invitation to go into the room where the briefing will take place they should be told that the doors will be locked and once they get in they cannot get out for any purpose whatsoever until 5.45 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, there have in fact been consultations between the various opposition parties and the government regarding the briefing session which the government has scheduled for next Friday, November 7.

It seems that the government is preparing for a very important statement. Will such a statement be favourable or prejudicial to the Canadian people?

Be it as it may, my colleagues and myself are astonished at this procedure. We feel that the briefing session could have taken place right here in this House where all necessary services are available. However, since the Minister without Portfolio assures us that adequate equipment will be available in the Railway Committee Room, we agree to his proposal.

[English]

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I think the House appreciates what the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) said. However, I am at a loss to know, and he did not explain, why this paper could not be presented on Thursday evening at eight o'clock as is done with budgets. If this were done, members of the House could be briefed from six o'clock till eight o'clock and the paper could be tabled in the House at eight o'clock.

Late on Friday afternoon a number of members of the House catch planes to go home for the weekend. This is a most inopportune time to have this briefing, and I would like the minister to explain why this could not be done on Thursday night.

Mr. Speaker: It would be irregular to allow the minister to make a second statement at this time, but if hon. members wish to allow him to make a second statement in answer to the question asked by the hon. member, the Chair will comply with their wishes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gray: Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I wish to confirm what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said. He put forward perhaps more broadly what I said in my initial remarks in regard to the briefing being on a confidential basis. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) has asked why the briefing and the tabling are to take place on Friday. Without taking time to go into detail may I say it was felt, often considering all the circumstances, such as the hours of closing of markets, the attendance of all those who wished to take part in the briefing—press, provincial officials and so on—and in particular the interest of hon. members, that the most appropriate time could be only on the afternoon of Friday, November 7, with the tabling to take place at six o'clock on that day.

[Translation]

Finally, I wish to reiterate the assurance I have already given the members of the Créditiste party. All the necessary steps will be taken to have the required interpretation facilities available in the Railway Committee Room.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

INSTRUCTION TO STANDING COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER POLICIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved:

That the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be empowered to hear evidence on and to consider Canada's policies with reference to defence and external affairs;

And that the evidence adduced by the committee in its study of the aforementioned matter during the first session of the twenty-eighth Parliament be referred to the committee.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that we have agreed that by unanimous consent this and another motion will be put, and I think there will be no dissent. However, at this time I would like to file a caveat. There is a good reason why these two motions and the four already passed with regard to the terms of reference of committees should be dealt with as rapidly as possible by the House. But it is desirable that the notice paper be used wherever there may be some hon. members with an interest in having discussions of certain terms of reference, and they should be given the opportunity to do so.

• (11:50 a.m.)

It may be that in future there will be other cases where it will be necessary to expedite the granting of terms of reference to a committee, and we shall certainly be prepared to discuss this at the proper level. Our view generally is that the notice paper is there to be used and, wherever possible, it should contain notice of these motions so that hon. members may have an opportunity to discuss them. I say that even though we have already agreed that these two motions may be put and that we have no objection to them.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the caveat is a good one, but we also agree to this motion.

Mr. Speaker: The motion has been put to the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

INSTRUCTION TO STANDING COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER CERTAIN MATTERS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved:

That the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications be empowered to consider the following:

1. Representations from Mr. Peter Rohl, the Ben Ginter Construction Co. Ltd., Lucas Construction Ltd., and Krywa Bros. Construction Ltd., with respect to claims in relation to the construction of the Great Slave Lake line of railway for the Canadian National Railways;
2. The problems of transportation in the Atlantic Provinces;

And that the evidence adduced by the committee in its study of the aforementioned matters during the first session of the twenty-eighth Parliament be referred to the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the same remarks apply to this motion as applied to the previous one. In case the wording makes it look to some hon. members as though it is setting up a rather lengthy agenda, let me say that this is just a case of referring back to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications precisely those same matters the committee was dealing with before the end of last session.

Motion agreed to.

EXPROPRIATION

ACQUISITION AND ABANDONMENT OF LAND, APPOINTMENT OF HEARING OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-136, respecting the expropriation of land.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY

NATIONAL MARKS AND STANDARDS

Hon. H. A. Olson (for Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-137, respecting the use of national safety marks in relation to motor vehicles and to provide for safety standards for certain motor vehicles imported into or exported from Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION ACT

GUARANTEE OF REPAYMENT OF MONEYS BORROWED BY COMPANIES AND PERSONS

Hon. H. A. Olson (for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-138, to amend the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—AGENDA AND TYPE OF MEETINGS—INQUIRY AS TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Prime Minister. Will he be able to give us the agenda of the federal-provincial constitutional conference to be held next month? Also, will he be able to confirm that the meetings will be open to the press and therefore to the public?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On both these questions, Mr. Speaker, I have yet to hear from several provinces. I have had correspondence or contact with all of them, but I have not had a complete expression of their views on either the agenda or on the question of whether the conference should be public or private. Therefore, in accordance with the usual rules I should not like to make a decision until there has been a consensus reached between the provinces and the federal government.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister say whether it is the intention of the government to establish a parliamentary committee on constitutional matters during the present session?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, it is, Mr. Speaker. I expect that the House leader will be able to make an announcement fairly soon in that regard.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask another supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Would the government consider arranging for consultations with the opposition parties in connection with the preparation of the terms of reference of such a committee?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am sure we will want to discuss with the opposition the orientation and terms of reference of this committee. We have views on it. We think this committee should follow the general pattern which has been followed by the provinces and the federal government in the study of these constitutional questions.

COMMUNICATIONS

TELESAT CANADA—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Communications. In view of reports of prolonged argument over the division of ownership of Telesat, can the minister inform the House what progress, if any, has been made toward actually setting up Telesat Canada and beginning work on building the satellite?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): The work is proceeding quite satisfactorily, Mr. Speaker. I do not know what is the source of the reports to which the hon. member refers. All I can say is that work is going ahead with a view to signing contracts. After that, and not before, it would be normal to expect that there would be financial arrangements, namely, financing through the issuing of shares or debentures to the public. In the meantime the president and the provisional directors have been appointed. They have met regularly. They are undertaking negotiations, and the actual conclusion of contracts with the main suppliers is going on.

Mr. Lewis: Can the minister inform the House who the directors are? We all know who the president is. In view of the fact it is assumed that the number of directors is related to the proportion of ownership, can the minister inform the House who the provisional directors are and how they were appointed?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, as is known, the provisional board is composed of two directors named by the telephone companies, Mr. Krupski and Mr. Archibald, the President of Maritime Telephone and Telegraph. Mr. Krupski is President of the Trans-Canada Telephone System. These were the nominees of the common carriers. Nominees of the government are Mr. Picard and Dr. John Chapman who is extremely well known to all members of the House. Members representing the public are Mr. Sothern and Mr. Golden, the president. The chairman of the board is Mr. Francois Ouimet, a former president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Lewis: Another supplementary, Mr. Speaker. What about Alphonse?

Mr. Kierans: I am sorry, I should have said Alphonse. François is another friend of mine.

Mr. Bell: You got all your friends on the board.

Mr. Lewis: We can easily understand. There are always arguments between Alphonse and François. I wish to ask the minister whether any decision has been made on the division of ownership? If so, what proportion has been provided to the carriers, what proportion to the government and what proportion to the public?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should tell the hon. member I had serious doubts about his first supplementary and I have even graver doubts about the second. I think the information the hon. member is seeking is of a general nature and perhaps should be given to the House by the minister in a statement on motions.

Mr. Lewis: I think I appreciate the reason for Your Honour's ruling. May I be permitted to reword my question simply? Has the division of ownership been decided upon or is it still a matter of discussion?

Mr. Kierans: Such questions should be addressed to the president and board of directors of the corporation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

POSSIBLE CONFLICT OF FEDERAL LAW AND QUEBEC BILL 63

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question to the Prime Minister.

Has the Prime Minister examined bill 63 now under consideration by the Quebec National Assembly, and if so, does he think this bill to be contrary to the official languages bill adopted here last June?

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest to the hon. member that his question, as worded, is hardly acceptable.

The hon. member is inviting the Prime Minister to express his opinion on the legality of a bill. Yet, even in the case of a federal bill, I do not believe that his question, as worded, could be acceptable.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO ASSIST WESTERN FARMERS—INTEREST RATES ON FARM MORTGAGES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. There is a most extensive problem in western Canada, in Alberta and particularly in Saskatchewan where large acreages of crops will not be thrashable because they are in swath and climatic conditions prevent any action being taken. The result is that farmers are in a desperate financial position. Has the government given consideration to bringing in extraordinary legislation, if I may call it that, to meet this emergency so that some form of credit will be available for these farmers who are unable to market anything because they cannot have their wheat, oats or barley thrashed? They are in an impossible position.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, both the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister without Portfolio, responsible for the Wheat Board, have been out west investigating this problem. I ask the right hon. member to address his question to them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? One would think when ministers are on pilgrimages the Prime Minister would be able to answer. Will the Prime Minister exercise the prestige that he has and communicate with the chartered banks and point out to them that under all the circumstances they ought to provide credit which today is being denied?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I prefer to discuss this matter with the ministers responsible and I will decide if any action is required by me.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. In the course of his pilgrimage to western Canada did the minister have any discussions with the Minister of Agriculture for the province of Alberta or for the province of Saskatchewan with a view to joint action along the lines indicated by the right hon. member for Prince Albert? At this time I also invite the Minister of Agriculture to reply to the question I asked last Thursday with regard to advising farm mortgagors of the possibility of taking advantage of methods of securing a reduced rate of interest.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is far more than one question contained in the speech made by the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Baldwin: You look like you have a lot to say.

Mr. Olson: I have, but I like to stay within the rules, Mr. Speaker. I spent two days in Alberta discussing the problem of harvesting and what action would be useful and of assistance in this situation. I attended meetings in the hon. member's home town of Peace River as well as in Fairview, Spirit River, Grande Prairie and Edmonton. I also had a meeting with the Minister of Agriculture for Alberta, Mr. Ruste, yesterday afternoon. We are looking at a number of things we can do to be helpful in concert between the two levels of government.

With regard to the other question, Mr. Speaker, that I was asked on Thursday, I am having this checked by the Department of Justice. While it may be improper to give a legal opinion on it, I think the reply should come from the Department of Justice after an opinion has been expressed on the application.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was not asking for a legal opinion. The supplementary question I asked on Thursday was whether, under a certain assumption, the minister would consider giving notice to farm mortgagors of the rights which they hold with regard to the question of interest rates.

Mr. Olson: I am fully aware of that, but the certain assumption my hon. friend talks about is a legal interpretation of law.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister consider making representations to the banks in these areas asking them to continue to renew loans made under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, which carry a much lower rate of interest than short term loans, in view of the reports we have that banks are urging farmers to transfer overdue notes into the high interest rate range?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure the question is properly directed. This act is, of course, administered by the Minister of Finance, and for good reasons. However, I will examine the content of the question and see if there is anything our department can do which will be helpful.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In the course of the minister's perambulations did he form any estimate of the total acreage in Alberta and Saskatchewan that today is in swath and is an almost hopeless condition? The minister would require that knowledge before he would be in a position to discuss effective action.

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That is precisely the reason for going to the northern part of Alberta over the weekend and the reason for the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt going to parts of Saskatchewan.

So far as the estimates are concerned they would, of course, be only estimates, but there are some communities which are substantially worse off than others, where the amount of grain left in the fields is very high indeed, as high, in fact, as 80 or 90 per cent in some cases. I do not, however, subscribe to the pessimistic view that there can be no salvage value from many of these swaths. We have been through occasions before, last year among others, when crops which were in bad condition when harvested produced an unexpectedly high yield. I want to be helpful but I think we had better make use of our experience in the past when assessing the situation.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL—THEFT FROM MAIN POST OFFICE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to dial a question to the Postmaster General.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macquarrie: Can the minister advise us what efforts or investigations are under way following the reported theft on Saturday last of $250,000 from the main post office in Montreal? Specifically, have the looters been apprehended or has any of the loot been recovered?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): In response to the second part of the question the answer is no—not until the moment I entered the House, anyway. In reply to the first part of the question, the police force and the investigators belonging to the department are working very hard and in close co-operation.

Mr. Macquarrie: Considering the fact that Canadians are concerned about the security of their mail as well as the safety of postal employees, can the minister advise whether any of his multitude of task forces are looking into the question of ensuring greater security for registered mail?

Mr. Kierans: The RCMP is making a detailed analysis of the extremely professional manner in which this particular burglary was carried out and they will undoubtedly have recommendations to make to us.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Has there been any evidence that the schedule of this well-planned robbery was advanced a week in anticipation of the white paper to be brought down by the Minister of Finance so as to make sure there would be no possibility of the take being subject to a capital gains tax?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid the hon. member has to be given a busy signal in connection with that question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO INCREASE MINIMUM WAGE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker. Since the hon. gentleman stated on September 5 that the federal minimum wage should be raised from its present level of $1.25 an hour to $1.50 an hour or perhaps to $1.75 an hour, is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation in the near future to raise the federal minimum wage to a level which would permit recipients to live above the poverty level?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The department is now concluding a departmental review of the minimum wage and its effect on the Canadian economy and, particularly, its effect on programs financed jointly by the provinces and the federal government. When this study has been completed it is possible that the cabinet and the Minister of Labour may consider it appropriate to introduce legislation.

Mr. Hees: As this is precisely the answer the minister gave me in reply to a question on this subject some 14 months ago, is it not obvious that the government intends to put this matter off year after year and has no intention of introducing legislation in the foreseeable future?

Mr. Speaker: I have to rule out the supplementary question asked by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the minister care to look at Bill C-99 which is on the order paper in my name? If he likes it I would be glad if he would take it over.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, if you look long enough at the order paper you will find that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has a bill set down on every subject which has been introduced into this house over the last 25 years. It is the only opportunity he will ever have to introduce a bill.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PRESENCE OF DDT IN IMPORTED FOODS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): My question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker. Further to today's statement concerning DDT, will on analysis be made of all food imported into Canada, and will the presence of DDT in proportions higher than the indicated new tolerance result in the imposition of a ban upon this merchandise?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): If foods are brought into Canada containing DDT in proportions above our tolerance limit, their sale will not be permitted.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSIONS WITH U.S.S.R. ON RESOURCES OF NORTH PACIFIC, ACTIVITIES OF RUSSIAN FLEET

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs having to do with the meeting which I understand took place between himself and the foreign minister of the U.S.S.R. in Ottawa earlier this year. Did the minister hold any discussions with Mr. Gromyko on our joint interest in the resources of the north Pacific Ocean and, in particular, did he discuss with the foreign minister the activities of the Soviet fishing fleet which is operating off the shores of British Columbia and Vancouver Island? If so, can he give the House a report on the nature of these talks?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. We did not discuss that subject.

Mr. Barnett: In view of what I can only describe as a grave omission from the list of topics covered, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to give the House some assurance that he will take up this important matter with the Soviet government?

Mr. Sharp: Although we did not have this particular subject on the agenda of the talks with Mr. Gromyko, the Canadian government and the Soviet government are, of course, in communication constantly through our respective embassies. This matter has been under discussion for some time and will continue to receive our attention.

Mr. Barnett: I notice that the Minister of Fisheries is present in the House. May I address a supplementary question to him. Has the Department of Fisheries any up-to-date information on the activities of this Soviet fleet? Is it, in fact, taking Pacific salmon in addition to groundfish?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): We are keeping this particular fleet and other foreign fleets under close observation, certainly whenever they come within hundreds of miles of our shoreline.

LATIN AMERICA—REQUEST FOR FINAL REPORT ON MINISTERIAL VISIT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker. About a year ago we were given an interim report on the ministerial pilgrimage to Latin America. When does the minister expect to be in a position to place a final report before the House and the country making clear what benefits will accrue to Canada as a result of this extensive and expensive ministerial mission?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): A draft white paper is now in the course of preparation. This white paper will deal with much more than the tour which was undertaken by the five ministers, a tour which I believe laid the foundation for the closer relationship which will develop between Canada and the Latin American countries. It will deal with much more than that; otherwise it would have been published long since.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Did that visitation by the five ministers have its climax in the closing of those two missions in South America? Was that a consequence of the visit?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is my recollection that this question was asked last week, though I do not recall an answer being given.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not know that. No answer given.

POST OFFICE

CURTAILMENT OF SATURDAY WICKET SERVICE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General, Mr. Speaker. Last session the hon. gentleman advised the House that he was reconsidering his policy of closing certain facilities in main post offices across Canada. Has he now reconsidered this policy, and may we expect the wickets of all main post offices to be opened on Saturdays?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I expect to make an announcement in this connection as far as the Christmas season is concerned very shortly, perhaps by the end of this week. With respect to the general question, this is a subject at present under negotiation with the unions.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FUNGICIDES—INQUIRY AS TO BAN OR RESTRICTION

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention, in addition to imposing restrictions on the use of DDT, to restrict or ban the use of fungicides which, together with DDT, have been responsible for rendering the pheasant and Hungarian population of southern Alberta unfit for human consumption?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: Hungarian partridge.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You've lost the Hungarian vote.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Agriculture has the residual effect of these fungicides under constant and intense examination.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's statement concerning the curtailment of the use of DDT, and in view of the recent report of the Canadian Wildlife Service that unexpectedly high concentrations of DDT have been found in the carcasses of polar bears killed in remote regions of the Arctic, can the Prime Minister assure the house that there will be close liaison between the federal authorities and the territorial governments so that an acceptable ban can be placed on the use of DDT in the north?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will refer that question to the minister of northern affairs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED U.S. NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is it the intention of the government to make representations to the United States, or have representations already been made, concerning further nuclear testing in the Aleutian Islands? If so, what is the nature of such representations?

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that that question was asked last week. So many questions have been asked, of course, that it is a little difficult for the Chair to keep track of them all. If the question was not asked, perhaps the minister could reply at this time.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Your recollection, Mr. Speaker, is correct; the question was answered.

AGRICULTURE

FEED GRAIN FREIGHT ASSISTANCE—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSION WITH CANADA GRAINS COUNCIL

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Did the minister discuss with the Canada Grains Council the policy of cutting back on the eastern feed grain freight subsidy before making his decision?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have some doubt whether that question is in order.

IMMIGRATION

EFFECT OF INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION ON POLITICAL REFUGEES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that Canada became a signatory to the international convention on political refugees in September of this year, will the minister assure the House that no deportation order already made by the Immigration Appeal Board will be executed until the alien appellant has had an opportunity to explore the convention and to take whatever action is necessary in the hope of finding asylum in this country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we intend, of course, to respect the spirit and rules of the international convention. I cannot give any assurance that the obligation imposed on the minister by the Parliament of Canada with respect to the execution of a deportation order under the act can be stayed, but every consideration will be given to the point raised by my hon. friend.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BRITISH HONDURAS—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE AGAINST EXTERNAL AGGRESSION

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government of Canada been approached by the government of British Honduras with regard to a request for assistance against external aggression after the official independence day of that country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think I had better take that question as notice.

LABOUR RELATIONS

LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—RATIFICATION OF SETTLEMENT

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Are the recently concluded negotiations on the Vancouver waterfront subject to ratification?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the collective agreement is subject not only to ratification by labour but by the employers as well. I am hoping it will be ratified because I think the collective agreement is in the interest both of employers and employees. We will know by tomorrow evening whether it has been.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHANGES IN CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC ESTABLISHMENTS—POSITION OF STAFF

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In his statement about the changes in missions the minister mentioned generally a redeployment of personnel. Can the minister guarantee that there will be no lay-offs of those affected by the changes he has just announced?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the closing of these offices does not, of course, mean that Canadian based staff in those missions will be laid off. There is to be a redeployment of our personnel round the world. So far as locally engaged employees in those offices are concerned they, of course, will receive notice. Since the department is redeploying its resources, I cannot guarantee that there will not be some surplus staff. Indeed, I expect that there will be.

FISHERIES

DOGFISH CONTROL—LEVY ON SALMON CATCHES—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. Would the minister agree to refer to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry his proposal for a 1 to 5 per cent levy on salmon catches in regard to dogfish control, since I believe it has been the subject of a number of criticisms by the industry?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

FARM MACHINERY—INQUIRY AS TO BARBER COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the continually rising costs in the agricultural sector and the urgency of reducing those costs, can the minister inform the House when the Barber commission on farm machinery will be in a position to make a report?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a date when we will receive or be able to distribute or table the final report of the Barber commission. However, during the last few days we have received a further report from the Barber commission dealing with price relationships between tractors and combines in various parts of the world. This report is now in the hands of the translators and printers and it will be made available as soon as it is ready.

Mr. Gleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the decision taken on the use of farm chemicals, is it now the intention of the Department of Agriculture to conduct research to find alternatives for those chemicals we have been using, such as DDT and the mercurial chemicals that have caused trouble to wildlife? What research is the department carrying on, or is it planning any research?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question as asked is very broad in scope and would normally require a statement on motions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT NIXON ON VIET NAM—CONSULTATION WITH CANADA

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Without for a moment suggesting that the President of the United States is under any obligation to do so, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has in fact consulted the Canadian Government or, as far as the Prime Minister knows, any other government with respect to the statement on Viet Nam that the President of the United States is expected to make today?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I know of no consultation of this sort, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question. In view of the request that the President of the United States made in the United Nations when the General Assembly first opened that all countries assist in settling the problem in Viet Nam, will the government consider taking some initiative in discussing with Washington some of the steps that might be taken to that end?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there has been, and there will continue to be, consultation on these matters. On both occasions when I met President Nixon we talked about Viet Nam and the eventualities there; this was in response to the specific speech to which the hon. member has referred.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SENTENCES FOR OFFENCES INVOLVING DRUGS

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, as reported at page 350 of Hansard, the hon. member for Calgary North asked me several questions concerning the sentencing of seven young people in Calgary on charges involving marijuana. I have looked into the matter and I find that the charges did not involve marijuana; they involved hashish, trafficking in hashish.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

SUGGESTED VOTE BY MAIL FOR DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that when the Manitoba legislature amended the provincial Elections Act to provide for voting at age 18 it also included a provision to make it possible for persons who are so disabled they cannot get to the polls to vote by mail, I wonder whether the federal government would consider making a similar recommendation so far as the federal Elections Act is concerned?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for amendments to the Elections Act. I think the hon. member should ask the President of the Privy Council the next time the minister is in the house.

ADDRESS DEBATE

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, October 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Jack Cullen for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, last Friday when the debate was adjourned, I was dealing with the question of the coastal fishermen of my region and the problems they have to face. I was suggesting then to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) to support the associations desirous of grouping the fishermen so that they may become strong enough to participate effectively in consultations with the various governments.

The problem to be found sometimes among these people is that they do not agree about solutions and consequently, remain always in the same unfortunate situation.

I can give as an example agencies in my constituency, such as the Northern Regional Development Council, that helped the professional association of fishermen to get organized.

I hope that the minister will take note of these comments and will make sure that the necessary funds are made available to that association for the pursuit of its goals.

Mr. Speaker, I think that all hon. members agree that the real solution to poverty is to improve our education system so as to prevent our young people from prematuraly leaving school or university.

As to those who are too old to go back to school or university, it is a good thing that they take advantage of the retraining programs of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. But in spite of that, there will remain a group of people between the ages of 40 and 60 who can neither go back to school nor take part in the retraining program. What should be done with these people, for it is where the real problem of poverty lies?

I think we should resort to social development. Those people should be informed so that they will become aware of their problems. It would not solve anything to tell them: coastal fishing is bound to disappear and you will be requested to move to the city, or you will have to undergo retraining.

These people must truly become aware of their problems, and, to a certain extent, become masters of their own destiny.

I would like to mention the excellent job being done to this end by various organizations: the Professional Association of Fishermen and the Northern Regional Development Council. I hope that they will always be able to rely on the support of the various levels of government.

In a roundabout way, Mr. Speaker, this brings me to the subject of the Company of Young Canadians, of which much has been said in this House lately. Much has also been said about it here and there in the country and a charge was recently made against it by the executive chairman of the city of Montreal. In my opinion, we should consider the aim of the Company of Young Canadians, its structure and the kind of people working within it

I was both surprised and distressed, Mr. Speaker, when I heard the charges laid by Mr. Saulnier against the Company of Young Canadians. This group was specifically set up by the federal government to help the poor and the underprivileged to organize themselves and to settle their problems in a more satisfactory way.

It seems quite possible that those people will form within society, a group and perhaps resort to violence, because they have been overlooked in the past by the various government levels. They have been rejected by the Canadian society. They are truly alienated. No decision has been taken by the government in this connection. Those people are not strong enough to assert themselves.

Yet, when other segments of our population are affected by some government decision, they can resort to lobbying and try and influence the administration.

But, what course can the poor and the underprivileged citizens take since they are never consulted? Sometimes they resort to violence.

I really regret that such a serious administration as that of Montreal should have made demagogic charges, just taking advantage of the conditions that prevailed in the city, while people were nervous after several days of violence, and blamed the Company of Young Canadians.

I agree with the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and the leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas) when they say that if subversive activities are carried out within the Company of Young Canadians, the matter should be left to the Montreal city police. Why did Mr. Saulnier not ask the police to stop such disorders? If there are any subversive activities in another organization in Montreal, will he not send the police there to inquire? No, what he wanted was to destroy the Company of Young Canadians. As for myself, I feel differently. Those who make such charges do not want social animation. They cannot accept it.

The Liberal party in New Brunswick, for instance, was threatened—and so was I because I was a member of it—by those who were doing social animation. We did not blame these organizations when they did it. They are welcome in my province. In fact, it is fine that they should help the poor to get organized and to become aware of their problems.

I would like to raise another matter, one which affects the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). Everybody was pleased to see the launching of the new industrial incentives program which, I am sure, will help our area. I would simply like to mention, Mr. Speaker, that it is possible to help the small businessmen in our area, those of the northern part of New Brunswick or those of the province of New Brunswick to organize themselves, but sometimes they lack expert advice or economic guidance. There are goods and there are markets, but the businessmen of the Atlantic provinces have always been accused of not being good salesmen.

In my opinion, the department could easily establish and finance an organization with engineers and consultants in order to help these small businessmen, incite them to launch their businesses resolutely and along sound lines. They could be given assistance in rationalizing their industries and perhaps in expanding them. They could also be helped in finding markets. This might not bring an immediate solution to the unemployment problem in our area or improve the socio-economic standard of living of these people, but at least they will be encouraged to take small risks and get their businesses off to a good start.

I feel that the department, in co-operation with the province of New Brunswick, would do well to organize or finance an agency or board of that type. The small businessmen who can prosper in our region would thus have access to experts to obtain information.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to congratulate the two members responsible for the moving and seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. They have my deepest admiration for the courage they have demonstrated in attempting to justify such a Speech from the Throne and persuade the House that it should be accepted. I admire the tenacity with which they struggled to put forth salient points which might have been included in such a speech. I also readily admire their native ability and eloquence in seeming to indicate that such a speech justified consideration by this House.

Normally Speeches from the Throne do not create a great deal of interest on the part of the citizens of Canada. Normally corporation lawyers and small businessmen have knowledgeable partners who pursue the substance of Speeches from the Throne in order to have some indication of the government's intentions in respect of the business and financial world and how the legislation proposed will affect directly their own businesses. But I earnestly feel the situation was just a little different this year. I believe that Canadians as a whole were very much concerned about the Speech from the Throne and were very much interested in what it might contain because over the past months the ordinary Canadian has become increasingly alarmed about the future of this country.

The ordinary Canadian has been faced with the highest cost of living in Canadian history; he has been faced with the highest interest rates in Canadian history; he has been faced with the highest tax rates in Canadian history. He is aware that we have the highest national debt in our history and is finding that the new measures chosen by the government to curb inflation tend to stagnate business and cause an ever-increasing trend toward the highest unemployment in Canadian history. So I contend that the citizens of Canada were more concerned about the Speech from the Throne this year than in any previous year.

As a country we are approaching a new decade with perhaps more basic knowledge at our command than ever before and more instruments and tools with which to work for the welfare of human beings world-wide and in Canada than ever before in the history of man. Therefore this speech was anticipated on two grounds. It was anticipated, first, because of the basic troubles facing the country and the hope that a solution might be presented and pursued in the ensuing ten years. I think the lack of attendance by members in the House, the lack of attendance in the press gallery and the lack of attendance in the public gallery are a terrible and solemn condemnation of the failure of the Speech from the Throne to generate specific enthusiasm on the part of the people of Canada or to portray any hope for the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: Even the members of the press, those keen students of political science, in trying to wade through the chaff and pick out the kernels are finding it particularly difficult to discover in the Speech from the Throne any basic interest or principle for the Canadian public. When the press of this nation have to concentrate on two main points in the Speech from the Throne, first, that the voting age of citizens of Canada will be reduced to 18 years and, second, that perhaps the Speech from the Throne will become famous for what it did not say rather than for what it did say, this is an indication to me and my colleagues of how difficult they find it to accept this Speech from the Throne.

We who sit in opposition in parliament and the people of Canada must try to convince the government that the time has now come to deal with some of the desperate problems facing Canada today. No longer can we accept platitudes, alibis and excuses. No longer can we accept statements that discussions are under way, investigations are taking place, task forces are about to report and something will be done after consultation. During the past 18 months we have found these statements to be mere verbiage; they do not mean anything. The people of Canada are becoming well aware that this government would rather see important questions bogged down in excess verbiage than take serious steps in order to create an atmosphere in which a solution might be forthcoming.

I criticize the Prime Minister of this country, although not as an individual because I feel every member of this House is entitled to his own personal life. The Prime Minister, however, certainly represents the image of this country and in effect is the leading parliamentary figure in Canada. So his actions have a direct bearing on every phase of Canadian life. That is why I express concern today about his actions.

When this Parliament began the Prime Minister seemed intent not only on ascertaining what the problems are but on dealing with them by direct dialogue with the people of Canada, with a frank and honest exchange of views, in order that all might participate in what he termed "the just society." I feel that this ideology, this concept of participatory politics, is to be commended. Environmental politics appeal to people of all classes. We soon learned from actions in the House, however, that what seemed to be an ideal was not to be the order of business by the government controlling Canada today. When a Prime Minister who insists on direct dialogue with the people of Canada must hold a special caucus of his own party in Ottawa because of a lack of direct dialogue with his own backbenchers this gives an indication of how he has failed to promote dialogue among the people of the country.

It would seem to me that a man intent on convincing members of this House and the people of the nation of his serious intentions should provide an image so that we could follow his example. But what do we find? We find that this man who speaks of direct dialogue has in his own office many men engaged in specialized services in the role of assistants, executive assistants, secretaries to assistants and secretaries to secretaries. The list grows longer and longer. As a matter of fact as an indication of just how cumbersome his office has become there is a division into regions and there are regional desks designated to control the welfare of areas across Canada. Does it not seem strange that the Prime Minister despite the presence of Liberal backbenchers representing Canadians feels the need to institute such an establishment in order to find out what is going on in the various constituencies rather than consulting his own members.

• (12:50 p.m.)

I stated in my opening remarks that the Throne Speech was a golden opportunity to present to the people of Canada a challenge of what might be expected in the future and how by assessing our opportunities and using our own native skills and talents as well as the new tools of the age we could create for Canada a position of leadership among the nations by means of both our research facilities and our productivity. Instead we find that we are approaching the next decade in utter confusion. We seem to be faced with a mass of contradictions.

The Prime Minister and his associates appointed a representative to the Vatican. We had representation in Rome but apparently we could not combine the two and we had to have separate representation in Rome and in the Vatican. I am not aware of any reason or necessity for this action because the matter was never discussed in Parliament. Another contradiction is found in the announcement this morning that Canada is closing down three embassies in South America, namely, in the Dominican Republic, Ecuador and Uruguay. We are opening a new embassy in Rome where we already have an ambassador and closing down three embassies in South America, an area of the world where the action is and where purchasing power lies, an area which has expressed a desire for more trade with Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: We have the contradiction of a government which opened this Parliament with a drive to create new departments, new task forces, new investigating groups, new research and regional desks, a government that added thousands of new civil servants and a few months later announced its intention of cutting 25,000 employees from the civil service by attrition and other means. This seems to me to be another contradiction which can do nothing less than throw the departments into utter confusion because no one in the civil service today knows whether his position is guaranteed or will continue, regardless of seniority.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: In my own field of agriculture legislation was brought forward with the primary purpose of lending to the young farmers of this nation ample funds to consolidate and increase their holdings into so-called economic units. However, that was last session. This session the emphasis is on cutting down the subsidies to agriculture and the moneys poured into the agricultural field. The result is that these young men are faced with a curtailment of trade and production, a lack of sales and a tightening of credit. This is forcing them into a position where there is no other future but bankruptcy. They cannot survive on what was provided for them last year having regard to the economic climate provided for them this year. This is a direct contradiction in policy.

In another field we have heard over and over again Ministers of Finance stand in their place and say that the future of Canada depends on increased productivity. As productivity increases our gross national product increases and so does our over-all economy. What do we see now? We see direct government action designed to cool off the economy of Canada—I think that was the wording used—and we see a tight money policy designed to decrease productivity and increase unemployment or bring about a slack in employment in order to create an atmosphere in which the government says that it can fight inflation. This is in direct contradiction of the policy that was in effect some months ago. As a matter of fact, what has alarmed members of the opposition in all parties is the contention on the part of government members month after month that Canadians have never had it so good, in spite of our protestations that we were in trouble with inflation and a higher cost and decreased standard of living. But all of a sudden we see in the Speech from the Throne the realization by the government that inflation is of prime concern, and these drastic steps are being taken ad hoc to counteract it.

Then we have another contradiction, which was mentioned by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon), with regard to the committee system of Parliament. The lack of attendance in Parliament can be placed directly at the doorstep of the government members themselves because as the powers of the representatives in parliament are decreased, as there is taken away from Parliament the ability to criticize and hold up for inspection the government's measures, the efficiency of Parliament is decreased, not increased. This seems to be their prime objective. If they were successful in their contention and right in their intent regarding Parliament, this House would be filled with members and would resound with debate. We would have the political cross-fire for which Canadians throughout the ages have been noted. Under those conditions Parliament produced good legislation for Canada, but under the present system we find that all we are dealing with are housekeeping measures and clean-up legislation and we are studiously avoiding any discussion or debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It being one o'clock this House stands adjourned until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, at the time of adjournment I was dealing with some of the inadequacies of the Throne Speech, and with the sorry state in which we find parliament today. Parliament certainly has not the image that it should have in Canada and among the nations. It no longer has the prestige that it should have in Canada and among the nations. And certainly, it no longer has the influence that it should have in Canada and among the nations. The whole responsibility for this deterioration can be laid solely at the feet of the present government.

When a parliamentary career is begun by requesting at least half of the ministers not to attend in the House on particular days, thus making it impossible for them to answer questions from opposition members on the workings of their departments, it is not conducive to the fulfilment of the full-time parliamentary obligations of all hon. members. Ministers not only have the opportunity to be the heads of departments but share the obligations of other hon. members to be full-time representatives of those people who chose to send them to Ottawa to look after their interests. I am sure the leader of my party would be in dire difficulty if at any time he even insinuated that a member of this party should not attend every sitting of the House.

It does not do parliament any good when policy statements are not presented on motions, but are made in the halls of parliament to television and press representatives, with no opportunity accorded to members of the House to criticize and point out the weaknesses in announced policies. This happens time and time again. We now find that newspapers, by means of so-called leaks, are able to obtain indications of government policy sometimes days in advance of that policy being announced in this House. This does not do the prestige, influence and image of parliament one bit of good.

The Speech from the Throne afforded an opportunity to demonstrate Canada's intentions in many areas. At one time Canadians were world leaders in many fields. No one can forget the effect that the discovery of insulin had in helping the diabetics of the world. No one can forget the pioneering work done by Canadians with uranium, particularly the first reactors that were constructed in Canada. These were outstanding events. No one can forget the tremendous work done in Canada in the fields of plant breeding, animal genetics and in the use of chemicals. No one can forget the work done in Canada to perfect machinery for production. No one can forget the high productivity levels reached through the efforts of Canadian management, unions and other labour groups.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard).]

Now, we are no longer leaders. Under this administration it seems that we only follow. We did not do anything about tobacco and its alleged evil effects until other countries had demonstrated the ills that could flow from the use of tobacco. We did not become aware of the danger of cyclamates in foods until another country discovered it. What are we doing to investigate saccharine? Look at our delay in taking steps to meet the DDT problem. We should be giving leadership in these areas instead of following others. We know what the problems are, yet nothing is done about them.

• (2:10 p.m.)

The people of Canada had every right to believe that in the Throne Speech the government would enunciate a solid, comprehensive program to deal with the problems facing the nation today, problems of pullution, problems of inflation, problems of poverty, problems of housing, and the serious and ever-growing problem of drug addiction among young people in Canada. It is my considered opinion that members of the opposition and the people of Canada generally will not be satisfied with verbiage, platitudes, white papers, investigations and other time consuming and delaying actions on the part of this government. The people of Canada demand, and have the right to demand, that their parliament act. Members of the opposition are just as determined to see that this shall happen. Nowhere does the Speech from the Throne say exactly what the government intends to do. As a result of our questioning and our prodding, we must force this government to take that action on behalf of the people of Canada that we feel is necessary and justified in order that Canada may once again take her rightful place among the community of nations.

An examination of legislation proposed during the previous session reveals that that legislation seemed to be social legislation only. It dealt with the climate of ever increasing permissiveness in society. In the ten years ahead of us, we have the opportunity to make a name for Canada. Why should Canadians not deal directly with problems facing

Canada and the world. I am, of course, referring to those problems I have outlined. Why can we not do that instead of dealing with nebulous bills and legislation designed, it seems, to degrade and break down the essentials of human dignity or, in the alternative, to eradicate in this House and throughout Canada the defenseless symbols of English influence. Certainly, the time has come when we must act on behalf of the people of Canada. That the government has such intention is not evident in the Speech from the Throne.

The mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne have my warmest admiration and my greatest sympathy. Having read how little the legislation outlined in the Speech from the Throne will deal with matters that are of vital importance to Canadians today, I request hon. members present, one and all, to reject this Speech from the Throne.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, hon. members on both sides of the House have been unanimous in praising the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I, too, would like to congratulate our two new members of parliament for the way in which they have enlivened our proceedings at the beginning of this debate. They both saw a great deal of merit in the government's program for the coming session, and for this I commend them heartily.

This year's Speech from the Throne is notable for several reasons. It is wide-ranging in the sense that it provides us with a backdrop against which to assess the government's priorities. It is also informative in that it defines important issues and mentions major pieces of legislation. One of the foremost issues which it defines is pollution. Another is the extension of Canada's jurisdiction seaward from our shores. Both these subjects, of course, are vital to our fisheries.

In my remarks today I want to take you a bit farther. I want to talk about fisheries and about Canada's own fishing limits. I want to say a word about the effect of pollution on our marine life and I want to draw your attention to the damage which large foreign fishing fleets are doing to our nearby fishing grounds in the North Atlantic and in the Pacific as well. Man is learning to manage his affairs in many fields of endeavour. But in respect of fishing we have a long, long way to go.

True, we are beginning to manage our living resources in an intelligent manner. We are assessing fish populations and estimating maximum sustainable yields. We are trimming our fishing fleets down to size and increasing the income of the average Canadian fisherman. But all of this is of no avail if industrial wastes on the one hand, and foreign fishing fleets on the other, are paying scant regard to sound conservation practice. This is why we have a number of pieces of new legislation, new fisheries legislation, to deal with during the coming session. This is why we will have more legislation next year and the year after that, legislation which will not only increase the value of our commercial and sports fisheries but also help to protect the living resources of the northern hemisphere as well.

Several hon. members opposite have been talking as if we didn't have anything to offer in the fisheries field. Obviously, they have not read the Speech from the Throne carefully; that or only the first few pages. Rarely, if ever, has a government program contained so many references to this vital sector of our economy. Rarely has a government had so many fisheries bills to introduce.

Perhaps I should list the main ones now. They are, first, the Fisheries Act, which is to be amended; second, the Salt Fish Development Act, which is new legislation; third, the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, which is to be amended and, fourth, the Territorial Seas and Fishing Zones Act, which is to be amended. I could add to this list the Canada Water Act, because that is a new act which will deal with pollution from coast to coast, and the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The question of unemployment insurance is of great interest to our fishermen as hon. members know.

Anyone interested in Canada's fisheries can have a field day on any one of these pieces of legislation. However we are looking for action and above all we are looking for suggestions. No good suggestion from whatever source will be ignored. We want to do the best we can for our own fishermen and the thoughts of any hon. member or any hon. member's ideas for action will be considered seriously I can assure you.

The government is proposing to do things, a good many things. It is proposing to re-organize our fisheries on both coasts, in the Arctic and in our inland waters. By legislating on pollution we will be protecting the resource itself. And by defining our fishing limits we will be improving our competitive position internationally as well.

After listening to some members opposite talking about the good old days I became curious. I checked up on what happened when the Conservative Party was in power. What did the Speeches from the Throne say between 1957 and 1962 when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) introduced seven Speeches from the Throne. Four Speeches from the Throne out of the seven didn't mention fisheries at all. Two others merely said that provisions in old bills passed by the preceding Liberal administration would be continued for a few more years. Only one had a whole paragraph on the fisheries. It was the first of the seven and it was followed by no legislation whatsoever.

And what by contrast do I find in the Speech from the Throne today? I find all sorts of references about the fisheries, about pollution, and about the protection of our resources offshore. I see references to fish life in the Arctic, references to international agreements and referencs to new fish marketing arrangements. What more can hon. members ask than that?

Fishing in other words is being upgraded by the present government. It is being looked at for what it is, part of our total ecology. We see it as one renewable resource among many, a resource along with wildlife, trees and water itself; a renewable resource the protection of which is essential to the future health and prosperity of mankind. In the present Speech from the Throne, the speech before you outlining the government's program for 1969-1970 I read this:

> The competitive position of Canada's fisheries must also be strengthened . . . by extending Canada's exclusive fishing zones.

This by itself is an important announcement. It emphasizes the government's intention to finish the job of defining Canada's exclusive fishing zones. To this end you will be asked to amend Canada's Territorial Seas and Fishing Zones Act. You will be asked to include a clause defining a new concept—that of "fisheries closing lines". We will be asking this House in other words for authority to complete the fisheries map of Canada, the map showing where Canadians alone can fish and where we alone can say exactly what happens to our marine biota as a living resource.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Those of you who are familiar with fisheries matters know that we have a 12-mile limit. We have had a 12-mile exclusive fishing zone ever since 1964. Before that it was three miles the same as our present territorial sea. The first three miles out, in other words, are part of the territory of Canada. The next nine miles are part of our exclusive fishing zone. That was the rule, and that zone followed the ins and outs of our coasts until we drew "baselines", and the idea of "baselines", or lines from headland to headland, was also contained in the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act of 1964.

The government began to draw its first baselines in 1967. It drew them from headland to headland down the east coast of Labrador and around the eastern and southern coasts of Newfoundland. This spring it drew other baselines down the east coast of Nova Scotia and up off the west coasts of Vancouver Island and the Queen Charlottes. As a result, we have closed numerous bays and inlets to foreign fishermen. Not only that, but we have a 12-mile limit extending seaward from the headland to headland lines, or baselines, which we have already published on our fisheries maps for all to see.

There are still a number of important gaps in our 12-mile fisheries lines. These gaps can easily be spotted on our maps. They include the Strait of Belle Isle and Cabot Strait in the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. They include the Bay of Fundy, also on the east coast, the Queen Charlotte Sound and Hecate Strait on the west coast.

Generally speaking, these are wider waters, longer distances, bigger gaps, than those which we have spanned with our baselines. There is, for instance, a 56 mile gap across the Cabot Strait between Newfoundland and Nova Scotia and a 94 mile gap across Queen Charlotte Sound off British Columbia. Here is where the concept of fisheries closing lines applies. Here is where we, again, must distinguish between Canadian territorial waters on the one hand and Canadian exclusive fishing zones on the other.

I say "distinguish" because Canada took the lead among the nations of the world in separating the fishing concept from the territorial waters concept, separating the fishing zone idea from the territorial waters idea, more than a decade ago. We said that our fishing limits should extend 12 miles out to sea, while our territorial waters remained at three miles. At first there was considerable opposition, internationally, to this idea, but the Canadian view prevailed in the long run. Now, many countries, including the United States, have a three mile territorial limit and a 12-mile fishing limit.

Now, we are pushing for a series of "fisheries closing lines". We are pushing for "closing lines" which will apply to fishing and fishing alone. We want to be able, for instance, to regulate and conserve our fisheries in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. We want to do this under Canadian law. Having drawn a fisheries closing line across the Strait of Belle Isle and the Cabot Strait, we will be able to keep foreign fishermen out. Not only that, but we will and can apply the anti-pollution provisions of our Fisheries Act, which will be improved by amendments this session. When the fisheries closing lines are drawn the Fisheries Act will apply to the whole Gulf of St. Lawrence. We will be able to protect the marine, animal and vegetable life in the Gulf and do this without let or hindrance from others.

To repeat, the concept of a "fisheries closing line" is new to the field of international law. It is new, as our 12 mile concept was a decade or so ago. It is a line related to fisheries only; to the ecology of the area. It is a line defining what is, and what is not, the exclusive fishing zone of Canada. Inside the line we can regulate and protect marine life.

Outside of it, on the other hand, our fishermen are still in a sort of no man's land, a land where few rules apply and where overfishing on the part of many nations threatens to upset the ecological balance over great areas of our continental shelf. This will not be true within our exclusive fishing zones where we will have full control over pollution, fishing and the like.

Within these new and well-defined exclusive fishing zones of Canada we will be able to do a number of things. We will be able to protect the resource using an amended Fisheries Act. We will be able to deal with pollution, more effectively, from land based plants, from ships and from oil drilling rigs. We will also be able to tailor our fishing capacity so as to fit the resource. We will be able to conserve and to operate on the basis of a sustained yield. We will be able to exploit our marine biota, animal and vegetable, to the maximum while, at the same time, keeping an eye on the long term future. We, in other words, will be able to manage and conserve the resources within our exclusive fishing zones, zones which, thanks to baselines, the "fishing closing line" concept and the 12-mile limit will be continuous around our coasts.

So far, I have said little about the north. But the same laws and the same concepts should apply in Canada's Arctic. One might visualize, in the fullness of time, a sequence of fisheries lines forming a complete umbrella over Canada's great Arctic archipelago. They would stretch from our northernmost island down to Alaska in the west, and down to Labrador in the east. They would create a great and varied Canadian exclusive fishing zone in the north, and the pollution control provisions of our Fisheries Act would apply there as well. They would apply as much to the plankton as to the walrus and the polar bear. They would apply as much to the seal, the Arctic char and the northern cod, as to the various forms of vegetable life which grow, more slowly, it is true, in the great seas, straits and inlets, Canadian seas, straits and inlets, in this great Canadian northland of ours.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I am making myself clear in one important respect at least. I am not talking about territorial waters. I am not talking about navigation. I am talking, essentially, about the protection and management of our living environment. I am talking about the intelligent management of our living resource of the sea. I am talking about animal life, vegetable life and Canadian laws in exclusive Canadian fishing zones.

This life we must protect at all costs. We must protect it while, at the same time, allowing other people to come and go without undue hindrance or loss. I am not talking about territorial waters so much as exclusive fishing zones. I am not talking about transportation in the wider sense of the word. I am talking about conservation and the intelligent harvesting of living resources. I am not talking about hindering mobility. I am talking about a healthier ecology. We always want to maximize our mobility—and that of other people. We must at the same time protect the living environment, the ecology of all of Canada and its adjoining seas.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like hon. members to look even farther afield; to look out even farther from our shores; to look even farther into the future to see what it holds for our fishermen and ourselves. I want them to look out to the limits of our continental shelf and beyond. I want them to think, not only in terms of straight baselines and exclusive fishing zones, but also of the natural habitat of much of our fish life. I want them to recognize the fact that fish, being highly mobile animals, are no respecters of man-made boundaries. They will continue to swim back and forth across Canada's man-made fishing lines. It follows that, in order to manage our fishery resources intelligently, we will often have to look out to the edge of the continental shelf itself, out to the limits of our Grand Banks in the east and the edge of the great deeps in the west. We will have to look at the living quarters of each of our major fish species, the geography, and the whole of their habitat. We will have, in other words, to concern ourselves about the state of the living resource, the living marine resource, the whole area of the seas adjacent to our shores, the seas beyond our exclusive fishing zones.

We have every right to do so, Mr. Speaker. That right is enshrined in the articles adopted by the international conference on the law of the sea back in 1958. Article I reads:

> All states have the right for their nationals to engage in fishing on the high seas, subject . . . to the interests and rights of coastal states . . . and to articles concerning conservation of the living resources of the high seas.

Article VI goes even further. It states that:

> A coastal state has a special interest in the maintenance of the productivity of the living resources in any area of the high seas adjacent to its territorial sea.

Article VII takes us a step further. It goes so far as to say that:

> Any coastal state may, with a view to the maintenance of the productivity of the living resources of the sea, adopt unilateral measures of conservation appropriate to any stock of fish or other marine resources in any area of the high seas adjacent to its territorial sea, provided that negotiations to that effect with the other states concerned have not led to an agreement within six months.

This all sounds clear enough. But what has really happened in the North Atlantic? What is happening today in the North Pacific? Gigantic, foreign fleets are moving in. The total fishing effort is going up. Fish stocks, many of which are already threatened, are going down. Productivity is dropping off. Some species are already over-fished, and the fate of our inshore fishermen, our Canadian inshore fishermen, is in the balance. Already the scales are tipped heavily against these Canadian fishermen. There is little they alone can do to restore runs of fish along our shores or raise their income from fishing, no matter how hard they try.

What, really, has happened in the North Atlantic for instance? The total fishing effort, the international fishing effort, has more than doubled over the past decade. Massive foreign fleets have moved in and, while the total catch has gone up, the catch per unit of effort has gone down. The big, foreign state-owned fleets are not as productive as our own Canadian fishermen, but they catch a lot of fish.

A recent report of the Atlantic Development Board tells us that the productivity of Canadian vessels is much higher than that of the big Russian ships operating in the North Atlantic. Their catch per hour was only about 60 per cent of the Newfoundland catch per hour in 1960 and today it is only about 40 per cent of the catch taken per hour by our Newfoundland fishermen. In other words, these big foreigners do not catch as many pounds of fish per man day at sea as our vessels do. Their top officials are frank to admit that the economics of their long-range fishing effort are suspect by western standards. The fact is that they continue to throw these massive fleets at us, fleets of 50 or more vessels each in which the length of the average vessel ranges upwards of 200 feet.

Mr. Lundrigan: Can the minister indicate the volume ratio as between foreign and domestic vessels as far as catches are concerned?

Mr. Davis: On the east coast—I am talking about the North Atlantic—the Canadian fishing fleet now takes about one third of the total groundfish catch whereas we took about one half ten years ago. This gives an idea of the relative fishing effort.

During the past summer I flew over a Russian fleet just outside the 12-mile limit off the west coast of Vancouver Island. It consisted of 40 giant trawlers, every one of which was bigger than a B.C. ferry. At night the fleet looked like a city, all lit up in the distance. It was indeed a small city, in that it was manned by at least 5,000 Russians. And it stayed there, close by our Canadian fishing limits, for many days. Dragging gigantic nets backward and forward over a few square miles off our coast it cleaned off one of our most productive fishing grounds. It can clean it off, not just for months, but for many years to come. And, mark you, there are many such fleets working their way up and down our coasts. They are cutting into our marine resources in a truly massive way. They are hitting our fishing industry hard, and they are hitting our resources hard. They are hitting them so hard that many of them may never recover.

Important species have been knocked back to the point where they are of little commercial interest to Canadians. Haddock from the east coast is a case in point. Ocean perch over the shelf areas of the North Pacific may soon be another. This is exploitation with a vengeance, and it has to stop.

I might elaborate. Whereas the maximum haddock catch in 1965 was of the order of 250,000 metric tons in the North Atlantic it is now approximately 100,000 metric tons a year at the maximum. On the west coast, the result of a day's catching effort in terms of groundfish is now 40 per cent of what it was five years ago. In both cases, big foreign fleets have been very active and the reduction in yield indicates what the effect on the resources has been.

Here is what a recent British report had to say about the situation in the North Atlantic:

> There is no doubt that the general decline in stock abundance is, in the main, due to fishing pressures. Although the international catch, in total, is as high as ever, the catch per unit of effort has fallen substantially, with the effect that some fishing units are no longer economic.

The report states further:

> In some stocks the level of production could actually be improved by reducing the amount of fishing, so that, for the purpose of obtaining the maximum amount of protein for the minimum amount of fishing effort, there is much to be said for some control of the amount of fishing.

Our own Canadian studies, meanwhile, show that the tonnage of fish caught per hour has continued to drop. It has dropped sharply over the past decade. The Russian effort, although it is only roughly half as productive as our own per man day, has increased nearly fivefold. And, according to the Atlantic Development Board, "the fact that the Canadian fleet is more than twice as efficient as their own obviously has no bearing on the Russian decision to fish. What is more significant is that the increased effort by other nations has led to a decline in Canadian return per unit of effort."

In groundfish, our share has dropped from roughly half of the total ten years ago to about a third at the present time. Our inshore fishermen, meanwhile, are catching fewer fish. Productivity, in terms of pounds per man day, has been cut roughly in half. This, really, expresses the fate of many of our inshore fishermen, particularly of those who live in Newfoundland. They are catching half as many fish now as they did in the 'fifties. It is true prices have risen but they have not risen sufficiently to offset increases in their costs. In other words, their real income has tended to decline over the past decade in marked contrast to the rise in living standards of most Canadians.

This drop in productivity, like the failure of our Labrador fishery this year, can be attributed largely to an excessive offshore effort, an excessive offshore effort not only by big Canadian trawlers, but by a much larger and more rapidly growing fleet of state-owned vessels operated under the flags of the U.S.S.R., Poland and East Germany.

In this connection, I should like to quote another study which we commissioned and whose results we have now received. It states:

> Concern has been growing, particularly in the last decade, over the very large quantities of groundfish taken from the sea in the ICNAF area.

"ICNAF" stands for International Convention for Northwest Atlantic Fisheries. The report continues:

> Biologists collecting and analyzing the data are warning the countries fishing in the area that the resource is fast reaching maximum sustainable yield. The warning is particularly strong for haddock and cod where maximum sustainable yields have been reached and in fact surpassed in some of the ICNAF sub-areas.
> Indications are that haddock stocks are in a very poor state particularly in the southwestern portion of the Convention area. Though the cod catch could be expanded slightly in some sub-areas, the maximum sustainable yield seems to have been surpassed in 1968. All indications are that efforts by ICNAF member countries will continue to grow and that the area will be seriously overfished within a very few years.

These are the facts. All the world has the facts, really. The living resource out over our continental shelf areas is under heavy pressure. Some species are over-exploited already, yet foreign countries are stepping up their fishing pressure. As far as they are concerned there are no rules in this game. Certainly, there are no rules yet; it is a matter of first come, first served, and heaven help the hindmost.

Unfortunately the hindmost in this case is our own Canadian fishermen. They are being out-fished, not because they are less efficient, but because foreign governments are prepared to build massive fleets and run them like military operations. Our individual enterprisers, our rugged inshore fishermen, our small long-line operators and trawler operators—our God fearing, self-respecting fishermen—are no match for these gigantic adversaries. They are crushing us by the sheer weight of their tonnage and their gear, and our commercial fishing activity is being compressed into the smaller and less productive areas of the continental shelf. Our inshore fishermen are being hurt. Indeed, all Canadian fishermen are being hurt.

There has been a great deal of talk recently about the loss of marine life due to the sinking of the big oil tanker the Torrey Canyon off the south coast of England. Although this was a terrible thing, the damage to the marine ecology of that area brought about by the sinking of the Torrey Canyon was small compared to the havoc being wrought persistently year after year by some of the world's big, long distance fishing fleets. In a year they kill hundreds of times as many fish and other marine organisms as did the Torrey Canyon. They kill them every bit as effectively as hundreds of thousands of tons of oil did in that case. Equally important, they clean off the grounds in so far as future generations of fish and fishermen are concerned.

Fortunately the oil from the Torrey Canyon is disappearing. It is gradually evaporating or being oxidized in the sea itself. The same cannot be said of these giant fishing fleets which are growing in size and are taking more fish than ever before; and they are taking this fish without regard to sound conservation practice.

Worst of all for Canadians, these fleets are doing this just outside our own exclusive fishing zones and out over our own continental shelf. They are doing this to stocks of fish on which we have depended for centuries and on which we have every right to depend in the future.

We must bring this situation under control. We must press for the effective management of marine resources to the limit of our own continental shelf and beyond. This we must do at the next Law of the Sea Conference, and we must do it not only in the interests of our own inshore fisherman but in the interests of all mankind.

Hon. members will also have seen references in the Speech from the Throne to the need to provide good paying jobs to Canadians in those parts of the country which have been less fortunate than others.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the minister but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The Minister of Fisheries.

[Mr. Davis.]

Mr. Davis: From an income point of view, many of our fishing communities are on the bottom rung of the ladder. They need government help. They need help from their industry. More than anything else, our fishermen need useful occupations, jobs in the fishing industry that will pay well and offer a measure of security over the long run.

Fishermen in our inland waters have gained a greater measure of security and are receiving higher incomes as a result of our new Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, the legislation setting up which, hon. members will recall, was passed last spring. We plan during the coming session to set up a Salt Fish Development Agency with the same objectives in mind. Meanwhile, our new Department of Regional Economic Expansion is doing its utmost to round out our local fishing economies with a view to removing many of the financial inequalities of the past.

But what good will all these measures do if the resource itself is undermined? What good will all this legislation do if pollution is allowed to destroy our marine life, or if foreign fishing fleets continue to make it harder to catch fish? Obviously, we must deal with this much bigger problem of conservation and good management, and deal with it not only on a national scale but on a global scale as well.

We must take our case, if necessary, to the United Nations. Certainly, we must take it to the next Law of the Sea Conference, which hopefully will be in 1971. We must do our utmost to bring order out of chaos. The question is no longer that of unlimited freedom to fish; rather it is that of conservation in the best sense of the word, of protecting the resource from serious depletion and of putting all our fisheries, Canadian and international, on a sustained yield basis.

We must protect ourselves wherever necessary. Certainly, we must protect our fishermen and their families. But always there is the need for co-operation. As citizens of an affluent nation, we do not want to keep all of our material wealth to ourselves. We want to manage it well, but we are also prepared to share it with others. This is a note that I would like to strike with regard to the harvesting of our fishery resource both in Canada and out over our continental shelf. It is an approach which, I am sure, will command itself to developing nations everywhere.

As the Prime Minister said in the House of Commons the other day, as reported at page 39 of Hansard:

> Part of the heritage of this country, a part that is of increasing importance and value to us, is the purity of our water, the freshness of our air, and the extent of our living resources. For ourselves and for the world we must jealously guard these benefits. To do so is not chauvinism, it is an act of sanity in an increasingly irresponsible world.

With this statement I agree. I agree with it not only in respect of our inland waters and Canada's exclusive fishing zones, but in respect of the continental shelf areas as well. I believe we should do our utmost to conserve these marine resources, to protect them and to harvest them with due regard not only for our fishermen today but for our future fishermen.

We do not ask that we have the exclusive right to fish anywhere. We do not ask for the exclusive right even to fish in our own continental shelf areas. But what we do ask is that others respect the same laws of nature and the same laws of economics as we; that they conduct themselves on the high seas in a manner that is consistent with the interests of all mankind.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, before the Minister of Fisheries takes his seat would he permit a question?

Mr. Davis: Certainly.

Mr. Crouse: I listened with interest to the minister's remarks about conservation, especially that part where he said that we have had a 12-mile exclusive fishing zone ever since 1964. In view of this statement would the minister indicate when we may expect the phasing out of the enormous fishing activity that is being carried on by the fishing fleets of Spain, Portugal, France, Italy, United Kingdom, United States, Norway and Denmark from that area which lies between our 12-mile zone and our 3-mile territorial sea?

My question is this. When may we expect the fishing activity of these enormous fleets to be phased out?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, this phasing out can begin immediately after we have defined our own exclusive fishing zones. Until we have drawn all the lines, we cannot tell these countries what areas we are concerned about and the areas out of which we wish them to move. In other words, we must identify them on the map. This will require the passage of legislation which we will be proposing during this session. Once we have established these fisheries closing lines, the negotiation and phasing out process can begin.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Fisheries a question. Do the U.S.S.R., East Germany, Poland and Japan attend the Law of the Sea Conference, and do they abide by the rulings of the conference?

Mr. Davis: They all attend these conferences. There have been two conferences, one in 1957 and the other in 1958. Not all countries have ratified the convention that was adopted at the conferences. I am not certain which of these countries have ratified all of the articles of the convention and which have not.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a question. He made lengthy reference to the need for conservation and indicated the extent of the tragedy created by foreign fishing in waters off our coasts. In this regard, he referred to the need for a conference and said one would be taking place in 1971—presuming there are any fish left at that time. I am wondering whether he can indicate what steps we are taking as a nation to initiate this conference on the law of the sea at an early date?

Mr. Davis: We are hoping there will be a conference in 1971. We are holding a number of discussions both within the government and with other countries in this connection. I gather the main concern at the moment is which group of countries will have the right to advance the first draft and therefore initiate the first discussion. There is a certain amount of jockeying going on in that connection.

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Thank you, Mr. Speak- going to have another 40 minute question period.

Mr. Rose: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I stood up two or three times in an attempt to be recognized in order to ask a question of the minister before he sat down. Since no one from this group has been recognized, I wonder whether I might be permitted to ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, this is the second or third time during this session of parliament we have heard a government reference to pollution control in the Arctic and other Canadian waters. Does the government plan more stringent enforcement provisions in the Arctic and other Canadian waters than are presently in effect? My understanding of our discussions during the last session was that we only enforce provisions in respect of matters such as oil tankers up to the value of the tankers plus the cargoes. When the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act went through the Senate, the unlimited liability provisions to protect the public were withdrawn because the vessels could not get insurance. Does the government plan more stringent measures than we have at the moment?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the answer is very definitely yes. However, there are a number of fronts on which we can attack pollution, and the Fisheries Act is one. Obviously, it deals with protection of life in the water, but there is pollution of air, which would have to come under other legislation. There is legislation dealing with the construction of vessels which might sail through our territorial waters. This would have to come about largely as a result of international agreement in respect of transport. There are a number of fronts on which we would have to attack this problem.

Mr. Peddle: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. In view of the contribution just made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), he should not be permitted to participate further in the debate.

This is the Throne Speech debate, so called. I listened to the Speech from the Throne and read it over a number of times. To me, it is an impossible item for debate. It does not invite debate, it defies it. I am not saying there is nothing in it or that it does not contain vague suggestions. What I am saying is that it is a catalogue, and I do not think we could debate it any more than we could debate the Ottawa telephone directory or the list of new books available at the Parliamentary Library.

I am sincere in saying that because appended to the Throne Speech is a list of almost six dozen pieces of legislation. There is no doubt that some good, solid legislation is contained in this list, but certainly no one can say that list provides us with anything that is debatable at this point. We are going to deal with the Small Business Loans Act amendment. We do not know if these loans are going to be increased, cut out, or what will happen. The list also indicates we will deal with an investment companies bill and the Expo winding-up bill. Apparently we will also deal with a young offenders bill. We have no details of these measures and do not know what is intended. In order to debate the Throne Speech as such, we will have to wait until some of these pieces of legislation are presented. However, this debate does give hon. members an opportunity to range rather widely in respect of a variety of subjects.

The first comment I should like to make is that the period set aside for the Throne Speech debate this year is just another example of the phasing out of Parliament. There is a pattern being set. A few days before the Throne Speech we heard a statement from the Prime Minister concerning how much he believed in, appreciated and respected this institution of Parliament. When we heard that we knew there was something coming.

The next thing we heard was that, for the first time in history, the hour for the delivery of the Throne Speech had been changed from three o'clock in the afternoon to ten o'clock in the morning. If that is not part of the downgrading process or phasing out of Parliament, then I do not know what I am talking about. When the Speech from the Throne is delivered at that time the function of Parliament is not the same since the speech does not receive the same attention as one delivered at the traditional hour of three o'clock in the afternoon. The next Speech from the Throne, which will probably be the last one, will likely be delivered at 7 a.m. or earlier.

The making of a president is taking place, and the president is not being made by anyone other than the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). This should be very obvious to all hon. members. I do not know whether that is good or bad as I have not thought much about it, but I think hon. members should be told what is taking place. That should be the obvious thing to do. Parliament should have some say as to its future. It should not be left to one man, or three men at the most, to phase-out what this country has cherished for so long.

I did not hear the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) when he moved the Address in Reply. He is the hon. gentleman who is so concerned about newspapers in Parliament and a full attendance. I did not hear his colleague, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau), who seconded the motion. He is the hon. gentleman who has blueberries of such proportions it only takes one to make a pie. I was in my riding on urgent business, but I wish I had heard them. I want, as a matter of course, to congratulate these gentlemen for their contributions.

Having listened to the contribution by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) today, let me make one thing clear. I have not been out after the hide of the minister. In fact, this is the first time I have ever risen in this chamber to criticize him in any way. On the contrary, I went on record some time last year giving him a pat on the back because I thought he was trying to do a half decent job on behalf of the fisheries of Canada. Since the latest schmozzle regarding seal hunting in Canada, I can no longer hold my peace. I feel it is my duty to comment on the minister's handling or, should I say, mishandling of this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Peddle: Last year about this time we were deluged with little cards reading "Stop the slaughter of baby seals—whitecoats". This year the cards read "Stop the slaughter of harp seals". Next year, the message will relate to hood seals, and then seals, period. First, I should like to make clear that I am in no way insensitive to cruelty to animals or human beings. Anyone who knows me will know it to be a fact, although kind of ridiculous, that if a horse fly, bumble bee or some other insect gets in my house in the summer I will get a bottle, a match box or something, catch that insect and release it outdoors. But I do not believe I would do that if I were depending on bumble bee skins, or something that had to do with these insects, for my living.

I have here a sheaf of correspondence which the minister graciously supplied to me some time during the last session. At the very beginning of this sheaf of correspondence there is a letter from the minister. I will read it into the record. It is not confidential. It reads as follows:

My dear Colleague:

Since the Committee has adopted a Motion to consider various aspects of the seal hunt I thought I should send you copies of recent statements which I have made on this subject as well as the reports submitted by a number of eminent veterinarians and members of Humane Societies who have observed the sealing operations in the Gulf of St. Lawrence over the past two years.

This information may be useful to you in preparing for your Committee meetings to consider this subject.

This letter is dated April 2, 1969.

I was not active on the fisheries committee at that time. I deliberately stayed out of the seal debate because I gave the Minister of Fisheries credit for having enough common sense not to capitulate to the arguments of a bunch of impractical old ladies over in Europe who, in the evening when they finish their curried lamb, suckling pig or calves liver wrapped up in bacon, dress up in their kid gloves, put on a mink stole and kid shoes and go out to save the seals. When the minister supplied me with this sheaf of correspondence—and he did so without solicitation—it was obvious he supported the contentions and conclusions of the eminent veterinarians to whom he referred them.

Mr. McGrath: That was before the old ladies got to him.

Mr. Peddle: My colleague says that was before the old ladies got to him. I don't know. For the record I should like to list the people who went out to check the 1967 seal hunt: Mr. T. I. Hughes, General Manager, Ontario Humane Society, Toronto, Ontario; Dr. Forbes MacLeod, Managing Director, Saint John Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Saint John, N.B.; Dr. Douglas H. Pimlott, Department of Zoology University of Toronto, and a Director of the Canadian Audubon Society, Toronto, Ontario; Mr. James St. Onge, Director of Animal Welfare, Canadian Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Montreal, P.Q., and Mr. John Walsh, Assistant Director, International Society for the Protection of Animals, Boston, Massachusetts. I have here the reports of these eminent veterinarians, but I also have a resumé of these reports. The following is a quotation from Mr. Hughes' final summary in his report:

In my opinion the regulations require further amendments which would close the loopholes and clarify the intent of the present regulations. Equally there is no doubt that the killing of whitecoat harp seals in Area 2 of the Gulf of St. Lawrence by Canadians is now as humane as the average slaughter house operation, in most provinces of Canada—

Note this!

—and more humane than many slaughter house operations particularly in those provinces where there is no Provincial Humane Slaughter Laws, such as Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec. In fact this might not be entirely coincidental. I am confident that a force of specially trained, physically fit Fishery Officers, with improved equipment and with further experience can ensure that the hunting of whitecoats in the Gulf of St. Lawrence by Canadians will be as consistently humane as any slaughter house operation in Canada or for that matter, Europe.

Those are the words of Mr. T. I. Hughes, General Manager of the Ontario Humane Society. He mentions that he was not forced to make those remarks. Then, there is another resumé by Dr. Forbes MacLeod, Managing Director of the Saint John Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. This resumé reads:

Close scrutiny was given to the sealing operation by this observer during the first three days of the hunt.

Over 800 carcasses were examined and less than ten per cent did not have fractured skulls.

Then, this statement is very important:

No evidence of suffering prior to death could be observed in the ten per cent without fractured skulls.

A crushed skull should be satisfactory proof of a humane death.

The résumé continues, and then there is this very interesting point:

Sad sights—

A little bit of philosophy, really.

—are frequently misconstrued as cruetly. Compared with other types of slaughter, the seal hunt is not inhumane.

This particular report, made by all those eminent veterinarians, was unanimous. Then, we have an announcement by the Minister a day or two before this House convened in the fall, obviously made outside the House to avoid any argument or debate on the subject. Again, to add insult to injury, the minister stands up today, makes a major speech, and completely avoids the subject.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. McGrath: No regard for parliament.

Mr. Peddle: I do not like to make these remarks, but I really feel they must be made. I should like to quote from the Evening Telegram of St. John's, dated October 17, 1969. This is from an editorial entitled "Mr. Davis gives in". It reads as follows:

Fisheries Minister Jack Davis, whose riding is on the Pacific Coast in British Columbia, has finally given in to the pressure from the lobbyists and the sob-sisters. His announcement that there will be no killing of baby seals, whitecoats, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence next spring, is taken by some sources as marking the beginning of the end of the entire operation. For make no mistake, the ardent campaigners against the seal hunt will not be satisfied unless they get a complete ban.

It is, moreover, typical of Canadian government mentality that they have put the cart before the horse again.

[Mr. Peddle.]

I will not go into that. We are not interested in that because we all know it, Mr. Speaker. Then the editorial reads:

It all adds up to another illustration of Canadian hypocrisy, and is another indication of a subconscious desire to play the "good guy" before the world. The so-called cruelty to baby seals is no worse than the cruelty inflicted on millions of other animals, birds and wildlife in general, not to mention the domestic animals butchered every day to fill our stomachs. And the crowning irony is that some of the strongest protests have come from the U.K. where they show no sign of getting rid of that most cruel of sports, the fox-hunt.

An hon. Member: Tally-ho.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Peddle: I read that editorial because the minister avoided any reference at all to this situation in his contribution to this debate. The minister took it upon himself to reply to this editorial in a letter to the editor of the St. John's Evening Telegram. So a minister of the government of Canada has to resort to a letter to answer criticism and uphold the principle of pro bono publico. He felt so insecure that he had to resort to this approach.

Mr. McGrath: He did not think anyone would read it.

Mr. Peddle: As I said, I have never been critical of the minister, but this action of his disappoints me greatly. I will not read the letter—

Mr. Davis: Why not?

Mr. Peddle: All right, I will read it. I was going to say that it would take too much time, but if the minister wants me to, I will read it. The heading reads: "Hon. Jack Davis Denies 'giving in' to Lobbyists". Why he has to do that I just do not know. The letter reads as follows:

Sir: I read with some surprise and disappointment your editorial on seals of October 17, 1969. You, apparently, believe that I have given in to "the lobbyists and the sob-sisters" and cut back the seal hunt insofar as Newfoundlanders are concerned. Nothing could be farther from the truth.

In my recent announcement on sealing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence I stated that aircraft operations would be banned. This, alone, is good news to Newfoundlanders. It means that the hunt will be reserved to sealing ships and landsmen. As by far the largest income to Newfoundlanders comes from ship operations, and because the aircraft operators from Toronto and points west had been taking a large percentage of the seals, this should give some aid and comfort to readers in your area.

Does the minister want me to continue?

Mr. Davis: Is that not true? I think it is a good point.

Mr. Peddle: Then I shall continue.

Mr. McGrath: Have it printed in Hansard.

Mr. Peddle: The letter continues:

Secondly, the quota in the Gulf remains the same at around 90,000 pelts a year. They will be "beater" pelts in 1970, not "whitecoat" pelts. As "beater" pelts are worth between $15 and $20 a piece as opposed to $10 for "whitecoats" this should mean an overall increase in the return to those who work from ships and to the local landsmen who take young seals.

I have, of course, been referring to the Gulf of St. Lawrence which is under Canadian jurisdiction exclusively. The hunt off the Labrador Front in the North Atlantic is something else again. Here we are in international waters and have to compete with the Norwegians.

We have no intention of limiting our Canadian operations as long as the Norwegians refuse to agree either to the establishment of an overall quota on young seals or to the limitation of the hunt to "beaters" and older seals. Hopefully Norway, under pressure, will agree to establishing a quota and, hopefully, it will also agree with us that the taking of baby "whitecoats" is undesirable from a purely financial point of view.

In the meantime our own Canadian hunters will work to the same ground rules as the Norwegians and the hunt will be conducted as before. I personally, am sorry that this is so as I believe that we must set a much lower quota for the hunt on the Labrador Front as, otherwise, we will seriously reduce the total herd and undermine our position in the long run.

I realize that you could not let my announcement pass without some comment. But a quick, off-the-cuff reaction can be misleading. This is why I am writing to you now in the hope that you will also publish this letter for the information of those who are directly involved in the hunt.

(Hon.) Jack Davis.
Minister of Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. McGrath: The letter should be headlined "Whispering Hope".

Mr. Peddle: This letter should be signed "embarrassed" as so many letters to the editor are signed. Where is the consistency of this government? This is a strained analogy, but last year the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) proposed diplomatic relations with the Vatican and he asked for representations from the people of Canada. They poured in by the thousands, as he admitted himself. But then he turned around, announced the appointment to the Vatican, and said that the representations were just the results of organized pressure. What in the name of heavens is this seal fishery deal if it is not the result of organized pressure?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Peddle: I am afraid if this type of irresponsibility continues, the next thing we know the cod fishery will be curtailed to the same extent as was seal hunting. If it can happen in one case, it can very easily happen in another. No one can tell me that was not the result of an organized pressure group, of a group that went out to the ice and took beautiful technicolor pictures of young seals and of blood. We know blood is red. Why did they take the pictures in technicolor if they did not want to sway the opinion of the Canadian people? Let them go out to the farms and the abattoirs where young sheep and young pigs are killed and where other animals are killed.

Mr. McGrath: All the old women in Victoria got to the minister through their member.

Mr. Peddle: How did the old, sentimental clucks think other animals die? Do they think they commit suicide by taking too many sleeping pills or something?

Mr. McGrath: There is not one vegetarian over there.

Mr. Peddle: I am sorely disappointed with the minister. I expected more from him. I did not expect him to capitulate before this kind of pressure that had no logical foundation. Who is Brian Davies except a slick-tongued promoter, a con man, as against these very eminent veterinarians, as the minister himself refers to them? The minister sent me his statement himself, a decision which was against the recommendation of the Committee on Fisheries of this House.

Mr. McGrath: Their recommendation was completely ignored.

Mr. Peddle: No one says the seal fishery is pleasant or pretty. I have not seen it and I do not want to see it, but I think I am practical enough to realize that we have lived for a long time by killing animals and so far I do not see a substitute for it. This is going to continue. Again I say that I am very disturbed and concerned. I have lost a great deal of confidence that I had built up in the Minister of Fisheries. I do not care whether or not he is disappointed about it, that does not bother me. I have said enough about seals.

The one other comment I want to make is that seals now have to be shot or killed with a bow and arrow. Picture to yourself the Newfoundland sealers. They are not marksmen. They can manage to hit a seal with a heavy club and do a good, clean job of putting him out of his misery, but they are not marksmen. They might end up shooting one another, especially if we try to make Robin Hoods out of them and equip them with bows and arrows. If I or any member of this house, and particularly those members who come from areas where this hunt is practised, can stand by and see the minister capitulate before a bunch of foolishness and unrealistic garbage rather than decide on the basis of honest to God professional advice, and see the possibility of some sealers being shot when they are trying to earn a living for their children by killing animals—a thing which we all do—then I would not be doing my duty nor would my colleagues be doing their duty if we did not object.

Mr. McGrath: The minister is a latter day William Tell.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Peddle: We certainly have heard enough about seals, Mr. Speaker. I do not know how much time I have left, Sir, but I am sure Your Honour will let me know.

I am sorry the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) is not in the chamber. He is getting too smart, too smooth, too suave, but I have a few questions for him. The other day we heard him mention how important it is for the federal government to disseminate information in a more even flow. He said that the people must have more information. I would like to have some information from him.

According to a news report he has jointed the inner circle—whatever that means. I think it refers to a select five or six members within the cabinet. From his exalted position within the inner circle, would he let us have some answers to some questions? He is cited as being the Newfoundland representative in the cabinet. I do not think that is right. I feel quite sure he represents the whole of Canada. However, he has not denied this description, and each time there is a news report concerning him he is described as the Newfoundland representative in the cabinet.

Let the Minister of Transport tell us where he was when the decision was made to abandon the salt rebate. Of course, at the time he said that it might mean $100 or $200 per fisherman, and, what the heck, they would get over it; it was a bandaid. As the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) said the other night, having taken off the bandaid the fishermen are now bleeding to death.

Where was the Minister of Transport when the decision was made to eliminate rail passenger service in Newfoundland? All he said was, "You fellows are taken up with sentiment." He used that very word sentiment, something which is supposed to have prompted the Minister of Fisheries to abandon the seal hunt. Where is the consistency in all this? Where was the Minister of Transport when the decision was made to abandon the seal hunt? Where was he when the freeze was lifted from freight rates?

Where was the Minister of Transport when our staunch, stalwart Labrador fishermen had their first failure for many years this season and the cabinet decided, "Send the boys down to the nearest welfare office"? Where was Newfoundland's representative in the cabinet when the terrible situation regarding communications in Labrador was referred to him months ago, when his department withdrew its radio telephones and left Bell Telephone to handle the problem?

I am not trying to be funny, Mr. Speaker, but I am sure everybody knows about that group of singers known as the "Chipmunks". Just call Labrador south by telephone and the conversation sounds like the Chipmunks coming through 200 feet of galvanized pipe. In fact, the Minister of Transport did not even answer the representations of the people concerned. I have been trying to drag him into this chamber at ten o'clock at night to answer questions, and I cannot even do that. I have to settle for one of his parliamentary assistants, or something like that.

Where are the minister's comments on the high rate of unemployment in Newfoundland? He talked about giving out more information. Let us get information on these questions. Where are his comments on the terrible effects that inflationary curbs are having on Newfoundland? Mr. Speaker, when I asked the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) to have a wharf fixed for the community of Raleigh, a wharf which is an eye-sore, which is a hazard but which must be used by the people, he sent down two men to put up a sign saying, "If you use this wharf you do so at your own risk." In fact, I have a photograph of it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. His time has expired and unless there is unanimous agreement he cannot continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peddle: I appreciate this concession, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to thank hon. members. Where is the Newfoundland representative in the cabinet who is building up such a wonderful reputation at the national level, but for what reason I do not know? He is miserably failing his own constituents and the people of Newfoundland. He was mute on the subject of pollution at Placentia Bay. He was mute on the subject of the terrible strike that took place in my riding of Labrador west. He was completely mute until driven to make some little concession there. It is a lovely job if you can get it, Mr. Speaker, but that kind of job doesn't last if you treat it in this way.

Half an hour is not nearly long enough to ask all the questions I have for that minister. When I began my career I used to say I had no intention of making long speeches, that I was not capable of speaking longer than five or ten minutes. In any event, Mr. Speaker, this is about the extent of my remarks on this occasion, but hon. members may rest assured that I will continue them at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member resumes his seat will he allow a question?

Mr. Peddle: Question?

Mr. Goode: I think there is need for a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It was difficult for me to determine whether the hon. member would permit a question. I do not think we can wait too long. The hon. member for St. Boniface.

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the government on his program outlined in the Speech from the Throne which promises an interesting session.

As many hon. members have done before me, I would also like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau).

[English]

I would like also to extend my congratulations to the two newly appointed ministers, the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) and the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury), and to wish them success in their jobs.

I would like to explain the composition of my constituency. Many people seem to be under the impression that I represent only the city of St. Boniface, but my constituency comprises three large urban areas within the greater Winnipeg area. They are Transcona, a city of 22,000 people, city of St. Vital with a population of 30,000, and St. Boniface itself with a population of 48,000, plus two country points, Ile des Chenes and St. Adolphe which are devoted to mixed farming. In fact, in the area of St. Adolphe farmers are still waiting to harvest their grain, since they have experienced very poor weather during the harvesting season.

The largely populated area that I represent encompasses a variety of ethnic groups, and these western Canadians represent a true example of understanding and unity in Canada.

Transcona is a fairly new city. It originated in 1912, and most of its labour force depends for work on the CNR shops located in that city. The residential city of St. Vital is the place from which Louis Riel came, and his home there will become an historical site with assistance from the local, provincial and federal levels of government.

[Translation]

The city of St. Boniface, founded in 1818, is often called the cradle of Christian civilization in western Canada. It is there that as early as 1800 most of our ancestors, the coureurs de bois, came to settle with Lord Selkirk. I regret that I cannot say more today about the history of St. Boniface.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

Today, Mr. Speaker, instead of speaking of the historical aspect, I should like to bring forward some of the problems that affect my area and the province as a whole. I agree with the contentions of many of my constituents, of people of the greater Winnipeg area, of Manitoba and of western Canada generally, that we are the forgotten people. Instead of being on the receiving end, the people of Manitoba and of western Canada are on the losing end. If anyone asks who speaks for our little people, may I say that I speak for the little people and all the people of my area.

May I cite some examples to show that we are on the losing end. One good example is the removal of the Air Canada base from Winnipeg to Montreal. That was a great loss to us financially and commercially. We shall also suffer losses as a result of the departure of those from the University of Manitoba who are engaged in activities for the Department of Forestry. We shall also suffer when NASA withdraws its support from the Churchill project. According to an NRC announcement, that withdrawal will be effective as of June 30, 1970.

While I speak of these matters on behalf of those who live in my province, I know that one cannot blame the federal government entirely for what has happened. This does not mean that the federal government has no responsibilities in these matters. The opposition seeks to blame the government for many of our ills and members of the opposition are nearly always quoting from newspaper articles and letters to this end. May I, also, quote from the Financial Post of October 25, 1969. I cannot read the entire article because there is not enough time. The article in my hand refers to problems Manitoba may face in 1970. It refers also to NDP actions in Winnipeg and to the actions of the NDP government. Referring to the budget that has been passed, Mr. Roy E. Robinson, president of Versatile Manufacturing Limited, is quoted as saying:

'It's a bad move for Manitoba,' . . .

'Rising costs will not attract industry to the province.

'Companies exporting products outside the province may find it more profitable to set up sales subsidiaries outside Manitoba. By setting up a sales subsidiary in Saskatchewan, as an example, corporation taxes would be paid in Saskatchewan and a company would save money because Saskatchewan taxes would be less than in Manitoba.'

I continue quoting:

Versatile wasn't considering such a move at present, he said, but the possibility exists.

Other companies have similar ideas.

The article continues:

'It's a hard blow to Manitoba,' said A. W. Swann, manager of the Manitoba-Saskatchewan division of Canadian Manufacturers Association.

'Any company thinking of moving to Manitoba now has an indication of the government's thinking.

'The whole budget is discouraging to manufacturing industries. In light of what can be expected it is likely the thin edge of the wedge. It will work against the avowed aims and objectives of the NDP.'

C. E. Atchison, president, of Investors Group, said he was disappointed in the 18 per cent increase (from 11 per cent rate to 13 per cent rate) in corporate taxes. It is likely to discourage new business from locating in Manitoba, he said.

The budget will not help the province but how much harm it may do remains to be seen, said T. E. Durham, Greater Winnipeg Industrial commissioner.

The budget will make it more difficult to attract people needed for the business community, in opinion of David Rothstein, president of Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce. Efforts started by the previous government to get Manitoba moving economically may be stalled, he commented. It found inducements were needed to attract industry and if increases in taxes are going to continue, it isn't much inducement for people to come to the province, Rothstein said.

I will not continue quoting from this article which refers to the many problems facing industry and commerce in my area. In view of existing problems that we face in the west I will make several suggestions that the federal government might follow. I do so because I do not wish to be like members of the opposition who criticize various ministers or the government without contributing any solutions to these problems. I therefore recommend, first, that the government announce once and for all, so as to re-assure the labour force of the city of Transcona, that the CNR shops are to remain in the area; second, in order to remove doubt from the minds of others, that the building which is required to service the new, large diesel engines will be built in the city of Transcona adjacent to the shop which is centrally located. This will give better service to the entire system. My third recommendation is that consideration be given to declaring Winnipeg airport an international airport. I realize that the government has brought in an austerity program, but this move will not cost a penny and will be of great advantage to Winnipeg because an international airport would bring many privileges.

To the best of my knowledge, the federal government has not extended any help to those areas east of the Red River—and I could go back a long way in verifying this statement. I think the time is long overdue for the government to consider ways of helping not only the people of the greater Winnipeg area but of the entire province. The constituents of the greater Winnipeg area ought to be given consideration, and to this end I ask the government to consider erecting some buildings east of the Red River. I also ask that office supplies, stationary and printing materials needed for federal offices in western Canada be purchased in western Canada.

May I also ask that the government consider the possibility of erecting a second mint somewhere in western Canada. Without doubt, there is lots of room for it in St. Boniface. At any rate, it would be a good idea if the government were to build a second mint in western Canada in order that we do not remain the forgotten west.

Next, may I ask that the government remove the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, as this would automatically reduce the cost of homes and make more homes available to newly married couples in my area. Without doubt the cost of new homes would be greatly reduced if the tax were removed. Perhaps the government could introduce a policy under which this tax would be removed only for those people in the lower income groups about whom we are so concerned, the little people, and especially the little people of western Canada.

I am tempted to quote from another newspaper article but I will not. Instead, may I say that in my constituency in western Canada, one third of the people are French speaking Canadians. Every time something good comes out of Quebec you hardly hear of it in western Canada; but, by gosh, let the separatists do something wrong in Quebec and our friends in western Canada will blame us every time. Well, we have learned to live with that attitude. We are glad to be western Canadians and want to remain as such.

• (3:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

La Liberté et le Patriote, on October 22, 1969, published an editorial on the Prime Minister and the CBC.

Mr. Trudeau dashed into his fifties over the week. And the separatists, the Parti Québécois and the independentists within the C.B.C. were not spared the backlash. In one breath, Mr. Trudeau assailed everyone and, moreover, managed to enjoin the English-speaking minority in Quebec not to tolerate being bullied in matters of education and language.

It is possible that the tension between Ottawa and Quebec will adversely affect us, the French-speaking people of the rest of Canada whom too many English-speaking people still consider Quebecers in exile.

Surely the federal government, and, in particular, the Prime Minister, cannot be anything but annoyed by these elements that stir up dissension and strife. No doubt Mr. Trudeau is right when he asks the C.B.C. management to act quickly and to get rid of those people who are using a government agency to spread ideologies harmful to peace and unity.

Would Mr. Trudeau go as far as to abolish the French network to get rid of a handful of undesirables? But would not that be lacking in logic with himself? How would he promote, support and encourage the French fact from coast to coast if he were to abolish the most powerful cultural vehicle?

Does he have to throw out the baby with the bath water to change the water?

Why not do some decentralization within the C.B.C. instead?

I go on with the quotation, while realizing that this is a recommendation I have often made. The article says:

Instead of centralizing everything in Montreal, why not give some decision making power to three offices, each one serving one region: for example, an office for the Maritimes and eastern Quebec, another for Montreal and Toronto, and a third one for the West. This is done for other government services.

Would it really be more expensive for the government to reduce grants that go to Montreal and to give more power, with a little more autonomy, to offices in the Maritimes and in the West?

Instead of letting Montreal dictate the policy of the whole French network, the C.B.C. should let the Maritimes and the West have more say in the matter. It should allow us to have our own newsmen and our own producers. The results may not have very much snobbish appeal, compared to what comes out of Montreal, but that will probably be more refreshing than the eternal Quebec squabbles that we have had to put up with lately!

My reason for mentioning this is that this article, in my view, shows clearly that the French-speaking people in the West—though they are a minority—have always got along very well with the English-speaking people in western Canada and intend to continue doing so. At present these matters create difficulties. It is no doubt only Quebec bickering, but we worry about it.

I do not intend to dwell on these matters, Mr. Speaker, because I know restraints are now the order of the day.

[English]

I suggest the policy of restraint is good. In fact, I think it is excellent. I feel, however, that while a restraining program does not hurt the rich, it surely does not help the poor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the hon. member permit a question before he sits down? In view of the comments he made on the budget recently introduced in Manitoba would he, as a member from Manitoba, say whether he approves or disapproves of the Manitoba government's action in reducing the monthly medicare premium to 55 cents for a single person and $1.10 for a family?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in answering the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I first wish to say that I am surprised he did not get the point. Perhaps I was reading the quotation too quickly. I was reading from an article in the Financial Post. The reason the corporate tax in Manitoba is rising to the point where it is chasing industry into Saskatchewan is that medicare went from $117 to $17 and it will be the corporations and the business people who will have to bear the burden of that cost. It is for that reason they want to move out. I agree that for the small people, whom I represent, this is a good move, but it is no t very good for industry and commerce in our area.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Since it is customary to allow hon. members a great deal of latitude in the subject matters contained in one's contribution in the Throne Speech debate, I intend to exercise that option and cover a number of matters that are of concern to me. I trust these matters also concern other hon. members of this House, as well as a vast number of Canadians.

I would like first to express my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) for their opening remarks. I am sure both hon. members must have felt a deep sense of pride to be given this honour. They spoke of the relevancy of parliament and I hope their colleagues will give special heed to their criticisms because it seems to this government that parliament has become a rather torturous exercise. We invariably get the impression they would like to scrap the whole institution. I would remind hon. members that when we speak in this chamber we are not only speaking to those in this House, but to all Canadians.

The opening speeches more or less set the tone for this debate. We have heard suggestions from subsequent speakers as to how government should function, and they ranged all the way from a dictatorship to a republic to a corporation with a board of directors. I do not intend to deal at length with the relevancy or irrelevancy of this institution. I simply want to say that, as far as I am concerned, it is a matter of one's own personal initiative and participation in carrying out the responsibilities which we accepted when we offered ourselves for this honoured position. Above all, it is the opportunity to serve Canada and to serve those who sent us here.

Referring directly to the Speech from the Throne, I may say I found it a rather generalized document containing very little to get excited about. There are, however, one or two matters to which I would like to refer and comment upon. There are some items in the speech of which I approve and there are others, which I will deal with later, that have been omitted, either deliberately or unintentionally.

[Mr. Guay.]

The first item I wish to deal with is the lowering of the voting age to 18. I wish to make it abundantly clear at the outset that I approve of this measure and I intend to support its passage in the House. No doubt some people in this country may question this legislation, but I ask them to bear in mind that we have reached a period where our younger generation is seeking greater responsibility. We hear the cry that our young are irresponsible, but how can they ever become responsible or take up the challenge of responsibility if they are not given the opportunity of meaningful participation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: I do not suggest for one minute that we have put an exaggerated premium on our youth, but I do get concerned about some of the headlines that we read in our newspapers about radicalism, violence, and riots. Perhaps it would be wise if we took the time to glance at the inside of these same papers to get a better idea of what responsible youth groups are doing.

• (3:50 p.m.)

I was glancing through the Calgary Albertan the other day. The headline on the centre page read: "Appealing to you—Youth groups help". Underneath, appeared the following:

> The youth of Calgary forms one of the major groups working this year to help the United Appeal reach its $1,662,000 target.

The article went on:

> Kathy Ballantyne, a student nurse at Holy Cross Hospital and member of the girl's football team, questions whether the exposure is great enough.
> "Show me where it's spent" is her attitude, and Kathy says there are lots of her fellow students who may feel the United Fund is a good thing, but would like to be told where the money they help to raise is being spent.
> Their inquiring minds are asking not how the money is spent, but where, so they can identify with the contribution they are making.

The Edmonton Journal contains a whole page devoted to student projects, proceeds from which will go to the United Community Fund. I should like to name some of the high schools concerned: O'Leary, Victoria, St. Joseph's, Macdonald, Ross Sheppard, St. Mary's, Ainlay, Queen Elizabeth, Louis St. Laurent, O'Brien. I ask you, Mr. Speaker; doesn't this sound like responsibility?

We hear suggestions from our youth that political parties are irrelevant. They want more than mere participation at the polls at election time. They are looking for, and they are ready for, a meaningful sense of participation. We in the various political parties all say that the future of our parties depends on the involvement of youth. But what are we doing to encourage the youth of this country to become more active in political affairs? I hope possession of the franchise will instil in them a real sense of enthusiasm for the building of this country; God bless us, there is a great deal to be done. I am sure it will lead to much the same enthusiasm as many of us experienced in our election campaigns last year.

We in the Province of Alberta have for some time allowed citizens aged 19 and over the privilege of voting, and the results have proved to be very satisfactory. I hope that in due course we may expect the institution of a uniform voting age across this country. I also hope parliament will consider the possibility of lowering the age at which young people may legally enter into contracts. It is somewhat ridiculous that a young person aged 18 can vote in a federal election, and influence the choice of a government, while being unable to enter into a contract to buy an automobile if he is self-sufficient, or self-supporting.

Since I became a member of this House my party has given me special responsibilities for dealing with youth matters and developing liaison between that segment of our society and our own caucus. I must say this has been one of the most gratifying duties I have had the privilege of undertaking since I took my seat in this honourable House. The association I have had, as a result, with our young people has convinced me that an enormous amount of energy and enthusiasm exist among our youth—enthusiasm for Canada. All we have to do is harness it.

Certainly, there are some radical differences of opinion, but this is natural in a free society. I would remind hon. members that radical differences of opinion prevail between senior members of our society, too. When any group, whether composed of the young or the old, feels a sense of alienation and frustration, it is bound to react. I am confident that the proposed legislation concerning the voting age could provide a foundation for sound, sensible involvement on the part of youth for the good of Canada. However, no one should expect that the mere passage of a bill will satisfy all the aspirations of Canada's youth. Not only should political parties give the youthful segment of society adequate opportunity to be heard, but immediate steps should be taken by all levels of government and by the public at large to encourage our young people to become actively involved in the activities of political parties; positive measures should be taken to encourage them to opt into our political society and work from within, rather than to opt out.

Above all, our educational facilities should begin to instil a little moral fibre, in place of the attempts to dissolve this moral fibre which now prevail. Programs of education should be geared to orientate and familiarize youth with the nature of our political framework at an early age so that voting becomes a meaningful privilege rather than a mere exercise.

I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his colleagues are not misled by an impression that because they have promised to introduce this particular measure they will necessarily have a monopoly of support from the young of Canada, and thus have provided the means of buying their way back to power. It may be that the right hon. gentleman's own party has failed in its dealings with youth. If I am correct, there is a fair amount of disillusion being felt among the young Liberal elements of his own party. I am sure it is fair to say that all political parties have considered lowering the voting age. I can certainly affirm that the subject has been actively considered, and the principle endorsed by the Progressive Conservative party.

As I have said, a simple lowering of the voting age will not satisfy all the aspirations of Canada's youth. Indeed, perhaps we are wrong when we think of today's unrest as being a "youth problem". It might be more helpful to consider this whole perplexing situation involving youth and society as being a "society problem" rather than a "youth problem". Have we earnestly tried to understand the young, or have we merely allowed them to live in their own sub-culture?

One of the most pressing problems facing society today concerns the use of drugs. I wish to emphasize what was said by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) when he suggested we should move very carefully and cautiously in considering legalization of the use of marijuana.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: Anomalies and inequities may certainly exist in our present laws concerning certain types of drugs, and I hope these will be subjected to a comprehensive review. I have in mind particularly present laws as they relate to the use of such drugs as "speed" and heroin. The whole question of drug use is an exceedingly complex one. We must find means of analysing the state of mind of our young people who are taking drugs, and we must seek to understand why they are doing so. Meanwhile, until we are able to secure sufficient information as to the total implications of the use of marijuana, I submit we would be committing a grave error were we to move at this time in the direction of legalizing this drug. I believe that we, as legislators and as citizens, must take account of the growing use of drugs in our society. I would recommend that immediate steps be taken to familiarize the young, as well as others, with the dangers and implications of the use of all drugs. Specifically, I should like to make the following recommendations:

1. That a system of centres be established across Canada to provide information, consultation and assistance on a more humane and rational basis to drug users. This organization should be federally funded.

2. That further funds be made available for research into the effects and nature of drugs.

3. That a national drug foundation be established for the administration of the previous two recommendations, for the co-ordination of research and for the exchange of information.

I might add that I intend to put forward a private member's bill dealing with this matter; I hope we shall have an opportunity to discuss it fully in this chamber. Until we have compiled a total assessment backed up by scientific and medical data, I submit we should move very cautiously. On the other hand, we should move vigorously in undertaking a comprehensive review and study of the state of mind of the young: above all, we must discover the underlying reason why so many become users of drugs.

We have heard a great deal recently about the Company of Young Canadians and its activities, and the controversies surrounding them. I personally believe that the majority of Canadians are fed up to the teeth with the CYC and I submit that the whole organization should be scrapped.

I realize that there may be some dedicated and sincere people within the organization of the Company of Young Canadians, but these are in the minority and have the least influence. The organization seems to be dominated by a bunch of long haired, bearded radicals who do not believe in any established values, including the responsibility of having to work to eat. By virtue of its name and its past record, it implies that all youth in this country are radicals and subversives. I say that the damage this organization has done to the youth of Canada is irreparable, and we must abandon it before we turn all citizens of this country against our youth.

I suggest that if like the Canadian Union of Students, this organization had to operate on voluntary contributions and voluntary membership, it would collapse within 24 hours. Further, I should like to point out that the mere fact that the Canadian Union of Students has failed is ample proof that the majority of youth in Canada want no part of radicalism, subversion and mutinous activities.

Coming from an agricultural area I would be remiss if I overlooked some of the glaring problems facing western agriculture, as the government seems to have done in its Speech from the Throne. The Throne Speech contains one piece of proposed legislation to attempt to alleviate the desperate situation that exists in the west. I refer to the Canada Grain Act, which I suspect will merely lower prices to the producer while allowing greater market flexibility.

It is not my intention to go into depth with regard to the problems confronting agriculture. I am sure they are well known to all members of the house, including the Prime Minister who visited the west recently. These problems have been ably restated by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam) and the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey).

To sum up the situation briefly, let me simply say that conditions in this area have not improved one iota during the last 12 months. There has been a continual deterioration in the situation, with very little evidence of hope in sight. Quite frankly, the agricultural picture in the west is one of gloom. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but the whole rural community appears to be in jeopardy.

I become very confused when, on the one hand, the government classifies agriculture as expendable and plans for the early retirement of farmers, encourages these people to leave their farms and transfer to the cities, while, on the other hand, the Prime Minister suggests that rural life is worth preserving, as he stated in his speech on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Such statements are contradictory.

As far as I am concerned, rural life does have something to offer. It breeds self-reliance, self-discipline and self-determination. If this government were to take positive measures to stimulate rural life, then I would support them, as I am sure would many other members of the House.

I recall that the late General Eisenhower, who grew up in the small community of Abilene, Kansas, said that the robust life he had led as a prairie youngster, camping with friends, roughing it with his five brothers, helping to do the family chores, earning money on the side and learning the stern but compassionate rural ethic, were all part of the great and priceless heritage of living in a small town.

I should like to know why the Prime Minister, his colleagues and assistants, do not get together and face squarely the problem of rural life and agriculture. I believe it is high time they realized that agriculture is a necessary part of the Canadian economy, and that a vast number of Canadians prefer living in the country to urban life.

The production of food is more important today than ever before in world history. The Food and Agriculture Organization suggests that by 1975 a desperate shortage of food will exist in the world. This talk we hear about lack of markets and surplus of grain is sheer nonsense. The simple fact of the matter is that we are just not getting our share of the market. In 1966-67, we achieved 26.3 per cent of the world wheat market. In 1967-68 our percentage dropped to 17.2 per cent. Figures for the 1968-69 crop year are not yet published, but I suspect our percentage is even further below last year's, probably around 15 per cent.

We have not been selling our grain. I submit that what is required is a national grain selling agency with a progressive and imaginative policy. Such an organization should be organized in consultation with the producers. For too long have agricultural policies been formulated behind closed doors. We now have a new minister in charge of grain. With all due respect to the previous minister, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), who is a very amiable fellow, he knew as much about growing, marketing and selling wheat as I know about walking on the moon.

In addition, we should introduce immediately a program to appraise and completely reassess our grain handling techniques and distribution methods. I think our methods of handling and distributing are outdated outmoded, and lack efficiency. It seems to me that our method of grain handling is the only part of the whole spectrum of grain production and marketing that has not changed one iota during the last 25 years. Certainly, the criterion we should aim at is to become more efficient and streamlined.

We all recall the election promise that if the Liberal party were elected to office in three years we could look for sales of one billion bushels of wheat. Half that time has passed and the only notable achievements in the grain marketing field so far have been lost sales. For a year and a half the government has been aware of the grain marketing problem. It has sent out surveyors and task forces and has established advisory councils. Even the Prime Minister was dispatched on a western tour. A grain council was set up, but I have heard nothing from it since its inception.

The government has suggested that farmers should diversify. I say, diversify to what? Beef? The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) has looked after that by proposing a boycott of beef. Beef prices are too high, and he maintains that the bulk of the increase is being passed on to the producer. Although diversification might solve some agricultural problems, it must be handled in a manner that is commensurate with the region. For example you cannot raise beef on the wheat plains of Saskatchewan. Therefore, a co-ordinated program of regional diversification in consultation with the provinces is required.

I believe it is the duty of the government accurately to analyse the supply and demand position of certain commodities and to encourage farmers to produce to meet those needs. However, no action of this kind has been taken by the government to cope with the situation and, above all, to meet the growing crisis.

At the present time farmers in the northern part of the prairies are undergoing difficulties resulting from adverse weather conditions. As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) pointed out today, in many areas 90 per cent of the harvest still remains in the fields. I know the minister and his colleague, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang), have visited the west and are analysing the situation. The province of Alberta has already announced its intention to provide some form of assistance. But I submit this is a joint responsibility. I hope the minister will stand in his place and make an announcement this week in order to put the farmers at ease. The farmers are short not only of grain but of straw and feed to winter their livestock. So, certainly some assistance is necessary.

Some time ago Parliament was asked to approve and establish a department of regional expansion. We were led to believe this new program would benefit all Canadians suffering as a result of living in slow growth areas. We were led to believe that all areas suffering from regional disparity and drifting out of the mainstream of Canada's economic progress would be included. The fact is today that areas in Alberta and Western Canada which have experienced slow growth and have faced difficult times have been excluded. By an odd coincidence the only area of Alberta that appears to be in need of economic assistance, according to the minister and this new department, lies in the constituency represented by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). It is this kind of thing that makes western Canadians skeptical of the good faith of this government.

If the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) were to take a completely unbiased look at the economic plight of Canada today, I believe he would decide to treat the whole Canadian agricultural area as a designated area for economic assistance. The great tragedy of this country is that hundreds of thousands of solid, taxpaying productive citizens are being driven from their preferred occupations by a combination of government indifference and lack of leadership. Canada's agricultural community is a valuable national asset, not only as a producer of food and of exports, but as a reinforcement for the framework of Canadian society.

I should like to comment briefly on the situation of our veterans and the Woods report. I do know that the Standing Committee on Veterans' Affairs has been meeting and considering this document. I simply want to go on record as supporting the recommendations in the Woods report. I speak on behalf of all those I represent and on behalf of the many members of the Legion in the area surrounding my constituency.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

Let me particularly emphasize the need for an equitable basic rate of pension related to the rate for unskilled labour in the public service, as outlined in information given to the 1919 parliamentary committee. It seems to me grossly inequitable that there should be a discrepancy now between the basic pension and the rate for unskilled labour to the tune of approximately $1,000, particularly in this time of rampant inflation and rising living costs. The whole approach to the adjudication of claims must be put on a more humane and rational basis, emphasizing the application of the benefit of the doubt.

Having regard to the Legion magazine, I submit that equitable mailing rates should be re-established to allow the Legion magazine, Canada's voice of the veterans, to once again enjoy parity with some of the subversive publications which have been disseminating malicious propaganda. I am sure it is no secret to hon. members or the public that the Legion's publications were saddled with a whopping 1400 per cent increase in mailing rates. Certainly, there can be no justification for this.

In concluding my remarks, I should like to put in a plug for my good friends and neighbours of the city of Edmonton. As you may know, the city of Edmonton is known as the gateway to the north. It is Canada's only major city—as a matter of fact, it is Canada's fourth largest city—that does not enjoy a direct international air service link with the United States. You may be aware that the citizens of Edmonton are conducting a vigorous campaign in support of the request by North-West Orient Airlines for the right to link up Edmonton with Minneapolis, Chicago and Anchorage. I am sure I do not have to go into detail with regard to the economic advantages which this would have for the city of Edmonton and the province of Alberta. As a matter of fact, the future growth of Edmonton and Northern Alberta could very well be hindered if a favourable decision is not made.

An indication of the desire to have this service implemented is evidenced by the fact that more than 125,000 signatures, backed by more than 200 business enterprises, have been collected, together with written support in an accompanying brief which has been submitted to the chairman of the Air Transport Committee which will be reviewing these bilateral agreements this month. I want to go on record as being one of those actively engaged in supporting this application and I urge those who are charged with the responsibility of making this decision to react in a favourable manner, thereby giving Edmonton the opportunity to enjoy similar service to that enjoyed by all other major cities in this country. If such service is not established, it will simply mean that Edmonton will be doomed to become a second class city in Canada.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members for your attention.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark and Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to rise in this famous chamber and be identified in some way with the many speeches that have been given during this rather lengthy debate on the Speech from the Throne. I want to identify myself with all members in this house who commended the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) on the very excellent speeches they made at the initiation of this debate.

At this time, I should like to say a few words about my own constituency and then deal with three different topics. As hon. members will have noted when Your Honour gave me the floor, my constituency is officially called Lanark and Renfrew. This is most unfortunate, not because it is called Lanark and Renfrew but because I represent three counties in Ontario, Lanark, Renfrew and Carleton. I have difficulty in convincing the people of Carleton that they are in fact included. For that reason, I have a private member's bill before this house asking that the name be changed to include Carleton.

I am also aware as we sit here day in and day out, week in and week out, to quote a famous member of this House, that "you cannot tell the depth of the well by the length of the handle on the pump", and that similarly you cannot always tell by the speeches made how great or how small is the contribution.

The three topics I want to deal with in the few minutes my time will permit—and perhaps I cannot cover them all—are the initiation of full diplomatic relations between the government of Canada and the Vatican; the Canadian rural dilemma, and additional means whereby regional disparity can be significantly reduced. This may seem like a very large slice from the cake. Perhaps I will not get around to all three, but I want to share some of my convictions, thoughts and research on at least two of these topics.

My position regarding the recognition of the Vatican can be put very simply by saying I am not in support of it but rather strongly opposed to it. This may be surprising to some hon. members. They may suggest that, as a member on the government side of the House, I should support it. They may suggest I have some prejudices and so on. For my own satisfaction, and hopefully for the edification of the House, I will as lucidly and as briefly as I can indicate why I am not in favour of recognition of the Vatican in the sense of establishing full diplomatic relations. I have already indicated my feelings to the people of my constituency, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp).

First, let me make one clarification. Some people say we are not establishing diplomatic relations with the Roman Catholic church but rather with the Vatican city state. It seems to me, if we analyse this situation for a moment, it is easy to see that diplomatic relations are not established between two sets of buildings; they are not established between pillars and they are not established between some kind of parliamentary assembly hall in nation A and some kind of assembly hall in nation B. Rather, they are established between governments, between those who, in fact, represent the people who live in those respective countries. It is between the government of Canada and the government of Vatican city that diplomatic relations have been established. Who is the government of Vatican city? Well, Pope Paul VI and the Curia happen to be the government of Vatican City. Who are they? They are none other than the titular and actual heads of the Roman Catholic church. In elementary school, I believe it was, we learned a mathematical principle that things equal to the same thing are equal to each other. So, it seems to me in a very real sense that we are like the Irish Rovers and their Unicorn when we say we are not involved with the Roman Catholic church but are just establishing diplomatic relations with the Vatican. We are playing silly games.

If the Pope is not the head of the Roman Catholic church, then I do not know who is and neither does anyone else. So, let us dispel once and for all the idea that they are not one and the same thing. I repeat that our diplomatic relations were not established with a group of buildings but with the government of the Vatican. That government is the Holy See of Rome and the Holy See of Rome is the primary bishopric of the Catholic church in the world. I say all of this to lay the foundation for hon. members in this chamber who may be interested in, or will at least tolerate, the presentation I am about to make. I must say this to clarify the reason for my opposition to the move to recognize the Vatican.

The recognition of the Vatican by Canada is not something that can simply be identified with or even compared with the 68 other countries which have established diplomatic relations with the Vatican before us. The reason we in Canada cannot compare our own situation with the situations which have existed in all the other countries is simply that we have a history that is distinctly and uniquely unlike the history of any one of those other 68 countries. It is basically different in relation to this topic.

What, in fact, does our history have to do with our establishing diplomatic relations with the Vatican now? Well, fellow members of this House, I am desperately convinced it has a great deal to do with it. It has a great deal to do with whether or not we should have diplomatic relations. I regret that the historic facts have received so little, almost pathetically little, consideration in the discussion or in public debate of this subject. Therefore, I beg hon. members to allow me to sketch for a few moments some of the brief and pertinent facts of the past out of which this nation's present has come and which bear directly on our diplomatic relations with the Vatican. Let us all remember—and this is almost a cliché or obvious truism—that we do not exist in a vacuum. We all have a history; we have come from somewhere, we are going to somewhere and where we have been has a great influence on where we are now and where we shall be later.

In order to make my point extremely clear I must go back some 712 years. In the year 1257—

An hon. Member: You have a good memory.

Mr. McBride: I have done my research. In the year 1257, the Sorbonne was founded in France. From the time of the establishment of the Sorbonne, the Roman Catholic church in France was always much influenced by a teaching that could most simply be described in this way. The Roman Catholic church in France—this belief existed there to a greater extent than in any other country—should be more or less free from the authority of the Pope and should be a nationally autonomous church. That idea has since that early date been of great influence in France. The Church should be nationally autonomous to the extent that even the appointment of the bishops should either be done by the king or the king should have the last say in the appointment thereof, rather than the Pope. This form of catholicism quite naturally, came to be known in historical circles as Gallicanism French catholicism has always been extremely Gallican. The other extreme, the opposite to Gallicanism, is where you are directly under the Papacy; where the bishops in another country—not merely in Vatican city or in Italy but in any country of the world—are appointed directly by the Pope. This is called ultramontanism.

I do not wish to appear to be a teacher or in any sense to be talking down to members, but this whole debate in respect of diplomatic relations with the Vatican has been entirely too shallow. It has ignored our history and has failed to note that Gallicanism was the catholicism that came to Canada when the French settlers from France first arrived here. This was Gallican catholicism which meant that the bishops were appointed by the king, to put it in its simplest form. When New France was settled, the religion was catholicism and it was Gallican catholicism. All of the leaders of the Catholic church in New France had very strong Gallican sympathies. We all know the history, but I must set the stage for what I am attempting to establish here. New France eventually fell to the abhorred British. It was very obvious, as in all cases where the British were able to conquer some other colonial power, that they had to give rights and privileges to the residents of New France. These had to be extended by the British or they could not hope to retain control over their freshly acquired territory.

If one studies British colonial expansion, one will find that this happened all over. The fact that the French court of the day—sort of back home on the ranch in France—had fallen on evil days meant that New France was reduced to the level of an abandoned orphan. It was left in the arms of the loathsome British. All of this has nothing to do with what I or other members think; this is the history of our country. This meant that the leaders of New France approached the British and said that one of the things they wanted was religious freedom; freedom to pursue the religion they had known. The British said they would grant religious freedom but that appointment of bishops by the King of France would absolutely not be allowed and that there was no way the King of France was going to meddle in the affairs of New France any longer. So this, for the Gallican catholics of New France was a difficult situation. The leaders came back with a counter-proposal. The counterproposal was that if they could not continue to have the bishop appointed by the King of France, they would like to go directly to the Pope and become ultramontanistic. The British, who wanted to get free of French political and practical involvement in North America, said fine. So, something happened in Canada that was absolutely unique in the world.

Overnight, these people, who had been strongly Gallican, became members of one of the world's most ultramontanistic churches. This is the point in North America when the interests of the French speaking people and the interests of the Pope of Rome become fused into one. From then on, the two were linked together. This is a fact of history and this is a situation which does not exist in any other country. It may be that French speaking members from Quebec in this assembly would stand up and say I am talking about things which are just ancient history and which are not relevant any more in French Canada. They might say that the opinions of French Canadians and the Pope are not one and the same any longer. But this conviction has not been understood in English speaking Canada or in areas where the population is non-Catholic and English-speaking. I have always found in Ontario and in western Canada there is a distinct conviction that this is the situation; that the historical fusion of French rights and the interests of the Papacy are still one and the same.

One year ago a very special bill known as the languages bill was introduced in this house. It was my conviction that it was a fantastically good bill, and I supported it unreservedly. As a result, and because of the history of Canada, I went into my constituency and said to my people: I know that so far as you English-speaking Canadians are concerned you still believe that the interests of the French language Canadians and the Pope of Rome are one and the same. But that is not so, I said. This was a coincidence of history but it is dead. It will not be perpetuated. They are two separate things. This government is interested in extending French language rights. We are not interested in the Roman Catholic church one way or the other. I made a very fine case. I think hon. members can see where I am going because when we established diplomatic relations with the Vatican, people like myself, from English speaking constituencies, who believe in Canada and who believe we should have an extension of the French language rights in Canada, had the rug pulled right out from under our feet.

I am embarrassed to say that not only has my credibility been damaged but the credibility of the government in which I have a minute share as a backbencher has also been damaged because if this type of action is going to undermine our progress toward bilingualism and resurrect the corpse that I had told people was laid to rest for ever—and I believed that that was the case—then this is a sad, sad day. I want to make my position very clear. Judging from what an hon. member to my right is saying under his breath, I am getting it across. I want to make it clear that I do not support this government action. It is most unfortunate that we have perpetuated what I had hoped was over and done with for ever. Religion and language should be two separate things. If there is anything that can be done to help English-speaking Canadians to recognize that we are not in any way perpetuating Catholicism, either pushing it up or down, but that language is one thing and religion is another, I would still like to hear about it and be a part of it.

My case has tumbled to the ground. For that, I am embarrassed and sad. I make my position clear and say that this has been a most unfortunate thing. It is a heavy price to pay at home to have millions of Canadians, who are in fact not Catholic and who speak English, believe that this government which is for extending the rights of French Canada is ipso facto and automatically for extending the rights of the Roman Catholic church in precedence over all others. This is very sad. However, that is water under the bridge and there is nothing I can do but cry the blues.

I do not want to use up too much of my time on this subject since there is a second point I would like to make. I will concentrate on one small area of the globe, namely Latin America, an area that holds my interest very strongly. There are 22 countries in Latin America and 20 of the 22 are predominantly Catholic. Of those 20, 19 are nations which have been colonized by either Spain or Portugal. The national churches in both those countries are Roman Catholic. The churches in both Spain and Portugal, if you know anything about the present day history, tend to be the most traditionally bound and tend to have the least ability of any national Catholic church in the world, in the context of their homeland, to manifest any relevent social conscience. In short, the missionaries who have gone out, as well as the whole of the churches in the 19 countries of Latin America, take their predominant tone and theme from Spain and Portugal. Therefore, in Latin America, the church has come to be too much identified with the establishment, with the people who have the power. As far as the mass of the people throughout Latin America are concerned, the people who have the power have the land, suppress the people, and have made a comfortable alliance with hunger, poverty, disease and illiteracy.

In increasing our own ties with the Vatican, we are identified with the establishment in a huge portion of the world where I, for one, want us to be future-oriented and identified with the mass of the people. In this sense, if you look into the future, the establishment of a diplomatic post at the Vatican is a disadvantage. Unfortunately, my time is running out and I will not be able to go into the other reasons. I have talked to other hon. members privately, and they have said they have never heard other people talking about these problems in discussing our relations with the Vatican. I am not attempting to suggest to the House that I have an insight which no other member has, but I thought these factors should be put on the record to indicate there are good reasons why it was a bad thing for Canada to establish diplomatic relations with the Vatican. Unfortunately, we are now on the side of yesterday. We are not standing with tomorrow. Too frequently, we creep where we should have walked and we walk when we should have run, but in this instance we ran forward only to catch up to yesterday.

I believe that bilingualism and biculturalism are more important than most of us think and that anything we do to diminish their importance is a step in the wrong direction. Therefore, I oppose the establishment of diplomatic relations with the Vatican.

Leaving that topic completely, I want to address myself for a few minutes before my time elapses to the problems in the Ottawa Valley and in my constituency, an area where roads are desperately inadequate, where avenues that will permit industry to place its products on the markets of Canada or of the world are so limited that industry is having a tough time in competing. We are in an area that is not one of the designated areas in the regional development plan. For that reason, you will see on the order paper a notice of motion in my name that we should become a designated area. I hope it will be debated on some future occasion. We have some industry in our area, but the Ottawa Valley is primarily an agricultural area in a day when 7 per cent of our population is made up of farmers but when we are moving very swiftly to identify with the United States situation where less than 2 per cent of the population is in fact involved in primary production.

The problem in agriculture in Canada is a very simple one and I am familiar with it from first hand experience and professional training. In Canadian agriculture, the whole problem can be stated in one word—over production. In Ontario, we most certainly need—and I am not so familiar with the rest of Canada although I had the privilege of being a member of the Agriculture Committee as we travelled across the country—to control and organize our marketing. To do so, and to control our production, good supply management is essential. It is nowhere more essential than within the agricultural industry. In the midst of any attempt toward supply management, and any attempt to uproot or relocate people, no houses and much pollution, and we paramount. People-values cannot simply be thrown to one side. In Canada, we have a queer situation. We have cities with many people, no houses and much pollution, and we have rural areas with many houses, no pollution and no people. We need to balance these situations somehow or other. We need to get a little optimism in the pessimists and pessimism in the optimists.

To cope with this problem I have an idea, which may be farfetched but which I think ought to be given serious consideration. I call it the central agency for transportation, or, for short, CAT. The whole point of CAT, as I envisage it, would be that every manufacturer in the whole of Canada would pay no transportation costs to truckers or rail lines etc. Instead, all would pay an equalized levy to the central agency for transportation. CAT would levy an equal rate per ton or per hundredweight for transportation costs on all companies, whether they had to ship their goods 500 miles or two miles in every part of Canada. Thus, one of the most severe restrictions on decentralization of industry would be eliminated. It seems to me that although the regional incentives idea is a good one, it will never really work. We will never really achieve what we must achieve in Canada unless some such additional scheme is adopted.

We might reasonably expect that our incentives would work more effectively if we could off-set at least one of the disadvantages that a company which locates in northern Ontario or eastern Ontario has over a company located in Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver, the disadvantages of extra transportation costs, the difficulty of securing rapid delivery, and the added difficulty of that company being located away from the large pools of skilled labour.

I know that many of the companies in the Ottawa valley area, which I represent, and companies in northern Ontario and elsewhere say, "Our problem is transportation costs. We have to compete with companies that are located only one mile away from those who buy their commodities." If anything could be done to diminish this disadvantage, then industrial decentralization could occur.

I would, therefore, leave the idea with the House that perhaps the Standing Committee on Transportation or the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) could consider some sort of central agency for transportation, an agency which would equalize transportation costs for all industries regardless of where they were located. The net result would not work to the disadvantage of a company that decided to remove its works and its workers from the over-polluted, over-crowded city and place them in the country, where with proper safeguards its operations would not pollute the country. This is necessary in a country as great and as growing as ours. I find that in essence, Mr. Speaker, I have covered my topic and am leaving a little time for the next speaker.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, on rising to participate in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne in this second session, I suppose it is normal and courteous to congratulate not only the two members who moved and seconded the Address in Reply to Her Majesty's representative but also to congratulate you, Sir, on having weathered the first term of this parliament, and all the officers who assist you in your work in this House, because it is only through the proper conduct of your duties that we are able to carry on in an effective manner on behalf of the people whom we represent.

Like so many other comments that have been made over the past few days, mine will be in nature a pot-pourri in an attempt to deal with some of the concerns that strike me as being important. One is tempted to respond to some comments that were made earlier, but I will refrain from doing that. Rather, I will deal with matters that I think are of very important concern, both to this House and to the country.

One of the chief concerns that people have had over the last year since the government took office—in fact, it is well over a year ago—has been the attempt to understand the shape and direction of its leadership. The shortest description that has been used up to now of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been that of a pragmatist. It is a very popular thing in the era of the 1960's to be regarded as a pragmatist. John F. Kennedy, who opened his leadership in this decade, was regarded as being a pragmatist above all else. In most quarters it is regarded as a compliment.

However, I would suggest that as the shape of the leadership of the government is becoming clear to us we are becoming more and more aware of the fact that it is led not by a pragmatist but by a legalist. For people in the future to understand the kind of decisions being taken, it will be important for them to understand the kind of leadership given. I would like to illustrate my suggestion that the Prime Minister is a legalist and practices a new kind of political philosophy that can be described as 'legalism' by giving three examples of three issues considered important to the people of Canada within the past year.

The first was one in which I was very closely involved—the whole business of the Nigeria-Biafra conflict, stretching over many months. There was great public agony, not only in this country but in many western countries, over the senseless slaughter taking place in the country formerly known as Nigeria and now known as Nigeria and Biafra. As recently as this month, one national church publication lamented in the strongest tones the inability of governments like our own to respond to the senseless loss of 2 million lives in little more than a year in that part of Africa. Our government has not acted. If we were to go through the various ins and outs of the discussions which have been held, and the things the government has said, and the attempts it has made to deal with this problem, one thing would become clear, that is that the government, from the beginning of its awareness of this problem, has been circumscribed by legalism.

Of course, a man of law such as our Prime Minister, and such as others who work with him, would quite naturally respond, "That is how we carry on our affairs, particularly those that pre-occupy the business of nations with nations." Mr. Speaker, I would say to you that when we very easily suggest that there is an accepted body of doctrine known as international law by which we can govern ourselves, then we have made the first basic mistake in trying to understand and deal realistically with what is happening in the international community.

We know only too well how ineffective the World Court at the Hague has been in trying to make its decisions stick, and this in fact in dealing with basic questions of international law. The international community is not one governed primarily by law and order. Rather, it is a human jungle. I suggest we have yet to reach that point where we can govern ourselves according to any kind of laid-down international dictum to which all nations, big and small, give assent. We know only too well that spheres of influence and powerful concerns play a much more important part in the decisions that are taken by governments than any adherence to some kind of abstract international law. Would to God that some kind of international law did, in fact, exist.

From the beginning, the Prime Minister has stated both publicly and privately that he could not act because it would be in contravention of international law. However, lawyers both in this country and in other countries who have spent some little time in examining the various international laws, so-called, that might apply to this kind of situation, and the various examples that could be culled from earlier decisions respecting international intervention, have argued strenuously that there is a good body of international law that would allow for a variety of creative responses to this situation. But we have not seen one ounce of solid, creative response to this most difficult problem. All we have heard from the beginning to the end has been a kind of resort to what I would call illustrations that bear no similarity to the problem, and these sometimes so crudely put as to be offensive.

Even more recently, we learned that our problems with regard to our sovereignty in the northern part of this country were placed in a great state of confusion because some months ago the Prime Minister suggested it was not at all clear what kind of jurisdiction we would exercise in the waters between the islands in the Canadian Arctic archipelago. However, it is interesting that each time he has spoken since then he has moved back more and more to the position which has always been assumed by prime ministers in this country, the position that we do in fact claim sovereignty over all the waters that lie around the islands in the northern part of our country.

Now, the Prime Minister resorts to what to me seems the most strange way to get around this problem. Now, we are told that because of the danger of pollution, and because of the fact that the Eskimos for years have been walking on the ice as well as the land, we of course have jurisdiction and sovereignty in that part of the country. But naturally the Prime Minister will not speak forcefully until he has established, by some legal means that he has yet to make clear to us that he can proclaim and have it readily accepted internationally, that we are sovereign in that part of our country.

Thirdly, and perhaps of most immediate concern to people in our own land, there is the problem of inflation. Of course, inflation is a difficult problem to deal with, and to suggest it could be dealt with quickly or easily would be to ignore the real problems inherent in the situation itself. The government decided to establish a Prices and Incomes Commission which would attempt to determine what might be a reasonable increase for those asking for higher wages as well as for those who are asking for higher prices. Almost within a week of one another, we had two examples of the recommendations of that commission being ignored. The Canadian Labour Congress as much as said it was not prepared to co-operate with the commission, and one of our major steel companies announced that it was increasing the price of basic steel by 6 per cent. Today I hear that another firm has followed suit, with price increases of between 5½ and 6 per cent. Of course, the Prime Minister has argued that the government does not want to interfere with the work of the Prices and Incomes Commission, because this is the commission's responsibility. Why the government feels this way is an intriguing question.

• (4:50 p.m.)

When asked what action the government might take, because there seemed to be some doubt in the minds of some that the government might want to take action, the Prime Minister said that the question was being looked into. When he was asked if the federal government is empowered by the constitution to control prices and wages without encroaching upon certain powers he replied, as reported at page 235 of Hansard as follows:

> This general matter has been referred for consideration to the Department of Justice which, as the hon. member knows, acts as an adviser to the government on constitutional and legal matters.

Have we reached that stage when the government of this country, on being asked a question affecting our basic economy, must refer the subject matter of the question to some legal tribunal in order that we may decide what right the government has to act? I wonder whether we have a government at all, or if we have not been ruled by some new kind of law society which will pass judgment from time to time on questions of the day that are of most legal interest. Mr. Speaker, the government this Prime Minister heads is not one of pragmatism but of legalism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I feel it is unfortunate that the country will have to bear, for at least another three years, with this kind of legalistic behaviour.

As one looks at the realm of international affairs, one can see that in the dying years of the 1960's such behaviour did little to enhance Canada's image. We are told in the Speech from the Throne that we shall be intensifying our direct contacts with many of the governments and peoples of Latin America, Africa and Asia. Presumably, we intensify our contacts by closing up shop in various places in order that we can cut our expenditures or losses—choose your own term. Is this the way that we are to co-operate more closely with some countries and understand them more fully? At the time, we have pledged ourselves to be an active member of the United Nations, and we suggest that we are now in a position perhaps to play our part in revitalizing and strengthening the United Nations. I wonder if anyone in New York city, say, would take such a statement seriously, especially if he realizes that in the last few years in major matters which have come to the forefront of international affairs, Canada has displayed no leadership in terms of insight or courage. We have been happy to pander to the ideas of many other countries, many of which are not great powers but small powers, when they have told us that our price for being accepted by the international group is for us to go along with other people's ideas.

It strikes me that we are verging on hypocrisy, Mr. Speaker, when we announce to the world that we are to establish, all on our own, an international development research centre. Sometimes I think that we see reflected in the makeup of this government the worst trends of Canadians who travel abroad. They have a smugness about them as they look at the difficulties from which our great neighbour, the United States, is trying to extricate itself, implying at the same time that although Canada is not so powerful we are really much better off and much better fellows. We can set up an international development research centre all by ourselves. Frankly, I do not know what we shall research. We have not even given the aid we have committed ourselves to give. I remember the figure of 1 per cent of our gross national product being mentioned in the grandiose pronouncements of our former prime minister a few short years ago.

In the Speech from the Throne, and in the Prime Minister's remarks, we see comments about the nature of our society, about its uncertainty, its shifting values and its propensity to action through violence. Some of that violence we have seen at close range. We are all genuinely concerned in this House about the ways in which traditional values and patterns of behaviour have undoubtedly changed. We are very much concerned that institutions such as this will not respond quickly enough, in terms of temperament and change, to the social realities of the country and of the world. But I say to you, sir, that as one reads the Speech from the Throne and the Prime Minister's remarks one will see little evidence that there is an awareness of what must be done, because the situation of today in the world has changed from that of only a few short years ago. If the Prime Minister and the government believe that all they have to do in the face of current unrest is lower the voting age by three years, then I say that he and the government have lost all sense of what it means to lead the country today. What use are all these public discussions and white papers, if the Prime Minister has decided that he will not listen to the recommendations of parliamentary committees and that the government will, so to speak, do its own thing? I say that he has not really committed himself to discover what is happening in this country today. It is interesting to note that while the Prime Minister, during his election campaign, spent some little time talking about the need for people to participate in government and about the need for them to communicate with him their concern about what is happening today, we see evidence that the government today is trying to dampen down discussion, avoid criticism and, in a sense, go its own sweet way.

No Canadian was more shocked than I was when hearing what the Prime Minister had to say about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Even more shocking was the lack of public outcry which ought to have arisen from what he said. It is hard to believe that only a few short years ago one Prime Minister was publicly rebuked for sending a personal letter to the president of the CBC; yet here we have another Prime Minister saying that if the CBC does not behave he will close down part of its network, and there is no outcry. Government interference in this field will mean that instead of public broadcasting in this country, something which is extremely valuable for the freedom of people, we shall have state broadcasting, which very few here seem to understand. It is interesting to note that France is in the process of moving away from state broadcasting and is going to public broadcasting.

On the other hand, under the direction of our Prime Minister, we are moving in the other direction. I hope that this serious folly on the part of the Prime Minister, occasioned perhaps by his desire to present some kind of heartwarming speech to his followers in Quebec, will be seriously reconsidered and that no more of these outbursts will be allowed to occur. I do not know how many such attacks it would take by a leader of a country upon its crown corporation before the corporation would crumble not only from within but from without. The Prime Minister has a rather unfortunate habit of talking against those who use rather aggressive ways of dealing with situations and then doing the same thing himself. He referred to the difficult situation that exists in Quebec, but not in terms helpful to the situation. There was a rather strange situation last week. In Montreal the Prime Minister made a speech which had great appeal to those in English speaking Canada who are looking for very simple answers to very complex problems. Following this, the leader of the Liberal Party in Quebec suggested exactly the opposite. If anyone understands whether there is some strange bond between the federal and the provincial branches of the Liberal Party in Quebec, I hope he will explain it to me because I have difficulty trying to consolidate this point of view into any kind of unanimity.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

• (5:00 p.m.)

There may be some short-range political gain in suggesting it is time for people to stand up and take on in an aggressive way those who suggest a different course for this country to adopt, such as preaching separatism or some kind of independent status, this is not really the way to deal with political situations in Quebec or anywhere else. Leadership should be more than a strong speech, more than an attack by innuendo. If we are to do more than play upon the divisions of this country and are to try to heal its wounds, we require different leadership than that shown by the Prime Minister in the last couple of weeks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Much of what the Prime Minister has said about participation and the chance for involvement is a thin veneer with little reality behind it. He has been in his position for some months now. If he is serious about participation, beyond having a few more teenagers going to the ballot-box once every four years, it is time he proved it. There are some basic things the Prime Minister could do. I cannot understand why at the beginning of his leadership he did not seriously and publicly advocate the broadcasting of the sittings of this House and its committees so that all Canadians could be aware of what is happening in the forum that, hopefully, represents their national interests. I cannot understand why in this day and age, when we put so much emphasis on what we learn via radio and television, political leaders should be allowed to avoid facing the responsibility of broadcasting the proceedings of this House. I have not heard any good arguments against the same access being made available to the audio and visual media as is now available to the printed media, and has been for many years.

If there is any seriousness on the part of the government to at least expose this institution and its committees to the country, and vice versa, surely broadcasting of our proceedings is a first requirement. Even that would be only a first step toward a major involvement of the Canadian people. If the government is concerned about the amount of antipathy and even cynicism that exists in the political processes of this country, confrontation of the kind the Prime Minister exhibits from time to time is really not the answer. It is sad that somebody who is reasonably bright should resort to what is not a very bright technique in place of real political leadership. We must make changes in our institutions. Some of them must undergo major change if they are to work effectively for the remainder of this century. It is not enough to cling to the past or tinker with what I call incidentals; we must go to the bottom of basic problems. If we are not willing to consider these basic problems they will one day be forced upon us in a very unpleasant way.

We should not fool ourselves. Simply because we have elections from time to time and people seem reasonably satisfied with the leaders and representatives they elect does not mean that all is well. We know it is not. We know that times have changed greatly. People no longer want to be simply spectators in their own country. They want not only representation but genuine participation. They do not want a sham kind of participation that simply means they have been allowed to take part but their opinions are not worth very much. This is sometimes the way parliamentarians on committees feel when reports are made and they find the government has neither considered them important nor even considered them at all.

I hope we might get beyond some of the peripheral questions that seem to concern the government at the moment, and raise basic questions about how parliamentary democracy flourishes in the kind of technological age in which we live. We have acknowledged that new realities exist in our system, whether they be of communication, education, transportation or social interaction. Unless we are prepared to recognize this fact, the difficulties we have been experiencing will become greater and not less. It is my hope that in this session of Parliament, perhaps through a special committee or an effort by some members, we will begin to work on this question in a way that will allow the kind of genuine participation that Canadians not only ask for but require. If we do that we will have taken a genuine step toward the kind of participatory democracy that has too often been a slogan and seldom a fact.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I join other hon. members in congratulating the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. The Speech does not really set out where we as a country hope to go and what we hope to do during this session. It is rather sketchy. However, it does touch on some things with which we have to deal. It devotes a sentence to the situation of the native people of Canada. It devotes a couple of paragraphs to northern development and what we may or may not do in the Canadian north, the last frontier of Canada and indeed the last frontier of the North American continent.

The North American continent has been penetrated and developed for two centuries. Part of the United States and Canada is older than that, but mainly in the last two centuries has this continent been penetrated. The Speech declares we should take the necessary steps so that we do not despoil, ravage and abuse the last northern frontier to the extent that we have ravaged, despoiled and abused the part of the continent that we now inhabit.

The Speech from the Throne declares that important opportunities will be provided for the Indian people. Some of the Indian people in my constituency were kind enough to invite me to visit them while the House was in recess. They were kind enough to provide a hall and to put on a banquet or dinner, as is the custom on the prairies. They asked me to meet with them, to discuss what they could do and hear some of the things they were talking about. Last year we changed the regulations applicable to the Farm Credit Corporation and passed farm credit legislation to make it possible for these people to borrow money with which to operate farms. I was told that evening that six of these people had applied for loans and all had been refused. I was also told they had sought to build houses. I know this was the case. A large-sized quonset hut had been built on that particular reserve a year or two earlier and there had been an undertaking that Indians would be trained to build houses and take part in the construction of houses for that and other reserves. When I met with them they told me they would like to know when the houses which had not yet been completed would be completed. They were anxious about this because the program had come to a standstill.

There were other questions raised. This lack of action demonstrates the gap between proposal and performance. Who in his right mind would start to build a house and not complete it? What is the use of saying credit is the answer, and promising to provide credit, if we do not intend to follow through? I have no doubt in my mind that there are in some areas Indian farmers who are reasonably well established and who have obtained loans. But surely when we changed the act we understood that when dealing with the Indian people an approach would have to be taken somewhat different from that which applied to requests for loans by a Canadian farmer operating under good conditions. If the proposals we were making at that time were to be anything more than a sham and an empty promise, this must have been in our minds. It disturbed me that we should have acted without taking the steps necessary to make sure these people would be able to play their part and be in a position to take advantage of the legislation. They will not look at this question from the point of view of someone who listens to a speech made in this House and says; "Well, he had good intentions." They will judge the legislation by the results.

There is in this document a reference to the need to continue the fight against inflation, to win this battle and make the policy effective. Mr. Speaker, in the area in which I live and farm, people are not concerned about inflation. They are concerned about deflation, which is severe and has now reached the point at which it is working hardship. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) went out to meet these people. He sat and talked with them. I read some of the reports. It sounded like "Alice in Wonderland" economics. I am not an economist but I have talked to a great many economists. I never knew, until the idea was advanced at these meetings, that because a person had an investment he is automatically considered to have an income. I never knew that because a person owned a house or a farm it was automatically considered that he had a satisfactory income. I always thought the two things were different. Apparently that is not so.

We have a regional development program in the province of Saskatchewan. It is meant to take up the slack, I suppose. One of its projects is near Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale, around Hudson Bay Junction. I hope it works out and that some kind of industry is established. But while this is taking place, Gulf Oil in Saskatoon is proposing to remove its refining plant and concentrate production in the Edmonton area. I suspect a great deal more will be taken away than will be added, because this industry is natural to the area; it is fed by pipeline; it costs the taxpayer nothing to get it here—neither the taxpayer nor anyone else had to make a contribution.

We need an over-all plan for Canada I have to agree to some extent with the hon. member who spoke before me when he said, "Let us not accentuate pollution and inflation, but rather let us have some planning and objective in mind to solve these problems." The real objective of the government has yet to be explained. Fighting inflation is not, in itself, an economic objective but an attempt to deal with a situation which already exists. It is a negative approach. What is the positive approach of the government in terms of employment and economic growth, in terms of the well-being of the Canadian people?

This is what should have been dealt with in the document. What is the objective of the government in connection with the grain industry in western Canada? The document says that the production of grain has increased substantially, outstripping demand. Grain is described as one commodity whose reserves have piled up, causing financial hardship to many farmers. There is in the speech a promise to improve international co-operation and to re-establish orderly marketing. We are told we shall be asked to consider amending the Canada Grain Act so as to provide more effective competition by Canadian wheat in world markets. The document states that the reduction in markets and prices has been causing the utmost concern to the government.

• (5:20 p.m.)

The changes that were taking place in world markets must have been evident to the government before now. Indeed, they were evident following the second world war and the institution of the Marshall Plan. It was obvious that a substantial portion of our markets would lie not in western Europe but in China, Japan, Asia and Russia. The trend of future markets was clearly shown. Yet we emerged from the Kennedy Round and GATT negotiations with a pricing arrangement and marketing outlook that gave the impression that our main markets for grain were still in western Europe. The western farmer would like an answer to the question whether our trade policies have altered to take into account the new circumstances with which we have to live The Globe and Mail for October 10 last carried a news item concerning trade negotiations between the United States and Japan, part of which reads:

> Japan also agreed to free the imports of soybean meal and peanuts for oil production by the end of 1971, and to expand import quotas for sausage and those for beef and pork, both by 20 per cent, Japanese sources said.

There is more to the story but I will not expand on it. I should like to know whether Canada is negotiating for increased access to other markets and is prepared to accept some imports in exchange for what we have to sell. I should like to know whether we will be able to increase exports of rapeseed which will offset the disadvantage these exports suffered as a result of the Kennedy Round negotiations. I think therein lies the answer to the grain and wheat problems facing western Canada.

The government has shown some initiative in the matter of barley sales and has recognized some of the new facts of life of the export market. Oddly enough, at the same time the government has limited the amount of subsidy paid on the movement of feed grain to our own markets in the east. Surely these are among our most valuable markets. I think one of our objectives should be to try to get maximum sales volume in our domestic market.

Mr. Olson: You cannot get more than 100 per cent volume.

Mr. Gleave: I hear the minister say we cannot achieve more than 100 per cent, and this is right. But let us first get that 100 per cent. If the policy of this government results in a 100 per cent volume of sales, well and good; I will be happy to congratulate the minister. But let us be under no illusion: unless we are able to sell our grain, western Canada will have to face the prospect of agricultural land going out of production. What western Canada needs above all is an agricultural policy that gives direction to the farmers for the future. At the present time one province proposes to put up $6,000 a year for each farmer who wants to raise small beef herds: another province is encouraging feed lots. The same is being done with regard to hog production. I should like to know whether the federal government and the provincial governments can get together and agree to a policy that will be of significance to our farmers.

I am sure most farmers would agree that some diversification can take place so as to change production to the farmer's advantage. But unless a proper assessment is made, a hodge-podge policy will emerge; poor investments will be made and human hardship will inevitably ensue. But above all, as I say, the western farmers need direction so they have some idea what lies ahead. At a time when we are trying to survive, to overcome our present trading difficulties, one minister of the government of Saskatchewan is spending his time sniping at the Canadian Wheat Board, the only agency we have to stabilize prices. I do not take that sort of thing lightly. There are always those who when a difficult situation occurs are ready to seek a whipping-boy, and this is the case with a minister of the crown in the government of Saskatchewan. This sort of thing is a sheer waste of time. If there is lack of aggressiveness on the part of the Wheat Board, let us ascertain why and take the necessary corrective action. The real solution to our problem lies in our overall approach to action that will stabilize prices for other farm products as well as wheat.

For example, the price of beef during the last year has been most erratic. In my opinion, our market information is inadequate. I wonder just how much market information is gathered from small sales barns that are scattered across the country, and how quickly information in terms of price and volume is transmitted to the marketplace so it can be interpreted by our farmers. If we are to have some diversification in western Canada, we must have security of price and a marketing system in which the farmer has confidence. This is one of the first requirements.

I urge the government to carefully consider trade and agricultural policies that will serve this very important region of Canada and give its people confidence and courage to continue to develop farms that are viable, high-production units. I shudder to think of a farming economy in western Canada that following four or five years of deflation—depression if you like—has lost a large part of its capital investment and is no longer as viable, strong and competitive as it is now. Our objective, Mr. Speaker, should be nothing less than the maintenance of a strong and competitive agricultural industry that can hold its own in any market in the world.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I recognize the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) I should like to inform the House of the questions to be debated at the time of adjournment. Following that I will recognize the hon. member.

At the time of adjournment the question to be raised is: the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle)—communications, southern Labrador, request for temporary reinstatement of D.O.T. service.

The Address—Mr. A. B. Douglas

ADDRESS DEBATE

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Jack Cullen for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we seem to be reversing the usual order today. In the last hour or two we have heard two clergymen in succession, followed by two farmers. This seems to be almost going from the sublime to the ridiculous.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are you sure it is not the reverse?

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): I appreciate the opportunity to take part in this Throne Speech debate. I join those who have preceded me in congratulating the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) on their fine speeches when moving and seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne last October 23.

Last year, on September 23, 1968, I spoke of the startling drop in farm income, especially in the prairies, which was experienced in the crop year 1967-68. The value of our wheat and wheat flour exports that year dropped to less than $700 million, after we had experienced the four best years in history when under a liberal government from 1963 to 1967 the value of our wheat and wheat flour exports averaged over $1 billion per year.

The downward trend continues. I have not seen exact figures, but we did export 305.8 million bushels of wheat in 1968-69. Calculated at $1.90 per bushel, which is probably high when one considers the low grade of some of that wheat, the export value for 1968-69 would amount to $581 million. Coupled with the drop in Wheat Board final payments last spring, the grain farmer's loss of income has reached the proportions of a national calamity. Let me assure the government, which is rightly concerned about inflation, that the prairie grain farmers are certainly not contributing to that problem; on the contrary, they are among those being victimized by it. I will have more to say about inflation later.

The fact is that we already have a full-fledged depression in the grain growing areas of the prairies which is affecting not only the farmers but those urban communities which exist mainly to serve the needs of the farmers. Many of these urban communities are rapidly becoming ghost towns.

Regional development was mentioned in the Throne Speech. I am happy to learn that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and in particular its incentive activities, will continue to get increased attention and funds. I was very pleased to learn that a large part of southern Saskatchewan has been made eligible for area development assistance. I welcome encouragement for industrial development and I know that we in southern Saskatchewan will do our best to make use of the help offered.

In this connection I was interested in a comment made earlier in the debate by the hon. member for York-North (Mr. Danson) which points up the contrasts in Canada. He said, as reported on page 108 of Hansard:

> We are blessed in our region. We have expansion going on daily that would create headlines anywhere else. This hardly ruffles the surface. It is almost routine. I have in mind a 4,000 man increase in employment in one aircraft plant, of which most people in the area are not even aware, which puts additional pressure on the economy of our region. There was a $32 million development in one corner of my riding which I read about in the local suburban newspaper. So we enjoy success and prosperity beyond measure.

Things like that rarely happen anywhere in Saskatchewan. If they did, and especially if they should happen in my constituency, everybody would talk about it for years before and probably for years after. This contrast lends urgency to the development of the area incentives plan. However, I believe that positive action to improve the lot of the grain farmer would do more to quickly revive our ailing economy and put life back into the service industries on the prairies, on a short-term basis at least.

May I again suggest that the government support the price of wheat at $1.95½ as was done between August 1, 1967, and July 1, 1968. That was during the period when no International Grains Arrangement was in effect. Now that the IGA has been agreed to and ratified by the government, there is even more justification for the government supporting that minimum price. This is a government agreement, negotiated by governments, signed and ratified by governments, which has been broken by government action in the first year of a three-year term. Farmers planned their production and financing on the basis of that three-year agreement. Now suddenly they are left high and dry and are being made the victims of an international price war between governments. No government would dare treat big industry or labour unions in such a cavalier fashion. So I renew my request that the government consider what farmers believe to be a legitimate claim for this kind of assistance.

Farmers appreciate the beginnings of a two-price system. The principle has been established. I call on the government to make it more realistic in terms of general price levels in the Canadian economy. I ask the government to provide some meaningful assistance to grain farmers who may wish to diversify, which is what some government spokesmen are recommending.

Much has been said in the last year or two about who was responsible for encouraging farmers to increase their grain production. At one of the many meetings I attended in my constituency this fall, one farmer, who must have had a good filing system or at least a better one than I have on the farm, produced a copy of "Farm Letter", which is a monthly publication of the federal Department of Agriculture. It contained an article entitled "Outlook 67" and was dated January 1967. It was issued with the authority of Hon. J. J. Greene, the then Minister of Agriculture. Let me read two short paragraphs on the outlook for wheat:

> The forecast is for a carryover of 580 million bushels on July 31 when the crop year ends, and the experts say this is not too much.

Remember, they are referring to July 31, 1967, just a little over two years ago. Listen to this:

> Continuing high production of wheat will be needed. But given average yields, Canada should be able to meet the demand by planting 30 million acres to wheat, the same as in 1966.

Can anyone deny at least some government responsibility for the wheat surplus?

In March of 1968, a little more than a year after that "Farm Letter" was published, the task force on agriculture said that farmers should progressively reduce their wheat acreage from 30 million to 20 million by 1980. There has been talk about supply management in this House. Grain farmers operate under the most stringent system of supply management one could possibly devise. I refer to the quota system, which in effect only allows us to deliver from the farms that which is actually sold. The quota system and the resulting pileup of surplus grain on the farms caused farmers to go halfway toward the suggested 12-year reduction of 10 million acres in one short season. Wheat acreage was cut almost 5 million acres in 1969. If farmers should continue at that rate—which is quite impossible, of course—we would reduce our acreage to 20 million acres in two years instead of twelve. If carried further to an absurd conclusion, by 1974 we would seed no wheat at all.

The unpredictability of the wheat industry is demonstrated by the production this year: while the acreage went down by about 15 per cent, the production of wheat increased by over 4 per cent. Someone will say that farmers just used more fertilizer on the reduced acreage. I have in mind the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle). The use of fertilizer was almost cut in half in 1969, compared with 1968. The average yield increase from 22.1 bushels per acre to 27.2 bushels was almost entirely due to rain coming at the right time, and despite a reduction in the use of fertilizer.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Harries) made a very good point when he spoke in this debate last Thursday—I hope interested persons will take heed of what he said—as reported in Hansard for October 30, near the end of page 295 and on page 296. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I believe the word "not" was left out of the seventh line in the first column on page 296. I quote with approval one paragraph from page 296 of the hon. member's speech:

> I do not think it makes sense, Mr. Speaker, to permit Canadian agriculture to function on an external basis when virtually all the rest of the economy is functioning on an internal basis. This creates poverty and, in my view, conditions quite out of sympathy with, and inappropriate to, the kind of productivity that we can enjoy in Canada.

I urge the government to allow the budget to expand for agriculture rather than be constricted. Farmers are among those people referred to as being unable to exact from our economy their fair share of price and income increases. I believe that the people of Canada, who are on the average very prosperous, should through the federal government come to the aid of disadvantaged people such as the farmer, the fisherman, the pensioner and the slum-dweller.

Someone may ask, "Where can we get the money?" Again I refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona who I believe is a former dean of economics of the university at Edmonton. He suggested that crown corporations which have been successfully developed should be sold and the money used for other development. I would prefer that we dispose of other government agencies, particularly those that incur deficits. The first one that comes to mind is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is expected to have a deficit of $151 million this year. I selected the CBC for more than financial reasons. They seem to be responsible to no one. I have not watched any CBC plays for years. I used to watch them but I could not stomach them. From my correspondence it seems that many people now have the same reaction. I am sure that few people would willingly pay to see some of the stuff the CBC puts out.

Most people in my area prefer the private network where management depends on public approval to make the operation pay. There is one exception. The private network station in Regina does not carry school television broadcasts. Early this fall the CBC unceremoniously switched stations in Regina with the private network, with the result that many schools which had purchased TV equipment and developed timetables making use of these broadcasts were left without the programs. One would think the CBC would have had enough consideration for its patrons to make arrangements with the other outlet to continue the service. The Don Messer fiasco was another example of the indifference of the CBC to its public. The CBC network and facilities should be worth a lot of money. We should sell the assets, use the money for more urgent programs and release almost $200 million a year of our annual budget for better uses.

I think funds could be diverted to greater advantage in the Department of Agriculture. My favourite suggestion is to dispose of the Tobacco Research Station at Delhi, Ontario, to the tobacco companies and save several hundred thousand dollars per year. It is ludicrous, in my opinion, to have on the one hand the Department of Health and Welfare spending large sums of money to combat the bad effects of the use of tobacco, while on the other hand the Department of Agriculture is spending large amounts to assist its production. There is also the question of the experimental station for fur-bearing animals which is being developed in Ottawa. I am informed that the fur producers believe such a federal research station is not required. So again I say, let us give more assistance to our dairy farmers, our hog farmers, our grain farmers and other agricultural producers. They are now receiving less government assistance and protection than farmers in almost any other developed nation.

That is not to say that the government has done nothing to help the farmers. More money than ever has been made available to provide farm loans and to assist credit sales of farm products. The Export Development Corporation was set up last session. Only about three months ago it was announced that our external food aid program was being increased $20 million, from $65 million to $85 million. Most of this aid consists of wheat and wheat flour. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) only a few days ago announced an increase of $1 million in the amount budgeted for feed grain freight assistance.

The government has appointed a minister to deal exclusively with the Wheat Board and the problems of the grain industry. Prairie farmers were pleased by the appointment of Saskatchewan's Otto Lang to that important position. I wish him well and assure him of my active support and assistance. He will have the constant and perhaps dubious benefit of my advice, solicited or otherwise, as he has already discovered.

I believe that one of the most significant things the government has done for the grain industry recently was the appointment of Mr. Charles Gibbings to fill a vacancy on the five-man Canadian Wheat Board. Ever since the Wheat Board was established by the Bennett government in the '30s, farmers and farm organizations have asked for farmer representation on the Wheat Board. Successive governments, including that headed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), failed to comply with that request. Last July this government did appoint a farmer, so we at last have farmer representation on the Wheat Board—and not just any farmer; Mr. Gibbings was a practising grain farmer who was president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool for many years. He is probably one of the best known, most highly respected, and most knowledgeable farmers in Canada, if not in the world. The government has not received as much credit for this very commendable appointment as I think it is entitled to, and I propose to try to rectify this omission at every opportunity.

Already I believe we can see positive results from this appointment. We have a new, unprecedented deferred delivery plan to take care of unequal delivery opportunities at the end of the crop year. We have an investigation within the Wheat Board of the whole operation of the quota system, which has had little revision since it was instituted 25 or 30 years ago. We are selling grain to new markets and reviving old ones. These are only a few of the results of this appointment. I take some credit for the initiation of some of these new policies.

Some hon. members opposite have accused the government of hampering the operations of the Wheat Board, of undermining it and trying to do away with it. This is absolutely not true. When the Standing Committee on Agriculture heard witnesses from the Wheat Board last spring one of the committee members asked if they would like any further assistance from the government. As I recall it, the reply was that they received the fullest co-operation and assistance from the government. May I remind hon. members that it was a Liberal government which two or three years ago introduced legislation establishing the Canadian Wheat Board on a permanent basis. Under previous governments it was set up on a renewable, five-year term, and every five years its enemies had an opportunity to press for its discontinuance. If any members of parliament are trying to undermine the Wheat Board, they are not in the Liberal ranks. I and the others on this side are 100 per cent behind the principle of the Canadian Wheat Board, Mr. Speaker.

I am the only western farmer on the Liberal side of this House of Commons with the exception of our Minister of Agriculture. Not only that, but I am the only farmer M.P. for any party from southern Saskatchewan. The hon. members for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh), Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam), Regina East (Mr. Burton), Regina Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) and Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) are urban men.

Mr. McIntosh: And also farmers.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): Consequently, more and more people from all over southern Saskatchewan are coming to me with their problems. One of the problems which is affecting particularly Saskatchewan and Manitoba is the shortage of box cars and the inequitable distribution of the box cars that are available. I experience the effects of these conditions myself. Many farmers inside and outside of my constituency are complaining. The discriminatory treatment that some railway lines and some delivery points have been receiving is almost unbelievable.

Mr. McIntosh: Why don't you do something about it?

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): I am. As of October 24 some points had not received one box car since August 1. Many others had received one, two, three, four or five box cars. On favoured lines they have been getting plenty of cars, as many as 100, or more, at individual points.

On October 22 I complained very loudly about these matters to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). Within a week he had arranged for me to meet the top officials of the CNR and the CPR. We had an extremely frank exchange of opinions and ideas on October 29. I was able to present facts to bear out my contention that many farming communities are being very unfairly treated. An investigation into the general situation was promised. In particular, all concerned agreed that a concerted effort would be made to make space available for farmers to deliver the supplementary quotas on durum and barley which expire on November 28 next. Similar deadlines last year cut off delivery of supplementary quotas of durum and oats before all farmers had an opportunity to deliver; they were arbitrarily deprived of important income opportunities by the vagaries of box car distribution. Farmers thus treated were justifiably incensed, and I hope that such an outrage will not occur again this year.

Imagine what a labour union member or a bank shareholder would do if someone such as the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans), failed to deliver his pay cheque or dividend cheque. I am going to watch the box car supply and distribution situation closely for signs of the improvement which I hope will result from the meeting last week.

My friend and neighbour, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam), spoke in this debate last Wednesday. He had an advantage over me because he had just returned, armed with a great deal of material, from some sort of convention at Niagara Falls. His speech consisted largely of quotations from that material, although I do not believe that he made reference to the very interesting guaranteed income plan put forward by his leader but which was reportedly scuttled by a group of Tories led by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). By the way, the hon. member for Crowfoot must have exhausted himself in the scuttling operation because I noticed him in the house only briefly one day this session. Neither did the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain reveal his solution for the pressing problems of inflation to which I will refer in a few minutes if I have time.

Mr. McIntosh: You should be the minister of agriculture.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): He did say something about the relative position of the United States in wheat exports compared with that of other countries, including Canada. He stated that in 1967-68 the U.S. increased its wheat exports while all other exporters lost ground, and total exports dropped by 12 per cent. This is true, and he probably knows why. The IGA expired on July 31, 1967, and the new IGA had not been ratified. So until it was ratified to become effective July 1, 1968, there was no floor price. The United States had no qualms about cutting prices, which was perfectly legal at that time. Canada, through our Wheat Board, tried to maintain prices to ensure that importers would ratify the agreement, because the agreement was probably more valuable and more important to Canada than to most other countries. I do not believe the hon. member protested this attitude at the time.

Mr. McIntosh: Your government sold us out at that time.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): Perhaps Canada would have acted differently if present world wheat market conditions could have been foreseen. Up to that time it had been a sellers' market. In less than two years it has become a buyers' market and the hon. member's hindsight is marvellous to behold.

He should also have been using the latest figures available on page 5 of the August DBS publication, catalogue No. 22-005, which gives figures for 1968-69, the crop year just ended. Again, world wheat exports from the four major exporters listed dropped, this time by 18 per cent rather than the previous 12 per cent. The U.S. share dropped from 53.6 per cent in 1967-68 to 46.7 per cent. Canada's share went up from 24 per cent to 26.4 per cent. Why did he not give us the full picture?

He also berated the Minister of Agriculture for being realistic instead of blindly optimistic about grain markets in the next few years. I think it is far better to be a little pessimistic than to contribute to another cruel disillusionment such as has befallen grain farmers in the past two years. Farmers have so much built-in optimism that it does not require artificial stimulation. If they were not basically optimists they would all have quit the business years ago.

Recent statements by cabinet ministers, including the Minister of Agriculture and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, indicate that Soviet Russia intends very soon to enter negotiations regarding taking the balance of the 336-million bushel 1966 wheat contract, and will also talk about further purchases. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who is still highly regarded in western Canada, recently made a trip to the Soviet Union. Perhaps he paid his own expenses, or perhaps the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) allocated to him part of the research funds which Parliament voted him. In any case, I am afraid it was not a very productive investment. It was pathetic, but not surprising, that the only announcement I heard him make on his return was a warmed-over version of what had been announced at the time of foreign secretary Gromyko's visit to Ottawa a few weeks ago and repeated several times since.

Further on the subject of wheat sales, the Wheat Board completed a very important wheat deal with Mainland China earlier this fall. Charles Gibbings was one of the three commissioners who spent some weeks in that country negotiating the sale. That sale was very encouraging to grain farmers who are now fairly confident that our exports this year will at least reach last year's level.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, before I interrupted myself at the dinner adjournment, among other things I had briefly reviewed some of the recent developments in wheat marketing, including the impending talks with Soviet Russia on the balance of the biggest wheat deal in history, a total sale of 336 million bushels negotiated by the Wheat Board under a Liberal government in 1966. The last item I mentioned was the large 82 million bushel, one-year agreement signed with Mainland China a few weeks ago.

In the statements on agricultural policy quoted by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain last Wednesday one can see the fine hand of that self-styled super-salesman, schoolteacher from Saskatchewan, Alvin Hamilton. He says he has the solution to our wheat surplus problem. If it is anything more than pure fantasy why does he not impart this precious knowledge to the Canadian Wheat Board? He cannot hope to regain command of the Wheat Board for another three or four years at least. If he were really concerned about the welfare of grain farmers he would not conceal such valuable information and thereby allow the farmers to continue suffering from low quotas and low incomes. I submit he has no solution and that he is only trying to perpetuate a myth that he contrived to build up some years ago. The voters of Regina East called his bluff on June 25, 1968. It is rumoured that he made a trip to the Orient recently. If that is true his timing is not as good as it used to be. This time the big wheat sale had been announced some time before he got there. Or perhaps the difference is that he is no longer in a position to manipulate announcements until he can be on the spot.

We need some long-term planning for agriculture, Mr. Speaker. We need a national farm policy. Farmers hopefully await the final report of the Task Force on Agriculture which is expected before the end of 1969. In arriving at that final report members of the task force will have had the benefit of the discussions and conclusions at the history making agricultural congress held in Ottawa last March. A reliable blueprint for the future of agriculture is long overdue but I believe this new Trudeau government would have been open to criticism if a comprehensive farm policy had been announced without the benefit of this thorough study of farm problems. Also, the Canada Grains Council, which was established during the last session, has just started to function and should be able to contribute a valuable input to a national farm policy. So, Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the tabling of the task force report and to taking part in the development of agricultural policy and programs based on it.

Another report that we impatiently await is that on farm machinery costs. One of the recurring complaints at the meetings held by the Standing Committee on Agriculture in the prairies last spring was that of spiralling costs. In the many meetings I have attended since then, this remains one of the prime concerns. Our cash incomes are still comparatively high compared with 20 to 40 years ago, but our costs have risen astronomically. Farmers hope that the government's efforts to contain inflation, including the work of the Prices and Incomes Commission, will be effective in halting this unendurable cost-price squeeze which has bankrupted many already and which has brought most other grain farmers to the brink of insolvency.

We fervently hope that the commission's attempts to obtain the necessary voluntary restraint from industry, unions and professional people are successful. The first apparent responses are not encouraging. The unions appear to be hostile to the idea of voluntary restraint. Industry is cool, with one of the pace-setters recently announcing steel price increases; and professional people, such as rural Saskatchewan teachers, are already campaigning for salary hikes in 1970.

The highly respected economist, John Kenneth Galbraith, was reported to have said a couple of weeks ago that he could see no alternative than for the governments of Canada and the United States to impose strict price and wage controls on at least the major North American industries and trade unions. If the alternative to such control is mounting inflation followed by a terrific depression, which I am afraid is the most likely prospect, I am all in favour of such controls, and the sooner the better. I believe that most people on the prairies feel the same way.

In my opinion the Speech from the Throne was a very fine document. It is encouraging to know that the government is concerned about the strengthening of the United Nations, which I believe should be one of the top priorities. I eagerly look forward to the progressive legislation planned, including items to lower the voting age, to revise the Canada Grain Act, to increase grain sales, to reform taxes, to control and preserve our water resources, to reform criminal law, to protect consumers, to provide more low income housing and to improve labour-management relations.

Last but not least, I see much evidence in the Speech from the Throne and in actions and words of our Prime Minister and various other Ministers, that the government is genuinely concerned about the serious problems of Canadian farmers and is doing something about them. Mr. Speaker, I shall support the motion.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, on rising to take part in this debate may I first concur with other hon. members of the House in congratulating the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau). Before proceeding with my comments on the Speech from the Throne may I bring to the attention of hon. members the fact that the federal riding of High Park which I have the honour to represent is, through redistribution, composed of parts of the old ridings of York Humber, York South, York West and High Park. It is a most diversified riding economically and contains residents of a mosaic of ethnic origins.

May I take this opportunity to congratulate my predecessor, Mr. A. J. P. Cameron, for conscientious and unselfish dedication to this institution during his many years of service here and wish him well in his future endeavours. May I also express my deep regret and condolences to the family of the former member for York West, Hon. Robert Winters, on his sudden passing. His great contributions to Canada's economy and our democratic institutions shall long be remembered. He was indeed a great Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the short time available to me to briefly enunciate a few of my opinions on the Speech from the Throne. It was regrettable that the Speech from the Throne did not contain a greater priority in respect of urban affairs. Today, when more than 80 per cent of our nation's population resides in large cities such as Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Halifax and others, from whence the majority of our problems arise necessitating legislation in transport, health, manpower, welfare, housing, consumer affairs, criminal law and communications, to name but a few, it would appear that our government does not consider this to be a major priority.

I know that the majority of those who do not agree with my statement will fall back on the excuse that this is not within the jurisdiction of the federal government and is a provincial and municipal matter. This is partially correct; but I submit it takes in all levels of government, as can be illustrated by some opinions advanced by a group of builders with whom I had the privilege to discuss the question of housing. They classified their difficulties in the following manner. First, municipal governments are maintaining outdated, archaic and restrictive building codes and demanding outdated building methods and materials. They hedge on re-zoning in areas where housing would be possible. In some cases builders are held up for more than three years by local councils. The builders' overheads, taxes and interest on the land are all added to the cost of the lot for which the home buyer eventually pays. I am advised that land costs now account for approximately one-third of the total cost of a home.

[Mr. Deakon.]

Second, provincial governments have not made land available to the builders. As an example in Ontario one can cite the Thistletown and Malvern land projects. Third, I submit that the federal government has been causing trouble for our builders in that it has make their work uncertain and difficult by an uncertain and fluctuating mortgage loan policy, to the point where builders cannot plan ahead. A builder is required to hire a large staff just in case more units can be permitted to be constructed and this increases his overhead and the ultimate cost of a home. Costs are also added since he can only construct one, two or three buildings at a time instead of introducing a whole assembly program which could bring about a large saving by the elimination of waste material and labour.

This is one example of overlapping jurisdiction and, therefore, of the constitutional argument. But the average man on the street has not one gram of knowledge about constitutional ramifications. All he knows is that he needs shelter at an economical cost; he needs food, clothing and medical attention for himself and his family. So let us take the bull by the horns, provide leadership, co-ordinate the efforts of all levels of government and endeavour to resolve some of these problems confronting the urban dweller. If we do not do this and we do not have jurisdiction, let us not abdicate our responsibilities in this regard Let us allow the provinces to do the job and distribute our finances to them on a per capita basis. The cities and urban centres are the pulse and heartbeat of our nation. I am therefore in agreement with the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens) and would respectfully recommend that the government set up a standing committee of this House to deal with urban affairs.

Another issue on which I hold strong views is that of the sovereignty of our northern waters. This question has within the past few months come to the fore with the voyage of the Manhattan through the northwest passage; yet our government does not consider that these recent developments constitute a threat to Canada's sovereignty over her Arctic waters. This is indeed an optimistic point of view since one need only refer to the United States state department which has openly stated that the United States regards Lancaster Sound, Prince of Wales Strait, McClure Strait and other channels which comprise the northwest passage to be international waterways.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if we do not take a strong stand now and snap out of our lethargy, we may lose by default. We must immediately take steps to assert our sovereignty by increasing our patrols by ship and aircraft over the Arctic waters. We must set up regulations with reasonable requirements as to the use of proper equipment and safe navigational practices for ships travelling the northwest passage. We must also set down stringent conditions in order to control pollution.

I had the privilege, with other colleagues of this House, of visiting the northern Arctic. We had the opportunity of going to the spot where apparently one of the large barges had been sunk. The barge contained high test airplane fuel which had apparently leaked out and evaporated, but it still contained approximately 110,000 gallons of diesel fuel. I do not know all the details of the operation, but apparently the barge had been moved and sunk at a depth of approximately 200 fathoms. I submit that because the barge is made of metal it will in a very short time corrode in the salt water. Eventually the pressure of the water will cause the barge to burst and a lot of diesel fuel will seep out and pollute large areas of the Canadian Arctic.

I am pleased to know the Prime Minister has indicated that the government will be taking some steps in this direction but I respectfully submit this is not sufficient for the following reasons. First, circumstances at present favour a stronger stand since it has been proven that even ships as massive as the Manhattan cannot penetrate the northwest passage without the assistance of powerful icebreakers and expert help. Canada has both expert help and the icebreakers to do the job. Second, by such methods as those I have recommended, Russia has acquired control over its northern sea route. Third, Mr. Speaker, we need not be too concerned if we carry out the previous suggestions as to asserting our control, and should we be challenged about our claim the subject matter would be adjudicated by the International Court of Justice of the United Nations. Three of the nations represented on the court are Japan, Britain and the Philippines, all of which are island nations and have a vital interest in maintaining control over the sea channels between their islands. I believe, therefore, that we can count on them for a sympathetic hearing. I therefore support the other hon. members of this House, Mr. Speaker, who are in favour of the Government of Canada formally declaring the Arctic channels to be Canadian territorial waters.

Although the National Advisory Council on Fitness and Amateur Sport has made a number of studies regarding amateur sport in Canada, there is still a great deal more which can be done, especially on the general subject of minor hockey, its mushrooming pee-wee tournaments, its contribution to the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association and its numerous financial problems. At present, if it were not for the large number of volunteers who unselfishly give of their time we would not have the calibre of athletes we have today. If we are to remain in international competition and are concerned about the frustrations of today's youth, we must immediately take steps to promote, encourage and financially assist these sports. I commend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) for his part in the establishment of the cross-Canada sports demonstration project. This is a step in the right direction, but there is a great deal more that can be done.

I have listened to numerous speeches in this House by hon. members opposite, implying that they are the only ones concerned about old age pensioners and others on fixed incomes. Let me just reiterate that we on this side of the House also have a genuine concern for the old, needy and less fortunate, and I trust that the government will be taking steps to rectify these inequalities. There are numerous other matters which require urgent legislation. Notably among them are bankruptcy regulations and a revision of our immigration laws. I intend to speak on these subjects at a later date.

Taking the cue from other members and thinking it might be advisable to involve the general public in our legislation, I distributed a questionnaire to my constituents, the results of which have been tabulated. I think they might be of interest to hon. members present. I would like to have these questions and answers placed on the record. They are as follows: Should Canada recognize Red China? Yes, 60.3 per cent; no, 29.9 per cent; no opinion, 9.8 per cent. Is Canada taking sufficient steps to protect its sovereignty in the north? Yes, 13.9 per cent; no, 70.9 per cent; no opinion, 15.2 per cent. Would you agree to wage and price controls? Yes, 70 per cent; no, 24.3 per cent; no opinion, 5.7 per cent. Should a guaranteed income become the basis of a revised welfare program? Yes, 41.7 per cent; no, 48 per cent; no opinion, 10.3 per cent. Should family allowances be paid to only those below a specified income level? Yes, 69.4 per cent; no, 25.7 per cent; no opinion, 4.9 per cent. Should cigarette smoking be banned? Yes, 59.3 per cent; no, 28.9 per cent; no opinion, 11.8 per cent. Should the sale and use of marijuana be controlled on a similar basis to alcohol? Yes, 62.5 per cent; no, 27.6 per cent; no opinion, 9.9 per cent. Should old age pensions be geared to the cost of living index? Yes, 96 per cent; no, 2.2 per cent; no opinion, 1.8 per cent. Should a more uniform sentencing system be instituted? Yes, 83.8 per cent; no, 11.2 per cent; no opinion, 5.8 per cent. Should our tax reform program include a capital gains tax? Yes, 59.7 per cent; no, 29.8 per cent, no opinion, 10.5 per cent.

Legislation must be passed to control inflation even if it maintains wages at their present level? Yes, 74.8 per cent; no, 16.9 per cent; no opinion, 8.3 per cent. More effective and stringent bankruptcy laws should be passed immediately? Yes, 82.7 per cent; no, 3.5 per cent; no opinion, 13.8 per cent. Criminal records should be expunged after five years? Yes, 49.8 per cent; no, 36.9 per cent; no opinion, 13.3 per cent. The bail system should be placed on a more equitable basis? Yes, 77.3 per cent; no, 9.2 per cent; no opinion, 13.5 per cent.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, this is a most significant survey because a very large number of the questionnaires were returned. In many instances the people who returned them wrote three or four pages of comment on other subjects. This clearly demonstrates that the public are interested in our institutions.

In conclusion may I say in all sincerity that notwithstanding these aforementioned criticisms, the government should be commended for proposing the reduction of the voting age to 18, setting up programs to reduce regional disparities, proposing tax reform and improving and preserving our water resources, to name but a few. I trust that with the co-operation of our amicable opposition the coming session will be a productive one.

• (8:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, according to custom, I should like to join with the hon. members who have already contributed to the debate to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and this, for several reasons: first, because with rather clever dialectics they managed to gloss over the disappointment felt by the Canadian people following that Speech from the Throne, since it provided them with very little relief.

Also, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member who had the floor before me for the inquiries he carried out to prove that he had heard many complaints against the present government in his constituency. In fact, his findings show that the government has failed in the Speech from the Throne to consider the urgent problems of the day.

Despite the 71 legislative proposals, the speech offers very few concrete measures to solve the kind of problems which the hon. member has just mentioned.

I went through the list of the 71 bills submitted by this government in its Speech from the Throne which I would define as follows: an exercise in academic rhetoric more remarkable by the number than by the quality of its proposals.

Needless to say that I examined the contents and the scope of these 71 bills. I find, as every hon. member must have, that 38 are designed to amend existing legislation and that 22 only are new proposals, few of which are really important.

Such is, Mr. Speaker, the performance of a government which promised not only to create a just society, but also to examine concretely the problems Canadians are facing. And yet in its second year in office an opportunity was afforded to it to settle Canada's urgent problems through legislation.

However, as we have found out, there is no indication of any measure to control and promote the development of family housing.

No measure is introduced to restrict and restrain inflation.

The interest rate is left unregulated. People are wondering if they are to continue paying interests at the rate of 9, 10, 11 and 12 percent and if the government will let this plague worsen, since it neutralizes all the home building industry in Canada.

Furthermore, the cost of living is still increasing. In this connection, someone was telling me that during a recent trip to Edmonton he had paid 79 cents for a piece of steak that costs $1.69 on the Montreal market.

Those are only a few examples of what people are really interested in.

In the proposed bills, there is no provision for air and water pollution control. Nothing indicates either that the government intends to legislate on drug control—I am referring to psychedelic drugs, marijuana and other related drugs—the use of which is really dangerous for our youth.

Moreover, no reference is made to the possibility of improving the postal service in spite of the rates increases implemented last year. Nothing new is proposed in the constitutional field, in spite of growing tensions in federal-provincial relations. We are not given to understand that attempts will be made to settle problems which require an urgent solution because they threaten the structure of our country at this time.

The throne speech makes no mention of measures to eradicate the plague of unemployment that particularly affects Quebec and the Maritimes. The minister himself said recently that there was an 8 per cent unemployment rate in Quebec and I was most surprised to hear the seconder of the Address in reply say very sincerely and perhaps naively, as the tyro making one of his first speeches in the House, that the unemployment rate in his riding was 14 per cent.

If that is the situation, I think government members should recognize the importance of those matters and ask the government to act immediately instead of eternally delaying the necessary legislation.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we would also have liked to reconsider welfare pensions and others. We all know—and I think that the hon. members opposite also know it—that it is impossible today for our older citizens, those who have reached a venerable age and who live on welfare allowances, to live decently due to all kinds of increases. That is why, like most Canadians, I am so deeply disappointed by the Speech from the Throne which does not let us foresee any improvement in the lot and condition of the aged.

Nor is there, Mr. Speaker, anything to indicate that the angry outbursts of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) against the C.B.C. will have any effect if there is no follow-up to his public criticism. The Prime Minister blurted out those words during an enthusiastic and congenial meeting of Liberals, and we may well wonder whether he did mean them, whether he was merely carried away or again whether he was threatening in some way certain persons in the C.B.C. who had offended him or who had refused to give him their support in the last election.

It remains that if the government has no intention to pass legislation in order to change certain elements of the internal structure and certain operating methods of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, we can only wonder whether it intends to take direct action as it did in laying off employees earning an average salary instead of going after the management of this state-owned company.

We must deal with issues of great current interest, such as the present economic situation in Canada and the measures the government intends to take in order to restore order, respect for the law and security in Canada.

I have greatly appreciated the contribution made by hon. members in particular the seriousness and the interest which they often displayed in their remarks on Canadian problems. Even if the government members obviously do it to protect the government, I think that on the whole hon. members discharged their responsibilities in a competent and honest manner.

In my opinion, the most important problem in Canada is surely that of the economy. Every day, we hear about the plague of regional disparity and of the dangers ensuing from it.

Regional disparities make it possible for people in one province to have more than a sufficient income allowing them to live in comfort and prosperity while in other areas some citizens live in the most abject poverty.

I was wondering what were the reasons for those regional disparities. Of course, we must rely on the initiative of the government which has promised a great number of measures in that field but has yet to do something about it.

We were recently given a small pamphlet featuring a mid-year review and the 1969 outlook for private and public investments in Canada. It contains statistics on investments and capital expenditures for the second term of the current fiscal year. Referring to the figures appearing on page 6 of the pamphlet, I shall draw a parallel with the investments and capital expenditures of recent years. For instance, the Atlantic provinces show an increase of 11 per cent in capital expenditures over 1968. In the other provinces, increases over 1968 were as follows: Quebec, 5 per cent; Ontario, 16 per cent; Prairies, 6 per cent and British Columbia, 12 per cent.

There are clearly disparities in the capital expenditures and investments of lower levels of government. What particularly struck me is that in this economic report, for statistical purposes, Canada is divided into five regions, i.e. the Atlantic region, Quebec, Ontario, the Prairies and British Columbia.

I wish to recall a statement made by the premier of one of the provinces during a constitutional conference. In order to solve the problem of regional disparities, I wonder whether the Standing Committee on the Constitution might not look fully into the advantages of dividing Canada into five regions, each of which would correspond to economic realities, so as to minimize political differences that quite often stem from economic causes.

I know of course that some people have been opposed to this idea for very good reasons, whether of a local or regional nature. If we, the representatives of the people who are here to deal with the problems, do not eliminate the root causes of conflict or of regional disparities, if we are afraid, if we shrink from the imperative necessity of dealing, in a drastic way perhaps, with such problems, we should not be surprised to see our country disintegrate and thousands of Canadians suffer from the inaction of the government and from the inefficiency of the laws, because the mechanism that is proposed to solve the problems is not what it could be if we reviewed provincial boundaries, to make of the provinces economic entities which could, of course, at the same time, correspond to political realities.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to a remark made in this house during the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Someone has referred to the role that a member should play. Very often, hon. members say in the newspapers, on television or directly to their constituents: I am just a member, I cannot do anything. In the house, at least, it may seem that I have no influence, but I do express the views of my constituents at the party caucus.

I think that the time has come, more than ever, for hon. members to stop pretending, in conferences or meetings with their electors, that they act within the caucus. We all know that a lot of work is accomplished in the caucus. All of us also know that each individual member has his heart set on representing his riding within his party. However, I think that when a member is elected it is to express here in this house the needs, the opinions and the hopes of those who elected him. I wish to see some day the disappearance of such an easy excuse which several members may use at times.

[Mr. Valade.]

Hon. members have received a mandate. They cannot discharge that mandate if they only make themselves heard within the caucus. They ought to do it in the house. That excuse which we use too often may perhaps be traced back to the famous standing order 75C which restricts the length of the debates in the house, therefore preventing too often a member from participating in the debates and making known the opinions, the hopes and the problems of the people in his riding.

We are living now in Canada, and especially in the province of Quebec, unprecedentedly grave hours. We have come to the point where we often wonder—and the public also—what on earth we are doing and what is the point of having governments. A majority of the Canadian people are urging government members, parliament members, public servants at every level of government to open their eyes to the deplorable condition now prevailing and to take the necessary steps and legislation to prevent the country from collapsing into unrest and anarchy.

It is high time for the men in public life to make up their minds and to take action thus ensuring the respect of law and order in Canada and guaranteeing the future safety of every Canadian citizen in every province of Canada, from Halifax to Vancouver.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Never, Mr. Speaker, has our society been threatened more than it is today. Its social structure is threatened, as is the family as a unit.

The disturbances which of late have become more frequent in my province worry even the most optimistic.

When union leaders and teachers extol the overthrow by force of the powers that be to children of 9, 10, 11 or 12 years of age, and undermine family authority through revolutionary indoctrination, when the call to violence becomes the modus vivendi of the student body, the authorities and the governments have not only the right but the imperious duty to intervene.

Even if such things happen more often in Quebec, it does not mean that this situation is confined to that province.

One needs not be a pessimist to notice the progressive and steady disintegration of the Canadian society, but rather a realist and a clearsighted person.

Every Canadian citizen is partly responsible for building a better society as well as for the present disorder.

Rulers should be able to face up to ringleaders, professional agitators, and anarchists, too often imported in Canada because of permissive legislation.

If every Canadian citizen must contribute to restore order, justice and the respect for the law, it is also the imperious duty of governments to intervene. The example, as the saying goes, must come from high up. Nothing is more true and more realistic at the present time.

It is not enough for the Prime Minister to fly into a violent temper over the national TV network, before his supporters. This can only be harmful, and likely to lessen the respect that everyone must have for the high office he holds.

Mr. Speaker, to close one's eyes and to pretend that things will settle with time is to sit on an erupting volcano.

For too long the Prime Minister of Canada has ignored or made light of the many warnings that were given to him, both in this house and outside. When tolerance, Mr. Speaker, turns to flabbiness, when liberalism becomes licence and political dogma obliterates authority, sweeping reforms are needed to prevent a disaster.

The federal and provincial governments must enforce strict laws to ensure the security of citizens and some respect for their individual and collective rights.

In Canada, the word "democracy" has been used so widely that its limitations have been forgotten.

The government must ensure through adequate and efficient pieces of legislation that the Department of Manpower and Immigration will not open its doors wide to professional revolutionaries. It must ensure that our Criminal Code imposes the capital punishment to those who will advocate through violence the upsetting of democratic law and order. The seditious act should be more clearly defined in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Speaker, if we are not completely blind or criminally slothful and if authorities do not react, we are surely heading for what I would call the "Canadian dilemma".

If we do not take strong and immediate action, if our society does not wake up, we will be faced with the following alternatives: McCarthyism or communism; dictatorship or anarchy; censorship or licentiousness; economic control or recession with its disastrous consequences.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps those who will say that I am a pessimist or something of the kind have too soon forgotten the Sir George Williams University affair, the riots which occurred at the time of the Montreal police strike and the events now taking place in the province of Quebec.

I certainly wish, Mr. Speaker, that my predictions are exaggerated and unrealistic. Only time will tell. It is up to us to act so that those predictions do not become an irreversible political reality.

To fill in the cracks which are beginning to show in the structure of our society, politicians must have a sense of responsibility.

The agitators of whom I spoke earlier take advantage of the constitutional problems and the political clashes between Quebec and Ottawa. The Prime Minister of Canada must stop providing the agitators with weapons through his irresponsible statements.

Is it necessary, and I ask the question seriously, for the Prime Minister of Canada to stand as the uncompromising opponent of Quebec in order to maintain his popularity?

By its negative aggressiveness, its unconsidered responses towards Quebec and its government, by the refusal of the Prime Minister to hold a dialogue on matters deemed essential by Quebec, the federal government emphasizes the Quebecers' distrust of Ottawa and French-Canadian members sitting here. In addition, it provides with arguments those who only try to justify their anarchy.

The purely political matters are not the only devices to which agitators will resort in Canada.

The head of a family who is unable to provide for the essential needs of his children is an easy prey for those people.

Quebec is restless? Yes, it is true!

Economically speaking, Quebec faces great difficulties at the present time. Unemployment has reached dangerous levels.

Recently, His Eminence Cardinal Léger, on a visit to Canada, reminded us of this self-evident truth that the distance separating the rich from the poor is still growing.

In Montreal, Canada's metropolis, there are cases of dire poverty, cases of extreme hardship, which we in public life who are responsible for the government of the country have no right to ignore or to tolerate in a self-styled just society.

This distance, Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of all of us and of the government to reduce it. Half-measures are no longer acceptable.

Let us postpone the adoption of less important legislation such as the omnibus bill and others of the same type. Let us settle the urgent problems: housing, the cost of living, employment; social measures allowing people on relief to live decently.

I heard the hon. member who spoke before me say that he too was concerned with the problems of older people and that he supported the government in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, if the hon. members on the government side realized in what exceedingly difficult situation live older people with no other income than their meager old-age pension, they would quickly understand that those people who are still able to do countless things for their follow-citizens, cannot live, cannot eat three meals a day with the meager allowances we grant them at present under our social legislation.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Let us not delude ourselves, Mr. Speaker, and tell these people that the government cannot increase these allowances because it would run into more debts, that it cannot afford it and that we are living in a period of austerity.

Mr. Speaker, should I be asked to choose between an increase of $200 million a year for welfare and old age pensions or the C.B.C., I would sacrifice the $200 million for the C.B.C. and earmark that amount for the old people of our country who are only waiting for assistance and perhaps a little gratefulness from their government representatives.

Mr. Speaker, let us give our young people positive options for the future. Let us see to it that they escape narcotics and psychedelic drugs and their after effects.

Recently, I was reading an article in La Presse—and I think all the newspapers have published this news item, relating to a very sad case that has to do with the daughter of a famous American comedian, and I mention him by name, since it is a well-known fact, I mean Mr. Art Linkletter who devoted all his life to the young people and made a most interesting career out of it. In this article from La Presse, Mr. Linkletter said:

My daughter did not commit suicide. It is the makers and peddlers of LSD who murdered her. She was not herself.

I suggest this is an indictment for murder, on the part of a father who lost one of his beloved daughters.

Should such a calamity befall one of us, we would unhesitatingly request the government to take immediate drastic action to exercise control over these narcotics which are leading our youth to their destruction.

I am confident that if we provide young people with the necessary leadership, bring them up with sound principles and a healthy outlook, show them that their parliamentary representatives have their interests at heart, they will resist contamination by the bane of narcotics.

Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that if we prepare young people for the future not through anarchy and chaos but with due respect for law and order, then in spite of the present unpleasant situation, there will be a better future for Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is up.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, in closing, I hope that life will be good in Canada and that we, members of this house, will make that possible.

[English]

Mr. R. L. Whiting (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to congratulate my colleague the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) who moved the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, and my colleague the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) who in seconding the Address did great service to his constituency by drawing attention to the size of the blueberries grown there. I am sure all lovers of blueberry pie will appreciate his remarks. May I also congratulate those hon. members who were recently appointed to the cabinet or to the position of parliamentary secretary. The choice of individuals to fill these positions was in my opinion most appropriate. I know they will distinguish themselves in the fulfilment of their duties.

Despite the remarks of certain members of the opposition to the effect that the Speech from the Throne was filled with pious platitudes liberally interlaced with empty promises, I, together with many people in my constituency, find the Speech from the Throne to be a document which has encouraged the people of Canada to look forward to a constructive session of Parliament. Today I should like to speak to one specific item. I refer to the proposal to lower the voting age to 18. This proposed move on the part of the government involves many implications. It is a recognition of youth and the part youth has played and is playing in the Canada of today, and will play in the Canada of tomorrow. Youth has an interest in government. This was evident in the last election when youth joined the ranks of all political parties throughout Canada. This aspect of the campaign was especially evident in my riding. In my opinion it was one of the highlights of the campaign on all sides, indeed, it added a new dimension and injected new life and enthusiasm.

The youth of today are vitally interested in the affairs of the nation. They express themselves in many ways, some of which are not constructive. Everyone, including youth, has the right to protest, but with that protest there must be responsibility. A democratic society is not based upon force and the destruction of property, looting and causing bodily harm to others. By lowering the voting age the government is bringing youth into the mainstream of decision-making. Although at times they may feel their part and the influence of their individual ballot is small, nevertheless they will be aware they no longer are on the sidelines but are taking a part in their country's affairs. It will not be long before they become aware it is the cumulative effort of many people casting their ballots for a cause that creates action and has its effect on society.

A corollary to the lowering of the voting age is the present attitude of people and government toward youth and the effect that some of their actions have upon youth. One of these is the reduction in the size of our reserve forces. Most members of this House will heartily endorse the action of the government in its effort to fight inflation by cutting back expenditures. I believe, however, that the reserve force is one area in which serious consideration should be given to a no-cut policy. Through the militia, as it was formerly called, thousands of young Canadians have over the years received important, useful training which has made them better citizens. The reserve forces have provided physical and mental stimulation as well as moral development. It has been brought to my attention that the dollar investment in the reserve forces yields one of the greatest returns for the money spent. I subscribe to this opinion because a large percentage of the members of the reserve forces are in the high school and university age group. The pay received has assisted students to continue their education and has provided summer employment through participation in summer courses of up to eight weeks' duration.

When speaking of the reserve forces I must point out that the militia has been the vital fibre from which our armed forces have stemmed in every national emergency. This was true at the beginning of World War I, the Second World War and the Korean war in 1950. It was from the militia that our forces drew their original strength. The militia formed the nucleus of our fighting power at that time. Although we hope and pray that this need may never recur, the reserves have always performed a patriotic duty in the preservation of Canada as a nation. So Canadians owe more than a debt of gratitude to the reserve forces. If anything were done to diminish their effectiveness or curtail their activities a Canadian image which has been created through patriotism, hard work and dedication, it would be deplored in the hearts of many loyal Canadians.

Although we must be guided by a principle which ensures fairness and equality in reducing national expenditures, nevertheless there are extenuating circumstances which must guide the consideration accorded certain plans. This has already been done in the case of regional development. In my opinion the reserve force is another example which should be accorded special consideration. I have referred to its importance in relation to youth, I have talked about the part the reserve has played in national emergencies and I have mentioned the opportunity for patriotic expression associated with this organization which has been built through dedication to our country over its years of existence.
