Nimilug (in Cimistian Abt), a dise or plate, communly goliden, sometimes red, blae, or green, or bambed liko a rainhow, placed vertieally behind the heads of persons of spechal dlguity or sanctity as a symbol of honour. This dise is sometimes reluced to a more ring, s'ugle or double, showing the background through. It 1, as a rale, perfectly plain, exce a $^{2}$ in the case of our Saviour, whoso binbus is commonly distinguishad by a eross. The eross is semetimes, but rarely, lepicted lmmediately abovo the Sacrol Head, either just withont or just within the circumference of the dise (as in the mosaies of tho nteh of the trilme nt St. Maria Maggiore), but it is almost universally inseribed within the circle. After the elghth ceutury living fiersons were, In Italy, distinguished hy in symare nimhus, which sometimes insmmed the form of a seroll, paitly untolled.
The nimbens is undoubrolly of ethnie origin. It is the visible expression. art of the luminuss nehula silpused to emanate from and to elothe n i)ivine Being. It erlginally investal the whole boily. Thus Yirgil deseribes Juno as "nimbo sucelneta" (Aen. x. 634). By degrees, however, It was restrictel to the head, which was naturally regarderl as the chicf seat of thls divine radinace, Tlie heals of the statues of the gols (lucion, de Jed Syr. 675; Timon, e. 51, 154), nut of the emperors, after they began to claim divine honours, were lecorated with a crown of rays, or brilliant cirvet. Servius (wh Aca. ii. 615) defines the nimbus with which lallas was distingulshed at the destruction of Troy, ns "fulgilum lumen, quo keorums eapita cinguntur: sic enim pingi solent;" and again (bid. Bii. 587). "proprie nimbus est qui dearum vel impramtium eppita quasi clara nebula nmbire tingitur." We also tind in the "Pramegyriens Maximiani,' which passes under the name of Mamertinus, "lus divinum verticem claro orbe complectens," asswelated with the trabene nod the fasces aud the curnle chatr as symbols of imperind dignty. From the resemblance of the nimbis as commonly depicted to a circular plate of metal, it has been derived by some from the
 the heads of statues to prevent birik from set4 ling on them, and polluting then (ef. interpr. nil Aristoph. Ares, v. 1114); but though similar in form and position the connection is probahly oaly mplarent, not real (Ciampini let. Mon. f. i12). Buowarrnoti (fiservis. P. bin) is of opinion that the nimbus was borrowed from the Egeptians, wheh is also the view of Pignorius (Cinmpini, a.s. 1. 112). Others hold that it was of Etrascan origin, and cthers again derive it frem Indla, where it was certainly ased to encircle the deaties of the Hindu mythology (Dilron, Econotyr. Chrét. pp. 43, 136); but froms whatever quarter it wals derived, the nimbus was regarded la the early agos of Christinnity as a mere symbol of honour and digulty, mul was not at nil assoclated with divinity or apecial sunctity. In the bast enpecinally it was considered as an nittribute of mero power, whether goan or evil, nud was asel much more prodigally than is the West. Thus wa tind It assigned la Byzantine art to Sintan (Didron, p. 103, fig. 46), nud to the beast in the Apuenlypse (ib, p. 165, tig. 47). In the West it nay be seen enctreling the bust of the emperor Clandiug (Monthancon, Antipuité explizuef, v. 162); tho heal of Trujan, and severnl medullions on the arch of Constautinc, and of Antunlnus l'ius on the reverse of one of his mednls (Oisell. Thes. Numism. tnb. Ixvil. 1). Herod is illstiuguishod by the nimbus in the mossies of St. Mary Major's at kome, ne nre Justinian and Theolora in those of St. Vitnlis, and Constantine logonatus, ILeracllus and Tiberius at St. Apolllnario in Classe, and Justinian at St. Apolfiunris ia Vrbe, at Ravenna; and Constantine and Chriles the Great in thoso of the Iateran Triclinimm (Agincourt, Peinture, xvi. 18). Ou medals the nimbus is frequently found surrounding the heads of the Chrlstian emperors. We may lustance Constantine the Grent on the reverse of a grent bronze of Crispus (Snuclemente, Numm. Sclect. iii. p. 182, fig. 1), the obverse of a gold cein of Constnntine (Morelli, Nov. Spec. tab. vii. No. 1); nul one of Fansta (bid. tab. Iv. No. 4); Caveloni, Ricerche, p. 5:3). Constans, Constaatlus nad the later emperors are similarly distinguished. On the great shicld of Theodosins he nud his two sons have the uimbus. (Buonarruoti, Osserdazioni, $11 p .60 \mathrm{sq}$. .). A silver shield discovered in the nucient bed of the Arve, nesr Genera in 1721, tigured by Montfaucon (Antiq. Expliq. xiv, p. xxviii. p. 51 ), representiag Valentininn making gitts to his soldiers ntter a rictory, shews the emperor with his head surrounded by a plaia nimusus. The statues of the Merovingian kings which formerly decomatel the chief portal of the nbbey of St. (icrmain des I'rés at Parls are also deseribed as having their heads surmounted with this symbol of royal dignity (Mabillon, Annul. Ord. Bened. anu. 557, tom. i. p. 169).

In illumluated MSS. niter the sixth century, the sesular use of the nimbus is very frenuent. It dues not nppuear in a MS. of Genesis of the fourth or fitth century, in the library at Vienua (Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xix.); but Priam and C'assandra have it in the Vatican Virgil (Ciampini, , s. s. 1, tab. xaxvi. 16, 17), and in a MS. of the book of Joshua of the seveath or eighth century from the same collection (No. 405), Joshua himself, ns well ns the cities of Jericho, Gibeon, &e., represcated as females, is thas decorated. In the Alexandrine MS. and in a MS. Bible of St. I'nul's nt Rome, of the 8th or 9th ceutury (Agiamenrt, Peinture, xxriil.-xsx.), not only sacred anil quasi-sncred personages, e.g. Mwses, Joshua, Eli, Samuel, Balanm, &e., but kings, such as Pharach eud Ahnh, benr it (Buansruoti, u. s. p. 62). The case is the same in the Menologium of Basil of the tenth century, where the nimbus is given without dist/nction to the siauts, and to the emperors, to Herod and other poten-

Meroury with Clroular Nimbus (Dldron.)

Pamiliar as the use of the nimbus was as a yymol of dignity or power, esprecially in the East, it was unknown as a distinetire mark of divinity or sanctity to the earlier ages of Christian art. As Didtun remnrks (horoopr. (che et. p. 100), "the must ancient munuments in Prance and Jithly present divino aod sacred persouages without the and sured persouages without the nimbus." The first five ceaturices offer few, if any, genuine, esamples, Ditrou indeed asserts (ib, i, 101), that "Sufore the sixith ceutury the (brixtion, that "Lffore the sixth ceutury the Christian

From these the nimbus is almont oniversaily totaliy absent. There is not a single euaple of this symbol on any of the shreophagi engravei by bywio and Ariughii, or in thoso of the Literan Muse .nh. Not ouly the navels and holy personger, but christ Minaself is devoid of it. Itis equally absent fron the sircophayi of Aries, Siat Maximin, aud Marselles. At Ravenna, howerer, there are two sareophagi, both of the xreath ceatory, which present nor Lord nimbied; that of the exarch Jsanc at St. Vitaiis, A.D. 644 , tepresenting the adoration of the Magi (Appell.

The testimony of the klass vessels discovered to the entacant belonging jrobably to the farth century, is equally decisive as to the late iatrutioction of the nimbus. There are a few fampples in Garrucci'g great collection in which thriat is nimbell ( ietri Ornath, tav. viin. 7, tav. sii. 5 , tave, xiii. 6, tav. xxill. 7), but in the rot majerity of iastances He is destitute of it.

The reasell of the distiaction between these twin figures of our f.omd is evidently that the whe is intended for Christ as a Teacjer on earri, the oticer shaws Him as seen by St. Stephen in

The same ornament is also given to the Lhoiy laml, and to the evangelistic symbols. (Bugati, Ji'msice di Sitn Celsto, in fin.)
The same distinction holds good in the ratacomb freseos. The immene majority of then do not exhithit the nimbus, even in the case charicord ant his mpostles. When found, the character of the painting points to a date subs serguent to the fitt century, oten to a considerajpuar, it perio. In some cases, where it dees appear, it is certainty due to the modern resturutions by which tho value of the evidence of the catacomb pretures has been no seriously dhamaged. To instanse sonse of the more remarkable examples. The beautiful yonthfill head of Christ from the cemetery of St. Callisius is destitute of the nimbus (Aringhi, I. 561 ; J J:SUE Cimast, Repishasentations of, j. 875). The same is the chse with all the figures in the fresco of Christ in the midst of His npostles with the scriniuin before them (Aringhi, 529), and with the hamons Virgin and thild trom St. Agnes (inid. ii. 208). [Sce Mary, Virgin, in Art, p. 1150. ] To discover a nimbed figure la the catacombs wo must descend to a comparatively date date. It appears abundantily in the frescoen assigued to the second half of the ninth century which decorate the baptistery in the catacomb of St . Pontianus nad the aijacent parts. In the fresco of the Baptism of Christ our Lard, the Baptist and the attendant angels have the entire nimbus (ifid. i. 381 ; Dove, p. 576), which aiso encircles the heads of the saints Ablon and Senneu and their companions in the adjaceut fresco, where Christ has the cruciform nimbus (see Ahbo:t and Sennen, p. 8; Atinghi, i. 383, 385). The fine head of Christ from the same catacomb (ii $\dot{4}, \mathbf{4}, 379$ ) is distinguished by a cruciform nimbus formed of pearls, A late frescos from St. Agnes shews us Chist seated between two apostles (Perret, tom. ii. pl. 4), and St. Peter hetween St. and St padst. Tavoing to the movales we fiad the nimbus equally rare in all the earlier examples. Where it does appear in works betore the sixth century, it may usually be consldered an unauthorised addition ("On a tant retouché les mosalques," Didron, p. 33, note 2). As a token of sanctity it is at first geoerally limited to our Lord, and, somewhat later, to His attendnat angels, though it still continues to be given to kinge as a mark of secuiar power. Our Lord weirs the cruciform nimbus on the nreh of St. Sabiua in Rome, A.D. 424 , und on that of St. Paul, A.D. 441, where the ulmions is sarrounded with rays. In the important mosaie pictures whlch decorate the arch of the tribune of St. Mary Majur's, A.D. 440, Christ and the attendant angels, and, as has been already remarked, King Herod, nre the only figures that wear the nimbus. The Virgin Mary is always without it. In the Ravenaa baptistery, A.D. 430 , our Lord aud perhaps the Baytist are alone furnished with the nimbus. The case is the same in the mansoleum of Galla Placidia, a.D. 450. The vaultel ceilings of the chapels of the Lateran Buptistery, A.D. 462, exhibit the Holy Jamb with the cruciform nimbus.
In the earliest mosaic pletures of the next century at Rome, those of the church of St. Cosmas anI St. Damian, the only heads distinguished with the uimbus are those of Christ and the aagels nad tho Holy Lamb. The church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna, A.D. 547, shews the gradaal extrosion of the employment of the nimbns. It is given not merely to our Lord (Whose nimbus is crucitorm) and the angels, but alse to St. Vitalis, and to the evangelists and prophets on the walls of the saurnrinm. Nelchizedek as a priest wears the nimbus, but not Abel or Abraham. The nimb surronnding the heads of Justinian and Theodora has already been noticed (see for these the article Crown, vol. i. p. 306 b). In the Ariso buptistery at haveonn, where the mosaics are a close coply of those in the ortholor baptistery, the later date is indicated by the aimbus being assigned to the apostles, ny well as to Christ. In St. A pollinaris in Urbe, d.D. 566 , every individual of the long procession of male and female snints on either side of the nave is thus distinguished. From this time onwards the use of the nimbus for holy personages became uaiversal, the only distinction being that the nimbus of Christ was asually cruciform, that of other individuals plain.
The result of our examination of dated exnmples is that, as Didron has laid down, the aimbus, however frequent previously aв a token of dignity, does not appear ns a Christian emblem before the sisth century. That during and after the sixth century the nimburs was gradually adopted as a mark of sanctity, though not by any invarinble law. That the seventh and two succeeding centuries witnessed the transition from the complete absence to the constant presence of the nimbus, the sume monument presenting personages sometimes with and sometimes without it. (Dídrou, Iconogr. Chrét. pp. 101-102.) We see slso that (setting nstule the secular use of the numbus) the image of our Lord was the first to be thus distiugaished; that thowe of the ungels ("lumen yued circa angelurnm capita piugitur nimbus vocutur," lsidor. Hispal. Ori\%. iib. six. c. 31); and that these were followed by tha evangelists and their aymbolical animals, theu by the apostles, and that uitimately, towards the end of the seventh or begiuning of the eighth ceotury, this honomr was extended to all saints. No auperior dignity tn this respect was origioally accorded to the Virgin Mary, nor does any definite rule seem to have been followed. She is not marked by the manbas in the fifth-century mossica at St. Mary Major's, nor commonly io the representations of the adoration of the Magi. On the tomb of the exareh lsanc at Ravenas, A.D. 64, she is unuimbed, while the Holy Child las the nimios, while io the mosnics of St. Apellinaris in Urbe of the preceding ceutury, A.D. 566, both are thas distinguished. Io the mosaics of the chapel of St. Veoantius at the Iaternn, A.D. 642 , the Virgin as well as the alxteen afiostles and saiutly jersonnges whe stand on either side of her wear the nimbus. In some examples of Byzantine Art, however, the growth of the cultus of the Virgin is indicated by the nimbus being assigned to her while the arostles are without it. As examples of this distiaction we may refer to the mosaic representiag the Asceasion on the cupela of St. Sophian nt Salonica, of the 6th century; and an illumination of the same scene from tha Zagba MS. of the Syrian Gospels in the Medicean Library at Florence, of which a cut is given, article AnaEls, I. 85. Didron asserte the the square almbus ts not found anywhere save in Italy, and expresses his regret at its absence, as depriving works of art of this evidence of their date. Another singular variety of the nimbus is that which presents it in the form of a keroll partially unrolled at either end. Examples of this remarkable confignration only to be found in MSS. or in ping which scems given by Agincourt from a Latin Pod glass, are the 9 th crntury in the Library of the Minerva at Rome (Peinturr, pl. xxxvii., xxxviii). ## Ho. E, Nlmbace Lallin Mgs, pth centary. (From Ddiron.)

The nimbus is given not only to divize and sacred personages, but also to allegorical anımals. We may instance the Holy Lamb in the two chapels of the Lateran Baptistery, the apse of St. Cosmns and St. Damian, and the vaulted roof of St. Vitalis; the holy dove on the dossier of an episcopal throne (Bosio, p. 327); and the evangelistic symbols, as at St. Paui's and the chapel of St. John the Baptist at the Lateran. The phoenix, a favourite emblem of immortal life through death, has a stellate nimbus in the apses of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, and those Ft' St. Praxedes and St. Cecilia, and on a coin of Faustina (Cismpini, tab. xxxri. fig. 14). De Rossi furnishes other examples (Rom. Sotter, ii. p. 313). The aureole (aureola, the golden reward of special holiness) may be defined as the nimb of the body, as the ordinary nimuss is that of the head. To adapt it to the shape of the budy, the aureole is usually of an oval form, and often pointed at ench end, of the shape known as the Vesica piscis. Its duration in Christian art was but brief. It sppeared atter the nimbus, and disappenred before it. A singular example is found in one of the wall mosairs of St. Mary of ajor's at. Rome, where it assumes the character of a solid shield protecting the persons of Moses and Aaron from the stones hurled at them by the adherents of Korah and his companions. It is very often found eneircling the form of the Deity, or of our Lord.

NOTITLA. The word notitia is technienlly osed for a sort of list or court-almanac of places and ullicinls, and the enrliest and most famons notitite are of " purcly eivil character. The most famnus of all is, of course, the Notitit Dignitatum, compiled in the time of Arcadius or Honorlus, rirea 400 a.d. (see Gibbon, ii. :303, note 72. Pancirulus and Bücking), which is a complete list of the provinces with their subdivisions, and of the whole official stall of the empire. This has been edited by Pancirolns, whose work has, however, been quite superseded by the editions of Biickilng ( 2 vols. Bonn, 18:1918.33) and Seeck (Berlin, 1876). This great nutitio is of a purely civil character, and its interest for the stulent of Christian antiquities lies solely in its giving him a ready means of testing the closeness with which the local divisions and gradations of power in the chureh were modelled on those of the state. It is well known how the erelesiastical arohbishopries and bishopries followed the limits of the greater and lesser provinciat governorshipg-the urchtrishop whage seat was at Narbonne tor instance exercising spiritual jurisdiction exactly over the country which had tormed the province of Gallia Narbonensis. Cases of Retragression, \&c. ; 4. Suumary. 1. As soon as the monastic life begru to assume Its coonobitic form, all persons desirous of admussion into the coumnunity had to of admassion into the community had to undergo a period of probation., During this time they wientes," "dapxapitin," less commonly "incipientes," "גрхapiot," " veorayeis" (Alteserrae cf. Athanas. E.riort.ad S/,ons; Christi, where Adam is called "rudis et suvellus"), all terms expressing Inexperience in a vocation. They were called also "pulsantes" (Mabillon, Praef. вaece, iii. i. 21), as knocking at the door to be let in; and sometimes in the East, $\delta \alpha \sigma 0 \phi \delta \rho 01$, a semi-barbarous worl of the later empire, curiously descriptive of the intermedinte state which they occupied, wearing the monk's tunie, by way of trinl, under their ordinary outer robe, which they retained till furmally admitted. They were also enlled "conversi" or converts. The "conversi" were distinct from those who were received into a monastery under uge, "pueri oblati" or "nutriti." This use of "conversi" and "oblati" must not be confounded with the use of these words to designate laybrothers (Mabillon, Pracf. iii. I. 21 ; iv. iv. 59).
2. In instituting a roviciate for all who wished to become monks, the founders of monssticism followed, as usual, the preeedent set by some ancient sehools of philosophy. The Pythagoreans required a noviciate of five years (Manry, Ilistoire dos Neligions de la Grèee antique); the Druids, in some cases, one of twenty years (Thierry, Histoire des Gaulois). It was necessary as a safeguard for stability of purpose. On the one hand, none were to be rejected except for some insupernbia impediment; on the other hand, none were to be lightly accepted, lest the community should be disgraced by the inconsistencies of its members. On the one side there was the gracions invitation of Him who says, "Come unto me all that labour and nre henvy Iaden," and on the other there was the Pisnlmist's anxious misgiving, "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord ?" (Basil, Req. c. 6). Thus Benedict of Monte Casino wisely orders that ingress into the monastery must not be too easy (Bened. Rey. c. 58), and thres centuries later the great Fraukish legislator repeats the injunction, adding that no one is to be forced to become a monk against hls will (Car. Mag. Capitular. Mun ust. A.D. 789, c. 11). It was ditficult to gain admittance into the monastery, because it was still more difficult, once there, to leave it. "Vestigia nulla retrorsum."

The would-be monk had to wait as a supplinnt at the door of the monastery-hy the rule of Pachomius of Trabennae and of other Egyptian asceties of his nge-seven days (Reg. c. 49 ; Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 28; Res. Serap. Mach:etc. c. 7) : according to Cassinn, ten days (Instit. iv. 3,36 ; Cullat. xx. 1); by the rule of Fructuosus (bishop of Bracara [Braga], in Portugal, in the 8th century), ten days (lieg. c. 21), nfterwards moditied to three days and nights ( $2^{\text {do }}$ Reg.c. 4). He was to lie there prostrate, by the rules of Pachomins and Fructuosus, and, by the latter rule, fasting and praying, and the perter was to test his sincerity and patience by insults and revilings (Fruct. ib. ce. 4, 21). If ignorant of it, he was to be taught the Lord's Prayer (Paehom. ib.). He was also to be questioned about his motive for seeking admission, and in particular, lest wo should prove to be a fugitive from justice, whether he had committed any erime which had made him liable to punishment (lachom. in.; Ferreoli Re!. c. 5 ; Fruct. Ree. ec. 4,21 ). course of time a less austere reception was accorded to postulants. Mabillon explains the passage in the Benedictme rule which orders them to wat a few days (five days, in his interpretation) nt the gate ("nd portnin", Bened. Re.j. c. 31) to mean not outside the monastery, but in a cell specially set apart for this purpose within the eloister (Mabill. Pracf. i. saec. iv. vii. $1: 0$ ).
3. Though allowed to enter the monastery, the postulant was still an alien there. At first he was placed in the strangers' eell or guestchamber, "cella hospitum," near the gateway (Cass. Inst. iv. 7) for a year (Cass. ib. ; Fruet. Reg. e. 21), or, necording to the rule of Isidurus (bishop of Seville in the 7th century), for three months (Isid. Key. c. 5). In Mabillon's exposition of the Benedictine rule, the postulant was to stny only two months in the strangers' cell before being transferred to the cell of the novices (Mabill. Praef. i. v. s.). Under the orders of the superintendent of the straugers, "custor hospitum," he was to be busily employed in menial offiees for their comfort (Bened. Ref. c. 58; Fruet. Req. c. 21). Thence he massed, nfter a shorter or longer sojourn aceording to the rules of the monastery, to the cell of the novices, sometimes ealled the "pulsatorium," or chrmber of those who were still, as it were, knoeking to be let in (Bened. Reg. v. s.; Cupitul. Aquiggr. A.D. 780).
The period of probation varied in its duration and the severity of its discipline. It lasted three years by the rule of Pachomlus (Pallad. Mist. Lansi) nud by the code of Justininn (Norell. v. 2) ; but a latter decree makes this term of three years necessary for strangers only, that is, persons coming from a distance; only one year by the rules of Ferreaius (bishop of Ucetar [Uzis.], in Southern France in the 6th century) (lics. c. 5), of Fructuosus (Re.1. c. 21), and by the so-called rule of Magister (ieeg. Mut!. c. 9(1). The former nllowed even a sherter term, five months, at the nbhat's discretion (v. s.); and the latter even permitted the noviee to reside in a eell not within but near the monastery (o. s.). Gregory the Grent found some abbuts in his time too facile in the admission of novices; to correct this laxity, he insisted on a probation of two years at least (Epp. x. 24), and in the cave of men that had been soldiers, three (ib. viii. B). Benedict had been content with a novieciate of one year (heig. e. 58), of which, aceording to Mabillan, two months were to be passel in the "cella hospitum," and the remainiug ten in the "cella novitorum" ( $P$, acf. iv. vii. liol), but, aceording to Martene, all the year in the nowices ehamber (Req. Comment. c. 58). This was usually, but not always, on tow east side of the clointer ir quadrangle, between the gateway and the east end of the chapel, next to the room of correction, and facing the scholars' chamber, and the "scriptorium" or expyists' room on the wet (Altes. Ascet. iv. 3, ix. 7). In some of the larger monasteries the novices had their own quadrangle, almost like a separate monastery, with ther own refectory, dormitory, intirmary, nnd even, in rare instances, thelr own chapel ; but this ceased with the deerease in the number of candidates for admission ( R 'g. Bened. Comment. c. 58).

All the time of his novicinte the aspirant fir the cowl was under very strict tutelage. On entering the monastery. he was assigned to the guardiamship of one of the older and more experienced of the brethren, who was to report of his heinaviour to the ntbat (Bened. Re\%. en :is; Lasil. leeg. e. 1.5; lsidor. Ve, e e 4 ; Fruct. bicy. c. 21 ; Rej. Siugist, c. 87 ; Gregor. Magn, Eyp

Even so trivial a fault ts walk!ug with the head up, instead of bent forward, was to be marked and corrected by "t he master"' (ib. c. 7). Slight allowance was made for their not being as yet inured to the severe discipline of the doister. From "Inuds" te "prime," when the odder monks retired to their cells, the novices, with those monks who had not completed five years in the monastery, were to wait in their dormitory, learning psalms under the eye of the offeial for the week, or "hebdomadarius" " (ib. c. 8 ).
uLeave your bodios outside the enter the monnastery" enter the nomastery " was the stern welcome of Permard of Clairvaux to postulants (Altes. Ascet. ir.1). In the same spirit one of the founders of monchisnn in the East enjoined on novices ignominious hardships of every kind, and the neeesity of rory frequent coutpssions neeessity of vory frequent couffessions to test their perseverance (Basil. Reg. c. 6). In the lith century the docility and constancy of porices in England were sometimes tested by foggings (Hospinian, Slist. Monach. iii. c. 23).
Opportunities were given to the novice from time to time of recoasidering his determination. Oa firte entering the monastery, before boing ssippled of the outer garnents which he had rorn in the world, he was questioned whethe:; idetell, reacuancing all other things, he would doey inpllicitly his new rule of life (Pachom. Ref. C. 49). By the rule of Aurelian, bishop of arles in the 7th ceutury, he was to listen in the maiting-roon, or "sillutatorium," while the rule mu read oper to himp (Rey. c. 1). He was then to be led into the chapter-house, where, affer laying avide his arnos, if he carried nny, he was again to make a profession of his intention in presenee of the fathor-aibbat nad the brethren. he night, if he pleased, send back a fareweili pessge to the friends left behind (Mab. Praeff. ir viii. 150). At the end of two manths. agsia at the end of eight months, and once again at the end of the yonr, the "senior" to whose charga he had been conmitted was to read over the rule ta him, bidding him go back at once to the wold if he wished (Bened. Abbats were forbidden, under penalty of excommunication, to take any bribe for admission (Conc. Nicaen. II, A.d. 787, c. 19; Capitul. Franconfurt. A.D. 794, c. 16 ). In the later developments of monachism, the consent of the brethren in chapter became necessary (Hospin, Hist. Mon. v. s.).
4. The monastic dress was not usually assumed till the novicinte was over (Chssian, Instit. iv. 5 ; Gregor. Magn. Epp. iv. 44). Originally, indeed, the dress of a monk difiered little from thast of ordinary people, except so far as it resembled the dress of the philosophers of the Roman empire, or was distinguished by a Quaker-like simplicity from the fashions of the day. When, however, the mmastic life began to be organised more systematically, the dress became a not unimportant part of the rite of initiation. In the saine way monks at first were only required to keep the hair short, as a protest against luxury and effeminacy; and the tonsure was fur them a thing of later date (Bingham, Ori\%. Ec. les. vii. iii.). By the rule, so-called, of "Mlagister," the novice becoming a monk was to receive the tonsure from the abbat's hands, while the brethren stood round singing psalms (Reg. Nafist. c. 90). The congregation of Clugny, at a later peried, ordered their novices to have the tonsure as well as all the monastic attire, with the exception of the hood or cowl. But this was a deviation from the old Benedictine rule, which reserved the tonsure with the outer robe for the expiration of the noviciate (Bened. Kicg. ce. 55, 58; Mabill. Acta Sanctor. O. S. B. tom. i. p. 7, not. a). not. a).
5. The novice was in every instance required to divest himself absolutely of all his worldly possessions. He was to be exaninined very particularly on this point, lesi by keeping back a single coin for himself he should incur the guilt of Ananias (Cass. Inst. iv. 4; Aurelian, Reg. c. 1). Even the clothes on his back ceased to be his own (Cass. i), c. 5). But in the earliest and purest days of monachism, the monastery was not to be the gainer by the novice's liberality, but his own relatives or the poor (Cass, ib.; Fruct. Ref. c. 4). Afterwards he was nllowed to choese how his property should be disposed of, provided always that he retained nothing for himself. By the rule of Aurelian he might give it away as he pleased (Reg. c. 1). By the rule of "Magister," the abbat was to exhort' him to intrust his worldly goods to the monastery for the use of the poor, or, if he preferred it, for the common fund of the monastery (Reg. Mug. c. 87). There was a curious regulation of the monastery of Ternay in Burgundy (Mabill. Ana.. O.S. B. i. $30,71,73$ ), that property "in kind" was to be converted at once into money, in order, probably, to facilitate the distribution of it. Thus, if a novice brought a flock of sheep, the albbat was first to buy it for the monastery, or to sell it by the agency of the prior, and then to hand over the proceeds to the novice, to be applied by his direction (Reg. Tarnat. c. 5). It Is easy to understand how, in course of time, as monasteries vied with one another in opulenece

of what a novice was renouncing. Once theirs, it was sacrilege to deprive them of it in sny way. But these acfuisitions were not always an unalfoyed sdvantage. Sometimes a novice, presuming on his munificence, made himself troublesome to his brethren and his abbst (Fruct. Reg. c. 18). Somctimes, If faithless to his profession, he would reclaim his property by litigation or by arms (ib.). It was important, therefore, thit, whatever he gave to the monastery, he should give by his own act and deed (" ipse suâ manu," ib.). And though noae might so much as enter the monastery as a postulant, ) anging with him anything of his own, the , rmal and completa renunciation of all that he L ' in the world was to be made, solemnly, publiely, in writing, before the abbat and chapter, at a later stage of his noviciate (Reg. Mag. c. 87). It was even provided in the rula just quoted that the abbat should recold the aames of the donor and of the subscribing witnesses in his own last will and testament, lest at any future time the validity of the gift should be called in question (ib. c. 89). In the case of a minor, his parents wera to lay his hand, wrapped in the folds of the altar clotb, on the altar, and might either row away his property from him absolutely, or reserve the life interest till he should come of age (Rened. Reg. Comm. c. 59), When old ebough, the novice was bound to exceute this promise of remuaciation (Aurel, Reg. c. 46). By the rule of "Magister" the parents might either promise all the boy's fortuae to the monastery or might divide it in three equal portions betweea the monastery, the poor, and his own relatives. In either case they swore on the Gospels to bequeath him nothing (Reg. Mag. c. 91).
6. The rules of disqualification for admission varied continually in different countries and at different periods, especially as to the limitations of age. The conflicting decrees of councils and popes on these points testify to the difficuity of a compromise between the conflicting claima of the home or the state on the one side and of asceticism on the other. Basil, in the East, withont defining more precisely, allowed children to be received very young to be trained in the monastury (Reg. c. 15); but they might go buck to their homes, if they wished, before being tinally admitted. Once in the monastery, by Benelict's rule, they could not abandon their vocation (Mabill. Annal. iii. 37; cf. Prasff. AA. O. S. B.). Cassian speaks of young boys occasionally among the Egyptian monks (Collit. ii. 11). Gregory the Great forbade them to be received before eighteen years of age; but the prohibition has been explained as applying only to the islands in the Tuscan Sea, where the discipline was peculiarly trying (Epp. 1. 50). The emperor Leo fixed sistcen as the limit ( Aotell. 6). The rule of Aurelianus, bishop of Arles in the 6th century. excludes children under ten or twelve as thoughtless and as requiring a nurse (Rev. c. 47). A canon to the same effect was passed by the Trullan council at Constantinople, A.D. 692 (Conc. C. P. iii. c. 40), Leo IX., towards the close of the l1th century, prohibited novices before they nave arrived at years of discretion; Urban II., rather later, forbade them noder twenty. After the beginning of the 9 th century they were aeldom admitted under acven-teen years of age (Hosplnian, de Orig. Sionach. iii. 23). Boys intended for the priesthond were by a decree of the second council of 'loledo, A.d, 531 , to be trained in the house of the hishop, till they were eighteen yenrs old (Conc. Tolet. il. c. 1).
7. There is the same uncertainty, and thero are similar contradictions, as to the right of the parents to devote a child to the novicinte, and of a child to present himself without the consent of his parents. Basil, in the earliest days of monasticism, forbade children to be admitted unless hrought by their parents (Rei, c. 1i). At a later date the civil lnw not only diseonate. nanced parents keeping back their chililren from the noviciate, but even allowed children to be admitted against or without the consent of their natural guardians (Nowrll. exxiii. 41). Jerome, in a more than usually deciamutory pasnige, upbraids Heliodorus for permitting his affeco tion for his parents to keep him back from the life of a monk (Hieron. Lipp, 14, § 2). The council of Gangra (Kiangarl, in Anntolis), A.D. 525, a cuuncil not very favourably dispused to monasticism, condemned strongly sons retiring from the world without this parents, leave, anathematising all so doing (Conc. Genyr. c. 16). Alteserra contends, withont, however, muchi shew of reason, that this and similar canons of the council of Gangra were intended only against monks tainted with heresy (Avaticon, iv. 1). But two councils during the 7th century in Spain, already distinguished unong the countries of Ehrope by its momastic syinpathies, decided that children unler age were bound by the act of their parents devoting them to the monastery, and must abide by that promise, however unwillingly, in after years (Cunc. Tolet. iv. A.d. 633, c. 49 ; Conc. Tolet. x. A.D. 656, c. 6). The former of these councils of Toledo, according to Bingham, is the finst council that sanctions this perversion of pimental responsibilities and of filial obedience (iris. Eccles. vii, jii.). The latter enacts that up te ten years of age the child mny be deroted by the parents; that on attaining that tender age the child has full power to devote himself, with or without their approval ; and that, if parents have so much as tacitly allowed a child under ten to wear the monastic dress, he may never return to the world under penalty of excemmunication (v. a.).

The marringe tie was another source of perplexity. Basil dissuades married persons from entering the monastic life, unless together, lent the husband or wife left aloue in the world should be guilty of adultery (Reg, c, 12). Cassian, relating how Theonas, an Egyptian monk, persisted in becoming a monk in spite of his wife's entreaties, scems by his silence to disapprove (Collat. $\times x i .8,9$ ). The council of Gangra, already qnoted, condemns any such disregard of domestic duties on the jirit of wives or parents (v. s. co. 14, 15). In the same spirit Gregory the Great cautions husbands sgainst lorsaking their wives even for the life of a monk (Gregor. M. Fpp. vi. 48). But these salutary cautions were in practice too often neglected la the fervour of inonastic propagandism.

The case of slaves was different. There the monnstery was interposing to restue men from degradation. Yet there, too, was danger of a collislon between the tions. Canons and pound, and it could point. The council the council of Gangra be admitted without Cuilced. c. 4; Cone. ordered them to be sllewed them, if not (lurell. exxiii. 35 ; c iii). Basil makes refe awsy slave, sent back (Reg. c. 11). collision between the monastery and soclal obllgatimas. Chnons and decreea give an uncertain pound, and it could hardly be otherwise, on this pontit. The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 , and the eouncil of Gangra, A.D. $\mathbf{i 2 5}$, forbade alaves to be admitted without their masters' leave (Cono. Cumbed. e. 4; Conc. Gangr. e. 3). Justinian ordsed them to be kept three yeare, and then allowed them, if not reclaimed, to become monke (lursll. exxiii. 35; ef. Valentinian. II. Norell. dil). Basil makes reference to Onesimus, the runawy slave, sent back to his owner by St. Paul (Ray. c. 11). The great Gregory has frequent occasion in his correspondence to advise on this knotty point. Slavea are not to he taken in Knutty point. Slavea are not to be taken in rashly (Greg. M. App. ad Epist. Ifecrect. v, 6), daeson, to whom Gregory is writing, is told to pay the money to redeem a slare longing to berome a monk (iv. iii. 40). On the whole, witbout doubt, the influence of the monasteries was often exereised wisely as well as berero-lently for the alleviation and gradual extinction of the evila of slavery. For example, a master desiring to become a monk, and bringing a slave with him, found within the walls of the monastery that he had with him "no longer a slave, buta brother in the Lord" (Reg. Sirupion. c. 7 ; Ref. Turnut. c. 5, \&e.).

The profession of the monk clashed not infrequently with the duties of the eitizen. By a decree of Valentinian and Valens, in the latter part of the the century, all persons in monastries liable to serve in the local senates of the empirs ("curiales")" were ordered eitlier to return to public life or to sell their estates to olhers of a more publie apirit (Cod. Theed. xii. If Bingh. Orij. Ficcles. vii. iii.). The council of Chaleedon, in the snme century, protested of Chalcedon, in the snme century, protested wasast monks serving in the army or navy ( (man. Chalced. AD. . 451, c. 7). Gregory wisely discouragel public officers from becoming monks, zuless they had first passed their accounts, mid so cleared themsalves of their civic respontibilities ( (ireg. M. E.pp. iii. 65; viii. 5). Again, the edmission of criminale involved questions of some difficulty. There was, on the one hand, tha danger of interrupting the course of justice, by praventing the sentence of the haw from being carriad into effect, and of bringing down on the monastery harbouring criminisls the strong arm of the law, as well as the danger, whieh Dr. Arnold felt so keenly at lughy, of the moral contagion that might spread itueff from an evil esampla. On the other hand, it might firily be asked, was not the reformation of oftenders one of oftenders one great purpose of the monastery?

Cassian speaks of reclaimed robbers and even murderers among the monks of Egypt in his day (Cullat. iii. 5). The rule of Fructuosus provides that novices of this eharacter may only be received where the abbat is a man of more than ordinary experience and gravity, and that they must always be subjected to a discipline of more than usual rigour (Fruct. Re.j. c. 19). For a somewhnt similar reason, as well as not to interfere with a sister institution, monks, by a decree of the council of Agde, in the 6 th century, were not to be admitted from ona monnstery into another (Cimc. Ag, th. A.D. 506, e. 58). Old age was sometimes a bar to admission, in the earlier days of monasticism. Cassian says of some who desired to become monks that tha were too old to lenru (Lustit, iv. 30; cf. Pallad. Hist. Litus. ec. 20, 28). Poverty was never a disqualification. The poorest outeast, eraving to be let in, with no possessions of any kind to renounce, either for the monnstery or for the poor, had simply to vow, like the rest, that he would be obedient, and that he would never go away without leare of the abbat and of the brethren; if naked, he was to be clothed (heg. Magist. c. 87). The following list of impediments to becoming a novice in some orders is given by Martene; but a goud deal was always left to the discretion of the abbat and chnpter. Immature age, heresy, achism, need of a dispensation, illegitimacy, debt, evil notoriety, gross wickedness, bodily infirmity, and, in case of a novice aspiring to the diaconnte or priesthood, gnorance of latin (Rej. Bened. Comment. c. 58).
8. In the earliest ages there was no vow of perpetuity, in so many words; only a tacit understanding on both sides that the novice would persevere in his vocntion (Bingham, Orig. he turned back. If, after making his profession, what turned back to the world, he was to forfeit what he hal promised to the monastery, and was to be left to mnke his peace with God as he could (Justinian, Norell. v.). Short, however, of an irrevocable row, everything was dnne to Insure his perseverance. Shnuld there, after all be necessity for his expulsion, his old secular dress was to be given back to him (Bened. Reg, c. 58) ; and he was either to be ejected ignominiously in the dnytime or allowed to ateal away under the shadow of night (Cass. Instit. iv. 6). The medineval treatment of such offendera was more severe; they were to be immured for life (Hospinian, de Orig. Monnch. ad loc. eit.; Bened. Reg.). During the noviciate egress wa. comparatively easy. After two months of it, the novice might, if be wished, depart in peace, with staff, wallet of provisiens, and the abbat's benediction (Reg. Mag. c. 88). If, even at the last monent, just before solemnly assuming the monk's habit, he wlahed to retract, he wha free to do so, but noder sentence of penance for levity of purpose, and as a man atill in God'a sight dellicated to the life of a priest, if not to the higher life, as it was regarded, of a monk (Mnbill. Prueff. iv. vii. 150). A novice receding within the year was, by the rules of the Benedictine order of "Grandimontenses," never tul be allowed to try again (Reg. Coun-ment. c. 29). ment. c. 29).
Novices generally enjoyed, daring this probntion, the civil exampltinns and inmunities of monks (Alteser. Ascition, lv, 4). Degradation to the novicinte was sometimes $n$ punishment for monks who were disobedient (Du Cnnge, Glissit: Lat. s. v.). Benedict ordered the younger monks, just out of their novicinte, to be corrected for their faults by extraerdinary fastings (Reg 30).

, 4.$]$ these carcfully devised regulations abeut novices shew that the founders and reformers of monastic orders regnrded the novicinte, and rightly, as a very important part of their system. If the authority of tha nobrat was the keystone of the arch, the rigorous probntion before becoming a monk was the cornerstone of the edifice. Thus the admission of a novice ("susceptio novitii ") was one of the five principal duties of the abbat and chapter ("praecipua agenda monast tif"); the other four being the expulsion of renegades, the pennnces for misconduct, the neceptance of donations or bequests, and any proposition for changing any of the rules of the society (Reg. Benect. Commentat. c. 3). Benedict himself lays down the pinciple, that, while the discipline of novices must not ge beyonl their power of endurance, still, so far as it goes it must be adhered to strictly ( $R$ eg. Prolog.). It was a sagacious remark of Eutropius, a Spanish nbbat (Serbitanus or Sirhitanus) towards the end of the 6th century, "we do not want quantity, but quality in our novices""non quantos [quet] sed quales" (Mybill. Ann. O. S. B. vii. 21). Yet the noviciate and the framing of regulations about it seem to have been left genersilly to the monastic bodies themselves. The canons of councils, though continually relating to the monks and monasterics, are comparatively silent about the neviciate. It was considered probably an integral part of the internal adoninistration of the monasteries. It may be obscrred that, while in the commencement of monasticism the age for admissinn was earlier, and the probation longer, the inverse practice prevailed in course if time. Obviously the younger the novice, tha greater the need of long and elaborate preparation.

(1) Among the various designations used by ancient Christian writers far nuns, the most noticeable are these. "Nonna" (Hieron. Etp. 22 ad Eustochiu:n), a term of filial reverence, signifying an aged woman, a mother, or narse, just as the older monks were ealled "nenai" by taeir younger brethren (Bened. Rcg. c. i` .. .ned. Anian. Concord. Regul. c. 70 ; Mena. .t. ad ioc.). The word is perhnps from Egypt, and oceurs ia the form of $\nu \delta \boldsymbol{v}_{1}$ in some editions of Palladius. "Sanctimonialis," or "Catimoninlis," expressing the holiness of the vocation; the latter syliables of these words become in Inter writers the substantive word " menialis." "Monastria," n lesa usual word, signifying seclusion from the world. "Sponsa Chris"!," or spouse of Christ. "Ancilla Dei," handmaid of God. "Velata," veiled. "Ascetien," ascetic (Alteser. Ascetio on. III. ii.). The names " ngapetne," beluved, and "sorures," sisters, degenerated into terms of reproach, as implying familiarity with monks (Bingh, Oriy. Eiceles. VI, ii. 13 ; cf. Conc. Ancyr. A.D. sly. c. 18).
(2) There were precel ats in paganism for an institution of this kind. i e Roman vestals held a very high place in the Roman constitution. Usualiy admitted very young, between tha ages of six and ten, they were bound to fulfil a term of thirty years after admist:on; ten as novices, ten in the worship of the temple, teu as teachers of those who were to take their places. After the expirntion of these thirty years, they were free to marry, but availed themselves of this liberty very rarely (Preller, Les Dieun de l'uncicune Rome). Among the P'ythagoreans, also, women consecrating themselves to virginity might attain a very exulted ranik in the nierarchy (Maury, Histoire des Relifions de la Grèce Antüquc). Ambrose seeks a precedent in the sacred observances of the Jews (De I'irginibus). But the passage in the book of Maecabees ia a very slight foundation to build upon (Il. Mace. iii. 19).
(3) In one sense the profession of a nun dates from an earlier period than the corresponding profession of a monk. Before the custom of addicting themselves for religinns purposes to an unmarried life had made mueh progress ia the Christian chureh among men, it was already in vogue among women. They had na public duties to renounce; it was easier for them to exchange their ordinary employments for thosa of charity and devetion ; perhaps, too, they were predisposed to understa purity, which are so prot cxhortations to virginity, ahont marringe as thos Corinthinns in the most 35). predlsposed to understand the exhortations to purity, which are so prominent in the Gospel, as eshortatioas to virginity, and to take such words about marriage hs those of St. Paul to the Corinthians in the most literal sense (1 Cor. vii. 3i). The "sacred virgins," or "ecelesiastjcal virgins," were an important part of the organlsation of the church in its first three centuries, and their names were enrolled on the list (" canon" or "matricula ") of church aticials (Bingham, Oriuin. Eccles. vii. 4; Hospiaian, de Orit, Monaciatus, i. 10). The empress Helena, mother of Constantine the Great, shewed eipecial respect for these devoted women (Socrat. Hist, Liccles. i. 17). But these " asceticue" were not living together in communities, nor bound by rows (Cyprian, Epp. 4, 62; cf. De Habitu Virg.). Even so late as the close of the 4 th catury, a canon of the council of Carthage qeaks of these virgins as dwelling with their parents (Conc. Curthag. III. A.D. 397, c. $3: 3$; parents (Conc. Curthag. III. A.D. 397, c. $3: 3$; Gregor. M. Dialog. ii. 7, 14). If orphans, they were to be placed by the bishop in a building set apart for them. Probably the persecution.: of the "sacred virgins" by Julian (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. v. 3), by that reaction which ineritably follows persecution, helned to make their roeation at once more popular and more systematic. Some of the Roman ladies, who were induced by Jerome'a influence to devote themselves to $i$, continued in their homes. Cthers left their homes to give themselves more completely, sis they believed, to a lite of devotion (Epp. ad Eustoch.; ad Demetriad.; Ambrose, LPp. ad Marcell.). The civil law of the later empire esempted from the capltation tax (a plebeiae capitationia injuriâ) these ecelesiastical virgins, and grants them espeeial proteetion from insults, making it a capital offence to offer violence to any one of their number, or even to propose msrriage to them (Cud. Theodos. xiii. x. 4, ix. mr.; Cod. Justinian. I. iii. 5).
(4) Very early in the 5th centary Palladius describes several communities of virgins living together in the Scetic desert, in Egypt, nnci in Tibenase, an island on the Nile. Some of these conmunities were a aparently not under a very careful discipline. Dorotheus, the superintendeut of one of them, used to sit at an upper window, looking down on the inmates, to stop their quarrellings (Pallad. Hist. Lutus. ce. 34, 36, 38, 137). Chrysostom mentions crowds or associations of virgina (eoctus virginum) in Igypt, in those days pre-eminently fertile in asseticism (Homil. in Matt. c. 8). Ruffinus spesks of them in Oxyrinchus (Behneseh) in Fgypt. Ambrose says that they abounded in Alexnadria, in the East, in Italy, and were exteemed very highly ( $D_{e}$ Vir,jinit. 7, De Virginibus, 10, De Lapsa lirg.). Jerome complains that parents were apt then, is in later yenrs, to get rid of their sickly or ill-favoured daughters in this way (Hieron. Ep. ad Demetriad.). Gragory the Great, attributea the preservation of Rome from the Lombards to the prayers of the nuns, about three thousand in number, within its walls (Gregor. M. Epp. vi. 42, vii. 26).
(5) At first, as was the case with monks, and especially in the East, youth was hardly considered a hindrarce to self-dedieation. Basil draws the line at sixteen or seventeen (Reg. c. 7; Ep. ad Amphilech. c. 18). Asella aod Paula devoted thentselves, or were devoted, even earlier (Hieron. Epp.). Ambrose ndvises that it must nei depend on the number of years, but on the maturity of character ( $D_{0}$ Viry,initate, c. 7). The Council of Saragossa, in the close of the 4th century, ond the Couneil of Agde, a little more than a century later, forbid the veil to be assumed betore the age of forty (Conc. Cacsurauy. A.D. 381, c. 8 ; Conc. Agathens. A.D. 506, c. 19); and the third Council of Carthage, about the same date as that of Saragossn, before twenty-five (Conc. Cur (hag. III. A.d. 397, c. 4). Gregory the Great writes that nuns may not be veiled before sixty years of age, but the profession might be made sooner ( $E_{i}^{\prime} p$. iv. 11; cf, Mabill. Annal. U.S. B. viii. 47). Charlemagne, in order to diseourage the practice of taking the veil prematurely, re-enacted the old African canon already quoted, fixing twenty-five years $f$ age as the earliest age for it (Cupitul. A.D. 789, c. 46 ; A.D. 805, c. 14). The Council of Frankfort nllowa an earlier age in exceptional cases (Conc. Francof. A.D. 793, c. 46). The Council of Aachen, twenty-two years later, forbids young women to become nuns without the consent or' their parents or guardinns (Cunc. Aquisgr. A.D. 817, c. 20). As to the leagth of time necessnry for probation, a Council of Orleans in the bth century, draws a distinction bet veen convents where the inmates are to stay for ever, and those where they only sojourn for a time. In the latter case the probation is to last three years; in the former, one year is enough (Conc. Aurclian. V. a.d. 549, c. 19). [Novice.]
(6) From the first it was understood on all hands that a women conseerating herself to the in ofession of virginity ought not to marry ; and in accordance, as it was thought, with apostolic precepts ( 1 Cor. vii.; I Tit. ii.), anyone going back from this profession was gravely censured as falling from a higher vocation (Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 315, c. 19). But it was not till the Benedictine rule had been established in Europe that the vow of virginity wes regarded as absolntely irrevocable. At first in some cases, if not in all, the distinction whs reeognised between lawfil wedlock and incontineney. In course of time the same stigma of infamy was branded on a num marrying, as on one guilty of gross immorality, just as a monk was condemned alike for marriage and fornicatiou. The Council of Elvira in Spain, early in the 4th century, allowed nuns formaking their profession to be restored to communion, if penitent, after offending once, but not in case of the offence being repented (Conc. Eliberitan. A.D. c. 324, c. 13). Basil ordered a penance of one or two years before restoration to communion; in his eyes, the marriage of one who is ali.enty the spouse of Christ is adultery (Ep. ad Amplitoch. c. 18). The Council of Valence, in Southern

France, about the came date, sentenced nuns marrying to a long, but not perpetual, excommunication (Conc. Valent. A.D. 374, c. 2). The Theodosian code allowed thens to return to the world at any time before attalaing forty years of nge, especially if they had been compelied in the firat instance by their parents to become nuns (Cod. Theodos. Nov. vii. et ix.). Pope Innocent $I$., in the commencement of the Sth century, forbids a nun nfter marrying or being seduced to be restored to communion, unless the partner in her transgression has refired into the clolster ("de saeculo recesserit," understood by Hospinian as if it were "decesserit') (lnaoc. 1. E'F. 2 ad Victric. Rotomajens.). Epiphanius drav's very strongly the distinction, obliterated in Iater ages, betweea the marringe of a nun and prolligacy; in tbe former case, after penance done, the bric of excommunicatlina is to be taken off from her (Epiphan. Haeres. $1 \times \mathrm{i}$.). Leo 1. , in the middile of tivs ceatury, only allows nuns who have tyoukn their vow before taking the veil to be receivel after penance to communion; for those who so offend after taking the veil there is no restoration (Ep. 30). Rather earlier in the century Augustine, with charncteristic largeness of thought, aduits that marriage in these rases, though very culpable, is not invalidated ( $i$ c Bono Viduitat. 8, 9, 11). Jerome, 13 charicteristically, writes more inexorably ( $K p$, ad Demetriad.). The Council of Chalcedon, prescribing a period of penance varying in duration according to the discretion of the bishop, recommends the offending sister to mercy (Conc. (hatced. A.D. 451, c. I6). The aecond Council of Arles, in the: year following, re-enacts the decree, already cited, of the Council of Valence, adding the limitation, "if the offender is over twenty-five years of age " (Conc. Arelat. ii. A.D. $4: 2$, c. 33). The decree of the Council of Orange, a few years beturs this, is of the same purport (Cono. Arausican. A.d. 441, n. 28). A century later the sentences pronounced are more severe. The fifth Council of Orleans excommunicates both parties in the event of a nun marrying after her fourth year in the convent (Conc. Aurelian. V. A.D. 549, c. 19); and the Council of Mâcon makes this an excommunication for ever, except by special dispeasation from the bishop in mortal sickness (Conc. Matiscon. A.D. c. 581, c. 12). The third Council of Paris pronounces anathema against any one presuming to tempt a nun to mary (Conc. Paris, A.D 557, c. 5). Gregory the Great censures in gravest terme the marriage of a nun, as a grent wickelness ( $E p$. v. 24). Nuna otherwise breaking their vow of chastity he ordera to be transferred to a stricter monastery for penance (Epp. iv. 9).
(7) The Consecration of a nun was a solemn rite, only to be administered by a bishop, or, at least, by his authorisation. The third Council of Carthage, in the end of the 4th century, forbade priests so to officiate, except by the bishop's order; the Council of Paris, under the successor of Charlomagne, forbade abbeases to usurp this function (Conc. Carthay. III. A.D. 390, c. 3 ; Syn. Hippon. A.d. 393, c. 34 ; Syn. Carthag. A.D. 419, c. 6 ; Conc. Paris, A.d. 825, cc. 41, 43). Ambrose, in the 4 th ceutury, cautions womea against assuming the veil precipitately and whthont dne conslderation (De Virginitate, c. 7). His eister Marcelllos was formally almitted in the great basilica of St. Peter at Rume by pope Liherius, and part of the cermony was her receivlag from lis haads the robe of virginity (Eip. ad Marcellin.; Innoc. Ep. ad Yittr. o. 13. He relates elsewh re how young women came to him at Milun from other parts of Italy and from other countries to be velled (De Viryinibus, i. & 10 ; ct. Conc. Cirthay. Iv. A.D. 398). Hospinian (De Orig. Menuth. u. s.) contends that thers was no such ceremony before Constantine the Great, and that Mextellian (De V'inginibus Velanaïs) speaka orly of the modesty in dress and depest tment which hr comes Christian maldens generally. The favourite seasons for this caremony were Eiphany, Faster, and the festivals of Apostlus (Gclavius. Fp. 9, ad Episc. Lucan. c. 12). Ths veil was a siga of belonging to Christ slone (Athanns. Kxthortat. ad Spons. Dei). The fillet or riband (vitta), with its gleam of purple or gold, repreanted the crova of victory (Optatus, de ©hicruti. Donat. vib 4), and the tresses Fatheed up and tied together marked the ciffereace between the bride of Christ and the iri e of rin earthily bridegroom with her tresses lisered necorling to the old Roman custom. The ring aud bracelat, symbolic also of the betrothal to Christ, ns well as the use of a special office for the oceasion, were. Bingham argues, of a comparatively modern date (Jrig. Eecles. VII. iv.). The Council of Gangra, while correcting several laxities of the day, coulemned the practice of nuas dressing like monks (Cons. Gangr. A.D. 365, cc. 13, 30). The same coancil forbnde nuns to have their heads shaven (ib. c. 17 ; cf. Cod. Theodos. XVI. ii. 27); and so decreed two Gall; councils in the 6th sad 7th centuries (M. 'l. Anncl. O. S. B. vii. 52, xiii. 7). Ambrose and Optatus write to the same effect (Ambr. de Laps. Virgin. c. 8; Optat. de Schismat. Donatist. vi. 4). On the other hand, Jerome and Augustive imply that the custom in their experience was otherwise (Hieron. Ep. ad Sabinian. August.; Ep. 211). la Egypt and Syria the custom of shaving the head seems to hive beea adopted for cleanliness, nans having infrequent opportunities of washing the head (Hieron. u. s.; cf. Sozom. Hist. Eccl. マ. 10). The uncertainty of rule, and the diveraity of practice on this point arose, perhaps, la part from the apostolic injuactions to the Christian women at Corinth ( 1 Cor. xi.) conflicting with the moaastic tonaure; and partly from the twofold espect of the vocation of a nun, as, on the one hand, pledged to virginity, and, on the other, betrothed to the Redeemer. Another objection against the tonsure of auns in Europe was the circumstance that this was a, ancient punishment for adulteresees among the Teutonic tribes.
(8) The rules of the conventual life for women resemble closely those for men (Mabill. Anmil (. S. B. I. 52). Scholastica, sister of the greal. $\overline{0}$ rodict, was esteemed in Europe the founa: : nunneries, according to the legendary traution (Mabill. Praeff. 1, iii.). The nums were to obey their sbbess implicitly (e.g. Augnst. Ep. 211). By the rule of Caessrius, bishop of Arles, in the 6th century, they were never to go out of the convent; were to hare

Reg. cc, 4, 13). Tha rigorous rule callal "Cujusdam," not uorensonably ascribed by se"al to Columba of Iona, prescribes for nuns continual silence, frequent cenfessions, a very ppare diet, very hard labour, under penalty of excommonication (Reg. Cujusd. ce. 6, $9.10,12,18$, 19). The rule of Donatos, bishup oc Besançon, in the middle of the th celit ry, males mention of bale efficers corresponcing to the abbat, friar, beidemadarits or septimassitius in a monastery; 15 allows wires, whis, have lett. their husbands, to be atmit ted (cf. Syn. Carthag. JI, A.D. 309, c. 1) ; It forbids the nuns to keep auything under lock and key; it crders small delinquencies to be punished by slappings (Denat. Vesontionens. Rey. cc. $4,5,7,11,32,67$ ). Gregory the Great, in his life ef Benedict of Nursia, gives a curious legend, how twe nuns were punished grievously tor their silly chatterings (Gregor. M. Vit. S. Bened. c. 23).
(9) Nunnerles were generally, as might be aticipated, more amenable than monasteries to the control of their bishop. But the occurrence from time to time of a canon on this point obews that they, toc, conld sometimes be insoturdinate (r.q. Conc. Arelat. A.D. 5.54, c. 5 ; Gone. Forojul. A.d. 791, c. 47 ; Conc. Francofurt. 4.d. 793, c. 47 ; Conc. Aquisgran. A.D. 816 , c. 68 ; Con: Piris, A.D. 829, c. 13). Again, another conncil insists that they must account to their bishop for all immunitie; from episcopal daes (Cone: Vernens, A.d. 755, c. 20). Gregory blames a bishop for not having hindered a nun from leava bishop for not having hindered a nun from leaving her cenvent (Gregor. M. Elpp. ix, 114). He orders the bishent nunneries heing founded without suffiprevent nunneries heing founded without sufficient endownent.; to keep lay-women out of them (Epp. iii. 9, iv. 4, v. 12, vii. 7). The power of abbesses, like that of abbats, was checked by certain limitations beth from within and withont. By the rule of Donatus the abbess mast tske counsel with her nuns (u. s. c. 2). By ths decree of an English council in the 8th century the abbess is to be elected by the nuns, either from their own number or from elscwhere, with the advice of the bishop (Conc. Chalcyth. [Chelsea ?], A.D. 787, c. 5). Gregory the Grest in his day disappreved of young sbbesses, sind of abbesses from another convent (Epp. iv. 11, vi. 12). By a council near Paris (Epp. iv. 11, vi. 12). By a council near Paris in the 8th century it is ordered that the

must do penance in the monastery for her ts by the bishop's direction (cum consilio apl, Conc. Vernens, A.d. 735, c. 6). Charleangan enacted that the bishop must repert to the Crown any abbess guilty of misconduct, in der thst she might be deposed (Conc. Francoint & D. 795, c. 47). Abbesses were forbidden, thi foign of his auccessor, to walk alone, and thas were placed In some degree under the surveillance of the sisterhood (Conc. Dogunt in. ii, A.D. 847, c, 16). Charlemagne prohibited abbesses from laying hands on any one, or pronouncing the blessing (Capitul. Carol. M. A.d. 798, с. 76 ; Conc. Francofurt. A.d. 798, e. 46). Hospinian alleges that some abbesses claimed to ordain, but this can only be understond in tho sense of admitting into miuor ordera or into the sisterhood (Hespinian, u. a.). Bingham states that abbesses are first mentioned as taking jart in the proceedings of a synod nt the Council of Becantield (Becanceldae), in Kent, A.D. $69+$ (Bing. Origin. Eecles. VIl, ili.; cf. Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. xviii. 28). In the feudal system abbesses were liable, like his other vassals, to the king's service, but by ploxy, because of their sex and vow of seclusion. They of course exercised lordship ever the fiets belonging to thoir convents. In each province the convents were under the supreme authority of the abbess of the central convent ef that order, just as the monasteries were subject to a "provincial" aud "general" of the order.

(10) The routine in a nunnery corresponded very nearly with that of a monastery. There was the same periodical rotation, hour by hour, of sacred services, varied by work, chiefly manual, of one sort or another, with brief intervals at stated times for rest or iefection. The usual occupation, in the way of working, was from the first in wool. Jerome, urging nuns to adviscs them to have real by strenuous diligence, hands them to have the wool ever in their hands (Ep. ad Bustoch.). The passage in Augustines writings, where he speaks ot them handing through the door of the convent the dresses which they have made for the aged monks waiting there with food for the nuns in exchange (August. de Morib. Eccles. c. 31), recalls the ancient epitaph on the Roman housewife in the simple days of the republic, "domi manait, lansm fecit." But this primitive employment was apt to degenerate into a prefurence for fancy-work, which was discouraged as frivolous and ain, except when it was made useful, in ecclesiastical embroidery, &c., for the adernment of the sanctuary (Msbill. Annal. O.S. B. xvl. 24). The rule of Caesarius enjoins werking in wool, but forbids tancy-work (ts. s. cc. 14, 42). The rule of Aurelian ciders (literas nus all to learn reading and writing (literas discant omnes, u. s. c. 26). In the revival of education under Charlemagne, the nunneries did good service. Hitherte monastic achonls had been used ebiefly for training monka and clergy only. The great legislater extended the advantages of education to the laity also, instituting for them the "scholas exteriores," and leaving the "scholae interieres" for the ethers. The scheols in the nunneries were already useful for girls in this larger sphere, the training of the young boing natnrally congenial to the nuns. Their course of lessena differed of course from the "trivium" and "quadrivium" ef the monastio system, being confined to an elementary sort of eatechism in religieus knowledge, music, housework, and, inore rarely, Latin (Alteser, Ascetic. v. 10; Herxog, Kloster-S.hnlen). Nuns were alse employed frequently in transcribing and illuminating aacred books, and in the arts of nie licine and palnting (Mabill. Acta Sanctor. O. S. B. i. p. 646 ; l'raeff. ii. 3, iii. 4). Bonlface, during hls miasionary labours in Germany, sent to his old home in England for a supply of nung to asaist In civilising and Chrlatianising the wild hordes whom he was converting (Othlon. Vit. S. Bonifacii, c. 25 ; Mabill. Praeff. iil. 2, 4). Hosplnian says that he made use of them not for teaching only, hut also for the purpose of preaching ( $u$. B.; cf. Mabill. Praeff. 11.).

(ii) Great care was necessary from the firat to prevent a too close proximity of nuaneries and monasterles, as well as any intercourse between the nuns and the other sex generally. Augustine, Jerome, and other fathers of the church reiterate their cautions against these dangers. The Conncil of Ancyra forbade the consecratel virgins to associate with men even as sleters (Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 314, c. 18 ; cf. Conc. Carth. A.D. 312, c. 3). Justinian forbade women to enter the conventual buildings of men (Novell. exxxiil.). In the 5 th century canons were made strictly prohibiting any more monasteries to be founded for monka and nuns together, and ordering those already In existence to be partitioned between the sexea (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. Y. 23 ; cf. Herzog, Kloster). The ruie of Caesarius allows no other' mnn than the bishop, the clergy officiatiog, aud the steward (provisor) of the convent to enter withid its walls (u. s.). The nuns were to make their confession to the bishop through their abbess (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. xii. 32). Some nuns were cenkured in the 6th century for having nursed through his illness a monk of the venerable age of 80 (Mablll. u. s.). The Council of Sevile, a little later, forbids a nungery to be placed too near the monastery to which it is attached for protection; enacts that thls arrangement must have the sanction of the bishop or council; that no communication is to pass from the one establishment to the other, except through the abbat and abbess; and, while sllowing the nuna to work with their fingers on dresses for the monks, and the monks to minister spiritually to the nuns, precludes all other intercourse whatever (Conc. Hispul. A.d. 619, c. 11). The letters of Gregory the Grent abound with precautions and directions on this delicate subject. The person actiog for the nundery in its temporal affairs must always be either a monk or a cleric, of high repute and of long experience; he must save them sll occasion tior going out of the precincts; nuns are never on any pretext to lodge under the roof of a monastery. He denonaces severely the custom of nuna being "commatres" with monks (Gregor. M. Epp. iv. 9, 42, rili. 21, 22). The danger, indeed, waa one of constant recurrence, and required unceasing vigilance (Syn. Carthag. c. A.D. 346, cc. 3, 4; Conc. Toletan. I. A.D. 400, cc. 6, 9). The second council of Nicaes condemned the double or mised monasteries already mentioned, nad, even in cases of consanguinity, forbade a nun to aee a monk, except in the presence of an abbesa (Conc. Nicaen. ii. A.D. 787, c. 20). The council of Frejus forbada the abbat of the protectiog monastery to visit the nunnery without the bishop's leave (Conc. Forisjut. A.D. 794, c. 12). Still, in spite of every precantion, the insidious temptation bafled only too often the edicts of councily and reformers. la the 8th centary nuns gaioed admission into monasteries on the grouni of belng necessary in tlcknoss aud almilar eutergencies, and secular women, on the same excuse, were harboured in convents Mabill. Praeff. Ill. i.). In the monastery of St. Maurice (Agaunense), in the Valnis, women were in the habit of frequenting the basilica or chapei of the mónastery (Mabill. Annal. U. S. B. I. 74). In the 10 th century the archbishop of Sens, In Champagne, destroyed the aeparnte cclls (aediculae), then becoming common, in which auns lived apart from the restraints of the convent (Mabill. O.S B. Praeff.V.vi.). The "cmannicae" of the 8 th and subsequent centuries differed from auns in retaining more of their secular character. They were not bound by a vow of perpetuity; they repudiated the titles of monachae and matrea ; and, though engaged, like nuns, in the work of education, they confined their teaching chiefly to the children of the nobles [CasoNICI; SCHOOLS]. The "wldows," who deroted themeelves to the service of the church from its enrliest days, belong in many respects to the same category as the "sacred virgins." Like them, they were exempted by the Code of Theodosius from the ordinary capitation tax; but it was expressly provided that this exemption should only be granted to those widows whose advanced age and sobriety of demendonr gave a guarantee that they would not merry agsin (Cod. Theodus. u. s.). The so-called "Apoatolical Constitutions," after saylog thst a widow does not recelve the impnsition of hands (oi хеіротоveital, cf. Gelasius, Ep. 9, c. 13) ensct that only those may be admitted into the order who are altogether beyond suspicion of levity or inconstancy (Apostol. Constitut. vili. 25). Similar precautiona occur repentedly In luter ages, for instance, in the decrees of the Council of Orange in the 5th century, and of the Frankish kingdom in the 9 th century (Cono. Arausican. A.D. 441, c. 27 ; Conc. Tolet. x. cc. 4, 5 ; Capitul. A.D. 817, c. 21). OATHS on formal and aolemn occasions, or for the purpose of legal attestation, were not prohibited amoug the early Christians. There were considersble soruples, doubtless, in using them, and their use was regarded with jenlousy by more than one of the great church writers. The ground of the aversion to them, as to other prestices which have since been held to be generally lawful a among Christian people, wha the prevalence of idolatry. All adjurations in common use naturally invoked the name of a heathen deity, or were cast iu some form which a Christiau could not utter without a tacit complinnce with heathonism. 'I'ertullian has name passage (De Idololat. c. 11) where, after speaking of lying being the servant of covetouspess, he proceeds: "Of false owenring I say nothing, since it is not lawful to swear at all "-a pas-sag- which nu:bid seem to forbid the use of as onth under нгу circumstances. It is manifest, however, that Tertullina le not discusaing the lawfulness of oastbs, but is repeating in a general way the prohibition of our Lord (St. Matt. v. 34) agninst int roducing adjurations into common conversation. Nevertheless, the feeling of that age was strong against the indsscriminate lise of oaths. Thoa Clement of Alex-

 The mende of conducting the furmality is given in Lety. Alcmun, vi. 7. The witness's were to place their hands upon thu chest containing the relics, and the principal in the cause alune was to utter the worls, and lay his hand upun their hands, and swear that he had right on his side. To add solemaity to the oath, it was nlways to be taken in a church, elther on the er. - or the altur, or the Gospels, or the relies. Aut the Eaglish l'enitentials refer (Theodor. I. vi.4; Bedie, v. 2; Egbert, vi, 2) to an uath thus tuken, nt the hand of a bishop, or on the altar, or on the cross. An instauct of a fither swearing, with his hands raised over the altar, to the inuocence of his daughter, is given by Gregury of Tours. (Ilist. iii. s3.). In the Capitulary of Charles the Great, v. 34, a snyperted priest is orderod to purge himself with an onth tuken on the Gosijels in presenee of the people. The practice, how. ever, of requining an vath from the clergy was ${ }^{\text {not unf }}$ uniform. Thus, the council of Meaux, A.D. 845, c. 48 , prohibited bishops from swearing upen any asered ouject ; it was sullicieut, nyprarently, that the onth was taken in presence of the object. And, prior to this, the Cupitukr. Episcop, A.D. 801, e. 20, had ajprointed that a priest hould not swear at all, bnt sinply make his sle ation with gravity and truth. And the

In disputes abeut property the oath of a 1 priest conld trausfer the lapd of one gerf to tha church. In sweariug by the Gospels, the ordinary formality was to lay the hands upon the sacred volume, but sometimes the buok was held, Thus ielagius, afterwards pope, A.D. 555-560, wheu charged by the Roman people of factions conduct towards his predecessor Vigilius, ${ }^{\text {ascended the pulpit of St. Peter's, holding the }}$ Gospels and the eross above his head, and swore that he was innaceent. The hands were to be phaced on the relic cheat (Lef. Alcman. vi. 7), or on the tomb of the saint (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Confers, c. 93), or wer to be extended towarde the senal fiti. 'Treg. OBLATE, (oblata, oblatio; barb. obladi, oblayma, oblic). "Oblata" is a late equivalent to "ablatiu" (as proba=probatio, confessa $=$ confessio, missa $=$ missio, \&c.). When oblatio wan understood of the provislon for the Eucharist it generalty included both elements, e.g. "Populus dat oblationes suas; id est, panem et vinum" (U'd, R(m. ii. 6 in Mus. Mul. II. 46); "Oblationem, i.e. punem et vinum, virl et foetninae nd missas ofleruat " (Allocutio Episco. 89 in Regino; de Eecl. Discipl. II. 5; so Amalarius, de Eccel. Off. ill. 19). The ollering of bread alone was, however, also called "oblatio" as by Germanus of Paris, 555 ; " Dum sacerdos oblationem confrangeret" (Expos. Missae Breo. in Martena, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. 1. Ir. 12, Ord. 1.); in a Gregurian rubrio in one ancieat MS. "Otleruntur a populo oblationes et vinum;" and by Amalarius, "Cum oblatione calix Domini auferatur de altari " (Ecloga, 22). But "oblata" was the tar more common form when the bread only was intended, and from the frequency of its use, when men spoke of sacramental brend, it came at length to be applied to smaller loaves or caltes of bread for ordinary uses. Thus a writer in the 9th century speaks of "rolls of bread which are commonly called oblatao" (Iso, do Mirac. S. Othmari, ii. 3, in Surius, Nov. 16). In Quluquagesima the monks of Clugny received at supper cakes "which by men of the Roman tongue are called nebulae, by our people oblatas" (Consuet. Chuniac. 1. 49 in S/icil. Dnch. i. 667, ed. 2). Simiiarly the customs of Evesham allowed in Lent is certain quantity of wheat from the granary "ad ollatas ad caenam," and half as much on Maundy Thursday (Dugdaie, Monast, i. 149, ed. 2). At length, when the Eucharistic bread was made very small and thin, wafers for sealing were called cblatue, whenee the French cublie and the Spanish oblea.
Ublata was more commonly applied to the unconsecrated loaf, hostia to the consecrated. Thus in the Urdo Romanus, before the consecration, "Pontifex . . . suscipit oblatas de manu presbyteri," "Archidiaconus suscipit oblatas Pontitieis "' (Grd. i. 15, &c. ; Sim. §48; Ord. i1. 9, 10, iii. 13, 14, v. 8, 10), while "hostia" [Hos'] is only uad after (as in i. 19, is. 13 ; iii. 16), of the "fraction of the hosts." Yet until "hostia" entirely superseded it, "oblata" was also occasionally used of the consecrated element. Thus in the 8th century, when the usage was quite unsettled, "Pontifer antem tangit a latere calicem cum oblata," "Rumpit oblatam ex latere dextro" (Ord. Ilom. i. 16, 19). Amalarius: "Fractio oblatarum " (Ecloga, 25).

the form of oblatew, see ELEMENTB, vol. I. pp. 801-604.

OBLATI (Monarrict). Like the terms "converaus "and "donatus," the word "oblatus" in eouncalon with tha monastic system has several meanings, which must be carefully diw tinguibied, ns sxpreasing dilie reat thens belonging to dillierent periods in the hastory of munas. ticism. In every sense the "oblatl" were a link between the worlll and the monastery.

In the tirst Inetance the "oblati" were chil. dren brought by their parents to the monastery and there dedicated to the monnatl: lite. In this aenee the "oblatl" were distinct from the "conversl," jersons of mature age taking on themselres the vowa. [Converral ; Novice..]

When monks, in couree of time, ceased to be regarded as Iaymen, and began, by the very fact of their profession, to be raaked with the clergy, and ss the original alinpllity of the monastic life began to disappear, the need eane to be felt of a class of persona in every monastery who should assist the monks la eome of their more ordinary occupationa, and so leave them inore free for the services of their chapel ame the meditatons of their cells. At the same time theae, assistanta were useful for purposes outside the walla of the monastery, and could be sent by the abbat or prior on various errands of a secular kind without the monks belng disturbed from their devotions (Fructuosi Rey. c, 13 ; lsidori Rey. c. 20). In thla sense the obluti were "laybrothers," or, as Ménard explains (Commentur. ad Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. Ixx. 5), the servants or domentics of the monastery (servi vel famull, ib.) receiving their food and a diatinctive dress from the abbat, bat not bound by the same vown as their brethren in the monastery (Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s. v.). The third council of Arles (A.D. 455) speeaks of a " lay multitude aubject to the abbat, but not owing any sabjection to the biahop of the diocess" (Cunc. Arelat. iii. App.). Sometimes from humility a novice, it might be of high rank, of great learning, or already in sacred orders, chose to be admitted into a monastery on this humbler footing (Alteserraa Asceticon, iii. 5 ; Du Cange, Gloss. Lit. s. v.). Monasteries gradually enlarged their posseasions; and the services of laymen wers requisite not merely within the preeinets, but to superintend and cultivate the land belonging to the monastery (Du Cauge, ib.).

At a later period a class of "oblati" cama Into existence, not so closely attached to the monastic system of which they claimed to be members. In mome cases persons, without assuming a distinctive dreas, or residing within the monastic precincts, devoted their property to the monastery, reserving to themselves the life intereat only; in others they bound themselves and their descendants to be its servants or retainers (Du Cange, Gloss. Lat. s. v.). Of course in cases such as thess there was no probation. The promise itself sufficed. These "oblati" or "denati" are described by Alteserra as the associates and deputies of the monke (adjuvae et vicarii conversorum), or as that servants (servi monachorum), because they ded. eated themselves and their possessions to the monastery without taking on themselves the outward garb either of a cleric or of a monk (Altes.

These anaciates, having been objected to in some onarters, were formaily approved by poppe Urban II., A.D. 1091 (ib.). Single, and even married, women were sometimes silmitted on thase collditions (ibi). Mabillon apeaka of these "oblati" or "donati" as not in any true enare monks (nequaquam monachi), though not uncummenly termed moukn of the second order (monachl aecundi orlinia). He quotes a paseage from Alcuin, in the 8th century, about a number of lay brothers attached to monasteriea (grex devotorum), but the terin "oblat us" in thin ense is of a later century (Mabill. Ann. O. S. A, xv, 49).
From an early period, indeed ae soon as the monastie life began to command the reverence of secular potentates, thene, in return for their benefactions, not infrequently sought and obtuined admission into the frnternity, as outmembera, in order to have their names ingeribed on the roll, and mentioned in the conventual prayera. Thus Maurun, a diaciple of the great Benedict, received Theodebert, king of the Pranks, into the monnastery afterwaris called "st. Maur aur le Loire" (monaaterium Glannafolienase) in the close of the bth eentury, 584. (A.D. 584, Mabill. AA. O. S. B. Vita Sti. Mauri, ec. 40, 50, 51.) Similariy, many kings, mobies, and prelates during the middle syes, for inatance the German emperor Frederio III, and the Greek omperor Emanuel Comnenus, claimed the honours of monkhood, without formally subjecting themselves to its discipline. Ia qome instanees grandees were ndmitted as oblastes during sickness, or at the point of death. (Alten. Asceticon, iii. 7.)

OBLATION, THE (oblatio, sacrificism, roustif). Under this name the Eucharist, the Christian thank-otiering, was understooll at a very enrly period. Thus Irenaeus, 167 , referring $\omega_{0}$ its institution, says that Christ taught His disciples "the new oblation of the new covenant" nant" "(Iter. iv. 17, \&5). The ancrament is vith him "The oblation of the church, whlch the Lerd taught should be offered over the whole world " (18, §8). The Apostolical Canons speak of the time of the holy oblation" (c. 3. comp. 8).

1. In the mind of Christiuns of the first liturgial period there was a much eloser connexion betwees the oblation of bread and wine and the conmemorative sncrifice than would be likely to wurvire the expanaion and rearrangement of the original form of the analmoza. For the memerial of the sacrifice of Christ nppenrs to have been made at first by the aimple offering of the bread and cup by the priost with thanksgiving (Eucharist), the acconnt of the institution, and the Lord's Prayer. This hypotheesis sstisfes all the phenomena. It explaias langunge in the fathers (see Canon of tie Lituray, vol. i. p. 268) which otherwise would seem ambiguous or confused; it harmonies with the fact that in the Gallican liturgies, which have ndmitted go changesince the 8th century, that which we should anw call the caoon consisted to the last of the narrative of the institution only; it accounts both for tine statement of Gregory I. that the canon us the composition of a scholastio, and that it

Missale Francorum and the Sacramentary of Besan on (i)id. ii. 634, 778). The Spanish and Gallican canens were very ahort, and the commemoration and oblation found their place in a prayer which came immediately after it, the Post Pridie of the Spanish and Post Mysterium, or Post Secreta, of the Gallican liturgies, which embraced the invocation ss well. Very few, however, of thos extant contain these three set forth with any distinctness, snd some of those of later composition lose siglit of them all. The following example from the Mozarabic Missal is complete; "Facimus, Domine, filii tui acstri Jesu Christi commemorationem, quod veniens ad nos humaniun tormam assumsit, quod pro hominibus quos creaverat redimeudis passionem crucis perpessus est. . . . Per ipsum ': ergo, sumine l'ater, exposcimus, ut hanc tuai placationis hostiam, quam Tibi offerimus, e manibus nostris placatus accipias, eamque de caelis a sede placato vultu respiciens benedicas," &c. (Miss. Moz. Leslie, 15). From the Gothico-Gallicion Missal we may select this: "Memores gloriastssimi Domini passionis et ab inferis resurvectioais, oflerimus tibi, Domide, hanc immacalatam hostiam, rationalem hostiam, incruentam instiam, hunc panem sanctum et calicen salutarem, obsecrantes ut infundere digneris Spiritum tuum sanctum edeutibus nobis, vitam aeternam requiemque perpetuam conlaturs potautibus" (Lit. (iall. Mabill. 298). This collect is of great interest, as down to the word "calicem" inclusive it ngrees with a quotation by PseudoAmbrose (de Sicrumentis, iv. 6), who was prebably a Gallican Hishop, Ambrose of Cahors. of the age of Charlemagne (Oudin, de Script. Eccl. i. 1897). As the Gallican books were at that time being suppressed in farour of the Roman, we probably have in this prayer a part of the Romall capon sbove cited varied with a view to conform it to a familiar Gallican formulary. This is made more probable by the fact that the prayer in Pseudo-Ambrose continues to resemble the Roman canon from the point indicated, while it becomes wholly unlike the Gallican Poit Mfysterium. There is no express prayer of oblation in the old cason of Milan, which after the words of institution proceeds thus: "Haec facimus, haec celebramus, tua, Domine, praecepta servantes, et ad cominunionem inviolabilem hoc jusum, quod corpus Domini, sumimus, mortem Dominicam nuntiamus. Tuum vero est, Omnipotens Pater, mittere nunc nobis unigenitum Filium tunn, quem isquaerentibus sponte misisti" (Murat. Lit. Lat. Vet. Dissert. i. 133).

OBLATIONS (oblationes, munera, donu, $\delta \hat{\omega} \rho a, \phi \rho \sigma \sigma \phi о \rho a l)$. The presentation of offerings of various kinds and under several names is recognised by the enrliest Christian writers as one of the proper functions of bishops and priests. Thus, Clement of Rome, "It will be no smald sin in us, if we cast out of the overseership (exiakonरीs) those who have offered the gifts blamelessly and hoily" (Epist. ad Cor. 44). This passage may be illustrated from the socalled Apostolical Constitutions (viii, 5 ; see Bunsen, Auulecta Aute-Nicaena, ii, 379). Iaymen were also anid to offer. Here we need outy quote remark of Hilary the Deacon, who wrote about 360: "Qunmris enim proprio sacerdos fungatur officio, ille tamen offerre divitur cujus nowine sgit sacerdos. Ipsi enim imputatur cujus muners ofieruntur" (Quaest. ex Vet. Test. 46 ; in App. 3 ad Upp. S. Aug. ed. Ben.). Hence, fro. quently in the Roman aceretae, or prayers super oblata, such expressions as these, "Muners populi Tui" (Vig. S. Joh. Bapt.); "Oblationes famalorum fumularamque 'luarum" (Dom. 7 post Pent.) ; "Oblationes popili Tui" (S. Jac. Ap. Nat.), \&ic.

The present article treats of the gifts or oblations above mentioned, and of the rules and usages that prevailed with regard to them. On the anthem sung during the reception of the altar oblations, aee Offentoricm.
I. Oblutions of Bread and Wine.-A part of the oblation of the peopla from the first were bread and wine. Thus St. Irenaeas, 167, tells as that, as God " gave to the people (of the Jews) a precept that they should make oblations, dog. He now will that we also should ofter on the altar often, without ceasing " (Huer. iv. 18, §6). The 3 rd apostolical esnon forbids bishops or priests to "ofter on the altar" (with soms exceptions named) "snything beyond what was appointed by the Lord to be otfered at the sacrifice." The council of Carthage, 397, renewing this prohibition, sdls, in explanation, "that, is, bread and wine mixed with water" (can. 24; in Coul. Afric. 37). In the Acta of Theodotus, the mnrtyr of Aocyra, 303, we read that the governor of Galatis ordered all bread and wine to be polluted by contact with things offered to idols, "so that not even to Gud, the Lord of all, could a pure oblation be presented " (Bolland, May 18, p. 152 ; Ruinart, Acta Sinc, Mart. vii. 298). Martin of Bracara, 569, in his collection from the Greek canons, inserts a prenilition like that of Carthage, but makes no exception: "It is not lawful for anything to be oflered in the sanctuary but breal and wine and water ${ }^{n}$ (55; Conc. Hard. iii. 397). The council of Macon, 585, finding the sncient rite reglected, "decreed that on every Lord's day an oblation of the altar should be ottered by all, men and women, both of bread and wine" (can. 4 ; comp. Paeudo-Fabian, Hard. Conc. i. 1797). The council of Nanter, assigned by I'sgi to the year 660, speaks of the "oblations which are oftered by the people" for the sacrament, and "of the loaves which the faithful offer at the church," and directs their use (can. ix.). According to the Ordo Romnnus, "the people give their offerings, thst is, bread and wine " (Ord. ii. 6 ; Mhs, Ital. ii. 46). So a rubrio in the Gregorian Sacramentary printed by Pamelius : "After that the otfertory is sung, and the oblations and wine are otiered by the people" (Lituryicon, ii. 178). After the 8th century, at least, bishops inquired st their visitation, "if men and women offered an oblation, that is, bread and wine, at masses: and if the men did not, whether their wires did it for them, for themselves, and all belonging to them, as it is contained in the canon" (Regino, le Discipl. Éccl. ii. v, 89 ; see Conc. Matise, A.d. 585, can. 4). Amalarius of Metz, 847: "The people make their oblations, i.e. bread and wine, aiter the order of Melchizedec " (Do Ecol Uff, iii. 19).
II. Sir...ar CSlations offered for the Dead.-(I) These ware $f$. altive, but the motive chsiged after the 3 rd century. At first the encharist was celebrated at the funeral, or at some other time after the death of a person in full commanion as an act of thanksgiving for his victory. Oblaxions were brought to these celebrations by the friends of the deceased; but we do not find that any thought of benefit to him from these offerings was then entertained. See for information connected with the subject of this aection, Onsequtes, §§ xxix.-xxxv.

(3) The very nature that many might be co oblation. Yet we are t this (Walafr. Strabo, de lar error seems to bay the East ; for a canon of tinople declares that "h one oblation for three per Graec. Cotel. iii. 446).

We must distinguish between these oblations, a part of which served to the celebration of the sserament, and those which were designed for the feast of tho commemoration. It is to the latter that St. Augustine relers, when he saya, "Oblationes pro spiritibus dormientium. quas vere aliquid adjuvare credendum est, super ipsaa mentorias nin sint sumtuosae," &e. (E'pist. 22 ad Aurel. 6). These were of the nature of alms, beang given to the poor on behalf of the deceased. See Ons quies, § xxvi.
(2) Among the prayera of oblation to be said privately at the offertory in the eollection of eucharistic prayers known as the Missa Illyrici are three to be said "pro defunctis," and one both for living and dead. They begin thus, "Suscipe, Sancta Trinitas, hanc oblationem quam tibi offero pro anima," &e. (Martene, de Ant. Evol. Rit. i. iv. 12, ord. 4). The MS. is not older than the 10 th century, but the prayers may be earlier. None of them have been adopted for open use in the Miasae Defunctoram of the church of Rome. The same prayer occurs in the Codex Ratoldi (who died 986), belore the Super oblata (Ménard, in Sucram. Greg. Opp. Greg. Bea. iii. 486).
There was evidently at a somewhat early period a temptation to defraud the dead of their oblations. The council of Carthage, 398, im. plies that the surviving friends wera sometimes guilty of this: "Let them who either refuse to the churehes the oblations of the departed or give them with difficulty be excomniunicated, as persons who starve the needy" (can. 95), The th canon of Vaison, 442, dwells on this crime at some length, and oruers the offenders to be "enst out of the cnurch as un) lievers." The 47 th of the council of Arles, $$ 52$, edopts by namie the decree of Vaison. See to the sanne effeet Conc. Matiseon. 581, cnn. 4. It is probatle that many of those whe withheld the usual offeringa were influeaced by the teaching of Aërius, who rejected all prayer and offerings for the departed (Epiphan. adv. Haer. Ixxy. 3).
(3) The very nature of the sacrament implies that maay might be commemorated under one oblation. Yet we are told of some who doubted this (Walafr. Strabo, de Reb. Ecol. 22). A similar error seems to have required correction in the Eist ; for a canon of Nicephorus of Constantinople dechures that "he does not sin who offers one oblation for three persona " (can. 11 ; Monum. Giraec. Cotel. iii. 446).
III. From whom and for whom received,-(1) Epiphsnius, 368, tella us generally that the church "receives oblntions from those who commit no injustice, and are not transgressors of the law, but live in righteonsness " ( $D_{e} F i d e, 24$ ). The bishop was to decide on the fitness of an offerer. Constit. Apost. ip. 6: "It behoves the bishop to know whose oblations he ought to recive and whear not." Disinualifications for baptism would also be diaqualificatlona for offering. Among these were the proteasions of the nctor, charioteer, glaliator, racer, fencing master, olympie, piper, harper, lyrist, dancer, astrologer, &c. (Cinst. Ap. viii. 32; Coptic, vi. 78; Tatt:um. 167).

The oblations of all mon-communicants were rejected. "Bishops ought not to receive gifta from him who does not communicate" (Cuno, Illib. 313, can. 28). In fact, with one exception, tbey were not present when the ollerings were made (Conc. Valint. 324, can. 1). The cousistentes [Penitence] formed the one exception, They were present, but could not offer.

Persons not in charity were forbidden to offer as well as to receive. See Optatus (De Schisin. Donat. vi. 1); the couucil of Carthage, 398 (can. 93); the councit of Tolelo, 675 (can. 4 ; 715 (Capit. Reg. Fr. vii. 242); Gregory 11. A.D. 715 (Capitulare, 11).
By the 94th canon of Carthage, 398, the priests are to reject the oblations of those who oppress the poor. It was for an net of tyraany that the offering of Valens at Caesarea, 393, was not received by St. Basil (Greg. Naz. Orat. 43 and 52).
(2) With regard to the oblations of the dend, the general principle is thus stated by Leo, A.D. 440: "Horum eansa Dei judicio reservanda est. . . Nos autem quibas riventibus non communicavimus, mortuia communicare non possumus" (Epist. ii. ad Rust. 8; comp. Ep. 1xxxiii. ad Theod. 3). St. Cyprian ordered that "no oblations should be made for the falliag asleep" of oue who had, in contravention of the canons, made a presbyter his executor, and he says that this was ia accordnace with the practire of his predecessors (Epist. i. ad Furnit.). See Oissequies, § xl .
IV. The Sucramental Bread and Wine taken out of these Ublations.-St. Cyprian, reproving a rich woman who brought no offeriag herself, says that she "took part of the sacrifice which a paor person offered" (De Opere et Eleemos.) St. Augustine: "The priest receives from thee that which he may offier for thee" (Enur. in Psalmos, 129, § 7). St. Caesarius, 506: "Offer oblations to be consecrated on the altar. A man able to afford it ought to blush, if he has communicnted flom the oblation of another " (Serm. 66, § 2). In John the Deacon's Life of Gregory the Great is the story of a woman who was corrected by a miracle for smiliag in disbelief, when she heard the oblation, which she reeognised as made by herself, called "the body of the Lord " (ii. 41). In the Ordo Romanus of the 9th century, the archdeacon takes from the whole mass of oblationa, "et ponit tantas (oblataa) super altare quantae possint populo suthicere" (Ord. iii. § 13; Mus. Ital. ii. 57). And somewhat later: "Accipiat (diaconus) ex ipsis oblatis quantum ei videtur; et ponat desupar altare" (v. 8; ibid. 67). Compare Psendo-Clement, Ep. oul Jacub. in Hard. Conc. 1 . 50. Hinemar of Rheims, 852, provides for the use of those "oblates which are offered by the people, and are more than are required for the cousecration" (Capit. i. c. 7).
V. In what Vessels offered and reetitect,-In the West the bread was presented by the offerer in a fanon of white linen, and received in a vessel or cloth called offertorium (see Fanon (3), vol. i. p. 661, and Ofretimbiuat, (2) (3)). The wine was brought in amulne [ 1 MA, vol. $\mathrm{i}_{4}$.

OBLATIONS

p. 71], and poured into a "calix major" [Cualice, ib. p. 340]; whence, if the offerings were large, it was transferred, if necessary, to a Scypilus.
VI. Where these Oblations vere received.-It is prebable that at first all who offered brend and wiee, and perhaps cblations of varieus other kinds, drew near te the altar and there presented their gifts to the deacons. Thus, in the East, Dionysius of Alexandria, A.D. 254, speaks of a layman "going to" and "standing at the table" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 9). The same writer implies that, except at certain times, even women "went up to the holy table" (fpist. ad Basil. 2). In the 4th century, however, we find a different rule. The council of Laodicea, probably is 365 (can. 19), after settling the time at which the laity shall "give the pence, and so the oblation be celebrated," ndds, "And it is lnwful for those in holy orders alone to enter the altar-place" ( $\theta$ voia ${ }^{-}$thpon; see Voigtius, de Altaribus, ii. 28). Another canon (44) of the same council forbids women to enter it. The council in Tralle, 691: "Let it not be permitted to any one whomseever among the laity to ge iate the sacred altar-place" (can. 69). There was an exception, however, "in accordaace with a very old tradition," in fiveur of the emperor, "when he should desire to effer gifts to the Creator" (itid.). Evidence of the alleged tradition occurs in the story of Theodesius, 340, who at Coustantinople not only "brought his gifts to the holy table," but was expected to remain withia the inclosure (Theoderet, Hist. Eccl. v. 18). Theedosius the Younger, in 431, says of himself: "We draw near to the most holy altar for thr: oblation of the gifts oaly" (Edict. Labb. Cuic. iii. 1237). Turaing to the West, we find Theodosius at Milan, 390 , "when the time summoned to offer the gifts for the holy tahle, rising up and geing on to the sacrarium" ( $\tau \hat{\omega \nu}$ дцакт $\dot{\rho} \omega \nu$; Theoderet, u. s.). In France, in the 6th ceatury, the laity communicated in the chancel, and therefore, we infer, oftered there. Thus the council of Tours, $565^{5}$ : "Let the hely of holies be open to laymen and women, that they may pray there and commuaicate, as the custom is " (can. 4). Theodult of Orleans, 797, says: "Let net wemen on any acceunt draw near to the altar when the priest is celebrating mass, but stand in their places, and let the priest receive their oblations there to offer them to God " (Capitis ud Presbyt. 6). Laymen are only cautioned lest they provoke the fate of Uzzah (ibid.). In the fifth book of the Capitularies of the French Kings (collected about 845) is a law, not traced to any earlier source, which orders that " notice shall be given to the people that they offer oblations to Ged every Lord's day, and that the said oblations will be received ontside of the inclosure of the altar" (c. 371). Similarly, Herard of Tours, 858, cap. 72 . At Rome, 730 , at a pentifical mass, we find the oblntions of the nobles received in the senatorium ("quod est locus principum"; Ord. Rom. iii. 12), those of the rest of the people in the body of the church, the receivers going firt to the men's side and then to the women's (Ord. Rom. i. 13 ; comp. ii. 9 ; iii. 12 ; จ. 8). The priests and dencons offered last, and "before the altar" (ii. 9). "They alone," says Amalarins, "appronch the altar whose ministry is nbeut the altar" (Ecloga, 18), Somewhat later the laity seem to have gine all to one place to present their offerings; for the revised Urdo says: "Let him (the bishup) be led by a presbyter and the archileacen to the place where the oblations are offered by the fuithful laity, whether men or women " (1/rd. v. 9).
VII. Prayer of the Offerer.-It is to be suppesed that a devout wershipper would alwaya say a silent prayer when presenting his gift. In the collection known as the Missa llyyicl some short forms are suggested for use at this time (Marteae, Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. 12, ord, ir.).
VIII. By whom received from the Offerers, $\rightarrow$ In geacral the oblations were takeo, net by the celebrant, but by a deacen or suh-deacon, if present. None of the ministers of Basil, we are teld, came ferward to receive the oblations of Valens, because they did net know his mind about them (Greg. Naz. Orat. 43, § 5:); from which it is clear that it was at that time no part of the bishep's duty to take them even from the haad of the emperor. Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610: "The sub-dencons receive the oblations trom the faithful in the temple of Ged" (Etymol. vii. xii. 23 ; De Eccl. Off, ii. 10 ; Amalar. de Eecl. Uff. ii. 11 ; Ratan. Ilnar. de Instit. Cler. i. 8 ; Conc. Aquis, jr. A.n. 816, i. 6). In an "Allecutie nd Subdiaconum Ordiandum," in the missal of the Franks, it appears to be implied that the sub-deacon not oaly received the oblations, but separated at his discretion as much as would be required for the commanicants (Liturg. Gu/l. Mabili. 803). Pseude-Clement, in the 8 th or 9 tin century, speaks of the " minister of the altne", i,c. in strictness, the deacon, as "taking the oblation of the holecaust from the oflerers" (Epist. ad Jacob. Ilard. Conc. i. 50). In a pontifical mass at Rome in the 8th century the oblations of brend etfered by the nubles were received by the bishop himself, the archdeacon following to receive the Andiab. The regionary sub-deacon teok the leaves from the pontiff and gave them to another suedeacon, by whom they were placed in a larger shect of linen ("cerperale, id est sindenem," Ord. Rom. i. 9 ; "lineum pnllium," v. 8) held by twe neolytes. The amulae were emptied by the archdeacon intn a flagen (scyphus) carried by un neolyte. The other offerings of brend were reccivel by the bishop whose weekly turn it was, who himself pat them into the sindon borne after him, A deacon takes the amulae, and pours their contents into a scyphus (Ord. Rom. \&. \& 131 comp. ii. 9 ; iii. 12; v. 8). But $R_{f}$ glus of Auxerre, A.D. 880, represeots the prist as taking the oblations, though he supposes a deacon present: "Suscipit interim (while the offertory is being sung) sacerios a populo oblata" (De Celebr. Mis., nd calc. I'sendo-Alcuin. do Div. Off.). So Ahyto of Bale, 81\}, directs that, "when the oblates are offered by the women, they be received by the presbyters at the chancel screen, and ao brought to the altar" (Capitula 16).
IX. By whom set on the Altar.-In the West this was the offico of tho dencon. Thus ladure says that it belongs to the Levites "ebiationes inferre et disponere" (Epist. at Loul.fr. 8; comp. Etymol. vii. xii. 23 ; Conc. Aguistr. 818 , i. 7) ; i.e. ${ }^{4}$ inferunt oblatlones in altaria, componant mensnm Domini" (De Eecl. Off. 1i. 8) It was thought that the propriety of this usage was indicated by the fact that the first deacons were chosen to "serve tables" (De Eccl. Off. iii. 19). Rabnaus zays: "Levitae offerunt oblationes in altaria" (De Instit. Cler, i. 7 ; comp. with lsid, above). At Rome, in a fiontifical mass in the 8th century, the archdeacon, receiving the oblates from the sub-deacons, set them on the altar Then he takes the bishop's nmula, and pours the contents through a strainer into a chalice, and similarly those of the deacons. The sub-deacon receives the water offered by the choir from the precentor, and "pours it crosswise into the chalice." Next, the bishop, going to the altar, takes the oblates from tho presbyter of the week and the deacons. The archdeacon then takes the bishop's oblates from the oblationary (subodeacon), and gives them to the bishop, who sets these on the aitar himself. The archdeacon then takes the chalice from the regionary subdeacon, and, putting the Offertorivas through the haudles, sets it on the altar near the bishop's oblates on the right (Ord. Rom. i. 14, 15 ; comp. ii. 9 ; iii. 14 ; 15 ; v. 8 ; vi. 9 ).

In the liast this appears to have been generally the part of the celebrant. The Apostolical eanoas imply as mich when they forbid bishops and presbyters to bring and aet $n$ the altar bread, wine, &c. (ean. 3). The Clementine liturgy says: "Let the deacons bring the gifts to the bishop at the altar" (Constit. A A ost, viii. 12). The liturgy of St. James: "The priest bringiag in the holy gifts aays this prayer" (of eblativa, Assem. Cudex Liturg. v. 17). In the Syriaa elfices the celebrant "brings the eueharittic bread on to the altar" (Liturg. Orient. Coll. Reuaud. ii. 3), and the same usage prevails among the Copts und Abyssinians (ibid. i. 185-188). The Nestorina rites vary (Bndger's Nestoriuns, ii. 218 ; Neale, Introd. Hist. East. Ch. 436). In the later Greek liturgy, at the "great entrance" the deacen bringa in the patea, the prient the chalice; but the latter sets both on the holy table (L'cholog. Goar, 73).
X, By whom presented to God.-Deacons, aa we hare aeen, might set the oblations on the altar, but oaly a bishop or priest could offer them to God. "Deacons have no nuthority to offer" (Conc. Nic. 325, can. I8). The principle was that "exordium mindsterii a summo est sacerdote" (Pseudo-Ambr. de Sucram. iif. i. § 4); and as the power of the priest himselt was and as the power of the priest himselt was the bishop," says Ignatius the martyr, "it is not lawful to baptize or to celebrate un agnpe," whleh incladed the eucharist ( $A d$ Sinyrn. 7 ), where the interpolator has, "or to offer, or to bring sacrifice, or to celebrate a feast." Hence bring sacrifice, or to celebrate a feast." Hence priests were forbidden to "celebrate inasses" in ady diocese without the banction of the bishops (Conc. Vernense, 755 , can. 8). The bishop was the offerer by himself of by the priest, and the offerer by himself of by the priest, and a good bishop was one who "affered the gifts blamelessly and holily" (Clem. Rom. Epist. L. 44).
XI. How offered by the Celebrant. Prayers of Obsation.-At first "the whole of that action Was recomplislied in silence" (Boua, Rier. Liturg. ii. viii. §2; Murteue, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. 1.
iv. vi. I6; nad others). It must not be inferred, however, that the primitive church did not $1 \mathrm{e}-$ gard the action of the celebrout with respeet to the unconsecrated gifts as a distiact offering of them to God. It only means that such an oblation was not verbally made when they were set on the altar, though implied in the long encharistie prayer which immediately followed. St. Ireareus expressly says that Christ, in instituting the sacrament, "taught the new oblation of the New Testament, which the chureh throughout the world offers to God who gives us aliments-the first-fruits of His gifts in the New Teatament" (c. Ilaer. iv. 17, §5). "This pure oblation the church alone offers to the Creater, offering it to Him of His own creature with thanksgiving " (ibid. 18, § 4). Hence it is evident that he who said the eucharistic prayer was believed to ofler the elementa to God. Such au oblation is assumed, though not expresced, in the long preface (the original cuxapiorla) of the Clementine Liturgy. All other liturgies have a distinct prayer of oblation introdueel, as we must suppose, at aome later period. It is always said by the celebrant. and was probably at first only a clearer expression of an oblation of tie good creatures of God then lying before him. This is evidently the meaning of the earlier and simpler forms; but the later, as will be seen introduce thoughts which must nppear entirely out of place. We will begin with those which are true to their original intention. In St Mark, after the cry of the deacon, "Pray for the offerers," "the priest aays the prayer of proposi tion," in which is the following petition, "Cause Thy face to shine upon this bread and on these cups which the all-holy table receives through the ministry of angels and attendance of arehangels and service of the priesthood " (Renaurd i. 143). This is only a prayer for the acceptance of the gifta expressed in a lofty style, nor cnn we see more than this in St. James: "Thy self bless this offering " ( $\pi \rho \delta \theta \in \sigma i \nu$; comp. Heb. ix. 2; Matt. xii. 4), "and receive it on to Thine altar above the heavens" (Assem, u. s.). In St. Basil's "prayer of oblation" (єù ${ }^{\text {. }}$ $\pi \rho o \sigma \kappa о \mu \delta \bar{\eta} s)$ the celebrant prays chiefly for himself that he may rightly fultil his otfice, but also for the aceeptauce of the offerings, "Of Thy gonduess, 0 Lord, receive these gifta from the hands of us sinners " (Goar, 164). In St. Chrysostom, however, which has long been the commen liturgy of the Greeks, the prayer would be more suitalile after the consecration, for it is an invocation [Epiclessis], "that this our saerifice may be acceptable uato Thee, and that the good spirit of Thy grace nary make His abode on us, and on these gifts, and on all Thy people" (Gour, 74).

In all the Easiern liturgies of later revision there is the same tendency that we observe in St. Chrysostom, to naticipate the consecrution, or to confound the previous oblation of the elemeuts with that of the sacramental body and blood. Thus in the Armenlan: "Do Thou to Whom we bring this sacrifice accept this offering trom us and make it the mystery of the horly and blood of Thine only b' $\therefore$ ten Son, and grunt unto us who are partaners of them that thls bread and wine may be for the healing and pardoaing of our ains "(Neale, $u$. s. 444).
In the West there was no unv oblation of the elements until after the 12 th century (Microl. A.D. 1160, De Eccl. Observ. 11). Five have become of obligation since, viz. (1), "Suscipe, Sancte Pater, omnipotens neterne Deus, hanc immaculatam hostiam," &c. ; (2), "Offerimus Tihi," &c.: (3), "In spiritu humilitatis," scc. (whleh appear to be borrowed from Spnin ; Misy. Mozur. Leslie, 2, $2: 32$; see below) ; (4), "Veni Sanctifieator," &c. (which is Gailitan ; Microl. u. s. 11 ; see below) ; and (5), "Suscipe, Sanctn Trinitas," &c., which is both Ambrosian (Pamel. Kitucle 1'P. i. 298) and Gallican (Microl. $u$. s.; see below). Long, however, betore any of these prayers are known to have beeu even in private use, there was u varinble collect in the sacramentaries, called in the Gelasian the secreta ("because it is said secretly "; Amal. cle Off. Eecl. iii. 20) ; and in the Gregorian either secreta or oratio super oblata, in which the oblations were directly or indirectly offered. The following is an example trom the so-called Leonian ancramentary: "We beseech Thee, 0 Lord, that the gifts of Thy people may be acceptable to Thee through the intercessions of the blessed apostles (SS. Peter and Paul); that as they are offered to Thy Name for their triumphs, so they may be pertected by their merits ; through," &e. (Nurat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 330).

During the whole office of oblation an anthem of three verses was sung; the first of which, calle. the OfFertory, was repeated bet ween the gecood and the third until the offerings were all brought up, and the celebrant said "Orate" (Urd. Rom. ii. 9). "Ia offereadis revertuntur versus, dum ollerenda repetitur" (Remig. Autiss, in Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. 40). See examples in Antiphonarium Giregor. (Opp. iii. 653 et sey., ed. Ben.)

In the Milanese rite the celebrant says in a loul voice, "Receive, most merciful Father, this holy bread, thia cup, wine mixed with water, that it may become the body, the blood, of Thine only begotten," \&c. (Pamel. u. s. 297). This ia followed by later prayers said secretly, and by a variable "Oratio super Oblata alta voce dicenda" (see Missa VIII. (2) (c)), which corresponds, though said aloud, to the Roman secreta. In the Galliwan liturgies, suppressed in the 8th centory, there is no constant form of ublation; there was, however, a Collectio post Nomina corresponding to the secreta of Rome. See examples in Dlissa VIII. (3) (e). The Mozarabic priest saya four distinct pragers of oblatiou: (1) over the bread and cup, "May this oblation.. witich we offer for our ains, be acceptable to 'iliy' Majesty," \&c. (2) orer the cup oniy, "We oller unto Thee, 0 Lord, this cup for the benediction of the blood of Thy Son," \&c. ; (3) setting the cup on the altar and placing the reil (filiolam) over it, he says, "We beseech Thee, O Lord, graciously to accept this oblation, and to pardon the sins of all the offerers for whom it is offered unto Thee, through," \&c.; (4) "In spiritu humilitatia," \&c. (Lesilie, th. s.), of which "Voni . . . Sanct ${ }^{\text {- }}$ ficator" (above) is in this liturgy a continuntion The souriftuium (the Mozarabio offertory) is theo sung; some priyers of preptrition fillow, and the celebrast having anid, "Otferunt Deo Domino sacerdotes nostri, Papa Rumensis et reliqul, pro se," \&c., and res] the unmes of those commemorated, this part of the liturgy closes with the Oratlo post Nomina (see Missa viil (4) (d)).

We observe in many of these Latin prayers of oblation the aame dejarture from their origiana intention that was noticed in several of the Eastern forms. Thus in the Roman Missal we hare, "Receive this immaculate host" which I otier .... for my numberless sins," &c. SimiMozarabic Post Nomiua (Lesie, 39) tompted explinations see Bona, lier. Vit. it. ix. 3 ; Le Brun, Explic. de la Messe. iii. vi. 2; Romsée, Sens. Rit. Miss. xiv. 5 ; and others. They smount to this: "Qu'en commen aut à offrir le pain nons jarlons déja comme si nous ofírions cette hostie sans tache qui est l'unique, dont l'offrande puisse nous laver de nos péchés" (Le Br.). Many Roman secretse contain a similar assumption (Sacr. Greg. ii. 46). Similar incongruities occur in Gallican collecta Post Noraina (Miss, Goth. 191).

It may be coajectured that the foregoing anomalites first made cheir appearance when an attempt was made in an age of decaying learning and intelligence to aimplify, by breaking up and rearranging, the prolouged eucharistia, which originally embraced both the oblation of the gifts when brought to the celebrant, and all that belonged to, and was connected with, the subsequent consecration.
XII. The Reinainder of the Consecruted Oblm tions.-No uniform mode of disposing of then prevailed during any part of our period either in the East or West. For a considerable time a part was sent to the absent, and a part taken away by the communicants for daily use at home. [Reservation.] A part was also in some places, from the 6th to the 8th century iaclusive, seat to other churches, as Fermextcic. We have to speak here of the part that still remaiued when due provision had been made for these purposes. Evagrius, near the end of the 6th century, tells us that "it was an ancient custom in the royal city (Constantinople), whenever a large quantity of the holy particles of the undefiled body of Christ, our God, was left over, for uncerrupted boys of those that attended the school of the underinaster to be seat for to consume them" (Eccl. Hist. iv. 35), From the testimeny of Nicephorus Callistus, who had himself, when a boy at that school, communicated in this manner, we larn that the custom survived till the earlier part of the 14 th century, if not later (Hist. Eecles. xvii. 25). At Jerusalem, however, as we know trom the authority of Hesychius the patriarch, 601, "winatever happeaed to be left unconsumed was given to the fire," as were the remains of the sacritices mentioned in Exod. xii. 10 (Explan. in Levit. (viii. 32) ii.). In the West the couacil of Mâcon, 585 , decreed that "whatever renains of the aacrifices shall be left in the sacrarium after the mass is ouded, inoocent children be brought to the church by him whose ollice it is on the Weduesday or Friday, aad, a (subsequent) fast haviag been prescribed them [Fasting, § 8], receive the snid remnias sprinkled with wine"

The following order occars ta one of the forged decretuls about 830 , but probably derived from na earlier document : "But if any shsill renunin, let then not be reserved till the morrow, but consumed by the enre of the clerks, with fenr and trembling. But let not those whe consume the remains of the Lord's body that have been left in the sacrarium come together immedintely to take common food," \&c. (Eppist. Clem. ad Jac. ; Hard. Conc. i. 50 ; see the same as Praecepta $P_{\text {etri }}$ in S. Leoo. Opera, ed. Bsller. iii. 674). That this latter usage was widely spread in the West we may infier from the eppearance of the above pasange from PseadoClemens in Regino (de Ecch. Discipl. i, 195; Burchard, Decr. v. 11; and Gratian, Deor. iii. De Cinsecr. 1i. 23).
XIII. Dispusal of the Unconsecrated Surplus.The Apostolical Constiturions (both texts): "The enlogine that are over and above in the mystic nitee let the dencons distribute nmong the clergy, according to the discretion of the bishop or the presbyters - to the bishop, four parts ; to n presbyter, three parts; to a deacon, two parts; and to the rest, subdeacons, or readers, or singers, er deaconesses, one part " (viii. 31 ; in the Coptic Canons of the Apostles, tr. Thttam, c. 75). They are here called eulogiae, because blessed through being offered. Theophilus of Alexandria, A.D. 385 : "Let the clerks divide those things which are offered on account of the sacrifice (that remain) atter those consumied for the use of the mysteries, and let not a catechumen eat or drink thereof, but rather the clerks and the fsithinl brethren with them" (caa. 7; Hard. ( ame. i. 2000). These ublations are spoken of adder the name of eulogiae by Socrates, who syss that Chrysanthus, the Novatisn bishop nt Constsatiouple, "reecived nothing from the churches, only taking two lonves of the eulogiae en the Lord's day" (Eccl. Hist. vii. 2). John Moschus, A.D. 630 , relates the story of a monk who, beiag employed to distribate eulogine, "which the deacons had set on the holy niltar," hisppeese to say over thens the words of coasecrstion, and thas, as it was afterwards revealed, nointentioaally consecruted them (Prat. Spirit. 25).

We have less distinct information of the disposal of the superfluous oblatione at an early period in the West. The earlier driffts of the Ordo Romanus tell ns nothing; but from Ordo vi. (Msbill.) we leara that, after all the oblations of the clergy and people had beea placell on the altar, fresh losves were brought to the urchdeacon, frem which the bisthop took what he thought proper for coasecrntion, and then gave all the rest back to the archdencon, "who gave them in charge to the custos of the cluureh for safe keeping" (§ 9). This belongs to a period at which fewer communiented thna during the 7th century. We nre not told how these remsina were anployed, but it is probable thnt in the West the superfluous oblations of a festival arrvel for the eclehrations of other days; for we are toll in the Life of St. Augustine, by Fossidius, that he would sometines in church dimmnish the falthful for "thetir regtect of the gazophylscium and secretarium, from which the things needful for the allar are brought $\ln$ " (24). Accorling to St. Anibrose, the custos was a demon: "Haec quantl consilii sutt prooppicera, non ignoratls. Et ideo eligitur Lerita qui sacrarium custodiat" (De Off. Min. i. 50, § 265) Gifts for the altar were put into the sachariua or secretarium ; those for the poor, the clergy, or the church, into the gazopiylacium.

As the excess of bread and wine offered for the sacrament gradually decreased, so it ceased to form part of the ordinary provision for the elergy, and was distributed only as a token of communion, or blessed for the nntilorod. [EULogiae.] This last application is expressly ordered by the council of Nantes, perhaps in 657 (can. 9; Hard. vi. 459), and after it by Hinemar, 852 (Ad Presbyt. 7).
XIV. Other Altar Oblations.-The third apostolical canon, as we have it, after forbidding nnything but what Christ appointed $t_{1}$ be offered on the altar (aaming Honey and Malk [see vol. i. p. 783; Tertull. de Cor. Jtil. 3 ; Id. adv. Murr. I. 14 ; Clem. Alex. Paed Ig. i. vi. 50 , 51 ; Hieron. adv. Lucif. 8 ; Joan. Diac. Epist. ad Senar. (12) in Mus. Thul, i. 75 ; Storain. Leon. in Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. 1. 3t8; Ratoldi Pontif. in Hienard, Sacram. Greg. a. 338; Ordo Romanus in Hittorp. 87; Apost. Const. Copt. ii, 46, Tattam's tr. 62; or Buetticher's in Bunsen's Analecta Antenicaena, ii. 468; Orclo Bapt. Aethiop. in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. i. xv. 16], "sicera, birds, or any living thing*, or legumes"), ndds, "except new grains or grapes in their season" [Fruits, Offering of]. The secoad book of the Coptic Canons of the Apostlev, the Coptic form of the Constitutions, permits "the blessing of the grape, the fig, the poniegranate, the olive, the prone, the spple, the peach, the cherry, and the almond." Again: "It shall be that they shall offer flowers: let them offer a rose and the lily" (c. 54 ; Tattam's tr. p. 74 ; or Boetticher's, u. s, 471). The Greek canon proceeds: "But let it not be permitted to offer anytbing else upon the altar, in the time of the holy oblation, thnn oil for the lamp [Ont ] and inccase" (Bereridge, Works, xi. xxxiz Oxf. 1848). [Incense, Vol. 1. pp. 830, 881.] Oil for another purpose-viz. for the urction nfter baptism-was offered at the altar in Africa before the probable date of the above canon. Thus St. Cyprian, 2i5, speaks of chrism as "the oil hallowed on the altsr" (Epist. 70). Mueh later, in Pseudo-Dionysins, the bishop "takes the $\mu$ ípov, and sets it on the holy nltar" (De Eecl. Hier. iv. 2). According to the Urio Romanits, however, this oil was brought "ante altare", and there consecrated (Orl. i. 31 ; app. 7).
XV. Deeds of Gift, sic. laid on the Altar, or held before or over it.-By a law of the Frank king Dagobert, A.D. 630, all free persons who gave aught "to the charch for the rasoon of their soul," "vills, lands, serfs, or any money," were to confirm the gift hy an "epistle" under their own hand before six or more witnesses, who were to asibscrihe the deed. "And then let him place the said epiatle on tbe nitar, nad so delicer the money itself in the presence of the prlest who serves there" (Capit. Reg. Franc. Baluze, i. 95). Sim. Lirx Alamannorthn, zod. ann, (hid. 37). In 803 Charlemagne received a petition trom his states, in which they asked for greater security for gifts made to the church, on the ground that the looor " makes a writing of those things which he desires to give to God, and holds the writing itself in hls hnad before or over (coran altari sut supra) the altar, saying to tiee priests nud guardians of the plnce, 'I ofter and dedicate to God all the thinge which are set down in this paper, for the remission of my , sins, and of the sins of my parents and children, (or fur whstever he shall toish to mathe them over to God for), for the service of God out of these things in sacrifices, and celebrations of masses, in prayers, lights, the maintenance of the foor and the clergy, and other forms of service to God, and of usefulness to this church." They were offered unler expressed pain of sacrilege if the church were robbed of them (Cap. Baluz. u. s. i. 407 ; or in the collection of Benedict, vi. 370).

It was probably a vere frequent custom to lay valuable gifts of any dind, of small size, on the altar, npart from the eucharistic service, with or without such udeed as is described above. 'Thus "a devout man" iu the 6tb century "placed on the altar of the church " of St. Nazaire, nesr Nantes, a belt most carefully wrought, of the purest gold, with all its furniture. He gave it "sal reficiendos pauperes," but with prayer for the aid of the martyr in his needs (Greg. Turon. de © for. Mart. 61).
XVI. Otlations not set on the Altar.-"All things thas, are offered to God are without doukt also cunsecrated. And not oaly are the sacrifices which are consecrated to the Lord on the altar called oblations of the faithful; but whstever offerings are offered to Him by the taithful, whether consisting of serfs or arable lands, vineyards, woods, meadows, waters, or watercourses, furniture, books, utensils, stones, buildings, garments, woollen fabrics, cattle, pastures, parchments, movabias and immovables, or whatsoever things are done to the praise of God, or can furnish supply and ornameut to boly church and her priests, hy whomsoever they are of tree will offered to God and His church, these all undoubtedly are consecrnted to God and belong to the right of the priests " (Cupit. ii. Car, Magn. A.D. 814 , c. 12 ; Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 522; in Benedict's collection, vi. 407 ; Cap. Herardi, 65 ; Isaac ling. vii. 7).
(a) Charitable Gifts.-Justin Martyr, in Sumarin, A.r. 140, te'is us that, when the Christians of hls day met on the Sunday for prayer and the holy communion, "those who were prosperous, and wished to do it, gave each ns he determined beforehand what he would, and that the collection was laid up with the presiding (elder), who personally relieved orphans sad widows and those who were in distress from sickness or any other cause, and those in bonds and strangers sojourning among them, and in a word took care of all who were in any necessity " (Apol. i. 67). Tertullian nt Carthage, A.d. 199 : "Though there be a sort of (money) chest, the amount in it is not got together from payment as for a religion that is bought. Every person once i month, or when he will, and only if he will rud be able, places therein a moderate gift; for no one is forced, but gives it of his own accord. These are, as it were, the deposits of piety; for therefrom are dispensed portions, not fur feasts or driating bouta, or thantrless bannts of varacity, but thr feeding nad burying the needy, snd for boys and girls destitute of menns and of parents, nud for the aged confined now to the house, also for the shipwrecked, and for any who become pensioners on their confession, in the mines or the istands, or in prisuns, if only it be for the sake of the way of Goi" (.1pol, 39). Caesarius of Arles, 502, considers it the part of a gnod Christian, "wnen he comes to church," to "offer according to his ability moncy or food for the poor" (Serm. 77, § 2 ; comp. Seru. 7í, § 2). Similarly Pirminius, 750: "Quando nd ecclesinm convenitis, puuperibus secundum vires vestras nut argentum nut alind nliquid poryigite" (Scarapsus in Vetera Analectu, Mabill. 72 ; ed. 2). Isidore of Serille, 595 , says that it was part of the duty of the archdencon to " receive the money collected from the comiuunion " ( $L_{p}$, ad Leudefr. 12).

The fourth apostulicnl canon, referring th the grapes and corn mentioned in the third, says, "But let every other fruit be sent away into the house (or chnmber, olkov, the Gazopily lacium or Domus Ecclesiae, Possid. Vita August. 24), as first-fruits for the bishop and the preshyters, but not hrought to the altar." In the Life of' St. Aurustine (u. s. see abuve $\S$ xiii.) a distinction is made wetween offerings for the gazophylucium and for the secretarium. We learn there also how the former were applied: "He was always mindful of his compraions in poverty, and used to distribute to them from the same ssurce as to himselt nad all his household, viz. from the revences of the church, or even from the oblations of the faithful" (23). A feast for the poor was often the object of an oblation. Thus Paulinus, A.d. 405, relstes (Poema xx. 317) how a pig was reared with this intention. Two other instances are mentioned by this author in the same poem (lines 67, 389).
(b) Offerings were also made for the furniture of the chureh, and of a lamb at Easter. [Layb, Offering of.]
XVII. To whom the Oblations were intrusted.All oblations of' whatever kind were given to the kishop in trust. "That which is collected," says Justin Martyr," is laid up with him who presides" (Apol. 67). Among the carlier of the apostolical enuons are two $(39,41)$ which place the whole property of the church from whatever source derived in the hands of the bishop in trust for the poor and the clergy, himself iacluded. Hence the precept addressed to the bishops in the Constitutions (ii. 25): "Dispease the otlerings to the orphans nnd widows and afflicted and strangers giving their shares to all in want, and yourselves using the things of the Lord, but not devouring them alone; but sharing them with the needy, be ye without offence before God.

It is right for you, 0 bishops, to be nourished from the things brought into the church; but not to devour tbem." This is in the purer text also (Bunsen, Analecta Autenicuena, ii. 256). See further under Property of the Church.

OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD.-The heathen fear of evil, if the body were left unburied or aeglected, wns unknewn to the Christian from the first. "All those things, that is to say, the arrangement of the funeral, the sunte attendance on the burial, the pomp of obsequies, are rather consolatiess of the living than advantages to the dead" (Aug. De Civ. Dei, i. 12; so Serm. 172, §3, and De Cur. pro Mort. ii. §4; cemp. St. Chrysontom, Hon. iv. in Heb. §5; see after, § riii.). But "not on that account are the bodies of the departed to be spurned and flung aside; and least of all those of the righteous and faithful, of which the Sprit has made use as organs snd instrumeats for the periormance of all good works" (De Cir. 13 ; De Cur. iii. § 5). It was inferred frem various references in huly Scripture (Gen. xlvii. $30,1.2,24$; Tob. ii. 9 , xii. 12 ; &c.), sod especially from the narrative of our Lord's burial, that "the bodies of the dead are subjects of the providence of God, to whom even such works ef piety are well pleasing" (De Civ. u. s.). But the future resurrection of the body was the chief ground of present care for it; it could not be right, they thought, deliberately to destroy and dissipate that for which God designed a glorious fatnre. Thus Prudentius, Myinn. in Exoq. Dofunct. 1. 45 : -

> "Hinc maxima cura aepoleris Impenditur ; binc resolintos Honor oltimus accipit artua Et funeris ambitua oroat."

1. The Laying-out of the Body.-The first selemn circumstance whs the formal composure of the whole body: "They put the hands together, close the eyes, put the head straight, draw down the feet (Pseudo-Chrysost. de Job. Hom. i. § 2 ). Dionysius of Alexandria, A..o. 254, says that during she ${ }^{1}+$ ue the Christians of that city "toek up the buivios or the saints (who died of it in their urms and laps, clooid their eres and meuths, carijed thiem on their shoui ters, and laid them out," &re. (Easeb. Hist. Eccl, vi.) 22.) St. Augustine closed his mether's eyes with his own hands (Conjess. ix. 12, §29). PseudoEpijhanius, apostrophising Joseph of Arimathea, asps: "Dost thou then with thy fingers close, as becomen the dead, the eyes of Jesus, who, with His uadefiled finger, opened the eye of the blind? And dost then close the mouth of Him who opreed the mouth of the dumb?" (De Sepulero Dum. inter Opp. Epiph. iv. 17 ; eld. Dinif.).

jucidentally that the body of our Lord was so treated. Tertullian nlludes to it when he says, "1 can be stiffand pale after a bath wheu deal " (Apol. 42). Gregory Nnzinnzen asks those who delay their baptism, If they are" waiting that they may be washed when dcad " (De Bapt. i. 6.18). The ceremonial importance of the action in France in the 6th century is evident from the frequency with which it is mentiened by Gregory of Tours, When we can discover no other rensen for his noticing it (Hist. Franc. ii. 5; iv. 5 ; vii. 1; De Glor. Conf. 75 ; Vitae l'utr. xiv, 4), See ocher examples of men, Hist. Franc. vi. 46; De Glir. Conf. 81 ; l'it te PP. x. 4 (" corpus sacerdos ablutum recondit in tumule"); itid. xiii. 3. Similarly of wemen, "Having, been washed by other women, she was buried" (De Glor. Conf. 16). Miracles are said by Bede to have been wrought by the earth on which the water used in washing the body of St. Cuthbert had been thrown (Vita S. Cuthb.). To come to the end of our period, the body of Cbnriemngne is said to have been washed "more solemui" (Eginhard. in Vitu, e. 9 , § 36 ).
III. Tw Beard, fec, cut.-At one period there Was a custom of shaving the head, at least in rrance. When the body of St. Eloy, who died about 665, was removed from its first restingplace, "his beard and hair, which had been shaved off according to custom at the time of his denth, had grown in the tomb in a wonderful manner ; (Vita, auct. Audeen. ii. 47 ; Dach, Spicil. ii. 116, ed. 1723). A later example occurs in the case of an Angerin bishep, who was buried "barba rasâ" (Gesta Gulielmi Maj. c. 1, in Spicil. Dach.
if. 160 ) ii. 160).
IV. The Body anointed or embalmed.-The next process was to "anoint" the body. This may have been often done with the simple oil, but more frequently, where it could be procured, with a precious unguent, mipov, which might be, as Galen describes it, only medicated cil ( $D_{e}$ Methodo Medendi, xi. i(i); but semetimes we are to understand that the body was embalmed with various antiseptic gums and spices. When the woman in Matt. xxvi. 7 poured ointment on our Lord's head, He accepted it as done in anticipa-a view to propare me for burial" (ver. 12). After His death, Nicodemus (John xix. 39, 40) "brought a mixture of myrrh noil nloes, nbout a hundred pound weight, nad wound the body in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jewa is to bury." Afterwards the women who had followed Him trom Galilee, probubly in ignorance of what had been done, "prepared spices and ointments," ¿рẃ $\mu a \tau a$ каi $\mu \dot{\prime} p a$, for the same purpose (Luke xxiii. 56). This example would probaibly have auggested the custom among Christinns, had they not inherited it from their Jewish and heathen forcfathers.
Tertullian is alluding to this practice wheu he says, "The Sabaeans will know that merchandise of theirs, more in quantity and more costic, is larished on the burial of Christians than on the censing of the gods "(Apol. 48). Again, "1.et them look to it, if tha same ohjects of trade, frankiacense to wit, and other fereign things fol sacrifice to idols, are likewise usefinl to men for medicinal pigments, -to us (Christinns) Also her-0. side for a solace of burial " (De Li/ol. 11; sce ahso De Resurr. Carn. 27). Clemens Alexandrinus,

A.D. 192, explaining a mystlc loterpretation of Matt. xxvi. 7, anjs incidentally, "For the deai are nnointed " ( $\mu$ opíSoviai, Paedag. II. 8, §62). In the Octavina of Minutius Felix the heathen objector suy ", "Ye (Christians) reserve unguents for funerals" (c. 2). In the same centary (290) we find a Koman gevernor threatenlug a martyr this, "You imaglne that some wretched women are going to enbalm your body with spices and olutments? But what I am thinking of is how to destroy your remains" (Acta Tarachi, 7; in Ruinart, Acta Sinc. 385̈). And many other instances are fonad.

A sweet odour has often been perceived on the opening of an ancient tomb (see Catacombs, Vol. I. p. 309). This arose, without any loubt, from the spices buried with the body, but superstition has regarded it as a proof of the sametity of the person who occupied the tomb. This was an early opinion. Thus, when the tomb of St. Valerius was opened in 550, the sweet smell was taken te indicate that "a friend of God rested there" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. 84). So at the discovery of the body of St. Mallonas, the bishop of Cologne, who was present, exclaimed, "I believe in Christ that He is reveting His, martyr to me, seeing that this sweet odour has surrounded me" (idid. 63). Compare also St. Jerome's Lifc of IIIlarion, 46, where he speaks of the body of the snint as "tantis fragrante, odoribus ut delibutum unguentis putares." When the tomb of Amantius was opened, an unspeakably aweet odour proceeding from it rached even the people in the porches and courta of the church (Furtunatus in Vita $S$. Amant. 11). See also Epist.; Luciani de Rerel. Stephani Mfart. § 9 ; Eugippus of St. Severin in Res Gest. S. Sev. Baron. A॥n. vi. § 1i), ad an. 488, &c. For a similar story from Constnatinople, see Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. ix. 2. Evagrius auppliea another from the East (Hist. Eccl. ii. 3). Bat they were common every where.
V. The Grave-clothes.-'The body was alwaya clothed, often in linen only, but sometimes also in the best dress worn in daily life, or in the insignia of office. The custom was traditional, but it received a mystic interpretation, the new dress then put on being said to represent the garment of incorruption in which the body will be clothed when restored to life (Pseudo-Chrysost. de Putiontiâ, ix. 808).

1. The body seems to have been generally sirathed in linen (see Catacomis, p. 309), as might be expected from what we know of the custom of the Jews. Lazurus was "bound hand and foot with grave-clothes" (John xi. 44). "Then took they the body of Jesus, and wound it ( $\delta \delta \eta \sigma a \nu$ ) in linen clothes ( $000 v i o n s$ ) with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury" (ihid. xix. 40). St. Matthew (xxvii, 59) and St. Luke ( $x$ xiii. 53) say that Joseph "wrapped, or (каөајă, M.). St. Mark (xv. 46) sвys, $\langle\nu \in f \lambda \eta \sigma \epsilon$ $\tau \hat{j} \sigma \iota \nu \delta \delta \nu$. The custom had been brought from Egypt and retained, though the Jews did not embalm their dend. Words that expresa the nution of swathing are sumetimes used at an later period. Thus the disciples of St. Anthony einigartes bis body-buried it (Athan. Vita $S$. Anton. 90). Similnuly Diunysius of Alexandria apeaka of the Cluristians of that city as $\pi$ epr-

the bodies of these stricken by the plague (IIist. Eccl. Euseb, vii. 22). In Latin authors the mese common wold is "obvolvere." In the above two instances the material ia not mentioned, but we may assume that it was linen, the use of which was common everywhere, if not uaiversal. To give exiumples, St. Jerome, speaking of a woman who had been unjustly piut to death, says, "They wrap the bloody corpse in a linen eloth" (E.pist. ad /nnoc. 12). Sixtus Ill., A.D. 432, "with his own hands dressed" the hody of his enemy, Bassus, "with linen clothes nad spices" (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. No. 45). In Gregery of Tours we read of a nun who was buried "laduta linteis mundix" (Hist. Frane, ri, 29), and of a bishop who in a vivion was told to prepare for his burial by "getting him clenn linen clothes" (ii 5). The linen was sometimes waxed. Thus in one Life of St. Cuthbert we are told that his body was " in sindone cerata curatum" (Iita, lii. iv. 13 ; Bolland. Mart. 20). The body of St. Ansbert, arehbishop of iecen, A.D. 698, "magna fidel ambitione vestitum ext, ac desuper linteis eeratis obvolutum" (Aigrad. in Jita insb. 9 ; Boll. Feb. 9). In a inter Instanee we read of a " shirt (camisaie) corered with wax" enrefully put on the body of the dedeared (St. Udalric), "lest the priestiy spo parel in which he was clad sliould be quickly destroyed by the enrth " (Vita S. Udalr, axvii. 83 ; Boll. July 4).
2. Among the Romans, while the private citizen was buried in a toga, those in office, eren to the lowest vicomagister (Livy, xxxiv. 7), were buried in the dress proper to it. The analogous practice was to some extent adopted nmoog Christians. In the Acta of l'eter of Alexandrin, martyred in 301, it seems impied that the linen in which he was wrapped was the dress in which he uaually officiated (Migne, Ser. Gr. $x$ viil. 464,5 ). This is not a contemporary necount; but if it be not historically true, it may be taken to ahew the etistom of the country a century and a half liter. St. Cuthbert was "vestimenta sheerdotalia indutus" (Anon. Vita, u. s.). The same thing is related of an Irish bishop named Merolilanus (Flodoard Hist. Ecel. K'cin. iv. 48), and of Gebhard of Constance: "Sacerdotnlibua, ut moris est, vestibus indutus" (Iita, l. 22 ; in Ménarl, note 680 to Sacram. Greyor.). Of St. Ansbert we rend: "As he had been wont to stand at the holy altars of Christ, so the brethren had taken care that he should be elothed " (Aigrad, u. s.) Hadrian I., A.D. 772, wns " wrapped in his apo stolical ornaments (infulis), as the custom is to bury a Roman bishop" (Vitor, in Mus. Ftel. i. 41) Observe also the instance of Udalric in the last paragraph. Charlemagne was clad in the im perial vestments, and "his face covered onder the diadem with a napkin" (Iita, Auct. Monach. Engol.)

Under this head we may mention un order aseribed to Eutychian, A.L. 275, that no marty should be buried "without a dalmatic or u pur ple colloblum" (Anast. Vit. Pont. No. 28); such ornaments thas hecoming the insignia of mar tyrdom.

Gallienus, Astyrius, a aenator, clothed the boly "very richly" for the burial (Enseb, Mist. Eocl. vil. 16). The remaina of Stratonica and seleucus, A.t. 297, were covered with a silk cloth (S. E. Assemanus, Acta SS. Murtyrum, ii. 121). sti. Anthony wripped the boily of Paul, the first herinit, In a "pallium" which St. Athatnavies hal given him (Hieron. in Vita Puuli, § 14). St, Anthony himselt; when dead, whs Frapped in in old cloak which had also been the gitt of Athanasius many years betore (St. Ath. io Vita $S_{0}$ Ant. § 91). St. Gregory of Nyssia gives an elaborate account of the manner la which the borly of his sister Macrina was prejared for the grave (A.d. 379). It was propusel to bury har in her ordinary dress, but her brother had provided a better. As this was not done to please haman eyex, an oill black maotle (ludriov) was thrown over all (De litta S. Hacr. fi. App. 200 ; Piar. 1618). St. Jerome, addressing wealthy Christians, asks: "Why do ye wrap (obvolvitis) your dead in garments covered with gold ?" (Vita Pauli, 17.) Ut Paula the same father says: "What poor man die I who was not wrapped in her garments?" (Epist. 108 ad Eustoch. §5.) Several times Gregory of Tours mentions that persons of eminence were clothed befors burial "dignis vestimeatis" (Hist. Fr. iv. $37, \mathrm{sl}$; De Glor. Conf. 81 ; Vitae Patrum, xiv. 4, xx, 4). When Chijperic wus slain, A.D. 584, a bishop covered his body for barial with "better garments" (Hist. F'r. vi. 46). The Seven Sleepers of Ephesns "to this day rest In the very place (where they were tound), covered with clothes of silk or fine linen" (Miras: i. 95).
4. In tha 6th centary we first hear of a atrange abuse by its prohibition. The council of durergne, 533: "It is to be observed that the bolies of the dead be not wrapped in palls or diriae services," i.e. cloths used for the service of the altar (can. 3); "Touchiug the covering of the Lord's body or the pall of the altar, let not the body of a priest, when carried to the tomb, be ever covered with it" (can, 7). The council of Auxerre, A.D. 578 : "It is not permitted that the bodies of the dead be wrapped ia the veil or in palls " (can. 12). The latter praetice is also forbidden by Boniface of Mentz, 743 (can. 20). Nor was the East free from the 743 (can. 20). Nor was the East free from the same superstition. Pseudo-Athanasius, as quoted by John Dsmascene: "Fail not to burn oil and wax candles at the tomb, though the body be boried in an air," i.e. a encharistic veil of the largest size (Dsinasc. Orat. de iis qui in Fide dormierunt, § 19).
5. It is probable that, however the body was dressed, a napkin always concealed the face, as in the scriptural examples (John xi. 44, xx. 7). Of St. Cuthbert we read, "Capite sudario circumate " (Anen, Vita, iii. u. s.) ; of St. Ansbert, that "sudarium cerâ litum capiti ejus imponere velleat" (Aigrad. u. s.) ; and of Charlemagne, "Sudario sub diademate tacies ejus operta" (Monach. Engol, u, a.).
6. The richness of the dress and ornaments oometimes buried with the dead was a temptation to thieves. This led to their being cut or torn and otherwise rendered uselesa before the body was left in the tomb. Thus Si. Chrysostom: "A costly burial has often been the cause of the tomb being broken open, and of the bedy that was buried ou carefully being cast out naked and graveleas.

That this may not happen, muny per is tear the fine linen clothes and fill the with many kinda of apices, that they may in two ways be made ustless to those who are guilty of such outrage, and so commalt them to the earth" (//om. 85 in S. Juan. Ei: § 5). Examples of such robberies are not wsating. Thas when, in $85, a woman of high rank had been burled at Metz, "with great ornaments and much gold," some young men of her family "uncovered the tomb and took and carrieal otf all the ornanenta of the dead body that they could find "(Greg. Tur, Hist. Frunc, viii. 21). When Halrian I. was huried in the monastery of Nonantula, A.D. 79., some of the monks, thinking that the ricb robes with which the boly was cevered would be better bestowed on their choreh, "went at night to his sepulchre, and having stripped him of his shining and glittering garments clad him in poorer" (Vita IIfadr. In Mus. It il. j. 41).
VI. Bells tolled.-We first hear of bells in connexion with death in the 7 th century ; but the notices are seanty. Bede relates that when St. Hilda died, in 673, a qua in a distant monastery founled by the saint, while in her dormitory at night, "suddenly heard in the air the well-known sound of the hell by which they were wont to be roused to prayers or called together when any one of them had been called out of this world" (Hist. Eccl. iv. 23). Here the custom was to toll the bell as soon as the death had taken pluce. The Life of St. Bonifoue seems to imply that, in the churches founded by him, the bell was tolled when the corpse was on the way to the grave. The inhabitants of the place, we are told, resisted the removal of his remains, A.D. 755, but suddenly "the bell of the charch, touched by no human hand, was put in motion" (Willibuldus, Vita S. Bonif'. c. xii. §38; sim. Othlo in Vita, if. § 25). This was accepted at once by all as an intimation that the body was to proceed to another place of rest. Starmius, the founder under Boniface of the great monastery of Fulda, seeing himself in danger, A.D. 770 , ordered all the bells of that house to be rung to assemble the monks to pray for him and to receive his last words (Vita, c. 25 ; Actia Bened. iv. 279). The aeoond council of Cealchythe, A.D. 816, directs that "in every church throughout the parishes," on the death of the bishop, " the signal be immediately struck, and every congregation of the servants of God meet at the basilic" to sing psalma for his soul (caul. 10).
VII. Prayers and Psalms before the Funeral. -The body of Constantine was watched day and night as it lay in the palace "in a golden colfin," covered with a purple eloth and surrounded by inzumerable lights (Euseb. Vita Const. ir. 66); bat we do not read of any religious rite performed at that time. Nur are any prayers or psalms mentioned at this stage in the case of St. Ambrose, though his body lay in state in the great chureh called by his name (Paulinus in Vita S. Amb. 48).

1. Yet Tertullian, about A.D. 195 , speaks of prayer being made ut this time: "Cum ln pace dormisset, et morante adhuc sepulturá, interim oratione presbyteri componeretur," \&c. (2s Anini, 51). What this "prayer of the presbyter" was does not appear. In the Gelasian Sicramentary are four sets of prayrr to be used orer the departed. The first group are headed, Orat. post Obitum Ilominis ; the second, Orut. ante ןun all Sepulerum deferatur (Liturgia Lat. Vet. Murat. 1. 747,9). In the Gregulinn Saeramentary (ibid. il. 213) we find prayers curreaponding to the former of the above groups under the heading, Orationes in Agcmla Mortuorwm quando Anim i egreditur de Corpore. After these prayers, pinlms (not indiented; in the Vatienn Codex, "pisalmi congrui," opp. S. Greg. v. 230, ell. 1615) are sung, and then "dicantur capituln" ("deiude Oratio Dominlea et hnec versuum capitella," Cod. Vat. u. s.): "In memorla," \&c. (Ps. exil. 6, P. B. v.) (after which Cod. Vat. gives "Anima ejus," \&c., from Ps. xxv. 12); "Ne tradas bestils anlmas," \&c. (Ps. Ixxlv. 20 ; see Vulg. ixxlii. 19); "Pretiona," \&c. (Pa, cxvi. 13), for which Cod. Vat. substitutes," Redimet Dominus anlmas aanctorum suorum" (derived probably from $\mathrm{Ps}_{3}$, xevii. 10); "Non lntres," \&c. (Ps. cxliil. 2); "Requiem acternam dona cia, Domine " (derived from 2 Esdr. ii. 34 ; Vulg. 4, Esdr.). Two prayera follow in this book as given by Murntori, headed Incipiut Orationes post Lavationem Corporis (215), which correspond to the second set in the Gelasian, as described sbove. In the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 41) are prayers bearing a strong general resemblance in matter to the above Western forms, under

The Gelasian prayere mentioned above : found, with aome change and omission, in a TUTs ancient MS. preserved at Rheims (printed by Menard, Sacram. Greg. not. 68), in which they have the following heading: "Incipit Officiun pro Defunctis. In primis cantatur Psalmus, In exitu Israel, cum antiphona, vel alleluia." The book appenrs to have been written in the time of Charlemagne (Prnef. $x$. Opp. Greg. lii. ed. Ben.), when the alleluin was generally in the West no longer thought anitable to a funeral office. It is atill enng in the Greek offices (Euchologion, Goar, 526, 527, 531, 535, 553), and in that for priests with frequent repetitions ( $562,563,564, & c$.$) .$
2. Testimonies to the use of palma before the funeral are much more frequent than to the prayera. When Monica diei, "Evodius selzed a psalter and began to chant the psalm Misericordiain et judicium (the 101st), the whole family responding" (Aug. Conf. ix. 12, § 31), Bufore the barial of Macrina there was "psalmody throughout the night, as at tha vigil of a martyr's festival "(Greg. Nyss. De Vitâ S. Macr. ii. App. 200). St. Jerome tells us that at the death of Pnula " not wailings and beatings in the breast were heard, as is the wont among men of this world, but numberleas paalma in divers tongues" (Epist. 108 ad Eust. § 29). Even before Fabiola was dend, if we are to take St. Jerome's words to the letter, this chanting had begun: "Psaims sounded, and the alleluia echoing aloft ahook the gilded ceilings of the templea" (Ep. 77 ad Oce (n. §11). Earlier in the aame century the disciples of Pachomius (cir, 350), "having cared for his venerable body after the custom whola night watching, alnging psalms and hymns" (Vita, 53; Rosweyd, 138). The 6th century furndshes many instancers ; e.f. the body of Fulgentins, A.D. 55.3, placed in the oratary of a monastery, " invited both monks and clerka to wateh together that whole night in pralins and hymas and spiritual songs " (lita, in fine: Surlus, Jan. 1). St. Gall, a.D. 554, lay three dhys in a church, "constant singing of pailms goling on" (Greg. Tur. Vilue PP. vi. 7). SimiInrly St. Salvius (about 560), (Id. Ifist. Frame. vil. 1) ; St. Ardius, 571 (Fita S. Arid. 34; inter Opp. Greg. Tur, 1303); and St. Radeguad, 587 (Baudon. In Vita, 27).

VIII. Mourning Ha'nits.-The feelling expressed In the foregolng extracts was carried so far that In many churches, if not in all, mourning-dresses of $n$ dark colour were strongly discournged. Practically this affected one sex only, at least among the Romans, for thelr women in mouming already, i.e. from the 1st century, "wors white garments and white head-dresses" (Plutarch, Quaest. Rom. 26). Hence the condemanthon of dark colours made a distinction between the Christian and the heathen man, but permitted none between the women. In the former ease the principle created the difference; in the latter it was thought more important than the maintenance of it.

St. Cyprian is the earllest writer in whem the objectlon occurs : "Black garments are not to be assumed here, when they (who have gone befcre) Wiste put on their robes of white " (De Mortal. X&4. ed. Brem.). St. Basil tails one who exliibs: ed such outward signs of grief that he s"ae:abled actors in a tragedy: " Like them thoo bhivsest that the outward condition of things should befit the mourner, a black dress and disorvesed hair, and darkness in the honsc, and dirt aad dust, and a chant unpleasling to the enr, and that keeps the wound of grief evei fresh in the soul. Leave auch thlngs to them that are without hope" (De Grat. Act. i1. 363). St. Chrysestom condemns among other tokens of grief the custom of "covering ourselves with black garments" (Hum. iii. in Ep. ad Phil. § 4; comp. Hom. 62 in S. Joan. Ev, §4). An unknnwn but very anclent nuthor, whose tract is preserred in a MS. of the 7th century, asks: "Why do we dye our garments black, unless it is to prove that we are truly unbelleving, not only by our weeping but by our dress?" (De Consol. Hort. Serm. ii. c. 5; in App. Opp. Aug.) Nevertheless this rejection of a dark mourning-dress could hardly have been common among men in the West in the age of St. Augustine and St. Jerome, for the latter, writing in 404, claims praise for a Roman of high rank for having given up his mourning habit (lugubrem vestem) and resumed hls white garments (candida vestimenta) at the end of forty daya, after the loss of his wife and two daughters within a few days of each other (Epist. 118 ad Julian. 4). In France, when the elder son of Chilperic died, A.D. 580, there was "a great lamentation of all the people; for the men mourning, and the women clad in monraing habits, as the custom is at the obsequies of husbanils, in such sort attended this fuaeral" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 35). It may be doubted whether women in the East acted generally in the spirit of St. Chrysostom's advice even in the 4th century. Had they done so, it woald

IX. The Bier and Cuffin.-I'he bully was placed on 3 bier (feretrom, lectus, grabatum, sandaplla, кגivn, $\sigma x i \mu \pi$ ous), sometimes in a coflin (area, loculus, capulus, $\lambda d \rho \nu a \xi$, oopds). 'There is reason, however, to think that the bier and colfin, by whaterer world described, were genero!'y one. The collin was without a 1 ll , and the face (at least) of the corpse wias often exposed during the prowession. At the funcral of St. Hrail, A.D. 399 , the people could see his thee (Greg. Naz. Orut. xliii. 80). The same thing is mentioned of his sister Macrina (Greg. Nyss, de l'ita Miter. 201). When Honoratus of Árles was carried th tha grave, A.D. 4:30, the prople were able to kiss various parts of the boily ("osculum ant ort aut quiboscunque membils impressit," Hilar. Ared, in lita /lonor, vii. 35). This was probabiy general among the Greeks, for it is their custom to this day, the face being pninted to simulate life.
It is probable that in many eases the whole body was concealed nt first by a loose pall, sometimes of rich materinl, of which we often read buth in the liast and West. A dalmatic was thrown ever the bier at the funeral of the bishops of Rome, until Gregory 1. ordered that for the future "the bier on which a Roman pontiff was carried to burial should be vested with no covering" (Epist. iv. 44). He desired to suppress the poppular custom of tearing the dasmatic to pi"ces and preserving thein as relics, Hilary of Arles says that the body of Honoratus, slreasly mentioned, was "clothed on the bier by the great solicitude of faith, and almost stripped afterwards by a greater, when it was taken to the grave" (Viti 11, nor. vii. 35). When the empress Placilla, a.d. 385, was carried into the city before her burial, the body was covered "with guld and purple cloth" (Greg. Nyss. Orat. Fun. de Placilla, ii, 960). Her daughter Pulcherin is by the same writer only said to have been "borne on a galden bier" ( $\kappa \lambda / \nu \eta$ s, in fiun. Pulch. Orat. inil. 948).
X. The Bearers.-Tertullian, 195, explaining Christian customs to the heathen, says that the ofierings of the faithful provided among other things "for the burial of the poor" (Apol. 39). The cuncil of Carthage, 398, decreed that the "peniteuts shonld carry the dead to the church sind bury them" (can. 81). St. Augustine, speaking of his mother's funeral at Ostia, where she died on their way to Africa, says, "De more illis quorum officium erat funus carantibus" (Confess. ix, 31). Sueh ofticials, we infer, were to be found among Christians in every populous place. At Constantinople Constantine had already provided a large body of inferior clerks to whom this duty was committed. Their number wasatterrards increased by Justinian. They were paid for their services out of a public fund, so that every burial might be tree of charge. [See Copiatae, Dlcant, Fossaki, Pahabolani.] These prepared the grave, bore the corpse, and buried it. it is probable, however, from the number of it is probable, however, from the number of inslances on record, that relations and others often became bearers, not from necessity, but Trom a desire to shew honour to the decensed. The body of St. Basil was thus "borne aloft by the bands of holy men," Jan. 1, 379 (Greg.

Naz. Oriut, xllii, (80). When his sister Macrina was buried In the amme year, the bler was borne by her brother, Gregory of Nysм, the blslup of the dlocese, aud two other eminent clergymen (Vitu Mucr. 201). St. Ambrose in the same year implles that he helped to carry his brother Satyo rus to the grave (he Excessu Sict. 1. 36). Paula at Bethlehem, 404, was "removed by the hands of bishops, who even put their shoulders to the bier" (llleron. Ep. 108, § 29). Sidonius, 472, snys of a lady of high rank "that she was taken up and borne to her abiding home like one asleep, by the hands of priests and relatives" (Epist. 1.. 8). Fulgentius Ruspetasis, A.D. 55.3, Wha taken "by the hands of pulents" to the chorch ln which he was buried (Vita, Suriua, Jan. 1).
During our period monks and nuns were buried without the bounds of their monnsteries (Martene, de Ant. Mfor. Rit.v. x. 99), and the latter at least inust often have employed the services of seculars as benrers.
XI. Time יf liturial. - A Christian funeral took place by lay whenever it was permitted. See Burial of tiee Dead (3), p. 253. There was in France, at least, a feeling against buryIng on Sunday; for in a law forthiding servile works on that day in the Carlovingian code, we find the burial of the dend excepited, only "si forte necesse fuerit" (Reg. Fr. Cupit. i. 75, vi. 380). Nevertheiess St. Ambrose was buried at Milan on Easter Day (Paulinus in Vita, 48), and St. John of Naples in that city on the same day (Uranius, De Ubitu Puu/imi, 11).
XII. The Procession.-Allusions to the triam. phant character of the funeral procession as nurked by the ainging of psalms and hymns, the carrying of lights [see Liguts, Ceremonial LSE OF, viii.], and palms, &e., are rery frequeat. The Apostolical Constitutions, probably compiled near the year 200, give this direction: "In the going torth of those who have frllen asleep, conduct them with singing of psalms, if they ne faithful in the Lord, tor 'precious in the sight of the Lord is the denth of His saints'" (vi. 30). Constantine, who died in 337 , of the funeral of martyrs: "Nor is the wweet smell of frankincense desired, nor the funeral pyre, but pure light sufficient to light them that pray " (Urut. aul Sunct. Ceetum, 12). St. Paul the first hermit Was taken to his grave, A.b. 340, by St. Anthony, "singing hymns and psalms, after the Christian tradition" (Hieron. Vitu Pauli, § 16). At the funeral of Macrina, " no small number of deacons and servants preceded the corpse in order on either side, all holding tapers of wax," while "from oue end to the other of the procession psalms were sung in one purt, as in the Hymn of the Three Children" (Greg. Nyss. Vitic Macr. 201). At Constantinople Justinian, A.D. 554, made legal provision for the singing at all funerals (Noo. lix. 4). In Hrance, 587, St. Radegund was carried to the grave with psalms and alleluias. (Baud. Vita, § 28.) In Spain, the council of Toledo, 589 , ordered that the body should be conveged to the tomb with psalmsinging only.

Incense was sometimes used after the first three or four centuries of our period, In the deta (of late and uncertain date; see Tillemont, Mim. Lecl. note sur St.-Pierre Alex.) of St. Peter of Alesandria, 311, we read that the people

"carried palms the tokens of victory, while tapers blazed, hymos resounded, and Incense Hamed" (Migne, Ser. Graec. xviii, 465). Hilary of Arles, speaking of the funeral of Honoratus, his predecessor, A.D. 430: "We saw then, carried before his bier, apices and incense" (l'ita Honor. vii. 35). At the funeral of St. Lupicinus in France, in the 6th century, there were "crosses anil wax candles and the smell of sweet incense" (Greg. Tur. Vitac PP. xiii. 3). "Incense and lights" are also mentioned by Pseudo-Chrysostom (de Pat. i, tom. ix. 808).

Neither the Gelnsinn nor the Gregorian Sacrnmentary indicates the psalins used in the procession. We may, however, leara something of the Greek custom from St. Chrysostom: "Consiler what thon snyest at that time, 'Turn again unto thy rest, 0 my soul, for the Lord hath rewarled thee' (Ps. cxvi. 7, P. B. v.) ; and again 'I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me' (xxiii. 4); and again (xxxii. 8), 'Thou art a place to hide me in; Thou shalt preserve me trom trouble'" (Hom. iv. in Ep. ad Heb. (ii. 15)).
XIII. The Body buried.-The church inherited from the first converts a repugnance to cremation, as doing violence to nnturul feeling. The henthen ascribed this abhorrence to a wrong motive, viz. a fenr lest the bedy being dissipated should be incapable of resurrection. "Some," says Tertullian," are of that opinion ; they say that funerals ought not to be by fire for that reason, out of a veedless care for the sonl. But the reason of that pious custom of burial is different, not a pretence of care for the remains of the soul, but an aversion to cruelty even in regard to the body" (De Animet, 51). In the Octavius of Ninutius Felix (c. 2), the heathen interlocutor inveighs against the Christians as superstitiously "execrating funeral piles and condemning sepultures by means of fire." To this the Christian replies (c. 10): "We do not, as you suppose, fear any loss of burial (comp. St. Augustine, de Civ. Dei, i, 12), but we observe the ancient and better (St. Ang. u. s. 13) custom of interment." The practice of cremation was extinct throughout the empire in the 5th rentury ("Urendi corpora defunctornm usus nostro saeculo nullus," Macrob. Suturn. vii. 7); but we infer trom a prohibition of Charlemagne that it existed aunong the tribes of Germany at a much later period: "If any one shall cause the body of a deceased person to be consumed by flame according to the rite of the pagans, and shall reduce his bones to ashea, he shall be capitally punished" (Capit. de Part. Suxon. 7, in Cup. Reg. Fr. i. 252).
In Egypt there was a peculiar custom of preserving the dend abova ground. "Tha Egyptinus are wont . . . not to hlde them under the earth, but to place them on littera and to keep them in their houses, thinking thereby to do honour to the departed." This statement is made, however, only in refereace to "the bodjes of the devout departed, and especinlly of the holy martyrs " (Athan. Vita S. Anton. § 90 ). The custom was carnestly opposed by St. Anthony, whe ordered his own body to be buried in a secret place, that it might not be so treated (ihid.). The author of his is the only writer who meutions it.
XIV. Place of Burinl.-For the earlier peried, especially in the cities, see ArEa, Burial, Cafacombs, Cemetery. Burial in charchee was forbidden by a law of Gratian, Valentinina, and Theodoslus, A.D. 381: "Let no oue thiak that the abode of tha apostles or murtyrs is permitted to be used for the burial of bodies" (Justin. Codox, i. ii. 2). This law was ndmitted $\mathrm{by}^{\prime}$ Justinian inte his code, A.d. 529. [ChurchYALRD, p. 391.]

Constantiue and his Christian successors, and the bishops of Coustantinople, are said by Sozomen (IIist. ii. 34 ; comp. Euseb. lita Const. iv. 70) to have been buried in the Church of the Apostles in the city; but from St. Chrysostom it appeirs that this must be understood of the approsch to the church. (Hom. xxvi. in 2 Cor. pr. fin.). St. Ambrose was buried, A.D. 397 , in the church at Milan built by himself and called after him (laulinus, Vita $S, A m b .48$ ). Paula was interred at Jerusalem, 404, "subter ecclesiam et juxta specus Domini" (Hieron. Epist. 108, § 30); i.e., as we conceive, under the church, but from without. Of the burial of Fulgentius of Ruspe in Africa in a charch, we read: "He was the first bishop who was henqured by being laid in that basilica, where a strict ancient custom permitted no oae, priest or laie, to be buried; but the great furce of affection removed the obstacle of custom, the citizens universally demanding it " (Vita in Surius, Jan. 1 in fin.). Here the ground of the "custom" appears to have been torgottea. Queen hudegund in 587 requested of the lishops of the province that she might be buried in a church which she had begun to build (ireg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 42). The occasional practice is also attested by stories of sinaers miraculously cast out of churches in which they had been interred. Such in event happened at Toulouse, according t. Gregory of Tour's (Mirac. i. 89), while Greg ory of Ronle places a similar occurrence at Mi an (Dial. iv. 53). Another story of the last writer shew that two ladies had been buried in a church at Monte Cassino (Dial. ii. 23).
XV. The Serrice in Church.-The bod; was often taken to a church and a service held over it there, though it was to be buried elsewhere. Gregory of Nyssa, in his account of the funeral of Macrina, says: "When we stood within the building [of the Holy Martyrs, in which the bodies of her parents lay], setting dowa the bier, we first betook ourselves to prayer" (lita S. Macr. 201). The body of St. Ambrose was taken to a church immediately after his death oa the morning of Ea-tpr Eve. On Suadsy at dawn, "after the celebration of the divine sacraments," it was removed to the church in which it was to be buried (Paulinus, Vita, 48). The languige of St. Jerome, when he says that the alleluia of the preople shook the roof of the temple at the funeral of Fabiola (Epist. 77, § 1i), seems to imply an office of praise sad thanksgiving in the church. Panla, before burial, was "placed in the middle of the church of the cave of the Saviour," and the joyful chanting of the procession, it is implied, coatinued there (Hieron. Epist. 108, § 29). PseudoDionysius, in the East, tells us that if the decensed had been of the clergy, the body was set before the altar; if a layman, by the sacrio

XVI. The Composition of the Service.-Psalma and hymns formed a considerable part of the service in the charch and at the grave, but there were prescribed forms of prayer nlso, and lessons from Holy Scripture, at an early period. We read both of pasalms suag and of prayers said in church at the funeral of Macrina ( Fita, u. s.). Psalns with the nlleluin were snng nt that of Fabola (Hicron, u. s.); and psnlms in Greek, Latin, and Syrine at that of Prula (Hir, u. s.). The martyrs Epictetus and Astion were buried "in a meet nad fit place, with hymns and psalms" ( Yita, 20; Rosw. 219). Of other murtyrs, Victor Vitensis says, "The remains of the blessed saints were buried with solemn the blessed saints were buried with solemn hymas" (Pussio Septem Monach.). The same writer represents a persecuted chnrch asking, solemn (i.c. customary) pruyers?" (De Persec. Vand. ii.) Pseudo-Dionysins, spenking of the service in the church, snys: "Then the of the celebrates a prayer of thraksgiving. Next, the ministers, having read the unfailing promises of our second resurrection set in the divine Scriptures, chant deroutly the songs of the oracles of psalms aud hymus to the same end and intent. Then the chicf minister dismisses the catechumens, and recites the names of the saints who kave already gone to their rest, with whom he deems the person lately decensed worthy to be classed in public commemorntion, and exhorts all to seek the huppy end in Christ. Then the divine chicf priest drawing near makes a most sacred prayer over him" (De Eiccl. Hicr, v. iii. 2).
The Gelasian Sacrmen
The Gelasian Sacramentary gives prayers to be said "Ad Sepulcrum priusquam sepeliatur," and others, with a "Commendatio Anilnae," to be said "Post Scpulturnm" (Lit"rg. Lat. iet. Murat. i. 750-1). The corresponding prayers in the Gregorian are headed respectively "Orationes ante Sepulcrum, prinsquam sepelintur," and "Oratio post sepultum Corpus" (ibta. ii. 216). In both the "Commendatio" is the final prajer. We tike the following from the Gregorian as an example: " We commend unto Thee, 0 Lord, the soul of Thy servant $N$, that Thee, 0 Lord, the soul of Thy servant $N$., that being dead unto the world he may live unto Thee. And it by the frailty of worldy converThee. And it by the frailty of worldly conversation he hath committed zins, do Thou by the sation he hath committed sins, do Thou by the pardon of Thy most merciful pity clennse them away, through," &c. (ibid. ii. 218). At one tlme the whole of the service in the church and at the grave was called the Commendation; for the conncil of Carthage, 397, orders that where a funeral takes place in the afternoon, "the commendation shall be made by prayers only, if they who make it are found to have already broken their thst" (can. 29); i.e. the eucharist shall not form part of the commendation in that case. But only a few years later we find the word used of single forms of intercession (for the liring, in can. 12 Conc. Milev. A.D. 416 ; comp. Cons. Tolet. A.d. 633, c. 13. See CommendaTHON), nnd it is the specific name expressly given to ths last prayer at funerals in the Gelaian Sacrumentary. By an order of Hincmar of Rheims, A.D. 845, the priest is to learn by heart "ordincm et preces in exequils atque agendis defunctorum " (Capit. 4 ; Labb. Conc. viii. 569). It is evident, therefore, that at this time nothing Was left to the disoretlon of the officiant.
We may add, with reference to the lessons, that some copies of the Comes Hieronymi (App. ad Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 1351 ; see Lectionary) to the eucharistic lessons to be read "in Agenda Mortuorum "(sic) add nine "Lectionea Defunctorum" (see Amalarins, de Eecl. Off. ir. 42) from the Book of Job, to be read in the Officia Mortuorum. Of these some or all, we may suppose, would be read in the church or at the grave, when the eucharist was not celebrated. They nre, Job vii. 19-21; x. 1-7; x. 8-12 xiii. 22-28; xiv. 1-6; xiv. 13-16; xvii. 1-15; xix. 20-24; xix, 25-27.

The enrly remains of the Greek church do not give us the same information respecting the prayers actually said in the chureh or at the grave within our period. The prayers in the Apostolical Constitutions, to which we have referred in § vii. 1, might be used with propriety at that time ; but the rubric (viii. 40) shews that they were the special addition on occasion of a death to the ordinary daily service. Elsewhere (vi, 30) this book mentions lessons and psalms : "Assemble in the cemeteries, reading the sacred books and singing psalms on account of the martyrs who have fallen asleep, and of all saints from the beginning, and of our brethren who have fallen asleep in the Lord ; "n direction which seems to apply both to the occession of the funeral and to subsequent commemorations. In the East one of the Arabic canons of Nicaea, referring to the funeral of a bishop, says, "Les those things be read at the funeral which the doctors and holy spiritual fathers have ordained tonching the prayer" (can. 65 ; Labbe, Conc. ii.
For the discourse sometimes delivered at or after a funeral, see Funeral Sermon
XVIN, The last leace.-Pseudo-Dionysins says that after the prayers the bishop kissed the corpse, after which all present did the same (Eccl. Hier. v. iii. 2). This was tha kiss of peace, and a sign of communion unbroken by death ; but it could never have been common. From a prohibition of the practice by the conncil of Auxerre, A.D. 578 (can. 12), we learn that there was some observance of it in France in the 6th century.
XVIII. The last Unctu,n.-In a work nscribed to St. Chrysostom, in the imperial library at Vienna, it is said that we " ought to pour oil on the dead at their burial" (Comment. in Biblioth. Cues. Lambecii, VIII, xlv. 68). Psendo-Dionysias sayg that after the kiss the bishop "poureal oil on the departed, and then after offering a sacred prayer. for all present laid the body away with other sacred boties of the aame (eccleainstical) rank" (Hier. Ecel. v. iil. 2). Theodore of Canterbury 668, says that "there was in the church of Rome a custom of carrying monks or religious men to a church when dead, and anointing their breasta with chrism, and there celebrating massea for them " (Cupit. 90; Labbe, Conc. vi. 1877) These statements are worthy of uote trom the fact that in the Greek charch of the present day either oil from the church lamps or a cinder from the thurible is put on the corpae immedrately before burial (Euchol. Goar, 538). PseudoDionysius glves a mystio reason for this unction. The unction at baytism, he says, "calls the initiated to the sacred strife, but the oil now poured on the bedy shewe tbat he whe hns fallen asieep has fought the sacred fight, and la perfected " (ibid.).

XIX. The Eucharist given to the Dead.-We meet with several traces of this profane superstition from the ead of the 4th century downward. It was forbidden in Africa by the council of Carthage in 397: "It is decroed that the puchurist be not given to the bodies of the dead" (ean. 6) ; by that of Auxerre, 378 : "It is not lawful ior the eucharist to be given to the dead" (can. 12); and by the council of Constantinople in 691 (can. 83). The cauen of the last is, however, only a traiscript of that of Carthage, and even repeate its nrgument : "It is written, Take, eat; but the bodies of the dend cana neither take nor eat" (comp. St. Chrysoatom, Hom. 40 in Ep, i. ad Cur. §1). It is not intimated in these canons that the eucharist was placed between the dips of the corpse; nad we inter probably, from other records, that it was placed on the breast,* especially us Bulsemon (Comm. in Can. C. P. u. s.) suggests that the intention of the practice was to kecp off evil spirits. St. Beaedict is said to have ordered "the body of the Lord" to be placed on the breast of a corpse that had been cast out of its grave by unvisible hands (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 24). An oblate was placel on the brenat of St . Cuthbert (Amainr. de Off. Eccl. iv. 41). In the late and fabulous Lije of St. Basil falsely nscribed to Amphlolochius, the saint is said to have ordered a portion of the eacharist which he consecrated on a certain occusion to be reserved that it might be buried with him (Opp. Amphil. ed. Combetis. 176, 224). For the later history of the practice see Notitia Euchuristica, p. 920 ; ed. 2.
This observince must bave beeu more common, especinally at Rome, thnn has been usually supposed, if modern antiquarians are right in thinking that the vessels tinged inside with red found in the loculi in the catacombs contained euchariatic wine (Catacombs, 308; but see Glass, 7:30); but the nge and paucity of the notices of the custom must be coasidered one objection to that opinion. It is probable that intinction was practised-i.e. that the bread was meistened with the wine. See Spoon, EuchaRistic.
XX. How phiced in the Grave.-The pesition of the budies found in the Catacomiss (see Vol. I. p. 307) shews that their direction wns conaldered unimportant for the first four centuries. At a later period we find evidence both in the East and West of the face being generally turned towards the rising sun, Thus Pseulo-Chrysostom: "We tura the coffin to the East, signifying thereby their resurrection" (De Pat. i. u. 日.). See also the Vienoa MS. before cited (Lambec. VIII. x|v. 68). Pseudo-Epiphanius (de Sepult. Donn.), apostrophising Joseph of Arimathea: "Dost thou bury towards the East
 Aต̂v?" The beliet that our Lord had been so buried would be sufficient to induce a general practice. A similar testimony is given by Latin writers. Thus Arculfus, whe visited the Holy Land in 679 , says that the soles of the feet of the [^64]patriarchs were not turned as it is the custom for the soles of the buried to be turned ta other parts of the world, viz. towarde the east, but to tha south, and their heads to the nerth (Adamn. De Lucis Sanctis, ii. 10; Acta S. O.s.B. 1i.). Bede says that the boily of our Lord "had the head on the west," nad therefore lookiug enstwnrd (ir, in S. Sarci Ec. c. 16).' The boly whe generaily, but not always, laid on the back. Charlemagnic was seated on a throne (Munach. Engol., in Vita).

XXI. Bay-leaves, fo., in the Grave.-The floor of the grave was sometimes strewed with evergreens. Thus when the bedy of Vnlerius wsa found in the 6th century "he had bay-teares strewn under him" (Greg. Tur. de Cilor. Coug. 84). When certain todies, supposed to be those of St. Simon and St. Jude, were translatei from the ancient Vatican ba-ilica in the 17 th century, "there were found leaves of bay ualer their heads" (Casnlius, de l'et. Sucr. Christ. Ait. ©6, p. 266). Even in the 12th century John Beleth (copied by Durandus A.D. 1285, Ration. VII. xxxy. 58) says, "Let ivy or bay, which keep the greaness of their lenves for ever, bo placed in the sarcophagus near the bodies, to express that they who die do net cease to live in Him" (Div. Uff. Explic. 141).
XXII. Instruments of suffering buried with Martyrs.-St. Babylas, A.D. 250, necerding to St. Cinrysostom, requested to ke huried with the iren chatins in which he had died (De Babyla c. Juliun, 11). St. Am ${ }^{1}$ ese, about 39.3 , nsserts that he found in the grave of Agricola at Bulugaa the cross and nails by which he had sulfered ia 303 (E.chert. Virgir.. ii. 9). St. Sabine desired that the stone which was to be tied to him when thrown in the rlver should be buried with his body (Surius, March 13; not in the copy of Baluze, Miscell. i. 12 ; ed. Mansi). Whea the body of St. Daniel was fov:' ' 707, the nails by which be suffered y, al with him (Petr. Nutal. ii. 60, apud" . de Fun. Vet. Christ. 181). For other cas touad in tombs, see Catacombs, Vol. I. p. 314.
XXIII. One not buried on another.-This was forbidden by the conncil of Auxerre, 578:"Non licet mortuam super mortuum inittere "(cna. 15), and by a law of Childeric about 744 (Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 153), which was adopted by the enmpilers of the Carlovingian code (vi. 197). The reason of the prohibition is not given; but we may believe that it could not have been that asaigned in an inscription given by Gruter: "Solus cur sim quaeria. Ut in die ceasurio sine impedimento facilius resurgum " (Corp. Inscriph. mlii. 8).
XXIV. Flowers on the Grave.-St. Ambrose, 302, clearly alludes to a eustem of decking the grave with flowers in his oration on the death of Valeutinian: "I will not scatter his tomb with Hymn. ill in tin.).

In Gregory of Tours (de Glor. Mart. 71) we read of sage-lenres seattered in the crypt of a basilic "10 honour of the martyrs" buried there.
XXV. Lijhts at the Grave.-It is impessible to suy when this practice began. The council of Eirira, about 305, ordered that " wax lights shall not be burdt in a cemetery in the daytime: for the spirits of the saints are not to be disquieted" (can. 34) ; the more probnble sease ot which is, that a needless blaze of light in the daytime wuild disturb the devotions of the thithtiul who frequented the cemetery tor private prayer. See Notitia Bucharistica, 133 note; ed. 2. It is probable that these were in honour of martyrs only. The practice was apparently the same whed Vigilantius wrote about 404: "We see under pretext of religion a enstom introducel into the churches, after the fashion of the Gentiles, of buroing masses of wax lights while the sun is atill shining.

These people do a great hodutar to the most blessed martyrs, in conceive ing them to receive light from worthless wax tapers, whom the Lamb, who is in the middle of the throne, lights with the full blaze of His anjesty" (apud Hieron. contra ligilant. §4). Jerome ascribed the practice to women who had more zeal than knowledge, but at the same time defended it, "Hoc fit martyribos, et ideires recipiendum est" (§8). At a later period we tind lights left at the grares of others besides martyrs, and otten renewed as at theirs. Thus when the mother of Aredius was buried, 570, "they placed a wrx candle at her head " (Greg. Tur, do Glor. Conf. (04). This ls related incidentally ; so that we lofer a common practice. In the East Pseudodthanasius says: "Fail not to burn oil and wax st his tomb; for these things are acceptable to Goul, and they bring a great reward from Him" (apud Jonn. Damase. Orat. de iis qui in Fide dormierunt, § 19). See Liants, tue cerremonial VBE OF, six.
XXVI. Alinsgiving at Funcrals.-The giving of alms both at the funeral and on days of commemuration was so strongly inculcated and atrictly practiged both in the East and West, that it is deslrable to shew the grounds of it as well as to give testimonies to the fact; the more so because the reason more commonly alleged gave tise to momentous consequences in atter-ages. to Apostolical Constitutions, about 200, appesr to regard it as a simple act of piety to the deceised, to conclliate respect for his memory and to keep it alive among the people: "Of the thiogs belonging to him, let there be given to the por for a remembrance of him " (eis avd $\mu \nu \eta \sigma \nu$ eutoij, riii. 42). Before the end of the 4 th contury, however, we find St. Chrysoston iassiting without hesitation on a very dillerent tr.).
reason: "I shew you another mode of honouring the dend than by costly graveclothes, . . . the resture of almsgiving. This garment will rise again with him" (IIOM. 85 in Ev. S. Joan. §5). Elsewhere he urges the practice that the departed "may be elothed with grenter glory. If he has died it sloner, that his sins mny be lonsed: if a righteous man, that there may be an addition to his recompene and reward" (Ilom. 31 in $S$. Matt. Ev. ix. 23). Again, speaking of n sianer "Ithe has "offended God in many things," he says : "It is right to weep (for him), or rather not to weep only, for that does not profit hinn, but to do those things that may briog him some com-fort,-to give alms, to wit, nnd make ollerings" (Hom. 6:2 in S. Joan. Ev. §5). A later Greek writer calls "the alms left to the poor by the departed dead sacrifices," but sdds, "Nevertheless, if he was mercitul in his littetime, his good deeds In death are accepted of God" (Quaest. ad Autioch. 90 inter Opp. S. Athan.).
The same sentiment prevailed in the Latin church at least from the middle of the 4 th century. St. Jerome, for example, A.D, 397, says decidedly of Pammachius, thit he moistened the asles of his wite with the balsam of alms (Lipist. 66 ad Panon. § 6). St. Augustiue: "It is not to be doubted that the dead nre helped by the alms which are distributed on behalf of their spirits; so that the lord deals mor' mercifully with them than their sins have leserved" (Serm. 172, c. 2; sim. Enichirid. 110, § 29 ; De Dulcitii Quucst. ii. 4, sad De Curu pro Mortuis, 18, § 22). He explaids, however, that nlms after death only protit those who have so lived $B s$ to be capable of benefit from them (Ench. u. s. cited by himself in De Dulc. Quaest. u. s. ; comp. Serm. u. s. and De Cura, u. s.; also Isidur. Hispal. do Offic. i. 18). Laws were nt length founded on the practice. Thus a caion of the Euglish council of Cealelythe, A.D. 816, orders that on the death of a bishop " $n$ tenth of his substance sliall bo given for his soul's sake in alms to the poor, of his cattle and herde, of his sheep and swine, and also of his provision within door, and that every Eaglishman [of hic] who has been made a slnve in his days be set at liberty, that by this meads he may deserve to receive the fruit of retribution for his labours and also forgiveness of sins " (can. 10 ; Jolidson's XXVII. 7he Feast at the Funeral.-The motives which led to the giving of slme ot a funernl also gave rise to $n$ custom of entertaining the poor at a fenst, which was often rejeated on days of coammemoration. An early nllusion oceurs in the Apostolical Cunstitutions: "In the memorise of the departed, feast when invited in na orlerly manner and in the fear of God, that ye may be able to intercede for those who have departed" (viii. 44). Constantire, about 325 , speaks of tho "perfectly sober teasts celebrated by many" at the funerals of the fnithful "for pity and relifef of the needy and the assistance of exiles " (Urat. ad Sanct. Coetum, 12). "Why," asks St. Chry. soston, "dost theu invite the poor and call prlests to pray? That the departed msy come to rest, you bay, that he may tind the judge "If thul" (Hom. 31 in S. Matt. Ev. ix. 23). "If thou wert commemorating a son or a brother deceased, thou woukdst be couscience-stricked if thou didst not whserve the custom and invite the poor " (Hom. 27 in 1 Cor. xi. 25). Panliaus, a.t. 397, has left a deseripition of the funeral ferst given ly l'ammachlus, on the death of his wife, to the porr of Rome in tho charch of St. Peter (Ejuist, xiii, 11).

It will be observed that Preudo-Origen speaks as it the festival were of the same character, whether it celebrated the death of a murtyr or of a private friend. The fact is that the festivlty of a anint's dity was at first nothing more than the repetition of his funeral least on the anniversary of his denth. [Cebla Memomiae.]

When Christianity becane the religion of the people, suth occasions anturally led to excess and other evils. "1 know that thereare many," says St. Augustine, "who eat and drink most luxuriouslyover thedead" (De.Ifor. Liccl. 34, §75). On this account $S t$. Ambrose suppressed the feasts of commemoration al Milan (Aug. Conf. v. 2); but it is uncertain whether his prohibition embiracd that held at the funeral itself. St. Ausustine, encouraged by the example, induced his linhop Aurelins to do the same nt Hippo ( $E_{p}$ ist. 22 ad Aurel. i. § 6). With this advice of St. Augustine to his bishop we may connect a canon of the council of Carthage, 398 , at whleh both were present: "Let those who either refuse to the churches the oblations of the dead or give them grudringly be excomimunjeated as slayers of the needy "(can. 95). The last phrase occura also in a canon of Vaison in France, 442, where the reason assigned is that "the thithful departing from the body are defrauded of the fulness of ${ }^{-}$ their desires, and the poor of the relief of alms and weedful sustewance" (can. 4). Modern writers have called the feast of which we have now suoken "the funeral agape." We are not aware that it was evor so called by the ancients. Nor does it answer to the true notion of an agnpe. It was not a common meal to which many contributed and of which all partook as an act of communiou. Whatever its motive, it was simply a provision for the; poor by the rich mouraer, and it dues not appear that even the giver of the feast sat down td it with those whom he ted.

Though the festivities of saints' days ciflginated in the funeral feast, they are mure properly referred to another head.
XXV]H. The Encharist at Frenerals.-The eucharist was celebrated at tunerals, but we cannot say that this was general, even when the ceremony took place zin tho morning. The persons In whose ease it is mentioned were of eminence. The Apostolical Constitutions, referring to the obsequies of the deal, say: "Offer both in your churehes nat in the cemeterics the acceptable eucharist, the antitype of the kingly body of Christ" (vi. 30) ; but this would be satisfied by any subsequent celebration. The eouncil of Carthinge, A.D. 397, orders that " the sacraments of the altar be celebrated only by men fasting ;" and as a cuasequence, that when the "commendation of any deceased persons, whether bishops or others, is to take place in the afternoon, it be celebrated with prayers only, if they who celebrate it are found to have already broken their fast" (can. 29). Tha natural inference is that a celebration at the time was not considered all-important. Nor was it likely to have been so considered, seeing that it formed part of tha later rites of commemoration. The following are annong the instances on record of a calebrathon at the funeral Itaelf. Eusebius says that Constantine was at his funcral " deemed worthy of the mystic liturgy, and enjoyed the communion of huly prayera" ( Vita Const. iv. 71). St. Augustine says in reference to his mother's burlal, "Those prayers which wo poured out to Thee, when the sacrifice of our ransom was olfered for her, the body alreally placed near the tomb before its burial, as is the custum there," &o. (Conf, ix, 12, § 32 ) So at the funcral of St. Augustine himeelf: "The sacritice fir commendation of the burial of the benly was oflered to Goal, and he was buried" (Possid. in l'ita Aug. 31). Similarly in the tith century, St, Lnplelnus was buried "celebratis missis" (Greg. Tur. l'itito Patr. 13).

OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD

St. Ambrose was carried from the church (where he lay in state) "after the celebration of the divine sacraments to the Ambrosian basiliea, in which he was buried" (Paulinus, In Vita $S$. Ambr. 48). Aa this was on Easter lay, the celebration was not " pro detuncto," but hie name would be inserted in the oflice for the day. "For this, handed down from the fiathers, the whole ehurech observes, that prayer be made for those who have died in the communion of the boly and blood of Christ, when they are commemorated in their place at the sacrifice itwelf, and thant it be also mentioned that it is offered for them" (Aug. Serm. 172, 太 2). T'o this rommemoration of the departed St. Cyprian refers when he aays of an uffeader, "He does not deserve to be named at the altar in the prayer of the priest," which he otherwise expresses by saying that " that sacrifice should not be offered for his falling aslecp" (Epist. i. p. 8). In accordance with this Cyril of Jerusalem says, "We pray for the holy fathers and binsops, and, in a word, for all who have gone to their rest among us, belleving that a great benefit will result to the souls of those for whom the prayer is offered when the holy and awful sacrifice is set forth" (Catech. Myst. v. 6). This will receive illustration from later sections, XXIX. Commemorations.-There were commemorations by prayer and eucharist at various periods after the death or burinl. Thus the Apostolical Constitutions: "Let the third day of those departed to rest be celebrated in paralms and reading (of Scripture) and prayers, for the sake of Him who rose again on the thirl day; and the ninth for a remembrance of the surviving and tha decensed; and the forticth (some MSS, thirtieth), because the people thus bewailed Moses (Deut. xxxiv. 8), and the anniversary in remembrance of the person, and let there be giren of his aubstanco to the joor for a memorial of him" (viii. 42, the original text ; sim. the Coptie Constit. 76, Trattam's tr. 146). St. Ambrese says that some observe the third and the thirtirth, othera the scventh and the fortieth day after death (De (bitu Theod. 3). His oration on the death of Theodosius was delivered on the fortieth. His first De Excessu satyri was preached at the tuneral ("procedamus ad tumulum," sub fin. § 78); the second on the seventh day after the death (§ 2). In a story told by Palladius, 401 , the fortieth day was being celebrated in a monastery an a certain ocension for one person, and the thirl for aacther at the same time (llist. l.aus. 26). An dffican bishop, writing to St. Augustine, says, in refero Justinlan in his laws reengrilses the days meationed in the Apostolical Constitutions (Coll. ix. 16, xul. ; Novell. 133, c. 3). The rules Jald dowa by Theodore of Canterbury, a Greek of Tarsus by birth, are especilally interesting, from his histury and poosition: "Ile ought to celebrate the masses of departed laymen thrice In the yess, on the third day, the ninth day, and thirtieth day; because the lord roge on the third duy, nud gave up the ghost at the ninth hour, and the sons of lisrael bewailed Mases thirty and the sons of Israel bewailed Muses thirty dgys" (Capit. 37; Labbe, Conc. vi. 1876). "For a deceased monk mass is performed on the day of his burin, on the third day, nad afterwards, If the abbot will; for a good layman three or seves masses are to be said, after tasting; for a penitent, on the thirticth or seventh day; and his relations ought to fast, and offer an oblation on the altar on the fifth, as in Jesus, the son of Sirech, it is read, "The children of lsrael fasted for Saul;' and afterwards, if the presbyter will" (ibich, 19). Of "monks or religious men," he says that at Rome "a mass is pertormed for then on the first and third, and ninth and thirtieth day; and it is observeld agnin at the end of the year, if they will" (ibid. 90, 1877). Amalarius, at the beginulng of the 9 th century, says, "We have it written in a certain sacranentary (eomp. the Gelisian, lii. 105; Murat. i. 762) that the ollices of the dead are to be celebrated on the third, the seveath, and the thirtieth day" (De Eccl. Off. iv. 42). It is naturally inferred from sone of the foregoing authorities that these days were reekoned from the death ; but at Rome, during the latter part of one period, at least, it seems to have been from the burial; for In the Gelasian Sacramentary, a commemorative aissa has this title, "Missa in Depositione Defuacti tertii, septiml, $x \times x$ ml dieram, vel annuelem" (Murat. u. s.). So in the Gregorina Prefaces (Murat. ii. 355), "In die depogitionis Defuncti tertio, et sejtimo, et trigesimo.".

Although the ninth day was so widely observed, especially in the East, we find it rejected by St, Augastiae, as recalling a henthen observsace. He says that it has no precedent in Scripture: "Theretore they ought, As it scems to me, to be kept from this custom (" which they call among the Latins, novemdial," ibid.), if any Christians observe that number in the case of their dead, which belonge rather to the custom of the Gentiles" (Quaest. in Gen. 172).
XXX. Annual Commemorations. - The celebratien at the year's end was recurrent from a very early period. Tertulllan, A.D. 195, says, "We make oilations for the departed by way of birthday gifts on the andirersary " (De Cor. Mil. 3). St. Cyprian, 250, of certaln martyrs: "We alWays, as ye remember, offer sacrifice for them, as often as we celebrate the passions and days of the martyrs by an annual commemoration" (Epist. 39, p. 77). Gregory Nazianzen thus apustrophises his deceased brother Caesarius: "Every year will we, at least those who are left alive, offer honours and rites of commemoration " (Orat. wi. § 17 ). It is probable that Monica had in mind this custom of a yearly when she said, shortly before her death, "J nsk no more than that, wherever ye are, yo will rememler me at the altar of the Jord" (Aug.

Cinf. ix. 9). Cinf. ix. ?).
XXXI. Daily Masses far the Deal.-In the 6th century we find masses said daily in the West on behalf of the departed: e.g. a widow of Lyons "celebrated masses every day, and offered an oblation pro memoria viri " (Greg. Turon. de Glor, Conf. 65). Gregory of hime in hls Dialogucs (iv. 55) spenks if a priest who "for a whole week afflicted himselt" In tears, and dialy oflerel the salutary host "tior one decemand. He also relates of himself that he once ordered a priest "to oller sacritice for thirty days congecutively" for the soul of a mook who had broken his rule (ibid.). It is, in all probathility, owing to this statement of Gregory, that the practice of treatals (trigintale, trentale, trigintalium, trigintinarium, trentenarium, tricenarium, \&c.) was said to have originated with him (Saln in Boan, lier. Lit. i. xv. 4). We do not hear of It, however, as usual, until the 8th ceatury. In 757, Lullas, archbishop of Mentz, writes to his presbyters: "We have sent you the names of the lord bishop of Rome (Stepibun II., Intely decensed), for whom let each one of you sing thirty masses et illos psalmos et jejunium (probubly corr"pt), according to our castom" (Ep. I07, inter Epp. Bonifacil, ed. Wiirdw.). In the 9 th century, tho filthtul in France were commanded to keep fast and to make oblations for their klndred thirty days (Capit. Reg. Fr. vi, 198). Siunilarly Herard of Tours. (can. 58): "Triginti diebus amisi et parentes pro eis agant." This lengthened observance of thirty days was obvlously susgested by Numb. xx. 29 and Deat. $x \times i v .8$. In Bede wo read of a priest who offered masses frequently (saepius, crebras) for a brother supposed to be dead (Ilist. Eecl. Angl. iv. 22). They do not appear to have been daily, nor is any period meationel throughout which he offered them.
XXXII. Where the Name of the Deceused vas introduccd. - For several centuries there were no special prayers provided for use when the eucharist was celebrated on account of one departed: only the name was introduced at some appropriate part of the service. The "council of Châlons-sur-Saône, 813, orders that "in every celebration of the mass the Lord be entreated for the spirits of the departed at a suitable place" (can, 39). At that place tha names were mentioned. It varied, as at length fixed by custom, in the several liturgies. [DIPtycus; Names, Oblation of.] XXXIII. Missa Defuncti.-We do not know when, at a celebration for the dead, a set of proper prayers (Misss pro Defuncto, Missa Defancti) was substituted for the usual collects. For a long period "a mass for the dead differed [only] from an ordinary mass in being celebrated without Gloria, and Alleluia, and the kiss of pence " (Amal. do Eccl. Off. iii. 44). There is reason to think that the change began in France, for our earliest examples of a Missa Defunetl are thence. One occurs in the Besancon Sacramentary discovered at Bobio, consisting of a proper Praefatio (Oallican), Collectio, Post nomina, Ad pacem, and Contestatio (11", Poust Ital. . . 385). The MS. is of the 7 th century. There is also a fragment of a Missa pro Uefunctis discovered by Niebuhr, and published by Bunsen, which the lattor ascribes to Hilary of Poitiera, A.D. 350 (Analects Antenic. lii. 2633). Had it been so earl;, we should certainly have found similar-fermsin alf the sacramentaries used in France, but there are none in the Gallico-Gothic, the Frankish, or old Gallican, the MSS. of which date from about 550 to about 800 (Nurat. Lit. Hom. Vet. ii. 513). There are soveral such missse in the Moxarabic Missal, but we can gather nothing to the purpose from this fact, as that liturgy was in use and receiving additions till the 1lth century. Turning to Kome we find several such masses in the Gelasion Sacramentary (Murat. i. 752, &c.), the MS. of which is at least 1100 years old; but thoy could not have baen in general use or much known when Amnlarius wrote (827), for beside the remark quoted above he snys expressly ( $i$ id.), " Recordatio mortuorum nuncupative agitur ante Nobis quopue peccatoribus," i.e. in the canon. The MSS, of the Gregorinn Siscramentary, in which similar forms are tound (Murat. ii. 752), do not carry us with probability higher than the 8th century. The Gelasian Missa Defuncti contained a collect for the day, Secreta, Infra actionem, l'ost Commun. (Greg. Ad complendum), to which the Gregorian adds a proper prefice (Murat. ij. 354 et sef.).

The name of the person for whom the oblation was made was inserted in each of the proper prayers of the Missa. Thus in the Besancon Sacramentary: "That Thou vouchsafe to take the soul of Thy servant $N$. (famoli Tui ill.) into the bosom of Abrsham" (Pracf.) ; "lo take to Thy. self the soul of Thy servant N." (coll.); "We pray l'hee for the soul of Thy servant N." (Post nom.); "For the spirits of all the departed, but chietly for the soul of this 'Thy servant N." (Ad pac.); "Do Thou, O Christ, receive the soul of Thy servant N." (Contest.) (Mus. Ital. i. 385).

These Missae pro Defunctis were in use in the church of Rome before prayer for acknowledged saints was given up in it. The Secreta for the feasts of St. Leo and St. Gregory was left with the following petition in it down to the 13th century (see Innocent JII. Decr. Const. iii. 130): "Grant, 0 Lord, that this oblation may profit the soul of Thy servant Leo (or Gregory)" (Murat. ii. 25, 101).
The omission of the Alleluia which Amalarius (u, a.) seems to have thought universal in his time was, as we have seen, contrary to the feeling of the earlier church. Nor was thia expresgion of joy ever quite diaused even in the West. It is sung with the Othicium or Introit of the Mozarabic Missa Defuncti: "Thou ert my portion, O Lord. Alleluia." "In the lend of the living. Alleluia," bis (Miss. Moz. Leslie, 456). Compare the Officium pro Defunctis mentioned at the end of § vii. 1.

The Antiphonary escribed to Gregory I. supplies two sets of Antiphons for these Missae Defunctorum (Pamelius, Ritualo PP. ii. 175), in which the chief point of interest is that one of them has the introit, "Requiem aeternam dona eis, Domine, et lux perpetua luceat eis " (from 2 Esdr. ii. 345 ; Vulg. 4 Esdr.), still in nse. The former clause of it had been used earlier as a capitulum (see before, vii. 1).

Toledo in 694. Priosts would say "missam pro requie dufunctoruin" for a living object of their hatred, in hope that it would crase his leath, "ut ; . mortis ac perditionis incurrat periculum" (can. 5). It is dillicult to believe that this was very common, though the council aifirma that meny priests ("plerique shecerlotum") were guilty of it. Gratian givos the canon in brief, but preserves this startiing expression (II. $x x y i . v .13,81 ;$ Quicunque sacerdotsm).
XXXV. Muturl Compacts for Misses, fo.In the 8 th century we legia to hear of agreementa between priests that prayers and masses shail be said by the survivore for those of the number who should pre-decease them. In 752 we fiad Boniface making this proposal to the abbot Optatus: "We earsestly beseech you that there be the intimacy of brotherly charity between us, and that there ba mutuad prayers for the living, and that prayers nad masses be celebrated for those who depart out of this world, when the aames of the deceased ahall be sent from either of us to the other" ( ()$^{\prime}, 93$ ). About the same time Cuthbert writes to lallus: "The names of the brethren which thou hast seat to me are recorded with the aames of the brethred of this monastery who sleep in Christ, so that I have given order to celebrate for them Didety masses, and more than that " (Ep. 127, joter Epp. Bonif.). As the writer speaks of the "amicitiae foedera" long existing between them, and eatreats Lulius to continue to pray for him, and declares that he (Cuthbert) remeinjers him in his "daily prayers," we shall not be wrong in regarding this celebration of masses as another instance of the muturd engagemeats then becoming common. In 765 a number of bishops and abbots, met in council at Attigai-sur-Alsne, agreed that "every ode of them.. should, when any one of their number deprated this life, say one huadred psalters, and their presbyters sing a hundred spectial masses for him; and that the bishop should himself perform thirty misses, unless prevented by sickaess or any other hindrance, in which case he was to ask another bishop to sing them for him. Abbots, not bishops, were to ask bislopss to perform thirty maxses to their stead, and their presbyters were to perform one hundred masses, and their moaks to remember to sigg whe hundred psalters" (Labb. Conc. vi. 170:). A similar compact was eatered into by the bishops at Tousi or Savonières in 859 (see ciad. 13, Labb. viii. 678). [See Necrologivm.] XXXVI. To whom Christian lites tere denidd. -Catechumeas were not geaerally buried with the solemaities thst we have deseribed. St. Chrysostom, after a refereace to those rites, says: "But this concerns those who have dejarted in the faith. Catechumensare not thought worthy of this consolation, but are deprived of every help of the kind, with one exception. What is that? We can give to the poor on their behalf, and that yjelds them a certain solace, for God wills that we should be bevefited by one noother" (Hom. iii. in Ep, ad Philipp. § 4 ; sim. Hom. xxiii. in Ev. S. Joan, § 3 ; xxxxv. 50; Mom. 21 in Act. App. 3, 4). This was the rule, but there must have been exueptions in the case of catechumens who suffered desth for the taith, for their martyrdom was considered an efleetual baptism in blood (see Blnghem, x. ii. 20, and Dun, Iv. 21, §29). Valentinian was an instance. He wis preprared, und enrnestly desired to be bapitized, but wns cut off suddenly before he could receire the sacrament. We should infer from the langunge of St . Ambrose that he was liuried with all the usual rites; for not ealy dil he delizer a funeral orition on the occasion of his denth, but in it he says, "Give the boly mysterles to his manes; let us pray for his reat with plous affection. Give the henvenig acraments ; let us wait on hls soul with our oblations " (lre Obitu Valent. 56).

In 518 the council of Braga decreed that "neither the commomoratlon of an oblation nor the effice of pasilin-siuging should be bestowed on catechunens who had dled without the redemption of buplisun " (can. 17) ; and, with regard to suicides, that "no commemoration should be made for them in the oblation, and that their bodios should not be conlucted to the grave with paimy " (ean. 16). Buth these rules, the council deciares, had been vlolatod through ignorance. If made the same ordur with reference to those who are "pumished for tholr crimes" (can. 16). The council of Auxerre, 578, also forbids the oblation of suiches to be received (can. 17). Earlier than either, the councll of Orleans, 533 , rsps: "We judge that the oblation of the dead Wha have been eut off in any erlme (i.e. probubly, 'while under aceuantion for any offence'), onght to be recelved, jrovided that they are proved not to have brought death on themselves by their owa hads" (can. 14). Fugeniua II., A.d. 824, deprives nuns who perslast to the last in breach of rule, of "Christian birial" (Dicr. 3). He deerees the same agnluat those who exhibit feats of rtrength at fhirs, &e., though granting them "pensnce and the viatlcum" (ibid. 7). The conacil of Menta, $8+8$, decrees that "the bodies of those who ure hung on the gallows may be carried to chureh, nad mases and oblations offered for them, if they hare confessed their bins" (ean. 27).
XXXVII, linreconciled Penitents.-The Gregarian Saciamentary provides a "Missa pro Defanctis desideruntibus Poenifentiam et minime consequentibus" (Murnt. OCTAVA, sister, probably, of St. Laurentius ; comnemorated Aug. 17. (Usuard, Mart.)

OCTAVAE INFANTIUM, Low Snnday or the octave of Liaster, otherwise called Dominica in Albis, so called because the white bands which were wrapped round the heade of the newlybaptized infants were then taken off. "Hodie Octorse dicuntur infantium, revelonda sunt capita corum, quod est indicium libertatis" (August. de Temp. 160, § 1); and again, "vos qui baptizati estis et hodie completur sacramentum Octavarum vestrarum, infantes appellamini quia regenerati estis." (1bid. Serm. II, de Diversis.)

OCTAVE OF A FESTIVAL. (Octava, Octavac.) The eighth day, or space of eight days, after a festival, kept as a prolengation or repe tition of the festival itself, honoris causa. It is a Western custom, appareatly unknown in the Oriental church. [See Arodosis.] In more recent times the number of festivals to which octaves are assigued has been largely multlplied; and the octaves are divided into four cliasses, according to their degrees of solemnity ; but within the first eight centuries it would seem that only Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost had this distiaction, together with the Epiphany in some localities, and perhans the Feast of the Dedication of the Church, or of the Patron Saint.

Various rensous have been assigned for the custom. Different writers on ritual have found a ground for it in the Jewish observance of the eighth day for circumcision, to which indeed St. Augustine refers in speaking of the octare of Easter as kept by the newly bapilized, Oetavae Infantiom (do Div. Temp. cap, i.; Ep. Iv. 32, 33, &e.). or th the eelebration of the feast of Tabernaclos tor eight days, or iu the Fenst of the Dedlention of the Temple by Solomon, and of the re-ledication uuder Zerubbabel; or, ngaln (umler the now covenuat), In the applearance of our loord on the eighth day from the Resurrection; and in the mystieal value of the number eight, as a symbol of perfection nad of rest.
But the first actual trace of the custom upon which wo light is the Octave of Easter, luring which the newly buptized continued to wear their white lapitismal garments. Bele mentions the Octave of l'eatenost. In n capitulary of Charlemagne we meet with the octavos of Christmas, Ejphany, nul Easter ; in can. 26 of the connell of Main $\angle$ (A.5. 813) with these of Christmas, Easter, and l'entecost. The end of the 8 th and berginuing of the ath ceutury was the periml to which may be asaignell the chief growth of this ubservance. In the trentise De Eiceles. Off. of Amalariua, we hear only of the otaves of Christmas, Eyiphany, Easter, nad l'eatecost ; but it says also (iv. 3ib): "Solemus octavas natalitiorum aliguormm Sanctorum celebrare, eorum seilicet, quorum festivitas apud nos elarior habetur, veluti est iu octavis apostolorum I'etri et Banli, et cacterorum Sanctorom, quorum consuetudo diversarum ticelesiarum octavas celebrat," clearly implying that the eustom was growing up in differeut parts of the church, but that it hail not yet become a matter of uuiform obligatiou.
As to the liturgical observance of these days, from the fact that neither iu the Gelasian nor Gregorim Sacramentary is any mase assigued tor the days within the octave, but only for the octave itself, we may perhapsinfer that at lirst the octuve whs mevely, as it is still in the majority of cases, a repectitiou of the festival, and of its otlice on the day week, nud that afterwarde the intermeliate days were filled up by similar repeated commemorations. This would only hold good, however, of the principnl octaves. The various rules for determiniag the rlght precellence of officus, wheu uther fostivals fall withia an oetave, belong to a perial later than cur limits.

The counell of Antioch, A.D. 341 (c. 24. 25), bipenk.s of the jussibility ef the revenues of the church being misuppliesi by the pishop and his presbyters, und decrees that nll church property should be nilministered with the knowlelge of the whele of the clergy, bath priests nad deatons, nud a regular acconint kept of the property belonging to the chareh, in oriler to prevent waste on the one hand, and spoliation of the property ot a deceased bishop on the other. Though the nppointment of an oeconomus is not specinily decreel in these eanouns, yet it seems to have been considered as lmplied in them, or at least originating from them. At the council of Chateedun, A.D. 451 (act. 9). the case was brought forwaril of lbas, bishop of Eidessa, who was chargel with mulrersation of the property of the church, and who promises that for the future the revenues of the see shall be administered by an oeconomus chosen trom the elergy, according to the decrees of the grent council of Antioch. From the dite iadeed of this council the oecubomus is recognised in the decrees of couacils as one of the ollicials uecessurily existing in a diveese. The council of Gangra (e. 7, 8) torbinls under paia of anathema that any one shall reccive or dijpease the revenues of the church except the bishop himselt; or the officer appoiuted to the stewardship of benetiactions (eis oikovoulav eìmotar). [Vacancy.] It would appear trom these canons that the otife of oeconomus was ankoown in the dioseses of Spmia at the date of the councils by whleh they were tnade. But the secoad conncil ot Soville, A.D. 618 (c, 9), after reciting that It had come to the knowloige of the council that certain bishops had oeconomi chosen from the laity, enacts that no bishop should siminister the temporal uthals of his diocese except throngh un veconomus ehosen from among his clergy, nceording to the decree of the couseil of Chaleedon, giring as a reason that it ls unbecomiag that a layman should be the representative vicurius of a bishop, or sit in judgment on church matters; and that those who sre assuclated with a bishop in the sdministration of ablairs ought not to ditier with bim citiser in aprurel or profession. From this canon it ajpears that the oeconomus possessed mome jurisiliction in the ndjustment of finameial matters. Hhus we are tuld (Theod. Lect. $M . E$. . .)

Cone. ii. p. 660), strictly torthis him to take money for the appoutment of an oeconomus, whom he styles the dispenser of the property of the charch ("facultatum ecclesine dispensator"). In an epistle to the church of Laun ( $O_{p p}, \mathrm{li}, \mathrm{p}, 17 \mathrm{~N}$ ), the same predate derlares that the eeconomua was the proper guardian of the property of the see at the death of the bishop. Liberatus (Brcv. c. 16) ppeaks of a certain John, who was promutel trom being an neconomus to be presbyter of the charch at Talenuesas, and afterwards became again veconomus, having charge of the revenues of all the churches. The duties of the oecomomas are dehithed at ength by Jxidore of Seville (Dpist. I.; hibl. Patr. viii. p. 210) as comprising all businesa relating to tha boilding of churches, the management of all law matters in which the church Was concerned, the superintentence of all tields, vinpyards, add all ecclesiastlcal possessions, the division of the revenues in due proportion among the elergy, the widows, and poor, and the allowance of food and clothing to the clergy and others belonging to tifi, bohop's houvelold. But all to be done ander the authority and liy the direction of the bishop.
From all this two thinga seem clear-that the oaconomus was to be one of the clergy, and to be appointed by the bishop. But a canon of Theaphilus of Alexandria (c. 9 , in Beveridge, Pundect. ii. 173) salys that t'e oeconumus was chusen by the vote of all the clergy. (See Bingbam, Anti;uities, iil. 13, § i.)
In later years the duties of the occonomus appear to here been transferred to the treasurer, Thesaurarius.

The Antiphonarlum nacribed to Grugory, but Inter, provides offertoria for every considerable day of the Christinn yoar. Walnfrill (u,s.) tells us that dewn to his time no offertory was sung on Fiaster eve, nor lo we find any provided in the antiphonary of Gregory (Pnmel. u. s. ii. 111).

The Milanese Offerende, now called effertorium (Marteue, de Ant. Eecl. Rit. I. iv, sii. ord. 3), was constructed like the Romnn (Punel. s. s. i. 298). It is now sung while the priest is censing the nitar and nblations, after having said the secret prayers of oblation (Mart. u. s.; Le Brum, Disaert. iii. art. ii.).

Roman Pontiff in the name of St. Peter and the Church to a victorions general, and expresses his oelicf that this, as well as the Veronese basin, may have been presented to a captain of the Byzantine army of Belisarius or of Narses. But there is no doubt that Dona Dei in eceles:astical Latin aignifiea gifts made to God, i.e. retive offeringa. Fontanini gives (p. 32) an inscrip)tion over a side door of the church of St. Peter's at Baynacavallo, c. 857 : De Donis Dei ct Sincti Petri Apustoli, Johunnes umilis Presbyter fecit. The inscription on the golden cover of the Evangeliarium given by Quecn Theodelinda ta the church of Monza contains the same formula, and there is no doubt that the meaning is the same here. Mabillon (Iter Ital. p. 77) mer.tions a similar diah of bronze in the Museo Laadi, which he designates, on very insufficient grounds, the shicld of Belisarius, exhibiting Vitiges as a suppliant. All these dishes are of Byzantine workmunahip, and belong to the same period, the 5 th or 6 th century. The British Museum contnins an example of an offertory dish of Northern manufacture once belonging to the abbey of Chertsey, and dug up in its ruins at the begiuning of this century, bearing an inscription in characters variously regarded as Runic, Russian, or' "a fanciful manipulation of German black letter" (Eric Magnusson). This veasel is a flat circular dish of nearly pure copper with a very wide rim, on which the asscription, of which we give a cut, is engraved.

Inscription on Offertory Dish.
Its diameter is about 9 inches, and its greatest depth $1 \neq$ inches. Mr. John Mitchell Kemble (Archacolot. 1843, vol. xxx. pp. 40-46) regarded it as a copy made in the 10 th or 11 th century of a Scandinavian alms-dish used in the monastery almost from the time of its foundation in the 7 th century. He renders the inscription in Saxen words: GE-TEOH VRECKO, i.e. "Offer, sinner." Mr. G. Stephens (Rumic Monuments, vol. i. p. 482), on the other hand, considers it to be an original work of the 9 th century, which must have found its way by gift or otherwise from the North of England, to which the words of the inscription beleng. On the authority of Russian scholars he denies the Sclavonic character of the inscription (on which see Archaedog. vol. xliv. pp. 73, 74), which is engraved "in mixt Runic and Decorated uncials." Mr. Stephens remarks that "more than once Old English charters mention an 'offriug disc' presented to same church or monastery," and adds that during his residence in Scandinavia he had come across many modern examples copied from ancient works, with pious inscriptions cut or painted on them.

OFFICE, THE DIVINE (Officium DivivUM). This stated service of duily panger has been callell by varians names: such as Opus Dei in the rule of St. Benedict, as though it were the special work to be performed by the clergy for and to God; or Cursus, from the course of the oun which determines the hours of prager (St.

Columbnaus, Reg. cap. 47), so cslled nlsa by Gregory of Tours, " exsurgente Abbate cum Monachis all celebraadum Cursuin;" and by St. Bonifice, bishop of Mentz, wha bids hls clergy "speciales horas et Cursum ecclesiae custodiant."

We also meet with the following terms used in the same sense:--Collecta in the rule of St. Pa. chomius ; also the Greek words canon or synaxis. Also ayenda in the acts of various councils, ns being we of the mere important duties to be performed. The term missa, alsa, is sometimes applied to the office for the hours of prayer. " ln conclusione matutinarum vel vespertinarum missarum" (Conc. Agath.).

The name breviary, by which the Divine office, or rather the book containing it, was subsequently known, und whioh in cammon use took the place of all others, probnbly originated in the form of office, thus deaignated, being an abbreviation of a previuusly existing form [Breviary, p. 2t7].
The object of this article is to give an eutline of the othices for the several hours of prayer, which together censtitute the Dioine office, as distinguislied from the liturgy-of the breviary, in a word, as distinguished trom the missal.

There is much obscurity as to the sources and original furm of these offices. Heace many conjeetures, some resting upon very slight hints. To pursue this most interesting inquiry with any fulness would far exceed the limits of an srtiche, and we must cantent ourselves with the bare statement of results arrived at. It is sufficingt for our purpase that the germ of the offices as they now exist may be traced to primitive, if not to Apostolic times.
But though in course of time the Eastern and Western farms of worship came to differ so much from each other, that In the opiniou of a learned madera writer, the Oriental rites (i.e. of the dnily office) are, as to their origin, " perfectly distinct from those of the Latin churches" (Palmer, Orig. Lit. vol. i. p. 218), it seenis more probable that both the Greek and Latin effices were derived from the same source, and that the wide subsequent divergence is due to the different manner In which they were developed or added to, and largely to the different bent of the Greek and the Latin minds, and the different genius of the Greek and the Latin langunges." It is also probable that the germ of both Eastern nad Wcitern forms alike is to be found in the earliest Eastern forms.

This form appeara ta have consisted in the recitation of psalms, tegether with prayers and hymns, but with no lessons; and to hare been dexigned for use during the night and in the early morning. SS. Basil and Chrysostom and others often spenk of these services. The origin of these prayers has been traced with much probability to the "Eighteen prayers", used in the Jewish synagogue. [Archdeacon Freeman develops this theory with much ingenvity in hls learned work The Principles of Divine Sorvice, cap. i. sec, iii.] It may be permitted to say a few werds on the arigin and grewth of the Western rites, and especially of the Roman. This has undoubtedly the chicf faterest fur Western Christians, as being the moull in which the devotions of the Western chorch hive been cast for so many centuries. Though there were countless variations of national and local use in the early and medineval church, yet these variations were, nfter all, in matters of detail which did not touch the outline or substance of the office ; and all the uses, with the two important exceptions of the Ambrosian sad the Mozarabic, were closely modelled on the Romana pattera.

The earliest form of the Roman office appanrs to have consisted solcly of the psalter, so distributed as to he recited once n week. At the end ot the appointed number of psalms for the daily office Pater noster was said. This seems to have constituted the entire office, which contained no lessons, hymns, or collects. Traces of this custom may still be found in the title of the first part of the brevinry, which is still called psalterium, though it now contains a great deal more than the psalter (indeed all the "ordinary" parts of the office, except the lessoas and what is appointed with them, which are relegated to the proprium de tempore), and which is headed $/$ 'salterium dispositum per hehbomadam; and also in the fact that Pater naster is still recited at the end of the psalms of each nocturn.
Thns the author of the book de Virginitate, smong the works of Athannsius, couples Pater .ioster with the psnlms as forming a complate office ; and Gregory of Tours (Vit. Patr. c. 5), Whea wishing to say that he had not yet recited his office, says he has not gone through his palins: "Quod necdum Domino psslmorum decautationem debitrm exsolvisset."
Lessons were in carly times only read at the nass. So we find that of the enily office books sent by fregory the Great and others into Gaul, the missals alone contrined nny lessons. It will le seen, too, in the course of this article, that the nocturaal office [ $\mu \in \sigma о \nu$ úктiov or $\mu \in \sigma о \nu \cup к т \iota к \delta \nu$ ] of the Eastern church and the Nozarabic matins contain no lessons at the present time.
The first to introduce lessons into the nocturnel office nppenr to have been the monks, with the double object of thus obtaining variety is the office and occupation for themselves during the oocturnnl watches. Thus St . Benedict in his order prescribed no lessons in the nocturunl office during the summer, when the nights are shorter; nad when a question arose in the time of Charlemagne, why he had made this prorision, Theodemarus, abbat of Monte Cassia, in a letter to the emperor, gives as the ressoa thst before the time of St. Gregory the pope, it whs not the custom at Rome to recite any lessons, and that that pontiff was the first to alopt them: "In Ecelesia Romnna Sacras Sripturns legi mos non fuerit ante B. Greg. Psp." &c. [Lection.]
Cassinn, also, when describing the nocturnal ofice of the moaks of Palestine, says only that ofter twelve ${ }^{\text {b }}$ psalms they recited a prayer, and, on Suntay only, two lessons.
To this earliest form of othice, panlms and Pater toster, the Aposties' Creed was added; and it is supposed thnt pope Damnsus [A.D. 356-384] sanctioned an order of distribution of p-alms, neting with the co-operation of St. Jerome, who is also reputed to hnve framed an order of lessons, 1 known ns Cones Hieromymi, or simply Liker Comrs or Liher Comitis. [LAectionary.]

Whenever the lessons were finally made part Scrip office, it is clear that the course in which and bere should lie rend was fixed definitely and by nuthority. For in nll the wriety of breviaries of the Roman type, however much the individual lessons may vary-nud there nre great variations-certnia books are rend in all at ceriain seasons; so that Issiah Is universnlly read in Advent, St. Pnul's Epistles in the Epiphany season, Genesis and the rest of the Pentateuch from Septurgesima onwarids, Jeremiah in Passiontide, the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles in Eastertide, and the historical, moral, nid prophetical books from Trinity Sundny onwards. The Gospels were read at the Mass, and so do not appear in the course of daily $r$ tr ?. Indeed, so firmly has this sequence of is rooted itself into the mind of the clur:h, that the modern French breviaries, which utterly revolutionised the order: of saying the pwalter, respected the course of Scripture reading, while often altering and lengtheniag the individusl lessous. ${ }^{\text {c }}$

Gregory the Grent added antiphons and responsories: and this, with the exception of minor enrichments, the date and origin of which it is often diffieult to nscertain, brought the office to the degree of maturity which is sufficient for our present purpose, and, to the form in which it substantially exists and is used nt tha present day. Later modifications and rerisions sre beyond our scope.
We now proceed to give a skeleton of the offices themselves, beginning with those of the ortbodos Enstern church. Detuils would the here unsuitnble, and, unless entered into more fully than the space at command permits, would confuse what they were meant to elucidnte.
The daily offices of the Greek church are contained in the Horologium [p. 784]. They are arranged, beginning with the nocturnn] office.
The following is the order of the offices :-

The Western offices will not detain us long. Even those parts which are not intimately. known to all are of a fnmiliar type. They are also shorter than the Eastern, and arranged with much greater terseness nud method. The Roman ofice is by far the most important and most widely used. The older English, French, Gurman, [^72]and Scandinarian uses are of precisely the same form, and only ditler in details, such as the calendsrs, commensorntions of soints, order of lessons, responsories, &c.-variations which it would be at once hopeless and useless to attempt to point out, and the magnitude and importance of which have been mueh exaggernted. There are indeed few more striking evidences of the uniformity and organization of the lioman Church than the wide dissemination and reception of its offices into distant regions and ditlerent races, and the unsnimity with which what was in essentials the same rite whs observed. The only two notable exceptions are the Amhrosian and the Mozarabie othices, both of which are very different from the Roman, and of great beauty; but which were used within narrow limits, and so are of much smaller practical impertnnce. They will be described.

The Roman hours are seven or eight in nun.ber, according as matins and lnuds are counted as one or two, i.c., Matins, lands, prime (or the hour), the third, sixth, and ninth hours, ves. pera, compline. Taking them in order we have:

1. Matins (matutinum):-

These consist on Sundays and double feasts of three nocturns, On simple fensta and week days of one. Easter day nut Pentecost with their octaves have only one nocturn with three psalins. The office for Sunday and feasts of nine lessons is as follows: is as follaws:
N.B. Before matins and all hours except compline is said secretly, Pater noster, Are Murua; and at the beginning of mntins and prime, and at the ond of compline, the Apostles' Crad.

In nocturn i . I'salms as appointed [12 on Sundays, 3 on fensts]. A verse and response. Pater noster, short form of absolution (absolutio), three lessons from Scripture in conrse, ench preceded by its benediction, and followad by its responsory.

In nucturn ii. Three psalms, each with its antiphon. lerse and response. Pater noster, absolution. Three lessons from the patristic writings, each with its benediction and responsor!.
In nocturn iii. The same as in nocturn ii., the lessons being a commentary on the gospel of the dny from some homily. Instead of the last responsory, Te Leum is said, except in Adrent, and from Septungesima to Easter, when it is only said on festivals. When Te Deum is not said, there is a responsory instead.

3. Prime:-

Pater noster. Ave Maria. Crelo. Deus in adjutorium, \&c. Hymn," $\mathrm{Jnm}_{\text {In }}$ Incis orto sidere."
Four psalms (on Sundsy), 53 [54], 117 [118], 118 [119] (first tour sections of eight verses ssid as two). On week days, 54 [54], a varying palm, 118 [119] (the same as on Sunday). The Athumusion Creed (when the service is on tha Sunday, ${ }^{4}$ and on Trinity Sunday). Cupitum:

Rep. "Christe fill Del vivi. Miserere nehls (bie). V. Quil sed.s ad denteram Patris. R. Miserere nobis. V. Giotla, &c. Il. Chisie filt, &e. V. Exaurge Christe ajuva nos. R. Eit libera nos propter neruen tuam.'
Then follow these preces, which are not said when the office is double, or within octaves. hyrie eleison (ter), Puter noster, Credo.
Preces of the ordinary form of verse and repone. Alternate confitcor and nisereatur by priest and choir. A few more alternate versioles. Then, whether the office be double or not, the Orutio, "Domine Deus Omnipotens,"' &c.

V. Benedicamus Domino, R. Deo gratias,

On weak duys the Athamasian Creed is not aid: in other respects the ollice is said as above. in Advent, Lent, and on certain other days, sditional preces are said before the confitior, from which point the office proceeds as usual.
4. Terce:-

Puter, Are, Deus in adjutorium. Hymn, "Nunc sancte nubis Spiritus."
Six sections of eight verses of Ps. 118 [119], aid in three, under one antiphon. Capitulum. Ruponsio brevis. Callect for the dity.
5, 6. Sext and now' are of precisely the same form, and reyuire no separate remark. At sert the hymn is "Rector petens, verax Dens," and at none "Rerum tenax Deus vigor."
When preces are said at lnuds, a shart form of rreces is aid at terce, sert, and none immediately before the collect for the day.

7. Jespers :-

Pater, Ate, Dous in adjutorium. Fire psalms as appointed, each with its antiphon. Capitulum. Hymn(varying with the day an! season). Verse and responie. That for ordinary Sundey and week days is
V. Dilgatur Domine oratio mea. K. Sicut incenoum In craspectu tua.
Magnificat (with its proper antiphon). Collect for the day. Commemorations, when snid.

[^74]When preces are said at lauds, they are alao said at vespers after magnificat.
8. Compline :-

Lectur. Jube Domne benedicere. lened. Noctem quietam, de.
Lectio brevis. 1 Pet. v, 8.
V. Adjutorium nostrum in nomiae Dominl.
il. Qui fecit cuelum et terram Pater, Confiteor, &c., alternntely, as at prime.
V. Converte nos Deus safutarle noster.
R. Et uverte írmituam a nebis.

Deus it adjuturium, do.
Pss. 4, 30 [31], (1-6), 90 [91], 133 [13.1], aaid under one antiphon.
Hymu, "Te lucis ante terminum." Cupitulum (Jerem. xiv. 9). Responsio brevis. Nunc dimittis (with its antiphen). Kyrie eleison (ter), Pater; Cred", and shurt preces. The collect "Visita quaesumus," &c. Benediction.

No notice has here been made of the short capittiar office at the end of prime, or of the antiphons to the B.V.M., of which one is aaid deily after lauds and compline.
The Roman office here given in outline is the model on which the seculur breviarics threugheut the Roman obedience were formed. These were universally of the same form, though differing iu many details, and local commemorations an i nsages. The Gregorian distribution of the psnlter is always adopted.0
In the old English uses the hymns and antiphons at compline varied with the season; and every day after compline and lauds, except in double feasts and during certain octaves and in Christmas and Eastertidee, a shert form consisting of Ps. 122 [123], a few versicles, and a collect was snid "pro pace ecclesiae." When this was said at lnuds, a sinilar form for protection during the day was satd after prime.

The monastic office, of whlch the Benedictine is the type, differs from the secnler in many respects, the chiet of which nre the following:
(1) The Benedictine distribution of the psalter is used and not the Gregorian.
(2) On Sundays, and days with three necturns. There ere four lessens in each nocturn, there are six l'ealms in beth the first and second nocturne, and three canticles in the third, each with responsery. Those of the first nocturn are from Scripture; those of the second from the writings of the fathers, or from the lives of the saints; those of the third from patristic exposition of the gospel. Te Deum is said after (not instead of) the ninth responsory, nud then follow the gospel and collect of the dny.
(3) On week days, and days of three lessons, twelve pselms are seid in two nocturns; six in each. In the first necturn three lessons, mostly from Scripture, are read. In the second necturn there are no lessons. In the weekday office of the Benedictine rites, from Easter to Nov. 1, no lessons are read, but only a Lectio brevis, varying with the day of the week.
(4) There are no preces in Lent, &c., at lauds
(5) Pe. 30 [31], ver. 1-6, and Nunc dimittis are not sail at compline, except on the three last days of the Holy woeh.

OFFICE, THE DIVINE

The Ainbrosian office, which is atill used in the diocese of Milan, except in the Swise portlon, which udheres to the Roman rite, requirce more detailed nutice. Its origin and, still more, the steps by which it arrived at its final shape, are involved in much obscurity. It is undoubtedly of high antiquity, and originally tramed by St. Ambrose. St. Simplician, who succeeted him as archbishop of Milan (a,d. 397), is said to have made many additions. It is probable that daring the following century tha office assumed its complete form as to its main teatures, and was afterwards gradually perfected in details. When St. Charles Borromeo beennie archbishop, he set to work to restore the ancient rites of the Miinnese church, into which he complains that much had been introdnced without nuthority from time to tima by individual priests ; and by comparison of the office, as he fuund it, with ancient documents and the "Ambrosian lastitutes," and with the help of learned men, to bring it back as far as possible to the originai form described by the most distinguished writers on tha divine offices, and especially hy his predecessor Theodorus."

The Ambrosian office then, in ita present form, which we are obliged to quote, owing to the uncertninty of earlier forms, is in outline as followa:-

Matins (Ad Matutinum):-

Pater noster. Ave Muria [secreto]. Deus in adjutoritu, &c. Domine ad adjueandum, &c. Giorit. Sicnt. Hymn, "Aeterne rerum conditor" [sail daily] Responsory [varying with the dny]. The Song of the Three Children [" Benedictus eч," &c. vv. 29-34] with its antiphon. Benedictus es Dires. R. Amen.
[The foregoing is commnn to ali matins.]
Then: On Sunda 18 three canticles said in three nocturns, one in ench, each with antiphon. In Noct. i. Song of Isuiah [from chap. $x \times x i$.] De nocte vigilat.
In Noct, ii. Song of Hannah [from 1 Sam, ii.].
In Noct, iii. in Winter (i.e, from the first Sunday in October till Palm Sunday) the Sony of Ilubakkus [Hab. iii.].

In Noct. iii. in Summer (i.e. from Easter till the last Sunday in September) the Song of Jon th [Jon. ii.].
[On Sundays no psalms are said at nocturns.]
On rece diys, the nppointed section of the psalms, called a decuria, seid in three nocturns [v. art. Psalmony].

Then follow three lessons.
On Sunlays from a homily on the Gospel.
On week duys from the Iloiy Scriptures read In course.

Each lesson is prefaced by a benediction; and the first two nre followed by, a resjonse, and the third by Te Joum when said. When nut said, there is no third response.

[^75]The benedictions are more vnried than in the Roman rite. The responses, no the contrary, ars for the most part not so full or rich.

Lauds:-
The following is the order for Sundays and the more important festivnis of waints :-
Deus in adjutorium, &c. Benedictus, with its proper antiphon.
[On Suadays in Advent, Christmas Day and ita octave, and on the Epiphany, Attende coelun [Deut. xxxii.] is said instead of Bencdictus.]

Kyric eleison (ter).
An antiphon called antiphona ad crucem, proper to the day, and anid five, or on sume daya seven times.
The Song of Mroses ["Cantemus Domino," from Exod. xv.] with its propar antiphon, and prefaced by na ubvarying oratio secreta.

Benedicile with antiphon and oratio secreta.
A cullect (oratio $1^{\mathrm{mm}}$ ) [varying with the season].

V. Sancta Trinltas nos semper salvet et benedicat. R. Amen.
V. Ftdetiom animae per thet misericordiam requiescant to pace. R. Amen. ${ }^{-1}$

On week days the office varies thus:-
Instead of Cantemus Domino nad Benerlicite, Ps. 50 [51] is snid on all days but Saturdsy. Ps. 117 [118] is said on Saturdiy.

There are no psallenda. The resp. in bapt. and the four rerses of a psalm are nlways said, and there are three collects instead of four.

There are variations in the arrnggement of the details of the otfice at special aeasoms and on festivals.

Prime :-
Pater noster, &c., as at the beginning of all the hours. Hymn, "Jam lucis ol to sidere." P'ss. 53 [54], 118 [119] (four first sections of eight verses). Epistolella, a a tew versicles and responses. Athanasian creed (called simply sy $1 / n b o(u m)$.

Then on Suadays and the higher class of festivals three collects, of which the first is the same as the corresponding Roman collect, and the office ends, -

When preces are not said, the collects or aratienes follew immediately the response after Nuns dinititis.
In Lent an additienal hymn is said after the paalms.
The Mozaratic or Spanish office differs widely from all others. It is of high antiquity. The Spanish tralition would trace its origin to St. Peter, te diaciples of whom and of St. Paul it assigns the introduction of Christianity into Spaine sad maintains that it should be called origially Roman and Gothic, after the conversios of Recesredus, king of the Goths, to the Catholic fsith, and the public abjuration of the Arian heresy in the third council of Toledo, A.D. 589. Subsequently St. Isidore, archbishopp of Serille, and his brother Leander, who was a frlend of Gregory the Great, revised and expurgated the oflice, which had contracted many Haws, and it is heace often known as the Isidoriinn rite. At a later period Cardinal Ximenes, "quasl npis argumentosa," ngain revised the office and reduced it to its final form.

The opinion now generally accepted is that the Mozarabic rite is a variety of the so-callod Gallican or Ephesine family, which professedly traces back to St. John. The traces back to St. John. The groundwork of the office was probably introduced with Chilstianity into Spain. To enforce uniformity of use the Council of Gerona [A.D. 517] directed that the order of celebrating mnss and the Divine office, which was used in the Metropolitan church of Tarragona, should be alone adepted throughout the prorince. Gregory V11. [A.D. 1073-1085] directed the use of the Spanish office to be abolished, and the Roman lotroduced in its place. After some resistance this was eflected. Afterwards oo strong a leeling was manifested at Toledo in favour of the national rite, that its uss was sanctioned in seven of the old churches of Toledo, the lioman being adopted into the ot hers. Cardinal Ximenes nfterwards built and endowed the so-called Mozsrabic chapel in Toledo cathedral for the maintenance of the rite.
The hours are the same as the Roman, with the uddition of $A$ urora, which is said wheu the otlice is of the week day [in feriss]."

All the hours begin as follows :-

Kyrie eleison, Christe elcison, Kyrie eleison. Paler noster. Ave (secreto).

A short form of commemoration, consisting of a verse and response, here cailed lauda, and n short prayer for protcetion and guidance through the diay.

Aurora:-
This service is said when the office is of the week day (in feriis per totum nonum). Psis. 69 [70], and the following sections of Ps. 118 [119]: Benti immacu'ati, In quo corriget, Retribue servo tuo, said under nde nntiphon. A laudu, Pater noster (with the emboiismus), a short form of interccssory prayers (preces).

Prine:-
P'ss. 66 [67], 144 [145] (said in two divlsions), $112[11: 1], 118[119]$ (Adhacsit pavimento, Leyen pone, Et reniat), saill under one antiphon.
Rtsponsory (varying); a shurt lesson (Zachar. viii.) called prophetiu; second (Rom. xiii.); a lund h.
Hymn ("Jam lucis orto sidere"), except in Eastertide, when the hymn is "Aurora lucis rutilat."
V. bımum est confiteri domino. R. Et praltere nomint tho altissime.

On uech days (in diebus ferialibus), Benedictus cs (as at laods), and Ps. 50 [5!].

Suphlicatio [in firm a short bidding prayer] beginning "Oremus mundi," &c. Cupitula [a prayer]. Pater noster, &c. Benedictio. These all tary with the office.

Terce: —
Four psalms, i.e. Pss. 94 [95], 118 [119] (Memur esto, Portio mea, Boastatem), under one antighon. Ricsponsory. Two siort lections (similar to those at prime). Lauda, hymn, supplicatio, capitula, Pater noster, &e. Benedictio. All the parts of the otlice except the palms vary with the season.
sext and None are of exnctly the same form and require no remarks.
h There sre varieties of antiphons, as has been explained in the arifte Antuphon. It is impossible to translate these technical terms.
1 Of this there sre two torme-a langer one used on Sundays, and a shorter on other days. I ater noster is sald with the response "Amee" to each elause, except to Panem nostrum, to which the risponse is "Quia Deus es."
J Mizarable beneffetions sre in three claneen, each snswered by"Amen." They vary with the day, and gome are very beauliful.
$k$ This is sald to the Mozarabic rite in the plurs! : "Credimus in unum Deum," sc.

OFFICE, THE DIVINE

The psalms rre: at Sext, Pss. 53 [54], 118 [119] ( (ieci julicium, Mirabilia, Justus es Dumine). At None, Pss. 145 [145], 121 [122], 122 [123] $123[12+]$. In lent, and oo certain other penitential days, the form of the office for these three hours is dillerent, but offers no specinl jeculiarity to call for explanation in this short survey.

- Vespers:-

After the introduction, a laudat; antiphon; noother landa. Hymr, suppliatio, capituh, Pater noster, &e. Denelictio, with its ir tio Sonus (or sono) [onitted "in feriis"], follewed by another luult with Its oratio, and a short form of commemoration of the same form as that at lauds.
Compline:-Pss. 4, vv. 7, 8, $9 ; 133$ [134]. A few versicles for protection and forgiveness, Hy $\mathrm{mmn}^{2}$ " Sol nngelorum respice." P 's: 90 [91], with its nntiphon. More versi les from the psalms. Hymn, "Caltor Dei meeneato." Supplicatio, capitula, Pater noster, \&c.; benelictio. At the end of the service a short form of conmendntied corresponding to the commemeratio at lauils and vespers.
On Saturdays and high fegtivals, "in diebns snbbatorum vel praecipunrum festivitat um,"after the ipsalms ma responsory is said, foliowed by two short lessons, then a hymn, Ps, 50 [51] with a versus, said ns an nntiphon. Kyrie eleison, Pater noster, &c. Then on week days (in feriis) miserationes, which nre short intercessery petitions in the form of litanies, with a ceantant response, so called because the opening werds are "Miserere," or "Deus misereve," or "Dumine miserere," and vnrying with the day of the week. Then a capitulu:n, I'ater nostcr, and benedictio, and form of commendation as usual.
In the foregoing summary ne notice has been taken of national or local varintions of the msin types of office, such as the old English utes (except in one point), or the ancient pecoliarities of ritual in the chorches of Lyons or Besam, on, or any of the monastic varintions frem the normal Benedictine type. These, however interesting to liturgical studenta, rre confinal $t$ to points of detail. Neit her does it como within the scope of this article to discuss or compare the enntents of the several othices sketched in it. We mas, however, draw attention to a few peints which are obvious even from the skeletons given.

The Eastern offices, we thus see, are much longer and less methodically arranged than the Western. They coutain also much less et Scripture ; while the odes and canons which ferm so large a portion of the office, though often very benutiful and devotional, are much too prolix, and at times too rhajisodical to suit Western taste. The same may be said of the proyers.
The Western offices, on the other hand, are more clealy and compactly arrnnged. The hymns and collects are models of ceapressed thought and language. The antiphons and responses are for the most part taken from Scripture. Among the Western rites, the Reman is undoubtedly the most terse nad pointed. The Ambrusian has many beauties, and is more raried

Oil of the Holy Places.-(1) We learn wrom Pandinus Petricerius, A.d. 46 f , that it was the custom to set vessels of oil in the places sion wed by the birth, death, burial, and asceasion of our Lord, under the belief that it would ( $D e$ juise trom them a miraculous healing power (De Iti S.  OIL, HOLYOil of rie Saists. - Theodoret of Cyrus, A.D. 423, thought that he heard an evil $\mathrm{s}_{\mathrm{j}} \mathrm{j}$ rit addresslag him one night, who amung other things said, "Be assured that 1 should long ago have shot thee down, had I not seen a band of martyrs with James (the ascetio of Nimuza, who was still lising) guarding thee." The narrator explaina, "I understood that he enlled a band of martyrs the ampulla of the oil of the martyrs which, containlag the blessing (bìjoyiav) gathered from many martyrs, huag beside my bed " (Historic Religiosa, 21). The oil of the martyrs or saints was of five kluds : (1) That which was supposed to exude from their relics ; (2) that which flowed miraculously from their tombs; (3) that which had aegulred virtue from contact with, or nearness to, their relies or tumbs; (4) oil that distilled from their leons; (5) uil from the lamps which burat before their images or shrines.
(1) In the Life of John the Almoner, by Leontius of Cyprus, A.D. 390, we are told that "n sweet, heatth-giving unguent flowed from his prectous rel'es" (c. 54), und the author adds that io Cyprus the same grace was given to many saints, "the sweetness of unguents flowing from their precions relies as from fountains" (e. 55). Justinian is said by Procopius to have been healed by oil that flowed from the relies of seyeral saints (De Aclif. i. 7). Unguent ( $\mu \dot{\prime} \rho a$ ), which flowed from the bones of Glyeeria, $n$ martyr at Heraclen, bad long run freely into a brazen basin. When a silver one, which without the knowledge of the donor hal been used for magical purposes, was substituted, the oil censed to How (A.1. 583), nor did it run again until the unpolluted yessel whs restored to its place (Theophylnet. Simoc. Historiu, i. 11). St. Myrops of Chios "collected the unguent ( $\mu$ ípa) that flowed from the relics of the huly martyrs and npostles" buried at Ephesus, "nad henled the sick therewith." From this circumstance she even received her name (Bolland, July 13, ex $S$ /naxariis Graecis).
(2) In the Life "f St. Sampson (§ 23; Surins, June 27) we rend that a henling oil used to flow from his tomb on the anniversary of a mirncle performed by him. St. Bonitus "ordered the sick to be anointed with oil, which he had ordered to be raised fur a blessing out of the tomb of st. Peter at Clusina in T'uscany" (Iita S. Bun. vi. 26; Bolland. Jan. 15, p. 1074). A dying woman was healed by the oil flowing from the tomb of St. Eloy ( 1 it ', ii. 51 ; Surius, Dee. 1). The church of St. Mary trans Tiberium is said in the Aeta S. Quirini,", 8 (Boll. Jun. 4), "fundere 心eum fundatoris."

In the E.nst. SS. Anlrew, Nieholns, Theodorus Stratelates (Goar, u.s. 4in), and ubure all Demetrius, were noted for this miracle. See especially the Analecta de Linyuento seu Oleo e S. Demetrii Tumulo, in the supplement to the works of Simeon Metaphrastes (iii. Migne, Sor. Gr. 116).

This substance was also called manna, Thus among the relies collected by Angilbertus at Centule was some of "the manna of St. Juhn the Evangelist" (Scriptum S. Angil. 15, in Bolland. Feb. tom. iii. 103). See nlso I/cmelo,. Basil. May 8, St. John Ev. as eited by Ducange, Glos: Grace. v. $\mu$ d $\nu \nu a$. Gregory of 'Jours speaks of it aa a dust, probably dust saturatel with the supposed oil: "C'ujus (S. Jonn.) nune sepulcrum manna in modum farinne hodjegue erurtat" (De Niruc, 1, 30). But others sjeenk of it a fluld (Dte, Glosv, Lat. In Manme).

(3) In the ease of Demetrius, anil many others, there is no ambiguity ; the oil itself is supposed to be a miraculous product. isut it is somes. times doubtful whether this is renlly meant. For there was a custom of placing oil in or new the tomis of the saints in the hope that it wouls derive virtue from their remnins, or from the earth Into which they were resolyed. Thus Paulinus of Noln, A.b. :30:3, says of the tomb of St. Felix (Vutul, 6, 1, 38). that it was anointed. And ngnin (Nat. 13, 1. 590):-
> " Iata suluerfletes tabulae gemino patet ora Pracbeas infusie subjecta torimina nardo, Quare cfueris mancti venterua a sede reponta Sanctificat medicans arcana spifteus aura.

From Paulinus Petricorius, quoted above, we lenrn that the practice was common in the 5th century. The tomb of St. Martin was especially famous for the oil that reeferived virtue from it (Greg. Turon. de Mirac, $S$, Mart. i. 2; comp. If. 32,51 ; iii. 24 ; iv, 36 ; Se.). It is, we suppose, oit oil thus sanetified at the Memoria of St. Stephen that St. Augustine spenks, when he relates the recovery of a boy from apparent denth oa being anointel "ejusdem martyris oleo" (De Cirit. Dei, xxii. viii. 18). St. Chrysostom: "Siut the bones of the martyrs only, but their tembs and cotfins, puur torth abundant blessing. 'Take holy oil, and thon wilt never sufter the shijwreck of drunkeuness" (Hom. in Murt. ii. 664). A mag. nate of Antioch, anointed with oil from the tomb of Euthymius, was at once healeq ( $L$ whyyn. Vita, 127 ; Monum. (ir. Cotel. ii. 3(1) ).
(4) There was an ieon of the Blessel Yirzin nt Constnntinople in the 7th eentury, from which oil was believed to flow continually. Of this Arculfus, the French bishop who went to the Holy Land in 690, declared himself to be an eye witness (Adamnanus, de Locis Sinctis, iii. 5).
(5) Far more common are slories of helling by oil from a lamp burnt in honour of christ of the saints. The following examples nre from the East. The wounded hand of a Sarneen wis healed by oil from a lamp before the icon of st. Guorge (Mirac. S. Gcory. vi. 35 ; Boll. Apr: 23). St. Cyrus and St. John "apprented to a pero son suffering trom gout, and bade hin take a little oil in a small ampulla from the lamp that burnt before the image of the Saviour " in the greater tetrapyle at Alexandria, and anoint his feet with it (litue SS. Clyr. et Joun. §$2; Boill, Jan. 31 : see also Vitu E thymä, 147, in Cote. lerii Junum. Gr. ii. 32.5; rita Lnuce Ju; Combef. Awtarium, ii. 1012; Vita Eulocini i. 9, Boll. July 30).

Similar stories are found in the Western writers. Thus Nicetius of Lyons, by means of "the oil of the lamp which burnt dnily nt his sepulehre, restored sight to the blind, drove demons from bodies possessed, restoreal soundness to shrunken limbs," &e. (Greg. Tur. Ilist. Fnme. iv. 37). An epileptie was cured by oil from the lamp that burnt night and day nt the tonb of St. Severin (Transl. S. Sen. Auct. Jean. Diar. Boll. 8). It was revenled to a blind womna, that oil from the lamp of st. Genevieve would restore her sight, if the warden of the church

Mat. E.P. 86 vii. 373 ). From this we infor that oil fomm any church lump was thus nsed, before the trom any church lamp was thus used, before the cutaom arose of setting lights before icons, and of taking the oil that fed them with a view to engage the interrecssion of the saint represented. Whe have an example in the life of Nilua the Yoonger, who invited a pricst to his oratory, to pray over a siek persuon and "to anoint him with oil from the lomp." We are told that "in this mamuer he healed monks and larmen who were harassed by evil spirits, soinating soiating them with oil by the hands of priets" " (Iitut, viii. 58, 59; Boil. S.ppt. 26). The pratiee is not extiuct. In one "Office of Suppliation" for the sick, priutod by Goar, we have this rubric :"And hy this rubric: "And hu anoints him with holy oil trom the lanp, ssying this prayer." The liead lang of the prayer is, "A prayer on the unction of the siek with holy oil" (Ewchol. 842). An instance in the West is relateil by Gregory of Tours (de slirac. S. Mart. i. 18). In a cattle pague a person "went to the holy basilitea, and took the oil of the lamps which hung from the arched root", "nad asointed the animals affected with a good result.

Weat this 0 . Weat this office was restrained to the bishope at a soneawhat early period. Pscudo-Innocent says that it was lawful fur presbsters and others to apply "the oil of chrism" to the siek, but that it must be "mado by the bishop" (Epist. i. 8). Thie was at kome. The rule seems to have been enforeed elsewhere much later. About 730, however, Boniface orders "nill presiyters to obtain the oil of the sick from the bishop and hnve it by them " (Statutu, 29; ed. Würiw. 142; comp. Capit. Reg. Fr. vi. 179). The early Galliean charch knew no auch restriction; but Pepin, $7+4$, seeme to have borrowed it from Rome (cap. 4 ; in Capit. Reg. lrane. i. 158). The council of Chalons, 813 , deeides that "the siek ought to be anointed by the presbyters with oil, which is blessed by the bishop " (can. 48).
This rule never oittained in the East. Thus Theodore of Caterbury, by birth of Tarsus, A.D. 668: "According to the Greeks it is lavsul for preroyters.... io make exoreised oil and chrism for the sick if it chrism for the sick, if it be neeessary" (Cuyitularo apud Martene, de Ant. Eccos. Rit. i. vii. $3, \S 7$ ). Among them it is now generally consecrated as required by a siek person, either in their house or in the church, by seven prieste, if they ean be brought together, though one is ${ }^{\text {sufficient (Metrophanes Critop. Cunfessio, } 13 \text {; in }}$ Kimmel, Monum. Fülei Orient. ii. 15.3; Goar Euchol. 408, 432). The Armenian rule in the 8th century was that the priest should bless the oil of the sick, "using proper prayers, as much as was needed Arr the occasion" (Joan. Canthol. can. 11, Mai, u. s.).
(4) Oil in tile Agnus Def.-The Ordo Romanus, abuut 730, tells us that at Rome, on Easter-eve, the arehdencon, coming early to the church of St. Joho Lateran, " pours wax into a clean vessel of large size, and mixes oil with it in the Eame, and blosses the wax, and pours out thereof into the figure of lambs " (Alus. Epist. xv . l.eon. M. 130, ed. Vea. 1748).
The fact of Manichenn baptism in oil will hardly be doubted by those who are aware that the practice was at least not unknown among the orthodos Christians of Pernia. Our authority for this is the Menology of the Greek church in its account of the martyrs Dadan, Gubdelaas, and Kasion. (Lesson for Sept. 29; Lib. Mens, Venct. 16:8.)
(i) Oil an the Eccharistic Bread.-For many ages the oblates of the Nestorians and Syrian Jacobites have been made with oil. Among the former the preparation of the dough, which in accompunied by prayer, is the sublject of rubrical direction. It is to be made with " ine flour and salt anl dive oil, and three drops of water" (Officium Renovatiunis Fermenti; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. i. iii. 7 ; sim. Balger, Nestorians, ii. 162 ; see also Le Brun, Explication, Diss. xi. 9).
(7) OIL in tate Font.-From the second century downwards, tha bishop consecrated the water of baptism by prayer, though the sacrament was considered valii without it. See Bartism, § 42 , Vol. J. p. 159 . That no oil or $\mu$ ipon was at first used in this consecrution, or poured into the water after it, we may infer fron, the silence of the earlier writers. Our firss witness is P'seudo-Dionysius, who is genernlly supposed to have written about 520: "The chief priest pours the $\mu$ úpay in lines forming a cross, into the purifying font of baptism" (De Hicrarch. Eicl. iv. 10 ; comp. II. 7). [Font, Benedictiun of, p. 680.]
The orders both of the East and West supply intermal evidence of the fact, that the consecration of the water was originaily considered complete without the infusion of the oil or chrism. This was a later ceremony added to the several offices at various and uncertain periods.
(8) OIL in Cuurcu Lamps.-The lights of a church were so costly that at an early period some stated provision for them, beyond the voluntary oftierings of the faithful, became necessary. We nigh 'ser this from a tradition of Eudocia, the wify : Thendosius the Younger. It is said that " $\omega, \cdots, \dot{r}$, rer Day going fato the church (at , , . , mis to ce!p rate the holy resurrection t' \&: she garg 10,000 sextarii of oil to be $\because \mathrm{wd}$ : Ti\&, lights " (Nirephorus

Caesarius of Arles, 502 : "Let thone who are able present wax tapers, or oil to be put into the lamp" (Serin. 76, §2).

OLD TES'RAMENP (IN ART), The mano ner in which the Old Testament was generally employed in early Christion art indleates a morico thon of the identity of the revelation contained in It with the fuiler one made in the New Tevo tament. The cycle of suibjocta nelectoil from it for pletorial representation, and the mode in whith they were intermingled with subjects trom the Gospels, may be regaried as a vixible exmudito antion of Augustine's worifa, "Novum rextio mentum in vetere latet. Vetur ’estminatum in novo patet." From the almost bouailess wealth of persons and histories oflering thensselves to the pencil of the artist in the older books of the Bible, only those, as a :ale, sre chosen which the Christian conselousneon regarded as typical of the great redempitive acts of thrin, or of the Sacraments of the Church. In the Weatern charch, where alone any Jarge remainy of ecclesiastical art have been preacrved to w, a rule was very speedily established in practi.e rigidly defining not only what subjects were atitable for employment in religions art, but the very form and arrangement in which they were to te represented. Fiierntic types were prescribed fir each of these chlef symbiolic eventa, trom which, when once defined and accepted by the church, it was not pernissible for an artist to diverge. So permanent was this formulated tyive, so unchanging the accessoriee, that a very small fragment of a fresco or a mosaic is frejuently sufficient to ensble us to determine its subject with perfect certsinty. Insteai of having the licence "quidlibet audendi," the ecclesiastical artist was confined within trammels so clase that he became little more than the meclanical reproducer of authorised designs. it is 11 eifero here to repeat what has been Jrea

(5) Abraham's Sucrifice.-The purely symbelical character of early Chriatian art ia evidenced by the perpetual recurrence of this apecially typlal act, alune wut of the whole of the incidents in the life of Abraham. It is one of the scenes which meet useverywhere. The primilive character of this type appeary from a passage from St . Gregory Nysam, juoteil in the recond Nicene counell (act. iv. : Labithe, Concil. vil. 736), de riblag a pleture which he says he never looked on without tears, in which the aacrifice of Isaae was represented just as we it on the walls and ceiliags and on the aarcophagi of the catacombs, St. Augustiae Fiveaks too of it as "tot locis pletum " (Contr. In one invtance Abrahain is vested in the high priestly robes of the Jewish ritual (Bottari, tav, elxi.). The aubstituted ram appears hard by, sometimex struggling in the brambles (which were regarded as a type of our Lord'e crown of thorns), sometimes standing free. Abraham'a sacrifice nepears In the moales of the sametunry of St. Vital'e at Ravenna, in conjunction with the reception of the three angolx. The lunette containing these subjects corrasponda to that containing the conjolaed sacrifices of Abel and Melchizedek. The euchnristic and sacrifieial retereace of the whule seriea is evident.
(8) Melchizedek.-As already stated, the otferling of bread and wine made by the rogal priest to the fsther of the laithrul, is one of the enchaistio subjects at St. Vital's, [EUCuartst, p. 626.]
Thiasubject is also the Thia subject ls also the first of the series of Old Testament representations in the name of St. Mary Major's at Rume.
(7) Moses,-There is no Old Testament history from which so many tllustrations have been taken as that of the great deliverer and lawgiver of God's ancient people. The sacrameatal charncter of the passage of the Red Sea, the giving of the manna, and the water flowing from the smitten rork, haviag beea 60 recognised by our Lord aad His apostlea, these eveats naturally took their place anong the leading oncharistic types, and are found perpetually recurriag in every variety of Christian art.

OLD TESTAMEN'I
one of the most frequent subjects in the catacomb froscoes, and rappear's in early mosaies, as at St. Vitai, Ravenna, and St. Catherinc, Mount Sinal.
(b) The Passaye of the Rel Sea,-We do not tiud this subject so frequently represented as we might have expected from its universal recognition as a type of baptism. It is not found in paintings, only on sarcophagi. We may instance one from the Vatican cemetery (Bottari, tav. xl.; Agincourt, Sculpture, pl. viii. no. 1). The subject is represented with far greater detail and a larger number of tigures on other sareophagi (Bosio, p. 591; Bottari, tav. cxciv.; Millin, Dridi de la France, pl. Ixvii.). In the Museum of Aix is one discovered at Arles, which in addition to the Gathering of the Quails, and the striking of the Rock, represents the Exodus from Egypt and the overthrow of Pharaoh (Nillin, u. s. pl, 9). Three sarcophagi at Arles, two in the maseum, and one at St. Trophimus, also present the scene in detail, with the remarkable addition of the pillar of fire going before the Israclites.
(c) Moses striking the Rock.-This subject, so distinetly typifying the waters of baptism and the supplies of spiritual gence and strength flowing trom the smitten rock, "which was Christ" (1 Cor. x. 4), meets us perpetually. lt is seen constantly in the catncomb frescoes, and is seldom absent from the sarcophagi, whers the thirsty crowd, generally wanting in the pictures, are eagerly drinking of the copious streams which are gushing from the rock struck by the miratulous rod. In close connexion with this subject there is almost always tound on the sarcophigi a group of persons in flat caps, who seize an old and bearded man carrying $a$ rod by either arm, and lead him off as a prisoner (Boslo, 103, 285, 287, 295, 425). This has been usually identified with the apprehension of St. Peter. Martigny considers that it is intended for the rebulion of the 1sraelites, which preceded the miraculous girt of water (Exod. xvii. 4). Probably there is an intentional combination of the two seenes, thas evidencing the complete identification of the two revelations in the mind of the early Christians, by whom Peter was regarded as the antitype of Moses, "the leader of the new Israel," as Prudentins calls him. This is also indicated by the marked resemblance the figure of Moses in this subject usually bears, in the general look of his hair and bend and the outline of his features, to the traditional type of St. Peter, and is still more strikingly brought out in some of the gilded glasses representing the striking of the Rock, where not only is the resemblance unmistakable, but all doubt is removed by the name Pviraus being superseribed. (See Brownlow and Northeote, Rom. Sitt. fig. 33, p. 287 ; pl. xvii, no. 2 ; pp. 248, 2155, 287, 3u3.)
(d) The Manna and the Qusils. The mannit, as a symbol of the Living Bread that came down, might have been expected to nppear more frequently than it does. Only one iudnbitable example is founl among the catacomb pictures. This was discoverel in 1863 in the cemetery of St. Cyriaca, and was deseribed by De Rossi (hutletin), Oet. 186:3, p. 76; see Manna, p. 10st). Dr. Appelf cites another example from the sarcophagus of the abless Euselins in the museum at Marseilles, figured by Millin (pl. Iviii. no. 2). He also muitions one example of the quails from the Arlea sarcophagus in the museum at Aix, already spoken of. It is not at all improbable that the same combination of Old and New Testament symbolism spoken of in connexion with the striking of the rock has place also in this allied miracle, nad that a large number of the pictures usually identified with the multiplication of the loaves and fishes in Its closing scone, the gathering of the fragments, have also, as Martigny suggests (following Bosio's lead) a reference to the gathering of the manna ia baskets. The venerable bearded personage represented has more resemblance to the type of Moses than that of Christ (Bosio, p. 251).
(e) The giving of the Tables of the Lau.-This subject is found in juxtaposition with that of striking the rock on a very large number of the sarcophagi. Moses usually stauds with his right foot on a rock, surbolizing Mount Sinai, and receives the tables arom a hand emerging from a cloud (Bosio, pp. 363, 367, 589 ; Bottmi, tav. $x$ xvii.).
(8) The Grapes of Eshcol.-D1. Appell mentions that a sarcophagus in the mu:cum at Marseilles, traditionally said to have containel the bodies of two of St. Ursula's virgins, bears on its cover the parallel subjects of the twe Israelite spies bearing a large bunch of grapes on a steff, and the miracle of turning the wite into wine at Cana (Millin, u. s. p. lix. no. 3; Dr Piper, De Caumont, Bullet. Monument. rol xxxi, pp. 553-558).
(9) David.-Singularly enough, this remark able type of Christ is only known to appear one in the whole range of Christian art. This is ;: a fresco filling one of the compartinents of t: ceiling of a cubiculum in the catacomb c: Ca listus (Bosio, p. 239 ; Bottari, tev. Ixiii. ; Aringíh i. 54). In his right hand the youth wields it loaded sling, and with his left raises the fold a his short girdled tusic, bearing a supply 0 . stodes.
(10) The Ascension of Elïah.-This subject, at once a type of our Lord's ascension (Greg. Magu. in Evany. Hon. xxix. c. 6), and a proof of the rapture into heaven of the glorified bodies of the living saints (lyen. lib. v. c. 5), was a special tavourite with the enrly Christians, who delighted to have it sculptured on their surcophagi and painted in their burial vaults. Elijah is usualiy pourtrayed standing in a four-horse chariot, an almost exact reproduction of the triumphal cars of the Roman emperors carved on their arches and stamped on their coins. With his right hand he delivers his mantle to Elijah. Attendant figures of a diminutive size stand for the sons of the prophets, watching the prophet's ascent. In some instnnces the Jorlan [p. 890] is prorsonified by a river-god, with a crown of rushes, leaning on his arm (Appell, p. 34'). The finest example is on a sarcophagus in the lateran Museum, figured by Brownlow and Northcote (fig. 30, p. 250), and Dr. Appell (Monuments of Early Ciristian Art, p. 22); see ulso Bosio, pp. 73, 77, 161, 257 ; Aringhi, tom, i. pp. 305, 309, 42: ; Bottari, tav. lii.; Allegranza, Suiejuzioni, tom. v.; Perret, tom. iv. pl. xvi. no. 2 t.

It anpears on a few sarcophagi, and ls always represented $\ln$ the same manner. The firophet stands erect, holding his roll, extending his right had towards a group of two nakel men standlog up, into whom the spirit of life has just been breathed, and a third, atill inanimate, entended on the ground, by whose sile are two hamsa heads, one a mere skull, the other partially corered with flesh. (Bottnri, tay. xxxviii. carsiv., cxcv.; Agincourt, Sculpt. pl. viii. no. 3 ; Bosie, pp. 95, 425; Parker, Photofr. 29:1.) (12) Daniel.- Dnaiel in the Lions' Den disputes for frequency of representution with Moses Striking the lock, and the History of Jonah. It meets the eye everywhere, and always conforma to the same general type, with many forma to the same general type, with many piacor molifications. The prophet is almost always entirely naked, standing, with his hauds eatended in prayer, betiveen two lions. Habeatended in prayer, between two lions. Habakkuk, according to the apocryphal addition, stands by, with the hand which has conveyed him through the air sometimes still grasping his hair, and offers the prophet a basketful of round bresd cakes, decussated, exactly resembling our "hat cross buns" (Bosio, 155, 285). A fish is sometimes added, in evident allusion to Christ as the food of the soul, as in the very curions design, from a sarcophagus at Brescia, given bf Dr. Appell ( $p$. 31). In the enrliest known crample, in the cemetery of Domitilla (Brownlow and Northcote, p. 73, fig. 11), Daniel is clothed in a short tunic; but this is so excepLional that Le Blant (Inscriptions Chreticnnes de Guul, tom. i. p. 493) is only able to produce five similar examples, and all of these of comparatirely late date. Sometimes he wears a ciocture (Botari, tav. cxce.). The apocryphal story of his destruction of the dragon with balls of pitch and hair is also sometimes depicted on sarcophagi. There is an example from the Vatican cemetery (Bosio, p. 57 ; Bottari, tav. xix.; Parker; Fhotygr. 2920). I'he woodcut given [DRagon, p. 579$]$ from this sarcophagus readers description ueedless, The position of the serpent twiaing round a tree sets historical truth at defiance. It is found on a ssreophagus at Verona (Matfei, Ver. (13) The Three Children in the Furnace.This is another constantly recurring representation. Nut so frequent is the preliminary scene, When they are required to worship the Golden Image. It is found in a fresco from the catacomb of St. Cullistus (Bottari, tav. Ixxviii.); and s surcophagus from the Vaticau cemctery

There is one example in which there are only two youths. In one from St. a beautitul (Bottari, tav. clxxxi. ; Bosio, p. 5.51 ) by a beautitul symbolism, a dove is depicted in the olive branch of peace in her mouth carrying the (14) Jonath - peace in her mouth.
(14) Jonath.-As a type of our Lord's Resurcomb fris prophet occurs constantly in the catadiptychs freoes snd on the sarcophagi, on lamps, diptychs, gilt glisses, and repulchral slalis. Three scenes in lis history are of constant recurrence, sometimes forming distinct pictures, as in the cemeteries of Callistus (Bosio, p. 225) and Mnrcellinus (pp. 377, 383), sometimes through exigencies of space ingeniously combined into one compendious scene (Busio, pp. 289, 463). (a) Jonah being cast into the sea sud swallowed up by the sea monster ; (b) being vomited forth; (c) reclining under his gourd, to which a fourth, is sometimes alded, (i) deprived of the shale of his gourd and lamenting over the sparing of Nineveh (Bosio, u. s.). He is always absolntely naked. The "grent fish" is an impossible monster of the dragon type, with a very long and nurrow neck, and large head and ears und sometimes even horns, and an elongated sinnous tail. The gourd also is a plant totally unknowa to nature, covered with dependent swelling pearshaped fruit. Its trailing branches cover a trellis, beneath which the prophet lies supprorting himself on one arm, with an aspect of chagrin. One of the most spirited rejiresentations of the history is on a sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum, from the crypot of "St. Peter's (Bosio, p. 103; Aringhi, vol. i. p. 335 ; Bottari, vol. i. tav. xlii. ; Appell,' p. 19; Parker; Photogr. 2905). In a Lotogr. 2905). In a snrcophagus from St. Lorenzo (Bosio, p. 411) the histories of Jonah and Noath are combined, and the dove is conveniently perched on the prow of the ship.
(15) Job.-Job, sented on a henp of aahes, or on a duaghill, visited by his triends and reproached by his wife, is found on Christian art monuments with some degree of frequency. It nppears in the catacomb frescoos (Bosio, p. 307; Bottari, tav. cv. ; Perret, tom. i., pl. xxv.; Bottari, tav. xci.) and on ssrcophagi, though more frequently in southern Frauce than if Italy. There are examples in the Museum of Arles and Lyons (Millin, u. s. pl. xlvii. 1). The best representation of the scene is on the tomb of Junius Bassus, A.D. 359 (left-hand corner of the lower tier). In a fresco given by Bottari (tav. zel.), and Bosio (p. 307), Job holds a potsherd with which he is scraping his leg.
(16) Susanna.-As a type of the church persecuted by the two older forms of religion-the Pagan and the Jewish-the history of Susanna is tound on sarcophagi, but only rarely. It ia more frequent on those of France than in Italy. The mode of representation is always the same. Susamnn, veiled, is standing aa an orante between the two elders. tongue at some doves among its branches (Bosio, p. 83, no. 4 ; Bottarl, tav, $x \times x i i ., 1 \times x \times i . ;$ Buonarrueti, Vetri, p. 1 ; Millin, u. s. pl. lxv. 5, lxvi. 8, Ixvii. 4). An allegorical picture given by Perret (rol. i. pt. lxxviii.) represents the story under the image of a lnmb between two wild bensts, inteuded for wolves. The application is made certnin by the words "Susanna" and "SENiones" above them. [Civercii, p. 389.]
(17) Tobias.-The fish caught by Tobias, whose gall drove away the evil spirit and cured blinduess, was regarded by the early Christians as a distinet type of Christ (cf. Augnst. Sirm. iv. de Petr. et Paul. ; Optat. lib. iii.). In n catiteomb fresco we see him starting on his journey with the angel for his guide (Agineourt, Peinture, cl. vii. 11. 3). The most frequent subject is his catehing the fish. Once in the vault of a eubiculam of St. Callistus he is depicted quite naked, carrying the fish by a hook in his right hand, and his traveller's staff in his left (Butari, tav. Jxv.; Bosio, p. 243 ; Macarii Hagioglypta, p. 75). He is also naked, save a cineture, in auother freseo (Perret, vol. iii. pl. xxvi.), in which be presents the fish to the angel. More generally, as on the gilt glasses, he is elothed in a short tunic, and has his right hand down the fish's throat (Buonarruoti, tav. ii. no. 2 ; Perret, vel. iv. pl. xxv. no. 33; Garrucci, Fetri, iii.; Hagioglypt. p. 76). A fresco from the cemetery of Priscilla, badly drawn and misunderstood by Besio (p. 474), is decided by Garrueci (IIagioglypt. p. 76, nete 2) to represent Tobias earrying the heart, liver, and gall of the fish, with his dog ranning before him. On a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, pars iii. p. 54) the dog is depicted fawning on old Tobit on his son's return.

This list includes all the subjects frem the Old Testament embraced in the ordinary cycle of early Christian art. A few isolated subjects may be found bere and there, not enumerated above, chiefly on ivories and other minor works of art, but they are quite exceptional, and it does not fall within the purpose of this article to dwell upon them. It will be seen that the leading prineiple of early Christian art is the unity of the two covenants, and the interpretation of the Old Testament by the New, and the exhibition of the New as the fultilment of the Oll. This prineiple had its most complete development in the system of parallelism, by which type and antitype were placed in such immediate juxtaposition that the eye could embrace both at once and observe their correspondence. It was not an unfrequent practice to devote one wall of the nave of a church to the Old Testament, and the opposite wall to the New. This is specially recommended in the letter of Nilus to Olympiodorus cited in the acts of the fourth session of the second Nicene conocil (Lable, Concil. vii. 749). "Novi et Veteris Testamenti historiis hine inde parietes templi repleri doctissimi pictoris operà velim," the ubject being, as there stated, that the unlearned who were unable to read the Holy Seriptures might be instructed by the sight, and be excited to emulate the devotion and noble deeds thus depicted. The legates of pope Hadrian I. at the same council aeknowledged that this was the received custom, and mentioned a basilica erected by a former pope John in which it was adopted, referring partieularly to the pictures on opposite walls of the expolsion of Adan from Pandise, and the admission of the penitent thief (Labbe, ibid. 750). The basilicas erected by Pnulinus at Noln contained the one subjects from the Old, the other from the New Testament. [Frusco, p. 701.] In the same article is a list of the twenty-one seriptural paintings, all but four taken from the Old Testament, with which St. Ambrose decorated lis basilica nt Milan (ibd. p. 700). We have a remarkable example of the same principle of arrangement in England in the ehurches erectel by Benedict Biscop at the end of the 7th century at Wearmouth and Jarrow. AtSt. Peter's, Wearmouth, the south wall was occupied with seenes from gospel history, the north with eorresponding subjects from the apocalypse. At St. Paul's, Jarrow, the parallelism between the Old and New Testament was developed on the opposita walls, Isnac carrying the wood for his sacrifice, answering to our Lord bearing His cross, and the Brazen Serpent to the Crucifixion (Beda, Yit. Abbutt. е. 5 , ce. 5,88 ).

The very remarkable scenes of mosaic pictures from the Old Testament in the basilica of St. Mary Major's at Rome, stand completely isolated, and form a class by themselves. They are simply a series of scenes from the sacred narrstive treated purely historically, witheut the olightest hint of symbolism. These pictures, which begin with the interview between Abraham and Melchizedek, and carry on the history threugh the lives of the succeeding patriarchs to the times of Moses and Joshua to the battle of Bethhoron, have been described in an earlier article, to which the render may be referred (Mosaics, p. 1327).

We shall not here enter on the very interesting series of Old Testament pictures contsined in early Greek MSS., such as that in the Imperial Library at Vienna (Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xix.) and the Book of Joshun in the Vatican (ibid. pl. xxviii.), which have been treated of in the article Miniature.

OMENS. It was to he expected that some at least of the superstitions of heathenism wunld survive in the church. In fact they did survive, and none more rigorously than the observation of omens and portents, which Christianity has nerer been able to extinguish. Chyssortom laments (Ifom. in Gulat. i. e. 7, p. 669, MunthuCon) the iafluence exercised upon the minds of casts from ethnic superstitions, such as toreסoviguol), chasce sounds or expressions ( $\kappa \lambda \eta$ $\delta o \nu(\sigma \mu \nu l)$, from the flight of birds (oiwvi $\sigma \mu 01$ ), or chesis ii chesis ii. cul Cilumin. p. 141) he inveighs strougly ngainst certain superstitious practices ot his time, nad nmong them against omens. If, he says, when a man first leaves his door, he meets one who has but one eye, or is lame, he the pomos of sinous of evil. This is part of the pomps of Satan; for it is not the meeting a mas that makes the day evil, but the spending it in sin. ... If a man meets a viruin he says, "this will be aa uaprofitable day with me;" but if he meets a harlot it will be a forsunate day. Augnstine (de Doctr. Chr. ji. 20) stigmatises similar superstitions. An omen is drawa, he says, from the throbbing of some part of the body. If, when two friends are walking arm in arm, a stene, or a dog, or a child chance to come between them, they stamp the stone to pieces as a divider of their friendship; nay, they even beat the dog or the innocent child froin the same superstition. A man returas to bed if he has sneezed while putting on his shoes ; he returns to his house it he has returns to his house it he has stumbled on going out; he is terrified with the out; he is terrified with the apprehension of future evil if the rats have gnawed his clothes: less wise than Cate, who, when the rats gnawed his boots, said that it was no marvel, but if the boots had gaawed the rats it might have been thought a portent. A kindred superstition is the observation of lucky and ualucky days or seasous 79) asast which the same father (Enchiridion, c. 79 ) also inveighs, as utterly unworthy of "

OMOPHORION ( $\omega \mu 0 \phi \dot{\prime} \rho 10 \nu, \omega_{i} \mu \delta \phi 0 \rho o v$ ). The omophorion, as its nome implies, is an article of dress worn over the shoulders; and thus we find it as a part of the ordinary female dress. Thus Palladius tells of one Taor, a virgin, who never wished for a new dress, or omophorion, or sandals (Hist. Lausiaca, c. 138; Pattr. Gr. xxxiv. 1237). The ehurch at Balcherne was snid to possess the omophorion of the Virgin Mary (Lee Grammaticus, Chronogr phia, p. 241, ed. Bekker).
In its ecclesinstical sense, the word is used to describe an ornament worn by patriarchs, and also by bishops generally in the Greek church. This consista of a long band of woollen materinl, passing once round the neck, with the ends falling before and behind to the knees or lower, and on it are embroidered crosses. There seems little doubt that it has been a recognised restment since the 6th century at lntest. Thus Isidore of Pelusium, writing carly in that century, after speaking of the $\delta \dot{\theta} \delta \dot{\eta} \eta$ worn by dencons, gecs on to dwell on the weollen omophorion worn by bishops, the material being meant to suggust the nution of the lost shecp borne on the shoulders of the Good Shepherd. Therefore it is, he adds, that when in the service the book of the gospels is opened, the bishop irys asile his omophorion as in the presence of the chief Shepherd Ilimself (Epist. lib. i. 136; Patr. Gr. 1xxviii. 272). These words of Isidere are copied almest verbatim by Germanus, ${ }^{4}$ patrimech of Constantivople in the 8th century (Ifist. Eceles. et Mysticu Theoria; Patr. Gr. xeriii. 390; ef. also Symeon Thessal. de Stera Liturgia, c. 82, ib. clv. 260). Another early example may be drawn from the life of Chrysostom by Palladius (c. 6; Patrol. Ar. xlvii. 23), where 'Theophilus of Alexandris is accused of illtreating a monk named Ammonius, in that he oikeias $\chi \in \rho \sigma i$, and then boat him about the hend.

Again, at the third general council of Constantinople (A.D. 1880), in its eighth Actio, in which the heretic Macarius, bishop of Antiech, was on his trial, his vicws were at length received with cries of "Anathema! rightly let him be deposed from his bishopric, let him be stripped of the omophorion that encircles him " (Labbe, vi. 759). At the fourth general council of Constantimple (A.D. 870) the rule is laid down as to the wearing of the omophorion at the proper time and place by those qualified to wear it ( $\tau 005 \delta \rho i \sigma \theta\{\nu \tau a s$

In the Byzantine historians, the omophorion is frequently referred to. Une example will sultice: -Cedrenus (under twenty-first year of Constantine) tells us how Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, was strangled by the Arians with his own omophorion (vol. i. 529, ed. Bekker).

A confinmation of our statement as to the early use of the omophorion, may be derived from the fact that in the still existing ancient mosaics in the chureh of St. Sophia at Constantinople, said to be of the 6th century, are figures of th century bishops wenring white vestments with omophoria, on which are coloured crosses (Marriott, Vcstiarium Christionum, p. 1xxv.).

This being the case, we may at once dismiss the story told by Luitprand (Relatio de Legationc Constant. e. 62 ; Patrol. exxxri. 934), to the effect that even the patriarch of Constantinople only wore the omophorion (here called pallium) by pezmission of the pope (" scimus, inmo videmus, Constantinopolitanum episcopum pallio non uti, nisi sancti patris nostri permissa,"), bnt that by means of bribes leava was obtained from the Roman usurper Albericus, in whose hands the then pope, John X1. (ob. A.D. 936), completely was, for the patriarch and his successors to wear this ornament, without any further jermission being necessary. Ilence, adde Luitprand, the custom of wearing the pallium spread from the patriarch of Constantineple to the bishops of the eastern church generally.

Into the question whether the omophorion properly belonged to a prelate of the rank of a patriarch or metropolitan, or merely marked the episcopal order, it is not our purpose to enter. The evilence we have brought forward seems to us to lead strongly to the latter conclusien, The point is discussed at length by Goar (Eucho. logion, p. 312) ; reference may also be made to Ducange's Glossarium Graecum, s. v. $\dot{\omega} \mu \mathrm{a} \phi$ piav.

ORARIUM. (1) Besides its technical meaning of a atole, this word is used in the literal sense of a handkcrehief, primarily, as tha derivation shews, to wipe the face. Jerome, writing to Nepotianus, and dwelling on the proper mean to be shewn in dress, observes, "ridiculum et pleuum dedecoris est, referto maraupio, quod sudarium orariumque non habeas gloriari" (Epist. 52, § 9, vol. i. 264). ## ORATION (Funeral). [Funeral Oration; Ousequites.]

ORATIO MISSAE. A part of the Mozarabic liturgy, tillowing next ntter the offertory, which, though called Orettio, is not, strictly apeaking, a prayer, for it is gencrally cast in the form of a short address or exhortation to the people, reminding them of the particular person or tact commemorated on the day. It is therefore one of the variable parts. Sometines it is called simply "orntio." In the Gallican sacramentaries it is sometimes called "Praefatio Missae" (which must not be confounded with the Preface, commonly so designated), sometimes "Missa." It is a feature peculiar to this family of litargies.

We the confession, that they cooordinary us relacs of those saints; and this tained sup-is confirmed by the fact that a supposed fragment of the true cross was put in the confession of the third. Several "arntoria" of the sume materials, dediented to SS. Thomas, Ajollinaris, Sosius, John the Baptist, John the Evangelist, and to the Holy Cross, are said to have been given be Symmachus, A.b. 498 , to the basilicis of St. Andrew and St. Peter. They all had confessions, nud in the confession of the last was also "lignum Domini" (ithid. n. 52). Now here, we appear to have the descripition of a miniature chapel, i.e. of a shrine or tabernacle it which the people were invited to pray. on the same grounds ns in a larger oratory, viz. its dedication, and possession of relies. Such largy oratorles, with the entire bodies of martyrs or others under their confessio, were frequent ia the large churches of Rome [see (3) below]; ned the small fabrics of preeious metal of which we have now treated, appear to have been mado in imitation of them.

Theodoret says that "they built many enclosures for prayer (ankeìs eikenplous) to Marciun "(Hist. Relig. in Marc. iii.). They plnced the abbat Thomas in a tomb, aud " builta a smsll oratory over him" (John Mluschus, Prat. Spirit. 88). The foregoing, it will be observed, are instances in which the oratory has no immediate connexion with a charch.
III. Many, however, belonging to the last century of our period, were so connected, being huilt either (1) within, or (2) on to the church itself, or (3) in close proximity to it.
(1) John VII. A.D. 705, "made sn oratory of the holy mother of God inside the church of the blessed apostle Peter" (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. n. 87), before the altar, in which oratory he was himself buried. Gregory III., A.D. 731, "made nn oratory within the same basilica, by the principal arch on the men's side," in which he deposited relics (ibid. n. 91). The same popo enlarged a basilica "in which there were pre-

For binall shriaes or tabernacles within a charch, also called oratories, see (2).
(2) Many oratories were built against churches with sn eatrance into them, or placed within baildings (as purehes, vestries, baptisteries) cousected with churches. These were the early furm of the side-chapel and chantry, afterwards so common (see Muratori, Dissert. xvii, it $\mathbf{S}$. Paulini Pocmata). Ana-tasius Bibliothecarius tells us that Sergius 1., A.11. 687, restored all the calicula romal (is cirenitu) the basilica of the blessel apostle St. P'aul" (l"itue l'ont, a. 8is), and those attached "circumquaque" to St. Peler's (ilid.). That by "cubicula" we are to anderstand oatories is evideat trom the same suther's account of Symmachus, a.d. 498 ; in which, after enumerating sevecal "oritories" built by him, he immediately adds, "All which culicula he built up complete from the foundation " (ibud. n. 5:). St. Pauliaus, too, A.D, 393 , tion " (ibud. n. 52). St. Pauliaus, too, A.D. 393, sdided "cubicula" to his chureh at Nola, "iuserted in the louger walls of the basilica " (Ejist. serted in the louger walls of the basilica " ( $E_{/}$isst.

sars (ibid.), thr the private use ot persons " paraing or melitating on the law of the Lord " (l's. $i_{1} 2$ ), as well as for memorials of the departed. Elsewhere (Poema, 27, 1. 395 ; comp. 19, 1. 478), he speaks of them; and of those whom the desire to pray had attriyted to them. That these oratories opened into the church, appears from the tact that s thiel', who had concealed himself in one of them, escaped when the door of the churech was unlocked in the morniag (Poema 19, 1. 480). (3) There is also freyuent meation of oratories near a chareh, and belonging to it, but not part of the same structure. Such appears to have been one at fours in the 6th century, viz. "Oratorinm atrii beati Martini." (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Martyrum 15.) At Rome in the 8th there was an oratory of St. Leo, "secus fores jutroitus Sancise Petronillae." (Auast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. n. 95.) Theodore, A.D. $6+2$, built one "foris nortam beati l'auli Apostoli" (ibid. n. 74). This position oppears to have been common at Rome; for the eartiest Ordo lomanus, in giving directions for striking the light on Maundy Tharslay [see Ligurs, Cliktimonial uns of, & $v$.] orlers it to be done "in a place outside the basilica; but if they have no oratory there, then they strike it in the doorway there." ($ 32 ; Jus. I.al. ii. 21.)
IV. The name of "Oratory" was given to different parts of the interior of a church. Thus, in a law of Theorlosius, the nave is called "the people's oratory" (eünch́pion toû גaov̂ Epist. Theod. et Valentin. Colex Treolos, ix. 45 ; tau. 3, p. 366). Compare the expression $\tau \delta \nu$ e $\dot{\delta} \boldsymbol{\sim} \tau$ hpion vaiv, denoting a part, expressly distinguished from the bema an from the bema an! the narthex (ibid. 1. $4 ; \mathrm{p}$. $35 t$ ). In the West, the word has been used to denote the choir of a church. A bishop of Mans is anid to have luken great puins in the construction of the "upper parts" of a new church, "oratorium scihicet quod chorum vocitant, Conom. 34; Mabill. An.ll. \&c. (Act. Pontif'. Conom 34; Nabill. An.ll. Vet. 312, ed. 1723 ).
V. (1) Every monastery, whether of men or women, had its oratory. Thus St. Augustine, writing in 423 to women: "Let no one do in the oratory anything but that for which it was male, and from which it has received its name." (Eyist. 211, ad Suctimon. & 7). Sim. in the lie'gula ad Sercos Dei, adapted from this, & 3. Cnssian about the same time, of the monks in the bast: "He who at teree, sext, or none, has not come to prayer before the palm whieh has begun is over, does not venture to enter further into the orntory" (Dc Co nob. Inst. iii. 7). In the rule of St. Benediet, A.D. 530, the word occurs frequently, e.y., "Oratorium hoc sit, quod dicitur" (c. 52).
(2) The oratories in monasteries of women had no priests attached to them until the beginto hare the 5th century, and the prastice seems to have spread somewhat slowly: They wera publicly professed in chureh, and nttended it regularly in a body, a part, spoken of as enclosed, being assignal to them. These facts are proved in Canenicas thg testimonies, St. Basil, Ejpitimia in Canonicas, 17 ; ii. 3 II ; St. Ambrose, de Lapsu J'irg. v. § 19 ; Palladius, Mist. Lirus. 138. St. Jersme, when describing (in 404) the life of those in the house tounded by Paula, says that "ouly on the Lord's day did they go out to the chureh, by the side of which they dwelt" (Epist. 108, ad Eusloch. § 19). Elsewhere, in 414, he implies locs members of a female community went "nd loes religionis," and says that he "knew some who kept at home on festivals becanse of the concourse of the people" and its attenilant concourse of the people" and its attendant evils (Lip. 130, ad /emetr. § 19). On the other hand, the community to which St. Augustine writes in 423 (if the epistle be wholly from his hand), though not confined to their house (Epist. 211, ad Sunction. § 10), had a priest who celebrated, we may presume, in the oratory which Augustine mentions (§ 7 ).
(3) The houses of charity 80 numerous in the early chureh [Hospitals] were all under the management of tha clergy or attached to monasteries: and there is evidence that some, and a prolubility that many, of thelu had their own oratories. For example, it is recorded of Leo MI., A.D. 795, that he gave certnin ornamenta to the "oratory of the holy mother of God in the xenodochium nt Firmi" (Anast. B. litae I'ont. $1.98 ;$ pp. 130, 6), to the oratories in three other xenodochia at Rome, dedicated severally to St. Iucy, St. Cyrus, and Ss. Cosmas and Damian (isid. 139), and to "the oratory of St. Peregrine, which is placed in the hospital of the Lord at Naumachia " (i,id.).
VI. (1) Chapeia under the name of oratoriea were often attached to episcopal palaces. E.g., in the Life of John the Almoner by Leontius (c. 38), we read, "Facit missas in oratorio suo" (Rosweyd, 199). Gregory the Great says of "in episcopii oratorio a little before bis death "in episcopii oratorio missas ferit" (Hom. 37, do Evany.). Gregory of Tours, 573, consecrated "cellulam valde elegantem," which had beeu the buttery of his palace, for an oratory, and removed to it relies of SS, Martin, Saturuius, and Julian (do Glor. Conf. 20). It was "infra $\underset{P p}{ }$ domm ecelesiasticam urbis Turonicae" (Vitue PP. ii. 3). Pope Theodore, 6.42, "fecit oratorium beato Silveatro intra episcopium Lateranense" (Anast. Biblioth. Vitue Pont. n. 74), i.c., in the

(2) Oratories ( $=$ domestic chnpels) were conmon in or near the houses of the wealthy. ly a law of Justinian they were to be devoted to prayer alone," We forbid to all the inhabitants of this grent city, and much nore to all uthers under wur rule, to have oratories (eúnctpious olkous) in their houses, and to celchrate the satered mysteries therein. . . . But if any simply think it right to have saered chumbers in their houses for the sake of prayer only, and nething whatever pertaining to the sacred liturgy be performed there, we permit this $t$ " them" (Novell. 57). Compere the Cardovingian law: "He who has an oratory in hia hoose my pray therc. But let him not presume to celebrate the sacred masses therein withuut the lieense of the bishop of the place." The punishment was to lie the contiseation of the house and exconmonication (Cauit. Reg. Fran., v. 383; comp. v. 102, and Capit. Ingilheim. 826, e. 6, &e.). The council in Trullo, 641, orders the elergy who serve in oratories in a house, to do it under the rule of the bishoy (can. 31). Another eanon (59) says, "Let nut baptism be on any account celebrated in an orntory within a house." in the West, the eouncil of Agde, 505 (can. 21), orders that "it any of the clergy chose to calebrate or attend masses on festivals (Eastar, Christmas, &c., had been named) in the oratories (unless the bishop order or permit it), they be driveu from commanion." A canon of Theodalf of Orleans, 797, shews that this rule had been relaxed by time: " let nut the priests on any eccount celebrate masses in the orntories, except with anch precaution before the second hour that the people be not withdriwn from the public celebrations" (ean. 45 ; Labbe, Cone. vii. 1147). In snother injonction of the same bishop the rule is extended tu suburban monasteries end churehea, and the early eelebration permitted is to be "toribus reseratis" (Additio altera, Labbe, u.s. 1857), which here can only mean with doors closed (eomp), ressirre).
(i) Such oratories (often on the homesteade, or nttached to the houses of the wealthy) were often unconsacrated, and still more frequently served by priests not submissive to authority. So early as $5+1$ the fourth council of Orleans had to furbid the domini praediorum to "introduce strange elerks against the wish of the bishop" of the diocest to serve "in the oratories" (ean. 7). The cruncil of Chatons, about 650, states that the elergy who sarved the "oratories in the vills of the powerful" were not allowed by their patrons to submit to the archdeacons (can. 14). The council of Paris, 8.29 (i. 47), complains that masses were wont to be celebrated in gardens and houses, or at least in "acdiculae," which they built near their houses." These are contrasted with " the basilicas dedicated to God," which their builders hat forsaken. Presbyters were "compelled" to celebrate in them, and all this "in detiance of episcopal nuthority." Sueh an abuse maturally tended to degrade both the character and the position of the clergy. Agobard tells us that the "domestici sncerdotes" were employed as huntsmen and butlors, and in various other servile enpacitice (De Privilogio et Jure Stcerdotii, 11). To arert such evils, masses were absolutely forbididen by many authorities In all but dedicated churches, as in the Excioptions of kegbriht, $7+0$ (ean. 5:) ; by Charlemagne in 769 (Capit. 1. 14), and in 789 (Capit. iii. 9); by Theodulf of Orleans, 797 (Cusit. 11); by a council of bishops held at sone unknown plate in Frnnce, 802 (can. $y$; Labbe, Conc. vii. 1179); by the council of Chalons - sur - Snồne, 813 (can. 49); and by the couneil of Aix, in 816 . Spa ulso Junas of Urleans, 821 (Instit. Laic. I!, in Spieil. Iach. i. 83), who sjeaks of the unconseorated " ne liculae" of the rich in turms which the eouncil of l'aris seems to have burrowed. We must suppuse, however, that during the preo valence ot heresy a breach of this rule womd have been justified in the West, as we kurw that it was in the East. Thus, Theodore Studita says (Epist. i. 40, ad Naucr.), that in that case it was lawful "even to perform the liturgy in sa oratory."

Another eheak was the law that all who built oratoria for more than privnte prayer should endow them. Gregiry I. directed that an oratory built by a nobleman at Firmi shonld be consecrnted, provided that " no human body had been buried there," nod that there was a suitable endowmeut for the eardinal presbyter who was to serve it ( $E_{\mu}$ ist. x. 12). He permittel the consecration of another orntory outside the walls of the same city, "percepta primitus donatione legitima ;" but ordered that in this case the mass should not be publicly celebrated at the consecration, sad that a presbyter caldinalis ahould not be appointad to serve it, nor a baptistery built in connection with it (Ep. vii. 72). Similarly, Zachary of Rome, writing to Pipin about 743 (Epist. viii. 15). And these restrictions are made conditions in tho form of mandate for consecration in the $1 . \mathrm{l}^{4}$ er Ditrnus (v. 4). Cbnrlemngne enaeted generally, that "those who had or wished to have a consecrated oratory, should by the advice of the bishop make a grant out of their property in that eame place" (a.d. 803, e. 21 ; Ctpit. Rey. Fruns. i. 401). See also Justinian, Nuvella, 123, § 18.

Mueh informution on this subject may be found in J. B. Gatticus, de oratoriis Domesticis, ed. 2, Rom. 1770; Josephus de Bonis, de Urutoriïs Pullicis, and Fortunatus a Brixia, de Oratoriis Domesticis, both printed by J. A. Assemani (Rome, 1766) as a supplement to the work of Gatticus ; Z. B. Van Espen, Jus Ecel. Unid. ii. i. v. 8; J. M. Cavalieri, Comment. in Rit. Comr. Decreta, v. 4, Venet. 1758 ; and many others. Under the gencral demomination of Judicieas Deit we have
I. The Inel, a form especially prevalent ameng Toutumic natoms. In the year A.D. 500 , the collo "I' laws promulgated at Lyous by Gendebald, the Ariun king of Burguidy, and known as tho Len' Gumbetle, gave legal sanction to this mude of ordeal. Burborrous as were the times, the promble of the enactinent relating to the suhject implies a benve that such a law requires some justification, and this is found in the ulloged finet that tha morality of the commuaity is at so low an ebl that it is a common practice for indluiduals to olfer evidence on oath vith respect to matters of which they have no certala knowledge, or even knowingly to perjure themselves. It is accordingly enacted (with reference apparently to an already existing institution analoguou in sume respects to the E.uglish frithb, wh of a later period) that whenever a cause of disputa shall have risen, and the party ngninst When juigment la given shall still deny his obligution to what is demanded of him or his comaission of the alleged offence, by a sacramental oath " (s sorumentorum wbliguti ne neyawertl), the dimputo shall be thus decilesl: if the party on the side of him to whom the sacramental furm of outh has been proffered, shall refase to maku sucrumental ittestation (nofucrit sucrumenta sust (yperic), but, contident in the rightfulness of his cause, shall declare themselves able to cenvince his mitngenist by arms, and those of the opprosite party refuse to yield, it shall be lswful to decile the diapute by combat ("pugdandi litentia non negetur." It is, however, requirol that one of the witnesses, of those who hal wate prepared to muke sacramental attestatien, shall be 11 combatant (" Deo judicante configat"); it being right, the law goes on to say, that if uny man unhesitatingly alfirms his knowledge of a mutter in dispute, and proffers his sacrumental outh in attestation, he should not hesitate also to tight. Then, if the witness on the side which has oflered to take the onth ("testis partis ejus quae obtulerit sacramentum ") be varlululher, all the witnesses who had otiered to do the sune are required forthwith to pay a fine of 300 shillings; but if he who declinel to talie the outh should be slain, the party of the victor are to be indemnified, as to the mulct, out of the dead man's possessions ("de ficultutibus ejus novigildi solutione pars victoris reddutur indomnis." Cancianj, Barburorum l.evers Antiguac, iv. 25, 26).
This formal sanction of duelling confirmed the custom; mind looth among the Franks and the Lombards a similar recognition was extended to it by legislation. The colle of Rotharis (A.D. ${ }^{6+3}$ ), king of the lattor nation, opposed it ne one form of superstition to repress nother, in diresting that any man bringing the aecusation of witcheraft aguinat a freedwoman (calling her "striga, quod est maxa "), shoul! be compelle to nake guod his churge in single fight,-"si perseveraverit, of dixerit se probare posse, tune [^81]per Camplonem caussa, id est per pugnam, nd Dei judicuan decernatur" (Cancínni, i. 79). The character of Lultprand, who reigned over the Lumbards A.D. 713-735, is illustrated by his superiority to this superstition. He says that he hears that many are defented in the duel, Although theirs is notoriously the juster cause, but confesses his inability to repenl sn "impious law," sanctioned by the custom of the race. The utmost he could do was to direct that the party whole substanict should not therewith lose his whole substance, but be allowed to make a com-position,-" sicut antea fuerit lex componendi. Quia incerti sumus de judicio $/$ /ei; et multos audivimus per pugnam sine justa caissa suam caussum perdere. Sed propter consuetudinem gentio nostrae Longobarderum legem impiam vetare non possumus." Luitpranci Loycs, iv.

The advance of edacation and general enlightemment under Charles and his son Lewis, -dems to have in no way eheeked this superstitious practice. In the year 809, at the council of Aachen, the same mode of proving his innocence is conceded to a criminal found guilty of a capital oflence (Pertz. Lesyly i. 155), and a distinct article (art. 25) of the same eapitulary, forbids that any shall venture to call in question the validity of such a test, "ut omnes judiclo Dei credant absyue dubitatione" (ibid i. 157). A canitulary of the year 819 permits those accused of theft to vindicate their henour in a contest with their aceuser, to be fought "scuto et fuste " (Baluze, i. 782). The single combat Lewis the Pious, of which Saniln, in the reign of is given by Pious, of which a minute description is given by Ermoldus Nigellus (book iii. v. $550-$ 638), is perhaps the most notable instance to be met with at our period.
The voice of the most enlightened churchmen was not unfrequently, though vainly, raised against this kind of ordeal. "Purgation," or the formal proof of innocence, is described hy ecclesiastical writers as of two kinds, "canonica" and "vulgaris"-the former being by "sacramentum et juramentum," that is by sacramental and simple oath, the latter by the duel, hot or cold water, &e.-methods to which Agobard refers as devices of men, "hominum adinventio," and which Jvo of Chartres denounces as a law for which no sanction ean be claimed, "nulla Wanctione fulta lex " (Migne, Patrcl. clxii. 37). We learn from the former writer that Avitns, bishop of Vienne in the 6 th centary, in a conversation with king Gondebald, strongly condemned the duel ns a method of deciding personal disputes. Migne, civ. 125.)
But while the voice of the ehureh appenrs to have been gencrally raised against the duel as a barbarous and inequitable test, inasmuch as superior physieal powers, or skill in the use of weapons, thus became the real criterion of right and wrong, the religious superstition of the age favoured the resort to other metheds, which appealed to the belief in the mirae:lous. One of the earliest instances of this kind ${ }^{b}$ is that

Simplicins was ace:used of adultery. and both he anl the woman implucated in thu charge vindieated thomelves by taking live coals in the folds of their garments, and holding them there for nearly mo hour, their gurments remaining uninjured (te Gloriz Conf. c. 76 ; Migne, Ixxi, 907 ). Amony other and more common forine of orleal was-
11. The Ordeal of Hot or Cohl Wuter.-Buth of these methods were sanctioned by ecclesiastical authority. Among the Formudae biteres Exurcismurum (sea Baluze, C'pit. Re\%. Frunc. li. 639 ; Bumuet, S.rintures, iv. 597), there is given a form of exoreism used on the employment of either test. In that of ordeal by hot water, the two parties in the dispute repaired to the neighbouring chureh; there they knelt down, while the priest recited a preseribed form of prayer. Mass was then celebrated, anl the two presented their alins and received the holy commumion, having previously been solemnly aljured if in any way participant in or cognizant of the allege I crime not to communicate. Then mass was performed, after which the priest proceeded to the appointed place of ordeal, bearing with him the gospels and tho eross; he then chauted a short litany, and finally pronounced the fillowing exoreism over the water before it was heated: "I exorcise thee, thou ereature water in the nama of God the Father Omnipotent, and in the name of Jesus Christ His Son, our Lori, that thou mayest become exoreised water, to put to flight all powers of the enemy and every phantasm of the devit; so that if this man, now about to put his hand in thee, he innocent of this fault of which he is aceused, the compussion ["pietas"] of Almighty God shall deliver him. But if, which may God forbid, he be guilty, and shall have dared presumptuously to put his hand in theo, may the power of the same Almighty One condeseend to declare this concerning him, so that all may fear and tremble before the holy and glorious name of our Lord, who lives and reigns ever One God throughout all ages." When the water had been raised to boiling heat, the aceused reeited the Lord's Prayer, male the sign of tho cross, and then drew from the vessel containing the water a heary stone, previously placed therein by the presiding judge.

Theseverity of this form of ordeal seems to have given it the preference in cases where tho aecused was of the servile class. In the year 816 , a capitulary of Law is the Pious directs that slaves aecused of homicile shall submit to this test, in order that it may be made apparent whether they had designedly slain their victims, or done so only in self-defence. If the slave's hand exhibited marks of injury from the ordeal, he was to be put to death (Baluze, i. 177 ; see also 1251).

The method of procelfure at the ordeal of cold water was similnr; but here the difficulty was reversed; for while, in the former method, it consisted in eseaping injury, in this it was nlmost impossible to obtain a conviction. The aceused was only held guilty if he or she floated on the surface, the element having been previously adjured by the pricat to refuse to receive him or her if really erimiual (non suscipiat te ayua ineredulum aut seluctum). A deriation from this method is recorded by Gregory of Tours, on an otcaslun when a woman accused of alultery was flung into the Rhone, with heary stones fastened round her ne.k; whe, however, inroked the nid of St. Genesis, and was miraculously borne along on the surfiee of the current, and her innicence establlshed (de Ghoria Mart. c. 70 ; Nigne, Ixx1. 799). But the former nuethod was uuloubtedly the more common, though in th. - : mion of Le Brun (Mist. crilijue, p. 4177), it was not recoguised by law beffire the 9th century, when pope Eugenius 11. gave his sanction to its employment (Migne, exxix, $9 \times 5-7$ ). Lewis the lions, on the other land, in a capitulary of Anchen of the year 829, crdered it to be discontinued (Baluze, l. 668), though nut, proo bally, with the view of abolishing a sujersiticus practice (for other furms of ordeal were still resorted $t_{1}$ ), but, as Muratori has puintel out, because it practically amounted to an evasion e? justice.

III. Judicium Crucis, otherwise known as Slare ad Crucens.-In this node of ordeal, the acensed and hls accuser lifted their arms to a horizinial position, so that the entire boly of earh represented the figure of a cross. Then some chaptere from the Gospels, or a portion of the church sarvices, were read aloul, and he who, from fatlgue, was first compelled to let fill his arms was held to be defeated. Herehenrad, biship of Paris in A.D. 771, having beeme involvel in a disputc with a monastic lody, offerel to submit the question at issue to this test, nul was victorious (Muratori, Lessert. in Antip. Ital. Madii Aevi, vel. iii.),
A capitulary of Charles the Great of the year 799, directs that persons accused of perjury shall "stand cross-fashion " ("stent ad crueen," Pertz, Leyg. i. 37). Another of the year 803, directs that if the prosecutor of a treeman who is unable to pay a fine, refuses to receive the "aacramenta" of twelve men in evidence of such inability, then the dispute shall be settled either "by the cross" or by a duel fought with cluhs and shields (Baluze, i. 397). Similarly, in the year 806 a decree of the same coperir enjoins that in disputes respecting boundaries, "the will of God and the truth of the matter" shill be ascertained "judicio erucis" (i,id. $i$. 444). [Mortification, p. 1320.]
IV. The Ordeal of Hot Iron.-This consisted either in drawing a bar of iron from a furnace with the naked hand, or in walking over leated ploughshares with naked fect-numes denotel by the expressions, "judicium calefacere," "judicium portare," where judivirm is equal to ferrum. It is prescribed as a method of self-rindication froin the charge of manslaughter in the code of Luitprand, king of the Lumbards, "et si negaverit ipsum occidi-se ad novem vomeres iguites ad Judicium Dei examinatos aceelat " (Canciasi, i. 162). A capitulary of Charles the Great, of the year 003 , enacts in the case of a man who is acensed of having slaia $n$ aeighbour in defence of his own freedum, but denies the deed, that he shall pass over (accednt) nine fiery ploughshires, to be tested "juilicio Dei" (ibaluze, i. 389). Accorling to Milman, this mode of ordeal was aspecially reserved for accused persens of aggut rank; and ho mentions as in Jividuals by whom it was undergone "one of Charlenuagne's wives, our own queen Emina, the empress Cuaegunda" (Litt. Christiouity, bk. iii. c. 5).

V. The Ordend of Seallorimy Foo 1,-it was folievel that bread and cheese, administered with due prescrithed solemuities to an aecused person, would infallibly cloke him if he kuowfagly perjured himself (Muratori, te a.).
The most remarkable and elaborate protest aguinst this superstitlon, In all ita firms, was uadoubtedly that coutalned in a treatise by A tobard, bishop of lyons in the 9 th century, who, almut the year 8:10, composed a treatise ontrs dempubilem opinionem putantiun divin! julieii veritatem igne, vel ayuis, tel conflictus amuran patesieri (Migne, civ. 250). This remunstrance produced no spall ellect in its own day ; mud P'ulgrave (Ilist. Normandy and Erghand, i. "41) ascribes the prohibition of the wateronleal at the synad of Worms, A.b. 1076, to its iatluence. Agobard relied mainly on Scripture for his arguments. He was, however, opposed by Ilinemar, who in his malliesto (He Divortio Lothurii et Tethergu') npheld the eystem, enjleclally the water-ordeal. He maintainel, that where fiith was reully present in the hearts of those who conducted or submitted to these tents, the result was an infalible declaration of the divine will; only doubt und vacillation would dejprivs it of its efficacy (Migne, exxvl. 171).
The belief had, indeel, taken too strong a hold of the church to be readily dispelled by mere argument; and in Eaghatad, neariy a centary lster, wa find the forms II. and IV. Ceferred to ad sanctioned with considerable eireumstan. tiality. The language, however, is calculated to saggest that, either through fraud or connivance, these tests had been often successfully evaded, ond that the physical injury likely to be sustained was but trilling (Brompton, Chronicon; ia Twysden, Scriptores, p. 856). Even oo late ns the Ilth centory, these practices etill prevailed la the chureh. Ivo, of Chartres, when writing t. Hildebert, bixhop of Mans, resplecting an accusation brought against one Gislaudus, a priest, deems it necessiry to give special instructions Niat none of the ahove tests shall be resorted to (Migne, clxii. 37). II. Internal Organization of tue Clergy (ie, grades and divisions of orders).- it is clear
 (1 Thess.v. 12), of ท́raú $\mu$ evoi (Heb. xiii. 7, 17, ondo in the singular, which has been pointed out sbore, that a distinction was drawn in the enrliest period between the governing body of a church period between the govering body of a church and its ordinary members. What were the eleand its ordinary members. What were the elemeats of that governing body, and how far the meants of that governing body, and how far the distinction which was thus created corresponded to the litar distinction between clergy and laity, are questions of too great intricacy and uncertsinty to be properly discussed here. But eide by side with the use of $\kappa \lambda \hat{\eta} p o s$ and ordo in the singular, which almost phssed away with the civil organization from which it was derivell, is found, also in enrly times, their use in the plural "estates" of met the governing body, hut all the nardideyos, or list of members of each church, as in the corresponding lists of the Gruek ani Roman asmoelations, with whish the enrly churches had much in commen, the members were arranged ill groupro ench of these gronjus wan a kגñpas or "orilo"; the numbier of such groupm was nut rigidly definad, and the variety which exists in the lists which have come down to us makes it extremely dillicult to lay down any general propositions concerning them. The ecumeration of orders in the $A_{/ p n}$ ito lical Constifutions io probably a relie of such a list. it suecifies bishop, presbyters, dencons, remidera, singers, doorkeepers, deaconesses, whiows, virgine, orphans [laymen] (C. A. ii. 25 ; viii. 10, 12), but elsewhere there is a shorter enumerntion of ilerks, virgins, widows [laymen] (iii. 1 if; cf. of the . The difficulty of determining which of the clases thus enumerated corresjonded to the clergy of a later age is increased by the fact that sometimes the members of the elcrus seetn to have been regarded an identical with the persons whose names were inscriled on the canon, a pire which was in ordinary use under the empire, in reference to fixed payments and allowances of provisions (Conc. Nicacn. c. 3, oi $\langle\nu \tau \hat{\varphi}$ were thus incluled in a common list with the church officers, those which survived longest were tiose of widows and virgins. When the distinction between clergy and laity began to be more sharply drawn, these classes remainel for some time on the border-line; and it is an indication of the conservative character of forms of pullic prayer that the ancient enumerntion of orders survived in the misonls long after it had eceled to be recagnized in conciliar decrees, or by ecclesiastical writers. For example, in bishop Leofric's Exeter missal, in the Bodleinn library (A.d. 969), the "ordines" include bishops, presbyters, deacons, subdencons, acolytes, exorcists, readers, doorkeepers, cunfessors, viryine, widows, and all the people of God (fol. 108). But in the menntime, though not uniformly throughout christendom, the distinction between those who held office and those who did not had beeome sharply accentuated. Between them came those who hal taken monastic vows ( $\mu \bar{\alpha} \lambda \lambda o \nu \tau \hat{\varphi} \lambda \alpha \hat{\psi}$ Areop. Epist. viii. ad Demophil. p. 599), the $\tau \alpha \dot{\alpha} \gamma \mu a \tau_{\omega} \nu \dot{d} \sigma \kappa \eta \tau \hat{\omega} \nu$, Cone. Lsod. c. 24, or $\tau \dot{d} \gamma \mu \alpha$ $\tau \bar{\omega} \nu \mu 0 \nu a\{\langle\delta \tau \tau \nu$, S. Basil. Epist. Canon. ii. ad Amphiloch. c. 19. Into this class were merged, not only the ancient orders of widows and virgins, but also that of deaconesses ; the former became simple nuns, the latter were more usually abbesses. Hence there came to be only three orders or estates-the "ordo clericalis," the "or.lo monachorum," and the "ordo laicorum" (Hrabanus Maurus, de Instit. Cleric. lib. i. c. 2 ; cf. Hugo de S. Viet. de Sacram. lib. ii. pars 3, c. 14). It may be added that the distinction between monks and clerks was apparently always reeognized in the West, e.g. S. Hieron. Epist. 125 (4) ad Rusticum, vol. i. p. 944, "ita vive in monasterio ut clericus esse merearis," and usually in the East, e.g. S. Cyrill. Alexand. Epist. al Episc. Lib. c. 4 ; S. Athanas. Epist. ad Dracont. c. 9, vol. i. p. 211 ; but not always in the East, e.g. Schol. in Nomocan. tit. 1, e. 31, ed. Rallé nud Potlé, Athens, 1852, vol. i. p. 71; Balsnmon, in Conc. Carth. c. 35 , vol. i. p. 357, though elsewhere Balsamon includes among clerks only those monks who had receivel episcopal ordination, in Cone. Carth. c. 6, vol. i. p. 119 ; in Cone. Trull. c. 77, vol. i. p. 247.

But even if the term "orders" be limited, as it will be limited in what follows, to the "ordo clericalis" in its later sense, there is great diversity of use in regarl to the persons whom it denotes. No two periods and no two churches altogether agree as to the grades into which the elergy were to be divided, or as to the offices which crented a difference of grade in distinction from those which were merely differences of function between persons of the same grade. A complete account of this diversity of use would be considerably beyond our preseut limits; but the following incomplete account will give the lealing facts in regard to (1) the grades which were at various times recognised, (2) the groups into which those grades were divided.
(1) Grudes of (Irdirs (gradus ordinum, Conc. Taurin. A.d. 401, c. 8). -1 . Bishops, presbyters, deacons.-Without here entering into the question of the primitive distinction between bishops and presbyters [see Priest], there is no doubt that from the end of the 2nd century these three grades were generally if not universally found, and even so late as the 4th century they are sonetimes treated as comprising all the elcrgy; e.g. in the synodical letter of the council of Antioch in reference to Panl of Samosata, Euseb. II. E. vii. 30, "bishops, snd presbyters, and deacons, and the churches of God;" so $S$. Cyrill. Hieros. Catech. 16, 22, p. 256, bishopa, presbyters, deacons [monks, virgins, laymen], and even much later Suidas, p. 2120 c , defines $T i \rho \omega \nu$. (The later tendency to trent bishops as not being a separate order, but as constituting with presbyters the "ordo sacerdotum," Conc. Trident. sc3s. 1 xiii. c. 2; Cutech. Rom. ii. 7, 26, may be either a survival from the earlicr tims in which, whatever may have been the distinc. tion between them, thishops and preshyters together formed the "ordo ecelesinstieus," or an exaltation of the conception of the prirsthod; the latter scems to be the view of a lith rentury pontifical in the library of St. Geneviere at Paris (B. B. I. 50, fol. xiv.), "episcopatus non est orilo sed sneerdotii culmen et ajex atque tronus dignitntis.") 2. The enrliest addition to these three grades (there is no certain evidence of its primitive coexistence with them) appears to have been that of reuders. The four grades of bishop, presbyter, deacon, and reader form the nucleus of every organization in both East aud West, and they are sometimes the only grales which are recognized, e.g. Tertull. de Prutescript. Hıeret. е. 41 ; هıaт. К $\lambda \eta \eta_{\mu} \boldsymbol{\nu} \tau o s$, ap. Lagarile, /ur. Ecel. Reliy. p. 74, Pitra, Jur. Ecco. Gir. vol. i. p. 84 ; Conc. Sardic. c. 10 ; S. Greg. Sazinz. Orat. xlii. c. 11, p. 756; Conc. 上, hhes. Act i. cap. 23. The only churches which have pree served the order of bishops without retaining that of readers are probably those of Eingland and Abyssinia (Ludolf, Historia Aithiopia, Append. pp. 306, 320). 3. The complex chsracter of the duties of descons caused them to be divided, and n new order of assistant-leacons recognised; nmong the earliest instances of such a recognition are S. Cypr. Epist. 24, vol. ii. p. 287 ; Const. Apust. viii. 11, 12, $20 ;$ 'Conc. illib. e. 30 ; Neocmes. e. 10 ; Laod. e. 22,43 ; Sozom. I. E. i. 23 ; Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. 2 , 7. The five grades of bishop, presbyter, deacoa, subdeacon, and reader are apparently the ouly grades recognized in S. Joann. Damasc. Dith c. Manich. c. 3, vol. i. p. 431 ; S. Sym. Thessal. de Sacr. Ordin. r. 156, p. 138 (but ill. de Ditino Templo, c. 26, 27, 30, p. 275, omits subleacens); they became the ordinary grades of the Greek, Coptic, and Nestorian churches (see Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 8, 1 ; Denzinger, Rit. Orient. vol. i. pp. 118, 122 ; but the Schuliast in Ralle and Potle's edition of the Councils, vol, i . p. 71, states that the current practice agreed with the Nomocanon in also recognizing the order of singers ; the Copts and Nestorinus also zublivided the higher orders as mentioned belaw). 4. Sometimes the order of readers was subdividel so as to make a separate order of sinyers, Justio. Norell. 123, c. 19; Nomocanon, tit. i. c. 31 ; the subdivision has remained in the Syrian churches, both Jacobite and Maronite, who, however, also subdivide the higher orders ns mentioned below. Sometimes when singers are recognized the orier of subdeacons is omitted, Const. Apost. viii. 10, and some MSS. of Can. Aprost. 69. 5. Sometimes doorkerpers were added as a separate orter, Justin. Notell. 3 ,rnef.; but ibid. c. 1 , $\$ 1$, doorkeppers are distinguished from clerks ; similarly in Const. Apost. ii. 25 doorkeepers are mentioned, whereas ibid. vili. 10, they are omitted ; so in the Nestirian canons of the patrinrch John, cire. A.D. Poo, ap. Ebedjesu, Tract. vi. cap. 6, can. 11, пp. Мai, Scriptt. Vett. vol. x. p. 117: "de omnibus orlinibus, sacerdotum et clericorum ntque ostiariorum." They are also mentioned in the calupia of the Alexandrinn chureh, wrongly attributed to St. Athaunsius, but are not recegnized in the Inter Alexandrian (Coptic) ordinals, nor in other eastern ehurches. They are mentioned ns members of the clerus by St. Cyprinn, Erist. 16; but they are apparently excluded in Const. Apost. viii. 25 , and though sometimes mentioned, e.g. by Greg. Barhebraeus, Nomocan. c. $7, \$ 8$, they never had any general recognition as a separate orler in the East. (a) From this list sometimes singers are emitted, Cell. (b) Sometimes deerkeejers as well as singers are omitted, so appnrently Cone. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 10 (which is ene of the few recognitiens of exercists in ERstern canons); this is the case even in some of those Western ordinals which give a ritual for the ordination of doorkeepers, viz. those which quote the decretal of Zusimus (II inschius, Decret. Pseudo-Is̈̀l. p. 553), in which only six orders are specified. 7. Sometimes acelyths are added to the orders enumerated above, S. Cyprian. Epist. 28, 3 ; possibly Cod. Theodos. lib. 16, tit. 2, c. 10 ; Isid. Hispal. Etym. $7,2,2$, but when this is the case singers are commonly emitted. This is the earliest Roman list, being found in the 3rd century in the account which Cornelius gives, ap. Euseb. II. E. vi. 43; it is not tound in the East, nor until the 8th century is it cemmon in the West, one of the rare instances of its eccurrence being in a Gallican inscription of A.D. 517 , given by Le Blant, Inscriwtions Chretiennes de ia Gutle, No. 30; probably alse inic. No. 617, A.D. 445, assuming that "sequentibus" is a translation of akouncú保s. Bat it came at last to be the usual list of the western canenists, e.g. Cnpit. Hadrinn. c. 72; Yres of Chartres, Se,m. 2, vel. ii. p. 263 ; Alcuin, de Duv. Offic. c. 34 ; Hraban of Dlainz, de Cleric. Instit. c. 4 (where, however, readers and singers appesr to be identified), and Hugh of St. Victor, de Sacram. lib. ii. p. 3, c. 5, ap. Nligne, P. L. vol. dxxvi. p. 425. It was adnpted in later times by the council ef Trent, sess. x xiii. c. 2, with the exception that bisheps and presbyters are claszed together ss "sacerdotes." But Innecent III., though recognizing acolyths, excludes exorcists and renders, thus giving the six orders of bishop, preshyter, deacon, subilencon, acolyth, and singer, which he regards as the Christian counterpart of the Levitical erders "pontifices, saceriletes, leritns, nnthinaeos, janiteres, et psaltas" (Innoc. Ill. de Sucro Altaris Ministerio, I. I, Migne, P. L. rol. cexvii. p. 775). 8. In seme Oriental churchea there are grades which in the west either do not exist or are net ranked as grades but as functions: (a) cha episcopi sre distinctly ranked as ceoordinate with the other grades of clerks in Conc. Chale, c. 2; Cod. Justin. lib. 1, tit. 3, 40 (39), § 9; Gennadius, Epist. Encycl. in Act. Conc. Constam. A.d. 459, Mansl, vii. 911, Pitra, vol. ii. 184; and ameng the Jacebite Syrians, the Maronites (both of whem have a separate form of ordinntion for chorepiscopi), and, accurling to Gearge of Arbela, the Nesteriana. (1) Periodutue are also ranked as a separate order in Cod. Jnstin. l. c., probably in Conc. Laed. e. 57 (c.. Hefele, Councils, E. T. vol. ii. p. 32L), among the Syrians both Jacobitt and Maronite, and, according to Ebedjesu, Tract. vi. c. 1, ap. Mai, Scrip:t. Welt. vol. x. 1. 106, nmeng the Nestorians but in regard to the enstern status of both chore ${ }^{\text {is }}$, Oricntaliuin, vol. i. pp. $1: 11 \mathrm{sipf}$.). (c) A, eludeacons arc Jeckonel as $n$ separate order among the Copts, Jacobites, Marenites, nnd Nestoriang. (d) The Copts alse Copts alse recognise an order correspending to the archpresbyters or protopresbyters of the Latin and Greek churches, whom they call Igumeni [ńrov́uєvol, prejerly used of ablats or srehimandrites, Denzinger, i. 117]. (e) The Nestorinns recognise an order of officers to whem they give the name $S$ ci, they give the name Scithur', whe are a specina grate of singers, Denzinger, i. 124. 9. The oriental churches alse retognise grades of the episcopate; the Copts have bishops, archhishops ( $=$ metropolitans), anl a patriarch, for each of whom there is a distinct form of ordination, Denzinger, i. 116, ii. 33; the Jacobites and Muronites have bishops, metropelitnns, nnd patriarehs; the Nestorians, decorling to Ebedjesu, have bisheps, metrepolitans, and patriarchs, but according to George of Arbela there is properly a distinction between patriarchs and oatholici [Catnolicus, Vol. I. p. 321]. The western church has also semetimes recognised differences of grade in the episcepate. Isid. Hispal, Etym. vii. 12, 2, recognises bisheps, archbishops, metrepolitans, and pitriarchs. Hrabinus Maurus identifies archbishops and metropelitans, de Cleric. Instit. c. 5. But the council of Trent made these grades to be with "priests simply so called," i.e. presbyters, grades nut of the episcepate but of the priesthoed, Catech. Rom. 2, 7, 26. 10. From the bth century it appenrs to have beceme the custem, especially in the Gallican churches, to confer upon persens the privileges and immunities of the clergy by giving them the tonsure withont admitting them to any special otfice in the church; such persons were called clerici, but it is admitted by canenists and by the council of Trent that they were not an "orde" (Catalani, ad Pontif. Kom. pars i. tit. iii.). 11. Several other classes of church officers appear st various times to have been recognised as members of the clerus, e.g. (a) copiatar, Cod. Theodes. lib. xiii. tit. 1, 1 (but distinguished from clerici, ibid. lib. xvi. tit. 2, 15), S. Epiphnn. Expos. It is possible that mysticsl rensons had something to do with the elimination of some of these classes from the list of gradea which came ultimately to be received by. theologians in the West ; the sevpn orilers were the seven manifestations of the work of the Holy Spirit, e.g. Y ves of Chartrees shys that " sanctn ecclevia septiformis gratiae est munere deceratn" (D. Jvon. Carnot. Scrm. 2, il, p. 2633); so Hugh of S. Victor: "septem spiritualium officlorum gradus proinde in saucta ecclesia secundum septiformem grithmm distributi sunt " (IIugou. de S. Vict. de Sucram. lib.
ii. pars 3, c. 5). But Innocent IIL. de Sacro Altaris Minister. lib. i. c. 1, Migne, P. L. vol. cexvii. p. 775, finds an equally valid mystical reason tor six orders, "senarius eaim numeras est perfeetus;" and still later canonists agree with lisidore in reekoning nine, adding elerks aod bi-hops to the seven grades which were ordinarily received by theologians (Catalani, note to the Pontificale Romanum, pars 1, tit. 2); so in the Maronite pontifical, Morin, de Sacr. Ordin. pars ii. p. 40if). Alcuin (albinas Flacens) reekons eight orders, by making bishops distinct trom presbyters, assigning the mystical reason that the gates of the templie in Ezekiel's vision had eatch eight steps (Albin. Wace. de Divin. Off. 33 ; Ezek. x1. 31, 34, 37). Tho same number, without the reason, is given by Hrabmas Maurns, de Instit. Cleric. 1, 4, nod in St. Dunstaa's and the Jumieges pontificals.
(2) Groups of Grades of Orders.-The several ordines tended to combine iato groups; but the groups varied wideiy under ditierent circamstances.

1. Sometimes the bishop was regarded as standing apart from the other oflicers of the church. This distinction, which is important in rejation to the history of the episeopate, shews itself from the fourth century onwards in the restriction of the use of $\kappa \lambda \hat{\eta} p o s$ and $\kappa \lambda \eta p i \kappa 0$ to those who were not bishops. This may not have been universally or invarisbly the case, as many passages, c.y. in the Apostolical Canons, may be inte:preted in either way ; but the following instances are clear: in the Canon Law, Conc. Ephes. c. 6,

Trull, e.77, which makes the tripartite division iepatioous $\boldsymbol{\eta}$
 West subdeacons were for several centuries on tho border-line; they had sometimes the prisileges of the higher, sometimes those of the lower, division of the clergy. (ii.) In the West a distinetion was ultimately drawa between "orlines" and "sacri ordines"; the latter were for some time regarded as consiating of bishops, preshyters, and deneons, but the enrliest cabonical restriction ot the phrase to these three orders is probably Conc. Benevent. A.d. 1091 (Mansi, vol. xx. p. 738), which is the anthority quoted by Gratian, pars i. dist. 60, 4. But the earlier use of "saeri ordines" for all classes of charch olficers is oceasionally found eveu after the limitation had become ordiaurily fixed, (c.g. in a Reims pontifical, no. 179 (162), fol. 109, "sscri ordines" are distinguished not from minor orders but from the orders of virgina or widows). The modern inclusion of the subdiaconate among "holy orders" dates from the 12th century. It is expressiy excluded by Hugh of St. Victor, de Sacram. lib. ii. pars 3 , c. 13. Peter the Siager, A.D. 1197, speiks of the inclusion as a recent institution ''er', Abbres. c. 60 ; Migne, P. L. vol. cev. 18t, and abuut the same time Innocent III. says that "hodie" a subdeacon is in holy orders and may be elected bishop (Lpist. x. 164; Migne, P. L. voi. cesv. 1257); Durand (Rationale, ii. c. 8), ascribes ths inclusion to lnnocent III. himself. (Ct. Morin, de Saer. Ordur. pars iii. exereit. 12, c. 5 ; Mnrtene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 8, bit. 2.) Earlier traces of this elevation of the subdiaconate are S. August. Serm. 356, de Ditersis, c. 2, vol. v. p. 1575 ; Can. Eccles. Afric. c. 25 ; Conc Gerund. A.D. 583, c. 1 ; 2 Cor.c. Tolet. A.D. 53 I $_{\text {; }}$ c. 3 ; on the other hes.d in most Oriental charehes subdeacons still retain their primitive place, and do not enter into the sanetuary.
3. Sometimes bishops, preshyters, and deacons were classed together, without express reference to their sacred or priestly charaeter, as formiog a higher class of clergy; the existence of this distinetion in early times is made apparent, without being expressly stated, by dillerences in discipline, e.g. in Can. Apost. 42, 43, 54, 55; afterwards it came to be commonly expressed, e.g. 1 Cone. Matiseon. A.D. 581, c. 11 ; Episeopi, presbyteri, vel universi honoratiores cleriet; Josan. Diac. Iit. S. Greg. The distinction does not exist in Oriental cburches.
(3) Succession of, and intervals between, grades of orders. - There is no evidence of the existence in the earliest period of any rule against the appointment of a layman to any office whatever in the church, still less is there any evidence to shew that a clerk who had begun in a lower grade had to pasa by any regular steps of auccession to a higher. There are instances (1) of bishops who had never been presbyters [Bishop, Vol. I. p. 219], to the examples given ta which place msy be added the case of Pauliuanus in S. Hieron. Epist. 82 (64), vol. i. p. 318: the cnses mentioned in S. Leon. M. Epist. 14, ad Anastiss, e. 6, vol. i. p. 688 ; S. Greg. Msgn. As early ns the Pastoral Epistles promotion to a higher grade is held out (1 Tim inducement to "use the office well" ( 1 Tim. iii. 13), and a person who had only recently been converted is made ineligible for come to be disregurd regulation had evidently 4the century disregarded at the beginning of the th century, and the council of Nicaen, $c .2$, in ing of the it extended it to all clerks (the mesning of the difficult Greek text of the canon is " "robably best expressed by Rufinus, II. E. 2, 6, "ne quis nuper assumptus de vita vel conversatione Gentili, sccepto baptismo, autequam enutius examinetur, clericus niat;" so in effect Dionysius Exiguua, but Hefele ad loc. takes a slightly ditlerent view). But in the course of the same century there are traces of the growth of a tendency to appoint no one to a higher office until he had passed through the lower. The tendency was probably fostered by the civil law in regard to appointmenta, "ut gradatimn honores deferantur," Modestin. in the Diy. 50, 4, 11, quoting a letter of Antoninus Pius; "gerendorum honorum non promiscua fncultas est, sed ordo certus huic rei adhibitusest," Callistratus in the Di, $50,4,14, \S 5$. Tbis tendency finds its frist authorized expression in Conc. Sardic. c. 10 , which however denls with the apecial case of a wealthy being elected to a bishopric, and requires such a man to pass gradatim throngh the offices of reader, deacon, and presbyter. Gregory Nazianzen is less definite. He lays down as a general rule that a man should fill a lower office in the church before filling the higheat office (Orut. 2, apolog. § 111, vol. i. p. 62, sometimes interpreted that he should be a render before being a presbyter). The first writer who speaks of passing "per solitos gradus" is Jerome (Epist. 60 (3), ad Heliodorum, vol. i. p. 337). Leo the Grant discourages the omission of the lower grades, but does not disallow it (Epist. 12, vol. i. p. 674), whereas Gregory the Grent opeaks of the omission as "grave nimis" (Epist. ix. 109, vol. ii. p. 1014, writing to Brunbildi of, ibid. ix, dendum it. p. 1009, "ordinate ad ordines accedendum est ").
When the rule had been fairly established, there still arose cases in which it created a difficulty. In ouch cases the rule was at once obacrved and craded by accumulating ordana.

tiona, i.e. a person was admitted to successive grades on the aame day or at short intervals. liarly instances of this practice are that of Wulfnd, in whose favour Charles the Bald wrote, Epist. Ciroli R. in Conc. Stuession. A.D. 8t6; Mansi, vol. xv. p. 708, anil that of a bishop of Salerno mentioned by Leo Maraicanus, Chron. Casin. ii. 98 ; Atigne, P. L. vol. clxxiti. One elition of the Roman pontifical (that which was published by Albertus Castellanus at Venice in 1020 and (ledicated to Leo X.) makes provision for the case of a pope who was elected either as n layman or in minor orders, "accipiet priman tonsurnm et minores ordines, ut alii inferiores," with this diflerence, that he is to be rested from the first in mitre and rochet, and to receive the instruments of the sevaral orders at his faldstool. But even when grales were not nccumulatel, it was not until the 8th century that ordinations per sultum began to be considered iavalid or to be punished by deposition.
One of the earliest instances is in the Frankfort capitulary of a.D. 789, which deposes a bishop Gaerbod, who nimits that he had not been ordained presbyter or deacon (Capit. Francofurt. § 10 , sp. l'ertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. 1. p. 7i). Of later instances the mediaeral uanonists furnish an ahundant crop, e.g. Innocent III. E'pist. vii. 192 . A presbyter who han not been ordained dencon is allowed to retnin his wlers, but has to go through the ceremony of traing ordained deacon, id. Epist. viii. 118; a deacon who does not know whether he received ranor orders or not, is required to receive them "ad cautelnm," id. Epist. x. 146; a deacon who has knowingly passed over the subdiaconate is seat to a monastery for a time.

The question what grades were necessary resolves itself into two questions-(i.) what was the tirst grade, (ii.) whit were the necessnry subsequent grades. (i.) The inference to be drawn from recorded historical examples is that, as a rule, those who dedicated themselves to the service of the church began ns readers. An indication of this is found as early ns the time of Cyprinn (Epist. 33, vol. ii. p. 319, of the orilinntion of Aurelius; but the use of "placuit" shews at the same time that there was no existing rule on the subject). In the following century Basil (according to S. Greg. Nazinnz. Orat. 43, c. 27, vol. i. p. 792) and Chrysostom (accorling to Socrat. II. E. vii. 3; Pallad. Jit. S. Chrys. c. 5) both began as readers. In the 5th century there are the instances of Felix of Nols (Paulin. Poem. XV. de S. Felice, t. 108 ; Migne, P. I. vol. Ixi. 470), and of John of Châlons (Sidon. Apollin. Epist. iv. 25). The same interence as to the custom of beginaing as readers tollows (1) from the constant practice of the Greek church; (2) from the earliest papal decretals on the subject, those of Siricius, Zosimus, and Gelasius, which are quoted below; (3) from Conc. Milev. A.D. 416 (cf. S. August. Epist. 63 ( 240 ), vol. ii. p. 231), 2 Conc. Nienen. c. 14. The earliest indication of the practice of beginning as a doorkeeper is probnbly that which is in licated by laulinus of Noln Epist. I (6) ad Sever. c. 11 ; Migne, P. L. vol. $1 \times 1,158$ (although thia may shew rnther his own humility, than the provalence of a custom); but in the Gth eentury the rule was laid down which has bees the rule of Western cunon lnw ever since that every clerk must puss through that grade (Silvest. Ejust. c. 7; Cnli E'pist. c. 6 ; both adopted by the Pacuda-Isidore from the Liter Pontificalis, see below). Martin of Tours hegna as an exorcist (Sulp. Sever. Vit. S. Murtin. c. 5), and Gregory the Great speaks of a monk who began as a subdeacon (Epist. 13, 28, vol. ii. p. 1237).

It must also be noted that there was a counter tendency to that which ultimately prevailel; it was probably not until the clerical otlice becanas a regular profession that promotion from one grale toanother became an ordinary rule; persons who were well fitted for particular onlices sometimes remained in them to the end of their lives. Ambrose (de iffic. Ministr. i. 44) writes as though division of labour were recognized in the church, sad as though it were a function of the bishop to find out the oflice for which each person was best qualified. As instances of the prevalence of this view we find an ncoljts of eighty-tive years of nge (Le Blamt, Inscriptions Chrectiennes de la Guu'e, no. 36) a deacon of fifty-eight (ibid. no. 430), a suldencon of thirtytwo (Le Rossi, Inser. Christianae Urbis Romanae, aó. 743, A.D. 448).
(ii.) The detinition of the particular grades through which a clerk must pass, and of the time which he must spend in ench grade, belongs to the period of the lsidorinn aid l'sendo-lsidorinn dicretals. The uncertainty which prevailed, even after those decretals hal been formally incorporated into canou law, is shewn by the great variety of rendings which exist in the various MSS. of the decretals. 1. The enrliest of them is probubly that of Siricius, Epist. ad Eumer. c. $10(=$ Gritian, Decret. i. dist. 77, c. 3 ; Ivo Carnot, Decret. 6, c. 91), which, necorling to the text given by Hinschius, Decret. Iseulo-Isid. p. 520 , allows a person to be ordninod render in early youth; then from puberty until thirty yenrs of age he is to be scolyte or subdeacon; fire yenrs afterwards he is to be dencon, but ne detinite period is prescribed before he can become presbyter or bishop; if, however, a person is not ordnined in early youth, he must be reader or exorcist for two years sfter his baptiam, acolyte, and subdeacon for five yenrs in all; there is no other preseription of time; but othet texts give an interval of five yenrs between a dencoa and a presbyter, nud of ten years between a presbyter nud a bishop. 2. The decretal of Zosimus, which is probably next in order of antiquity. (Epist. ad Ilesych. c. 3= Gratian, Dccret. I. dist. 77, c. 2 ; Nigne, P. L. vol. xx. p. 672 ; Hinschius, p. 553 ) provides that if any one has been ordnined in infincy he must remain as a reader uatil he is tweaty years of age; if he is ordained Inter in lite, he must be either reider or exoronst for five years after baptism; in aay conse he must be either acolyte (Egbert's Pontifical has "catholicus") or subdeacon for four years, and dencon for five years. No other limits are prescribe. This rule seems to have been widely recognized nfter the bth century, since it is found in the Gelasian sacramentary, and In the pontificuls of Egbert, St Iunstan, Jumiégea, Noyon, Cshors, Vutican ap. Muratorl. 3. The Liber Pontificalis supplied the eanon law with two other decretals: (1) in the Jit i Caï ( $=$ Cail Epist. c. 6; Grutian, Decrect. i. dist. 77, c. I; Mlgne, P. L., vel. v.

But it would be difficult to shew that the latervals thus prescribed were even generally observed. No doubt the rule came to prevail that the centerring of each of the lower grades mast precede the conferring any of the higher ; but the ideal of the decretals, accerding to which a clerk must remain long eneugh in each grade to prove his efficiency in it, was probnbly seldom realised, except in the case of those who seldom realised, except in the case of these whe were devoted to the service of the church from infancy. In the case of these who soaght admission to hely orders in Inter life, the oaly interval of time which mnintained itself throughout, and from which a dispensation was rery rarely given, was that of a year between the tirst admission to orders and the presbyterate. The Saram Pontifical bewails the degenerncy of the times which left so short an interval batween the "status laicalis" and the "status presbyterii supremus" (ap. Maskell, Mon. litual. vol. iii. p. 158); but it is probatly the case that the adeption of this particular interval was due to the enstom which grew up in some parts of Spain snd Ganl in the 6th century of requiring as "adaus conversio," i.e. a year's saclusion na "adaus conversio," i.e. a year's saclusion from secular life before admission to major orders ( 3 Conc. Arelat. A.D. $524, ~ c . ~$ Aurel. A.D. 538 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538 , c. $6 ; 5$ Conc. Aurel. a.D. 549 , e. 9 ); this again was connected with, and perhaps grew out of, the rule that a monk must haps grew ont of, the rule that a monk must spend s year in minor orders and the diaconate before being ordained presbyter (S. Gelas. Epist. 9 ud Epi-c. Lucan. c. 2 ; Gratian, llecret. i. dist. 77, c. 9 ; Hinschius, p. 650). At first this year was divided into definite periods; Gelasius directs that a person must spend three months is each of the four olfices of reader (or "notarius" or "defensor"), acolyte, subdencon, and deacon (ibid.). But afterwards the conferring of minor orlers became a mere form and a clerk conld pass through all grades up to the diaconate on one and the same day (but according to loman canonists, only the pope could grant a diapeasation for accumulating major orders on the same day; see Catalani, ad I'ontif. Rem. pars 1, tit. $2, \S \S 4,6$ ).
la the East the primitive custom of appointing a layman to any church othice lingered longer; the custom of interstiti: is almest a aknown. The limitntions are rnther limitations of age than of interral ; for example libed Jesu, Iract. vi. c. 4, 2 ; ap. Mai, Scriptt. Iett. Suv. Coll. vel. x. p. 112 , lays dewn the rule that boys are nat to receive imposition of hands, but are only to be appeinted readers; when they have reached adolescence they mny become subdencens; at the age of eighteen they muy become deacons, at twenty-five presbyters; but even after a succession of graides had become established a person whe had attnined the requisite age might he admitted to more than one grade on the same day; nmong the Nestorians such an nceumulation of grades hecane the usual rule (see the ritund in Denzinger, Rit. Orient, vol. ii. p, Western Western practice, which allowad a layman to be appointed te Hny office whatever, but eompelled all the go through the ordination ceremonies of all the lower grades. (See above for the case of a layman elected pope.)

IIl. Externalorganisation of tine Ctemgy. -In apostelic and sub-apostalic times there is no evidence of the existence of any other than the internal organization which has been descrilied above. Bach ehurch has its officers, but each church was indepeadent and complete in itself. There ware frienilly relntions lietween one church and another; there was an interchange of letters and of hespitality; but there does not appear to have been any organized combiantion for common purpeses, and still less any subordination of the othicers of one church to the officers of anether. But in the course of the 2nd century begin to appenr the outlines of a system which has done more than anything else First of all the clergent history of Christendom. First of all the clergy of neighbouring churches, and ultimately the clergy of the greater part of the Christian world, came to be associated in a single organization.
Inte the conses which produced a tendency to organization it is not to the present purpose to enter. But the shape which the organization took cannot be understood without a reference to the influences which produced it. Those influences flewed chiefly from the system of administration which prevailed in the einpire. Just as the internal organization of the church reflected the main features of the civil policy and religious associntions of the time, so did its external organization follow the lines which were already marked in contemporary life.
This is seen in the following respects esje-
(1.) Every year deputies ( $\sigma \dot{\prime} v \in \delta \boldsymbol{\delta}_{\rho o i}$, legati) from the several to wns of a province met together in a provincial council (kovory, conciitum). The pobjects of these councils were varions and their powers extensive. They had a common fund from which they could build temples or erect statues; they decided as to the " Inries of the territories of cities; they had the right of commonicating directly with the emperor in regard to the civil and judicial administration of the province. From them came the first beginnings of ecclesiastical organization in similar assemblies or "councils" of the elergy. Such conncils began in Greece and Asia Niner, where the civil councils ara knewn to have ocen excentienally active (Tertull. de Je;un. c. 13, "aguntur per Graecins illa certis in locis concilia ex universis ecclesiis;" cf. Euseb. II. E. 5, 16, queting probably Apollinaris of Hierapelis: т娄" quveג $\theta$ dur ats тôfo [sc. against the Montanists] $\sigma \cup \nu \in \lambda \theta \delta \nu \tau \omega \nu)$; in the time of ('yprian they were A frinning to be a regular institution in North permanend from that time ouwards they bacame cils, Vermanent factors in chureh history [see CousciLs, Vol. I. p. 473 sqq.]. Their importance in regarl to the organization of the clergy is that, following the example of the eivil councils, tho ecclesiastical councils kept to the lines marted out by the civil govermment, and that consequently instend of the urgunization for ecelesinstienl purposes being determinell by proximity of place or similarity of origin, it was iletermined by the lines of demarcation of the Roman provinces. Those provinces became ecclesiastical units, and their chief cities became centres of ecclesiasticnl administration. (For the facts in relution to the civil councils, see Marquardt, Römische Staatscerioaltung, bd. i. pp. 365̄-377; id. in Ephemeris Epigraphica, 1872, pp. 200214 ; Duruy, Histoire des Romains, vol. v. pp. 213-219; Fustel de Coulanges, Histoire des Institutions Politiques do l'Ancienne France, vol. i. p. $107 \mathrm{sqq}$. .)
(2.) In the civil councils the president was an oflicer whose functions were to in grent eatent religions, nnd who bore the name of Succrdos procinciae (Cod. Theolos. 12, 1, 46, 75, 174), or àpxiepés's (C. C. G. 3487, and elsewhere). To him the other priests of the province were subordinate, and in some cases he nippointed them. (Iulinn, E'pist. 49, 63 ; Eunnp. 57, ed. Boisson. ct. Mnryunrdt, l. c. p. 368). When the ecclesiastical councils came to be estnblished, their president not only received the same or an suinmis sucerios, but he was also invested with the right of confirming both the appointment and in certain cases the nets of the other bishops of the province. In the East this otfice fell to the hishop of the metropolis, who was hence also called $\delta$ т $\hat{\eta} s \mu \eta \tau \rho o \pi \delta \lambda \epsilon \omega s$ or metropolitanus; but in Africa, mad probably also at first in Gaul an! Spain, it fell to the bishop who was senior in date of appointmert: [see Primate].
(:3.) Within the limits of the grent provinces were smaller organizations. The provinces wera subdivided into districts, partly for fiscal, partly for commercial, but chietly for judicial proposes. These were known ns conventus, comentus juridici, juris lictiones, soarhoreis ( n use of the word which must be kept distinct from its use to denote the larger divisions of the empire under Diodetina). Einch of them had its centre of a lministration, its "county-town" with its basilica or "county-hall." It was in these centres that Christinn communities were first formed, and the nren of the juridicnl conventus or "diocese" becume naturnlly the nren of the ecclesiastical organizntion. The jurisiliction of the bishop und presbyters was concurrent with that of the civil authority, and the sent of jurisdiction, which was also the plnce of meeting, whs under the Christinn emperors, the busilica of the civil magistrnte. At first of course there were many disiricts in which the Christinn community was not large endigh to warrant the formution of any organization; where this was the case, n neighbouring bishop was charged with the oversight ot such communities, until in process of time, and usually through the interrention of the provincial council, they were large enough to have bishops of their own; but even in the sth and ith centuries the sphere of a bishop's jurist 'ction is sometimes spooken of in the plurnl. Sulp. Sever. Dich. 2, 3, "dum dioceses visitat;" ef. Sidon. Apollinar. Epist. 7, 6, p. 183 ; 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 36 .
(For an necount of the civil conrentus or dioceses, see Marquardt, Robm. Staatsv. Bd. I. p. 341 ; the early history of ecclesiastical dioceses has yet to be written.) be written.)
Such were the three chief respects in which the ecclesiastical organization followed the lines of the civil organization ; in the association of churches nccording to provinces, in the forma. tion of an intrn-provincini hierarchy with s metropolitun or primate at lts head, and in the recognition of the bishop of a city as having jurisdiction over the district of which the city wns the centre, the church adapted but did not mnterinlly transform lending elements of contemporary civil life.

How close tho corresponaence was between the ecclesiastical and the civil organization can be shewn from many instances in both east und west. The most interesting case in the west is that of Guul. According to the Notitia Provinciaram et Dignitatum (circ. A.d. 400), Gaul was divided into two civil dioceses: (1) D. Galliaram ; (2) D. Viennensis. The former was subdividel into ten provinces, viz. Belgics primn et secunda, Germanin primn et secunda, Mnximn Sequanorum, Luglunensis primn, secunda, tertia, quarta ( $=\mathrm{L}$. Senonin), Alpes Gruiae et Pooninae. (TheV eronese MS., which gives the division under Diocletisn, dirides Lugdunensis into two instead of furr divisions, thus shewing that the subdivision took place in the 4th centurs; cf. Mommsen, Abhandlungen der Berlin. Acudem. 1862, p. 492.) The latter was subdivided into sevea provinces, viz. Viennensis, Narbonens:s prima et secunds, Novem Populi, Aquitania prima et secnnda, Alpes maritimae. Not only was the civil metropolis of ench province sa episcopal see, bat in all cases except two (Elusn and Ebrodunum) the sen has remained until modern times, and in almont nll cases the metropolitan character of the see has also remained, the lishops being styled archbishops to the present day. For exsmple, tho metropolis of Belgica Primn was Augusts Treverorum = 'Trier, $n$ bishop of which see was present at 1 Conc. Arelnt. in 314 ; that of Belgica Secunda was Durocortorum Remorum $=$ Reims, $s$ bishop of which see was nlso present at 1 Conc. For example in the Provincia Viennensis twelre such towns are mentioned (besides the metropolis Vienna), viz. civitas Genavensium=Geners, civ. Grutianopolis=Grenoble, civ. Deensium (: Ad Denm Vocontiorum of the Peutinger Tshls $=c i v$. Dea Vocontiorum of the Jerusalem Itisermry $)=$ Die, civ. Vnlentinorum=Valence, cir. Carpentoratensium = Carpeatras, of which a bishop is mentioned in 483), cir. Aresuicorum ( $=$ Avemione of the Peutinger Table) $=$ Avignon: civ. Arelatensium (in some MSS,

Erery one of these towns had a bishop in Niomun times. The same was the case, with hardly on exceetion, in the other provinces. France prererves in its bishop,rices to the present dny the outlines of the Romnn administration. On the other hand, England is un exumple of a country io which, the Roman organization having almost entirely passed away before the tinal urgunizitiva of the church began, tho dioceses were for the most purt formed out of the Suxon kiugdons and similiarly in relnni, "the spiritual jurisdiction of the bishop was coextensive with the temponi sway of the chieftnin" (Reeves, Lechesistrca! Antimitics of Duen, Connur, ard Dromore, p. 3033).
Within the skeleton thus furuished several other tendencies operated which arose within the church itself.
2. There arose a tendency to attach a clerk to a particular church, nad to give local limits to the exerciss of his functions. In the earliest nges
there is |resumptive cvilence that 4 member of there is presunnptive evilence that a member of the ordio of one church might freely pass to another. It did not of course follow that he thereby became a meml. sr of the ordo of the other church. But the fact of his holding othice elserwhere was recognised, and he enjoyed a certain preecence. Sometimes also he was placed on the clergy-roll, and he might thus be on the roll of everal churches at once. An ambitious or a disaffected clerk was able in this way to pass easily from a narrower to a wider aphere, or to rid himself of the supervision of a too cxiyeant supperior. But this came at last to be prohibited, nerept with the full consent of all who were concerned. The final prohibition wns indeed the cerned. The final prohibition wns indeed the resuld of a long struggle, nor is there any enactment of canon law, except those relating to marriage, which requirell to be so frequently reperated. The earliest existing enactnent in the east is Conc. Nicaen, .16 . 16 (which her the east is Conc. Nicaen. c. 16 (which huwever refers to n土 earlier canon, poossibly thnt which is preserved in Cin. Apost. 15), which provides that no one who is on the clergy-roll of any church shall leare it under pres church shall leare it under penaity of excommunication; and that any or ination in one church of s clerk what any on the lination in one church of a clerk who is on the roll of nother church, without the consent of hia $p$ p per bishop, shail be involid. These enactinents were reparted, with ad litions, by 1 Cone. Antioche c. re- 3 , Cooe. Sardic. e. 15, Conc. Chalc. e. 10 , ufter which no further regulation on the subject became necessary in the east for two centuries and a half; when the Trullin Conncil recognized the fact of the non-observance of the earlicer canouns, and repeated them (c. 17). In Africa similsr reesulareperted them (c. 17). In Africa similsr regulation? were made by the councills of Carthage, and Vernense diplex, c. 12, ap. Pertz, 1, 26). In Eugland they ${ }_{787}$ were recognized by the Lagntine Synods in 787, c. s' (Haddan nad Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 447 ), and by Egbert of York (Diall, Egbert Ebornac. ©. 7, 9, ibid. ppe 402 suq.). Aiterwards they pinsied Vict. de Sacram. 2, 3, 22), nor has there been any serious subsequent attempt to destroy the relation of lord and rassal which they estillished between a bishop and the other membera of the ordo ecclesiasticus. ordo ecclesiasticus.

3. A second tendency, which arose in the course of the 3rd century, and d which ran puri prri passu with that which has just Leen descrited, took the louble form of giviug lucal limits to limits to a bishnp,s powers, and of sub, rdilinating him either to the provincial cauncil, or to a single sulperior. (a) Probably the first express revagnition of the resognition of this local linitation is in the letter of the four Egyptian bishops, Hesychins, Piuhomius, The eudorus, und Mhilens, to Meletius of Alexandrin, in A.D. 303-5, which wus Pullished fron a L Lation rersion nt veroua, by Multiei, Opusc. Eccles, ii. p. 253, nud republished by Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 1. A few years later the cuancil of Antioch expressly limits the exereise of a bishop's powers to his own province or $\begin{aligned} & \text { mapxia (which mny } \\ & \text { possif }\end{aligned}$ possibly be used as in Cunc. Nimenen, c. $6=$ orof$\kappa \eta{ }^{2}(\mathrm{~s})$; he could not for the future piss into naother province for the purpose of making ordint ordinitiona, except on the written invitution of the the metropolitan and bishops of that praviuce (Cunc. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 13); the council of Constnntiuople, forty yeirrs later, renews the

 mskes an explicit excep|tion in regard to nations outside the Roman organization (è roîs $\beta \alpha \rho \beta c$ pikois tevegi). In thuse parts of the West in which the meshes of that organization were closer, the relation of one bishop $t_{1}$ another were still more sharply defined. Where, as in Gaul at the beginning of the 4th century, there was a bishop for every civita, i.c. for the centre of every eircle of civil juridediction, it was provided that each bishop shuuld be confined to his own circle, and should not exercise authority in the circle of his neighbour ( 1 Conc. Arclit. A.D. 314, c. 17, "at nullus episcopus ${ }^{\text {a }}$ alium episcopum cooculcet," 1 Turon. A.D. 461 , C. 9 , exconnmunicates those who trangress the "termings a patribus constitutos;" 1 Lugd. A.d. 517 , c. $5 ; 1$ Arvern. A.d. 535 , c. 10). But, on the other hand, as a proof of the intimate counexion between civil and ecclesiastical organization, where, ns in Ireland, the imperial system of adminisistration did nut prevail, the bishops preserved their original status; they were the officers not of districts jut of single congregations; they moved about almost as they fleasel; dheeses In the or imary sense dill not exist until the syowi of lath-Bresail in 1141 (see Rreves, Ecclesiastical Antiguities of Dhnon, Connor, and Dromore, appiend. IIP. 135, 1:19). (b) It is also probable thit in the earliest times, a bishop or a eommunity had the power of ajpolatiug any baptized persun to oflice withnut regard to the place of his baptlsm or to his belng already on the clergy-rolt of nother church. But whlle on the ode hand, as we have already seen, the conacila gradually cume to prolibit a nember of one clurch from taking athice in another, on the other hand they restrained bishops from ordalaing such persons, partly by makiag such ordinations null, and purtly by subjecting offending bishops to the prenaliy of suspension and excommunication. (c) It is also probable that in the eariiest times each bishop was iodependent of his colloagues; the several shepherds of the flock of Christ were annanble, not to any earthly superier but to Christ Himself: "singulis pastribas portio sit adseripta, quam regat unusiuisque et gubernet, rationem sui nctus Domino reldituras" (St. Cyprian, Epist. 55, ds Cornel, e. 14, vol. Ii. p. 821). But in the course of the 4th centary there grew up the tepdency, which was probably reflected from the great contemporary developmeat of the hierarchical system in the empire, to sulordinate bishop to bishop and church to charch. The details of this subordination g'ew out of the extension to the ecelesiastical sidhere of the civil system of provideial councils and proriacial high priests; but the spirit which led to that extension grew up within the church itself:
4. A third teadeney, which arose in the East from the gradual decay of the populition, and in the West from the necessity of consolidatiay an organization, which had interwoven itself with the civil administration, and round which a complex growih of material interests had clustered, was the ter '?ncy to limit the oumber of towns io which bishops were appointed. The Damber of bishops in enrly times, in both Enst anit West, was very large. From the small province of Asla Proconsularis, which formed but a teath part of the Divecesis Asiana, thirtytwo bishops were present at the council of Ephesus in 431. In the provinces which made up the Dioecesis Africue, 470 bishoprics are kuown by aame before the Yandal lavasion; and possibly there may have been some truth in the retort of Petiliadus to the reproach of Alypius, that the Donatists had bishops in villages and on estates, "immo rero ubi habea sane et sloe populis habes" (Collut. Carthig. i. 181, ap. Gallanil Bib. Pati. vol. v. p. 620 ; for the de$t$ lis here given in respect to Africa, cf. Gams, Scries Episcoporum, p. 463; Kuhn, Städt. u. bürgerl. Derfassung des' Rön. Reichs, Bd. ii. p. 436). In Ireland the number of bishops cannot be certsiuly aseertained, but must have been large; the Annals of the Four Masters, at non. 493 , speak of St. Patrlck as having orlained 700 bishops and 3000 priests; and Aengus the Culdee, in the 9 th century, speaks of no less than 141 places in the island, in ench of whicls there were or had been seven contem$1^{\text {wll }}$ tary bishops (Todd, St. Patrick, pp. 32, 35; theeves, Eccitsiastical Antigu.tics of Down, Connor, and Dromore, app. A. p. 123 sqq wh.re several other references are givea). In the last, no doubt the gralual diminution in the aumber of bishoprics arose from the deeay of the popula. tioa, but in the West it was the result of pulicy. The power of the bishops was thereby incressed. This is expressly stated by Leo the Great, wha coutcads that bishops should not be mipuinted "In quibuslibet locis neque in quibuslibut cas. teilis. . . . ne quod sanctorum I'atrum divinitus laspirata decreta vetuerunt viealis et posessionibus vel obscuris et solitariis municipilis trihuatur sacerdotale fastigium et hoaor euj debent excellentiora committi, lpas sal numerisitate vilescat" (s. Leon. Magn. Ep. 12, c. 12, I. p. 6ib7). In the cuntury that followed the conversion of Chlodwig, a dillerent policy was no doubt fullowed within the Friakish domain. A large namber of new bishoprics then, for the first time, appear in hinory, and the lines of the Roman organazation sre broked. But this foundition of new sees lasted only for a time. There is no record of any new foundation between that of Montpellier in 585 und St . Brieux $\ln 848$. Oa the contrary, it became necessary to reeenact the provisiun of the civil law: "ut episcopl debeant per sid. gulas civitates esse" (Pippini Ca, nit. Verm. A.D. 7.55, cf. Pertz, i. p. 24); but this does ant appear to have amounted to more than the allirmation of a principle, and was molified by the Cupit. Fr. neof furt. A.D. 794, c. 22, which repeated the Sardican canon. The exigeacies of the ease wore met by the combination with the existing system of an order of bishops, who were not tied ton articular eity. Such an order had existed in the chorepiscopi of the East, sad uader that aane it was revived in France, These chorepiseopi went from parish to parish, performing especially sueh episeupall acts as conGirmation, and the consecration of the chrlm and admission to minor orders; bat they do not seem to have had either jurisdiction or power of ordninlag preshyters (Hrabani Mari de Instit. Cler. i. 5: ordinati suat chorepiscopi propter pruperum. curam qui in agris et villis coasis. tunt, ne eis solntium confirmationis deesste: Pippini Cupit. Verner. A.d. 75.3, e. 14; Pertz, i. p. 22, where they are prohably meant by "eplseopls ambulantibus per patrias"). But they were found to give rise to many diffiealties, aud In the 9 th centary a determined and altimately successful attempt was made to abolish them. (The history of the struggle, which is of especial interest in consexion with tho origia of the Pseudo-Isidorian Deeretils, will be found on Welzgïeker, Dir Kampf geyen den Chorepisscopat des frän':ischen Reichs in neunten Jalir. hundert, Thibingen, 1859 ; see alro an srticle by the same writer in von Sybel's Hist riscte Zeitschrift for 1850 , pp. 42 sqq., and by pan Noorden in the same journal for 1862, pp. $311 \mathrm{sqq}$. .) A new form of orgnnizatlon had been gradually developing itself during the two previous centuries, and it now became loth extenderl and firmly established. The old Roman arganization still to a great extent surpiced. The old Roman cinitates were still bishops' sees; the limits of the old Roman conventus wore still for the most part the limits of the jurisdiction of the bishops of those sees. But the import-

1V. Ansusston to Orders.-1. Qualifications:

 -The liet that in the first ages of the ehurch a prrsan win almost Invirinbly appointed to olline in the elty in whleh he lived, and by the cotmmurity among which he haid been baptized, prevented the neceesity of minute enactinents In rearel to qualitications for orters. It was more a mateor of cummon understnnding than of ecelexinstleal rule that no one should be apmintel who hal been known to lend an immoral liff, or whose fituess for office had not been ancertuluel by experience. The election was practically free. The assembly which male it Was not liunnd by any regulations except those whleh it tuld dowa for itself. The pointe which wero lumell at were the internal qualifications of chanater rnther than the external qualiticntions of nge or atatus. Upin these internal qualifications all the earllest exhortations turn. The Pataral Spistles, 1 Tim. tii. $1-12$; Titus i . ${ }^{8-9}$, meantiun ne others; the almost contemporury epidetle of Polyenrp to the Philipplans c. 8, , , extront thit dencons be "blameless, not alanderers, not double-tongued, not fond of mony, tempierite in all thingn, compassionate, careefin, walking in the truth of the Lord; "the Cleminntines, e.y. Eplst. Clem. ad Jacob. o. 2, and the earlier bookn of the Apostolic Constitutiona, e., If. 1 uqq, direct that a bishop, at the time of his orilination, ehall be tested as to hly havlng brought up his ehildren In the admonition of the Lord, whether he In blameless in regare! to the needs of thislife, given to hospitality, and apt to miniater; the ordiannces of Clement ( $\Delta 1 a r$. Kли $\mu$., Lagarde, Gr. vol. i. p. 77 siq.) direct that terthony shall be given whether he "hnve a good rejuit from the heathen, whether he be without tunlt, food of the poor, sober, nut a drunkart, nut a fornientor, not overreaching or abusive, or a renpecter of perssuls, or the like: it were well that he were wifeless, but if not, let him be the husband of one wife, capable of diselpline, able $t_{0}$ interpret the scriptures; nad, eren if uubenrued, geotle, and ahoualing in love towards all." But this free right of election came gradually to be restricted. With the increase in the number of charches, with the loosening of the badys of close fellowship, which had buund together the members of the churches in the fare of the commun dnoger of persecution, nad with the multiplication of the links whech bound one church to nnother, the original system was found to be too iadetinite. The communitics wera teo large and too neatered to know the habits and charaster of each individual member, and the functlons which their officers had to fultil beerme too important and too complicatel to be entrusted to nry one without close inquiry. Stress begia to be iald upon the necessity of exnmioation betore appuintneent, and lefiate rules had to be agreel upon. With the existence of such an exanination the inhabitants of the Roman mundcipalities were already funiliar, and it is probable that the ecelesiastical communities followed in this as in other details of their organazation the analogy of the civil communities. No one could be elected to the civil "Ordo" without being previously examined ns to his possession of certain qualifications: he must be free-boro, oi a certnin age, unconvicted of any crime, and possessed of suflicient property to discharge the duties oi his office. The examination into these qualifications Immedintely preceded the election, and tho duty of making it fell on the presiding otheer (see Marquardt, Römische Sthasvervoultun!, Bd. i. p. 497); the chief authorities nre the Lex Julia Munlerpalis, Corp. Inser. Lat. No. 206, and the Lex Malacitana, a bronze found at Malnga iu 1851, which gives more minute details than wele previously known, end which has been published by Momasisen in the Abhan/lungen der könn. Sächs. Gesellsch. der Wissenschaft, Bd. 3, and, in a aeparate treatise, Die Stadtrechte der lateinischen Gemeinden Silpensis 4. Malaca, Leiprig, 1855; also by Girand, Paris, 1856 und 1868; in the Corp. Inscr. Lat. ii. 1964, and by Orelli-Henzen, No. 7421). In the sume way the prossession of certain positive qualifications and the ubsence of certain disqualificatious were made conditions precedent to the admission to the "Ordo ecclebiasticus," and the presiding officer was charged with the duty of seeing that such conditions were fulfilled. But it is obvious that under such an arrnagement the qualifications insisted upon must be such as to adnit of an external test; and it was nntural that, when once external tests began to be imposed, they should tend to become more complex and more rigid. The earliest of such texts arose out of the early controversies as to the marringe of the clergy. The only impedinents to aduission to orders which are expressly mentioned iu the Apostolical canons are digamy, and marrlage with two eisters, or with n niece, or with one who was not a virgin (c. 17, 18, 19). In subsequeat lists of qualifientlons and disqualifieations such impediments oceupy so large a place thit the lists themselves furnish the best cuntempo:ary ovidence of the state of fealing on the subject. Three such lists in three successive conturies may be taken as typical, nud, for the sake of more exact comparison will best be given in their origial form. 1. In the eth century the rules of mumission to ordere were settled by the civil law. Justinian (Novell. 123, c. 12) enaets as

 סia $\int_{\epsilon \cup \chi} \theta \in i \pi a \nu$ dudods. (Compare the disqualifications mentiened by S. Greg. M. Epist. 4, 26, ad. Jantutr. vol. Hi. p. 70t; id. Epist. 2, 37, ad Joann. vol. II. p. 600). 2. A century later than Justlaian, the fourth ceunell of Toledo, A.D. 633 , which whs held under Istdore of Saville, sums up as follows the canonical disqualifications which were recegnised in the West at that time: " (qui in aliquo crimine detectı sunt, qui seelera nliqua per publicam poenitentian admisixse confessi sunt, qul in haeresim lapsl sunt, qui in haeresi baptizati sut rebaptiznci esse Doseuntur, qui semetipson abseideruut aut naturali defectu membrerum aut decisione aliguid minus habere noscuntur, qui secundue uxuris conjuactiosem sostitl sunt, nut numeross cosjugia frequentaverunt, qui viduam aut marito relictam duxeruat, aut cerruptasum marit! tueruat, qui concubinas ad fornicationes habuerunt, qui servili conditioni obnoxii sunt, qui ignoti sunt, qui aeophyti suat, vel laici suat, qui sueculari militise deditl sunt, qui curise nexibus obligati sunt, qui inseii literarum eunt, qui noadum ad triginta snaos perveserunt, qui jer gradus eeclesiasticus non accesserunt, qui anbitu honorem quaerunt, qui muneribus henorem obtinere moliuntur, qui a decessoribus in sncerdotium eliguatur." (The last few phrases evidently apply not to all clerks, but only to presbyters or bislopes.) 3. A century later (eirc. A.D. 750 ), Egbert of York gives a similar list, but with important additions and omissions: "Hujusmodi tune ordinatio episcepi, presbiteri rel diaconl sata esse dicitur; si nullo gravi racipore probstur infectus, si secundam non habuit [uxosem] neca marito relictam; si poenitentiam publicam don gessit nec ulla corporis parte vitiatus apparet : si servilis aut ex origine nen est conditionis obsoxins; si curiut probatur nexihus absolutus, ai adseeutus est litteras; hune elegimus ad sacerdotium promovarl. Pro his veru criminibus nullum liceṭ ordinari sed promotos quosque dicimus deponendos; idela scilieet adorantes; per aruspices [et divinos atque] incantutores csptives se diabolo tradentes; fidem suam falso testimonio expuguantes; homicidiis rel furnicationibus contaniinatos; furta perpe trantes; sacrum veritatis nemen perjurii temeritate violantes." (Egberti Eberac. Dikl. c. 15, ap. Haddan ind Stubbs, Councils, vul. iil. p. 402; Wilkiss, Concilia, vol. i. p. 8j.)

We proceed to give io detail the vasious qualifications and disqualificatious for arders which were laid down between the 4th and the 9th centuries, grouplag them na-l. Perseanl. 11 . Civil; Hil. Leclesiatical; IV. Litemary.

1. Personal Qualifications.-1. A elerk must bu sound of limb, Cone. Rom. A.D. 465, c.3; 3 Cone. Ausel. A.D. E.38, c. $0 ; 4$ Cone. Tolet. e. 19; esperially he must net have mutilated himself with a view to living in chastity, Conc, Nicaen. e. 1 (ef. Socsat. H. E. 2, 20 ; Theodor. H. E. 2, 24) ; Can. Apost. c. 22 ; 2 Conc. Arelat. c. 7. At the same time it was hell in early times that the Levitical regulations (Levit. xxi. 17 sqq.) did not strictly spply to the Christinn church, and whes the menk Ammenius tried to disçuality himself for ordination by cutting of! his eas his mutilation was held to be no bar (Pallad. Ilist. Lausiac. e. 12, Nigne, P. G. vol. xxxis. 1032 ; Sozumen, IF. E. 6, 30) ; bat when in later times the Levitiesl analogy was strictly applied, the loss of any part of sny member was beld to be a disqualitication, and Innocent 1 II . ( $E$ pist. x. :24) gives a apecial dispensation to one whose finger had been cut oll against bis will (the canonists based thair rule ou a pse日dedecretal of Innocent 1. Hinschius, p. $5: 33$; Regino Prumiens. de Eccles. Discipl. Jih. i. 410 ; Burehard, lib. ii. c. 14 ; Migne, P. L. vol. exxxii. p. 272). Somie later Ruman pont:ficals (quoted by CataJani, ad Peirtif. Rem. p. 1, tit. 2) require the examiners to feel (palpare), sa well as diligently to observe the persons of candidates, and even to require them to take off their shoes, lest there should be a deformity in their feet. 2. (1) A presbyter must be at least thirty years of aga. This rule, which was based on a reference to the sge at which our Lord began bis ministry, was first laid dewn by Cone. Neocene. A.D. 314, c. 1: ; but it dees not nppears te have been universally aceepted, inasmuch as Jerome has to defend upon general grounds the ordingtion of his bsother, Paulinianus, at that age ( S . Hieron. Epist. 82 (62) al Theuph. vel. i. p. 518 ). But it was recognised by a Syrina council, A.b. 405 (?), c. 24 (Mansi, vel. vii. 1181), by several Western councils, 4 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 524, c. 1, 3 Cone. Aurel. A.D. 538, e. 6, 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 20 , and by the Trullnn comncil, e. 1t. It is also recognised in the civil law, Justiu. Novel 123, c. 13, and in the Cnrolingina enpitularies, Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 49 ap. Pertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 75. Bishops were sometimes ordained at an earlier age, bit until the 8th century thare is probably ne instance of such an ordination of a presbyter. The instunces even then belong to the outlying provices of Christendom. Bede, in his history of the monastery of Wearmeuth (Migne, P. L. vol. xeiv. 729), clearly implies that Ceolfrid was ordained preabyter at the age of twenty-seven; and pope Zachary gives permission to Boniface, "the npostle of Germany," in 751, to ordein presbyters, in cases of emergency, st the age of twenty-five (S. Zachar. L'pist. 13, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. Ixxxix. 952 ; Gratian, pars i. dist. i8, c. 5). On the other hand, some canonists allowed of no exception to the rule which made thirty the minimum age, Burchard. Wermat. Decret. ii. c. 9, Ivon. Carnot. Decret. vi. c. 30 , Panorm. ili. 29 ; so the Conc. Melnt. A.D. 1089 , c. 4. But the sule was ultimately relaxed, sad the ceuncil of Raveana, A.D. 1314, c. 2, fixed the age at twenty-ive; so Stat. Eccles. Cudurco at at eighteen (Jostin. Novell. 123 , c. 13), but it is st eighteen (Jostin. Novell. 123, c. 13), but it is clear that clasr that ordination might canonicaliy take place at a much earlier age. There hal already prisen at a much earlier age. There hat already ansen the arisen in the West, and there soon afterwards arose in the East, the custom of dedicating children to the service of the church in their earliest fears ; hence the text of the Nomoc:anon, which incor porates the regulation of Justinian, rssies in grood MSS. between the agea of eight, eighteen eiphteen, and twenty; and the Schuliast ad huc.

Gra: lan, pars 1. dint. 77, 2) directs that "If any one has given his name from infancy to the minlotry of the church, let him romain among the renders until the age of tweaty." In Gaul the coancil of Vaison ha 529 , e. 1 , in Africa the third councll of Carthage, c. 19, and in Spaln the aecond council or Toledo in sti9, c. 1, provide for the case of readera for the case of readera matrying when they attain to puberty; and the fict of early orling-tions tions is proved by bistorical examples, e,g. Sidon. Apollin. Lipit. iv. 25, p. 126 ; S. Paulin. Nolan. ${ }^{1}$ loem. XV. de S. Felice, v. 108; Anastas. Liber. Le Blant, Inseriptions Chrelimnes do ha Giale, No. 48.4. The later meliaeval practice, wnich was alopted by the council of Trent, was not to conter the tonsure before the age of seven.
II. Civil Qualifcations,-1. In regard to the admission of slaves to orders both the canon and the civil law varied at different times: in the Bast the only early regulation is Cun. Apest. 82, which allows slaves to be ordained only when they have bcen manumitted; this agrees with the civil law, Justin, Cud, I. 3,37 (36), Jovell. 123, 17. In the Weat the enrliest regulation ie that of Conc. 1lliber. A.D. 305, e. 8, which disallows the ordination even of a freedman whose $p$ tronus was in sucenlo; but 1 Cono. Tolet. a.d. $4(0)$, c. 10 allows such orlination with the patron's consent. In the fifth century Leo the Great, writing to the bishols of Campania, objects to the ordinntion of alaves ns inconsistent with the dignity of the clerical office, but is at the aame time a, witness to the occurrence of such ordinantions." (S. Leon. M. E.pist. 4 (3) ad Lipit.' Cumpan. I. p. 612 . for the "pitt. Cumpan. 1. p. 612; for the meaning of "" originnli," cf. St. Auguet. de Civit. Dei, 10, 1, "conditionem debent genitali solo propter agriculturam sub dominio possessorum.") In Gaul it would appear that ordination was at one time held to involve manumission, for 1 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 8, enacts that if a biahop knowingly orlains a slave without the consent of hia master he must pay "duplex satisfuutio ;" if he has done it ignorantly, then those who "testimonium perhibent aut eum supplicarerint ordinnri" are to pay such satisfaction; (this seems to imply that part of the "testimonium" which wns required before ordination was that the candidate wns free.) In a council held in the same city a quarter of a century later, there ia a definite exelvsion of both slaves and serfa: aut nullua servilibus colonariiaque conditionibuas obligntus juxta statuta sedis npostolic:ae ad honores ecclesiasticos admittatur, nisi prins nat testamento aut per tabulas legitime constiterit absolntum (3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538 , c. 26 ;) but eleven yeara later this rule was relaxed, And a slave might be ordainel with his maxter's conaent. or, if ordained without such consent, "is qui ordinatus est, benedictione servata, honestum ordini domino suo impendat obsequium," i.e. he might continue to be a clerk without ceasing to be a slave ; it ie, however, also pruvided that the bishop might, if the master preterrell, give him two slaves in placet of the one who had been ordained ( 5 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 549 , c. 6). In Ireland the cmucns of St. Patrick, which nare pro-councils, ctearly lmply that a clerk might he a alnve; c. 7 providen for the excommunicition of a clerk who is negligent in coming to prayers : "nisi forte jugo servitutis sit detentus." But In lingland Egbert of York, nbout the sume period, exires.ly dianllown the ordination of slavea, at least ta the dinconnte (Eigberti liborac. Dial, c. 15, ap Iladinn and Stubba, Conncils, oc. iii. p. 40:). The Carotingian rule was equally strict : if' a slave was orlained without first obtaining his liberty he must lose his orders and go back to hie master (Crpit. H/ulowici 1. 2. The privileges and Immunities [p. 822] which Constantine at tirst conterred upon the clergy caused so many rich men to seek refuge froma the burdens of taxation by taking otlice hin the church that it apeeiily became necessary to enact that ao person whose fortune phaced him in the rank if hose upon whom the weight of ${ }_{j}$ rublic burdens feil should be allawed to become a clerk; the first law on the subject has not been preservel, but the continuation of it whish enicts that it shall not be retrospecive is found in Cod. III. Beclesinstival Qualifcations.-1. Bnptism, It wan so invariably assumed that any one who was advanced to office in the church had alrealy been made a member of the church by buptimm that the enactinent of a cenon on the subject was unnecessury. At Alexaudrius a catechamen might be a realer or ninger, but the custom is meationed as exceptional by Socrites, II, E.S, 22, nad, moreover, renders and singers were sometimes not reckoned in the cler at ath. In the midille of the 3ril century Cornelius of Rome expreases $n$ doubt whether clinic baptism was sulficient in the cnse of Novatian, Inasmuch ms it hal not been followeyl by contirmation (haseb, II. E. (6, 43); and early in the following ceutury the council of Neocaeairen, c. 12, is disposed,

 ailow altogether the ordination of those who hal recsived clinic baptism. Bat the noa-renewal of the enactment (except in 6 Conc, i'aris. A.D. 829, o. 8, Mansi, 14, 542, which extends it to all Irregular bnptisms) makes it probable that it was construel rather in the spirit of its es. ceptions than in that of its main prorisios. The case of a presbyter being ordained before being baptizel! was so rare that no provisian in male for it in any canon of the lirst eight centuries. The genernl case of uncertain or defective brptism is sonctimes mentioned in acelesinstical writers, e.g. S. Dionys. Alesand. Ep, ad Xystum np. Kuseb. II. E. 7. 9; S. Leon. Magn. Ep. 66 (35) ad Neon. Karenn. p. 140 ;id. Ep. 67 (2) ad Rustic. Narbon. c. 17, 18, p. 1427; bnt the specinl ense of an unbrptized presbyte: is first mentioned in Ahp. Theodore's i'enitentis] at the end of the 8th century, who apparently denls with two contingeneies: $a$. If the presbyter has been orlained through ignorance as the part of his ordaloer that he has nat been baptized, the ordination is involid, the baptisms performed by the supposed presbytet nre aloo invalid, and he himseif mast be bajtizel, but cannot be reordnined (Poenit. 1, 9, 12 ; Haddas and Stubbs, Curncils, vol. lii.). b. If a presbjter is ordained unler the belief that he has bees baptized, an'l then discovers that he has nut, be may be buth baptizel and reordainal, but persons baytized by him must be rebaptized (id. 2, 2, 13). In the following century ${ }^{4}$ capitulary of Pippin, which mentions a gimilar case, loes not specify what is to be done with the presbyter, but allows his baptisms provided that the Holy Trinity was invoked at the time (Capit. Compendiense, A.D. 757, c. 12; Pertz, Leyum, vol. i. p. 28). As the imposition of hands was an integral part of baptisin, it must be held to be implied in the general regnalations as to baptism ; the explicit mention of it as a condition of ordiantion is much later. (But it is sometimes supposel to be meant in Conc, Xicsen, c. 8 , which requires returning Cathari to be ad Pontifio. Roman. p. 1. tit. 2, 3 ; but Gratisn, 8, $i, 7$, and others understand ordination, act confirmation, to be meant.)

4. It was enacted, with a frequency whlch indieates that the rule was often broken, that no one shonld be ordained out of the church to which he belonged (i.e. probably, the church in which he hal been baptized, but the question is not ensy of determination : see the discussion of It in Inallier de Sucris Electionibus, pp. 605 , "ilq.), or promoted to a higher grale ont of the church in which he was first ordnined. Volations of this rule rendered the ordination invalid ( Kinupos $^{2} \sigma \tau a t \dot{\eta}$ Xeiporov fa), according to Conc. Nicnea. c. 16 ; Antioch. c. 24 ; Sardic. c. 15,2 Arelat. Chale. c. 10 excommunicates both the ordaining bishop and the orlnined clerk until the latter returns to his own church; 5 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 5, susjeads the ordaining bishop for three menths, and the ordinined elerk during the plenaure of his proper bishop. The rule is also fouml, but without any express penalty for the vielation of it, in Africa, 3 Conc. Carth. c. 21, $44=$ Cod. Eccles. Afric. e. 54; in Gnul, Cone. Arausic. A.d. 441, c. 8 ; Venet. The regulation probnbly arose in the first instance from the desirnbility of a man's being urdained among those who could hear witness to lus innocency of life nad soundness in the faith (so expressly Conc. 111 ib c. 24), but it was kept ap in later times chiefly in the interests of ecilesiastical organization. (For the origin of the system of dimissory letters, see Dimissony Letters, Vol. I. p. 558.)
5. The regulations in regard to the marriage of candidates for orders were governed by the Pauline injunction, miâs qovaukòs ávòpes ( 1 Tım. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6). As to the interpretation of that injunction, there appears to have been a consensus of epinion; it excluded those whe, having

Iost one wife, had married another. But two questions arose: firstly, whether the rule applied in the case in which the first wife had been married before baptism; secondly, whether the rule applied to others than preshyters and deacons. On these questions there were varieties of opinion; as tu the first, the Eastern rule seems to have been that only marriages after baptism were to be reckoned; so Can. Apost. 17, $\delta \delta \boldsymbol{\sigma} \boldsymbol{l} \gamma \boldsymbol{\gamma} \mu \mu \mathrm{or}$
 3 ; cf. Balssm. ad loc. This limitation of the rule Is dsfended at length by Jeromo, Ep. 69 (83) ad Oce m. i. p. 411, but herein Jerome stands almost alone among Western writers. (At the same time it may be noted that Jeroms's general view of digamy was of the strictest; cf. Epist. 123 (11), c. 6, i. p. 904). The Western rule rigidly excluded from the priesthood all who had married a second wife, whether the first marriage had taken place before or after baptism; so S . Ambros. de Off. Ministr. i. 50 , ii. p. 66 ; S. Augustin. de Bono Conjut. c. 18 ; Migne, 6, p. [. 387 ; S. Leon. Epist. 5, c. 3, vol. i. p. 617; Innocent. 1. Epist. ad Victoric. Hinschius, p. 530 ; Migne, 1'. L. vol. xx. 474 ; Zosim. Epist. ad Hesych. Hinschius, p. 553, quoted (sometimes as a decretal of Innocent I.) in the pontificals of Ecgbert, St. Dunstan, Cshors, Jumiéges, Vatic, ap. Murstori, and in the Gelasian sacramentary; and the later canonists, e. 1. Gratian, 1, dist. 2b, $3 ;$ D. Ivon. Decret. i. 292 . (It is probable that the exceptions mentioned by Tertull. de Exhort. Cust. c. 7 [Montanist], and Hippol . Piilosophum, 9, 12, refer to violations not of the rule in general, bit of this stricter interpretation of it.) The attempt to extend the rule to all clerks was not altogether successful, and the fluctuations of opinion which are marked in the succesaive enactments are worthy of study. The following are the more important enactments which bear upon the admission of married persons to orders; for a more general account of the regulations which affected persons already in orders, see Celibacy, Digamy. (I) No one who had married a second wife could become a clerk : Can. Apost. 17; 1 Conc. Valen. A.d. 374 (?), c. 1 ; Rom. A.D. 465 , c. 2 ; Gerund. A.D. 517 , c. 8 (which excludes any one who, after the denth of his wife, "aliam cujuscrunque conditionis cognoverit mulierem" ; 4 Arelat. A.D. 524, c. 3 (which spesks of the necessity which had arisen for imposing a severer penalty for the violation of the rule) ; 3 Aurel. A.D, 5:18, c. 6 ; Stit. Eccles. Antiq. c. 69 ; 4 Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 19 ; Kom. A.1). 743 , c. 11 ; Poenit. Theod. i. 9, 11 ; and in the civil law, Justin. Novell. 123, c. 12 (but apparently limited to presbyters and deacons in id. Novell. 6, 5). (2) No one in a similar case could be a deacon or presbyter: Origen in Luc. Hom. 17, iij. p. 953, ed. Delarue; Justin. Novell. 6, $5 ; 123,14$; Conc. Epaon. A.d. 517 , c. 2. (3) No one who hat married one who had been herself married before, whether widow or divorcée, could be ordained: Can. Apost. c. 17 ; 1 Conc. Valent. A.d. 374, c. 1 ; Rom. A.d. 465 , c. $2 ; 8$ Aurel. c. $6 ; 4$ Arelat. c. $3 ;$ Epaon. c. 2 ; Stut. Diccles, Ant. o. 69 ; Conc. Eom. A.v. 743, 11 ; Zosim. Epist. ad Hcsych. ; ' 'oenit. Theod, i. 9, 10 ; Egbert. Eborae. Disl. c. 15 ; Conc. 'Trull. c. 3. (4) No one could be ordained who had married two sisters (Can. Aןost. 19), or his niece (id.), or an actress, or slavc, or courtesan (id. 18. Couc.

Trull. c. 3), or who had a concubine (Can. Apost. 19; 4 Conc. Tol. c. 19 ; Trull. c. 3 ; Puenit. Theod. i. 9,6), or whose wife hal been guilty of adultery (Conc. Neocass. c. 8 ; cf. S. Basil. Ejpist. Canon. iil. c. 69). (5) The esrliest positive pro. hibition of the ordination of all married persens is 2 Conc. Arelat. c. 2, "assumi aliquem ad sacerdotium non posse in conjugii vincule constitutum nisi fuerit praemissa conversio" [i.e. renunciation of married and sccular life], br t the date and authority of this council are both very uncertain.
b. Sone other ecclesisstical disqualifications appear to have been of a local or temperary natura. (1) Can. Apost. 79, Conc. Arausic. A.d. 441, 3 Aurel. A.d. $5: 38$, c. 6,11 Tolet. c. 13 , enact that no one who had been possessed by an evil spirit could be ordained (cf. the story told by Gregory the Great in his life of St. Benelict of the youth who was exorcised by St. Benedict, and told never to enter holy orders; on his attempting to do ss, the evil spirit returned: St. Greg. Dial. 2, c. 16 ; Nigne, P. L. vol. Ixvi. p. 164). (2) 1 Conc. Carth. c. 8 enacts that uo one can be ordained until he has rendered his accounts as procurator, actor, or tutor pupillorum, in order to secure his entire disen. tanglement from secular busincss. (3) The Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua exclude "seditionarios, usuarios, et injuriarum suarum ultores " (cf. St. Basil, Epist. 188 [canonica prims], c. 14, p. 275). (4) In England the Dialogue of Egbert gives an indication of the mixed character of the Eaglish church in the middle of the 8 th century by expressly excluding "idoln alomantes, per aruspices [et divinos atque] incantatores captivos se diabolo tradentes" (Egblert. Eborac. Ditl. c. 15 ; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 402 ; Wilkins, i, 82). (5) Illegitimacy was first made a bar by the synod of Meaux, A.D. 845, c. 64, but even thea there was the exception," nisi ecelesite utilitas vel necessitas vel meritorum inaerogative aliter exegerit"; but the question was an open une for some time afterwards, as is shewn by the discussion between Roscelin and Theobald d'kstampes, whather the son of a pricst, as being necessarily born "ex lapsu carnis," could be ordained (Theobald's argument against the exclusion of such persons is given in D'Achery, Spicileginm, vol. iii. p. 448). In the List a canon of Nicephorus, sometimes printed as an a.ldition to the canons of Chalcedon, Pitra, Spicileg. Solesm. vol. iv. 465, id. Jur. Eccl. irr. vol. i. p. 536, vol. ii. p, 32×, expressly allows the ordination of the offspring of concubinags, digamy, or aven fornication; but the Westera rule was severer, and it further ranked as illegitimate the children of heretics and slaves (cf. Catalaniud Pontif. Koman. p. 1, tit. 2, 1, $$ \S 5,18)$.
7. Of later regulations, the most inyportant was that which requirerl every candidate for orders to have a fixed source of income, or title."

In the earlicst period, when ench church hat its own bisbop, and parish was synonymous with diocese, appointment to olfice was, from the nature of the case, appointment to a particular olice in a particular church. 'This primitive practice of appointments seema to have been first departed from in the 5 th century; but the departure from it was strongly condemned by the coancil of Chalcedon, c. 6, which enacted that the ordination of those who wers dimodócus be invalid. For three centuries after the enactment of this canon there appears to be no necessity for re-enncting it ; but it reappears in the Dislogue of Egbert, c. 9 (Haddan and Stubbs, Cuzacils, &e. vol. iii.) and in the Carolingian Capitulnries, e.g. Karoli Capit. Eccles. A.D. 789 , 0. 25; Pertz, vol. i. 58 ; Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 28, ap. Pertz, vol. i. p. 74, " nt non aboolate ordineatur," Capit. Exceryt. A.D. 806, c. 7 , Pertz, vol. i. 147. In the meantime it had become the custom at all ordinations to major orders to designate the particular church which the ordiand was to serve, nad from which be was to derive his income. This is the case in the Pentificals of Ecgbert, St. Dunstan, Vatican ap. Muratori, Rodrad, Rouen, Reims, Noyon, Ratold, end the Gelasian Sacrameutary (but the omission in the Missale Francorum and the Cod. Maffeianus is to be noted). But there does not appear to be any direct canonical requirement of a titulus earlier than the end of the 11th oentury : Conc. Placent. A.D. 1095, c. 15, "decernimns at sine titulo facta ordinatio irrita habentar"; at the same time Urban II., under whom this council was held, in writing to the bishop of Toul, leaves it to his discretion to allow, such ordinations or not (Append. ad Epist. Urbani Papee II. No. xvii. ap. Mansi, vol. xx. 676 ).

IV. Literary Qualifications,-It both follows from and confirms the general view of the nature of the clerical office in the primitire church that literary qualifications were viewed as subordinate and Donesesential. The Pastoral Epistles require [^83]that a bishop shall be "apt to teach" ( $\delta, \delta \alpha a k \tau u k \delta$ s, 1 Tim. iii. 2, which is paraphrased in Const.

 $\tau \bar{n} s$ हो $\sigma \in \beta$ eias), but eurly Christinn literature distinctly conteniplates the existence of an unlettered bishop ( $\Delta$ car. K K $\lambda \mu, 16$. (18), пaiseias centuries there are no conciliar or other regula tions requiring knowledge of letters as a qualification for orders; and Jerome expressly mentions that, in his time, "judicio Domini et populorum suffragio in sacerdotium simplices [i.e. illiterate persons] eligi, sultem illud habeant ut postquam sacerdotes fue-:int ordinati discant legem Dei nt possint docere quod didicerint et augeant scientiam magis quam opea" (S. Hieron. Comment. in Aggae, e. 2, v. 11, vi. p. 761). But in the 5 th century the altered position of the clergy in reterence to the laity, the formation of a liturgy, aud the growing tendency to lay stress on forinulae, rendered it necessary to lay a stresa which had nat been lidid before on the possession of certain rudiments of education. A Syrian synod in 405 (?) (Mansi, vii. 1181), c. 26, enacta that not even a subdeacon is to be ordained uotil he is nut only otherwise instructed in doctrine, but can say the Pailter; nnd the liomnn council of $46 \overline{3}$ (?), e. 3 , enacts that "inscii quoque litterarum ad sacroa ordioes aspirare non audeant." But the first well-estnblished enactmeuts are those of the civil law. Justin. Novell. 6, 4, A.D. ${ }^{533}$, emncts that clerks must be $\gamma \rho a \mu \mu d \tau \omega \nu$ ${ }_{\mathrm{F}}{ }_{\mathrm{F}}$ sucell. 123, c .12 , of clerks without reservation. From the 7th century onwards, and in the later cnnonists, knowledge of letters, the degree and kind, however, rarely specified, is made an indispensable qualification: 4 Conc. Tolet. A.d. 633 , c. 19; 8 Cone. Tolet. A.D. 653, c. 8, which "plecifies the requisite knowledge to be that of "totum psalterium vel cauticorum usualium et hymnoruus sive baptizandi supplementum"; in England, Dial. Egtert. Eborac. c. 15; among the Culdees of Scotland and Ireland, "Prose Rule of the Celi Dc," in Reeves' The Culdees of the British Ishluruls, p. 95 ; in the Frankish kinglom, Capisit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 20, Pertz, i. 73; in the canonists, Gratiun. p. 1, dist. 24, c. $5=$ D. Ivon. Carnot. Punorm. 3, c. $21=$ ejusd. Decret. 6 , c. 21; Burchard Wounat. Decret. 2, 18. The further regulations, themselves also comparatively rare, which apecially apply to the higher orders, corroborate the inference that the knowledge of letters which was requisite tor admission to the lower orders must at first hive been extremely small, 2 Conc, Aurel. A.D. 533, c. 1b, euacts that no one can be ordnined presbyter or deacon "sine litteris vel si baptiziadi ordinem nesciat." Conc. Narbon, A.d. 589 euncta that no bishop ls to ordhin an illiterate persion presbyter or dencon; if such persions have been already ordnined, they must be complelled to learn; if any one will not learu, he must lose his stipend. If he is still obstinnte, he must be relegated to a moonstery "quia non potest aedificare populum." Gregory the Grent, about the same time, objects to Rusticus, a deacon who was candidate for the bishopric of Ancona, that he was reported not to know the Psalter, and suggesta that the bishop to whom he is writing shoull find ont " quantos psalmos minus tenent" (S. Greg. Magn. Ljpist. 14, 11, vol. ii. p. 1269), No doubt Gregory's jersonal influence did much to raise the ordinary standaril of attainment; and two centuries after his time hls own works were ranked with the Gespels, the Epistles, and the apostolical canona, as constituting the proper ubjects of a prlest's study: Conc. Mogunt. A. $\mathrm{D}_{6} 813$, pradf. ; 3 Code. Turon. A.d. 813, c. 3 ; 2 Conc. Cubilion. A,d. 813, c. 1, and elsewhere. So also a knowledge of the calendar was required, e. g. by Hinemar, Cupit. Synod. c. 8, A.D. 852. How much knowledge of Seripture was required in the 9th century is shewn by the selection of pussages which was framed, in order that candidates night learn it by heart, by Prudentius of I'royes (S. Prudent. Trec. Floriligium, ap. Trombelli let. Patr. Opp. Bonon. 1753, from a MS. furnished by Bianchini).

In the East the standard of attalnment seems to have tallen very low, 2 Conc. Nicnen, A.d, 787 , c. 2 , found it necessary to make an explicit regulation that every one who Fus advanced to the oflice of a bishop must know the psalter and be able to read the Scriptures and the cnoons. Still later, the Nestorian canons of Ebedjesu ( T'ract. vi. c. 4, can. 3, ap. Mai Script. V'ett. vol. $x_{1}$ p. 12) enact that no one must be ordnined city deacon who does not know the lessons and epistles, but a country descon may in cases of emergency be allowed who knows only some $u$ the palter. The implication is that in neither case was it requided that he should be able to read, but only that he should know the prescribed portions by heart.
2. Moxh of Testing Qualifications. Examination. -It has already been pointed out that the ecclesiastical followed the analogy of the civil organization in requiring definite qualifientions in its officers; it is also probable that the same analogy was followed in regard to the mode of testing those qualiticntions. At the time of election to ofice, cither before votes were recorded or before the election was declared, the returning officer of an ecclesiastical as of a civil community enquired vive voce whether the necessary conditions had been fulfillad. This enquiry was made not of the person electent, but of those who voted for him, or who presented him for admission. It was an enquiry ulmost entirely into moral fitnese. The reasum which Cyprian gives for msking ecelesiastieal appointments in the common assembly of the church is that "in the presence of the people the crimes of the bad and the merits of the good may alike be disclosed, and that the ordination may be regular and legitimate which has been tested by the vote and judgment of all" ("omolum suflragio et julicio examinata," S. Cyprian, Epist. $68,3, \mathrm{vol} . \mathrm{i}, \mathrm{p} .1026)$. In another passage, Cyprinn appears to distinguish between the testimony which was given by the clergy and the rote which was given by the people (id. inter Epist. S. Cornel. 10 rol. i. p. 770). This testimony is distinctly described by Basil ns the result of provious enquiry and examination ( $E$ jist. 54 (181) ad Chorcpisc. Migne, P, G. vol. xxxii. 400); and the giving of it formed a feature in almost all rituals of ordination. But whereas in the carliest period the enyuiry of the bishop was aldressed to und the testimony given by the whole body of the clergy of a charch, in the ensuing period two or more deacons presented and bore testimony to a deacon, two or more presbyters to a preshyter. Afterwards the practice which was peculiar to Kome in the time of Jerome (S. Ilieron. Epist. 146 (85) ad Beanif.) became almost universal in the West. The clergy were represented by the archileacon who, as the chief officer of the exterinal discipline sud activity of the church, would be most likely to be cognisant of tl.s current repu. tation of any of its members. (The exceptions to this practice are comparatively few in the West; the Salzburg and Cambrai pontiticals and Colea Maffeianus direct $n$ preabyter to be presented by two presbyters, and the bishop's yuestions are addressed to the bystanders, which niay num of all the clergy in the sanctuary.) So important was this function of the archdeacon that lyaisamon (Rallé and l'otlé, इuvtar. кav. vol. iv. p. 480) expresses a doubt whether $n$ deacon could be ordained without it. But this public examination tended to become s mere form, and was found to be insuthicient. Popular testimony was apt to be partial. The bishop himself was regaired to take more active steps to ascertain that the ordained was worthy. Chrysostom (Hom. in prouth, de dec, mill. talent., Op. ed. Migne, vol. iii. p. e: 3 ) warns his fellow bishops that this is one of the things fur which they will rave to gireanaccount. Justinian (Norell. 137, c. 1) speaks of the scandal which had arisen from clerks having been ordained without due examination. The third council of Carthage, c. 22, and the third of Braga, A.D. 572, c. 3, buth lay stress on such examination in addition to the requirement of testimony (" opartet non per gratiam munerum sed per diligentem prins discussionem, deinde per multorum testinonium clericos ordinare"). In order that such an ex amination might be more effective, Gregory the Great advised Adcodatus to nssociste with hin.self "graves expertosque viros" (Epist. iii. 49, vol. i1. p. 660); and this became ultimately the general practice throughout the West. The mediaeval rule was based by the canonists (Gratian, pars 1, dist. 2t, c. 5 ; Ivo Carnot. I'on vm. 3, e. 21, Decret. 6, c. 21 ; Burchard Wormat. 2, c. 1) on a canon of an otherwise unknown cuuntil (Conc, Nannetense, al. Manetense, said to have been held in A.D. 895 , in the pontiticate of Furmosus), which, as it to a great extent govems the modern Roman, and also the English, practice, may be quoted here: "Quando episcopus ordinstiones facere disponit omnes qui al sacrum ministerium accedere volunt ferin quarta arite ipsam ordinationem erocandi sunt ad ciritatem una rum [archi] presbyteris qui cos repraesentare debent; et tunc episcopus a latere suo eligere debet sneerdotes et alios prudentes viros gnaros dirinat ligis et exercitatos in ecelesiasticis sanctionibus qui ordinandorum vitam, genus, patrinm, setatem, iustitutionem, locum ubi educati sunt, si bene sunt literati, si instructi in lege Domiai, diligenter investigent; ante omnin si fidem catholicam firmiter teneant et verbis simplicibus ssserere quennt...Ita per tres continues dies diligenter examinentar et sic sabbato qui probati iarenti sunt episcopo repruesententur." This exnmination was in come dioceses supplementel, in the case of a presbyter, by a further public exaninstion at the time of ordination in regard to his willingness to be ordained, and to be obedient to his bishop (so the Mainz and Soissons pontificals, published by Martene ; one of the Cortey pontiticals, published by Morin: and Hittorp, Ondo Epist. 51, 60, vol. I. p. 241, or of Bassiamus, Acta Cunc Chac. si. ap. Mansi, vol. vii. p. 278), the latter to seenurs the often contested rights of bishops over parochial clergy [Pabisi].

Rominus, p. $9: 1$ ); the asmination was $p$ against the ordinati will (ss in the case 0 51,60 , vol. i. p. 241 Clade xi. ap. Mansi, senurs the often con parachial clergy [l'

There was a further test, which was, however, mother negative than positive, in the appeal to the peeple at the time of ordination. It is probable [see Ordination] that originally all appointments to ecelesiastical office were made by popalar election; subsequently names were proposed by the clergy or by the bishop, and although the form of a popular clection still remained, yet the part of the people was confined to the exclamasurrived was the appenl of the bishop to the people thast, if any one knew any reason why the person elected should not be ordained, he should come forth and declare it. is nevel of Justinian (Siocll. 123, c. 14, and, in effect, 137, c. 3) regulates the procedure in case of an objection appearing; but the canon law appears only to provide for the general case of a bishop knowingly, or after warniag, ordaining an ungualified person (e.g. 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6). It is probable that a person who made an objertion which he did not succeed in subsf wituring was linole to the penalty of excom ... lowed sll false accusatior.s riv larin (Conc. Illib. c. 75, Agath. c. 31), and aisu inat an objector must himself be a fiuithful inember of the chureh and of irreproachable character (3 Cooc. Carth. c. 8 ; Conc. Chalc. c. 21); hence the clause, which still remains in the Roman pontifical, in the appeal of the bishop to the preople, "si quis &c. . rerum memor sit conditionis suas." But that the checks thus imposed on grouadless accusations were not intended to crush eaquiry is shewn by the fact that, when the extension of the area of dioceses, and the multiplication of parishes within the limits of $n$ single diocese, made the appeal to the peeple in the cathedral church at the time of ordination less effective than it had originally beea, an additional test was imposed by makiug a previous appenl to the people of the parish in which the ordimand lived.
Ultimately there were four, and in some cases fire, tests which every ordiaand had to satibfy. 1. He mast have the testimony of the presbyter of his parish. This was originally given vier rove st the time of ordination, and the presbyter or archpresbyter presented the ordinand perlonally to the bishop ("qui cos repraesentare debeat," is the Conc. Nannet. quoted above); atterwards it was given in writing, and the archlescon presented and bore testimony to all ordiands alike, both those of whom he had personal knewledge and those who hall the testimony of other presbyters. 2. He must prolluce eridence that his intention had beea publicly declared in the parish in which he lived, nad that ne objector had come forwarl. 3. He must not have been objected to, or, if objected to, mast have been cleared from the objection at the tims of ordination. 4. He must have been peraonally tested by the bishop, assisted by other competent persons. (It ls possible that the testimnny of the archdeacon ln the modern nation ; but the fact that the Cone. Namnet., which forms tise canonical authority for the practice, dues not mention the archdeacon, shews that onigually the examination by the bishop and the enyuiry by the archleacon were distinct. The emrliest mention of the archleacen in connexion with this examination is in late pontificals : e.g. Cod. Vat. No. 474 t.) 5. The public examination by the bishnp, which forms part of the modern Euglish ordinal, is an exteusion, appurently withont early precellent, of the examination mentioned above, into an ordiand's willingness to be ortained and to obey his diocesan. In the Roman pontitical it follows, ordination, and is treated not as an examination, but as a contract ('ontif. Rum. pars i. tit. 12, §§ 29, 30).
V. Civil Status, Manner of Liye, and Disciphine of Persons in Hory Orders.(i.) Civil Staths: 1. In the pre-Constanimian period of church history the officers of the church hat, of course, no tistinct civil status. They were liable to the same burdens as all other citizcus, whether Christian or pagan; they had to take their places among the decurioncs, to act aa trustces, and to serve in the army. Nor is there any atrung presumption that the disclarge of such functions, except where it involved the receguition of the State religinn, was exceptionally distasteful. The sentiment of the incompatitility of church offices with active civil life lisst appears in North Africa. In the busy commercial towns of that thriving district the Christian communitics were numerons, and the work which devolved ypou their ollicers was consequently consilerable. At the same time auch officers were among the most intelligent and must trustworthy citizens. They were consequently in demand for civil offices of trust. But when thus "sneculo obstricti" (Tertull. do Praecript. J.cerct. c. 41) their attention was liable to be clistracted, nall the administration of ecclesiastical athirs to suffer, Such employments, so far as they were voluntarily undertaken and not imposel by the civil power, were therefore discouraged. In addition to this, the amalogy between the Christian ministry and the Jewish priesthood was begiming to assert itself in practice, and the frequeut outhreaks of persecution male the antithesis between the church and the world exceptionally strong. The writiogs of Cyprian contain frequent protests ing just the combination of church ollice with civil life: he inveighs agninst commercial bishops (De Lapsis, c. 6): lhe clnims for church olficers that they ought "nonnisi altari et sacrificiis deservire et precibus atque orationibus vacare" (Epist. 66 (1), \%ol. ii. p. 397); and coasequently since Geminius Victor inad named Faustinus, a presbyter, as his executor, he inflicts upon the former a posthumous punishment, "non est quod pro dormitime ejus npud vos fiat oblatio aut deprecatio "lignn nomine ejus in ecclesin frequell-tetur" (init?). tetur" (ínicl.).
2. But from the time of the recognition of Christianity by the Emplire, several powerful canses contributed to foster the nascent tenderacy to separate church othicers intn a class distinct, both cirilly and socially, from the ordluary members of the Christian communities.
(a) The first of these causes was the concession to clerks of the immunities from publio burdens which hal been enjoyed by certitin classes of heathen priests, and which continued to be enjoyed by some of the liberal professious. [immunitis. Vol. I. p. 882.]

But although the existence of theae immupitics operated fowerfully to give clerks a distinct status, aud although the enactment of frequent aafeg."rds against their abuse ahews that they war largely acted upon, and although, moreon er, it was unlikely that anyone who could claim exemption from public burdens would voluatarily undertake them, atill it is clear that the concession did not act as a probibition, and that church officers were still entangled with civil affairs and engaged in commercial purauits. There is a wile dilference between exemption from, and ineligibility for, the discharge of civil functiona: the empire granted the former, the ohurch csme to impose the latter. But it was not until the Council of Chalcedon that the olding of civil office, or the sdministration of recular business, became an offence against ecclesiastical law ; and it was not until cighty years after that council that the civil law fiually prohibited any of the highcr municipal officers from being elected preabyters or bishops (Cod. Justin. i. 3, 53 (52), A.D. 532 ; cf. also Justin. Novell. 123, c. 15).
(b) A second important and concurrent cause was that clerks came to be in certain cases exenipted from the jurisilintion of the ordinary courta of law. The grauting of this exemption was of itself a recognition of olerks as a distinet class, and the contiuued existence of it paturally tended to jncrease the class feeling. The date of the earliest concession is ont certain: Haenel, Corpus Leyum ante Justinimum latarum, p. 204, gathers from Sozom. II. E. i. 9, Niceph. Call. II. E. vii. 46, S. Ambres. Epist. ii. 13, that it was made by Constantine about A.d. 331. But it is not olear that either Constantine or his immediste successors did more than recognise the validity of church diacipline; i.e. of the voluntary jurisdiction to which the members of Christian societies had aubmitted themselves.
(0) A third cause was that after the time of Constantine the funds of the ohurches no longer consisted wholly of voluntary and temporary offerings. The churohes could inherit and hold property (law of Constantize in 321, Cod. Thendos. xvi. 2, 4). The provincial governars were required to furnish annual provision not only to clerks but also to widows and virgina on the cinurch-roll (lnc. Auct. de Constant. ap. Haenel, Corpus Legum ante Justin. lat. p. 196 ; the regulation was repealed by Julian but restored by his successer, Sozom. H. E. v. 5 ; Theoloret. iv. 4). A fixed proportion of the land revenues of every city was assigned to the churches and clergy (Sozom. II. E. i. 8; Niceph. Call. vii. 46 : cf. Euseb. II. E. x. 6; Vit. Const. iv. 28). The rich endowments of pagan temples were transterred in some cases to the newlyrecoguised religion: for example, Constantine gave the church of texaudria the reveuues of the temple of the Sun (Sozom. v. 7); and Theodosins gave the same church the wealth of the temple of Serapls (id. v. 10). It la true that these endownents did not in the fourth century reach all the clergy: for example, Basil speaka of his clergy as gaining their livelihood by
before hla elepatlon to the episcopate, as werking Tov Blov, Epist. 36 (228)). But the fact of ohurch officers being raised, especially in the great centres of populatiou, auch as Conatantinople and Alexandria, above the necessity of work, and of their being thus withdrawn from some of the most intimate assochations of ordinary life, must have contributed, probally more than any other single cause, to isolate them from the rest of the community.

The result of these and other co-operating influences was that by the close of the fitth century tho officers of the Christian church enjoyed a unique position among the citizens of the Empire. Exempt, to a great extent, from public burdens, fenced round with special privileges even in civil procedure, and endowed with revenues which the State had given them special facilities for holding, they became not merely civilly distinct, hut the most powerful clase ia the civilised would. In the East their ststus remained practically what the early emperors had made it until the final fall of the Eastern empire. But in the West, it was not maintnined without a struggle. For example, the law of Valens and Valentinian (Cod. Theodos, xvi. 2 23) had recegnised the jurisdiction of local aynods in all ecolesiastical causes: this eractment was repeated, though without its subse quent extensions, in the Visigothic Code; but it is clear from the "interpretatio," and from all the "epitomes," that it was understood tn apply only to disputes "inter clericos" (of. the texis in Haenel, Lex Romana Visigothorum, p. 246). Even when under the Carolingisas the Eastera canon law began to be recognised in the West, and to be quoted in Capitularies, it is extremely doubtful whether such a recognition amnunted to a re-enactment, and whether the claima of clerks to such a separate civil etatus as involved separate eoclesiastical juriediction were ever allowed. (For the discusaion of the question see Dove, de jurisdictionis ecolesiasticae apul Germanos Gallosque progressu, Berlin, 1855; Boretius, dio Capitcdarien in Langobardenreich, Halle, 1864; Sohm, dic geistliche Gerichtsbarkeit in fränkischen Reich, in the Zeitschrift $f$. Kïrchenrecht, vel. ix, pp. 193 sqq .)
(ii.) Manner of Life.-The distinctinn between olergy and laity was of slew growth, add the result of many co-operating causes. Even in divine service it was not atrongly defined! in social life it hardly existed at all. Like the succesaors of the non-juring bishops in the eighteenth oentury, or like the earlier preachera of the Wealegan Methodista, the officers of the esrly Christian communities worked at trades, kept ahops, tcok part in mnoicipal affaira, sad wore the dress of ordinary citizens. (See, for examplea, ©unk, Handel und Gewerbe im Christl. Alterthum, in the Theol. Quartalschrift, vol. Ivill. 1876, pp. 371 sqq.; Commence, Vol. I. p. 411.) There was no aense of incongruity in their deiag 80 . The Apostnlical Conatitutions repeat with emphasis the apostolical injonotion, "That if say man would uot work, neither should be eat" ( 2 Thess. iii. 10), and appeal to the exsmple of the Apostles themselves as fishermen, tentmakera, and tillers of the ground. But since every chureh was, as every Jewish aynagogue had come to be after the virtual fuslon of ajpe-

The apostulic admonition to Timothy was of universal application, " Be thou so exanple of the believers, in word, in conversatinu, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity" ( 1 Tin. iv. 12). If a chnrch officer failed in these respects, it was competent for the church of which he wns an officer to remove him. (This is clearly implied in Clem. Rom. i. 44.) 3 ut this was ohviously an inconvenient form of procedure, especially when the list of ollences was nodefined; and it was gradually supplanted by the elaborate system of synods, provincial, diocesan, and cecumenical, which has been described above. The general regulations which thess synods lnid down, present, as far as they hars been preserved, an accurate picture not onls of the ideal but also of the actual state of the clergy in various parts of Christendom. They are in some cases extremely minute. They probsbly grew in most instances out of individual cases which arose, the decisions in such cases being framed as genernl rules for future guidance. They wers for the most part only valid in the prorince or diocese in which they were franed; sad valuable as they are in enabling us to arrive st the state of opinion at a particular time in a particular conntry, they must not be regarded as having had, at least in the first instaice, the character of general laws. In later times, when a large number of these decisions and regulations were collected together by Dionysius Eriguus, Ferrendus, and others; end in still lster times, when these carlier collections were smalgamsted with other elements into a corpus of canon law, the decisione of local councils received sn authority which they had zot at first possessed: but for the purposes of church history sod church antiquities, it is of great importance to bear in mind in each case the circumatances of their origin and the limits of their validity. If these necessary limitations be borne in inind, it will be found that during the first four cencurias the ecclesinstical regulations which affected the social life of church officers were comparatively few in number. In the East the most important of such regulations were that clerks should not take usury (Conc. were that clerks should not take usury (Conc. Nicaen. c. 17, Laod. c. 4, Can. Apost. 44); that ther shonld not bs present at the immoral masquerades of bnaquets or marriages (Lnod. c. 54); that they should not bathe with women (Laod, c. 30); that they should not dine at club enter a tavern except on a journey (Laod. c. 94 , Can. Apost. 54). in North Africa the regulations sre mainly to the same eflect: clerks unust not take usury ( 1 Carth. c. 13; 3 Carth. c. 16; ; or go to taverne ( 3 Carth. c. $27,=$ Cod. Eccles.
Afric. c. 40 ); nor may even their sons exhibit or witness secular games (3 Carth. c. 11). (The minute regulations of the Statt. Eccl. Antiq., frequently cited as 4 Conc. Carth., especially c. $45-63$, almost certainly belong to a later period.)

usury are found in four councils of this periodlllib. c. 20 ; 1 Arelat. c. 12; 2 Arelat. c. 14; 1 Turon. c. 13. The fact that clerks lial not yet cessed to trade is indicated by the enactment that bishop,3, presbytera, and dencons were not to trale ont of their provinces nor go about the country in senrch of the most profitable inarkets (illib. c. 18). But although the regulations were neither numerous nor stringent, there is no doubt that by the end of the fifth century the officars of the church, throughout the greater purt of Christendom, had becone a class socially as well as eivilly distinct from its ordinnry members. The theory of the ehurch was more conservative than its practice. The form of the primitive "cauon," or church-roll, still remained. The The "order" of thaded off into one another. The "order" of the laity still held its place side by side by the "orders" of presbyters, deacons, readers, and widows. But the later conception of the clergy had been formet, and was beginuing to express itsalf. The socinl distinction between ehurch officers and ordinary whembers was accentuated by two circumstances, which, though slight in themsnlves, and in the first instance rather effects than causes, helped materially to increase it: the one was the adoption of a peculinr dress, the other was the adoption of a peculinr mode of wearing the lair (a) The first of these had shewn itself at th beginning of the fifth century, but only in tl form of a tendency to wear garments of a morc sober hue than was customary. Jerome discourages it: "vestcs pnllas aeque devitn ut candidns" (S. Hieron. Epist. 52 (2) ad Nepot. §9). It was succeeded by a tendency to preserve the older forms of dress, instead of following the changes of fashion; and ultimately, chietly under the influence of the monsateries and the cazonical rule, the "habitus laicorum" (Pippin. Capit. Suession. § 3, A.D. 744 ; Pertz, Legum, i v. 21) was absolutely forbidden [see Dress, Vol. I. p. 582]. (b) The second mark of distinction was slow in its growth, but strong in its influence. At first all that was insisted npon was that the hair should not be worn long or elaborately dressed; consequently the earlier references to the subject-e.g. Sidon. Apollin. Epist. viii. 9 ; Arator, Epist. ad Parthen. 69, 70, np. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. I xviii. 251-do net prove that what was afterwards known as the ToNsure actunlly existed. But in the latter part of the sixth century the tonsure appenrs to linve become definitely established as a mark of saparation between clergy and laity: this is clear from Greg. Turon. Lib. de Gloria Cenfessor. c.32, 1. 92 ; id. Vit. Patr. c. 17, p. 1233 ; and from the fact that Gregory the Great defends its use on scriptural grounds (Reg. Pastoral. pars 2, e. 7; jd. Epist. lib. 1. 85, p. 514, quoting Ezek. sliv, 20 : but it may be remarked, as an indication of the later origin of the practice, that. Jerome in writing upon that passage $f$ Ezekiel ninkes no mention of it, the words which are found in most editions being confessedly interpolated: S. Hieron. in Fizech. lib. xiii. c. 44, vol. v. p. 547).

In the meantime the inner life and discipline of tha class which was thus being formed was largely influenced by the growth and wide extension of monssticism. This influence is especially shewn in the tendency to live in community.

This tendency to live in comp inity has some.

times been traced to much earlier times. But although there are indications that in primitive times all who were on the church-roll, whether as officera, widowa, virgina, or poor, ahared a common furd and a commun meal; there are no indications thas they lived together, until in the fourth century church officers began to form a distinct class. The system which afterwards prevailed appears to have originated with Eusebius of Vercelli, $\dagger 371$, who "gathered together all the clerks into the fold of $n$ single habitation, that those whose purpose in religion was one and undivided might have a common life and a common refection" (S. Maxim. Serm. 23, ap. Muratori, Anecd. Lit. vol. iv., Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. Ivii.; see alao S. Ambros. Epist. lxiii. c. 66, 82, vol. ii. pars 1, p. 1038 ; Ps.-Ambros. Serm. 56, vol. ii. para 2, p. 468, ascribed, perhaps correctlv to S. Naximes, ap. Muratori, l. c., and Migne, vol. Ivii. p. 886); and probably from the e: 'mple thus aet by Eusebius and strongly approved by Ambroae, it was established by Augustine in his own diocese in North Africa, expressly on the monastic principle of the renunciation of private property by those who thus lived together, and who are hence called "monasterium clericorum" (S. Angustin. Serm. $355=$ de divers. 49, Op. ed. Nigne, Patr. Lat., vol. v. p. 1570 ; see also the following sermon). 1. the course of the next three centuries it aeans to have become the prevailing ayatem of clerical Wife throughout the greater part of the West. Ihe city clergy lived together under the eye of the bishop; they dined at a common table; they even slept together in a common chamber ( 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 23, makes apecial provision for the case of aged or infirm bishops, priesta, or deacons, who required separate cells). The country presbyters in the aame way, were each at the head of a "domus ecclesiae," in which, as the tendency grew up to dedicate boys to the service of the church in their earliest years, they educated auch boys and trained them for the higher orde s. Those who so lived together, whether in the cathedral city or in the country parishes, appear to have been called "canonici," and to have had their definite portions of the offerings which were made to their respective churches. Occasionally we find that a special endowment was made for the aupport of their common table (S. Greg. Tnron. M. F. x. 16, p. 535 of Baudin, bp. of Tours in the time of Clothair J., "hic inatituit mensam canonicorum;" cf. the will of a bishop of Le Mans circ. A.D. 615, ap. Mabillon, Vitt. Anal. i. 254). But as the aystem became general, it was found that neither the ecclesiastical canons nor the personal control of the bishop were sufficient to prevent a laxity of life among those who thus lived together; the "canonici" contrasted unfavonrably with the monks who lived under the atern rejime of St. Benedict. Consequently it was found advisable to frame a rule of life for "canonici" as well as for monks, and from the middle of the eighth century almost all Weatern elergy became "canonici regularep" [see Canonict, Vol. I. p. 282; to which may be added the important disaertation of Muratori, do Canonicis, in his Antiquit. Ital. vol. v. p. $183 \mathrm{sqq}$. ; and a note to one of the canons of the Eniliah Legatine Synoda in Haddan and Stubbs, vol. 1. p. 461, which however adınits of some question]. The ideal of this canonical lifa, or "vita communis," is found not only in the formal rulea of Chrodegang (Mansi, Vol. xiv, 313, Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. Ixxxix. 1097 ; and it its longer torm, Ilarzheim, Concil. Germ. vol.i. 96 ; D'Achery, Spicile jium, vol. i. 565), or of Asas. larius (Harzheim, l. c., Nigne, l'atr. Lat. vol. ev. 815), but alao in the letter of l'ope Urban in the Pgeudo-Jaidorian alditions to the Decretala (Hinachius, !. 143). But unfortunately it has its darker side: the penitential books of the eighth and ninth centuriea, even if it be nllowed that sume of the oflences there mentioned are rather innginary than actual, show that at any rate in Northern Europe the atar lard of clerical life hal been rather lowered taan rnised by its dis. sociation from the common life of the Chriatian world.
(iii.) Discipline.-There is no evidence of the existence in the earliest period of any gpecial diacipline for church officers. The distinction between the law of life which was current am'.g the mass of meu, and that which was binuing on Chriatians, existed for all members of the church alike; and although exceptiona! qualities were required in a church officer, whatever might lawfully be done by any Christian night also lawfully be done by him. Neither in the Pastoral Epistlea, nor in any other of the earlieat records of eccleainstical organization, is there any trace of the exceptional rules for chnreh officera which distinguish later canons. But the exerciae of the ordinary diseipline is surrounded in their case with special safeguards: "Against an elder receive not an accusation but before one or two witnesses" (1 Tim. v. 9).

But with the gradual separation of church officers from the reat of the community there came also to be rulea of discipline which were specially applicable to then. Theac rulea may be conveniently considered under two beads: A. Punishable offences; B. Punishments. On most points aeparate articles will be found elsewhere, and therefore what is given here will chiefly be by way of summary.
A. Puniahable offences may be divided into three clnsaes:-(1) Offences relating to marriage and sexual morality, (2) offences rolating to eccleaiastical organization and divan serrice, (3) offences relating to social life.
(1) Offences relating to Murriage and Sextal Morality.-It is especinlly important to bear in mind, in the case of these offences, what has been uaid nbove as to the originally local nad tempoo rary character of moat of the regulations which exiat. The drift of opinion in favonr ot celibacy was by no means uniform in either its direction or Its rate of motion. (a) In regard to the marriage of ordained peraons, the following are the chief disciplinary regulations:-Conc. Ancyr. c. 10, enncts that deacons who marry atter ordination without having expreasly stipulated for likerty to do so at the time of the rerdios. tion are to be deposed; Conc. Neoc. $c$., enacts that a preabyter who marrica after ordination is to be deposed; the Apostolical Canons go farther, and say that no clerk can marry after ordination, except readera and singers only (C. A. 26); the Aportolical Conatitutions, vi. 17, extend the erception to subdeacons (ínnpéras) and dooro keepers (but, on the other hind, Conc. as a custom of aome provinces, inapx (a), only). These enactments were confirmel by the civil law. A law of Juatinian in 530 (Cod. Justin. i. 3,45 ) goes 80 far as to make the children of such marriagea, including those of subdeacons, illegitimate; and a novel of the anme emperor (tiovell. 123, c. 14) subjects the offenling clerk to a farther civil penalty (but this penalty was afterwards modified, on the gronnd of its being toe severe, by the Emperor Lee, Const. 79 in Corp. Jur. Civ. iii. p. 814). The lending Weatern canon on the subject it 8 Conc. Tolet. A.d. 653, c. 7, which enacts that anyone who nfter ordination either marries or becomes a layman must be deprived of hla diguity and aecluded for the rest of his life in a monastery ; but the existence of an anrlier Western canon is indicated by 2 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 533, c. 8, which enacts that a def.con who marries in captivity is to be deposed upon his return : 9 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 655, c. 10 , makes the children of such marriages slaves of the church of which their fathers were officers. (b) If a peraon was ordained who was already married, the Apostolical Canone, c. 5, forbill him to put away his wife ( $\pi \rho 0 \phi d \sigma \epsilon_{l}$ є $\dot{i} \lambda \alpha \beta \in f a s$ ); and Conc. Gangr. c. 4, anathematizes those who refused to receive the communion from a married presbyter. But Epiphanius, ii. 59, 4 , speaks of a canon to the opposite effect, which, however, he admits not to be observed: Socrates, H. E. r. ऽ2, notes, on the other hand, that although there wsa no positive enactment, many clergy did ebstain from their wives, and that in Thessaly a clerk was excommunicated who did not so sbstain. A distinction in this ret, net was afterwerds drawn in the East, which with some molifications has remained until modern times, between presbyters and bishops. Justinian enacted in 531 that no person could be made bithop who did not practise married continence (Col. Justin. i. 3, 48, ef. Conc. Trull. xii. 13; and bee Celibacy, Vol. 1. p. 324). In the West, Conc. Illib. A.D. 313, commanda all married clerks to abatain and not to beget children under pain of deprivation ; ao also the doubtful addition to 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 29: 2 Carth. c. $3=$ Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 2, gives the prohibition without specifying a penaity: $5 \cdot$ Carth. c. $3=$ Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 25, makes the enactment apply to subdeacone and upwards, but not to inferior clerke: 1 Tolet. A.D. 398, assigna the milder penalty of non-promotion; so also 1 Taron. A.D. 441, c. 2 ; but 1 Araua. A.d. 441, c. 23, Agath. A.D. 506, c. 9, Arvern. A.D. 535, c. 13 , revert to the peasalty of deposition in the case of priests and deacons: Gerund. A.b. 517, c. 6, 3 Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 2, 5 Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 4 (bat not 4 Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 17), Autisaiod. A.D. 578 , c. 20, and apparently 2 Matisc. A.D. 581, c. 11, 3 Lugd. A.D. 583, c. 1 (all Gallican councila, and all belonging to the century which sncceeded the baptlsm of Chlodwig), include subdeacone in the same penalty. This inclusion of subdeacons is alao mentioned by Leo the Great (Epist. 167 ad Rustic. c. 3; Epist. 14 ad Anastas، c. 3), and its adoptinn in Canl geems to be due to Roman infiuence, as Gregory the Great (Epist. i. 44, vol. ii. p. 538) speaka of it as a "mos Remsnus" which had recently been imponed on Sicily. The Decretala follow in the same track (S. Siric. ad Eumer. c. 7, Hinschius, p. 521 ; S. Innocent I. ad Victoric. c. 9, ad Exsuper. c. 1, ad Maxim. et Sever., Hinachius, pp. 530, 531,544): so sleo, with strong emphacis upon the enactment, in the Poeudo-Ividorinn Eprst. Clement. ii. c. 46, Hinschius, p. 48.: 2 Conc. Turon. A.D. 567, c. 19, throws upon the rural arch-presbyters (i.e. the later rural deans) the duty of seeing that the other clergy of their districts observe the rule : in case of a breach of it, not only is the offender himaelf to be suapeaded, but the arch-presbyter who has neglected to guard against a breach of it is himself to be secludell, and fed on bread and water for a month. (c) In cases where marriage was allowed, digamy in any of its forme was strictly prohibited. in the Fiast the Apostolical Canons (c. 17-19) refuse to nllow anyone who has married (1) two wives alter baptiam, (2) a widow or divorcée, to be on the clergy list (ef. Const. Apost. vi. 17; Justin. Novell. vi. c. 5). But the regulations seem to have fallen into disuse, inaamuch as at the time of the Trullan Council apecial legislation had again become necessary, and the unalogy of the Western church wis expressly followed (Conc. Trull. c. 2). In the West there wers numerous enactments on the subject :-(i.) 1 Conc. Valent. A.D. 374, c. 1, disallows digamists for the future, but does not intertere with those who were already ordnined: 1 Tol. a.D. 398, c. 4, degrades a digameus subdeacon to the rank of a reader or doorkeeper, and dejoses a trigamist: Araus. A.D. 441, c. 25, will not allow a digamist to rise higher than the subdiaconate: Agath. A.D. 506, c. 1, will not allow a digamous presbyter or deacon to exercise his functions; so Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 2. (ii.) The wife of anyone who is allowed to marry must be a virgin. 1 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 398, c. 3, enacts that a reader whe marries a widow cannot rise higher than the subdiaconate: 1 Turon. A.D. $461, \mathrm{c} .4$, enacts that he must in such a case hold the lowest place on the clergy list : Agnth. A.D. 506, c. 1, in compassion to those presbyters and deacons who had broken the rule, doea not depose them from their office, but will not allow them to minister; but 2 Hispul. A.D. 619, c. 4, deposes deacona in a similar case without hope of restoration: 4 Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 44, orders clerks who heve so offended to be separated from their wives. So also in the Decretals: S. Siric. ad Eumer. c. 11, Hinschiue, p. 522; S. Innocent. ad Victoric. o. 4, ad Felic. c. 2, ad Ruf. et Euseb. c. 1, Hinschius, pp. 530, 533, 549. That it became not only the law but the usage in the Wext is a fair inference from the fact that the pseudo-Isidore does not even mention it in the spurious part of hia collection. (d) Sexual inmorality was at all times punished sererely; but the canons are few in number, because the gravity of the offence was so universally recognised as to render the repetilion of positive enactments unnecessary: the leading Eastern canons are Conc. Neoc. c. 1, Can. Apost. 25 ; but Conc. Trull. c. 4, is a remarkable indication of later Enstern usage, inasmuch as it seems to imf'y that a lesser punishment than deposition had come to be the rule when the woman with whom a clerk committed sin was other than a nun. The earliest Weatern canon is that of Elvira, c. 19, which inflicts on adulteroue bishope, presbyters, and deacons the severs penalty of perpetual excommunication: much later, the Carolingian Capitularies punisi an offending presbyter with scourging and two years' imprisonment on bread and water (Karlomanai Capit. A.d. 742, c. 6; Pertz, vol. 1. p. 18); but the British churches were more lenient. In the bisth centary nu offending presbyter or deacon was punished with three years' renitence (Gildse pruef. do poenit. c. 1 ; Haddan and Stubbs, vol. i. p. 113). Theolure's Penitentlal, i. $\theta, 1$, revives the Apostolical Canon which deposes but does not excommunicate a clerk; cf. Pocnit. Egb. v. 1-22, Hnddau and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 418. (e) In some cases the purity of the clerical order was further guarded by panishing clerks for the incontinence of their wives: Conc. Illib. c. 65, enacts that a clerk must pat awny an offending wife or be himself perpectually excommunicated; Neoc. c. 8, enasts that he mast either put her away or cease to exercise his office; 1 Tolet. c. 7, empowers clerks to imprisen their erring wives, and to reduce them to peniteuce by salutary fastiag. See also the canon of Photios in reference to presbyters and deacons whose wives had been abused by barbarians, ap. Mai, Scriptt. Vett. vol. i. p. 364.

(2) Offences relating to Ecclesiastical Organization and Divine Service.-These may be divided according as they are connected with (a) the growth of the diocesan syatem, (b) the growth of the parochial system, (c) the establishment of ecclesiastical courts, (d) ordination, (e) divine service.
(a) It was not without n struggle that dioceses, in the modern sense of the term, were formed, and that the charch officers of a particular district or province came to be regarded as an orgauic unity. The former of these results was cliefly due, as has been pointed out above, to the establishment of the system of aynods; the latter was chiefly due to the regulations that a clerk could not be on the roll of two churches at once, and that he could not be transferred from the roll of one church to the roll of another without the consent of his former superior. The earliest ensctment to this effect is Conc. Nicaen. c. 16 , which laid down the rule that if any bishop appointed to office in his own church a clerk beloaging to another church, the appointwent ( $\chi$ єiporovia) should be invalid. But the fact that the rule required to be re-enacted again and again shews that it did not easily establish itself: a few years after the Council of Nicaes, the Council of Antioch (c. 3) repeated it, with the addition that the bishop who received another's clerk against his will should be linble to be punished by the synod: Can. Apost. 15 punishes a bishop in a simiar case with excommunication; 80 Conc. Chalc. c. 20. Later on in the Eist, Conc. Trull. c. 17, after reciting the frequency of violations of the rule, enacts that for the future no bishop shall receive another's clerk without a dimissory let ${ }^{+n} \mathrm{r}$ under pain of deprivation. Still later the Nestoriaa synod of Patriarch John (Ebedjesu, Tract. vi. cap. 6, can. 8, ap. Mai, Scriptt. Vett. vol. x. p. 116) puniehes clerks who so passed from one diocese to another with a year's suspension, and subsequent degradation to the lowest place in their order. In the West, 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 21, deposes presbyters and deacons who tranafer themselves to another church: 1 Tolet. c. 12, excommunicates them, unless they are refugees from a heretical to an orthodox church: Milev. c. $15=\mathrm{Cod}$.

Eccl. Afric. c. 90 (which probably arose out of the case of Timotheus, who had been a realer of Auguatine's, but was promoted to the subdiaconate at Subsana, S. Augnst. E/ist. 63 (240), Op. vol. ii. p. 231), enacted that no one shovild abandon the church in which he had betn ordained render: Valent. c. 5, excommunicates and deposes presbyters and deacons who do nut nithere to the place assigne. io them by the bishop who ordained them; 2 Hiepal. c. 3 , deala with the case of a clerk who, having been do dicated to the service of the church at Italica, near Seville, had Hed to Cordova, and regarde such clerks as being oa the footing of "coloni agrorum:" 1 'Toron. c. 11, 2 Arelat. c. 13, Statt. Eicl. Antic. c. 27, allow a clerk to migrate with the consent of his bishop: so Conc. Hertfurd, c. 3, ap. Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 119.
(b) it was apparently an early, if not a primitive rule, that the presbyters and descone of a church could not ordinarily act without the bishop of that church. In the next stage of organization it was enscted that a preshyter or deacon could not detach himeelf from the chureh of which he was presbyter or deacon and set up an altar of his own (Conc. Antioch. c. 5). The next atep was to provide for the cases in which monasteries or other ecclesiastical institutiuns were established in a city of which there was a bishop: Conc. Chalc. c. 8, following what it states to be an older tradition, subjects all such institutions to the bishop of the city; Trull. a 31, 2 Nicaen. c. 10, do the same for private chapels. In the West, 4 Aurel. s.D. 541, c. 7, requires the clerks of "oratoria domini prsediorum" to have the consent of the bishop; but the Capitularies, by repeating the rule that "all preebyters who are in a diocese (parachia) must be under the jurisdiction (potestas) of the bishop of that diocese, and muat not baptize or celebrate mass without hia sanction," seem to inply that the rule had been brokea (Pippini Capit. Vern. dupl. c. 8; Pertz, vol. i. p. 26). The regulation that a presbyter could only celebrate the Eucharist in a place consecrated by the bishop is first found in 2 Conc. Carth. c. 9 ; but it does not appesr to have been universslly recognised, since it required re-enactment at a Iste date, viz. in the Liber Pontificalis, Vit. Siric. c. $2=$ Decret. Synod. Silvestr. c. 9 , in the Psendo-Isidorian decretals, Hinschius, p. 450\%, cf. Atton. II. Vercell. Capit. c. 7, ap. D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. i. p. 403.
(c) A third class of offences consists of those which grew out of the jarisdiction of ecclesiastical courts. The exercise of discipline by the church in eccleaisstical matters nuat be digtinguished from its exercise of jurisdiction is civil or criminal matters. The former was inherent in the original constitation of the Christian communities; the latter was of the nature of voluntary contract. The history of both is intricste, and has yet to be fully written; it must be sufficient to mention here that while the State constantly recognised the ecclesisstical courts as courts of arbitration, and was resdy to enforce their sentences when both parties had agreed to be bound by those sentences, the church on its part endeavoured in the West to compel clerks to resort in all cases to ite own courts rather than to the ordinary civil courta. This is seen especially in 3 Conc. Carth. c. $9=$

(d) Offences reluting to Ordination.-The offenees which consisted in ordination out of the proper dlocese have been mentioned above under (4). of ordination.
(e) (iffonces rolating to Divine Service and the Religinns Lifo.-1. The Apostolical Constitutions ( 2,59 ) enjoin all the faithful, laity as well as cergy, to go to chureh twice every day, and the Ajputolical Canons (c. 8) and Conc. Antioch. (c. 2) ennct that clerks, if present, must communicate; but it appears from the civil law that clerks were rather negligent in this respect (Cod. Justin. 1, 8, $42(41), 10 ; 1,3,52(51))$; and a century and a half later the Trullan Council theught it sufficient to punish a clerk or layman himgelf from divine servica for three successive Sundays. The Spanish rule, as given in 1 Conc. Tolet. c. 5, was that any clerk who was in the neighbourhood of a church must go to the daily sacrifice. The Gallienu rule, as given in Cino. Venet. A.D. 465 (?), c. 14, punished with seven days' axcomnumication clerks who were without Good excuss absent from the morning office. The lriah rule, as given in the Canons of St. Patrick, c. 7, was that a clerk who did nut go morning and evening "all collectas," was to ba excommunlcated, ualess he wero detained by the obligatione of aervitude ("jugo servitutis "). The North African rule was, that ualess a clork were present at vespers he should lose his pay (Statt. Eccles. Anti.. c. 49). ii. The regulntions which relnte to the conduct of divine service are not numerous. The Apostolical Canons (c. 3) depese a bishop or presbyter who offers upon the altar milk or honey, or birds or vegetables; or (c. 59 ) a clerk who reads pseudepigrajha as though they were eacrel books; 3 Cone. Brac. A, D. 572 , c. 10 , excommunientes prlesta who celebrate mass without a stole on both shoullers; 13 Tolet. A.D. 683, c. 7 , deposes slerks who in pique or quarrel strip the altar of its vestments or put out the ehurch Jights; Conc. Rom. A.D. 743, c. 13, under Pope Zachary, excommunicates bishops, presbyters, and dencons who celebrate mass with a staft or with covered head; the Nestorian canons of Ebeljesu (Tract. vi. can. 6, c. 2) punish a clerk who officistes without his boots. iii, It was enneted that elerks must not join in divine scrvice with deplosed clerks, or heretics, or Jews (Can. Apost. c. 11, 45, 65) ; or fast on the Lorl's day (ib. c. 64); or fnil to keep Lent (ib. c. 69); or eat flesh with the blood in it (ib. e. 63).
(3) The enactments which related to the social life of the clergy during the first four centuries have been for the most part mentioned above under (ii.). The following belong to later centuries :-In the East the Trullan Council made a series of enactments which, being for the most part repetitions of earlier enactments, shew that such earlier enactments had fallen into neglect. It provided that clerks should not be the lessors of taverns, c. 9 ; that they should not take usury, c. 10 ; that they should nut wear unbecoming dress, c. 27; that they should not play with dice, c. 50 ; nor be concerned in stage-plays and stage-danciag, c. 50 ; nor keep brothels, c. 86. In North Africa it was enacted that they should wear a becoming dress (Statt. Eccles. Anti. c. 45); that they should not waste time in walking about the streets (ib.c. 47); *a( that they should not sing songs at a banquet (ib. c. 62) : on the other hand, they were quite at liberty to procure their livelihood by handicraft or agricalture (ib. c. 51-53). In the provincia] councils of Gaul and Spaio it was enacted that clerks who were engaged in trada must not sell dearer than other people (Conc. Tarrac. A.D. 516, c. I), or drive hard bargains (3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 27); that clerks must not live with seeular persons withont the permission of the bishop (2 Conc. Awrel. A.D. 533, e. 8) ; that they must not frequent banquets at which love-songs were sung (Conc. Venet. A.d. 465 , c. 11 ; Agath. A.d. 506 , c.
39 ) ; nor sing or dance at banquets (Conc. Autis39) ; nor sing or dance at banquets (Conc. Autisgiod. A.D. 578 (?), c. 40 ) ; nor be drunk (Conc. Venet. c. 13 , Agath. c. 41 ); nor bear arms (Conc.

Herd. A.D. 523, o. 1); nor keep hunting dogs or hawks (Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 4: ef. Conc. Forojui. A.d. 798, e. 6 ; Capit. Generale, A.D. 789, c.15, l'ertz, vol. 1. p. 69, which adda "jesters" to tha list of prohibitions ; Hettouis Basil. Capit. 11). In Irelaud almost the only social reguiation which is contained in the Canons of St. Patrick is that if a clerk becomes surety for a "gentile," anl "quod mirum non est," if the gentile cheats the clerk, the cierk must pay hia bond, or if he tights the gentile insteal, must be excommunieated (Can. S. 1'atric. c. 8); the later collection of Irish canons repeata the enactments of the Statt. Eccles. Antij. (see Wassersehleben, die Iris:lic hanowenauminuny, p. 33, &c.). In England the penitentials of Bede, Eigbert, and Theadore combine to afford conclusive evidence that the chief social oflence against which prorision had to ba made was drunkenness: there is, perhaps, no more deguading picture of tha atate of the clergy at any period of the history of the church than that which these penitentiala present (e.q., Pocnit. Theodor. i. 1, 4, ap. Wassersqq., and lladdan and Stubbs, vol. i.).
B. The punishmenta by which the obaervance of disciplinary rules was anforced were various; the most important were the several forme of excommunication, degradation, and deposition.
(1) Exconmunication.-(a) Timporary: The simplest mode of enforcling obedisuce was to suspend a clerk from all the privileges of church mernbership so long as he was recalcitrant elvai, Conc. Nicaen. c. 16 ; "a communione alienus haberi," 2 Cono. Arelat. c. 3, 1 Turon. c. 3), Tais did not in early times imply more than that the offending clerk could not remain with the faithful to participate in the communion, and that he consequently lost his share in the offerings. It was a corollary of this sentence that he could not exercise his offica (hance Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 7, explains the phrase "archiparaphonista [i.e., archicantor] a pontifice exconnmunicabitur," by "ab officio euspendetur"). Sometimes the period duriog which a clerk should remain excommunicatad was expreased in tha canon : e.g. a year (Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517 , c. 15 ; 2 Turon. A.D. 567, c. 19 ; Narbon. A.D. 589, c. 10 ); three months ( 11 Tolet. A.D. 675 , c. 8). But more commonly the time was not specifiel, it being understood that submission wouli be followed by re-admission to full status. Tha Apostolical Canons, however, contain a atipulation that the bishop who re-ndmits a clerk must be the same bishop, if still living, who had excommunicated him (C. A. 28, where Balaamon a tds that even if the bishop had died, hia place in this respect could only be taken by his succeasor, or the metropolitan, or the patriarch). In time, and especially in the West, this form of punishment became more sovere than it had originally been. A canon of the fifth (?) century, which claims for itself the authority of earlier canons, separatea an excommunicated clerk not only from communion but also from all Chriatian society ("a totius populi colloquio atque convivio ") until he submits: so also In the Canons of St. Patrick, c. 28; and even more stringently in the Capitularies (Pippini Capit. Vern. dupl. A.D. 755 , c. 9, Pertz, vol. i. p. $26=$ Conc. Vern., A.D. 755, c. 9, Pertz, vol. i. p.
Mansi, xii. 577 ; Capit. Ticin. 4.D. 801 , c. 17,

Pertx, vol. i. p. 85). (b) Permanent: For some oflences a clerk was permanently ejectoi fiom church membership ( $\ddagger$ feoeiatas tideoy kal

 This luvoived complete loss of atatus; re-aduisslon was only pussible through the door of formal and public penitence. Bven this was in solus cases deniel (hence 1 Conc. Araus. A.D. 441, c. 4, "poenitentian desiderantibus clericis non nogandum "), and in the enrliest of Western provincial councila the door was elhut by express enactment of the camon itself (" nec in fine [sc. in articulo nortis] accipera communionem," Conc. Hilib. c. 2, 19: but it may bo noted that this severe form of sentence does not appear to have been repeated by later councils).
(2) Suspension and Degradation.-Of these thers were several furma and degrees: (a) a presbyter might be suspended from the function of offering the Eucharistic sacrifice, but not from other functions (Conc. Neoc. c. 1); (1) a clerk might be suspended from the exercise of the functions of his office, but retain his rank (Conc. Agnth. A.D. 506, c. 43 ; Epaon. A.D. 517 , c. 2; Truil. o. 26: so also S. Basil, Epist. ii. ad Ansphiloch. c. 27, id. Epist. iii. ad Amphiluch. c. 70); (c) a clerk milght lose his seniurity snd be placed last on the clargy roll ( 1 Conc. Turon. A.D. 461 , c. 4 ; Trull. c. 7 ; 2 Nicaen. c. 5); (d) s clark might be degraled to a lower urier (1 Conc. Tolet. c. 4); (e) a clerk might be cut of from the hope of promotion (Conc. Tnuron. A.D. 401, e. 8; 1 Tolet. c. 1; 1 Araus. c. 24; Andegav. A.D. 461, c. 2 ; lierd. c. 1,5 ; Statt. Ecel. Ant. c. 54; ao also S. Basil, Epist. iii. ad Amphitoch. c. 69); $(f)$ a clerk might be deprived of his stipend (3 Conc. Aurel. A.d. 538, c. 7 ; Narb. A.d. 589 , c. 11, 13). (This, which was probably one of the chief effecta of excommunication in early times, was retained as a aejarate and minor punishnent, when excommunication came to carry with it greater penaltias.)
(3) Deposition.-This was sometimes more and somatimes less than excommunication. In the earliest times it does not scem to have involved more than the reducing of an officer to the ranks in the army. Thia is impliad in the phrsses by which deposition is designated: $\pi \epsilon \pi a v a \theta a u t \bar{\eta} \mathrm{r}$

The person so retnoved from office was for the future a laymsn: his place in church was no longer on the raised stepa or aeats; he had no longer a voice in the administration of discipline; and he had no longar the larger alare of the offeriggs which fell to the aeveral grades of officers. A.D. 667, c. 10, "dejpsitue ab emni officio clericali inter lalcos se observare cognasest " (but with permission to sit among the realers in the choir). There is no trace of the recognition in early canoun law of the opinion which afterwards came to prevnil, that a peraon so deposed was atill in poise what he hall been before; and that the repend of the sentence of deposition weuld restore him at onee to all the privileges and powers of hie lost place. On the contrary, even solate as the seventh century, and even in cases where the deposition was found to be unjust, reordination was neceasary (" non potest esse quod fuerst niei gradus amissos recipint coram altario," 4 Cone. Tolet. A.d. 633, c. 28). One of the earliest inatances of the inter opinion is in the Cupit. Vernense of Plppilu, a.d. 753, I'ertz, vol. i. p. 23, which allows a degraded presbyter to baptize in casee of extreme emergency. The sdiditon of excommunication to deposition was in early times a eeparate and cumulative panishmeat; the Apostolical C'anone, c. 24, maintain that the former is sufficient without the latter, even in csses of theft or perjury, on the ground that a man must not be punished twice for the same effence. They allow them to be combine if enly in the case of simony (c. 28; the interpretation of $e .64$, which apparently visits with the asme double punishment those who assueinte with Jewe and heretice, is not certain: ef. Bolsamon and Zonsras ad loc.).
(4) Other Punishments.-(a) In the sixth ceatury, when the practice of appointing very yeuag persons to minor orders began to prevail, it was sometimes enacted that " juniores clerici" who transgressed the eanons should be whipped (Cenc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 15 ; 1 Matise. A.D. 581, c. 8; Nirbon. A.D. 589, c. 13 ; 11 Tolet. A.D. 675 , c. 8). The fourth Council of Brsga, whieh is of the ssme date as the last-mentioned council, goes 10 far as to sllow presbyters to be scourged for grays offences, but discourages the practice which some bishops seem to have had of beating their clergy themselves. So also in the following ceatury a presbyter whe commite a ein of the flesb is to be scourged, "flagellatus et scorticatus," before being imprisoned (Karloman. Capil. A.D. 742, c. 6 ; Pertz, vol. i. p. 17). The civil law recognises the anme mode of panishmeat for clerks below the grade of deacons (Justin. Nuvell. 123, e. 20 ; cf. Cod. 1, 3, 8). (b) Whes the moastic aystem began to prevail, clorks were sometimes punished by being eecluded in 8 monastery: e.g., Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 22; 3 Aurel. A.d. 538, c. 7 ; 4 Tol. A.d. 633, e. 29,$45 ; 8$ Tol. A.D. 653, e. 7. So also in the civil law: Justin. Novell. c. 11, substitutes this paxisbment for that of banishment, which had been imposed nenrly a century and a half earlier bys lsw of Arendius and Honorins (Cod. Theodos. xvi. 2, 35). It was sometimes further enacted thet elerks who were thus seeluded should be confined in oolitary cells and fed on bread and mater (2 Conc. Turen. A.D. 567, c. 19 ; 1 Matisc. A.D. 581, c. 8 ), and that they shouid be subject to the sbbat (Narbon. A.D. 589, c. 6). [E. H.]

Rilny, p. 58, "ordinalibus, consuetudinariiz, misealibus" are enumerated separately among the books given to the abbey by abbat l'aul, A.D. 1077-1093; an ordinurius liber or ordinarium is mentioued in a charter of St. Wulfran's ehurch at Abbeville in A.D. 1208 ; it was a book of, directions, specifying "quid et quando et quomodo eantandum sit vel legenilun, chorus regenfus, campanae pulanndae, Luminare accendendum,"&c. But it has been supposed that there were different ordinaria for the several classes of ministers, and that the ordinarium episcopals was the same as the pontificalc. In the absence, therefore, of any precise ancient term, the information in question has been placed under the present heading, as being more expreasiva than any otber to modern English readers.

1. Western Urdinals.-It is not possible in the present state of knowledge to lay down many general propositions in respect to carly Weatern ordiasls. The earlier MSS, of those which are known to exist do not appear to have been carefully exsmined by any seholar of emineace since the time of Muratori, and some of thoee which have been published, and which are mentioned below as belonging ta a certain date, are found on examination to be composite M.SS., i.e. MSS. of clearly distinguighable and sometimes widely separated dates, which have accidentally been bound up together. Consequently, almost all facts in relation to ordiuation which are assigued to certain dates on the authority of printed editions of the several MISS. are liable to correction. It is, moreover, probable that many MSS. remain still unexamined, and that much light may be thrown upon early ecelesiastical usages by fresh discoveries. The following accounte will be confined to those whicb have been printed: nor even in the case of those which have been apecially examined for the purposes of this work will there be any discussion, which must neeessarily be elaborste and lengthy, of their origin or approximate date. But even with this limitation it is clear that the printed ordinals belong to several distinct types, nad that the type which ultimately survived, and which, being retaincd in the minlizeval service-bookn, has come down to moulern times is the Romas and Augliean or limals, wa nut the earliest even of thuae which atill remaia.
2. Among the earliest of the remaiaing typea is that which is printell by Mabillon (IWuseum It tivenm, vol. ii. 85) as Urdo Jlomants viii, It contains short forms for the ordination of acolytes, mbileacons, leacons and preshyturs, and a louger form for the ordination of a biahty.
3. Another type of great natiquity, but whether enrlier or later than the preceding la nut at present clear, is that which was first printed by Jlittorp, do Ilivition Cotholicte Kistesise Ufficio, Culugne, 1503, p. 88, col. 1 and part of col. 2. This is diatinatively 1 suman, as is shewn by the direction that the pere anil clergy are to gis in procesalon from the chureh of St. Alrian to that of sit. Marla in l'racsepe. It is important, as seprarating election from almiseion to olifee (i.e. or.lination in its later sense) by an interval of two days. It gives no form of cither prayer or benediction, and it ia confined to presbyters an! deacons. It was printed agnin by Mabillon from a st. Gall Ms. (.IIus. Ital. vol, ii.) as Urdo fiom thus Ir. and by Martene (de Autiq. Ec\%. Lit. rul. ii.) from a MS. of the Benedictine Abbey of the Trimity at Vendome, also as Ordo Ir. ; both these editors asd to what Hittorp had publishel an order for the benediction of a biahop; and Mabillon, not Martene, givea an order resuecting the four seasons, which is not in accorlance with the preceling part of the Ms., and ia probably a remmant of a diatinct rite ; this last part is also printed from MSS. at Zurich and Einaiedeln by Gerbert (Monum. Liturg. Alemmin. vol, ii. 38; cf. id. Liturg. Alcumann. distras. V. c. 4, vol, ii. 494).
4. Another type of great antijuity, and one which is pussibly earlier than either of the two preceling, is that which occurs as a preface or preliminary rubric to the ritual of the ordination of deacons and preabyters in some of the later ordinals (for which see below), viz. Sneram. Gelas. i. e. 20, Miaanle Francornm, Cod. Maff. ap. Maratori, Pontif. Eegb. S. Dunst. Rodral, Catalani, cird. ii. It ia remarkable as giving no forins of benediction, nor any mention of vestments, and for the retention of the primitive custom of making the oblations to the bishop himself at the Eucharist, and receiving them back from him when consecrated.
5. The older MSS. of the sacramentarles contain prayers which might have been combined with any of the rituala hitherto mentioned.
(a) That which is known as the Leonine Sacramentary contains prayera withont rubrical directions, to be used in (I) the consecration of a biahop, (2) the benediction of a deacon, (3) the censecration of a presbyter. The Veronese MS. which contains the ascramentary is assigned to the luth century. The anthorship of the aseramentary is absulntely uncertain; various conjectures will be found (1) in the preface to the original edition of the work by Bianchini in his edition of Annstasius, vol. iv. Rome, 1735 (whose ascription of it to Lee the Great was withdrawn later in life secording to Gerbert, Fet. Liturg. Alem. vol. i. p. 80); (2) in Muratori's Dissertiotio de Rebus liturgicis, c. iii. prefixed to his edition of it in his Liturgia Romanis Jetus, vol. $i$. The text will be found not only in the above-men-

Woned volume of Bianchini and Murntori, but alno in the Mallerini edithon of St. latu JI. vol, il. p. 110 .jf. (reprinted in Migne, Iatr. Lat, vol. Ix. p. 113 3.17.).
(b) The older MSS. of that which is known m the (iregorian Sacrminentary alno contain prayers, without a ritual, to be used at the orilination of bishops, preshyters, and deacons. The chinf of these older MSS. are (1) one in the lomerial Library at Vienna (No, 1815, 5 ; furmerly Theol. 149), which is describel by Lamberins (bibi, Cuswor. t. Ii. e. 5, p. 299) (who supposel, but wrongly, that it was the eopy which lia irian l. presented to Charles the (irent), an I by Desis (Codl. IfSSS, 77e I. R, P, t. 1. ןurs iii. 1, 3/32); (2) a Vitican colex, wheh, with a cullatina of (3) a codex in the Ottuboni Library, was printed by Muratori (Lit. Rom. Iei, vol. ii.), In which edition the several prayers will be found on $\mu$ p. 882, 918, 1064.
(c) The MS, which was publlished by Carlinas] Tomasl in 1680 from a Ms. of (queen Christina of Sweden, and which since, though its ascrip. tion t" Gelasius is generally repuliated, has been known as the Gelasian Sacmuentary, erntaim two sets of directions and prnyera fur urdinations: the one (lib. I. e, 2 (i-23) correspunile to some extent with the Leonine Sacramentary, the other (lib. h. c. 95-99) with the encliaals mentioned below. The text will be found is Tomasi (reprinted in Daniel, Cudix Liturcicus, vol. 1. p. 208), In Muratori (Lilury, Ron, Vel. vol. ii.) ; and in Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. Ixxiv.
5. The type which ultimately prevailed and which, after the analogy of the sacramentary to which it is usually appended, may be called the Gregorian, is more elaborate, nud therefore probably later than the types mentioned above. The most important of the MSS. which have been publiahed, and which can therefure be compared together without great ditficulty, sre the following : (1) Miastle Francorum : a Ms, found by Morin in the library of A. Ietau at Paris, afterwards bought by queen Christina of Sweden, and now in the Vatican. It is aupposed by Moria, on Iateranl evidence, to have beea written for the use of the church of Joitiers, and ia ascribed by him to the 6th century, between A.d. 511 and 560. Mabillen, who first gave it the name by which it is now known, thinke that it representa the prevalent Frankieh ritual, but ascribea it to the 7 th century either date places it earlier than the MS. of any existing Western ordinal, although the type which it embodies is probably later than several of those which have been mentloned above. It contains the ritual for the ordination of doorkeeper, acolyte, reader, exorciat, Bubdeacon, deacon, presbyter, biahop, virgin and widow. The text is given in Morin, de Sacris Ealesive Ordinationibus, p. 261 ; Mabillon, Litury. Gall. lib. iii. p. 301 ; Muratori, Liturgia Romana Velus, vol. iii. p. 439. (2) Codex Remensis: a MS. formerly belonging to the obbey of St. Remiglua at Reima, printed by Morin, p. 290. (3) Codex S. Eligii: a MS. probably of the 9th century, once in the abbey of Corbey; in Morin's time in the lihrary of St. Germain-asaxPrés, now in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paria (No. 12,051). Thia MS. furms the basis of Mébard's text. (Paris, 1642), and alse of the Benedictine text (S. Greg. M. Op. vol. iv.), of

I. 1,1 , but of the 13th century according to the Cambridge catalogue, No. 1347) with a collation of the Winchester Pontifical (also at Camb. Univ. Library, No. 921) of the 12th century, the liangor Ponlifical (at Bangor) of the l4th century, and bishop lacey's Exeter Poutifcal of the itin century (since published separately by Mr. Barnes, Exeter, 1847). The only other English ordinals which are known to the present writer to have been published are (1) Cardinul Bainbridge's York Pontifical, in the Cambrilge Univeraity Library, which was edited by Dr. Henderson for the Surtees Society in 1875; (2) a Sarum Pontifical of the 11 th century in the British Musenm (Tiberius, e. i.), published by Mr. Chambers, Divine Worship in Eagland in the XIII, XIV. and XIX. Centuries, London, 1878.
Of unpublished and uncollated Pontificals there are many; some are mentioned in the list given by Zacearia, Bibliotheca Ritulis, vol. i. p. 164 ; but the catalogues of most great libraries supply instances of others. The mast important of unpublished English Pontificals is probably that which is contained in Leofric's Exeter Missal in the Bodleian Library, a MS. of various datea, one part of it containing the dste A.D. 969.
II. Eustern Ordinals: i. Greek.-The earliabt

ORDINAL

Greek ordinal, the date of which is extremely obscure, but which probably representa a primitive type, is that which is contained in the eighth book of the Apostolica! Constitutions, and which prescribes the ritual for the ordination of bishops, presbytera, deacons, deaconesses, subdeacons, and readera. (The best modern texts are those of Lagarde, Const. A post. Leipzig, 1862, and of Pitra, Jur. Liccl. Graecorum Hist. et Mon. vol. i. pp. 45-75.)
ii. Next in importance is the ritual which is given, interwoven with a mystical explanation, by St. Dionysius Areopagita de ecelesiastica Hierarehia, c. v., which should be compared with the scholia of St. Maximus, and the paraphrase of George Pschymeres, both of which are usually printed with it. (The text will be found in Migne, Patr. Graec. vol. ii. ; and Morin, de Sacr. Urdin. p. 52.)
iii. The later ordinsla seem to have taken their finnl shape in the course of the 8 th and 9 th centuries; they have not yet been thoroughly investigated, but the differences between the MSS. which have hitherto been collated are cinsiderably less than those which are found between the Pontificals of the Gregorian type in the Weatern church. The chief MSS. are the following : (1) Codex Barberini, of the 9 th century, formerly in St. Mark'a Library at Florence ; priated by Morin, vol. i. p. 64 ; J. A. Asseman, Cod. Liturg. Eccles. Univ. vol. xi. p. 103 . (2) Codex Dessaivion: of the 10 th century, given by a Cretan presbyter to cardinal Julian at the council of Florence; afterwards in possession of cardinal Bessarion, who gave it to the monastery of Crypta Ferrata, near Rome, of which be was abbat; printed by Morin, i. p. 74, J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 125 . (3) Codex Paris: not carlier than the 14th century; in the Bibliotheque Nationale; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 83 ; J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 147. (4) Codex S. Andr. Vall.: of uncertain date, in the library of the church of St. Andrea Vallensis at Kome; printed hy Morin, vol. i. p. 91 , J. A. Assemsn, vol. xi. p. 166. (5) Cudices Vat.: one of the 12 th century, containing the offices for the ordination of reader, singer, subdeacon, deacon, deaconess, the other containing those for presbyter, bishop, abbat; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 97, J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 179. (6) Codex Leo Allat.: of much inore recent date, and possibly more Syrian than Greek; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 104, J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 196. The other editions of the ordinala are leas precise in atating the ISS. authorities upon which they are based; the chief of them are Habert's 'A $\mathcal{A} \boldsymbol{\prime} \in \rho a \tau i k \delta \dot{\prime} \nu$, Liber Pontificalis Eccl. Graecae, Paris, 1643, and Goar'a Eujox́́yıv, aive Rituale Graecorum, Paris, 1647 (the notes to which are valuable). A convenient edition for general reference, but uaeless for scientific inquiry, is that which is contained in Daniel's Codex Liturgicus, vol. iv. fasc. ii. Leipzig, 1853.
iv. Coptic.-The Coptio ordinal, which may be presumed to retain the chief traditions of the later church of Alexandria, was first publiehed in Its present fori $\%$ by Gabriel, son of Tarik, patriarch of Alexsndria, in 1141. It has been printed in the West from several different MSS. which do not materially differ: (1) The greater part of it was first transluted into Latin by father Kircher, from a MS. which was sent to the Propaganda, and published by Bartold Nihn. lins at Culogne in 1653, in the इv $\mu \mu \kappa \tau d$ of Leo Allatius ; this was reprinted by Morin, de Sacr. Ordin. (2) The officea for the ordination of a biahop, metropolitan, and patriarch, which had been omitted by Kircher, were printed by Renaudot, Liturg. Oriental, vol. i. from a I'aria MS. and the office for a patriarch also from Ebnassal, Epitome Canonum, A.D. 1239, and from Abulbireat Lampas tenebrartum, saec. xiv. (3) A later version from other Paria NSS. is given by Vansleb, Histoire de l'Éllise d'Alexandric, Paris, 1677, p. 4, sect. 2. (4) J. S. Asseman translated the offices for a reader, subdencon, deacom, pres. byter, and bishop from a Vatican MS., and published them in his Dissertazione dell inazione dei Copti, \&c. 1733, which was reprinted by Mai, Script. Vet. vol, v. pars ii. § 5. An orthodox Copt, Raphsel Tuki, published in 1761, under the auspices of the Propaganda, an edition of both the euchologion and the pontifical from MSS. which he found at Rome; a Latin version of this is published, with a collation of other editions, in Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, vol. ii. Würtzburg, 1864.
iii. Jacobite.-The ordinal of the Jacobite Syrians, which probably retains the main fentures of that of the church of Antioch, is said to have been arranged by Michael the Great about A.D. 1190 . It has been published in three forms, between which there are conaiderable dilferences, (1) By Morin in Syriac and Latin ; (2) by Renau. dot, Perpetuité de la Foi de l'Éllise Catholiuse from a MS. in the Grand Ducal Library at Florence. (3) It is also found as a collation with the Nestorian ordinal in J. S. Asseman, Bibliotheca Orientalis, vol. iii. p. 2. Probably older than any of these ordinals in their present form are the canonical directions which are given by Gregory Abulfaradsch (Bar-Hebraeus), who in the 13 th century furmed a collection of canons, a Latin version of which by J. A. Asseman is published in Mai, Script. Vett. Nov. Coll. vol. x. pars ii.
iv. Maronite.-The Maronite ordinal so Desrly resemblee the Jacobite ordinal as to have been sometimes identified with it. It was first printed by Morin, but imperfectly, inaamuch as the MS. which be used was a Diaconicon and not a full Pontifical. It has aince been fully printed (1) by J. A. Asseman, Cod. Liturg. vol. ix. x. from a collation of ancient MSS. supplied by a Maronite patriarch; (2) by Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, vol. ii., who has reprinted Assemar's text, with the addition of a collation of some important materials which had been left in DIS. by Renaudot.
v. Neatorian.-The Nestorian ordinsl ascribes to itself a higher antiquity than any of the other Oriental ordinals. It brars the nsmes of the patriarcha Marabss I. †552, and Jesujab t660 of Cyprian, bishop of Nisibis, f. 767, and of Gsbriel, metropolitan of Bussorah, circ. 884. It has been printed (1) by Morin from a Vatican MS. in both Syriao and Latin, the Latin version being however to soms extent untrustworthy; (2) by J. S. Asaeman, Bibliotheca Oriontalis, vol. iii. p. 2, from the same and other Vatican MSS., but with an amended Latin version ; (3) by J. A. Asaman, Cod. Liturg. vol. xiii. ; (4) by G. F. Badger, The Nestorians and their Rilual,

I. Numes for Ordination.

The Greek and Latin words which were used to express either the whole or part of the series of processes which in English are commonly grouped together under the word ordination, sre so aumerous and so slgnificant as to throw considerable light upon the conception which was entertained as to the nature of the processes themsulves, It is therefure nccessary to tiest of them with some minuteness of detail. |l. Soms of them are words which were in ordiary use to denote civil elections or appointments; 1l. Others are ordinary words for promotion to dignity; ill. Others express only the fact thaz a person was ranked in the кл $\hat{\eta} \rho o s$ or ordo; iv. Others connote a special aacredness in the office itself, and the pertormance of sacred rites in admission to it.

1. Words denoting appointment or election: (1) Xeiporoveîv ( $\chi \in i p o r o y i a): ~ t h i s ~ w o r d ~$ is used (a) in the New Testament, Acts xiv.

 apostolic Greek, St. Iguat. ad Philad. c. 10 ; (c) in the Clementines, Clement. Epist. ad Jacob. c. $2 ;{ }_{2}(d)$ in the Apostolical Constitutions, e.g. 2, 2, 27 ; 7, 46 ; and the Apostolical Canons, e.g. 2,36 ; (e) in the Canon Law, e.g. Conc. Aucyr. A.d. 314, c. 13: Neocaes. A.d. 315 c. 3 : Nicaen. A.D. 325, c. 16, 19 : Antioch, A.D 341, c. 2 ; ( $f$ ) in the Civil Law, e. Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 42 (41), § 9 ; Novell. Juiviin. 6, c. 4. Its meaning was originally "to elect," but it came afterwards to mean, even in classical Greek, simply "to appoint to office," without itself indicating the particular mode of appointment (cf. Schömann, de Comitiis, p. 122). That the latter was its ordinary meaning in Helleuistic Greek, and consequently in the first nges of church history, is clear trom a large number of instances: e.g. in Josephus, Aut. 6, 13, 9, it is used of the appointment of David as king by God, id. 13, 2,2 , of the appointment of Jonathan as high priest by Alexaader: in Philo, 2, 76, it is used of the appointment of Joseph as governor by Pharaoh: in Lucian, de morte Peregrini, c. 41, of the appointment of ambassadors: in inscriptions, e.g. Le Bas et Waddington, No. 42 , of the appointment of municipal officers; and so also of civil appointments in ecelesitistical writers, e.g. in Sozomen, II. E. 7, 24, of the appoint ment of Arcadius as Augustus by Theodosins; in Isidore of Pelnsinm, Eipist. 2,264 , of the appointment of military officers. In later times a new connotation appeara, of which there is no early trace ; it was used of the atretching out of the bishop's hands in the rite of imposition of hands. But the 12 th century canonist who affirms this to be the contemporary meaning, admita also that the word was used in earlier times in reterence to election (Zonaras, ad Can. Apost. 1). About a century later the earlier meaning so completely passed away, that Balsamon in his commentary on the same pasaage of the Apostolical Canons, contradicts Zonaras by denying ito existence. (For the ultimate identification of $\chi \in i \rho o \tau o v e i ̃ \nu$ and $\chi \in i \rho \circ \theta \in \tau \in i \hat{y}$, see below.) (2), кa, $\boldsymbol{\theta} i \sigma \tau d \nu \in i \nu$ (kardaragis): this is the most common word. It is first found in Clem. R. 1, 42 (of the eis $2 \pi \iota \sigma \kappa \delta \pi$ ous кal 8 ., and it is afterwords found in all classes of ecclesiastical literature: e.g. Clement. It is the ordinary classical and Ilellenlstic word for appointment, without any religions or ecclesiasticell connotation. (3), Lucian, Toxir. c. 10 ; and this is nometimes its meaning in ecclesianticnl Greck: but its more usual meaning in ecclesinstical Greek is "to propose a nume for election," as is clearly shewn, e.f. by Socrat. H.E. 1, 9 : $\boldsymbol{\pi}$ poxel-

Valois to Euseb. Vit. Constant. iii. c. 62, and of Hase to Leo Dinconus, Hist. vi. 6. An instance of its use in this sense in secular Greek occurs ir an inseription at Corycus in Cilicia, ap. Le Bas et Waddington, No. 1421. (4) $\pi \rho o \beta d \lambda$ $\lambda \in \sigma \theta$ al: e.g. Conc. Chalc. c. 2 ; Soernt. H. Tib. c. 65, equivalent to кaөıoтd́veiv, and equally colourless in its meaning: but co-ordinated with eligere in S . Hieron. Dial. c. Lucif. c. 9.

(5) ardinare (ordinatio): found in almost all writers from Tertullinn onwards: e. g. Tertull. de Praeser. Haeret. c. 41 ; Clement. Recogn. 3, 65 ; 6, 15 ; S. Cypr. Epist. 33 ; 68, 3 ; S. Ambros. Epist. 63, 65 ; Conc. Illib. A.D. 305, c. 30 ; 1 Arelat. A.D. 314 , c. 2; 1 ('arth. c. 8; 1 Tolet. c. 2; and the Civil Law, passin. The enrlier classical meaning of the word had already been narrowed in its civil use, from administration in general to the appointment of magistratea: e. a. Suet. Dom. c. 4; lespus. c. 23 ; sn, hs late as Carolingian times, e. $g$. in the Copit. Lnngobsrd. A.D. 782, §2, ap. Pertz, Legum, vol. i. p. 42. The secular use which comes nearest its ecclesiastical use is in the nrmy, where "ordinati" = "qui ordinem adepti sunt, id est, centuriones facti" (Corpus Inscr. Lat. ed. Mommsen, vol. iii. no. 8:30). It was used of the appointment, not only of clergy, but also of monks and abbats; e. $g$. I'venit, Theod. 2, 3, 3, iu Haddan and Stubbs, Councile, &c., vol. iji.
iv. Words denoting admission to office, and especially to snacred office. (1) $\chi \in 1$ pofereiy ( $\chi \in i p o \theta \in \sigma^{\prime} a$ ) : first found in Clom. Alex. Pued. 1, 5, p. 104, ed. Pott ; and Origen in Matth. vol. iifi, p. 660, ed. Delarue, of Christ putting His hands on the young children: so, also, in a general sense, in Doctrin. Orient. c. 32, np. Clem. Alex. ed. Pott, p. 964 . Its earliest uses in reference to the clergy are probably Conc. Neocass, c. 9 , Nicren. c. $8,19,1$ Antioch. c. 17 , Const, Apost. 2, 32 ; frequently afterwnrds. But it is difficult to determino accurately the time at which $\chi \in i \rho o \theta \in \tau \in i \sigma \theta a l$ came into general use in reference to ordination, berause the taxts of the MSS., especially of writers med councils of the 4th century, vary so much between $\chi$ eipotevia and $\chi \in i p \circ \theta \in \sigma$ ia as to make the determination of the reading, in the preseut state of eriticism as applied to patristic Greok, a matter of grent uncertainty. Instances of such variations will be found in the MSS. of Conc. Antioch. c. 21 ; St. Basil, Epist 217 (3) ad Lmphilo h. c. si, p. 325 ; Conc. Chalc. c. 15 . No doubt, after $\chi$ etpo$\theta \in \sigma l a$ was once introduced, $\chi$ モiporovia tended to be identified with it, as is clear from 8 com . parison of Isidore of Pelusium, E'pist. 1, 26 with id. Ejist. 2, 71, where the two words are used interchangesbly of the same person in refereace to the same thing. That the earlior meaning of $\chi$ eipotovia still survived, is clenr from its use a few jears afterwards in Theodoret ; e. g. Qurest. in 3 Reg. c. 8 , int. 27 , of God's appointment ot Solomod ; id. in Epist. ad Rom. c. 4, v. 17, of the appointment of Abraham as $\pi \alpha \tau \epsilon ́ \rho a ~ \pi a ́ v \tau a v ; ~$ but that the original distinction between the words was afterwards completely lost, is shewa by the somewhat clunsy attempt of Symeon of Thessnlonica to invent n new one (de Sucr. Ontin. c. $156, \mathrm{p} .138$ ). It need hardly be pointed out that the identification of the two words is of great significance in regard to the history of the corception of ordination. (2) iepâo $\theta a i$ (Sozom, HI. E. 1, 23), or iepov̂otai, whence the desigastion of those who are in major orders as of iepwhévol (sometimes written ieṕć $\mu \in \nu 0 t$ ); e. g. Justin. Nov. S, 2, 1 ; Socrat. H. E. 1, 11. The use of the word in the sense "to be ordaned," as well as in its classical sense, "to serve as a priest," is made certain by its use in the setive in an inscription sp. Kichter, Giriech. u. Lat. Inschriften, ed. Francke, p. 134, cf. ib, p. 138.
(3) consecrari (consecrstio): S. Ambros. Epist $63, \$ 59$, vol. ii. p. 1037, of Anron and Eleazar, probably as a translation of á $\gamma$ ád $\oint \in \nu$; of Christian bishops, preshyters, and deacons, S. Leon. Mngn. (4) benedici (benedictio): leritica, Couc. Araus، A D, 41, c. 23 ; 5 Conc. Aurel. A.d. 549, c. 6; Conc. Autissiod. A.d. 578, c. 20, 2 Conc. Csesarangust. ## 11. Nature of Ordination.

It is evident, from the foregoing enumeration of facts, that most of the phrases which were in use in the earlier period to denote appointment to office in the church, were also in use to denots appointment to office, or promotion to digaity, in the empire. It may rensonably be inferred that they had in the former case meanings snalogous to those which they had in the latter; and since the evidence which exists in regard to the former ia nbundant, whereas that which exists in regard to the latter is scanty, the one may fairly be used to throw light upon the other. In the absence of any convenient manal to which reference could be made, it ia necessary to mention here the leading facts which have been established in regard to it.

1. The most common mode of appointment to office in the enrlier cmpire, as onder the republic, was that of popular election. The form of sueh so election was preserved long nfter the substance had disappeared; and it was preserved in the provinces after it had practically censed to exist st liome. In the case of two provincial towns of Baetica, Salpensa and Malnca, bronze tablets containing the original regulations for election have been preaerved. They are especislly important in relation to the present aubject, as shewing (1) the conditions which were imposed as to the eligibility of candidates, (2) the inportance of the presiling officer. That officer hal the function of examining the candidstas in set form, before votea were recorded; hecould refuse to take account of votes which; were given for a candidate who did not satisfy him: he could, in default of other candidntea, himself nominate candidates, and declare them to be daly elected: and, as at Rome, the election ans only complete when he formally amnounced it (renunciarit). Hence, an officer who was rolly elected by popular vote was technically sid to be made (crentus) by the presiding officer. (See on the whole subject, Mommsen, Die Stadtrocite der litimischen Gemeinden Salpensa und Mulact, Leipzig, 18.55, and also in the Abhandlun en der König. Süchs. Gescllsch. der Wissensch. H. 3; Mrrquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, bi. $1, \mathrm{pp}$. 464-474, where references will be fond to a large number of other authorities.)
2. Grailually free election by the people, subject only to the veto of the presiding officer in the case of legal ineligibility on the part of a candidste, was superseded by election by the senate, aubject only to a formal approval on the part of the people. This became the case at Rome 80 earrly as the time of Tiberius (Tacit. Ann.i. 15), and by the 4 th century had become the prevailing, though not the universal, rule throughout the empire (Ulpian. Dij, 4, 1, 3, 4; Cod. Theodos. 11, 30, 53: 12, 6, 20; Cod, Jus', 7, 62, 2: 10, 31, 46, make popular election invalid; but from Cod. Thood, 12, 5, 1 it mang be gathered that popular election was atill the rule in Afriea, since the magistrates are cautioned to procure the election of suitable pcrsons: this to procure the election of suitable persona: this is ateo to be inferred from henier, inscriptions dillerie, no. 4070 , where a menier, inscriptions ppecilly mentions his election by the Ordo, as thongh it were exceptional). The continuance of the formal appeal to the people is shewn ao late as the end of the 3rd century, in the account of the election of the emperor Tasitus (Vopisc. réit. ${ }^{2}$ ). Of course onder the imperial regime the part which the eenate played in the netual aelection of candidntes tended to become no more free than the part of the people; but the importaut fact is that the form of election by the senate remained until late times, and that even after the disintegration or the empire the grenter civil appointmenta were made, not directly by constitutive nomination, but indirectly through the form of "commendatio" (ef. the letters of Theodoric to the senate, ap. Cassiodor. Variur, e.g. lib. 5, Epp. 22, 41).
3. From the earlieat times the ehief officers of state bad possessed and exercised the right, which must be carefully distinguished from the right of commen latio, of nominating certain of their subordinates without the neeessity of even a furmal snbmission of the names to either the senate or the peopie. The right had been jealonsly guarded, and in some cases restricted, but it had never passed away, and the emperors were able to make, especially in the provinces, a large number of direct appointments without violating any constitutional forms. it is recorded among the many virtues of Alexauder Severus that he voluntarily limited his own privilege in this respect by consulting the peuple hefore making any important provincial appointment, "hortnns populum ut ai quis quid haberet criminis probaret manifestis rebua;" and it is interesting to note that, although himself a heathen, he adduces us a renson for the course which he pursued the example of appointments in the Christian chareh (Lamprid. Alex. Sever: f. 45 . On the geveral question of appointment by superior othicers, see Mommaen, Römisches Stratsrecht, bd. i. pp. 181-192, bd. ii. pp. 860-

The facts which exist in reference to early eeclesiastical appointments corruborate in a atriking manner the general presumption that, ainee the same words were used for them as for civil appointmenta, the same modes of appointment prevailed.

1. Of the exiatence of appointment by popular election aome proofa bave been given elsewhere. [Bishop, Vol. I. p. 213 ; Eleciton, p. 599.] But as in the Ruman municipalities, so also in the Christian churches, popuiur election, though a condition of appointment, did not of itself constitute appointment. Just as a civil appointment was not valid until the officer who presided at the election hal accepted and declared it, so it was alao in the case of ecclesiastical appointmenta. "The seven" were chosen by the church, but they were appointed by the apoatles ; the word used of the former is
 vi. 3, 5). This distinction, which has been often ignored, ia of great aignificance. Nor is it the only point of analogy between civil and ecclesiastical elections. Just aa, on the one hand, popnlar electiona were not conatitutive, 80 , on the other hand, they were not absolutely free. Checks of two hinds existed-(1) conditions were imposed on the eligibility of candidates, and meana were taken to ascertain that these conditions were complied with ; (2) the approval of other persons or bodies was required to make the election valld. The operation of the former of theas checks resolted in the gradual establishment of a complicated series of qualifications, and of a sjstem of examination, with a view to test, qualifications. [Orders, Holy : iv. Qtuali' tions for: Eximination for.] The operation of the second check was shewn in the gradual narrowing of the function of the laity from election to express 0 . tacit approval. Just as in the empire, the senate at Rome, or the curin in a municipality, came to intertere in popular elections, and ultimately to render them nugatory; so puri pussu in the church, appointment by el "tion passed into appointment by cuonptation, and ultimately into appointment by nomination of either the bishep or the civil power.

2. The second mole of appointment which existed in the empire thus tended to become the prevailing mode in the chureh. It had no doubt existed in the earliest times, for Clement of Rome spenks of the successors of the apostles as having been appointed by other distinguished men with the consent of the whole church ( $\dot{v} \phi^{\prime}$ екклךбias $\pi \alpha \sigma \eta s$, Epist. 1 ad (Cor. c. 44); but its employment seems to have been local and limited. The function which Cyprian assigns to the African and Spanish clergy in eecleainstical appointments, is that of consenting or giving testimony, not that of nominating or appointing (cf. esperially Epist. 68, 3, i. p. 10)26, which ia important because it expressly rpplies to the appointinent of deacons as well as of bishops) ; and it is clear from the ease of Cornelius that this was the case also at Rome (id. Epist. 10, i. p. 770). But in the 4th centur. it is clear from the synodical letter of the council of Nicaea to the church of Alexandria, that in that church the right of the people to elect was limited by the punishes the Melitian clergy (who had supported Arius) by depriving them of thet ;ht, but allows them to succeed to the vac cies caused by death among the orthodox clerg provided that they are found worthy, that the people elect them, and that the bishop of Alex. andria votes for them and confirms the election (Socrat. H. E. 1, 9 ; Sozom. H. E. 1, 24). It was probably this right of proposing names for election which in the case of the clergy of the Christian churcizes, as beyond question in the case of the Roman municipalitiea, reaulted in the virtual election by the clergy, subject only to approval, by acclamation or by silence, on the part of the people. The fourth canon of the same council has sametimes been interpreted as being a formal subatitution of co-optation for popular election in the case of bishopa (cf. Hefele, Cuuncils, E. T. vol. i. p. 384 ; Van Espen, Jus Eccles. p. 1 tit. 13, n. 10); and in the courae of the next quarter of a century the council of Laodicaes (c. 13) expressly enacted that the elections of those who are to be appointed to the priesthood (by which Zonarss and Balsamon underatand the presbyternte, Aristenus the episcopate) are not to be entrusted to popular assemblies (70îs $\gamma_{\chi \lambda 10 i s) \text {. At the beginning of the following }}$ century, Theophilus of Alexandian gives the election to the clergy ( $\pi a \hat{\nu}$ rod lepareiov), the approval of the candidntes ( $\delta 0 \kappa \iota \mu d \delta \in t v$ ) and their forinal appointment ( $\chi \in i \rho o \tau o v e i v$ ) to the hishop. The part of the people consists, as in later times, only in their bearing public testimony at the time of appointment ( S . Theophil. Alexandr. can. 6; Nigne, P. G. vol. Ixv. 40). The existence of this mole of election at the tirie, probably somewhet later, when the eighth book of the Apustolical Constitutions was written, in clear from the mention of a presbyter as having been advanced to his rank "by the vote and decision ( $\psi \prime, \phi \psi$ ка! к $\kappa / \sigma \in 1$ ) of the whole clerue" (Const. Apost. viii. 15 ; ef. the expression in the same book, c. 4, "nominated and approved,"

3. The third mode of appoint ment which ei isted in the empire existed riso In the church, but to a more limited extent. Some officers were appointed by the mere nomination of a superior officer. An archileacon was appointed by bishop, a singer by a presbyter. But the num. ber ot such officers was small; the original de. mocratical constitution of the church shewed itself in the jealous limitation of such appointments. In all but a few cases the nominations were in the form of a "eommendntio;" they were aubject to the approval of either the clergy or the people, or both. And just as uoder i.. - . e, this form of numination was frequalio in the form of a letter or a speech, setting forth the virtues of the person to be appointed, so it was also in the church. An interesting example of such a speech is that which Sidoaius A pollinaris mode at the election of a bishop of Bourges, and which he has himself recorded. It concludes by giving the form of nomination: "In nomine Patria et Filii et Spiritus Sancti Simplicius est quem provinciae nostrae metropolitanum civltatis vestrae summum sscer dotem fieri debere pron'untio," and by asking the people to signity their assent. (Sidon. Apollid. Epist. 7. 9, p. 190.)

As the organisation of the Roman empire became gradually weaker, while that of the church grew atronger and more centralized; as the power nal importance of the episcopate in. creased and that of the presbyterate dimiuished and as, moreover, a new group of ileas clustered round the primitive conception of the clerical office, the whole system of sppointments tooffice underwent significant modifications. But io the sltered types whieh tended to prevail io the East and West respeetively, the old elements were still present, though in varying degrees and these elements have been 50 thr ignored and overlald in subsequent times, that it is important to shaw in detail the extent to which they once existed.

cised on the one hand the right of presenting persons for appointment, on the other the right of rete. Both these rights are survivals of the older right of election by direct vote. That older right wns gradually limited aud nullified by the operation of a regulation which had been introduced as a safeguard. In the course of the 4 th century it had become the rule that no ecelesinstical election was valid unless the bishop or bishops had voted with the mnjority.* In the election of a bishop the votes of at least three nelghbouring bishops were required; in the alection of a preslyyte; the vote of the bishop of the ehurel in which the election took place was sufficient. (That this is the true interpretation of the seeond npostolical canen is admitted by both Zonsras nad Aristenus, who explain xetporoveiv by $\psi \eta \phi(\S \in i v . ~ B a l s a m o n ' s ~ v l e w, ~ w h i c h ~ i s ~ b a s e d ~$ on the later practice, is contradicted not only by historical thets, but by his own interpretation of Conc. Laod. c. 13, which he makes to refer to presbyters as well as to $\}$ shops.) It is easy to see how this regulation opernted in ceurse of time to throw the election practienlly into the hads of the bishops; the bishops came thus to fulfil a double function, they both elected, aubject, as will be shewn below, to testimony aud to vete, and admitted to office. But it is important to note that between these two functions there was a recognised difference. In two of the aldest Westeru ordinals the election, as represented by the summons to objectors to come furward, and the "advocatio" or call to office, take place on Wednesday and Friday, the imposition of hands and the benediction take place on the following Snturdny. (Hittorp, Ord. Rem. i. p. 88; Mabillon, Ord. Rom. ix. p. 90.) In later ordinals the separate elements are combined in a single service; but even in them there is a clear distinction between the declaration of election ("eligimus" \&c., see below) and the subsequent " benedictio" or " consecratio."
But since election, except in the case of bishops (for which see Brsirop, Vol. I. pp. 213, aqq.), became in later times a mere form, it will be advisable here to shew briefly the extent to which it existed. For this purpose we shall tnke the unimpeachable testimony of the ordinals of both the Eastern and Western churches, in preference to collecting historical examples, or citing more or less rheterical passages from ecclesiastical writers.
(a) Election of Presbyters,-In almost all Western ordinals the bishop begins the office for ths ordinntion of presbyters by announcing the fact of their election to the people: "By the help of onr Lord God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ, we elect $N$. to the order of the presbyterate. .. "" (Cod. Vat. ap. Murat. vol. lii. p. 31 ; Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Suession. S. Elig. Bece. Corb. 4. ; Hittorp, Ord. Rom. Vet. ii. p. 91 ; Catalani, Ord. ii. $)^{\text {b }}$ That this formula was regsrded, even until compara-

[^84]tively recent times, as the declarntion of an actual election, is shewn by the fact, that when a presbyter was appointed by the pope's mandate it was omitted. (Caeremomiale Ambrosianum, published by order of S. Carlo Borromen, p. 69, ed. Nilan, 1619.) The Inter English ordianls are more explicit than other Western ordinala in recognising the two fnctors of the elecioral body, "electi sunt a nobis et clericis huic sanctas sedi famulantibus" (Sarum, Exeler, and Winchester ordinals in Maskell, Mon. Rit. mol. iii. ple 155, 160); and this explicit recoguition is preserved in the modern Roman pontifical, where the bishop nddresses the presbyters-elect as "ques ad nostrum adjutorium fratrum nostrorum arbitrium consecrandos elegit" (Pontif. Rom. p. 1 , tit. 12, §5). No doubt election became a fiction; how or when it began to become so is uncertain. Hiatorical references to it occasionally appenr in comparatively late writers, e.g. Venantius Fortunatus (?) in the Lite of Medard of Noyon (c. 3, Migne, P. L. vol. Ixxxviii. p. 536) anys "presbyterii officium electus excepit, proo batus ohtinuit," and it is clear that it wns the rule at the time when the Liber Diurnus was compiled, inasmuch as that book contains a formula for a papa] precept refuiring a bishop to proceed to the ordinntion of a presbyter without electiou (" sine auffragatione;" Lib. Diurn. Rom. l'ontif. c. 5, tit. 1, ed. Garnier, p. 91). In the subaequent address to the people, asking fer their prayers, the election is attributed to the grace of Ged, the assumption being made, as e.g. in Acts $\mathbf{i} .24,26$, that election is an indiention not 90 much of human choice as of the divine will; 80 Sacrnm. Leon. Pontif. Eegb.; Catalani, Ord. i. In the later Eastern ordioals this is almost the only trace of election which has survived; e.g. in the Marovite ordinal, according to Asseman and Renaudot, ap. Denzinger ii. p. 151 ; in the Nestorian, according to both Asseman and Badger, ap. Denzinger, 1i. p. 236, 267 ; in the Coptic, according to Kircher and Vansleb (but not according to Asseman) ap. Dézzinger ii. p. 12. But that this is only part of the earlier Eastern practice is shewn by the fact that the eighth book of the Apostolical Censtitutions (c. 15), which is peculiarly Eastern in its character, speaks of a presbyter, in the formula for bis ordination, as having been elected by the vute of the whole clergy.
(b) Election of Deacons. In the earliest ordinnl of the Gregorian type, the Missale Francorum, the deacons are expressly stated to be elected hy the clergy, and the assent of the people is requested. The election is claimed as a special privilege of the "sacerdotes," ut the bishop desires to know whether the peop, judge the ordinand to be worthy: "et si vestra antul meam concordat electio, teatimonium quod vultis vocibus adprobate." After the prayer whic: fullows, the bishop adds "commune votum [the word in its mediacval aense is equivalent to the Greek $\psi \hat{\eta} \phi 0$ s, the English 'vote;' see Ducange, s.v.] communis prosequatur oratio." In almost all the later western ordinals, the bishop begins the office for the ordination of deacons with the same formult, mutatis mutandis, as in the case of presbyters, declaring their election; so e.g. Cod. Vat. ap. Muraturi, Pontit. S. Dunst. Noviom. Cat uric. Suession. Becc. S. Elig. Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii. p. 91 ; so also in the modern Pontif. Kom. p. i. tit. ii. \& 3.

ORDINATION

And although in that decluration of election the co-operation of the church is not expressly mer tioned, it is clearly impled in the formula which follows it, as it follows the corresponding leclarntion in the Missule Francorum, "comnazine cotum communis oratio prosequatur" (so Coi. Maff., Pont. Eegb. S. Dunst. Novion. Caturic. Suession. Becc. Mogunt. Corb. i., Hittorp Ord. Nom. li.; Catalani, Ord, ii, iii. and in the modern Pontif. Rom. p. i. tit, ii. § 5).
(c: Election of Subdeacons. It is not certain whether diring the first nine centuries subdeacons were elected in the same way an preslyyters and deacons, or whether they were, as sulor linate oflicers of the church, nppointed by the bishop. The doubt is chiefly caused by the variety of reading in the enrliest Western ordinals in the general formula of declaration of election which has been already mentioned. Some of them insert the word "subdisconii," others omit it. The intertion of the word can be easily accounted for, at the period to which most of the ordiouts belont, by the struggle of the subdiaconate is be ratis 1 mong majer orders; the omission is ditlieuts the explain if gubdeacons, like deacons and presbyter', had been elected from the begi:n, It way be added that the modem lionan. Purtifienl speaks of them in the litany which precedes this ordination as "electos" (p. i. tit. 1v, $7).
(d) Election of Fieaders. The most remarkable example of the conservation of the primitive practice of election is in the case of readers. All the ancient Western ordinals mention it, and almost all refer the election, not to the bishop, but to the "fratres," i.e. probably to the body of the clergy, "eligunt te fratres tui ut sis lector in domo Dei tui," so Mise. Frnncorum, Sacram. Gelas. c. 96 , Cod. Vat. ap. Murat. Cod. Maff. Pontif. Eegb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Bisunt. Becc. Mor at.; English ordinals np. Maskell; Catalani, ( $\omega$, i. (corrupted to "diligunt" in id. Ord. ii. iii.) Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii. p. 89 (so also the Cambray Pontifical and one Noyon Pontifical) has "elegerunt," which is important as making it cleur that the bishop's office was rather miniaterial than co-operative.
ii. There was always the testimony of the chuich to the fitneas of the candidate. It was necessary to have, not merely "suffragin," but "testimonia." This had been insisted upon from the emrliest times. The pastoral Epistles require a biahop to have "a good report of them which are without" (1 Tim. iii. 7; see S. Chrysoat. ad loc.) Cyprian speaks of Cornelius as having been made bishop "de elericorum paene omnium testimonio," as well as "de plebe quae tunc adfuit suffragio" (S. Cypr. Epist. 10. i. p. 770); and he apologises for having ordnined Aureliua as a reader in his retirement on the ground of exceptional merit, "exspectanda non sunt testimonia humana cum praecedunt divina suffragia" (id. Epist. 33. ii. p. 320). The eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions enacts, that after a person has been elected bishor, nod presented for ordination, and formally idrotilis as being the person elected, the further : $\sim=\frac{n}{}$ must be put, " whether he is attested $b, b$ $\qquad$ s being worthy" (Cons'. Apost. 8, 4). So slso Leo the Great lays down the rule, "exspectarentur certe vota civium, teatimonia populorum; quareretur honoratorum arbitriuna, electio clericurum" (S. Leon. Magn.

Epist. 10. ad Episc. per prov. IVenn. I. p. 637, cf. iud. p. 639). An I it was one of the accust. tions against Chrysostom nt the synol uit the Onl:, that he had ordaine! persons "without tist1-

The ordinals continued the prianitive requirement, and through them it has descented to modern times. It is almost alvirs twofold, being a requirement of the separate testimony of the clargy and of the peopie ; and since each of these requernents had ita own form, it will be convenjent to describe them separattly,
(a) Teatimony of the Cifrg\%.-The Greek ordinal is ay larently the only one which has reserved the $\mu$ rimitive custom on ashing for the viva rose testimeny of the assemblet cierg., The Western orllinals new frame! in their present form after the archdeacon hat secome the officer who stood st the head of tie clergy and next to the bishop. Consequently the voice of the clergy is expressed through the archdeacon. When he comes forward in the name of the church (" poatulat sancta mater ecclesia Catholica ut hunc praesenten [subdiaconum] ad onus [diaconii] ordinetis "), the bishop asks "scisne illum dignum ease?" to which the archdeacon replies, "quantum humana fragilitas noase sinit, et acio et testificor ipsum dignom ease ad hujua onus oflicii." this is the formula (1) in the case of presbyters and deacons (Cod. Maff, ap. Murat. vol. iii. p. 62 ; Pontif. S. Dunst, Corb. i. Mogunt.; English ordinala ap. Maskell; Catalani, Ord. ii. iii. nnd in the modern Romsn lontifical, p. 1. tit. 12, § 3): but in Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii. p. 93, the enquiry is male of the presbyters who present the candidate. (2) ln the case of subdeacons the correspouding formuls does not appear in the existing ordinals (unless it be implied in the general formula which is given in Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii. p. 88), and its disappearance tends to confirm the doubt which has been expressed above, whether subdeacons were elected by the church and not rather appointed by the bishop, (3) In the case of readers and other minor orders, llittorp's Ordo Romanus, ii. p. 88, preserves a formula which reaembles that of the modern English ordinal: the bishop says, " vide ut naturs, scientia, et moribus tales per te introducantur, immo per nos tales in domo Domini ordinentur personse per quas diabolus pellatur et clerus Domino nostro multiplicetur."

Inlater timea the testimony of the clergy, signified through the archdeacon, had to be supple. mented by the teatimony of the parish priest and the schoolmaater of the candidate. The former was aufficient as long as the persons to be appointed were members of the churct if the city in which the ordination took place, $\quad, \quad$ been trained under the eye of the archde.. he diaconium. (b) Testimony of the Laity.-The Western ordiasla agree in requiring the testimony of the laity ts the fitness of anyone who is appointed presbyter $v$ aldacon. The primitive rule seema to have been a) consult the laity three days before the monintment was consummated by admission to 2tiry; so Mabillon, Ordo ix. ap. Mus. Ital. vol. 4. f. 90 ; Hittorp, Ord. Rom. i. p. 88. But the Ister, and perhaps also occasionally the earlier, practice was to require the testimony to be given at the time of admission. The testimony whis sometimes positive and sometimes negative. Iu th. earliest of the later ordinala, the Missale Prascorun (so Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii.) the bishop chsry's the people not to be silent, but to say ogenly what they think ahout the actions, character, and merits of those who are to be adamed presbyters, and requires them "electionem vestram publica voce profiteri." (It is remarkable that the same formula, with but slight changes of phrase, is preserved in the modera Romnn pontifical, p. 1, tit. 12, § 4.) Nor does he proceed with the ordination until the testimony has heen given: (it may be infierred from the analogous form at the ordination of bishops that the answer was expressed by "Dignus "). But the majority of ordinals require only negative testimony: they prescribs thst an appeal shall be made to the people at the time of the declaration of election, and in contisuation of the formula " By the help of our Lond God.
" (see above, under "Election of Presbyters.") "If anyone has anything against these men, let him in God's name, and for God's sake, come forth with boldness and say it." This is the prescribed form in the case of presbyters and deacons, in Cod. Vat. ap. Murat. ; Pontit. Ecgb. St. Dunst. Noriom. Caturic. Suession, Becc. Mogunt.; Catalani, Ord. ii. iii., English orlinuls ap. Maskell. In the case of readers, whose office, as being in primitive times the first step above the laity, had to be guarded with special care, the ordinals enact that the bishop is to sddress the people, "setting forth their faith sad life;" so Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Col. Maff, Pontif. Ecgb. Rem. Rodrad., Cstalsai, Ord. ii.
In later times it became a rnle of the Western church that this testimony of the people should be ssked for, not only at the time, and in the church of ordination, but also in the church in which the ordained resided, and that the parish priest should testify to having so askel for it. But the rule was not embodied in $s$ canon eurlier than the council of Trent, sess. 23 c. 5 , and the tourth (provincial) council of Dilan under St. Carlo Borromeo.
iii. There was also a declaration of appointment, corresponding to the civil renunciatio. In the Western church this was almost the only relic of the primitive election, and the form of declarstion has been given above as an indication of the existence of election. But all the Eastern chnrches ngrea in giving considerable prominence to this element in ordination. 1. They all have a formula corresponding to the western formuls, "By the help of our Lord God . . "but different in its form, inasmuch CHRIST. ANT.-YOL. II.
as what in the one is regarded as the act of the church, is in the other ragarded as the act cf

 $\nu 0 \nu]$ eis $\pi \rho \in \pi \beta$ útepov. The primitive character of this formula is proved by its being found, with unimportant variations, not only in all MSS. of the Greek ordinals, but also in all Oriental ordinals, for both presbyters and deacons. 2. All except the Greek ordinals have a much more elaborate formula, by which not only the appointment but also the admission of the newly orlained person is said to be complete. The Coptic formula in the ordination of a presbyter may be taken as typical. The bishop snys, "We call thee into the holy church of God;" the archdeacon thereupon makes proclamation, "N. presbyter at the holy oltar of the holy catholic and apostolic church of God of the Christian city M.;" the bishop confirma the archdeacon's words: "We call thee, N., presbyter of the aforesaid boly altar, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." This is, with unimportant variations, the formula for both presbyters and deacons, among Copts, Jacobites, Maronites, and Nestorians, (for the rituals in detail, see Denzinger, vol. ii. pp. 9, 13, 67, 71, 73, 86, 91, 127, 232). It is remarkable that the Greek ordmals preserve no trace of it; but it is important to note, that a trace of it exista in Hittorp, Ord. Rom. i., Mabillon, Ord. Rom. ix., where, after describing the consultation of the laity three days before final admission to olfice, it is snid that the ordinands are called up, from the lower level of the laity to the raised floor of the sanctuary ("advocantur sursum et statuuntur in siuistra parte altaris, usque dnm pontifer missam compleat").

What, if any thing, besides this public declaration of sppointment, was necessary in the earliest period to constitute the person appointed a charch officer, is not always clear. Under the civil regime, which was reflected in so many ways upon the ecclesiastical organization, renuncirtio was followed, either immediately or after a defined interval, by performance of the duties of the office. A Roman consul design tus dressed himselfin his official dress, went in state to the Capitol, took his seat on the curula chair, and held a formal meeting of the sennte; by doing this he became consul de facto; the whole process was a usurpatio juris; the ceremonies and forms with which it was accompanied were no more of the easence of the process than were its accompanying festivities of the essence of a Roman consensual marriage (Monmsen, Römisches Stuatsrecht, Bd. i. p. 503). In a similarway in the early church the declaration of appointment to olfice was followed by the public performance of the duties of that offic Even to the present day, in the chief Wester. Atuals the newly-ordained dencon performs the deacon's. function of reading the Gospel; in the lioman ritual the presbyter not only takes his plare in the presbytery, but ls "concelebrant" with the bishop, i.e., he is associated with him in the celebration of the encharist: in the Greek ritual, the reader performs his proper function of reading, and the subdeacon, who in early times was a kind of under-servant, washea tha bishop's hands. But between the renunci,tio and this first public performance of luties, certain ceremonies came to intervene. To these ceremonies the canonists anil theologians of the midule ages attached great impurtance, and the canonista and theologians of later times have for the most part assume i them to be essentinl. But in the period with which the present work mainly deals, they held a very diflerent place from that which has since been assigned to them.

III. Rites of Ordination.

The ceremonies which were interposed hetween appointment to ollice and the usurputio juris, or publio entrance ujun otlice, were mainly of two kinls-(a) prayer, accompanied in most rases by imposition of han le; (b), the formal delivery of the insignia and instruments of otlice. (a) lt was both natural and fitting that any appointment should be nccompanied by prayer, and prayer accordingly is found to nccompany almost all appointments from the carliest beginning of peclesiastical records. The signiticance of the rite is clearly expresaed by St. Augustine: "quid aliud est manuum impositio quam oratio oper hominem" (de bapt. c: Donat. 3, 16); and even the ultra-mysticism of Dionysius Areopagita finds no other meaning in it than that of fatherly oheltering and subjection to God (Dc Eccles. Hier. 5, 3, 3). But there had bean from the first a connexion between the inposition of hands and the xapifuara, or " apiritual gifts;" and under the influcnce of the sacerdotal ileas of the 4 th century this connexion became so strong that Basil, speaking of some schismatics, Amphiloch. 188 (canonica i.) vol. iv. p. 270). This led to a restriction of the rite of imposition of hands to the higher orders of clergy. It censed to be part of the ceremony of ndmitting deaconesses (hence the grent variety of interpretations of Cunc. Nicaen, c. 19 ; ef. Van kspen and Hefele, ad luc.), or subdeacons (excepit rmong the Armeuians), or readers (except among the Nestorians). And at last, in the 12 th century, the theory of the connexion of the rite with the gift of the Holy Ghost was so firmly impressed upon Western Christendom, that aome ordinals put iuto the bishop's mouth at the time of imposition the words which have been retained in the English ordinal, "Receive the Holy Ghost;" (see below in the acconnt of the ritual of the ordination of a presbyter ; for a long series of patristic references see Morin, pars iii. p. 141).

(b) The history of the rites of delivering to the persons ordained the insignia and instruments of their office is less clear, but their origin is obvious. 1. The ceremony of admission to office was followed by the performance of the duties of the office. It was natural that the presiding officer should formally deliver to the newly ordained person the lnstrumenta [p. 862] of such a performance. A reader had to read: the book was delivered to him, and he read. A subdeacon had to wash the bishop's handa: a pitcher and towel were delivered to him. A deacon had, in southern countries, to drive away insects from the oblations upon the altar: a fan was delivered to him. [Flabiclocs.] The delivery of the eucharjatic ressels to a presbyter is probady of late date; it is not found in the olldest Western ordinals (see below, Ordination if I'restytirs, §12); and it was prohally limited in the first instance to the eases in which a prosbyter was ordainel, not to preshy terial rank in the cathedrul, but to take charge of an outlying whurch; it was thus part of the ceremonies not so much. of orilimation as of Institution or ibluestion, leat it must he noted, that almost ail writers on the subject call attention to the much smaller at resa which was laid upon these rites in the East than in the West. In the latter the opinion came to prevail in the schools, that the physical contact of the instruments by the orilinan'l was of the essence of the sacrament (S. Thom, Aq. Summa, pars lii. qu. 34, urt. 5); whereus in the former ( 1 ) the instruments were deliveret nfter the ordination was finished, (b) no formula of delivery was prescribed (sce Catnlani, wil Pontif. Rom. p. i. tit. 5, & 3 ; Morin, de siter. Ordia. pars iii. exerc. ii.). 2. The delivery of vestments is sometimes traced back historically to the time of Gregory Nazianzen, who says that when ordained bishop he was rested by his Orat. x. in sctpaum, vol. i. p. 241). lut the extreme scantiness of subsequent nllusiens to such a rite, and the absence of any mention of it, not only in the Apostolical Constitutions, but also in Dionysius Areopagits, tend to shew that, even if it existed, little stress was laid upon it. Ita signifieance was originally the same as that of the vesting of one who was newly baptizel. Nor was it the only point of close analogy betueen the ceremonies of baptism and thase of oriia. tion. The vesting in restments, which became so important a part of the ordination ceremony in both East and West, and of which the details will be found below, is apparently of mach later origin. The firat certain mention of it is in 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 28, and it is nbsent from several of the most ancient Western ordinals. It grew up with the growth of s distinction between clerical and lay deess; its use can be traced in several instances to the influence of the regular upon the secular clergy ; snd its significance was determined by the mystical inleas which gradually attached themselves to the vestments which were worn at the celebration of the eucharist.

We now proceed to give an outline of the riturl which was observed in both the election on appointment and the almission of the several orders below the oriler of bishop [for which see vol. i. p. 221 ]. It has been necessary to append ia the case of the Western rituals, the precise evjdence which exists for the antiquity of the several rites: for in no department of Christian satiquities has there been a stronger tendency to assume that rites which prevailed in the 13th century prevailed also in the 8th, and that rites which prevailed in the 8 th century are part of primitive Christianity. In the cass of the Eastern rituals, references only are given to the authoritics in which they will be found, becane in the present state of knowledge on the $\mathrm{ar}^{2}$ ject it is impossible to determine with even .... xi. mate accuracy which of the several rites aro ancient, and which are of later giowth.

(In addition to this form, the pontificals of Ecgbert and St. Dunstan insert the words "sive psalmistarum " in the preface to the benediction of a reader, from which it may, perhaps, be inferred that when a singer was ordained by a bishop, the sarre form wad used as for a reader, as was the case in the Greek church.)

The ancient ritual given by Mabillon directa that the person to he ordained ahail bo brought furwarid (appreatly vested in a chasuhle) and that he shill sweas on the Holy Guspels that he is ant guilty of any of the four classea of caraal ilas (i.e. solonom, atule, , ile rognomy, sin w.th a consecrited virgin); when lie has dune so the urchleacon or the blshop shali give him the holy cup, anl say over him the same prajer as over an melolyte (ee above). The ritual of the Inter oriluails is as follows: 1. The blshop, sitting mitred ta his chair, declares the duties of subleacons (Cod. Maff, and Engliah ordianla np. Makeil, except Pontil. Wintoll,, wilch directs that the caud.date shuli previously have ween lastructed in his duties hy the blshop; not la the majority of oridiala). 2. The earliest ritund which han been preserred is that which, ns mentioned above in the account of the orlination of a deacon, is given na a preliminary rubric in the Minale Francorum, Sacruin. Gelas., and other early ordinals. The ordinandu are preaunted to the bishop, who, after receiving the teatimony of the presenter, duclares the election in the form given below, "By the help of our Lord God," isc A litany is then snid; when it is linished all rise, and the pwrisons elected go up to the bishop's chair; the bishop gives a blessing upon their ollice; they then go down and stand in the proper place of their order. The gospel is then real, and aiterwarls the newly-ordained preabyters give their olferings (sc. of bread and wine) into the hand of the bislup, and receive them back from him consecrated. (This last innportant rite is found in l'ontif. Corb. Suession. Camerac., Cod, Matt., C'atalani, Ord. ii. ; nee below, § 16.) ii. Mabillon's Ordo Romumus vill. gives the following directions: "The archilencoll holding him lends him to the steps of the altar, divests him of the dalmatic, and so vests him in abasuble, and leads him again to the hishop. And there, saying over hin another prayer, he consecrates him preabyter, giving a kiss to the bishep or to tho other priestg, nad stands in the rank of presbyters, fond Alleluia is said, or rank uf presbyters, and Alleluia is said, or the tract and gospel." iii. The majority of of deacons, the deelaration of election the ease adnassion to ollice.
a. Delarution of Election: 1. Two deacons conluct the ordinanil, vested as a dencon, to the presbyters; then two presbyters receive and conduct him to the bishop's chair (Cod. Matf., Pontif. Salisb. Camernc.; but instead of presentation, the Mainz Pontiticals require the ordinands to be summoned, "Let those who are to be ordained presbyters to the title of St. N. come forward;" the Besan;on Pontilical alda the name of the priest who witnesses to and presents him).
2. A deacon (Cod. Matt.) or the archideacon (Pontif, S. Elig. Katuld. S. Dunat. Suession. Salisburg. Noviom. Mogunt.) or the priest who presents (Cod. Bisunt.) sdilresses the bishop, "Our holy mother, the catholic chureh, remands that thou shuuldst orlain this present deacon to the burden of the presbyterate." The bishop naks, "Dost thou know him to be worthy?" The presenter replies, "As far as human frnilty sllows, I buth know and testify that he is worthy of the burden of this otlice" (l'ontif. Mogunt. S. Dunst. S. Elig. Uatalani, Ord. ji. iii. ; Hittorp, Ord. ii. ; ef. S. Hieron. Epist. 146 (85) ; but Cod. Msff. uses the plural, "Illis sttestantibus"). 3. The bishop then aldresses the people, and asks their testimony. Sacram. Gelas., Pontif. Rodrad. Rotum. Senon. Ecgb. Caturic, simply sny "dsta orntione;" but Pontif. Rem. Noviom. Vat. sp. Murat. add the form of address, which concludes by asking the people openly to give their testimony ("ideo electionem vestram debetis publica voce profiteri "). Apparently in the place of this address to the people, the Salzburg, Soissons, Cambrai, and Mainz pontificals have a public examination of the ordinan । ficals have a public examination of the ordinan!l:

Whont thou wish to be obedlent to thy bishup to Whose diocese thou firt to be ordained, in all things lawful, accoriing to the "nimical statutes?" (Col. Matf. is singular in having no tion.)
4. The blahop then makes the declarntion of election: " Hy the help, of our Lard Goil nud our Saviour Jeaua Chriat we elect thia person to the order of the presbyterate, If any one haa anything agalast him, in God's behalf and for Giol's anke, let hins come boldly forth an iny lt. But, nevertheless, let him he mindful of his condition." (The retention of this form "i si quis" probably a relic of the for direct testimony, in probably a relic of the earlier practlee, which is found in Mabillon, Ordo ix., where the form is appended, not to the declaration of election, but to the announcement by the reader of the intention to elect four daya previously to the actual aimission.)
5. The biahop proceeds: "Let the common whereupon a Maff,) (b) The Mainz Pontifical directs that the bishop shall say, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and may the power of the Highest keep thee withont sin." (c) The later English ordinals ap. Maskell direct that the bishop shall say nothing. (d) A Toulouse Pontifical of uncertnin date, quoted by Norin, de ふitcr. Ordin. pars ii. p. 340 (cf. ib. pars Iii. p. 135), says that in some churches the bishop said, "Receive the Holy Ghost ; whosesoever sins ye remit," &cc. This is alded in the Exeter, Bangor, and Sarum pontificals ns a separate rite immediately before the post-communion. It is found also in Cntalani, Ordo ii., where it is placed after the dellvery of the paten and chalice, and where the words are in the plural. It is found also in the same place, written by a later hond, in the margin of the Cod. Maft., where the words are first given in the singular, and then in the plural ("quo singalis facto ad ultimum dieat in generali, Accipite," &c.). But no mention of the rite is found in the earlier English ordinals, or In any ordinal earlier than the 12 th century, or in any of the great liturgical writers of the middle age, Amalarius, Hrabanus of Manz, Ivo of Chartres, or Hugo of St. Victor. Nor was there any eanonical authorty for its use until the council of Trent. 7. The prayers which follow are alike, with only verbal variations, in all ordinals (including the Leonine and Gelasian sacramentaries). 8. The bishop then says the preface (or "consummatio preshyteri"). "Let us make a common prayer, brethren, that these who are elected for the help and sdrantage of your anlvation may receive the benediction of the prestyterate. . " The prager of benediction follows, "Sanetificationam omnium Auctor cajus

vera censecratio, cujus plena benedictio est : tu, Domine, super hos fanmulos tuos quos presbyterii honore dedicamus manum tune benedictionis infunde..." (Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. Eegb. Rem. Noviom. S. Dunst. Catur. Rotem. Liatold. Wiaton. Mogunt ; the benediction is found without the preface in Cod. Maff. and in the Besaurcon, Sarum, and Exeter Pontificals.) Both forms are placed (1) as here, immediately after the prayer of consecration, in the earliest ordinals, i.e. Missale Franc., Ced. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. Eegb. Rem. Noviom. ; (2) nfter the vesting in the chasuble and before the anointigg of the hands, Pontif. Camerac. Neviom. ii. Mogunt. ; and without the pretace, Cod. Maff. ; (3) after both the resting and the anointing, Yontif. S. Dunst. Catur. Becc. Some orlinals omit the mention of either form, se Pontif. S. Elig. Radbod. Rodrad. Thuan. and sta cram. Leen.
9. T.e lishop then turns the stole, which has hitherto been worn over the left shoulder only, over the right shol:'der, saying, "Receive the yoke of the Lexd, for His yoke is easy, and His burden light" (Pontif. Maff. Salisb. Camerac. Mogrant, Enghish ordinals ap. Mask.); in l'ontif. Ecq'J. this rite takes place apparently at the begin'ing of the ritual, or as in Poatif. S. Dunst. Catraric. Rotom. before the prajer of consecration. The formula in Pontif. Eegb. S. Dunst. is, "The Lord put the stole of justice round thy neck, and the Lord keep thy mind from all taint of siu." In Mabillon, Urd. ix., after the benediction, the archdeacon takes the stoles from the tomb of St. Peter, where they had been placed the day before, and vests the new presbyters in them. Many of the earliest ordinals omit the mention of this rite; sc. Sacram. Gelas., Missale Franc., Codd. Vat. ap. Murat. S. Elig. Redrad. Rem.; Maskell, Mon, Rit. vol. iii. p. 208, thinks that it was a remnant of the primitive use of the British church, and that it was thence introduced into France ani other countries.
10. The bishop then vests the presbyter in the chasuble ; this rite is omitted in Sacram. Gelas., Missale Franc., Pontıf. Rodrad. Radbod., but the mention of it in beth Mabillon's ancient ordinals (Ord. viii. ix.) as well as in the ordinals mentioned below, leaves little doubt as to its antiquity. Seme ordinals, as has been just mentioned, place it before the " consummatio presbyteri;' and its place in relation to the anointing of the hanls also varies, most ordinals placing it in the order which is followed here ; but Pontif. S. Dunst. Rotom. Caturic. Becc. place it before the amointing. The formnlae with which the rite was accompanied vary: a. Pontif. Bisunt. "The Lord clothe thee with the garment of innecency;" b. Pontif. Suess. Salisb. Mognnt. Sarum. "Receive the priestly vestment by which is betokened charity, God is aile tog give thee an increase of grace;" c. Cod. Maff., Pontif. Exoa., combine the two preceling formulae, Pontif. Camerac. gives them as alternatives ; $d$. Cod. Vat, ap. Murat., Pontif. S. Elig. Rem. Rotom. S. Dunst. Nevion. Becc. Thuan. "The benodiction of God, the Father, the Sun, and the Holy Ghest, descend ajon thee, and mayest thon be blessed in the order of the priesthood, and mayest then offer oleasing victims to Almighty dod for the sins an! otiences of the people." (This form of benedir ion is elsewhere placed at the end of the rituai, afore the kiss of peace ; so Cod. Maff., Pontif. Can. .nc. Suess.

Salisburg. Winten. ; its use at this peint serves to shew that at one time the vesting in the chasubi.e was the last of the rites of ordination.)
11. The bishop then anoints the presbyter's hands with the chrism, or oil and chrism, or oil of the catechumens, with a prayer that "whatsoever they blesset might be blessed, whatsoever. they sanctified might remsin sanctifiel." (a.) This rite is found in almost all ordinals ; but not in Sacram. Leun. or inCodd. Vat. Othob. of Sucram. Gregor. or in Pontif. Rodrad : it is mentionel by two French liturgical writers of the 9th cen. tury, Amalarius of Metz, $\dagger 837$, de Eccl. Ofli: 2, 13 , and Theodulphus of Orleans $\dagger 821$, Cipit. ad Presh. i., Migne, P. L. vol. cv. p. 193; the enrliest canunist who speaks of it is Burchard of Worms ( $\dagger 1025$ ), Decret. xx. c. 55, Migne, P. L. vol. cxl. p. 628, but the recognised body of camon lsw distinctly disall ows it, quoting a response of pope Nicholas I. to the archbishop of Bourges in 864, whe says that it is not a custom of the Romsa church and that he has never hearll of its heing practised in the Christian church (Gratian, Decret. 23, c. 12, Migne, P. L. vol. clxxxvii. p. 134, Iro. Carnot. Decret. 6. 121) ; this must be held conclusive, at any rate ns to its not being a general prsctice in the 9th century ; but afterwsrds it no doubt became general, for Innocent 111 . insists upen it, and objects to the Greeks for their omission of it (Innocent IlI. Epist. lib. 7. 121; Migne, P. L. vol. cev. 407). It is important to note that even the Pseulo-Isidorian authorities for the rite (Epist. Anacleti, c. 18, itp. Hinschius Decretales Pseulo-Isidorianae, p. 75 ; Epist. Clement. iii. c. 58, ibid. p. 53, to which may be added the spurious Comment. in lib. I. Revum, ascribed to Gregory the Great, lib. 4, c. 5 ; Migne, P. L. vol. lxxix. 278) refer only to bishops; nt the same time they clearly shew that the origin of the rite was the growing tendency to institute an analogy of ceremonies hetween the Old and the New Testament. (b.) Several ordinals direct that the hands shall be blessed before being anointed, and givs a form of beaediction for the purpose; Pontif. Ratold. S. Elig. Rotom. Caturic. Becc. (c.) The Mainz Pontifical directs that while the rite of anointing is going on the hrma "Veni Sancte opiritus" shall be song, and also, if the number of persens ordnined require it, the hymn "Veni Creator;" in the Soissons Pontifical the hymn "Veni Creator" is apparently sung immediately after the anointing; and in the English ordinals np. Maskell, except the Winchester Pontifical, immediately befere it. There is no mention of either hymn in other ordimals, (d.) In addition to the aneinting of the hands, a group of English and Norman pontificals direct the anointing of the head; so Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Caturic. Rotom. Becc., but not elsew here.
12. The aneinting is fellewed by the delivery of the "patenam cam oblatis et calicem cum vino" (Pentif. Mogant. has "calicem pro sacramento praeparatum, superposita hestia') with the words "Receive power to offer sacritice to Ged and to celebrate mass, as well for the living as for the dead;" so Cod. Maff., Pontif. Radbod. Salisb. Bisunt. Camerac. Mogunt., English erdinals ap. Maskell, Catalani Ord. ii.; but there is no mention of the rite in the oldest ordinals e.g. in Missale Franc., Pentif. from the practice of which a record is presarved in the directions which are given in Mabillon's Ordo ix. for the ordinntion of a parish priest at Rome. Afte: the conclusion of the whole scrvice ("expletis omnibus, missa rite completa"), the pope is to give to the new presbyter the priestly vestments, and the instruments of the inass, gold or silver, wine, corn, and oil, with which a procession is made to his parish, both the pope and the people accompanying him.
13. One ordianl, Cod. Mafn," directs that if the presbyter is n "presbyter cardinalis," i.e. a parish priest, the pope shall give him a ring, saying, "To the honour of our Lord Jesus Christ and the Aposties "eter and Paul, we commit to you the church N., with its clergy and people;" this is probahly the earliest form of institution.
14. The beuediction follows in Codd. Maff. &c.; seeshove, $§ 10$; the Sarum, Exeter, and Bangor Pontificals place it at the end of the whole office, stter the commnnion ; the Winchester Pontifical places it here.
15. The newly-ordnined presbyter then gives ths kiss of peace to the bishop, and to all the clergy who are present, Codd. Maff. Suession. Camerac.; the Mainz Pontif. places this rite before the beneliction, and directs that the bishop shall go round to each of the newlybishop shall go round to each of the newlyordained preshyters, saying, "Pux tibi, frater, Winton., also place it immediately before the benediction, but transfer both rites to the postcommunion office.
16. The communion office then proceeds: a descen reads the Gospel: the newly-ordained presbyters make their offerings to the bishop, ad receive them back from him consecrated: ${ }^{30}$ Pontif. Suession. Camerac., Cod. Malf. ap. Murateri, vol. iii. p. 56, directs this generally in the case of both presbyter and deacon, but ibid.

they shall offer two lighted tapers, two loaves, they shill offer two lighted tapers, two loaves, snd two bottles (amphorne) of wine, and omits the clause which follows in the carlier rubric, "et st eo consecrstus accipiant." Mabillon's Ondo ix. dirests that from these oblations the "povitil prisyteri" shall commnuicate for eight enseling lays. The rite is an important relic of the primitive communion, in which the bresd snd wins were offered to the bishop, then blessed by him, and then distributed. The rite itself fell into disuse, but one of its effects survived in the rule which is mentioned in the Soissons Pontifical, and which prevailed in sonie dioceses, that a presbyter should keep the bread which was consecrated at the time of his ordiation for forty days, taking a portion of it every dsy. The rite probably survived nlso in the mbric of the later ordinnls, that the newly consecrnted presbyters should receive the host from the hands of the consecrating bishop.
17. A still more important relic of the primitive communion survived, nad jossibly survives newly-ordne theory that in this celebration the nexly-ordained presbyters were "concelebrant" with the bishop. The only other instance of the surnival of the same rite is that which is menetioned by Innocent III., de Sacrumentis, c. 25, Migne, P. L. vol. cexvii. 873, of the cardinal preshyters at Rome being celebrant with the of the rite whs appreciated by medineval canonists, e.q., Durandus in iv. Scnt. dist. 13, qu. 3, who, in spite of the statement of innocent III, denied its existence. The elements of the historical consideration of the question will be fonad in Morin de Sicr. Ordin. pars iii. exercit. §, p. 158; Catalani in Pontif. Rom. p. 1, tit. 12,

" (then follows a prayer that he who been the vote and election of all the clergy has been advanced to the presbyterate "may be filled with the spirit of grace and counsel; with this prayer the ritual ends). ii. ## 1V. Time and place of Ordination.

I. Timbi of Ormination.-(1) Season of Ordination: There is no evidence of the existence in the earliest periorl of any fixed rule as to the season of the year at which appoiutments to ecolesiastical oflice might take place, and there is strong yeason to believe that entrance upon oflice followed immediately upon appointment. The non-existence of any such rule is rendered almost certain (ii) by the fact that when in the Western church in later times a rule was laid down it became necessany to invent an early suthority (the decretal of Gelasius) in order to support it; (b) by the fact that in the Greek chureh, even to the present day, ordinations may take place at any time (except that in Lent they wre limited to Saturdays and Suodays).

Several limitations of the season of ordination gradually arose in the Western church, and the rule which ultimately became established by the canon law was neither the earliest nor the only one.

1. Zeno of Verona ( $\dagger 380$ ) speaks of Easter (i.e. probably Easter Day and Easter Eve) as being a sjecial time for the promotion of clerks (ministri), and the reconciliation of penitents (S. Zenon. Veron. lib. 2, tract 50, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. xi. p. 506).
2. Leo the Great (Epist. ix. (xi.) ad Diosc. Alixand. vol. i. p. 628) has a passage which has given rise to some contruversy. He says that ordinations to the priesthood or the diaconate nught not to take place on any chance day, but "post diem sabbati ejus noctis quate in prima sabbatislucescit: " (1) According to one view, these words are to be understood as allowing ordinatiuns only at Easter (i.c. on Enster Eve and Easter Day). In support of this view is the fact, that Leo only allowed laptisms to be celebrated at Easter and l'entecost (lipist. xvi. c. 3, i. p. 719). (b) According to another view, the words allow ordinations on Saturday night, or on the morniag of any Lord's Day. This view is readered almost certain by another passage, in which Leo, writing to Anastasius of Thessalonica, objects to the practice of limiting the restriction to the Lord's Day to the ordination of bishops, and of orlainiag presbyters and deacons on any day (Eipist. vi. (iv.) i. p. 610). A further corroboration of this view is the complaint which, in writing to the emperor Marcian, he makes against Anatolias; it is, that the latter had ordained a greshyter ons Friday; but nothing whatever is silid about the limitation of ordinations to "particular sessos, (E'pist. iii. ad Marcian. Imp. i. p. 1185 . Ont the whole question see the notes of (Uuesmel, and the Ballerini to the passage of Leo first quoted above; and also Quesnel, Dissert. vi. de jénuw sabbati, reprinted by the Balleriai in their elition of Leo, vol. ii. p. 1069, and by Migne, P. 1. vol. lv. p. 627.)

3. The ordinary practice of the bishops of Kome, which however does not appear to have bcen erceted into a rule, and which probably grew up in the period intervening between Leo the Great and the establishment of the four seasons, wats to hold ordimations in December (see Anastasius Bibliothecarins, liber Putificalis, passim, but especially Bianchini's ed. vol. iii. § 72 ; Amalarius de Div. Off. 2, 1 ; but Mnbillon, Jfus. Ital. vol. ii. p. ciii, Catalani, Com. in Jontif. Rom. pars i. tit. ii. § 12, mention various exceptions to the prectice).
4. Out of the rule or usage that both ordainers and ordained must fast at the time of ordination, arose the usage which appesis to have become a rule in the course of the sth century, that ordioations must cake place at the Ember scasons, i.e. at the fasis in the first, fourth, seventh, and tenth months. The rule is given in the majority of ordinals in the form " mensis primi, quarti, septimi, decimi, sabhatorum die in xii. lectionibus; " so Sacram. Gelas, Pontif. Rem. S. Lhunst. Rodrad. Vat. ap, Murat. Elsewhere the particular weeks are specified, as being the first week of the first month, the second of the fourth, the thisd of the seventh, the fourth of the tenth; so Pontif. Eigb., Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cicr. ii. 24; Cone. Mogunt. A.D. 813 , c. 34 , quoted as an authority by Gratian, Dist. 76, c. 2 ; Mabillon's Ordo iz. agrees with the preceding, except that it specifies the Saturday before Caristmas; so Amalarius, de Ecol, Off. 2, 1. But although it became customary to speak of four seasons only, it is clear that ordinations in Lent were not limited to a single Saturlay. In probably the oldest existing MS. which contains the rule (Fragm. Cod. Yat. sp. Murator Lit. Lom. Vet. vol. iii. p. 17) any time "a yuinquagesima incipiente uscue quinto decimo die ante pascha," appears to be allowed; and the Psendo-lsidorian deeretal, upon which subsequent usage made the rule to rest, silecifies the Saturdays at the beginning and in the middle of Lent (S, Gelas. i. Epist. ix. ad l:pisc. y er Lwath. c. $13=$ Decret. General. ap. Hinschius, Dered. Pseudo-Isid. 〕. 652 ; cf. Gratian, Dist. 75, 7; D. Ivon. Carnut, Decret. 6, 7t). It is, however, claar, that ovan after the genaral recep tion of this decretal there was some variety of usage; and the rule which ultimstely prevailed, and which is recognised in the modero Roman Pontifical, appears to combine the rule of the four sensons with the earlier rule of holding ordinations at Eiaster.

The carliest certain instance of the ohservance of the four seasons as times of ordiantion, is in Paul the Deacon's account of Chrodegang of Metz (circ. 766) ns having ordained presbyters, "as is the custom of the Romm church, on the Siturdays ut the four seasons" (l'mul. Diacon. de Ordine E'pisc. Metens, ap. Migne, l'. L. vol. xev. p. 710 ) ; but they had been previously recognised by the Roman Conacil of 743 , e. 11 , under pope Zachary; and not long afterwarils the Frankish capitularies gate them a civil sanction (Statt. Rhispac, et Frising. A.D. 799, c. 7, ap. Pertz, Leyun, vol. i. 1. 78),

It may be convenient to add, that the modern Roman raleallows (a) the tonsure to be conferred at any time, (b) minor orders on any Sumbay or double fustival, (c) major orders at the times stated in the above-mentioned decretal of Alexander III.
(2) Day of Ordination.-It may be gathered from what has been said above, that even before ordimation came to be restricted to certain seasons of the year they were limited in the Wentern church to a rertain day of the week. It is antecedently probnble that the more important appointmeuts and almissions to church ollices would take place on Sundays, and there is therefore reason to suppose that the Greek practice, to which Leo the Grent (see above) besrs witness, of ordnining bishops on Sundaya, is primitive. It is diflicult to trace the origin of a similar limitation in the case of presbyters and deacons. Bat it is in entire harmony with the general view of the nature of ordiantion which has heen given nbove, that the evening of Saturday rather than Sumlay should have been the custumary time. The performance of the sacred functions to which they were called immeliately sumeedel their appointment and recoguition. If the functions themselves were performed enrly on Sunday morning, the appointment ani recognition of the officers would naturally take place on Saturday evening. Hence the Western rule, which is cinbodied in the Gelasian expression "die Sabbati circa vesperam."
(3) Pluce of Ordinations in Divine Service.Iarsmuch as almissions to ecelesiastical orlice in primitive times consisted in a public recognition of the otficer who had been elected or appointed, followed by a performance of the duties of his office, it was natural that such admissions should take place under circumstances which admitted of such performance.
In the Western ehurch it seems to have been customary thnt admissions to major orders ahould take place during divine service; but not even the l'seado-Isidorian decretals give any authority for the custom, and according to Hallier, de Sacr. Elect. p. 969 , later eamonists sometimes inserted the words "intra missam" into a letter inserted the words "intra missam" into a letter of the l'seado-Anacletus in order to obtenin the of the l'seado-Anacletus in order to obtnin the sppearance of such authority. The custom is, however, assumed by the ordinals, all of which (but not the Missal. Franc.) direct that the declaration of election to major orders shall be made mmediately afler the introit, (") postquam Antiphonam ail Introitum dixerint' "); so Sacram. Gelas. Cod, Vat. ap. Murat., Montif. Rem. Ratold
S. Dunst. S. Elig. Seuon. Noviom. Caturin.

Salish. Rotom. The plare of the ceromonies of admission is less precisely detined: (1) The oldent rubric (see above, Ordination of Dereons, i.) appears to make the benerliotion follow immediately upon the litany which follows the declaration of election. (i) Mabillon's (irdo, viii. and almost all ordinals jlace the ceremonies of ordjnation between the epistle and gosjel, hetore the Alleluin or Tract, (3) The Sarum I'ontifical expressly places the ordination of subtrianoons betore the epistle, which the new subdeneon reads. (4) The Pontif. liatolid. (Snsamat. are apparantly alone in plasing all ordinations before the epistle. The innjority of ordinals give no directions as to the time of admission to minor orders. The l'ontif. S. Elig. places thein "post comanumionem," the Sarum Pontifical luring the lessons, before the mass proper begins.

In the Greck church there are early indications that the celebration of the Eucharist immediately followed admission to major orders, e. \%. C'lement. Recoln. 6, 15 ; Dionys. Areop. de Ecel. Hier. 6, 3, 5 ; although even 80 late as the begimuing of the 9 th century it is not spoken of B though it were a universal rule; $e, g$. by S. Theodor. Stod. Epist. lib. 2, 101. But all MSS. of the ordinals agree in making ordinations to the lectorate and subdiaconate take place outside the iturgy, and in making ordin nations to major orders take place at a definite point in the liturgy. The ordination of dascons is placed after the oblation an the opening of the doors; that of presbyters al er the eherabic hymn.

In the other Eastern ehurches there is less uniformity of usage. The Nestorian Ondinal expressly provides for the case of ordinations (except those of bishops) which are not accompanied by a celebration of the Liturgy. The Copitio ordinal places all ordinations, except to the episcopnte, immedintely hefore the preface of the aonphora. The Jacubite and Maronite ordinals place ordiations after the consecration of the elements. (For a more precise account see Ienzinger, Ritus Oricintalium, vol, i. p. 144.$)$
11. Place of Ordination.-There does not appear to have been in the earliest times any rule as to the place in which ordination, in the sense of appointment, night be made. From the nature of the ease, when appointments were made by popalar suflirage, they Were made in a popular assembly ; hence Origen (Hom, in Levit. 6, e. 3, vol, ii. p. 216) argues fiom the public appointments of priests by Moses. But when they were made by the bishop or the Ordo, they were necessurily, in some sases, made under circumastances which did not almit of the gathering of an assembly in a detinite place. As, thr example, when, with the tacit consent of the people and the other mem. bers of the Orlo, Ciprian, and those who were with hin, appointed Aurelius and Celerinus (S. Cypr. Epist. 33, 34, vol. ii. p. 320, 324). The stress which Cyprian elsewhere lays on the necessity of ordinations being male in public (id. Ljist, ti8, 3, vol. i. p. $1026=$ Synmal letter of the council of Carthage to the clergy and people in Spain), shewe that tite freedom which existed as to the place of appointment was in danger of oxisted. subject, which ia found in the tirst five centurlea, ia that of the Cone. Laud. c. 5, which enacts that xeipotóvia: (i,c. appointmenta, accurding to both Balsumon and Zonarias) ahould not take place in the presence of \&кроб́де уot (prob. $=$ catechumena, but accorling to llefele, Conacils, E. T. vol. li. p. $301=$ the class of penitents so nament. See vol. i. p. 151, Audientes). The reason for this ruie was, that the faulta of persons were freely canvassed on such oecasions; and that it was inexpedient that any, except full membera of the church, should take ${ }^{\text {nort }}$ in the election. When special buidlings came to be set apart for assembly and worship, ordiuation naturally took place in them; amb Gregory Nazianzen is indigmant because the ordimation of Maximus the Cynic, which was begun in a church, was finished ua a private house (S. Greg. Nazianz. Doem. de rit. sth v. 909 ; ef. Greg. Presb. lit. S. Gre\%. Vizzienz. Migue, P. G. vol. xxxv. p. 282). But the paint was not the sacerelness of a church, but its publicity ; even Theophilus of Alexandria does not do mure than insist that ordinations shal! mot be made in sceret ( $\lambda$ anpaiws), and that wheo the eharch is at peace they shall cousepucurtly be made in chureh (S. Theophil. Alex. can. 7, ap. Pitra, i. 648).
Tho earliest regulation as to ordiantions in the sense of admission to olfice, null the earliest pesitive ennctment as to ordimations in any sease, is that of the civil haw. Justinian (Novell. 6 , c. i. 9 , and e. 4, A.1. 5.55) enacts that admissiuns to ecclesiastical othee must take place in the presence of all the people as a guaruntee of the purity of the election. The absence of an earlier regulation, whether eeclesiastical or civil, is shenn by the fact that the later canonists were compled to invent one; i.e. they insertel the werd manifesto in Conc. Chalc. c. 6 (Gratinn, Derret. 1, Dist. 70; D. Ivon. Carnot. Panorm. 3, 27). Of the very doubtful Syrian council, which is sometimes assigned to A.D. 405, and of which the camons are printed by Mansi, vol. vii. 1181, ne accotunt negd be taken. When ordinations came to take place in a chureh, it was natura! that they should, as a rule, take phace in the cathedral church. At the same time there has never been any rale limiting them to the cathedral chureh.

In later times, when the ceremonies of admissien to holy orders were interwoven with the liturgy, it was enacted that they ahould take place, not merely in a chureh, but before the altar. There is a prolasibility that this had come to be the rule in the early part of the 7th century, inammuch as 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 28 , in providing for the readmission to office of a clerk who had hown unjustly deposed, provides that the ceremont. of his original ordination shall be repented, and this ia to take place "coram altario." But the first direct enaetment to this etfect is that of the ordinala, which are probably at least a century later.

The rule of the medern Lioman Pontifical is, that the tonsure and miner orders may be conferred in any place whatever ("quocinque buco," "nbl-anin- ise," Pontit. Ron pars 1. tit. 2. 88, 13, 14): but the ritual assumes throughout that the phice will be a clurch. Orlinatious to holy orders must take place either in the eathodraf, or, if nny other place in the dincese, in the "ecclessa diguior" of the place (ib. \% 22).

In the earllest period of ehureh history when, as has been shewn above, the important element in ordlantion was not the act of mlmision to ollice but the net of appolutaneut to it, the question as to who coul. I ordiun is pritetically ilentieal with the question which has been alrealy answered, as to who conlil take part in an appointmeat. The presumption is that, at least in the three primitive ollices of presbyter, deacen, and render, the whole chureh acted together. There was alwaya a nominatiou, an election, an approval, mad a declaration of election. The two latter of these functions, in the chureh as in the empire, devolved on the presilling officer, who, in the church, as also in the empire, frequently added to them the further funtion of ammination or "commendatio." Bat when, in course of time, a church ceased to be a complete, self-coutained and organic unity, and had outlying churches dependent upos it, or was itself merged in a larger organization, and when greater importance came to be attached to the recognition by a elurch of its newly-nppointed officer, and to the prayer for blessing upon his oflice, thure grew ap an abuadaut crop of guestions, partly as to the limits of the rights of dependent thurehes to make appointments without reference to the mother church, and partly as to the limits of the rights of independeut clurches to act without reference to the general contederation of ehurches, and partly as to the unity or the plarality of the ehannels through which divino grace flowed, some of which questions are still unsolved, and many of which have, at various times, been the camse pot only of theolugical consorersy but of political disturbance. It is, of course, inpossible here to do more than indiente the chief tiets which must be taken into consideration in any general view of the sobject; and, for the sake of clenrness, the word orduiner will be used in its natrower sense of oae who can admit to ecelesiastieal ollice, whethur the persou admitted be appointel by himself or by others.

1. Orduiners of Presbyters, -i. The earliest evidence is presumably that of 1 Tim. iv. 24, where the giving of the "gift" ( $\chi$ ápıг $\mu a)$ to Timothy, is said to have been accompanied with ( $\mu$ eta') the "laying on of hauls of' the presbytery." But the ovidence is ambiguons, inasmuch as It is uncertain (1) what was the precise oifice which Timothy fillel; (2) whether the presbytery acted alote, or whet her the presence of an apostle or other president is assumel, though it is not meationed. ii. Eirly patristic evidence is for the most part aubigroes, on account of the ambiguity of the terms $\mathrm{em}-$ played; e.g. in Firmilian's letter to Cyprian (S. Cypriau. Epist. 75, 7, vol. i. p. 1161), "majores natu qui et baptizauli et manum imponendi et ordinandi possident potistatem," where manum imponendi may possibly refer only to rontirmation after baptism, wald ordinandi only to election. iii. That the bishop and presbyters acted together is renderei probible, part! y by the genernl character of the relations betwcen bishops and presbyters [Prass], and partly by tho fact that the Western church, which in many similar respects has been mere

That the blshop could in certain cases aet alone, is a probable but not a proved bypothens. Its probubility chietly arises from the fict that in the Apostolical Constitutions, and in all eastern ordinalls, though the elergy, and especially the archdeacon, as the representatlve of the clergy, have a place in the ritual, the bishop alone imposes his hands. v. Whether preshyters could act alone is a keenly disputed, but as yet unsolved question: (a) The cise of Isehyras, who was ordnined presbyter by the preslyter Colluthus of Alexandrla, and whose ordination was subsequently dissllowed, would hardly have been possible if the point hal previonsly bean ruled in the negative by competcut nuthurity. (For the detail of the controversy, see the letter of the Mareotic clergy to the synod of Tyre, ap. S. Athamas. Apol. c. Ariun. c. 75, vol. i. p. 152): (b) The early canun (Conc. Ancyr. c. 14) which furbids chorepiscopi to ordain ( $\chi \in \rho о \tau о \nu \in i \nu$ ) preshyters or deacons, also forhids city presbyters to do so, except by commission frem the bishop; assumning that ordination is here used in its later sense, the canon is a clear admission that presbyters are disqualified from ordaining presbyters, not by any defect inherent in their ollice, but on the ground which is assigned by the Apostolical Constitutions, of church order (aív $\eta$ 3,11 ). It is interesting to compare with this the statement of the great antiguarian and canenist of the West in the seventh century: "sola propter austoritatens sumno sacerdotl ordinatio et consecritio reservata est, ne a multis ecelesine disciplian vendienta concordiam bolveret, scandala generaret" (Isidor. Hispal, de Eecl. Off. 2, 7): () In later times presbyters were no dorbt dissualitied, and so far did the notion of th ir disqualification go, that 2 Conc. Hispal. A.D. 619, c. 5 , disinllows the ordination of certain preshyters upen whom a bishop had laid his hands, but to whom, at the same time, in pressbyter 30.1 not the bishop had given the benediction. In this resplect even the dispensing power of the prope was regarded as being limited: he could coranission a preshyter to confer minor but not major orders, "qui habent immediatam relatlonem ad corpus Christi" (St. Tha m. Aquin. in IV. Sent. dist. 25, qu. 1, art. I $=$ Summa Theol, suppl. in p. iii. qu. 38, nrt. 1). vl. The question of the right of chorepiseopi io orlain presbyters is also one of great dilliculty: (a) In the fourth centary chorepiscopi nire fond only in the Gast, nnd were probnbly no more than the parish prlests of rural parishes they were the first attempt at ceclesiastical organization in the drection which afterwards resulted in the parochial system; their rights In respect of ordination, which may, bewever, in this ease mean ouly appointinent, are strictly defined by Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 314, c. 8, 1 Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, e, 10 , which give them an origianal right of ordaining seaders, subdeacons, and exorcists, but only a deputed right of ordaini,g presiyters and deacons. (b) The orgin and status of the French chorepiscopi of the 8 th and 9 th centuries is much more obscure; and the question of their right to ordain was probahly the chlef cause of the forgery of the l'seudo-Indurian deervials. The genuine writings of 1 sidore (de Ecel. Off. lib. 2, 6) repeat the rule of the council of Ancyri, and allow choreplscopi to urdain preshyters with the consent of the eity bishop on whom they deprend. But in the 9tb century there appoars to have beon on the one hand a claim on the part of certain chorepiscopi to dispense with the necessity of such consent, and on the other hand a contention that not even with such consent could they ordain either preshyters or deacons. The controversy is one of great interest, because it Involves the whole question of the valifity of non-cpiscopal ordontion; but the points involved are too latrieate, and the litprature too extensive, to be more tham mentioned here. (The olempats of the controversy will be found in the spurious let ters of Dimasus, de vana corepiscoporum s"perstitione vitanda, ap. Hinschius, Deciret. I'se dio-Isddor. p. 509, of L.co the Great, itid. p. fi28 (printed also among St. leon's werks as lipist. 88, ad Germaniue et Gullise Lipisc., on which see (Quesnel's dissertation, which is reprinted by both the Ballerini and Nigue), and of John 11I. ibid. p. 715 ; in the letter of Leo III. in nnswer to Charles the Great's mission of Arno of Salzburg, ap. Apl'ent. ad vol. viii, in the letter of Nielholas I. to the archbishop of Bourges (S. Nicol. Epist. append. i. ep. 19, 1, ap. Mansi, vol. xv. 390, Migne, vol. cxix. p. 884); and in n number of synolical decrecs or capitularies, the most impertant of which is that of the council of Meaux, A.D. 845, c. 44 (Mansi, vol. xiv. p. 829). The controversy has been reviewed by mest writers on the clerical office, e,g. by Morin, de Gucr. Ordin. pars iii. excrcit. 4, and by Natalis Alexander, Append. ad diss. te Episcop. super Presb. Enuinentia. The best account of its history is in Weizsäcker, Der Kampf ycjen den Chorepiscopat des fränkischen Reicks, Tiibingen, 1859. The ultimate result of the controversy was, that in the Western church chorcpiscopi ceased to exist except in name, and that the city bishops finally established thrir claim to he the sole channel through which the spiritual status of presbyters could be conferred.
2. Orduiners of Deacons. - What has been said above ns to the competency of others than bishops to ordain presbyters, applies also, for the most part, to the case of deacons. The special claseness of the connexion between the episeopate and the diaconate gave un especially strong claim to the iomer to admit the latter to olfice. The case of Felicissimus, whe was made ("constituit") dencon by Novatus (S. Cyprian, Epist. 49, vol. i. p. 728), shews that the nppointment, which, from the peculiar circumstances of the casc, may be hell to include the nilmission, of a deamon by a presbyter, though viewol with grent diaftavour, was not regarianil as invalid; hut th.e whole tendency of eceleslasticn! discipline was opposel to such ordinations, and medineval cunonists held that not even a papal dispensation could nuthorise them.

L. vol, expi. 314.)
4. Orduiners of Clerks.-The Apostolical Constitutions, dealing probably with the period in which each chureh was eomplete in itself, do not allow preabyters to ordain even elerks (C. A. 3, 20) But in the West, when the parochial system established itcelf, and the rectors of rural parishes came to have a sphere of work and authority which was in many respects independent of the bishop, presby bris stood in a very dillerent relation to the lower orders of elergy. lu the 7 th century they were not only allowel to admit clerks, but encouraged to do so (Cone. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 18) ; and almost all the orlinale of the Gregorina type agree with Statt. Ev. Ant. c. 10 in enacting that a singer may eater upon his othice "absque scientin episcopi, sola jussione presbyteri."

VI. Re-ordination.

It is probable that in the earliest period each church deliaed for itself, in indiridual cases, the conditious upon which a person who had forfeited his office should be restorel to it, or upon which the oticer of noother church should hive his status recoguised. It is also probable that, although the honorary rank which was frequently given sometimes became substantive, the state of things which is torbidlen hy Can. Apost. c. 69, once actually existeu, aad that an officer of one church who sought office in another had to uadergo a second election and a second admission to office. When the age of counctls began, the rules which were laid down, either for a group of churehes or for the catholic chureh throughout the world, ordinarily specitied the peaalty whle ${ }^{+}$was incurred by a violation of them. The chief of these penalties were, rove'), and a requirencest to cease from office
 The offences to which they were affixed were chiefly, (a) violation of rules of ecclesiastical orgaisation, by having been ordained out of the proper church, or by otber than the proper bish"p; (3) simoniachal ordination; (c) ardiantion while in a state of lipse or heresy. [For a detniled account of the several otiencis, see Orbens, Holy: Qualifica'ions for: Discylin: of.] A person who wats so deposed, or whose ordination was so declared to be aull, conlli not become a church officer again without again going through the processes which he hal gone thrmeh incomplately in tho first hastance: for example, Cone. Vicaen. c. 8 enacts that returaing Cathari shall ruceive imposition of hands: id c. 19 enacts that returaing laulanists uust he bath re-roveliatuaav). This continued to be the practice of the church. Fur example, when some of the Arian elargy wished to return to the catholie filith, It was enacted that they might to ado initteal to etlice by the bishop, "cum inupositio manus benedictione" ( 1 Conc. Aurol. A.I. 511, c. 10 ; Conc. Citesuraug. A.n. 592, e. 1): se in the following century, of those who were ordained "a Scotormon vel Britonum episeqpis," who held schismatleal views on the quest ions of toasure nad Easter (l'oenit. Theolor. ii. 9, 1, ap. Huddan and Stubbs, vol. iii.) : and so ulso in the following century, of those who were orlained by "episcopi ambulantes" (I'ippin, Cifit. Vor. mer. A.d. 753, § 14, ap. Pertz, /equm, vol. i. p. 23) ; and for those who hal been unjustly degraled 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 6333, e. 28, pre. scribes the ritual of reordimation.

But early in the history of the chureh, there had resulted from the Donatist contruwersy a belief in the minds of many theologitms that the grace which was cenferred at or lination, like that which was conferred at bapitism, was inslienable; and that, in spite of lapse, the one as well as the other remained till death, and might, mereover, be communicaterl to wthers. This belief is expressed with some emphasis by St. Augustine: e.g. de blaptismo c. Duntt. i. 1, vol. ix. p. lu9; contris Fi, ist. Pirmen. ii. 23, vol. ix. p. 70, and is either stated or imptiel in Cod. Eceles. Afric, i. 27 (on which see Schelstrat ap. Van Espen, in loc.) ; itl. c. 48 ; 5 Conc. Carth. c. 11 ; and it was again strongly asserted by Gregory the Great, Epist. ii. $$ 6$ al Jouns. Ravenn. ; see also S. Leo Magn. Ejpist. 18 (14) ad Jamur. p. 731. An isolatad but important fucter in the discussion is the existence of a Galatian inscription of A.D. 461, Corpus Inser. Grace. No. 9259 , which gives a record of ene

VII. Literature.

The literature of ordination is extensive, but the following will be found to be the most important refereaces: 1 . The early authorities and ordinals, for which see OrDiNAL. $\because$ The early mediaeval antiquarinaf, Isidore of Seville (de Eculesiasticis (Ifferis), Albinus Flaceus (Alenin) (de Divinis Officiis), Amalarius (te Ecelesiasticis Officiis), Hrabanus Maurus (de Institutione Clerionrum) (whioh four treatises, with ethers, will be found printed together in Hlittorp, do Dininis Catholicae Ecclesite Officiis, Cologne, 1568). 3. The French liturgical writers of the 17th century: Hallier (de Streris Eletionibus et Ordinationibus), Paris, 16.36 ; Moria (le Steris Ecclesive Ordinationims), 1'aris, 1655; Thomassin (Ancienne et Jornoll's Jiscepline de CEqlise: ed. i. ORDO. A direetory for the duo performanee of any sucred rite. An ordo might (1) contan directions enly, or (2) it might give the prayers also. [Jaturaicat. lionks, p. 100s.]
For several centuries thi prayers in the saeramentaries were not aceompanied hy sutlicient direetions for their proper ose. The rubries in the liturgies of St. dames and St. Mark aro very few and brief compared with those of the present Greek effice. The same ditlerence is observallo when we compare the Gelasinn Sacramentary and the earlier enpies of the Gregorian with the later copies of tha latter; and so again when we compare the old Gallican missals, disised from the 8 th century, with the Ilisiano-Guthie, which was In use, and unlergoing changes, down to the end of the eleventh. This pancity of directione would causp great inconvenieace, especinlly when cerpmonjes were multiplied to the degree of which St. Augnatibo complains (Ep. 5S, al Janur, 19 , §35), sid a supplementary book of instructions in ceremonial would be found equally necessary with that trom which the prayers were loarnt. In the West this want was met by the compilation of a buok to which, betore long, tho conrentional name of Ordo attached itself. In Gaul, in the 8th century, each priest was required to deseribe his own pristice in writing, and to present this "libellus ordinis" to the bishop, in Lent for his npprobation, " rationem et ordinem miaisterii sui, sive de baptismo, sive de fide catholica, wive de precibus et ordine missnrum" (Capit. Kinrlomanni, A.D. $7+2$, in Baluz. Chpit, Req. Fmne, i. 89f). In the sanne age, Reg. Fmane, i. 89t). In the same age, about 73", as it is supposed, appearel the " liballus ordinis Romani," or "Ordo Romanus," a directory for the use of the bishops of Romo and its subrrbicarian dioceses ( Orl l. Rom. i. § 28 ; Mus. Ital. ii. 17) in the first lustanee, but which beemme, in time, so fnr as it conld, a guide to all the priests whe used the Romin offices, Mabillon has printel three libelli de Missa Pontificali (Ord. l. ii. iii. u. s. 1-60), which may be ealled three editions, differing little in age, of the same direstory; two others, de Missa Episcopsti (v, vi. $6+76$ ), which, from the celebrant being callel episcopus as frejuently as pontifex and from other inlications, appear to be intendel for the nse of nar bishop; one "Orlo Serutinii arl electos, qualiter debeat celehrari" (vil. 77-84); and two conceraino the ordination of the elergy (viii. ix. 35-94)[0nmiz ( 1 ]: all of which were, in the judgment of the eidn.r." written befure the 9th or 10th eentury" (Cimbont. Praev. ix.). Ove of the libolli de Miss, Episcopaliabove-mentioned, speaks of the strictly Roman book from which it was derived as Romanus Ordo ( $0, ~ v i, 8, p, 73$ ); and nader this name a directery nuthoilsed by Rome was adopted iu Gaul towards the end of the 8th century: "Unusquisqua presbyter missam ondine Romano com smudalils celebret" (Capitularia Rig. Franc. v, 371). Penitents wepre to be revacifed, "sicut in sacramentario, et in Ordine Romano, continetur" (ibid. vii. 202, and Canones Iswaci Ling. i, 35). Amalnrius of Jetz. Ahout 821), wrote s eommentary on parts of Ordo
it. (Mus. Ital. ii. 42-51) under the title of
"Eglogae In Ordinem Romanum," first printed by lhaluze (Capit. Re... Fr. ii, I:1F'2); then by Mnhillon (u. s, p. 549), in the body of which he nlso numes tho libellas absolutely " Rumanus Ordo." He also frepuently refers to this, and to the njparently earller turm of it, Orelu i. (u, s. 3-40) In his work De E'culestinsticis Officiis, There it is "Libellus Romusnus" (1. 17; iii. 27), "Libellus Romani Ordinds" (i. 30), w" "fibellus qui continet Jomanum Ordinem" (i. 21). In his treatise, De Antiphon rio, he arain calls it simply " Romanus Orilo" (c. S2), There also he recoglizes the existence of mure than ono such directory : "Soripta quae enntinent per diversos libellos Orlinem Romanum " (ihist.).

That the Ordo Romanus was later than the sacommentary, and ancillary to it, is evident from a reterence to the latter in Ordo i. On Wednestay in holy week the bishop, "dicit orntiones solemnes, sicut in sacramentorum (libro) continetur" (e, 28, p, 19). But at longth many of the directions of the Orio wera incorporated with the sacramentricy, and thus became "mbries." Compare, for example, the rubrice peculiar to Cotex Eliginnus, from which Ménard prints (Opp, S. Greg, tom. iii. 64, 6t, Wednesday In holy week; 65, Mannly Thursilay, &e.) with Ord. Rom. i. § 28,30 , &c. The enrliest Orilowns at least re-written after the time of Charlemagne, whom it thus mentions: "Sabbato tempore Adriani institutun est, ut flecteretur pro Carolo rege" (24, comp, § 28 ). Usher supposes that it was originally compiled about 730 (Cave, Hist. Lit. in v. Ord's Rom.).
(2) An oflice of prayer, with its rubries, was also ealled Ordo. Thus in the Besançan saeramentary of the 7th century, "Incipit Orido Baptismi" (Mrus. Ital. i. 3:3); in a Roman sacramentary of the 9 th, "Ordo vero qualiter catacizantur (sic) est ita" (Corl. Gellon, in Marten. Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. i, 18 ; Orl. 6); "Ordo nd Infirmum caticuminum (sie) ficcicodum vel baptizandum " (ibid. Ord. 7); "Ineipit Ordo ad poenitentiam dandam" (Ex eorl. cod. u. s. i. vl. 7 ; Ord. 6), ete. OREMUS ( $\delta \in \eta \theta \omega \bar{\omega} \mu \nu$ ). This is the elgnal, or invitation, to the people to join in spirlt in the prayer which is to follow. In the West, except in Spalu and perlaps Gaul, both the iovitation and the prayer were uttered by the priest, who was said respectively crationem indicere and dare. In the East it belouged to the dencon's office to "bid" the prayers; and the earlier and full form, of which the Clementine Jiturgy and that of St. James give several examples, censisted in the deacen aooouncing the tepies of prayer to the people clause by clause, while they responded Kúpiє é $\lambda$ é $\eta \sigma a \nu$, or some corresponding ejaculation, at the close of which the priest summed up the petitions in $n$ collect. It is possibly a trace of a similar custom that we find in the Gelasian Sacrameatary for certain days (e.g. lib. i. 41, Ordo de feria vi. passione Domini) such directions as these: "Sacerdos dicit Oremus, et admuatiat diaconus Flectanius genua. Et post paululum dieit L.evate. Et dat orationem." Similarly, Ordo Romanus 1. (Mabillon, Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 22, \& c.). That in Africa the priest bade the pravers may be joferred from St. Aug. Ep. 217, ad Vitulein, § 2 (Migne, tom. ii. 978), where he says "quando audis aicerdotem Dei ad altare exhortantem populum Dei orare pro Incredulis," \&c. In Spain and Gaul it appears that the deacon gave the lavitation, while the priest pronounced the prayer (cf. Isid. Hispal. do Eccles. Off. lib. ii. cap. 8: "Ipsi (se. diaceni) elara vece in moduin pracconis admonent cunctos, sive in orando, sive in flectendo genua, sive in psallendo, sive io lectionibus audiendo"; aud immediately afterwards "illi (sacerdoti) ortre, huic (diacone) psallere mandatur." l'he sermon attributed to Caesorius of Arles, among the Sernomes Supposit. of St. Augnstine, tom. v. upp. Serm. 286, §§ 1, 7, suggest, the same conclusion. [Praeco; Prosphovisis.]
In the present Mozarabic Liturgy, "Oremus" is only said twice, viz. before the "Agyes," and before the Capitulum, which introluces the Lard's Prayer.

It is worth while to netice the occurreace of the word in the Roman Missal, just before the offertory, where no spoken prsyer follows it. This probibly marks the place of some variable prayer, answering (it may be) to the Ambrosion Oratio super sindunem, which has become disured. (See Pseude-Aleuim di, Itiv. Off. cap. 'de Celebratione Missae,' and Amal. do Eccles. Off. lih. лii, cap. 19.)
The ordinary use of the word in any of the offices is to mark the begianing of a set prayer, to be said by the priest alond, in which the people only coneur by the concluding "Amen,"

In contradiatlnetion to some other form of praver, e.f. by versicles and respenses, or some other set of worahip.

ORGAN. The name "orgoaum" Wha at first not restricted to a particular instrument, but appears to have aearly become so by St . Augustine's time. Commenting on Psalm cl. he says: "Nam cum organum vecabulum graccum sit, ut dixi, generale omnibus musicis instrymentis, hee cui folles alhibentur slio Graeej nomiae appellant. Ut autem organum dicatar, magis Latina et ea vulgaris est consuetudo." And-"Quamvis jam obtioucrit consuetudo ut organa proprie dicuntur ea quae inflantur tol. libus." So from his enarr, on Psalm |vi (our: 57th), "non solum illud organum dicitur quod gradede est et inflatur follibus, sed quicquid aptatur ad cantilenam," we alse learn that organs were of coasilerable size. In the same comment he applies the term "organum" to the cithara and the psalterium.

For a full account of the histery of thit instrument the reader must be referred te Dr. Rimbault's portion of Hopkias and kiabault's excellent work on this subject. There it is conclusively preved that the first efrech which distingushes the antique organ from the mediseval one, viz., the invention of the keybeard, is very nearly svncluronons with that which diso tinguishes natique from mediaeval music, the invention of the stave, being about the eod of the 11th century. U'p to this time it would appear that organs ooly diftered io size and number of pipes, and in the appliances tor supplying wind. The article "Hydraula" in Smith's Dict. Greck and Rom. Anti]. gives the earlient form of it.

Athenneus says that it was lavented by Cteslbius, of Alexandria, from a contrivance applied to a elepsydra, in order to announce the heura at night. This contrivance is attributed to Plate, but it seems very doubttul, beeause it is only said of him as a tradition ( $\lambda$ érecau), and Aristexenus was not aequainted with the thing; he, being not far removel from Plato's date, asd protessedly writing on music, would be likely to have known of such an iavention of Plsto's (if it were so). The urgau of Ctesibius is of cuifie much later (Athen. Deipn. iv. 23).
The organ is simply a development of the Syrinx or Pandena pipe, and in its earliest form consisted of a mall box into the top of which a row of pipes was in from the perionne at one ent ; and ar mesns of drawling the hole in which being pushed in as the communleation being thus cut off, In modern argans subutituted valves

The dirnt olyject neemed to be to angmeat the soun!, by multiplying the number of plpes which would be in unison with each other ; and Ctailhius has the reputatlon of having fuvanted, or remlered practicalle, the perforated allif, which enalled the perfurmer to have the plpen more under command. This will be best understood by the following tigure, which represeats tho holes in which the pipes stand.
[This would be now technleally called an orgsil of three stops.]
karh of the alldes mentioned before would cover one of the vertical columns in the above figure, and Ctesibsus'e slides would cover one of the horlzontal rows; the modern analogue of the lattor in the "register " or "atop." If three carls be taknul plerced with holes exactly as in the figure, and the one be kept whole, and the others divided Into sectlons containing respectively a verticnal column and a horizontal row, so $u$ to ba muvable, and the three be placed over osch other, the action will be clearly seeu.
The lncrease in the number of pipes required whan artiticisl methods for supplying wind; the bellows was adopted, and by the time of the emperor Jullan the Apoatate had become so large as to be made of a bull's hide. This uppesrs from an epigram of his:

Thys the organ becamie a complicated instrument. Tertullian (do Anima, xiv.) uses it as a similitude for the many members composiag one body. "Specta purtentlissimam Archimedis munificentham, organum hydrolicum dico, tot membra, tot parten, tot compagines, tot itinera vocum, tet compendia sonorum, tot commercia modorum, tot acles thblarum, et una moles erunt omnia." It would seetn from this that the organ was constructed so as to be played in the various constructed so as to be played in the various modes, Durian, Lydan, &ic., and thus supplied modes, Durian, Lydlan, &c., and thus supplied with pipes all the sounds of tha complete "syitem"; if the "modi"" here be understood to laclude the "Genera," we should have an orgno of a compass of three octaves and a tone, with some quartencones in it; but it might be much omaller than this. The "connpeadia ponorum" would appear to be slides, to cot of the wind nltogether, or from some ot the rasku of pipes, i.e. our modern "stops" (the harizuntal rows in the figure given abeve) ; and of "itisera vocum" would probably be the row of piper belonging to the same note (the vertical columne his the figure).
So St. Augustine (on Paslm cl.): "Quibus forthme ileo addidit organam, not ut singuiae bonent, sed ut diversitate concordissima consonent, sleut ordinantur in organo." Thus the organ would be likenad to a whule combination of dilteront simbical listruments.

Te wind was supplied either directly from a betuws worked by hand (in some ceses worked by the weight of a man standing on it), constltuthing a "p menmatic" organ; or the, wind from the bellows was subjected to a water presenre to steady ite supply, constituting an "hydraulic" organ. The latter airt was at first considered the better, but afterward it considered the better, but afterwards it was superseded by the other.
Vossinu (do Pocmatum Cantu) says that the use of hydrnulie organs had censel at the time of Casslodorus (isth century), and this author is cited as menloaing organs as in common use, He gives the following quotation from Claudian:
> - Vel qui, magna tevid ditrudene murmura tartu, Innumn ras voces kegetts modulatur abienac, Intonat "rraont digito penitusque trabait > Vecte laborantes in carmina concitut undas,"

From this it appears that the pipes were frequently made of bronze, and the sonad produced by drawing the slides.
This practice was continued as late as the tlme of St. Dunstan; the pipes are then described as "aerene fistulae" (W. Mlalmest. Vit: $S$, Aldhelmi).
Vossius tells us that the harbarians tried unsuceessfully to make hydranlic organs, and so usually they were made pnemmatic, with leather bellows, but that the, ydraulic obes were still considerel superior. He quotes Cassiodorus's description of one: "organum est quani turris quaedam diversis fistulis fabricata, quibus flatu follium vox copiosissima destinatur [var. lect. dixtinetur]; et ut eam modulatio decora compoaat, linguis quibusdam ligneis ab interion parte construitur, quas disciplinabilhter matgistrorum digiti reprimentes, grandisonam effciunt et suavissimam cantileuam."
There is a very singular poem representing an organ, by Publilius Porphsrius Optatianus (4th century); something in the style of the "Altars," "Easter Wiags," &e, of George Herbert. One thing seems to be clear from this poem, that the longest pipe, and therefire the bass of the organ, was nt the performer's right hand, precisely contrary to our present arrangement, but analogous to that of the harp, so far as the right hand of the performer is concerned. This arrangement was probably alopted as it appoading to that of the strings of the lire. It appears from the latter part of this poem that the pipes were made of bronze, and arranged in ranks in a quadrangular form, as in the figure given above, and these appear to have been the slides worked by the performer, to open and ohut the holes in which the pipes were placed; the wind being aupplied by a number of youthe each in charge of a bellows.
A reprosentation preserved in Gori's Thesaurus Diptychorum (said to be from a MS. of the time of Charlemagne) seems to egree with this very well. King bavid on a throne, playing a lyre, is accompranied by three men on a trumpet, a sort ol' violin or barbiter., and a set of belle (or perhaps cymbals); and ariner off is a pnenmatic organ, with the felormer (seated at the extreme right, in the eticircular part of the drawing) working the slldes, aud another blowing the bellows. It would seem most probable that the king la viewing one end of the rrgan, so as to see buth the organist and the bellows-blower, they belag on opposite shes of the iastrument. This would put the longent, i.e. the bass, pipes opposite the orgaulat's right hand. (See cut No. 1.)

At this end of the organ appear to be two other slides, and these weuld seem most prom bably to bo registers or stops, runaing unjer a rank of pipes such as thst shown in the drawing; there would, therefore, be suother shmilar author, quoted in Hawkins, Ifist. of Mfusic, $p$. 258), and an hydraulic one was rected at dix. la-Chapelle in $8: 20$, for Louis $t^{\prime}: l^{\prime} 1 \cdot 115$, by ne George, or rather Gregory, a Visetias, after the Greek manner (Vossius, de I'vernutum C'antu) ; but though the writera of that age had praised Gregory's undertaking, they did not say whetherit was a success. An organ was niso sent to Charlemagne, by the Caliph llaroun Alraschid, and was probably placed in one of the churches of Aix-la-Chapelle.
S. Alibhelin (de Lurude Virginum) is quoted in proof that the external pipes of organs in Saxon rank behind these; this vgan would be of two steps, unless some more were understood. The slides worked by the performer would run transversely to the ranks of pipea, and each slide would open two (or perhaps more) plpes of the same sound. The performer eeems to be pulling one slide out and pushing another in, thue pessing from one note of his tune to the following note. He had, previously to his performance, it would seem, gone to the bass end of tha instrument, and drawn out two steps.

The use of organs in churches is, on the authority of Platina and others, ascribed to pope Vitalian (658-672); but Lorinas gives it a higher antiquity. "Julianus, unus de auctoribus catenae in Job multo antiquior Vitaliano et Gregorio magno, ait cum pietate organs usurparl pesse, et jain in templis usnm illorum fuisse cuns scriberet." "In Concilio Coloniensi praecipitur sic alhiberi organorum in templis melodiam, ut non lasciviam magis qusm devotionem excitet, et ut prater hymnos divinos canticaqua spirituslia, quidquam resonet ac repraesentet. Pontifex in Capella, et graves quidam relligiosi, eornm abstinent usu." But in England the contrary practice obtsiagd, as the monastic churches were generally provided with organs, as appears from the account of the death of king Edgar (Sir H. Spelman, Glossar!!, e. v. Organ): but it does not appear that they were in use in any other charches. (Compare Mosic, p. 1346.)

timos were gllded. The quotation hitherto given consists of tha last thres lines of the followiag extract :-
> ${ }^{\omega}$ Si vero quiequam chordarum reapuit odas Et potiora cuplt quem pulset pectine chordas Quîs Psaimiate pius psallebat cantibus olim, Ac mentem maguo gestit modulumine pasci Et cantin gracill refugit conculutuadesse, Maxime millenis auscuitans organa flabris, Mulceat auditum ventods follibus iste, Quanilbet auratis filgescant caetera capsis."

It appesrs to the writer of this article that the coatrsry is rather proved-that the besutifal appearance arising from gilding, &e., refers to other instruments, and that the organ had to appeal for its adoption to considerations of seand only, and had the diasdvantage of an uppleasing appearance. Certainly the representations of it nre not very attractive to tha sight. But this passsge does prove that organs in the 7th and 8th centuries wera large, althongh "milleais" must be considered somewhat indefinite. So St . Augustine, "quod grande est" above. Net much later than our period an organ was erected af Winchester, with fourteen bellows and 400 pipes, 40 to each key. This also had the "lyric semitone," and it would seem most probable that its compass was

If this be true, the bass pipes had got placed at the performer's left hand, as wa have got them now. ORIENTATION. A term applied to the situation of churches, with the sanctuary, or part contaioing the altar, towards the east.

One of the earliest traces of orientation is fonnd in the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 57), "And first Iet the house be oblong, turned tovards the east, the pastopheria on either sida towards the east." It in asserted, indeed, by Mabillon (de Lituryia Gallicana, i. 8), when speaking of the ancient churches, that "they all used to end in an apsis or bow, and nsed to look towards the east." Thia-statement, however, needs some qualification. For the chureh of Antioch is described by Socrates (Hist. Eccl. Lib. v. cap. 22), who says that "it had its position inverted; for its altar looks not towards the East, but towards the Weat." Paulinus speaks of the orientation of a church, not as the universal or obligatory usage, but only as "morem usitatiorem." On the whole, it appears that the enstern position of the altar was the rule, but that there were exceptions to it from very early times. For the origin of this usage, see EAst, p. 586.

In the attempt to form an opinion upon the subject we must not lose aight of the fnet that othere besides Christiana have had a rule of the kind. There is an elaborate discussion of the point in the Lexicon Uwiversile of Hofmann (a. v. Occidens). He shews, upon the authority of Joaephua, that both in the tabernacle and in the temple the arrangements of the structure were auch as to cause the Jewish worahippers to face, not towards the enst, but towards the west, in the functiona of religion. Maimonides (On Prayer, enp. xi. 1, 2) traces the usaga to a still higher nntiquity, finding evidence in Scripture itself that auch was the position adopted by Abraham upon Mount Moriah-a position which amongst the Jews whe not confined to tabernacle and temple, but extended likewias to synngegue and prayerhouse. He adds a reason of the uange-that inamuch as the gentile heathen faced toward the east, it was proper that the people of God should adopt the opposite position. Under this head the following passege from a vizion of Ezakiel is relevant: "And he brought me inte the inner court of the Lerd'a house, anl, behold, at the door of thatemple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar, were about fiva and twenty men, with their backa toward the temple of the Lord and their faces toward the east; and they worshipped the sun toward the enst" (Ezek, viii. 16). There is aome difficulty in harmonizing the statements of Vitruvius and other pagan writers of autherity as to the orientation of the altar, the sacred image, sud the worshipper in the temples of the heathen. But the following passige of Clement of Alexandria may perhapa be taken as giving a clear and accurate account of their usage: "The most ancient temples (of the pagans) looked towards the west (i.e. had their entrance towarls the west), that those who stood with their face towards the image might be tnught to turn towsrds the east" (strum. vii. 7, § 43). Hence the practice of orientating a ehurch may be, in its origin, one of those many customs which Christianity found current in the pagan world, and which by a wise ceonomy it took up and turned to its own purpose. A long discourse on the entire subject will be found by those who wish to pursue it farther in the Annals of cardianal Baronius (Ann. 58, c. 105).

(2) A.D. 533, or 536 according to Mansi, June 23; by order of the kings of France, when twenty-one canons on discipline were passed, to which Honoratus, bishop of Bourges, subscribed first, Leontiua, bishop of Orleans, second, with twenty-four bishops and five representatives of absent bishopa after thein. As regards their matter, the seven first relate to bishops, metropolitsos, and councils; the eighth and minth to deacons and presbyters; the tenth and eleventh to marrisge. By the thirteenth, abbuts, guardisns of shrines (martyrarii), recluses, and presbytera, are inhibited from giving letters of peace (epintolia: which is, however, the correction of Du Cange, for apostolia, which he cannot explsin). "Presbyter, vel diaconus aine literis," says the sixteenth, "vel si baptizandi ordinem nescist, nuliatenus ordinctur." The aeventeenth sad eighteenth are directed against deaconesses, of whom no more are to be ordained. By the aneteenth, Jews and Christians may not intermarry. By the twentieth, Catholica who go back to idolatry, or partake of meats offered to idols, are to be excluded from church-nssembliea. By the twenty-first, nbbats refusing to obey bishops are to be excluded from communion. This cuacil is not given in the Isidorian collection. (Mansi, viii. 835-40.)
(3) $\ldots$ D. 538 , May 7, the preface to which seems lardly consistent with so short an interval betwee.s this and the list council; and this, on the other haod, is given in the Isidorian collection. It was attended by ninetcen-bishops, of whom the netropolitan of Lyona subscribed first, and the bishop of Orleans last, and by the representatives of seven absent bishops. Thirtythree canons on discipline were passed, most of them testifying to a general negleet of the canons from the metropolitan downwards, and aome of them not easy to underatand. [Communion, Holy, p. 419.] The thirtieth forbida Jews to mix with Christians from Maundy Thursday till Easter Monday. The thirty-first threatena the civil judge with excommunication who permits heretica to rebaptize Catholics with impunity, because, say the bishops, "It is certain that we hava Catholic kings." Thirty-eight canons wera passed; but it ia to bo observed that noither this nor the next council la iucluded in ths Isidorian collection. The first and necond canous relate to Easter. The fifteenth and sixteenth shew that paganiam was not yet extinct in France; the seventcenth that there were pricsta and deacona who were married men, though it. prohibits their living as such; the twentieth decrees: "Ut nullua asecularium personarum, practermisso pontitice, seu praeposito ecclesiae, quemquam clericorum pro auà potestate constringere, discutere andeat, vel damuare . . ." The twenty-seventli reaewa the teuth canon of the preceding council of Orleana "tbree years before," and likewise the thirtieth of that of Epanng A.D. 517, against incestuous marriagea. (Mansi, ix. 111-22).
(5) A.D. 549, Oct. 28, convened by king Childebert, when, according to some manuscripts, the bishop of Lyons, according to others, the bishop of Arles subscribed first, and the other secoud; furty-eight more bishops and twentyone representatives of absent bishopa complete the list; but the bishop of Orleans was not among them, having been unjustly banished, though he was restored here. Twentyfour canons were passed, the first of which is somewhat after date, directed against the followers of Eutyches and Nestorius. The second ordains, "Ut nullus aacerdotum quemquam rectae fidei hominem pro parvia et levibus causia a communione suspendat ..."; the ninth, "Nullus ex laicis absque anni conversione prae. missà episcopus ordinetur. . ", and the twelfth, "Nulli viventi episcopo slius superponatur aut superordinetur episcopus; nisi forsitan in ejus locum, quem capitalis culpa dejecerit." The fifteenth relates to a hospice (xenodochium) founded at lyons by the ling and his cousort (Mansi, ix. 127-40).
(6) A.D. 6:38, "ou environ," say the authors of L'Art de vérif. les Dates, but it is variously fixed, and the sole anthority for it is a vague statement by Audoenus, archbishop of Rouen, in his Life of St. Eligius, to the effect that an un-nained heretio was confuted in a meeting of bishops at Orleans, due to the exertions of that aaint previoualy to hia being made bishop. It can hardly pass, thereforc, for a sixth council. (Mansi, x. 759-62.)

ORPHANAGE (ठофа⿱отрофейоу, orphano trophium). From the very first the duty of assistiag the orphan, among the other classes of destitute nad helpless persons, was recogaised ns incumbent on tha Christian. St. Igaatius (Ep. ad. Smyrn. cap. Vi.) mentions it as ono of the marks of the heterodos t!at "they eare not for the widow, the orphan, or the distreased." Again and again in the Apostolical Constitutions exhortations are given concerning them to the bishop to protect them, to individual Christians to remember them in their charity and, if posible, to adopt them. The way in which they are enumernted in the Clementine IIturgy is the Deacon's. Litany, along with "Reaiders, aingers, virgius and wldows," auggeste that perhups there mny have been some sort of formal "church roll" kept of them, and it la obvious that so long as the church was a proscribed and persecuted rellgious body, her provislun for them could not hava gone beyond some auch lnstltution as thls. With the time of Constantine came endowments for this nad similnr purposes, which he formally permittad, and himaslf set the example of giving. (Euseb. II. E. x. 6, and Vit. Const. iv. 28). It was looked upon as a fitting duty for a clerle to undertake the guardianahip of orphans, and in managing thair attinirs even to miugle in secular business (Conc. Chatied, o. 3). Clerics seem commonly to have been at the head of orphanages and hospitals (Zonaras in can. 8, Conc. Chalced.). At Conetantinople the orphanotrophua, who was necessarlly a priest, and who was a public guardian of the orphans, was an official of high rank. [Hospitais.]

By a Frankish capitulury (Cone. Gcrm. I]. 29) immunities are granted to orphanages expressly, along with other charitable foundations; shewing that hy the beginalng of the 9th century such institutions were widely recognised.

Both at Rome and Conatautinople orphans from the orphanage were employed as chorlsters, so that in some Greek rituals (see Gour, p. 359) the word రpфaves ls ased for "cholr-boys," and at Rome (see Anast. Blblioth. in V'ita Seryii $I I$.) the orphanotrophlum came to be used ns the Schola Cantorum.

OSTIANUS, presbyter and confessor In Vivarois; commemorated Juae 30. (Usuard. Mart. ; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. v. 578.)
[C. H.]
 It is argued by Bingham (Antig. lii. 6) that the order of ostiarii was introduced at Rome in a time of persecution, the earliest mention of them beling in a letter of Cornclius, bishup of Roma, in the 3rd century (Euseb. Hist. vi. 43). The order has been laid asidite in the Greek church from the time ef the Trullan council (A.d. 692). But whatever may have been the date of the introduction of the oatiarius as a functionary of the church, the word was certainly used in a vary similar sense in pagan times. For not only was there an ostiarius (the modern concierge) at the entrance of a private house under the Roman empire; but while the basilicn was still a court of justice it had an ollicer (ostiarius) whose duty it wa to regalate the approach of the litigants to tha judge, and whose name still survives in the French term huissier, and the English usher, applied to officials who are charged with similar dutics. (See Hofmann, Lex Criv. a. v.) [Compare Doorkeeper.]

The definition of his duties given by Chsrle. magne (Fragm. de Ritib. Vet. Ecel.) is as follows: "Ostiarius ab ostio ecclesias dicitur, quod ita debet praevidere, ne ullo nodo paganus ingrediatur eccleaiam, quis suo introitu polluit eam. Debet etiam custodire ea quae intra ecclesiam sunt, nt salva sint." The first duty then of the ostiarius was to keep the door of the church, but only that one through which the mea entered. The door through which the women passed was kept by a deaconess (Constit. Apost. ii. 61, quoted by Mede, Opp. p. 327). The object of this guardianship was to prevent the entry of improper persons. Martene observes from St. Augustine that the ostinrii of the Donatists would admit no ove to their churches till they had enquired of him to which com. munion (sc. orthodux or Donatist) he belonged (de Eiccl. Rit. i. viii. 8, 10). In the sncient Roman church a custem prevailed of the ostiarius asking every one for a certificate of faith (libellum fidci) before admitting him into St. Peter's. To the great church of Constantinople there wers attached no fewer than seventyfive ostiarii (Suicer, The aurus, 1417).

In the fragment of the letter of pope Cornelius to Fabius of Antioch, the Ostiarii ase apoken of with exorcists and lectors as amounting to fifty-two. (Migne, p. 743.)

The ostiarii wera termed an ordo, the word nged of their appointment was ordinare; and this "ordination" was solemnly performed by the bishop, with a service which appears to have been substantially the same in all the sncient Rituals and Pontificals. See Ordination, IIl. ii. 1, p. 1510.

By the sfnod of Laodicea (cent. 4) the ostiarii were forbidden, in common with all other clerics, to enter a public house (can. 24). From another canod (22) of the same council, it might be inferred that the duties of the ostiarius were st times performed by other orders. "The minister (subdeacon: Hefele) may not leave his place st the door." [See Doorkespers, p. 574.]
[H. T. A.]
OSTIARIUS (Monastic), the porter of the monastery ; sometimes called " janitor," or "portarius."

The gatekeeper or doorkeeper was $3 D \mathrm{im}$ portant personage in the monsstery, entrusted as he was with the twofold reaponsibility of keeping the monks from going out, unless with the abbat's permission, and of allowing straogers to come in. Belng thus the medium of communication between the monastery and the world outside, it was imperative that he should be 8 msu of trustworthiness and discrimination. The very lowliness, in one sense, of the office made it all the more honourable among those whose professed aim and object in life was self-abssement (Rafin. Hist. Monach. c. 17).

The importance of keeplng the members of the monastery within its walls was admitted geyerally, in accordance with the old Benedictive rule that each monnstery ought, if pessible, to hars its garden, mill, bakery, supply of water, and aecessary tradea within it precincts (Bened. Reg. c. 66). Only one way of egress was permitted, or at most two. Much dejeaded on the porter being discreet (Bened. Rey. c. 66). He was to be a man not only advanced in years but grave and sedate in character, dead to the world; with s youager and more uimble monk to carry messages for him if necessary ( 1 b.). By the rule of Magister there were 10 be two porters, both aged men, one to relieve the other (Reg, Ma $\mathrm{f}_{\mathrm{\prime}}$ c. x. xev.). In the Thebaid in such esteem was the office held that the porter was to be a presbyter (Pallad Hist. Laus. c. 1xxi.). Sometimes, in earlier days, when visitora were not so numerons, the porter had also the superintendence of the guest-chamber (hospitium) and of the outer cloisters, as well as of the abbat's kitchen. (Martene, li'g. Bin. Comm. c. 66.)

Simetines, indeed, the porter was promoted to be sblat (Martene, tu. s.). Benedict gives an enpecial emphasis to the chapter in his rule ("De 0 .tiario "), by ordering it to be read aloud repeatedly, that ignorance might never be pleaded for its infraction.
The porter's cell was to be close to the gatewry (lb.). He was to inapect all comers through a small barred window or grating in the door, biddiag those whom he thought worthy to wait within the door, and the rest without, till he could learn the abbat's pleasure. Every night at the hour of compline he was to take his keys to the abbat or prior. When called a way to chapel, to refectory, or to lection, he was to leave the gate locked, neither ingress nor eqress being allowed at those times. It was part of his duty to distribute the broken meat and other scraps of food atter meals to the mendicants waiting outside the door, and to aee that the horses, dogs, &c., of strangera were duly attended to. (ll.)
Benedict apeaks of risitors knocking at the door or crying out to be let in. Some ntators have imagined that he apeaks is of the rich and the poor ( $I_{5}$.). section that the porter is to reply "Deo Giatias," or "Benedic," has been similarly explained as meant for these $t$ wo classea re"ppectively; Another reading is "Benedicat." "Beoedic" or "Benedicat" is supposed to be intended for a priest-porter, "Deo Gratiss" for a laymsn; or the latter to be ased on first hearing the knock or cry, the former on accostiog the applicant (1b.; cf. Augustin. Enarrat. in Pss, crxxii.). Anyhow, this curious trait of monastic manners recalls the primitive salutation of Boaz an his reapers in the story of Rath in the Old Testsment. The word were to be spoken gently, reverently, affectionately.
It was one of the lixities of later ages that thls Important ollice was not unfrequently delegated tos lsy-brother, technically styled a "converaus," or sometimes to a mere layman. Even so atrict an order as the Cisterciana allowed one of the two porters in their larger abbeya to be a laybrother. (Marteue, u. s.)
There was an official in nunneries whose duties corresponded very closely with those of the "ostiarins." It was splecially enacted in the suonymous Rule, ascribed by some to Columba, that the "ostiaria" or porteress should be not ouly aged and discreet, but not given to gosripping. (Rej. PAENULA．1．Etymology．－Although it would seem that this word is not used at all in ecclesiastical Latid ${ }^{\circ}$ as the name of a Christian vestment，still the corresponding Greek word， variously spelt，is the recugnised name in the Greek church for the vestment known in the weat as a chasuble［Casula］，and the same thing is denoted in the Syrian churches by a word directly formed from the Greek．More－ over，although the word paenula is not used in this way，yet apparently the paenula itself resembled in shape，even if it was not quite identical with，the casula and planeta．We shall therefore briefly discuss in our article the history of the Latin word itself．

It first，however，becomes a question whether the Latin word is derived from the Greek，or the Greek from the Latin，or whether both are to be referred for their origin to a third langusge，as the Phoenician．The absence of any very satisfactory derivation in either Greek or Latin would be， ss far as it goes，in favour of the third view， were anything reasonable forthcoming．We do， indeed，find in Hebrew｜h＇o，for a kind of outer garment（Tal n．Jer．，K̇elim，c． 29 ；cited by Buxtorf，Lrxicon Chaldaicum，col．1742），but this is most probably merely a reproduction of $P$ ：llium；nad in any case there is no evidence to justify us in including it in the list of words that passed from Pboenician into Greek and thence into Latin．

It has been very commonly asserted，with reference to St．Pnul＇s use of the word in 2 Tim． iv．13，a passage to which we shall refer at length presently，that it is to be taken as one of the many Latin words occurring in the New Testa－ ment．This view seems to us to be entirely un－ tenable，from the fact that the Greek ward can be traced back nearly to the time of Alexander
－We find in laidore of Sovilie（Orig．xix． 24 ；Patrol． ixxxii．691），＂l＇enula eat pallifum［here evidently a mere peneral term for an outer garment，like i $\mu$ átiov］cum fimbriis longis；＂but bere the word is of conrse not used by lilm as an ecclesiastical term，but merely in its ordinary sense．Also in an oid Latin version of the letter of tha Patriarch Nicephurus cited below，which is given by larunius（Annales，odi ann，B11），we find фaıvóıav ren－ dered by penula．The translator（probably Anastasius 1stbliothecarins）was doubtleas influenced by the simi－ Larity of the word，but the inatance cannot be aupposed （t）Bfind the lrast support to the bellef that the paenula was the name of an eccieniastical vestment in the Wext－ ern Church．Binterim（lenkw，iv．1，208）remarks that ＂the pianeta was also called paenula by the anclents，＂ but he glves no evidence for this assertion，and it doca nut seem very likely that any is adducible．
the Grent，a period at which it cannot be fancied that Greek adopted any words from Latin．The word ocenrs in a fragment of the／phiyenia in Tauris of Rhinthon，a writer of comedies，or rather burlesque tragediea，in the time of Ptolemy I．As this seems the earliest adducibls． instance of the use of the word，we shall cite the passage with ita context from the Onomas－ ticon of Julins l＇ollux（vii． 60 ；p．288，ed．

It will be observed that the citation is in Doric Greek，Rhinthon being a native of either Tarentum or Syrncuse．b

The word фatvodns continuel to exist in Greek in its ordinary sense，quite apart from Christianity．It occurs in the digeat of Epictetus given by Arrisn（lib．iv．c． 8 ；vol．i．p．637，ed． Schweighseuser）．Again，we find in the Uneiro－ critica of Artemidorns，a wark written ahout the time of Antoninus Piue，that the $\delta \lambda \in \gamma \delta \mu \mathrm{evos}$ $\phi$ aırбえךs is associated with the $\chi^{\lambda a \mu \nu i s}$ or $\mu a \nu \delta$ buas as $^{2}$ to its significance in drenms（lib．ii． c．3；p．135，ed．Reiff）．Abont the same time， or a little later，Athenaeus uses the word：－oi

We shall next cite from the Greek lexico－ graphers．Here，it will be observed，we meel with a diversity both in form and menning；for， besides its use for an onter garment，it is slso stated to mean a roll of parchment，and a case or cofler．Whether this difference is to be ex－ plained by assuming the existence of two origin－ ally distinct words，фaiv $\delta \lambda \eta s$ and $\phi$ ai $\lambda \delta \nu \eta s$ ，does not nppesr，nor does it matter for our iresent purpose．e．As far as we are concerned，there csa be no doubt from the spelling consistently found in the above cited examples，and from the on－ varying form of the Latin，that the original and proper spelling of our word is qaivoin $\eta s$ ；ths other spelling being either that of nother word， or a nutre metathesis for the former．It will bs observed that the lexicographers give some sup－ port to the former hypothesis．Thus Hesychius

 Magnum definea $\phi \in \lambda \delta \nu \eta$ s in alinost the same worda as the first of the above three, und фauv $\quad$ $\lambda \eta$ ns also as Suidas hnd done. It is perhnps worth noting, that while spellings in which the $v$ precedes the $\lambda$ are alwnys defined in the sense of garment, those in which the $\lambda$ precedes the have either no mention of garment, or have it at the end, as if a subsequent uddition. It is of course quite possible to assume the esistence of two originally distinct words, and yet explain each as the name of some kind of garment (ao Snlmasius, l.c.). In any case, however, the latter spelling, as well as the former, with various inodifications of the vowels, occurs for the Greek name of the Christinn restment. Again, passing this point, it seema doubtful whether the word is $\delta$ фaivod $\lambda \eta$ or $\dot{\eta}$ фaivo $\lambda \eta$. The line of Rhinthon makes it tne teminine, nad the Latin, it is true, is feminine [but the termination in $\eta \mathrm{r}$ would naturally be replaced by one in $a$, which would be feminine, if there were no special resson for making it masculine; so, e.g. xdpins, кох入^as, yaváraar, sll masculine, nre replaced by the feminine charta, cochlea, ,/ausapa], but our later Greek citations make it mnsculine. Whether there is a misreading in Rhinthon for kauvb, which misreading has been reproduced in Hesychius, or whether the old terininntion was in $\eta$, sad the later one in $\eta s$, it is impossible to say. As regards the varintion in spelling of the first syllable between $a_{1}$ and $\epsilon$, we can hardly doubt that the $\in$ is a mere corruption, especinlly when the I.atill spelling is considered, where, whether we write the diphthong ae or the vowel e, the first syllable is uniformly long.
2. Use of the woord in Latin.-We ahsll next, befors considering the Christian usage of the word, examine its use in Latin. Here we find it freely used from the time of Plautus onwards, to iadicste a warm, heavy outer garment, for travelling or cold weather. This covered the whole person, having merely a hole for the head to pass through; and thus it did not require sleeves, but fell over the arms. The general impression, lett from a considersble series of passages (see Forellini, s. $v$.) is that the garment was ooe which would not be worn by a person in the bigher ranks of life, save under the special circumstances given above, though it would be Forn as an erdinary dress by slaves and the like. Our earliest instance is from Plautus (Mfostelliri:, ir. 2. 74), where a slave is told thnt it is ouly his paenula that ssves his back from a beating. Considering the source whence Plautus's comedies were drawn, the fact that the Latin word is Ours trscest trace is found in without significauce. Our nest trace is found in one of the fragments of the Satires of Lucilius (lib. xv. frag. $6 ;$ cited, as slso the two following instances, by Noujus Marcellus, xiv. 3). In one of the farces (fabulue Atellanae) of Pomponius Bononiensis, one chnracter bids another, "paenulam in caput induce,

paenula

ne te noscat," referring preaumably to the hood, with which the pucnula, like nost other similar dresses, was furnished [Hoov]. Varro agnin is cited, "'non quarenda est homini, qui habet virtutem, paenula in inbri."
In Cicero the word is usell seversl times. In his speech pro Milone (c. 10; cf. c. 20), he tella how Milo, when on his way from Rome in a carringe, having his wife with him, and wearing a prenula (paenulut/rs), on being nttackell, springs from the earringe und ensts aside his paenula, which would only fetter his arms. Iu his speech pro Sextio (c. 38), he spenks of the pacnulu as n garment worn by mule-drivers. Cicero nlso uses the phrases scindere paenulum, attingere paenulam alicujus, to indicate respectively over-urgent civility, and "taking a man by the button-hole" (Epp. ad Atticum, lib. xiii. 33). We have ssid that the pacnula was a warm, henvy garment, and thas Horace (Epist. i. 11. 18) speaks jokingly of it ns a thing which no one would drenm of wearing in het weather. It was generslly made of wool (pacnulu gousapina: Martisl, Epil. xiv. 145), but sometimes of leather (paenula scortea: ${ }^{i}$. 130). Martial (v. 27) contrasts paenulatus with toyatus, as indicating a lower rank in society. Juvenal (Sat. v. 79) makes the prrasite, when on his way to dioner with his patron on a stormy night, complain of his dripping paunla. It seems also to have been used as a soldier's overcont (Suetonlus, Galba, e. 6; Tertullinn, de Cor. Mil. e. 1). In travelling, indced, the paenula might be made to serve the purpose of a blanket by night, as well as a cloak by day (Seneca, Epist.
Ixxuvii. 2 ). Ixxxvii. 2).
The Historiae Augustae Scriptores furnish us with several instances of an interesting kind. Spartianus tells of Hadrinn that. when tribune he lost his patenula, which he took as an omen of his future imperinl dignity, since tribunes wore a paenula to keep off the rain, but emperors never (c. 3, where see the notes of Salmasius and Casaubon). Agnin, Lampridius mentions that Commodus (c. 16), after the death of $n$ certain gladintor, ordered the senators' to come to the spectacle, not in the toga, which was white, but in the paenula, which was, ns a rule, dark-coloured. Lampridius remarks that this was "contra consuetudinem," that is, doubtless the wearing of the paenula was still not common among the better classes, except under special conditions. Indeed of this n further proof is given by Lampridius, in the life of Alexnuder Severus (c. 27), in that this emperor gave special permission to senators to wenr the pacnuld in Rome, ns a protection agninst cold, but did not extend this permission to inntrons, who were only allowed to use it on a journey. This need not be assumed to contradict the remark of 'Spartianus given nbove, for we may suppose Alexander to be permitting the wearing of this dress as a warm cloak at the discretion of the wearer, whereas before it needed bad weather to justify its use, nnd was thought to be a kind of undress, so that emperors never used it. Lampridius, in his life of Diadumenus, the poor little son of Macrinus, who was Auguatus before he was ten years old, tellg (c. 2) how, on the child's assumption of the name Antoninus, the father hal prepared for dis-tribution to the people "paenulas coloria rosei" [here probably equivalent to rissei; ef. Trebell. Vit. Cluudii, c. 14], which were to be called Antonisiante.

We pass over here a passnge of Tertullian, till We have spoken of the use of the word by St. Paul, and shall nest refer to a law in the Theodosisn code, publiehed in A.D. 382, as to the dress to be worn by aenators and others. In this senators are forbidden to assume the warlike garb of the chlamys, but are orlered to wear the peaeeful dress of colobium and puenula. It is added that officials " per ques statuta complentur ac necessaria peraguntur" are also to use the paenuhe. Penalties are provided in case of disobedience (Cexd. The dos. lib. siv. tit. 10, l. 1, where see Githofredus's note).
3. Usc of the word by St. Paul.-We must now consider the use of the word by St. Paul ( 2 Tim. Iv. 13), "The cloke that I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments." The word here traaslated "cloke" by the E. V. Is found variously spelt in the MSS. as $\phi \in \lambda \delta \boldsymbol{\nu} \eta \mathrm{r}$, undeubtedly the true reading. It will be obeerved that in all these cases the $\lambda$ precedes the $\nu$. The old Latin version (Subatier, in loc. ; cf. also Tartullian, de Orat. 15 ; de Cor. Mil. 8) and the Vulgate render the word by pacnula, evidently thinking it the same word; but the l'eshilto trans-

latea it by (a casé for books).

Again, Chrysostom (Hom. in lnc.; vol. xi. p. 780, edi. Gaume) mentions this view, " by фe入óvns here he means the outer garment ( ${ }^{\mu} \mu \alpha^{\prime}$ iov). But some think it means the case ( $\gamma \lambda \omega \sigma \sigma \delta$ ко $\mu$ ov) where the books lay." Jerome, too (Epist. 36 ad Damastm, § 13, vol. i. 167), says, "volumen Hebraeum replieo, guod Prulus $\phi \in \lambda \delta \nu \eta \nu$ juxta quesidam voeat." It is impussible, however, to speak here with any great degree of certainty. The only independent evidence, apart, that is, from this jpassage, for the meaning of "case," is apparently that of the Greek lexicographers, but possibly these have only cited Chrysostom. Then, too, it may be said that the notion of the "ease" may have been suggested merely by the context, still, it might have been thought, if the word were merely the name of a well-known garment, It would be a somewhat unlikely mistake for a translator to make. Further, the rendering of the Peshito is the more worthy of notice, seeing that in eeelesiastical Syriac the derived from the Greek as the name of the vestment.
If we assume that the apostle is asing the word in the sense of a garment, then increased point will be given to the urgent wish (v. 21) that Timothy should come before winter, the aged apostle feeling the need of extra warm pro-

[^88]tectlon against the cold. Here the matter might have been allowed to rest, as one ineapal, of positive solution, seelng that there is much to be baid for cither view, were it not that sume writere (Carijian Bona [Rer. Liturg. 1. 24.8] and others) have gravely argued that the apos:le bere deslres Tlinothy to bring the chasuble he had left behind him. We have seen that there is a respectable amount of evidence for exjlaining the word as not meaning a garment at all, but, walving this, positively the only direct evilence for the above theory is that this word in a modified spelling (фaivóiov, \&c.) Is the techaical Greek word for a chasuble. Chrysostom, however, took it for an ordinary outer garment ; and this is significant, when taken in connexion with the ao-ealled Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, where the word фaivóniov occurs for the ecelesiastical vestment, shewing, as it does, that at the end of the 4th century the word had not been restricted into ite speeinl eucharistic meaning, otherwise St. Chrysostom would hardly have expressed himself as he does. Again, nearly two hundred years before the time of St. Chrysoston, we find Tertullisn shewing very distinctly the views of hls time (de Oratione, i 15). Nis has been speaking of certain practices as belonging to superstition rather than to religion, and thas mentions that it was the custom of some to lay aside their paenula lefore eagaging in prayer, as the heathen did in their idel temples. Eut for this there is no anthority, " nnless," he adds irenically, " anyone thinks that Paul, from har. ing engaged in prayer at the house of Carton, had thus left his paenula behind him. Gol, I suppose, does not hear men elad in a pacaula, Who yet heard effectually the three saints in the furnace of the king of Babylon, as they praved in their sarabarae and turbans."' Tertnlilian here laughs at the idea of St, Paul's having takea of his paenula to pray. The notion of this garmeat having been one specially put on for the eacharistic service is evidently utterly toreign to the sense of the passage. The gist of Tertulliana's remark is merely, "What a toolish notion it is of these people to think it unseemly to go to chureh in a paenula!" He could hardly hsre spoken in this way, had he thougit, or had people generally in his time thought, that $S$. Paul's pienula was really a sacrificial vestment. ${ }^{\text {b }}$ It may be added here that in a commeatary on the 2nd Epistle to Timothy appended to the works of Jerome, but npparently spurious, the theory is broached that this paenula was sa offering from some convert, whieh was to be sold for the apostle's benefit (Comm. in lo: rol. xi. 429). This too is utterly foreiga to ay notion of a chasuble. Of course the sjurionsuess or genuineness of this document makes little matter to our present purpese, which is to show the general way in which the passage was anciently understood.

Again, as regards the identity of the term with the word in Jater Greek, this of itself will not count fer much, when we consider of how many other vestments this might bs said, h It to amazing to find that Sula, the editor of Cardiost Booa, ean gravely remaik (vot. hi. 238, ed. Turiu, tri9), " fuprunc ttaque Tertultiant aevo qui Pauti peaulam ore tionts vestem seu sacrificatem putareut." Comment on such perversity is superfluous.

As regaris early Easteru pictures of this dress (ior the West is not now in question, for there the corresponding vestment appears first as planatn and then as casula), we may refer first to mosaics existing in the vault of the church of St. George at Thessalonica. These have been figured from coloured drawings taken on the apot, in Taxier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture (reproduced in Marriott's Vesturrium Cliristianum, plates xviil.-xxi.), who give argumente to show that the church was built by Constantine himself during his first stay at Thessalonica.

The word phenolion is aiso used in the Greek church as the name of the special vestment of a "reader," who, on being made a sub-deacon, has it replaced by the stichurion (ib, 936, 244.) A phenolion was also worn as a special jrivilege by the archicacon of the clergy attached to the palace of Constantinople, on the Suniay of the Adoration of the Cross (see the articia), but only on that one occasion (Codinus Curojaiatu, c. 9).

Paganism (in Cimistian Art). In a former article [Fresco] atteption has been called to the intimnte connexion between early Christian art and that of the pagan commnnity in which the church arose, and from which its first members were gathered. It will be unnecessary to repeat what has been there said of the absence of any strict line of demarcation between the system of decoration adopted by the adherents of the new faith, and those to which they hal been accustomed as members of a heathen society, and the rarity of anything in their earliest pictorial and sculptural representations distinctive of the religion they had embraced, which rendered primitive Christian art little morn than the continuation of that which they found already existing, puritied and elevated by the influences of their new fuith.

In the same article reference has been made to the manner in which distinctly mythological personages were pressed into the service ot the church, and, a new spirit being breathed into old forms, ebjects, persons, and scenes, to which the mind was familiarised in connexion with pagan myths, were made the channeis of conveying to the iaitiated the higher truths of which they became the symbols, and "all that was true and beautitul in the old legends found its fulfilment in Christ, and was but a symbol of His life and work."-(Farrar.)

It remains now briefly to shew how this principle was carried out in detail, and mythological types and classical forms were made the expobents of Christian doctrine.

We have at the outset to distinguish between (1) that cinss of subjects which contained a fundamental religious idea common to l'aganish and Christianity, which, dimly shaduwed forth in the one, recejved its fuil development in the other; and (2) those in which the resemblance is merely formul sad external, the mytholugicai rapresentutions sanplying a vehicle for Christian liteas. To thesa we may ald (3) the atili more abuninnt ciass in which claswical forms and lileas ure usel simply as ornamental accessories, without any symbolical reference.

1. The first cinsa ln which a sulject from pagan mythology is used typically to depiet some Christian truth is a very small one. The deep-sented foulness of the myths of chassical antiguity, on which the early Christian writen were never weary of eniarging, caused a nataral revulsion of the Christinn mind from them, and rendered them, generaliy through their asveriations, quite unsuited for conveying saerel truths.
(1) The only subject borrowed from Pasan mythology which gained any general neceptance in Christian art, is that of Orplieus tamiag the wild animals by the notes of his lyre. Almost from the beginaing, the power of Orpheus in subduing the ferocity of savage brasts and gathering them round him in mutual harmony, vas regarded as tyrical of the nil-conquering influence of Christ's Gospel in taming the firre passions of the human hesrt, and uniting warring anil discordant tribes in one common homaga to their universally-acknowledgei Diaster. (De Rossi, Rom. Sutt. ii. 1. 3.i7, c. 14.) 'The myth of Orpheus wis thus regaridel as an adntnbration of the words of Christ (lohn xij. 32), " 1 , if i be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me," and a parallei to the well-known prophecies of Isilah, in which the sime symbolism is adopted (ls. xi. 6-9, |xv. 25). In this reference the Orphic myth is not unfrequently alluded to by the writers of the eariy church (Clem. Alesandr. Cohort. ad Gentes, c. 1 ; Euseb. de $L_{\text {tw }} l_{\text {, }}$, Constunt. c. xiv.; Greg. Nyss. in Hexuen. c. 7 ; Chrysost. Honnil. xii. c. 3i., Genes. Honil. xxiii. in c. vi, ; Momil. xix. in c. ix.; Cassiod. in Ps. xix. ; cf. Lactant. Inst. vii. 24). Orphens is still more often niluiled to by the Fathers, and the writings ascribed to him, in common with the Sibyliine verses, quated as affording testimony to the unity of God and other points of Christian truth (Theophil. Autol. iii. 2 ; Just. Mart. Cohort. ad Graec. c. 15, de Monarch. c. 2; Clem. Alexandr. Strom. v. 12, 14 ; Lactant Instit. i. 5, 6 ; Avg. Contr. Faust. xili. 15, 太c.) We cinnot, therefure, be surprised that he should become a favourite subject of early Chrintian art. The most remarkable representation of Orpheus is that from the ceiling of a cubiculum in the cemetery of St. Callistus, of which a woodeat is given, Vol. I. 1. 696 (Bosio, p. 2:9; Bottari, ii. tav. lxiil. ; Aringhi, i. $5+7$; Gaurneci, Pitture, tav. 25 ; Perret, i. pl. xxxiv. bis, p. 35). The subject occupies the central octagonal patal of the ceiling, the surrounding panels containing slternately fandscapes and scenes trom the 01d and New Testaments. Orpheus displays the hieratic type of a young man in a high Phrygian bonnet, and loose frock, his legs ciotheil with ananyrides, embroidered with a chlamys. He its among trees, holds has lyre in his left had, and beats time with his right foot. A lioa, tiger, horse, peacuck, and uther birds and beasts staod round him. An arcosoliun from the same

No example of the subject is lound in mosaic or in miniatures.
(2) The Sirens were Introduced Into Christian trpoligy as embiems of temptations to sensual indulgence, to which the man of God, aymbolised by Ulyese, was exposed as he traversed the waves of the troublesome world on his way to the ahere of everlasting rest (Maxim. Turin. IIomil. i. de pass. et cruce Demini; Hippolyt. Philosophum. viii. 1), and which he was enaliled to overcome br the crose of Christ, as Ulysses fastenad hime velf to the mast. One such representution only has come down to ua, and that not certainly Chriatian. It is a frugment of a sareophagus discovered by De Roasi in the cemetery of St. Cosilistus, assignoed to the 3rd century, and deucribed by him (Dulletino, 1863, p. 35 ; Romut Qult i. tav. xxx. p. 5 ; Martigny, Dietionn. art. Clysse; Northcote, pp. 232, 298). Ulysins sits weeping in his vessel with two companions. The three sirens stand around, in the form described by lsidore (Orig. xi. 3, 30), half woman, half bird, with wings and clawe ; one holding sipre, one a flute, and the third singing from a roil of music. The cruciform arrangement of the monogrsm Tyranio suggests, but doee not prore, the Christian origin of the sculpture.
(3) The Hermes Kriophorus of pagan art certsioly sopplied the original type of the Goud Sicpherd in its countless repretitions., [Sukpuerd, Good.] The syrinx, or Pandean pipes, which is ene of the most frequent accessories of the figure In Christian as in pagan art, was regariled as typifying the music of the Gospel, which recinils way. (See the quatations given by Garrucci, way. (See the quatations given by Garrucci, Vetri; p . 63 .) The face and form of the Good Shepherd, as of other representations of Christ, appear often to be borrowed from those of the young beardless Apolle (Piper, u. s. Pp. 79, 100-105; Munter, Sinnbilder, i. 64, it. 7 ; Rnoul. Ruchette, Ta'leau des Cutacombes, p. 161 ffi)

11. As exsmples of the aecond class of subjects Where pegan mythology only supplies the furm of the representation as a vehicle for Christi:in idens, and the resemblance is externai oniy. the most ramarkable are Hercules carrying off the enpides of the Hesperides, and the chnriot of the Sun God, as respectivel the Sun God, as respectively fiurnishing formal trpes of the Pall, and of the ascent of Elijanh. The resemblaace between the Hercules subject and its Christian correlative is too striking to allow suy donbt that the one was borrowed from the ether (Piper, i. 66 ff ). Another part of the same myth, Hercules feeding the finbled dragon with cities of poppy-seed, appears to have fanaished the motive for the representatien of the apocryphal atory of Daniel killing the dragon at Babylon (aee woodcut, Vol. I. p. 579).

Equally marked is the resemblance het ween the fire horseal chariot in which bilijah is represented asseading to henren, nad the ordinary represeutations of Aprollo, or Phoebus, as the Sun (iod in his rising. In the absence of distinetive accensories it la hardly prosible to determine which of the two suijecter is intended. This diticuity in sometimes increased by the introduction of the Jorian as a river god, with his urn, in the Seriptural event (liper, u. s. jp. 7577). The corresponilence of the twa has alse beed contirmed by the aceldental respmblance of the words Elias and Helios ($ Misos). (Sedul. Carm. Pasch. lib. i. v. 184). This xymbolical representation of the Jordan by a river geal with his urn occurs aleo elsewhere. There are remarkable instances in the mosaics of the baptixmo of Christ in the baptiateries at Larenna.
III. Little need be enid upon the use of ernamental accessories, derived from heation art, such as winged genii, victories, armed jemaks, centaurs, caryotides, telamones, pegusi, hippa, camp;, and the like. It would be misajplied ingenuity to endeavour, as has been qometimes lone, to affix an allegorical meaning to each of these objects, the Introduction of which may be satiafactorily attributed to the fancy of the painter or aculpter, who being perhajs atill a pagan, and certainly one who had learnt the principles and practice of his art in pagan schools, found it impossible to diveat himself of its traditions, and satisfied both himseif and his employere by discarding everything that was essentinily profane, or which could give rise to an impure innagination. As Raoul-Rochette las remarked (Tubleau, &c., p. 214), "it is no cause of eurprise if in the design of these monuments, the thoughte of the early Cinristian artists went back to the traditiona of paganism, so that in the execution of subjects drawn troon IIoly Scripture, their hand, by the blind force of habit, reproduced a large number of the details of protine art, eapeciaily in costume, firniture, ornament, and architecture, which were indifferent in themselves, nnd to which they had been so long arcustomed." Thus, in the nords of Kugier, "many modes of expression of an innocent nnture belonging to ancient art, though ciosely associated with the old idulatry, long maintained their position for purposes of decoration," and that with so littie individuality of character that in many cases by nothing ity the occurrence in some part of the design of me decidedly Christian bymbel, its non-pagnin origin can be ascertained (Raoul-inochette, Tubleau dey Cutacombes, pp. 120-122; Pelliccia de Christ. Eccl. Porit. tom. iii. 1p. 230-2:34, ed. Neapol. 1779; Northeote, Rum. Sott. p. 196). There is not one of these decorative forms of such frequent occurrence in early Christiun art as tho vine, together with acenes connected with ita cultivation, and the ingathering of the grapes. The examples are toe common to particularize ; but we may refer to the very lovely vine of tha Callistine catacomb, "of an sntique style of beauty" (Kingler) ["f which there ia a woodeut Fresco, Vol. I. p. 695]; and the rintage scenes from the baptistery of St. Cuatanza [MOSAice, Vol. IJ. p. 1322]. In thia we have an instance of the way in which a purely conventional mode of ornamentation was adopted by Christians, and clothed with a religious signification, full of

W'e have yet to speak of the eases in which direct payan subjects oceur, to which It is difticult if nut imposaible to nasign any exoterle Chriatinn menning. The fuct that theae are found entirely on arcophagi and gildied drinking glingen, never in momales or the wall-paintings of the entacombs, suggests the probable conclualon that the urticles on which they occur are ot hentisen origin, and were used by Christians from the alianenee, in the early period of the church, of artists of thelr own faith eapuible of fabricating them. This must have been expecially the cuse with sarcophngi. Those who needed them were compelled to resort to hrathen acolptora' workahop, and to content themnolves with selecting thore which did the least violance to the new faith. In thls way we may account for the occurrence of pugan barcophagi in Christian burial-pluces. "We have abundant evilence," writea I'rofensor Weatwood (Parker, Archteodergy of Kome; Tombs, p. 39), "not only that pagan arreophag! were uaed for the burlal of Chriatinns, but also that aubjecta of a pastoral or pagna charaoter were adopted on the sarcophagi of the earlier Christinns, to which aymbolical meaniags were attached, whereby in the minds of the uninitiated their Chrlatha destination wonld never be suspected. In the words of Mabillon (Iter. Itul. $10, p. 81), "Sic profanis tumulis Chriatiani non raro quasi proprifa ual eunt.'" As examplea, we may name one found In the cemetery of St. Agnex, bearing the epitaph of a Christian virgin named Aurelia Agapetilla, designated "ancilla Dei," which is ornamented with a figure of Bacchus, surrounded with naked Cupils, and the genil of the seasons (BoldettI, p. 466), and two given by Millin (Voyage au llidi de la France, iii. 156, 158, p. xxyi. 4, xxsvii. 3), on one of which is carved the Forge of Vulenn. On another, given by Northcote (p. 26i), Cupid and Psyche are represented side by side with a Good Shepherd, who is everturning a basket of fruit. The conversion of anclent carved marbles into articles tor the use of the Christinn church, such as fonts, holy water bneins, alms-boxes, which at one time largely prevailed, has proved rather misleading from its having been supposed that their present uee was necessarily contemporaneous with their firet oxecution.
Sume of the gilded glasees extracted from the catncombs bear scenes from pagan mythology, and the figures of henthen deitles, Hercules, Minerve, Achilles, Serapla, &c. On others are depisted subjects which are incapable of a Christian interpretation, and which it is difficult to conceive could have been executed by a Chriatian nitist. One, given by Perret (iv. pl. sxx. no. 82), represents a naked femnle waited on by winged genii, one of whom holds a mirror. Others have the genius of death winged, either leaning on an incrertel torch (Garrucci, 201, 5; Buoparruoti, xxviii. 2), or arrested in full career by the meta or gnal, indicating the end of life (ibid.). The pronounced pagan character of theae glasses renders it diffeuli to assign them ac Christian erigin, and though both Garrucel and Wiseman are of opinion that thls art was confined to the Christiada alone, they bring forward no grounds for this view, which is primet facie impruinble, such an to forbit un to regarl them qs the work of pagan artint

PAGANISM, BURVIVAL OF. Euquiry In connesion with this subject may be simpli. fied by treatling it under three heads: (1.) Puganism as a form of public worship stupperted, recognised, or tolerated by the cirit pover. (ii.) Ae a popular belief existing in open contravention of state authority and in avoved antrgonism to Christimity. (III.) Ae interworen exith the reli. gion, disciptine, and cercmoniul of Christian omm. munities, or diseernithe in their everyday life and practice. [For pagan influeloes on education, see Schoots.]
Some of the priseipal facte relating to (I.) are glven under Inolatry, but it will be of sertice here to pass under review, somewhat more gene rally, the influences that snccessively determined the relations of paganism to the ruling power under the emplre-a part of the subject intimately econnected with (II.) and (III.).
(I.) The enrliest sentiments of pagnimm with respect to Christianity appear to hare been those of Indifferent tolerance. When, however, the true character of Christianity began to be better understood, as that of an avowedly aggressive and intolerant creedaggressive, that is to say, in that all other beliefs were regarded by its followers as hostile, and intolerant in that it professerily aimed at the overthrow of all other religions-the attitade of tha civil power altogether changed. I. 21, A.D. 335 ; Xli. . . 2, A.D. 337 ; Haenel, 1204, 1278). When his palace was struek by lightaing, he sent to consult the pagan augurs he hinswelf continued to be saluted by the titie and represented in the attire of Pontifex Masimus (Mionnet, Mefidilles romaines, ii. 236) ; and the atatement of Zosimus (iv. 36 ), that the same hoaour was necopted by his successurw natil the time of Gratian, proves that tha title still carried with it, in tha eyes of many, a certain saount of preatige. Other fucts point with equal foree to the tenneity with which the forma ond fashlons of paganism continued to pervads official and ceremoninl observince. A panegyric addressed to Constantine in the yeer 32 !, by Nazarius, is full of allusions to the pagan mythology. A law enacted in the same year, while condemning magical rites, neverthelese givas direct annetien to the $u$ se of charms and incantations sgainet snow or hail (Cod. Theod. IX. xyl, 3; Haenal, p. 868). In the year 331, a date which hae been assigued as marking the decisive averthrow of pagan worship (Beugnot, Hist. de IL Destruction du Pay. L. 175), fronit the fact that It wituessed the aimost complete destruction of the temples in Africa, we find Anicius Paulinus, the pretect of Rome, restoring the temple of Concord (Gruter, Insc. totius Grbis Romani, i, Concord (Gruter, Insc. totius Grbis Romani, i. 100). Cosstanting, after his death, received the honours of apotheosis and the appellation of honours of apotheosis and
"Divus " (Eutroplus, $\mathbf{x}, 10$ ).
A pelitic regard for jopular feeling, as associated with time-hallowed obeervancea, appears to have led the civil authorities stili to sanction or permit many of the traditional formalities and solemnities of paganism, but in the meantime public sentiment itself was undergoing 8 great change. Of thie a remarkable proof is afforded in the fact that the tombs of the dead (which among purely pagan communities were slways ragarded with superstitious veneration and invested wlth a peculiar annetity) now began te be frequently plundered and deseerated. The symbols and adornments of these structuree, l.egisiation now appears an largely dictated by a twotiold regard: (i) for the responslisilitiea Incolved in the profeasion of the Chriatian faith by the state, (2) for the feelings of the Christian majority among the jeople; while, on the cther bani, there is ample evilence, especialiy in the Went, that respert for the prejudices of what was still a powerful minority often caused suo cessive enactmants to remain almoat a dead letter. It would accoritingly appear probable that, for a lengthened period, repressive legisIatlon was virtually inoperatire. Thus, in the year 341, we lind that prgan ancrifices were formaliy furbilden-" cesaet superatitio, ancrificiorum nboleatur insania" (Cud. Theod. XVI. x. 2 ; Ilsenel, p. 1612). The proot; however, that such suerifices were still publicly oflered is so ineontrovert'ble that labastio coajectore that reference is here futended only to private eacrifices and tha magienl ritea with which they ware frequently assowinted. But sueh an hypothesis is rendered highly improbable by the language of an edict promulgated in 346 , which, while directing that the temples without the city wall. ahall be parmit ted to remnin uainjured, diatinctly Implies that those within the city preeincts were markod out for destruction; and oven the rebervation in favour of the former ia justified aolely on the ground that the public games and Circenses had origianted with the worship thut was "smocinted with certain templas, and that it was "not fitting that those should be overthrown from whence the Koman people derived the celebration of ancient festivities" (Corl. Theod. XVI, x. 2, 3; Haenel, p, 1612).

A similar difficulty attaches to two enactments, purporting to belong to the years 353 and 356, forbidding sacrifices of every kind under penalty of death; for here again Beugnot proves, from the evidence of inecriptions, that throughout tha reign of Constantius II. the temples were open and sacrifices offered, not only in Rome, hut throughout the Western empire. Of thil contradiction, Beugnot can find no other explanation than that afforded by tha supposition of Labastie, that the above laws, though probably drawn up during the reign of Constantius, remained unpromnlgated, and, being sabsequently found by Theodosius amung the state papers, were inserted by him in the code with conjectursi dates.
During the reigns of Jolian (361-363), Jovian (363-364), and of Valentinian in the West (364375), and Valens in the East (364-378), the state theory appears to have been that of general tolerance and atrict impartiality with respect to religious belief (Gieseler, Firchengeschichte, I. ii. 21, 22); but we lave evidence that the imperial power atill charisbed a certain sympathy with many pagan practices [Magrc, V1. 2). The coins and medals of the period bear the figures of many of the pagan deities, especially those of Egypt (Beugnot, i. 271, 272). It is stated by Anastnsius Bibliothecarius that in the reign of Vnlentinian, an emperor whose Arian sympathies diviled and wearened the Christian party, paganism nssumed so aggressive a demeanour that the clergy were afraid to enter the churches or the public bnths - "neque in ecclesias neque in balnen haberent introitum" (1itae Rom. I'ontif.; Migne, Hutrol. exxviii. 31). It is, however, not a little remarkable that an edict of the same emperor, of the year 368 (Cod. Theod. XVI. ii. 18) presents us, for the first time, with the term "pagani" as applied to the adherents of the old religion. At Rome, we have abundant evidence that this party was atill powerful. Prudentius (cont. Symmash, i. v. 545) can congratulate only six families of senatorial rank on having embraced the new faith (the Anicii, the Probi, the Paulini, the Bassi, the Olybrii, and the Gracchi), and Augustine (Conf. viii. 2) distinetly implies that in the time of Simplicianus, the teacher of St. Aubrose, the majority of the Roman nobility were strongly opposed to Christianity. Even Gratinn ( $367-383$ ) appears to have proclaimed almost perfeet liberty of conscicnce, except with regard to some minor sects, whose tenets were supposed to involve obligations incompatible with fidelity to the atate (Soz. H. E. vii. 1; Migne, Series Graeca, 1xvii. 1418). But in the year 382 he ordered that the statue of Victory, "custos imperii virgo," should be remored from the Curia; he also forbade the offering of the "hostine consultatorine" (Cot. Theod. XV1. x. 7), rud refused, for himself, the title of Pontifex Maximus. It is evident from the language of Zosimus (iv. 36) that this last nct was interpreted by the pagan party itself as a formal renunciation of the ancient union between the supreme spiritunl and the supreme temporal power, and as intimating the imperial repudiation of all claims of paganisin on the lntter.

The enactments of Theodosius (378-395) may be considered to mark the real conmencoment of the downfall of pagnnism, but their influence was still almost entirely limited to the East. The emperor had the sagncity to perccive how largely unity in religion might be made to conduce to the object towards which his whole policy was directed-the establishment of the unity of the empire. "We will," says the edict of April 27, 380, "that all the nations subject to our sway be of that religion which the divine apostle leter (as the faith introduced by him and preserved to the present time declnves) hanled down to the Romans" (Col. Theod. XVI. i. 2 ; Haenel, p. 1476). A law of the year 381 (ib. XVI. vii. 1) enacted that thnse who had relapsed into paganism should forfeit the right to dispose of their property by will; this enactment was confirmed two years later (i). XVJ. vii. 2); in the yenr 385 the inspection of entrails and all magical rites were furbilden under pain of denth; a law of lebruary 391 , promulgatel in the first instance at Milat forbade sacrifice to ilols, or even to enter the temples (ib. XVI. x. 10; Znsimus, IV. xxxiil. 8); while the same law, ns promulyated at Constantinople in the November of the following year, visitgd onch practiees with the penalty of death (Cad Theod. XVI. x. 12 ; see also livolatry). It it stated by Theodoret (Eccl. Hist. v. 20; Migoe, Series Graeca, $1 \times x \times$ xil. 1055) that Theolosius also decreed the demolition of the temples, but no such law is extant, and the nssertion must at lenst be looked upon as of doubtful authority. We have it, however, on the authority of Libanius that the prefect Cynegius was instructed to close the temples in Egypt, where both the Greek and the Egyptian worship still numbered many adherenta (Urat. pro I cmplis, p. 194).

The distinetion, above referred to, between East and West now becomes of primary im. portance. Generally speaking, the evidence would seem to shew that legislntion which wns severely enforced in the former division of the empire was practically inoperative in the Intter. In the Enst, paganism, being unidentified with any political party, and possessing no influence over the executive power, wss incapable of any organised resistnnce. Instsaces, indeed, are to be found, even so late as the 5tb eentury, of pagans occupying posts of high office-as, for example, that of Optatus, who was prefect of Constantinople in the yenr 404 (Socrates, H. E. vi. 18; Migne, Series Grueca, Ixvii. 337); but these are of rare occurreace, and whatever infuence the pagan party still possessed was mainly limited to the schools, Hence, even so early as the commencement of the 4th century, Lucian, the celebrated teacher of Antioch, who suffered mirtyrdom nnder Maximin, affirms that "whole cities and the grenter part of the world "are already al the Christian faith (Milman, Hist. of Cir. ii, 276), a statement which, the evidence alresidy adduced shews, could have been even approximately true only with reference to the bastern provinces. In the West, on the other hand, sad especially in Rome, where the hereditary dig. nities and offices, and the whole historical associntions of the city, were closely interworen with the ancient rcligion, paganism mnintained its ground with remarkable tenacity. Theolosius himself evidently recognized this broad distinotion ; for though be is accused by Zosimus (r. 38) of persecuting the ancient ritual, he arither closed the temples nor proacribed the pontiffs io the West. Finlay (Greeks under the Ewpire, p. 160) considers that the attachment of the Roman aristocracy to paganism proved the ruid of the Latin provinces; while those of the East were saved by the unity of their religious faith.
At the commencement of the reign of Honorias (395-423), temples to Jupiter, Mercury, Saturn, the Mater Deum, Apollo, Diana, Minerva, Spes and Fortuna, and Concord, were still standiag io Rome, and many of the old religious ceremonies and festivals continued to be observed. An edict of the year 399, promulgnted nt Rareana while forbidiling the pagan worship, prohibited the destruction of the temples; it was the imperial plensure, it stated, that edifices which gave so much adornment to the public thorongho faree should be preserved-"publicorum operum orn:menta servari" (Cool. Theod. XVI. x. 15).
It is not accordingly until the year 408 that paganism can be regarded as having been rigorously suppressed in the West. In the December of that year an elict of Hooorim,

In Africa this legislation agpears to have been put in force with exceptionnl severity, and three out of the fire edicts directed in the reign of Honorius agninst Paganism relate to that province. Augustine (docio. Dei, xviii. 54) testifies to the actual execution, by the imperial otficers, Gaudentius and Jovius, of these enactments: pagan priests who had failed to ments: pagan priests who had failed to quit Carthage by a certuin day, were compelled to retire to their native towna or villages, anil all property devoted to the support of the pagan worship was confiscated.
The testimony of contemporary writers to the general orerthrow of paganism now becomes explicit and unanimous. Zeno, bishop of Verona towarrs the close of the 4th century, spenks of "nearly the whole world" as already Christisa (ad Cor. I. vii. 29; Migne, xi. 304); Jerome, writing a few renrs later (A.D. 40:3), says "the golden Capitol is dishonoured; all the temples of Rome stand begrimed with smoke snd covered with sathwebs; begred city is stimoed to it foundntions, and the populace strenm past the half-demolished ahrines on their way to the tombs of the martyrs " (Epist. cvii)., Augustine, in Afrias declarea that God has willed the orerthrow of Gentile superstition, and that He has adresdy to a great extent completed His purpose. "Ye behold," he says, in one of hia epistles, "the templea, some fallen into ruin, ome overthrown, some closed, some converted to other uses ; and the idols thensel leas detrosed" (Epist. cexxxii)., The language of Theodoretus in the East is still more emphatic; he avers, with something of Orieutnraggeration, that the temples hal been so atterly destroyed, that their very fashion had fined from memory, and men no longer knew how to construct an altar, while their materials had been consecrated by being used for the tombs of the martyra (Sermo de Martijn; Migue, seris Griec!, 1xxxii. 1034). An edict of Thedosius II. of the year 423, nsaunes thnt magnism is virtually extinct-" pagnoos qui supersunt, quazmquain jam nullos esse cred imus, pronulgatnrum legum jamdudum priescripsta compescant " (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 2.2); but the soppearance of subsequent repressive enact nienta, ey. one of the year 425 (Apprend. to Cod. Theod. p. 1th) forbidding that pagnns should practise at the brr, exerciss military functions, or own

On the whole, the commencement of the 6 f n century must be looked upon as the period when the severance between the civil power in the empire and the pagan faith wns first really carried into complete effect, and the closing of the schools of Athens by Justinian, in the yenr 529, marks the formal repression of the old philosophy, between which and Christian doc-in in avowed ant पyonism to Christianity.-This, again, requires to be distinguished according as it presents itself (i) as a survival of the nucient Greek or Roman inythology ; (ii) as the religion of Teutonic or other barbarons nations.

(i) Pagnnism being, as the wurd denotes, the fraith of the villager, its later history is to ba traced almost exclusively in districts conpmarntively isolated from intercourse with the great centres of civilisition. The furce of the term is illustrated by the observation of Orosius, that "as aliens from the city of God, living nenr crosa ronds and villages in country districts, they are cnlled rillngers or gentiles"-" qui alieni a civitate Dei ex locorum agrestium compitis et pagia pagani vocnutur sive gentiles " (Migne, xxxi. 3). Similarly Prudentius (contra Synmiohtum, iv. 620) sjenks of the defenders of the ancient faith aa "pngo implicitos." Of its persistence and reappenrance in such localities, long nfter the civil pwer had pronounced it extinct, we have frequent, and often startling, eridence. The triumph of Christianity was very far from being a continuously prugreasive orerthrow of the the old superatitions. Not to advert to those cases in which the new fuith itself became alto-gether extinct, as in Africa before the adrance

of Mahometanism, there are not a few instances of ita temporary dissppearance in comparatively limited districts, through the relapse of the populntion into paganiam. Generally spenking the following conclusions are probably sound: (1) That where a break in the recorded episcopal anccession presenta itself, paganiam regained the ascendancy during the period represented by this vacancy. "If," says Gregory of Tours, when referring to the succeasion in his own diocese, "any one should inquire why only one bishop, namely, Littrius, is to be found in the period extending from the denth of bishop Gntianus to St. Mnrtin, let him know that, owing to the resistance of the paryons, the city of Tours whs long deprived of all priestly benediction" (Hist. Fr. i. 43). ('2) That where, in the history of a community or of a city, we find no trace of a bishopric or of a monastery, paganism probably continued to hold ita ground.

The lnnguage of St. Augustine, who speaks of the fuith as "toto terrarum orbe diffuaa, exceptis Romanis et adhuc pancis Oecidentnlibus," points to a distinction which may be regarded as valid during the greater part of our peried. In the bth century the pagnn party in the East (the raifes 'Eגлh $\quad \omega \nu$, as they were termed) became subject to persecutions scarcely less cruel than those which the Christians encountered under Diocletian. John Malalas [Chronoyraphia; Migne (S. G.), xevii. 449] states that in the year 561 there was a great persecuproperty of many adherents of paganism was contiscated; while a decree forbade them to exercise their political rights as citizeos. He nlso tells how certain gamblers ( $\tau$ vess têp коттเбт $\omega \nu$ ) who had been guilty of blasphemy sentenced to have their hands and feet cut off, and in this state were paraded nnked on camels through the streets of Constantinople, while their books and the images of their gods were burnt at the Cynegium.
In the Italian prefecture, on the other hand, where the presence of the barbarian conqueror (still either pagan or Arian) secured for the Roman paganism a certain toleration, the nacient religion was long cherished and ita rites practised, At Rome it found support in the politienl traditions and nssuciationa of the nristocratic party, and in the rural districta of Italy was protected by a genuine, though bigoted, devotion to the mational worship. Even Christian historianas imit that in these latter regions idolatry still reigned in the 4th century, nnd that the work of evangelization was nttended with considerable peril. In the mountainous distrecta of the north, Snturn and Diana continued to receive the homage of the peasuntry, and the first prenchers of Christianity encountered a martyr's fate (Bengnot, i. 284). The inhabitunts of the valleys of Piedmont stubbornly defeniled the faith of their ancestors; Vnlena and Valentinian were saluted by the Venetinns as the "divini patres " (Muratori, i. 264, no. 4). At Turin and Breacello, statues were erected to Julinn (Marnop: Tutrinen. i. 249). At Milin, where the influence of St. Ambrose was paramount pagnnism almost disappenred; but a tractate of Maxinus of Turin (Migne, Pat ol. lvii. 721), written nearly half a century later, "Contra Paganos," proves the extent to which it pree vailed in the surrounding districts. Etruria, which Christian historiuns have represented as completely converted during the reign of Con. stantinc, appears by the testimony of Ammianus Marcellinus (b. xxivi. c. 3) and that of Zosunus (v. xli.) to have been n stronghold of the art of divination in their time, and to have surplied nll Italy with diviners. At Florence, distinguished by its worship of Mars, " tradition prevailed that if the statue of that deity were dishonoured evil would betall the city (Villani, i. Lx.); null, out of deference to superstitious feeling, the stntue was placed on the bank of the Arno, where it long continued to receive the homage of the citizens. At Volaterra the pagan worship, protected by the powerful family of the Caecinue, mintained its ground, und was professed with impunity (Kutilius Numit. i. . . 453). In the central portion of the peninsuls, the evidence of inscriptiona and of pagan writers reveals the existence of the pagan element at Sestinum, Rimini, Spoleto, Alba, Ostia, Prueneste, &c. (Symmachus, Epist. i. 43; Ammian. Mare. b. xix. c. 10; Macrobins, Sxt. i. 2:3). The south, owing in a great measure to the inaccessible nature of the country, long reminined pagan. Niples was distinguished by its ndherence to the national faith (Benevent. Ant. Thes. i. 118). The insularity of Sicily exercised $n$ similar influence, and ingeriptions at Drepanuin and Marsala shew that these cities were still unchristinnized so late as the reign of Vnlens and Valentiniun (Siciliae Inseript. Collect, pp. 27, 36). Beugnot (i. 289) considers that paganism continued to be dominant in the ishad until supplanted towards the enil of the 5th century by the worship of the Virgin, which, after the third general council at Ephesus, was largely iutroduced (Cronologiu univ. dellu Sícilia, p. 601 ).

The islands of the Western Mediterranean long remained altogether pagan. Rutilius (i. $\sigma$. 375) spenka of the worship of Osiris ss prevailing in Elba, while that of Hercules appears to have predominated in Sardinia (Graevius, Thesaur. xv. 58).
In the province of Africa, where the intimate relations with Rome gave rise to a similar state of religious feeling, a spirit of indifference seems long to have tolerated the ancient worship of the country. The deitiea to whom specisl reverence was paid were the Tyrian god, Melcarth (identified by some writers with the l.ibyau Herculea), together with Saturn snd Celeste. Salvinn (de Gub. Dei, Migne, liii. 178) represents even Christians of his time as unitiog with pagans in ceremonies instituted in henour of this goddeas. In Mnuritania and Numidia, we meet with other names, probnbly thase of the legendary heroes of the country. At Utich, Apollo; at Carthage, Ceres and l'roserpine, were principnlly worshipped. But the most noticeahle feature of these provinces, and one which long survived the open worship of pagun deities, was the devotion of the people to saperstitious arts, such as magie, sortilegy, angury, &c. At the same time paganism itself exlibited a bold front-a fact partly attributnble to intercoursa with Kome, partly to the Donntist sclism, whereby the influence of the Christian party was seriously impnired. The spirit of the

In Spain the resistance to Christianity appears to have been feeble. The absence of a distinct nstionsl religion probably favoured the introduction of the new faith, the previously existing worship haring included the deities of different lands, the gods of the capitol together with those of Phoegicia, Greece, sad Carthage. We find, however, evidence of a strong Roman element.b From the reign of Coustantine to that of Valentinian, the list of the magistrates of the province is noticesble, as presenting us with the names of families distinguished by their ndherence to paganism (3asdeu, v. 507). St. Pacian, bishop of Barceloas, who died towards the end of the 4th century, declares thnt many of the inhabitants of his diocese are still given to idolatry (Mignc, his diacese are still given to idolatry (Mignc, sili. 1084); and Macrobius spenks of the Oecisili. 1084); and Macrobius spenks of the Oeci-tanl, a people near Caliz, as worshipping in the ssme century, "cum maxima relligione,"' a statue of Mars, whom they alored under the name of Yeton (i. ix.). Bengnot, whe differs from Masdeu and Milmnn on this question, considers the estly conversion of the proviace to have been little more than nominnl, and calls attention to little more than nominnl, and calls attention to the articles of the council of Elvira as indicating the existence of many pagan usages and, at best, but a very impure form of Christianity (i. $313-4$ ).

In the Gauls, the langnage of St. Jerome, "Gallia menstra nen hrbuit," implying the absence of idolatry, must be unlerstood as spplicabis spplicable only to the southern portion of Trans-alpine Gaul ; and even in this spine Gaul; and even in this region, where Roman iastitutions and Reman civilization leng Roman institutions and Reman civilization leng held their greund after they had been overheld their ground after they had been overcherished with remarkable tenacity. In Brittany, the place of these traditions wns supplied by Druidism, and in the north-east by Teutonic paganism. St. Martin, in the 4th century, appears to hnve been the first whose efforts nt erangelization were crowned by any substantial eracgelization were crowned by any substantial silcess. "Before his arrival," snys Sulpicius stlceess. "Before his arrival," snys Sulpieius Sererns, "none, or scarcely any, worshipped the Sererns, "none, or acarcely any, worshipped the true God; where he overthrew temples, he immedintely erected menasteries or or churches" (lligne, Patrol. xv. 167). Gregory of Tours, [^94]in his life of Simplicius, bishop of Autun, narrates how the worship of cybele still reigned in the bishop's diocese, and that it was custonary to carry her statue round the fields and vinevards in order to render thein productive, in the north, his friend Wultilinch describes the destruction of a statue of binnn, worshippe: of the inhnhitants of Trevos, in the last quarter of the 6th century (Mist. Frunc. viii. xw.) 1 and court of Dhatheyear 689, fomed that at the court of Dngobert II., king of East Francin, tho same golten image, "in sumima veneratione cury cury was an object of specinl veneration in Elsass (Mone, it. 343). Temples to Jupiter, Mercury, and Apollo existed nt louen in the ith century, and were still visited by worshippers (Martene, Thes. Nov. iii. 165b, b.). The conversion of the Frnnks to Christianity was a far more gradual process thra the exnmple of Clovis natiopear to suggest. The superstitions of the nation were widely spread by them in Gaul, and a kind of fusion seems to have taken, jlace between the religion of the conqueror and that of the conquered. Beugnot considers that in no part of Europe were idolntrous rites and practices mure prevalent subsequent to the introduction and partial acceptance of Christianity. 200) states that in de Jure Met,op. Migne, exxvi, Chrisintes that in the time of Charles Martel the Christinn faith had almest died ont, both in Austrasia and Neustria, large numbers of the eastern Franks never having received baptism. The worship of the Teutonic gods was maintained under the names of Greek or Lloman divinities; Odin became Mercury ; Thor, Jupiter; Frigga, Venus. To this practice we may attribute the singular error of Gregory of Tours, who represents Clotilda, when endeavouring to convert Clovis, as referring to the objects of her husband's worship under the names of the deities of the Greek mythology. In the year 743, the council of Lestines, in condemning many pagan superstitions still rife, refers to "sacra Jovis et Mercurii" (Mansi, xii. 385); but here the design appears to have been simply to denote, under classical names, the Teutonic deities, fer a form of abjuration drawn up for the people in the vernacular substitutes the names "Thunacr ende Uueden."

In England, where Celtic Christianity was driven, with the native population, into Wales, the different kingdoms were indebted for their erangelization each to a different source; and the work of conversion to even nominal Christianity was not completed until nearly a century frem the time of the landing of Augustine. Kent and Essex relapsed into paganism. Mercia, unler Penda, remained pagan until 633. Bede states that up to the time of Wilfrill's mission in 681, strangers the prevince of the South Saxons were strangers to the name and faith of God" (Eccl.
Hist. iv. 12). It is obser mitirely heathen population. The provisions of the $\mathrm{C}_{1}$, itulary of Paterhorn, A.B. 785 (de Jartims Sasim (ae), bear witnese to this fact; and it is inferred by Bengnit that the stringent oharacter of theies enactinents, when compared with the milder legishation relating to simllar superstitione in Gnul, proves the more atubborn adherente of the Saxent to their natlonal faith. It may be observed that these provisions were again promulgateil as late as the year 1035, by Conrad II. nguinst the pagan practices of the Wonds.

III. Paganiam (1) as interwoven with the religious rites, discipline, and ceremonial of Christianity; or (ii) as discernible in the every day life and practices of profissedly Christian eommunities.
This part of the subject belonge mainly to the periud distingulsled by beugnot as the thirel and concluding stage of the fall of pagamism la the West, commencing whith the reign of Vulentinian III. and terminating with that of Charles the Great. After the tall of Rome bufore Alarie, in 410 , the aftitude of the state la rehation to jaganism was little alteved; but great eoncessions appicar to have been male ly the church with the design of facilltating the work of conversinn. The pulicy which dictated these concessions may be referred to a threefold sentl-meat:-(1) the desire to mitigate the resentment of those who asserted that the tall of Rome was attributaile to the neglect of the worship of her unciout gols ; (2) to a sense of the eommon dagere to Christianity ual pagan civilization alike, presented in the trlumph of the harbaric invaler; (3) it a belief In the appronching eud of the world-an event which, ns we learn from Tertullian (Apol. +2) and sther writers, was believed by the Cliristians themselves to be dostinual to follow on the fall of Jome, and which rendered them denbly anxious to waive such points of ditierence as, although of small doctrlual Importance, atill constituted serious obstacles to pmgan ewiversion.
(i) The observition of Chrysostom, that the devil, "findling himself" unable to win the Christinas to ilolatry, tank a rouml-ahont way to seduce them," polnts to the existence of miny pazan practices among Christlans eveo in that father's time; but a large uumber of usages in the ritual and observinces of the chureh cannot low tracel firther back than tha 5 th century. The language ut some of the fathurs seems, it is trup, often to $1 m p l y$ a spirit of unspring eat rmination; but it is certain that a much lar jer amount of eompromise actually prevailed than theory countenance $l$. Among the 'Teutonic nations expleelally, there was a dlapmesition on the part of the earliest evangelisers to be satistiedHt least in the first instance-wlh a series of enuseralons little more genulue than those efferte 1 in India and Ceylon in the 15th century L. Franels Xavier and the Jesuits; and even where mare real results were galned, it was nitu-n found expedient to leare many distiactly pugan usages unelullengel for a time. It is periapos in harmuny with the distinction niove ialicatel, as observable in the Christan policy prior and subseguent to A.B. 411 , that the line of conduct anthurisel liy Gregory the Great in his instructions to Mellitus [linolatry, p. 811], and that recommended by bishop Daniel to Boaiface In liankland (Epist. xir.; Migue, Ixxyix.

707-710), is in atrong contrast to that already relerred to as parsued by St. Martia In Gaul. Heathen temples with their surrounding preelacts were uften prermitted to stand uninjurei, the idols beling remeved, and the bulldings conseerated to Christian uses; while minor observances were sufferel, either by conairance or taclt assent, to cuntinue, which, with the Inpse of time, were regariled as baving gained the direct snoction of the chureh.
Among the Latin races, the worship of Mithra, the Sun-ginl, appears to have survived that of nearly nll the other gods of the Roman mytho logy. M. Gaston Buissier (Lat Feliyjon remaine ii. 417) considers that, at the time of the fall of the em, e, paganism, as it existed in ltsly, recognised searcely noy other deity. Pope Leo the Great states that mang Chrlstlana in his time adored the rising sun from lofty heights, " jartim vitio ignoranthe, partim paganitatis spiritu;" and that some Cluristians did this under so mistaken a notion of religion, that eren when asceading the steps of St. Peter's at Rome they were wont to turn and make their obeisance to the sun (Migae, Patrol. liv. 94). Maximus of Turin reproaches those whom he addresses with culpable indifference to idolatry as practised by others. lle says that if their attention were drawn to an idol, they weuld say it was ao coscers of theirs, "causa men non est, non me tangit" (Mligac, lvii. 610). Pope Gragory, writing to queen brunehaut, urges hifr to put a stop to idolatry and the worship of trees; for be hears, he says, that Cluristians who go to chureh still worship daemons (ibid. $1 \times x$ xii. 939 ). Agila, ambarsador from the Gothic mauarch Lenviehildus to king Chilperic, infurmed Gregory of Tours that his people held the worship of Jlels to be perfectly compatible with that of the God of the Christians (llist. Franc. r. 44 ; Migne, lxxi. 256). Grimm indeed ebserves that buth among the Anglo-Saxons and the Northmen the same idea prevailed (Deuteche $M_{\text {; thol. p. 7 }}$ ): and Bede (list. Eccl. ii. 15) states that Relwald, king of East Anglia, had in the same temple an altar on which to otler Christias sacrifice, and auther, a smaller one, on which to offer victims to devils. The eanoa of the council of Elvirn (A.D. 325) foribiding all who have received baptism, and are of years of discretion, to enter a temple in order to participite in idolatrous worship, under penalty of being refused the sarrament of communion at death, is, however, sutficient proof that the actios of the church was very early direcied againat such gross misconceptions, which appear to have lieen, for the most part, contined to semi-bnrlsious nntions.

A more interesting and instructive iaquiry is that which relates to those pagan eleaneots which beame parmanently interweven with Chilstian belief and practice, snd were eves defended by many of the great teachers of the ehurch. The controvarsy between Jerome and Vigilantius, an 1 that between Augustine and the Mauichuean Faustus, offer valuable illastration of this portion of the subject. Vigitatins attacked the adoration of suints, the veneration paid to martyrs and their relics, and the rastom of placing lamps betore their shrines. Fastos declared th it the Christians had really la go way absodoned the pagan mode of life. They

It appears unguestionable thst. both Jerome and Augustine ailmitted the pagan orfigin of these customs, but maintained their atility, and especially vindiented their retention on the ground of expediency; but both Angustine and Theodoret Itisclaimed the notion that it wis the design of the churelh in any way to deify the martyrs, whom it honoured and revered solely as instruments of the divine power. (Milman, Hist, of Christianity, bk. iii. c. xi.; bk. iv. c. il.; Nemder, Cinurch History (in Clark's series), lii. 452-3; Gieseler, Kivchengesch. (ed. 1845), i, if. 333-5.)
It is the opinion of Baur ( Firchen jesch. i. $5 \mathrm{~S}_{\mathrm{i}} \mathrm{-7}$ ) that the veneration of martyrs and their relics (from whence he derives the invocation of saints) is to be traced to the hero-worship, of pre-Christian times; Nennder, on the other hand, claims for the celebration of the memory of the grest lights of the church "a purely Chrictian root," but holids that it received a different charucter by becoming "estranged and diverted from the original Christian spirit " (u.s. ii. 448). The earliest instance of the practice is probsbly the celebration of the anmiversary of Polycarp's passion at Smyraa (Ruinart, Act. sinc. Mart,r. pp. 35, 43). The dove which, it was ssid, bal been scen to riss from the martyr's body is compared by Bnur to the mounting eagle which proclaimed the apotheosis of the Roman emperors, Tertullian (cle ('or. c. 3) spleatis of

The worship of Mary, as practised Ly the Collyridians, is looked upon by Neander (u. s. iii. 458) as directly traceable to that of C'eres. This sect, which was represented by a number of women who emigratel from Thrace and settled in Arsbis, were wont, on a certsin day, to carry about in cars ( (í申pou), similar to those used in pagan processions, cakes or wafers consecrated to the Virgin, which they first presented as offerings, and subseruently ate. This practice Nennder derives from the customary cake-otfer-

to have been not uncommon under the pretext of a semi-religious observance, the pretext of a semi-religious observance, though frequently condeinned by the Fathe"s. "I have," says St. Ambrose, "a grave complinint against you, brethren. I speak of those who, though celebrants along with us of Christ's bir'th, join in the festivals of the Gentiles; and, after that heavenly banquet, have prepared for themselves a feast of superstition. . ... He who seeks to share in divine things must not associate with idols," (Serm. vii.; Migne, xvii. 399). Augustine, when reproving the Christians of Carthage for joining in like festivals, represents the pagn party as asking, "Why represents the pagin party as asking, "Why

[^96]should we almodon our gorls whom the Chaise tians worship ns well as ourselips?" (1/nuru, ef. $1577, x_{1} 9$ b). A discourse of l'etrus Chrysologus, bishop of Ravenna in the year 431 inplies that pirticipants in these festirnls sometimes enlenvonred to exculpate themselves thy denying the aflinities of slech colebations to pagan practices. They plealed that their observance of the Kalends, for instance, was "a new tatis lactitin non, not an ancient error," "noviwas "aetitia non vetustatis error," and that It was "anni prindpiun, non gentilitstis oflensa" townris the close of the sil). Pupe Gelasius, towambs the close of the ith century, expressly pryan customs ns "adulterue of Christian anl demnine customs as "adulterous," ard, in condemning all participation in the Inperialia, that such obonstrates with those who inngine securing the favour of are of any real elficacy in securing the favour of the gods (Paronius, Arnal.
vi. 5222 ). The change of the the year from change of the commencement of Beugnut foon danuary to Enster is asserted by desire to have been the result of the ehurch's the yenr brenk with such pagan tralitions. In It was forbid, at the seconl council of Tours, Feralia, or the Terminalia (Mansi, ix. sija; Hefele, iii. 27). But even so late as the gith century, Rahanus Mmurus, who spenks of Christianity ns covering the whole enrth, "in toto orbe dilatatam" ( $1 /$ cra, vi. 172 ) asks in n homily "Contra Paganicos Errores," how they can hege to rejoice at the eternal binquet of the saints, who do not here loathe the unlitwful feasts if the pagans? How shall they sing with suge!, the praises of God in eternal light who here keep (ibid sport ("funestos ludos") in honour of idols? (ibid, v. 606 ). Nodern fuirs nnd feasts ("ferine" and "festn") bear witness to the tenacity of hese traditions.
In Christian ritual itself not a few observances have been referred with consilerable probability enst a pagan origin. The custom of freing the enst in worship, derived in the tirst instance from lersian notions of sun worship (see supra li4.), appears to have been borrowed from Greek anl Roman practice (Aeschylus, Ayainemnon, 502 ; Vergil, Ac'neid, viii. bষ; Uvid, Fasti, iv. 777, with Mr. Paley's note). The "ter injectus pulvis" has passed into the Christian burial service; while the letters D. M. on the tomus of the early Cliristians point to the tenacity of pagan traditions in connexion with the state of the departed (Northcote and Brownlow, Romu Sitterr ine; p. 26). Lacerda, in commenting on the (ine, "Spargens rore levi et ramo felicis olivae" (Verg. Aeneid, vi. 230) considers that the n't therein denoted represents the origin of sprinkling with holy water, a practice which Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 62 ; Migne (S. G.), vi. 80) declares to have been introduced, at the instigation of dsemons, into the Christian ritual in imitation of the true baptism proclaimed by the prophets. "Epitapbia," ar funeral orations over the dend, such as we freçuently meet with in the writings of the Fathers, ars distinctly traceable to pagau precedent. [FUnERAL SERMONs,] signed to point out. The use of incense is condemned by Tertullian and other early writers as a pagan practice [INcesise]. We learn from ditterent writers (Urigen, cont. Cels. viil. 17 ; Min. Felix, Octav. c. 10 ; Arnobius, bk. vi.) that the absence of images in their churchea was made a reprosch by paganism ngainst the Christians, and Augustine expressly states that the introduction of these visible objects of alloration was regarded as unlawful in his dny, and speaks of the adorntion paid to them as a kind of insanity (ad Ps, cxiii.; Migne, xxxvii. 1183-1185). The earliest mention of pictures in churches has refarence to the 4th century, and thair introduction is expressly forbidden by the 38th canon of the council of Elvirn, A.D. 324 . Epiphanius, in the same century, tells us (ap. Jerome, Epist. 51 ; Migne, Patrol. xxii. 253) that he fell it to be his duty to destroy a hanging "velum tioctum atque depictum," which he found suspended in a church in Palestine, representing Christ or one of the saints. Theodoretus Cyrensis (Gracc. Alfect. Curatio, Migne (S. G.), Ixxxiii. 022) refers with express approval to the practice, prevalent in his day, of euspending votive offerings ( $d v a$ $\theta \eta \mu a \tau a)$ in the churches over the tombs of the martyrs, on escape from danger or recovery from sickness; similnriy, those who were childless presented such offerings in the hope of being blessed with offspring; those already parents, to secure the divine blessing on their children.

The little chapels with imnges of the Virgin that so frequently meet the ege of the tourist in Sonthern Germany or Italy cannot but recall to recollectiou the "Compitales" or deities who presided over cross-ronds, and whose statues and shrines adorned the points of junction. The asylum afforded by pagan temples to fugitives from justice or from their foes offers perhaps too Vague and general a resemblance to the right of sanctuary to be regarded as necessarily the origin of the latter, which may with equal or greater probability be referred to Jewish precedents.
(ii) Among the vestiges of pagnn bellef disceruihle in the everyday life and practice of Christian com:nunities mny be included many observances of a harmless character and little moral significance. The Roman custom of precenting gifts at the commencement of the new year is still observed, and the expression of good wishes on the snme occasion is alike a pagan and a Christian usnge (Ovid, Fasti, $i$. 175). The use of bridecakes at weddings (the loman confarreatio), the palatine bay and ouk on our coilnge, the names of the nonths, which even the decree of Charles the Great could not permanently alter, all distinctly recall a like origin.

Of such customs, one, the "strenne" (modern "étrennes") degenerated into a serious abuse, which the chtoreh did its best to suppress. [New Year's Girts, p. 1381.7

As proof that the gient majority of the superstitions of the age were a direct inheritance from paganism, we may clte the followlog illustration. Amid the lioss of much that the ancient astronomers had bequenthed to posterity, the dineorery of the real cause of eclipses appears to have been faithfully preserved; and in his Nitural Ifistory, Pliny takes occasion to extol this triumph of science over superstition, and warmly urges philoophers to like achlevements. As his writings contluued to be studisd through. out the greater part of the middle ages, this philosophical solutlou of a constantly recurriug phenomenon was never lost sight of by the ell:cated few, and hence the teachers of the church are frequently to be found rebuking the vulgar superstition which led the common people'to assemble and utter cries on the ocenslon of a lunar or solar eclppse, in order to prerent the moon or sun from being totally devoured. Discourses directly levelled ngainst this practics are to be found in the writings of Maximus of Turin (Migne, vii. 337), and of Rabanus Maurus (Opera, ed. Colv. v. 606), wlth which compars Theitus (Annal. 1. 28). On the other hand, as Pliny expressly states that earthquakes portend calamity (Hist. Nat. ii. 81-86) so the Fathers shared this belief with the multitule. St. Ambrose decinres that the denth of Theolosios was foretold by earthquakes, by " mountains of ruin and an unwonted darkening of the sky" (Migne, xvi. 1386). The prges of Gregory of 'lours are in this respect as superstitious as those of Livy. Four suns portended a great defeat in Auvergne (Hist. Franc. iv. 21); hluod flowed from broken bread (ibid. v. 34); it rnined blood near Paris until men threw aside their stained gurnents in horror (ib. vi. 14); a bright body resembling a lofty beacon appenred in ths henvens to toretell the denth of Gundebnld (vii. 11). (See also de Mirac. St. Martin, Buaquet, Script. ii. 469.) The belief in astrology [Astrologers], which Pliny (Nat. Nist. ii. 5) notices ns fust gaining ground in his time, could never be entirely eradicated throughout the period here trented.

It must nevertheless be admitted that the voice of the church wns generally strongly pronounced agninst the more childish and irrational forms of the belief in omens. "Thou seest," says St. Besil, "how wrong a thing it is to look for omens; yet many Christians deem it no harm ( $\alpha \delta$ iddopov) to listen for sounds and to gire heed to signs" (Cominent. in Isai. c. ii. ; Migne, Series Graeca, $\mathbf{x x x}$. 247). He instsnces such trivial cireumstances as striking one's foot ngainst some object on leaving the house, or finding one's garment caught, and admonishes Christians rather to take note of the proofs of divine wisdom and goodness exhibited in the naturnl world. St. Chrysostom refers to the belief that to meet a cripple or a one-eyed persoa, when starting on a journey, was a bud omen (Hum. al Pop. Antioch.); St. Eligius, in the 7th century, enumerntes a large number of similar superstitions, such as the belief that to allow one's flocks to pass by hollow trees or near pits gave them over to the power of evil spirits. He dissuades women from wearing amber about their necks, and from invoking Minerva, and rebukes the folly of hesitating to set about new uodertakings at the time of full moon (Migne, lxaxvii. 528).

Much as the Germana aseribed at pleasinre a piace in their Waihalla to departed heroes, so they appear to have assumed the right to canonise departed Christians. This assumption we find again forbidden at the council of Frank fort in the year 794. (26) "De simulaero de cousparsa farioa." On certain days the Germans were accustomed to make honey cokes representing fignres of their gods. Hefele states that in West phalia the cakes made at tise time of Carnival are still known as "Heidenwecke." (27) "De simulacrls de pannis factis." Flere some real "comedant," and consider that allusion is desigued to a belief similar to that referred to in l'ibullus, "Hanc ego de coelo ducentem sidera rhili." Maximus of Truin, in his l01st homily (Migne, 1vii. 337), remonstrates with those "qui patireet lunam de coclo magorum carminibus posse deluci," and implores them that, putting aside this pagan error, "practermisso errore geatili," they will nccejt a view more consonant with Christian enlightenment.
Simiarly, a equitulary of Charles the Great, of the year 768 , requires "at populus Del paganias non faciat," and enumerates as "sparcitiae gentilitat is" profane sacrifices to the dead, aortilesy and divining, phylacteries, anguries, incantations, and offerings of victims, which last, it states, " foolish men are wont to offer close to charches, in pagan fashion, in the nume of the holy murtyrs aud confessors of the I.ord " (l'erta, L'uq. i. 3:3).

Featnres of a more general character, pointing to a low conception of Christinn morality, auch as the settlement of disputes by duelling, authorisel by the code of Gondehnid, king of Burgunly in the 6th eentury (see Ordeal), the avenging of murder by murder, as recorded on the part of bishop Gewelib in the 8th century, and facts of a like niture, are often more justly to be regarded as djstinct traditions of paganism than meroly as evldence of a corrupt or imper. fect Chriatianity.

PALLADIUS, anchoret in Syria, 4th cen. tury ; commemerated Jna. 28. (Cul. Byzant.; Bull., Acta SS. Jan. ii. 841.)
[C. 11.]
PALLAIRE, POLAIRE, POOIIRE. When books were few in the ancient Celtic church, and required enreful preservation in ncompanylag their ownera from place to $\mathrm{p}^{\text {lace, }}$ they appear to have been deposited in leathern satchels or wallets which could be attached to the back by thongs in tra relling, and hung upon pegs on the wall (Todd, Obit. Ch. Cn. Duhl. j. Ixxi.) when a house was ranehed. For these the two distinctive names of Polaire (Pulluire, Poolire) and Tiay (tiayha) were used, apparently according to the size. The former was comparatively smadl, often a case for manuscripts or for ouly one book, like the case int which the Book of Ariangh now lies, and which is very richly embossed sod covered with figures and the usual Irish iuterlacing patterus. The latter was of coarser material (as of aenlakina, Colgau, Ir. Thum. 86 , c. 93,130 , c. 9 , calling it s.acculus and pera) and of greater capacity, a wallet to hold not only aeveral books, but relics a!sw and sscred utensils. Evidently the writer of the Tripartite Life of St. tatricia (Colgan, Tr. Thema. 123, c. 38 ) is in error when he says St. Patrick lelt at the church he had newly founded at hellfine, "libros, and cum acrinio in quo Ss. Petri et Pauli reliquite asseruabantur, et tabulis ia quibua scribere solebat vulgo Pallaire appellatia " (Reeves, S. Addunan. PALLIUM. We find this word in a grest variety of uses in ecclesinsticul Latin. Before proceeding to these, however, we shall first note its classical aceeptance as equivalent to $\langle\mu \mathrm{a}$ riop, a term for an outer article of dress similar to, lut not the same as, the toga." We may desuribe it as being, to all intents nad purposes, a square or oblong blanket; for though it was occasionally found of linen and other materials, wool was by far the most cominon. These blankets

Such an article of dress would, of course, be Inconvenient if the wearer hal to rion or to ellgage in active work, and therefore he would throw it over his shoulders. Thus we find one of Plautus'a characters, a prasite, saying (Cuplivi, v. 1. 12): "Conjicinm in collum pallium, primo ex me haue rem ut nudiat," that is, I will throw back my pu lium to be nble to runquickly with the news. Accordingly, in the next scene (l. 9 ), he is observed coming "conlecto prallio" (cf, also Terence, Phurwio, v. 6. 4). In counerfon with this, a curious mistake has been made by St. Jaidore (Etymol. xix. 2t. 1): "Pallium est quo ministrantiun scapulae conteguntur; at dum ministrant expediti liscurrant." lanntus : Si quid facturus es appende ia humeris pallium, et purgat, quantem valet, tuorum jedun juerniprius super indumenta pellicis ret pellints, quin prius super indumenta pellicio veteres utebantur, quasi peltes sive a palla per derivationem (lés. diminutioaem"). Here it will be seen that Jsidore treats as the normal state of things that which was exceptional.

Besiles this special sense of the word pallium, It io used by lsidore in the same chapter quite as a general term for a garment, c.g. the togit is pallium purun forma rotundu (§ 3 ); the puludimentum is insijns pallium and $p$. bellicum $(\S 9)$; the pacntla is p. cuin fimbrias lonyis (§ 14); the lacerna is p. finliriatun (ib.); anl the pruetcxta

A third use of the word in pat listic latin is to designate the coarse outer garment of monks and of others wha affected to imitate the austerities of moaastic life. Thus pope C'elestinus I. (ob. 432 A.D.), speaks of such as beiag "amicti pallio" seemed thereby to claim n saactity not rightly theirs (Epist. 4 ad Episc. Vien. at Narb. c. 2 ; Patrol. 1. 431). Salvianus again pallio mentiaris" (adv. Avaritiom iv. 5; Putrol. liii. 232). To take a different type of exmople, shen Fulgentins became bishop of Ruspe, he retsined his former monastic habit. His biographer tells us that "subtus casulam nigello rel lactineo pallio circumdstus incessit," and tbat, when the weather permicted, he wore a pallium alone within the monastery (lita, e. 37; Patrol. Ixv. 136.
Again we meet with the word pallium in the phrase pallium linostimum, which we have already discussed [Maniptic].

It may be noted that the wool for the pallitim ing, and has long been, furnished by the lamhe which are reared in the convent of St. Agnca at liome. In the Life of Gregory the Great, however, by John the Deacon, reference is male on the occasion of the trauslation of his body to his patlitur of being "hysso canlente contextum" (lib ir. 80 ). Whether this is exceptional, or is to be taken as inllicating a difference in Gregory's time, does not appear, probably the Intter.
A littlo further on (c. 8t), the same writer, in minutely describing the ancient picture of Gregury, says of the present vestment: "Pallio mediocri, a dextro videlicet humero sub pectura super stomachum circulatim delucto: deinde depositu, eujus pars alteram pest tergum humorum veniens proprin altera super eundem medinm corporis, sed ex rectituline, non jer deaseription would give ex latere pendet." carius of Marcus, bishop of Fome (ob. 336 A.D.), though it is possible that the refurence is of a dilferent kind-"hie constituit ut epincopus Ostiensis, qua consecrat episcopum urbis [i.e. Rombe], pullio uteretur, et ab endum ejiscopo [heq. eplacophis] urbis koma consectaretur" (litioe pontif. tif). It will be ubservel that wo have here gut the case ot a bishup, nut an archbishop; but the honour may at tirst have beengiven with rather more latitude, fur we find Gregory the Great bestowing the pallium on Syagrius, bishopr of Autun. It is to be noted that in the letter in which Gregory seta this fisth, he distinctly calls attention to the permission of the emperor -"serenissimi dominl imperatoris [Mantice] -. 1roma voluntas eet, et concedi hoc omnino desiderat" ( fipist. lib. ix. 11 ; cf. ib. 108: vol. iii. 934,1013 ).

Saving the rather doubtful case of the bishop of Ostin, the carliest Instance of the bestowal of the pullinis is that granted by Symmachus (ob. 514 a.b.) to Theodare, archbishop and metropolitan of Laureacus in Pannonia ( $E$ 'pist. 12; Patrol. Jxii. 72). In this case no mention is made of the imperlal authority. On the other hand we have a letter written by pope Vigilius in $5+3$ A.1). to Auxaniux, archbishop of Arles, in which he defers granting the pallinm till the pleasure of the emperor shall have been ascertained. In a subsequent letter, written two years later, the impurial sanction having been given (" progloriosissimi tilii uostri regis Childeberti Christiani devotione mandatis"), the honour is granted (Epp. 6, 7 ; Patrol. Ixix. 26). Other instances are those of Caosarius, archbishop of Arles, on whom the palliun was bestowed by Symmachus (I'ita Cues. lib. 1. 30 : Patrol. Ixvii. 10(6), Bul Virgilius, also of Arles, to whom it was granted by Gregory the Great (Epist, lib. v. $53 ;$ P'atrol. Ixxvil. 784). Into the famous dispute as to the rescript of Valentinian in connexion with the pallinm of the bishope of Ravenna, it is not our iutention to enter.

In sevorai of these cases the recipient had been some time in possession of his eee on receiving the palliom, which thus became an exceptional distinction, conferred when the Roman see wished to bestow such. As this was one of the countless ways which went to the building up of the papal power, we need feel no surprise at the new phase of things which meets us in the 8th century. The pillium is now no longer an exceptional honour, granted to this or that archbishop, but a badge, the acceptance of which implied the acknowledgment by the wearer of the supremacy of the apostolic see. Thus we find in a jetter written by St. Boniface in 745 A.D. to Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, the declaration on his part of willingness to obey the see of Rome, and that "metropolitanos pallia ab Illa sede quaerere" (Epist. 63 ; Patrol. Jxxxix. 763). Indeed we find from some Jetters of pope Zacharias to Boniface ( 743 A.D.) that the latter had already male application for $p$ allia for several of the metropolitans under him. (E"pp. 5, 6; ib. 9:15.)

One step more alone remains. Pope Nicholas I., in his Responsa ad consmila Bulyarorvin ( $866^{\circ}$ A.n.), orders (c. 73 ; labbe, viii, $5+1$ ) that no archbiahop may be enthroned or may consecrate the eucharist till he shall have received the palliun from the Roman see.

Another polnt may be briefly touched upa, namely, the question of the pullium Cinllistama as distinct from the pollinun homunum. It has been seen that under whatever condit]ans the pallinin was bestoweal, it distinctly tuok the form of a gift vouchaafed at the will of the limman see. This being the case, it la not easy to understand the onder of the council of Macon ( 581 A.b.) that no archbishop ahall prosume to say mass sine pillio (can. t; labibe, v. (tits). To suppuse that this means that archbishops are prohibited from celebrating mass till their pasition is, as it were, ratified by Rume, is, consilerlng time and place, an anachromam, anm the langunge of the canon taken per se would never lead to such a conclusion. Honce many have held (e.g. Hefele, infra, p. 217), and it would seem with much justlce, that this Gallican use is distinct from, and exists side hy side with, the special papal pullum; that it was simply a mark of archicpincopal rank, which was to be spreially worn at mass, just as each other order would be required to wear lts own peculiar halge, A possible illustration of this may be found in o frogment, edited by Martene and Darami, which dwells on the vestments in use in the ciallican church, inclading the palliuin (Thes. Anecd. $\mathrm{p}_{\mathrm{t}}$ 99 ; cited by Marriott, p. 204).

PALM. The great beauty of the dite-palm in all stages of growth, and under all circumstances of background and association, has made it, like the vine or the corneenrs, one of the natural symbols of Divine blessing. The righteous shall tlourish as a paloz-tree (Ps, xci. 13) may be taken as a typically Eastern use of the tree as an emblem.

As may be supposed, the palm branch is found most irequeutly in sepnlehral monuments sad inscriptions, and is frequently alded to the monogram or chrisma as an elublem of the victory of the faith (Bosio, p. 4:36, and Martigar's Woodcuts, p. 498). In Bot tari, $\mathrm{y}^{\mathrm{l}}$, xxii. (Aringhi, vol. i. p. 289), it is besutifully used as a pillar to divide the surface of a sarcophagns into compartments or panels. Also Aringhi, i. pp. 293, 297, 301 (where the fruit is indicated, see infri), and, perhaps, at p. 307. At p. 321 the heals of two apostlos, probably St. Peter and St. Paul, are ornamented each with the whole erown of folinge of a palm. It is unquestionably the sign of martyrdom in the wilest sense of the wordthat of persistent testimony borne to Christ, and oonsummated by death. It is admitted on sll hands, that, though the pain accompanies the martyr, it does not indicate that the hearer actually suffered violent death in will and deed (see Rev. vij. 9, and Gregory the Great in Ezech. bk, ii. hom. xvii., where the palm branches ase

It is true that the same epithet is found repeatedly in a set of eleven prayerex to the Virgiu, in Greek, attuibuted to St. Euhrem (Op. Gr. iii. Pp. 542, &s.), 3nt the whole cast of these prayers obvinusly celongs to a time tor later than that of St. Ephrem.

There is also a monastic ceremony callell Panagia, at which a trinagular shaped piece of blessed bread is elevated, nad partaken of, after a meal with certain prayers. by all present; und a cap of wine is likewise distributed to all with a thanksgiving and special lavocation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, whence the name of the ceremony ia sald to be derived (Du Cange, $G r$. PARABOLANI, an inferior order of church officers whe fulfilled the duty of hompital nttendants and nurses to the alck poor, whom they telieved from the alms of the faithful, "depu. taatur ad curanda debilium aegra corpora" (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. Tit. ii. de Ejpisc. et Cler.
lez, +3). Binterim attributes the establinhmon of these fuactionaries as a distinct ordel to the peace of the church under Constantine (Denkvirdigheit. vi. 3, 26). Previous to this time the care of the sick and the burial of the dead, as we see from Dionysius'e graphic account of Was filve at Aipxiadria (Euseb. /I. $F$ \% vii, 22), was filt:lim' h.  тараклитікбу). One of the prineipal and most necessary of tho Greek olfice-books. It is arranged on the principle of the Octoéchos, but extended so as to contain the Troparia of the whole Ferinal office for the year. By some writers it is attributed to Joseph of the Studium (died A.D. 88.3); by others to another Joseph, surnamed Meludus (see Leo Allat. do Lijiris Eeclcs. Gracc. p. 28:3). Two derivations are given for the name: viz. either quasi consolatorius, because its contents tend to the consolation of the penitent; or quasl invitatorius, because they largely consist of invocations.
The course of the Ferial offico depends not so much upon the season of the year as upon the Tones (i×01), of which there are eight, arranged to follow one another in regular sequence, beginning with the week after Easter week, atter which they recur again, and ao on. Ench Tone has its own Troparia, and governs the service at all the flours for its week. Thus the entire det of variations of the service is finishell in a period of eight weeks. Thore are propor tsbles to shew how these periols of eight weeks, with their Tones, fill in ditlerent years, necording to the date of Easter. By referring to these tables the proper Tone for the week in which any given day falls may be found; and then the paracletice gives the proper Troparia for the different offices of the day.
[C. E. H.]
PARADISE ( $\pi a \rho d \delta \epsilon i \sigma o s$, from a Persian word meaning a park or pleasure-ground) is used (1) in inscriptions to designato the place in which the dead in Christ wait the final judgment. It is said (Martigny, Dict. p. 577, 2nd ed.) not to occur earlier than the end of the 4th ceutury, when (A.D. 382) it is found in the epitaph of Theodora (I)e Rossi, Romo Sott. i. 141, No. 317). But, without the actual use of the word "Paradise," the dwelling of a sont in bliss is often indicated by pictures or symbels of the last resting-places of the faithful. An areosolium of the cemetery of Cyriaca shews an oranti standing between two figures, who draw back the curtains on each side; this is supposed to typify the entrance of a soul into the rest of parudise (De Rossi, Butlct. 186:3, p. 76). A painting in the cemetery of Petronilla (Martigny, p. 639) is thonght to represent the reception of a soul into Paralise by Petronilla. The soul admitted to the joys of Paradise is sometimes represented as a female figure standing between two troes in an attitule ef contemplation (Perret, Catacombes, $\mathbf{v}$. pl. v.; De Rossi, Romu Sott. i. 95), often accompanied by the words in pace. This inseription appears in the representstion of Dionysas (said to be of the 3rd contury) in the cemetery of Soter (D) Fissil, Romas Nott. iii. tav. i.), where the departed appears in the midst of a garden full of fruits and flowers, where birds seem to flit from branch to branch. On some sareophaguses (as in Bottari, Sculture, xix. ; Millin, Midi de la France,

1xy. Ixviii.) trees or vines form columas sepa. rating the ditherent groups; these are thought by some to typify laradise. Oceasionally the promised land is typified by the $t$ wo spies bearing a groat bunch of grapes between then on a pole (Millin, lix. 3; Garrucci, l'etri, ii. 9). Ani again the soul is typitied by a bird sitting of a tree (Lupi, Scuerac R'pituphion, tav, x vii. p. $1: 37$ ), or in the inilst of flowers, See the epitaph of Sabinianus (Martigny, p. 576). The flowers and icaves, which often edclose representations of the Lord in glory, as in some of the ancieat mosaics of Kome and Ravenna, are thought to refer to Paradise [Dosalcs, p. 1337]; and figures of saints in basilic.s are frequently placed ia the midst of a Paradise indicaterl in the same manar. The same kind of symbolism is tound in gilded ghass (Buonarroti, Ossertazione sopra alowni Frammenti di letro, xviii xsi.; Garrueci, ix. 8). The rich dress in which many fomale figures are represented on sepulehral monuments is thought by many to indicate the "splendour of lara lise" ( $\tau \rho \cup \not \subset \bar{\eta} \tau 0 \hat{0} \pi a \rho a \delta \epsilon(\sigma 0 v)$ of which the liturgies speak. The brinquets which are so often represented on the walls of sepulchial chambers are also very commonly supposed to typify l'aralisiacal joys (Polidori, Conviti Effijueti, in the Milan Amico cattolico) (Martigny, Dict. dcs Antiq. chret. s. v. Paradis).
(2) The word Paradise is sometimes used to designate the quadrangulur space enclosed by a cloister, often used as a burial-ground. Coinp. Nartuex, p. 1379.
[C.]
PARAGAUDA, PARAGAUDIS ( $\pi$ a $\rho a$. rấdis). This is a species of ornamental fringe attnched to a dress. We find in the Theodosian Code (lib. x. tit. 21, 1. 1) a law of Valens proo hibiting the use of "auratse ae sericas paragaudae auro intextae" to private persons. A lav of Thendosins the Great (ib. 1. 2) repeats the prohibition in stronger terms. The word is also used, by a natural extension, for the dress so ornamented (see Gothofredus's note in loc.). As there is no opecial Christian connexion of the word, it is needless to give further instances, It is apparently oriental, but the derivation is unknown.
[R. S.]
PARALYTIC MAN. Two cures of the palay (besides that of the ceriurion's servaat) are circumstantially narrated in the gospeis-one of the sutlerers at the Peol of Bethesua (John r. $2-17$ ), the other of him whom his friends lowered through the roof in the crowded assembly of Capernamm (Matt. ix. 1-8; Mark v. 21 ; Lake viii. 40, v. 17-26). The former is by far the more frequently represented-nlmost alwars in the act of carrying away his bed, or "that whereen he lay," which is sometimes a Greek couch, sometimes a somewhat modern, stampbelateac. See Rohault de Fleury, L'Etample, pl. li. figs. 1-5, Bottari, tav. xxxix., snd Be: titesda, p. 201, for a cut from a Vatican sarco phagus. Soe also Rohault de Fleury, pl. lii, for inany varieties of the grabatum, two from ivories at Ravenna and at Cluny. A seribe or spostle is sometimes present (Buttari, sExi.). PARISH. I. Names for.-The Greek word тapoukia, from which the English parish is derived, through the Latin paroecia, parochin, the Norman-French paroisse (Lois de Guillaume le Conquerant, 1), and the early Einglish paroche, parusike, parcsche (Stratmann, s. v.), sppears to have had two mesnings. (1) In Greek inscriptions it is not uncommon to find the inhalitants of a town diviled into those who have and those who have not full civil rights, and described collectively as of $\tau \in \pi 0 \lambda i \tau a s$
 No. $16: 31$ at Thespine, No. 2906 at l'riene, No. 3049 at Teos, No. 3595 at llinm Novam; hence, in the first use of the term and its cognate terms in Biblical and ecelesiastical Greek, they nre found in this literal seuse of a "80jonruer" "nd "sojourning,"e.q, in the LXX. Exod. ii. 22 ; Dent. v. $14 ; 2$ Kings viii. 1 , in the $\mathrm{N} . \mathrm{T}$. Acts vii. 29 ; Eplhes. ii. 19 ; Ileb. xi. 9 ; in Philo, e.g. vol. i. pp. 161, 511 , ed. Mangey; in Josephus, e.g. Antt. Juw. viii. 2, 9. It is probable that the Lerin came thus to be ordinarily applied to the colonies of Jews in the great cities of the East, who were not absorbed in the ordinary citizens, but kept their nationality distinct; e.g. at Cyrene, where Strabo np. Joseph. Antt. Inut. xiv. 7, 2, says that there were fuur divisions of the popul iation-citizens, farmers, $\mu$ éroikoi, and Jews. It was prohably continued or adoptel by the colonies of Christians in the same citics, who atool in a similar relation to the rest of the popmation: hence, in Clem. Rom. i. c. 1, the church of Rome deacribes itself ns in $\boldsymbol{i} \boldsymbol{\kappa} \kappa \lambda \eta \sigma i \alpha$
 Philipp. 1; Martyr. Polyc. 1. With this mingle: the metaphorical sense of the word in which this "sojourning" pןon earth was contrasted with the "nbiding city" in heaven, c.,f. 1 l'et. i. 17 ; Clem. Rom. ii. c. 5 ; Corpus fuscr. Gruec. No. 9474, 9683.
(2) It was used, in a sense which contimned its earlior sense of "dwelling nenr a city;" ns equivalent to a rural commune or a detached suburb. This meaning is rare, and the elitors of the Corpus Inscr. Grace. treat the use of $\pi$ deookos in the sense of "colonus," as a prof that the inscription on which it occurs, No. 8656, is not earlier than tha 4th centary, A.D. In the Inter civil law mapookia was spplied to villeing or pensant-farmers ; e.g. in the Practica, tit. 15, c. 2, ap. Von Lingenthal, Jus Graeco-Lommum, pars i. p. 42.
In the ecclesiastical use of the words these two meanings were confounded-the former meaning predominates in the earlier period, the latter in the later; nor does the confusion disappear until far on in the middle ages; i.e. тapouk!a, paroecia were used (i.) of the whole colony of Christians in a given city or district, i.e. of the "diucese," in its modern sense of the district over which a bishop came to have jurisdiction; (ii.) of the rural or suburban communities which were more or less dependent on another church-i.c. of the "parish" in its modern sense. Between these two uses of the words it is not always easy to distiaguish. The following must be taken as being only an approximate classification of some leading instances: $-\mathbf{i} .=$ the modern "diocese": S. Iren. Ep. ad Florin. ap. Enseb. I. E.: r. 20; Apollon. This use of diocecsis (snd the concurrent absence of the use of parrocia) is especially found in Italy-e.g. in the long dispute between the bishops of Arezzo and Siens, the documente relating to which are given hy Muratori, Antiquit. constant variant for paroecia, srisen from arisnt for paroecia, seems to have parochus, which has been revived in modeal times by Bsur, über der Ursprung des Episcopats, p. 78, but is altogether untensble.)
ii. Origin of Parishes.-The origin of parishes, in the modern sense of the word, is to be found in the suburban and rural organization of the Roman empire, In the more civilized countries of that empire, each important, rity had a district surrounding it, within sontich its magistrates might exercise jurisdistion ( $=$ regio, Sicul. Flace, in Gromut. Vett. ed. Lachuiann, p. 135 ; territorium, Digest, $50,16,239, \S 8$; סiolk $\quad$ ois Cic. od Fum. 13, 15). This district might contuin within it vici, castella, payi, киิцаи, фроúpıa, which formed dependencies of the city (Isidor.
Hispal. Origin, whe Staatserwaaltung, Bd. i. pp. 7 gq.). In addition to these large cities, with their surrounding teiritory snd their dependent villages and hamlets, there were independent communities in rursl districts, which had their own officers, and sometimes also their own territory (Marquardt, Bid.; Kuhn, über die Entstehung der Städte der Alten, Komenverfassung u. Synoikismss, Leipzig, 1878). By the end of the 3 rd century, Christimity had penetrated to the majority of these had to bo made for tham in the gend provision zation. The provision in the geners organidifferent times and in different considerably it the modern parish is the survivor of many earlier erperiments. experiments.
(1.) In Syria it was sometimes the practice to attach $\frac{1}{}$ small town for ecclesinstical purposes to a neighbouring larger town; for example, Bethlehem was attsched to Jerusalom (Sulp, Sever.
Dial. i. 8 , ed. Halm, Dial. i. 8, ed. Halm, p. 159 , writing of St. Jerome, says, "ecelesiam loci illius (Bethlehem) Hierony: qua preshyter regit; nam paroecia est episcopi qui Hierosolymam tenet "). But more commonly to have become ths practice, as early as the 4th century, to appoint presbyters and deacone for amall towns and country districte, who were in bome raspects on a lower footing than the prescies. c. 13 ; Antioch, city churches (Conc. In North Africa, the system or rural or itinerant bishops, wath jurisdiction over detached towns or villages, does not secm to have existed. It is clear, both from the large number of bishoprics which are known to have existed, and from the taunts which were thrown out on both sides in the course of the Donatist out on versy, that bishopsof veinted, whershops of full rank were ordinarilynppointed, wherever a Christian community existed; ayatem which after time there are traces of the prevail, e.g. in St. Augustine, Epist. 209, whlly to he speaks of a "castellum", Epist. 209, where outlying dependency cellum" which formed an "antea ibi nunquam episcopus fuit of Hippo: cum contigua sibi regione ad fiscop sed simul nensis ecclesine pertinebst." ad paroociam Hipporound Alexandria, $\dot{\eta}$ Mapećrvs (3.) In the district were entrusted to pape intendence of the presbyters, under the sujpernasius mention upwishop of Alexandrin. Athnalso speaks of the bishop of ten such villages, and $\left.\mu^{\prime} \dot{\nu} \psi\right)$. The dispute with Ischyras, which ( $\pi \in \rho \in \chi_{0}-$ pies a prominent place in his the Arians, seems to in his controversy with attempt of Ischyras to have arisen out of the bishop of one of these villages, whimself appointed resists on the ground of its being contrnry to local practice (S. Athsuas. Apol. a contrinry to vol. i. p. 143; c. 85, vol. i. p. 158). (4.) In Gaul and Spain, the circumstances under which Christinnity spread, and the elaborate civil organization with which it found itself in contact, led to the growth and consolidation of the aystem which has aince become permanent in the Western church. It is probable that in those countriee it did not penetrate to the country distriets and organizamunes until long after its complate organization in the chief towns. Those towns consequently became missionary centres. Preabyters and deacons were sent into the custella and vici, partly to preach and partly to minister there. there. That they did not go far from the towns, full advantages dot give to the Christians the by their haring of Christisn worship, is shewn every Saturday, in order to to the city church of tha Sundny, (Con order to assist in the services of the Sundny (Conc. roll of the city clergy. They received their allownnces, as before, from the common fund. Thes could be recalled by the blshop, and re-nttached to the sity church (so Inte as Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 12). But gradually they beenine fixed in their several districte, or "paroecine." As such they were nt first called "cardinalee," a term which was also applied to the permanent chapliains of endowed orntories ( 8.9. by S. Greg. M. Eipist. xii. 11), and wns ultimntely superseded in the case of alnost all parishes, except the Roman tituli, by the terms diecesani, o.g. Conc. Agnth. e. 22; Tarracon. e. 1:1, parochitani, parocсіиni, parochiales, Leus. Limerit. c. 18; 3 Tolet. c. $4 ; 7$ Tolet. c. 4 ; 9 Tolet. c. 2 ; locales, 3 Tolet. c. 20 ; forastici, Can. Martin. Brac. c. 15 (trans-
 c. 13).

Such is in outline the history of the origin of the parochial aystem. When it finally enme to prevail, it tendel to absorb into itsclf the other systems upon which Christian communities had been organized, and, although only after atruggles which stretch fir into the middle ages, and not without the co-operation of the civil power tor the $p^{\text {urpeses of political convenience, to apread }}$ the network of itt elaburnte organization over the whole of Western Christendom. But it will be noted that the listery which has been given takes account only of rural or suburban districts, and of towns which were included in such districte. It is neceasary to explain briefly the extension of the syatem-i. to epiacopal cities; ii. to privately founded churchea.
(i.) In the Inrger citica, aome kiad of subdivision soon becanie necessary, not only because a slogle building became too small for worahip, but also because a single orgnizntion became too cumbrous to discharge effectively the various functions of diseipline and of cherity whica the church nssumed to iteelf. But instead of subdividing the church into separate communities, each complete in itself, the theory of the unity of the chureh was preserred by nsaigning to ench community one or more presbyters, and regarding theae presbyters as forming collectively a single ouvespov, or consilimm, under the presilency of $n$ eingle bishop. This wat the ense at Alexandrin; ench district and quarter ( (גuúpce) of the eity had its own church and its own presbyter (S. Eplphan. adv. Haceres. 68, $4 ; 69,1 ;$ S. zom. H. E. 1. 15). This whe also the case at Rom? The earlieat certain evidence whleh we possess on the point is the letter of Corneliua in Euseb. H. E. vi. 43, which says that there were at that time forty-gix presbyters at Rome. A few yenrs Inter Optatus (de Schism. Donat. ii. 4) mentions that there were mure than forty basilicas; it la inferred that

- That cardinalis in thts une, whtch was transferred from certain civll umices under the emplre, means "fixed" is rightiy maintatned by Gothofred, ad Cod, Theodos. 12, 6, 7, Jicking, Notitia Dign. Orient. c. 6, 2, vol. 1. pp. 24, 205; it is shewn, e.g. by a letter of pope Zachary to Pippln (fipist. 8, c. 16, Migop, P. L. vol. txxxix, 835) who wili nut attew a "preshytnr cardinalls," to be appointed on a pifvate eatate, but ruics that whenever masees are required in private oratortes a presbyter must be apecially asked for from the blshop. The other tate Lattn meaniug of "cardinatis " (i.e. praeclpuus, accordlog to Serv, ad Virg. Aen. I. 135), to less applicable to either its civil or its ecciesiastical use.
there was one presbyter for each basilica, and probably a larger number for the bishop's basilica. The Liber Pontificalis is of less authority as to the early period, but is more precise in its details. The earliest account which it gives is that St. Evaristus assigned churches and their revenues in Rome to presbyters ("t titulos in urbi Roma divisit presbyteris." Vit. S. Evaris? . F. 6). The next account is that St. Dinunsius assigned churches to presbyters, and instituted cemeterics and parishes (the text $l_{3}$ partly uncertain: Bianchini reada "parochias dixieses instituit," but probably the second of these words is a gloss of the first, as parochia was a comparatively rare word in Italy, and also as Hincmar of Rheims Opuse, in caus. Hincon. Itus dun. c. 15 ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cxxvi. 330 and the Pseudo-Isidore, Epist. ii. Dionys. c. 3; Hinschius, p. 196, evidently read "parochias" only). A few years nfterwards, pope Marcellas is said by the game authority to have instituted twent $\boldsymbol{\text { -five " }}$ tituli" at Roine, "quasi dioceses propter baptismuns et poenitentiam multorum qui convertebantur e paganis" (Vit. S. Marcell. p. 31). It may be inferred from these three accounts that in the first instance the presbyters of the several Roman churches had no special district assigned to them, and that probably they wers not even attached to any particular church, After the time of pope Dionysius, each chusch had its own clergy, its own proper district, and its own revenuea. The presbyters, deacon, and sub-deacon of each church were "cardinales," i.e. fixed to the given church; but collectively, as at Alexandria, they formed a single body, which, by corporate continuity, with changes of detail but not of principle, remains to this dsy as the "collegium sanctae Romanae ecclesise cardinalium."
But the queations of the relation of thess "tituli," "parochiae," or "dioceses," to the "regiones" into which the city was also dirided for ecelesinstical purposes, and also of the degree to which they were analogous to the parishes of other parts of Christendom, are questions which do not seem to admit, upon extnnt evidence, of any certnin answer (some help towards the solation of the first of these queations will be found in the treatises of the learned 16 th-century antiquary, Onuphrio Panvino, np. Mai, Spicilegium Romanum, vol. vi., and in Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. Comm. praee. in Ord. Rom. c. 3).
(2) Co-ordinate with the normal formation of Christian communities by the aggregation of the Christians of a city or district, and their organizntion, whether under presbyters or bishops, was the custom of erectiog places of worship upon the estatea of landed proprietors. In the first instance there appears to hyve been oo restriction upon the erection of such places of worship; the civil law, fer fiscal reasons, required the officers of such churches to be taken from the eatate (law of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 398, Cod. Theodos, 16, 2, 33= Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 11), but otherwise until the middle of the 6th century left them practically free. It is not clear whether Conc. Chaleel. c. 4, which forbids the erection of $\mu$ ovartipney分 eivetipuoy oikol without the consent of the hishop of the city, refers to these churches; if, as appears most probable from the general tepor of the canon, it doee not refer to them, the

The two points which were mainly insisted upon in regard to (i) That they should be under the bishop's were trol; and (2) That they should be sutficiently codowed. The former of these rules probably appears first in 1 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511 , c. 17; 541, c. 33. A good example of the kind of endowment which was required is afforded by $S$. Greg. M. in the one case the archpresbyter and in the other the archdeacon succeeded in establishing bis claim.

Conversely, the bishop was theoretically an integral part of the parishes which came to be detached from the church in which he personally presided. The parish presbyter had not at first, as he came practionlly to have in later times, the full powers of the ininistry in his parish. In Rome the presbyters of the several tituli had not even the power of consecrating the eucharist; the consecrated bread was sent round to them every Sunday from the bishop's church (S. Innocent. E'pist. ad Decent. c. 5; Liber Pontificalis, Vit. S. Melchiad. p. 33) : there is a trace of an attempt having been made to make this the rule for sll presbyters (cf. Liber Pontif. Vit. S. Siric. p. 55), but Innocent, $l$. c., expressly disallows the practice in regard to psrishes which were remote from the bishop's church, on the ground that "non longe portanda sunt sacramenta," and that presbyters have the right of consecration. In regard to baptism, the co-operation of the bishop becnme necessary in two respects, ( $a$ ) the parish presbyter could only use chrism which the bishop had consecrated, and for which he had to send to the bishop once a year; (b) the baptism was incomplete until, as in baptisms in the bishop's own church, the bishop had imposed his hands (see Priest, III. Functions of, (2) ii.)? In regard to discipline, the probability is that in the earliest period neither a bishop nor a presbyter could act slone, and that the rule of the Jewish synedria which required an ecclesiastical court to consiat of st least three members was ordinarily observed. Some details of the long struggle between bishops and presbyters for the right of the latter to act alone are given elsewhere (Priest, III. Functions of, (1) c). This struggle was by no means ended within the period of which the present work takes cognizance, and ita later history can only be considered in connexion with the general history of the relstions of the Roman see to the Western church in the post-Carolingian periol. It may, however, be mentioned here that an interesting survival of the earlier theory is found in the council of Ronen in A.D. 650, c. 16, which clearly implies that the bishop's ordinary visitation of a parish was conceived as the holding of a court in whicb the local presbyters were his assessors; the purport of the canon is that minor ecclesiastical causes should be determined by the local presbyters before the visitation, and that the graver canses only should be reserved for the more solemn conrt in which the bishop himself presided.

It is impossible, within the linits of the present work, to enter in detail into the intricate question of the precise periods at which, in the several parts of Christendom, the authority of the bishop of the principal church of a district came to extend over all the towns and villages which were included in that district. That nuthority was not established without many struggles, and its nature seems to have varied as widely as the extent to which it was recognized. But it canne at length to consist in three principal particulars. (1) The appointinents of clerks to parochial or other churches were subject to the bishop's approval. (2) ('lerks so appointed were subject to the bishop's jurisdiction, which was exercised partly in the course of annual visitations of the several parishes, partly by requiring clerks to repair periodically to the bishop's church for the jurpose of being examinat? (3) The bishop had the sole right of consecrating churches and altars.

1. The hiyht of Approval.-In the carliest period, when the clerks of rural churches were only temporarily detached from the city church, the question of the necessity of the bishop's approval conld hardly arise, inasmuch as that approval had already been given in the fact of their original ordiantion. After the first permas nent organization of the churcl, the right of presbyters to detach themselves from the bishop, church, and form communities for themselres, was, as has been pointed out sbove, speedily crushed. The practical difficulty began with the foundntion of placea of worship by private persons on their own estates, or in rural districts which were not as yet recognized as forming part of the "territorinm" of a city. Those who founded auch places of worship clnimed the right to appoint anyone whom they pleased to officiate in them without interference on the lart of a neighbouring bishop. But the civil law interfered, in this as in other cases, in the interests of orthodoxy. A law of Arcadius and Honorius io A.D. 404 , the year of Chrysostom's second banishment, forbids "nova ac tumultuosa conventicola extra ecclesiam " (Cod. Theodos. 16, 2, $37=$ Col. Justin. 1, 3, 15). In the following century Jus. tinian (Novell. 57, с. 2, A.D. 537) forbade founders of churches from appointing anyone whom ther pleased to serve them, without the consent of the bishop. Another Novel (123, c. 18) throwi a similar enactment into a positive form by providing that founders of churches may nominate clerka for them, aubject only to the clersa being found worthy; but the immedinte result of these rules appears to have been an attempt, which was also checked, to dispense with clerks alto. gether in such plnces (Justin. Norell. 123, c.32, 131, c. 8). About the same time similar rules were enacted by a Western council. 4 Conc. Aured. A.D. 541, c. 7, will not allow "peregrini clerici" to be appointed to oratories without the censent of the bishop of the "territorium." Still later In the East Conc. Trull.c. 31, 2 Conc. Nicaen. c. 10, forbade clerks from serving chajels or orstories without the consent of the bishop, under penalty of deposition. But the question was not settled in the Weat until the Carolinginn period, whes it is clear that a determined struggle took place between bishops and founders. The Capitulatie re-enact the rule that no layman could either appoint or eject a preabyter with a frequency which shews that it was frequently broken, ef. Karoli M. Capit. de Presbyt. c. 2, Pertz, rel. i, p. 161 ; id. Excerpt. Can. c. 2, Pertz, i. 189; Hludowici, Capit. Aquisgran. A.d. 817, c. 9, Pertr i. 207 ; Capit. Wormat. The bishops in the petition, out of which the Capitnlaries of Worms resulted, complain that the emperor himself had enconraged the practice in regard to the clergy of his own palace (Consid -ormat. On the other baad the enactment wss made, probably as the result of a conpromise, that a bishop wha beund to approve a clerk whom a layman pre-seated for approval, except in caae of evidant sented for approval, except in case of evident candal (Hludowio. et Hlothar. Constit. Wormat. de persmna sacerdotalal; c. 15, Peritz, vol. i. p. 337). 2. The Riyht of Visitution and Discipline.- It is probable that when the churches of great cities founded branch cnurches in their subarba the bisbop of the city church periodically visited such churches for discipllinary and other purposea. Thii was at any rate the case at Alexandria at the begining of the 4 th century. The bishop made his circuit ( $\pi$ tepooia), and it was in the course of one of these circuits that Ischyras was presented to the bishop by the presbytera of the Maretic churches as an otiender against the ecclesiastical canona (S. Athanas. Apol. c. Arimn. c. 63, 85, vol. i. pp. 143, 158). The exiatence of the same practice in the 4 th century in the West is shewne e.g. by. Conc. Turon. A.D. 397, c. 2, which, in deciding a dispute between the bishopa of Arles and Vienne, decides that each of them is to "risit those churches which are shewn to be sdjscent to their respective cities." But there is remarkable absence of conciliar enactonenta a remarkable absence of conciliar enactmenta astil the 7 th century, when 4 Conc. Tolet.
A. $633, \mathrm{c}$, 36, recitea that bishops ought to viait the parishes within their diocese every year, and in enacting that they may do ao by deputy, meatiors as the purpose of auch visitation an enguiry isto the revenues of churches, their state ofrepair, and the manner of life of their ministera. But it is clear from a canon which was enacted at the same place thirteen years later that the hishop not merely enquired into the revenues of praishes, but claimed a portion of them ( 7 Couc. Tolet. A.D. 646, c. 4). In other words, the bishop appears to have claimed the game rights over the rerennes of dependent churches which he posesesed over the revenuea of the city church. The limitation of the bishop'a claims in this reapect forms the subject of many canona and capitularies, even after it had become an eatablished rals that he had no claim to the lished rals that he had no claim to the rereanes. Enactments were also made for the parpose of limiting his cluim to dues and offerparpose of limiting his claim to dues and offerings on the score of the expenaes of the visitation, a.g. Karoli M. Cupit. Lanyobard. c. 5, Pertz, vol. a.9. Karoli M. Cupi. Lanyobar. C. C. S, Mertz, vol.
i. . 110 K Karoli II. Synod ap. Tolos. A.D. 84t, c 4, Pertz, i. 379 (which, in addition to fixing the precije amount of produce - wine, fowls, egga, dc-which is to be offered, rules that if a bishop Fisits a parish more than once a year he ia not to claim his dues more than once), Hludowic. 2
 Whea the rite of confirmation becaine finally added to the pnrposes fur whinh the visita waa added to the priposes fur which the visitation nas made, and is sometimes spoken of as a principal purpose, e.g. Karlomanni, Cupitul. A. A. 742, i.3, Protzz, vol. i. p .17 , "q quandocunque jure canoico episcopus, circumeat parrochiam populos ad confirmandos;" but the burden which thia entailed on bishops was probably one of the chief cnuses of the reyival in the Frankish kingdom of the earlier aystem of rurnl as distinct from city which (Hruban. Maur. de Instit. Cleric. 1, 5), which waa crushed by tha l'seuldo-fsiderinu decretals. The right of visitation, for all purposes except this of confrmation, night be exercised by depaty ( $(4$ Conc. Tolet., c. 36 , allows the bishop to the bishop to depute auy "probabiles presbyteros ant diuconua"), and ultimately cmue to be mainly exercised thronglı the rnral archdeacons.
In adidition to the aupervision over the clerka of parishes which was thas exercised by mesus of annual or other visitations, it was sometinles enacted that anch clerka ahould periodically present themselves before the bishop in his own church celebroting give an account of their mode of A.D. A.D. 742 , c. 3 ; Pippini Capit. Suession. A.D. 744 , Some Krish M. Capit. General, A.D. 769, c. 8). Sone bishops went so far as to require their cler clergy not merely to present themselves, but to bring with them their instrumentu ecclesiae, altar-vessels, and service boeks (e.g. Theodulph. Aurelian, Capit. ad Presb. 4; Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. ev. 193), and in England the Liber Legum Ecclesiast. c. 4, Wilkins, vol. i. p. 266.
The jurisdiction which a bishop came to exercise over the clergy of parishes was not different in kind from that which he exercised over the clergy of the city church. It was carefully guarded by a long succession of enactments both of canon and civil law. The accused clerts seems never to have been without a right of appeal; and the primitive theory that the bishop's jurisdiction attached to him not as acle judge, but as president of the presbytery, aeems never to have wholly faded away.
3. The Rinht of consecrating Churches and Altars.-It geems to have been an early cuatom that that churches ahould be solemnly dedicated, and it may be assumed that the bishop, as the chief olficer of a church or of a district, ordinarily took part in auch a dedication. But it ia clear that when the parochial syatem took root in the West the presbyters who were in charge of pariahes did not at firat consider the preaence of a biahop indispensable to such a dedication. ${ }_{2}$ Cunc. Brac. A.D. 563, e. 19, deposes a preabyter who for the future ("post hoc interdictum") consecratea a church or an altar. And in the following century the cnnons of St. Patrick enact for the churches of Ireland that "if any presbyter haa built a church let him not offer (sc. the Ewcharist) until he bringa hia bishop to consecrate it, for thua ia it seemly" (Can. S. Patric. c. 19). It was a later series of enactmenta which limited the original rights of a preabyter in regard to offering the euchariat, by requiring hinn not to offer $\mathbf{i t}$, unless under presaure of urgent necessity, except in a consecrated place. The earliest enactment to this effect is of doubtriul date, resting only on the authority of the Liber Puntificalis and the Paeudo-Isidore (Lib. Pontif. Vit. S. Syric. c. 2; Gcst. Synod. S. Silvester, c. 9, ap. Hinschius, p. 450). The other enactments are Carolingian, e.g. Karoli M. Capit. Gencral, A.D. 769, c. 14, Pertz, vol. i. p. 32; Capit. Aquisgran, A.D. 801, c. 9 ; Illudowic. 2 Capit. Ecoles. A.D. 856, c. 14, Pertz., vol. i. P. 440 , and post D'Achgian, e.g. Atton. Vercoll. Capit. c. 7, ap. DeAchery, Spicilegium, vol. i. p. 403. By a earlier than the preceding, it was proviled that if a presbyter offered the eucharlst, as he might do in cases of urgency, outside a consecrated building, he should only do so upon a portable altar which a bishop had previoully consecratel (Karoli M. Capit. Guneral. A.d. 769, c. 14; Conc. Paris, a.d. 829, c. 47 ; Hincmar Remens. Capit. A.b. 856, e. 3 ; Migue, Patr. Lat. vel. exxiv. 704).
iv. Internal Oryanization of Parishes.-(a) The evi lence which exists as to the earliest organization of parishes is not sufficient to enable us to frame many general statements respecting it. If the instance of the Batunean town, which has been mentioned above, is to be regarded as typical, it would seem as though the principle of the Jewish synelria had been preserved in the East, sul that in each parish there were at least two presbyters to form with the rural bishop a court for the administration of discipline, and two deacons for the dispensing of the church funds to those who were upon the roll. In the West the statement of Ambresiuster is clearly to the same eflect: "aliquantos presbyteros (oportet esse) ut bini sint per ecclesins ct unus in civitate episcopus" (Comm. in Epist. 1 ad Timoth. c. iii. 12, ap. S. Ambros. Op. vol. ii. p. 295). In Rome each titulus had at least one presbyter, and ultimntely also one deacon and one oub-dencon; but the precise relations of deacons to the titudi in early times are extremely obscure. In Gaul and Spain a single presbyter or a eingle deacon was sometimes put in charge of a parish, and sometimes a presbyter and a dencon took charge on alternate weeks (Conc. Tarracon. A.D. 516, c. 7). That a deacen might be "rector" of a parish is clear from many instances-e.g. Conc. Illib. c. 77, "diaconus regens plebem," S. Greg. Turon. de Gloria Confessor, c. 30 , p. 918 , of a deacen whe "rexit ecclesiam vici," at Issiore, near Clermont; but if he alone baptized, the baptism was net complete witheut the subsequent benediction of the bishop (Conc. Illib. c. 77 : the rule was afterwards extended to baptisms by presbyters); and 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 15, disallowed the practice which had growa up of deacons efferiog the eucharist. But the practice of entrusting parishes te deacons was ultimately forbidden, though apparently not until the 9th century (Hludowic. et Hlothar. Capit. Eccles. A.d. 825, c. 1, Pertz, vol. i. p. 250). There are indications that laymen were sometimes placed in charge of parishes. Cenc. Cabillon, A.d. 650, c. 5, enacts that "saeculares qui necdum sunt ad clericatum conversi" are not to be entrusted with the governinent ("regendum") of either parishes or the property of parishes; Cenc. Rem. A.D. 625 , c. 19 , disallews the appointment of archpresbyters whe are not clerks; and among the Culdees of the British Islands lay parsons of parishes, though discouraged by the disallowance of some of the emeluments of the office, are not forbidden (Reeves, Prose Rule of the Celi $D \dot{d}$, p. 94). The question of the appointment of monks to the charge of parishes, which was krenly contested in the middle ages, belongs to a later period. Such appointments are nllowed by Conc. Megunt. A.D. 847, c. 14, with the proviso that the monk is to save his vow of peverty by giving up the revenues of a parish to the bishop or his deputy. But the general rule, which required the eccleslantical head of a parish to be a presbyter, though broken suificiently to shew that it wna nut absolute, was no doubt ordinarily observed. Every purish came to have its priest. If there were several churches withlu a parish (by which, as will be pointen out below, must nut be understond in pre-medineval times a district yih definite boundaries) ench of these churches was required to have lts own preshyter. Twe or more churches could not be committed to the same preshyter, unless the revenues of the eingle churches were insulficient for his support (Conc, Emerit. A.d. 666, c. 19 ; 16 Conc. Tolet. A.D, 693 , c. 5 ; Conc. Paris, A.D. 820, c. 49 ; Hudnwic. Capit. Aquisyrim. A.D. 817, c. 9, P'ertz, vol. i. p. 207 ; Ansegisi, Cupit. lib. l. 86, Pertz, vol. i. p. 283). But Hlothar. I. Constit. Popiens A.D. 832, c. 1, ubsolutely disallows the commission of more than one church to one preshyter, and ennets that unless a poor church is shewn to bs necessury, it is to be destroyed; if, on the contrary, it is shewn to be necessary, it is to be endowed with lands by the state. It is important to note that in the expressions which are constantly used in reference to the ecolesinstical head of a parish, whether presbyters or others, the sacerdotal idea is nlmost always in the bnckground. He is not so much the "sacerlos" ss the "rector;" he is said "plebi praeesse;" hs is sent-not to administer the sncramenta, bat "ad regendum" (e.g. 9 Conc. Tolet. c. $2 ; 11$ Tolet. c. 3 ; Pippin. Cupit. Eccles, iv. A.d. 789, c. 81 ; so also when a parish presbyter resigns his office he is said "ab ordine et titulo et rejimine plebis se exuere," Conc. Rem. A.D. 874, c. 1 ; Migne, P. L. vol. exxv. 796).
(b) It does not appear that any other officers were regarded as necessary to paiochial erganization. In regard to the earlier period there in no evidence except that which has been given above. But there grew up a feeling against presbyters offering the eucharist without the assistance of other clerks; and it cume to be enscted in the West that parish presbyters shonld both have such clerks, and should take them inte their houses in order to train them for the service of the church ( 2 Conc. Vaisen, A.D. 52?, c. 1 , which speaks of this ns being a common custom in Italy ; Conc. Emerit. a.d. 666, c. 18). These "clerici parechiuni" varied in number under different circumstances, and their duties were the ordinary duties of clerks in divina service. They survive in the medern "parish clerk."
(c) The question of the mode in which the presbyter or other chief officer of a parish was sppointed in early times is one upen which only scanty evidence exists. It is probable upin general grounds thnt such appointments did not form an exception to the genersl rule, which at first required an election by the peeple and an appreval by the bishop, and which afterwsrds allowed the clergy or the bishop to nominate, and the people merely to approve. Bat the endowment of parishes by private persena, snd the interweaving of the parachial with the canenical and monastic aystem, so far everlsid the primitive practice that there was in the niddle ages only a small proportion of parishes in which the people had any real share in either the election or the approval of their parish prieat. (d) The limits of parishes were probably in almost all cases fixed by the previously exinting orgaization. Where the Roman organization prevailed, the parish was the petgus, viens, or castellum, with its surrounding territoriun. Where, as in England, the Roman organization hal been slmost completely swept away, the parish was ilentical with the township or the manor (Stubbs, Constitutional Mistory of Englemed, vol, i. p. 227; Toulmin Smith, The Parish. 2nd elit. pp. 16-22). But, in a large proportion of cases, it is probable that thesa limits were not precisely defined until the legal enforcement of tithes rondered such a definition necessary. Nor Has it until a much later period that parishes came necessarily to aljoin each other ; between parishes, as between townshijs, were frequently trscts of more or less unsettled or common land, on which chnjels might be erected withou: treaching on any parochinl rights. It is probable that, in England, the final parcelling of the whole country into parochial districts was not effected until the era of the poor-laws.

pascilae clausum (Pascha Clauba, Pascha Clausum, Claugula Pabchae). Most modern writers (as Mabillon, Liturgia Gallicana, 148 ; Gerbert, Lit. Alem. Dis 1 x. Iv. 2 ; Ruinart in Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. ix. 44; Du Cange in v.) identify thia with the first Sunday after Easter (Low Sundny, Dies Dominicus posi Albas, Dominica in Albis depositis, Quasimolo), but early authoritiee, whom they do not notice, and certinin facte bearing on the question, prove that it wns a name given to Saturday in the Easter week. Only the Macri (Hierolexicon in v.) within our realing have stated this correctly, and they give no authority. Others have been probubly misled by the fact that Low Sunday is now called Payue close in France, to which and the neighbouring province of Metz the use of the term Pascha o'ausum was, , far as appears, contined. It was natural that the name should be transferred when the Saturday censed to be marked by any special observance, i.e. when the great baptisms of Easter cessed.

Amalarius, A.D. 812, snye expressly : "Septuagesima perficitur in Sabbato quad voeatur Clausum Paseha" (De Or.l, Antiph. 32). Alcuin, about the same time or earlier: "Videtur Septungesimus dici posse dies propter decem heblomadas quae sunt ab jpso die usque clausum Pascha in quo alba tolluntur vestimenta a nuper baptizatis " (Epist. ad Car. Mayn. Hittorp. 300). Rabsmus Maurus (Instit. Cler. ii. 34) echoes the words of Alcuin. But the newly-baptized laid aside their white dress with ceremony, not on the Sundny, but on the Saturday. Thue Amalarius: "De Sabbato . . . Hodie revertuntur ad fontes, ut exuant se albis" (De Ord. Antiph. 51).
That the Clausum Paschae was a great feast in France might be inferred from the foregoing notices; as also from the faets that Gregory of Tours treats it as a well-known note of time: "Eo anno post Clnusum Psscha tam immensa cum grandine pluvia fuit," &e. (Ilist. Franc. ix. 44), and from the almost absolute use of the word "elausum" alone, as when the same authur says of some persons baptized at Rions: "Nullus ad elausum pertingere potuit vivus" (Glor. Conf. 48).
[W. E. S.]
PASCHAL EPISTLES were letters written by patriarchs and archbishops to the bishops within their jurisdietion, and in the case of the pope of Alexnadria to the bishop of Rome, if not to other patriarchs, containing a notiee of the day on which the next Easter should be kept. They were also called "Festal Epistles" (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vii. 20, 21, &ортaбтikal entoтo入al), or "Festal Writs"(i'id. 22, íopt. ypaфal), from their connexion with the great feast of Easter
(Eus. u. a. 20). At Alexndidia they were first deliverel as homilies, belug afterwirids put linta the form of un epistle, and so sent to the comprovinchal blahops. ilence they are anmetimes called " ilomilies" or "Diseourses." They were carried by a apecial mensenger ( $\delta$ aakomach h. The Uffice of the Bishop of Alexandriu.-It is aaserted by Baronius (Annal. Licles. nd san. 32i), Bialus (labbe, Cone. Hi. 69), Dupin (libo lioth. Le bes. uuler Cyril. Alex.), and many others, that the blohojes of Alexanidi were espressly requested and authorized by die first council of Nicaen to give anamal notice to the whoie chureh, through the incumbeats of the principal sees, of the day on which the elnauiug Easter was to be celebrated. That the pope of Alexandria did at one time givo such nutice to tha blshop of Reme ny well as to those of Egept is not to be disputed, but it may well bedoultel whether he diid so in pursuance of any decree of that council, nad, agaia, whether he trausuitted a similar notice to the other patriarchs of the Enxt. If we ure to be gulded by the eridence still extaut, wo shall rather infer that the custom, whatever its extent, arose from tho voluntary detrrenee paid by other churches to that of Alexandria in a question of mathematical sciesce. No formal proof of the alleged conciliar sanction or decree has, to my knowledge, ever beea attempted, and the only document that I csn meet with which ascribes it to any oecumenical synod appears to me of very doubtful weight. This is the Prolugus S. Cyrilli de Fisti Pasch. Ratione, which is found in latin only, and in a single MS., seemingly of the 9th century. It was first printed by the Jesuit Aegid. Bucherius stter his Comment. in Can. Pasch. Iictorii Aguit. Astr. 1633 (Prolog. u. s. or Epist. 87, § 2; upp. Cyr, Al. x. 38:3; Migne, $1 \times x$ vii.). But more, perhaps, has been built on $n$ statmeat of Leo the Great, who however (Epist., 94, c. 1) speaks only of "the holy fatbers" in general. If the conncil made that arrangement, we should reasonnbly look fur some mention of the fact in the paschal epistles of the bishops of Alesandrin, of which a large number are estant, especially in those of Athanaxius, who was himseif at Nicaea, and, becoming bishop of ales. andria within a year of the conclusion of the council, must have been the first to act on its decree. Yet neither in his first festsl epistle nor in say subsequent one does he make any mention of it. Those of Theophilus are equally silent, and so are the festal homilies of cynil. Twiee alsa within a century of the cousciit of Ni:seal we find bishops of Rome consulting these of Milan and Carthage, as will be scen presentiy, when in doubt ns to the right day. We observi also that Leo, in the epistle above mentioned, begged the emperor to help him by applyiag to "the Egyptians, or to any others whe were re ported to have eertain knowleige of this kind of calculation" (Epist. 94). Mareian wrote to Proterius of Alexandria, who in a long reply justified the enleulation which Lee doubtel (inter Opp. Leon. p. 203). PASCIIAL TAPER. This wasa large taper, which anong the other ceromonies of Easter Eve ("sabbatinn sanetum") was soleminly hlessed before the altar, at liome by the archdeacon, in Spaia by two deacons, then lighted from the newly-struck and blessed fire, and carried in procession before the catechomens to the font. It was afterwards placed before the altar, and was to burn incessantily until after the solemn mass, or the second Vespers, or the Compline service, of Easter Day, according to different rituals: that of Soissons requires it to burn for foar consecutive days (Nartene de Ant. E'cles. Rit. Jib. Iv. cap. 24). The symbolism Is obvious. In its origin the paschal taper was a special observance of the general custom which, through East and West alike, celebrated that night "much to be observed" by a bright Illumination, changing the darkness into llght. [See Easterz, Ceremonies of, Vol. 1. p. 595.] The twofold reference to the new rising of the Sun of Righteounness from the dark ness of the tomb, and to the illamihation of the newly-baptized, is constantly recalled to mind in the ollice of the Benetictio Cerei. In the procession of the neophytes, and when the taper precedes the pope, as (according to the old Ordo Romanns) it should do during the whole paschal week, it is taken to represent the pillar of fire which led Iarael through the Red Sea.

The institution of the paschal taper has been commonly attributed to pope Zosimus (A.D. 417) on the strength of the notice in the lite of him in the Lilur Pontificalis, "per parochias concessa licentia cerees benedici," or, according to another version, "per parochias concessit ut cereos benedicerent;" but it was pointed out by Baronius (Annal. in ann. 418) that this really implies the extension to the parish churches of a custom alrady existing in (probably) the great basilicas. The hymn of Prudentius, "inventor rutili," commonly sung during the office of the benediction of the taper, cannot be ralied on as an argument for the antiquity of the rite, for it is in truth only an excerpt of forty Ines from a much longer hymn, which aeensling to the bent realing is laneribed wit inornoma Jwernise, not do cereo puschali, and which, boing No. V. of the Cithemerinon hymun, wism dearly intenled for daily use at the Vexpur nervicn when the candlew uspd to be sulemaly lixbtel. It is ponsibly, hawever, alluided to by St. Augune the (Do Civ. Jei, xv, 22) where he sayn, "ia laula quadam cerel breviter versibus, divi," \&c. where "cerei," and not "createrls," secman to be the true vealing. Ennodius, bishop of Ticias (dled 521), has left two forms of Ihenotictionerich, from an expression in one of which it is interred that the practice of preserving particlen of tha wax of the taper an charms hol alowiy growa up by that time. Gregory the Great ( $\dot{f}_{i}$ lid, al. 33) and can, 9, C. Tolet. IV, both speak clearly of the paschal tajer; various custons grew up, round the rite in later times, such as that of makling live holes in the inper, or attaching tive grains of incense to it, of utamping upra it the date, the Indiction of the current year, ar the lettern $A$ and $\Omega$, or of fistening to it luseripiluns of various kinds, of which examples may be neen In Martene ( $u, 8$ ). This he considers more probahle than its connexion with $\kappa d \mu \pi 7 \omega$ and $\kappa a \mu \pi \dot{\Delta} \lambda \eta$, a curved staff.

The naise feruld (ferio) polnts to the correctional use of the staff.
The etyniology of crosse ls contruvertel. We have the forma crochic, croyua, cruculat, anil also orocea, cronsen, cruct, cronsa. Some of these forms may be traced to croo and crochet, whilst othera suggeat crus and the Italian crocc. Magri observes (//ikrolex, s. v.) that the pastoral staff was called croccea (Anglicè, crutc/), from the uae that was made of it as a support lu walking.
The most ancient crosiers (sic) appear, says a learned writer, to have been much shorter than bishop of Coelogng ages. That of St. Severinua, served hlm ogne, who died in the year 400, xvil. 37).
There are no grounds for saying whether pastoral staff, when it was first nulopted an the emblem, was designed to be the nupted as an or of jurisdiction i whether it betokened the ohepherd's duty of tending the flock of God or (as a form of sceptre) the right and the responailility of a ruler. Both these idens seem to bo conlined in one of the earliest latin authorities on the subject-the passage of St. Isidors of Seville (A.D. 560-636), who eays that the staff was given to a bishop as a token that he "vel regat, vel corrigat, vel infirmitates infirmorum gustin sustineat " (de Officuis Éclesiasticis, eap. v.).
the shepherd's pastorna staff" seems to point to wand or sceptre which has symbolized the of the terial offee from very early time minisSuicer (Thesaurus Eccles, 8. V. Bakr Indeed, unhesitatingly assigns its origin: "Becria) thus ministers of the church are called shepherds, and their duty is to feed the tlock of Gud, namely, the church, therefore to them is given a staff or rod."
There is an undoubted propriety in the symbol 00 interpreted. But we may not yet have arrived at the bottom of the matter, if we rest here; for there is some reason to think that the pastoral staff of the Christian clergy was but an adoption with n new significance of a religious usage older than Christianity itself. .The sculpthe and coins of Italian paganism shew us that the augurs of antiquity bore a staff (lituus) very closely resembling the pastoral staff. It was with such a etaff, in fact, that the augur divided the expanse of heaven (templum) into regions for the purpose of divination. The annexed figure from an Etruscan aculpture will give an jdea of the augur's staff. In connesion with this figure it should be observed that the early form of pastoral staff appears to have been quite short-much shorter than the specimens of mediseval art that have aurvived to us (Reusens, Eleinents d'Archéllogie chrétienne, hand, whilst the handling of the pastoral ataff does not appear to have been so restricted. In extant representations the pastoral staff is held sometimes in the right and sometimes in the left hand. Such a variation, however, will hardly be thought sufficient to negative the possibility of the hypothesis-which has the authority of Mosheim (Instit. Ecel. Hist. pt. ii. chap. iv.)-that the pastoral ataff is one of those many things which with but slight alterations the early Christians felt at liberty to adopt from paganism as being accepted aymbola of piety and reverence.

According to another theory of its origin, the pastoral staff is a survival in the case of bishopa of what was once to be seen in the hands of all. It is, in fact, the episcopal walking-stick. Thomassin, Grancolas, and other liturgists of modern times, have vindicated an origin of this kind for the staff. According to them it is no other than the crutch or staff (sustentaculum, reclinatoriun) which at first was permitted to the aged and infirm, and which afterwards became general as a snpport while standing in church. When seats were introduced into choirs, the reclinatorium was doomed to disappenr, and (according to these writers) survived in the band of prelates alone as emblems of hononr. The flaw in this theory appears to be that the reclinatorium certainly remained in general use long after the date at which we can trace the pastoral staff.
We now reach the question by whom the pastoral staff was used.
(a) Pope.-lt is commonly said that the pope never carried a pastoral atuff. The reason assigned for this custom cannot be better given than in the words of Innocent 1II. "The Roman pontiff does not use the pastoral staff, because St. Peter the Apostle sent his staff to Eucharius, the first bishop of Treves, whom he appointed with Valerius and Maternua to preach the Gospel to the German race. He was succeeded in his bishopric by Maternus, who was raised from the dead by the ataff of St. Peter. The staff is down to the present day preserved with great veneration hy the chnrch at Trèves." (De Sacro Altaris Mystrio, lib. 1. cap. 62.) It is sarcastically observed by Cahier. a Jesuit writer, that St. Peter must have repeated more than once the sacrifice of his pastoral staff, for several places claim to have it. The same writer, however, shews that there is renson to think that popes did bear the pastoral staff up to the 11 th century, and he gives a figure of Gregory the Great bearing a staff from a mininture of the 1 th century. This figure we reproduce here (Canier, Caracteristiques des Saints, 1. 298).

Gregory the Great. (From Cahier.)

Barrault indeed aays (p. 25) that the portrayal of St. Gregory with a stsff proves only the ignorance of the illuminator in the 13 th century. Perhaps however, this is not quite fair. It may shew that the present question was in debate in the 13th century, and the plate before us may be the record of the view which the illuminator took in the controversy.
Another representation of Gregory the Great with a staff (though it is of a ditterent shape, being surmounted with a cross) is published by the Arundel Society. This singular monument, says Mr. Marrioti (Vestiarium Christianum, p. 237), is assigned by antiqusries to the year $7\left({ }^{(19}\right)$ or thereniouts. The figure is easily sccessible in Mr. Marriott's work, and therefore need nut be reproduced here.

Migns (Dict. de C'Orfèvrerie, s. v. Crosse) denies that the popes ever used the pastoral staff properly 80 called; but he ndmits that they had a baton, which was straight as $n$ sceptre. This, however, would hardly differentiste it from the pastoral staff proper, which Fas not restricted to a particular shape. Baronius, it may be mentioned, concludes that the stsff is to a bishop what a sceptre is to a king. It should be borne in mind that, when writers contend that the pope bore a pastoral staff, they do not probably intend to say that the stnff was always curved. Krazer indeed (De Liturgits, p. 353) shews that the oft-quoted words of Innocent III., in which he is understood to disclaim the pastoral staff for the pope, are to be understood as disclaiming only the curred staff of ordinnry bishops. By aoms ariters (e.g. Martin and Barrault) a distinction is drswn between the cambuta, the crook or $T$ shsped staff, as the symbol of the pastoral office, and the ferula orsceptre-like staff which betokened bovereign authority. Such writers in the Roman Catbolic interest are not unwilling to admit that the pope carried the ferula, whilst denying that he had the cambuta. It would obviously be a great gain to their position if it conld be shewn that from the earliest days the aymbol of the pastoral care had not been associated with the person of the pope, whilst the emblem person of the pope, whilst the emblem of sovereignty had always been so-that, whilst the one character had, of course, been understood, the other had been with the emphasis of the very symbolism pointedlyaffirmed ns attaching to him. In judging, however, of this vexed question, this point is not to be forgotten, that we do not find sny trace of the disposition to repudiate the pastoral staff for the pope until about the 12th ceotury, which is at least a suspicious epoch on a question which in no indirect way concerns the ( $\beta$ ) Bishops.-On the early sovereignty. hishops, we may quote the anthority of Earonius (ad ann. 504, n. 38), who says that bishops employed the staff certainly in the 4th century. The esrliest mention of it, given by Maskell (Monum. Rit. iii. 273) as forming a part of the rite of consecration of a bishop is the passage quoted above from Isidore of Spain (A.D. 560-636). In the early part of the 5th century there seems no reason to donbt, snys a competent writer, that St. Patrick took with him to Ireland, when he went to preach the Cospel there, the pastoral staff which afterwards became so samous under the name of the Staff of Jesus (Arch leologia, xrii. 36).
In the will of St. Remigius (Flodoard. Hist. lib. i. cap. 18) mention is made of a pastoral Btaff carved and covered with gold plates.
The earliest mention of the "staff" among was addinessed appenrs to be in the letter which Fas addressed by pope Coelestine (A.D. 423-432) Narbonne on the subje provinces of Vienne and Conc. ii.). " By dressing in episcopal dress (L.abbe, putting a girdle round their (pallium) and that they shall fulfil the truth of Scripture not in the spirit, but in the letter. For if the precepts in question were given with a view to being kept in such a fashion, why are nct the subsequent precepts equally observed by holding burning lamps in the hand as well as a ataff,"

Amongst the Greek writers there is a mention of the pastornl statf' as early as the time of St. Gregory of Nazinnzum (cent. 4). He says (Oratio 42): "I know the staff which can support and the one which belongs to pastors and teachers, and which corrects the sheep which have reason."
In the Life of Caesarius, bishop of Arles (A.D. 469-542), written by Cyprian, his pupil, mention is made of the pastoral staff being "borne by his chaplain (notarius)" (Martene de Rit. Jib. i. cap. $8, x, 18$.) So early as the time of Romanus, archbishop of Rouen about A.D. 623, we tind the investiture taking place at the hands of the king by giving the pastoral ataff ("Rex . ... baculum illi contulit pastoralem ").
In modern times a bishop is represented with a crook, an archbishop with a cross or crosier, bars, and with a croas having two transverse bars, and the pope with a cross of three bars. But there is no appearance of this classification

( $\gamma$ ) Abhats and Abbesses.-The proof that in very early days abbats had the staff' is found by Barrault (p. 5) in the fact that mention is never made of the staff in the pontifical bulls (of which one is quoted as having been issued by Theodore I. in A.D. 643), granting to abbats the use of episcopal insignia. The gloves, the mitre, the ring, and others are specified, but never the staff. This, Barrault argues, could only be because abbata already had the staff. We have exper this be accounted as proof or not, early as the 7 mention of the abbat's staff as Garl, who the 7th century. In the Life of St. Gall, who lived in the early part of that censtaff of Colue this mention of the abbatial quem of Columban: "Qui et baculum ipsius, quem vulgo Cambottam vocant, per manum ante transitum sunt dicentes, Sanctum Abbatem mum transitum suum jussisse ut per hoc notissimum pignua Gnllus absolveretur." There ployed on these occasions ; the ritual emception of the passage just qnoted, it is not easy to say with certainty that any one of them falls strictly within the limit of time embraced in this work. Several, however, belong certainly to a period not much later; gnd the investiture with the staff is so generally mentioned in them as to lead to the inference that the usage was already a general and accepted one. Pugin, indeed, observes (Glossary, s. v.) that abbats did net borrow the use of the pastoral ataff from the opiscopal order, as they afterwards did that of the mitre, but that they had this distinction from the beginning.

properly called a pastoral staff. Hofinnnn, however (Lex. Univ. s. v. Baculus), quotes Philostratus as an authority for the use of it by priests in the East. But in the Eastern church there is always a risk of mistaking for an official baton the ordinary sub-axillary staff which even laymen carried to church.
Shape.-.Owing to the entire absence of primitive representations, there is uo absolute proof that the earliest form of the staff was that of a crook (we know, indeed, that in some cases they terminated in a globe or a cross); but, as Pugin observes, the crook form is exceedingly ancient, and as we have seen above in the case of the lituus, was not unknown amongst the emblems of religion, even in pre-Christian times.

nudependently of the few monuments that have survived, we find that a writer of the time of Charles the Bald (died A.b. 877) could even thea spenk of the curved staff as an antiquity (Msbillon, Acta SS. Ben. Snec. iii, pt. ii. p.
244 ).
In the case of the curved staff we can distinguish three constituent parts-the point, the

Remigius is an example of early work in preciuns metal. The so-called staff of St. Augustine (which Gavantus thinks is at Valentia in $\mathrm{S}_{\mathrm{S}}$ pain, while Baroniuy (in anno 504) places it in Sardinin) is made of ivory. Besides wood, ivory and the precious metals as the material of the pastoral staff, we find mention of horn, brass, iron, lead, and even crystal, both for the volutes and the knobs of the rod. It is possible, however, that the surviving specimens made in base metal were not actually borne, but were rod, and the crook or volute. The purpose of these several parts was embodied in ths line Which appesrs on the staff of St. Saturninus at

" "Curva trahit, quos virga regit, pars ultima putngit."

Latia bishops, says Magri, bear a staff curved at the top; Maronite bisions a staff surmounted by $s$ globe sad cross (whicn, it may be observed, is also the form of the staff in the figure of Gregory the Great that is engraved with this Tide; the globe alone is found in an AngloSaxoa MS. of the 9th century engraved by Dr. Rock); sad Greek bishops carry a staff in the form of a $T$ cross. This form perhups points to the use of the staff as a aupport (fulcinatorium). But in the East, where they do not sit in church, secular persons, as well as eeclesiastics, supported themselves at diviae service on a staff of this shape.
Material.-The means of judging what materials were employed in primitive times are excessively seanty. It seems, however, to be generally agreed that wood entered into the fobrication of the pastoral staff, Martigny says that in primitive times it was of wood, and he adds that it was of cypress most commonly (Dict. des Antiq. chret. 8. v. Evèques). It may howerer, be doubted whether any evidence of the cepress is forthcoming which is of an earlier date than the staff seat to Stephen, bishop of Tournsi (cent. 12), and afterwards presented by him to the bishop of Orleans. Staves of wood are cited by Barrault as existing at Montrenil-sur-mer, Rstisbon, the treasury of Cologne, and elsewhere. The same writer gtates that whilst the rod was of wood, the upper part, whether in the ehape of a tan or of a volute, was of a more precious material. Ivory was especially used tor the tan-shaped staff, The ataff of St . merely copies made for interment with a deceased
abbat or bishop.
A question arises as to whether the right or the left haad held the pastoral staff, or whether either did it indiscriminateiy. We have seen above in this article that the pastoral claff was not in this respect regulated by the laws of the lituus, which had to be held in the right hand. The most common usage, in later representations at least, is for a bishep to hold his staff in the left band, While he raises the right in the act of benediotion. Nor dees there appear any reason to suppose that in that solemn act the staff was ever held otherwise than in the left hand. Yet there are many representations of bishops, when not engaged in the act of benediction, holding the staff sometimes in the right and sometimea in the left hand. The truth of the matter appears to be that whilst a bishop in benediction alwaya bore his staff in the left hand, upon any other occasion he was free to hold it in either hand as best suited his pleasure or convenience. The annexed plate (p. 1570), which is extracted from the work of Barranlt, is described by him as an abbat blessing his monks. It is of the Carlovingian period, and shews the act of benedietion at an early date.
Dr. Reck (Church of our Fathers, vol. ii.) has verified a large number ofancient representetions, and they tail to bear out the alleged rule either in regard to holding the staff always in the left hand, or in regard to the volute baving any pardirection.
It remaias only to add that as the glving of the staff was a ceremnial of investiture (Die ifarca de Conc. Eccl. et Imp.), so the surrender of it was the token of abdicaticn, and the breaking of it was that of depositlen. PATAPIUS, "our father," nacetic of Constantinople, native of Thebes in Egypt; com-primitive paten differed in little or nothing from a veseel of domestic use; and until the primitive practice of employing the cakes of bread brought as oblatione by the congregation was superseded by that of using wafers made expressly, patens were often of large size. Such were the patens weighing from twenty to thirty pounds eech which are mentioned in the Liber l'ontipealis as given by various popes in the 4th, 6th, 7 th, sod 8 th centuries ( $v$. Lives of popes Mark, Ilurmisdas, Sergius and Gregory III.).
According to liona (Rcrom Liturgiarum I. xxv. 3) these large patens were ministeriales, and were not used by the priest celebrating, but only in distribution to the people.

Patenae chrismalcs are alse mentioned which, according to Bona, were "ad usum baptisnstin et confirmationis," but very little would appear to be known as to their use.

It is obvious from what has been said sbore that patens in the larger churches were in the earlier ages often of great size. Roman silver was extremely massive, but patens weighing 25 lbs. must have been of very considerable dimensiona. A modern circular salver 15 inches in diameter may weigh sbout 5 lbs , and the size of those weighing 20 and 25 lbs , may thence be roughly inferred to have been not less than 2 feet to 21 feet in diameter, if circular, and very proo bably much more. If the materisl were gold, the size would of course be much smaller. Masy, doubtless, were much less. The golden patea if it be one) found at Gourdon measures aboat 7? inches by $5 \frac{1}{4}$ inches, and the circular paten foand in Siberia measures 7 inches in diameter.

Patens were probably uaually circular ; twow formed are shewn on an altar in a mosaic in S . Vitale in Ravenna, the building of which churd was commenced in A.D. 547. In S. Apolliugre od Classem, near the same city, a building of about the snme date, two objecta, which it would setm are intended for patens, are of a sexfoil abspe (Webb, Continental Ecclesiology. p. 440). a covered pnten of gold weighing 25 lbs , which pope Leo III. gave to the church of St. Peter. That of tourdon is oblong in form, from which fact it has been doubted whether it was really a paten.
The msterinl was most commonly silver, but not unfrequently gold; e.f, the Byazatine emperor Michael sent to pope Nicholas 1. "l'atenam ex auro purissino eum diversis lapidibus pretiosis, albis, prasinis et hyacinthinis" (Lib. Putif. in vith Nicholai). l'ope Zepherinus (4.15, 203-2:21) is said in the Lib. Pontif, to have orlered that patens of glass should be borne before the priests in the churches when masses were celebrated. They were not unfrequently fornsed of this material. Gregery of Tours (de Mircte. S. Martini, lib, 4, c, 10) mentions a paten of a sapphire "olour, which doubtless was of glass; and the "sacro catino" at Genoa of green glass, which, through the middle sges was supprosed to be an emerald, may very pussibly have been a paten; it is hexsgonal. Cav. de Rossi has given engravings (Bull. di Are/. Crist. 1864, p. 80, fig. 5) of fragments found at Cologne of a glass vessel slmost a foot in diameter which he believes w bave served as a jaten; and another almost enthae exists in the slade eollection in the British Soseum (Cut. of Slude Coll. 1p,50), which was originally about 10 inches in diameter ; this was also found at Celogne, and may perhaps be assigned to the 4 th or 5 th century ; the decorstion of these vessels is described below. In the treasury of St. Nark at Venice are two or three sbillow basius of glass, which bave probably been used as patens; they are, however, possibly lster in date thsn the period embraced by this Ister in date than the period embraced by this work. Other materials were sometimes used; in the ssme treasury is a Byzantine pateu of slahaster, sbout $13 \frac{1}{2}$ inches in dismeter, and serersl shallow vesels, probably once used as patens, of agate, sardonyx, or other semi-precious stones, hsndsomely mounted in silver gilt with iaserted gems, It is impossible to affix precise dates to most of these, but if they do not belong to the period treated of in these volumes, we can no doubt form from them correct ideas ns to the forms, sizes, snd decorations of patens during some centuries antecedent to A.D. 1-04, about

As the ressels used in the earliest times as patens were either actually such as had served domestic uses or, as in the case of chalices, were formed upon the same models, and as the Christians of the earlier ages undoubtedly wers Io the habit of ornamenting their domestic it is ofteu s matter of other religious symbols, it is oftes s matter of much dlffieulty to distinguish between vessels which were and which Trere not intended to be used exclusively in the rites of the church. Thus it has been doubted by that eminent authority, Padre Garrucci, whether the golden vessel found at Gourdon, and shewn in the accompanying woodcut, was intended to be used as a paten, although it is above, of an octagonal paten, the ohjection loes not seem decisive. We have but few eanmples of early portens, and it seems quite possible that some may have had this oblong form, one not uncommen in Roman silver vessels, for secular examples, probably of the 5th eentury, may be seen in the British Museum, and the Corbridga land is an earlier instance. In favour of the supposition that it was actually a paten, it may (v. Cinalices), and that the eentre hith a chalice which is in slight relief, a circume has a cruss would seem to make it ill-suited for thace which purpeses of domestic life. Ihat patens were so decorated, we may learn from the passage in the Liber l'ontif., where we are told that pope Sergins (A.D. 687-701) gave to the Vatican Basilica "patenam aureain majorem habentem gemmas albas et in medio ex hyacintho et smaragdo crucem"). It was found with coins of the earlier part of the 6th century, but may perhaps be still older. The octagenal paten alluded to above

The paten of alabaster mentioned shove has in the centre $n$ medallion with a half-length tigure of our Lord in cloisonne cnamel; on another, also In the treasury of St. Mark's (of ayate or sardonyx?) is a sinilar medallion, with the words, may perhapa be assigned to the 10 th or 11 th century.

The paten of glass found at Cologne, of which only fragments remain, was of clear uncoloured glass ornamented by thres concentric circles of medallions of blue transparent glass of varying dimensions. The larger of these are decorated with figures, the smaller with rosettes, all executed by the application of gold leaf, which has been removed except where required to form the figures, which were then completed by $s$ few lines marking out the features, folls of drapery, and other details. The subjects of thess medal.

liona are chiefly Biblical-Adam and Eve, the atory of Jonah, that of Danie!, the eacrifice of Isaac, &c. In most cases only one figure ia to be found in each medallion. The cantre was probably occupiad by a figure of the Good Shepherd, symbolizing our Lord.

The paten of glass mentioned sbove es being in the Slade collection in the Britith Museum ia decorated with gold leaf by the same method, and with enamelling in blue, green, and red; but the subjects ars not in medallions, bnt arranged, as will be seen in the woodcut, in eight compartments, divided by slender columns. The subjects of these are-Jonah coming out of the whale, and in the background, reclining under the gourd, Jonah thrown overboard; the paralytic man carrying his bed; the Nativity; the sacrifice of laate, or prerhaps, more probably, the haptism of our Lord; the three Hebrew youths in the furaace; and Daniel in the lims' den. Of the centre, small fragments only remaid, but on them may be distinguiahed a figure of an anlmal, spparently sheep, and the letters $50 .$. .

DULCI. The subjact was, there can be do doubt, the Good Shepherd.

Another vessel of glass, which may very pro. hably have served as a paten, is in the collection of M. Basilewsky at J'aris. It has heen figuied and described twice in Cav. de Rossi's Bulfeturo (1874, p. 153: 1877, p. 77), mul will be trested of $n$ third tince in the same puhheation. It woald appear to be 9 iuches in diameter, and is a shallow diah. De kossi does tout call ita paten, but a "piatto"; tho central subject, Abraham about to snerifice lsmes, seems, how. ever, one very njpropriate to n puten. Kound the central subject are the fullowing stibject: the history of Jouah; the temptation of Adam; the raising of Lazarus; a figure atriking a tree, whence lssues water; Dabul in the lions' den; tho three Hebrew yoath in the furnace; and Susmma and the elders The subjeets are sccompauied by inscriptions, which contain many irregularities, e.g. Abraham occurs in plece of Adam, ned that attached to the figure striking the tree reals, "Petrus virga perculit." The lines of the cugraving are scratehy and irregular and appareutly done with a diamond point. The art is of the lowest order, but Cav. do Rossi thinks that the laste may be circa A.d. 400 ("tra il quarto e il quinto secolo "). It was found in P'odgorition the ancient Doclea, in D.lmatin.

Occasionally patens bore inseriptions commemorating the donor, or containing mention of tha church to which they belonged. Une of silver, of the 5 th or 6 th century, which belongsd to the Vatican Basilica, has bees Mllustrated by Fontanini (Discus Argenku ootious reterum Christianorum, l.omne, 1726).

PATRIARCH (Marpidex $\eta s$, patriarcha). The title patriarch seems to have been introduced Into the Christian church from the later organizatioo of the Jews, In pre-Cbristian times the 1 Eappid wan a subdivision of the tribe (e.g. 1 Esdr. i. 4 ; II. 7), and one of the titles of the heads of these subdiviaions was $\pi$ rarpides of (he2 Chron. xxlii. 20 , where some MSS. have incarov-Chron. axvii. 22. How far the tribal organization survived the dispersion is not clenr; but as the same title is found under the ompire to designate the heads of Jewish communities, or confederations of communities, it is probable that the later use was a continuaticn of the earlier. The first mention of these later rarpidexat is probably io a letter of LIadrind, quoted by Vopixcus (Vit. Saturnin. c. 2); they are ulse mentioned by Origen (Conm. in Psalm. vol. ii. p. 514 , ed. helarue), by Eusebins ( $C$ mm. in Jadi. c. 3, Migne, P. G. vol. xxiv. 109), by Cyril of Jerusalein (Cute H. 12, 17), but more particularly by Epiphaniua (1. 31), p. 128), who implies that the oflice was one of considerable dignity. They are also mentioncid in the civil law-e.g. Cid. Theodos. 16, 8, 1, 2, 11, 13; but from Cod. Theodos. 16, 8, 29, and Theodoret, Eramistes, no. vol. iv. p. 32, ed. Schulze, Migne, P. G. vol. Ixxxiii. 61, it appenrs that in the first quarter of the 5th century the oifiee cabe to no end. (On these Jewish patriarchs, see Gothofredus, ad coul. Christiate aeems to have been in use in the the the Jews. The earliest refurences to it are or to ; dor is it clear in what dense it was used, 169 or to whom it was restricted. Baxil (Eipist. 169, vol. iv. p. 258), writing to Gregory Nazianzen about the deacon Glycerius, siys that, despising his presbyter and his chorepiscopus, he had invested himself with the name und dress of the pat:iarchate, by which muat probably be meant the episcopate. Gregory of Nyssa (J)rat. funcbr. in Melet. Antioch., Migne, P. G. vol. xlyj. 853 ) uses it in a rhetorical passage of all the Constantinople vere assembled at the council of Constantinople. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. xlii, p. 764) appears to use it as a term specialiy applicable to senior bishopa, refe $\sigma$ ßut $\rho \omega \nu$ d $\pi t$ confirmed by its use in Iaidore of Pelusium (Epist. 2, 47, Migne, P. G. vol. Ixxviii. 489). But whether it was at any time applied. except metaphorically, to all bishops is very doubtful, thoug', it was occasionally applied to bishops who would not have been called patriarchs in either of the techolcal senses which the word

(1) In its most important use the title has been confined to the bishops of the tive sees of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. This use grew out of the general teadency to frame the higher organization of the church on the lines which were furnished by the empire. The gradations of rank between bishop and bishop, which correaprouded to the gradations of rank between cily and city of the same province, came to exist between metropolis and metropolis of the grenter divisions of the empire. dionecses, Oriens, Pontion, Asiann, Thraelae (thla aprears from the Varonese MS. which is published by Mommsen, Abhundlang d. Derlin. Acodemie, 1812, p. 491). Farh of the in dievecses was divided juto prowinces ( $\$ \pi a p \chi\left(a_{1}\right)$, and ench province had one or more motropolis (e.y, in the province of Asia, Ephesus, Snrdes, Smyrma, and l'erganum were all enlled $\mu \eta \tau$ оow $\delta \lambda+15$; the reterences in promf are given in Marquarilt, Romische Stutsucrualtung, Bd. i. 1. 186), Figyt was at this time part of the dioecesis Orientis, but the sixth canon of the council anticipates the later civil organzation by recognizing it as an independent cerlesiastical division, nod aubjecting to the bshop of Alexandrla not only the bishops of ligypt, but also those of lentapolis and libya. There were thus in the Last rive grent confederations of churches, each of which was independent of the other; lit the West the see of liome stood alone in its anpremacy. In the following rentury the council of Chalcedon, c. 28, took nway the ecelenlastionl independence of the thecerses of Pontur, Aria, aml Thrace, and subjeoted them to the see of Constantinople, thos roducing the number of sees of the highost rank to Rome, Constantinople, Alexandrin, Antioch, with which the see of Jerusnlem was recknned, extra ordinem. This action of the council of Chalcedon was vigorously protested against by the Roman delegates, Leo the Great rejected it, and tha 28th canon ls not inserted in the authorized latin versions of the acts of the council (see the Actio Scrtadecima of the council in Mansi, vol. iv. p. 379 ; S. Leon. M. Epist. 94 (:35), vol. i. p. 1198 d; Epist. 119 (92), vol. 1. p. 1215 ).

But it is remarkable that although the title "patriarch" was not unfrequently given to the bishops of these sees in contemporary extracouciliar literatore, and beeame in later times their ordinary ollicial appellation, it does not occur in the canons of any of the councils of the first eight centuries; ner is it confined exclusively to them until the time, probably the 9 th century, at which carlieat Notitiac were compiled. In extrn-conciliar literature, it is given (a) to the bishop of Rome, e.g. by Cyril of Alexandria, Ilomil. Divers. 11, ap. Migne, l'atrol. Graec. vol. Ixxvii. 104), by the emperor Theo dusius, Epist. ad Gall. Thacid. ap. S. Leon. M. Epist. 63, vel, i. p. 989, and by Justinian Contra Monophysitas, np. Mal, Script. Vet. vol. vli. p. 304 ; in later times, Hrnbnaus Maurus addresses the pope as "primus patriarcha per orben," Commendatio Papae prefixed to the trentise De Laudibus S. Crucis, np. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cvii. I39. (b) It is given to the blahop of Constantinople in the civil law, e.g. Justin. Notell. 3; but the assumption of the title "Oecumenicsl l'atriarch" ( olкou dpxŋs, perhaps firat by Nemaas in a synedical letter of the council of Constantinople in 536, Mansi, vol. vlii. p. 959, and frequently afterward, e.g. C. I. (7. No. 8685), raised a strong protest in the West (S. Greg. M. Epist. 5, 43, p. 773 ; Pelag. II. Decret. ad Universos Episcopos. ap. Hinschius, p. 721), and even before the final separation of the Lastern and Westerin churches led to the omission of the name of Constantlnople from the list of "primne sedes" (see e.g. the Praefatio Nicaeni Cuncilii in Quesnel's Codex Canon. PATRON dox bellef, Justinian enacted on the one hand that no church or oratory should be erected without the consent of the bishop or without a suthelent enlowment (Novell. 67), and on the other hand that the founders of churches should not appoint clerks to minlster In a church without first presenting them to the bishop for examiuathon (Novell. 57, o. 2). Almost the only ather eastern regulation is that of the Trullia Conacll, which virtually repeats the second of these regulations, and in doling so shews by impliention that It had come to be disregarded (Conc. Trull. c. 3I). [ORA'ORIUM.]

In the West the canone of Spanish and Galllcan councils shew that the respective rights of the owners of estates and the bishops of neighbouriag citles were subjects of frequent dispute. The earliest regulation is that of the first council of Orange ( 1 Conc. Arıusic. A.D. $4+1$, c. 10 ) which enacts that If $n$ bishop has built a church upen an estate beloaging to him which lies within the territory of nnother bishop, he shall have the right of nominating clerks for that chureh, but that the actual appolatment of such clerks, and alse the dedlention of the church, shall rest wlth the bishop of the territory. This eanctment implies that in a similar case a laymnd had no absolute right of nomination, but that the blwhop within whose territory the chureh was built could either accept or refuse the clerka whom the founder wished to appoint. A century later, within the Frankish domain, and after Teutonic conceptions of the rights of the owners of land had entered with the Franks into Gaul, the fourth Council of Orleaus passed a series of enactments, the tenor of which shews that the owners of estates upon which churches were built claimed large powers over such churehes: it enacts that those who bulld them are to endow them with sufficieat lands, and nppoint a sufficient number of clerks; that they ure not to appoint auch elerks against the will of the bishop "ad quem territorii ipsius privilegium noscitur pertinere;" and that the clerks, when appointed, are to be amenable to ecelesiastical discipliue, and noi to be impeded by the owner of the estate or his agenta in the discharge of thelr ecclesisstical duties ( 4 Conc. Aurelian. A.d. 541, c. 7, 26, 33). But in the 7th ceatury the conacil of Chalons-sur-Saone makes it clear that the owners of such estatea had again asserted a right both to appoint and to govern their clerks, independently of the bishop, and enacts that this usage is to be reformed, so as to give hoth the ordination of clerks and the disposal of the revenues of oratories to the lishop (Conc. Cabill. A.D. 650, c. 14). None of these or any other Gallican canons deal expressly with the case of ordinary parish churches; and this must probably be taken as negative evidence in faveur of the supposition that the primitive usage had not been altered. There is, however, a Spanish canon which gives to the builder, and apparently to the restorer, of a parish church the right of presenting cletks to the bishop for ordiation, and disallows any orditation which is made by the bishop to auch a church in detiance of the founder's nombation ( 9 Oonc. Tolet. A.D. 655, c. 2); hut the absence of any mention of heirs in this canon, coupled With the exprese mention of them in the preceding canon, establishes a presnmption that the right of nomination was personal to the fonnder, and did not descuml to his holrs. With the exs ception of this canon, thera is naevidence of the recognition in the Western church before Corrollagian tlmes, of any right on the jait vither of a founder or of any other person to nominate clerka to a parlsh church; (the Instance glated la the cnuon law, Gratian, Derret. parsil. cnus. 16, quaest. 1, 31, and ancribed to pope Pulagias, is clently of much later date).

The polley of the popes from the time of Gregary the Grent was even more decidedly in the suma direction. That pope, writing to Felix of Messiaa, request.s hin to cousecrate a church which has beea bullt upon private property, if he fiade that it bas bena autlicicatly endowed, but expressly deales to the founderany rights, except the right of nimis. sion to service, "which is due to all Chrintinas In common" (S. Greg. M. Epist. H. 5, ad kelic. Messan.). This letter, which was afterwards ascribed to Gelasius (Append. ad Epist. Gichasii Papae, ap. Mansl, vel. viii. 133, Migno, P. L. vol. lix. 148), became the basis of the eanon law on the subject (Gratian, Decret, pars ii. cans. 16, quaest. 7, 26), and its substance is emborlied in the form of petition which is glven in the i, ber Diurnus for the conseeration of an oratory (e. 5 , 3, p. 92, ap. Nligne, P. L. vol. cv. 88). In order still further to secure churchea ereeted on private eatates from interference on the part of the owners of the estates, and to prevent, as it wera by naticlpation, the abuses to which the later system of $\rho^{\text {antroange gave rise, Gregory, mithough }}$ he required an endowment for such charches, decllined to allow presbyters to be permaneatly appolated to them: they were to be served thy presbyters sent by the bishop from time to tina (S. Greg. M. Epist. ii. 12 ad Cutatur. Arimin., in. 70 et xii. 12 ad Passiv. Firman., ix. 84 ad Benen. Tundarit., ef. Nabillon, Comm. Prues. in Ord. Rom. in Mus. Ital. vol. ij. p. 19 ; the rule is alse tound in a fragment printed by Holstici, Coll. Rom. vol. i. p. 234, and Migne, P. L. vol. Ixix. 414, and ascribed, without sufficient ground, to jope Pelagins). And a century and a-half afterwards, immediately betore the great change which we are about to deseribe, pope Zachary lays down a similar rule in almost ideatical terms: ( S . Zachar. Epist. 8 ad Pippin. c. 15, ap. Nigee, P. L. Ixxxix. 935, xcviii. 87, Codex Carolious ed, Jaffe, p. 26 ; in contraat to this may be noted the later policy which disallows "presbyteros conductitios" where a church has funds eneugh to have "proprium sacerdotem:" Conc. hemens. c. 9, aub lnoocent. il. A.D. 1131, ap. Mansi, vol. x 1 . 460).

But although these earliir relations of founders or owners of churchea to the clergy cancot properly be passed over, they are essentially distinct from, although they have often been coafused with, the later aystem of patronage. That aystem is an outgrowth of feudalism. Both the name and the thing belong to the Frankish demnin, and to the period of the Carolinginns. At that period the church had become the greateat landowner in Gaul: it has been computed that a third of all the real property in Gaul belouged to it: (for some particulars, see e.g. Reth, Geschichte des Beneficialwesens, p. 248 sqq. Erlangen, 1850). From time to time laymen had been allowed to have the usufruct of some of these lands, on condition of prying

The lands "o appropriated were assigned nes "beneficia," i.e. as revoonble and conditional grate to indivilual soldiurs. The system of appropriation soon became geaeral nad tha appropristious when general also tended to become permsaeat. Not leng nfter his conquest of the Lombards, Charles the Great confirmed previous beneficiary grants of church lands, reserving only to the kiug himself the right of rec:alling them (Cayit. It was not long before the ecclesiastical duties for the performance of which the lands had originally been intended to provide were regarded as subordinate to the geaersl privileges of the ownershig of land. little more than half a century after the death of Charles Murtel, this tendency had become so strong that not only the people but also the bishop was ignored. Charlen the Great atrongly intertered to support the rights of the blshops; he urote in a tone of indignant reluke to thore who were gailty of the "Immoderate presulapbishops, of retusing to present presbytors to out their bianding to ajpulat to purishes withpro Episcopis, ap. It is important to nete, although the aubject cannot be pursued at length withia the limits of the present work, that the usurpations of the beneticiary holders of church lands, and of the other feudal lords within whose domsios churches were situated, were not limited to the They pation of the right of appointment of clerks. They begnn to claim a share of those funds which were left to tbe churches after the alienation of their lands. In doing so they were supported by the state. Charles the Great directed the bishops to determine what tribute presiogters should pay for their churches to their lords (Capit. de Presbyteris, A.d. 800, c. 3, sp. Pertz, vol. I. 161, "Ut episcopi praevideant quem honerem presbyteri pro ecclesiis senioribus the amo $;$ and Lewis the Pious, after specifying the amount of land which parish preshyters they sheuld pay "debitumat if they had more, suis" (Hludowic I Cam servitium senioribus Pertz, vol. i. 209) Capit. A.D. 817, c. 10, ap. attributed to 209). A later decretal, falsely rated in the corpus of canon, which is incorporeprobation of the growing law, apeaks with claiming part of thwing cuatom of laymen offered in church (Gratian, Deoret. pars ii, wire quaest. i. 16). In one point only were patrons checked with any degree of success. Their assertion of the right to nominate clerks was closely followed by the practice of selling nominstions, or at least of accepting prescuts for them. This practice, although it was not altogether suppressed, was at least checked and disceuraged. It is disallewed by Cinc. Mo,mnt. A.D. 813, c. 30 (which forms c. 7 of the Ststuta erroneously ascribed to Boniface of Mainz, nad printed as hle in D'Achery, Spicileyium, i. 508).

PATRON
Later in the 9 th century Hincmar of Rheime ly eapectally distinguished for the atand which he made against it: he expreasea hls dieterailuation in every caae to make inquiry, and in no case to ordain a clerk on the preseutation of a patron, it the clerk has given a slagle peany tor his presentation (Hincmur, Remens. E'pist. 43, ad Toutulf, Comit, ap, Migne, Patrol. I.at. vol. exxvi. $26+$; II. Cupit. in Syned llemens. A.D. 874, c. 5, ap. Migne, l'atrol. Lat, vol, exxy. 800).
The system of patronage which thus grew out of the introfuction by the Carolinglans of the system of granting church lands an fiefs wan supported by two other circumstances, which alio resulteil from the Frankish rule.
(1) A treeman who built a church upon his own lind had an ahnost absolute right of property ic it. In direct opposition to the Roman rule, aecurding to wibich, as has been shewa ahove, the fuusaler of a cluuch had no special rights whatever in the chureh which ho had huit, but in tall aceordance with the spirit of Frankish jurtyprodence, Charles the Great enacted that such 3 church might be assigned and sold: "de eccleslis quae ab ingenuis hominibus const'ruuatur licet'eas tradere, vendere, tantum modo ut ecelesia non destruatur sed seiviuntur cotidie honorea " (Capit. Francojurt. A.D. 794, c. 54 , Pertz, vol. i. 75). Accordingly the gift of a church to a monastery or a bishop was accompanied with the same forms ns the gift of any other real property (seo Rettlerg, Kircheny. Deutsch. vol. ii. 617). This right of ownershlp carred with it the right of appointment of lts ministers, subject, however, to the approval of the bishop; the right was not personal, but descended with the estate, and if the estate were dividel, and disputes arose as to the right of appointineut, the hishop could not interfere otherwise than by suspeading the services of the church until the joint owners or co-hcira had agreed to present to him a single preshyter (2 Conc. Cabillom. a.d. 813, c. 26; ap. Mansi, vol. xiv, 98 ; so in effect Conc. Tribur. A.D. 895, c. 32 ; for some questions arising from this rule of joint patronage see Hinschius, in the Zuitschrift für Kirchencecht, vol. vis. pp. 1 sqq.). At first, provision was made that the toundation of such churches should not interfere with the rights of previously existing churches to tithes and other dues (Karoli M. Capit. ad Salz. A.d. 803, c. 3, Pertz, vol. i. 124, and Excerpt. Can. c. 19, Pertz, vol. i. 190 ; Conc. Morfunt. A.D. 813, c. 41 ; Hludowici et Hlotharil Capit. c. 6, Pertz, vol. I. 254 ; Ansegisi Capit. lib. ii. 45, Pertz, vol. i. 299); but in time the distinction bet ween these privately-founded churches and parish churches proper was broken down, and the original rights of owners in the one case became indistinguishable from the usurped rights of feudal lords in the other.
(2) All holding of land onder the Franklsh role involved military service. The full rigbta of a freeman could only be claimed by one who could defead those rights by arms. In some instances it would appenr that clerks did not hesitate to tage the field (e.g. Annales S. Amandi, A.D. 712, Pertz, M. H. G. Scriptorum, vol. i. 6 ; Einhardi, Azuales, A.d. 753, ibid. vol. i. i39; Ruodolfi Fuldena, Annales, a.D. 844, itid. vol. i. 364 ); but there was a strong feeling agaiu-t their doing so, and enactments were passed to prohilit it, e.g. Karlomanal Cunit, A.D. 742, c. 2 ; Perta, Lryun, vol. i. 16 ; lipilhi, Cint. Vermer. A.s. 75:3, c. 16, ithe, vol. 1. 22 K Karoli M. Capit. Gearral, A.D. 769, e, 1, thid. vol. 1, , 2, and Cupit. Ecclesiast, a. D. 789, C. 日ま, ihid, wal, i. 64. It was, in nther respects, desinuble fus clerks to avold aonie of the perixomal burlens which attached to freemen, aul it nut intio. quently breame necessary to protect their ןryo. legea and their lands agalast usurpation. Con. secinently thoso churches snl monanteris which were large iandowners frequently put themelisea under the protection of a nelglimuthing seeular lord. Tha common name fur the tie which thus came to exist was "udroeatia," but with this "patrocinium" is interchangeable ("a this joiat see Wuitz, Deutache Reihsterfassumy, BI, ii. 450, lii. 32t). The powers of the "ailvocatus," or "patronus" in this sense, came in time to be considerable [Advocate of the chercit, Vol. I. p. 3:3], enjreciaily in relation to abbers, and in the course of tho middle ages, though so far trom the perini embraceal in the present work ns not to admit of beiag stated in detail hero, included the right of presentation. in our own country thls system previiled to so greatana extent that the word "advocatia," under ita modern form of "adrowson," lias come to be synonymous with the right of jresentation.

PATRON SAINTS. For the general doctrine of the influence of glorified saints crets human affairs, see the Dict of Cur. Biog. as. What is here given relates simply to the a wall practice of Christians in adopting sainto as patrons whether of places or persons.
I. Nomcnclature. - A martyr supposed to have a special interest in a place and its inhatitants was called their patron first in the latter half of the 4 th century. St. Ambrose is probably the earliest extant witness to the usege, when, in 386, he calls Gervasius and Protasiua the "patrons" of the orthodor at Milan (F.pist. xxii. 11). Somewhat later he says of departed kings and martyrs, "dlli fiunt supplices, hi patroni" (Expos. in Ev. S. Luc. x. 12). Paulinu: of Nola frequently gives the title to Felix, to whom his church was dedicsted, and under whose peculinr protection he beliered himself and bis people to live. Thus, writing in 395 (Carm. ij. in S. Fel. 26) -

Thua hath the divine goodness provided for the whole world by giving to the several provinces or peoples a special pntron in whom to rejoice" (Hom. de lat. Willibrordi, 1). In the age of Alcuin, we observe, certain honours were claimed for a martyr in every church, though special honours were paid to him, and special trust reposed in him in those places of which he was the patron. But at first the homours paid to them and other saints were entirely local. A curious illustration of this occurred when Julian separated Constantia from Gaza, of which it was a suburb. As a consequence, says Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. v. 3), "each has its bishop and clergy by itself, and its celebrations of martyrs and menorials of the bishops who have belonged to it."

The saints protected the church dedicated with their relics:
"Ita suis meritis jam tecta bacrata tuetur, Ut procul effugiat thosilis ab uede sscra."
(Alcuin, Carm. 35 ad Orat. S. Andr.)
Similarly Carmina 42, 77-79, 85, 95, 98, 115. They afforded a general protection to the people who worshipped in their churches:

Specimens of the Dedication-formulae of churches (e.g. "in honorem S. Joannis Baptistae") may be seen under Inscriptions, p. $8+8$.
IV. The Angels Patrons.-When St. Michael, St. Gabriel, and St. Rapbael were first chosen by authority as patrons of a church or oratory, we are unable to say. A church dedicated to St. Michael was built at Ravenna in 545. (Ciampini, Vet. Monum. ii. tav. xvii. in vol. i. p. 87). The Besnncon Sacramentary, a Gallican book modified by Roman influence, of which the MS. belongs to the 7th century, gives a "missa in honore Sancti Michahel," which was evidently used on his day in oratories, &c., named after him, or possibly, as the Gallicans of that age had very few saints' days, on the anniversary of their opening whenever it was ("in honore beati arch-" angeli Michahelis dedicata nomini Tuo loca," Mus. Ital. i. 356). There is no similar mass in any other Gallican missal, but we find examples In all the old Roman aacramentaries, to which we infer from the Besancon that they belonged at an early period. The Gelasian aselgns to iii. kal. Oct. "Orationes in Sancti Archangeli Michaelis" (Liturgia Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 669), which contain no reference to the dedication of the church; but the so-called Leonian gives five missae for pridie kal. Oct., under the heading, "Natnle Basilicae Angeli in Salaria," of which two (i. iv) allude to his being the patron of the church (Murat. u. s. 407). The early copies of the Gregorian all have such a mass (iii. kal. Oct.), and they all by the title (Dedicatio Basilicae S. Michaelis, Mur. S. Angeli) intimate that

St. Michael was the patron of the church in which it was to be used (see Rocca'a copy in Opp. Greg. M. V. 151, Antv. 1615 ; Pamelius, Rituale SS. PP. ii. 345 ; Murat. u. s. ii. 125 ; Menard in Opp. Greg. ed. Ben. iii. 135). Among the poema of Alcuin are two on churches dedicated to him (29, 168), three on altars of St. Michael (37, 64, 77), and a sixth (186) "ad aram sanctorum archangelorum," i.e., as the verses shew, of Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael.
V. Patrons of Classcs.-In the middle agea every trade and protession had its patron, sod every disease a saint especially gifted for its cure. The germ of this distribution of offices appears even from the very introduction of saint-worship. Thus Justina, persecuted by the magician Cyprian, "implores the Virgin Mary to aid a virgin in peril" (Greg. Na\%. Hom. 24 in Cypr. § 11). St. Agnes is addressed by Prudentius (De Coron. 14, in fine) as the especial patroness of female chastity. St. Nicetius, the putron of Lyons, was the especial friend of prisoners (Greg. Turon. Vitae Patrum, viii. 7). St. Sigismund cured the ague (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Mart. 75). In the Besançon Missal found at Bobio, belonging to the 7th century, in a mass of St. Sigismund, "pro frigoriticis" (Mabillon, Musae. Ital. i. 344). Phocas was the patron of sailors (Aster, Amas. Eincom. in Phoc. 5 in Combefis, Auctar. i. 180, par. 1680). Sailors at thair meas would by turns depusit in money the cost of a meal as the share of lhocas, and when they arrived in port distribute it to the needy in his name (ibid.).
VI. Gwod Offces expectel from Patron Saints. -(1) That most frequently assigned to them was one, the fulfilment of which was lenst open to dispute. They seconded the prayers of their rotaries, and thus often led to their accomplishment, where without such aid they would have failed.
 xix. 8, xxiii. 7). Leo of Rome exhorts his people to keep vigil in St. Peter's, "who will deign by bis prnyers to assist our supplications and fasting and almsgivings" (Serm. xi. 4). Gregory l. calls patron saints "adjutores orationis" (In. Evang. ii., Hom. 32, § 8 ; comp. Bas. above). In fact the constant hope and request of their clients might be expressed in the words of Alcuin,
"Iste preces nustras adjuvet, opto, suis."
(Carm. 61 ad Aram, S. Jounn. Bapt.)
Similarly Carm. 28 ad Sepulcr. Amindit "Adjuvat iste preces populi;" and Carm. 47 ad Aram SS. Grey. et Hieron.
(2) There was no danger or difficulty in whlch their aid was not invoked with success. "Let us keep vigil," says Leo, "in the church of the blessed apostle Peter, by whose merits siding us, we may obtain release from all tribulations" Serm. 84, § $2 ;$ comp. 81, § 2). Some of the iostances in Paulinus are, even by his own confension, calculated to raise a smile rather thsn to edify. For example, a rustic who had lost two oxen by theft, instead of pursuing the robbers, flies at once to the church of St. Felix, whom he declares responsible for their restorntion ( $D_{0}$ S. Fel. Gamm. Vi. 29!).
(3) The martyrs were the especial protectors of those who were named after them. Thos Theodoret nays that Christians " make a point of giving the appellations of the martyrs to their

(t) The active assistance in battle of aome Jong departed hero was the aubject of many a Greek and Romsu myth, Among the semi-converts of the 4th century, there could not fail to be many on whom these romantic traditions had made a deep impression, and we cannot be aurprised at their apeedy reproduction under a Christian guise. The patron martyr was regarded ns a faithful ally, both in aggression and defence of those who served him well. It is, in short, in the heathen myth that we discover the germ of the mediacval romance which culminated in the conversion of the aposthes into knight-crrants. Theodoret relates that on the night before the battle in which Theodosius overthrew Eugenius, A.D. 394, St. John snd St. Philip appeared to him "in white graments and riding on white horsea" and told him that they had been "sent as his allies and champions" (Hist. v. 24). St. Ambrose and champions" (Hist. v. 24). St. Ambrose had promised that he would often visit Florence. After his death in 397 "he was frequently seen praying at the altar in the Ambrosinn basilics which he had himself built there," and when the city was besieged by Radagaisus in 406 , he appeared to besieged by Radagaisus in 406 , he appeared to a citizen of the place and foretold its anfety. The next day Stilicho came to its relief (Vita Ambros. a Paulino conscr. 50). During the war with the Goths, A.D. 410 , the Romsns refused to repair a weak part of the city wsll, "athirming that Peter the apostle had promised them that the guardianship of that place should be his care. For the Romans reverence and worship this apostle abova all" (Procopius de Bello Gothico, i. 23; ed. Nieb. ji. i19). St. Augustine, 421, heard and believed that when Nola was besieged, St. Felix, its that when Nola was besieged, St. Felix, its patron (cd. Nieb. ii. 110 ), appeared (/e Cur. pro Hort. xvi.). Leo of Rome, 440, asks triumphsatly, "Quis hanc urbem reformavit saluti? Quia a captivitate eruit? Quis a caede delendit? Ludus Circensjum, an cura Sianctorum ?" (Serm. 81, § 1). Venantius, A.D. 560, says of St. Peter and St. Paul (Poem. jii. vii. 19),

(5) But more slien still from the spirit and thith of the Gospel was the dependence placed on the patron from protection from the consequences hlsiphemons expreasion, as I think it must be deemed, of this dependence at the earliest period of patron worahip. PaUL, Apostle; Festivals of, etc.
(1) Festival of St. Peter and St. Paur. See Peter, Apostle, Festivals of. Commemoration of St. Paul on June 30, ihid.
(2) Festival of Conversion of St. Paul.-The observance of this festival dates from a much later period than the preceding, though it is not at all easy to approximate to the time with nny degree of certainty. The reason for such a comauch astion is not far to aeek: a conversion auch as that of St. Paul stands on an nltogether different footing from the call of any other apostle, and when it is cousidered how ditlerent, humanly apeaking, Christianity would have been, had God not thought fit to employ St. Paul as He did, we may allow that there is $n$ sense in which Renan is justified in calling St. Paul "the second fonnder of Christisnity."
Besides tha general importance of the event herein commemorated, there was also probably a St. Pau bestow a further commemoration on St. Paul, as though he had hardly received of sufficient recognition by the festival of June 29, of which the commemoration of St. Yaul on June 30 is also evidence; a need which would be the more felt inasmuch as other important festivala soon became associated with the naine of St. Peter. It may be noted that the feast of Western church, She Paul is peculiar to the we have spoken as special necessity of which being, on the when as tending to its origination In inquiring as to peculiar to the West. first find traces of the observan which we can wa shall do well in observance of this festival, ground of fictitious instances place to clear the Rom. Jan. 26) nppeals Baronius (Mart. tine for this festival, an appeal which, if substantinted, would give a decidedly early dare. The sermone in question are thoae given by the Benedictine editors as 278,279 (Pitrol. xxxviii. 1268), and also 189 of thosa rejected by them as spurious (ib. xxxix, 2098). As regards the first of these, while it is true that the convarsion of St. Paul ia dwelt on, the partlcular part of the Acts containing that history having, yet wond seem, been the laction in the service; yet the heading which connects tha sermon with the festival [pro solemnitute conversionis $S$. Pauli] is certainly late, for the sermon ia cited in tha Indiculus of Possjdius (c.8) as "de vocatione spostoli Pauli et commendatione orationis dominicae," and it seems to have been one of those made for the paschal season, when the Acta was regularly read. It may be added that the Calenduriun Carthaginenso mokes no meution of this festivsl, a weighty argument against its celebration in Africa in Augustine's time.

Not unnaturally, in the course of time, when the festival was actually established, the subject matter of the sermon led to its receiving its later title. Thus Florus (Expos. in Epp. Pauli; 1 Cor. iii., 1 Thess. iv., 1 Tim. i. $\mathfrak{i}$ Patrol. cxix. $324, \& c$. ) invariably cites it as Sermo de Conversione Apostoti Pauli. Assuming the authorship of this expositio to be established, the above is the earliest allusion we are ncquainted with to the existence of the festival, bringing it to about the middle of the 9 th century.

The second sermon is entitled in some MSS., it is true, in Conecrsione $S$. Pauli, but Florus always cites it merely de Patelo Apustolo (op. cit.; Rom. i. viii. ix.; Phil. ii.). The third sermon is merely a cento made up from other sermons of St. Augustine.

No homily for the day is found in the works of Leo, Maximus of Turin, Bede, &c. The festival is given, however, in some forms of the Gregortan Sacramentary (col. 22, ed. Ménard), where the service includes a 'solemn' benediction. On the other hand, however, Pamelius obelizes it, and the Cud. lieg. Suecite (Vat. 1275) of the Benedictine edition omits it nltogether. This MS. is, however, of about the date 900 A.D., snd. Ménard's $C_{1} d$. Theodericensis i., a century earlier, gives the fesival, but puts it after the commemorations on the same day of SS. Emerentinnus and Macharius. It may be notad that the festival is altogether wanting in the Gregorian untiphomary. Almost identicnl with the form in the Gregorian Sacramentary is that in the Ambrosian, the only differences being that the latter has a prayer super sindonem, and that the benediction is shorter. In the Comes Hieronymi it is entirely absent, Jsn. 25 being merely recognised as the Natale of Macharius and Emerentisnus. Tsking then into account the reference of Florus, and assuming the date of the Cud. Theodericensis to be rightly given, it will follow that the festival was existing at the beginning of the 9 th century, but its absence from MSS, of the sacramentary of a later date will suggest that it came but slowly into recognition. Thus there is no allusion to it in the capitulare of Ahyto, bishop of Basle early in the 9 th century.

On turning to the martyrologies, we find in the Dfurt. Hieronymi for Jan. 25, after the entry "Nicomediae, Biti," the further potlca," Romse, Translatio Sancti Pauli Apostoli" (Putrol. xxx. 455), a suggestion, it would seem, of $n$ different kind of origin for the festival. The metrical martyrology of Bede givea a notice of the day, "Octavas merito gaudet conversio Pauli" (Patrol. xclv. 603). This, bowever, is wanting in some MSS., and may be summarily dismissed as an interpolation. Moreover, in the ordinary martyrclogy of Bede, in Ita true text as edited by Hanschenius, there is no mention of the conversion of St. Paul, though this occurs among the additions of the latetaxts (Acta Sanotorum, March, rol. ii. p. x1.). The martyrology of Rabanus

Maurus mentions, on Jan. 25, both the trans Intion and converaion (Patrol. cx, 1130); :ee s!so Notker (Patrol. exxxi. 1039). Wandulbert, in the 9 th century, commemorates the festiva?, "Octavo ex Saulo" conversum gloria l’aulum" (Patrol. exxi. 587). Some 9thorentury calendars, however, do not recognise the festival (see, e.g., the Kal. Floriacense, in Martene aud Durand, Amyl. Coll. vi. 650). We may perhapis approximate to the date of the introduction of this testival into England by noting that, while there is no mention of it in the pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York (732-766 A.D.), yet it is gived In the sacramentary of Leotric (bishop of Exeter, 1050-1072 A.D.). The MS. of this, however, now in the Bodleian Library, is of the toth century (Surtees Saciety's Publications, vol. |xi. p. xi.).
(3) Apocryphal Literature. - Of apocrrphal works connected with the aime of St. Pial there is a considerable quantity. 'There are Acts of' Peter and Paul, published by Tischendorf (Acta Apustolorum Apocrypha, pp. 1. sqq ; cf. p. xir). There are also Acts of Paul and Thecla (ih. p. 40; cf. p. $x \times i$.) referred to as early as Tertullian (de Baptismo, c. 57). A Syriac version of this has been published by Dr. Wright (Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles).

Two spurious letters exist in Armenino, oge purporting to be from the Corinthian church to St. Paul, and the other the apostle's answer. $d$ Latin translation of these is given in Fabricias (Coder Pscud. Vet. Teet. iii. 667, sqq.). da English translation by Lord Byron is also given in Moore's Life of Byron. We have also a sparious letter to the church of Lnodicea, is Latin (for which see Lightfoot's Colossiuns, ed. 2, pp 281, sqq.), and a series of letters ia Latin, forming a correspondence between St. Paul and Seneca. These are given by Fabricius ( $o p$. cit i. 871; cf. Jeroma de Viris itlustr. 12; Ang. Ep. 153 ad Macedonium, § 14 ; reference may also be made to the essay in Lightfoot's Philip pians).

Further, wa have an Apocalypse of Psul, firs edited by Tischendorf (Apocalypses Apocryphoen pp. 34, sqq.) from a Greek MS, in the Ambrosian Library. A Syriac text also exists, of which an English translation bas been published (i). p. xvii.).

PAVEMENT. Although scarcely to be included among Christian antiquities, the plat form or pavement on which Roman governors of provinces and other like officials were accustomed to place their chairs when sitting in judgment comes under our notice on one occasion of such pre-eminent interest that some mention of it can hardly be omitted. It must be almost need. less to say that the occasion referred to is that in which our Lord was brought before Pilate-"in the place called the Pavement " (eis cónoy $\lambda \in \gamma \delta \delta^{-}$ that it was the practice for Roman officiala of high rank to cause such a pavement to be constructed as an adjunct to a praetorium wherever one was established. Suetonius (in fita Jul. Cues.) says that it was related of Jnlius Cacsar that in his expeditions he carried with him pavesments aectile and tesselated ("in expeditionibua tessellata et sectilia pavimenta circumtulisse "). Cassubon remarks upon this passage, that what he carried with him were probably the materials with which such officisl pavements might be constructed.
A representation in art of such a pavement mav. be found on the top of the reliquary of carred ivory [Reliquary] preserved in the Biblioteca Quiriniana at Brescia, in the subject of Christ brought before Pilate, tha seat of the latter being placed on a slightly raised platform or dais. This casket is probably of the 4 th century.
The pavementa of chorches were in the earlier. ages usually either of mosaic, or tesselated, or of sectile work, the latter being made up of pieces of marbles, norphyries, or granltes, cut so as to fit together and form patterns. One of the earllest examplea of the former ls probably the pnvement In the basilica of Reparatus, near Orleansville, in Algeria, probably circa A.D. 325. (Sce woodeut.) The two kinds of work were oecasionally mixad, as In the pavement of the chapel of St. Alasander, on the Via Latina, s faw miles from Rome, discovered about twenty jears ago. In this inatance slabs of marble enclose squares of coarse mosaic of white marble, in which wera a sort of quatrafoils, roughly formed by teeeerae of dark stone. This pavement probably dated from the 5th or 6th century. Ona of very aimilar character, and probably of the same data, was discovered in 1858, when the original level of the north aisle of tha choir of S. Lorenzo-fuor-le-Mara, at Rc me, was reached by axcavation. The parenient of the earlier church of San Clemente, at Rome, was found to consist of elabs of marble arranged In a somewhat simple pattern. The churches of St. Sophia and St. John Studios, at Constantinople, both retaln portions of their original pavements: large slabs of marble, circular or quadrangular, are enclosed by bands of interlacing ornament, chiefly exscuted in strips of marble, but in part in mosaia (c. Salzenberg, Baudenhmale Constantinopels, & c .). A good, though small, example of a sectile pavement will be found in the triforium of the cathedral of Aix-la.Chapelle, being no doubt a portion of that brought by Charles the Great from Roma or Ravema.

Mosaic pavementa not unfrequently contained inscriptions recording the names of the donors. The remains of such an inseryption were found in the rulne of tha basilica of Reparatue mentioned sbove. In thls occurs the names of Parlus, Pomponius, Ruiticue, and Adeodatus with the additions "votum solvit," "voti comp." &c. The pavement la oue of considerabla elegance; It la divided into compartmente, in which are figures of stags, goats, sheep, &e. An engraving will bo found in Les Currelages emailles, by M. Amé, pp. 15-28, borrowed from that given in tha report of the Commisaion Sclentifique de l'Algérie (Beaux-Arts, I. I. pl. liii.). Anuther instance of a pavement provided by the contributione of the members of the churct is afforded by a recent discovery at Oiympia, mentioned in a letter printed in the Tines if April 16, 1877. It is there stated that the ruins of a large Byzantine church, "perthapo as early as the 5th century, had been found. The pavement of this church was formed of large marble slaba, on one of which, in the centre of the nave, was inscribed, "Kyriakis, a most discreet Anagnostes, who for the saliry tion of his coul ornamented the parement."

In the crypt of the cathedral of Verona are remains of a tesselated pavernent of elegant design, probably not later in date than the jith century (v. engraving in Museun Veronease hy Maffei, p. ceviii.). In the compartmenta of thit are inscriptions containing the names of the contributors to the work and stating the quas. tities paid for by each, as "Eusebia cum suis tessallavit P. CXX."
Another remarkable inatance of an earily pavement is that of the church of Dedanoukha, in Mingrelia (The Crimea, &c. by Capt. Teifer, p. 123), which is attributed to the 6 th ceantury. In this instance forty small circular slabs are lié into the floor near the south entrance, and are asserted to be placed over the heads of the in Armenia, in the time of Licinius, by being exposed to the rigour of a winter frost in : marsh.

Nor were pavements made use of for memorials only, for Gregory of Nyssa (in Theod. (Irat. 35) says, "Nor do the walls alons of this temple read us lessona of piety, for the very parement, in its mosaics like a flowery mead, promotes ont instruction." That few examples have remained to our time will not appear surprising, wheniti remembered that the pavement is the psrt of the church of all the most exposed to iojury.
One example of a tesselated paveneat requira mention as being one of the few instances of the occurrence of Christinn symbols in Roman remains in England; tha pavement discovered at Frampton in Dorsetshire, an engraring of which has been given by Lysons (Reliquix Britannae-Romanae). The ruins in which it was discovared were apparently those of a rilh; it covered the floor of an apartment of a sqoirt form with a semicircular projection or ape frum ona side. In a compartment occupyige tie central part of the arc of the apse remaind the two hadles with portions of the lip of a vase which if completa would probably hare borna tha form of the vases or chalices oftea found in early Christian art (v. Chalec); whila in the cantre of the chori of the semicint was the labarum torming the centre of a basd of foliage; Immediately, however, beyond this band was one whlch ran round the room, am was decorated with figures of dolphins. Is tha centre of thls brad and in contact with the labarum was a large head of Neptune, while 1 figure of Cupid occupied a like position an nnother side. It is difficult to form satifico tory conclusion as to the destination of tis apartment In view of this Femarksble colloratis of Pagan deities and Christian symbois.

PEACOCK. See Lamps, p. 921. The peacock was a favourite ornament from the 1at century; it is found, with other birds, at Pozznoli (aee new frescoes in the South Kansington Maseum, nos. 1270-73), at Pompeii and Herculaneum, and repuatelly in the Jewish catscomba of the Ist century (Parker's Phatoyraphs, nea. 561,562 ). Martigny says it was a aymbol of the Resurrection, from the annual moulting ferring to Bosio ( $R$. Sutsiful tail-feathers, re(erring to Bosio (R. Sutt. p. 641) and Aringhi
(R. Ivi. e. 36, p. 612). Mamachi (Antiq. Christ. l. iii. p. 92) says there is neither authority for. nor objection to, the symbolism, a view in which we concur; and Martigny quotes a sentence from one of St. Anthony of Padua's sermons ( 5 post Trin.) which compares our body to all the trees of the wood as well, and with equal plsusibility. St. Augus speaks of this bird as an Divi, 1. xxi. c. iv.) tality, from the opinion of his time that immorwas in part or entirely incorruptible. For this or whatever renson it is made in the cemateries to sccompsny the Good Shepherd and the symbolic Orpireus, see Fresco, p. 696, Bottari, iji. tav. Isiii. Like the Vine and the Good Shepherd, it was part of the repertory of heathen decoration. The fact is, as any draughtsman will see, the percock with outspread tail is specislly sdapted to ornament circular vaultings and wnilis beneath them, as in Aringhi, R.S. col. ii. p. 59, Its radiating plumes make it a geometrical centrs for circles or curves of decoration, and it is equalls well suited to be a centre of colour. It was probnbly one of the earliest ornaments adopted by Christian paintera, bit it may have bcen one of the lateat invested with sacred meaning.
The writer cannot find it in Garrucci's Vetri; but it seems to have been particnlarly in favour as a fresco subject for walls or roof ornament. Martigny gives an example from the cemetery of SS. Marcellinus and Peter (see woodeut) of a peacock with circular train displayed atanding "an a globe, with the remark that the artist coul rising above the symbolise the winged coul rising above the earth after the resurrec-

A peacock with two chicks is represented in fresco on a vaulted monument in the catacombs of St. Januarius at Naples. The latter seem to be issuing from a kind of nest-shaped basket (D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. ii. na. 9). The pencock and young are also found in a Christisn entacomb discorered at Milna ia $18+5$ near the basilica of St. Nnzaire, for which Martigny refers to Polidori sopra alcuni Sepolcri anteCristiani in Milano, 1845, p. 57.
One reason for believing the figure of the peacock to be rather oraamentnl than symbolic is that it is but rarely found in sculpture. Two peacoeks nre found with a versc on the epitaph of the priest Romanus in the Musée Lapilaire at Lyons, and this ornament was frequently used Veniter dnys in the byzantine sculpture of Venica (R1 skin, Stones of Fenice, vol. i. p. 235 . M. Leblant (Inscr. chret. de la Gaule) says he has only found it three simes on monument?, and Martigny only knows two examples in homeone on the tombstone of Aurelia l'roha (Boldetti, p. 361). The names rationate, tojium ( $\lambda \delta^{\prime} \gamma_{10}$ ), were adopted by Christianity from the highprieat's breast-plate. They may be best explsined in Magri's words (Hierolcxicon, s. v.): "quia miraculose futura demonstrabat, et quasi loquebatur ac ratiocinabatur, ideoque rationale etiam dicebatur." It should be noticed that neither Durandna nor Thomas Aquinas includes the pectoral crose amongat the official vestmenta of a bishop; yet it appears that, though it was not a part of the exclusively episcopal vesture, bishops wers in the habit of wearing a pectoral cross in the time of Duran lus. The prayers which are usually recited on putting the cross upon the breast are not anterior to the 14 th century, at which date the pectoral cross seems first to have taken rank amongst episcopal ornaments.

Pugin (Glossary) observes that the ctoral cross is now considered an emblem of jurisdiction, hence when $n$ bishop enters the diocese of another he wears the cross concealed.

PENITENCE. The penitential discipline, in its original conception, required a delinquent to pass through three stages, beginning with a confession of his guilt [Exomologests], and ending with absolution, and a restoration to his forfeited privileges [Reconciliation]. repentince-implying change of heart, contrition, and amendment. In this sense it was frequently used by esrly ecclesiastical writers. The transition from this meaning to that of penitential disciplive is not difficult to trace. Along with the inward feeling of contrition, there came to be combinerl, in the theologicnl idea of repentance, an outward act of self-nbasement. Gradunlly the outworl act wa: accepted as a sign of the iaward sorrow, and ultimately took the place of it. Isidors (ii. 16, de Poenitentibus), following Augustine ( $E P .54$ ), derives the word from the peosl idea underlying penitence: "Poenitentia aomen sumpsit a poenn." In Rnbnn. Maur. Instit. ii. 29, the derivation is: "A punitione poenitentia nomen accepit, quasi punitentia, dum ijso homo punit pocnitendo, quod male admisit." The suthor of the de vera't fulsa Poenit. c. 19, which beass the nsme of Augustine, slightly varies the etymology: "Poenitere est poenam tenere, ut semper puniat in se, ulsciscendo quod commisit pecsando." This explanation is adopted by Peter Lombard (sentent. iv. dist. 14), and by Gratian (de Poenit. dist. 3), and is the nccepted etymology of the Roman canonists (Morinus Poenitent. i. 1). The Latin word in nniversal use to express penitential diseipline in all its stages and degrees was poenitentid, with its corresponding cencrete noun poenitens, a penitent, and the verb poenitere, to do penance In Cyprian and in the Conc. Bliber. the noun is generally nsed with some sdjective, as " agere, facere poenitentiam plenam, veram, legitimam." At a later date, poenitentia was employed as equivalent to the discipline of the ineelers, the third and principal station of pensnce ( 1 Conc. Tolet. c. 2 ; Conc. Agath. c. 60 ; Pelix, iii. $E p$. vi.) In the Latin penitentials the verb is used by itself absolutely. 2. Examologeais. A Greek word adopted by Tertullian (ioenit. c. 9), and used by Cyprian and Pacian, snd occasionally later. 3. Abstinere, communione privari, communionem non accipere. The lightest form of censure, consisting in rejection from participation in the sacred elements for a period; $s$ frequent formula in the Latin councila. 4. Segregstio, separatio; the translation of the Greek ápopı $\mu$ ós. 5. Flere, andire, substrari, con-sistere-the terms of the four stations.
The G: equivalent of poenitentia is uetavoua, it, s word retained for the most part its original meaning of change of heart. Bnsil uses it (c. 34) to signify the penitential course (see Conc. Latodic. c. 19); in another place (c. 22) to express the principal station of the ínonirrautes. In the latter instance it precisely corresponds with a similar use of the Latin poenitentia. In the later Greek rituals $\mu \in \tau$ divoia is a prostrstion. The theory of penitentin? discipline was this that the church was an organised body with an outward and visible form of government; that gile the were outside her boundarics were outaide the means of divine grace; that she $\mathrm{ha}_{\mathrm{l}}$ ! a her, to laid upon her, and authority given to her, to gather men into her fellowslip by the ceremony of baptism; but as some of thoze who where a mitted proved unworthy of their calling, she also hny the right, by the power of the keys, to deprive them, temporarily or absolutely, of the privilege of communion with her, and, on their amendment, to restore them once more to shunch membership. On this power of exclusion and restoration was founded the system of ecclesiastical discipline. It was a parely spiritual jurisdiction. It obtained its hold over the minds of men from the belief, universal in whe catnulic church of the early ages, that he who was expelled from her pale was expelled sentence whie way of salvation, atnd that the on earth was was pronounced by God's church on earth was ratified by Him in henven. No power, heretics ever ventured to claim this sacerdotal Ambrose was not merely taking high sacerdotal ground, but stating an historical fact, when he said (De Poenit. i. 2): "Hoc jus sibi recte Ecclesia vindicat, quae veros sacerlotes habet; hacresis vindicare non potest, quae sarerdotes Dei non habet. Non vindicando autem ipsa de se pronuntiat, quod cum sacerd́ntes non habeat, jus sibi vindicare non debeat sacerlotale." Penitence has at once its origin and sanction in the New Testament, and primarily in the promise of Christ Himself (St. Matt. x xiii. 18). A aystem of discipline was undoubtelly in force among the Jews at the Christian era, and was recognised by our Lord (St. John xvi. 2 ; St. Luke vi. 22). In the developnent of ehurch organisntion which the apostles were appointed to carry out, penitential diseipline was assigned its place ( 1 Cor. v. 3-5; 2 Cor. siii. $10 ; 1$ Tim. i. 20; Tit. iii. 10). Twe of the great " mortalia delicta," moechia and idolol thit, in the case of the incestuous man at Corinth (i Jor. v.), and of the heretics Hymennens and Alexander, were visited with apostolic censure.: The former example contains the elements. of the future discipline. It was a distinctly spiritual sentence. The decision emanated from the chief pastor: "I have judged already." It was announced before the congregation:" When ye are gathered together." Ite effect was to expose tha delinquent to some bodily mortification:" Delivered anto Satan for the destruction of tha flesh." Its object was his amendment: "That the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord." And its result, his ultimate restoration, on his repentance, to the fellowship of the church (2 Cor. ii. 6, 7). Nany of the fathers snw in this expression-"delivered unto Satan for the deatruction of the flesh," a sanction for the austerities of pennnce (Origen, in Levit. H/um. xiv. 4 ; Pncian, Puraen. ud Poenit. c. 18 ; Basil, c. 7 ; Ambrose, ds Poenit. i. 13 ; August. de Fíi. et Upp, c. 26). 'The references to ecelesiastical discipline in the carliest writers are naturally rare and frngmentary. The organizntion of the church was no less incomplete in this thmu in other matters. Clemens Roman. (E'p. ud Cor. c. 57, ed. Jacobson) has the following passugg :

 aùrov̂. The reference of this to some simple forin of discipling is anmistakable. The Shepherd of Hermas, which is probnbly a generation Jater than the Clementine E: pistles, spenks clearly and fully at the beginning of the 2nd century of the practice of separating an offender: (Herm. Pustor. vis. iii. 5; see Ijull. Similitud. vii.) An evidence for the existence af penitential discipline in these early times, which is, perhaps, stronger than any isolated passnge, is the universal tradition of the rhurch. The origin of Montanism is dated by Epiphanius in one place (Haeres. li. 33) as far back as A.D. 126. Other authorities fix it about A.D. 150 (Rubertson, Ch. Hist. i. 5). That is to s:ty, Montanus was only one generation removed from the apostle St. John. He separnted from the church chiefly on the ground of the claims of the church with regard to discipline. In other words, discipline was so widely prevalent, and so firmly established, as to crente a achism within a generation of the last of the apostles. The inference from this is weli drawn out by Thorndike (Laus of the Chur.h, iii. x. 2 ; Works, Lib. of Anglo-Cath. Theol. vol. iv. pt. 1). After Montanus there can no longer be any question on the discipline of pennnce being part of the regular organisation of the chorch. In the early ages the necessity for church censures must have been comparstively rare. As the need arose, the bishops with their priests dealt with each case in some simple manner, after the model, no doubt, laid down by St. Paul. The treatment of those who lapsed during the Decian persecution gave the first impulse to a more systematic and uniform organization. Crimes were classified, penalties promulgated, and the duration of penance was defined. The corre, pondance between the Roman and African churches, which sppears in the epistles of Cyprian, gives some insight into the method in which a degree of uniformity was gained. Local needs and circumstances, no doubt, had their inHuencs on the decisions of the early synods. The system, in the West does not appear to have been 80 -rigidly defined as in the East. The canonical epistles of Gregory Thaumaturgus, Hasil, and his brother Gregoly of Nyssa, were at once the expression and the support of this more inflexible rigidity. Under their inflaence the elaborate aystem of tha penitential stations took its rise. These stations were enken intu the canonical colle, but they never sppesr to havo entered into the practien alministrotion of the Western diacipline. The 3al, th, and the begitning of the sth conturies may be regaried within genernl limits as the fourish. ing period of the jenitential system. If was then complete and regular, nul at the ssma time had not censed to be sustninel by the zeal and belief of the church. The extent to which it catered into the routine of Christian legis. lation, is manifest from the spuce which penitential directions occupy in the writings of that period. The austerities were genuine and roluntary, endured fropn a firm conviction that only by such endurance could sia be expiated, "I have known masay," snys Ambrase (de Poeni. ten. i. 16), speaking as of fucts which hal come under his persoual knowledge, "who have furrowed their cheeks with e atinuous tenrs, who have laid themselves in the dust for all to trest upon, nud whose faces, thin and pallid from fasting, have presented the appearance of living ghosts." With the beginuing of the bth century the framework of the system was still unnltered, but the substance of it was rapidly decaying, more rapidly in the East than in the West. Through the 7 th century public penitence was all but dend. It revired for s time under the ecclesiasticnl rule of the Cmolingisn princes, but the renl life of penitence resided in the privata system administered through the penitentials. Milman (Lat. Christion. iii. 5), in a passage on the power accruing to the clergy through ecclesiastical discipline, thus sums up the value of the system fountled on the peniteatials: "However severe, monnstic, un-christian, as enjoining self-torture; degrading to homan nature, as substituting ceremonial observance for the spirit of religion ; nud resting in outward forms which might be countel and calculated; yet as enforcing, it might be, a rude and harsh discipline, it was still a morsl and religious discipline. It may have been a low, timid, dependent virtue to which it compelled the belicrer, yet still virtue. It wis s perpetual proclamation of the holiness and meter of the Gospel. It was a constant preaching, it might be, of sa unenlightened, superstitious Christianity, yet still of Christianity.

II. Prior to the Spread of the Novatha Hertisy.

The chief characteristics of discipline prior to the spread of the Novation heresy, as compared with those which afterwards prevailed, were the shortness and mildncss of the censures, and the simpler forms by which the system was administered. The Stations of Penitents had not pat been elaborated. The earlier censures no donht corresponded with those imposed afterwards is t e stations, but the technical names of the stations, and the systematic division of penitents connected with them, are of later date. Is the first three centuries there appear three distinclly marked degrees of censure-(1) exclusios from participation in the elements, (2) exclusion from the sight of the sacrament and from the eachristic prayers, (3) exclusion from the churd altogether, that is to say, excision from the body of the faitbful, and excommunication, slthough

An examination of the principal sources of informatien fur that period will sperve to shew clenrly the nature of these penalties, The Aposiolic Canons employ four terms to express church censurs- 1 , dфop! Seatal, sepnration, which applies equally to clergy and laity; 2 , каOapetai, deposition, whieh was confined to the drosdarder $\theta a t$, excision from the church, to which all were autbject. The severity of this last sentence was still more incrensed in two canons (cc. 27, 28), which direct that a priest ministering in holy things aiter deposition vavidanariv Rrкоттé $\sigma \theta \omega$. In the Apestolical Constitutions there is no record of any orgnnised aystem, but only the mention of lighter and weightier censures, In Apost. Const. ii. 16, after sonie general directions thst the bighop shall the mode of treating a delinquent. He was to be ejected from the church, nad the dencons meantime were to visit him and remonstrnte with him, and if he appcared contrite they were to come to the bishop nad intercerle for him, the

In further directions in the same chapter, the bishop was to refuge the penitent the boly communion for a period, the length of which was to be adjuated to his offence, and afterwsids receive him as a father would a repentsnt son. For ordinasy purposes of discipline, and for light offences, this was the censure employed. The heavier pennlty given in the Conetitutions corresponds with the excision from the church of the Canons. Here is evidently the germ of tha syatem of stages of penitence Which was atterwards the law of the church.

Censures, he states of proyer, from the sole men from the communion holy fellowship. Penitence with him from all labotious outward selfatabssement, him was of a holy privilege. It was an exomologesis, a confessien of sin by act as well as by word ; a in what this confession consisted he shews ripidly (Poenit. c. 9): "Exomologesis is a disciplins for the sbasement and humiliation of

ullinn disclose nppenra in the epistles of his dis. ciple Cyprian. The stations had not found their way into Africa in his time. Cyprian'a usunl terms fur expreasing penitence were "agere poenitentiam," "facere exomolngesim," which signify rarely or never of dew occasion penitential sets. not approach the ten, fifteen, or twenty yeara which were inflicted for graver offences after the 4 th century, is rendered probabl: from the absence of auy mention of long periods of exclusion in the writings of Tertulian, The same inference may be drawn frem the sllence of the Apostulcil Cunons. The: alfix no perioll whatever to their penaltics." The teaching of Montanus and his great convert, Tertullian, whe seceded from the church partly on account of her laxity, had the natural etfect of rendering the entholic discipline more severe. Still, in Africh under Cyprian, and in Rome under Cornelius, it does not ajpear that a sentence eften exceeded one or twe years. The demand of the lapsei to be admitted without penitence, and the curtailment or remission of the period of exclusion by a commendatory letter from a martyr, are clear indications that the sentences were not long. In one instance there are the materials for determining the actual length. In a syned held under Cyprian, in A.D. 251, after Ëaster certainly, and most probably in the summer, it was resolved among other matters that thuse of the lapsed who had even sacrificed should be admitted after a term of penance. Cyprian foreseeing signs of the renewal of persecution, directed through another synod on the Ides of May of the following year (Ep. lix. 12) that these lapsi should be at once re-admitted (Ep. lvii.). Their penitence therefore had not exceeded nine months. It is true that they were recenciled under circumstances of particular urgency; but one or two centuries later, an idelater would net have been admitted in less than several yeare, under any circumstances. In general it may be stated, that up to the time of Mentanus the duration of penitence was very short ; after Tertuilian it became longer; but frequently in urgent cases it was curtailed, both by councils and bishops, and in some instances remitted edtirely. The contrast between this leniency in the African and Roman churches and the crushing severity of the Spanish fathers at Elvira, about a generation later, ahews that the system of discipline was not yet organised on a uniform basis.
2. Rites and Usages.-Although in the earliest ages the term of penance was short, and part of it was frequently remitted, there was greater strictness than afterwards prevailed in granting it. No one was admitted who did not beg admission from the bishop, with all the outward signe of deep contrition. From the time of Novatus onwards admission was easier, for when penitence was known to involve long years of public humiliation, less scruple was shewn in opening its privileges to all who were content to submit to it. After the 4th century it came to be laid down that penitence was to be denied to none whe sought it. Innocent l. A.D. 402-417 (Ep. xxv. init. ; Labb. Conc. ii. 1288), declared that he held it to be an act of impiety to refuse imposition of hands; an opinion upheld by Celestine I. A.D. 422-432 (Ep. ii. ad Episc. Gall.

c. 2 ; Lahb. Conc. II, 1620). Similar resilntions were passed by oome of the Frankish conarili (Conc. Ande riv. A.d. 453, c. 12 ; Cunc. Einn. A.D. 517, c. 36). But in earlier times peritence was regarded more in the light of a privilege sid concession than of a right, and more cautiom was usen in granting the privilege, from thu' fact that It was alminintered once only; if the jeaitcat afterwards relapsed, there was no door by which he could return.

The earliest records exhibit the dellaquant outsite the dowr uf the church, cluthed in wack. eloth, anll with asher upon his head, sakung the worshijijers as they entered the church to im. plore God on his lechalt. anil make intercestion for him with the bishops and presbyters and tho whole congregntion. In the Apost. Const. ii. 18, airealy cited, it is directed that the otleader is to be kept outside the hurch, and detained there till he has given evidence ol genuine repentance. The length of the exclusion rested aibsulutely with the bishop. He too was the sole juige of the sincerity of the repentance. The leveality of the repentant man who was sceking the peace of the church was outside the door (Tert. de Pudrid, 3); there, in his remorse, he threw himself in the dust before the feet of the pricsts (Tert. d Poenit. c. 9), and before the brethren (i'il. c. I 0 ), with weeping and supplications for mercy. Hin self-abasement was a request to be admittel to the grace of penitence; it was the first act of tha repenting sinner, begging his repentance might be accepted. The behaviour which befits the repenang sinner is drawn out by Cyprisa, in language which there is no rcason to suppose is not to be accepted literally (de Laps. c. 2t): "Men must pray, and entreat with increasel continuance; pass the days in mourning, and the nights in vigils and weeping; emplay their whole time in tears and lamentations; lie stretched on the ground; prostrate themselve among ashes, sackcloth, and dust ; after Christ'1 raiment lost, wish for no garment beside; after the devil's feast, must voluntarily fast; give themselves to righteous works, whereby sing are cleansed ; apply thamselves to frequent almb. giving, whereby so. "s are freed from death." Compare Eusebius, II. E. v. 28. The neit atage was, that the bishop, satisfied of the man's repentance, and yielding to the intercessions aidressed to him, sent the deacon to bring him into the church (Apust. Const. ji., 16), and solemnly laid his nands upon his head, and admitted him to peniteace. Whether his public confecsion, which had necessarily been uttered during his abasement outsid, was repeated now, or at some later stage, or was apoken again and agnin at different atages, there is no evidence clearly to sher. [Exomologesis, p. 644.] What is certsin is that an open acknowledgment of guilt ww required at the beginning of penitence. The imposition of bands, as in contirmation and ordination, was invariably accompanied with prayers, the form of which no doubt ranied in different churches. One exsmple is given in Apost. Const. viii. 9, of what dste is uncertain; and such forms of prayer an found in all the penitential rituals of the 9th and following centuries. ## Ill. Tife Penitential Stationg,

Ater the close of thu ind century, discipline becaine more systematic and more rigid. Thy Nusatian controversies had had a twotold elfect on the Catholic system. On the one haul, peniteuce was very rarely denied to onn olfmenler; on the other, its duration was lagger, and its austerites shap per. expression of inward grief. There expression of inward grief. There was no fixed time for their coatinuance ; this was deterninined solely by the earnestness of the repentance, and solely by the earnestness of the repentance, and the discretion of the bishop. But now penitence became a penal sentence, which was to be worked out by certaia appointed stages-so many years to be passed in one stage uuder certain conditimn, so maxy mors in another with a relaxation of the conditions, the later stage not to he begun tations. The East was their birthplace. In the councils of Neecasarrea, A.D. 314, c. 3 , and Ancyra, A.D. 314, cc. 20, 21, 25, reference is made to the dppiapivoo pappol of penanice, procing that there were celtain stages which were so well mere so well known and well established in the church that it was not necessnry to define them. The enriest mention of them hy distinet

This canun is commonly regariled as of a somerhnt later date than the rest of the Ephatl, but it expresses the view of a period what was then believed to have been the course of disciplise in Gregory's age. The definition definition there given of the stations is this this: "Fletus est extra portam Oratorii, ubi Pectatorem stautem oportet fideles ingredientes the stations bore a prominent place; and their use seemens to be taken for grantel in the councila of the early part of the 4th century - Aucyra, Ladicea, Neocaemarea, Nieaea, They hal then become a recognised, and, so tospeak, a canomical branch of the penitentinl organization of the church. Their working will best be seen ly taking the penitent through the several stages. At the outset it is supposed that the delinujuent, exther by confession or noturiety, or after an examination, stands convicted of a grievous $\sin$; that he has male all noen neknowledgment of it, whether before the hishop or the preslytery, or the whole congregation [Fxомohands from that he has received imposition of hands from the bishop, and is then to undergo The strine through ench step of the series. begin at the tirst of the law sentenced him to begin at the tirst and lowest of these, but this relaxed. relaxed. Even when the system was in its greatest foree, that is to say, in the Eastorn church through the tith century, some counthenance was giren to this laxity ly the canons themselves. Thus the Cunu. This was the course enjoined by the Couacil of Ancyra, ce. 5, 7, 8, 16, 24. In Basil, however, a strict adherence to the four consecutive atations was decreed for all grent crimes. In the Canonical Epistle of Gregory of Nyssa, the station of "consistentia" does not occur. The penitent is allowed by him to pass from the station below to full cominunion. These variations are fouad duriag the full vigour of the system. When once it had been weakened, it must have been impossible to restore it, and to recall delinquents severity.

1. Tue Mourners, flentes, wooakia!outes.This was the first stage through which the peniteat was to pass. It is to be distinguished from the mourniag and weeping outside, to which reference has already been made in the discipline of the earlier centuries. The station of the mourners was the position of those whose penitence had alrealy begun. The mention of the name is rare among the early authorities; and it is not likely that the of the itself was frequently imposed. It was part of the scheme and framework of the system, held in reserve rather than commenly inflicted. (c. 11), whin made to it dirently in the last canon (c. 11), which is attributed to Gregory Thaumaturgus, and indirectly, in c. 8 of the same epintle, where certaln robbern are held to he undeserving even of hearimy; that is to any, they were not to be allowed loside the building. The only atation then remainling for them would be among the mourners. Basil introduces the station ly a similar paraphrase. "Jolygamists," he saya ( ( 80 ), "are not to be recelved for three yeara;" and a ahurt time afterwarda nentences wher culprite to bo ejected for threo years, and In each case adds, "the they are to be hurers for two, kneelers for three," &c. The terms "to be ejected," and "not to the received," signify some atage belew that of hearers, which can ouly le anneng the mourners. In many of his canons (ec. 22, 54, 57, 58, 59, 64, 60, 75), the atation is mentioned directly, and by name. But this is not the case in the Canonical Epistle of Gregory, of Nyasa. He remarka that there is a canon of that surt that habitual fornicatora are to be expelled for three years altogether from prayer, and alterwards be hearers for three yeass, &c. The lieing eapelled from prayer ls an indirect way of deseribing the lowest station.

Their l'osition.-lı the appointment of the ancient churches there was an open area or space set apart in front of the door. All who eatered the church necessarily came through this areal or ajproach. This was the place assigned to the mourners, and beyond it they were forbiden to pass. The removal of delinquento outside the very doers of the church was a practice as old as Tertullian, who atates (de Pudicit. c. 4) that for certain monstrous crimes the criminal was not allewed to evess the threshold of any part of the sacred building. At a later perliod Chrysestom warns (Hom, xvii. in Mutt.) some of his hearers, that if they continue contumacious they shall be prohibited from entering even the porch, as adulterers and murderers are prevented. Morinus is digposed to think that ejection from the building and exposure to the elements is the interpretation of the disputed c. 17 of Conc. Aucyr. which sentences those guilty of unatural crimes to pray els toùs xecpa§opivous, inter hycmantes.
ii. Duration and Slode of Penance.-The mourners being placed outside the very doors of the church, could take no part in what was going on inside. They were cut off from sll sacred rites whatever. They could hear neither the reading of the Scripture nor the preaching; still less could they join in the prayers or in the sacred mysteries. So far as public worship was concerned, they were to all intents and purposes aliens from the church. There remained to them only their personal devotions, and their hopes by earnestness of rejentance and amendment of life to obtain a mitigation of their sentence. Still there were certain duties attached, not exclusively to this station, but to a state of penance generally, and which would be more rigorously enforced in this station whenever it was occupied, by the performance of which the penitent was led to explect that he might make a favourable impression on the church from which be had been expelled. The foremost of these was an open and frequent acknowledgment of his guilt. And this self-abasement, as Ambrose points out (Poenit. ii. 10), was not inflicted merely for the humiliation of the oflender, but as proot and fruit of his contrition. If pardon, he says, has to be obtsined from one

For a fuller account of the penitential dress see beluw, under the aection hincters, p. 1593. It remains to point out the lougth of time fur which delin. quents were remitted to this lowest dip th of penitence. Busil, c. 56, assigns twenty ypars to a murderer, four of which are to be aineng the monrmers. For the same crime the cole of Oregory of Nyesa places the murderer for nine yenrs in the lowest sintion. For manslaughter, (Basil, ec. 58, 59), twe of the eleven years of oxclusion are to be among the mourriurs; fur adultery, four out of fitteen; for uncleanness, two out of seven. One canon (c. 73) sentencres an apestate to spend the remainder of his life a mourner.
 notices of this second station are scanty. There is no express mention of any rites or susteritics peculiar to it, nor of any ceremeny by which the penitent was premoted to it frem the atage helow. With many of the Latin Fathers-Tertullisn, Cyprian, Augustine-the "aulientes" were tha catechumens, and these writers do not use the term at all to express a penitential station. In fact, it is doubtful if the station itself ever ohtained a general use in the Western church. It was unknown in Africa; it is not mentioned by Ambrese as part of the Italian systen! ; it is altogether omitted in the Collectio Camon, of Martin of Braga, and therefore presumably was not in use in Spain. The only precise and direct reference to the hearct's among Latin writers is to be found in one of the letters of pope Felis III. A.D. 483-49: (Ep. vii. ad E'psc. l'niers. Labbe, Conc. iv. 1075), who decrues that these who subinitted to a second baptism sheuld undergo the same penalty which c. 11 of Cum.  but this could not always be enforced in prsetice. The object of this station was, that he should be a listener to the Scriptures snd the sermon. In some buillings he might be sble to hear while standing in the restibule; hat as s rule his place must have been assigned within the building at the lowest end of the church. Inside the church was the position as interpreted by the Greek canouists (Balsamon in e8s. 11, 12,

And so the pontifical letter of Folix III. (Ep. rii.), already citel, renders the iroxesobray of c. ii. Cunc. Nicaen. by "subjaceant juter poenitentes." It therefore uppears that, generally, when the word penitence was emplayed in the West during the period under review, it referred not to the four stations in unceession, but to this particular one of the hneders. In this station nlso was performed the exomologesis of the earlier fathers, and the "plens, legitima poenitentin" of Cyprian and the Conc. Eiber. In one of Basil's canons (c. 22) this station is called pre-eminently metd ${ }^{\text {poia }}$, Sozomen (II. E: vii. 16) gives a graphic necount of what he had himself, perhaps, witnessed it a Koman ehurch "In the Western church, nud especinlly in Rome, the place in which the penitents stand is visible to all; they take ap their position in it dis. tressed and sorrowful. When the liturgy is finished, as they may not share in the sacred mysteries, they throw themselves prostrate on the ground with cries and tenrs, when the bishop, in his compasson, coming to them, falls likewise by their side, raising his voice with theirs, till at length the whole congregntion is dissolved in tears. After this the bishop is the first to rise and to take them by the hanl, and when he has olfered the prayers suitable fur sinders perfurming penance, he dismisses them from the church." The same cercmony of assigning the penitents a apecial place, and uniting with them in prayer, and disunissing them with the catechumens, was in use in the Frankish church (Conc. Agath. c. 60 ; Conc. Epaon. c. 29).

iii. Dress.-The delinquent in this stage of penance was to be arrayed insackoloth. Whether und was required to wear this at all times while under sentence, or only during bis public prostration in the church, does not appesr. So Ambrose (ad Viry. laps. c. 8) exhibita a virgin who had fallen into sin, undergoing penance, clothed in sackeloth, and with ashes spriniled upon her head. And so Jeronie ( $E p .30$ ad Oceun.) deacribes the garb of Fabioli, while doing penance in the Lateran church in presence of the clergy and peeple of Rome, with a garnent of sackeloth, with her hair dishevelled, and her face and hands unwashed. So Gregory of Tours (Hist. viii. 20), depicts the penance of bishop Ursicinus. It wiss one of the decrees of the comecil of Agle (A.D. 506, c. 15), that an offender, from the beginning of his penanee, should wear "cilicium," as was the custom throughout the church; and that if he had neglected to change his dress, he should not be admitted among the penitents. The "sicut ubique constitutun est" of c. 15. Con'. Aygath. is illustrnted by Tertullian de Pulicit. c. 5 ; Cyprian de Laps. c. 19 ; Caesarius Arelht. Hom. i.; ${ }^{2}$ C Conc. Tulet. c. 12 , and by the subsequent directions of the rituals of the 8th and 9th centuries. The sordid garb of penance was to be worn as long as the exclusion continued (Pacian, Paraen, ad Poenit. c. 19). Another austerity, enjoinet by c. 15, Cone. Ayath. was cutting off the hair-a direction also found in 1 Conc. Barcinon, A.D. 540, c. 6 , and 3 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 584, c. 12. A man was to shave his hend; a woman to wear a veil. Thia veil was the general dress of a female penitent (Optatus ii. in fin.). Ambrose (Virg. laps. c. 8) had ordered his penitent virgin to cut of that hnir which before she had used as a blandishment. The shaving the head gave place, at a later date, to the opposite practice of neglecting t.ie hair and the bentd, and sulfiering it to grow long and heary, as a symbol of the weight of sin resting on the penitent's hend (1sidore $d e$ Eccles. (off; ii. 16).

iv. Penitentul Excrecises, -In addition to the public submission to the appointed course of discipline-the prostration in the church, the open coniession, the penitential dress, the rejection from the Eucharistic service-certnin special acts of self-mortification were required from the penitent. In the earlier ages, and when zeal was warmer, these acts of contrition were left to the conscience of the contrite sinner. All that was ahsolutely demanded of him by ecclesiastical usage wss obedience to the rites of the public censure. Still it was thought becoming, and a suituble token of sincerity, that the private life ahould be in accordnnce with the public profession. So Pacian (Param. ad Poenit. c. 19), apenks of it na a daily duty of a penitent to weep in sight of tho church, to mourn a lost life in sordil garb, to fast, to pray, to fall prostrate, to refuse luxury, to hold the poor man by the hand, to entreat the prayera of the widows, to fall dor a before the priests, to csany all rather than to perish. But, as will be seen when a later period is renched, these private acts of penance came mure and more to be added on to the public discipline, till, ultimately, they uerrped its place. A atill later stage will ahew these acts redeemable by money payments. The chief of these penitential exercises was fasting, borne sometimes as a self-imposed austerity, sometimes as an additional penalty inflic. $\mathbf{t i}$ by authority. At $n$ later dnte these special fastings were an invariable accompaniment of the censures of private penance. In the 4th and 5th centuries, if not invariable, they were always expected (Ambrose. ad lirg. Laps. © 3; de Poenit. ii. 10; Caesnr. Arelat. Hom. i.) Sozomen, continuing his account ( $1 / . E$. vii. 16) of the prac. tices of the Western church, stutes that, in addition to the public formalities, the pent tent voluntrrily exercised himself in fastings, and is nistionence from ment and from the bath, wr in other mortifications which had been conntanded him. These nusterities were usunlly sssigned, as Sozomen relates, hy the peniteutiary; thut as that ofice was altugether abullished in the time of Nectarius, the mure general practice in the church must hnve been that the bishhp, or priest, under whose ministrations the delinquept ordi: narily lived, allutted them. By the end of the 5th century, specinl penitential lastings wers the common practice (Felix 111. $E_{p}$, 7). Towatsthe middle of the following century, other restric tions were ndled. The tirst cumeil of Larcelens, A.D. 340 (ce. 6,7 ), not only orders penitents to pass their time in prayer and fasting, with a shaven hend and a religious dress, but also forbids them to be present at banquets or to take a part in public ailairs, but to lead a trugsl life in their own bomes. The length to which these deerivations and mncerntions were carried may be gnthered from what is told of a visit to the penitential cells of a monastery by John Climacus in the 6th century (npud Dovin. vi. 11). After relating the laborious pennoce of the prisoners, he adds, "What I saw and heard among them filled me with desparir, when 1 compare my easy ways with the rigour of those anints, and consider what the asirect of the place, and of their whole dwelling was, how dark, and foetid, and sortid, and squalid," "\&c. In addition to fastiug nnd abstinence frem the ordinary enjoyments and luxuries of life, thete were two other restrictions laid upnn penitects, one of which cut them off from marriage, or, if they were married, from conjugal interc urre; the other, from the profession of arms or any other secular calling. These two restrictions were curiously confined, both ns to the date and the part of the church in which they wre io force. In the first place, they are not met with in any of the authorities prior to the cenversion of the empire. Neither Tertullian, nor Cyprian, nor Pacinn, nor the councils of Elivira or Arte, make any reference to penitents being excluded from marringe or marriage-rights, or from besing arms, or carrying on business, or taking aay part in public nffaiis. So, with regard to the restrictions on public or professioual life. Chrise tians were und ubtedly prohibited from andertaking certain public oflices (Cono. Elter, c, j : 1 Cunc. Arelat. c. 7), not because they Write penitenta, Lut bechuse of the taint of ididatry attaching to the officea in question. What has been sidid with regard to the absence of thee restrictions in the West in the first three certuries, applies to the Eastern church albsolutely. Neither celibacy, nor retirement from zecular life, was ever imposed in coanexion with public penance in the East. Such prohibitlons were frequently laid upon the dergg, but upon the clergy nlone (Con. Apost. ce. 8il, 82 ; Conc. Chalced. c. 3). Conirg to the Western usage, the Latin fathers na doubt counsel seclusion and continence during the tima of penance (for example, Ambroue de Psenitent. ii. 10), but they do not maske them obligatory. The earliest decision on the suljeet is in a letter ( $1 \cdot \mathrm{p}$. i. 5) of pope Siriciu, La Conc. ii. 1017), which prohibits $\mu \mathrm{sr}$ ticipation in the elenents, although it sanctions comnunion in prayer, to those who, alter their penance, had returued to military life and contraeted a second marriage. There was slways a tendency in such restrictions to increase in severity. Accordingly, the 2 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 443 , c. 21 , casts out alfogether from the doors of the church s penitent who, during his penance or afterwards, entered upon marriage a second time. And 3 Conc. Aurelian. A.d. 538, c. 25 , prrhibits a penitent from resuming arms or secular pursuits ufider penalty of being denied communion to the hour of death. Still severer is a decree of 2 Cunc. Burcinon. A.D. 599 , c. 4 , which places marringe during penance on the anme footing as the roarriage of a nun, and orders both to be utterly expelled from the church. Some of the Frankish councils (2 Conc. Arelat. c. 22; 3 Cunc. Aurelian. c. 24) forbade married people even to be received as penitents. the one of Barcelons just quoted. These special penalties may therefore be said to have been in use through the 5th and 6th eenturies, and only in the Western church. They will reappear no longer, however, as an ordins discipline; public penance, but an ordinsry part of ments for specinl great crimes. it is manifest that this discipline strictly enforced would not only lay a heavy burden on those who submitted to it, but would also lead to great practical inconvenience. The number of penitents at this time was rery large, and if they were to be excladed, not only during their pensnce, but for the remsinder of their lives, both from carrying of livelihood sould becular pursutits, their means of the case led would be cut ofl: The necessities of the case led to a system of diapensation, upon wistles of pope leo is thrown in one of the Labb. In reply to the next question, with regard to trade and business, he decrees that although all matters of buying and selling are Jikely to stain the soul, still that there are some trades which are honourable, and he gives no decision in the matter. In practice this distinction appears to have held good, that a respectable trade or profoscion was open to a penitent; but that if he resumed any questionable, still more any discreditnble business, he again expused himself to ecclesiastical censure. And this is in sccordance With the langunge of Gregory (IIom. 24 in Evangel.), that there sre certain trades which can scarcely be csrried on without contamination with $\sin$, snd it is obligntory on a repentant sinner not to adopt one of them. laid also upon these, although it is most probable they were spsred the humiliation of a penitentisl dress, and of public imposition of hands.

i. Their position.-The position of the consistentes was above the ambo with the rest of the congregation. This may be taken as a matter of course. It is nowhere expressly so stated, but as all those below the ambo, catechumens, penitents, energumens, were dismissed before the beginning of the enchsristic service, and the comsistent.'s were permitted to remain, it is natural to conclude that their position in chnreh would be above those who were dismissed. But whether they mixed indiscriminately with the fuithful, or were cet apart by themselves, is not so clear. Basi! uecrees (c. 4) with regard to aome who had contracted a third marriage, that after so many years among the IIourers and Co-standers, they were to be restored to the plicc of communion ( $\tau \hat{\psi}$ $\tau \delta \pi \varphi \tau \hat{\eta} s$ коขwrias), which wuld seem to imply that the actual communicant occupied a distinct place in the church; and bearing in mind the orderly arrangement of an ancient Christian congregation, the men on one side, and the women on the other, the monks, the virgins, and the sscred widows, in the front, it seems more likely that the penitcuts, even when they had reached the highest station, had a aeparate locality in the church.

IV. From the seventh Century to the ninth.

1. In the East. With the beginning of the 5th century, the Eastern ayatem entered ufon a new stage. The abrogation of the office of the Pevitentiary priest, which took place some time during the episcopacy of Nectarius at Constantinople, A.D. 381-397, may be taken as the point of departure from the earlier practice. The reason and the circumstances of the removal of this church oflicer are given in Sozomen, II. E. vii. 16; Socrntes, II. E. v. 19. The changes which may be traced to this act of Nectarius are-1. The removal of the presbyter whose office it was to superintend confession and penance. 2. The decline of the custom, which dated from the earlicst ages, of acknowledgiag certain crimes openly before the congregation, the supervision of which had been one of the duties of the fienitentiary. 3. The selection by the penitent of his acts of penance, instead of their assignment by the penitentiary. 4. The gradnal cessntion of public penance for secret crimes. 5. The ceasation of the public rites of daily imposition of hands and prayers for the penitents, which were the chiff ceremonics in the ritual of the station of the ímorimtoves. Of these changea, the first four followed as a matter of course from the abolition of the penitentiary'a office. The public imposition and prayer did not long survive ; they may be said to have ceased with the termination of the observance of the stations, and they formed no part of the Eastern discipline at the close of the 5th century. The aolemnities observel toward the kneelcrs, who comprised the great body of those who were undergoing public penance, consisted of two parts; the firat, the laying on of hands and the prayers; the second, the formal dismissal from the church. The latter of these continued in force after the former had fallen into disuse. Morinus ('oenitent. vi. 22) discovera a mention of this solemn dismisaal in the Ecel. Mystayoy., c. 14, of St. Maximus, who wrote in the 7th century. The diaappearance of all the aolemnities peculiar to the stations is coincident with the omission of any mention of the stations from the canons of councils. The one exception to this statement is Conc. in Trull. c. 87, which sentenced am adulterer to he a Mutumer one year, a Ifearer two, Sc., &c. Martene (de Rit. Antip, i. 6) suggests that this canon points to the existence of the stations in the 7 th century. Morinns, with more resson, regards it rather in the light of no historical reference by the fathers in Truilo, than of a canon on exiating discipline. The sbsence of any reference to the rites and solemnities of penitents is equally marked in the Greck liturgies, as in the canons slready cited. Those of hasil and Chrysostom are altogether silent with regard to them. So are the liturgical writings of Germanus, patrinrch of Constantinople, about A.D. 720. The Syriac liturgies of Antioch and the Nestorisns, in common with all the oriental liturgies, mention the ritual of the catechumens, but not that of the penitents. Equally silent is thst of St. Mark, which is said to have been used by the churches of Jerusalem and Alexandria. The liturgy of St. James has one direction which may refer to the dismissal of penitents. After the reading of the Gospel, the deacon is to say, Let none of the catechumens, none who are yet uninitiated, none who are unsble to pray with us, be present at the mysteries. It is not inuprobable that the expression "those who sre not able to pray with us," may refer to delinquents undergoing penance, but they are not mentioned by name. The same direction occurs in the Abyssinian liturgy (Morinus, Poenitent, vi. 22). In the age of the compilation of these liturgies, the old pentential rites of public prayer and imposition of hands, and to a great extent of solemn dismisssl, had apparently vanished. In the time of the Greek canonist Balssmon, the 12th century, every vestige of them bad completely deprarted, and they are spoken of in c. 19, Courc. Laodic, as customs of the early ages. It is difficult to determine with any fulness the penitential rites which took their place. The chief source of information is the Penitential book which bears the name of Joho the Faster, who succeeded to the patriarchate of Constantinople, A.D. 585. The Penitential is published in the Appendix (pp. 615-644) of the great work of Morinus, together with the Canonarizm of John the Monk, who in the title is called adsciple of Bssil, which can menn no more than that the treatise contains some of the traditionary tpaching of Basil, or carries on his systens. If the date conimonly assigned to these books conld be depended upon, there would be no difficulty in aketching the outline of the penitential system in the East, in the 6th and following centuries, But the booke manifestly contain much lster additions, and modern eriticism has not yet determined how much is genuine, and how much spurious (Wasserachleben, Die Dusvordnuygen der ubendllandischen Kï'che, p. 4, note). There is little doubt that John left behind him a collection of penitentisl canons, which for some ages bad wide authority in the Eastern church. Nicephorus Chartophylax (Ep. ad Theod. Mon ch.) writing about the year 800 , testifies to the general reception of the canons. A council of Constantinople, beld under Alexius Commenns about A.D. 1085, replying to certain questions of some monks, condemns (quest. 11), the canonich.

The book apprars to have passed through the same history as some of the more familiar Penitentials of the West. la its present form it probably contains most of the original instructions of John, but with so much of accretion that it is unsatet to rely upon it in manters of detail. The use and enceurngemeat of minute secret confession are unquestionable, if tbe Penitential is to bo accepted as authentic in any shape. To atimulate conterssion, the priest was instructed to examine the delinquent in the utmost detnil. Then there followed the delivery of the sentence, eonsisting mainly of fatings, and coutinuing sometimes for a number of fenrs. Lastly, there came the singular pranctice, which may be dated from this age, and which contivued peenlinr to the Eastern diseipline, of granting a preliminary absolution immedintely atter the confession, and after the imposition of penance, but deferring full restoration to conmunion till the completion of the penance, however long or short it might be. The only restige of the public penitence remaining was the retirement of the penitont (and $\tau 0 \hat{\nu} \nu a 0 \hat{u}$ ) from the choir of the church into the narthex while the Mass was being colebrated. He was under instructions to retire at the same time with the catechumens, but he was not, like them, solennuly dismissed, although his retirement was doubtleas $a$ remnant of the old rite of formal disinissal. Reference to this practice of the penitent retiring is made in a MS. of Simeou of Thessalonica, In Sacr. Litury, about A.D. 1600, published by Mlorinus, Appendix, p. 470. The order of conducting the confession in the Greek Penitential was thiss first, the conf fession, accompanied by a cei cann ritusl of posture and prayer, then a minute interrogation of the delinquent, theu a short precatory sboolution, and afterwards the assignm?nt of a penance to be performed without any public ceremoxill. [See ExomoLogesis, Vol. I. P. 650.$]$ The sentence sometimes extended to ten or fifteen yesrs; the eintiflaca (or penitential exercises) were chieffy confined to restrictions on matters of food and drink. [See Fasting, Vol. I. p. 663.] Aa, however, the eiritica wera precise and elaborate and rals, night le omitted entirely, it was euatomary to assign them in writing. Slaves and servants of all classes were to receive only half the penance imposed apon their masters. The ritual described ia the Penitentials was the model for the practice of penitence in the East throughout tha middle ages (Leo Allatius Consen. Eccl. Orien. cum Occident. iii. 9). dent. iii. 9).

the Gregrian or Gelasian sacramentaries, the Ondo Rouranus, the Ambrosian liturgy, or of of say reference to one in the early liturgical com-

Annther change, datiay from nbrut that period, and eoincident with the introdnction of the Penitentials, was the detinition of the listinction between public and private pranace. ages atter, which was unknown in the early agus, now almost entirely usurped the place ci the former; and it grew to be nceepted as a custom of the chureh that public penaivee should be reserved for notorious offenders, but that for secret sins private penance sutliced. No ezact date caul be fixed as date can be fixed as to the time in which pablic
penitan penitence fell into abegance. It deelined with the gralual decline of primitive church order. In the English church it had disappenred altogether before the close of the 7 th century. There is a decree in the penitential of Theodora (A.D. 669-690, I. xjii. 4), which states thut reronciliation was not to be publicly granted in his province, becnuse public penaice was wot in existence. Even as carly as the 6th ceatury private penitence had made an inroad on the public diseipline; there is a canon of 1 Conc. Mastiscon. A.D. 581 , c. 18 , which deprives certan delinquents of communion till they had made antisfaction by public penance. In the stricter system of former centuries, the deprivation itself itself would have been a pulbic penance. Morinus (vii. 1) $\mathrm{q}^{\text {ntes }}$ a decree from Conc. Leptin. A.D. 743, which he states to have been contirmed by pope Zacharias, that an oflender who privately and apontaneously contiessed ahould be dealt with privately; if he was openly convieted, or made a public confession, then he was to pass through penance pudicicly, canons presence of the church, according to the canons. This decree, which does not nppenr inserted in cur extant canous of l.estines, was inserted in the later collections of the Capitularies, v .52 ; and taken with other indirect indications of the decny of public discipline, it may he regarded as representing the general practice of the Weat at the closa of the 8th century. Thus the 2 Conc. Remens. A.D. 813, c. 31, called attention to the distinction which ought to be observed between those doing public and private penance: a distinction also made by 6 Cono. Arelat. c. 26 in the same year, and repeated in the Capitulary issued by Conc. Tiein. A.D. 855, (Laabb. Conc. viii. 149), and in Cone. Moyunt. A.D. 847, c. 31, under Raban. Maur. When once the custom became general that some might be exempt from public penitence, there naturally arose a difficulty in enforcing it in cases which had no cleim to exemption. In different provincea, unpealous and energetic bishops insisted upon tha observance of the canone. Thus among the Capitula issued by Hincmar, A.D. 852 (Labb. Conc. viii. 585), to the clergy of the diocese of Rheims, was one to the effect that if, in defiance of elerical admontion, a notorious criminal refused to submit to public penance, resort was to be had to the extrema cenaure of excommunication. Hincmar allows a criminal fifteen days' grace, after which, if he still refusea aubinission, he is to bs excommunicated. 1. England (Theod. Penitent. 1. xiii. 4) public penizence was in abeyence as early as the cluse of the 7th century. In France, Jonas, hishop of Orleans (de Instit. Laic. 1. 10), writing at the beginning of the 9th century, atatea that a public penitent was scarcely ever seen in the churchea, and that the vigour of the ancient

The 9 th century witnessel some revival of the old discipline. The rganisation of the statioas became ragan, in a moditied form, the rule of the church (see Mlartene, de Kit. I. vi. art. 4). The Cone: Iormut., A.s. 868, с. 30, appointerl a penitent to pray for a certain time outside the church doois; at the end of that period he was to be solemnly introluced, but still separated from the faithful, and be placed in $\Omega$ conspicuous corner of the church, and there to atand, unless he hal special permisision to nit (Conc. Mogunt. A.b. 888 , c. 16); nfterwhrls he was , armitted te mix with the congregation, but reception of the elements came linter (Capitular. v. 136). If the third stage of non-participation was prolonged, communion was errated on Christmas Day and Easter. Detail :d directions for dealing with particular delinquents will be found in the pastoral letters of pope Nicholas I. A.D. 858-867; Ep. xvii. ad lívol. E'piso.; Labb. Conc. viii. 003 ; Ep. xxiv. at IFinemurr.; ibid. p. 513; Conc. Nannetens. A.D. 895 , c. 17 . In the matter of dress it doea not appear that any change was made from the penitential garb in use in the earlier centuries. In some provinces it was the custum for the hair and beard to be ahaven, in others to be neglected and suffered to grow long. All the penitentials and rituals to which an "ordo" is attached, speak of hair-eloth and ashes as appropriate to the time of penance. A penitent was also to go barfoot, as nppears from the $E p$. I vii. ad liteol. \%isc of Nicolas I. just cited, which makes an exceptional concession in favour of an individurl offender to wear boots or saodals. Cono. Irilur. c. 55, forbad alse the use of linen. In addition to theae ansterities, a rigid and long-continuedsystem of fasting was imposed. Gregory 111. (4.I, 731-741, EPp. i. 7; Labb. Ct.nc. vi. 1469) decide , in reply to a question of Boniface, that a parrichle shonld be denied communion till death, shenld fast the aecond, fourth, and sixth days of each week, and abstain from flesh and wine as long as he lived. A man who murdered his own aon was enjoined by Nicolas I. (Ep, xyli. ad. Rivol. Eipisc.) to abstain from flesh all the days of his life, for seven years to drink wine only on Sundays and festivals, and the remaining five years of his penance four days a weak. He was sllowed Intercourse with his wife, but forbididen to bear arms except against the pagans, and if he had occasion to travel he must go on foot. Another criminal was ordered by the saine pontiff (Ep. ad Hinomar.) to fast till evening all the years of his nenanes, except at Easter and on the festivals; an exemption estended in another case to the fifty days from Easter till Pentecoat. These disabilitles and austerities are onforced with some vorjety in the councila of that period (Conc. Iormat. cc. 21, 30, 36; Conc. Tribur. 00. 56, 58). Morinus sume up the penalties inflicted after the heginning of the 7 th century, as distinguished from those of an earlier date, under four headings. 1. These which concesa dress and habi' including the obligation to go with bare feel, and to wear no linen and to travel on foot. 2. The observance of speceified days and medes of fasting 3. Corporal punishment. 4. Exile. [See Corieral Punisimacit, Exile, Fasting, Flageliation.] To this may be added a fitth of incarceration, or sectersion in a monastery, invelving, of comse, an abat. donment of secular life. An ancient MS. from Beauvais (Martene de Rit. i. 6) gives an account of rites of public pennce, which can harally be later than the 9 th century. It is intercsting to note in it the restiges of the old ritual, the detention without the door, the imposition of hands, and the solemn dismistal. "At the beginning of Lent, all delinquents uodergoing, or about to underge, public pelaance, should present themselves to the bishop betore the door of the church, clothed in sackeluth, with bare feet and dowrenst looks. There the penitentiary priest should be present to exmume their casea, and impese penance accorting to the appeinted grades. The bis'on hr itha bring them into the church, ". plostrating himself on the ground, together with all the clergy, shoulit sing the seven penitential Psalms; afterwards rusing from prayer, he sheuld lay his hands upon them in accordance with the canons, and sprinkle them with holy water and place ashes upon them, and cover thuir heads with aackcloth, and with groans and sighs announce to them that as Adam was cast out from Paradise, so must they be cast out from the church. He was then to order the deacon to conduct them outside the deer, the elergy following them, and saying the sentence, 'In the sweat of thy face,' \&c., and the bishop shall close the door upen them; and so they remain outside till t' Coena Demini." A Noyon MS. of the 9th c it $\because y$ gives a short "ordo" for public peannce, whir is repeated by the l'seudo-Alcuin, and many istunls of a later date. "Take the penitent on the fourth day in the morning in Capite Quadragesimae, and cover him with sackcloth, and shut him up till Cuens Domini." The same codex coetains a form for the beneliction of ashes, with the direction that when the ashes are laid on the head of the penitent, the priest is to say, "In the name of the Father, Son, and IIoly Ghost, remember that thou art dust, and that to duat thou shait retura."
ii. Private Penitence.-The whole system disclosed by the penitentials points to the prevaleace of private penance. In the Greek penitentials the delinquent makes a private nekuow. ledgment of his sins to the priest, he is questioned in private, and the various rites snd ceremonies which precede final recenciliatioa are also private. The Latin, no less than the Greek, penitentials are entirely silent on the essential elements of public discipline. Their contents bear out the statement of Theode(Penitent. 1. xiii. 4) that public peoance cid nuw exist in the province for the discipline of which he publisherl his book. The clergy had sutticient hold upon the coneciences of their Hock to compel them to subnit to many severe acts of self-abasement and self-deniai for their mas. But the converts of the independent northern races shrunk from the opeu humilintion of appearing before the congregation with a shaven head, and with the arms and the attire and the characteristic ornmments of a frce man lnid aside. The whole transaction, the imposition of the pensance on the one side, and its performance on the other, was, as it were, a secret one between the delinquent and his priest or bishop. The church, as such, took no part in the matter. The nature of the sins censured varied from some trivial carelessness up to horrible and unnatural crimes. But esch offender was alike subjected to perance whether his offence was labouring on the Lord's Day (Theod. Penitent. I. xi. 1) or marler (ibid. 1. iv. 2) or heresy (ibid. 1. v. 9). For the first of these offences the censure was But in either case the delinquent becsencs. But in either case the delinquent became a penitent. The sentence was passed by the bishop or the priest, or even by a deacon, but there was no open or public rite connected with it. Fisting and abstinence were the usual pennities, and these were generally expressed in the disciplinary canons of all the penitentials, rish, Anglo-Ssxon, or Frankish. To these the lrish books especially added Exile: from the native lnad for a fixed period, alma to the poor, and the emancipation of a certsin number of aervi or ancillne, and in the case of hodily injuries satisfaction to the parents or friends (Poenitent. Vinniae, Wasserschleben, pp. 108.224). As diseipline decayed, the notion of Redempitions began to be accepted, and other add easier pennlties were introduced, such as the singing of so many psalms, the payment of so many solidi to the poor, so many strokes of a rod, or genuflexions (Beda Poenitent. xi. x. Cummean, Pocnitunt. "de divite vel potente quomodo se redimit pro criminalibus culpis," Wasscrschleben, p. 464). Both Beda and Cummean give their sanction to the employment of a substitute by any one who was unable to say his psalms, an evasion which sounds perhaps the lowest depths to which the rigour of the primitive system had aunk. In most of the penitentisl books the quadragesimal season of the yesr and the legitimae feriae of the week were periods when more sevcre abstinence was inaposed. See below, Scason of Penitence. On inposed. See below, Season of Penitence. On certais days the penitent was free from hls punishment; these are stated by Cummean at days, Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, Pentecost, St. John Baptist, St. Mary Ever-virgin, the twelre Apostles, and St. Martin, becanse his body wss reposing in that province. Several of the Fraukish penitentinls have attached to them ${ }^{8}$ "ratio" or "ordo ad dandam poenitentiam." These are doubtless of a later age than the body of the canonas to which they are appended. They are apparently of a anfficiently carly date to throw some light on the system of private penance in the 8 th century. The Penitential the 8th century. The Penitential. PsetuloHoman., the text of which belongs to the 7th ceatury, has a long prologue, "Quomodo peniteates sunt suscipiendl sive reconciliand)" (Wasserschleben, p. 360). In it the priest is exharte, to fast one or two weeks with the penitent, and even with cries and tears to join in suppliention with him. In this latter direction there is a trace of the contom of the earliest ages (Soz. H. E. vii. 16). When the penitent comes to confess his sins the priest is to bill him wait a little till he has entered into his'enmimer for prayer, and if he has no chamber, the priest should say the prayer that followed in his henrt. After the prayers, are given further

In prolonged penitence Theodore permits communion "pro inisericordia" sfter six months or a year. A NS. from the church of St. Gatianus of Tonrs, attricentel by Martene (de Rit. i. 6) to the 9th centary, contains an "ordo privatae ceu annuof ritual poenitentiae," which discloses some variety of ritual. It directs all pricsts to exhort their Lent, and if from to confession the first dny of bent, and if from being on a journey or from being engaged in any business, they are nuable to come for reconciliation on Coens Domini, the priest may reconcile them at once. When each one comes to confess, if a layman, he is to lay aside his staff, and, whether a clergyman or a nionk, he is to bow himself to the priest, who will then oraer him to sit before him. Then follow tne profession of filith and confession of sin, after which the penitent is to prostrate himself on the ground with groans nnd tears (pront Dens dederit). The priest is to suffer him to lie there for a time, and then raise him and nssign him and then supplication com a second prostration, sion.

V. Sins and Penalties,

1. Sins subjectino to Penance.

 i. Open Sins.-Only mortnlin delicta exposedthe delinquent to penitence in the early age Lesser aquent to penitence in the early ages. Lesser offences were pnnished by the rejection of commanion. The faults and defects of in holy were considered the faults and defects of daily lifo prayer. Penitence, strictly so-called, which daily volved an open acknowledgment of $\sin$ and a performance of certain acts of ansterity and a special dress and a separation from the faithful in chnrch, was restricted to certain grievons sins as defined by the canons. The model on which the penitential code was founded was the decision of the apostles with regard to the newly-converted Gentiles (Acts xv. 28, 29). For the first 400 years the three grent sins of idolatry, murder, and adultery, or snch as wera closely nllied to them, and clearly fell under tha aame category, were in general the only crimes punished by public penance. The slight or apparent exceptions to this statement will be investigated presently. In the moral and period, the classiticetion the fithers of that period, the classiticetion of sins and the expiated by penance are which coald only be than in the cance are made with more fulness Tertullian in his tract De Pudicit. c, 19, which represents the most rigid notlons of rat age, yet admits that some ains were maiters of daily cecurrence to which all were suliject, and which consequently needed no penance. Among such he reckons anger and quarrelling, and a rash onth and a failure to keep an engngement, and an untruth told from modesty or necessity. But the three capital crimes he arranges on a level above all others (ibid. c. 12), and ensleavours to prove, in accordance with the tenets of Montanism, that the church had no power to nbsolve them, as, he infers, she claimed to do through penance. Nearly all the references to penitence in Cyprian are in connexion with the lapsel, that is to say, idolatry. Although there are two passages which intimate that pename was allotted in the African church to less beinous sins. In Ep. xvi. 2 he condemus the laxity with which the eucharist was granted to the lapsed, whereas in lesser sins (minoribns peccatis), sinvers do penance for an appointed time, and, according to the rules of discipline, come to confession, \&:c. In the following, Ep. xvii., he speaks again of "hathe being done fur an appointed time for lesseer offences which are not committed agains, :'0?, contrasting, that is, such otfences with idolatrer, which is directly against the majesty of Ciod. But the general rule of the church was that public penance was restricted to mortal gins. So it is stated by Pacian in his treatise or: penance, which manifestly reflects the teaching of Cyprian. Other sins he considers (Parom. ad Powit. c. 9) may be cured by the compensation of good works, but idolatry, murder, adultery are cespital crimes. Augustine clearly laya down that ouly the gravest sias were visited ty pablic penauce. There are some sins, he says (de Fid. ct op. c. 26), so greet as to deserve to be punished by excommunication; others which need not the infliction of that humiliation of penaace which is imposed upen those who are properly called penitents in the church; a third class, again, from which none css escape, for which our Lord has left us a remedy in the daily prayer, "forgive us our trespasses." This distinction of light ains, for the cure of which daily prayer is sulficient, occurs again and again in his writings (Enciridion, c. 71; Hom. xxvii. t. 10, p. 177; Hom, exix. de Temp. c. 8; Ep. Ixxxix. ad Hihor. quaest. 1; Ep. cviii. ad Selu F ian., cited by Bingham). He tells the catechumens (de Symbol. al ('atechumen. i. 7) that those who are seen doing penance have been guilty of adultery or some such grievous act. He distinguishes be.tween peccatum and crimen, the former, sinfulness from which none is free, the latter, an act of grievous $\sin$ (Tract. Ixi. in Joan. t. 9, p. 126 ; De Civ. Di, xxi. 27 ; de Symbol. i. 7). Ambrose (de Poenit. ii. 10) confines penance to graviora delicta. The canonical epistle of Gregory of Nyssa ia an elaborate treatise on the nature of crime and of the ecclesiastical diacipline suitable to it. Like the Latin fathers, he atarts with murder, idolatry, and uncleanness as the three mortal sins, but he basca his classification, not on the decision of the apostolic council (Acts $x v .28$, 29), but on the thrcefold division of the faculties of the soul, the rational, the irascible, and the concupiscible; and all sins punishable by penance he ranks under one of these three headings. Under the first are reckoned idolatry and apo-atnsy, elther of which, if committet wilfully and throagh instability of fuith, most be expiated by a life-long exclusion; if ubder fear or compal. sion, then a nine jears' penance is suducient. Under the second healing he indules adutery, which involves the disgrace or injury of another, and simple cucleanness, the former erime requiring double the penalty of the latter. To the irascible faculty he assigns murder, with the dissinction of voluntary and involuntary homicide. He then discusses covetonsurss, which, it the language of St. l'aul, he calls a wrecies of idolatry, and which he says springs trom a con. bination of all these facnlties, but the censure of which, he adds, has been overlnokel by the fathers before him. Of the branchen at covitousness he considers robbury with violenver and the spoiling of graves for the sake of the clothes and ormmments coatained in them, to be the oni? offences requiring public penance. S'mple the to and the robbery of tonibstones were matked $\mathrm{log}^{\circ}$ no ecclesiastical censure. He declines to attarb a penalty to usury and extortion, on the grouad that the ancient canons have not done so. By ugary, however, he must have meant usury by a In man; in the olse of a clergyman it had been distinctly condemaned by Conc. Niaten. c. 17. The three capitalia delicta are the princips! U ients of Hasil'a canons. He has, in addition, soe on perjury (c. 64), another on robbery (c. 61), and another on rape (c. 30) ; each of which might, without any violence, be hrought under the heading of one of the three flanda* mental sins. The councils of Elviro, Ancyra, Neocaesarea impose penance on these three mortal sins only. In Cunc. Eliber. cc. 73, 75, the crime of an informer was held to involve murder, and was punished accordingly. And in the same light, to judge from the extreme penalty attached to it, it was regerded by 1 Cinc. Arelat. c. 14, In course of time, and apparently ton $3^{\circ}$ the close of the 4 th century, the number of sus for which public penance was exacted began to be enlarged. As in the case of covetousuess, in the passage just quoted, Gregory of Nyssa states that it hal been overlooked by the ancient fathers, and that therefore he adds it to the list of delicta. Basil (c.30) says the aame of rape, and of polygnmy (c. 80), that he had no ancient canons to guide him, and that he male them penal by his own judgment. Still these and aimilar additions did not materislly alter the definition of ecclesiastical crimes, and as long as public penance was in force, the description of 1 Conc. Tolet. A.D, 398, c. 2, held good: "that a penitent was one whe either on account of murder or various crimes and most hemous sins was doing public penance." Excommunication for amall fanlts was strictly forbidden by Conc. Alyuth. A.D. 506, c. 3. The 5. Conc. Aurelian. A.D. 549, c. 2, and a Cunc. Arvern. A.D. 549, c. 2, laid a like prohibition on suspension from communion for light causes; an offender was to be suspended only on those grounds which the ancient fathers had decreed. As the boundaries of the church were enlarged and in relations with the state became chnar. the ewisgiastical was framed more in accorid. witls ing civil law. Thus the 2 Conc. Tur A.L. 50 , c. 20 , inticted long peuance on abduction of a sacred virgin, on the ground thin the Roman law had made it a capital crime

The following enumeration is given in the archbishop's Penitentinl, c. 1, "de enjitnlia crimina." "Nune igitur enjitalia crimina secundum canones explicabo. Prima superbia, invidia, fornicatio, innais ghria, ira longo tempose, tristitia seco:; aviotitia, ventris ingluvies, sacrileginna, iv est sacrarum rerum furtum, et hoe masimuns pt furtum, vel idolaticis ietviensera, id est auspiciis et reliqua, adultosilm, fal ur Cestimontam, furtum, rapinnm, cinctas adsidua, idvolintria, molles, sodomita, maidici, perjuri." His second chapter treats "de minoribus peccatis," but the distinetion between minora and capitalia in his list is altogether arbitrary and unmeaning. The complete necount of the sins which reguired formal penitence must be rought in the penitential books themselves.
ii. Sceret Sins, - No diatinctien was made $s o$ long as public penitence was in force between secret and notorious crimea. The same jenalty was required for ench. In the earlier sgea, when public confession was practised, it followed as a matter of ceurse that the ensuing penance should be public too. There is nothing to shew in the first four centuries that secret sina, after once they had beceme known to the church, were treated in any other way than sins which were detected. The only distinction was that, If the offence was spontaneously confessed, the penance was lighter (see below Pranalities, iv. Allevation of ), but it was none the less open canons ceuld only of the offences censured by the of them; fer instance, Conc. Neocaesar. c. 9 ; Canc. Eliber, c. 76 ; Basil, LPp. ec. $69-71$. The very exception which Basil (c. 34) states was allowed in the case of a married woman, implies that open penance was the rule. Her sin, if it was unknown to her husband, must have been expressly a secret one. She was spared open disclosure, not because of its secrecy, but te Epistle of Leo her husband's vengennce. The lixx. ; Labbe to the bishops of Cnmpania (Ep. regarded as marking a din3), which is generally practice of open cenfession, is from the early out on the supposition that written throughwas open er secret, the penance was the same. Morinus gires seme censpicuous instances of the admission of secret sins being followed by cere sentences. ## PENITENCE

2. Penalties.

1. Whether exclusitely spiritual.-The different persalties inflicted by ecclesinsticnl discipline firy be divided into three degrees: i. excision from the church; li. penance; iii. exclusion fll the cemmunion. The second of these includes all the austerities and disabilities imposed by tion of them systern. The extent nud durnthe body of have been sutlicintly discussed in sion of the empire the church hal the converinterfere with the civil pight hnl no power to and her censures muil rights of her menbers, spiritual. "The weap have been exclusively and contumacious anon by wheh the proud (Ep, iv. 4), "is n spiritual sword", cyas Cyprian Law.] Yet sometimes the rulers of [Compre church did not hesitate to rulers of the heathen emperers to uphe to sply to the In answer to such anheld their discipline. commanded the judgment application, Aurelian of Samosata to be enfont which deposed Paul (Euseb. $H$, be enforced by the civil power being confine vil. 30), the emperors authority the house and churehpuling Paul to give up date the bishops still more readily At a later the nower of the more readily called in censures failed to magistrate, when spiritual (Conc. Antioch. 5aintain ecclesiastical order Codex African. ce. 63, 3 Conc. Carthuy. c. 38 ; able part of the 68,93 ); and no inconsider bodied in the Thecclesiasticnl legialntion emperiod in the coodosian Code, and at a lnter kings, had for capitularies of the Carolinginn discipline of the object the minintenance of the the natural rights of. What may be termed by apiritual censures. A parent wnder touched did not lose his aure. A parent under pennace nor were subjects sbsolved frem their alleginnce to a prince, whe was censured alleof the Christian emperora was a penitent, others heretica, and another an apostate, but, this did not loosen the submission of the chureh to their imperinl authority. With respect to other disabilities nffecting penitents, there is no mention of any direct refusnl of tuneral rites. The 1 Conc. Iasen. d.D. 442 , c. 2 , decrees that penitents dying suddenly in the field or on a jeurney before the priest could be brought to them might'he buried with a sacred service if they were leading sntisfnctory lives; by implicacion denying Christion burial to the contumacious and impenitent. The nbsence of any commemorntion after death would follow from the refusal of the rites of burinl.
ii. Persons on whom inflicted.-All baptized church. Overe subject to the censure of the church, Over Jews or heathen outaide her chumung of course did net extend. Catenever never becnme penitents. If they were guilty of an eccleaiastical crime they were degraded to a lower class of their own order. The clergy were dealt with on a different footing to the rest of the community (aee below, Ponitence of Clerigy). Penance was improsed equally upon women as upon men. Binghom quotes Valesius in Socrat. H. E. v. 19 ; Bona, lier. liturg. I. wrii. 5, In favenr of the opinion that although women fasted and mourned in private, they were not exposed to upen penance for the first thres centuries, But no such exemption appeara in Tertullian or Cy'prian ; and in the Spanish chureh at any rate, women were sentenced to penance. Conc. Eliber. c. 5 decrees that a mistress beating her slave to death shall be restored at the end of five years "acta legitima poenltentia; " and e. 14, in the case of a fallen virgin, makes a broud distinetion between her exclusion with or without pienance (compare Ibid. co, 8 , 10, 12, 13, 63, 655 ; Con: Ancilr. c. 21). The statement of Basil (e. 34) that the fathers hai decreed that an alulteresa should not be compelled to putlish her crime, conld hardly have been inserted if problic penitence of women had not been the rule-as in the 4th century there can be little doubt it was the rule. The penitential exercises of Faibiola were commended by Jerome (Ep. 30, Epitıph. Fabiol.) not becanse she was a woman, but because they were undertaken spontancously. A woman aubmitting to penance was no special object of commendation. (Siee the instructions given by Ambrose ad lirg. lops.) The 3 Conc. Tulet. c. 12 gives directions for the penitential dress of a woman. A man under penance was to ahave hia heal, a woman to wear a veil. Female penance must have been Bo common aa to require regulating where the rule prevailed that a married woman could net become a penitent without her husband's consent ( 2 Conc. Arelat. c. 22). (For spocial female delnquencies, see Theodor. Puenitential. I. xiv. "de puenitentia nubentium;" Egbert, Poenitentiul. e. 7, "de machina mulierem.")

Neither wealth nor otfice was allowed to exempt a delinqueut from the censure of the church. Under the heathen empire the mere acceptance of certain magistracies, inasmuch as they involved their holders in idolatrous ceremonials, was an ecelesinstical offence (Conc. Eliber. ec. 2, 3; compare the note of Gothofred on Corl. Theod. XV. v. "de apectaculia"). By 1 Conc. Arclat. A.b. 314, c. 7, all Christian governors of provinces were ordered to take with them commendatory letters, and bring themselves into communication with the bishop, so that if they transgreased against diacipline there might be no ditticulty in expelling them from communion. Although in the 4th and 5 th centuries no consideration of rank checked the great bishops from cenauring offonders in high placea, as, for instance, the condemnation of Anilronicus, governor of Ptolemais, by Synesius (Ep. 58), and the governor of Libya by Athanasius (Basil, Ep. 47), and the fameus expulsion of Theodosius from communion by Ambrose (Bingham, Antiq. XVI. iii. 4), yet in practice the sight was rarely exerciaed. (For reasons for this forbearance see Barrow, of the Pope's Supremacy, p. 12.) The age at which a young person caine under the diacipline of peaanee is nowhere defined. It is not likely that the church would excommunicate a boy or a girl. A Roman synod under Felix III. (A.D. 487, c. 4) decided that boys whe had been baptized by the Arians should remain a short time only under the imposition of handa, and then be restored; for it was not reasonable that their panitence should be proionged. The Con?. Agrth. c. 15 exempted the young from severe penance because of the weakness of youth. In the discipline of a monastery a delinquent under age was flegged (Macar. Rej. c. 15 ; Penedict. Rej. c. 70 ; Gregor. Ep. ix. 66, чunted by Bingham). And probably in the ehurch at large the weapon of penance was used only against those who had prased their minority.
iil. Uniformity of.-It is laid down in the Apostolical Constitution (ii, 48), that greas care and diseretion were to be excressed in treating offenders; some were to be dealt with by threats, some by terrors, some hy being urged to almsgiving, aome to fasting, and some by ejection from the church. And for a long time no doubt this diseretion was vested in the bishop, assisted perhaps by his presbytery, As the church grew, and intercourse increased betwe $n$ her different branehes, a more uniform scale of penalties was adopted. The frequent communientions which passed between Rome and Africa, trices of which are preserved in Cyprian's epistles, are the first important ettorts after uniformity of discupline. The decisions of the councils of the succeeding age were a further advance in the same direction. Nearly all the twenty tive camons of Ancyra and the eighty-one of Elvira treat of the panal. ties anitable to ecelesiastical crimes. The ssme may be said of the tiventy-two canons of the tirst council of Arles, and to a certain extent of the canona of the Apostles. These various judgments of the assembled fathers represect, in fact, so many penitential codes, whose decrees would be the model, if not the rule, for the administration of discipline throughont the chureh. The appointment of the Penitintiary officer in the dioceses of the Greek church weuld also tend to produce a uniform standard of penaltiea. The treatise which more perhsps even than the decrees of councils hel ped to establiah a yystem in the East was the epistle of Basil. For many ages this canonical letter of Basil was the atandard which governed the diacipline of the East. Hardly less authoritative was the epistle of his brother Gregery of Nyasa. The decisions of the popes on questiens referred to them were a further contribution to a body of penitential law ; for example, Syric, Ep. i. 3, 5, 6 ; Innocent, $E \rho p .1 .7$; 1i. 12, 13; iii. 2 ; Leo, $E$, lxxix. 4, 5, 6; Felix lli. Ep. vii. ; Nicolas, Ep. ad Rivol. The Peuitentisl books were an additional attempt to codify the law. Originating either from fannus monasteries, or embodying the decisions of great prelates, they apread far and wide through France and England, and in a less degree through all the churches of the West in the 7 th and 8th centuries. The 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 11 in the 6th century, and the Conc. Morunt. c. 31 in the 9 th, alike complain of the diffieulty of maintainieg penance at the true canonical standard. The penitentials were no doubt designed to meet the difficulty. The principle laid down by Conc. Mogunt. was, hat penalties were to be based on the anclent canona, or the authority of scripture, or the custom of the church. The penitentials in themselvea possessed no canonical autherity. and their multiplication was in some instance regarded with jealousy. "Their errors," said the biahopa in 2 Conc. Cabilon. a.d. 813, c. 38, "sre certain, and their authors uneertain." With the growth of the papal power and the centralization of ecelesiastical jurisdiction at Reme, dis. cipline tended to become more and mors anjform.

a. By repentance. - Although the church almed at uniformity of discipline, the sume penalty was not always imposed on the same crine; or if the penalty was originally the sume it was not car" sd out alike in all cases. There weuld be practical difficulties in the way of inisting on the completion of a merely spiritual sentence extending over twenty or twenty-five verrs. But in aldition to the necessities of the case a mitigntion of the pennlty wns openly granted in certain Instances. The tirst ground of relaxation was earnestness of rejentance over and above the formal submission to censure. Conc. Ancyr. c. 5 orders the bishop to examine the present and past life of a penitent and shew clemency necordingly. By Cone, Laodi: c. 2, perseverance and prayer and confession, and a total abandonment of evil habits, were allowed to move the pulers of the church to pity (see Cime. in Trull. c. 102). Conc. Nicacn. e. 12 decided that a delinquent who proved his amendment by fear and leara, and submission and good werks, and labour and dress, should, after his appointed time among the Hearcrs, join in communion of prayer ; that is to say, the lnborious ststion of hineelers might be omitted; those, on the other hand, who thought it sufficient to shew their repentance by merely coming to the church door, were to complete their full sentence. The 4 Cone. Carthag. e. 75 speaks to the sarne effet on "negligentiores poenitentes." Bnsil (c.74) considers it an act of duty that those whe have the power of binding and loosing should remit part of the penalty of the earnest and diligent. The same sentiment which appears sercral times in the epistle of Gregory of Nyssa, regulated the administrntion of discipline threughout the church (Innocent I. $E p$. i. 7 ; Lee, Ep. Ixxix. 6 ; Cone. V(rmat. c. 75).
b. By confessi,n.-One who spontaneously coofessed his crime was generally treated more Ieniently than after detection. Conc. Eliber. c. 86 made a wide distinction in the case of a deacen who allowed himself to be ordained after the commission of mortal sin. If he made a rolvitary confession, he might be reinstated at the end of two years, but if others conricted him, he was to do penance for five years, and then be restored to lay communion only. In Msrtin Bracar. (Collect. Conc. c. 25), a priest confeasing under similar circunstances might retain the name of priest, but not celebrate; if he was convicted, even the name was to be taken from him. Gregory Thaumaturgus ( $E p$.ce. 18, 19), with reference to robbenies which had occurred daring the confusion arising from a Gothic iavasion, made the station of a delinquent depend apon the manuer in which the theft was reFaled, whether by conviction or by confession and restitution. Basil (c. 61) diminished the penalty of a thief who confessed by one-half. The asme authority, at the beginning of his treatise, gives to spontaneous confession and lapse of time and ignorance an equal power in allevisling pensnce. (See Ambrose, Virg. laps. c. 8; de Poenitent. ii. 8; Prosper, Vit. Contemplat. ii. ${ }^{7}$ In some flagrant instances, as in the casc ut an adulterous elerk ( 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 7), confession was of no arail. c. By infercession.-The necounts of public penance during the first three centuries frechrist, ant.-VOL. II. quently represent the delinquent imploring the congregution and the whlows and the virgins and the clergy to intercele with the bishop for him. And when the length of penalties was undetermined by canon, and reated practically with the indivilual bishop, such intercerssions were a recoguised channel by which to obtain a mitigntion of penance. With the elaboration of the system which began with the 4th century, these intercessions are rarely heard of, although Augustine mentions incidentally (E.p. liv. ad Macdom. p. 93), a custom of magistrates interceding. p. 93), a custom of magistrates intercedling with the church for offenders. In Afrien a practice arose, which quickly becnme abused, of granting allevintion of perance to the intercession of martyrs, that is to eay, of Christinn in prison expecting death during persecution.

3. Pentrence denied.

I. Sometimes to the first Commixsion of mortalia Delicta. The grace of penitence appears to hare been withheld from certain delinguents in the enrly centuries, not beenuse the church had any doubt about her authority to grant it, hut on the ground that the power of linding was vested with the same sanption as that of loosing, nnd that to open the door with equal readiness to all great criminnls alike would only bring discipline into contempt. This seems the probable explanntion of the undoubted effect ot some of the early decisions. Cyprinn has left it on record (Ep. Iv. c. 17) that among his predecessors some entirely closed the place of penance agninst adulterers, and by implication against the other two mortal sins which were of a still graver character; but he adds that in doing so they did not break the verity of the church. How far this exelusiveness was followed in other provinces is one of the many vexed questions of the primitive discipline. See Albaspin. Observat. II. vii. 20 ; Bonn, Rer. Liturg. 1. xvii. 1 ; Fell not. in Cypr. Ep. vii. p. 17, cited by Binghum. By the clear testimeny of Tertullinn (de Pudicit. c. 1), pope Zephyrinus, A.d. 202-218, grianted penance to the sins of unclearness and fornication, and Tertullian founds npon this a chnrge of inconsistency against the bishop because he was not equally indulgent to murder and idolatry. Morinus (ix. 20) holds that the evidence of Tertullian in this trentise on the usage of the Roman church is not worthy of eredence. Martene (de Rit. i. 6), on the contrary, eites him na a trustworthy witness. If the ordinury reading of "nee in fine" in many of the canons of Elvira is to be accepted, there can be no doubt that penitence was denied in Spain to idolatry and to murder (see for instances cc. 1, 6, 63, 73, 75). With regard to moechia the decisions were more lenient (re. 13, 14, 31, 69, 72); except in aggravated cases (cc. 12, 66, 71), when communion was refused absolutely. It may be well to enumerate the exnet crimes for which communion was deaied by the council of Elvira even at dath : idolatry in an idol temple after baptism (c. 1); a baptized flamen sacrificing agan (ce. 2, 17 ) ; adultery after penance (cc. 3,47 ); killing by witcheraft (c. 6); if a woman deserted her husband without cause and re-married (c. 8); parents selling a child for prostitution (c. 12); dedicated virgins becoming prostitutes (c. 13);

betrothal of a danghter to an Wol priest (c. 17) adultery by clergy-on account of the seandai (c.19) ; nurder ly a woman of her child born in a lultery (c. 03); clergy retaining elulterous wives (c. 65) ; unnatural crimes (c. 71); nggravated alultery (ce. 64, 72, 79); glving information which leads to a Christian being put to denth (c. 73); malicious charges agrainst the clergy (c. 75). These dechalons appers to have had at the moat only a provincial authority, and not to have governed the general diacipline of the chureh. For the Conc. Ancyr. (ec. 9, 10), whleh was contemporary with Conc. Eliber. or only $n$ few years later, granted pennnce to each of the three mortnlis delictn even in their most aggravated forms. And, Indeed, throughout the Eastern church, with the exception of a declalon of Conc. Surdic. c. 2, which rejeets certain frandulent bishops from even lay communion at death, there does not appear any trace of the refusal of the rites of penance for the first commission of nay sin sincerely jepented of. Nor does any trnce of such severity occur later than the Conc. Eliber. In the West.
ii. Generully to a Repetiion of Sin once expi-aled.-The refusal of penance a second tlme was one of the unwritten camons of the early disclpline. No council passed a decree against its repetition, but in practice its reiusal was almost universal from the very begioning. Hermas (Pastor, Mandat. ii. 4), considering whether an adulterous wife ought to he recelved by her husband, determined that she should be taken back, but not often, for to be servants of God there is but one penitence (compare Id. Suinilit. iil. 9). This decision of Hermas is cited and approved by Clem. Alexand. (Strom. ii. 13, p. 459, ed. Oxon.). The language of Tertullian is very explicit (do Pudicil. c. 7); "God hath placed in the porch a second repentance, which may open to those who knock, but now for once only, because now for the secoud time, but never again." The "first repentance" which he had in his mind was baptisin. A little later (ibid. c. 9), he spenks of the "second and only remaining repentance." A passage in Origen (Hom. xv. in c. 25 Levit.) gives a clear account of the general practice. "In graver sins the peace of repentance is granted but once only, or seldom; but those common sins which men frequently commit, always admit of repentance, and are redeemed at once." The words "or selilon" are generally regarded as a later interpolation; the date of their insertion probably coinciding with the growth of greater laxity in tra Eastern church. There appears some reason for believing that Chrysostom did not hesitnte to grant penitence more than once. Socrates (II. E. vi. 21) states that he taught that though a synod of bishops had decreed that relapsed penitents should not be readmitted, he was williog to receive them a thousand times. On the accuracy of this statement with reference to Chrysostom see Morinus, v. 37. At the beginning of the 5 th century the privilege of frequent, penance was taken away from the Massalisu lieretics by a synod of Constantinople, A.D. 426 or 427 , under Sisinnius, one of C'hrysostom's successors, because it had been so often abused. From this Bingham concluder (Antiq. XViII, iv. 7) that a repetition of penance was not unknown in the metropolitan province. The relaxation of the early rigour may be partly attrihutable to the expesss ve leagth of the sentences Imposed in the Enatern church after the 3 rl century. if a delinquent had tope pellume for fifteen or twenty yenra, and whi williag to mass through the ordeal a second :me, it wo i tealonul impoasible to reject him. The Conc, Fliker., which was so severe in refusing reconciliation even once was not likely to grant it a serohad time (c. $3,7,74$; l'acian, Eip. iii. contr. Sm. pron. c. 27). They are rightly reprosed, sny: Ambrose (do Poenitent. It. 10), who thiak thint penance can be performed often, for they wnoten agalust Christ. Augustine (EPp. cliii. ad Micede s. c. 7) is a witness that even the ' "Ince in the church was refused en a rimposing $1^{n}$ nitent. The manner of dealing with such lapsers in the Western church is lnid down by ${ }^{\text {rops }}$ Siricius (Ep. i. al Hincr. c. 5); they were not to hare the benefit of a second penitence, but might be present, without communicatling, at the celebrs. tion, nud be allowed a viaticum at their death. By 2 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 443 , c. 21 , a penitent repenting his $\sin$ was to be cast out of the church. By 1 Conc. Turon. A.D. 460 , c. 8 , he was ejected, not only from the church, but from the society of the faithful (Conc. lenet, A.d. 465, c. 3). By the 6th century penitence begna to be conceded frequently. For the 3 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 589 , c. 11, complains that is many of the Spanish churches diseipline was no longer administered nccording to the canons, but as often at men sinned and al plied to t.e priest, so often pennnce was granted. This abuse the conncil checked. The disappenrance of the enrly rule dates probably from the decline of public discipline, and the substitution of a private system by which a sinner obtained reconciliation as often as he confessed his sin and aubmitted to penance.
iil. Till the Hour of Dcath.-The ordinary course of penance in the 4 th and 5 th centuries held an offender in its trammels for half a lifo. time for certain mortnl sins; if the sins were especially heinous, the penalty extended over the whode life, huwever long its duration. This severity was not confined to one proviace. In Spain the Conc. Eliber. c. 3, withheld communion till denth from a suserted flamen who, abstuinlng irom arcrifichig, merely exhibited a shew; and all his life he was to be under canonical penance. A consecrated virgin who had fallen was allowed communion at last only if she had passoti a life-long penance (ivid. c. 13). At a lncer date the Conc. Ilert:. A.d. 523, c. 5, seitenced any of the inferior clergy whe, after pennnce, relapsed into the snme sin, to exclusion till death. in France a sivil.. sentence was passed by 1 Conc. Arelat. liune onder penance all the dayn of thelr life, and not be present during the prayers of the filthful or even of the catechumens, and be admittel to lay communion only at denth. (See Ambirone, Lapy. Vi'g. viii, 38.)
4. Penitence of the: Sick.-The niek under direipline may be livided into three classes :i. those who for nome grievous crime had been ejected from the church and tell sick while outelide her pale; ii. thoee who were conscious of umbetected sin. and anked for penance on their slekbed; iij. thone overtaken by illness while undergoing penance. With regard to the first class, there seems little doubt that for about the first 300 years the full grace of penance Wa denied to them nbsolutely. ('yprian (Ep. ud Antin. 1v. 19) does not shrink from stnting this panitively. The great council of Arlen, A.D. 314, c. 22, at which most of the Western churches were represented. diccreed that apostatea who had not sought penitence in hoalth were to be debarred from it in ilnnens, uuless they recovered, and hal an opportunity of proving their sincerity. The denial of penance nt the hour of denth to those who had scorned it in life was continued in the case of condemned criminals for a long period in France. In Germany this rigour was r8lu, od in the 9th century by Cons. Vornatt. e. dit, Come. irimur. c. 31; in brance it was not repealed till reb. 1396, by a decree of Charlea VI. It ques not ajplenr that the refusal of reconciliation was neceosnrily a refusal of all the bencti ; of penitence; for Innocent I. A.D. 402-417 ( $E_{p}$. ili, ad E.euper.), otates that the old custom the church, in the car. of repentant delinguents at death, was to grant penance but deny communion, and that this was ic. in order to maintnin a high standard of disce : im doring the times of persecution, and that aiterwards, When persecutions ceasel, both penance andi ahsolation were vonceded to the dying, and tha this henceforth was the lav of the Catholic surch. There is $n$ saying of Cyprian (ad I)cnetriam, $c$. 15). "A unquarn sern est puenitentia si sit vera." None the less the great African father denied cammunion to grievous sinners in their last illness, not huwever because he doubted the full reconciliation was granted to all dying men seeking it, whaterer their previous career; and the question was nuthoritntively set at rest by a decree of Con-. Nicaen. c. i3. [See Recoxchintios.] The trentment of the second class of sick, those whose sin had not been detected or ronfessed till their last illness, was mure unifurin. Penitence and reconcilintion were An no nccourt to be r-fused them (Cunc. Andrgure. A.n. 4.3, c. 13). P'npe Celestine l.. A.D. 422432 (Ep. ii, ad Episc. S'ienn. ot Jarbon.), snys

Corthag, A.b. 398, c. 76, had carried the concession even farther, it had granteri penance, not only to the helpless, but even to the insensible, if there was evidence that lt had been desired by the putient 13 While he was rational (aee 12 Conc, Tolit.c. 2, 13 Conc. Ti.fet, c. 9). Theae derrees guverned the administration of the penitence of the sick during the midille ages. The third class of sick contained those who were overtaken by illnese during their pennnce. In the 4 th and 3 th centuries when sentencen anmetimes extendei over twenty jears, this class must have been n mumerous one. They were on the supposition already penitents. The minter remaining to be considered is the time and manner of their feconsciliation. One point in connexion with the penitence of the sick is involved in some ohscurity. If a penitent recovered who hal been absilved on his slek-bed, was he to complete his original sentence? In the case of light sins, for which an offendor had been $m$ ly debarred communion, it woold follow that when commednion was conceded the penalty was at an end. Morinus ( $x, 14$ ) is disposed to extend the same principle, at any rate up to the time of the sprend of the Novatian heresy, to delinquents guilty of grenter crimes, and who had been made penitents atrictly soocalled. He considers their nbsolution a satiafaction of all ecclesiastical censure. The treatment of the lapsed in the Roman and African churches, and nlso the silence pletion of a Elvira with regard to the completion of a sentence after reconciliation in exthe samenneas, bear out the inference. He makes with respentement, though with some hesitation. with respect to the Greek church in tho period prinr to the organization of the stations. With the beginning of the 4th ceatury the question becomea elearer. The seve.ity which spread the ugh the treatment of all penitents was extili to convalescents. The sentence left unto be taken time of a sickhed remission wns to be taken up on recovery. This rule was enforced, not only as a matter of principle, but to meet the easos of those, which appear to have been not infrequent, who feigned dangerous illness in order to escape part of their penalty. Originally a penitent once reconciled was sent back on recovery, not to his former position, but only to the station of consitentia. The coumsil of Nice (c. 18\% after resolving that no one on the threat of death was to be denied his $\langle\phi \delta \delta i o v$ (riaticum), goes on to decree thnt should the man revive after receiving it, he was henceforth to communicate in prayer only till his original sentence was finished. In some parts of the charch this middle course was the one adopted for a long period. It was approved by Yellx III. (Ep, vii.), in the treatment of the rebaptized, who in anticipation of death had been permitted to communicate, and is inserted by Martin of Braga in his Collect. Can. c. 82. PENITENCE

PI:NITENCE

The 4 Con- Curthay. A.D. 398, c. 70, with regard to penitence being given oven to one insenaithe, made it the duty of those who hail been witnesses of his contrition, to take eare that if he recoverod he fulniled his cminnical penance, the duratlon of which was to rest with the iliseretion of the priest. Hy ibid. c. 78, no aick man who hat received his ruati $u m$ was to censider hia penitence satistied without imposition of handa; and as this was one of the rites of the sulustrati, it wuall involve his being remitted to that atation. The completlon of penance after a sickbel abaolution was for a loug tlme the general rule (1 Conc. Aruusic. a.n. 441, c. 3; Cunc. Hpain. A.D. 517, e. 36). The rule was to aome degree modifled by a decision of 1 Chm:. Mirccion. A.p. 541 , e. 8 , that the length of a convaleacent'a penance should depend on the diacretion of the priest, but should in no case invelve inposition of hanis. From the 6th century, and up to the beginsing of the 12 th, severity towards the sick increased rather than diminished. An indication of thia is seen $\ln 3$ Conc. Tilet, A.b. 5K9, e. 12, which required sick penitents, equally with those in health, to shave their hesits if they were men, and if women wear a veil, aud put on baircloth or some other penitential dress. This injunction, whlch appears to have been eunfirmed by 12 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 681, e. 2, and by 13 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 683, c. 9 , must manifestly have depended on the nature of the sickness.
3. Season of Penitence.-The godly eustom that persens convicted of notorious crimes ahould be put to open penance, was not contined to the beginning of Lent in the primitive church. Bingham (Antiq. XVIII, ii. 2) says there is a perfect silence in the more ancient writers about it. Morinua (vii. 19) tracea the origin of the restriction to the quadragesimnl neasons to the 7th century, whea public penance had ceased to be exacted for secret sin. For the first half of the 5th century Hilary of Arles is a witness (lita, c. 13) that penitence was granted every Sunday. The primitive custon appenrs to have been to receive the penitent whenever he was brought to the bishop. In the Greek church this eustom was never restricted; hut in the Latin the various pontifienla and rituals of the 8 th and 9 th centuries disclose a practice of reserving the penitential rites to the beginning of Lent, whether the first Sunday or the previous Wedneaday. Even at that date penitence was not exclusively confined to the Lenten season. The caput jejunii was held to be the usual and most appropriste time, but there was no law of the church prohibiting the imposition of a state of penance at any season of the year if the ease required it.
6. Minister of Penitence.-In the administratien the bishop had supreme if not exclusive power. The statement, however, of Martene ( $d e$ Lit. i. 6), that he alone received confession, and he alone inrpesed penance, is too unqualified. For it seems undoubted that the presbyters shared the bishop's jurisdiction. Still, the power resided in the bishop alone, if he sav fit to exereise it. Cyprian trequently elaimed and used the sole right of disciptine (Epp. xrii, xix. xxv. xli. xlii. x|vi. &c.) and his presbyters ncknowledged his elaim (Ep. Culdonat. ap. Cyprian, xxiv.) The Apostolic,l Constitutions, which deal so largely with discipline, are addressed to the bishop. He was to preside over all, a a entrated with the power of binding and loosing (Jpat. Const. 11. 14); upon him the blame was to be haid if he neglucted to exereise his power (ithl). o. 10), for ho was set in the church to ait ia judgment on allimers. [Bismol, p. 23f.] But although Cyprian and othere did not hesitate to vindicate their epiecopal authority, they frequently acted in conjunction with their preshy. ters in the difliculties disturbing the chures. From the earliest ages there are indientions of this association of preshyters with their bishops. Some such nasociation appeare in the seateace isaued by St. Paul ugainst the incestans Corino thian ( 1 Cor. Y.). The excommunicution emanated from the apestle, luit it was to bo decreed by the assambled chureh, "when yo are gathered together," at Corinth. 'The aposile was present oaly in apirit to preside over their assembly.

Ignatiua, whose eplatles show the grent authority possessed by presbyters io the 2od century, refers (iad Philodelph. c. 8) to the penitent coming to the bishop's ceasistery, in after speaking of the presbyters as the adrises of the bishop, and the council and senste of the church, go on to say that the presbyters, and the dearma shall ait in judginent with tho bishop (Apost. Const. ii. 28). Tertullisn's detinition of exemologesis (Poenitent. c. 9) mar. prised aubmission and aupplication to the presbyters. Humilintion befure the presbytere is related of Natalis the confeasor (E.useb. II. E. v. 28). In Conc. Eliber. c. 74, the "conventus elericorum" is male the judge of the gravity of a perjurer's offence. Cyprian has numerous allusions (Epp, xvi. xix. \&c.) to the presbyten uniting with the bishops in the alministration of discipline. For himself, he said (E'p. sir.) frem the beginning of his episcopacy he hat resolved to do nothing of his pirisate judgment without their concurrence. Cornelius similarly ( $E p$. xlix. ad Cyprian) would nat decide the case of the enofessors who hal sided with Neratian till he had summoned his preslytery. The councils which condemned Origen (Pamphil. Apolog. ap. Phot. Cod. cxviii.), Novatinn (Euseb. II. E. vi. 43), and Pbul of Samnesta (ibid, vii. 28), were composed of bishops and presbytes, the last-mentioned sypod containing descons also. The first step in the prosecution ef Dietras (E.piphan. Hteres. lvil. 1), and of Arius ( $\mathrm{bid}_{\mathrm{L}}$ lxix.3) was to bring them before the presbytery. Hefore Alexander, bishop of Alexandris, issucd his circular letter to the other bishops sgainst Arius, he had previously summoned the presbr. ters and dencons, not enly to hear the letter, but also to give their assent to the judgment ( $C$ oo teler, ad Const. Apo-t. viii. 28). On the condemnation of Jovinian by Siricius (Ep. ii) , presbytery was summoned, sad the presbytea and deacons were associated in the premulgation of the sentence. Similar steps were takra by Synesius (E'p. Ivii.) in excommunicatins 100 dronicua. The fourth Cone. Carthay, c. 23 , proo hibited a bishop frem hearing any couse alope without the presence of his clergy; but it is not clear whether the cnuses in view wen clerical or lay. It wonld have been inpractlcable for the bishop to have long maintained this auperevisua promolaly. In the earliest ages, when every nuember of a church was known $t_{0}$ the bishop aad to each other, he probably did so; the congregation would anpply all needful evidence of the performance of an erring member's penalty. But ns the dioceses locreased in size, he must have found it necessary to delegnte him suthority. In the bast It whe transferred to the Jenituntiany presbyter, appointed by the hishop, end neting for him. In the West the duty of aupervision appeara to have been committed to a great extent to the dencon. The Apostalic Constitutions (ii, 16) aproint the descon to attend to an expelied menner, and keep him out of the chulch, and niterwarila bring him to the bishup. In the 0th century rituals, this duty is laid, not on the deacons generally, but on the archdeacon. Ile it was who collected the penitents end almonished them, and Introduced thein to the bishop, and afterwarda bore testimony that their penance had been duly pertormed. Morinus (ri. 17) conjecturea that, for at least 300 years prior to the date of these ritusla years prior to the date of these rituals, these same duties fell to the charge of the archdencon. In the larger dioceses the the archdencon. In the lnrger dioceses the rural deans shared the duty; and aubsequently, as appeara from the visitation articlea of A. appeata from the visitation articlea of

The power of remitting the length or severity of a sentence was one ot the privileges of the bishop. He, said the council of Ancyra (c. 5 ) Was to examine the life nud conversntion of the peaitent, end increase or mitignte his penslty. A similar power was recognised by a auccession of councils (Conc. Nicten. c. 12 ; Conc. Chalced. 4.D. 451, c. 16 ; Cono. Andegav. A.d. 453 , c. 12 ; Conc. llerd. A.d. 523, c. $5 ; 4$ Conc. Aurel. A.d. $341, c, 8$ ). As the number of penitents increased, more discretion was veated in the presbyter, but aiways with a reference, and, if necessary, with an appes to the bishop. Basil, c. 74, gives the power of alleviating penance to those who have power of alleviating penance to those who have was alee used by Conc. in Trull. c. 102. By 4 Conc. Aurel. c. 28 ; 1 Conc. Cubilun. c. 8 , the "sacerdos" was the judge who determined the oxteat ef penance. In'the Eastern church, from the time of the Decian persecution till the opiscopacy of Nectarius of Constantinople, the peniteatiary must have been the executive peniteatiary must have been the executive minister of discipline.
7. Penitence of Cloryly, The penitential Jluele pline as it atficeted the laity wha medicimal rather thas jernal. In its troatment of the clargy, the jubal eleatent predominuted. Not only was a delimpent clarik expored to the humilintion of a publle censure, but he was also deprived, tomsporurily or aboulately, of his office, and the rank shld ennolunene of oflice. And the sentence was the more severe, thit in the parly ages a degraded clerk was never reinatatel. Hence $\boldsymbol{n}$ charge againat a elerggman wan recjuirid to be proved with legal formality, an his guilt involved not only a moral st igma, but a loss of privilege and muans of livelihoot. This twofold etfiect, the spiritunl and the troparnl, of an ecelesiastical conare on the clergy, nuturally regulated the alministration of discipline to wards them. One of the iportalical Canoms (c. 24) laid it down, that a bishoj, jriest, or deacon, for certain crimes, was to be depmed, but not excommunicated, because the Siriptures had said that a man was not to be punlshed twice for the same otlience. The rule was repented iby Busil, ce. $3,32,57$. Stll! it doen ant represent the unvarying diselpliae for tho first three ceuturico. In general a clergytman was degraded in cnaes in which it layman was excommunlented. And where this rule helil good, a clergyman was not subjected to pesifence. Jlut in the primitire ages it frequently wecurred that no difference was made between the penance of clergy and laity, the penalty followed the same course as if the delinquent haj not been in orders-cjection trom the church, and re-admission hy pemanee. (See council ol' Veocaesarea, c. I.) The k.lriran canons stlord a still clenrer illustration of clerical pennnce. A deacon confessing a preorlination crims might receive commanion at the end of three years, acla legilimat poenitintia (Cunc, Eliber. c. T6). For instances of jublic penance, see the account given of Natalis (Euseb. II. L. v. 28) ; and of the presbyter Felix (Cyprian. Ep. xxv, ad Culdon.; Ep. Culdon. nu: Cyprian, x xiv.) ; of Novatua (Id. Eip. lii. 3); of Trophimus (Id. E'p. Iv. 8) ; of i,ishop Fortunatue (Id. Lp. lx .) ; and of hishop Basilides (Id. Ep. Ixvil. 6). Nor did open clerical penance, which was part of the stricter systen of a time of persecution, altogether cease with the close of the 3rd century. The first council of Orange, A.D. 441, c. 4, followed by the second council ot Arles, c. 29, determined that clergy ahould be admitted to penance if they sought it. 'fhe first council of Orleans, A.D. 511, e, 12 , mentions a presbyter, "sub professione poenitentis." The third council of Braga, A.D. 675, e. 4, threatened a clergynman with six months'subjecticn "legibns poenitentiae." (See also 1 Cunc. Turon. c., 3,5 ; Conc. Jenet. c. 16 ; Cunc. Agath. ce. 8, 42 ; Conc. Merd. с. 1, 5; 2 Cenc. Tulet. c. $3 ; 3$ Conc. Aurelian. cc. 4,8 .) On the other hand, a statement of Pope Leo, 441-461, seens difficult to reconcile with these anthorities. He lays it down (in Ep. xcii. c. 2, ad liustic. ; Labb. Conc. ijii, 1408) that it is not in accordance with ecclesiastical custom for a presbyter or deacon to obtain the grace of penance by imposition of bands. One explanation is that the "ecelesiastica consuetudo" alleged by Leo was prevalent only in the Roman church. Another, that the words of Leo were strictly correct, and that no presbyter or deacon as such was ever subjected to penance, because he was first degraded and had ceased to be a clergyman. But this explanation, while reconcilang the pope's language with canonical decisions, reduces it to a mere truism. The privilege, or inability, in whichever light it may be regarded, which as a general rule protected the higher clergy from open penance, was not extended to the lower orders. The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, decreed i: two canons (cc. 2, 8), that for purposes of discipline monks were to be regarded as laity; a decision repeated by 1 Conc. Barcinon. A.d. 540, c. 10 ; Conc. in Tmull. c. 81 ; 2 Conc. Nicaen. cc. 5, 13. For a further account of clerical penalties, see Bishop, p. 228; Degradation; Disciplive; Orders, Holy, p. 1492. [G. M.]

Penitential books : Ziber Poenitentialis; Poenitentiale; Confeshionale; Poenitentiales Conices, Conigelli, Libella; Leges Poenitentium; Peccantium Jidicia. The term is applied to collections of penitential cnuons :asued under the name anit with the authority of some eminent ccelesirstic, with a view to establish a uniform rule for the administration of discipline; the best, known are the Anglo-Sexon penitentials of the 7th and 8th centuries.

Tha early history of canons of discipline is involved in some obscurity. It is probsble that each bishop, with his preshytery, administered the discipline of his diocese on certain general principles which left the details to local regulation. Afterwards, as individual bishops by weight of character gained a reputation in the church, their decisions on matters of discipline obtained more or less the furce of church law. Hence the epistles of Basil and his brother Gregory of Nyssa on penance were received as of something like canonical authority. In this view they may be regarded as the earliest penitential books. Of these two sets of canonical laws, that of Gregory is in the forin of a letter to 1 ntoius, bishor of Melitinc. It attempts to trace the source of all $\sin t$ one of the three facultics of the soul, which he designates the rational, the concupiscible, and the iriscible, and for cach a separate mode of treatment is to be adopted; but there is no regulated scale of penalties for different degrees of $\sin$. The epistle of Easil contains more direct penal enactments. It deals principally with the three capital crimes of idolatry, murder, and fornication, and allots to each form of siu its eppropriete punisiment. Although stamped with nu cunonical authority, Rasil's epistle evidently had a wide inflaence on the administration of the discipline of the Eastern church, and eventually received ide synodical sanction of the council in 'I'rulio, a.p. 692. Other rudimentary penitentiale are to be found in the numerous decretals of the lioman bishops, although no one of these deals systematieally with the subject. After the 3 rd eentury the chief authority for the regulation of discipline was in the penitential canens of the councils. In addition to the general conncil of Nice, the Oriental councils of Anoyra, A.D. 314, Neocapanyea, A.D. 314, Gangra, A.D. 362 , and the various African comacils of the 4th and 5 th centuries, and the Spanish and Frankish from the 4 th to the 7th century, contain a copious legislation for the administration of penance. The decrees of these councile had onlo a provincial, or at most a national, force, and there was no attempt to establish a unirersal code of penitential law. The nearest approach to systematizing the laws of discipline is in the Codex Eicclesiue Africanae, emanating from Carthage, A.D 419. The full development of the penitential system is usually nttributed to Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. $669^{-}$ 690. But recent investigations have estrnblighed tho genuineness of fragmentary British and Irish penitentials, which indicate that the syatern was fourishing in the Celtic churches in these islands at a period anterior to Theodore. The nature of the contents of the various penitentials, wherever there is any peculiarity to call for remark, will appear as the list proceeds; but in general it may be said that they had one common characteristic, varying little with the nation for whose guidance they were compiled. They maintain a complete silence on the dogms. tical controversies which shook and disunited the Eastern church; in many of them there is little or no reference to the ordinances of the church ; their whole purpose and strength are concentrated on the enforcement of prictical duties. Among the rude tribes of the north and west, the outward profession of their newlyacquired Christianity was by no means invarisily followed by an abandonment of the ferocions and licentious passions of the old hearhen life. It was the object of the penitential book to allay, and gradually to extirpate, the vices of henthenim. The pictures which they disclose, especislly of the sins of the flesh, is a dark one. lut the public denunciation of these crimes and passions in the church, and the determination of her rulers to restrain them, was a step towards tho light. The drawing out a catalogue of differest vices, and appending a proportionate punishment to each, no doubt fostered the notion tast ench vice had its price, by the payment of which it might be expinted, and so far tended to biunt the moral sense of the iniquity of sin. On the other hand, the church, by declaring that it was her function to discover and punish vicu becanse it was vice and against God's law, brought home to the people, in the only way these simple races could understand, a belief in God's moral government of the world. An undue multiplication of the books was jealously wat ched. In the Gallic church, where, to judge from the number of Frankish penitentinls which survire, their influence must have been widespread, the council of Chalons, A.D. 813 (c. 38 ) pasises upon them a forms! censure ; they are said to clash with the authority of the canons; their authors are declared to be uncertain, but their errors certain.* The disclpline of the peniten isls was

I. Britisit and Irisit Penitentials.

1. Excerpta quacdam de Libro Davidis - The date of these fragmentary extracts irom the 'liber' of David, bishop of Minevin, the present St. David's, lies between A.d. 550 and 500 (Halldsa snd Stuhts, Councils and Liccl, Documents, 1.118). They consist of sixteen canons treating of draakenness, fornication, homicide, perjury, roblery, usury ; and may be considered as the es:liest penitential boot connected with the British islands.
2. Sinolus Aquilonalis Britanniae.
3. Altera Sinodus Luci Vistorine. - Two synods held under Davil, in the year 569 . The first contains seven penitential canons, the second nine.

The locality of the synods was probably Llandewi Brefi, in the neightourho wl of Cardigsn (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 117). The state of morals exhibited by these early canons was degraded. The 'Liber Davidis' opens with the peaaity for excessive drinking among priests about to minister in God's temple.
4. Pocnitentiule Vinniai-This book was first printed by Wasserschleben (Bussordnuingen, &c. pp. 108-119) from a comparison of the MSS. Cod. Sangall. No. 150 , saec. ix ; Vindob. Theol. Ist. No. 725, saec. ix; Sangerm. No. 121, saec. viii. ; and the Jrish canons of the Cod. Paris, No. 8182, ssec. xi. xii. It is dilficult to identify the Viminus, or Finian, whose name it bears. Wasserschleben coujectures the author to be the Finiaaus mentioned by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Msrt. i. p. 391) who, born in Ireland in the year 450, lived for some time in Gaul, then went to Walea, to bishop David, whence, in the end of the 5th century, he returned tu Ireland, in order to uphold the faith and discipline which had declined since the death of St. Pitaick. If this Fininn was a coatempornry of David, he lived a century later, but even so he would be earlier than Columban, which corresponds with the conclusion which would be drawn from a conclusion which would be drawn from a of Columban, where the greater part of Finian's work is repentel. Wasserschleben divites the bnok it.o fifty-three paragraphe. This penitentinl enumerntes the principal crimes of the clergy and laity, with their approprinte punish.. ments. Like the synods under St. Patrick, and the Liber Iharidis, it shews the influence which the clergy had obtained in temporal matters sineng the Celtic nations.
5. P'refatio Gildae do Penitentia,-The date of this fragment must be place! somewhere before the year 370 (Haldan and Stubbs, i. 113). It comprises twenty-seven sections, several of which are repeated in Cummean and Bele, and in the so-called Roman Penitentisl. The mode of penance to be inticted is strictly stated at the outset, and is much more in detail than the penance to be found in any other esrly book.

6. Canones Adamnani (Addamnari vel A/ldominari). -The camons of Adamnan, abbat of the monastery of Hy , the date of which must lip between the years 679 and 704, were probably passed by some Irish synod under Adamunn't influence (Haddan and Stuhbs, ii. 111). They consist of thirty chapters, treating almost entirely of unclean food
7. Cunones Wallici-These canons are a collecthion of national rather than ecclesiastical law. They are found in the Cod. Sangerm. No. 121 , saec. viii. with the title "Incipit judicium culparum;" in the Cod. Paris, No. 3182, from Whence they were taken by Martene (Niov. Thes. t. iv. col. 13), they are called "Excerpt: de libris Romanorum et Francorum." For the argument for their Welsh origin, see Haddun and Stubbs, $i$. 127. Their dnte is probably the first half of the 7th century.
8. Canones Hibernenses.-These canons are found in the same French MSS. with the preceding collection. They are all of grent antiquity ; some, as spparently iii. "Synodus Hibernensis decrevit," being decisions of synods over which St. Patrick presided. The canons are interesting as specimens of early penitential rules, and as the sources from which later compilations were derived. Wasserschleben (pp. 136 144) has published six collections:-i. " De disputatione Hibernensis sinodi et Gregori casaseni sermo de innumerabilibus peccatis incipit." Many of these canons are afterwards nsed by the compiler of the /enit. Bijoti:num [infra, p. 1612]. Their spelling of Latin terminations, is remarksble; there are also trinces of the use "Pe old vernacular, as, for example (c. 4), "Poenitentia magi vel votivi mall, si credulus id dem ergach vel praeconis." ii. "De Arreis." This is the earliest notice of redemptions to be found in penitential books, and was the parent from which many later developments of the system drew their origin. The first canon gives a fair instance of the nature of the commutations : "Arreum superpossitionis C. psalmi et C. flectiones genuum vel iii. quingentn et canticn vii. iii. "Synodus Hibernensis decrevit." iv, "De jectione." A curious scale of payments to be made by one who turns a poor man adrift or refuses to succour him. The "jectio" shall be a certain proportion, from a fifth to a ninth, of the composition for murder. v. "Do canibus sinodus sapientium." vi. "Item synodus sapientis sic de decimis disputant."

II. Frankish Penitentials.

The discipline of the Frankish church from the 4th century was regulated by the decrees ot provincisl councils, which are remarkably full of disciplinary canons. It was not tilit the Th cen. tury that anything approaching to a systematic compilation of the diflerent acts of councils in the form of a penitential was attempted. How well the ground was prepared for such a conupilation appears from the numerous penitantial works, which ware at once drawn up on tha basia of the fi-st whleh was published.

1. P'erniti atiale Coinmbani. - This earliest Frankish penitential was the work of the lrish usouk (columbon, born in the first half of the fith rentury, In the province of lecinstor. Ile Jival for some time in the great monastory of Jangor, amd then erossed to Ganl in the yenr 590 : $n$ fow years later he penetrat od to Italy, and foumded the monastery of luobion at the font of the Apmines, where he died, A.In. 615 [Dics, Cims. Byoos, i. ©O5]. Among his writings are two penitentinl books, one "Regula Coenuhinlis," designated In some MSS. 'Poonitentiale,' 'liegula fratrun Ilibernensium;' in others, 'Cobumbani Liber de quotidianis poenitentils monachorum,' This work, framed on a severe stamiard, contains a code of monastic rules, and has no enneern with the general alministration of church diseipline. It is remarkable for the frequency with which corporal chastisement oceurs ameng; its pemalties. Six, fen, or even two humbred strokes night he laid on a vareless or effending monk, Columbun's, other work is entitled 'Lilier de Poenitentio,' or 'de lounitentinrum mensurn taxanda.' The work was tirst published by the Minorite friar Fleming, in the yenr 1667, from a coxlex of the monnetrry of Bubbio. This Cod. Bobbionsis is the miny lis, of the penitentinl known to pxist, It consists of two parts, which enn never have been intonded to form one consecutive set of cancons. The tirst part contains twelve rhapters on miscellaneons otlences, some of which are also deait with in part two, and not, in all eases, curying the same punlty. The second part, which is the true pratentiai rale, begins with the introduction, " Diversitas culparum diversitatem facii poenitentinrum;" then tollows an alnbornte comparison between bodily and spiritual disurelers. After the introduction come twelve sections on the "copitalin erimina" of the "clerici et tnomnehi;" ce. 1:3-45, on the "crimina" of "laici;" and the remaining ce. 25-30 on the "minutae monablimem sanctiones." The last chapter of Columban (c, B0) is an injunction laid upen the monks to confess lorfore mass not only actual uffences, but thoughts and desires. It is interesting as one of the earliest examples of a practice which was afterwards to be stringently enforced upon the whole church.

In the intruluction to the penitentin), Columban states that he has composed his woris partly from his own discretion, and partly from the "traditiones seniorum." Among thess "seniores" must be placed Vinninus, from whose Irish penitential Columban has borrowed no less than thirteen of his thirty sections. Compare Coltant. I'sin. ce. $1,2,4-3,11,16,20,21,23$, with lïnuicus, Poen. 23, 12, 11, 22, 18, 19, 20, $25,26,97,5,917,: 32,24,9$.

C'olumhan's book whieh, from the name of its nuthor, has usually been regarded as an Irish Work, Wasserschleben pronounees to be Frankish, composed after he had crossed to the continent, The grounds for deciding against its lrish origin are crrtainly very strong:-(1) Monkish rules and penalties niways emanated from the superiors of cluisters, or from tome one in high anthority it is highly improbable that Colnmban would have been allowed to publish a work of this im. portance while he was oceupying a subordinate position in the monastery at Bangor. (2) No trace of Columban's canous is observalile fa Theodore, while, on the other hand, they forn the basis of numerous undoulitell limakish mil. lections, (3) C. 25 forbids commaniatnge with the heretien! sect of the bumasinci, who were syroml uver Ciaul mal Italy, but were unknwn in the British lsles. (4) The urangement of the materials shews an independent umpretaking. At the hem of the cupitalia crimim, Columban plases homicide ; afterwards fullow furnication, perjury, &e., mand this order was alopted hy most of the limakish penitentinls; whereas thise which rest upen Theolore's work bergit with drunkenness. This arrangenent was jrohsily due to the prominence which these varions viees and crimes attained nomong the repertive races. With the inhabitants of the British Isles drunkentess was the prevniling sin-with the German tribus, murder, and cribues of vinleme.
2. In close connexion with Columban's work, Wasserschleben (Bussomlnumpen, 111 . 360-424) has printed cight anonymous peniteatinls, all of which slow n Prnakish origin.

3. Ponitentitle Cummecmi.- The histnry of this penitential is invelved in mach ubsecrity, nud the ident:fieation of the Cumunan (Cummenn, Cumian, Cumin, Comin) whose name it brars, is nu less perplexing. The Athe SS. Mherucns. xii. Janary, mention twenty-mne Irish ecclesiastics of that name, but no intimation is given of nyy

The, fact that this Cummenn is

Iv. cel. 22-30), under the title "Liberlus de remediis peceatorum, which is a variation from that found in the MS, Wassersehleben ha printed his edition (pp. 441-460) from C'ul. J'arin, Keg. 3182 (olim Bigot. 89) fol. suec. xi. P1, 280-204. No name is attached to it, and Wasserschleben gives It the title Bijotionum, that being the only MS, in which it is found. The same MS. contains most of the Irish and British fragmenta, aml the compiler has evidently drawn largely from Irish sourcpa. lle quotes "canones sapientiun et Ciregorii" (aee supra, Cunones Miberncuse's, p. 1609), the ('anones jatrum, Vinmiaus, Theoslure, the liraakish prenitentials, Cassian, sad the lit te Sinctortum, from which he adduees the examplea of the Abbis I'nstor, Moyses, Deritus, Antonins, St. Symuletira, and others. This element in the penitential would leal to the con-- lision that, like Columban and Cummenn, the anthor was one of the many lrish missionaries whonsttled in France. The work appears to have been male use of by Cummean, unless, as is not moprobable, buth were derivai from a common 6onrce nut yet discovored. It is especially rich In material, and the writer has shewn unusual origimity in the arrangement of his matter.

"Jaliciam Theodori," or "Judicium Canonicum," are frequently cited in succession for the ssme offence. From the preponderating use mad :of cum. mean's work, and Irish and Anglo-Suxen sources and from the citation of a "Judicimm S"utoradi," it is a probable conjecture that the penitential was compiled by some Scotch missionary. The treatise appears to have has a wide circulation, for large excerpts from it appear in a MS, of the Austrian Cistercian Monastery of Holy Cross, stec. $x$, in the Cod. Valicell. silec. xiii, in the so-called Collectio Saminuna, nud in the Colloctio Aaselmi Lucens (Wasserschleben, Beitriajue zur Geschichite der vorgratianischen Kirchenrechtsquellen, 1p. 34,

Anglo-Saxon Penitentials.

1. Poenitontiale Theodori.- The treatise waich bears the name of Theodore is the most important of the penitential books, but it is only within the last few years that a genuine text of the work has been published. Whether Theodore was himself the author of the book, and what it was, and whether any set of canons existed which could be proved to be drawn up under the authority of the great archlishop-these till quite recently were open questions. This obscurity is the mote remarkable as there was a manimity of tradition for many centuries that Theodore's was the first Anglo-Saxon Penitential, and it long had a widespread influence in England, and was long the source and model of the peniteutial regulations in France and Germany. This influence was partly due to the nature of the work itself, and partly to the learning and commanding character of Theodore, whose primasy, extending from A.D. 669 to 690, was a memorable one in the Einglish church. The evidence for the belief that a Penitential did emmate from Theodore is as tollows: (1) Eigbert, who was consecrated bishop not later than A.D. 733 , and who must have been born t:unsequently soon after Theodore's death, twice in his undoubted Penitential quotes Theulore by nane in the preface he speaks of him in company with Angustine, Gregory, and other Fathers, as one of the great anthorities on penitence; and in the body of his work ( $v . i i$. ) he takes a canom almost verbatim trom Theodore's treatise, with the introo duction "Teodorus dixit." The Liber Puntificalis (ed. Vignol. Rom. 1724, tom. i. p. $27(1)$ which was first published in the second half of the 8ti century, states, "Theodorus Arehiepiscopus pec cantium judicia, quantos seilicet annos pro unoo quoque peceato quis poenitere debent, miratili tt discreta consiteratione descripsit." Identiesl testimony is given by Paul Wamerrid (laulus Diaconus) eited by Wasserschleben, p. 15. (3) The C'odex Cononum IIterniorum, the date of one MS. of which lies between A.D. 76.3 nal 790 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii, 174), quotes the werk by name, ns do also many of the French penitentials and collections of canons, (4) It is spuken of by Rnbanus Maurus (De julic. poenit. lai orum, c. 6 ; opp. Colon. 1626 , tom. vi. p. 119) as "Poenitentialisquem Theodurus constituit." Ant hegito of Prüm, in his Visitation Instructions requires the ecclesiastics under his juristiction to be jroo viled with a copy of either the lioman l'enitential, or Theodore's or Bede's, On the other hand (1) Theodure's contemporaries are silent ; Dele, who speaks fally of the arehhishop's activity in the English chuxch, bas not a single refertace to

Theodore's Penitentinl, either in his own treatise or in his Histury ; (2) by the twelth century the work was unknown, or forgotten, in England.
Before coming to that which can now be confidently accepted as the nuthentic work aseribed ia the 8th century to Theodore, it will clear the ground to give a list of the imperfect or spurious editions of the book that have beon published.
(1.) In A.D. I639 Spelman, in the tirst velume of the Concitia, published the headings of 78 chapters under the title of "Poenitentiale Theodori Archiepiscopi." He took them from a MS. of the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and expressly states that he was not permitted to make a copy of the whole. This MS. seen by Spelman, C. C.C.C. 190 , wns published, with six chapters at the begimning and twenty-two at the end emitted, by the Record Commission, Ancínt Latrs and Institutes of Englund, p. 277, seqq. edited by Therpe. The C. C. C. C. 190 MS. was taken as the text, and MSS. Cotton. Vesp. D. 15 C.C.C.C. 320 , were collnted with it to supply various rendings. In favour of this being the original work there is only the title, which ia conjaratively mudern, and the authority of Spelman furuded on a glance at the MS. Against this supposition are these fatal objections: c. 20 consists for the most part of cannons trom the second Ruman ceuncil under Gregury II. A.D. 721 ; c. 38 contains a long passage from a capitulary of Charles the Grent, A.b. 789; in almost all the chapters use is made of the Collection of Canons by Halitgar of Cambray, circ. 829 ; there are numereus citations from the French councils of Orleans, Agde, Chalons. The conclusion from this eridence is, that Spelman and Thorpre's Penitential is $n$ French eompilation not earlier than the ninth century. This edition was again published by Kunstunnn (Dio Lateinischen I'önitentialbiicher der Ayfelsuehsen. Majence, 1844), who also publishel from a Ratisbon NS. a scries of 193 canons, ander the name 'Canones Gregoriani.' The full title in the MSS. is "Canones Sancti Gregorii Papie urbis Romas," the origin of which heading is doutstess te be found in the replies given to Augustine hy Gregory on the eeclesiastical government of Englnad. These "Canoles Gregorii" are reprinted by Wasserschleben (pp. 160-180) They censist of a disorderly solection from the genuine work of Theodore.
(2.) D'Aehery in the Spicilrgium, vel. ix. published (A.D. $166{ }^{\circ}$ ) 120 chapters from various Pa isian MSS. under the title "Capituln Theodori." In A.D. lifl they were republished by Labbe and Cossart (Comethit, vi. 1875), and again in A.D. 1723, in the new edition of the Spicilegiatm (i. 48fi), edited with the notes of Baluzo and Martene, when the 120 original canons were increased to 168 , of which however the last twenty came from the Irish book of Adamman (s'pra, p. 1609). In Wassersehleben's cellection these canons are printed (pp. 145-160) as "Capitula Dacheriama," The "capitula" are a mixed collection, nrranged without any method, containing few canons on penance, and possess no clain whatever to be (3) as the original treatise.

The capitula of Favier have no connexion with Theodore, but are from sources as late as the loth century, Thia selection of Petit was reprinted by Mlgne in A.D. 1851, in vol, 99 of the Patroloyia.
(4.) The obscurity which oo long hung over the Penitential of Theodore was at length dispelled by the learning of Dr. F. W. II. Wasserschleben, I'rofessor of Law in the University of Halle. In der introduction to his work, Die Busvordnungen der abenlliindischen Kirche, published at Ifalle in A.D. 1851, he has demonstrated (11.1. 13-37) that Thoodore himself wrote no penitential, but that the treatise which bears his name contains his original decisions, the name of the writes being unknown. Rejecting all previous editions, he has instituted a fresh search into the chiet continental libraries, and as the result of his lahours, has brought to light a book which he is satisfied is the original treatise issued under Theodere's name. For his text he has made use of the following MSS. : (a) Cod. Vindob. no. 2195 (Salisb. 324), fol. saec. ix. x. fol, 2-40; (b) Cod. Vinlob, jur. can, ne. 116, 8vo, sacc. viii, ix. ful. 1-16; (c) Cod. Sangerm. no. 940 (el. 912): thia is an "apographum" of the Corpus MS. 320, to be mentioned below ; (d) Cod. Herbipol. Theol. bo. 32 , 4te, saec. viii. ix., containing an index of both books, but only the text of the first. The remaining MSS. contain only the second book: (e) Cod. Paris, ne. 1603, 8vo, saec. viii. ful. $92-$ 103 ; (f) Cod. Paris, no. 3846 (el. Regins, 3665 , Teller. Remons. 2b2), fol. snec. ix. x. ; (g) Cod. Paris, no. 1455, fol. (ol. Sangerm. no. 1365, 4to, suec. x. xi.; and 2 Codd. Thuan., from which Petit's fourteen ehaptera were taken.
(5.) Soon after the publication of Whsserschleben's edition, and befure thoy bal themselves seen his text, l'rofesaor Stubbs anl the late liev. A. W. Hndian discovered $\frac{1}{}$ copy of the true work in England, which only differs from Thisserschleben's text in various verbal realings. This text was published by them in A.D. 1871 , in Coun ils and Ecclesiastical Jocumcnts, iii. 176203. It is taken from NS, 320 in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, an enrlier of ivan any of those which are the source of Wasserschleben's publicntion, being Irubably not later than the 8th century; although even in this a reference (I. viii. 5) to "quibusdam codicibus" indicates that the original MIS. has net yet been diseovered. The Corpus MS. is one of these which Thorle used without sceing its value; but of which Wasserschleben hal only an imperfect transcript in Ced. Sangerman. $9+0$. The fact that the researches of English scholars have brought them to the same conclusion as that xeached by the eminent German investigator into Penitential literature may be regardel as decisive on this long-vexed quostion. We now pessess a sulstantially accurate text of the treatise which was known in the enrly part of the middle ages by the name of the lenitential of Theodoro.

Praefatio

In Nomine Domini
incipit Praefatio libllai quem Pater Tingomorc's diversis interrogantibus ad bemidium temperavit penitentiae. Discipules Umbrensium Universis angloruy catholicis proprlae animarum Medicis sanabilem stithex in Domino Ciristo salutem.

This title is follewed by a long prefaee, written in particularly barbarous and cerrupt Latin. Nevertheless it threws considerable light. on the authurship of the work. The treatisa purports to be a series of decisions on ecclesiastical discipliue given by "venerabilis Antistes Theodorus" in nuswer to the questions of the priest Eodn, surnaned "Christianus." In it use has also been made of a "libellus Scotgrum," atiterwards referred to (1. vii. 5), the auther of which is expressly stated to have been an eeclesiastic. Of this Eoda, whe submitted the questions to Theodore, nothing whatever is knewn; he cannot Le satisfactorily identitied with hishop Haeddi mentioned at the end of the Penitential, nor with any of the many persons of the age whe bore similar names. The identitication of the "dis.ipulus Umbrensium," whe is represented as the editor of the treatise, is equally remete. The designation siguifies either that he was a native of Northumbria whe hal been a disciple of Theodore, or, more probably, an Englishman of southern birth who had studied under the nertheru scholars (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 173). The conclusien which is clear, and which can be drawn from the preface, is that Theodere was not the author of the Penitential in the sense of having written it himself, but that it contains his judgments, was drawn up under his personal direction, was published with his anthority and during his lifetime, and has always borne his name. The priest Eoda is apoken of as "beate memoriae," and was therefore deal before the publication; but that Theodore himself was yet living seems highly probable, from the rerses, first published by Kunstmann, in which, at the conclusion of the I'enitentinl, he commends his suul to the prayers of bishop Haeddi.

For his decisinns, next after Holy Scripture, Theodore is indebted to the current ecclesiastical law, and particularly the Coulex Cousonum of Dionysius Exiguus. Comp. Theod. Poenit. I. i. 1, with Cin. Apost. 42 ; T. Poenit. I. ii. 6, with Conc. Ancyr. c. 9 ; T. Poenit. 1. v. 10, with Cone. Sicaen. ce. 11, 12; T. Pocnit. I. xv. 4, with Conc. Ancyr. c. 23. In T, Poenit. I. v. 2, pope Innocent is quote: by name, with a reference to a decision of his in Ep, ud Lipiso. Likcelom. which is contained in the Dionysian codex. There is further evidence that this collection of canons was knewn in England in the 7 th century at the council of Hertforl, A.d. 673, Theoli irs brought forward certain "Canones patrum" in order to select those which were suitable fur the needs of the English chureh; and these "canones" in all probability were the collection of binny sius Exiguus. 'Traces of Theod re's Greek training are seen in ths frequent references to, lhasil's Epistle to Amphilochius. Five times he quites Basil by name, in aldition to many indiret ajpeals to his decisions. (Cenf. Theod. I'en. 1. ii. 7 viii. 14, xiv. 3, II. vii. 3, xii. 6 ; Busil. Sfo re $58,18,4,9,21$.) A further evidence of hasteru learning appears from his many allusions to Greek practices ; one chnpter (ll. viii.) contains nething else but a comparison of the different customs and opinions of the Greeks and humans. Justiainn's Novells are another Eastern source an which he drew, (Conf. Theod. P'cn. Il. xii. 7 11, 12, 21, 23, 32 ; Notell. Justim. exl., xxxiv, 10 $\mathrm{xx} 5,7,6$.) Theodore must also have been conversant with the British and Scotch seurces of ecelesinstichl law. Theod. Pen. I. ii. 1 is spparently taken from the Lilkr Davidis, c. 6; Theved. Pen. 1. ii. 7 from the Sinodus Luci rictorive c. 8. Theod. I'cn. I. ii. 16 impnses fifteen year prance on incest, but adds that according to anot her standard life-long exile has been allotted this is in reference to the Sinod. Luc. lic. c. $\quad$, which inflicts exile on incest. The one canen of Thendere which sanctions commutation of peaance (1. vii. 5) is also founded on a Celtic sutherity ; it comes from that same "ibielius Scotorum" to which allusion was made in the preface. [Redemitions.]
2. Judicium Clementis.-This fragment was first printed by Kunstmann (Die Late: inis.hea I onitentiallhibeher der Anyelsachsen, pp. 176, 1ii) frem an Augsburg MS. no. 153. With this Wasserschleben has collated a 10 th century $1 / 5$ from the Austrian Cistercian convent of Holy Cross. Kunstmann identifies this Clement with Willibrerd, ene of the Anglo-Saxon missionsrits to Frisia, in A.D. 692. Willibrord is known to have berne the name of Clement from oue of the letters of Boniface to pope Stephen ( Ep .10 F, edit. Jatle). Haddan and Stubbs have printed (Councila, &c. iii. 226) the canons as a fragment illustrating the Angle-Saxon system of penitential discipline. Wasserschleben, however, withuat giving his reasons, appears to doubt whether the identification can be authenticated, and ha3 appended the "Judicium" to the Frankish penitential. It comprises twenty sections of ac special interest.
3. Poenitentiale Baedace.-There is no clue to the exaci date of this work. Bede died on Ascension Day, a.d. 735, and assuming, as there is no reason to doubt, that the treatise was written by him, the date of it must be fixed in the early part of the 8th century. The penitential was tirst published in the Amplisvimit Collect of Martene and Durand, vol. vii. col. 37, takea from a MS. in the monastery of St. Hubert. at Andain in the Ardennes. This edition is income plete, containing only the latter half of the work. Into sections. It is reprinted with various readIngs from the issue of Martene and Durnand, by In this form it may be (Cuncoils, &c. pp. 325 -334). In this form it may be neccepted with little hesitution as the gennine prolluction of Bede. It beara the title, Inciutr Exscarbsum Domint Bedsini Presiyteri. It contains twelve chappters. In addition to this anthentic treatise of Bele, another has been printed bearing his name. It appears in aeveral editions of his collected works under the heading "Liber de remeduis Peccatorum." It is printed in the Concilit of spulunn the Concitit of Spelmnn and Wilkins, the former of whom appears to have had some doubt of its authenticity, and to have omitted considerable portions of earlier editions. The best text is that printed by Kis Ponitentiabbuicher, (Ponitentialbïcher, &c. pp. 142-175) from a 133), and adopted by Wasserschlebeben, in whose collection it bears the title "Penitentinle PseudoBedae," Ha lian and Stubhs regard it as a compination from two distinct works, the Peitential of Bede and the Penitential of Egbert.
4. Poenitentidele Egberti-Several trentises have been published bearing the name of Egbert. The discovery of the authentic work involved a no less complicated investigation than was necessary in the case of Theodore's Penitential. Amung the documents which, wholly or in part, hirre been attributed at various periods to the archbishop are -

1. In Wilking's Concilia (i. pp. 113-143) there is printed a work in five books in parnllel columns, Anglo-Saxon and Latilu, under the Eboracensis," This is Eboracensis," This is reprinted by Thorpe in the Honumenta LEclessistsica nppended to the Anvient Lars (pp. 343-392), but with a different dirisicn. The first is named "Confessiouale," the remaining four "Poenitentiale." In addition to which, under the title of Additament', Thorpe gires a collection of thirty-five other capons in purt of this work is given in Cooper's $A$ dition uf Bto the Report on the Foellera, with the title, "Poenitentialia Ecgberti Archiepiscopi Eloracensis, liber ivtua." The grounds for rejecting the clsim of any part of this to be accepted as the riginal work arv:- (1) The first three books of Thorpe's "Poenitentiale", of Therpe's "Poenitentiale" are, with one slight cxereftion, a translation of the third, fourth, and

3. In addition to the Penitential, a collection of Excervitiones has been published by Spelmunn (pp. 2:58-278), Latbe and Cossnrt (vi. 15861:s88), Thorpe (Ancient Laws, p. 321 et seqq.) and in a translation in Johnson (Cunous, ed. Baron. i. pp. 184-223) under the name of Egbert. The gource from which these excerpts are taken ia MS. Cotton. Nero, A. I. The fact that of Chey contain extracts from the capitularies of Charles the Great is alone fatal to their claim to be regarded as Egbert's.
4. The Liser do Kicmedis Pecoutorum is ascribed in some MSS. to Egbert. On its true history aee above, Poen. Buedse.
5. The Puntificate which was published in 18.33 by the Surtees Suciety, from a Paris MS., bears the name ol Egbert, and there is no reason to doubt its authenticity. It ia, however, ns the namo implies, a ritual and not a penitential book. Anuther work, the Dialtoyns, which is equally sutheutic, has an indirect bearing upon penitence. It is in the form of a series of decisions on seclesinsticml matters in reply to sixteen "interrogationes" submittel to the arechbishop (Hmldan and Stubbs, iii. 403-413).
6. The genuine Penitential was first printed ns nn anonymous work by Mnrtene and Durnnd (Amplissima Collectia, vii. cell. 40-48) from the same MS. in the monnstery of St. Hubert in which Bede's tract is fumud. The independent researches of Wassersschleben have led him to the ${ }_{H}$ conclusion that this must be the original work. His elition is printed in his Bussorinunnyen, &c. pp. 231-247, taken mainly from the Cod. Vindab. jur. can. nu. 116, ful. 77-87; it is nlso found in the following MSS.: Cod. Frising. no. 3, Ranshov, no. 73, Sangall. no. 677, 'at. Palat. no. 485 . The genuine Penitential is also to be found in the Bodleian MS. 718, which comprises four books; of these books the first, containing twenty-one capitulu, which gre the first twentyone capitult of the so-called "Excerptiones Egberti" of Thorpe, then the genuine work then certain confessional prayers of a later date the remaining three buoks belong probably to the 10th century. The tirst book concludes with the words "Finis lihri Poenitentinlis Ecgberhti Archiepiscopi." Haldan nud Stubbs have reprinted (iii. 416-431) Wnsserschleben's text With variuns realings, from the Andain MS. of Martene and Durnn, the Bodleinn MS. 718, and the fragment printed in the Surtees elition of the Pontificale. The identification of this edition as Egbert's resta on the ground that it containa no reference to nnything of a later date, that it is cited as his by Rabanus Maurus, a pupil of Alcuin, and that it is declared to be the work of the archbishop by the compiler of the Budleian MS. 718. The exact date of the Penitential cannot be fixed with any accuracy. It was no doubt published while Eghert was archbishop. He died A.D. 766 , in the thirty-forth year of his pontificate, and he probably received the pall as enrly as 734, for at this date he is known to have consecratod bistwo Frithbeat of thesham. The limits of time within which he issued the Penitential cannot then be drawn closer than A.D. 734-i66. ## Spanisit Penitential.

In the Codex Vigilanus, or Alveldensis, in the library of the Escurial (ff. 148, acr. 976) there is a penitential book of Spanish ofigin, the greater part of which conslats of excerpts from Theodore, C'ummean, and Frankish penitentials. The substance of the book, therefore, contains nothing noteworthy, but the spelling is remarkable for the interchange of the letters $b$ and $v$; for instance, prevent for praebent, scrbandum, obserburi, inebriubent, nobercu, abunculus, voberit, valneaberit, and decanus for diaconus. There is s trace of national customs in chapter 84: "Qui in saltatione femineum habitum gestiunt et monstruose se fingunt et majas et orcum et pelam et his similia exercent, 1 ann. penit." Majas is probsbly connected with the majo, maja, a boy or girl affectedly and shamelessly dressed; orcum, the orco of the old Spanish romance, the ogre or wild man of the woods ; pelum signifies in Spanish a richly-dressed boy, carried with dancing on a man's shoulders. See Wasserschleben, p. 71.

Greer Penitentials.

A critical investigation into the history and sources of the Greek penitential books has not vet been made. Morinus (le Sacramento Poenitentiae, appendix, $\mathrm{pp} .616-664$ ) has published two Greek books, one of which has the name of John the Faster, Gregory's contemporary and opponent at Constantinople. Morinus has taken his edition from a 13th century MS. at the "Bibliotheca Altempsiana" st Rome; he professes himself unable to decide to what extent the MS. contains later interpolations into the original work; but he finds extracts in the works of Harmenopulus and Matthew Blastares of the 14th century, which profess to be taken from John's Penitential, but which do not exist in the Roman MS. The title of the edition of

The other book, which he has published as a separnte penitential, taken from a Vatican MS. which he had not seen himself, is styled:

 бицтаөє́бтатон.
In aldition to these Morinus has published an 'АкодауӨla $\tau \tilde{\omega} \nu$ z $\xi$ оио入oyovuévav, taken from a 10th century MS. from the Barberini Library in Rome. He calls it a brevinry or enchiridion of a penitential. It comprises three hendings: the rite of making and receiving a confession, the form of examining the penitent, and the manner of giving absolution; it contains no list of penalties for sius, but refers to an index, from which Morinus infers that at the time when this breviary was in use there was well known in the Eastern church some penitential book, in Which the penaltues of sins were classified.
The methods and contente of these Greek books have little in common with the latio penitentials; they bear a closer reaemhlance to the later "ordo" or "ratlo" appeniled to somie of the Frankish books. Morinus has jrintel the Penitential of Joannes Jejunntor anil tit Canonarium of Joannes Mouachus as distinct works. Whether they have any claim to be considered as original and ac parate trentises, or whether they are based on authentic bouks net yet discovered, or whether they are altogether productions of centuries as late as the loth hr even 1 Ith, are questions which cannot bs satij. factorily determined, till some scholar shail examine the MSS, which survive in the Eastron church with the same completeness and dill. gence which have been bestowed upon the penitential records in the monasteries and libraries of the West.

For the chlef contents of this article the writer is indebted to the very learned work of Wasserschlehen, lie Bussordnunyen der akent. ländischen Kirche, IIalle, 1851, and to the critical notes introducing the Anglo-Saxin Penitentials published by IIsddan and Stuhbs, Councils and Ecclesiusticul Documents, vol. iii. PENITENTIARY. For our knowledge of the office of the Penitentiary Priests, Prestyyteri
 we are indebted to the account which Socrates ( 11 . E. v. 19) and Sozomen (H. E. vii. 16) give of the abolition of the office. The appointment dates from the time of the Nuvatian schism. Ths number of penitents, particularly of those whi had lapsed during the Decinn persecution, who flocked to obtain absolution fron. the ehurch. gave a handle to the Novatinn party to denuure the aystem of C'atholic discipline. P'enitents nlso frequently made confession of sins before the congregation which were unfit to be recitad in Jubilic, nad were $n$ cause of scaudai, buth to the bislop who published them nad to th: congregatimn who listened to them. To obviate these difticulties, a special officer enlled the Penitentiary was added to the ecclesiastical roll, whose duty it was to determine what crimes were too scandalous for public acknowledgment, and particularly to decide what offinces excluded the offender from partaking of the Holy Comnmunion, and generally to superintend, under the suthority of the bishop, the administration of discipline. The office was in force only till the time of Nectarius, Chrysostom's predecessor in the see of Constantinople. During his episcopacy it was abolished, at least in that part of the church which acknowledged the jurisdiction of Constantinople. The occasion which gave rise to the abolition does not appear to have implicated the Penitentiary personally. A certnin lndy of rank, who was doing penance ungler his direction, afterwards confessed that she was at the same time carrying on an intrigue with a deacon of the church. The scandal caused a great outcry, and Nectarius, to prevent similisr disorider for the future, formully nbrogated the office This was in A.D. 391. There hangs some obscurity over the question whether the office was at any time a universal one. Sozomen (H.E. vii. 16) implies that it existed throughout the West, and was particularly held in esteem in the church of Rome. But the more geaenal opplalen seems to be, from the absence of any mention of the Penitentiary among Latin ecclenistical writers, that the oflice was conined to the Eastern church. Compare however, Augusti, C'hrist. Archäol, ix. 122. The chief interant sttaching to the abolition of the ollice is the bearing which it has on the Roman controversy of auricular confession. Both Socrates and Sozomen expressly state that upon the discontinuance of the office, each one was to be allowed to partake of the, holy mysteries as his own conscience dictated. From which it seems to follow, that whatever masy have been the practice while the Penitentiary Priest was one of the recognised officers ef the church, benceforth secret confession was discountenanced, and that there was to be nothing approaching to compulsory confession befire coming to the holy sacrament. To weaken the furce of this infereace it has been suggested that Socrates and Sozomen were Novatians, or at any rate wrote in the interest of the Novatian party; but this suggestion has no foundation. For some account of the controversy, eee Hooker, Eocl. Pol. VI. iv. 8; Biagham, Antiq. XVlli. iii. 12.

Ducange quotes Anastnaius Bibliothecarius for the anthority that pope Simplicius, A.D. 468-483, appointed an officer called Poenitentiarius Ecclesiae Llom mae, with the duty of superintending the penitents and hearing their confessions, and that this is the origin of the office in the church of Rome. In medern times the chief of the Pevitentiaries, Maynus Poenitentiarius, is a high

PENSIONS. Certain allowances [G. M.] from very early times to have been granted from ecclesiastical revenues to ecclesiastical personages under certain circumstances, such as to the clergy who were disabled by sickness or oll sge, and to biahops who had been driven from their sees, or forced to resign them through bodily infirmity. Themassin ( let. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 2, c. 29, § 1) eays that these were ususlly given in two different forms, either simply as aa annual stipend, or by grantiag the nsufruct of lands belonging to the church; the Intter chiefly in the case of strangers who had latter chiefly in the case of strangers who had sought refuge in the diocese. Examples of both sought refuge in the diocese. Examples of both kinds of pension will be found ia the iustances thst follow.
Tho first recorded case of a pension granted by suthority is found in the acts of the council of Chslceden, A.D. 451 (act. 10), where Domnus, who had been ejected from the see of Antioch by the "Robbers' Meeting," was, at the request of his successer Maximus, allowed an annual sum from the revenues of the sum sum from the revenues of the see sufficient to keep him from want, and that his claims might not be s couse of disturbsace in future mears. The same couucil (acts 11, 12) sllowed Bassianus and Stephen, who had both been uncanoaically elected to the see of Ephesus, pensions of 200 aurei each from the property of the diecese. athundsut pensions were allowed of the causes for which Which they were allowed, and the different ways in writings of Gregery the Great. Thus (Epist. i.
42) in sending certain clergy to monasteries to do penance for incontinence, he orlers that they shonld recetve a sulficicut allowance tor their subsisteace, in order that they might not be a burden to the houses into which they were received. In another plasic ifpist. I. 43) he directs the bishops of Illy: 10 obey the mandate of the emperor, who had ordered that the bishops who has been expelled from their seas by the war should share homes and revenues of those who had remained uadisturbed, but adling a special provision that they only receive sulficient for their sustenadee, that they were only to be regarded as guests, aad that they should have 110 authurity whatever given them which should even approach to a partition of the see. Again, a peasion of forty prieces of gold (Eipist. ii. 53) was assignell, on the ground of cominon humanity, to Agathon, bishep of Lipara, who had been deprived of his see by canonical judgment. When a certnin Felix, a deacon, who had ceased commanion with the church from mistaking the intention of the fifth oecumenical council, applied for readmission, Gregory (Epist. jii. 14) entreats the bishop of Syracuse either to restore him to the office of a deacon or to allow him a part of the stipend belonging to it, adding that, in order to tuke himself a slare in the good work, he wonld add a small annual allownace from the funds of the church of Rume. A bishop of Gaul (Epist. xi. 7) whe was uanble to perform his duties from pains in the head, was to be persunded to retire, but his maintenance provided trom his church.
John the deacon, in his Life of Gregory the Great, says that pensions were allowed to blshnps for two reasons. First (lit. Greg. iil. 16) when they were ciriven trom their sees and alloted to other bishops for maintenance; second (id. iv. 39) when bishops retiring were allowed to receive from their successors a sum sulficient for their maintenance.
An instance of the usufruct of church lands being assigned na a pension is recorded by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 36) in the case of Euphrasius, bishop of Clermont in Auvergne, who allotted to Quintianus, bishop of Redés in Aquitania, who had been driven from his see by the Goths, gifts of houses, fields, and vineyards; and the bishop of lyons nlso allotted to him certain possessions of his diocese which were situated in the province of Auvergue. A more curious kind of pension comes to light by the same historian, who records (id. viii. 20) that when Frustinus, bishop of Aix, had been deposed by the council of Maton, it was alse ordered that the bishops by whom he had been ordained should ench allow him an annual peasion of 100 aured.
An instance of snother kind of pension is found in a letter of Hinemar of Rheims to pope Nichulas I. (Ep. 17, Opp. ii. p. 249), in which he sary that Kothadus, bishop of Soissons, having been obliged to relinquish his see, he had procured tor him the gift of a good abbey; nnd that all his fellow bishops had given him assistsace in his enlamity, partly from motives of pity, nud inartly that he might not give any further trouble to the see, " nt molestus et seditiesus ecclesiae cui praefuerat esse non decerexisted in connexion with the enthedral elergy. The third councll of Orleanc, A.D. 5i38 ( $\mathrm{m}_{3}$ I8), lenves it entlrely to the diacretion of the bishop $p$ to $p^{e} \mathrm{rmil}$ or to refuse ashave in the revenues of the aitheiral to clergy who had left it for the purpose of entering monasteriea or serving other churches. On the other hanil, the councll of Merida, A.D. 366 (c. 12), provides that the bishop shall bave the right of selecting his cathedral clergy from the parlah priests aud dencons, and that auch clergy shall retnin the revenues of thelr prishes on comilition of making an adequate allownace to the prextyter who has taken charge of the parish, anl to the other clergy connected with the church. The stipend in such casea aceruing from the eathedral reveures leaing deserbed as a gift from the blshop eonditionnil on the good beliwiour of the reciplent. Thamassin ( Fet, et Nov. Lect. Discip. iii. 2, c. 29, § 22, 23) thinks that the atipend derlved in thase cases from the catheital was called an allowadee (pensio) in order that such elergy might not be charged with holding a plurality of benefices.

In these cases the allowance of pensions was right and equitable. Abuses, however, appenr to have soon crept in, especially from the right nssumed by tine Frankish sovereigas of granting peusions at their will settled on property belonglug to the church. On the representation of leo IIf, this evil was checked by a capitulary of Charles the Great (Addit. iii, c. i.) positlvety forbidiling any division or partltion of the property of the church, either in his own lifetims or by his successors.

Another class of pensions, attended ultimately, With great evils, arose from the pratifs of appointing bishops, uniler various circtu: tabows to at least titular possession of more e. one.

IFNTECOST. The word $\pi \in \nu \tau \pi$ worr h in Latin writers sometimes Quinquayesimu) was used in a twofold sense by the primitive church, both for the whole purlod of filty days between Eanter and Whitsun Day, and also more strictly for the single festival of Whitsun Day.

In the early church the whole of the fifty days between Easter and Whitsun Day was regarded as one continuous iestival. Thus Tertuifian says that all the festival days of the beathen juit together will not make up the l'entecost of the Christians, "Excerpe singulas festivitates nationum tt in ordinem exsere; Pentecosten implere non puterunt" (de Idololatr. c. 12), and spenks of Pent ecost as a yery large space of time, " hatissimum sjatinm," appointed by the church for the alministration of Laptisn: (le Bapt. c. 19). In the smme. sense the canons of the council of Antioch in Encacniis, A.D. 34 t , speak of the quarta septimana penterostes, mediu pentecostes (ean. 20, Labhu, ii. 579). The Ordu Romanus lays down that "Tempus Pentecostes inchoatur a primo die resurrectionis et currit usque ad diem quinquagesimum post Paschn," and the Apost.lical Cunstitutions (lih. v. c. 20, ad fin.) extend the term to the whole period as one of festal juy (see Beverigg, Paule $t$, tom. ii. Annotat. 27 ; Cotelerius, Putr. Apostol. tom. i. p. 466). Basil the Great speaks of the seven weeks, rîs ífâs $\pi \in \nu \tau \epsilon \kappa о \nu \sigma r \hat{y}$ ( $d c$ Sjirit. Sinct. c. 27 ). From the continuous festal character of the perlod, fastigg and kneeling in prayer were prohibited, as on Supilays. Tertullan surm, " $W_{t}$ comnt it nolawful to fist of to worship karelligg on the Lorl's Day, and we refoice In the ame Inmunity from Easter Day to l'entecenst ('lertull, de Coron. Milit. c. 3). The same rute was lsil down by the council of Nicaea, A.D. 32 z (can. 26 , Labbe, ii. 37). Ambrose also deseribes the fity days as each like a Sunday, when "jpjuninm nescit eaclesia," and which the tralition of tho ancienta appoints to be regarded "ut Pawha"
 In Sermon 61 (falsely altrihutel to him) the same prohibition of fasting In leenteccist is found; and In the Praefat. ad Ps. 50 it is spoken of as the Christlan jubilee, when the didt of sia is remitted, the handwriting againat us botted out, and all Chriatlans rejoice with allehoias, We have nlso the authority of Eiplihanius (lirgos. Fid. c. 22) for the cessation of fasting and kaeeling during thls period. Augustine sleaks of "dies illi ifuinquaginta post Pascha usque al l'eutecostem quibus nun jejunatur " (Fipist. 86), though he elnewhere speaks with some doubt as to whether the rule was unlversally olserved (Epist. 119, ad Januer, c. 17). Jnring this period the allelnia, whleh had been silent during Lent, was hourd abundantly In the services of the chureh (August. ibid.). Isidore has a long passage (lee Uffic. Eccl. lib. i. c. 32) on the mode if observ'ing the pertod, and the absence of ail marks of mourning. C'asslan is also very full on this subject (De Institut. lib. ii. c. B, 1 l ; Collat. xxi. c. 8, c. 11, c. 20). Honorius Augus: todunus, in his Gemma Animae (lii. iii. c. l3b), writes: "'lempus Inter Pascha et Pentecostes Quinquagesima nominatur quia a Sabbato quo duo alleluia inchonntur usque al Sanctam Pentecosten quinquaginta dies computantur quibus alleluia in cantu frequentatur" (ef. Vales, all Euseb. Vit. Constant. lib, iv, c. 64; Bulvamon in can. Nic. xx., apud Bevereg. Pandect. tom. i. p. 84; Menloza, in Concil. Illiber. c. xrii. is can. 43 , apul labbe, Concil. 1. 126 1).

Early in the 5 th century an ordinance of the youthful devotee Theodosius Il., A.D. 425, douhtless emanating from his sister Pulcheria, prohibited nil stage-plays, Circensian games, and putlic spectacles during the period of "quinque* gesima" on aecount of its great sanctity (Cod. Theod. lib. xv. tit. v. do Spectactlis, leg. 5 tom. F. p. 253). By a custom of the churdh which was ancient in the time of St. Chrysostom (IIomil. Ixiii. [lxvi.] cur in Pentccoste Ads legentur), and which is atill retained in the Greek church, the Acts of the Apostles were rend between Easter and Whitsun Day (August. Thrch in Joann. VI. $$ 18$; Serm. 315 ; de Pracdett. Sand, c. ii. § 4 ; Chrysost. Homil. xxxiii. in Gen. 12, In the church of Spain and Gaul the Apocalpse was commanded also to be read at this season under pain of excommanication (Concil. Tolet. ir. can. 16, Labbe, v. 1711). In a more restrictel sense Pentecost stood for the festival of Whitson Day alone. In this sense it elosed the creled the Festivals of our Lord, semestre Domish, among which it held the third place, nfter Eastat and Chrlstmas. The earliest occurrence of the word in this sense is in the forty-thirl unat of the council of Elvire, A.D. 305 (Labbe, 975), which, referring to the erroneous cistors prevailing in some churches of Spain of cell

The vigil of Pentecost was one of the chief seasons fer the administration of the sacrameut of baptism, second only to Easter Ere. These two werc indeed the only times when baptism was permitted in the Western church, except in the case of the sick (grabatarii). To those In the Enstern church the Epiphany was added (Greg. Naz. Orat. xl. de Bapt.). In the time of Tertullisa it is evident that baptism was permitted during the whole of the firty days which were known as Pentecost in its wider seasse (Tertull. de Bapt. c. 19) ; Lut snbsequently It appears to have been restricted to the actuna rigil of the feetival (Bingham, Orig. Fasting being prohibitell by the enrliest church ordinauces during the whole of the l'entecestal periont, inoluling the following week, called Heblomus Spiritus Sincti, the nanal stationary fants on Wednesiags and Fridiys were oriyinally not resumed tili the week succeeding the Octave. Afterwarid, when the Emher weeks becnme fixed, the week aneceeding Whitsun Day was nbserved as a time of fasting anti prayer (Ember Days). Leo the Great, in his l'entecostal sermons, laya great atress on the olservance of the l'entecostal Fast on the Wedneadiay, Friduy, and Saturday (Serm. 75-81). The Rogation days date from the time of Mamerclia bishop of Vierne, o. PERA. This word seems to be used by Cassian In an unusual sense for the sheepskin which formed part of the monk's dress: "pellis caprine, quae melotes vel pera appellatur" (de Coenob. Inst. i. 8 ; Patrol. xlix. 74; cf. Cillat. xl. 3, 3.150 ). Hence the word has found a place with Isidore: " Melotes, quae etinm pera vocatur," &c. (Etyin. xix. 24 ; Patrol. Ixxxij. 691). It can hardly be supposed that Cassinn uses the word in its ordinary Latin sense, for it is not at nll likely that the monks under such a rule would be allowed to carry a wallet." Gazet (not. in loc.) suggesta that pera is a transcriber's error for pacnula; others would rend diphthera, and Ducange would transfer appellatiar to follow melotes. This. however, seems decidedly feeble. It is perhaps just possible that the word may be

PERITRACHELION. [Stole.]

PERJURY. The Chrietian code, following the old Roman law set a apecial brand of infamy on perjury (Cod. 7heod. II, ix. 8). It was visited with no less severity by the discipline of the chnrch. Chrysostom (Hom. xvii. in Matt. p. 182 ; Hoin. xxii. de Irá, t. 1. p. 294) placed it in the anme category with murder and adultery. By Basi! (ad Ainphiloc. c. 64) a perjared paraon was gllotted eleven year's penance. The first council of Mascon, A.D. 581, c. 17, epacted that he who instigated another to perjury ohould be debarred from communion for the remainder of hia life, and that his accomplice should be incapable for the future of giving testimuny. The crime occupied a chapter in each of tre enrly English penitentials. In the penitent:, I of Theedore (1. vi.) it is declared (c. 1) that he who commits perjury in a church shnll do peemance eleven years ; but (c. 2) if under compulsion (the compulsion of his lord, Bed. Pocnit. v. 1), then only for three quadragesimae. He who breakis a vow taken at the hands of a laymin (Th' $d$. Poenit. 1.vi. 3 ; Egbert. vi. 7) is left inpunished ly the Greek canons. But if the vow had been taken at the hands of a bishop, priest, orileacon, or on the altar or a consecrnted cross, the penance for breaking it was three years, witha remission of two yeurs if the cross was not consecrated (Theod. 1. vi. 4 ; Bcd. v. 2; Egbert. vi. 2). The penance for aimple perjury was three years. By the penitential of Bede, v. 4, the fnlse witness was to be punished according to the circumstances of the case ; and one (ibid. c. 5) who had unwittingly been guilty of perjury and afterwards confessed hia offence was to do penance a year. In the Frankish penitential of Cummenn, founded on that of Theodore (Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen der abendilandischen Kirche, p. 460, seqq.), the punishment is graduated to the ofiender's rank, A perjured layinan (Pen. Cum. v. I) was to do penance three yaars ; a cleric, five ; a subdeacen, six ; a deacon, seven ; a pricst, ten; and a bishop, twelve. By another clause (c. 9), a false witness ja punished lese severely, but on a corresponding scale. In c. 4, a layman conumitting perjury through covetousness was to sell all his goods and distribute them to the poor and retire to a monastery ; but if covetous iess did not lead to the crime, then for three years he was to lise is exi's, not bear arma, and fast on brend and water, for two more abstain from wine and flesh and give freedom to a slave, for two more years distribute alms, and at the end if seven he might be restored to communion.

The breaking of oaths which ough; never to have been made was not a matter likfly to come under canonical supervision. There are, nevertheless, a few decisions of councils. The Spanish council of Leridn, A.D. 523, c. 7, declired that any litigant binding himself by an inth to remain at enmity with his adversary shou'd on account of his perjury abstain from communiun for a year, and hasten to be reconciled. The lawfulness of breaking such oaths is discussed at length by the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 6.33, c. 2. The council supposes one or tive extreme cases, such as a man having sworn to slay his father, or compass the pollution of a sacred virgin, and resolves that it is far better ha should break his onth than keep it. The opinions of Ambrose, Angustine, Gregory, and Isidore, are cited in aupport; from the last of whom several decisions are quoted (Isidor. ii. 31; sent. 10,22) to shew that sometimes it is better to break an onth than observe it.

PERSONIFICATION (IN ART). The fashion

 of representing the virtues and moral feelings by human figures is one of great antiquity both mmogg writers and artiste, e.g. Panlinus of Nola (Episte 16, c. 4) tells us that "et spes et aemesis et amor stque etiam furor in simulacris clantur"; and Christian poets in like manner have embodied the virtues and vices in their vereat. Prudentius, for example, in his "Soul's Confict "(Psyohom. v. 21), gives this warlike representation of Faith :" Prims petli campum dubla sub eorte duelli Pugnatura Fidea, agrestl turblda vultu,

Pervigiliae. [Vigil]

PETER AND PAUL, BS., in ART. Representations of the two chief apostles-St. Peter as the spostle of the Circumeision, and St. Paul as the spostle of the Geotiles-had a very early place in Christian art. Ensebhis apeaks of having seen many such, attributed to the grateful feeling of those who had been converted by these spostles to the faith (H. E. vii. 18). Constantine's vision of the two apostles recorded in Const.ts of St. Sylvester (ap. Fuhrmand de Bapt. Const. tom. ii. p. 68), however apocryphal, is a proof that at that time these personages had acquired a recognised type. The earliest known examples of this traditional type, as shewn in the gilded glasses of twe catacombs, the bronze medals, the mosaics and sarcophagi, as well as in the early statues and stataettes of St. Peter, correspond in their main features to the portraiture given by Nicephorus Callistus as tall ii. 37). St. Peter is ueually represented as tall sad upright, his halr and beard short and crisp, hls face round and somewhat nndignified, With a loag flat nose and arched eyebrows. St. Panl is shurter in stature and a little bowred, his forehead bald, his beard long snd pointed, his face oval, with low eyebrows, and the nose atraight and long, and his physiognomy characterized by greater delicacy and refinement. The portraits given in the Greek Menaea (Buonsiroti, iasi antichi, p. 76) correspond with this type in alniost all polnts, except that they represent St. Peter, as well as St. Paul, as suffering from baldness. Some rare examplea, on the other hand, assign to St. Paul'a brow well covered with hair.
The earliest representatlons of the two apoatles are those found in the gilded giasses of the catacombs. They sre sometimes depicted alone-St: Peter (Garrucei, Vetri ornati, tav. x. o. 5, tav. siv. n. 3), where by a singular caprice of the artist the apostle appears as a benirdless, smooth-faced young man, and St. Paul (ibid. tar. vii. n .5 ) where the usual type is maintsined. In by far the larger number of examplea the two apostles are depicted together, either in bust (ibid, tav. x. xii. xili. xiv; Buonarr. tav. x. xi.) [Glass, p. 731] or atanding (Garrucci, tav. ix. xi.) or seated (ibid. tav. xiv. xv, &c.). In an exampla of this last attitude (ibid. tav. xv. n. 1-5), the two apostlea appear to be engaged in a lively discussion, such as that recorded st Antioch (Gal. ii. 11). Each holde a codex, and St. Peter presents his roll to his brother apostle with s degree of eagerness in keeping with the ardency of his character. The two apostles are in innumerable instances portrayed standing on either side of our Lord, either in person or symbolized by his monogram (ibid. tav, svi, n. 5), sccording to the custom spoken of St. Augustin as prevailing in his day in Africa (do Consens. Evangel. 1-10). [PHOENIX.] In many cases Christ is bestowing on Hia apostlea the crown of life (ibid. tav. xii. na. 1-7). The central place is not unfrequently occupied by a female orante. We hsve instances of the Virgin (?) (ibid. tav. ix. 6, 7), St. Agnee (ibid. tav. xxi. 1-3), St. Peregrina (ibid, n, 6). St. Lawrence also fills the same place (ibid. tav. $x x$, n. 7 ; Buonarr. tav, xvi. 2). Other ssints are sometimes associated with them, e.g. St. Pastor and St. Damas (ibid. tar. xxiii. n. 2), and St. Philip, St. Simon, and St. Thomas (ibid. tav, xxv. n. 6). In the room of the central figure in some instances we sce a chaplet of victory (ibid. tav. x. n. 2,4 ; Perret, tom. iv. pl. xxi. 3), or a flower (ibid. tar. x. nn. 6, 8), or several codices (ibid. tav. siii. na. 2-6). St. Peter is once represented seated, presching to s stauding femsle (ibiul. tsv. xri. n. 2). Instead of the more usual pavivs, we sometimes find St. Paul designated by his earlier name savivs (ibid. tav. xi. n. 3 ; tav. xvii. n. 7).

Neat to the gilded glasses the class of objects on which the two apostles most frequently oceur are the aarcophagi and sepulchral slabs of the catacombs. The engravings of Bosio, Aringhi, Bottari, Garrucci, Perret, Maffei (Mus. Veron. p. 484), Allegranza (Mon. Christ. di Milano, tav. iv. vi.), Bugati (Mem. di S. Celse, tav. I), Millin (atlas, pl. xxxviii. lix. Ixiv. |xix.), Le Blant (Surcophages d'Arles), may be referred to for a large snii instructive series of examplea. The type is almost iavariable. Our Lord stands on a hill, from which issue the four rivers of Paradise; on one side St. Peter, with covered hand, receives from Him a halt-opened codex; on the other St. Paul bows in reverence (Bottari, tav. xxv.; Marangoni, Act. S. jict. p. 42). A somewhat different arrangement appears in $s$ sarcophagus at St. Apollinare in Classe, Ravenus. Our Lord is sested, and gives a roll with His right hand to St. Paui, while St. Peter holds the key and oross on the left. Both apostles are opprosching Christ with hasty strides, their garments flying behind them in the wind. A sepulchral slab from the cemetery of St. Csilistus, commemorating a Christian nsmed Asellos (Boldetti, p. 193 ; Perret, vol. v. pl. xi.), bears the busts of the two apostles, rudely incised, with the sacred monogram between them. The hair and beard correspond to the usual type.

Another class of examples ls found in the mossics of the basilicas, for which we may refer

Examples of mosaics will be found in St. Sabina (Ciamp. tom. i. tab. xlviii.), St. Agatha (tab. Ixvii.), St. Naria in Cosmedin (tom. il. tab. xxiii.), St. Lorenzo (tab. डxxariii.) St. Praxedes (tab, xlvii.), St. Cecilia (tab. lii.), the baptistery at Ravenna (ibul. p. 234), anl at Capua (ibid. tab. liv.) ; the former basilica of the Vaticsa (de Sacr. Aedific. tab. xiii.), and the later mossics of the side spass at St. Costaza (ibid. tab. xxvii.). A bronze medallion found in the cemetery of St. Callistus, engraved by Boldetti (p. 192), and more faithfuliy by lle Rossi (Bulletino, 1864, Nov. Dec.), preserved in the Vatican Library, presents the heads of the two apostles embossed in a style of unusual excellence [eee woodcut, and Money, p. 1307].

It is difficult to point to an example ia which the normal type is depicted with 80 much dig. nity and beauty. This fine work of srt is placed by De' Rossi in the first hult * 3rd century.

There was no invariable r' , the position of the two apostles when ated together.
ln the earlier'glasses nas sher worss of art St. Peter generally occupies the righthand place, and St. Paul the left. In later examples the order was frequently reversed, and this disposition became the rule, especially in the papal bulls (Mamachi, Orig. et Antiq, Christion, $\ddagger \mathrm{mm}$, v. p. 503). It is evident that mo dogmatic importance can be assigned to this change of position.

On the identification of St. Peter with Moses, in the scenes of the Striking of the Rock and the Apprebension, the article OLD Testament in Art may be consuited, and that on Sculpture for a description of the existing statues of St. Peter. An oajx given by Perrat (tom. iv. pl. xvi. 85) represents the apostle walking on the water and our lord seizing his hand to rescue him. The warning of his Depial is a frequent subject on sarcophagi. There is a very remarkable example on one of the sads of the magnificent sarcophagus of the 4th ceatary discovered iu the Vaticsn (Bosio, 85, 87 ; Aringhi, i. 317, 319), now preserved in the Lateran Museum. ## (i.) The Festival of Sth Peter and

 St. Paul.1. Early History of Festival.-A joint festival of St. Peter and St. Panl, primarily and especially connected with the Roman church, can be traced back to the 4th century after Christ. The discussion as to the whole question whether St. Peter ever visited Rome, and if so for how lang, sad the evidence for Rome having been the scene of his martyrdom, will be found at length uader the article Pope. It may sutfice here to remsrk that Eusebius (Hist. Hocles, ii. 2.) cites Dionysius of Corinth, who, in a letter to the Romin church, speaks of Peter and Paul hoving taught in Italy and haviag borne witness to the truth кard тòv aürov кaipóv. Eusebius (in loc.) also cites the Roman presbyter Caius, as testifying to Rome as the scene of these mov ekк $\lambda \eta \sigma l a \nu$. The came testimony is also bome by Tertullian (contra Marc. iv. 5 ; de Pruescript. 36).

We have said that a festival in commemoration of this martyrdum can be traced back to the 4th century, the Natalis Apostolorum Petri ot Pauli, observed on June 29.
Prudentlus, on the pasainn Prudentlua, on the passion of these two apostles (Peristenh thes (Peristeph. 12), is evidence of the easly celebration of the festival in celebration of the festival in Rome. We cite the first four lines in evidence:

> Plus solito coennt ad gandis; dic, amice, quid sit; Romam per ombem cursitant ovantque, Festus apostolfict noble redit bic illea triumph Paull atque Petrl nobilis cruere."

Lnter on we find among the works of St. Leo three homilies (Hon. 82-84; vol. i. p. 321, sqq. ed. Ballerini), the first of which dwells on the double commemoration, the second refers to St. Peter alone (relegated to the appendix by Quessell, as partly spurious, partly a mere cento from the works of St. Leo), and the third is for the octave of the two apostles, the heading, however, being perhaps not genuine. At the beginning of the first of these, St. Leo claims that "in the place where the departure of the chief of the apostles was made glorions, there on the day of their martyrdom should the rejoicing take its riee." The Leonine Sacramentary contains masses for the day, to which we shall again recur (vol. ii. 35 sqq.). We also hare sermans for the festival by St. Augustine (Sermm. 295-299; Patrol. xxxviii. 1348), by Maximus of Turin (Sermm. 66-69; Patre!. lvii. 663), &c. It seems also pretty certain that the ancient Kalendarium Cartiaginense includes this festival, though the MS. is somewhat defective at this point. After St. John the Baptist's day (Jnne 24) come two entries partly lost, then ". . . Jnl. Sanctorum . . . Apostolorum." After another illegible line comes the ides of July. As no other festival of apostle is known to have oecurred at this time, it seems safe to refer this line to St. Peter and St. Paul (Patrol. xiii. 1222). The calendar of Bucherius, which Muratori (do Rebus lituryicis, c. 4; Patrol. Ixxiv. 877) refers to A.D. 355, has the eotry: "iii. calend. Julii Petri in Catacumbes et i'auli Ostiease, Tusco et Basso Coss." it is hardly necessary to add that all Western martyrologies and calendars agree in their recognition of this festival, as the different forms of the Mart. Hieronymi, Bede, Florus, Usuard. &c.
On the other hand, the Apostolic Constitutions, a work of distinctly Eastern origid, makes no defiaite nention of the day, perhaps due to the festival haring had a Western origia and gradually finding acceptance in the East. The order is merely given (viii. 33) that slaves are to rest on the great festirals of the Saviour, and also on "the days of the apoatles," to which is added a special mention of that of the protomartyr Stepheo. As regards the Eastern church, we find a dirsct atntement, valeat quantuin, made by Theodorus Lector (Hist. Eccles. ji.

16 ; Patrol. Or. Ixxivi. 189), to the effect that a Roman senator named Festus, being sent to Constantinople on political matters, exhorted that "the commemoration of the chief of the apostlea, should be held with great honour and reverence." Theodorus adds that the feetival had been kept at Constantinople before, but now received a great additionsl eplendour ( $\pi о \lambda \lambda \hat{\psi}$

 atnsius l., who died A.D. 518.

What credit we are to asslgn to the remark of Theodorus, that a festival of St. Peter and St. Paul had been kept at Constantinople before the time of Anastasius 1., or indeed to his whole atory, it is impossible to say. The absence of any homily for a featival, afterwarda so important, in the genuine works of St. Chryasotom, is conclusive against any general celebration of the festival in the East in his day. We may take this opportunity of adding that in the older aditions of St. Chrysostom (e.g. Saville, vol, v. p. 991) was contained a homily, cls roùs корифаíous ти̂v ג̇жобто́лау Пéтроу каl Паúлоу spuriousneas of this is, however, palpable; and Montfaucon contemptuously rejects it (vol, viii p. 7, in spuriis).

Binterim (Denkio. v. i. 384) cites as evidence for the early celebration of this festival in the East a discourse of Gregory of Nazianzum and une of Gregory of Nyess. As regards the latter, first published by Gretser (lngoldatadt, 1620), it is sufficient to say that it appears to be certainly the work of Maximus Planudes (see Patrol. Gr. xliv. 35). The former, delivered in A.D. 381 before the hundred and fifty bishops in Constantinople, does not appear in the passage cited to have anything to do with the subject before us, but to be a bidding farewell to a certain church in Constantinople-Xaipete, $\alpha \pi \delta-$

In the Eastern church at the preaent day the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul is, save the wo chief festivals of St. John the Baptist, the only one not immediately connected either with our Lord or the Blessed Virgin, included in those of the first rank. The entry for the day in the

The festival of June 29 occurs also in the Ethiopic and Coptic calendars (Ludolf, al Hist. Aeth. Comm. p. 420). Besides this, Ludolf also mentions, but in the Ethiopic calendar only, festivals of Cephas and Saul on September 22, and of Peter and Paul on June $19^{\circ}$ and July 8 ; but it is possible that these do not all refer to the two apoatles.

- In place of the Peler and Paul of the Ethtoptc calendur, the Coptto calendar gives the Patriarch Puter.

In the calendar of the Armenian church given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. li1. 1, 645 sqq .), we find commemorations of St. Peter and St. Paul on June 29 and December 27, the former parhaus Western inportation in addition to an slreddy exlsting celebration. There is also a commemo ration of Peter and Paul, who are, however. perhaps not the apoatles, on June I.

In connexion with the twofold nature of the celebration in the Roman church, a difficulty has been needlessly raised on account of a notica in the Microloulus (c. 42 ; Patrol. cli. 1009), where, in a discusaion on the rule to be observed on the concurrence of two festivals in one day, it is said that one may be postponed to the following day, "as the holy pope Gregory decided to observe the feast of St. Paul after the feast of St. l'eter," Now in the Gregorian sacramentary, after the heading, iii. kalendas Julii. Natalis Petri et Pauli, comes the heading, pritio kalendas Julï. Natalis Sancti Pauli. A suti. cient explanation is given by Menard, that originally the pope celebrated mass twice on the earlier day, once in the charcb of St, Peter and then in that of St. Paul, the latter aervice being afterwards transferred to the following day. The hymn of Prudentius we have alreidy cited speaks of the two masses as said in different churches on the same day (Peristeph. xij. 57, sqq.).

Confirmation is also to be had from the Gela. alan sacramentary, where three masses are gired, beaides that for the vigil, one for St. Peter proprie, one for St. Paul propric, and one for both apostles; all three, however, being for June 29. The presumption naturally is that a mass was specisliy provided tor the service in the church of each of the apostles, and a third for use elsewhere on that day. On the above grounds, and consideriag too that in the service for June 29 in the Gre gorian sacramentaly the nsmes. of the two apostles are equally dwelt on, it is but reasonable to conclude that the special commemorstion of St, Paul, whether held on June 29, as in the Gelasisn, or on June 30, as in the Gregorian sacramentary, was due to the desire to give that apostle 40 equal share of honour, the other commemoration having been held in the basilica of St. Peter.
2. Liturgical Notices.-At the riak of a certain amount of repetition, it will be deairable now briefly to review the information derived from our chief extant liturgical monuments. Begioning with those of the Roman charch, we find in the Leonine sacramentary a series of mssses in which the one apostle enters as prominently as the other. One of the last of these has the heading, Item ad Sanctum Paulum, in which, however, St. Peter is mentioned co-ordinately with St. Paul. To the sacramentary of Gelasius we have already referred; we may repest here that we have a masa for the vigil of the apostlea Peter and Psul. This is followed by three masses, one for each apostle propirie, and one for a conjoiat celebration. A number of forme are slso given for the vespers, and a mass for the octave of the festival (lib. ij. 29, aqq.; Patrol. lxxiv, illít). In the Gregorian eacramentary is a mass for the vlgil, for the festival (Natalis Petri et Pauli') and on the following day is a mase for the Nutalis Sancti Pauli. There is also a mass for the octave (col.111, ad. Ménard). It may be noted here that in some MSS. of the Gregorian zucramentary there is a twofold vigil given, the second being in the night (ib. col. 404). In the Gregorian antiphonary, the vigil bears the name of St. Peter only, sad so too the festival of June 29, followed by the uativity of St. Paul on the next day Into this point, however, we need not further enter. The octave bears both names conjointly. In the Ambrosian liturgy, there is a mass for the vigil and for the festival of the two apostles, but no commemaration of St. Paul is indicated for the following day.

We pass next to tha Gallican church. In the ancient lectionary (Lectionarium Luxoviense), edited by Mabillon, the lections in festo Sanctorum, Petri et Pauli are an extract from the acconnt of their passion (in place of the ordinnry propheticnl lection), Romans viii. 15-27, St. Mntt. v. 1-16 Mabillon do Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. p. 159;

Wo may, however, apparently go with safety much further hack. There is extnnt a frngment of a homily of Aritus, bishop of Vienne (circa S. Petri, bearing the hending, "dicta in basilicn condidit" (no. 6; Put ool. lix. 294; and the first of the following fragments evidently belongs to this homily). Again, Gregory of Tours mentions the Natule of St. Peter and St. Pnul among the festivals whose vigils were to be observed in the church of Tours (Hist. Fran orvim, x. 31 ; p. 531, ed. Ruinart). After such evidence, it is rather curious that we should find in a letter of Catulfus publico celebrare the remark, "sancti Petri in pubiico celebrare regno tuo constitues " (Patrol. occurred, or what special rensong thect may have been for urging such a poinst, it is there may hnve dible to say.

Lastly, of the festival may be urged fothe Roman origin absence from important urged from the fact of its Gelasian eacramentary, stlll an important poing

[^103]the other way is that the first notice of the festival occurs in a Roman ealendar, two centuries before any other notice is found. This' fact, combined with the $\dot{a}$ priori likelihood that a festival which specially brought into prominence the idea of the primacy of Peter should take its rise in the Roman ehurch, may perhape justify us in thas striking the balance of probabilities. If so, it must however be admitted that the Roman ehurch did not at first bring the matter into such prominence as at a later time.

We must now enter into the evidence seriatim. Our earliest mention of the festival is that in the Bucherian calendar, where the entry is viï. k. l. Mart. Natale Petri dis Cathedru (Patrol. lxxiv. 677). This is a rather peculinr use of the word natale, but it is obvionsly equivalent to festivitus. In the calendar of Polomeus Silvius, which belongs to A.d. 448, we find on Yeb. 22 the entry, Depositio S. Petri et Pauli, followed by the words, "cara cognitio, ideo dicta, quia tune etsi fuerint vivorum parentum odia, tempore obitus deponuntur" (see Acta Sanctorum; January, vol. i. p. xlv). The reference in the latter sentence is doubtless to the heathen rite of the feralis or parcntalia, celebrated in the latter part of February, to which we must again refer, and this may be illustrated by the entry for the day in the calendar of Furius Dioussius Philocalus, which earries us back a century earlier, Caristin (Kollar, Analect. Vimdobon. i. 963). As to the meaning of the former clause, the Ballerini, in their notes on a eermon of St. Leo for the festival of St. \eter and St. Paul, suggest (vol. i. 498) that there was a confusion in Silvius's mind with the grent festival of June 29, aided, it is hinted, by his observing a festival of the Cuthedra Patri on Jan. 18. It is evident, however, that we cannot speak here otherwise than very doubtfally. What evidence the Leonine calendar might have afforded us, it is impossible to say, as the early part of the sacramentary is wanting. The festival is passed over, as has been already mentioned, in the Gelasian sacramentary. It is given in the Gregorian sacramentary as edited by Ménard (col. 29), though not in the text given by Muratori. In most MSS. of the Gregorian sacramentary, the hending is merely Ca:hedra Sancti Petri; the Cod. Ratoldi pretixes in Antiochia. Some editions give in Roma. This irregularity tends to confirm us in our notion, that the special idens of liome and Antioch are not of the original essence of the festival, but introduced as an afterthought.
In the Ambrosian liturgy there is no recognition of the festival; but in the Gallican church it nust have had a rather exceptional prominence, ns in Mabillon's Lectionarium Luxuriense not only are lections provided for the festival itself, but for three Sundays reckoned from it. It does not seem clenr whether this Gallican feast is to be placed in January or February. The much greater prominence of the festival of the latter month in the West generally would favour the view that the latter is meant. Morenver, Mabillon's Gothico-Gallic missal gives us a mass for the day, which follows that for the conversion of st. Paul, whicn fell on Jan. 25. Another argument may be aerived from the order of the seeond council of Tours (A.d. 567) forbidding offerings of food to the dead on this festival. This order we ehall cits at length presently. It will be remembered that we hava already raferred to the heathen practice a ${ }^{3}$ prevailing at the end of Februnry. On the othe: hand, Mabillon reminds us that forms are only given for two Sundays after the Kpiphany, and slso that after forms for three Sundays following the Catheitra Petri come thoss for the beginning of lent. This is clearly in favour of the Jamary date. There is aleo independent evidence that, in Gaul the feast of the Cathedra Petri fell in January. Mabillon cites from a Murt. Gie. lonense, "xv. kal. Februarii, secundum Gailos eathedra anneti l'etri apostoli." It will thus be seen that there are reasomable grounds for thinking that the Gallican festival fell in January, but of course the casa is not suthiciently strong to be at all pressed.
Be the mattor as it may, the majorty of martyrologies and calendars recognise the two festivals. Thus in the Mart. Hieromymi we have, "xv. kal. Febr. Dedicntio cathediras sancti Petri apostoli, qua primo Romae sedit"; aud "rijii. kal. Mnrt. Natalis cathedrae S. Petri apostoli, qua aedit apud Antiochinm." The murtyrology of Bede has the festival in February, but only some forms of it recognise that in January. Both are given in such martyrologies as those of Uspard., Rnbnnus Maurus, Notker, &c. Wandnlbert, on the other hand, gives only the festival of Feb 22, his notice for which is (Patrol. exxi. 590):
"Octavoque Petri cathedra et doctrina coruscat, Urbs iacta Autlochi quo prinum praesule venit."
Binterim, speaking of ancient German calendars, remarks (IIcnkw. v. 1-331) that but few recognise the festival of Jan. 18. It was mot till the time of pope Paul IV. (ob. A.D. 15:9) that it was definitely and nuthoritatively estailished.
2. Liturgical Notices.-We have seen that nothing is to be looked for from Loman liturgies before the Gregorian, some forms of which give a mnss for the Cathedra Pctri on Fcb. 22. The notion of the festival is made sulficiently plain by words oceurring in the service. Thus in the collect we read: "Petro, collatis claribus regni caelestis, naimas ligandi atque solvendi pontificium tradidisti"; or agnin in the Preface: "Petrum apostolorum principem ob confessionem Unigeniti Filii Tui $\qquad$ cnelestium claustrorum praesulem custodemque fecisti, divino ei jure concesso, ut ,quae stituisset in terris, servnrentur ia caelis."

Attention has been already called to the fact that in Mabillon's Lectionarium Luxoricnse, lections are provided both for the festival of the Cathedra Petri and for three Sundays reckoned from it, Die Domiuico post Cathedram sancti Petri, &sc. (Mabillon de Lituryia Gallicana, lib. ii. 119 ; Patrol. Ixxii. 181). The epistle and gospel for the festival are respectively Acts xii. 1-17, Matt. xvi. 13-19, John xxi. 15-19; the lenf of the MS. which contained the prophetical lection is wanting. The mass in the Gothico-Gallic missal brings out very strongly St. l'eter's confession as its central idea ( 0 p. cil. lib. iii. 226; Patred. 1xxii. 181).

In the Mozarabic missal, which has the one commemoration in February, the prophetic lection, the epistle and gospel are respectisely lga. xxxii. 1-19 (with several omissinat),

3. Misceilineous Aotices.-W Whave referred abore to the order of the council of Tours $\ln$ connexion with this festival; we shall now cite part of the rule it question. After protesting sguinst the heathen abuses connected with the calends of January, and still practised in the sisth century, it proceeds : "Sunt $\varepsilon$ tiam, qui in feativitata Cathedrae domiai Petri Apostoli cibos mortuis offerunt et post missas redeuntes ad domos proprias, ad gentilium revertuntur errores, et post Corpus Domini snerntas daemoni escas scipiunt" (can. 22; laabbe, v. 863).
We find this practice referred to in the urmons for the Cuthedra Petri formerly sttributed to Augustiae, but palpably spurious (Sermm, 190-192 in Append (Scrmin. 190-1.92 in Append. ; vol. v. 2836, ed. Grume). Reference is made to a deadly error defanctorum cibos et ving, "at super tumulos defanctorum cibos et vina conferunt" (Serm. 190, c. 2; ce. 191, c. 3). We may remark here ia Augustine's time. The custom all in Afriea sbove, like many other henthen practicen, seems to bsve lasted on in the church for a long time; ond, in the 12th century, John Beleth refers to it in such a way as to indicate its long continuance (hat. div. off. e. 83; Patr,l. ecli. 87). He gres so far ns to describe the institution of the Christian feast as mainly designed to counteract the henthen feast. After onying that annually, on a certain day in lebruary, the heathen were in the habit of placing a fenst on the graves of their parents, for the refreshing of the spirits of the dend, but which demons devoured, he proceeds to say that this custom was so deeply rooted tholy men instituted the festival of the Calhella Pectri, fixing it on the same day on which those abominnale things were done by the benthen, so that thereby it should be altngether got rid of. Still the old custom left a trace of itself eren on the Christian rite, "unde etiam nb cpularum." It may perhaps be worth mentioning here that there is otill preserved in the Vatican a wooden chair, which is asserted to be the veritable one in which St. Peter ent. On this and on the wholequestion of the festival of the Cuthe Ira Petri, reference may be made to Phoebeus, Dissertitio de ulentitate cathedrae in qua S. ## (iii.) Tute Festival of S. Perri ad Vin. CULA, ETC.

Both the Eastern and the Western ehurchee conmemorate the imprisonment of St . Peter by Herod Agripna and his miraculous deliremnce. 0 n Jsm, 16 is the St, Peter's Chain in the Greek the Festival of Jan. 22 in the Armenian church (Assemani, h. c.): also August 1 is the Western festival Natale S. Petri ad Vincula. Neither of these timen, it will be observed, can be meant to represent the actusl time of the event, which fell thortly before Easter (Acts xii. 4); but it is chain $!$
prebnble that in both cnses the date has raference to the dedication of a ehurch in memory of it. The Western festival has by some been ansocinted with the chnins with which the apostle way bound by Nero; this, however, was discing not the primary iden, and we shall Wiscuss tho point at length presently.

Afterwards it was removed to Constantinople and deposited in the ehrine of St. Peter, which is in the Great is observed there his cemmemoration ( $\sigma \dot{\nu}$ agagr) As to th. is anid the supposed date of this event, nothing festival and it is quite uncertain when the festival commemorating it arose. There is, indeed, a sermon for it extant of which the latin trausIntion is given in Lipomannus and Surius (do probatis Sunctorum Historiis, vol. iv. 447); the Greek text itself also is found in MSS. in the Vatican Library and elsewhere, but, so far na I am aware, it has not been printel. The sermon, however, is ebviously of a date long subsequent to Chrysostom, and Baronius (not. in Mart. Aug. 1) asalgns it to Proclus or Germanus, patriarchs of Constnntinople. Baronius recounts how the empress Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius II., brought from Jerusnlem in A.D. 439 the two chaine with which the apostle had there been bound, one being sent for a church in Constantinople, and the other given to the empress's daughter Eudoxia, the wife of Valentinian Iil., who built a church on the Esquiline in its honour! As regards this story, we may remark that there is no trace of it in any Greek writer whatsoever. Nicephorus Callistus even, When spenking of Eudocia's journey to Jerusalem, nad of the relies thence brought by her Petist. Eccles, xiv. 2), makes no mention of St. Peter's chain. It may be added that this story is equally absent from any but quite late Western records, and may be summarily dis. missed. All that may be safely assuned is that at some time a church was built in Constantinople in memory of St. Peter's imprisonment; and there, doubtless in accordance with the taste of the age, chnins deelared to be his were treasured up.
In the Western church, too, the date on which the festival fell probably had reference to the founding ot a church. This is spoken of in many martyrologies as one built and conseerated by St. Peter himself, with no mention of nny iniprisonment. We cannot claim a very early date for it, for it is ahsent from the Kalendarium Carthaginense, the calendar of Bucherins, and the Leonine and Gelasian sacramentaries. Nor does

R This is on the whole the story as toid in the modern Roman brevisry, which adds that the chain brought from Jerusaien to Rome, when piaced by the pope with the became whith which the apostle bad been bound by Nero,

It occur in the Callican or Mozarable liturgles. The reference to the dedlcation of a chureh spoken of above oceurs e.!. in the Murt. Ilieronymi, "Romae, dedientlo primae ecelesiae s beato Petro constructae at consecratas" (though some forms anld, "et absolutio ejus a vinculis "), the Martyrology of IJede, In some of Its forms (I'atrod. xeiv. U93), Rabanus Nautus (ib. ex, 1160), &ce. The metrioal martyrology of Bede, It may be noted, omita the featival altogether.

That this church, whatever may be lta real bistory, either was origlaally built in memory of St. Petar's imprisonment, or aoon became associated with that idea, may be inferred e.g. from the heading tor the day in the Gregorian sacramentary ad sanctun Petrum ad Vincula. Wandaibert, in his metrical martyrology, tells ns, "Carcere Roma Petrum celebrat vinclisque reiluctum " (Patrol. exxl. 606). The anelent Mart. Geilonense gives (D'Achery, Spicilegium, xiji. 408), "Roma ad vincula catenas Sancti Petri osculindas." Similarly Ueuard. (Acta Sunctorum, July, vol. vi. 399), Notker (Patrol cxxxi. 1129), &ic. The last-named writer, nfter apesking of the church erected by St. l'eter as the first in Europe, adds that in this were deposited the chains from the prison in Jerusalem.

It may be next asked what grounds we have for judging whether it ls the Herodian or the Neronian imprisonment that is referred to. On this, besides our citation from Wandalbert and Notker, we may appeal to the Gregorian sacramentary (in loc.; col. 117, ed. Ménard), where the reference in the words "Qui beatum Petrum spestolum a einculis absolutum illaesom nbire fecisti "is nnmistakable. The homily aseigned to Bede (lib. iil. 96, de Vinculis Sancti Petri; Patrol, xciv. 498) ls spurious. This dwells on the chnins brought from Jerusalem and the church built in Rome in their honour by pope Alexander I. It neems pretty obvious therefore that the writers who have apoken of the chains as those of Nero have merely wished to strengthen the Roman associations. It may be worth noting that, besides the church of S. Pistro in Vincoli on the Eaquiline hill, there is also one of S. Pietro in Carcere on the Capitoline, the latter clearly referring to St. Petara imprisonment at Rome, and thus more or lesa disconnecting the former from that event. This ehurch is mentioned in tha Gregorian sacramentary, as edited by Pamelius, under the Monday after tha first Sunday in l.ent, in a note of the station, ad Sanctum Petrum ad Vincula. Durandue (Hat. Dic. Off. vij. 19) combines both reasons as causing the festival. On the whole of the sbove question, reference may be made to Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (June, vol. vil. 410 ) ; also Monsacrati, Dissertutio do Catewis S. Petri ad Bencdictum, xiv. 1750.
The familiar English name for this day fa Lammas, probably a corruption of the AngloSaxon Hlaf-muesse, i.e. Loaf-masa; reeing that on that day the Saxons offered an oblation of loaves made from new corn (sea Bosworth's AngloSaxon Dictionary, and Strattmann's Dict. of the Old English Lan juagc, s. v. Mlaf; Wedgewood, Dict. of English Etymology, s. v. Lanmas). Thus, in the Sarum manual, the day is called Benedictio novorum Fructuum. Some have chosen to consider Lammas as a corruption of Lamb-mass, on the ground that lambs were offered at this tims; and it has been meationed that tenants of the chapter of the cathedrnl of York fommerly jaid live lamb on Aug. 1. There does not howerer seem to be much authority for this Intter riew, though it is certainly curlous that we find a Weish name for the day, Dydd deguom ryn, Lambtithing day.

Besides the above three feetivala, we find in the Ethiopie calendar a commemoration of St. Peter on July 31 (Iudolf, p. 424), with merely the ontry, Petor the Apristle. Also, in the Armeaian caleadar (Assemani, l, c.), is the antice under May 24, "the finger of tho huly nowstle Peter," of the reference in which 1 am quite nnaware.

A considernble amount of apocryphal literature has been associated with tho name ot St. l'efer. A pasaing notice of it may be givenhere; for de. tailed Information concerning it, ruference may be made to the aeveral articles in the Dictionary of Christian Biography and Literuture. Eusebing (Hist. Eccles. 1ii. 3) mentions as works falsely ascribed to St. Pcter, his Acta, Gospel, J'reaching ( $\kappa$ hov $\gamma \mu a$ ), and Apocalypae. The Gospel of l'eter is also referrad to by Origen ( Cumm . in M it. xiii. 55), Euseblus ( Inist. Excles. iii. 25 ; vi. 12) Jerome (de Viris Illustr. c. 1), Theodoret (Haeret. Fabul. Compend. 1i. 2). The last-nand identifies it with the gosjel used by the Nazarenes. The Gospel and Acts of leter were condemned as spocryphal by $n$ conucil held at Rome in the episcopate of Gelasius, A.D. 494 (Patrol. lix. 175). Bebides Eusebius (l. c.) and Jerome ( (c. c.), the Acts of leter are referred to by laidore of Pelusjum ( lipist. lib. ii. 99 ; I'utiol Gr. lxxviil, 544); and, according to Philastrius (Hacr. 88 ; Patrol, xii. 1200), Acts of leter were in use among the Manichaenns. Acte of leter and l'aul have been published by 'lischentorf (Aota Apost. Apoc. pp. 1, bqq.), and also Acts of Peter and Andrew (A,ocal. Apoc. pp. 161 sqq.). The Prenching of Pater is cited by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 5, 15, \&c.), Origen (Comment. in Joan. tom. xiii. c. 17), \&c. His Apoeulype is cited by Clement (Eul. Proph. 41 , 48, 49), and in the Muratorian canon it is classed with the Apocalypse of St. John, though it is added that some are opposed to ita being read in the chnrch. An apocalypse of Peter, diatinct from the nbove, existed in Arabic, of which thera are MSS. in the Bodleian and Vatican Libraries (Tischendorf, Apocal. Apoc. p. xx).

In uddition to the above, another work, the Heplodon IItrpou, is mentioned, e.g. by derome (adv. Jovin. i. 262), and is obvionsly the same as the Itincrarium I'etri condemned at the Roman council under Gelasius. Jerome also speaks (de Vir. Ill. c. 1.) of the Judicium Petri, and Rufinus (Expos. Symb. Ap. 38) mentions, amung books not canonical, that "qui appellatur Duse Viae, vel Judicium Petri." The extant fragneats of the abova worka have been collected, with full information concerning them, by Hilgenfeld (Nuvum Testanentum extra Canoncm receptum, Fasc. 5).

revenues of the see of Rome, dorived originally simply from the patrimony of the Roman bishopric, should have proved inalequate to the papal requiroments as the oupreme pontiff gradually sssimad the superviaion of the whole chureh-A fuaction invoiving a costly expenditure in every country thist acknowledged his supremacy. Among other expedients for meeting this ditilculty, the tribute known woder the name of Peter's Peace was systematically levied in England (though often dieputed and withheldi) until abolished in J534 by Henry VIll. This was a tax of oas peauy on every haarth collected at the Feast of St. Petar and St. Panl (June 29).
Accoriliag to the atatement of Leo III. (Pope, A.D. 795-816), the tax was instituted by Off, king of the Mercians, in the ycar 787, out of gratitude to Jladrian J. for that pontiff's authocization of his plan of dividing the province of Canterbury and establishing a new archbishoprio at lichfield (Haddan and Stubbe, Councils, iii. 455 ; Stubbs, Const. Mist. i. 220). According to the traition preserved in the Life of Offa ( $\mathrm{p}, 29$ ) ascribed to Matthew Paris and printed by Wata along with his edition of the Historia Major of that writer (1640)-a tradition retailed with amplitications by Walsingham (Gesta Abbat. Monast. S. Albani, ed. Riley, i. 5)-Otia made the graat as an acknowledgment of extensive immunities granted to the newly-fonnded monaetery of St. Alban's. The above Lifs of Offa is, however, to so great an extent fabulous, that this statement is hardly eatitled to any credit. A more trustworthy account of the origin of this tix is probrbly that given by William of Malmesbury, who says that it was lnstituted in the yoar 855 by king Ethelwulf, on his visit to Rome, partly, it would seem, in retura for the hoaourable reception previousig accorded to hie son Aifred by Leo IV., who had also avointed the latter king: " Romam, composito regno, ablit; iblque tributum, quod Auglia hodie pensitat, sancto Petro obtuift coram quarto Leone paps, qai etiam antea filium ejus ad oe misaum honorifice susceperat, et regem inunxerat" (Gest. Rejum Angl. bk. ji. ed. Hardy, p. 152). "The graat," says Hardy, "appears to have been made after Aethelwulf's return to England, by what Asser calla a commendatory epistle, in which he oriered three hundrad mancuses to be sent annuslly to Rome, one-third of whioh the pope himself waa to have, the remainder to be equally distributed between the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul to provide lights on Fister Eve" (see also Haddan and Stubbe, Councils, iii.

In northern Europe, this tax was not institated until much later: in Denmark, in the rsign of Cnut ; in Norway and Sweden, by the cardinal-legate, Nicholas, in the years 1152 , 1153(Walter (F.), Kirchenrecht, sec. 198). About the same time the payment appears to have bees granted by Haraid, carl of Orkney, from the county of Caithness (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iij. 250). The tribute appeara to have bean scknowiedged as the pope's due by William the Conqueror, though irregularly paid in Eng-

[^105]land during his relgo (Selden, Append. to Eadmer p. 164 ; Lanfr. Eipp. ed. Giles, No. x.). [J. B. phillip, apobtle, Leoemd and Febtival of. Of the liff of this spostle, beyond what is toid us in the New iestament, but little is toid us in the New estament, but little is known, aud in much of this there la a counfasion between the aposile and his numesake the deacon. Clement of Alexandrin tells us (Strom. iti. 52 ; cited hy Lusebius, Hist. Eccles. ijiz. 30). that Pbilip hind children, and that he gave his dnughters in marriage. We salso gather from ters in marriage. We also gather from the same writer (ib, ir. 71) that Philip was not one of those whose life's work was erownod by those whose life's work was erowned by a martyr's denth. All this is possible enough, martyr's danth. All this is possible enough, bat the remirks of Poly crates apparently indicate a conturion bet confusion between the two Philipe. $\mathrm{H}_{e}$ speaks (sp. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. Lii. 31 ; cf. . . . . . 24 ) of of Philip as falling asleep nt Hiernpolis; Philip as falling asleepp at Hierapolio; as as having had two daughters who remnined virging to old age, and a third (presumably a married one, from Being thus separated from the other two), who, in Ephesus. Eusebiue then proceede to quote from the Dialogue of Caius, where mention is made of the four daughters of Philip, prophetesses at Hierapolis, at which place at Hierapolis, at which place was their tomb and that of their father. On comparing these notices with Aets xxi. 8 , it can hardly bo doubted that we have somewhat rary ing forms of tradition we bave somewhat rarying forms of tradition as to the persons there mentioned, more eatecinall to the persons there mentioned, more especially When Eusebius himself proceds to cite this last pesage as relevant to the matter. The legends contaiued in the Apocryphal Acts of i'hilip are thtaliy undeserving of credit, and it is is quite hopeless to try to determine which of the two Philips is indicated.

As regards the festival of St. Phillp. we find that he, like mest of the apostlen, had no sieecial nnd individual commemoration till comy, aratively lato. Among the earlieat witheases in the wast, where St. Philip is as a rule annociatel with St. James the Less on May 1, are the Juartyrologium Hieronymi, the metrical martyrulegy of Bede, and the Gelaalian, Gregnian and Ambrosian St. Phamentnrios, In the tirst of these documenta ${ }_{22}$ St. Philip is commemorated on two duys, April 22 and May 1, besidea the mention in the list of njuatles at the beginning-" $K_{\text {Kill. }}$ Stuii. In civitnte Hierapoli, provineine Asine, depositio Phillippi npostoli." On April 2s, St. If itilip is comuemorated alone; on May 1 , in connexion with St. James, a mention of Hierapolis being In ench case brought in (Patrol. $\times \times \mathrm{x} .467,469$ ). For the notices in Bede and eloewhere, where the two apostles are conjoined, and for the possible reason for the conjunction, reference may be made to the article on St. James the liess, Aa to the Roman liturgion, nothing need here be added. We mast note, however, that the ancient Gallican forms published by, Mabillon make no mention of a festivnl of St. Philip at ali, nor was he recognised in the Mozurabic missal.
On passing to the east, we no longer find the two apostles nasociated. In the Byzantine Philip the Dencon belated on November 14, October the Dencon being commemorated on metrical Greek $E$ nhetiee for the former in the broch to the Aota Sinitorums for by Pape-Terdprp. In the calendars of the EThioplo and Coptio charches also, November 14 is the day reserved for St. Phillip (Ludolf, ad /fist, Aeth. Comm. p. 3999, and Detober 11 for Hisily Aeth. Deacon. It is true that the latter is spoken of as Phillip "the Apostle," but then the Coptio calendar, adds the words "one of the seven deacons"; and in this it does but agree with the Menaea, which not only applies the name A postle to Philip the Deacon, bat also generaliy extenda the nse of the term considerably. In the calendars of the Armenisn church, which are given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. iti. 1. 644), St. Philip is commemorated on November 17. The "Philip the Apostle" mentioned by the first of the two calendars on February 9 , is defned by the second as "Philip, the Dencon and Apostle." is A certain amount of pseudonyinons literature is associated with the name of St. Philip, but it will be generally quite uncertain whether the apostle apostle or the deacon is the person intended. We have a gospel of Philip mentioned by Epiphaniue (Hiter. xxvi. 13) ns in use among the Gnostics.
Acte Acts of Philip were condernned by the council held in Rome in 494 A.b., under the episcopate of Silasing (Patrod. lix. 162). It is probably this the that is referred to by Anastasius Sinaita as in Cod. Pseul. Vct. Tcst. i. 806). The Greek text, odited her several large fragments of it, was first edited by Tischendorf (Acta Apost. Apocrypha, p. xxsi. 75; Apoced. Apoc. p. 141). Syrinc Acta have been published by Dr. Wright (Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles). This is a different document from the preceding, and probably refers to Philitit the Deacon.

PHILOSARCAE was, according to Jerome (Epist. 61 ad Pummach.), a name given by the Origeniste to those who believed in the resurrection of the same Identical flesh and bones which were buried. They also called surh believers "pelusiotas, luteos, animales, carnece" (Hieron. Epist. 65 ad Pamm. et Occan.), as not having attained to the things of the Spirit. The word mฑ入ouviôtas is explained by Jerome himself (Comm. in Jerem. xxix. p. 407) to mean "in luto istius corporis constituti." As the nichname was Alexandrian, there may be some alln. sion to Pelusium, the force of which is lost (Bingham's Antiq. 1. li. 17).

PHILTRE. The early Christians folly admitted the alleged power of magic to excito love or hatred, though believing themselves to be protected from its influence. Thus in the Clementina Appion is made to say that, when hopelessly enamoured in hia youth, he "fell ia with a certain Egyptian thoroughly versed in the arta of the Magi . . . . who freely tsught hi:m the charm (enausotiv), hy means of which he was successful" (Hom. v. 3). Gregory Nazianzen tells us that the legendary Cyprian in his endeavoure to corrupt Justina, eniployed the gervices of a dasmon "whose reward was sacrifices and libations and that close relation which is established through the blood and the odour from the viotims" (Orat, xxiv. § 10). PLIOTIUS, martyr with Anicetue at Nicomelia under Diocletian; commemorated Ang. 12 (Basil. Menol. ; Cal. Byzant. ; Daniel, Cod. Litury. iv. 265 ; Mart. Rom. Photinve; Wright's S,r. Mart. gives a Photius at Nicomedia with Archelaus and Cyrinus under Mar. 4). [C. H.]

PHYLACTELIY. Any thing might be ao called to which a protective power, nut due to naturnl causes, was ascribed. Thus Gregory of Rome in 603 sends to king Adulovald "phylacteries, i.e. a cross with wood of the holy cross of the Lord, and a lesson of the holy Gospel inclused in a lersian case" ( $E p$. xii. 7 ad Theodel.). Gregory himself wore suspended from his neck "phylacteries of relics " (Joan. Discon. in Vita Greg. iv. 80). [Ligaturate.] But the terin was chiefly applied to written charms, and of these we propose to speak now.

The use of "phylacteries" is frequently condemned without explanation, as by the council of Ladicea, probably in 365, which forbids the clergy to "mako what nre called phylacteries," by Epiphanius, 368 (De Fide, 24), by St. Eligius, $6+0$ (De Re:t. Cath. Convers. 3, 5, 7), by the council ot' Rome, 721 (can. 12), by Zachary of Rome, 743 (Ep. 2 ad Bonif. §6), in a law of Charlemagne, 769 (Cupitulure, i. c. 6), in a penitential of Angers (Morinue, de Sacram. Pocnit. 586), &c. But they are often described as written documents. Thus Caesarius of Arles, 502: "Phylacteria diabolica per characteras" (Scrm. 66, § 3 ; comp. §5). Boniface in the council of Leptines, 743: "Phylacteria, i.e. scripturas" (can. 33; Opp. Bonif. 142, ed. Würdtw.). The Capitularies of the French Kings : "Phylacteries or false writings" (vi. 72). The name was not used among the Latios so early as by the Greeks; for St. Augustine, 397, describes them without empluying it ; "Ligaturae ntque remedia . . . Bive in praecantationibus, sive in quibusdam notis quos characteras vocant" (Dc Doctr. Christ. ii. 20, $ 30). Neither Isidore, who copies this sentence (Etymol. viii. 9 n. 30), nor Hincmar, who borrow it from Isidore (De Dieort. Hloth. et Tetb. Resp. 15) introduces the word, from which we may perhaps infer that it was not even in their times very fanviliar to all the Latins.

Written charms are condemned under the name of phylacteries in the decree ascribed varionsly to Gelasius and Hormisdas de Apocryphis: "Phylacteria omnia quas non angelorum (ut illi confingunt) sed dsemonum magie arte conecripta sunt, apocryphs" (Hard. Conc. 1i. $9+2$ ).

The name was without doubt bnrrowed immediately from the Jews; and the general restriction of its meaning in practice is due to that circumstance. The Jewish phylacteries (tephlllin) were two pieces of parchment, on which were written four texts of Scriptare (Exod. xlii. 1-10, 11 16; Deut. $\mathrm{V} .4-9$; xv. 13-21). One of these was bound on the forehead, the other on the left arm at prayar. They were believed to avert evil from the wearer and to procure blessings for him, owing to the name of God (Shaddai, Almighty) being on them (Beveridge on Can. Laod. 36 ; Pandect. ii. 196; Schleusner, Lex. N. T. in v.)

The Jewish practice would also naturally suggest the freguent use of the Scriptures as phylacterics. St. Chrysustom, after speaking of the custom of the Jews, adds, that in like man. ner "many women now suspend the Gospela from their necks" (IIom. 72 in S. Matt. Ev, §2) and elsewhere "Do yon not see how women and little children hang the Gospela from their necks for a great protection" (фu入aкฑิs, Hom xix. ad Antioch. §4). St. Augustine mentions a practice of putting the Gospel on the hesd when it ached. He says that men wers ao besotted with ligaturae that he rejoiced when he found this done; not because they did it, but "because the Gospel was preferred to ligaturse " (ln S. Joan. Ev. Tract. vii. 12). This use of the Gospels continued for many ages. Thus Nilus the Younger, who died in 1005 , having met with an accident," took out of his bosom the phylactery which he always carried there (this whis a folding book, the treasure of the New Testsment) and put it to his eyes and lips and bresst " (Vita Niii, ix. 63; Bolland. Sept. 26). In the West, however, even this was distinctly pronounced unlawful. St. Jerome commenting on the Jewiah practice: "Hoc apud nos superstitiosse mulierculae in parvalis cvangeliis, et in crucis ligno, et istiuamodi rebus . . . usque hodie factitant, culicem liquantes, et camelum glatientes" (Comm. in St. Mfatt. Ev. iv. 23), St. Eligius (u. s.): "Etsi dicatur, quod rea sancta sit et lectiones divinas contineat, quia non est in eis remedium Christi, sed reneaum diaboli." [Compare Ligaturae, p. 990.]

PILGRIMAGE (Peregrinatio). A pilgrim

 Whs one who travelled from a motive of religion to any place considered sacred, because peculiarly associated with the memory of Christ or soy of tha saints. The growth of that feeling towards auch placea which led to pilgrimages has been traced in the article on Holy Places, Vol. I. p. 774. We now propose to spenk of the chief resorts of early pilgrims, their immediate motives, sad other matters of interest connected with them.I. The Holy Land-Paula snd Eustochium, writing in 386 , suppose that there had been a constant stream of pilgrime to Jerusnlem from the very infancy of the church: "It would be tedious now to run through every age from the sacension of the Lord to the present day, and enumerate the bishops, the martyrs, the men eloquent in ecclesiastical learning, who have come to Jerusslem, beeanse they thought that thay bad less roligion, leas knowledge, and had not, as the phrsse is, received the finishing atroke of their virtues, unless they had adored Christ in those places whence the Gospel had first thome forth from the Cross" (Ep. 46 inter Epp. Hieranym. ad Murcellam, § 9). The record of earlier visits ia sennty; but it is probable that these writers were not miataken. We must except from the holy places visited by their predecessors the most sacred of all; viz. the sepolchre of Christ and Calvary, which from the time of Adrian to thast of Conatantine were covered by a Fast meund of earth surmounted by a temple of Venus. It is to be obsserved Engebius, who to be observed, however, that yesrs old when those sites wand was sixty merely asys that the hesthen madly thought that by concesling them they should hide the trath (Vita Const. iii. 26); from which we ahould not infer that he was accustomed to see or hesr of crowda of pilgrims eagerly inquiring for the ecene of every grest Christion event. On the other hand, Sozomen, more than a ceatury later, infiuenced by the opinions and the custem of his own day, clesrly supposen that pilgrims wonld have frequented those sites in great numbers if they had remained exposed. Acoording to him the heathen hoped that truengh the means which they employed "the would in the the reverence paid to that place tisut neither daring of time be forgotten, ChrisCHIIST. ANT.-VOL. II.

We opoint it ont to others " (Fist. Eccl. il. 1). Holy band also that the first visitors to the Holy Jand of whom we have mention were at least as much inquirers as devotees. Alexande", the first whose name is recorded, is expressly said to have gone there cùx $\hat{\eta} s$ каl т $\hat{\nu} \nu \tau \delta \pi \omega \nu$ latopfas ivekev (Euseb. Hist. vi. 11). Origen, hls friend, A.n. 230, describes his own risit to the Holy Land as a "gearch after the footstep/s of Jesus and His disciples and the prophets" (Comm. in Ev. S. Joann. tom. vi. § 24 ). Fir. milinn, about 240 , is more vaguely said by Jeroms to have gone to Pnlestine " sub occaione sanctorum locorum " (De Vir. Illust. 54).
pilgrim, the mother of Cunstantine, is the first pilgrim to the Holy land of whose visit we have anything like a detailed account. About the year 328 , when above seventy years of ange, she mastened thither to ofler "thank-oflerings by means of vows (or "prnyers;" хapıбтทpta $\delta_{i}$ " ๒ux $\omega \boldsymbol{v} \boldsymbol{\nu}$ ), and to "seek knowledge of the land worthy of veneration." "When she land bestowed auituble worship on the footsteps of the Saviour, in accordance with the saying of the prophet, Let us worship the place whers His feet have stood (Ps. exxxii. 7), she forthwith bequeathed to pusterity a fruit of her personnl derotion" (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 42) in two churches which she built, "one at the Cave of the Nativity, the other on the Mount of the Ascension " (ib. 43). About five years after the visit of Helen, a traveller whose name is unknown, thongh the diary of his voyage is extant (Itincraria Romanorum, Wesseling, Amstel. 1735, pp. 549-617), journeyed from Bordeaux to Jerusalem, whence he returned by a ditlerent route from that by which he came. He was evidently a religions pilgrim; for notes are rarely himself on holy ground, his atages snd distances. list of sacred places, Ha gives us a long Ond often with some saw Tarsus, the birthplace way from home he of the house the birthplace of St. Paul, the site of the house (Sarepta, not mentioned) where where bustained Elijah, Monnt Carmel, Caesares sacrificed, the bath of Cornelius at Caearea, a certain spring claiming miraculous power on Nount Sinsi, Stradela, where Ahab sat and Elijah prophesied, tha scene of David's victory over Golinth, Mount Gerizim, Jacob's well in Sichar, Luz, where he saw the vision and wrestled with the angel, sad where tha hand of Jerobonm was withered. Arrived at Jerusalem he saw the pools made by Solomon on either side the temple, the two called Betherda, a crypt in which Jewish tradition taught that Solomon had confined evil spirita, the pinnacle of the Temptation, the place where Solomon whs said to have written the beok of Wisdom, his reservolrs, the stons stained with the blood of Lscharias, the marks of the spikes on the caligne of the soldiers who killed him, the house of Hezekiah, the pool of Siloam, the house of Caiaphas, and the pillar at which our Lord was scourged, the site of the house of David, the the city the praetorium of Pilate. Out of the city he visited Mount Golgotha, and, Antonin] Placentini from it ("eighty steps"), in which the Body of Jesus was crypt the church lutely built there by Constantide, the Valley of Jehoshaphat, the scene of the betrayal, the monaments of Hezekiah and Isaiah, Mount Olivet and the new church thereon, the Mount of Tranafigaration, the grave of Lazarus, the sycamore of Zacchaeus, the fountain made wholeame by Elisha, where was shewn him the vessel that held the aalt, the house of Rahab, the site of the plle of twelve stonea from the Jordan, the place of our Lord's baptism, the little hill whence Elijah was taken up to heaven, the tomb of Rachel, Bethlehem, and the church built there by Helen, the tombs of Ezekiel, David, Solomon, \&c., near it, the spring at which Philip baptized the eunuch, the place where Abraham dwelt under a tercbinth trea (Gen. x $\mathrm{a}^{2} \mathrm{iii}$. 4) and dug a well. In returning home he notea all the stages, as before, but only connects one with sacred history, viz. Philippi, where Paul and Silas were imprisoned.

It will be observed thint in this careful enumeration of sacred objects and places there is no mention of that which a few years later was the chief attraction of pilgrims to Jerusalem, the supposed cross of Christ. This at once disproves the later tradition of its having been found by Helen [Cross, finding of, Vol. I. p. 504 ; Iloly Places, dii. Vol. I. p. 776]. Many instances occur of pilgrims going to Jerusalem "to adore the holy cross," see e.g. the accounts of John of Sochus (John Moschus, Pratum Spirit. 180), Thalelaeus (ib. 91), Christopher (ib. 105), Theophilue and his two companions Vita Mucarii Rom. 3), the author of the Life of Euthymitss (Vita Euth. 136), &c.

Paula, the friend of Jerome, visited every ascred place and object of which ahe obtained information. "Entering the sepulchre she kissed the atone of the resurrection, which the angel had moved away from the door of the tomb ; and licked with faithful mouth the very place of the body in which the Lord had lain; as if being athirst she longed for water." "A pillar was ahewn to her, supporting the porch of a church, stained with the Lord's blood, at which He is said to have been bcund and acourged. The place was shewn to her where the Holy Ghoat came down on above one hundred souls of believers." Having "entered Bethlehem, going into the cave of the Saviour, after seeing the sacred lodging of the Virgin and the atall $\qquad$ she solemnly affirmed in my preaence that she saw with the eyes of faith the babe wrapped in awaddling clothes, the Lord wailing in tlie manger, the Magi worshipping, the star ahining above, the virgin mother, the careful foster-father, the shepherds coming by night . . . the infants alain, Herod raging, Joseph and Mary fleeing into Egypt." "Thence she went down to the tower Ader, i.e. of the flock, near which Jacob fed his flocks, and the shepherds watching by night were privileged to hear, "Glory to God in the highest," \&c. She saw "the glittering croas of Mount Ollvat, from which the Saviour ascended to the Father entered the sepulchre of Lazarus, saw the house of Martha and Mary, and Bethphage," the spot where Christ mounted the ass, the scene of the parable of the good Samaritan, the aycamore of Zacchaeus, the place where the blind man strod by the wayaide. She also travelled to many places in Paleatine of note in the history of the Old Teatament, both before and after her visit to Jerusalem; and lastly went to Egypt, where ahe would probably have remained amoug the ascetics of the desert, " ni majus sanctorm locorum retraxisset desiderium" (Hievon. Eip. 108 ad Eustoch. $9-14$ ). We hare omitted much of her tour, but given enough to show that pilgrims were now directed to many holy places which their guides did not profess themselvea able to identify when some sixty years before the pilgrim of Bordeaux travelled over the same ground. Paula sketched a similar route for herself and her friend Marcella when the latter should travel to the Holy Land (Puul. et Eustoch. ad Marc. Ep. 46 inter Epp. liieron. §. 12). Gaudentiua of Brescia, A.D. 387, mentiona a pilgrimage that he made to Jerusalem, but gives no particulara (De Icdic. Basilicae ia Vet. Brix. Episc. Opusc. 340, Brix. 1738).

At this period and onward the aotices of pilgrimagea to Jerusalem are very frequent. For thirty-aeven years, Melania the elder, who died in 410 , exerciaed hospitality towards Christisas who came to that city "for their vow's sake, both biahops, and monks and rirgins, and those joined in marriage, towards persens both in high position and thoae of private condition, inhabitante of Peraia, and Britain, and all the isles" (Pallad. Hist. Lans. 118). The Arabic collection of canons, falsely ascribed to the council of Nicaea,' says, "Faithful sons of the Church of God, when ye enter on a piigrimsge to pray and visit the houses of God, the places of His holiness, and the footsteps of His Christ, load not your bodies with meat and drink," \&c. (Decr. Alia, 25 ; Hard. i. 520). Some emineat namea are preserved. Philorhomus, a friead of St. Basil, "for a vow went twice on frot to Jerusalem to do honour to the hely places" (ibid. 113). Fabioia, who died in 399, sailed thither from Rome, and for a time was the guest and disciple of St. Jerome (Hier. Ep. 77 ad Ocean. 7). A few yeara later Maraaa and Cyra travelled from Beroes in Syria "to Aelia from a desire to behold the sacred places of Christ's aufterings " (Theodoret, Hist. Relig. 29). Peter, who was known to Theodoret when the lattep was a child, ia another example. In 421, Porphyrius of Gaza, then a young man, was seized with a" divina longing to adore the holy and venerable placea of God" at Jerusalem. Not content with one visit, some five yesrs lster, though in great alckness, he went there again, and "non cessabat quotidie obire loca sancta, innitens baculo" (Vita Porph. i. 4, auct. Marco Diac.) About this time also, Mark, his biographer, happened to "sail out of Asia to worship the holy places" (ibid. 5). The em.press Eudocia went as a pilgrim to Jerusalem in 438 (Socrat. Hist. Ecci. vii. 47). She also spent there the last ten or eleven years of her life, and evinced har religious interest in the holy city by repairing its walle, founding monasteries, and building the charch of St . Stephen st the place of his martyrdom (Evagr. Hist. Ecol. L 21, 22). Licinias, bishop of Tours, A.d. 508, " is anid to have been in the East and to havt Martin, a Panaonian by birth, afterwarda bishop of the monastery of Dumium, and in 562 archhishop of Braga, "made a rapid voyage to the East to visit the holy places, end ao imbued himself with learning sa to be conaidered inferior to no one of hia day " (ibid. v. 38; Isid. Hispal. De lïr. Illus. 45). Many other names might be given ; but the details in each case are so ccinty and devoid of interest, and so few of them come to us from authors of full credit, that it would be useless to attempt an account of sll. There is one traveller, however, who risited Jeruaalem in 690, the narrative of whose vogage is of great importance both from its falness and authenticity. This was Arculphua, 9 French bishol, of see unknown, who, under the gnidance of Peter, a Burgundian by birth, bat living as a hermit in the Holy Land, saw the places of chief religious interest therein, and apent nine moaths at Jerusalem. On his return home, "driven by stress of weather to the western parts of Britain" (Bede, Hist. Eccl. r. 15), he beesme a guest of Adamnanus, the nlinth nbbat of Hy , who took down from his mouth an accoant of his pilgrimage, and a few yeara later preseated it to king Alfred. The treatise of Bede de Sanctis Locis ia founded on it, and ${ }^{\text {some }}$ extracts are found in his history ( r . been printed by Gretaer (Ingulat. 1619) and Mabillon (Acta SS. Ben; asec. 3). From thia we may learn that many new discoveries and identifications were alleged to have been made since the dass of Paula, by which the faith of the pilgrim was confirmed and rewarded. The cross was not then at Jerusalem, but ita place was well supplied by the stone that had been at the door of the aepulchre, the cup uaed at the last aupper (" which the whole people of the e tity treat with immense veneration ", the

Arcaly the fiev of Blood, and the tree on which Judas hanged himself (17, 19). He saw (and is the first to mention) the footprints of Christ on the Moant of Ascension, miraculously permanent in the loose asnd (22). At Bethlehem he was shewn a natural basin in the rock full of pure

In the Itinereri i. p. i. 112, 113, uncertaln age, fin the litinerarium of later but uncertaln age, falsely ascribed to Antonious of Placentia, we observe the further progress of What we must, however reluctantly, deem imposture. For, to onit new identifications of place, we there real of the lamp "which hat been placed at the head of our Lord when He was buried "($18), of blood seen where He was crucified (ib.), of the altar on which Abraham was about to offier Isaac (19), the title which Pilate affixed to the cross, which the writer "held in his hand and kiased." A crosa was also shewn as that on which Christ died, though the litinerary seems seems to have been written long after that He axibited in Cyril's time had been carried away He also saw the reed and the aponge ("cum qua apongia aquam bibimua") and " the cup of onyxstone which the Lord blessed at the supper," a likeness of the blessed Virgin, and her girdle and head-band, &c. (20). In the church which had been the house of James, he found the horn with which David and other kinga of Judah had been anointed, the crown of thoras, the spear, and many of the stones with which Stephen was atoned (22). The tract ia, ua the Bollandists describe it, "refertum fabellia plane anilibus " (Prolog. in Maii, tom. ii. Migne, n. 1xxii, 897). We do not hear of the hearenly fire in the holy aepulchre on Eater Eve, an imposture practised to thia day, until the ninth century. It is then roentioned by Bernard, a Frenth pilgrim, who visited visited Jeruagalem in 870 ( $D e$ Locis Sanctis, $& 10$, in Acta Bened. iii. p. 2, p. 544). According to him, an nngel came down and lighted the lamps hanging over the aepulchre ; "of which light the patriarch givea to the biahops and the rest of tha people, that they may make a light fur

Hence, and from the greater faeility of reaching it, Rome becaute ere long a more common resort of Europenn pilgrims than the Holy Land itself; e.g. Paulinus of Nola made an "annual journey" thither (Ep. 43 ad Desid. 1; Ep. 95, Aug. ad Paul. 6) "pro apostolorum et martyrum veneratione " (Ep. 45 ad Auj. 1). He deseribes himself as apending the forenoon on one of these visits in the inemoriae of the apostles and martyrs (E'p 17 ad Sever. 2). Letters are extant, written at Rome in 449 to Theodosius the younger by Galla Placidia, Valentininn, and his wife Eudoxia, the emperor's d:ughter, expressions in which show that the writers had gone to Rome from a motive of religiou, "to pay worship to the most blessed apostle Peter" (Concil. Chutced. p. i. ec. 20-22, Hard. Conc. ii. 35-37). Galla, in a letter written to Pulcheria at the same time, says, "Ut Romam frequuentibus concursionibus adneque desideremus inspicere, causa nobis est ampleetendae religionis, ut terminus sauctornm nostris exhiberemns praesentiam" (ibid.; in Giderk, ap. Cotel. Moniur. Gr. i. 62). Venantius, in his Life of St. Remigius, who died in 533 , tells the story of a young girl whose wealthy friends conducted her in sickness from Toulouse "to the tomb of St. Poter in the city of Rome with a very great number of attendants and great devotion" (Vita, § 6 ).
From the foregoing testimonies, we may perhaps infer that during the first five centuries pilgrims went to loume chiefly, if not entirely, for the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul. Compare even the later Gregory the Great, Epist. vi. 19; Hom. in Ecang. ii. 37, § 9. It is evident, however, that visitors from a great distance could not even at that perind, and much less could they in the more troubled times that followed, arrive at Rome by a given day with anything like certainty. Hence, after the 7 th century at least, we find pilgrims flocking thither at every part of the yell. The first visit of St. Boniface was timed by the season and the affairs of his people (Vita anct. Willibaldo, v. 14).' In his time great numbers went to Rome from England (bangyth ad Bonif. Ep. 30, ed. Würdtus.). The stream had begun to flow about 653, when Benedict Biscop paid his first visit to Rome (Bede, Mist. Abbat. Wiremuth. §2), to be soon followed hy Wilfrid, who bad been his companion for part of the way. In reference to the journey of the latter, Eddi Stephani, his friend, says expressly that "as yet that road was nutrodden by our nation" (Vita Wilfr. §3).
The " limina apostolorum" were the first objects visited by pilgrims and probably by all religious travellers to Rome. Thns Sidonius of bimelf, "Priusquam vel pomeeria contingerem oriumphalibus apostolorum liminibus attiusus" (Epp. i. 5), where he aeems to refer to the shrine on the Ostian Way.
III. Other Shrincs.-St. Chrysostom says that the burial-places of St. Peter and St. Paul, St. John and St. Thomaa, alone among the apoatles, were known in his day (Hom. xxvi. in L'p. ad Heb. 2). Of St. Thomas, Gregory of Tours tella us that
"In that part of India in which he first reposed" there was a church in which "by the virtue of the apostle" a lamp burnt perpetually without any renewal either of oil or wick. Thither, he snys, " when hls festival came, a great ássemblage of the peoples gathered, and those from diverse regions coming with vows and merchandise" (Mirac. i. 32). A story told by Sucrates (Ilist. Eicl. iv. 18) seems to imply that Edessa, to which city his body, or a part of it, was translated, was equally frequented on that account. We read little of the tomb of St. Jobn at Ephesus, but it is incidentally mentioned by John Muschus as visited with other shrines by an ascetic of the same name, who was wont to leave home "for the distant deserts, or for Jerusalean to worship the holy cross and the holy phaces, or for Mount Sinui to pray there, or for the martyrs at long distanoes from Jerusalem; for the old misa was a great lover of martyrs, and would go sway at one time to St. John at Ephesus, at auother to St. Theodore at Euchailta, and again into Issuria to St. Thecla at Seleucia, and again to St. Sergius at Saphae, and journey one while to one asint, and another to another" (Prat. Spirit. 180). In the East, the tomb of Therla had many visitors. In the West, St. Felix of Nols was one espeeially famous. If we may belierc the puetical account of Paulinus, multitudes floeked to it at his festival from every part of Italy, even from Rome itself (Poem. xiv. Nat. iii. 54-85). Per baps, however, no shrine was so popular with pilgrims in search of health as that of St. Martin at Tours, where he was reported to have performed numberless curce of which very many are recorded by Gregory, 573, one of his successors in the see (De Mirac. S. Martini, libr, iv.).
1V. Mural Inscriptions hy Pilgrims,-The csta. combs of Rome have preserved a great number of these $g$ caffiti traced with a stilus or with charcoal on the walls by the tombs of the most illustrious martyrs. Many of the enrliest, ascribed to the 2nd or 3rd century, "merely express the names of the visitors; but others offier piens thoughta and touching prayers" (Martigny, Dw'. des Antiq. chrét. v. "Pèlerinage").
V. Motites to Pilgrimaye.-(1) Research.-The first resort of pilgrims was to the Holy Land; and their purpose, research, which they colducted in a devout and reverential spirit. [Ste before, § 1.]
(2) Vous.-If Eusebins is not merely speaking after the notions of his day, Alexauler, the earliest pilgrim on record, combined research with the fultiment of a vow. Vows are ascribed to Helena (Canonum Nicaen. Arab. Pruef. Hard. Conc. i. 525). Palladius, as cited § I., evidently supposee that all who received the hospitality of Melania went to Jerusalem "for their vow's sake." Philorhomus and Eudocin, mentioned before (ibid.), had both vowed s pil. grimage; the latter, if she should see her daughter married (Socr. Hist. E ch. vii. 47), Paulinus, describing his own visit to Rome, spenks thus: " lpsum temporis ante meridism in rotis nostris quorum cura venerumus per spos. tolorum et martyrum sacras memorias coassumentes" (Ep. 17, § 2). Wilfrid, 653, has made vows to visit Rome (Eddi Steph. in vitu 4), and long after him Canute, after such a pilgrimage, says of himself, "Hsnc quidem pine fectionen jam olim devoveram " (Gul. Malmesb.

(3) Buptism.- It is probable that many entechumens ounght the Holy Land frum an early Jordsn. Constantine, in $3: 37$, whel asking the baptism of the bishopops at Nicomedin, snys, " 1 intended formerly to do this at the stream of the Jordan; at which our Snvinur is recorded to have received the washing for sn example to us" (Easeb. Nita Cunst. iv. 62). Eusebius (Ue Loocis Hebracicis) says of "Bethabarn beyond Jordnn where John was baptizing" (St. John i. 28), "where also many of the brethren to this day aresnxious to receive the washing "; or as St. Jerome paraphrases his words, "desiring to be reborn there, flod " thood (Ve Sit. et Nom. Lwe. IL.br. Opp. tom. iiii.
col. 182 , ed. Vallars.). If Pseando-Amphilochins masy be trusted, St. Basil snd Eubulus intrented the bishop of Jerusalem that they might "receive divine regeneration in the river Jordan," which was permitted (Vita Basil. 4). See another example, Prat. Spirit. 138 . The eve of the Epiplisny was the st which the people carried awsy of thaptisms, crated water to opprinkle their of the conse befors they went to sea, and dipped themselves "pro benedictione," and linen clothes which they kept for their burial (Itin rarium Antonini Plac. 11). In the account of the pilgrimage of St. Willibald, written in 765, we read, "On the Jordan, where the Lord was baptized, there is now a church raised on stone piers, and beneath the church is now dry land, where the Lord was baptized" (Hodoeporicon S. Will. in Basnage, Thesaur, Mfonum. ii. p. i. p. 112).
A similar sentiment seems to have led some catechumens to Rome. Thus Cealwal, king of Neesex, A.D. 688, resigning his crown, " went to Rome, deeiring to obtsin for himself this special glory, viz. to be washed in the fount of baptism at the thresholds of the bleased apostles " (Bede, Hist. $E$ cl. $A n / l . \mathrm{v}$. 7 ).
(4) Devotion,-The object of most pilgrims, howerer, is best described as prayer in some holy place or before some holy thing. Faith was coafirmed and devotion inflamed by sight; and the more fervent the prayer the more acceptable was it deemed, from fervour might arise, whatever canase its greater Pelestine, that "gazing on the places that had witnessed the saving sulferings he might in them worship God the Saviour; not as if He were e circumscribed by place, $\ldots$ but that he might fesst the things he deyes with the contemplation of 9). This is the esired" (Theodoret, Hist. Relify. Paula (Epist. ad sirit which we observe in Hieron. Epp.). We have already ( $\$ 1$ ) seen such emotions ascribed to Paula by St. Jerome in terms which shew how highly he valued and respected them; though reason and experience led him to warn the ordinary Christian againgt of prayer at a martyr's sho of the prerogntive it necessarily gave a graat impecame genersl, ages. Men were readr to impetus to pilgrimobtain certainly ready to travel any distance to not procure finly a benefit, which prayer could health wns ther them nt home. The restoration of nothing was boon most commonly sought; but the goodwill supposed to be beyond the power or asked for children martyr. Some, therefore, some for success in (Basil. (fom. in xi. Mart. 8), or war (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. ii. 37), or fom. I) centinuance of peace ( $6 \mathrm{bid} . \mathrm{iii}$.28 ), or for the detection of guilt and vindication of in for the (Aug. Epist. Inxviii. 3). Others prayed for the souls of the departed. To a son who is represented asking, in reference to a pious father, "Why should I pray for him, why give alms, why fast, why visit the bodies of the saints?" the assurance is given, "It is a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead ( 2 Macc. xii. 46), . . . and to make pilgrimages that they may be released from their ging" (Pseudo-Aug. Serm. ad Fratr. in Eremo, 44 ; Opp. S. Aug. घpp. v.). With equal confidence men undertook pilgrimages as a means of obtaining spiritual benefits for themselves. Thus Caessrius, A.D. 502 , thought that grace to overcome sinfill habits would be granted to the pilgrim: "Frequenting the threshold of the saints, they would implore their help against the sins themselves" (Serm. 60, § 3). Victory over sin would insure its forgiveness; and this, also, the penitent pilgrim asked for in direct terms. E. g. Lothair, A.D. 560 , "in the 51 st year of his reign, sought the threshold of St. Martin with many gifts, and arriving at Tours, at the tomb of the said prelate, unfolded all the actions which he had done amiss, and prayed with great groans that the blessed confessor would beg the mercy of God for his faultg" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. iv. 21). Similarly, "Pepin, in 768, went to Tonrs to implore St. Martin "that he would deign to besesch the mercy of God for his crimes" (Fredegar. Hist, Greg. C'cin-

tia. iv. 135). In England alao, during the anme century, we lind persons planning a visit to lonne, "that there they might obtain the pardon of their sins" (Cangyth ad Bonif, Ep, 30 Inter Eipp. Bonif. ed. Würdtw.). Wilfrid went to Rume, "ab ea [sc. acde A postolicn] omnem modum uaculne solvemium sibi credens" (Vita, § 3).
Such voluntary penitents were known by their habit from the 6th century downwarde, but I cannot discover what its peculnrities were. Venantiua Fortunatus, 560, relating an old trudition, repreaents one whom he calla "righteons snd holy" as "going the round of very many villages nnd cities in the winter season, wearing the limbit of a penitent, in search of the medicine of his boul" (Vita S. Maurilii, 24). 1 do not take this as evidence of a practice inuch earlier than the age of the writer.
(6) /enance.-Pilgrimages voluntarily andertaken in the hope of obtnining the pardon of ain, maturally suggested the imposition of pilgrimage as a public penance. Morinus (de Sacrain. Pornit. viii. $17, \S 1$ ) supposes that this custom did not begin before the 7th century; but even if Capsintius ( 1.8 s.) refers to voluntary pilgrimagea only, a passage in Gregory of Tours is antficient to prove it esrlier. He relstes that, about the year 539, "a certain fratricide, bound with iron rings for the enormity of his crime, was ordered to make the circuit of the pinces of the aninta for seven years" (de Gior. Confess. 8i). The penance here described was afterwsrds common in the cases of aggravated murder, the riugs being made from the weapon with which the arime had been committed: "I рао decernenta pontifice, ex ipso gladio ferrei nexus componantur, et collum peccatoris, venter atque brachia, strictim innectantur ex lpsis ferreis vinculis " (Mirac. SS. Flerima et Florentii, Martene de Ant. Ecel. Rit. i. vi. iv. 2; вee also Baluze, Not. in Cupit. Req. Franc. ii. 1198).
The earliest canons which prescribe pilgrimage as a penance do not, as we shall see, mention the holy places; but that they wers visited by the professed penitents may be shewn from other documenta. The Poenitentiale of Theodore of Cnnterbury, A.D. 688, condemns a bishop, for certain sins, to be deposed, to be twenty-five years in pensnce, to fsst five on bread and water, and to "end the days of hia life in pilgrimage" (Morinus, u. s. vii. $15, \S 1$ ). Egbert, archbishop of York, 732, of a homicide: "For we will that he perform penance in a foreign land ten yeara" (Poenitentiale, i. p. i. 24). [Exile.] The murderer of an ordsined person was to "leave his country and possessions and go to Rome to the pope, and then do as the pope should order him" (Pocnit. iv. 6). The council of Chàlons-sur-Saône, 813, while condemaing pilgrimagea from wrong motives, yet dechrea that the devotion of those who, having confessed sin to their parish priest and received hia counsel to that effect, "dasirs to visit the threabolds of the apostles or any of the saints, peraevering in prayer, giving alma, ameading their life, and correcting their manners, is altogether worthy of commendation" (can. 45). From this century downwards, many great criminals resorted to Rome to obtain mitigation of the penance imposed by their own bishop. Nicholas I., 8 in , writing to a bishop with refarence to such a case, aays: "Undique etenim venientes Nic. 136 ad Rivers ludruin). We gee hero one of the many ways in which the action of the popes, ever anxiuss to keep up by exercise tha nuthority which thy hail aequired, tended to the destruction of all discipline. In such pilgrimages also we truee the origin of reserved cases, l.e. of the practice of referring some great ains to Rome for absow lution.

VI. Letters of Commendation. - Pilgrims received letters from their bishops, nbbnts, or other superiora, to attest their boná file charscter, addressed to the aecular so well as ecelesianstical authorities. Forms of such letters are extant. One runs thus: "Quatenua praesens portitor ille, non (ut pleriaque mos est) vneandi cansa, sed propter nomen Domini, itineria nrilun et Isboriosa parvipendena, ob lucrnndum erntionemı linina snnetorum Apostolorum Domini l'etri et Pauli alire cupiens," &c. (Marculfi Formuhte, ii. 49 ; Indiculum Gencrale ad Omnes II,mines). Another says of the pilgrim: "Petiit nolis ut ad basilicami S. Petri patris vestri pro suis culpis, vel pro nostrn stabilitate, valent ambulars ad orationem. Proptarea has literas cuin salutatione per iprunı ad vos direximus ut in amore Dei et $S$. Petri ipsum ad hospitium reeipintis," &c. (Formulac, Bignon. xv. Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 503, Charta Tracturia). Such letters were given to public penitents on whom a pilgrimage was imposed. Thus in a third form the bishop or abbat, after reciting the crime, adly: "Nos pro hac causa, secundum consuetulinem vel canonienm institutionem, dijudicavimus ut in lege peregrinorum ipse pracfintus vir annis tot in peregrinatione ambulare deberet." He therefore begs them, as the penitent is only wandering " pro peccatis suis redimendis," to give him shelter, fire, bread and water, "et postea sine detentione liceat ei ad loca sanctorum festinare" (Marculf. App. 10, Tracturia pro Itenere peragendo). This shews conclusively hew the period of exile was expected to bo spent. Among the extant letters of Alcuin is ene in favour of a pilgrim friend addressed "anicicis per diversas nominum dignitstes," He calls it "litterae precstoriae" (Ep. 210, Commend. ad Amic.). The biahops of Rome furnished pilgrim penitents with similar letters for their return home. The form in the Liber Diurnus Rom. Pont. begins thua: "Praesentium latores pro sus devotione liminibus beatorum principum apostolorum praesentati, petierunt ut, a nebis relaxati, valeant ad propria remeare " (cap. vi. tit. x. Item Tractoria).
VII. Other Encouragements and Helps.-Hospitality to pilgrims, both on the road and en their arrival at the shrine, was inculcated ss a sacred duty. Men were reminded that what they did unto them was done unto Christ (Car. M. 802, Capit. i. 27), and that they might hope to find that they had entertained angels unawares (Conc. Aquisgr. 730, can. 75). The council wion quoted addressed a decree to all laymen and clerks: "Hoc nobis competens et venersbila videtar ut hospites, peregrini et pauperes sus-

Such a honse was called anndwhim (" xen.; id est locus venerabilis in qui peregriai suscipiuntur"; Capit. Rej. lrano. ii. 29) or hospitule pergyrinorum (because in it were entertained "peregrini et pauperes, in quibus specialiter Christus auscipitur"; Capit. Carol. Calv, tit. xxviii, 10). "On the mount of Nitria," says Palladius, "was a xenodochium in which the monke entertained any guest who presented himself throughout the time of his stay, even if he wished to remain there two or three years " (Ilist. Luus. 7). Claudia, the mother of St. Eugenia, "built a xenodochinm at Alexsuluria, and settled lands to serve for the reception of travellers " (Vita Eugen. 19; Rosweyd, 346 ). Joba the Almoner, who became patriareh in 609, is snid to have built several in the same city (Leontius, Vita Joan. 49). There appears to have beea such an institution at Rome in the Tth century ; for pope Martin, in his exile, A.D. ${ }^{6.51}$, apeaking of the hoepitality accorded at fome to Pyrrhus the heretic, when he went ad Vestigia benti letri," says : "Quisquis venit

Petrus repellit venientium illuo; sed panis muadissimus et vina diverea dantur, non solum ei, sed et hominibus ei pertinentibus" (Commemoratio, Hard. Conc. iii. 684). Zachary of Rome, 742 , ordered frequent gifts of food to be taken "peregrinis qui ad beatum Petrum morantur" (Ansst. Bibl. Vit. Pont. 93), where the last word seems to imply a residence provided for then.. Leo III., 795, gave lands "pro alimoniis Christi psuperum, seu advenis, vel peregriais, qui ex longinquis regionibus veniunt" (inci. 98), and he is supposed to have built for their use the hospital of St. Peregrinns, which was afterwards largely endowed by Paschal, A.D. 817 (ib. 100). Louis the Godly, A.D. 814, assigned a property uear Vienne to this use: "Reddimus etiam ihi quandam villnm quae meatur Fasiana, quam volumus ad susceptionem peregrinorum et alimonis psuperum ibidem Pii, Baluze, Cupit. St. Columba, 560 , expecting vieitors, says: " Draw water to wash our guests" feet " (Vila auct. Adamn. i. 4).

1X. I'rotection on the Road.-From an carly period pilgrims were put under the especial protection of the law. A decree of Dagobert, A.D. 630, saya: "Let no one dare to molest or hurt a traveller nbrond; for some go about for God's sske, others for necessary business. Nevertheless, the same peace is necessary for all" (Tit. iii. 4 ; comp. Cap. Reg. Fr. v. 364). Pepin of who, ins: "Touching strangers and pilgrima, who, in the service of God, are hastening to Rome or to other places to the bodies of the saints, that they go and return in eafety under our protection" (Leg. Lonigob, i. ix. 28). Meriemsgne, writing in 796 to Offa, king of the Mercians, promises asfe-conduct to English pilgrims paseing through his dominions: throuching pilgrims who desire to go to the threahold of the blessed apostles for the love of God, and the health of their own souls, let them go in pesce, without say molestation " (Baluze, Capit. Rey. Fr. i. 274).
X. Exemption from Toll.-The words " without any molestation," used by Charlemagne above, intimated freedom from every impout paid by if travellers to the crown. For he proceeds: "Rut if any, not in the service of religion, but in pursuit of gain are foumd among them, let them pay the appointed " 't the proper places." Thie, however, was dy an old privilege, ing ing been granted by Pepin in 755 : "Touching pilgrims who travel for the sske of God, that they take from them no tolls " (in Synod. Vernensi, 22). Two yeara later, at Metz, he expressed this mere fuily: "That ye on ne account detain those who are on their way to Rome or eleewhere for the sake of God at the bridges anil dams or on the ferry-boat, ner make any accusation againat any pilgrim on arcount of his baggage, nor take any toll of then" "(byn. Met. c. 6)

X1. Evils of Pilyrimage.-The moral dnager te the pilgrim lo obvious, and bad reaults were early noticed. Gregory of Nysas, A.D. 370, urged agninst pilgrimage to the Holy Land that not only was there no command for it, but pilgrims autlered a spiritual loss threugh it. Hs dwells on the wickedneas of those citice in tha East, through whilch they had to pans, aud aaserta that it peuetrated into the lodgings and hostels which they were obliged to frequent, and asks in a proverb, "How can one pase through the smoke without smarting eyes?" (De Eunt. Micros. ii. 1085.) Nor does ha deem Jerusilem itself less wicked, or less full of danger. [See HoLy Plactis, 11, vol. 1. p. 775.] St. Jerome (ibid.), A.D. 393 , gives similar teatimony. Our countryman, Boniface, beara witness to the existence of the same evils in Europe. For, writing to Cuthbert of Canterbury, about 743, he allegea that the pilgrimage to Rome was almest certuinly fatal to femala chastity: "They are ruined in great part, few remaining chaste." "There are very few cities in Lombarily, or France, or Gaul, in which there ia not an adulteresa or prostitute of the English nation; which is a scandal, and the disgrace of the whole chureh." (Epist. ad Cudb. 8.) He euggested that women should be restrained by authority from making the pilgrimage. In France the council of Châlona-surSaône, 813 , denounced other evils of which pilgrimages were the occasion: "A very great error is committed by certain persons, whe illsdvisedly trnvel to Rome or Tours and certain other places under the pretence of prayer. There are presbyters and deacona and other clerks, who living carelessly think themselvea thereby cleansed from their sins, and entitled to eturn to the exercise of their ministry, if they each the aforeaaid places. There are alao aymen, whe think that they are sinning, or have ainned, with impunity, because they frequent those places for prayer. There are also some of the powerful who, to gain revenue, under pretence of the journey to Rome or Tours, make a great gathering, opprese many of the peor, and affect to do for the sake of their devotions, or of a visit to the holy places, that which they do in truth from covetousness alone. There are also poor pereons who undertake it either merely to have a better plea for begging (af whose number are they who, wandering to all parts, folsely asaert that they are going there), or because they are ao senaeless as to think themselves cleansed from their sine by the mere sight of holy places" (can. 45).
XII. Nomenciature.-At a later period a pilgrim to Rome was called "Romipeta" or "Romeus"; in Auvergne, "Romoneou"; in Provence, "Romieu"; &c. (Incange); in France generally "Romier"names given at length to all vagrants; whence probably the English verb "to roam." Similarly, it ia said, a pilgrim to the Holy Land (Sancta Terra, was a "saunterer." Those whe had been

we have endeavoured previous article [Paenola] the word under which trace out the history of vestment in the Greek the eucharistic superthe western chureh charch is designated. In century, this vestmen, since the end of the 8th known as caaula, but has beenalmost universaliy of suoh a veala, but se far as notices are found the word used is planeta use before that date, and $\phi$ aıv $\delta \lambda \eta$ s, the word. Like casula, however, eucharistic meaning, and we restricted to ita instances in which it is found for a presently cite laymen.
in all pro paenula, planeta. casula were to all intents merely in points of de dress, differing, that is, two latter words detail: and as regards the liturgiologists absolutely it is true that later Rabanus Maurus, infra), shewing that in (e.g. of time all distinction shewing that in process clear that at an earlien had been lost, yet it is idea was conveyed by the two a slight) $y$ different being a more costly the two terms; the planeta dress, the latter term and the casula a commoner vincial or popular name fer thg perhapa a proexpression pachula. name for the more geners.
Thus we find the casula as a dress of monka and peasants and working men (gee the article), bomething tos are met with to the planeta, ns something too costly for monks to wear, and ae earliest instance by senators and nobles. Our early in instance of the use of the name occurs later than 417 century. Cassian, writing not aress of the Egyptis., when describing the mafurs, or the short clonk whieh they wore curering the seck and whullers. "Thun," he sayn, "they avoid at once the cont and the oatentatinusness of phometive and hirri" (che Cirmobiornin Palit lis, $1-\frac{1}{1}$ Putiul. xlix. 72). The easelt terul un by Cassian Ia, it may be renuarked, gianetec, which we may ansume to be a diminotive of plameta. In like manacr, luidore of Seville, tivo handred years later, in hia kinle forbils to his monks the use of the phaneta:" orariam, birroa, $1^{\text {banctas, non est fas atl, neque }}$ lidamenta vel ealcenmenta, quae generaliter caetera monasteria abutantur [i.e. do not ase]" (Requda Monschurum, с. 12, s2; Patrol. Ixaxiil. 88:).

The flameta would thus appear to be a dress whose costliness rendered it unaulatile for the use of aimple monks, whose duty it was to avolid laxury. It was apuarently a full tlowing robe, for Cassian (surmi) contranta it with the compustum julliolum whieh the monks were to wear. With this agrees the nutlee given us by Isidore of the derlvation of the worl. As there are some difliculties councrted with the prasage, we give it at length. "The easula," he sayn, "is a rube with a hool, derivel as a diminutive from casa [a house], berause it covers the whole person-a cort of ministure casa. Similar is the origin of cucullat- $a$ yort of ininiatore cello. 1 may a.ll that the Greeks holl that we of their names for these roben, planitic, is derived from their free and flowing borders ${ }^{\text {b }}$ [sic et Grapci planctas dictos volunt, quia oris errantibas evagantur). Hence the term planetury stars; that is, roving atars; atars which roll here and there with a roving maze and motion of their own" (Etym. lib. xix. 24; Patrol. Ixxail. 691). On this bassage one or two remarks may be brietly made. After the derivation of casula has been given 38 " " little house," follows the mention of the $p$ isuetis, introduced by the worde sic el. Of course, however. the derivation In the lattcr case is on a totally different groove; therefore the sio points to a similarity not of the derivntion, but of the thing itself. That is to say, Isidore practically identifies the planeta with the easuf(a. Aguin the derivation of plancta in of course from the Greek, und as will be seen. Isidore diatinetly implies that the name pluneta was actually given to the dress by the Greeks. Excepting, however, a remark of Jabanus Manrus, which we shall presently quote, there does not appenr to be any further evidence forthcoming to shew that the word planet is ever used in Greek in that sense. This might tend to prove that the word pasaed from Greek into Latin in itg astronomiesl sense, and that the then latio word developed this new metsphorienl meaning. Whether, however, the dith $\cdots$ ty is to be explained by supposing that esile: fronge existed to Isidore, that is not forihean $\because \circ \mathrm{o}$ ". or whether Ioldore was mis-

Again, in the well-koown repreveurs. tion of Gregory the Oreat, with his fulher and mother, which ls deveribed by his limgrapher, Joha the deacon, is the 10th century, not oniy Gregory hinself, sin ecelesiastio, wears tha ploneta, but also his father Corifanus, a seuation. The former wore a "planeta super dalanatiam castanea" (lib. Iv. O. 8t ; Pufrol. Ixxv. g31); and as to the latter, "Gordiani hableus castane eolorls planeta ost, sub planeta dalimatica" (c. 8.3). It may fairly be inferred from lience that, as late as the eud of the bith century at any rate, the planeta, whatever lis ase by esclesinstles, whether for official use or otherwise, Was also a dress which any gentleman might faitly use. In another prasage of the mame blograjhy (lib. if. e. 2t ; op, eit. 104), the reference is not juite clear. A curtula puerwon having been excluded hy Gregory from emmanain foe achultery, sought the ald of soreevers, who un. dertook that the bishop's horse should throw him as he rode in processlon. The plan, however, was readily folled by the blahoj, in the barra. tive the expression oceurs: "When the surcerers recognized the prelute, ex planetistorm mappuld torumque processionibus." the mippuli, whiterer Its nature may have been, was, lis we hava shewn in a previous artlele [Mansilli:], a sumet privilege of the chiof ecclealastics of the limma chareh in Gregory's time. The planctes we hare aren to be worn by laymen as well as clerics. It seems to us, therefure, Impossible to detine the matter very exactly here; we can ody say that the two sets of people speritied were the officials of high risok in stteot. ance on the blshops of Rome; but whethet these are to be viewed as exelusively clerical, ot formed of elevies and laies both, is doubtful. Dacange (s. v. Planeta) explains the two clases as deacons and subdeacons reppectively; and Marriott (p. 202, n.) considero the nlanct wi to be presbyters and high officily pulati to be deacons nad suld however, whether the exzdence sutheient to justify us in coming to a definite conclusioa.

Thus far, we have seed that in the bth ceptury the planeta was not an exelasively clerical dress, elther at Rome or in North Africa Further, there appears to be no allusion whatever in the records of the tirst six centuria which puints to the planeta as part of the ministerial garb of the Christiun cleries, So far as it was wor: by cleries, it was in virtum of their olficial rank, not their clerienl prelessioa, the privilege being ane shared with Inymen.

The enrliest instance in which the planda is referred to as something apecially pertaining to the Christian ministry is in a eanen of the fourth council of Toledo ( 633 A.D.). PLEBS. (1) Sometimes used marely for the laity belonging to the church. Thus Augustine addresses his epistle to the church at IIIppo, to the clergy, the elders, and the whole laity, "quiversae plebl." Anll, again (Collat Donat, die $1, \S 5$ ), says that the people (jlebes) refused to aeknowledge two bishops in one charch. The sixth conacil of bishops in one (c, 25), rabukes sixth couacil of Paris, A,D. 829 tions practised, not only on the paroch for extorbut even on the faith on the parochial clergy, parochlae suae." fisthful laity, "in plebibue
(2) But it is more generally used it cease of an ecelominstical division, either a diocese, or a parish. Thus the first couacil of ordination A D. $3:$ ( C .5 ), provides against the "rdination of a layman from another diocesa, the bishop of the diocese to which kowledge of and (c. 12) Iistens with approbation to the complaint oi one of their number, that nuother kishop was in the habit of holling visitations in certain parishes of his diocese, "circuit plebes mihi attributas." The second council of Cartlisge, A.d. 390 (c. 20), Cod. Eccl. Afric. (ce. 98, 99), makes regulations for the allotment of parishes (plebes) to their proper dinceses. The third council of Carthage, a.d. 397 (c. 20 ), provides that ne bishop shall intarfere with parishes out of his own diocese, "plebee alienne." A council held at Rome, A.D. 826 (Synod. Rom. c. 16), spenks of the parishes under the jurisidiction of the bishop, "subjectis plebibus." The ceuncil of Mcaux, A.D. 845 (c, 29), ordere that bishops should visit the "pleben" under their juristiction. A Capitulary of Charles the Grent (tit. v. c. 4) spenks of the presbyters in charge of their respective plebes.

(3) Thomassin (de Eoch. Discip. Vet, et Nuv. 1. 2, c. 5, §8) thinks that the word was especially applied to the great parish churches which were in charge of arehpresbyters, in which alone bitptism was alministered, and which possessed eeme jurisdiction over the inferior parishes. Thus in the council held at Rume, A.D. 826 (Synod. Rom. c. 8), mention is made of the "plebes baptismsles." I'he first council of Раvin, A.d. 850 (c. 6) speaks of the nppointment of penitentiaries by the bishops and nrehpresbyters of "plebes;" and (c. 13) speaks of archpresbyters of "plebes" who were to exercise a certain authority, not only over the laity, "vulgus," but over the presbyters of the Inferior parishes, "qui per minores titules habitiat," and to have authority in their own parishes as the bishop in the cathedral charch, "aicut ipse matrici praeest, ita archijresbyter pruesit plebibus," yet in due submissien to episcopal authority.

PLURALITIES (Iluralitas bencficiorum).The othice of a clergyman is of such a nature as to be for the most part incompatible with ether empleyment ; nor is lt possible for one person adequately to discharge duties in two churches. Hence it has from ancient times been forbidden that one man should hold othee in different places. The council of Chalceton (A.D. 451) ordered (c. 10) that no person should be borne on the roll of two churches in respect of the same ollice. Gregory the Great (Jounues Diac. Vitis Greg. ii. 54; Decretum, p. i. dist. Ixxxix. c. 1) dealred that one olfice in the church and no more should be committed to one person; the members of Chrlst must subserve eatch its own use. The sixteenth council of Toledo (A.D. 693) ordered (c. 5 ) in the most emphatic manner that more than one church should on no account be committed to the charge of a single presbyter; and the second council of Nicaea (a.d. 787) enjoined (c. 15) that no clerk should hold preferment in twe churehes, for a man catuot serve two masters. A main ebject of thls cunon, as that of the coundl of Cbalcedon previously quoted, was to cempel clerks to remain in the church were they were first ordalued (Walter, Kirchenrecht, § 221, 0th ed.; Van Espen, Jus Exclesiasticum, p. il. sec. iil. tit. 3).

PLUVIALE. [Core, p. 458.]

PNEUMA. This word is quite as frequantly as not met with In the form Neusa; som"times ulso in the furm Neurma, which seems to print to the orthography of luenua; and in the form Neuma the origin seems to have beea lost sight of and the word considered to be of the tirst declension, as we find Neumue and Nomms. It is applied to a masical passage, consisting of a number of notes, which were either sung to one syllable, or to no words at all, in that case probably on the rowel a (ah). 'lhis appeers to have been used in the Jewish worship as a substitute for the instrumental performance of "Selah" (see Dials, irma), or may have been cousidered a meaning of that obscure worl. It is also thought to be a technical menning of the term "jubilare" used in the trauslation of the Psalms, so Belethus (quoted by J. M. Neale de Sequontiis ad II. A. Dunicl lepist. (rit.), "In bujus fine neumatizamus, ld est jubilamus, dum finem protrahimus et el velot caudam accingimus," and this was mystically referred to the eterual rejoicing of the saints: "Solemus Jongam notam post Alleluia super literam A decantare quia gaudium sanctorum in coelis iutermiaabile et inettiabile est;" and the absence of words is explained thus, "quia ignotus nobis cst noulus laudandi Deum in patria" (Neale, ut sup.). The Pueuma must have attained considerable mag. nitule within the period of this dictionary, because immediately afterwarls Notker leveloped out of it the practice of singing sequences (Nenle); it would scem very probable that it had been found inconvenient from its length. A very similar proceeding has takea place in the present centary in oratorio music; one seldom now meets with long florid pasages" such as are to be found in songs, aud even in choruses, in the works of Handel and Mnydn.

POLYGAMY. [Marriage, ix. p. 1101.]

POLymitus (Polymitum, Polymita VesTIs). This, as the name implies, is a garment woven with various coloured threads. Thus Isidore defines it (Etym. xix. 22 ; P'atrol. 1xxxii. 686), "Polymita multi coloris. Polymitus enim textus multorum colorum est." Caesarius of Arles forbids to nuns the use of "plumaria et acupictura et omne polymitum " (Req. ad lirg. 42 ; Patrol. Ix vii. 1116). Jerome (Epist. 64 ad Fabiolam, c. 12 ; Patrol. xxii. 614) uses the word in describing the Jewish priestly girdle. The word also occurs in the Capitulare de Imaginibus of Charlemagne (i. 12; Patrol. xcviii. 1033), where the "vestis polymita sive varia" is the "coat" of Joseph, symbolising the church gatheted out of many nations. PONTIFEX. The derivation of this word by Varro, from pons and fucere, "inasmuch nss," he says, "the Roman pontiffs built the Puns Sublicius and afterwards frequently restored it" (de Ling. Lat. v. 83), may be comparell with s capitulary of Charles the Grent which communces thus: "De pontibus vero vel reliquis aimilibus operihus que ecelesiastici per justam et autipuma consuctudinein cum reliquo populo facere debent" (Pertz, Lelgg. 1. 111). Rishter, however, cuosiders the theory that its Christian use was derived from the Romne emperors highly improthhle, and inclines to regard it as a reminiscentice from the Levitical service in the temple, carrying with it the notion of a mediatorial otlice (le hurbuch d Kiichenrechts, p. 204). In Christian literature the title first comes prominently before us, as sareastically applied by Tertullian to the bishop of Rome: "Audio etiam edictum esse prepositum, et quidem perempterium, Pontifex sciliect manimus, quod est episcopus episcoporum, elicit," &c." (de Pudicitia, c. i.). Cyprian employs language which sufficiently proves that such preeminence was unrecognized in the African chureh of hia day: " neque enim quisquam nostrum 9 fis. copum se esse episcoporum quando hateat omnis episcopus pro licentia libertatis et potes. tatis suae arbitrium proprium" (Aller, in Cone. Carth. ann. 256 ; Gieseler, 1. i. 361). The author of the Life of Fulgentius, spenking of the retum of the orthodex bishops to Afrien, says that hil. derie, the Vandal monarch, "Carthaginiensi plebi proprium donavit antistitcm "' (i.c. a metropulitian) "eunctisque in locis ordinationes pontificum" (i.e. bishops) " fieri clementissima auctoritate erding. vit" (Baronius, ann. 522, c. x.). This nlone suggests some deubt as to the genuinepens of the 39th canon of the African code, which enjoins thit " no primate shall be called a prince of priets, or pontiff"[African Councus, p. 38]. Similarl? the monks of Carthage in the year 525 , in a petition to Boniface, bishop of that city, aldress him not only as "apestolica dignitate praelitus," but also as "Christi venerandus l'ontijer" (Thomassin, ed. Buurassé, ii. 366). Hilary of Arles is styled " summus Pontifex" by Eucherius, bishop of Lyoas (Migne, 1. 773). Anastasius firat applies the term to lelagius I ., of whose ordination in the year 555 he says, "et ortinaverunt eum pontificem" (Migne, I'atrol. cxxviii. 109). Pelagius himself uses the title when speaking of his predecessor, Leo the Great (Sirmond, i. 319).
There is, however, abundsat evideace that long after the 6th century, especinily in the langunge of the civil legislator, the title continued to be applied to all blshops indiscriminately. It is of frequent occurrence in the Gothic and Lombardic codes, and in the capitularies of Charles the Grent, e.g. "Ut unuspuisque sacerdos cotilinuis adsist t orationibus pro pontifice cujus guberuatur regi. mine" (Pertz, Legg. i. 87). In a capitulary of the council of Aachen (a.d.803) metropolitansine deaignated as "summi pontifices." Segebedusia styled "tetius Gothise provinciae archipentifes" (Gulide Christiam, vi. 168). In the 10th cers. tury, Bruno, primate of Cologne, is designated aimply as "pontifex" (Pertz, Mon. Germ. The early Sacramentary was also a pontifical. Thus the Gelasian gives the prayers said by the bishop over public penitents on Ash-Wedneaddy and Mauncty Thursday (Liturg. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 505,549 ) ; the forms of ordination of Sishnps, priests, and all the inferior clergy

An appendix contsins, with many further instructions, the method of manking the Aaves Dus. Such a directory was necesary nt a time when the sacramentaries, as a.g. the Leoniar, or Veronese Gelasian (Mur. 4. 8. i. 294-48\%), were almost without rubrics, The necessary parts of this Orilo were afterwarda transferred, sometimes, it seems, without any alteration, as in the Codex Eliyianus, printed by Meard (Opp. Greg. M. iii. ; i. coll. 1-240) to the sacramentaries as rubrice.
The Gregorian sacramentary, as edited by Grimoald, who beenme albbat of, St. Gall in 841 , omits the ordinal, and the offices of confrmation offices ssiguned to bishops were already to be sought for in snother book, i.c. in a "pontifical." It nuny be doubted also whether the Benedictiones Episcopales ("sub finem Colonien. praecipuitiones. alia manu scrint.") originaliy belonged to this secramentary (Pamel. ii. 478).

It is probable thst pontificals were in use at least in England a full century before the time of Grimoild, though the name does not appear to hars been finally fixed at that period. (1)

[^109]The earliest extant is probably that of Eghert, archbishop of York, from 732 to 766, now in the National Library at Paris, no. 138. In oriler to exhibit the full contents of an early pontifical we will give the hendings of the several offices in this book, only premising that the extant copy appeara to have been written in the lifetime of Kgbert. "Literis Snxonicis ab annis circiter 9.50 eleganter eleganter seriptum,", said Martene in 1699 ( $D_{s}$ Ant. Liccl. Rit. ed. 1764, i. p. xx.). It contains the ordinatio episcopi (with proper missa and benediction) benediction); confirmatio hominum ab episcopo dicenda (with benedictions); orilo de sacris ordinibus, qualiter in Romana necelesia presliteri, diaconi, subdiaconi, vel ceteri ordines clericorum benedicendi sunt (with missae); ratio qualiter domus Dei consecrandus est (with missae), which is preceled by a form to be used by the priest when he gives notice of the intended consecration (Pont. of Egbert, p. 26 ; Surtees Soc. vol. xxvii.), and followed by a " missn in dedicatione oratorii," a proper benediction for the dedication of a church, a missa "in dedientione fontis," and the office to be used "in consecratione cimiterii" (with missa); reconcilintio altaris vel loci sacri, with missa in reconeilintione ecclesie, and a proper benediction. The second part (pp. 58-136) con-gists gists chiefly of episcopal benedictions, but other rites vites occur. We have (1) benedictions for Sundnys and other holidnya (58-93); (2) for ocensional use as at ordinations, super regem, pro iter agentibus, super synodum, &c. (pp. ${ }^{94-100)}$; (3) Missa pro regibus in die benedictionis, followed by the unction and prayers; (4) consecratio abbatis vel abbatissae, benedietio virginis monialis, consecrntio vidune, consecratio crucis, ordo ad sanctimonialem benedicendam ; (5) benedictions of fruits, brend, houses, bells, &c. ; (6) the Romnn rites for Maundy Thursdny, the blessing of the Paschal Lamb and other feaste, the blessing of incense on Enster eve ; (7) Benedictio armorum,-panis ad infirmum,-casei et butyri, et omnis pulmenti, ad sponsas benedictio, orationes ad libros benedicendos, benedictio vini, pro oculorum infirmitate, orationes dicende cum, ndoratur sunetn crux, ad pnlmas benedicendas vel ramos. Several of the offices are given by Martene (i. 92,275 ; ii. $31,188,199,214,246,285$, 294; iii. 101, 108). Morinus (de Sacram Ord. il. 230) refers to the same century the pontifical known as the Benedictional of arehbishop Robert now in the public library at Rouen, no. 27. It is so called from the episcopal benedictions preceding the offices in the MS. A full account of it is given by Mr. Gage in Archaeologix, vol, xxiv. pp. 118-136. The extant copy eeeme to have ofen written at the instance of Aethelgar of Canterbury, 989. The Ordinationum Ritus are printed by Morinus, u. s. 230-235; and in his work De Sacram. Poenit. he gives the absolutio dicenda ab episcopo super conversum et poenitentem (p. 478); see also p. 374). This pontifical seems to have been only 811 ghtly known to Martene, as he merely refers to it twice (ii. 163; lii. 88). The latter writer assigns to the snme age ("annornm 9n0") the pontifical formerly ia the Abbey library at

He also gives in extenso the order of the consecration of a church, with proper missa and benediction (251-27t). Martene has transcribed from it, ordo ad catechumenum ex pagano faciendum (i. 15) ; qualiter suscipere debeant poenitentes episcopi vel presbyteri (275); ordo ad unguendum infirmum (301); ordinationum ritus (ii. 37); benedictio monachorum (162), the same as in Bened. Robert, (163) ; virginum (189) ; regum (214); ecclesiarum (250); reconciliatio loci sscri (285); benedictio scrinii (shrine) vel arcae (300); formula excommunicationis (322); ordo ad energumenos adjuvandos (347); ordo ad benedicendum oleum infirmorum, oleum catechumenorum et sanctum chrisma (iii. 88; the same as in Ben. Rob.). Martene also describea (in 1699) "Remensis archimonasterii $\mathbf{S}$. Remigii antiquum pontificale ante annos 900 literis Longobardicis exaratum, Tirpini archiepiscopi Remensis nomine vulgo appellatum" (i. xxii). See officea cited by Mnrtene in i. 68 ; iii. 10.

The foregoing are, if I mistake not, the only pontificals extant which are assigned to the period ending with the death of Chnrlemagne. It mny be well, however, to mention some others of note to which a lesa antiquity is ascribed. (1) There ia one which wai given to a monastery by Prudentius, bishop of Troye, who died in 861 (Zaccar. u. s. 169 ; Martene, i. 192, 303, ii. 384, iii. 133, 153). (2) A MS. described by Jos. Hartzheim in his Catalogue of the Cathedral library at Cologne, 1752, as "Pontificale Remense," but prubably English, as the following petition which he cites from it nppears to indi-cate:-"Ut regale solium, videlicet Saxonum, Merciorum, Nordanhumbrorumque aceptrs, non desernt" (Egbert, Pont. pref. x.). (3) That of Rheims "circa tempus Hincmari (845) exaratum" (Zacc. 167). (5), (6), (7), (8) Those of Noyons (hy Radbodus) (Mart. ii. 47, 260), Sena (iii. 88), P'oitiers (i. 68, 93 ; iii. 74, 101, 133, 153), and Cahors (i. $93 ;$ ij. $45,262,333$ ), the copies of which are of the 10th century. (9) The pontifical of Dunstan of Canterbury, who died in 988, is in the National Library at Paris, no. $9+3$. Martene givea from it the rites of ordinntion, which agree with thoge in the MS. formerly at Jumieges (ii. 37), the benedictio monnchorum (168), and the ordo qualiter domus Dei consecranda est (255).

The Greeks and Orientals do not appear to have put their episcopal offices into a eeparate volume until long after the 9th century.

In the church of Rome Clement VIII., in 1596, supplanted all the other pontificals of his obedience by a new edition of the Roman (Catalani, Proleg. in l'ontif. Rom. ii. 5).

POOR, CARE OF

POOR, CARE OF. The care of the poor wns from the date of the Apostolic Cmone formally entrusted to the bishop. This indeed was but a detail of the very wide rule that the bishop was to have the care of everything that concerned the church. ( $\pi \alpha \nu \tau \omega \nu \tau \bar{\omega} \nu$ lкк т $(\delta a$. Can. Apost. $\mathbf{x x} x$ vii. Labbe, i. 34 н.) The argument of the fortieth canon is, that sin.e he was entrusted with the aouls of men he ought certainly to be entrusted with money.
The comment of Zouaras on the forty-first of the Apostolical Cunons is, that the cure of the poor waa committed to the bishop, who had the control of ecclesiastical property with this yiww; but that the bishop was to make the distribution to the poor through the agency of the priestsand deacons, in order to avert from himself the sugpicion of applying the funds to his own uses (Bevereg. Pandect, tom. 1. p. 29). A similar provision is made by the council of Gangrn (A.D. 325) which providea (can. 8) that no one shall either give or receive offeringe apart from the bishop or him whom the bishop appoints to make distribution to the poor ( $\delta$ initerayuivos it oiкovoulà єinottas. Labbe, ii. 418 p).
Bishops are erjoined by the tenth canon of the third council of Tours (A.D. 813) to have "maximam curam at aolicitudinem circa paperes;" yet they are to dispense what is collected by the churches, not indiscriminately, but "cauta circumapectione." In fulfilment of this duty they are authorised by the following canon to psy what ia necessary out of the treasury of the church in the presence of the presbyters and deacons (Labbe, tom. 7, p. 1262 d , e). The aame presence of witnesses (cum testibus) when the bishop makes these pryyments is insisted on in the Capitula (cap. 12) of Charlemngne of the yenr 813. The right of the poor to the property of a bishcpric was ndmitted by Joha the Almoner, patriarch of Alexandris, when he founded a monastery and endowed it with the revenues of the aee. To justify such sa alienation, he pleaded that the "patrinung of the poor", could not be better administered than by being given to those who were devoted to evangelic poverty. [Properti of tee Cnurci, C. (4).]

Pope Gregory's answer to the first question of Augustine of Canterbury is most explicit on the subject of the poor. "It is the custom of the apostolical see to deliver to ordained bishopsprecepts that of every oblation which is made there ought to be four portiona, one, to wit, for the bishop and his household, on account of haspitality and entertainment; another for the clegg; a chird for the poor; a fourth for the repairing of churches." (Sea Bede's Eccl. Hist. of the English Nation, Gidley's transl. p. 65.)
By a later council (Conc. Aquisgran. c. 142, A.D. 816) the ebligation to care for the poor is specially extended to canons. Canons might hare their own private dwellings, yet they were to maintain "intra claustra" an abode for the porr and aged.
In the last of the eighty Arabic canons of the council of Nicaea (A.D. 325) it is directed that ia every town there should be appointed an officer (to thia day at Rome called Procuritor pub perum), whose duty it was to care for the poor. He might be either cleric or layman; he was to

In frunce a similar order was made by the tifth cunncil of Orleans (can. 20). Every sunity the archdeacon or the dean (praepositus) was to visit the prisons, and to supply the church. Justinian ordered the same to of done on Wednesday or Friday. Other poor captives, too, the bishops might help. Some of the "slaves of the church "they might liberate, mske them a grant of money not exceeding twenty shillings (solidi), besides house, vine. rarl er plot of ground (Cunc. Ayd. 7). Other sisves there were to protect when enfranchised festure in his entogy of Manres it a special Cshors, that eutogy of Maurilion, bishop of those who might oppress them "defendens pasuperes ecelesiae de manu malorom judicum." It Was at the request of Meroveus, bishop of Poietiers, that King Childebert readjusted the butien, greatly to the relief of the poor of his dicocse (Greg. Tur. Hist. ix. 30). When the ssme officers that had been at Poictiers passed on te Tours, they were resisted by Gregory himrelf, who at length obtained from the king a coutirmation of the immunities that had been conferred upon the city of St. Martin. In England, Cuthbert of Lindisfarne thought that Eogland, Cuthbert of Lindisfarne thought that body distressed would betake themselves to his body even after death. The concourse, he argel, would be troublesome to the monastery, and therefore it was for the advantage of the breibren that he should be buried beyond its preciuct (Bede, Life). Nor was It only what it is the fashiou to call " the deserving poor " that were to be helped; but if any one of the faith fol bad wasted his property in drinking, and feasting, and wiekedness, still he was not to be deserted. Whatever way have been the practical effeet of the church's care of the poor, in theory at least she always discouraged idleness in the able-bodied. The bishop was to give food and raiment so far as he could to those who needed them; but it was only to those "qui debilitate faciente non possunt suis manibus laborare" (Conc. Aurel. i. cas. 16, qu. (A) PoPe * (abbas, papa, futher), a word derived from the Greek mḋ̃as, or $\pi$ danas, but often erroneously derivell from the l.ntin, "pnter patrum," e.g. Admm Scotus, in the 12th century, snys: "Ipsas enim papas, ill est, pa'res patıum, mos solet ecclesinsticus appellare, et ut sic vecarentur inatituit" (to Titipart. Tib. Migne, Patrol exaviii. 394), a false etymology, that mny be explnined by the fact that Greek was originally the oflicial langunge of the charch both in the Finst and in the West ; but that the knowledge of it subsequently beeame almost extinct ameng "the Latins" in medineral times. Walafrid strabo, who possessed some knowledge of Greek, writing in the 9 th century, compares the word to that of "church" ns one borrowed by Teutonic races from the Greek in order to express a previously unfamiliar idea: "Kyrch a Kurios, et papst a papa, qued cujuadan paternitatis nomen est et clericorum congrult dignitati " (Migne, cxiv. 927).

The enrliest ecclesinstical use of the word apperrs to have been to denote the spiritual relationship existing between a tencher of Chriatinnity and the convert brought by his agency inte communion with a recognised Chriatian body; in many cases the convert nssumed the name of his spiritual father. At a later peried the term began to be restricted to bishops and abbata. Severus, a deacon at Rome of the time of Marcellinus (a.D. 296-304), haring received permission from Mareellinus to open a double tomb in the catacombs, apeaka of having done so--" jusu papae sui Marcellini" (De' Rosai, Insc. i. p. exv.). Subsequently, as will be shewn in the conrae of this article, the title was limited to the bishop of Rome in the West and to the patriarchs of Alexnndrin, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Constantinople in the Enst, and finally was claimed by the pope of liome exclasively, although still the customary mode of nddressing prieats in the Greek church. ${ }^{\text {b }}$

The theory of the Papacy, as defined at the council of FInrence, involves the assumptions : (1) That Peter had beea invested by Christ Himself with in certain pre-eminency among the other apostles. (2) That he was the founder of the church at Rome, and that the inspiration and authority especially vouchsafed to him had been given in equal measure to his successors, the bishops of that church. (1.) (i.) On the question of the supremacy of St. Peter nmong the Apostles, nul of his pre, ence in Rome, so far ns it depents on Scriptural authority, see Peter in Dict, of the bihle.

When we turn to the evidence allorded by uncanonical writere, we lind that cither Pmil and Peter are designated as joint fuunders of the church in liome, or l'cter nssumes the foremest place, while l'aul receives but slight notice, or is altagether unmentioned.

The enrliest testimony is probnibly that of Dionysius, biahop of Corinth. In a frugment of the Catholic epistles of this writer, preserved by Eusebius (E. II. ii. 25), he expressly refers to Panl and Peter as teachers and founders of the churches ut Corinth and Rome, and also as having sullered martyrdom at the same time. Replying to Soter (biahop of Rome, A.D. 168-177) and the Roman clergy, who had addressed to the cem. nunity at Corinth a hortatory letter, he says:

 каıрди (Eusebiua, E. II. ed. Heinichen, i. 180).
The main statements of Dionysius nre sup. ported by the independent testimony of two yet enrlicr writers-that of Peter's martyriom by Clemens Romanua, and that of his teaching at Rome by Ignatius. The langunge of the former writer is explicit. "Let us," he says, "set before us the holy apostlea.  Corinth. i. v.; Hilgenfeld, Nov. Test. ext. Can. Rec. i. 8 ; Migne, S. (f. i. 217).

The meaning of Ignatius is perhaps less free from ambiguity, but the passage occurs in his Epistle to the Romans, the genuineness of which is generally admitted, and is aupported by the Syriac veraion. Addressing "The church which presides in the place of the region of the

The event foreshadawed in John xxi. 18, 19, may fairly be recognised in the above passage from Clemens, a passage strikingly confirmed b? that in the Muratarian canon: "Lucas optime Theophilo comprendit, quia sub praesentia ejus aingula gerebantur, sicuti et semate passionem Petri evidenter declarat" (see Westcott, Canon of the New Test. p. 499, ed. 1870). of note that, as no tradition ever assigned any other place than Rome ns the scene of I'eter's martyrdom, every allusion to that event is also an iadirect confirmation of his vixit to the capital. Irenaeus is the next writer after Dionysius, disciple of Polyearp and subsequently and, as the of the Western church, he can hardly be suppposed to have given expression to a tradition at rariance with the prevalent ('hristian belief of his age. He spenks of pither his age. He spenks of Peter and Paul as treatise refers to the church at fiome as that tratise refers to the church at fiome as that "greatest and most ancient church of universal esme which the two most glorious apostles, Peter and Paul, founded and organized ""maximae et antiquissimac et omnibus cognitae - gloriusissimis duobus npostolis Petro et l'aulo Romae fundatae et constitutne ecclesiae " (ib. iii.

S; ed. Harvey, ii. 9).
The language of Tertullian, in his enumeration of the spostolic churches, is equally definite. "How happy that church," he exclaims, "for which apostles poured forth their whole tenching with their blood; where Peter shares the passion of his Lord, where of his Lord, where Paul is crownel! with the fate of John!" (De Pracscript. alv. IIier. c. 36). The seventh book of the Apostolical C.nstitutions, which belongs probably to about the year A.D. 300 , represents both Paul and Peter as erdinary bishops of Iome-Paul ordaining the first bishop, Inus ; Peter the second, Clemens (Catelerius, Pat. dpost. i. 385).

relation of the latter treatlse, the Khри $\boldsymbol{\sim} \mu \mathrm{a}$, which exists only in fragmente (Hilgenfeld, u.s. iv. 52-67), to the former is not clearly ascertaiuable, but both expresely contravine a still carlier tradition, aaid to have taken its origin in Galat. ii, 11-17, of a permanent hostility between the two apostles. The חpḑeis חeтpov кal Haú $\lambda o v$, which must be regarded as essensially a complation from these two earlier treatises, is explicit in its language on this point: "We have believed, and do believe, that even as God separates not the two great lights which he has made" (the sun and the mnon), "even so He permits not you to separate Peter from Paul or Paul from Peter " (Tischendorf, u. s. c. 5).

The theory which Lipaius has endeavoured to establish-that all the extant suurces of the Petrine legend may be traced back to a yet older Ebionite veraion of the Acta S. Petri as to their common and sole origin, and that this Judaistic treatise forms accordingly the sole basis for the tradition of St. Peter's presence in Rome-has been disputed by many eminent scholars, among whom Hilgenfeld (sse Zeitschrift für wissensehaftliche Theologie, 1872-1878) has given a full discussion of the question. Any attempt to summarize these arguments is beyond the scope of the present article; and equally so is any examination of the atartling theory of Lipsius, that the passage above referred to in the Epistle to the Galatians became the origin of "eine immer weiter ausgesponnene Sagenbildung," which found a natural conclusion in the tradition of a final and decisive contest between the true and the false apoatle at Rome.

Against the theory of the two apostles' joint residence and labours, the fact that none of the epistles written by Paul from Rome (Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, and Philemon), though conveying many salutations, contain any allusion to Peter, pijsents an argument of no great weight, especially if we assume, as certain evidence suggesta, that their labours were bestowed on two distinct churches. If, therefore, it be proposed to assign Peter's arrival in Rome to a date subsequent to that of Paul, and also to the composition of the epistles written by the latter during his first imprisonment (at the aame time accepting the various statements with respoct to Paul's second imprisonment, and a renewal of his labours in the West during an interval of some years), the evidence in favour of such a theory is strong, if not conclusive. The allusion to Silvanus, the friend of St. Paul, in the first epistle of Peter (v. 12), end that to Paul himself in the second (iii. 15), admit of a far more natural interpretation when understood as written from Rome, at a time when the two apostles were labouring there contemporaneously, if not conjointly, in connexion, however, with two distinct communities; the labours of Peter being bestowed on a Judaizing church, those of Paul on a church composed exclusively of Gentiles. Even the tradition respecting Simon Magus, amid much that is pure invention, probably points to a real attempt at the introduction of heretical doctrine. He is asid to have been a aupporter of the heresy of the Patripassians, and the church of Rome, from the earliest times of which we have authentic record, is distinguished by its uncompromiaing opposition to heterodoxy in every shape.
(II.) The evidince for the succession from the time of St. Peter:-The difficulty which arta the to a belief In the tradition concerning Peter extenids also to that respecting his earliest auccessars, According to the lists accepted ns authoritn*ive by the Romish church, the succession was preserved unbroken, the duration of each bishop's tenure of ollice being accurately known to us, nut only in yeara, but even in months and days. On the other hand, a critical investigation of these liats, and a compariann of them with other and earlier sources of information, diaclose conaiderable discrepancies with respect not only to the periods of ollice, but also to the simple order of succeasion.

The original sources for the chronology of the bishops of Rome during the first three centurias may be divided into two classes:
(A.) The Greek or Eastern lista,
(B.) The Latin or Westorn lists,

This classitication is not indeed altogether free from objection, for the lists in the lirst class were undoubtedly derived from loman sources, while those in the second clnss were, in all probability, originally drawn up in Greek, which, up to the middle of the 3rd century, was the official language of the Roman church. It is, however, to be observed that the Greek lists aro distinguished by certain polnta of difference, which appear to indicate that they were tranacribed from those of the west prior to the time when the official lists of the Roman church were adopted in their final form.

In the following summary of the main facts concerning these different sources, and the conclusions that have been drawn from them, the Roman episcopal succession will be more easity considered if divided into two portions: (a) that extending from Peter to Urban (eading A.D. 230); ( $\beta$ ) that from Pontianus to Liberinu (A.D. 230-352). After the time of Liberius no difficulties present themselves that here call for diacussion, and for the purpose of the present article it will be sufficient to limit our cousiderstion almost entirely to the earlier of the foregoing divieions.
(A.) The first list of which we have any knowledge is that which was known to Hegesippus, who in his visits to the epostolic churches collected information concerning the succeasion of the bishops from the time of the Apestles, with the design of thereby establishing the eridence of an unimpeachable tradition of Cbristian doctrine. His atatement with respect to Rome is, that during his residence in that city he made out a list of the episcopal succession down to the

 $H$. $E$. iv. 22 ; the conjectural reading of Sarile, of $\delta$ iarpi $\beta \boldsymbol{\eta} \nu$ for $\delta i a \delta o \chi \eta \nu$, is rejected by the best authorities; see Heinichen's note ad loc.). This list is no longer extant, but we learn from Eusebius that, according to Hegesippus, Anicetas was the immediate predecessor of Suter, $\cdots$ a statement, as we shall hereafter aee, of consideralite importance, inasmuch as the early Latin lins uniformly place Anicetus before Pius, and Pius before Soter.

The list contained in Irenaeus (ado. Haer, bik. iii.,c. 3) represents Peter and Paul as the joim founders of the church at Rome, and ther, it is added, "Lino episcopatum adminiatrandae eccle.

The following table，taken from Lipsius（p．14） exbibits the chief points of difference between the foregoing list and that in the Ecclesiastical History down to the time of Urban．Here a certnin affinity is undeniable，as in the enumera－ tion from Clemens to Soter the only point of divergence is that in the Chronicon a year more is assigned to the episcopate of Xystus than is allowed in the E．$H$ ．On the other hand，the differences in the first four places and those that occur after Eleutherus appear to place it almost beyond doubt that the two lists welederived from entirely distinct sources．The nasigned imperial years of the two lists are altogether at variance

The vervion of the Chronicon by Jerome, wbich ds now generally almitted to be inuch more than a mere tranalation, exhlbits even in the list of the Roman bishops consilerable devintions. The only two dutea whlch esactly agree, i.e are the anne in the jatriarchal nul the Christian eras, anlalso in the lmpurial year, are thuse given un.ler Anencletua nul under Anteros and Fabinn; the inpuerial yeara sre, in fact, derived from the ECclesiastical llistory.
(13.) Among the Latin lista it the Catalojus Libervinus, contained in the eompilation of the chronicler of the year $\mathbf{i 5 t}$, and extonding to the hishopric of Liberius. It has been edited by Mommsen (Abhandlungen der phitolog.-histur. Chisse der königh, süche. Oesell chaft der Wisschschuften, vol. 1. (1850), pp. $582-5$, and $63+$-i), to whins we are indelited for the first correct text, anil also for original research with respect to its sources and compilation. The Cuhturyus liberiunus is the mont macient source of the Liter l'ontificulis, nad, aceording to Nommen, is in turn derived from a yet older list, that origiually contained In the Chronicon of Hippulytue, bishop of Portus, a work to which the chronicler of the year 354 io to be found having rocourse in uther purtions of his treatise, In the Chronicon of Ilippolytus the list itself is no longer extant, but the heading, "Nomina Episcoprorum Romae et quia quatannis praefuit," is alone preserved. A comparison of the Catubopus liberianus with that given by Augustine (ipist. 53; Migne, xxsiii. 19.i) and that In Opitntus (dec Schism. Donat. ii. 3) seems conelusively to prove that all three lists preserve esscutially the eane tradition, the main discrepancins being (i) that neither Augustine nor Optatus makes mention of "Cletus;" (2) that the Citaloms Liberianus (as known to us from existing MSS.) omits the names of Anicetus, Eleutherus, and Zephyrinus ; while (3) in ()ptatua the name of Alexander is (by a yalpable blunder) loft out before that of Sixtus and put in the place of that of Eleutherus.

The omissiona in the Catalogus Iiberianus are, however, clearly shewn to be owing to carelessness on the part of tranacribera or some anch cause, by corresponding gaps in the consular dates between Telesphorua sod Hyginus, Pius and Suter, and Soter and Victor: and thia evideace, taken in conjunction with the fact that the Catalogns Felicionus (the oldeat existing version of the Liber l'ontificalis) which was undoubtedly derived from the Cutaloyus Liberiunus, contains missing names, sufficiently justifies the conclusion of Memmsen that they originully existed in the latter list.
On comparing the following lists with these before given, we see that the hists from Augustine and Optatus support the Eastern omission of Cletus. In the opinion of Lipsius, these two writers have preserved to us a more nacient form of the Western tradition, and it would consequently appear to be a legitimate concluaion that the ingertion of Cletus in the Cataloyus Liberuinus is an interpolation ; Clotus and Anacletua, in all probability, representing one and the same person. Of this, the atntement of the author of the treatisa against the Theodotiana, who wrote in Rome during the episcepate of Zephyrinus, that Victor was the thirteenth bishop and חitpou (Eusebius, H. E. v. 28) affords a strong corroboration. Similnrly, Jerone, while reforring to a dille rence of tra lition with respect to the ontler of suceession, knows nuthing whateron of succession, knows nothing whatower of "Cletus: "-" Clemens, de quo eposidus l'nulur ad Philippenses acribens, ait, 'Cuni Clrmpure et eneleris couprratoribus meis quorum nombas aeripta suat in libro vitae ' (lhili, iv. 3), quartus

On the other hand, Augu-tine and Upitatus ditler from the t,antern lists in placing Anicetus before bila, while the chronicler of the year $35+$ altogether omits Anicetus.

(i) In relation to other churehes.

It will now be of service to notice some of the prineipal facts which illustrate the grailanl aceceptance by the church at large of the theory of the loman кupremary ; and here it ennmot but be looked upun as of peculiar significnace, that in the earliest times the history of the church at Rome appears involved in the greatext obscurity. From the Jnte of St. I'mul's Ejuintle to the Romans (a.b. 58) up to the epincopate of Victur (A.D. 193-202), ita annaly are a blank, wave when some incidental allusion in the controverviea of the time revenla an occraslotnl fuct.

The growing importance of the bishoprie is however clearly shown by the saying of the emperor Decius, preserved by Cyprinn, to the atfect that he would nooner hear of the appearance of a rival to hla throne, than of the hppointment of a new bishop to the Joman see (Eipint. ad Antomiars; Migne, iii. 774). The theory set forth by Cyprinn himself of the ensential unity of the church, miny perhnos justly be regariled as tending to aupport that of the primacy of the bishep of Rome. He speaks, for example (Epist. 55, ad Cornclium), of the "chair of l'eter," and "the principal church of Rome, from whence the priescly unity derived lts origin "-" $n$ nl l’etri cathedran atque al ecclesian principnlem, unde unitas sacerdotalis exortn est, . litterus ferre." This lnnguage, however, when compared with other passages (Ej/j) 7, 52, 57, 72 ; Epist, ml Q. de IIaereticis Raptizmlis; do linitate Éccles, o. 4) seemas, at most, only to prove that he regarded the bishop of Rome ns "primus inter pares;" he speaks for example (Apist. 54) of pope Cornellus as "collega noster," and diatinctly affirms that the other npostles were invested with an equal share of honour and power with Peter, -" "pari consortio praediti et honoris et potestatis" (de Unitute, c. 4). The plaraseology of the bishops of liome themelves, when addressing other bishops, is confirmatory of this view. In the 4th, and earlier part of the 5 th, century we find "Julius ... fratribus" (Mansi, ii. 1211); "Liberius fratri Eusebio" (iil, 204, 207, 209); "Liberius episc. dil, fratri Eusebio" (ib. 205); "dil. fratribus et coepiscopis nostris Liberius urbis Romae episcopus " ( $i^{\prime \prime}$, ili . 208); "Zosimus episcopus urbis Romne Hesychio episcopo Salonitano," "Leo episcopus urbis Romae," "Felix episc. a. ecclesine cath, urbis Romae Acacio," "Gelnsius Romanae ecclesiae episcopus," \&c. In these latter quotations the limitntion implied in the addition "urbis Romae" is of no small significance.

With the fourth century, the evidence that g The passages io this chapter which assign to Peter a suprenacy among the other ajostien do not occur in the eariler MSS., and are attributed by Gleseter (Kirchen. gesch. 1. 364) to Rominh tranmeribere; it is certale that they involve the writer in a contradfetion of himself.
fnvours the Roman theory becomps more nbundant and more decinivo. Much of it, however, relates $t_{0}$ the technionl question of juriadiction and will be found under Aprisil. ; much, again, to those relations of the binhop of Rome til tie general episcopate, which it han bepo found mope convenient to treat in the fourth divimion of the proment artile; our enyuiry hore will conse. quently be limited to ascurbaining the extent to which the authority of the bishop of limile wh. adin!tsel by the church at large in commextom with the detinition of dectrine and the muin. tenance of dincipline.

At the conncil of Nicaen the first signotires are these of Josius, Vito, ani Vincentius, thalatter two being further dencribed ns "jrestiylen Jomanl," suiveribing "pro venerabili vizo paple et episcepo nostro suncto Silveatro;" and, if it were poasible to accept the statement uf (iplasiun, Husius himeelf (the eminent binhip of l'orduba nnil president of the couneil) was really the legate of Sylvester on this occasion : ind $\chi \omega \nu$ r $\delta \nu$ тórov 692 ; Celasius, Hist. Cone. Nicacui, ih, ii, 80\%) This theory indeed is still aceejoted by Catholic writers (Hefele, Comsilinulese h. i. 2t-is ; von Schulte, Concilien, p. 65), but la rejected by Mij. man, Greonwooil, Rebertson, and wthery, on the ground of apparent interpolation nud condosion for at the council of Sarilien, eighteen years later (A.D. 343) we find the subserijitions of liondus and Vicentius appearing in the same jolaces, but without any adjition to indieate that tiey ntteniled in a legatine enpacity trom liome,

The alleged camms of the commel of Sardica undoubtedly conferred on Julius, bishop of Rome, the power of hearing appeals ; but the fact that the conens appear to have been unknown to the church for many years after (Greenwomi, $i$. $1 ; 5$ ), and that when aducel by Zosimux ( A.t., 417-8), their authority was denied by the Afrionn bishops (Milman, Lat. Christianity, bk. ii. c. 4), is strongly against their genuineness (Gieseler I. ii. 199). And even if their genuineness were almitted, it is still roost probable (though we find Sozomen and Socrates in the following century representing their scope as general) that they implied a departure from the rule of the choves, and were designed to have effect during the episcopate of Julius only (Baur, Christliche hirche, ii. 245).

With respect both to Sylvestor and to Jolius we have, moreover, other evidence which diso tinctly contravenes a contrary assumption. A letter nddressed to the former by the council of Nicnea, asks for a confirmntion of the couecil's decision by " synod of all the bishops of home: " episcopos totius vestrae apostolicno urbis in unum convenire, vestrunque habere concilium ut firmetur nostra sanctimonin" (Mansi, ii. 719) ; and similarly Julins, when he summoned the accusers of Athnoasius to Rome, and was met by the demand why he nssumed to write alone, replied that the views he upheld were not his slone effort made to include the East (which had never accepted the decree of Valentlaina 11.) in the enunciation of the foregoing theory; and the form of confession subseribed by John, the patriarch of Constantinople, on the return of the Eastern church to orthodoxy, although evasive ju expression, was regarded as recording a signal victory for Rome: "Sanctissimas Dei ecclesias, id est, superioris vestrae et novellise illius Romae, unam esse accipio; illum sedem apostoli Petri et istins nugustae civitatis unan esse definio" (ib. lxis. 444). We find necorilingly John I. (A.D. 523-6) refusing to hold intercourse with Epiphanius, the patriarch of Constantinople, until his right to take procedence had been re-

 'Enaфavíou $\delta$ 'Púpurs (Theophanes, Chronographia, Corp. Hist. Byzunt. XXVI. i. 261). In the smme spirit Pelagius II. (A.d. 578-90), while denouncing the assumption by John of Constantinople of the title of "occumenionl patriarch," asserted in the most unequivocal langunge the universsl primacy of the see of Rome: "cum generalium synodorum ennvocandi auctoritas apostolicae sedi benti Petri singulari privilegio sit tradita" (Migne, Ixxii. 7:39).

John, however, so fur from discontinuing the title, ngain subscribed himself thus in the letters in which he acknowledged the formal notifiention of the accession of Gregory the Great. This drew from Gregory (A.D. 590-604) a still more emphatic condemnation of what he designated as "a haughty and damnable distinction;" "moreover," he alds, " it is known to nll that the apostle Peter is the chief of the universal ch reh. Paul, Andrew, John-what were they other than ehiets of particular churehes?", (Migne, Ixxvii. 743).

The remarkable extension given by Gregory the Great to the power of the pontificate will be noticed under the two divisious with which it is most clasely associated; (1), the relations of Rome to the episcopal order ; (2), the extension of the chursh's patrimonium. In the West we have evideuce that important exceptions continued to exist to the recognition of the pope as universal metropolitan. In Spain, it is observed by Baxmann (Politik der Päpste, i. 116), that the only instance of Gregory's assertion of auch jurisdiction (see infra, p.1673) was at Malaga, where the imperial government still hell its ground. In support of the conclusion to which this finct plainly points, it may be notel that the language of Gregory's illustrious contemperary, Isidore of Seville, is singularly wanting in any such recog. nition of the Romau prerogatives as the papal assumptions of the preceding century might appear to demnad. Isidore admits indeel (ad Eujen. Episc. Tretet. ; Mlgne, lxxxill. 574), that the "potestns" and "dignitas" conferred on Peter, and trimsmitted from him to all bishops, were given " specialjus Romano antistiti;" but in a more formal treatise (de Uficuis Eecl. ii, v. 5) he expressly affirms that all hishops are to be regarded as equal, just as the other apostles were equal to St. Peter, "siquidem et caeteri apoetolorum cum letro pur consortium honoris et potcstatis effecti sunt . . q quibus decedentibus successerunt episcopi, qul sunt constituti per totum mundum In sedibus apostolorum." Similarly in his Origines (VII, xI.) he assigns "sedes apostolicae" to pntriarchs, arehbishops, and bishops alike: "Patrlarehn Graeca lingon sum. mus pater, quia primum, id est ajortulicum, tenct locuin" . . . Archiepiscopus Graece sum. nus episcoporum, tenet enim vicem aposteli. cum," &ic.

Amoug those Western ations which were indebted for their conversion to the direct agens of lome, we perceive, however, an increased and not unantural disposition to acknowledge a filial rather than a fraternal relation to the parent see; while alter Gregory's death, the courso of events-the subjugation of Syria nad tyopt b" the Saracens, with the Involved loss of Jerisalem to Christendom, and the extinction of the churches of Antioch and Alexandria-powerfully contributed to the establishment of the papal autoeracy. In kingland, from the time of the conneil of Whitby (A.D. 66t), the Gregorian tratitions, ns enforced by Augustine, Theodorus, Wiltrid, and others, were rendily acepgted, though a strong spirit of resistance to the Roman claims to immediate jurisidiction is from time to time discernible. The British church appears to have almost refused to regard the Eagliah churches as Christian (Bede, E. II. ii. 20). The representatives of the English church tased their antagonists, in return, with spurning "in tyrannous pertinacity the tradition of the Koman chureh" (see letter of Aldhelm to to Geraint ; Bright, Early Enylish Church Hist. pp. 419-423). From England this teaching was in turn diffused over Franklan!. In this latter country, however, more than oue important change in the relatiens to the papacy is to be noted. From the time of Caesaius of Arles (A.D. 500) the churches in Aquitania and Burgundy, converted from Arianism to Catholicism, appear to have assumed towards the Homan see an attitude of unquestioning deference. Of this the frequont acceptance of the pallium (infra, p. 1673), as well as other evidence, is sulficient proof. But in Neustria and Austrasia, among the purely Frankish population, this was bot enually the case. The Merovingian kings usurped the popular rights in appointing bishops to vacant sees (Guizot, Esscris, P1, 192-3); and the relations which the genius of Gregory the Great succeeded in establishing (Mansi, x. 34, 293 ; Sirmond, i. $420,454,456$ ) were not sustained. After the death of queen Brunehaut the intercourse with Rome appears to have come to an end. The council of Paris (A.D. 615), which restored the canonical form of episcepal elections, makes no reference to the papal nutheritr. Guizot observes that from the death of Gregory the Great to the time of Gregory Il. (A, d, 604 715 ), not a single document exists which enn be cited as proof of intercommunication betweea the rulera of Frankish Gaul and the papacy (Civil, en France, ii. 235). It was the great reault of the mission of St. Boniface that it restored the spirit of nllegiance to Rome in yet more than its original force; and the principle which he distinctly enunciated of the duty of referring all difficultios of an important character to the see of Rome for solution, markn an all. important era in Enropean church hitary: "eodem modo quo nos Romnoa ecclesia ordinatos cum sacramento constrinxit, ut si sacerdotes vel plehes a lege Del devias-e viderim et corrigere non potuerim, fideliter semper Sedi Apostolices heaven as chiefly to be gaited by the Christian "faith and religion." According to Godefroy (Novellace, p. 49) the terms "religion" and "faith," as here and elsewhere employed by the Roman lawyers, are to be understood in a sense wery diflerent from that in which these terms were used by the body of privileges, and deuoted ecclesias" or modıcela privileges (privilegia were respectively termed, in the West and the East), conferred upon Christianity as a recognised organization by the State.

Insuch a compact with the new religion, the emperors, with whatever admixture of higher metives, undoubtedly saw their own political gain; and in like manner the bishops of Rome, in their efforts to assert their jurisdiction over the whole chutch, discerned a similir advantage in a coalition with the imperinl power. This sdrantage was not, however, to be gained with. out a corresponding loss of independence and ecclesiastical freedom. "The laws of the Chrislan emperors," says an nble writer, "from absolute subordinatine philosopher, manitest the temporal quthority. The minutine of to the gevermment, the relntions of the clerg church themselves and to the state, their daties, their morals, and their actions, monastic regulations, the supprexsion of heresies-all the details, in fact, of ecclesinstical life, internal and external, are prescribed with the assurnace of unquestioned power, and with a enre which shews how large a portien of the imperial attention was devoted to the management of the church." A comparison of the letters of Gelasius (A.D. 192-b) with those of l.eo I. illustrates this difference. The with great deforence, invarialy adresses the emperor plicit manner the inperialmits in the most extion to the church wath reference to the Theodosius Il. he writes, council st Rome, "clementia $v$ of a general (Mansi, vi. 53); to clementia vestra concedut" timius tempus , to Marcian, "differri al oppor(ib. vi. 83). pletely the popes were now at the mercy of the emperor. Yet, notwithstanding, the Roman see still represented the highest and most influential authority among the Italians themselves, and the Pragmatic Sanction of Justinian (A.d. 554), which fixed the civil organization of Italy, was isaced at the requeat of Vigilius (Gitbon, c. xliii.).
With the establishment of the Lombard supremacy, that of the Byzantiue court was again reduced to little more than a shadow ; and it may be regarded as the key to much of the state policy of Gregory the Great, that his chief aim was to extricate the papacy from the dangers by which it was menaced by these two powers. His aversion from the conquerors did not prevent him from gataing over Agilulph, the king of the Lombards, to the Catholic ns opposed to the Arian ioterest (Paulus Diac. bk. vi. ce. 9 and 10). And though he continued to profess allegiance to the emperor, there can be no question that his sympathics with the empire were to a great extent estranged by the assumption by his rival at Constantinople of the title of "oecumenical patriarch." The relations which this pope sought to establish both with Frankliand und with England stand in rery close connexion with those existing between the papacyaand the Lomhard and Byzantine courts (Baur, Gesch. d. Kirche, ii. 251; Baxmann, Politik d. Päpste, i. 26).

The decrees of the Quinisext council (A.D. 691), of which the thirty-sixth canon was an endeavour to revive that theory of episcopal pre-eminence which regarded it as restiug solely on a political foundation, and the efforts of Jastiaian II. to thrust them on the acceptance of the West, mask the last stage of interference on the purt of the Eastero emperors with the papal power. In the poatificate of Gregory II. (A.D. 715-731) the dispute concerning image worship completed the zapture between Enst and West; the estatea of the Roman see in Sicily and Calabria were confiacated by the emperor Leo; and although Gregory continued to profess a nominal alleginace to the emperer, it would appear that it was mainly from motives dictated by yet stronger feelings of animosity to the Lombarda that he and his auccessora, to use the somewhat exaggerated expression of Gibbon (c. xlix.) "spare!! the relics of the Byzantine deminion "(Greenwood, ii. 481). Nothing, however, conld exceed in plainness the terms in which Gregory repudiated the right of the emperor to interfere in questions of dogma, and mnintained that the apheras of the imperial and papal authority were entirely distinct: "Scis imperator, saactae ecclesiae dogmnta non imperatorum esse, sed pontificum, quae tuto dogmatizari debeat. Idcirco ecelesiis praepositi sunt pontifices a rei publicae negotüs abstinentes, et imperatores ergo similiter ab ecclesiasticia ebstineant, et quae sibi commissa aunt, capeszant" (Mansi, xii. 960). The significance of this passage is enhanced when we consider that it is from the pen of one whom Gibbon styles "the founder of the papal monarchy."
It is, however, to the relations of the see of Rome to the Lombard power that we must refer that alliance with the Frankish monarch which paved the way for the assertion of that very political power which Gregory il. profesaed to disclaim." Placed between a heretic and a robler " (to use the expression of Bryce), the Roman pontiff fled for assistance to the Frank, and the appeal of Gregory III. to Charles Martel for aid against the Lombards marks the commencement of thnt new conjunction which resulted in the clains of mediaeral popedom. The title of "papr uaiversalis" which Gropory I. had de. nounced as blasyhemous, we: ctaimad by his suo cessors in the 8th century, and the aspiration to political iaftuence which Gregory II. disavowed, grew, in the middle ages, into an assertioa of political supremacy.

Other circumstances favoured these resilts, The Orbis Christianus no longer coinciled with the Orbis Rominus, and the want of a boad of naion between the nations of the West was 1 ainfilly felt. This want the papney could in in great measure supply; and the celibacy of the popes, and the elective charneter still preserved by their othice, served to diminish the jealousy with which a lise of hereditary rulers might hava been regnarded.

Under these circumstances, the appearance of Bonilace in Frankland as the pnpal legate was attended with signal success, and was productire of results which can hardly be over-estimated in their importance. The " familiar" relntions which this prelate had already entered into with Rome, the oath whereby he bound hiniself to perpetual fidelity to the supreme pontill' (Sirmond, $\mathbf{i}$. 512), and the strenuous manaer in which he upheld the theory of the Cathelic unity, the duty of subjection on the part of the whole elergy to the suceessor of St. Peter, nad the auperiority of the pope to all earthly tribunals ("quia cunctos ipse judienturus a semine est judicandus") constitute a crisis in European history. (See Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. $553-4$; Lablee and Cossart, iii. 1925 ; Greenweod, Cath. Petri, ii. 361-71).

The main-facts in relation to the compact with Pippin and Charles are stated elsewhere (see IV. iv. "Political Sovereignty"). It will be suri. cient here to observe, that although the elective charncter of the papal othice was preservel, the validity of each electlon, nt least throughont the reign of Charles the Grent, was entirely dependent on the sanction of the Frankish monarch, to whom the pope neknowledged a kind of ieudal relation. We find, for instance, that when leco III. announced his election to Charles, the later, in reply, expressed his pleasure at receiving the assuraoce of hamble obedience and the pledge of tidelity to the throne oflered by the pontiff, "gnvisi sumus reu in electionis unanimitate, sew in humilitatis vestrae obedientia et in promissionila ad nos fidelitate" (Carolina, ed. Jaffie, $p$. 354).

It is, however, at least questionable, whether the coronation of Charles at Rome (nu event hut imperfectly understood and very variously interpreted) was not, to a grent extent, a skilfil readjustment of the matual relations of the empire and the papacy. As the pope required the consent of the emperor, before his election could be regarded as valid, so the emperer hencetorth received the formal award of hia crewu from the pope.
Though the power of the Frankish episcepate largely increased with the decline of the Carolinginn dyassty, the papal and the royal supremacy were still held to be inextricmbly linked together. Thomassin quotes, in precf of this, the language of 849), addresse who, ht the sa allegiance to the metropolit Ruase: "omu Visariam B. primatum in (Sirmend, iii. man, when he of Chiersy to brother Charle could never des so solemnly by azacta Seles apostolicis ut $r$ nare" (Sirmon Io the memor I. and Hincma queen Theutber: these theories with unanswer: bishops. Similarly, Lewis the German, when he sought to bring over the council of Chiersy to his side in his contest with his brother Charles, received for reply that they 50 solemnly by the Frankish bighops i" quarated so solemnly by the Frankish bishops, "quenque sancta Sedes Apostolica, mater nostra, litteris apostolicis ut regem honorare studuit et contirdare" (Sirmond, iii. 129).
In the memorable struggle between Nicholas I. and Hincmar (arising out t the divorce of queen Theutberga by her husbad, Lothnir II.) these theories were asserted by pope Nicholas with unanswernble force against the French bishops. He maintained that even the imperial dignity and power were the gift of the holy see; and in the sequel Hincmar was compelied to restore Rethrad to the see of Soissons, and Lothis simultndeous exercis consort. In xupport of tive in the civil and in the of the papal prerogawe find Nicholas appealing to the False Demain, s collection ot spurious pontifical decrees which, it was alleged, had been compiled by Isidore of Seville, but of which the Roman archives presented on trace, their first appearance belonging to the years 829-840, when they were brought to light at Mentz. In these the oole legislative power of the pope was formally and systemati"bally laid dowa. "The papacy," says Milman, "became a legislative as well as an administratible step, if infallibility was not already In the the porver asserted to have been bestowed by the Lord on St. Peter, by St. Peter handed down in unbroken descent, and in a pleditude which could not be restricted or limited, to the latest of bis successors " (Lat. Christianity, bk. v. c. 4).

iII. Distinctive Features of the Office.  (i) Titles.

Papa.-This title, as already stnted, was of wide and various use before its final limitation to the Roman pontiff. In the East its ecclesiastical use has always been comparatively vague, incloding not only including not only bishops and priests but even readers. We find, for example, the emperor Isaac Cermanus, in tha 11th century, apenking of a "lecter" as "papa." "Quando episcopus facit simplicem papam siva lectorem" (Lupus, Opera, v. 214). In the 5th century, Avitus, bishep of Vienne, writing to the patriarch of Jerasslem, addresses him as "Papa, Apostle, and Prince of tha Univeraal Church:" "Papae Hierosolymitano. Exercet apostolatus vester cipem locum a Divinitate primatus, et qued prindipem locum ln universili ecelesia teneat, non privilegiis solum studet monstrare, sed meritis" (Epist. 23: Migne, Patrol. lix. 239). In Alestedria the title applanrs to have been firat borna by Heraclius, who was elected patriarch in the year 222: "ejus tempoie nppellatua est patriArcha Alexandrinus Baba, id est avua " (E. $t$ tychii Shxand. In the West it would appear from the testlmony of Walafrid Strabo (wpra, p. 1652), that throughout our period the title was not becessarily restricted to its modern use. In its actual employment, however, it appears to liave been contined at an enrly period to bishops. its limitation to the pope of Rome was gradual, commencing, probably, in the 6th century; and, at wa should naturally expect, among the communities more directly under the infuence of the Roman see. Liberatus of Carthage speaka both of the "bishop of Rome" and of the "pope of Rome," but, according to Thomassin, after the time of Agapetus (A.D. 535-6), restricte the title of "papa" to the pope: "Agapetus papa ordinutur;" "Papae et senatui Romano acribena parts of the West, ec. 18, 21, 22). In other parts of the West, the titla continuel for some time longer to be applied without restriction to Tours (Hist. Of this a passage in Gregory of Tration. (Hist. Thomassin, however, observes, that at the third (A.D. 538), fourth (A.D. 541), and fifth (A.D. 549) collacils of Orleans, and that of Clermont (A,D., 5+9), only Rome is atyled "apestollica sedes." He also cites a letter of Avitus (E'pist. 31), written circa 525, as referring to the jope simply aa "papa;" but in the same letter (Migne, Patrol. lix, 248-9) the expresaion "papa Urbis" nlso occurs, while in another (Epist. 7) Avitue ${ }^{\text {applears }}$ to attribute equal dignity to the "papa Constantionopolitanus," referring to the "papa and the Roman pontiff as a double constellation in the ecclesiastical firmnment, "velut geminos apostolorum principea . . . . velut in cuelo positum religionis aignum pro gemino siderc." Felix, bishop of Nantes: "Domino sanct" et apostolica sede dignissimo patri, Felici papae" (Misc. iii. 4 ; Migne, lxxxviii. 119) ; and writlag to Euphronius, biahop of Tours, inscribes the letter "Domino sancto . . . . papae" (ib. iii. 1; Migne, $1 \times x \times v i i i . ~ 115$ ).

It is supposed by Thomnssin and by Phillips (Kirnenrecht, v. 603) that, with the end of the 6th century the title began to be eatirely restricted to the pope of Rome, who was now generally recognised ns "pater patrum." We fad, however, that at the sixth general council, that of Constantinople in the year 680 , Honorius is referred to ns "papn nntiquare Romae," and Cyrus as "papn Alexandriae" (Mansi, xi. 214). The tollowing titles assumed by, or given to, pope Agatho, in the Acts of the same coubcil, nppear to indicate that such titles were largely enhanced, at discretion, by the use of adjectives, or a more amplified description: "episcopus servus servorum Dei;" "episcopus sapctne Dei catholicae atque apestolicne ecclesiag urbis Romac;" " sauctus nuper ordinatus papa in apostollen sede antiqune Romse;" "sunctissimus et beatissimus archiepiscopus antiquae Romne;" " sanctissimus et beatissimus papa;" "snnctissimus papa;" "orthodoxus papa" (io. xi. 202, 209, 285, 298, $322,330,346$ ).

In the 9 th century the dissociation of the title from ordianry episcopal digaity is attested by the fact that we find Gregory IV. (A.D. 8274) reproving the Frankish bishops for nudressang him by the incongruous titles of "firter" and "papa;" when It would, he says, have been 1.10re fitting to have shewn simply the reverence due to a father: "Romnno pontifici seribester, contrariis eum in praefatione nominibus appellastis, fratrem videlicet et papam; dum congruentius esset solam ei paternam reverentiam exhibere" (Migoe, civ. 207).

The use of this title in addressing any other ecclesiastical dignitnry then the pope of Rome was formally forbidden by Gregory VIl. in the council of Rome of the year 1073: "ut papae nomen uoicum sit in toto orbe Christinno, nec liceat alicui se ipsum vel alium eo nomine appellare" (Gieseler, Kirchengesch. i. il. 405, with note).
$P_{0} n^{\prime}$ ifex maximus and pontifex summus. [See Pontificx.]

Episcopus universalis or oectmenicus.-Thls title first assumes significance in the time of Pelagius II. (A.D. 578-590), who, as we have already seen, strenuously denounced its assumption by John the patriarch, and at the snme time disclaimed it for himself (Baronlus, ad ann. 587). His remonstrance appear's to have produced no effect on John, for we tind his successor, Gregory the Great, repenting both the remoustrance and the disclalmer. According to Gregory, the council of Chalcedon had already distinctly affirmed the exclusive right of the Roman pontiff to this title, but no pope had hitherto assumed to himself this "audrcious name," lest such an assumption should seem to involve the denial of the title to his episcopal brethren: "Numquid non, slent vestra firsternltas novit, per venerandum Chalcedonense concilium hujus apostolicae sedis antistites universales oblato honore vocati sunt. Sed tamen nullus unquam tali vocabulo appellarl voluit, nullus slbi hoc teinerarium nomen arripuit, ne si sibl in pontificatus gradu gloriam singularitatle arriperet, hanc omuibus fratribus dinegasse vileretur" (Epist. v. 18 ; Migne, Ixsvil. 743). Authorlties, however, concur in holling Gregory mistaken in his supposition that the title had been sanctioned $b_{j}$ the conneil of Chalcedon (Gieseler I. ii. 228; Hetele, Concil engesch. ii. 325 ; Schatf, p. 662); Leo was inly tion preterred against Dioscurus by two deacons of Alexnniria (Mansi, vi. 1006, 1012); and that he himself assumed the title in his correspundence is a statement that probably rests upon a forgery (see Gieseler, u. s.). Boniface Il. (A.b. 530-2) appears to have been thus stylel by Stephen, metropolitan of Thessaly; ani Boniface III. (A.D. 606), who necording to Antstasius (Muratori, Seript. HI. i. 135) nbtained from the emperor Phocas a decree entitling the see of St. Peter to rank as "caput omuium ecclesiarum," is said to have openly assumed the title. Gieseler (I. ii. 488) refers its earliest appearance aq self-assumad to the Liber Diurnus, which apparred A.D. 682-5; and Leo II. (A.D. 68:) was saluted as "papa oecumenicus" by the emperor (Mansi, xi. 713). Atter the 7 th century its occurrence is not unfrequent. It is given by the Roman sennte to Stephen IV. in the 8 th century (Mnasi, xll. 625); to the same pontiff by the Lateran councll of the year 769 ( $\bar{y}$. xij. 713); and to Leo III. by a syood held in Rome in 799 (ib. xiil. 1071). It was veed by Charles the Bald in ndilressing John VIII. in the year 876, on the occasion of that monarch's receiring the imperial dignity from the latter. In the proposals of the commlssioners presented to Lewis the Pious (A.D. 825) the pope is referred to as he "who, by npostolical authority and the reverential deference of the world, is exalted to the nniversality" (Baronius, ad nan. 8\%5). Hallam, however (Middle Ages, c. vii. pt. 1), quotes Gratian (Decretum, ed. 1591, p. 303): "Nec etiam Romanus pontifex aniversalis appelIatnr," and says that a distinction is made by the canonlsts between "universalis ecclesiac episcopus" and "episcopus universalis;" "that is, the pope has no immedinte jurisdiction in the diocese of other bishops, though he can correct them for the undue exercise of their own."

Apostolicus [see Arostolicus].-The latest of the eplscopal titles cininsed exelusively by the pope. Charles Martel, in the 8th century, when recommending Bonikace to the Frankish bishops, addresses them as "dominl et apostolici in Christo patres episcopi" (Migne, lxxxix. 609). To the evidence of Rupertus Tuitiensis (quoted in Apostolicus) may be added that of Adam Scotus, who, speaking of th? jope, says, "Ipsi quippe sunt principales, et maxini sedis npostolictie in ecclesia Romana successores; unde et ipsos speciallter apostolicos sancta ecclesin vocare consuevit" (do Tripart. Tab.; Migne, cxvill. 344).

Sertus serworum Dci.-This title was not originally restricted to $t^{\circ}$ bishop of Rome. Augustine (Epist. 217, ad Vitalem) superscribes a letter "August. episc. servus Christl pt per ips:m servus servorum ipsius." Fulgentius (E'pist. 5) styles himself "servorun Christl famulus " (Gleseler, I. ii. "2I4). Its enrliest nse as assumed by the Roman pontiffs appears to have been by Leo the Great, who so styles him-

(ii.) E'cection. This, as is generally allowed by ecclesiastical writers, was, in the carliest times, by the clergy and lnity of the church of Rome conjointly with the bishops of the neighbouring diocesses, and in no way differed from that observed in election to other bishoprics. [Gisuop; Ordis.tion.]
With respect to the election of pope Cornelius (A.D. 251) St. Cyprian tells us that he was raised to the dignity " by the divine decree, the tetimony of nearly all the clergy, the assent of the people, and by the college [Elcctoral Coulegis] of venerable priests, nad by good men" (Epist. 55 ; Migne, iii. 7i1). The emperor sieatimian II. in a letter respecting the election of Siricias (A.D. 385), saya: "We hold it to be the right of the Roman people that they should enjoy concord and elect the best man for bishop" (Coustaat, Epist. Roman. Pont. i. 639). In the disputed election of Boniface I. (A.D, 418) it was sileged as decisive in his favour that he had been electel by the Roman clergy, "amid the aeclamations of the people and the chief men of the city, sad that 70 priests had subscribed the act of election in the presence of nine provincial bishops " (ib. i. 1007).
The method olserved was consequently the same as that observed in other epiacopal elections ; hut almost as soon as the see of Rome rises into distorieal importance-from the time, that is to say, of Constantine the Grent, we find that the sct of censecration was always deferred until the rstification of the popular choice by the emperor (or by the exarch of Ravenva) had been received. lo the manaer in which this imperial prerogative was exereised, -according as it was invoked by

Under Honorius a law was enacted that whenever two candjuates for the vacant chair conducted the contest in an uncanonical manner ueither should aucceed to the vacancy, but that the Roman clergy should proceed to make another choice (Baronius, ann. 419). The law, however, as emanating from a secular seurce, has never been held by the caaonists to be binding on the chureh (Dict. Grat. v. Illed autem, D. 96), Bribery and other acandals continued, notwithstnding, to mark each fresh election; and in the pontificate of Siricius (A.D. 468-48.3) -a time when jealousy of the rival see oi Constantinople almost aboorbed that of the civil power as represented by Odoacer,--we find this pope mon invoking the interference of that monarch. lo view of the election that would Basiling his own decease, Simplicius requested such election prefect of Odoncer, not to sanction his anspices, unleas it shoulil be conducted under subject ${ }^{\text {a }}$, and the proceedings throughout be 977). The elections of Gelasius and Anastasius II. were conductel In due form (save that the former $p$ ontiff refused, in the first instance, to notify his election to the patriarch of Constantinople according to custom) ; $\because \cdot \cdot=$ the election of Symmachus another disgraceful contest ensued between his party and that of Laurentius, and the arbitration of the civil power, in the person of Theorloric the Great, was agnin invoked. Theodoric appears to have contentel himself with convening an assembly of the clergy (A.D. 499) which he left free to frame whatever laws might be deemed necessary; and under the presidency of Symmachus the following canons were enacted: (1) A direct adaptation of the ancient Roman law de Ambitu, wheraby any presbyter, priest, or deacon, canvasaing or soliciting vates, was rendered liable to degradation and.excommunication; (2) The penalty of the anathema Thay person guilty of the came offence; (3) That a majority of votes should decide an otherwise valid election ; (4) Immunity and reward to any person (even an accomplice) who ahould divulge uny attempts at electornl intrigues and malpractices (Buronius, ad ann. 499).

In the dithiculties which involve the hlstory of the Synodus Palmaris (A.D. 502) tivo poirts in relation to our subject may be regarded as autficiently nscertained: (1) 'That the synod repealell the enactment of Odoacer ; (2) Thit it did thia solely in order to repudiate the precedent thereby established for civil interposition, for the law conearning the allemation of church property was forthwith re-enacted in all its details by the same synol (Hariouin, ii. 9'5).

The electiona of Hormisdas and John I. present no particular feature; but nfter the latter had died in confinement, a victim to the displeasure of Theoloric, that monarch assumed to himself the right of both nominating and appointing Felix IV. (or III.). This invasion of their privilege called forth energetic remonstrance alike from clergy and people; and T'heodoric was ultinately presniled upon to decree, that in all future elections the cheics should rest with them, though he still reserved to himself the royal right of proneuncing upon such choice before the act of consecration (Casiodurus, laricr. viii. 15).

The elections of Boniface II., John II, ard Agapetus, conducted under Gethic auspices, mark another period of open and shameless bribery; and almost the last act of the expiring Reman senate was to issue a decree (ann. 532) declaring that any person convicted of giving or promising a reward for the purpose of bringing about the election of a candidate, should forfeit the right of sulfrage, while the bribe was made receverable by action against the receiver (ibid. ix. 15). This decree was subsequently ratified by a rescript from Ravenna, which extended its operation to all the metropolitan sees of Italy; and Athalaric, tha successor of Theodoric, gave order that "the laudable decree of the most noble senate " should be engraved on marble, and placed in the vestibule of St. Peter's (ib. ix. 16). ${ }^{\mathbf{k}}$
The right of a pope to influence in any degree the election of his successor appears to have formed a subject of deliberation at the synod of 499 (see Greenwood, Cath. Petri, ii. 69). In princip.e, however, such interference had been virtually condemned by Hilary, who had forbiddea the bishops of Tarraconensis to nominate their successors (Thiel, 1. 167). The theery was now revived by Boniface II., who obtained from a ayuod in the year 530 a decree empowering hini to appeint a successor, and actually nominated a deacon, Vigilius, who was afterwards pope. But a second synod reversed the decree ("quia contra canones fuerat hoc factum"), and Boniface himself publicly committed the writiag to the fames,- in the language of Adastasins, " reum se confessus majestutis" (Murat. Seript. 1. ii. p. 127.)

cxxiii. c. 25) shews that bishops were required to mnintain a resident ngent or secretary at the residence of thelr metrupoliten; the metropolitau, again, at the residence of his patriarch. The growing dependence of the Roman see on the emparor is prebably in licated by the fact, that Agapetus (A.D. $533^{-6}-6$ ) was the first pepe whe maintained an epocrisimits lezmanently at the Eastern conrt (Thomassia, ed. Beurassé, i. 141). From this time the inlluence exerted by that court over the pmpal elections may be iuferred from the number of nuocrisiarii (e.g. Pelagius I., Gregery I., Sabinian, Bonifice ll]. Martio I.) who succeeded to the papnl throne.

The illegal deposition and murder of Sylverias (A,D. 536-7) was followed by the uncanuniral election of Vigilina, at the dictation of Belisarius, who, however, according to Liberatas, condescended to obserre the usual formalitics: "Convocatis presbyteria et diaconibus et clericis, mandavit cis ut alium sibi Papam eligerent" (Migae, Ixviii. 1040). 13ut the election, to quote the language of Greenweod (ii. $146 \lambda$ "by every known rule of cancon law was void from the begiaaing." Pelagins I. (A.D. 555-60) the suocessor to Vigilius, was installed without erea these formalities, and his unpopularity was such that enly two biahops and a single presbyter could be found to otficiate at his censectation (Greenwood, ii. 162). It is not until the year 578, when the Lombard invasion had paralysed the pewer of the Byzantine conrt for interference, that we again meet with a really independent election,-that of Pelagius II.

The successor of Pelagins, Gregery the Greah, was summoned te the papal chair by the unanimous and spontaneous veice of the electors; "Clerus, senatus, populusque Romanus sibi coscorditer pontificem delegeruat" (lita a Joh. Diac. bk. i. c. 39). For nearly thrae quarters of a century from his time, no election cslla for particular comment, if we except, perhaps, that of Eugenjus I. (A.D. 654) whose installation at the dictation of the imperial power during the lifetime of his predecessor, was in open disregsen of the canoaical requirements. The chsuges that mark the relations of the papacy and the empire during this period, are, however, important. In the tirst instance, the emperer is to be seen endeavouring to retain his control over the Roman see by delegatiag his antherity to the exarchs of Ravenna,-the course adopted by Heraclius in 639. The exarchs nppear te have sympathised with the see of Ravenna in its endeavours to establish "autecephaly," and rendered themselves obnoxions to the Roman pontiffs by an arbitrary exercise of their powers. At the earnest entreaty of pope Agathe, Constantine Pogonatus, in the year 682, reassamed these powers to himeelf, and finally, on the succession of Benedict II. in the yenr 684, in consideration of the great expense and delay (sometimes extending to a twelvemonth) involved in referring each election to Constantinople, consented altogether to forego his right of saaction; from this time nothing more was required than a formal notification from Rome, while the act of consecration ne longer awaited the imperial sanction. Baronius speaks enthusiastically of this concession: "Restituta Romaaa ecclesis in pristinam libertatem;" and the election of John V, in tho year 685, is regarded by mony

The numher of Greeks or Syrians who appear as Benedict's succassors clearly prove, however, that the influence of the exarchs was still potent. Constantine's concession had been made, moreover, on the condition that the clection vers uncnimous; and the contests that preceded the elections of Conon (A.D. 686), and Sergius (A.D. 687), placed the newly-acquired freedom again in jeopardy. In the former case the "nilitia" and the clergy of Rome supported dituerent can. and the clergy of Rome supported diterent candidates; in the latter the interfereace of the exarch of liavenoa was soijeited, and his support gained by a bribe of one hundred pounds of gold. It was unt, consequently, until the outbreak of the iconoclastic controversy, and the loss of the exarchste, that the prerogatives of the Eastera emperor in relation to the papacy came definitively to an end. The last pope who solicited the imperial confurmation of his election was Gregory III. (A.D. 731-41); and the acts of the Lateran syuod of 769 exhibit for the first time the discontiaunace of the imperial year in the official records of the proceedings of the Western church (Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. 435 ; Mansl, xii. 703-21).
The Lombard kings appear to have nttempted no interference with the papal elections; hut in Reme itself the growing importancee of the influence wielded by the pontiff invested his office with a corresponding vilue in the eyes of political and approval after the selection had been made by the clergy (Hefele, Concilienjesch. iii. 438; Greenwood, Cathedra Petri, il. 403, note). But Is is evident that lf such were the desigu of the synod, it either failed to be carried into effect or was soon set aslde, for we are tolld by Anatasius of the electlon of Leo III. (A.D, 795), "cuncto populo Romano electus est" (Muratori, Script. 11. i. 195); of that of Stephen V. (A.D. 816) "a populo Romano eat electus" (ib. III, I. 212); and of that of Paachal I. (A.D. 81\%) "una voluntate a clenctis sacerdotibus seu proceribus, etqus omnd clero, noe non et optimatibus, vel ruacto populo est " (is in sedem apostolicam Pontifex elevatus est (ib. III. i. 213). lt would therefore nppear that the view of Fleury (ix. 464) is more likely to be correct, viz., that the popular or lay ratitication of the clerical cholce continued to be essential to the validity of the election (see Thomassin, II. ii. I3, § 7 ).

The statement that pope Hadrian, at a Lateran synod, A.D. 774, made over to Charles the Great the right of appointing to the see of Ronie, together with that of investiture to all ecclesinstical ns a mies in the empire, may safely be dismissed as a mere fiction. ${ }^{1}$ The utmoas that the Frankish monarch claimed, was the ancient imperial prerogative of confirming each papal election. Phillips (Kirchenrecht, v. 763) and Thomassin (11. ii. 25) concur in their helief that throughout the rule of the Carolingion dyansty these elections took place in due canonical form.

On the other hand, it is not to be denied that the stratagem whereby Leo III. exhibited himself to Christendom as the bestower of the imperial dignity on Charles (A.D. 800) introduced novel elements in the papal relations to the political the respective these in turn served to render and the emperor, in of the clergy, the people, doubtful and conflicting. In this Roman see elections became conflicting. In this manaer these elections became one of the chief causes of the atrife between emperor nad pope in the middle ages (see Phillips, Kirchenrecht iii. in the middle ages (see Phillips, Kırchenrecht, iii. 150; v. 763; Milman, Lat. Christianity, bk. iv. c. 12; Bryce, Holy Roman Empire, c. 5 ; Stnudenmaie. Bryce, derBischofswahlen, pp. 55-70). In the year 867, on the election of Hadrian II., we are told by, Anastasius that the "missi" of the einperor (Lewis II.) were in Rome, and were iddiguant that they were not invited to be present at the ceremony and take part therein. Whereupon they were assured that the omission was not casignad as a slight on the emperor ("Augusti causa contemptus "), but in order that no precedent might be afforded, to be pleaded on future occasions, for the presence of the imperial envoys at the papal elections (Nigue, exxviii. 1382).

the elected should be fifty years of age; (2) that ne should be one of the clergy of the church over which he was called to preside; (3) that he should have been duly and regularly admitied to the subordinate offices of dearoo and presbyter (see Bisuop, p. 129). No instance of trauslation from another see occurs withln our periol, the earliest having been that of Formosus, whe was trunslated, in the year 891, from the bishopric of Portus (Bower, Histor! of the Popes, v. 66). The absence of information respecting the exact age of each poatiff at the time of his clection, a fact attributable to the obscure origin of the majority, does not eanbie us to determine how far the iimitation with respect to age wab allhered to. Gregory the Grent was probabiy about forty-six nt the time of his nccession; Leo the Great was just fifty ; Damasuas, Pelagius I., Pelagius II., and Sergius 1. were considurably obove the latter age. That prior nilmission to the priestiy office was looked upon as ladispensable inay be inferred from the fact referred to above, that even in the case of the forced and irregular promotion of Constantine, in 767, It was deemed necessary that ine should tirst go through the forms of admission to the diaconate and to the priestly office. The precedents pleaded by Constantine sntficiently prove that no exception existed in faveur of the Roman see. Nutionality was not regarded, and seven of the bishopis of Rome in the first three ceaturies were of Greek extraction ; while the fact that from A.D. 687767 three were Greeks, four Syrians, und ouly one a Roman, indicates the infuence exerted at this period over the elections by the exarchs of Ravenda.
( $\beta$ ) The Electors.-These were originally the neighbouring bishops, in conjunction with the clergy and laity of the church of Rome. Such at least is the tenor of the evidence efforded by a letter of St. Cyprinn (Epist. 52) concerang the election of Cornelius (A.D. 251), mad his atatement is appealed to by the canonists as satiafactory proof of the due observance of the canonical forma as aoon as $w$. have any information respecting these elections: "Factus est Cornelius episcopus de Dei et Christi ejus judicio, de clerlcorum paene omnium testimonio, de plebis, quae tanc affuit, suffragio, et de sacerdotum antiquorum et bunorum virorum collegio " (Gratian, Jecret. II. causa rii. qu. 1, c. 5). From the 5th to the 8th century it would appear that (1) the whole body of the clergy, (2) the magistrates ("judices") as representatives of the "optimates," (3) the militin ("schola" or "generalitas militiae," who reaily represeated the civic clasa, while the "civium univeraitas" remained in the background) made up the component elements of the clectoral body (Lib. Diur. II. i.--vii.). In the yenr 769, we find Stephen III. (IV.) presiding at a synod, which refers in one of its decrees to the papal elections as being made by the "proceres et primates ecclesiae" (Gratinn, Decret. I. Ixxix. 5). In this body Thomaasin considers, we may recognise the college of cardinala, ${ }^{\prime}$ bnt the formal

[^113]decree for the election of the pope by this body was not promulgated until A.D. 1059, wheu the second Lateran council decided that from that time the choice, "juilicium," should rest with' the carlinal bishops, while the cardinal priests nuid deacons, the luity and the emperor, should be consulied only for their nsient (Phillips, Kirchenrecht, v . 792-796; Gratian, 1. dist. xxiii. 1).
( $\gamma$ ) Melhod of Procedurc.- The order of the proceediags as prescribed in the Liber Diarmus (Migne, Patrol. cv.) is supposed by the eifiters to be derived from that observed at four papai elections, viz., that of Buniface V. (A.D. 618), of Leo II. (A.D. 682), of Cenon (A.D. 68ij), and of Gregory II. (A.D. 715).
(1) Immediately on the pope's decease, a leter ("nuntius") was despatchet to the exarch at Ravenan, conveying a formal andouncement of the event. Originaily this letter purported to be written in the name of the whole body of the clergy ; but from the time of Delagius Ii. (Lib, Diur. II. I.) it appears to have been written in the names of the archpresbyter, the arcidencon, and the "primicerius" or chief notary. (2) After the funeral rites, and a solemn three days' fast, during which time the electors were enjoined to supplicate the diviae direction in their new choice, the clergy, "optimates," and "populus" assembled and gave their votes, and the decree was drawn up and received their signatures. (3) The eiection was then announced by a deputation to Constantinople, and awnitel the imperial anaction. ${ }^{n}$ (4) it was similarity announced to the exarch at Ravenan, und his contirmation besought; if, as at certain periods was the case, this authority was not vested in his office, he was devired to use his Influence in obtaining the sanction of the emperor. From the time of Honorius (A.D. 626-38), however, Gregorotius (Gesch. der Stadt Ron, ii. 124) cousiders that the Liber Ihurnus shews that although the election wns also notified to the imperial court, the greater importance was attached to the conseat of the exarch. (5) Letters were also seat to the judges, the archbishop, and the npocrisiarius at Ravenan, and to the "patricius," the patriarch, and the apocrisiarius at Constantinople ; and the decree ("decretales pagione") was deposited in the archives of the Vaticaa. (6) Whea the confirmation of the election nad been receivel, the new pope was conducted to St. Peter's, 一"ad confessionem sancti Petri." (7) 0 a arrivivg there he made a pnblic confession of faith before the relics (" corpus") of the apostle. (8) Atter receiving censecration and ordination, he repeated this contession. (9) Finally, he delirered a sermon in the city, copies of which were sent to all the churches.
Somewhat na the day of martyrdom was spoken of as the birthday of the martyr, in the community to which he belonged, so the dar of their election to the papal office was deacribed br the popes as "dies matalitius." Thus leo

iii. Insignia of the office.-The distinguishing Iasignia probably belongel to a period later than A.D. 800; although a trndition is preserved by Aimein (Hist. Franc. I. $2+$; Migne, cxxxix. 660) that the emperor Ansstasins sent a gold crown, sdorned with gems, to Clovis, kiug of the Franks, and that he, ot the suggestion of St. Remy, sent It to the pope. Kocen ( $d_{d}$ Tiarue Pontificiae Origine, Thes. pp. 7, 8) considers that the alluxion In the spurlous donation of Constantine to the "diadema, videlicet coronam oaplt is nostrif," proves that the pope had already assumed a crown. as distinguished from the ordinary epiacopal mitre. The crown was dexigned to symboiize the tempornl power. Innocent III. says "In signum spiritualium contullt mihi mitram, in signum temperalium dedit mihi coronam; mitram pro sscerdotio, coronam pro regno" (Serm. lii. ! Migue, coxvii. 665). The earliest reference to the deuble crown occurs, according to Richter (Kirchenrecht, p. 201) in the year 1297, in the pontificate of BonifaceVIII. ; secnrding to Phillips, (hirchenrecht, v. 612) as early as that of Nichofns ii. (A.D. 1059-61). Von Heffner (Trachten des christl. Mittclalters, p. 38) assigns the earliest meation of the triple crown to the time of Clement V. (A, D. 1305-14); ('hillips not earlier than that of Urban V. posed by a canen of the charch; and if in any exceptlonal emergency a blshop or looai synod ventured on such an exercise of power, tha act was always held to reguire the confirmation of a general council or of the pope. The view of thla writer with respect to the conditions under whlch such power could be exerefised are given under indulaence, p. 835 ; but the following instances are deserving of note, as illustrating more precisely the gradual developnient of its exerclas by the Roman pentiff.
The important part assigned to Melohiades (A.D. 311-14) in relation to the Dunatist achism [Caecilianus, Dict. Curist. Biog.] is cited by Catholic writers as one of the earillest and most important instinces. Melehiades restricted his condemnation to the author of the schism, and permitted thoae Donatlst bishops who had been ordained by Majorinus to re-enter the pale of communion, and to retaln possession of their sees on deciaration of their readiness to reuounce their sohismatlcal tenets. In casas where a Catholic bishop had been eatablished, he enduavoured to provide another cure ior the Donatist bishop, "ita ut quibuscumque locis duo essent episcopi, quos dissenslo geminasset, cum confirmari vellot qui fuisset ordinatus prior, alteri autem eorum plebs alia regeuda provideretur" (Augustine, Epist. 43; Migne, xxxiii. 167). This policy is warmly praised by Augustine as indicating the permonal action of Melchiades; but it should be noted that he also speaks of him as enacting these measures at Rome "cum multis collegis suia." The instance is however unquestlonable proof of the growinz defarence pald to the church of Rome and its bishop.
Other instancea, cited by Thomassin and and Siricius, as ocurring in the times of Damasus and siricius, nre referred to under Indulaence, p. 835. In the time of Anastasius I. (A.D. 398Africapplication was made to that pontif' by the African bishops to sanction a general diapens:tion to the Dunatist clergy. it had previously $3: 9$ ), dacreed, at a council held at Capua (A.D. unles , that no such diapensation should be granted of a ess under conditions that afforded a prospect of a complate suppression of the schisin. The church of Africa accordingly deemed it necessary to gain the approval of the Reman ses before it ventured to set the decision aside; but at the aame time it la to be noted that they do not attribute autocratical authority to the blshop of Rome, but simply such pre-eminence as might be ciaimed by the representative of an apostolic see, "Placuit ut litterae mittantur ad fratres et coepiscopos nostros, et maxime ud sedem apostolicam in que praeaidet Anastasius " (Cod. Can. Eccl. Afric. c. 68).
Symmachus vindicates a similar exercise of the papal parogative on the part of his predecessor Anastasius II. (A.d. 496-8) in relation to certain of the Guliican churches, although admitting it to have been "practor" ecclesiae cubauetulinem, et antiqua praedecessorum nostrorum statuta;" he also in the same letter takee occasion to enunciate the general rules that may be supecolasla regulate such excroise of supreme ecelaslastiogl authority, maintaining that "what a breach of the to the canon is not necessarily a wanton dithe cauon, which is violated only by would often be "cruel to insist upon a law when its observance was likely to be attended with detriment to the church, it being the design of all laws that they should benefit, not lajure" (Thiel, Epist. Rom. Pont. p. 657).

The doctrine of exjediency, as thus laid down, ani depending on the discretion of the peatiff, is illustasted in the pollcy of Boniface I. (A.D. 418-22). On the one hand he refused to permit Patroclus, bishop of Arlee, to essume the fuactions of a metropolitan in another diocese by ordaiaing a successor to a vacant bishopric "contra patrun regular," quod nequaqunm pessumus ferre patientor, quia convenit nos paternarum sanctionum diligentes esse custodes" (Epist. 12); on the other, in the permission which he accorded to Perigenes to assume the bishopric of Corinth, he appears directly to have departed from adherence to cnaonical law (Coustsnt, ed. Schoenemaxn, p. 723).

A certain dispensing authority is unaloubtedly implied in the permiasion accorded by Celestine I. (A.D. 422) to the Nestorinns, to be received again into the church (i). pp. 871-6).

The language of Leo I. is distinctly that of one who aasumes to be the censor of the whole ohurch, and bound to interfere, "quoties aliqua contra inatituta canonum et ecclesiasticam disclplinam praesumpta vel commissa cognoscimus" (Praef. in Decret.); and he asserts that compliance with the canonical diacipline is an essential condition of communion (can. 5); yet, notwithstanding we have a conspicuous instance of the exercise of the dispeasing power by this pontiff. In a letter to Ylavianus, bishop of Conatantinople (Mansi, v. 1365, 1406), he condemns the heresy of Eutyches, but at the same time exjoins that the latter ahould be reatored to communion, and to the administration of his monaatery, on abjuration of his errors, "aedis enim apostolicae moderatio hanc temperantinm servat, ut et severius agat cum obduratis et veniam cupiat praestare correctis." In a letter to the emperor Marcianus he severely condemna the presuinption of hie rival Anatolius, biehop of Conatantinople, in ordaining a bishop to the church of Antioch, "contra instituta canonum ;" and aays that his opposition to this measure has been withdrawn solely from a desire to restore the faith and from a love of peace, "quod nos amore reparandae fidei ot pacis atudio retractare cessavimus" (Epist. civ.; Migne, liv. 1153).

Thomassin conaidere that a yet earlier exexoise of the dispensing power in the East is to be found in the action of Damasus in relation to Flavianus, hishop of Antioch. On this occasion Theophilos, of Alexandria, is represented by Socrates, the historian, as having sent a messenger to Damasus to suggeat that it would be for the velfare of the church if, in order to bring about concord among the laity, he would condone the offence of Flavianus (Soc. H. E. v. 15)- $\boldsymbol{\lambda}$ vor-

 B. G. Ifvil. 281).

In the time of Leo's successor, Hilary, the prevalence of grave irreguinrities in Spain, in the appointment of bishops to racant sees, and in their removal from one diocese to another, rendered it adviaable to appeal to Rome. Hilary granted a general dispensation with respect to appointments which had already taken place, but forbade aimilar disregard of the esnons is future, "ut nihll deiaceps contrn praecepta beati Apoatoli, nihil contra Nicaenorum canouum coastitutum tentetur" (Thiel, p. 1fie).

Gelnsius, at the time when the Gothic invarion had deprived ltaly of half ita clergy, yividel to imperative necessity, and dispensef with tle observance of the canonical periods with respect to ordination (llardouin, Cuno. ii. 897).

Up to thls period, the evidence secms fuirly In harmony with the view of Thomassin, that dispensations were presumed to be in confurnity with the precept of Augustine, that the weal of the church, not the interest of indivilun's, should be consulted in the exercise of the lispensing power, the conditions being (1) that the mutter in question should be of primary magui. tude in relution to the church; (2) that the geod necruing should be clearly dllsceraible, either in the aveidance of some evil to which the observunce of the canon might allord admiswion, or in the galn of benefits which might otherwise be lost; (3) that such diapeasatioas should hare effect only with respect to past irregularities, and not be construed into precedeats in the future. In the language of pepe Martin I , "Canones ecclesiasticos bolvere don possumus qui defensores et custodes canonum sumus, noo transgressores."

With the advance of the 7th century, howerer, and especinily in the centact with teutouism, we find the papai dispensation aolicited and conferred in connenion with irregularities of a kind that afforded precedents for seme of the worst abuses of mediaeval times-the appropriation of revenues of bishoprics, monasterics, and cures for secular purposes. The extent to which this abuan had grown under Charles Martel, in Frankland, rendered hopeless the efforts of Bonifuce towards obtaining astisfactory restitution, and he accordingly obtained from pope Zacharias permission to forego the duty of demanding full reparation to the churchea 8 ad monasteriea. The pontiff himself, indeed, appears to have partially condoned these spoliations, on the consideration that they had been made in behnlf of the Christina state in its struggles agninst the pagan and the iafidel-the Saxon and the Saracen (Epist. x.; Migne, laxxix. 941).

Other facts relating to the same period seem to Indicate that this prerogative had already growa into an abuse. We find, tor example, a Fraakish noble pleading the papal indulgence for sa unlawful marriage, an irregularity differing in character from those of the kiad which the instructions of Gregory the Grent to Augustine might be held to condone, where the msrriage tie had been contracted while the parties were still pagans, "in qulbus ae per ignorantiam sate lavacrum baptiamatis astrinxerunt " (Epist. xi. 64 ; Migne, laxvii. 1190). Certain of the clergf, again, allegad that notwithstanding that they led immoral lives they had received the papal liceace to continue to perform their sacred functions, "revenienten ab apostolica sede dicunt se Romadum pontificem licentiam dedisse ministerium episconala in ecclesiar ministrare." Boniface appears to have treated these representations as mendacioun, "quia Apostolicam sedem aequar quam contra decreta canonum audivimus judicasse" (Epist. 49 ; ib. lxaxix. 747); but the men

Similar privileges were conferred in 750 on Moute Cassino by pope Zacharias. Engel (do Priv. et Jur. Nonast.) enumerates no less than fifty distiact privileges, grauted by papal authority to monasbic foundatioss at a somewhat later jeriod.
(8) On bishops, with respect to residence.-The earliest instaace on record oecurs nearly at the close of our period, whea Charles the Great, at the council of Frankfort (A.D. 794), notified that he had received frotn pipe Hadrian formal permission to retain archbishop Aagilramn nt his pulace, "propter utilitates ecclesinsticas ; " on the same occasion he nnaenuced a like permission with respeet to bishop Hildebald, and eolicited the asseat of the council to thexe arrangements, which was uaanimously granted (Sirmoni, if. 201). As Thomassin observes, thesc formaities clearly prove the importance attached, at that time, to such departures from canonical obligatious.
(r) With respect to minor details.-Among these may ine amined the right to open private chapels for public worship, to wear ecclesiastica! dress of a particular kind (Dalmatic), and others, of which, however, the exnmples are doubtful aud extremely rare before the 9th

As regarde elections to the episcopal office,
the outline of fincts preseated under Bishop (pp. 216-219), and other evidence cited by Thomassin (1I. ij. ce. 1-30), appenr to render it probablo that duriag the greater part of our period the canonical mode of election was main-thined-such election, however, always depend ing on the confirmation of the metropolitan, and generally upon that of the king or emperor. That this mode of election was fully recoguized by the see of Rome, is shewn by a letter addiressed to the bishops of Tarraconensis to pope Hilary, in which, after complaining that Silvanus, bishop of Calagura, contrary to law aad custom, had ordalned a bishop in opposition to the popular wish-"postponens patrum regulas et restra instituta despiciens, nullis peteatibus populis, episcopum urdinavit "-they assert that they have recourse to the papal see, as "uaicum remedium" (Thiel, Epist. R. P. p. 156). This last expression probably Indicates the real character of the authority wielded by the see of Rome in the West, where as the one apostolio see, its decision was from time to time invited in relation to questions of an extraordinary and unusual character. On the other hand, the alsence of all evidence of any claim on the part of ths pope to exercise a veto in ordinary elections, seems coaclusive agaiast the existeace of auch a right. Canonists who maintain that it was both claimed and exercised, are compelled to resort to the singular hypothesis that the power of the metropolitan was held by him simply as the delegate of the bishop of Rome; sad that the re-assumption of a direct dischorge of such functions by the latter, was merely a changed method of administration rendered im. peratively necessary by the inordiaate p. ten-slons of patriarchs and matropolitans, the growith of heresy and schism, and the decline of dian clpline (Phillipa, Kircheurecht, v. 314-8; Iloussel, Hist. Pontif. Juriod. 11. 12; Zacearia, Aati. Fobronis: il. 4).

The queation will admit of belng more concisely investigated, if comshdered as It preseats Itself In relation (1) to the East ; (2), to the West; (3), to jagan communitles,
(1.) In the Shat.-Even here it is allegen! (Phillips, ib, v. 319) that the papal authorlty in electlons to bishoprics was recogaized, and that the patrinrecs of Attoch and Alexandria exercised merely delegated powers. In support of this view, Phillips quates a letter from Damasus (A.D. 306-84) to Paulinus, bishop of Antioch. But the language of this letter (respectlag the genulneness of which some doubt may be felt) implies, at most, oaly a general sinj, remacy, of an honorary character, conceded to the blahop of Romi. If, Indeed, we remember that the authority of Damanus was dlsiputed in Rome itself by his brother hishops, it seems scarcely secessary to enquire whether it was recognixed In the linst. The evideace clted under II. (A) will serve in some measure to prove the hassoundness of such a theory; while in relation to tha decree of Vaientiaian III. (A.D. 455) it is to be ohserved that after the political severance of the two divisions of the emplre in A.D. 438, this could have had no legal force in the East, unless by the consent of the eastern emperor, which whs never granted (Gllbbon, v. 279 ; Greenwood, Cathedra Petri, 1. 459).

A letter of lanocent I. (A.D. 402-17) to Alexander, bishop of Antloch, which may reasoanbly be accepted as genulne, seems, however, ulmost deciaive.p Here, after distinctly Interpretiag the nixth canon of the council of Nicsea as recognizing the right of the bishop of Antioch to ordnia metropolitans for the whole of the Eastern dlecese, Inaocent goes on to say: "Itsque arbitrsmar, frater carissime, ut sicut metropolitanos auetoritate ordines singulari, sic at caeteros non sine permissu conscientiaque tus sinas episcopos procreari. In quibus hunc modam recte servabis, ut longe positos litteris datis ordinari censeas ab his, qui nunc cos suo tantum ordinant arbitratu; vicinos autem, si anstimas, ad manus impositionem ture gratiae statuss pervenire" (Migne, Patrol. xx. 5+7-9). Of his own authority in relation to such ordinatioas, lanocent says nething; but, as Thomassin (II. ii. $8, \S: 3$ ) points out, after interprating the language of the eouncil of Nicsea in the sense bove descrihed, holds that as regards the bishops of the ditfereat provinces included in the Eastera diocese, those in the provjaces nearer to Antioch were to be summoned to the metropolis to receive ordination at the hands of its bishop, While those in the more remote provinces were ta recelve ordlattion from their respective inetrojolitans, their elections being confirmed by the bishop of Antioch.

Finally, we have satisfactory proof with respect to the earliest consecration of an eastern blahop by the pope. Agapetus, in a letter to [^114]Pater, blahop of Jerusalem, after referrigg to his own coasecration (Mar. 13, A.s). Bibl of Mennan, patriarch of Constantlacpla (i.iberatus, c. 2& 1 Migne, Ixill. 1006), expressly states that "siace the time of the apostle l'ater, the Eastern church has never received $n$ hishop at the hasim of the pope" (Ilardouia, II. 2:36).

(2.) In the Hest.- Here the eviliencr, thangh conflicting, is such that It is not dificuls to arrive at a satiafictory conclusion. The riew of Themassin, that the inethom above recugnized by damecent as the cunonical mole of procelure la the liast, may be supposed to have corre sponded to that fa foren in the West, is in the highent degrea probable. The claita already referred to (stmpro, p. 1659) as put forth by Innoeent, of the oricimal foundiation of all the bishoprics of the West by St. Peter and his successors, points to a theoretleal supremacy of Rome over the entire episcopate. With respect to the suburblcariau hishops (Sunurucarn), thelr ordination was, of course, directly subject to the papal approval ss to that of thelr supreng metropolitan. The pupal sanctlun was alo necessary throughout the Roman patriarchate, Of this a letter written by Celestine in A.d. 423, to the bishops of Calnbria aud Apalia, uffords direct eridence. He here expresses his surprise that the churche of those districts, after electing laymen to the episcopal office should venture to look for his eontirinativa of such elections-" de nohis pessime sentientes quos credunt hoo posse facere" (Migne, Putrol 1. 436).

In the theory above indleated by Thomassia (who appears, however, scarcely to have appreheaded Its full significance), we have the key to much of the subsequeat history of the ese teasion of the papal authorlty aver the whole episcopate. Towards the close of the 4 th ceatury we are able, for the first time, to trace with any certaiaty the preseace of metropolitan bishops in the West. The linportance of thit fact in relation to our whele enquiry is conds siderable; for, as will be seen, it compula thase who assert that the papal prerogatives were ndmitted and exercised at a much earlier period, to have recourse to the singular hypothesis that durlag the time when the evidence tor a geueral recogaition of the authority of the bishop of Rome is expecislly defective, that nuthority was mest directly exerted.

At the same time, it is not to be denied that the bishop of Rone claimed a certnin nominal authority over all patriarchs and metropolitans, and their elections would appear to have been usually notified to the Roman eee, not, howerer, in order to obtain the ratification neceasary to validity, but as a epontaneous recognition of the honorary primacy of its bishep. Uf this slmost concluaive evidence is afforded in two Jetters addreased by l.eo the Great (a.D. 444) to the bishops of Illyricum. Here, after claiming to have authority, derlved from St. Peter, uver all churches (si:pra, p. 1659), he formally sppointh Anastasiue, metropolitan of Thessnlonica, his delegate to consecrate metropolitans in Illyricum,

II. 8, & 11)

The eardiest instance tiat polinta to a mere general rocognition of this authority, is perhaps that contwinel in the preamble of a letter addresaed to llilary by a synoid of llarcelona (a, d. 465), soliciting his contirmation of the uncanonical translation of one Irenaeus from a neighbouring bishursic to that of Barcelonn, and implying that their appeal is not simply dietated by a sense of the importance attmehed to the papsal decisions, but is the course limbing upun them as a matte: of church disci line:-"Etiamai nulla exstaret necessitas ecelenlasticae disciplinae, expetenium revera nebis fuerat illud privilegium sedis vestrae " (Mansi, vii. 924). Inasmuch as, however, IIIJary, in his reply, takes. occasion to rebuke them for ordaining bishops to different sees without obtnining the aanction of Ascausias, their metropolitan, It is evident that in Spain a delegsted authority was all that was at this time asserted by the pope (Thiel, Eyist, Hom. Pont, i. 166). In support of this view we may refer to the lnaguage of Gregory the Great, at a yet later period, in certain instructiona to his legate when the latter was about to set out for Spain. Here it is clearly implied that his jurisdiction did not ordinarily extead to bishops in that proriace, for in referring to a certuin bishop named Stephen, Gregory anys that "inasinuch as Stephen had wither a metropolitan nor a patribicch," a certain matter in dispute must consequently "belong to the apostolic chair, as the heal of all the churches, nond be decided by it " (Epist. x.11, 45 ; Migne, lxxvil. 125-t).
Generally speaking, however, the evidence exhibits the authority of the pope as adranciag from the time of Leo the Great, towarils that of a universal metropolitan in the West ; and again, at a period Inter than that which we are here called upon te treat, from that of a universal metropolitan to an immedinte and ordinary juris. dictien ever the whele episcopate. Amung the means whercley this great extension of the papal power was brought about, the encouragement given to the practice of appeuling to Rome [AיPEAL] must be regarded as the muat effectual. It will indeed be found that neasly all the precedents affiorded by our period, which canonists are wont to cite in support of the Florentine canon (supra, p. 1652) represent, in reality, exceptional casea, which, viewed in their proper light, tend rather to an exactly oppeaite conclusion.
In no relation were appeals to Rome more frequent than in connexion with olections, and in these cases the pontiff nenrly always appears as the defender of pepular rights and of canonical discipline against Jaxity or tyranny on the part of the metropelitan. Lee himself asserts in the plainest laagunge that the wishes of the laity and the concurrence of the electing bishops are essential to an ordination to a bishopric,-"Nulla ratio sinit ut inter episcepes habeantur qui nee elericis sunt electi nec a plebibus aunt expetiti" (Eyist. 167; Migne, Jiv. 142(1). It wonl.] ajpear indeed to hare been this pontifis great aim to preserve to every chureh its rights and freedom on such oceasions. When, for axample, the church at Panormus, in Sicily, were in grent perplexity with respect to the chojee of a new bishop (owing to the want of a alitable canilidate for the ollice) he desired them to send deputies to Ronie who should elect a bishop theres "quod tamen nos non valuntate impulsi loquimur, sed neressitate compulsi ; quin qunntum ent ad nostrae nuthoritatis judicium, de suis volumus ut debeant habere pastorem" (Lipist. xiii. 15 Migne, Ixxvif, 1229). kiven when he vouchasfed advice to a church with respect to its chuipe (as In the case of Constantine of Milan) he abstained as much as possible from all apjearance of dictation, "quin antiquae meae deliberntionis in tentio est, ad suscipienda pastoralia curne onera pro nulline unquam misceri peraona" (ib. iii. 29; of his biograp). At the same time the langunge of his biographer, Jounnes Dincenus, preves that the aelection of Sit persons for the otlice in his awn diecese was to Gregory a matter of the lirelieat interest, "ab ipso sune consecrationis exordio fer omnem diaecesim suam, eplscopus undecunque meliores invenire potuit studiosiasime ordinurit " iota, iii. 7 ; Migree, lxxv. 86).
Bnt notwithstanding Gregory's genuinc moderation, erents in the political world contributed very powerfully during his pentificate to augment the at thority of the Roman see. Of this are undeninble evidence in the frequency thth which the palliuin [PALIIUM] was solicited at his hands. Instances of the bestowal of this vestment before his time are exceedingly rare; asuong the best authenticated being ite presentation to Caesarius of Arles by Symmachus, in the year 513 (Jaile, no. 477), to the metropolitan of Arles by Vigilius (A.D. 537-555), and to the anme dignitnry by Pelagius 11. (A.D. $578-590$ ), Gregory assigus the fact of Its bestowal by his predecessor, is a reason for not nubjecting " the bishop of Arles" to the autherity of Allgustine (Bede, E. H. 1. 27). By Gregery it appears to have been bestowed $q$ on the metropinlitan of Hispalis (Mansi, x. 199), on the metropulitan of Arles (ib. ix. 1231), on the bishops of Augustodunum in Gaul (Migne, Ixzvii. 1014), of Salona in Dalmatin (ib. ix. 1166), of Prima Jastiniana in Illyricum (ib. ix. 1189), on Augustine as archbishop of Canterbury (ib. x. 394), on the metropolitan of Nicopolis ire Epirus (ib. x. 6), on the bighops of Messana, Syracuse, and Panermus in Sicily (ib, x. 7, 13, 867), and on the metropolitan of Ravenna, Boniface IV. (A.D. 608-615) sends it to Flerianus, metropolitan of Arles, and writing to Theoderic, king of the Franks, speaks of the act as "secundum antiquam consuetudinem " (Jalfé, Regest. Rom. Pont. p. 155). Honorius J. (A.d. 625-628) refuses to send it to Hypatius, bishop of Nicopolis, until the latter shall have purged himseif frem the accusation of having been accessury to a brother's death (Mansi, x. 581); he promises it to the bishop of Grada (Jaffe, p. 157); senda it to Honorius, archbishop of Canterbury, and to Paulinus, arehbishop of York (Mansi, x. 58(1); and decrees that metropolitans using it in the streets or "in litauiis" shall be deprived of the right to wear it (ib. x. 585).

The theory thnt the aeceptance of the pallium did not involve any special profession of allegiance to the pope of Rome (Thomassin, 11. ii. 45, § 10 ; Greenwood, Cath. Petri. ii. 220), can hardly be looked upon as valid after the 7th century. Gregory himself, it is true, appenrs to have considered that its bestowal must be preceded by the express wish and persoual application of the receiver, and also be sanetioned by the consent of the reigning prince (Migne, laxvii. 781). So early however as the year 581, a canon of the first couneil of Macon forbids metropolitans to celebrate mass without it,"ut archiepiscopus sine pallio missas dicere nen praesumat" (Sirmond, i. 371); and we find that its bestowal on Tilpin, archbishop of Rheims, in the year 772, was understood to entitle him to appeal to the pope from the authority of a loeal synod (Flodoard, Hist. Remens. bk. ii. c. 17).
(3.) The question of the significance to be attached to its bestowal will be further illustrated by the following evidence for the papal authority over bishops and bishoprics (3) in pajan lands. In this relation the evidence is far more plainly favourable to the theory of Roman supremacy. A bishop sent from Rome to evangelize a heathen community was directly accountable to the pope. He was known as "episcopus consecratus in sorte praedicationis," as Boniface was styled by Gregory 11. (Epist. 5; Migne, 1xxxix. 503), a relation compared by Phillips to that which Titus, when in Crete, bore to St. Paul,--and was empowered both to ereate new bishoprics as occasion might arise, and to ordain those who might be elected to fill them. When the district in which he laboured had been, to a certain extent, brought onder eceleciastical orgamzation, if the distance precluded a specinal journey to Rome, his ordination was delegated to another bishop. Of this an instance occurs in connexion with the archbishoprics of York and Canterbury in the time of Honorius, whe empowered the surviving archbishop to ordain a successor on a vacancy occurring in either sea (Bede, H. $E$. 1i. 18).
It would appear, however, to be beyond doubt that in pagan landa such powers were only delegated for a time by the Homan pontiff, and were resumable at pleasure. Of this, atrong presumptive evidence is afforded in the 28th canon of the council of Chalcedon, already quoted (supra, p. 1664). The endeavour here made to claim for the see of Constantinople rights precisely of Rome, involves the assertion of the right of the bishop of Constantinople to ordain, not merely the metropolitans of Pontus, Asia, and Thrace, but also the bishops "in sorte praedicationis" among the pagan communities still existing in (Mansi, vil. 427). The proviso in this latter clause would seem to have been designed to complete the parallelism between the jurisdictlon of the primate of Constantinople and that of the Reman pontiff, an attempt which was met by the indignant repudiation of Leo.

Among such communities themselves the theory that prevailed appears to have varied with the particular conditions and cireumstanees. At first, the papal claims would be received with ready assent, such as a cense of filial gratitude would naturally dictate. When, however, eccle. siastical power becaine associated with political power, there arose a spirit of greater independence, like that from time to time exhilited among those nations of the West whose conversion belonged to a much earlier period. We learn, for example, from Bede (II. E. iii. 29) that Wighard was sent to Rome to receive his consecratiou as archbishop of Cunterbury at the hands of pope Deusdedit, "to the end that he might ordain eatholie priests for the churches of the English nation throughout all Britain;" arch. bishop Theodore, again, was ordained at Rome by Vitalian ( l . iv. 1). Yet notwithstanding, only a few years after the ordination of Theodore, we find Alfrid, king of Northumbria, refusing to recognise the right of Wilfrid to the bishopric of York, though the election of the latter had twice been contirmed bv popes Agatho and John V. "I will not," ssid the monarch, "alter one word of a sentence issued by myself, the archbishop, and all the dignitaries of the land, for a writing coming, as ye say, from the appatolic chnir" (Milman, Lat. Christianity, bk. is. c. 4).

Again the tone of English eeelesiasticism changes, and within little more than half a century Boniface, in Franklond, announces to Cuthbert, in terms already referred to (sulp ${ }^{\prime \prime}$, p. 1660) a full recognition, on the part of the Frankish bishops and their metropolitans, of the supreme and final authority of the pope-"Decrevimus . . subjectionem Romsaae ecelesise fine temus vitae nostrae velle servare; ssacto Petro et vicario ejus velle subjici; . . . metropolitanos pallia ab illa sede quaerere et per ombis praecepta sancti Petri canonice sequi desidersre, ut inter oves sibi conunendntas numeremur" (Epist. 63; Migue, $1_{\text {xxxix. }} 763$ ). But it is evident that this deferential spirit was succeeded by something appresching to insubordination; for, a few years after, Boniface writes to entreat the indulgence of pope Zachary for the non-fulfilment of the above engngements, especially "de palliis a Romana ecclesia petendis," "quie quod promiserunt tardantes non impleverudt, et adhue differtur et ventilatur " (Epist. 75 ; Migee, 1xxxix. 778). "How diffieult it was to overcome the repugnance of the Teutonic prelates, is manifest in the fact that St. Lull, the especial disciple of St. Boniface, in whose favour the latter exercised the exceptional privilege accorded him of nominating a successor to the primatial sef of Mainz, though appointed in 754, had not get sought the pallium in 772, when Adrian l. wrote to Tilpin of Rheims, ordering him to investigste the doetrine and virtues of Lull, and, if the result was satisfactory, to give him a certificate, on the strength of which the pallium would be sent to him. It was evident that some alditions inducements were necessary to overcome this aversion and to bind thi hlerarchy to the threne of St. Peter" (Lea, H. C. Studies in Church History, p. 138). This assertion can be accepted only in conjunction with his peculiar view, that the acceptance of the pallium did not havolve nay aeknowledgment of submission to Rome, for both the bishops of Bourges and of Metz received that vestment at the hands of Hairian I. (Mansi, xii. 834; xiii. 909). On the dent that the papal pretensions in Frankland assumed a very modest guise, nad were little more than honorary in character; the relntions ablanshad between the papacy and the Frankish monarchy secured to the latter full powers over the church within its own dominions; and we find Leidradus, metropolitan of Lyons, when writing to Charles, implying that his appointment to monarch himself, "ad regimen ecelesiae Lugdunessis destinare voluistis" (Migne, xcix. 871).
In the year 877, pope Johu VIII. at the synod of Ravenna, ordered that all metropolitans should be deprived of their sees who failed to apply for the pallium within three months of coasecration-"a regulation," says Lea, "which met with little alore respect than previous like attempts" (Studies in Church Hist. p. 87).
