MÂCON, COUNCILS OF (Matisconensià Concilu). Three councils of Macon are recorded; the two first being held by command of king Gustram.

1. A.D. 581, when 21 bishops subseribed to 19 caans: Priscus of Lrons tirst, num Evantius of Vienne next. In their preface they declire they are not going to make new canons so much ns sunction the old. Yet their 6th canon is novel, as well in speaking of archbishops at all, as ia ordering that they shall not say mass without their palls. So is the 7 th, whieh threatens civil judges with excommunication it they proceed against any clerk. except on criminal charges. So is the 9 th, which orders Moadays, Wednes. days, nod Fridays from Nov. 11 to Dec. 25 to be kept ns fasts. Others relating to married priests aud bishops, and to the Jews in general, are remarkable for their severity. Nine more eanous are cited by Burchard and others as having been passed at this council. 2. A.D. 585 , when 43 p1essut and 20 absent ishops, through their depotere, sulseribed to 20 bishops, through their depotese, sulscribed to 20 cunons. In their pretice l'riscus, bishop of Lyons, is styled patriarch. The first canon is a short hainily for the hetter observance of Suaday. By the secoad, no work mary be done for six days at Easter. In the sixth, the 4 Ist African canon is quoted with nlproral, which orders that the Eucharist shall be celebrated on nll days of the year but one fasting; and further provision is made for what remains atter. celebration, by directing that it shall be consumed by persons of unblenisiled sumed by persons of unblemished character, brought to church for that purpose, and eajoined to come tasting, on Welnesdays and Fridays, having been first sprinkled with wine. By the seventh, slaves that have been set free by the charch nre not to be molested before the magistrate. By the eighth, none that have taken snactuary may be touched till the pricst has been consulted. By the ninth and tenth, the civil power may not proceel against aay bishop, except through his metropolitan; por agninst aay priest, deacon, or suh-deacoo. except through their hishop. By the sixteenth, no relict of a sab-deacon, exorcist, or acolyth may marry again. By the nineteenth, clerks may not frequent courts wherc capital causes are tried. The twentieth orviers the holding of councils every three years, and charges the bishop of Lyons with nssembling then Lyons with nssembling them, subject to the assent of the king, who is to fix where they shall meet. King Guatram, in a dignified ordinance, published at the close of this council, intimates that the civil authority will not hesitate to step in, if the canons are net entorcell with the rigour. MAFORS (or Mavors; sometimes Mrafora; Maфcíplov or $\mu a \phi$ óplov) was a short veil covering the head and neck, and flowing down noporing the shoulders.

1. It was originally an article of female dress : a cloak or veil. St. Athanasius mentions that the maforium of the Virgin Mary was believed in his time to be preserved in the palace of the Blacheraal ot Constantioople-Tò ò̀ äyıo fined in a MS. Greek Glossary, quoted by Du culls it distinctly a veil, $\tau \delta$ $\tau \hat{\eta} s \kappa \in \phi a \wedge \bar{\eta} s \quad \pi \in \rho!-$ B $\lambda \eta \mu a$, and Suidas (Lexicon) treats it as synonymons with ricinium, a band for the head.
1I. The term was also applied to a large coarse che or hood, worn by monks in the Eastern church: the monkish scajular. Cassian (do Hubitu Monuchor. i. c. 7) describes it thus: "Post haec angusto pallio tam amictus humilitatem, quam vilitatem pretii, compendiumque sectantes, colla pariter atque humeros tegant; quod matortes tain ipsorum quam nestro nuncupatur eloquio." It was the working dress of monks, and a passage in Fortuatus (Vita $S$. Ifilarii, c. ii. n. 2) seems rather to shew that the habit of a monk of peculiar sanctity would sometimes be folded or draped around his tomb; for he calls it "peplum seu velum quo sepulera et tumbae sanctorum obvolvebantur." That, at all events, is the apparent menning of the passnge.
H1. Some writers reckon mafortes among the vestments used in the services of the church, i.e. as a cope or amice. "Mafortem tramosericum rodomelinum aquilatum; item mafortem e teleojorphyro tramosericum opus marinum" (Charta Cormutiana, quoted by Ducange).
Cassian states that this habit was not generally used by monks ln the West.

MAGI, adoration of ; commemorated Dec. 25 (Basil, Menol.). Compare Magi in art.
[c. H.]
MAGI (in Art) (1) before herod. Two instances of this rare subject have been discovered by the industry of M. Rohault de Fleury, and are figured in his beautitul work l'Evanyile (lours, 1875), which is illustrated entirely from early art. One is from of rudo freseo in the catacomb of St. Agnes, of which we subjoin a woodeut, without being able to speak with any certainty as to its dinte, though De Fleury attributes it to the 2nd century. The magi bear their sittis, and the star is very prominent. In the origiaal Herod's face has a look of anger and suspicion, but this may possibly have been inserted or eahanced by some ingenious copyist or other workman, nothing being easier than sinister expression, especially in the large-headed nad large-eyed drawings of the Roman decadence. The second example is from the mosaies of Sta. Maria Maggiore at Rome, and is one of the original mosaics of the 5th century, Herod bears the nimbus, a rather singular instance of its oceurrence so early. Hebrew elders are with him unfolding their rolls of prophecy, and gizing upon him in a manner which appears to disquiet him, as though the text of St. Matt. ii. 3 was in the mind of the artist, and could not have been nore graphically expressed by Raffaelle himself. Of the three kings, or magi, two wear the Phrygian bonnet or helmet, the third, whe is of very yonthful appearance, having long curled hait. They all wear long close-fitting hose, apparently much ornamented down the tront of the leg, with short tunies, altogether presenting a rather mediaeval appearance. Martigny refers to the painting in St. Agnes (see woodent), and says that Herod is supposed in it to be protesting with hand on heart his good intentions towards the Holy Child. See also Perret, vol. ii. pl. alviii. He mentions a sareophngus at Ancona, for which he refers to Bartoli, Sopra un' area marmorea, etc., Turine, 1768, which contnins the same subject, with many figures. It will be found nmong Mr. Parker's Photographs, No. 2677, vol. x viil. Another at Arles bears the first scene of the history, the magi in the act of observing the serving the star, two peinting it out, to the third. Fignred in Rohanlt de Fleury, L'Livangile, vol. i. p. 62.

(2) Adoration of. A special interest is attached to the subject of the Wise Men in the primitive ages. It seems to have retained its hold mere strongly on the Clnistian imagination than many others, and has alwnys been a favourite of graphic artists.
The number of magi is almost always three. Two or four sometimes oecur, and Martigny attributes such changes of treatment to artistic motivea. But a very different account is given by Mr. Hemins (Ilistorical and Monumental liume, p. 661) of the appearace of two instead of three in the celebrated 5 th century mosaies of Sta. Maria Maggiore. "The Divine Child," he says, "is here seated on nn he says, "is here seated on on ample throne, while another personage is seated on a lower chair beside Him. In the original composition that personage was an elderiy male figure, no doubt intended for one of the magi, only two of whom are seen in the mosaic now before us, Whereas in anether of the groups (the three before Herod) we see three magi. A most unjustifiable alteration of this group was ordered when the church was resiored by Benedict XIV. lustead of the male figure seated leside the Child was substituted that of Mary with a nimbus-crowned head and purple vestmenta. Among other innovations then made, one of the magi was omitted, and the mother's figure, originally standing behind the throne of the Child ginally standing behind the throne of the Child, was ehanged into that of an nngel, adding a third to the greup of celestial ministers in the background." The mosaic in its present state is figured in Rohanlt de Fleury, $L$ 'Evanyile, i. p. 6 , xxi, See also Angels and Arcitangels, §S 3, 15,1 . 84 .

There can be little doubt that this subject belonged to the earlier cycle of the catacomb frescoes. It is found in the cemeteries of St. Nereo with four Mag, in that of SS. Marcellinus and Peter with two. They appear for the most part to have been more or less rodely restored at various times. Their netual nppearance maty be understool from Parker's Photograph, No. 1613; St. Neree (A.D. 523?), and No. 2116 (St. Marcellinus, A.D. 772). It is figured by Aringhi (vol. i. p. 597 ) from the Aringhi (vol. i. p. 597), from the walls of the Callixtine Catacomb: the Magi wearing the Phrygian cap and tunic, with modern boots, and rowelled spurs with spur-leathers; an addition in itself sufficient to cast a suspicion of restoration or reconstruction, even as early as Bosio's time, over all the paintings in the catacomb. At p. 615, on a Callixtine sarcophagus, they appear leading their horses, or perhaps camels. They nre bearing their offerings, and guided I y the star to the Holy Infant, who is wrapped in swad swadlling-clothes, and outstretehed on a cradle under the shed with the ox nud the ass. The

The Magi and Firgin. Tomb ot Earlh Inaac. Ravenna, Eth century, Dobault de Fleury' Len Evaugiles، vol. 1. pl. xa.

Two highly interesting 6th-century examples from Ravenna are given by De Fleury (vol. i. plates $x x i$. an 1 xsii.). One from the tomb of the exarch Isaane is here reproduced in woutcat; the other is the well-known mosaic of Sunt'Apollinare nella Citta. The latter is perhaps the earliest type of the Byzantine Madonma of the earlier mildle ages, found at Torcello and Murano, still retained in the unehanging art of the modern Greek ehureh, and reproduced most signally, perhaps, in the celebrated Borgo Allegri pieture of Cimabue, now in Sta. Maria Novella in Florence. The attendant angels are thoroughly Byzantine, and may stand as examples for the severer ecelesiastieism of Justinian's day. The magi wear the traditional hese, with somewhat medineval crowns, clonks, and tunics. Their ages are car:fully distinguished, and their appearance curiously Gothic. Their names, SS. Gaspar, Melehior, and Balthazar, are given in the mosnie, perhaps for the first time. The Infant raises Ilis hand in benedietion, and the Blessed Virgin nlso. The group forms the end of the celebrated Procession of Female Saints.
An Adoration oceupies the left-hnad side of the fine sarcophigus of Ancona, th century. See above.

A curious bas-relief from the French cropt of St. Maximin is given by De Fleury (v. i. pl. s..) , which he assigns with possible truth to the 3rd century, and which we reproduce.
 'Las Elaugilu,' vol. 4 . ple zuil.
Perhaps the most interesting example of this subject which is left us is a carving mude on the lone of a whale, now in the British Museum. It is among Prof. Westwood's fictile copies, and is figured in his Catalogue of Fictile Ivories, p. 234 ; in Stephens's Oll liunic Monuments, vol. i. 1pp. 470 sqq. ; and in Mr. Maskell's Icorics, Ancient and Mediaeval, p. 54. It was described by

Mr. Franks in the 2nd Series of Fapers of the $\mid$ the cover with a carious carving, whleh Dr. Society of Antiquaries, vol. iil. p. 882. thinks it is a beheading of st . John. The three magi hnve round massive fells of hnir, which might almost pass for a remembrance of the Ph ygian cups, except that other figures on the chest have the same. Their hoots aod braceae are uumistakeable; they are offering their treasures in covers and paterne apparently, and are attended by an ornamental duck or swan. This bird is repeated to fill up space. The star is very large, nai of many rays; there is a broad Kunic border, and nn inseription "Magi" in runes above the carving. The quasi-symbolie figures of the Virgin Mother and Child are extraordinnry, the former cods at the waist in waving flourishes, perhaps typienl of drnpery, but orammented with dots like nn Irish initial letter; the Child consists entirely of a larger face or medallion held as usuai before His Mother; the writer feels iittle doubt of its having been eppied or adnpted from some MS. of Durrow or lona; nad, as Mr. Maskell observes, following Mr. Stephens, it is one of the costliest treasures of English art; aud, as n speeimen of Northumbrian art and Northumbrian folk-speech, it is doubly precious.
The distinctively Persian dress of the magi, as represented on all the monuments, certainly deserves attention, ns it indicates the connexion, in the Christian imagination, between the religion of Zoroaster and the coming of the Lord, which Zoroaster was supposed to hnve foretold. See Hyde, de Religione veterum Persarum, c. 31, p. 38i, ed. Oxoa. 1700), nad Maji in Dict. of the Bhises, ii. 190. F. Nork (Dilythen der alten Perser als Quellen Christlicher Glaubensleliren, p. 82) considers that many representations of the Adoration of the Magi bear a decidedly Mithraic character.

MAGIC (Ars Mragica, from magus, Persian

 (c, mugh). "Among the Persians," snys Porphyry, "they who are wise respecting the Deity and are His servants are called Magi" (de Abst. Anin. iv. 16, p. 165, cited by lose (in Parkhurst), who also refers to Justin, i. ix. 7, sii. 13; Curtius, v. 1; and others). Xenophon distinctly ascribes to them the office of priests: "Then were the magi first appointed to sing hymos in honour of the gods at the dawn of every day, and to sacrifice daily to those gods to whom they, the magi. shoold declare sacrifice due " (Cyrop. p. 279;ed. Hutch.). The name ( $\mu$ dyos) is not used ed. Hutch.). The name ( $\mu$ 'joos) is not used as a repronch in the Septuagiat. See Dan. i. 20 ; ii. $2,10,27$; iv. ${ }^{7}$. The prophet Daniel was the bend of the "Magi" in Babylon (Dan. v. 11). It is also the tttle given to those who were led by the star to Bethlehem to those who were led by the star to Bethlehem (Matt. ii. 1, 7, 16). Nevertheless it had already acquired a bad sense among the Jews. Thus acquired a bad sense among the Jews. Thus Simon (Acts viii. 9) is said $\mu a \gamma$ eveev nod to use Simon (Acts riii. 9) is said $\mu a \gamma$ éeiv nod to use $\mu a y$ ía (11); while Etymas, a Jew, is expressly called a $\mu$ dros (xiil. 6, 8). This was the popular usage and at length it prevailed entirely, "Custom nad common speech," snys St, Jerome, "have taken magi for malefici- who are regarded in a different light in their own nation; ffrr they are the philosophers af the Chaldenns" (Comm. in Dan. ii.). It is probable, however, that Magism had long greatly altered for the worse, eves in the practice of its best professors in its original home; for Origen, speaking of the magi of Persia, says, "From them the magical art of their nation takes its nnme, and has travelled into other nations to the corruptior and destruction of those who use it" (c. Cels, vi. 80). Philostratus is also spenking of these Persian adepts, when he makes the strange statenent, thnt they invoke God when they are working unseeu; but subvert the public bellef in the Deity, because they do not wish to appear to receive their power from Him. (de Vit. Sophist. in Protay. 498.)
The "curious arts" ( $\tau$ d $\pi \in \rho$ lepra) reaounced by the converts at Ephesus (Acts xix. 19) were, necording to the common meaning of the term employed, the several branches of magic. What these were in the opinion of the early Christians we lenrn from many authors. Magicians, it wns believed, could ruise phntoms gicians, it wns believed, could raise phnatoms resembling persons decensed, could extract oracles from childreo, whom they entranced; nay, from goats nad tables (Tertuli. Apol, 23). In a book written a little before the end of the 2nd century, Simon Nagus is represented boasting:-"I can make myself invisibic to those who desire to seize me, and again visible when 1 wish to be seca. If I desire to flec, 1 can pierce mountains and pnss through rocks, ns if they were mud. If I were to enst myself down from a high mountain, 1 should be borve uninjured to the ground. If I were bound, I could release myself nad bind those who had chained me. If imprisoned, I could make the bars open of themselves. I could make statues live, so that they were thought to be meu by those who saw them. I could cause new trees to spring up suddenly, and produce boughs at once. If I thung myself into the fire, I should not burn. I change my face, so as not to be known; nay, I can shew men that I possess two faces. I can become na ewe or n she-goat. I can give a beard to little boys. 1 can shew gold in abundance. I can make and unmake kings" (Recognit. Clement. ii. 9. Comp. Pseudo-Clem. Hom. ii. 32 ; Gesta Petri, § 33). The supposed narrator is made to say that he saw a rod with which Simon was bentea "pass through his body as through smoke" (Recog. ii. 11 ; Ps.-CI. II (um. ii. 24), gad that a woman, his confederate, was seen, by a vast multitude surrounding a tower in which she was, to look out of every window on each side at the same moment (Recog. u.s. § 12); that he eaused another to look like himself (Gesta Petri, 136), nad "spectres and figures to be seen daily in the market place, statues to move as be walked out, and many shadows, which he affirmed to be the souls of pursons departed, to go before him" (Ilom. iv. 4; Gcsta Petri, 45). Simon's fntal attempt to fly is related or alluded to by several early writers; as by the nuthor of the Apostolical Constitutions (vi. 9), Arnobius (adv. Gent. ii. prope init.), Epiphanius (Hures, xxi. 5), St. Ambrose or Hegesippus (de Excid. Hieros. iii. 2), Sulpicius Severns (Siter. Hist. ii. 41), Maximus (Scrm. 39), PseudoAugustine (contra Fulgent. Don. 23), etc. Many of the Gnosties, as Menander (Iren. Haer.i. 23, §5), Basilides (24, §5), and Carpocrntes ( 25, § 3 ), with their diseiples, werc accused of "using magie and (mystic) images, and ineantations, and all other curious arts (perierga)." these arts were still brought into the aervice of heresy. He caused wine mixed with water, which he consecrated in the Eucharist, to appear purple and red (i.e. we presume, like venous and arterial blood); and again handing a small cup of wine and water to a woman, he ordered her to consecrate it ; which done, he filled from it to overtowing n much larger cup (ibid. 1. 13, § 2 ; Epiphan. haer. 34, § 2). Magic, under one name or another, professed to heal by rarious means. It was represented to the aick, "If you would send for that praceantator, you would be well at once; if you wore willing to hang such written charms (characters) on you, you could soon recover health. . . Send to that diviner ; forward him your girdle or stomacher. Let It be measured, and let him look at it; and he will tell you what you are to do, and whet her yen can get over it. . . Such an one is good at fumigating : every one to whom he has done it, has become better at once. . Women are wont to persuale each other that they ought to apply some charm (fascioum) to their sick children" (Caesarius, A.D. 502, Serin. $79, \S 4$ ). As we proceed, we shall see that astrology, storm-raising, sortilegy, etc.

> II. The belief that therge gal head of Magic.
in these arts was thate was something real Celsus allege, was apparently universal. Even miracles of Christ (Orig. o. Cels. i. 68). St. Peter was accused by the heathen of magic (August. de Civ. Dei, xix. 23). The Christian regarded it as evidence of the power and intervention of evil spirits in league with the wonder-worker. "By "isions in dreams," says Justin Martyr, A.d. 140 "and by magic tricks do they lay hold of all those who do not strive at all for their salvation" (Apol. i. 14). It was said that they could be mada to "obey mortals by certain arts, i.c. by magical incantations" (Recog. Clem. iv. 26). The truth of this is assumed both by Celsus and Origen, A.d. 230 (c. Ccls. vi. 39; viii. 60-644); and it is a first principle with Tertu.!lian ( $d_{e}$; Animú, 56). Laetantius, A.D. 303, says, "Astro$\log y$, the arts of the aruspex and augur, and what are called oracles themselves, and necromaney and the magic art are their inventions" (Div. Cistit. ii. 16). Minutiua Felix, A.D. 220 : "The Magi also not only know the demons, but whatever of the marvellous they pretend to perform, they do it by the nid of demons" (Octav. viii.). St. Augustine affirms the same thing: "All such arts, whether of a trifling or of a noxious superstition, fren a certain pernicious association of men and demens. . . ara to be altogether renounced and eschewed by the Christian" (de Doctr. Christ. ii. 23, § 36 ; aee de Civ. Dci, viii. 19). He distinguishes between "miracles of human and magic arts jointly (that is, of arts of demons working through men)" and miracles "of the demons themselves wrought by themselves" (de Civ. Dci, xxi. 6, § 1). His theory was that there were certain thinga which attracted had gave pleasure to evil apirits according to their several natures, ns animals are pleased by the food proper to their kinds. As apirits, they tonk delight in certain properties "in the various kinds of stones, herbs, woods, animals, in charms, and rites" (ibid.). He thought that they made their peculiar tastes known to their followers: "For if they did net teach it themselves, how could men learn what each of them craved, what he loathed, by what name he was to tie invited, by what compelled " (ibid.). Some allirmel that human souls served the magiefan: "They are invoked who have died an untimely or violent death," en the ground that it seems probable that those souls will be most helptul to violence nat injury, whom a cruel and untimely end hath by violence and injury torn from lite" (Tertull. de Animit, 57; Apol. 23; comp. St. Chrysostom, de Lazaro Cone. ii. 1). Simon, in the spurious Clementine benks, is made to confess that he mordered a young boy, and by terrible adjurations (Recognd his soul to assist him in his nagic practices (Recog. ii, 13; Hom. Clem. ii, 26 ; Gest. Petr. xxvii.). Justin Martyr spenks of " necromaneies and the inspection (of the entrails) of unenrrupted beys (see Dionysius Al. in Euseb. Hist. Ecel. vii, 10; so Eus. of Mnxentius, viii. 14; I'it. Const. i. 36 ; Ang. de Civ. Dei, xviii. 53) and the iovocahowever, that souls ( $A$ pol, i. 18). It was denied, however, that a departed soul could be brought up, and alleged that the magician was deceived by the demons who really came to his call (Recog. iii. 49). St. Chrysostom: "This is a pretenca and deceit of the dewil: it is not the soul of the dead man that cries out, but the demon who makes those answers, so as to deccive the hearrers " (Ifom. 28 in Matt. viii. 29).

A particular spirit ( $\delta u\{\mu \omega \nu \pi \alpha \rho \epsilon \delta \rho o s)$ was in many cases supposed to attach himself to the so!cerer. Thus Justin M. (u. s.), "They who among magicians are called dream-senders and $\pi d \rho \in \delta \rho o l . "$ Irenaens says of Mareus, "It is probable that he has also a familiar ( $\delta$ ainová riva napetoov), through whom he nppears to prophesy whom he deems worthy tomen to hia grace" (Har he deems worthy to partake of of "paredri and $13, \$ 3$ ). Elsewhere he speaks Sim. Euseb. Hist, Eccl. iv. 7). Tertullian: "We know that magicians, to explore sceret things, call up (the dend) with the help of cataholici (spirita that seize and cast men down) and paredri and pythonic apirits" (de Aninf, 28).
III. An opioion prevanled widely in the early church, derived from Jewish sources, that magic was first cultivated when the children of Seth intermarried with these of Cain; ${ }^{\text {b }}$ nad that Ham, who had addicted himself to it, dreading

[^1]Its loss at the deluge，cagraved the secrets of his art＇on plates of various metals，such as could not be spuilt by the flood of waters，and on very hard stones＂（Cassian．Cullat．viii．21），it is elsewhere affirmed that Ham practlsed and taught magle（Licog．Clem．iv．27；How，ix．3－7）；but not by writers of credit．The story of the engraved plates is evidently imitated from a tratition in Josephas（Antio．i．2，§ 3）that the chillren ot Seth engraved an account of their more lawful discoveries on＂two pillars，one of brick ant the other of stone．＂Another opinion was held by Justin Martyr（Apol．ii．5）and Ter－ tullian（do Idol．9）．These aathors，supposing that＂the sons of God＂in Gen．vi． 2 were angels， make them the instructors of man in the nrt of magic．

N．Fur more than three centuries after Christ there was ao tampering with magic on the part of Christians．Though believing in the reality of the art，they ridiculed it as delusive and worse than useless．Thas Tertullian：＂What thea shall we say that magic is？That which nearly all call it，deception．But the nature of the deception is known to as Christians only＂ （de Anina，57）．Diantius Felix（Uctuv，viii．）， copied by St．Cyprian（de Idol．Van．p．14；ed． 1690）：＂These spirits lie concealed under con－ secrated statues and images．They inspire the breasts of the soothsayers by breathing on them ； they quicken the tibres of entrails，they govern the tights of birds，they rule lots，thry give out oracles；they are always contounding false things with true；tor they are deceived and they also deceive＂（Cypr．）．St．Cyprian adds that they sead liseases and obtain credit for a cure by simply ceasing to afflict（ibid．；so Lactantius， Div．Ins．it．ii．15）．＂They fill all things with snares，cheats，wiles，errors＂（Lact．u．s．14）． ＂skill in the art of magie is good for nothing but te cheat the eyes＂（id．u．s．iv．15）．

V．The early Christians further believed that the demons，who wore the real agents in the wonders of magic，could be controlled by the strong faith of any true Christian acting and speaking in his Master＇s name．Even of astro－ logy，it was said，＂until baptism that which is decreed holds：after it astrologers no longer speak the truth＂（Clem．Alex．Fragin．§ 78）． The failure of the powars of evil began when Christ came．Tertullian：＂We know the con－ nexion between magic and astrology．．．The． hatter science was permitted until the gospel， that when Christ was born no one should theace－ forth cant a person＇s nativity from the sky．．． So also the other kind of magic which works by mirackes．．．．spun out the patience of Ged even to the gospel．．．．Atter the gospel，thou wilt nowhere find either wise men（sophistas） or Chaldeans，or enchanters or interpreters of dreams，or magicians，except such as are notoriously punished＂（de Idol．9）．Origen held that＂magicians having intercourse with demons，and invoking them as they have learnt and for their needs，can only succeed until something more divine and powerful than the demons and the charm（ $(\pi \Psi \delta \delta \hat{\eta} s$ ）which calls them，appears or is uttered＂（c．Cels．i．60）． He suggests that the magi of St．Nat thew ii．1， finding that the spirits who served them had ＂become wenk and strengthless，that their tricks were exposed and their power bruaght to nought，＂and remembering the prophecy of Baham，were led to think that，lie to whom the star guided them，＂must be stronger than all demoas，even those who were woat to apprar to them and inspire them＂（ibil．）．Hence it was sail that magic had been dertroye 1 by the star of Bethlehem，So St．lgantius A．D．
 19）．Compare St．1＇eter Chrysologus，A．t． 433 （Serm．156）．St．Basil， 370 （de Mun．Christi （iencv．i．591）；St，Ambrose（ ii．48），etc．Of astrology especially，Clemens Al．：＂For this reason a strange und uew star arose that put an enl to the ageient astrology＂ （ $\alpha \sigma \tau \rho 0 \theta \in \sigma$ lav）（Fragm § 74）；Sim．Greg．Naz． （Carm．de Provid．A．e．tn．v．1．6＋）．All this was by some understood in the command that the magi should depart iato their own conotry another way（St．Matt．ii．12）．Thus＇Jertullian （ $n, s_{0}$ ）：＂They were not to walk in the ways of their former sect．＂St．Augustiae more gene－ rally，but therefore inclusively，＂Via mutata， viti matata＂（Serm．202，§ 4）；Sim．Chrysol． （シerm．159）：St．Ambr．（Exp．Ev．N．Liu．i． 46）；St．Leo（Scrm．32，§ 4）；Greg．M．（in Evang．Hom．x．sub fin．）．

Vl．When after the conversion of Constantine such practices were found among professed Christians，the most strenuous efforts were made to suppress them by the teachers of the charch， and by legislators，both civil and ecelesiastical． They were denounced as remoants of idolatry， and a practical return to it．Thus Gregory Nazianzen，370：＂For this did the star lend， and the wise men fall down and offer gifts，－that idolatry might be destroyed＂（Orat．i．tom．i．p． 12 ，compare with last paragraph）．＂Branches of jdoletry，＂says Gaudentins of Brescia，A．D． 387，＂are witcherafts（veneficia），precantations， ligatures，phylacteries（vanitates），auguries，lots， the observing of omens，parental obsequies＂ （Tract．iv．irs Pasch．ad Neoph．）．St．Augustine： ＂It is a superstitious thing whatever hath been ordained of men towards the making ani wor－ shipping of idols，whether it pertain to the worship of a creature or any part of a creature as God，or to consultations and certain covenants by means of signs settled and agreeal on with demous，such as are the essnys of the magic art＂（de Doctr．Christ．ii．20，§30）．

The ennons and laws which we shall now cite will shew that the church and the state pro－ hibited every kind of magic on the grounds above mentioned．They will nt the same time give an opportanity of explaining some details， which would be hardly worthy of a separnte notice．
（1．）Eeclesiastical legislation．－The first con－ ciliar decree ngainst any branch of magic was that of Ancyra in Galatia，A．D．315，which condemns to five years＇penance＂those whe profess sooth－ saying（катаца⿱宀тєvóuevoi）and follow the customs of the Gentiles，or bring certain men into their houses to discover remedies or perform lastrations＂（can．24）．The version of this decree in the old Roman Code expaods the first clause thus：＂Qui auguria，auspiciaque，sive somnia，rel dirinationes quaslibet secundum mo－ rem Gentilium observant＂（in App．Opp．Leonis， p．18）．Here nagurium and anspicium may be uniferstood generally of the observation of omens： originally and strictly they were modes of di－ g the prophecy of that, lle to whom ist be stronger than who were wont to them" (ibi l.). Later on, when the evil hid increase l, the council of laudicea, probably about 365 . whith more details, forbad, uader pin of excommumbation, " priests and elerks to be magi-cians or enchanaters ( $\&$ raod $\delta u$ is), or mathematici or astrologers, of to make what are called phylueturies, which are boads for their own souls" (ean. 36). The mathematiel were astrolugers according to the usige of that age; but a distinction ajpears to be made here, of which no satisfactory aceount has been given. The fourth council of Carthage, 398: "He who is ent hralled to auguries and iacantations is to be driven from the assembly of the Chureh" (can. 81). In 569 , Martin, bishop of Bragat, a Greek by birth, ment to a council held at Lugo, a collection of thanons drawn chiefly from Greek sources. Women are told to use no eharms in working wool; but only to "idvoke God as their helper, who has given them skill in wearing" (75). This may be illustrated trom St. Eligius, 640: "l.et no woman presume to hang amber beads (sucinos) on her ueck, or when weaving or lyeing, or at any work whatever, name Minerva or other ill-omenel persoas, but desire that the grace of Christ may be present at every work, and to trust with their whole heart in the virtue of His name" (de Rect, Christ. The word is derived trom "character" in the sense of a talisman or amulet on which mystic charaters were written or engraved. chanters, makers of phylateries, nud soothsayers;" whose practices the council declares to be "pernicious and heathen" ("E入A duaka'). According to Balsimon aud Zonaras, it was the custom to give hairs pluckel from, and dyes ( $B$ ámцата) that had been hung ahont, bears and other animals as charms against disease and the evil ege. See Amulits, Ligaturas, PuytacThertes. These dyes are probably the same as (he succi (herhas et suctose), which Catarius (Serm. 66, § 5) forblds Christians to "hang ahout themselves or their friends," though we are not told that these were supposed to derive virtuo from an animal. Balsamon explains thit the cloud chasers were those who drew omens from the forms and grouping of the clouds, especially at sunset. He adds that the canon condemns in

list method he ascribes to women who used to "spend their time in the churches, and by the noly icons, and declared that they learned the future trom thein." In Clemens AI. (Protrept. ii. 11), we read of "flour-prophets and barlerprophets." Ecelesiastical prohibition occurs in a bripf canon (12) of the synod of Rome, A.D. 721. In 789 the canon of Laodicen was inserted by name in Charlemagne's capitulary of that year (c. 18); but in an abstract which heads it the word $\mu$ dono is represented by "eoclearii." So Cupit. Reg. Franc. 1. 21 ; v. 69. "Coclearius" is a corruption of "Cauculator," which is from кav̂кos, a cup used by diviners (see Gea, xliv. 5), or by makers of philtres. [Calculatores, p. 255.$]$ And another chapter (6;3) of the same capitulary; "We commaul that ano become either cauculatores (see ngain Capit. i. inc. an. c. 40 ; Baluz. i, 518 ; Cup. R. Fr. i. 62 ; vi. 374 ), and enchanters, or storm-raisers (tempestarii), or obligatores (see Ltgatures), aud that where there are such, they be reformed or condemacd." Storm-raisers are also condemned by a law of $800^{5}$ (Capit. 3i. 25) de Incantatoribus et Tempestariis. The nord is written "tempestuarius" in $n$ deeree of Herard, A.d. 856 (cap. 2). Agobard, archbishop of Lyons, who had of an adviser of Charlemagne, wrote a treatise of sume length against this offence. See Tempesrarius. In 813 the Council of Tours, under that "prince, directed priests to warn the people that "magic arts and incoutations are altugediseases, anding to the eure of any haman dying anime to the healing of slok, lame, or dying animals; and that ligatures of bones or (can. 42).

(2.) Faperial leyislation.-The first edict of Cons antine that has nuy bearing on our sulject appearel at the ead of October 312, nine months before the defeat of Maxentius. It was directed agionst the aruspices, and as It ouly mebthous the exerclse of their art in henses its probable olject was to check inquiry by diviaation into the destinles of the empire uid its rulers. The aruspex was to be burnt alive, and his employers banislied (Corl. ix. 18, 1. 3; de Arusp.). His uext (de Muhia), lu 321, went further, but was far from being thorough. It deelared generally the most severe panishment to be due to those who were "found, armell with magie arts, to have made attempts against the health of men, or to have turned chaste muads aside to lust," but it edds that "remedies sought tor the bodles of men or helps luacecently used in country places," against unseasouable weather were not to be treated us offences (i), 4). Constuntine and Jullan in 357: "Let no one consult an arbspex or a mathematicus
No one a hariolus, Let the wicked profession of the augurs and diviners be sileaced. Let net the Chaldeass and the magi, nud the rest, whom the people call malejci for the greatness of their crimes, make even a partial attempt. Let curiasity of divination for ever cease with all" (ib. 3). The penalty was denth by the sword. Aoother haw not a year later threateaed death oy fire to those who, "using magic arts, dared to disturb the elements, uadermine the lifo of the innocent, and calling up the dead by wicked practices to kill their enemies" (ib, 6). In July 358 , the same princes published an ediot condemnag every kind of divioation, avowedly on the ground that it was employed in a spirit hostile to themselves (ib, 7). The penalty was death with torture, and no rank was to plead exemption. The crime had been commou under heathen emperors, nad it is probable that most of the ollenders under Constantius were heathen. Long betore Tertullian had spokea of those who publicly hououred Caesar, bat privately "consulted astrologers and araspices. and augurs, and magi resplecting his lite" (Apol. 35, where in netes to the translation in the Library of the Fathers Dr. P'usey refers to Tacitus, Ann. xii. 52 ; xvi. 30, and Spartianus apad Gothofred, Prol. ad Lib. ad Nat. p. 11). Firmicus Maternus, in his treatise on astrology written between 335 and 360 , cautions his disciples thus: "Take care never to answer one who questions you respecting the state of the republic or the inte of the Roman emperor; for it is neither right nor lawful that we sheuld by a wickell curiosity say auything of the state of the rejublic. . . . But no mathematiens has been able to define anything true respecting the fate of the emperor" (Hatheseos, ii. 33). The necessity of this caution appears trem several stories in Ammianus (Hist, xix, 12), and others. In the reign of Valeas, for example, A.D. 373 , Theedorus was supposed to be indicated as his successor by a tripod of taurel wood duly prepared, which by some means sprelt out his name to the fourth letter ( $\theta$ eod $)$. The death of Theodorus and his partisaus dil not appease the emperor, who cansed many inoocent persoos to be murdered because their cames began with the same letters, or on grounds equalty frivolous (Sozom. Ilist. vi. 35). Julian humself professed to belleve in sueh arts. IIe acknowledged that the oracles had failed: but alleged that Zeas, "lest men shoull be altogether deprived of intercourse with the gods, gave them a means of olservation through the sacred art., from whleh they might derive mallicient help in their neel" (in Cyrin. Al. c. Jul. vl. p. 198 ; ed. Spanh.). In $364+$ Vnlenthiana condemned "magicos appuratns" in connexion with heathen rites performen by night (Cubex Theorks. ix. xvi. 7), and in 370 (ןrobably) male the art of the mathematicus, exercisel by night or day, punishable by death (ib. 8); but in :171 he deelared that the aruspex was not guilty of witchcraft. "We do aot blame the art of the arwspex, but torbid it to be exercined injuriously " (ib. 9). He regariled it as a necessary part of the he.then worship then tolerated; but its secret exercise was still prohibited under the law of Constantine, In 389 Valentinina, Theedosius, and Arcalius decreed that every maleficus shoulid be denounced as an "enemy of the pulilic satety;" but chariot-drivers in the public races were forbidden to inform under pain of death (ib. 11). Thisy were excepted, beeause many of them lay under suspicion of usiag magic to give speed to their own or to injure their rival's horses. See on this among Christian writers, Arnob. adb. Gent. i. cir, med.; Jerome, rits Hikurionis, c. 15 ; St. Chrysost. Honn, xii. in Ep. i, ad Cor. (iv. 11, 12 ); Grey. Naz, ad Seleuc.

MAGISTER. (1) Muyister discipliano or infiatum. A custom grew up in Spain towards the end of the fifth century, that parents should delieato their children, while yet very young, to the service of the church, and in this cave they were educated and brought up in the house of the bishop, by some "disereet and grave" presbyter, who was deputed by the bishop for that duty. He was ealled prupoositus or mayister tisciptince. The second council of toledo (A.D. bi:3), held under Amaitic, one of the Gothic kings, silys in its first cafituluan, of such young persuns, "in domo eccilesine sub episcopall praesentia a pruep $p$ sito silh debeant crudiri." (4) Mitister novitiorum, the officer in a monastery to whom the charge of the novices was especially committed.

Cusiun (de Instit. Coenob. iv. 7) tells us that a candidate for admission to a monastery is ant at once to be admitted into the general boily of the brethren, but given for a time ioto the charge of an elder monk, who has his station for that purpove not far from the entrance of the monastery. During this period the novice had no separate cell, and was not allowed to quit the master's cell without his permission (12. s. iv. 10). Similarty the Rule of St. Benedict (c. 58) provides that the aovice shall be taken to the cell of the novices, where he is to meditate, eat, nad sleep; an t that a senior monk shall be assigned to him, who shali give all possible pains to raise his spiritual state. It seems from this that St. Benediet designed to give a separate magister to each noviee; but the practice of later times was to have one roon and one master for all the noviees. Compare (1) above.
Cassian tells us (Collht. 20, c. 1) that he himselt acted as "magister" to Pisufius, who (though he had fled from another monastery) was treated as a noviee. Euphrosyne, in man's dress, was committed to the charge of a zenior by the abbat of a monastery to which she had fled (Life in Rosweyd's l'ithe P'utram, c. 8, p. 365); and a man like Joannes Damascenus, airandy of distinguished piety, was placed by the

The crime was itsplft called Malefisium, ax if preemiaently a deed of wickedness. A law of Constantius, i.t. 3:37, after reference to aruspices and otherv, proceeds to condemn "the Chaldeans and Magi, nall the rest whom the onmaen people call Maictici, from dhe greatness of their mumblus " (1. + , u. s.). They were believed to oltain their power to Injure others from evil spipits, either demons properly so culled, ne the mond of the dead. Thus Lactanthus (14, s.), sjicaking of the demens, says that the Maletici, "whon they exercise their execrable arts, call them up, by thelr true names" (not by thone of the anciunt heroes, etc., which they assumed to deceive). These spirits were invokeid with bloody nacritices nod other pagna ritey. St. Jernme, distinguinhing betweea Maletiel and other professors of occult arts, snys that the former "uxe blood nad victims, and often touch the bodies of the dead "(Comm. in Dnn. ii.). MANDYAS ( $\mu \alpha \nu \delta v i a s, ~ \mu a \nu \delta v i n, ~ \mu a \nu \delta i o \nu) . ~$ This name is now given in the Greek church to the outer garment wora by moaks, which is also used on some occasions by bishops, who are, as a rule, drawn from the monastic orders. In shape it is, on the whole, similar to a cope, being a long cloak, reaching almost to the feet, and fasteaed at the throat.

It seems originally to have been borrowed from the Hersians, and is defined by Hesychius as єiठ the West we fiad it frequently spoken of as a dress worlo by emperors and kings. The earliest instance of the $u$ ie of the word in its ecelesiastical seuse is appurently in Germanus, patriareh of Constantinople (IIst. Eccies. et Mystica Theoris; Jutiol. Gri, xeviil. 396). For later instances reference may be made to Ducange, Gossurium Gruccum, s.v., and Goar's Euchologion, pl). 113, 495.

MANCER (Pracsepe). In the crypt beneath the altar of the Sixtine chapel which torms part of the Liberian basilica (S. The culla is supposel to consist of five boards of the maner tu which the infant Saviour was lad at the Nitivity [Magt; Nitivity]. This manger was visited by Jerome and his disciple Paula (Hier.n. Epist. 108, ad Eustuchium, § I0). The boarls were brought to Kome trom Bethletiem, together with some fragments of rock from the cave which is the tralitional sceae of the Nativity, when the remaias of St. Jerome were tramslated th the middle of the seventh century by pope Theodore I. ENot A.D. 352, ás is maintained by Benedict XIV., de Canoni?. Smet. I. iv. pt. 2.] They are now enclosed in an wn of silver and exystal, with a gilt figure of the Holy Child on the top. This vestment in its primary form appears to have been merely a haudkerchiet or najpin held in the hand, but in later times it beame an ormamental restment pendent trom the left wrist. lt perhaps furnishes us with another illustration of what we have already spoken of in the case of the dalmatic (see the article), of the gralual exteasion of what was in its origin a jeculiar use of the locel Roman church throughout the whole of the West ; an extelusinin at tirst jealously resisted by the Loman elergy. The Eastern chureh has nothing answering to the maniple, but npparently the $\begin{aligned} & \\ & \gamma \chi \in i p i o n ~ s p o k e a ~ o f ~ b y ~ G e r-~\end{aligned}$ manus, to which we shall reter below, was in its time a real, though accidental, pamallel.
lossibly the earliest trace of the original use of the maniple is to be tound in the order of Silvester l. (ob. A.D. 335) that deacons should wear dalmatics in church, and that their lett hand should be covered witis a eloth of linen warp ( pallium linostimum: see Wialafrid Strabo, dc hebus Eceles. c. 24 ; P'utivi, caiv. 9.52 ; Anastasius Bibliothecarius, de fitis hom. /ont., Patrol. exxvil. $\mathbf{1 5 1 3}$ ). Others have argued that this pallium linostimum is rather to be associated with the stole (see esp. Mater, Hierole cicon, s. v. Linostimu).
In the time of Gregory the Great, we meet with the mappula as a jealously guarded vestment or ormment of the Roman clergy, which had been in use among them for some time. The clergy of the church ot Ravenua having ventured to make use of this vestiment, the Roman clergy loudly maintained that it was a peculiar right of their own. and protested against the clergy of Ravenal wearing the mop,uas either there or at Fome. Gregory, writing to Joha, bishop of Raremna, settled the matter by giving permission to the chief deacons of Ravenua (primis diacenibus vestris) to wear the muppul, when in nttendiane on the bishop; permission, however, being abselutely retused (vehementissime prehibemus) for 56 ; vol times and to other persons ( Epist. lib. iii. 56 ; vol. iii. 668). Bishop Joha, in his answer;, remarks that in the time of Gregory's prede-cessers, whenever a bishop of Ravenna had been cessors, whenever a bishop of Ravenna had been consecrated at Rome, the ottenilant priests and deacons hal openly used mappulic without any fialt being tomad, and that this had been the fanlt being tound, and that this had been the case when he was hiaself consecrated bishop.
The above instance has generally been supposed to pelong to the early history of the maniple, as by Bona (le Rebus Liturgici, i. 24. 5), Biaterim (Denkrürdigkeiten, vol. iv. part 1, pp, $20: 3 \mathrm{sq}(1$.$) .$ At a later period, however, the latter writer (op. cit. vel. vii. part 3, pp. 359 siq.), tollowed by Hefele (Beitrïje zu Kirchon, eschichte, Archäuloyic, und Liturgik, ii. 180), argued that it is here rather to be understood of a kind of moveable canopy (see Durandus, Rat. Div. Off. iv. 6. 11, and Buange, $s . v$.) ; and it may tairly be admitted that the terms io which both the eoutest and the concession are described are on the whole more applicable to this latter view. It is interesting to add here, in litee of this cooffict of theories, that, so tiar as appears, there is no maneple in the fimpuas mosaic in the charech of St. 'italis at Ravenna, which is assigued to the end of the 6th century. (Figured nbove, s. $v$. Dalmatic, from Gially Kuight's Ecclestiastical Architecture of Italy, plate x.)
It is nut till the 8th or 9th century that we meet with distinct allusions to the maniple as n $n$ sacred restment. Mabillon notices a donation bequeathed to a monastery in the year A.D. 781 , in in which, with numerons other charth ormawe have "quanque manipuli" (the earliest instance we have been able to find of the mome maniple) are mentioned (Anmales Urdinis S. Benedicti, lib), ${ }^{25}$, e. 5is), Martene again reters (de Antipuis Eccleviae Ritibus, iii. 187; ed. Venice, 1783) to an antient missal in the monastery of St. Denis and assigned by him to abont the time of Charlemagne, in which was given a prayer at the putting on of the maniple: "praecinge me, meam."'s irtute, et foue immaculation vitam

[^3]We may next cite R:banas Maras (de Cter. Inst. i. 18; Patrol. cvii. 18), who, writing early in the 9 th century, speaks of the maniple as the " mappula sive mantile ... quod vulgo phamonem vocant," which is held in the hathd at the celebration of mass by the "sacerdutes et ministri altaris." About the sime time we find Ama-larins (de latins (de Eecl. Off. ii. 24; P'atrol. ev. 1099) commenting on the maniple under the name sutturiun, and entering at length into the symbohism ot' it. We also find a reference to it in the treatise de Divinis Officiis, ence reterred to Aleuin (c. 39 ; Patrol. ci. 124,3). This work is now, however, assigned to the 10th or 11th century. In the homily de Cura Prastorali, ascrivel to Lee IV. (ob. A.D. 8.55), the injuaction in given that the maniple (faron) is to be among the vestments invariably to be made use of when mass is sung (latrol. cxv. 675), the others spewe beding amice, alb, stole, and planeta; and we find the same command repeated in the (Patrol exxxvi century Ratherius, bishop of Vereaa (Patrol. cxaxvi. 5j9).
To ald oue mere illustration, the order is makle in the year A.d. 889 by bisho, Rieultus of Sois"duo that each chareh should pussess at least (Statuta, e. 7; Pat totidem mappulas mitilas" (Statuta, e. 7; Pat ovl. exxxi. 17).
In Rabnnus Maurus and the other liturgiologists cited above, the maniple is spoken of as carried in the hand, the left being sometimes specially mentioned; but, in course of time, it wals worn pendent from the wrist (see e.y. Hugo de St. Victore, Serm. 14; I'atrol. clxxrii. 92̌ Honorius Augustorlnnensis, Gemmat Animac, i. 208 ; Patrol. clxxii. 606).
It eught to be added here that the maniple loes not appear to have been unirersally employed as a sacred vestmeot in the 9 th century, for e.g. in the illustrations in the Pontitieal ? Landulfus, which is assigned to that period, none of the priests wear maniples (see Marriott, plates 3+-36). Conversely also, it may be remarked, we find, and that at quite a later perioi, traces of the maniple being worn by lay minks. Thus c. g. Lantranc of Canterbury, speaking with " r in erence to the orderiag of subleacuns, says, "in coenobiis monachorum etiam laici allis induantur et antiqua patrum institutione solent ferre inanipulum" (Epist. 13; Patrol. el. 520). A council of loitiers (A.D. 1100) torbids moaks, unless they are subdeacons, to assume the maniple (Concil. Pietuv. can. 5; Labbe, vii. 72.).
With the growth of the chureh's wealth and power in the 9th century, the general character of vestments was conshlerably molitied into a more costly and elabosate form. As a curious example of this in the case of the maniple, we may cite the will of Ricnlfus, bishop of Helena, (ob. A.D. 915), whe in a long list of valuable articles mentions " manipulos sex cum auro, unum sex (leg. ex) iis cum tintinuabulis" " ( $P^{\prime}$ atrot. exxxil. 468). lato the later notices, bowever, of the naaiple it is not our province to enter.
The Bastera church, as we have said, does ant command of Charlpmaghe," a form which is realty from a copy of that liturgy printex to 1560 ly the commund of St. Charles [Borromeo], archbishop of Milao. (Martene, , th. p.

Bocles. et Mystiat Theorit: I'utrol. (ir. xevii. 39+4). The inoцav(к(w), while presenting an apparent simblarity to the maniple, is utterly different from it in tiact. The worl (a barbarons compound of Latin and (rreck) denotes a cuti, as being worn upmon the sleces of both arms, and is now one of the actnal moments of bishops (to whom it was long restricted) and priests (and latterly also of deacuns, Neale, l.e.) in the Greek ehurch (finm, Ju Hologion, jr. 111; Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 307).

Finally, we may give a passing remark as to one or two other ecelesiastican uses of some of the Latin uames of the maniple. Thus fanon is also used for the mame ol the cloth in which is wraphed up the breal for use in the Eucharist:so in au cirde homantas "fanonibus puris oblationes tenent" (Amalarius, Ecloga de Officio Jfissite, c. 19 ; in Menard's Greg. Sacr. 55t)and alse tor the cloth which enwraps the chalice (ibisl. c. 20). It is used again firr a kind of reil worn on the heal of the popee bencath the mitre (Orclo Komemus, xiv. 43; op. cit. 270; cf. nlso $281,357,537$ [even in death, ib. 527] ; it is also sigled simply matiga). The worl mutppula is used in the liequia Jonde horum of lidore (c. 12, I'atrol. Ixaxiii. 88: ) for a garment worn over the shoudders by a monk who has not a pallium. In the liegrila Fructuosi (c. 4; Patrol. Ixxxvii. 1101), mapphla is used apparently in the sense of a towel or napkin, as n part of the equipment of a monk's cell. Sce also Reg. MANNA (in Aut). Two examples from Bosin's plates (sce Bottarl, tav. clxiv. nad tab. lwii.) are supposed by Aringhi to represent Moses pointing to four or seven buskets of the manna of the wilderness. Bottari expresses some duubt in both cases, thinking that, nt all events in the eximple which contains seren la-kets, the figure must be intended for Our Lord. This maly be the case, but the contents of the baskets may still be intendell for manna, in reference to St. Juhn vi. 41. Millin (loyages dons le Slidi dc France, etc. xxxviii. 8, lix. 3), gives t wo sarcophagi, in which a personage who may pass for Moses stands pointing to three jars or "omers," probably meant for manna, the mure so as two figures bearing $n$ bunch of grapes are near them (Num. xiii، 24). Compare Loaves, 11. 10:38.
There is besides a newly discovered fresen, of which Mirtigny gives a woolent, which elearly represents the gathering of the manna; but, if it be correctly copied, the drnpery of the figures has a somewhat meliaeval-I lakian appearance. It represents the falling mana, with four figures sprealing their garments to catch it.
(Sce woodeut.) It was diveovered in 1863 in the eatacomb of St. Cyriaca. It oceupios the whole side of a crypt, aud the manna is represurted like snow or hail. Our Lorl's mention of the manna, and open appeal to it ns the symbol of Ilis boly best suited, hefore llis death, to the understnnding if His Jewish hearers, may very probably invest these pictures of the bread of the wiliderasss with encharlstic meaning. They may be sujposed to be picterint repetitions of the text "I nm that Bread of Lite." And this is yet more probable, where, as in Bottaril lvii., Moses is rejrenented in the act of striking the rock, hs an necompnnying sculpture.

As was observed before, it may be our Lord rather than Moses, who is represeutel with the seven baskets, though it was the miracle of the Five Loaves which preceded His discourse at Capernaum, and twelve baskets would therefore be more correct. Nevertheless, His words connect the manua of the Mosaic dispensation hoth with His mirncle, nad with the institution of the Holy Communion, and the pictures seem elearly meant for the sume purpose.

Strictly, the mansins seems to have been a piece of arable laul of twelve actes (ju Lera, bunnaria), which suggests mansus as the original form; but it was not restricted to pirces of that precise extent. When it is not so used, the quantity is mentioned (see Ducange in v.). Mansus dominicatus or indominicatus was the homestead at tached to the residence of the lord and oceupied by him (Kar. Calv. Exact. Nornumnis Constit. A.D. 877, Ctpit. Riel. Fr, il. 257, 258. Sim. Formuhe Marculti (lindenlor), c. 79, itail. 534, etc.). dwolt (cap. 19). By a like usage, n jiece of hand by which a church was wholly or partially endine ( $=$ the "glebe") was called the "mansus exclesiae." A haw of Lomis the Godly, 8It ("De Masis minneujnspue Eeclesiae '), 'decrees that to every churea be allutted one whole mamsins free of rorrice, and that the priests settled in them shmal " ${ }^{\text {do }}$ no service on aceonut of the afirewritten masus, except that due to the chureh" (Cipit. Aquisyr. 19: also in Capit. Rey. Franc. i. X5, $\because .214$ ). Charlemagne scems to have desired a larger provision, for in legishating for the saxons, he says, "All of the lesser chap,ters have agreed that the country people who go to $n$ church give to every church a court (eurtem) nud two mansi of hand" (eap, 15). The lombardic liws (iii. i. 46), 824 (ludov. P.), provide that "if" a chureh happen to be built in any phee which was whutel, nud yet had no endowmont," "one mansus consisting of twelve bunnaria of arable hand be giren there, nad two serts by the freemen who are to hear otice in the said church, that there may be priests there, and that divine worship may be held ; but that if the people will mot do this it be puiled down" (v. Eyjen, ii. iv. iv. 23). Hinchar of Rheims in 8.52 asked of each parish priest in his iivecse "whether he had a mansus of twelve bunamia, beside a cemetery und a court (corten) in which the ehurch and his house stoonl, or if be had four serts" (Labbe, Cone, viii. 573).
Mausi were given to churches to provide them with lights (Cajit. Ricy. Fr. ii. 5), nad an ancient gloss on the canon law siys, "Mhasus appellatur unde percipitur frumentum et vinum ad Eucharistian consecrandam" (From Chron. Wormat. ajud Ludewig. ii. Lecliq. MSS.-Ducange).
By a law in the Fourth Book of the C'apitularies of the French Kinys (iv. 28), compiled in 827, courts of justice are to be held "neque in ecelesia neque in atrio ejus." When this was republished by Charles the bald in 853 (tit. x. e. 7), nad again in 868 (tit. xxxviii. c. 7), he altered it thus, "Ne malla vel placitn in exitibuset atriis ecclesinrum et prestyterorum mansionibus nrum et presbyterorum mansionibus . . tenere presumant." presumant." In 870 (tit. xlv. 12) he worded the prohibition thus, "Mallus neque in ee:le ja neque prohibition thus, "Mallus neque in ectle-ja neque in perticibus aut atrio ecelesine oeque in mansione presbyteri juxta eeclesinm habeatur." We infer progress in the settlement of the clergy, nod that near their churches, through the proMsion of a curtis [see Alassa, ] on which a house might be built; but it does not appear that "mansio" was used in a conventional nad special sense to denote the residenee (in' "manse") of the priest. It meant a dwelligg-house of any kiad, nud is the origionl form of the common

MANSIONARII. [Compare ProsmanaRuss.] Officers discharging certain duties in connexion with the fabric and services of the church. Ducange (Gloss.) makes the word syaonymous with "aedituus" and " matriculnrius," nod explains it as deriring its meaniug from the fact that in revidence ("mansio") near the church was nttnched to the office. Jionysins Exiguus, in his Cotex Comonum, gives "Mansinnarius" as a rendering of the word rpaguavdioi, who are reckoned by the Conncil of Chalcedon (c. 2) among the clerical otheers who are strictly forbidden to obtain their situation, ly bribery. (Sre Bruns, Comenes, i. 2fi.)

Inst illus, Beveridge, and other aum hurities to prove that the mperpardoto were in reality the stewards or andmioistrators of the propwrty of the chureh. That the " mansionarii" wre clergy is evident from the words of Anantasius the librarinn, who in his lives of , luhn th and Benedict 2nd expressly reck ons them nmong the elergy to whom legacies were left: "Hic dimisit onai elnro ;. . diaconilus et mansionariis solidos mille." firegury the Cireat (l/itlog. III. 25.5) applies the title "custos "alesiae" nod " mansionarius" iodiseriminatrly to one Abundius. Their specinl functiens appear to have been connected with the lighting nand general care of the lamps of the church to which they belunged. Gregary the Great (limleys. i. i) speaks of ", certain Constantius who wats " mansionarius," and had chnige of the lamps, and in (Dialog. iii. 24) the same duties are allofted to one Theodesius, who is called "custes" in the text and "innasionarius" in the heading. See niso John the Deacon ( Iita (irey. 111. 58). In the Ordo Lomanus, i. & 4) the mansionarins of a titular church in Rome is to go forth, with a whestyter, bearing a thurible to theet the pope when he came to celebrate a pontifical minss. Praevius, I. xxyii) ootes that during the first nine centuries in the "patriarchal" churehes there were employed "mansiunarii seu custedes ecelesiarum ad eas ornandas emundandas ahaique praestanda quae necessarin erant." Except the above-mentioned passage in the Council if Chatcedon, there is ao trace of the existence of the oflice in the Eastern church.

MANUAL LABOUR. It appears to have been contemplated by the earlier councils that the elergy shoold, in part at least, maintain themselves by the work of their hands. The $A p y=$ stolical Constitutions (II. 63) exhort the younger elergy to provile for their own neeessities by the work of their own haods, while not neglecting the work of the ministry. Some of us, it is alded, are fishermen, some tentmakers, some husbadmea, for no worshipper of God should be itlle. The fourth council of Carthage (Statut. Eccles, Anti, u, ce. 51. 52) enjoins that all elergy, however learned, should provide themselves with food aad clothing by some handieraft (artificiolo) or agricultural labour, yet so as not to neglect their proper duties; aod (c. 53) that all clergy who were suthiciently strong in body should be instructed buth in some handieraft and in letters. These canoas are evidently referred to by the second Couacil of Tours, A.D. 567 (c. 10), where it is lail down, with somewhat curious reasoning, that there could be no justification tor any of the clergy who employed a woman not belonging to the house (extraneam mulierem) for the alleged purpose of making his elothes, since there was a general order that they should procure both fool and clothing by their own industry, and as the work of their own hands. Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eecl. Discip. iii. 8 ; e. 8, $$ \S(-5)$ thinks that these canons were permissive rathes than obligatory, and only Applied to the iaferior elergy, ootiag the faet that St. Paul is the only one of the apostles who is saill to have worked with his own hands. Thus the first council of Orteans, A.D. 511 (e. 5), provides that certain lands and revenues which Clovis had givea to the church should be employed in reparing churches in the redemption of captives, and ia paying the stipends (alimoniis) of the priests ani poor, while the elergy (elerici) or, as another realing is, the clergy of lower degree (junioris othicii) (see Bruns, Canoncs, ii. 162) should be compelled to help in the lahour of the church (ad adjutorium eecleniastici operis constringantu:), probably on the lands so given.

Amoag ecclesiastical writers manual labour is evidently cuasidered honourable and meritorious for the clergy, and in some cases habitually resorted to, but aever enjoined as a positive obligation. Epiphanius (Hiers. 80 ; nn. 5, 6) says that many elergy, while they might live by the altar, prefer from excess of zeal (ajundantia quadam virtutis) to support themselves by the work of their own hands; and (huecs. 70, n. :') speaks of a certaia sect named Audiani, in whose fellowship bishops, presbyters, and all elergy lived by their own toil. The very mention of such a fact seemingly proved that this was out of the common course. Chrysostom (Hom, 45 , ou Acts) speaks of four diflerent grades of excellence set before the elergy, the second ut which coasists in labouring for their own food, the third is also labouring to assist the poor. Augustine (de Op. Monuch. e. 29) asserts that the professional labours of the bishops and clergy are suthiciently onerous to exempt them from the obligation of toiling with their hands. Many instances, however, are to be found in which the most zealous attention to sjiritual doties was combined with hard and habitual work at a trade or on a farm. Soerates (II.E. i. 12) say's that Spiridon, bishop of Cyprus, was originally a shepherd, and through his great humility coutinued to feed his flock eveo after being made a bishop. Sozomen (H. E. vii. 28) speeaks of one Zenn, bishop of Mniuma, who provided for his owa wants, and lor the poor wf his floek, by weariag linen. Gennadius of Marseilles (ie Scriptor. E'ecl. c. 69) says that Hilary of Arles toiled with his own haads, not only for his own sup,iort, but that he might be able to help the pour. From Gregury the Great (Dialo\%. iii. 1) we leara that Pauliaus of Nola was an excellent gardener, and (Dialoy. iii. 1:2) that oae Severus, a priest of great sanctity, was occupied on a certain oceasion in pruning his viues. Gregory of Tours, in his Life ot Nieetius (c. 8), says that when a bishop he continued to live among his servants, and work on his farm. It would be easy to multiply exanples of this kiad, they all point the same way; the very tact of their being recorded seems to shew that they must be considered as instances of exceptivinal excellence, which was held in honour and esteem, but not illustrative of the general practice, or of conduct which was reckoned obligatory upon either bishops or clergy. Hiacmar of Rheims indeed, A.D. 845, appears to have endeavoured to make some measure of manual labour compulsory in his diocese, since (Cupit. ad Presbytcros, c. 9, opp. i. p. 712) he orders all his elergy to go out fastiag to work on their farms; but the general sen wo of the chureh in this matter appear's to be represented by the words of Eipiphanius, already quoted, that those who serve the altar have a right to live by the nitar.

MAPPA. Ualer the Roman empire a mippa. or haalkerchief, earried in the hand secms to have been regarded as distinctive of high rank. The dropping of h.is mappa by the person who presided was, as is well known, the stgual for the commencement of the games of the amphitheatre (Tertullian, de Spectaculis, 16). It was amoag the insigain of the emperors of the East, esperially from the time that they became perpetual consuls. An object resembling a mappa is sometimes found on Christian tombs, in company with the checus which denotes rank (Bottari, i. 73). In those diptychs in whieh, on their passing into the service of the ehurch, the consul was transformed by certain modifications into a saint or dignitary of the ehureh, the mappa of the imperinl official sometimes uppears. It is, however, in some eases doubtful whether the supposed mappa is not rather a volumen. or roll of a book (Martigay, Dict. des Antiq. Chret. s. v.).

monly fund in the statutes of Fonnlations against thine who violate them, [MabioncTlon.] In all these enses the effeet of the use of the word Maranatha seems to be, to exelade the otlender from the communiou of the chureh during his whole life, and to reserve him for the julgmeat of the Lord at His coming (Benedict XIV. de Sypodo Dioce. x. 1, §7). Suarez, however (de Censuris, Disp. vifil. c. 2), holds that such a sentence is in all cases conditional on the continued impeniteare of the sinaer. [Excosmunication, I. 639.]

MARCUS (1), the Evangellst, was very generally commemorated, and his name oceurs in the Greek, Latin, and Coptle fasti, but not always on the same day. Sept. 23 is assigned to his natalis at Alexandrin in Hieron. Mift., but one MS. omits natalis (Acta SS. infra). The Cal. Byzzant. commemorates Mark, "the apostle," on "fan. 11, and the Bollandists identify him with the evangelist, who is called in the same ealendar, under Ap. 25, "evangelist and apostle," and in Basil. Menol., under the same day, "apostle an. 1 evangelist." April 25 is the day more usually assigned to him (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Murt. ; Vet. Rom. Murt. ; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 258; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 344). The Sacramentary of Gregory observes his natalis on April 25, mentioning him in the collect for the day (Greg. Mag. Litb. Sacr. 84). His natalis is nlso observed in the Antiphonary (ibid. 711). The reason of his not being mentioned in the canon at the prayer Communicantes is believed to be, ns in the ense of St. Luke, that the fact of his martyrdom is uncertain (Krazer, de Apost. Eccles. Liturg. 497). There was a church at Constantinople dedicated to him, erected by Theodosius the Great, near the district or ward named Taurus, at which his festival was observel (Georg. Codinus, de Antiq, Constont. 11 ; Boll. Acta SS. ut sup.). There was a chureh nt Rome dediented to St. Mark by pope Marcus, A.D. 337, restored and adorned by Hadrian I. nad Gregory IV. (Cinmpini, Teet. Mfon. t. ii. 119), and there was a chapel in the Basilica Vaticaun dedicated to him by Mareus Barbus, phtriarch of Aquileia (Cinmpini, de Sac. Aedif.

MARRIAGE. The subject will be dealt with in the present article under the three headings of I. Marrtage Laws; II. Marriage Ceremonifs; III. Divorce.
I. Marriage Laws. The affirmative law of marringe, which has come down from the crention, and is written in the hearts of all mankind, is simply that an unmarried adult man may marry an unmarriel adnlt womna, provided that both parties are in their sound mind, both of them are willing to enter into the contract, and both of them capable of carrying out the primary end for which marriage is instituted. This affirmative law, however, is at once and everywhere limltel by a crowil of prohilitive regulations, ditheriag in ditjerent countries and at difierent times, but hariag ns thalr general ohject- 1 , the prevention of lucest ; 2, the prevention of evila which might aecrue' (1) to the state, (b) to rellgion. (c) to the indiviluals eancerned,
The first Jewiwh converts to Chumstianity, bound belore thetr conversion by tho prohibitions of the Mosside law, conttnued to be ellually bound by them when they had lecome Chilstians, except so far na any of the Mosaic regulations hat been nbrogated or mollified by the authority of christ and His apostles, or had become necessarily obsulete owing to a change of circunstances. The modifications made by our Lord in the Hebrew law of marriage and livorce, as it existel in his time, were two. He restored the rule of mongamy, nad he disallowed of divorce, except upon the siugle ground of the wife's nilultery. Apostolic sathority naldel the regulation that Christians should marry poue but Christians. The Mosiac rules that becams obsolete were of slight importance, being ot partienlar rather than of geneval application; surn as the laws commauling levirate marriages, p:80hititing the marriages of heiresses out of their tribe, and making regulations as to the marriage of the high priest. While these speeial laws fell Into abeyance, the general prohibitions contiaued to be still biadliug upon the Jewish convert, together with the prohibition of polygamy, divorce (for any reasod except one), nad heathen marriage.

When the Gentile convert embraced Christianity he, in like manaer, was nlready bound by the prohititions which he Roman law had introduced with respect to marriage. After his conversion he was still bound by them, ats being the law of the land, and not contrary to his Christian couseience. Io addition, he was bound by the Mosaie prohibitions (with the same modifications and additions as the Jewish convert), the Jewish convert being nanlogously hound by the prohibitions of the Roman law, as being the lans of the civilised world.
The first object of both laws, ns in almost every other ation, was, as we have said, to provent incest, which shocks the common instiacts of humanity ; nad for this purpose marriage was prohibited bet ween persons related or connected with each other within certain degrees. These prohibitions, adod the enlargements or curtailments of them which were made in the early church, will be diseussed under the heading of Prohibited Degrees. Here we shall only treat of these other impediments which were introduced for the good of the state, or of the church, or of the contracting parties.
In the 13 th century the schoolmen codified the impediments to marriage which then existed in the church; and their eode has been aceepted und acted upon by the greater part of Western Christendom down to the present day. It is contained in the five following lines, which are given in the Theoloyia Moralis of Saint Alfonse de' Lignori (lib. vi. § 1008), as embodying the rules which regulate preseat practice:-

$x$. Laptavest muller nee partl reldita tutne. Haee soclanda vetiat connublia, factia re. tractaut.
From the l:ith ceatury onwards these impedl. ments bave inure or less been regarded as nullifying marriage. It will be seen that the first, the seventh, the furrteeath, and thy fifteeuth are coatrary to what we have termed the primary law of marringe, which pertulates oa both sidex a koowledge of what is being tranoncted, willingness, and capacity. The neconl, which forthids marriage between persons ditlering in condition, was introluced by the state, aud for state purposes. The third, the sixth, and the eighth ariginate in the sopposed good of the chureh. The fourth and the twelfth have for their object the prevention of incest. The 150 parties concerned. We will puss each of these imprediments shortly in reciew, inasmach as they exinted though they were not formalised in early times. mes.

1. Error. This impediment required no canons for its extablishment. If the mistike affected the sobatautials of the marringe, such as $n$ mistake with resipect to the person, it ipso facto invalidated a marriage, as there could be no marriage where sudlicient knowledge was wantiag. If it had to do only with the quality or circumstances and aecilents of the marriage, it did not invalidite it during the period with which we are dealing, except in the cases which have to be meationed andar the next headiag.
ii. Conditio. Uader this head three questions arise: the marriage of slayes with slaves; the marriage of free men with slaves; the marringe of persons of a higher raak with those that were of a rank lower thaa thenselves. With regard to the marriage of slaves with slaves the first converts found the two laws to which they paid respect in eonflict with one another. According to the Roman law, there could be no such thing as the marriage of a slave: he was a thing, not a jerson, sad the utmost he cauld attain to was contubernium, not connubuin, wherens the Hebrew law reengaised in the slave a capacity of contractiag marringe.* We can trace a struggle between the Roman and the Hebrew priaciple in the early church, Lut the genios of Christianity Whe such as aecessarily to cause the more homane priaciple to triumph. The julgmeat of the charch appears in the Apostolical Coastitutions, which command a master to give his consent to the marriage of slaves (lib. viii. c. 32). Slaves therefore inight marry, but a condition of their doing so was the express consent of their master. This is repeated in St. Basil's Secoad Canonical Episte to Amphilochius ( Op. tom. iii. p. 296, Paris, Paris, 1730), which proaounces that "the contracts made by those who belong to others are of no force" (caa. xl.), except when made by the consent of their naster. This became the law of the early chureh. The fourth councll of Orleans, a.t. b. 41 , ruled that waves who put with with a view to getting marded, were "to be mighred to thelr parents or mastern, as the caves might be, and made to promise that they woull! veparate, liburty bring granted to the parents and masters to unlte them afterwards in marriage if they thought proper " (can. sxir., Iiar"]. Cuncil. tum. ih. 1. 1+40). The secund culnael of Chatoas, A.D. 813 , pronounced that the marriages of slaves belonging to dilficeat manters were mot to be nullitied, if oace the masters had consuated (can. $x \times x$, ibid. toin. iv. p. 1036)

The legality of marriages between freemen ant: slaves was ant so easily allowed, inviring overcome. a repugnance which was never wholly overcome. At the hegianing of the third censlave bishop Callistus, having himselt been a shave, attempted to oht a the nanction of the church at Rome for the marriage of free-born women with slaves. But he dif not surceel and we find Hippolytus treatiag his uttempt as matter for a passloante accusation agninst him (see Döllinger, I/ippolytus and Callistus, p. 147, Eng. tr. Edinb, 1876). The Apostulical Constitutions, which recognise the fropricty of the marringe of slaves with slaves, do not permit the marriage of a freeman with a slave, "If a believer has a slave concubine, let him give lier up, and lawfully marry a wife. If he has a frcewoman for a concubine, let him take her for his legitimate wife" (Apostol. Const. Jib, viii. c. 32). This principle is again Inid down in stil! harsher form by pope Leo I. A.D. 443 (Epist. ad Rusticum Narbonens. Resp. vi., Op. p. 408, Paris, recngaise marriage between of the 7 th century female slave ande between a man nad his fombid slave, aad ia case it has taken place to sell her he is wife put une is to be condemaed, and the slave(Canones Wallici, pratection of the priest Councils of Great Britain, vol. 1 p. and Stubbs' 17 th of the Capitula of Theadore of C. 137 ). . The as given by Harduin (Concil. tom, Canterbury, declares that "a man of free hirth ought to marry a woman of free birth." The form to the expression "ought to" (debet) implles that at the date of that canon the feeling against slave marriages had grown less strong than it had been, but we cannut be sure what that date is, as the canon is not Theodore's (see Maddun and Stubbs' Counci/s of Great lirituin, vol. iii. P. 210).c Among the geanine canoas of Theodore, A.D. 686, nre touad $t$ wo, one of which reengaises the validity of marriage between a freeman and a slave, and forbids the husband to dismiss his wife if the coasent of both parties nitential origianlly given to the marringe ( $P_{e-}$ nitential, lib. ii. cnjp. xiii. §5), while the other and the slave a gulf fixed between the freed and the slave that it allows husbands or wives

A third canón rules that if a man has reduced himself' to whavery liy crime, his wife may at the end of a year marry another man if whe has herswif been bitherto only once married (i), id, eap. xil. $88, \mathrm{p}, \mathrm{Q} 94$ ). The teeling agninat marriage with slaves (naturally strogger in rexpect to the marriage of freeburn womee with male slaves than of freemen with fomale slaves) found its most harefaced and reckiess expression in reme of the Burbaritn Coles. lyy the laws of the visi-

The Ruman duw was not so serere as this, it in true that a senutus consultum of the year 52 had enacted that if a freewoman firmei a permadent marringe relation or contuhernium (she could bot contract a legal marriage) with a siave, without permission from the latter's master, she should herself become the property of the master (Tacit. Annal. xii, 53); ned a tiveednase whe aspired to marry his patrima was liable to be sent to the mines or the public works (Paul. even these peanltiea do not equal those of the even these penaltiea do not equal those of the Barbarian Code in severity, anit they were more or lesss such as might be evaded. Nor does there seom to have been any desire to cnforce them haruhly. So enrly as the time of Hadrian the children of a freeweman and a stave were allowed to be regarded and treated as tee (Gaius, i, 84). When the 6 th century is renchel, we find Justinian appoiating, in case a master gave his slave in marringe ton freeman as being a freewoman. not that the marriage should be regarded as null and void (wisich would wadeubtediy hnve been the earlier roling), but that the slave should thereby be coastituteif free, and the marriage should hold be constituteli free, and the marriage should hold good (Auth. Collat. iv, it. i., Nu, Fell. xi., Corp.

The councils of Vermerie (can. xiii.) and of Compiègoe (can. v.), A.D. 753 and 757 , admit and enforce the legality of marriages deliberately enterod into betwean the free and the slave, whether the man or the woman were the slave. But if a min married a slave ubder the appreiension that the was free, the error was considered to affeet the substance of the contract, and the marringe was thereliy invalidated, by the legisintioo both of Justinian (Norell. xxii. c. 10, Corp. Jturis, tom. ii. pars 2, p. 125) and of the Caroliagians (Consil. Vermeriense, can. vi, ; Concil. Compen-

The furmer are in an analogons proition to that of married women, aud if they marry are to be treated as a lulteresses and not alnjitted to penance. The hatter are in the pesition of betrothed women, and are to do pemanee "for some time," lor breaking their promise to the heavenly sponse (caps. xii., xiii., Hard. Concil, tom. i. p. 1002). From the earliest times it is probable that any member of thase classes that married wats any silered to have been guilty of a $\sin$ and of a scinilal ( 1 Tim, v. 12), but the marriage was held as valid, as may be seen by St. Cypran's statement that virgins who could not, or would ant, persevere hat but to marry (St. Cyprr, fipist, 14. ul Pompon., Op. p. 3, ed. Fell, Oxon. 1682). As soon, however, as the idea of the spiritual marriage with Christ had taken possession of the mind of the chureh, the earthly marriage was regurded as no marriage at all. The conacil of Ancyra, A.D. 314, requires that any derentae who marry should be subjected to penance for a year (ean. xix.) ; the council of Valence, a.t. 374, that they should be saspended from commanion, and not be re-almiltel io it nisi pluè sulisfocerint Deo (can. ii.). v. Crinen. The two ofteners indicated by this heading are the murder of a hustand or wife, committed with a view to a second marriage, and adultery accompanied with a promise of future marrige. This impediment no doubt existed at all times, but it is net specitically uamed in early times, perhaps because, according to the early discipline, murder and adultery disqualified a penitent from marriage altogether duriog the whole time of his or her penance, and, therefore, a fortiori, disqualified from a maz riage to which the way had beea smoethed by such erimes. The council of Friuli, A.D. 791 , decreed that no woman put away for adultery Whs to be again married to any one whatever, even after her husband's death (ean. x., Hard, Concil. tom. iv. p. 860). The council of Vermerie, A.D. 753, declares that "if a man's wife has entered inte a conspiracy against his life, and he has killed one of the conspirators in selfdefence, he may put her away." Later copies of the nets of the council add that "after the denth of his wife he may marry again, and that the wife is to be subjected to penance, and never allowed to remarry" (an. v., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1990). The first council of Tribur, A.D. 895 , lays down the general rule prohibiting marriage between a man and a married woman with whom he has committed adultery, on account of a senndal that had lately oceurred, a man having persuaded a woman to sin on tho promise, confirmed by oath, that he would marry her if her husband died, a thing deseribed aa res

Ixiii., ibid. tom. iii. p. 59): and by Imperial legislation, which forbids intermarriage with Jews as a capital crime (Cud. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 7, leg. 2 ; lib. xvi. tit. 8 , leg. 6). St. Ambrose and the councils of Elvira, Agde, Laudicea, nad in Trullo (can. Ixxii.), enlarge the prohibition so as to make it apply to heretic's as well as to the unbaptized. Ou the other hanil, the Council of Hippo, A.D. 393 (can. xii.) and the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 45 t (can. xiv.) seem, by specifying, to contine the prohibition of such marriages to the sens and daughters of bishops, priests, and interior clergy. The general law was, ns might be expected, very frequently set at nought. St. Jerome bursts out with a fiery inveetive aqainst the wemen of his day, of whon he says with a rhetorical exaggeration that "the greater part (pleraeque), deapising the apostle's command, marry heathens" (ad. Jovin. i.. Op. tom. iv. p. 152). St. Augustine, in his work de File et operibus (cap. xix., op. tom. vi. p. 220 , ed. Migne), says likewise that in his time marriage with unbelievers had ceased to be regarded as a sin; and he hinself holds that it ought not to preclude from admission to baptism. St. Augustine's mother Monicn, Clothilda wife of Clovis, Bertha wife of Ethelbert, and Ethelburga wife of Edwin, are conspicuens instances of the rule being transer rule being transgressed to the advantage of Christianity.
vii. $i$ is. This impediment, like error, ipso facto invalidates marriage, the essence of which consists of its being a tree contract made nad deelared. Physical violence, or moral violence, carried to such an extent as to inferfere with the 'reedoni of netion, exereised on either party to the contraet, destroys that liberty of the will Which is a condition of the contract belng valid. Where there was violence there conld be no free consent; where vo free consent, no contract; where no contract, no marringe. A well-k nown instance in point is the marriage of Jane of Navarye with the duke of Cleves, which, after the eleven yeas 3 old maiden had been carried to chureh by her uncle, the Constable of Soutmoreney, naid eompelled to go through the wedding, was hroken off on the ground that the bride hat not collrelations, that was necessary. Among the He brews the fither was regarded as having the right of giving his daughter in marriage (Gen, xxiv. 51). The early Roman law looked upon wife and children as goods, belonging to the husband and father. Consequently there was room tor violence to be emplayed towards one of the contracting parties with a view to force her consent, which the law would not have recognised as violence. The claim of the woman to an independent voice, was to a grent extent ignored. "The girl," says St. Ambrose of Rebecea, whom he holits up herein as an example, "is not consulted about her espousals, for she awaits the julgment of her parents; inasmuch as a girl's modesty will not allow her to choose a husband" (de Abrah. lib. i. cap. ult., Op. tonı. i. p. $31 ?$, Paris, 1686 ), and he quotes with approbation Euripiles' lines:-

The second canobical letter from Basil to Amphilochius (Op. tom. iii. p. 296) calls marringes entered into without a tither's snnction by the harsh name of fornimation (can. xlii.), and roles that even after reconciliation with the parents, three years' penance is to he done by the daughter, (can. xxxviii.). The fourth council of Orlenus, A.D. 541 , says that they should be regarded in the light of captivity or bondage rather thnn marriage (can, xxii., Ilard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1439). An lrish coumcil in the time of St. Pntrick, abont, the year 450 , lays it down that the will of the girl is to be inquired of the flther, and that the girl is to do what her tather chooses, that the girl is to do what her tather chooses, innsmuch as man is the head of the worman (can xxvii., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 1796). See also St. Augustine (Epist. celv. al. 233, Op. tom. ii. p. 1069, ed, Migue). The imperin! laws were also very strict, as those of the henthen emperors had been. Constantius and Constnus made clan(Codine marriages of this nature a capital offence (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. xxiv. legg. 1, 2). Even widows under the age of 25 were firbidden by a lnw of Vrlentinian and Gratimn to marry without their parents' consent (ib.l. lib. iii. tit. vii. leg. 1); nad St. Ambrose desires young widows to leave the choice of their second hosbands to their parents (de Ahruhum. lib. i. eap. ult., Op. tom. i. p. 312). The third council of Toledo, A.D. 589 , eaacts that widows are to be nlowed free choice of their hushands, and that girls are not to be compelled to accept hasbands against the will of their parents or themselves (can. x., Hard. Concil. tom, iii p. 481). The Penitential of Theotore of Canterbury, A.D. 688, ordains that a father may give his danghter in teen, nfter which she must not be married without her own consent (lib. ii. cap. xii. § 36).
Nevertheless the independent right of . the contracting parties to give or withhold his or her consent was not nitogether ignored. A law of Diocletian and Maximin declares that none nre to be compelled to marry (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. iv. leg. 14, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. p. 418), and this liberty was testified to in the forms and ceremonies used in the celebration of marriages. As ages.

hy some they nre regarded as enjuining thit the persons selected regarded as enjoining that but once married for the ministry shomld be but once married; by others, that they should not lave put nway their wires, and have taken others in the lifetime of their first wives; by others, that they should not be men who were untaithful to their wife (whether a first, or a second, or a third wife) by keeping a concubine, according to a common Roman practice, or other laxity of life; by others, that they should not be polygamists, in accordance with Hebrew customs. The last of these tour interpretations is supported by the authority of St. C'hrysostom (Hon. in 1 Tim. iii. $2,0_{1}$. tom. xi. p. 599, Paris, 1734); the third, which does not exclude the tourth, is the expositlon of Theodore of Mopsuestia C Catenae Graec. Patr. in N. T. tom. viii. p. 23 , ed. (ramer) and of Theodoret (Com. in 1 Tim. iii. 2, 1 (p. tom. i. p. 474, Paris, 1642). The authorities and arguments for the second interpretation may be seen at length in Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. $\Delta$ ivapia. The thought underlying St. Chrysostom's iuterpretntion is that, whereas polygamy was allowed by example of wns still practised, as shewn by the oxample of Herod, and proved by the testimony of Justin (Dish. crinn Tryph., (ip. tom. ii. 4+2, of the apostle , it might have been the porpose was a postle to allow a converted Jew, who was a polygamist, to live as a layman without repadiating his existing wives, but not to allow a man in such a position to be a presbyter, "for" the Jews," says St. Chrysostom, "might proceed to second nuptials and have two wives tagether" (in t Tim. iii. 2). ${ }^{\text {d }}$ The exposition of Theodore and Theodoret is in harmony with the words of St. Panl, which literally translated mean "a man of one womnn," and need bear no turther signitication than one who was faithtol to the malriage tie, and "kept himself only to his wife so long as they both did live" (Marriage Service). It is Hlso in better harmony with St. Paul's argument ("one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity; for if a man know not how to rale his own house, how shill he take enre of the church of God ?"), than that which sees in the text only a prohibition of a second marriage. Theoloret says that he deliberately adopts the view of those who held "that the holy apostle declares the man who lives contentedly with one wife is worthy of ordination, and that he is not forbidding second marriages, which he has olteo rucommeaded" (in 1 Tim, iii. 2). The general understanding, however, of the words, which was accepted ia the early church, was that St. Paul intended to exclude Digamista from the ministry; and his instruction to Tinothy, thas understood, became converted iato a rule of charch discipline. See the Apostolical Canons (can. xvii.) ; the Apostolical Constitations (vi. 17); Origen (Hom. xvii. in Luo., Op. tom, iii. p. 953, Paris, 1740, who says plainly, "Neither bishop, priest, deacon, nor widow must be twice married "); St. Ambrose 'de Off. 1. 50, §257, Up. tom, ii. p. 66, Paris, $\left.169^{\prime}\right)^{\prime}$; St. Augus. tine (de Dono Cunjug. c. xvili., Up. tom. vi. p. 387, ed. Migne); St. Epiphavius (Haer. lix. 4, Up. tom. i. p. 496 , Parıs, 1622 ); and the councils of Angiers, A.D. 455 (can, xi., Hard, Concil. tom, ii. p. 480); Agde, A.D. 506 (can. i. ibid. p. 997); Arles, iv. A.D. 524 (can. iii. ibul. p. 1070). St. Paul's injuaction, thius interpreted, has been coutinuously the rule of the Oriental church both positively and negatively, except so far as it has been violated on the positive side by the Council in Trullo, A.d. 692, forbidding the marriage of bishops, which St. Paul appears not only to have permitted, but to have recommended, if not enjoined, in order that the bishop's power of ruling might have been tested in a smaller sphere betore he was promoted to a Iarge one (Cuncil, in Trullo, can. xlviii., Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 1679).

For some time before the Christian era a change of sentiment as to the relative excellence of the married and single life had been growing up annong a section of Jews. The national feeling was strongly in favour of marriage, and a ana who was unmarried or without children was looked upon as disgraced (see the legend of Joachim und Anua in the Protevangelion). But the spirit of asceticism, cherished by the Essenes, led to an admiration of celibacy, of which no traces are to be fouod in the Old Testament; so that, instead of a shame, it became an honour to be unmarried and childless. In the early church this spirit, at first exhibiting itself only to be condemned in the Encratites (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 29 ; St. Ang. do Haeres. x xvo), the A postolici (St. Aug. do Hueres. xl.), the Manichees (ibid. xlvi.), the Hieracians (i'ia. xlvii.), the Eustathians (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. 1143 ; Council of Gangra, cans. i. ix. x. xiv.), struggled with a heathicr fecling, till nt length it stifled the latter.
Another canse was working in the same direction. The days of chivalry were not yet ; and we cannot but notice, even in the greatest of the Christian lithers, a lamentably low estimate of worau, aad consequently of the marriage relatiouship. Even St. Augustine can see no justification for marringe, except in a grave desire deliberately adopted ot having children (Serm. ix. Ji., Op. tonl. v. pp. 88, 345, ed. Migne); and, in accordance with this view, all married intercourse, except for this siugle purpose, is harshly condemned. If marriage is soaght after for the sake of children, it is justifiable; if entered into as a remedium to avoid werse evils, it is pardonable; the iden of "the mutual society, help, and conifort, that the one ought to have of the other, both in prosperity and adversity," hardly existed, and could hardly yet exist. In the decline of the Roman empire, woman was not a helpmeet for minn, and few traces are to br, found of those graceful conceptions which Western imagiaation has groaped round wean?d love uad home affections. The result was that the gross, coarse, material, carnal side of marriage being alone apprehended, those who sought to lead a spiritual life, that is, above all, the clergy, instend of "adorning and beatifying that holy estate," and liftiog it up with themselves into a higher sphere and a purer atmosphere, regarded it rather as a necessary evil to be shunned by those who aimed at a holier lite than that of the majority.

Four questions arose:-1. Whether a clergyman might marry sfter ordioation; 2 . Whether after ordination he must cease to cohabit with his wife whom he had married before ordination; 3. Whother a man already married might be ordained; 4. Whether a twice married man might be ordained.
On the first question the East and West agreed in returning a negative answer, so far as bishops and presbyters were concerned. In the first half of the 3rd century pope Callistus is charged by Hippolytus with intrudacing the innovation of allowing elergymen to marry after they were in orders. Döllinger supposes him to have sanctioned no more than the marriage of acolyths, hy podiaconi (the title still borne by sub-deacons), and, perhaps, deacons. deacons), and, perhaps, deacons. But this is unlikely, or Hippolytas would not have made it so serions a charge aganst him. Callistus probably allowed his presbyters and deacons to mary, and the practice continued after his death amoog his special followers and disciples-hia "sehool," as Hippolytos calls them ( 0 ঠ̃ סtapévei rd but it did not prevail agaiast the opposite custom. The Coancil of Ancyra, A.D. 314, allows deacons only to marry, and that if at the time of their ordination they had given notice of their intention to do so (can. $x_{1}$ ). The Apostolical Canons restrict the liberty of marriage atter ordination to readers and singera (can, xxy.). Presbyters are ordered by the council of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314, to remsin unmarried if they are unmarried at the time of their ordination (can. i.). bishops, priests, and deacons are ordered to remaio unmarried by a Roman council under Innocent I., A.D. 402 (can. iii.). The only authoritative sanction for niarriage after ordination is found in a decree of a Nestorinn syood held under Barsumus, archbishop of Nisibis, towards the end of the 5 th century.
On the second question, whether clergy married at the time of their ordination were to cease cohnbitation, there gradually developed itself one of the disciplinary differences which after. wards declared themsel;es bet ween the East and West. The Eastern church has never forbidden marriage before ordination to its prenbyters, and has never laid upon them the burden of shatinence from thel: wives; and there is no doubt that the Eastern discipllae in this respect was the discipline of the whole ot the eurly church.

Thomassin, Natalis Alexnuder, the Bollandist Stilting, and Zaccuria assert that married ascelical precept, but they have no ground fur their assertion. Tillemont ncknowledges thnt for the first four or five hundred years it was not required, and De Marca argues that it grew up? insensibly ns a voluntary practice, and was tirst made binding by pope siricius at the end of the

The first authority on the question is Clement of Alexandria, who, in contrasting the practice of the church with that of the deacon, and layman as as "a plainly of priest, Socrates, who wrote (Hefele, viii. §§ 106, Heliodorus, bishop of Tricte A.b. 439, names had introduced into Thessaly ns the person who pusing clergy who Jived witb the novelty of despeaks of that custom prevniling in hes, and he Thessnlonica, and in Macedoniling in his day in he declares it cond in Macedonia and Hellias; but custom of the Eastern the otherwise universal and priests were Eastern church, where bishops pleased in this respect, "fiberty to act as they had children by their lawful wives during the time that thay nre bishops" ( Ihist. Eccles. v. 22 , Op. p. 242, Oxon. 1844). The argument drawn from the incontrovertible fact that popes were the aons of clergymen, and that well-known bishops and priests were married, and that sons and daughters of bishops and presbyters are frequently referred to in the canons of councils, is generally eloded by nssuming that, though married, the clergy did not cohabit with their wives after ordination; but the historian's statement ennnot be thus put aside, confirmed as it is iy overwhelming evidence. Gregory Nazianzen, whis sister and brother, were probably born it is certain that they were born a bishop: father was a priest (Carm. de born after their Cyprian charges Novatus, a priest, with , 502 ); to his wife, which caused her miscarriage (Exist, $x$ lix.) ; and Synesius, as we know, only accepte his bishopric on the understanding that he was to be in no way separated from his wife. Nevertheless, as time proceeded, the liberty not. wly of cohabiting with, but of having, wives was extinguished, so far as bishops were cencerned, in the East and West alike. Not so with regnrd to presbyters. regard to presbyters. In their case the discipline of the two halves of Christendom became more right of their cent. The East never yielded the married before clergy being fathers of families if speaks on this point with decisionncil in Trullo rul As we know that the Roman church has raled that candidates for the diaconate or has presbyterate are to make profession that they will no longer cohabit with their wives, we ob serving the ancient canon of apostolical perfection and order, declare the marriages of all in holy we refuse to forbill cohabitationnted valid, and deprive them of conjugal intercourse at proper times. Therefore, if a man is found fit proper ordained subdeacon, deacon, or presbyter, he is not to be refused on the ground of cohabiting with his wife. Nor at the time of ordination is anyone to be required to profess that he will nbstain from intercourse with his lawful wife; whs instituted by dishonour to marriage, which sence, the thed by God and blessed by His prehath joined together laring aloud, "What God and the apostle teaching, 'Marringe is honumiar,'

And, likewise, if any priest or dencon dismlsses his wife on the pretext of piety, let him be excommunicated, and if he be obstinate, let him be deposed" (can. xiii., Hard. Concil, tom. iv. p. 106ib). Meantime the West was growing stiffer aud stifer, Spain still leading the why. The first and the ninth councils of Toledo (canons 1 . x., Harl. Concil. tom. i. p. 990, tom. iii. p. 975) forbid cohabitation with increasing rigour, A,D. 400 aad 6.55 . The French councils of Arles II., A.d. 452 (can. xliv., Hard. Convil. tom. iv. p. 774), and of Mâcon, A.D. $58+$ (can. xi.), denounce the punixhment of deposition ; and Innocent I. in his letters to Victricius and to Exuperius (Hard. Concil. tom. i. pp. 1001, 1003), and Leo I. (Epist. ad Rusticum, Resp. iii., $O_{\mathrm{P}}$. p. 407) speak fur Rome in the same sense. Such a discipline so severely entorced could only end ia the prohibition of marriage altogether.
The third question, whether the married state and the clerical state were altogether incompatible, could not arise while St Paul's teaching was still ringing in the ears of Christians, for St . Paul had commanded the selection of married men for priests nud deacons ( 1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6), the reason of which command was explained by Clement of Alexandria to be that "they have learst from their own households how to govern the chareh" (Strom. iii. 12); but it necessarily arose, ard was necessarily answered in the affirmative, as soon as the cohnbitation of the clergy mative, as soon as the cohnbitation of the clergy with : weir wives had heen authoritatively forbilder. When public opinion came to require that a married man should abstain from living with his wife, it was only a question of time how soon it would require him to have no wife at all; and to many the latter course would appear less revolting than the former. A onesided development of the scriptural procepts coutained in Matt. xix. 12, and in 1 Cor. vii. 1-7, necessarily led to the high estimate of celibacy for its own sake that is found in some early writers (see Ignatius, Epist. ad Polycarp. c. v.; Athenagoras, Lejat. c. $x x x i i i$. ; Justin. Apol. x. xv.), and more naturally found its issue in the imposition of celibacy than of married asceticism, The arguments used from the time of Siricius on wards against cohabitation were of equal force ag.,inst marriage. If it were true that holiness aud abstinence from marriage intercourse were synonymous, and if it were true that the clergy were bound to be in a peculiar manner dedicated to holiness, the conclusion necessarily drawn was to holiness, the conclasion necessarily drawn was that the clergy should be unmarried. Siricius was the spiritual father of Damiani and Hildebrand. It is true that there was a long struggle, sometimes based by the opponents of celibncy on low nad carnal motives; sometimes fought on the higher principle which brought into prominence those other scriptural injunctions which ought to limit the application commonly made of those precepts on which the iden of celibacy had grounded itself; sometimes, too, appealing to the practice of the earlier church, still perpetuated in the East. But the battle conld not be a successfal one unless the principles laid down by Siricius were repudiated, and the honour of married life and married intercourse vindi:ated. In 9611 we find that " B grent disturbance took place" in Sonth Wales (as elsewhere) "because the priests were enjoined not to marry without the leave of the pope; so that it was considered best to allow matrimony to the priests" (lirut. y Tywysog. p. 28, Haddan and Stubbs, Councils of Great Britain, i. 286). But in 1054 the West was ripe for the decree of the Roban council under Nicholas Il., "Whatever priest, deacon, or subdeacon shall, after the colistitution of our predecessor of blessed memory, the most holy pope leo on clerical chustity, openly marry a concubine (wife), or not lcave one that he has marricd, in the name of Almighty God and by the authority of the blessed npostles Peter and Paul, we enjoin and utterly forbid to sing mass or read the gospel or epistle," &c. (enn. iii., Hard. Concil. tom. vi. p. 10.2). In the first Lateran Council under Callistus II., A.d. 1193, the word "wife" is introduced, together with that of "concubine." "We utterly forbid priests, dencons, and subdeacons to live with concabines and wives; and any other woman to be in the same house with them, except those whom the Conncil of Nice allowed on the ground of relationship, namely, mother, sister, nunt, aud so on, about whom no suspicion can fairly arise" (can. iii., Hard. Concil. tom, vii. p. 1111). The Lateran Council appenls to the authority of the Council of Nice as though forbidding that which it deliberstely refused to forbid.

The fourth question, whether a twice married man might be ordained, was nnswered in the negative, being contrary to an ecclesinstical rule which, as we have stated above, was founded on a probably mistaken apprehension of the meaning of St. Paul's injunction to Timothy and Titus ( 1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6). Accordingly, although about the year 220 pope Callistus admitted twice or thrice inarried men to the Episcopate, the Presbyterate, and the Diaconate, such ordinations were fortidden by the Apostolical Canons (can. xyii.) and Constitutions (ii. 2, vi. 17), by St. Basil's canons (can. xii.), nad by all the synods that denlt with the subject, except those held among the Nestorians. Here too, however, a difference of the discipline of the East and the West cxhibited itself. The East, which, whenever it could be, was moro human and less rigorist than the West, refused to count marringes which had taken place before baptism as disqualifications. Provided that a man had been but once married since his baptism he was eligible in the East to the priesthood, notwithstanding uny marriage that he might have contracted as a heathen or as a catechumen (see Council in Trullo, can. iii.). Not so in the West. St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, popes Siricius and Innocent, the councils of Valence and Agde, agree in pronouncing that no such distinction can be recogrised. Two marriages, whether before or after baptism, exclude from the ministry. The only voices raised in the West against this ruling are those of St. Jerome, who, in defending the regularity of bishop Carterius's consecration, declares that the worl was full of such ordinations (Epist. Ixix., Up, tom, i. p. 654, Tharis, 1846), and of Gennadius of Marseilles (de Ecules. Dogm. c. Ixxil. p. 38, ed. Elmenhorst). The rule, whether in its Lastern or Western

(In proof of this, see Tertullian, de E.chortatione Custitatis, c. vii., (\%). p. 12, for Paris, 1675; and Hippolytus, Philosoph. ix. 12, for early times: a series of councils testifies to the same fact at a later period.) Sometimes a loral custom to the contrary would arise. which maintained itself in opposition to the geueral rtile. In the 5th century Theodore of Nopsuestia refused to be bound by a rule which, while ic professed to pay deference to St. Paul's words, finstrated the purpose of the Apostle. Theodoret, following his lead, declared that he cared nothing tor a practice, however genernl, which was bised upon a false interpretation of St. Piul's command; and when the count Irenanus had been made bishop of Tyre, though twice married, and thereupon an order came from the emperor to depose him as a digamist as well as a Nestorian. Theodoret wrote a letter justifyengsecrators consecration on the grounds that his ennsecrators had but followed the example of those who had gone before them, eiting the of Beroen, who hader of Aotioch and Acacius of Bereen, who had ordained Diogenes, though salem, who had ordained of Praulius of JeruCatsarea, under like circumstancesus, bishop of ton, that the consecration of He asserted, lrenaeus had taken place with the twice married of Proclus of Constantineple, the chiet ecclesinaties of Pontus, and the bishoj,s of Palestine (see Epist. cx., Op. tom. iii. p. 979, Jaris, 1642). St, Thomas Aquinas and later moral theologians go furthes still; they allow that an excessive disgust for a wite justifies a man in regardiag himself impotent in respect to her (see Liguuri, Theol. xv. liaptus. This impediment is sometimes classed mader that of vis. it means not exactly the same as our word ravishment, but the violent remeval of a woman to a place where her actions are wo loager free, for the sake of inducing or compelliog her to marry. The aet of Bothwell in carrying away Mary Stuart, would have been precisely a case of raptus had there been no collusion between them. By some raptus is distiaguished into the two elasses of raptus seductionis and raptus violenticie. Whether ravishment in the strict seiuse of the word is an impediment to a future marriage is a question which has been answered in contrary ways. These whe regarded it as a shameful act that a man should gain his objeet by committiag a great crime, decided that it was an lasuperable impedinent for ever. These whe considered that the iajury done to the woman could only be atoned for and aullified by marriage, took the opposite view, and required the ravisher to marry her. The Roman law made it a perpetual impediment. Laws of Constantine and Constantius infiiet capital punishment on ravishers (Cod. Theod, lib. ix. tit, xxiv, legg. 1, 2); and Justinian, after having prenounced the penalty of death for the crime, continues, "Nor is the ravished woman to be allowed to ask for and obtain her ravisher as her husbaad: her parents are to marry her to whom they will, except the ravisher, in lawtul wedlock, but our serenity will never in any way consent to the act of those who try to wed in our state like enemies. For every one who wishes for a wife, whether free or freed, is to ssk her of her parents or other guardiaes in accordance with the tenor of our laws, that by their consent a legitimate marriage may take place " (Cod. Justin. lib. ix. tit. xiii. leg. 1, Cor $\mu$. Juris, tom. ii. p. 832). The law of the Visigoths went so far as to punish ravisher and victim With death if they should presume to marry (lib. lii. tit. iil. iegg. 1, 2, Canciani, vol, iv, p. 93). On the other hand the Ostrogothic law required the man to marry and to endow the werran.

Secoad mariages were discountenanced by the imposition of a penance, but how soen this practice arme is questioned. Some think that they tial it eujoined in the canons of the council of Lanilicea, A.b. 360, the first of whleh rules that "in accordance with the ecclesiastical cabon, thone who have been married a second time in a free and lawfol way, and have not tahen their wives in a clandestine manner, are to be allowed commualon (ex renia dari communiunem) after a little time has passed, and they have had a period for prayer and fastang (oratimibus et jejuniis tacaverint)." The last expression has been not unfrequently understond, and it is understood by Hefele (Hist. of Councils, bk. vi.), to refer to an eccleslastical peiance that the married couple had to undergo for their otlence in marrying a second time; but it may only mean that a space was to intervene ofter marriage, which was to be devoted by theur to prityer and fasting before they offered themselves at the Lord's table. The "ecclesiastical canon" referred to in the Laodicean canon is nut one that restralns second marriages, but, no doubt, the eighth canon of the council of Nicaea, which is in favour of them; and the practice of setting apart a time for prayer and fasting before communicating after marringe, whether regarded as a penitential discipline or not, was looked upon as a proper act of reverence, whether the marriage was the first or the second. (See Herard's Capitula, cap. Lixxix., Hard. Concil. tom, v. p. 456. Cumpare also the so-called fourth council of Carthage, ean. xiii., Hefele, bk. viii.; sad Theodore's Penitential, lib. ij. cap, xii. §§ 1,2 .) By the end of the 7th century this period of prayer and fasting was distinctly regarded as a time of penance, but it was a penance imposed upon those who contracted a first marriage, as much as upon those who entered on a second marriage, the only difference being that a longer period was nssigned in the latter case than in the former. Theodore of Canterbury orders that in a first marriage the husband sand wife are to refrain from church for thirty days, and then to do penance for fortr days, and give themselves to prayer, before communicating, while a man who makes a second marriage is to do penauce for a year on Wednesdays and Fridays, and to abstain from flesh ment for three Lents. This is a plain instance of penance being required for second marriage, but it is equally plain that the otlence for which penance has to be dose is rather that of marrying than of marrying a second time (Penitential, lib, $i$. c. xiv. §§ 1,2), No doubt, however, from very early times a difference was made not only in respect to the honour paid to first and second marriages, but also in the ceremonies with which they were performed. The Councll of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314 , forbids presbyters to be present at the festivities of a second marriage, and the ceremonies of crowning the bride and bridethe ceremonies of crowning the bride and bride-the Bulgurians, who had asked his counsel, A.D. the Bulgurians, who had asked his counsel, A.D. 860. "Betrothal," he says, "is the premise of future nuptials madn by the consent of the contractiag parties aed of their guardians;" and he explains that the betrothed proceed to their nuptials at some suitable time "after the man nuptials at some suitable time "after the man has betrethed the woman te himself with arrhae by adorning her finger with a ring of fidelity, and the man has haded over a dowry agreed to by both of them in a written form centaining his eoveaant befire witnesses invited on both sides." This passage sides." This passage embodies an aceount of the triditional practice which had exlsted for centuries previous to the date of Nicholas, for he distiactly states that he ls relating to the Bulgarians "the custom which the holy Roman church has received from old "(Nicol. Respons. all consult, Diulyarorum, Resp. ill., Hard. Concil. toln. v. p. 354). We see here that there are four things necessary to make betrothal regular: , arrhuc; 2, a ring; 3, a dowry; 4, witnesses.

1. The most essential of these ceremonies was the hestowal of the arrhae, or earnest money, supposed by some to have been originally given by the man as the symbolical purehase-money of the maiden, answering to the Jewish rite termed בכם ("by maney"), recalling in a sort both the Reman co-emptio, and the barbaric practice of purehnsing wives. But it is probable that it was no more thsn a pledge such as was given in other cases where bargains were struck which could ne $i$ be immedlately carried out. It served to assure the woman that she should hereafter share her husband's worldly goeds, of which the coin given at espeusals was on earnest, and it was evidence which might be exhibited by the aggrieved party in case of a breach of promise of marringe. Thus we read that Andarehins wint to law with the danghter of Ursus, aileging aileging as proof of his espousals with her that he had given her an arrha. (See Gregory of Ton's' History, lib. iv. c. 41, apud Fiist. Franc. Script. tom. i. p. 322, Paris, 1636.) That the practice existed anoong the Western nations before they were Christianized is proved by the ambassadors of Clovis betrothing Clotilda te "accordiag presenting a shilling and a penny, The Espousals to service is called by the Franks." aкодоuөia roû a $\dot{\rho} \beta \alpha \beta \hat{\omega} \nu_{0 S}$ or ordo in nuptiaruin subarrhatione in the Greek Euchologion (Goar, p. 380, Paris, 1647). Suburrhare came to be equivalent to espouse. [ArrinaE.]
2. The ring is deseribed by pope Nichelas as making part of the arrhae. It was used in preChristian times in marriages, and was probably borrowed by the Jews from pisgan ussge. Among the Jews it eccasionally took the place of the piece of money, the payment of which censtituted one of the three forms of Jewish marriage. Amoug Christians it was butably adopted, net only as part of tho arrhic, described hag (if it were the same ns the seal ring meanlug like clement of Alexandria), a symbofical meanlug like that of the presentation of a buach of keys, shewing that the wife had the eharge of the household goods. "He ring," says stenold goods. "He gives a guld ring," says St. Clement, " not for ornment, but that she may with it seal up what has to be kejp safe, as the care of keeping the holuse belongs to her" (Paedagug. iii. 11, Op. p. 287). Other and less material symbolisms easily atfached themselves to the ring: it was a type of fidelity, of safely gunrded malesty, of uaion, of Trotection, of the Holy Spirit's encircling grace. crtulian testifies to its use, in the words "digite quem sponsus oppignerasset pronuho annulo" (Apologet. c. vi., Op. p. 7). In later times the ring was blessed by a specinl service. Some Enstern rituals reyuired the iaterchange of twe rings (Goer, Euchologium, p. 38i). The latest Issued fittualc, that of the Old Catholies, centains of form for the blessing either of twe rings or of one (Old Catholic Ritual, p. 39, Eng. tr. Oxf.

3. The dowry is next mentioned. Atnong the Grecks and Romans it was the custom that the dowry should be paid or promised at the betrothal by the relatives of the woman (see llautus, Thinummus, act r.); with the Hebrews (as with the Germans-see Tacitus, de Moribus (iermanurum, e. xviii.) the dowry was paid by the man (Gen. xxxiv. 12; 1 Sum. xviii. 25), but occasionally the father gave a dowry to his daughter (Julges i. xv.). The Hebrew custom prevailed in the early church, and is embodied in the civil ns well as In the canon law (Cod. Theod, lib. iii. n . 3 ; lib. ii. tit. 21). St. Augustine says that niales wife looks upen the tabulate mitrimo niades as instruments cmptionis suae, whereby she has been madecome her lord ( $d$ lominus) and silla), as shen made his handmaid or slave (aneap. 6, Op. tom. v. p. 225, ed. Migne). The promise of a dowry was generally coasigned to writing, which was read before the witnesses to the betrethal, and it became a formal legal decument, of the nature of a marriage settlement. The following is an abridged form of nuptial tablets as used by the Jews: "On such a day of buch $n$ month in such a year at buch a place, such un one, the oon of euch an one, said to such an one, the daughter of such en one: 'Be thon betrothed to me for wife eccording to the ordinubces of Moses and the 1sraelites, and I , if it please God, will pay you respeet and honour, I will give you food and sustenance, and I will dress you in the way that Jewish husbands de whe henour, maintain, and clothe their wives as they ought. 1 also give to you, as the dowry of your maidenhood, $£ 4$, as the law requires, and I pledge myself to give you in addition beard and the cing, and I will live with you according to the customs of the whole earth.' Then she gave assent te be his wife. He then declared that he to the give such and such a sum as an addition woman original dowry. The goods which the and such ought with her are estimated at such or dowry settlement We have sealed this tablet the whele matter is clear, settled, and deter:
minet" (Sellen, Cxor Ebraica, II. 10, Op. of which it is usual to keep nlwnys in the church " tom. iv, p. ifis). In the Christinn tabulue mustrimeniles, the end for which marriage was instituted was alan insertel: "num if tabulae indicaut ubi scribitur, 'Liberorum procrenadoruna causi' " kays St, Augustine (Serm. ix., Op, tom, v. p. 88 , ell. Afigne); and again, " leecitantur tubulae, et recituntur in ennspectu onmium attestantium, et recitatur, 'Liberorum procrenmiorum eanza'", (Serm. li., bid. 1. 345); see also his Enarr, in $/{ }^{3}$ s. Ixasi. ( ( $p$, tom, iv, p. 1043).
4. Hitnesses were required to be present, before whom, as we have seen, the marriage kettlements were to be read and handed over. They were to be frienis of both parties, naid their presence was required not only to prevect frand in the matter of the dowry, but also to give n puiblic character to the transaction, that there might be a proot before the worlid of the consent of both parties to the contract. One of then ncted as best man to the bridegroom (amicus interior, conscius secreti cubicularls, St. Aug. Sern. cexciii, (p, tom. v. p. 1332) and one as bridesmaid, and, in case of the mother's death, as temporary guarlian to the brife. It would appear probible from sp passige in St. Ambrose (de hepsu Virymis, c. v., Op. tom, ii. p. 310) that the requifiste numbier of witnesses was ten (Ct. Ruth iv. 2, where the number of witnesses called by Boaz is ten),
5. Some minor ceremonjes, which were less essentiat to the rite, have also been handed down. One of these was a ki:s, which might or might not be given, but which, il given, was consitered to bind the betrotheid more closely to each other, s, that, in case ot the man's death, hnlf of his betrothal gitts were delivered to his betrothed; Whereas it there had been no kiss, they were all returned to his relations (Cod. Theod. lib, iii. tit. 5 , leg. 5 ; Cod, Justin. lib. v. tit, 3, leg. 16).
6. Another ceremony of similar nature was that of juining hunds, which is mentioned together with that of the kiss by Tertullinn: "Corpore et spirite masculo mixta sunt per osculum et dexteras, per quae primum resignarunt pudorem ${ }^{\text {spinitûs }}$ " (de Viry. Veland. c. xi., Op. p. 179). 7. In the time of Tertullian, the veil was nssumed by the woman at the betrothal nad worn thencerorward, but the custom was not unirersai (Rebeccam quidum adhuc velant), and in later times, like the offering ef the ring, was transferred to the nuptials (Tertull. ihdid) transterred to the nuptials (Tertull. ind.).
7. siricius in the 4th century spleaks, in an epistle which (rightly or wrongly) is regarded as geanine, of a bencdiction of the priest at betrothal, of so solemn a nature as to make it saerilege in the betrothed woman to marry another man (Siric. ( Nic. Riespons, ubi supria).
The tirst thing that forces itself upon our notice on reading the above passuge is that in pope Nicholas' time, and for such previous times as the cerenonies described by him had existed, marriage was regarded ns a religlous rite; being (1) performed in a church, (2) necompunied by ollerrggs and oblations made to Giod oy the married persons through a priest, (i) followed hy the solemn bene liction of the chit the solemn bene liction of the church, together with (4) other ceremonies of an eceleshastical character: nud this was the aspect in which murriage was vlewed from the times of Tertullian, ns is proved by the following passage: "How shull 1 state the blessedness of a marriage which the church brings about, and the oblation confirms, nad the benediction, seals, angels attest, and the Fnther ratifies " (ad Uror, lib. ii. c. 8, p. 171). In these words Tertullian, as is N (inted out by Gothotred (Con. Theod. lib. ill, tit. 7, leg. 3, tom. i. p. 280), contrasts the marriage ceremonies of the Christi..n church, A.D. 200, with the ceremonles used by henthens on tho same occasion. Among heathens, marriages were brought nbout by persons cnlled conciliatores. In the case of Christians, tho place of the concilictores is taken by the church, that is, by the othicers of the church, nanely, the bishops, prlests, dencons, and widows (see the passage of Tertullian referred to just below), the heathens offering of arrhae is replaced by the oblation of prayers and eims offered through the priest; for the sealing of the marringe settlements is substituted the senl of the church's benediction; the testimony of angels stands in the place of the testimony of human witnesses ; and ratification by a henvenly Father takes the plane of the expressed consent of the expressed consent of parents. Tertullinn's rhetorical description does not of conrse imply that the old ceremonies were abolished, but it does imply that an eeclesinstical character was given to them, and that they were carried out under the control, and by the hands, of ministere of the church. Elsewhere Tertullian states that Christian marriages had to be nnonounced to the church, nnd were allowed, or disallowed, by bishops, priests, dencons, nad widows (de Pudicitia, e. v.; ; de Monogam. c. xi., Op. p. 531). One object of this regulation may have been to prevent ignorant members of the flock from irnnsgressing various laws of the state with which they might be unacquainted; but this was not its only purpose; the church, that is, the bishops, priests, deneone, and widowe, would thus become the conciliatores of a Christian's marriage, necording to the idea employed in the previously quoted passige. St. lgnatius, in like manner, sags that people who marry ought to be united with the cognizance and approval of the bishop: ad Polycurp. c. v.). St. Ambrose says that mar-

The partleular form of the Chriatian benedietion, which differs from the Jewish by being a blessing on the newly married pair Instead of a thanksgiving to Genl, was at tirst probsably left to the oflielnting minister, but it would soon have become stereotyper in the rituals of tho several churches. The following is a form on which It will be seen that the final benediction in the solemnisation of matrimony in the Eaglish church is framed:-" $O$ (iod, who by Thy mighty powor hast made all things of nothing, who, nfter other things set in orier, didnt apruint that out of man (created after Thine own image and similitude) woman should take her beginoing, teaching that it should bo never lawful to put asunder those wham Thou halst pleased should be createl out of one ; 0 God, who hast consecrated the state of matrimony to such an excellent mystery that in It 'lhou dilst typify the Sacranent of Chriat and the Chureh; U frod by whom woman is joined to man, chad so blessed a unlon was Instituted at the beginuing as oot to be lestroyed eveu by the julgment of the tleod; look merclfully 1 poon this Thy servant now to be joined in wedlock, who secks to be defeaded by Thy protection. May she avoid all ualawful deeds. May she strengthen her weakness by the help of discipline! May she be inodest, grave, bashful, and instructed io Gol by learaing! May she be fruitful in childbearing! May she be approved and innoceat, and may she attain to the rest of the blessed, and to the heavealy kingdom! And may she see her sons' sons to the third and fourth geaeration, und may she reach the rest of the blessed and the kingdom of heaven, through," ete. (Mnrtene, de Antiquis Eechesiae ritib:s I. ix. 3. The practice of veling is mentioned by Tertullian (de Feland. Virgin. c. xi.) and by St. Ambrose (Epiat. xix. 7, Op. tom. ii. p. 84t); the tormer of whom speaks of it as a praiseworthy heathen custom commonly used in the ceremony of betrothal, after which (ia Tertollina's diys) the desponsata wore the veil hubitually. The heatheo veil, called flammeum, was of a yellow colour. The colour adopted by Christians was purple and white, thongh the oame flamueum was still sometimes used (St. Ambr. de Virgin. c. xv.; de Cnst. Virg, c. xvii.). It is probable, as St. Ambrose has observed (de Abrah. 1. ix. 93), that the word nujpials is derived from the word obnubere, which means to veil. In the earliest tinnes the vell was part of the married or espoused woman's dress, akin in form and parpose to the Enstern yashmak, But after the first few centuries it ceased to be worn by them, and the veiling same to tue a aymbolical act, making part of the marriage ceremony, and symbolising the womatu's forhusing all others and kepplag her chorms for hep husiand alone, and alsu her tuling submissive to him. "Jjeo velantur ut nuverlat se semper virig mula sulnditan esse" ( Duranil, hiat. Dio, "yf. lib, i. c, ix. 6). In the West the worl ewlutio erthe to signify tha whole marriage ceremony, und it became customary to lay the vei! on both hrile and bridegroom at the tlme of the benalletion (Martene, do Ant. Hoct. 2, Ix.).

The sume custom pevalled among the Jews. The erowns were male of goll, silver, olive, myrtle, or tlowers; their une to the city of Jerusalem was forbidden duriag the lhman slige, ns belug too great a sign of joy for such sal times. This shews that they were regarded as a symbol of rejoleing by the Jews; and as such probably they were adoptel by the Chilstian Church, though they came to be lonked upon rather as rewards for victory over passion and tokens of virgin purity, in consequeace of which they were not given at second marriages. In the Greek chureh they came to play chuch they come to play a much more important part than in the latin. In the West as we leara from pope Nicholas's reply to the Bulgarians, they were no more than a festive ornament worn by the married pair on leaving the church. In the East the erowaing, which Was once only n part of a lally's wodling attire (zee St. Amntor's Lite, Acta SS. Mny, tong. I. 52), became so substantial a part of the auptials that the whole marriage was ealled the Crowning, as io the West it wascalled the Veiling. The crowns were placed on the heads of the bride nad bridegroom immediately after the benediction, appropriate prayers being aail at the same time. The following is an extract from a form given by Goar:-"After the amen (to the beaedetory prayer) the priest takes the crowas and first erowns the bridegroom brying 'The sorvant of the Lord is crowned, for the sake of the handmaid of the Lord, in the name of the Father, and of the Soa, and of the Holy Ghost.' The woman is crowned in the sanse manner. Then he juins the right hand of the woman with the right hand of the man, Then is suag, "With glosy and honour hast thou crowned them, thou hast placed crowns of precious stones upon their heads.' Then the deacon says, 'Let us pray,' nal the priest offers the following prayer: Crowe them with Thy grace, unite them in temperance and digaity, bless them with a good old uge and with unshaken faith. Grant them length of days; grant to them all things expedieat for them, tear of Thee and thought of Thee; give them the fruit of the womb, comfort them with the sight of soas and daughters; let then rejoice in Thee and respect the words of the Apostle, "Marriage is honourable and the hed undefiled." If, however, there were any who desired that a ruligious character should not be given to the ceremony, they were permitted to dispense with it ; and their marriage was regarded as valid provided ooly that they made a contract one with another without trand or compulsion, and declared it before an adequate number of witnesses, and did not otherwise transgress the imperial haws.
III. Divorce. Our Lord's rule laid down in respect to divorce is plain and simple. He disallows it on any other ground than that of fornication or adultery on the part of the woman.p This contiaued to be the rule of Christian cunduct down to the time of Constantine. There is a consensus amongst the doctors of the early church that no other cause is adequate for the dissolution of marriage. Thus, Clement of Alexandria (strom. lib. ii. c. xxiii., Op. p. 506), Tlertullian (adv. Mare., lib. iv. e. xxxiv., Op. p. 449), and somewhat later, St. Chrysostom (Hom. xvii. in Matt., ( $p$ p. tom. vii. p. 227). St. Basil (Epist. Canon II., can. xxi.), and St. Jerome (lipist. ad Amand., op. tom, iv. p. 162). In the cilse of the clergy divorce was made imperative on the discovery of the wife's adultery by the councils of Neocaesarea and Elvira (ennons viii. and $1 \times \mathrm{rr}$.): laymen were left to their own julgment in the matter; but a cadon of Theodore of Canterbury requires nnyone who keeps his wife uader such circumstances to do penance for two years on two days of the week and fast days, or to abstain from living with her as long ns her penance for ndultery lasts (Penitential, lib. i. cap, siv. § 4). Jut, ns was to be expected, lib, i. cal, siv. § 4). But, ns was to be expected, a difference of opinion gr' w up as to the force of the word fornication. The Allegorists, according to their manner, insisted no understanding the word sptritually as well as literally, and thus ${ }^{2311}$ ). It is not certain that it is of the marriage benediction that Clement is speaking, $\square$ That in Mait. v. 42, Hopveia is nsed in the sense of poiveia, or rather that the generic term is enployed when the specille word mitght bave been nesed, waa not $\mathrm{q}^{10-t h}$-nted in the eariy charch, hur is there any sufflitent culss fir questioning it, much as has been written upon H. (See Selden, Czor Ebraica, iii. 23, 27.)
they made it bear the meaning of idolatry, inf. delity, and covetousness, as well as caroal fornication. So Hermne Pastor ("Is qui simulacrum facit moechutur," lib. ii. mand. iv., apud Patres Apostol., ed. Coteler, tom. i. p. 89). This view was adopted by St. Augustine (de Serm. Dom. in Monte, cap. xvi., op. tom. iii. p. 1251 , ed. Myge), but in his Retractations he expressed some doubt as to its correctness: "Qu:tenus iotelligenda atque limitanda sit haec fornicatio, et utrum etiam propter hane liceat dimittere uxorem, latebrosissima tom, i. p. 66 ). tom. i. p. 66).
Such differences of opinion as existed between theologians arose from their interpreting the word fornication with greater or less latitude; but there whs a substantial ngreement amnag them that no crime, however heinous, conld hare the effect of dissolving the contract once formed, with the one exception of the wife's fornication. Not so the civil law. 9 Constnntine appears to have wished to make a compromise between the lax practice whieh had come down from heathen times and the strict rule which had hitherto been acknowledged by Christians, though not always acted upon. Accordingly he passed a law, A.D. 331, allowing divorce to a wife if her husband should be a murderer, a poisoner. or a robber of graves; but sperifically disallowing it on the ground of his being a drunkard or a gambler, or given to women (muliepcularius). By the same law dirore was allowed to the man it his wife were an adulteress, or a poisoner, or a procurer (Cod. Theod. lib, iii. tit. xvi. leg. i., tom. 1. p. 310). Honorius, A.D. 421, passed a law of a similar charneter with that of Constantine, which allowed other causes -" morum vitia et mediocres culpae"-as adequate besides the three named by the first Christian Emperor (Cod. Theod. lib. iii, tit. xvi. leg. 2, ibid. p. 313). Honorins's law did not remnin long in force; but it, or Constantine's, was the law of the empire during the time of some of the chisef church writers of the fourth and fifth centuries. It was abrogated, together with the law of Constantiac, A.D. 439, by Thendosius Junior, Who restored the laxity nllowed by the civil law betore the time of Constantine-"durum est legum veternu maderamen excedere." Ten years later, however, Theodosius found it necessary to draw the reiga tighter, and he published a law, A.D. 449 , eaumeratiog the causes which were now held to be adequate to justify a divorce. To the three crimes named by Constantine he addeel those of treasun, sacrilege, manstealing, and similar oftences (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. xvii. leg. 8, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. p. 457). And this was followed by a law of Valentinian III. forbidding dissolut tion of marringe by the mere consent of the purties concerned. Again reaction followed reaction. First, a law was passed by Anastasius, A.s. 497, making divorce by matual consent legal (ihid. leg. 9). Next, Justinian. A.d. 5:8, recalled the second law of Theodositus Junior (that of the year A.D. 449), ndlling, however, to the causes there specified impotency lasting two yaurs (ibil. leg. 10), or three Years (Novell. $x \times i i .6$ ), a desire for the monastie (Aife (Norell. exvii. 18), and a lengthy captivity (Auvell. xxii. 7). Justinian's nephew, Justin, restored the liberty of divorce by consent (Norell. Photing thus the law continued, as we learn from Photins (Nomocanon, tit. xiii. c. The laws of the Westeration made by Justin. came christinnised were similar in charaeter to those of the empire. The Visigoths incerted into their onde of laws, a.D. 460, the original rule of Christianity, such as it was betore it was altered by Coastantine (Leg. Theodoric, king of the Ostrons in Italy, reTheodoric, king of the Ostrogoths in Italy, re500 , the law of Constantine, allowing three causes of divorce, and three only, to the husband and to the wife. The Burgundians at the same date allowed divorce to the man for the causes specified by Constantine, but not to the woman. Anong the Franks and the Alemanni divorce by mutual consent was permitted in the 7th century. At the Carlovingian era the law was generally made stricter, though Charles the Great himself divorced his wite Bertha and married Hildegard, holding himself to be in such matters above the laws. At the beginning of the 10 th century Howel the Good, with three bishops, weat to Rome " to consult the wise in what manner to joprove the laws of Wales," and after the laws were drawn up " went a second time to $R$, ne and obtained the judgment of the wise there, and ascertained those laws to be in accordance with the law of God and the law of countries and cities in the receipt of faith and baptism." Nevertheless the laws on divorce are remarkably lax. A husband and wife may separate before the end of seven years from their marringe-day on the hasband's paying her dower to the woman; after seven years, on sharing their goons between them, the husband taking twothirds of the children; but, "if' n man leserts jected wife is to remain in her house until the end of the ninth day; and then if she be suffered to depart entirely from her husband, every thing belonging to her is to go in the first plasee out of the house, and then she is to go that, on of the house atter all her property : after that, on bringing the other into the house, he wife, becanse no mun, (certificate) to the first wife, becanse no man, by law, is to hive two

 Cireck marriage was broken ofl. The Romau marriage was a more serious thing than that of any of the Greeks exceppt the spartans. To irreak ofl a marriage effected by confarreatio there was a form calied diffarreatio, nod a marriage by cocmptio whs disssilved by a form called renuncipetio. For a length of timo diverces were not heard of among the Romans; but under the empire they became common. Sometimes the nuptial triblets were broken and the Enjpousals were broken ett by the formula:-"Conditione tua non otar." And the Lex. Inlia de adulteriis required the preThe of of seven witnesses to make a divorce valid. The early Christians followed for the most purt the Roman prnetice; but as the marriage was contrated in the thee of the church, so also the divorce might not be etlected without the the divorce might not be etlected without the Co ured's cognisame. We have already seen that

Bemarridefe after ditorce.-The distinction between separntion a menan et thore and divoree ${ }^{2}$ ciment (the last of which nlone qualities for remarriage) was not formulated in the early church: and this is perbaps one reason why the imperial lows passed so readily, as by the swing of a pendulum, from severity to laxity, and from lasity to severity. There are fewer ennons of conncils bearing upon the question of remarriage after disorce than might have been expected In the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. vi. e. 17), and in the so-called fourth clergy are foribidden to be 398 (can. lxix.), the chergy are forindden to be married to a divorced wife, and peranits the wife's remarringe, on her repentanes, utter five years (lib, li. enp, xii. §5). Elsewhere he orlers that a man whodivorces his wito nad marres ugain shall do seven years' severe pemane or fitteen years' light penance (lih, i. emp. xiv. : K $^{\prime}$ ). It' we are to reconelle thowe two rolinge, we must suppuese that in the latter easg is memant a man who has divoreed his wite for some less oflenee than fornication. If' a wite deaves hor husband, and he therenpon remarries, he is tu do one yevr's penaace; if she returns to the huslatud whum she had deft, having lived innocently meantime, she is also to do one year's penance; if she thes not retara, she is to do three years' penamee (ithid. § III). If' a wlle hunglitily refoses to he reconciled with her husbual, after tive years he may marry aghio with the bishop,'s leare (lib. ii. eap, xi. § 19 ).

The civil law permittel remarriage. A law of Honorins manets that if a woman put nway her hosband for grave reasons, whe uight inarry after liva years; and that $n$ man in like ease might mary as soun "s he thought proper; it the reasons for the divoree were of a less grave character, the man must wait for two yenrs before taking amother wife; if he had no reasens he might not marry again, hut the injured woman might remarry after the lape of a year (Coit. Thend lith. iii, it. xvi. leg. .2). See alsu the Conlex Jnstinuenns, lih, v. tit. xvii. Inger. 9, 9. The laws of Ethelbert, established in th :onn Augastiue for England, A.b. 597, euatt - Be.t Angusticity that an alulterer is "to with his own money" for the injuresd hustand, "aad lring her to him" (Joom $x \times x i$. Haddua, and Stuhbs, Conncils of Great Britain, iii. p. 45).
The general enaclusion that we arrive at from a review of the ducuments and nuthorities of the early church is that while the remarringe of the guilty purty was steraly and naeompromisingly condemned, there was no consensus oa the ques$t_{1}$ n of the lawfulness or undawfulness of the remarriage of the immoent party After a time ao ever-widening divergence exhibited itself on this point, as on uthers, in the practice and teachiag of the easturn and western divisions of the chureh. Kastern thealugy at length framed for itself rules sluntly expressed in the finllowiag cemons, foand in the synocical deelisions of Alexius, who was purtiarch of Constantinople in the beginning of the llth cealury:-
"1. No elergyman is to be condemned for giving the benedirtion at the marriage of a divoreed woman, whea the man's conduct was the calse of the divores.
"2. Women divorcel by men whose conduct has been the eanse of the divoree are not to be blamed if they choume to marry agnid, nor are the priests to bre blamed who give them the benediction. So, tho, with regard to men.
"3. Whoever marries a woman divoreed for adultery is mn adulterer, whether he hus himself been married lethre or not, and he must undergo the adult erer's peanuce.
"4. Any priest whog gives the benedletion at the second nurriage of purties divorced by mutual conseut (which is a thing firbidden by the laws) shall be deprived of his othre" (see belden, Cxor Ebruiat, iii. 32, ( $\%$, tom. iv. 1. 855).
The tenching emburied in these ennons and the practice founded upon It has enatinued to be the tenching and the practice of the Oriental fhurch to the prosent day. In the East, thereart the one donbtiol grestion ur the lugality of the romuriage of the innewent party after diroree has been renolved in the nulirmative sunw; in the latin church it has beem determined in the negatlve, except when a prand dispunsatlon has intervened, which, accurding to mondern Ruman theology makes nll thingy pressille ant allowable. In England the law ui the land permits the remarriage of both jarties when a diveree has been judicially derlared; but having regart to the conserimenes of the elergy of the chureh, in whese eyes the remarriage of the guilty party would be presumably a wrong act, it does not reppuire that the ceremony of the second nuptials stumild be perfmmed by them.

Marriage (in art). The form of treatment, or the amount of batice. which the Christian rite of marriage reesived from the artists of the primitive chareh varied with the view taken of tl: solemn union of man and woman by her 0 thorities. The ascetic prineiple, which had aimost eatirely prevailed in the Eastera world, began to influenco Italy and Europe almost as powerfully atter the sack of Rome by Alaric. It need not be connected in our minds with misaathropy, the desire for power, or any equivocal motive; it was related more closely to terror at the wickedness, distress, and degradation of the present world, with the desire of esape from some of its dangers, and especially, as a consequence of these sutterings, with the hope of the speedy coming of Cirist to judgment, and th: end of the world. That this had a direct effect on art is pooved by the number of mosaic pictures, in particular whicil direct the thoughts of the worshipper to the scenery of the Apocalypse, the symbolic or trance-seen manifestations of the coning of the Son of Man; or image forth His glory in Hearea, contrasted in the same pieture with His presence as the Lamb of Sacrifice among men on this side of Jordan, and in the wilderness of the world. It might be expected accordingly that such works of art as either ripresent or commemorate the nıarriage of Christian persons would chlefly or entirely be confined to the first four or five centuries, at least in Italy. The monumentis or relies coanected with marriage seem to be of two kinils; elther capr, glasses, sigacts, or other memorials of the union of the parties, or sepulenral ettigies commemorative of the marringe bond as perfected and coapleted. hy their death in wellock. The earfiest of these latter which we possess is the tomb of Probus ond Proba, enrly in the latter half of the 4 th century. The fragments of cujs and phatters have principally been tound in catacombs or tombs of early date; and as it seemy agreed that the catncomiss were never used for fresh burials after tho tuking of lome by Alaric, and with tess frequency for some time beloro that event, these rulies enanot be later tham the that event, these relies enanot be later than the 4th century. [See Glass, Cumisilas, wote ', p. 734.] That few or none of them are carlier or later than the 4th century (ualess certain Greek forms be excepted) seems highly probable. Thking these memorial glasses first, there ure two given by Martigny (Dict. p. 288) trom Garrucei's l'etri, \&c. troratis ei cimiteri dei primitivi Cristiani, tav. xxvi. 11, 12, (see woodeut. No. 1), which seen to indicate the ritual of Christinn marringo in the earliest times, The parties stand side by side with joined hands; or rather the husband takes the right hand of the wife in his, as if in the act of plightiag troth. Martigny refers to Tobit vii. 13 on this point, bat that passuge describes the netion of a father in giving his daughter away to ber husband. There giving his daughter away to ber husband. There is exact resemblance between the netion of the two figures, and that of Ilercules takiag the hand of Minerva, on a heathen glass given in Buonarotti, Vetri, tav. xxvii.;'Garracci, tav. xxxv. ${ }^{\text {t }}$ Above the figures is the monogram of our Lord to itdicate wedlock in Him. The crown of marriage sometimes tnkes the place of the monogram, as in fig. I1, pl. xxvi. (see Tertullian, de Coronu, xiii. "coronaat nuptine spoasos;" and in other cuses the symbolism is completed by a figare of Christ plaeing the crown on their heads (woodcut, No, 2). Inseriptions are frequent on these glasses, arranged round the figures (see bid.) giving their names, with "Vivatis in Deo," or some other words of blessing.

A rolled piper or volume is sometines placed near the bride, and is thought to refer to the dower. See Garrucel, fnv. xxvii. I; Tertullinn, ad Uror, ii. 3, "tabult ad Uxor. ii. 3, "tabutae nuptiales." The bride stands on her hasband's right invariably, She is not valed, and is richly dressed and ormais not veiled, and is richly dressed and ormamented, perhaps in remembrance of l's. xlv. 10 , 14,15 . As to the veil, see Mabusage, p, 110 s , and Venc. He forther mentions an interesting relic figured in P. Mozzoni's Tavole Cronologiche della storia della Chiest, Veniee, 185tj-is3, suec. iv. p. 47. It is a smad! chest belonging to a

MARRACE

Is snill to have been st yuck at the marriage of Marianus and Pulcheria. They are repregented with nimbi, the tigure of the Lord above with the cruciform nimbus, and the legend Felicitikr nubtis sarrounds the device.
II. As memorials of the family, a number of gilded glass vessels and devices are in sxistence, which appear to represent deceased heads of fimilies; oftea with their children (Buonarotti, tav. $x x i i i$. xxvi. \&e. ; Garrucci, $x \times x$. .) or crowned by the Lord (xxix, 1). These were probably used at aghpae, and indicate a convexion or relation between the Christias and the ethnic funeral feast. b.ngraved stunes and rings are common; oue from 1', Lasi (Sceerae Martyris Épithph. p. 64. 1) Iepresents two fishes embracing an ancher, which may or may not symbolise a Christinn pair.
But our chief examples are found on aareophagi. That of Probus and I'roba has been mentioned, avd will be found in Bottari, tav. xvi. (Aringhi, vol. 1. p. 483). It represents the wedded pair with an aspect of deep distress, at in the act of parting.
The aarcophagus of Valerin Latobia (p. 291) has two figures learing the same aspect; nt least, if Bosio's draughtimen are to be trusted, Valeriu is taking her husband's hand by the wrist (reversing the ordinary action) as if bidding hian farewell. They aje sepmatated by an olject, which may be taken for three large rolla of papeer or parchment bound together, and the husband carries the usual volumen also. Aringhi thinks the represent the seriptures. Nartigay thinks the smaller roll is the consular mappa. Gnbly symbolic of affection, and the turtle arobnbly symbolic of affection, and the turtle-doves or other birds in the sprandrels of the small arehes on that of Probus and rroba may have the same meaning. See St. Ambrose (de Abrit ham, ii. c. 8,53 ), with reference to lake ii .22 ${ }^{\text {sqy. "duoa pullos columbarum quod in eolumba }}$ apiritulis gratia sit, in turture incorruptace generatioais, natura, vel immuculata corporis castimunia."
Martigny mentions a marble sarcophngus, carved apparently on the same principle of composition as the last-mentioned, of dividing the front by pillars into arched recesses, where the spaces are filled by figures of the different ages of a soldier, and of his courtship and marriage. It was discovered at Arles in 1844 . (See $1 . u l$. letin de 1 'rnstitut d. Corresp. Archeol. an 1844, p. 12 eqq.) It is in good classical style, and might he taken for a heathon monument, if the miracle of the lonves were not scalptured on the sides. This may be a Christian addition made to an antique sarcophagus, and doves and fruits are also tound on the ornamental carvings.

MAR'TYR. The Creeck word $\mu$ djpeus signifies oue who has such immediate kuowledge of past events as is derived trom netnal participation in them, und does not keep this knowledge to himself, but makes depasition of it freely as a freeman, nal makes it his papropia or evidence, the knowledge being such as to constitute a $\mu$ aprúptov, or testimony, as affecting a question not only of facts but of merits.
I. I. The history of the Christian modificatiou of the torm is as fullows: (a) The office of public, oral, oenlar testimony was insuthiciently discharged till the testimony was recorded, as the sentence against Christ had been pussed, in a ceurt of law. The word is used sprecinlly for such oflicial testimony, of Stephen (Acts xxii. 20 ), of Piul at Ronie (Acts xxiii. 11, 1 Tim. ii. 6), of Jimes (Hages, ap. Eus, ii. 23 ), of Peter nad l'anl (c'lem. Rom. 5), of John (J'olyerates ap. Kius, M. E.v. 24).
(h) 'The idea of martyrdom at tirst was not of maltratment, but of a perilous dignity. The witnesses won their title of honour by courage without sutlering. The title wis co-ordinate with bishop and teacher (Polyer, ap. Eus, H. E. v. 24), and prophet (Eus. II, E. v. xviii. 7). The typical instances are the grandsons of Jule, who were aecused before IDomitian and relensed unseathed, and took the lead ever after in the churches as martyrs (Hegesipp. ap. Eus. If. E. iii. 20, 32).
(c) The martyrs would have been mere confessors, not witnesses, but that they "endured as secing Him who is invisible." Thus they not only "confessed," but " witnessed the gooil cenfession." The contessors were "the companlons of the martyrs" (Bullettini, 1861, p. a:1). "Canfiosion," vays Clement of Alexanhtria, " is possible for all; the grace of tentifing by Nuereh is only given to amme" (Strom. Is, 0), Stealtastness unher turture was the testiminy Io which the advoeates of Chrinthanity 1 ! 1 walded. It was neelfinl that the honours and nuthority of martyrdom should not be won ton eavily. llenee, not merely peril, but artual suthering

(d) Bloodsheililing (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 4), insteal of speech, becane the mone of the testimony. "The eustom of the brotherhomp." says Origen (in doann, li, 88 , t. iv. $1 / 88$, ef. Cypr. Epp, x. 2, xxviil. l, $x x x \operatorname{li}$. 2 ), "ealla (hose alone properly martyrs who have testitied to the inystery of coillness by the shed own blood." This publle testimony, expreamed not in words, but in blood, was far more than testimony; it was martyriom.
(e) Nany Chrlstian Vorginias and Lacrethas thmmitted suichle to eseape the brutal Justs of their persecutors. They are extolled as manty is by Eusebius and Chrysostom (Eus. II. E., viii, 13, 14; Chrys. 7. 1, Klom. 40). Augustine promunces the practlce anlawful, unluse instiguted by a speetill revelation (De Civitute Ici, I. xvi.-xxy, 30-39).
(f) Martyis were made by popular rints and lynch law, without any judicial procoedings (Eus. II. E. vi, 41).
(!) It was once a complaint "Martyrio meo privor, dum morte praevenior" (Cypride Murtirlitate, p. 167, ed. (Oxon.), and this applied even to deaths in prison before the case was heard. There seem to have been cases of suluide in gaol to avoil torture ('lertullian, de Jejunio, e. I2). But the names of those who died in prison were recorded in A.D. 177 (Eiss, $/ I$, E: v. 4), allif in Airica, in A.D. 202 (Acta Purpetuae, c. 14 ), and they aro expressly reckoned ns murtyrs by Cyprian (Ej. 12 (:37)).
(h) Flight from perscention, though reprobated by lertullian (de Fufâ), was enjoinend by Christ (Matt. x. 23), and the Apostolic Constitutions (v. 3, cf. vili, 45) recommend the fugitives as deselving the same cure as the martyrs in giol. 'Those who perlshal in the harilshipis of their Ilight were recognised by Cyprian as Chrtyrs, whose martyridonn was witnessed by Chrint (Bp. Iviii. (lvi.), e. 4).
(i) The death of the Inwocents murdered by Herod was regariled as an aetive martyrdom, "testimonium Christi sangulne litavere" ('iurt. in l'ukntin. e. 2), "mart yria fecerunt" (Cypr. E/". viji. 6). The reeognition of it as sueh was closely connected with the sinetion of intiant baptism (Cyju, E;p, lxiv. (lix.)).
(f) Athanasius recognises as martyrs those who fell at the hands of the Arians. (Ath. tud Hon. p. 277.)
(l) In A.D. 368 some Christians, pat to death for cailing an ollicer of Valentinian's to justice, were celebrated as martyrs. The testimony of Ammianus Marcellinus (xxyli. 7) to this fact is most explicit and circumstantial, though ibe surdly derided by Gibbon. So Aurustine (in surdly derided by Gibbon. So Augustine (in l'salm. 140, c. 26) calls John Baptist a martyr to truth and justice.

(in) Augnatine says one becomes a martyr on $n$ sick bed hy rofusing to be eured by naugic (Sirm, :8\%, e. 28; ef. Serm. II8).
(n) Xugustine sayn agali, Yon will go hence a martyr if son have overcome all the tempatations of the iluvil (Surm. 4, e. 4).
(o) Reallowes for martyrilom is regarded as Itseli martyrilom (Chrys. li. 601, ed, Migne).
ii. Wo have traced the change of the mevalng of the word from witness to martyr. As a title of honour among tho Chrlatians, the term was alopited into Latin along with Christianity. In the limpuages of Orlental Christendum it In represented hy wome mative equivalent that has undergoni a like change of meaning. The testimony of Innosence and endurance was transfigured into the "prace, and grace, and glory" of marty ritom. What this meant aed was, may be seen in the H. E: V the martyrs of Vlemse and Jyoas (Enss. H. E. V. i.), and of Perpetua. Martyrdum could nut be perfict while the martyr stilf lived in the fleh. This was limly apprebended by dgantins, and was clearly grasped by the lyonnose confewors. (Fus. II, E, V. Ii.) To their brethron they seemed martyrs many times over; they thrinselves declined the title. "They are already martyrs whom Christ the Veritable Martyr has taken to llimself: we are confeswors mean and lowly." The line was not immediately and naiversally drawn where they drew it. They themselyres, though declining the title, exereised the prorogatives of martyrs, In Cyprian's time the lapsed went round to the martyrs everywhere, and corrupted the eanfessurs too (Cypr. Epp. 20), and theretore Cyprian wrote to the martyrs and confessors (bijp. 10, 15). A martyr as distlnct from a confessor was one who had shed his bleod, and could grant absolution, But In Rome the title was by that time limited to the dead. (Cypr. Epp. 28, 37.) Cyprian usually conforms to Ruman usage (cf. Epp. 22, 27, 66), though at the close of his daye he wrote to the martyrs in the mines (ED, 76). "What martyr," asks Tertullian, "is a denizen of the world, a suppliant for a shilling, at the mercy of the isurer or the physician ?" (Tert. de Pulic. c. 22.)
The first great interruption of the peace of the church la the 3rd century seems to have fixed the title to the departed, yamely, Maximin's persecution in Rome, those of Decius and Valerian in Africa. Valerian in Africa.
liy the beginning of the 4 th century the limitation of the term martyr to the defunct seems to have been quite extablished, though it is just possible to doabt whether in writiog "A Shule choir of martyrs greets you at once," St. lnuian (a.d, 312) means to convey a salutation from his fellow prisoners, or the tidings of an auto da fé. Ile adds that Anthimus has been consummated in the course of martyrdom (Routh, Nelliyuiac, iv. p. 5). Death, the consummation of martyrdom, was already regariled as the consnmmation of the martyr. After the triumph of the church under Conatantine, " living martyr" became an oxymoron. Yet Gregory Nazianzen in the oration (no. $x x$ ) in which he sn uses the jhrase, speaks of Basil being gathered as "n martyr to the martyrs," though it was only his whole life that was his martyriom.
Befure the close of the 4 th century the Pagan

Jath historinn Ammianus Mareellinus ( $x \times 1 \mathrm{il}, 17$ ) says: "Thuse whin when subjected to compulaiot to tanke then develate froms religion have endused torthre and perservered to a glorions death with fath maroven, buw are called martyrs." Bham where he explains the term to signify "divinitatl necrpotos" (Amm. Nare xxvii, 7).

(J) Hereties were excluled. Martyrs were at first of any suct that sulliered fur the name of Christ. The early guostics declined mary yrionn ( $R$ velition II. 14, 1.5 ; 'lertullian, Sumpince, i. ; Ejuphanius, Mist. Hier. xxiv. 4; Clom. Atrom. Iv. 4), suying that the marturs died lior Simon of Cyrene. But the Marcionites (Eus. $1 / 1 / \cdot t$. I'al. 10) and the Montanists courted it. Apmllianris of Hierupolis telln that in his flome Catholic martyrs refiased communion with Montmints to the last (Eus. II. I: v. 16). Compare Const.
Apost, v. 9.
(2) Schismatles were exelited. Cyprian (de Unitate, e. 14) kitys, He eannot be a martyr who is nat in the ehurch. So the Roman confexsors (Cypr. Ap. 36). Augustlae snys, Ontaile tho chureh you will be puntshed eviristingly though you have been hurnt alive for the name of Christ (Ep. 173 (204), c. 3 ).
(3) Self-sought martyrdom was nut allowed as such. Such a would-be martyr lapsed at the time of Polytarj's mart yrdom (.1fart. I'otyc. c. 4) Clemens Alexanilrinus speaks of self-surrember Cos heretical, and founded on disbrliel in the wheator (Strom. iv. 4). There were instituces in which it was jastified (Tertallian, ud $S_{\mathrm{c}}$ pmatam, 5; Acta Therdoti, Ruinart), and some nuch martyrs, e.g. Fiuplius nod Eulabia, were most celebrated. Ensebius naproved the proctice (Mfart. Pul. 3; II. E. vii. 12). But Meusurius of Carthage (Aug. Brevicul, coll tt. diei III. xiil, iv. 32) feter of Alexandria (Cmon ix. ; Routh, v. 32) furbude it.
(4) Icodoclasm (without imperial fiat) was disapproved by the teachers of the ehurch. The 60th canon of llliberis states, If any lireak idols and be slain on the apet, as it is not written in the gospel, nor found to have been done under the apostles, he is not to be received into the numher of the martyrs. The 41 st canon even allows the faithful to have idols in their houses if they fear that their slaves would ofler violence in cinse of their removal.
(5) Individual seruples were rofused recognition. Resistance to the obligations of military service, (which was the ground of the martyrdom of Maximilian in Manrita: a in A.D. 2915: see his Acts in Ruinart, ) is mude a bir to communion by the third canon of the 1 st eonncil of Aries.
(6) "Martyrem non facit poena sed cansa." The coneeption that suffering is martyrdom is Implied in the practice of the Donatists of offering themselves to armed wayfarers, and demanding with terrible threats the streke of martyrdom (Aug. Ep. 185 (50); T. ii. coll. 7, 8). But this whe disupproved by ethers of their number (Aug. Ep. 204 (61); T. ii. col. 940).
ir. Those who were arrested and not yet heard in ceurt were called martyrs designate (Tertullian ad Murtyres). Those of whose firmness their brethren were aet quite confident are named by Tertullinn uncortain martyrs (l'ert. de Jejunio, c. 12).

The Jews, indicel, had dealings with the GenHeace, while the and sept clear of idelatry. Heace, while the only intolerance shown to other religions was on occasional attempt to keep the worship of Inis outside the walls of Rome (Dio, Jir. 6, Val. Max. I. iii.), Judalsm was detested, and all the charges rehutted by Tertullian from the Chrintians, seeret enormities (Tert. Apol. 7-9), impions athelsm (ib. 10-28), disaffection to the empire (ib, 29-35), enmity to mankind (ib. $36-41$ ), Inziness ( $i 1$, $42-46$ ), prienterait (ib. 46-49), are brought also as calumnies against the Jewa ('ine. Hist. V. 4, 5 ; Juv, Sut. xiv. 96 ft.). Besides disbelief in the gods led easily to sacrilege (Aets xix. 37; hom. ii. 32), a charge dot brought against the Christinas. (Tert. Apol. 41.) Yet the Jews were tolerated, were protected in the observance of their code, exempted from civil action on the Sabbath, excused from adoring the image of the emperor, nad even permitted to make proselytes. Enactments in their favour are collected by Josephus (Ant.
Jul. xvi, vi.). Jul. xvi, vi.).

Stringent as were the Roman laws against treason, a erime into which words as well as acts might be interpreted-especially any disrespeet to the emperor's images-and whieh rendered all ranks alike liable to torture (Paul. Sent. v. xxix. ; Suetun. Oetav. 27 ; Amm. Marcell. xxix. 12 ; Arnub. 1v. 24 ; Digest. Xbviur. iv.), the only acts of the Christians which could be construed as treasenable were such as were freely permitted to the Jews. The example of Joseph might encourage either Christian or Jew to sweir by the life of Caesar: (Tert. Apol. 32.) They could pleal that to call him a god before his death would be ill-omened (ib. 34). Again, meetings for worship might be construed as treasonable (see Digest, XLVii, xxii. 2, Xlvini. iv. 1), and were at any rate strictly illegal, even in fulfilment of a vow, and even for veterans, unless express imperini or senatorial sanction for them were producible (Sneton, Julite, 42 ; Octav. 32 ; Digest, III. iv. ; xLvin. xi. $3, x \times i i$. ), and the old laws agninst even private worship of g.ns unrecognisged by the state
(Cic. de Leg. ii. 8) were dot ifuite extinet (Tac. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 8) were not yuite extinet (Tac.

Any departure from the ordinary reverenee for the gods might ensily be lioked with an attempt to turn the gods into slaves. Two main branches of supernatural art, astrology and exorcism, were largely in Jewish hands, and Moses Was reputed to have been a mighty wizard.

Any new superstition was looked upen ns a schoel of magic - "Magi extis quia novum nescion quod genus superstitionisinducitis" (Acta Achatii, § 7, Rus..rt). Otherwise works of beneticence would rather lead the rabble to regard the wonder-worker as a god than as a wizard.
Busy slander might produe Busy slander might produce a revolution of feeling, but to ail superdatural pretensions, magisterial scepticism had a ready answer, the

(2) Special. Thus far we have reviewed the first part only of the laws against the Christians, namely the previously existing legal principles that could be turned against them by " mijust disputations of the juris-consults." These charges of impiety, foreign superstitions, treason, unJawful assemblage, magic, appear to M. Le Blant sufficient to explain all the persecutions, But Lactantius (Instit. Iiv. v. 11) tells us that Ulpian Lactantius (Instit. Viv. v. 11) tells us that Ulpian also collected in the first book of his last work,

It was indeed necessary in order to bring the principles which are specitied above into play against the Christians, that there should be nuthoritative definitions, distinguishing Chriso tianity from the lawful religion of Judaism, and

(a) If we inquire when Christianity was first made criminai, tha answer of antligulty is unanimous. In A.D. 64, his mistrens, Poppaea, being a Jewish proselyte (Jos. Ant. Jul. $x \times$ vill. 11; "f. Tac. Ann. xlii. 45, xv. 6), Nero haid matle liume a very Sodom, when a fiery doom fell. 'The thames sparad the Jewlsh quarter aeross the Tiber, so, as culprite were wanted in order to runove the suspicion from Nero himself order to remove the suaspicion from Nero himself, the contiagration was charged on members of the new sect, whe confessed and betrayed the names of suthers. Then a decree of the emperor, probabiy alwo of the obsequious and not reluctunt genate, male the prufession of Christianity a crime, supposed to imply enmity to the human race, and sentenced to be visited with death, by beast, crosses, thmes, or novel horrors invented on purpose." Their deaths were turned to sport, and Nero gave his own gardeas for the ahow, (Tac. Ann. xv. 44; Suipieius, /fist. 31. 41; Tert. Apol.5). We have no hint of any opportunity The pardon on recantation, for these once arrested. The persecution was estended to the provinces (ef. 1 l'et. iv. 12-19), and even a oivis Romimus ingenuus like l'aul was behended (Tertullian, Scorpiude, 15).
The Neronian persecution has oniy left us two certain names of martyrs, Peter and Paul, of ench of whom their disciple, Clement, says emphatlvietims murdered hy Nero he only says that they auffered unhallowed outroges (c, 6). "Guilty as the Christians were," says Tacitus (l. c.), "pity for them arose." Yet on Nero's death, when al! his other constitutions were cancelled, we are told that this decree ngainst the Christians adone remained (" permansit erasis omnibus hee soiun institutum Neronianum," Tertull. ad Jutiones, i. 7). So we ad Nutiones, i. 7). So we lenrn from Dio that Vespasian in A.D. 70, after Jerusalem was taken, wrote to Rome, "wiping out the disgrace of those who hal been condemned for what were cailed implieties by Nero and those whe had ruled after him, alike of the living and of the dead, and putting an end to accusationa on such charges "

[^13](Die Cassins, Ixvi, 9). The senatuseconsuitum againat the Chystinns remained a!pmently unrepenied, only suspended by thlo imperial deso patch (ef, kus, II. E. v. 21).
(b) In the reign of Domitian, if we may trast the Colbertime Acty of Ignatiun (c, 1), there were many persecutions, The gramisuns of Jude, sent as prisoners to bomitian by invoeatus, as chiefs of the house of David, were dismisse $i$ contemptuonsiy as harmless prasants, and Dumitian atoppeit this jersecution (Hegesipp. in Eirs. $H$. $E$.
ili. 20, 32).
In A.D. 95, in the exaction of tribute from the Jews, profession of faith was made imprerative for every one, and the Christians were acensed of atheism. Some were put to dunth, fithers were atript of their property. Among the chief aufferers were Clemens and Immitilia, culusian to the emperor, and pareats of his heirs. Clemens, though consul of the year, was beheaded: llomitilla was only banished to the isle Pandatarin. Glabrio, who hai been consul with Trajan in A.D. 91, and had been compelied, to fight with a lion in the very year of his connolate, was now put to death, on the same charges as the rest, and also on the ground of his eany victory over the lion. Compare Suetoalus Domitim, e. 12: "deferebanatur qui vel improfessi judaice viverent," Dio Cnssilus, Ixvil. It, Bruttius in Elus. If. E. iii. 18, and Hieronym. Ep. 96 [27] and Eus. Chron. Olymp. 218. Donnitilla has girea her name to a Roman cennetery, where De Rossi has found lascriptions identitying the site as her property, and a shrine alorned with first century Christian paintings, nad espreciaily with a vine branch ( $\kappa \lambda \hat{\eta} \mu \mathrm{a}$ ) in ailusiou to the name of Clemens. (Bullettini, 1865, pp, 33 f ., toleration A.D. 96 Nerva proclaimed general toleration (Die Cassius, fxviii. 1), and closed the second oecumenical persecution, and the last till the daya of Decius (Melito ap. Eus. H. E. iv. 26 ; Tert. Apol. e. 5 ; Lactant. de Mortious, c. 3).
(c) Trajnn is universaily recoguised as a persecutor. The chronology of his reign is snmewhat hard to determine. According to the Culbertine Acts of Igantios, the triumph over the Datinas was followed by a persecution of the Christians, Christianity being regarded by the soldierly Trajan as insubordination. Trnjan's first triumph over the Dacians was in A.D. 102 . It seems to have been somewhat later in his reign that Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, suttered (Hegesippus, ap. Eus. H. E. Li. 32, ef. Zihn, Patres Apostolici, ii. 307).

In A.D. 112, according to Mommsen, Trajan wrote his famous rescript to Pliny (Plin. Ep. ء. 97, 98), making Christianity still a capital crime, but forbidding search for the offedlers, or anonymous accusations, and decreeing pardon for any who recanted. Under this law it was possible fur bold Christians to present nyolegies for the faith without being themselves arraigned. The apolegies of Aristides and Quadratus presented to Hadrisa in A.D. 125 (uf. Clintos ad amen.) were immediately followed by the rescript of that emperor to Fundanus, insisting that defiaite illegal acts must be alleged against the Christians by responsible accusers (Eus. H. E. iv. 9; Melito ap. Eus. iv. 26; Justin, Apol. I. ad fin.; Nube, pp. 264, 275).
Nothing eertain is known about the perseeution of the Christiaus by Hadrian. The martyr acts assignerl to his relgn do not Inapire confilence. The first historian who reckons him as a persee cutor is Suljeleins Severux, and he connecta hia furmerution with the foundat lon of Aelia C'apltolina on the wlte of Jerumalem. This seems jurobalite emough, fur wa munt remember that till then the Jlebrew church survived, that the funmiation of Aelia was an insolent rearing of the abomination of desolation on the sicerel sitea, that $s$ the wame time circumalsion was forimiliten, and inat thase ovents synchronzel with the deitiration of the vile Antinous (Cllnton. A.t. 13(1-13:). Barcoehbis, tha leader of tha Jewlinh revolf, practiset ail manner of crueltes upon the t'luristlans (Justln. Ajol. I. B1), und the mother church of Jerusalem ceavel to le, and was sneceeded by a Gentile eongregation at Aelia (Fias. /I, E: iv. 6). The only martyr of thls reign of whom we hare certain knowledge, Is the hishup of Rame, Telesphorun, whose executon may be assigned to A.D. 136 or $1: 37$.

There is some uncertainty as to the jdentley and date of Arrius Antoninus, an wrgent persecutor in Asla, who, when all the Chrintinns of the town presentel themselves before him in a bind, ordered some to he led ofl' to exceutlon, and saill to the rest, "Wretehes, if you want to die, thire are praclpices, and you have halters." (Trirtull, ad Kitp. c. 5.)

The chicf danger of the Chrlstians, however, was from popular wutcries, and the most prominent mombers of the chureh bore the brunt of the assault, and guenched the fury of their alversaries by their death (ef. Origen in Joann. vi. iti ; t. iv. j. 1333). A notable Instance is l'olycarp, bishop of simyina, who was burnt on Saturday the 9ird of February, a.b. 155 (Wullington, l'ie du Rhéteur Aristide, Mém. de l'Alad. des Cascriptions, 1867 , t. $x \times v i$. pp. 203 fi., 23:2 ti.). The sutherings of tha martyrs were the ocrasion and the staple of the apologies. Thus the apolngy of Justin complained of the mart yrdom of I'tolemy by Urblelus, i.e. between A.D. 156 and 160 . This seems to have elicited the extant rescript of Plus (cos, iv, trib. pot. Pp. xxi. i.e. A.D. 158 -given as of Nareus in A.D. 161, by Einschius, ${ }^{\text {b }}$ II. E. iv. 13 ), addressed to the council of Asia, demanding jroof, not mercly of Christianity but of treason, and in drfault of sueh proof, threatening the aceuser with condign pumshment. The gennineness of this reseript has been doubted, beeause of its frank recognition of the piety of the Christians, anil of their superiority to the syeophants who accused thum. This seems to us quite in keeping with the character of Jius.
( $d$ ) Marcus, the noblest of the emperors, appears as a persecutor. His sincere piety in troublous times probably decreed universal religious nobservances with which the Christians conld not comply. Beth the acts of Justin (A.D. 166), the comply. lhath the acts of Justin (A.D. 156), the earliest that nypear really to be taken down by martyrdom of Sagaris of Laodicea, A.D. 167 (Aube, p. $36^{3}$ ), speak of edicts ordaining that all who were conght should be compelied to sacrifice. If there were no reversal of the [^14]decialon of Trajan, and no bunt after the Chrise tians were decreal, there were at any rate jlenty of " ${ }^{4}$ concusslons." The Christians were Uriven to bulld their splendid tomis undergrouml, as in

Ajol. 5). I'his was subsequent to the delivorance of the nruy by an unexpected fBll of rain in A.t, J 74 . The reserlj,t

His hatred of priesteraft mado him decrea that whoever scared men's minis with superstition should be baalshed to an inland (Dig. XLVItt, xix. 30.) Meanwhile he was himsself somewhat priestrilden by his philosopihers ; the senators were for the most part utterly opposel to the new rellgion, and not likely to he opposed to the new religion, and not likely to ho Impartial juilges, and jopular uproar dil not always present Itself as the volice of a rabble, but sometimes, as at Vienne and but sometimes, as at Vienne und I.yons in A.D. 177, as the aet of a monicipality. The governor, on that occasion, found Christian primoners awaiting him accused by the whole town of Lyons, and himself proceeded io conmit of ndvocate who appeared for them and avowed his Christlanity, to torture the lienthen domestics of the Christians and to extract supposed evilence of cannibal banquets und incestuous orgies, to permit the murder by the rabble betore the tribunal of bishop lothinus, who was sulposed to be the Christ worshipped by the Christians, and finally to consult the emperor ahout those who were Roman eitizens without permitting them to go and plead their own cause luefore him. Marcus wrute back that those who recanted should be released; those who persisted should be drummed off, i.e. cudgelled to death. A similar decree appears In the acts of Caecilia, which are referred by De Rossi to this date. It seems to have called forth the apology of Athenagoras. The Gallic governor assumed a certain liberty in interpreting it. He gave up to the beasts all who were not Roman citizens, and one who was. Other tortures were applied to them in the nmphithentre for the amusement of the people, e.g. a chair of red-hot iron, in which the prisoner was fastened. This is noteworthy as indicating the effect of persecution of the Christians in whetting an appetite for horrors, -Tertullian (ad Martyres, 5) tells of some whe volunteered to run a ecurse in a flaming shirt,and also in undermining the old fabric of chartered liberties, and reducing the world under the tyranay of the emperor and his emissaries.

cution before the elose of his reign. Cyprian returned, and a new pepe was eleeted in the early part of 251 (Lipsius, Chron. Rom. Bisch. p. 18).

Persectution was renewed under Gallus, oceasioned by the plague (A.D. 252,253 ).
In a.d. $25 \psi$ commences a formal registration of the bishops in the state archives. Valerian seems to have hoped thas to keep coatrol over the chureh without the necessity of making martyrs. In 257 he had the bishops interrozated and bnaished (Fitit Cyprimi, e. 11). Reports of the interrogateries were published (Cypr. Ep. 77; Dienys. Alex. up. Eus. II. E: vii. 11), and seem to have earned the bishops the title of martyrs. At least Dionysins of Alexandria is commemorated as such, though he survived the persecation and died in peace. But in A.D. 258 , Valerisn wrote that all the clergy shoull be executed offhand, nobles and knights degraded and stript of their property, and oaly put to death it they still persisted, ladies should be banshed, officers of the household led off in convict gaags to pe ql laboar (Cypr. Ep. 82).
Gillienus (A.D. 260) stopt the perseention and gave legal sanction to the charcio boly, and reinstated it in possessioa of its corperate property (Ens. II. E. vii. 1:i).
Aurelian had inteoded (Eus. H. E. vi. 30), or even decreed (Lact. de Mori"3us, 6) a persecution, but the execution of the design was frustrated by his death (A.D. 275). The peace of the church endured till the opening of the 4th century.
Like his great master in stntesmanship, Aurelian, Diocletian alse appeared as a protector of the ehurch so long as he was oeenpiel with rebels or foreign foes. But in his 17 th year (A.D. C00) before his final triumphs, when he was anxiously awaiting news from the Enst, he expelled all Christiaas from the army (Eus. Chron. II. E. Vilu. iv.; ${ }^{\text {e }}$ Lart. de Mort. (10). In A.D. 303 he was induced by Galerius reluc:tantly to re-enaet the edicts of Valerim, with sone exceptions and additions. His decree was placarded at Nicomedia on February 23 . No blood was to be shed, but (a) the churehes were to be razed, (b) the snered books were to be to be razed, (b) the snered books were to be burnt, (c) the Christians were to be disfranchised and outlawed, ( $d$ ) liborti and addicti (oi $i \nu$ oikeriais) persisting in Christisnity were to be reduced to slavery (Eus. II. E. viii. 2 ; Jact. de Mot. 13). Two conflagrations in the palace eansed the torture and execution of the Christian domestics, and a secend deeree incarcerating the entire elergy (lact. de Murt. 14, 15 ; Eus. 11. 1:. viin. vi. 9). The celebration of the Vicenaalia at the close of the same year, which was the oceasion of the release of all other prisoners, was signalised by the empleyment of terture to foree the Christians te sacrifice (Eus. I. 11). The results of these edicts are graphically portrayed

ot long endure their hunger, so that man gave themselves up to be taken." Altars were placed in the law courts that nube inight plenl a celuse without first sacrificing (de Morti)ns, 15). A whole Christian town with its inhabitauts was barnt in Phrygia (Eus. II. E. vini, xi.). New tortures were invented. The vietims were stretched on $n$ rack (equaleus) or hung up with stones fastened to their feet, then beaten in that posture with endgels, rods, or scourges ; then torn with iren hooks (ungulae, pectines); then rubbed with salt and vinegar ; then burnt bit by bit from the soles of their feet apwards with terches or het-iron plates, water being meanwhile threwn in their thees to kpep life in them (Eus, H. E. viIf. vi. ; cf. Lact. de Mort. 21), or dragged along the rough ground to restora conscionsness (Eus. H. E. vin. x.). These who were remanded to ail were put in the stocks with their teet far asunder, and high up se that they had to lie on their backs. All these things were done before the persecution had properly cemmenced.
Throughout the west, in Italy, Afriea, Spain, and even in Gaul and Britain, except as far ns Herculius was eheeked by his subordinate Constantius, possession of Christian books, atten(hristin furistiun meetings, and cencealment of crimes. Sutives, were nlready reekoned capital bloodless decrees interpretation was put on the (Mason, Persecution of Diecletian by his cellengue 154 ff. 172 fi:). In the East it was still illega, to kill, but not to mutilate a curistill illegal M.rt. Pul. ii. 1). To understand the horror of the persecution it must be borne in mind that it was similar to the Revocation of the Edict of Nates, n sudden subverion of legal security, a sudden distruption of penceable society, bay, a sudlen withdrawal of impurial favour.
In 304 the persecution raged most fieveely, for Herculins was still suprenie in the west, and Giocletian was not io a condition to contrel Galerius in the east. At the beginning of the year a new edict exteaded the obligation of sacrifice to all the people of every town, and sanctioned the nrrest of the coaseerated virgins of the ehurch and their consignment to the brothels (Eus. Mart. I'al. 3; Acta Irene, c. 5; (f. A. ta Theodorae, e. 1). Even this did not satisfy the enemies of the chureh. In Aprila seaatns-censultum (cf. Martene, Thes, iii. 1649) and a reseript of Herenlius deereed the seizure of Chrisians "wherever found," and recognised that the penalty might be death (Mnson, p.

On the lst of May, 305, Diocletian and Maximianus Herculius abdiented. Constantius, who had retained the contessors and dismissed the apostates among the officers of his own househeld (Eus. Iit. Const. 1. xvl.), did not, of course, urge the perseention further in the west, but the church was not reinstated in her legal rights, and the western Cresar was a nominee of Galerius. In the east under Galerius and Maximin the porsecution raged with redoubled fury, and a law was promulgatel conderming the Christinns to die by slow fire (Dendemning 21). The mode of punishment varied from provicce to province. In Cappadocia their lego were broken; in Mesopotamia they were sutlo.

even slept inside the gaol nlong with him, bribing the giolers. Then dimaers of various viands were carried in, and their sacred treatises were read, and the worthy Peregrinus (for he still went by that name) was calied by these people a new Socrates. Nay, there are certain cities even in the province of Asia, from which some of the Christians came, depated by their community, to heip the man and support him in court and comfort him. They display incredible alacrity, when anything of this kind happens of public concern. And ns an instance in point, much wealth neerued to Peregrinus from them then, by reason of his incarceration, and he made no small revenue out of it. . . He was released by the man who was then governur of Syria. . . He weat forth a second time on his wanderings, with the Christians for a bank to draw upon for travelling expenses. As their soldier and servant he revelled is $0!1$ abondance. And for some time he battened so: then he committed some transgression agaiast their haw also, was seen, I tancy, eating of their forbidden meats, an.! they came to him no more."
This bostile necount is fully confirmed by Christian evidence. The jailors came to count on gains when they had Christim $\mathrm{p}^{\text {minoarers }}$ (A.ta Pionii, e. 12); nud when the oflicials fissbade the aceess of visitors for fear of attempts at a rescue by nagical uts (Aetat ierpetute. c. 16), the prisoners seem sometimes to have been in danger of starving (Actic Mout mi, e. 9). Directions were given by Cyprian that the contessor Celerinus, thongh but a realer, should have the salary of a preshyter (Cypr. $1 ; 0$, 39). The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 2:3) torliil contesors to arrogate to themsielves episeopal functious; and the 25th eamon of Hlitheris, which cajuins that if any briag letters of commendation as confessors, these shall be taken away aul simple letters of communion given them, hecanse all under the vaunt of that name everywhere make game of the simple (corutiment simplices, the word used for violent threats, from the nilitary). Compare also Apollomins (Gus, II. $E$ : r. 19), who speaks of Montanist mart yrx exacting evin from orphans nad wifows. And though Cillistus had obtanined recognition ass a martyr, cuatrary to the wishes of 'iector, that bishop thouglit it necessary to pension him (l/hilusuThumena, ix. 12).
V. Preroyntives of Mistyrs befure Dea'h. The hooours which martyrs receivel from their brethren in this life were fin" mure than the material emoluments. "Nartyrs," in the old sense, signed ns martyrs to the decrees of councils (Eus. v. xix.). The blood he liding of nartyrdom was a sacrament, a baptism that replaced or renewed the baptism of water (Tert. du Bupt. c. 16); one of the seven way* of obtaining remission (Orig. in Len, Ilom. ii. e, t. ii. p. 190): the wanderer's last retuge (Tert, Stor $p$. 6), in which not only suils wery washel otti, but stains blatached white (ib. 12), in which angels were the baptizers (Cypr, ad Furtun. pref. 4). Bnpti m Wis a time firr prayer (Tert do lhapt. 20, l'erputuai 2), aud so was martyridem. It did not sullice for a martyr to have jurgel his own sin: (Tert. de Pudic. 22 ): they begau to be io such dignity that they might aik what ther would (Perpetna, 3, 7): " martyrs gave grace to those that were not coartyrs," ind received the peni-teat apostates into communion (Eus, H. E. v. i. 41, ii, 7, 8): they had a right to be heard in claiming alsofution for their brethren, as they did netunlly atone for their brethren's faults; they wenried out by their patience the fury of the adveraries and broke down the power of evil (Orig. t. iv. p. 133 ; Eins. II. E. vin. x x i. 16 ): moreuver, their pleace was so divine, that to be at peare with them could not but be to be at peate with God (cf. Cypr. Ep. xxiii.). Hence martyrs excelted confessors by their power of receiving bnck the lapsed (Cypr, Epp. 20 [17], 10 [ 8 ]: Soon as a martyr was thrown into jail, sseekers of grace gathered round (Tert. do Pudic. 2.2). Those condemned to be thrown to bensts lost their frachise nnd freedom furthwith, and night be kept to be tortured for tinther evidence betore their sentence took effert (ib. 29). But praefects were forbidden to throw criminals to the beasts just to please a popular outcry ( $b, 31$ ). Criminals might of conlse die under torture, but were not to be put to aleath by torture, unless the nbove ways be so reckoned reckoned. Roman citizens were simply beheaded with the sword. Nen might be condemned, not to be thrown to the beasts, but to fight with them. Then there was slavery in the mines with heavier or lighter chains; the lime-works and sulphur works were eonsidered the worst, and the mines furnished oceupation to women as well is to the miners. Then there was transportation to an island, which involved loss of sitizenship, though not of freedom (ib, xxii. 6, 15). Then there were various motes of flog. ging, a culyelliog was thought nore honourable than a seourging : there was labour in public works, hanishment to nu istand, perpetual or temperary banishment. In almost every cave the punihment varied accorling to the station of the offenler. This is exemplitied in the chief instance that we have of a persecution of the Jews. The crimes of some would-be Jewinh Jews. The crimes of some would-be Jewinh missionaries in A.D. 19 brought the whole counmunity into trouble. Four thoussad of the humbier sort were shipped off to Sardinia to be employed nguinst the brigands-" if they died, small loss" "the rest were to recant by a given day or leave Italy (The. Ann. il. 85 ; Jos. dat. Jul. xviii. 5).
VII. Treatment of the Bodies of the Dead.The boties of criminals, and even the ashes of such ns hat been burnt alive, except sometimes in calses ot treavon, were given up for burial to any who might ask for them (Dijest, xuvin, xxiv.). In 303, at the beginning of the pernecition, Diocletian foond it necessary to have the bodies of the martyrs dug up and thrown into the sea (Eus. II. L., viii. 6). Thenceforth he refused them burial. Instances of the measures taken to rob the Christians of the relics will be found in the aets of Claudius and Asterius, of Victor of Marseilles, Theolotus of Anerya, Vincent of Villencia, Heazeus of Sirmium, &c. &e. They were geaerally thrown lato the sea in sacks. At Caesaren, on one occasion, they lay guarded, and the dugs threw then nill about the city (Eus. Nurt. F'al. 9). The more grievous the wrong done to the holy bodies, the greater the eagerness to requite them with due honour. There is a legend of a Ruman lady sending her paramour to the east, where persecution was still raging, to briog her some relics (Ado, June 5). Antuny strongig protested against the Eygptian practice of keeping the mummies of the martyrs in privite houses, whereas "even the body of the Lord was boried "ut of sight" (Athauas. lita Antonii, ii. 1. 502 ). The same practice is forbidden in one of the Arabic constitutions which claim 351).
VIII. Sepuiture of Martyrs.-The subject of Christian sepulture in general is treated under Bulial, Catacomis, Obsequies.

Of ditlerences in the manaer of sepulture of martyrs, which should enable tuture inventigators to distinguish them atter they had been torgoten, we have torgotten, we have very little evidence. The title Was somerimes inscribed on the tomb, eitioer at the lime of the interment or not long after at the lime of the iuterment or not long after (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. ii. 60, 61). In the lives of the popes, by Anastasius, Eutyehian is satid to have decreed that martyrs should not be buried without a purple dalmatic: Their blood was collected and buried with them (1'rudeutius, Peristeph. xi. 141-144), but the separate vessels surposed to contain blood are now recognised ns receptacles for the wine of the agapac, or else forgeries.
Leibnitz tested a red sediment on a fragment of aucient Christian glass with sal-ammoniac, and fiuding the solvent successful, concluded that the sediment, nust be blood (Boldetti, p. 187). Palm braneles, once suppposed to distinguish nartyrs, are common in the Christian epitaphs of the 4 th century ( $i^{\prime}$, p. 271), These were the signs by which the Romanists used to pretend to distinguish the bodies of martyrs. Mabillon, under the pseadonym of Eusebius Somanus, entered a powertul protest (De Cultu Sinetoram ignotorum, Paris, 1698). Comprre Mattiguy (Dict. des Anti,uités Carétionnes, sana

A pagan's will directing the construction of a memorill chamber [cella Memoriae] with an exedra or summer-house, marble and brenze statues of himself seated, a lectica and stone benches with draplery, cushions, and restments, and an altar to contaiu his bones, an orchard to be attached, and the property to be inalienable from the tomb, two freedmen to be wardens on yearly pay, and all the freedmen to club togetier to keep up a yearly tenst at the place, sacuif elect elub master's yearly who should sacrifice monthly through the summer at the tomb, is given by De Rossi in the Bullettini, 1863 , p. 95. A monument has also been discovered, probably of a Jew, in which sepulture is grauted to the freedinen themselves and their deseendauts, proviled they "belong to my religion" ( $i$ b. 1862, p. 80). The celebration of the euelarist and of agapes at the tombs was ouly illegal, becnuse the dead had died as fraitors.

was onsed upon the notion that their sonls were hovering about their bolies, and stood in need of the good oflices of the living to their bodies. Cliristian beliet is that the departed need the salvation of survivors, that they without us shonld aot be mule perfect (Heb, xi. 40). Undutitul neglect of their eerpses was thus iajarious to the dead, as it was periluns to the living (Cypr. Ep, 8). Their souls were not supposed to hover about their bolles, but their memory was the strongest incentive to that devotion on the part of survivors which they renlly needed. Hence their tombs from the tirst (ef. Hel xiii. Rev, vi. Martyria I. natii et Inlycarpi) ..sre places for the celebrution of the Eucharist.
When the competition between heathen ani Christian worship had once begun, the heathenish rurinus of honouring the dead by wakes and with warlights began to gain currency among the Cinristians. In the canons of lliberis, in or just after the time of the persecution of Diocletinn, it Fordained that " wnxlights should not be burnt hy day in the cemetery," and the :eason giren fir this prohibition is as superstitions as the fractice prohibited, "for the sphrits of the snints are not to be disquieted" (Can. Elib. 34; Routh, Re'l. Sucrae, iv. 265). [LiguTs.]

At the sama conncil (cau. 35) women were furbidden to keep vigil in the cemeteries, becarse under the pretext of prayer they conmit sin.
[Vigils.]

When Constantine restored the property of the church, the re-erection of memorial edifices and celebration of festival anniversaries was commenced under prosperons auspices. If every city had a patron deity, almost every city Prodentius native guardian saint. In the west, Prudentius enumerates the martyrs in whom diverse eities gloried. Carthage had Cyprian; Tarragous, Fructuosus Zoellus and another trio; Telix; ; Calahorra, Cheluosas his deacons; Gironda, Felix; Calahorra, Chelidonius; Bareelona, Cucufas; Narbonne, ; ul; Arles, Genesius; ConJutum, Justus ant Pastor; Merida, Eulalia; Tingier, Cassian ; Fez, the Massylitans; Valencia, Vincent ; Saragossa boasted Encratis and a groap of eighteen (Prad. Peristeph. iv). Rome seemed to be crowded with be crowded with martyrs: they were buried there in heaps, and the namber only, not the names, inseribed uprin the tomb: In one sepulchre lay sixty (ib, xi).
So throughout the 4th century, the rival cults contemid for that which is the first neccssary of a ritual system of heroworship, the honour of being the national religion. Paganism had the frestige of antiquity; martyr-worship was recommended by imperial farour, by its innate of the church of Christ. independent vital force of the church of Christ.
The deities of the heathen were by this time geaerally reengnised among the heathen themselves as merely deified men, and it was easy to demonstrate from the heathen myths that thry were bad men. The vices of the gods and heroes were the commonjlace of ancient phllowophers, and Christlan preachers. A race of troxe heroes had sprang up. The year after the ocearrence of these miracles the Arian empress was a fugitive and a suppliant at the court of the first Catholic Christian emperor, the great Theodosius, who finally suppressed Paganlsm, and who aeknowledged by his submission to penance the power of the church to grant or withhold to the sovereign of the world the bread of his life, but who prepared himself for the contest with the last champion of Inganism, the tsurper Engenius (Ambr. Kphraim Syrus entreats the mether of the forty martyrs to intercede for him with them ( $L_{2} \cdot 1$, Syx. 11 . 355,391 ).

Basid, in his sermon on these forty martyas, eries," Yon often labour to lind one to prave for you, here are forty. Where two or threw si it met in the Lord's name, Ged is there, but whors there nre forty, who enn donbt His preseace? These are they who guard our sunatry lise a liae of torts. Divide them inin a hunifred, imil thes do not exceed their proper number; bring then together in one and they are forty still, like fire" (Bisil, ii. 155).

So in the aext ecatury Theodoret. "Their noble souls roan round the heavens dancing with the unembodiet choirs. But as for their Inelies, it is ant a single tomb npiece that covers them, hut cities and rillages share them, and call them saviours of souls and healers of bodies, and hononr them as patrons and guardians. The leant little relic has the same power as the undiviled martyr, and all this does not persuade you to hymn their God, but you laugh and mock."

Basil, the Gregories, and Ephraim, did much else hesides latuling the martyrs. But in the west the title of Prudentius to thme lies mainly In the "passionate splenduars" of" the verse in which he hymns them, and the solitary devotion of the pret is more contagious than the fervonr of the orators. "I shall be purged by the radiance of thy propitieus face, if thou fill my heart: nothing is unchaste, that thou, juious Agnes, deigned to visit and to touch with thy footstep of blessing (Perist ph. xiv. 130-153). Be jresent now and receive the beseching voices of thy suppliants, thou efficacious orator for our guilt before the Father's throne. By that prison we pray thee, the iacrease of thy honour; by the chains, the flames, the prongs, by the stocks in the gaol; by the litter of broken sherls, whence thy glory sprang and grew; by that iron bed, which we men of afcer days kiss trembling, thy bed of fire; have jity on our prayers, that Christ may be afpeased and bend a prosperous ear and not impute to us all our offences, If duly we vencrate with voice and heart thy solemn lay, if we lie low as a pavement beacath the juy uf thine approaching footstejs, glide in hither awhile, bringing down with thee the fivour of Chtist, that our burdenel senses may feel the relief of thine iniluigence " (h. v, 5\%5 568). So when they tried to approach ('hrint through the martyrs instead of speling the martyrs in Christ, the martyrs began tis Usurj Chrlist's place.

The existrnee of a notinn that it way a wrong to a martyr tu leare him ancerpaprated, ns though he had looked for honour fram justerity rather than from the Lovi, is abundantly evilencel not only in the poems of Prudeatius, hat in the Inbours of the factious and poupous welate Damasus (A.D. 366-'184), who wat of maintay of the frue taith, a stiekler for the supretany of ti. It remained for the leaders of the chureh to correct or justify the heathenised character ot Christian worshijs. In one resject, in the west at least, they set about correcting it. 'The Christians were accused by the heathens and Manichees of turning the ancient snerificial feasts into agapae. In the cast these were forbililen in the churches by the 28 th eanon of the council of laodicea, and so were celebrated at the outluor shrines (Chrys. Tom, xlvii.). So Chrysostom urges his hearers. "If you want recreation, go to th., marks, to the river side, and the lakes; cons:. the flower-beds; Jisten to the song of the ciealas; haunt the shrines of the martyrs, where there is health for the boly and good for the soul, and no diamage nor rejeratance after the pleasure" (in Mitth. Hom. 37, t. vii, 477). So Theodoret bonsted that instend of the Pabdia and Dionysia there were public banquets in honour of Peter and Paul, nud Thomas and Sergits, and Nareellas and Leontius, and Panteleemon, and Antoninus and Maurice, and the other martyrs, nud instead of the od, toul deeds anil words they were sober teasts without drunkenuess and revel and laughter, but divine hymos and natred discourses nod tearful prayer ('i'heed. Griter, affect. Cur. viii. ald fin.). But in the west Ambrose torbade these agapae at Milan (Aug. Coni. vi. 2), Augiustine moved Aurelius to nbolish them at Carthage (Aug. ad Aurel. Lip. 22), then himself abrogated them at Hippo (add Alyp, Ep). 29, A. D. 39.), and finally juocured their prohihition by the 3rd conneil of Carthage, in A,b, 397 (can. 30). In Africa the feast was ealled, not ag'le, but lactitio. There were dances all night in honour of Cyprian (Aug. Scrm. 311, t. Y. col. 1415). Some brought food to the ale is of the martyrs to be blessed and s. tilied then tonk it to cat elsewhere or 1

Augustine rarely says noything to inerease the popular devotion to the martyrs. In one beriturs ha ewdims, "In what Christian's inouth does ont the lame of the marturs make a daily halutation. Woald that it dwelt so in our liearts that wanghe mitate their passions, amd not frsecute them with our drinking rujs' (., to, .h. 大im. 1. 2, t. Hii. 1979). Aguin he suys, "Ths mortyrs hate your drinking bonts, but if they at worshipped they hate that much more. Who snys, 1 otler to thee, Jeter. Christ chose rather to be, than to rlaim, a sucrilice" Serm. 27:, t. v. 1250). Again he complains that the martyre are mare honoured than the Apratles (sirni, $28, \mathrm{t}, \mathrm{v}$ i:365). But he ubserves that to sibure at the virtues of our betters is no small purt ot instation (Se.m. 280, it. 128:3), and once her sugyest, "If we are not fuite worthy to resit elat as ask through His triends (Serm. 3:32, ib. $14 t^{2}$ ).

In the 8 the ehapter of 2 and book de Civitute $D_{e i}$ Augustine enumerates the aseertained mirncles of the martyrs, and in the 9 th chapter he points out the dillerence between these and the admitted miancles of the pagan heroes. The demons workel wonders in pride to prove thomselves gods ; the martyrs, or God for them, for the growth of faith in the one God. Their memorials are not temples. They are commenorated, not invoked. There is no priest of the martyr. The sacrifice is the body of Christ, which the martyrs are.
Against Fuustus the Monichee, who mrges that the theoretical monotheism and practical polytheinm of the Christians werealike borrowed from jaganism, so that they were not n new creed but a mere set of sehismaties - "desciscentes a gentihus monarchiae opinionem primum volis:cum divulsistis, ut omoia credatis ex Deo, sacrificia vero corum vertistis in agapes, idola in martyros, quos votis similibus colitis; defuactorum umbras vino placatis et dapibas "-Aagustine answers that the martyrs are celebrated to excito our imitation that we maty be assochated with their merits and helped by their prayers, and that by the almonition of the places themselres a greater affection may arise to warm our love both to those whom we can initate aod to 1 lim by whose help we are able. So we worship the martyrs with that worship, of love and resort to this sorjety with which holy men of God are worshipped in this life, lont the more devoutly. as the more securely. But with the worship of listriut we worship, only one God. But, he silys, "hat we teach is one thing, what we have to put up with is another (Ang. c. Fust. xx, 4, 2J. t. viii. 370,38 t).

Theodoret says boldly that the Lood has raised the martyrs to the place of the heathen gods (l'heol. (iruec. aff. Cur. viii. ad $j$ n.).
XI. Lurial ncar the Marturs.-Ambrose himselt lail his bones beside Protasius and Gervasius (Ambr. (opp. ii. 1110). Dtmasus would tatin have been buried in the crypt of Xystus, but tlat he feared to vex the ashes of the pious. "Our ancestors," says Maximus of I'vin, "have provided that we should associate our bodies with the bunes ot the saints. While Christ shiuw on them, the gloom of onr darkness is dispulled" Max. Aurr. Hom. Ixsxi.). But this was a privilege that many desired and few obtained, as we read in an inscription, A.D. 301 , given by be Rossi (Inscrintioncs Christutmac, i. 119). ittegustine's work (De Curw Mortwoum) was wrifter in answer to a question put to him be l'anlinus, bishop of Nola, whether burial in such proxinity to the saints were of benefit to the deceased He answers that some are so gool aml uthers so bad that whatever is llone for them after death is muprifluous or useless, but many whose merits are only middling may be herietitel by the nct iuns of survivors; that sepulture in itselt does no good to the soul, but that care fior it is latudible, nult the grove reminds perple to prity for the deceased. The martyrs themselves did not eare how they were baried. Man have risions of the dead, as they have vishous ot the living, but the souls of the dead are not concurned with what is done here, yet the dead may know what is passing on earth, for the martyrs do haclp their supliante. The martyrs are purpet wally praying, and God hears their prayers, and gives the suppliants who seek their intercession what the himselt perceives that they want. The satcrifices of the altar, of prayers, and al alms are the only way of beneliting the depated (Ang. vi. 501 fl .). The epitajh of Sabinus the archdeacon, who was content to lie under the threshold of the church of St. Lawrence, is given by De Rossi (Bullettini, 18i99, 1, 3:3). See Mso le Blant, Inseriptions Chretienness de le Guи'с, t. i. 11. 396, 471, t. ii. p. 219.

XII. Vindication of murtyrs.-The many false clains to martyrdom made a kind of canoniation necessary. This was called vindication.
Defore Diocletian's persecution one lucilla at Carthage was said to taste (i.r. ki.ss) the mouth of some martyr, if marter it were, butiore the spiritual meat and drink, and when reboked by Cuecilian, then deacon, for preferring the month ot a deal man, and if a martyr, not howevar as yet viodicated, to the cup of salvation, she went off is anger (Optatus, i. 16).
The clergy were the wardens of the cemeteries, and kept the register of martyrdoms as they ocenrred, and we have also seen the rules Inid down for the qualifications of martyrdon. Doubts seem only to have arisen in Africa where there were numerons false claims of the Don: tists, and in Ganl which had been so free from persecution, and so unsettled by barbarian invasions, that it had many unauthorised shines, The and canon of the Council of Carthage in the times of pope Jnlius deerees, "Martyrum dignitatem nemo protanus infanet, neque al pinsiva corpora, quate sepultarae tantum projeter mivericordiant eeclesiasticam commendari mandatum est, redignt, at aut insanla praecipitatos aut alia peccati ratione divjunctos martyrum nomine :ppellet. At si quis id injuriam martyrum clanitati eorum adjungat infamiam, placet cos si laici sint ad poenitentiam redigi, si nutem sint cleifei post commonitionem et post engnitionem honore privari" (Labbe, Conc. it. 714). And the 14th canon of the 5 th council of Carthage, in the time of Augastine, decreed that no monument ot the martyrs shonld be accepted exrept where a body or relics or the origin of a martyr's habitation was faithfilly handed down by tront tion (ibid. 1217). In Gaul, St. Martin was troublied at the reverence paid to a tumb of which no certain account conl i be given, anl he had a vision of the oecupant as a lowek eriminal.

devotion to it (Sulpleius, Iita Mfortini, 11). The Conneril of dix in A.D. 787 deereed that the altars which are set up everywhere throngh the fields and ways as monuments of marigre, in Whach an buly or relies of martyiss are proved to be buried, ise removed by the bishops of the plares it' pessible. "It' popular tumu!ts do not subler this, yet let the people be admooished not to frequrnt thase plates." Then the Afriman canon is repeated, scenes of phasious being allowed as well as birthplaces or lomes, numg they prowed tu condemin trust in dreams. "The altars whidh are set up by inane revelatons are altogether to be reprobated" (labbe, Conc. vii. 979). Arian martyrs, such as George, arquired such celelnity in the East that it was impossible to exchudr them from Rome, but their nets were forbiden to be read by a conacil uader Gelasius, A.D. 414 ( Lable, Cinc. in: 1263 ).

MARTYRARIUS, or Custos Ecclesiae, " keeprer of a MantyRicm, or church of a martys. The listh camon of the second council of Orloans mentions them as a well-known elass: "Abbates, martyrarii, reclusi, vel presbyteri apostolia dare non praesumat, "" These relies were often preserved in little shrines or chapels (sacella), divided from the main builling, a practice familiar to classic times, ard uf which there are notices in Cicero and other heathen writers; and in the larger churshes, at all events at Rome, a separate guardian or mar-

Similarly, Zozimus, bishop of Syracuse, is said to have been in hia earlier life "custos pretiesi locnli S. Virginis luciae," apparently a shrine, and afterwards "ostiarius et templi custos."

Miantyrdom, Representations of. The earliest representations of martyrdem with which the writer is acquainted occur in the Nenologium of the Vatican library, which D'Agincourt places in the 9 th or 10 th century. See L'Art dans les Monuments, pl. xxxi. xxxil. xxxiii. The entire absence of any such pictures or carvings from the eatacombs, or earllest Christian works of the days of persecution, hasoften been the subject of comment. Daniel often been the subject of comment. Daniel between the lions unharmed, and the three claildren seatheless in the furnace, are the only tokens of the persecutions of the first twe centuries.

The introduction of martyrdoms of saints not mentioned in Holy Sei iptures probably syuchronises with that of the Last Judgment, with its hell, in the 11th eentury. For the subject of hell, in the 11 th century. For the subject of the Iloly lnnocents, see Innocsints, p. 841. The MAIITYRIUM (uaptiptov). Originally the whet where a martyr eadured martyribm, and where his remaias were buried. Wheo chapels nod dharches came to be built over these consecrated places, they aswmed the same name, mul ware kuown us "martyries." A martgry is detined by initore as "locus martyium, graecu derivathooe, en quod in memorian murtyris sit const ruct um, vel ynod sepulelira sanseturum ibi sint " (lsil. Etymol. lib, xv. c. 3). The term gradually gained a more extended application, "postea omnis beclesia titulo cujusvis sancti vocata est martyrium" (Suicer, shb rove), -partly justitied by the fact that no church could be consecrated without contuining the relics of a martyr. Thus we find the terms $\mu \alpha \rho \tau$ ópioy or $\langle\kappa \kappa \lambda \eta \sigma i a$ used without any distiuction, and often applied to the same building. Thus the chureh louilt by Constantine on Calvary is called by Athanasius тоे owt hprov uaptúpiov (Apul, ii, tom. i. p. 801), and Jerome says "cujus inlustria llierosolymae martyrium exstructum est" (llieron. Chron. 7 Euseb. 1 itt. Const. iv, 40 ; Theophanes, ann. 32 Const.). The same name js glven to the church to the Thomas at Edessa (Soer. II. E. iv. 18), and to those of St. John and of the A postles at Constantinople (Pallad. pp, 63, 159), and to the basilica ot' St. I'eter at Rome (Athmas. Ejpist. ad Solitar. tom. i. p. 834), and to the church at Constantinople where the relics of the 40 mastyrs were diseovered (Soz. II. E ix. '2). The warch of St. Euphemia nt Chalcedon, whleh was the place of mecting of the oecumenical

 i. and ii , is styled uapréprov in Acta isi. (l.abbe, iv, 371 ). The Council of iv. 371). The Council of the Oak was alse held in a "martyry " where the body of Dioscorus of Hermopelis, one of "the Tall Brethrea," was subsequent Jy interred (Socr. II. E.: vi. 17), and it was in "the martyry" of Basiliscus. in the vicinity of Comana, that Chrysestem died (I'allad. 99). Though they are often regarded as synunymous, that maptúpiov was not ilentical with Eкк入ทala nppears from the coniplaint of the Eistern bishops at the council of Ei,hesus to the emperors that Cyril and the Western mrelates hid closed ngainst them "both churches aud Maprúpia (Theoloret. Epist. 152, 153). The Theolosian code expressly sanctions the erection and adorament of martyrechapels, "quod martyrium vocandum sit," over the graves of saints (Cod. Theod. de Sepulchris riblatis, tit, xvii. lex vii. vol. iii. p. 152).

The Epteraach MS., though the earliest, is by common consent promomnesd the least anthentic. It reprecents a British Carm of the Martyrology, nod semens to bear a elose relation to the Martyrolury of Doneral - partly publlished by Todi nid Reeves (Dublin, 18.515 ), but buried for the most part in St. Isidore's, Rume-in which the topugraphieal autes are omitted.
(G) De loosi has discovered In Rerne library (Cud. Q89) a 9 th-century enpy belunging to the church of Me: $z$, which retains the tupmeraphieal motices in larger characters, dividing the martyrs of each diy into distinct local groups.
All these ISS. have in common sumdry arbltrary interpelations and corrections relatiug to early silints, which De Rossi traces to the misunderstanding of a 7 thecentury list of parail interments. He consilers therefore that the extant MSS. dil not diverge from their common stock till it had been subject to interpolation in the 7th century.

The text, however, no 111 restored by the monk of Auxarre, who, it miy be obserred, is supplase. contempurary with Gregery the Great, was Itself of the nature of a cento, ancording to the julgment of molern ciltics. The same pirinciple thit enablel the Rassi to refer the buagling recension to the thase of Aumarins induces blan to assign certain of the documents used in the compilation to the piepedmans of Bonlfice l. (a $.5 .418-429$ ) and Miltimdes (A.1, :111-i1t). Un the 29th of December the mattyrolary has "Bonificli episcopi de ordinatinue" "and this is certainly the right annlsersary of the ordiantion of Bonitace $I$. The not of his death, which is left uncelchrated. The burial of Miltiades ls properly noted on Jun. 10 ; but ngina, and this time without mention of a remetery, on July 2, the day of his orilinatina. (He Ressi, Rom, Sott. i. II2-114). These documents, he concludes, were far too rare and preclons to have fallen loto the hands of an obseure Gallienn monk. The Martyrology also contains uumerous aceurate notes of the tresh festivals instituted in fame in the sth century, esprecially by prope Sixtus. III., and there is evidesee that the Auxerre eompiler hill belire hin two copies, both eariched with these jasertions (i), ii. 36).

We may observe that the popedom of Bonifice coinciles with the last days of Jerome, within a decade of Wright's Syrine MS., and within thinty years of the conncil of Milan, and again, that the popjedom of Niltiades coinciles with the restoration of the church under coustantine, and the first compilation of the calendir of lhilu-

The two great families of' Westeru IIturgies beside the Roman, are said to owe their origin to Jlilary: a thirlier contemporarles, Ambrose and to Prydentius. The impulse tow owes something lation of the Nartyrology is suid to the compiSpanish. Jerome himselt assisted Damaxus in oidering the shrines of Rome; but while the shrines of the martyrs were most maportant there, the readiug of thuir nets was more custemary in the East. The materials that Aengas the Culdee protesses to have used aro similar to those assumed by the eritices for the llierunymian cento, with one exception: he had betore him not only Ambrosian had Gitlican liturgies, Damasian topographics, De Viris Illustribes, and the like, but the Martyrology of Eusebius.

C. The lesser Rom n Mirtyrology was found at Ravema by Alo, archbishop of Vienoe, about A.1, 8.0 , thought by him to bo pretty whl, reported to him to have been sent by a prije to an archbixhop of Aquileia, transcrihed by him and pretixed to his own Martyrology, as he tells us in the preinace, omitited as sujeriluans by eopyists, sought in vain by scholars, int last found at Cologne and edited by Rosweyd and claimed as the Martyrology mentioned by Gregory the Great, thrown into the shade by the discovery of the Hieronymien, supposed by Fiorentini a mare later efitome of Ado, maintained to be genuine but lacer than the Hierouyminn by Sollier, proved genuise beyead doubt by De Rossi's discovery of another cupy of Ado in the library of St. Gall (vol. 4:54) where this Martyrology follows the prefice with the title, Incipit Murtyrologiun homanum. This Najtyrology is pretixed to Ado in Nigne, t. exxiii.

The whole tissue of this Martyrology, necordIng to le Kossi, is that of a privare historical essay, not of a public traditional calendar, The days assigned to the lestivals in the uld cadendars aro often exchanged for new dates, tounded on histories that were in credit when the compiiaof wan made, and most of the chief characters of Seripture have their set days, of which there is no trace in the ancleat Fusti of any churen whatsocver. The author has used Rufinus's rersion of Eusebius, and worked up the acts of the martyrs. The changes he has introduced in noting the festivals often coincile with the changes introluced into the pontifical book lo the 8 th ceatury. The work seems to have beea compilel ir Rome, and notes some festivals there institutel at the end of the 7 th and beginning of the 8th ceatury. This does not prove it to have been publicly taken into use at the time. It is ulmost contemporary with Bede nad with the last recension of Jerome. Its methed of composition is similar to that claimed for Jerome, except that the Acts on which it is based are mostly religious fictions. Sce De Rossi, Rom. Sutt. i. 125; ;ii. xxvii-xxxi, or De Smedt, Int. Generalis, pp. 13:-137.

IV. Mirtyrologies shat add some det inls of the muty y doms.-The diflerence between the Hierobymian Martyrologies and the series ineaded by Bele may be thus expressed: the ore are replete with iossil fragments of geauine eatiquity, from which the skilled archaeologist can reconstract nud recluthe skelotons of ancient facts; the other present us with such mlaittore outlines of martyrs as were had in reoeration by the chureh of the age of Charlemagne.

Bele, at the end of the 7th and beginning of the sth century, was coutemporary with the last receasion of the Hieronymian Naryrolegy. He was acquanted probably with that form of it; but his work is chietly drawn trom the pontifieal books nod the Aets of the martyrs. It is the outcome of the same dissatisfaction with the chaos of the current books, as was felt by hisanonymous contemperary who framed the Rominum paritur: but he struck more at the root of the evil. Insteal of recasting the calendar to bring it into conformity with the supposed knowledge of the times, he has been coutent to confess ignomance. He was content to leave many days racant rather than adern them with a striag of mames without meaning. Deseribing his own work in the catalogue of his writings at the close of his Church History, he claims to bave given all those martyrs of whom anything was known in the world in which he lived. Thus he heals the long series of martyrologies in which short historites were added to their names. People soon male up their minds that they kne:s sonething aboat some more. Bede's work was enlarged again and again. We only possess it in the ealarged edition.

These three Martyrologies, the Hicronymian, the Lioman, Bede's, are the three original sources of almost all Western martyrologics and calendars. We mast just distingoish the chief martyrologies of the 9th century, becaase it is only through Ado and Usnard that the fesser Roman work has become known.

Flurus, subleacon of Lynns, A.D. 830, first enlargel the work of Bede. The Bolladists, Hensehen and Papebroch, pablished in the first volume of the Actis Ss, for March a not very trustworthy, nor indeed feasible, nttempt to purge the original Martyrology from the solsequent a ditions; but they revain indistinguishaile, and wo cathat even ha aure that wo have the work as it was left ly florus, This elition, DI intyrole fi $m$ Bedue in 8 antipuis MSiSS, acceptum ou:n Auturio Plori ex 3 codd. coll ctionc dis'incto, is reprumed by Migne, Putr. xciv. $\mathbf{7} 99$.

Rabanus, archbishop of Maintz, further enlarged the Martyrology of Florras, and worked it up with the Hieronymian. His work is printed by Migne, Patr. cx. 1121.
Ado, urchbishop of Vienne, was nequainted with Bele's vork as enlarged by Floras, bat not with Rabanus. His work was nndertaken as an expansion of that of Florus, but was really modelled on the lesser Roman, and became rather a ecllection of brief lives of the saints than a martyrolog. It answers more nearly to the menologies of the Greeks, exeept that it ls not put forth anthoritatively for ceclesiastical reading, but merely as a private manual. Yet the influence of his work through Usuard transformed ecclesiastical usuge and recast the calenlar.

Usoard, a mouk of Paris, about A.D. 875, has faithfully epitomisel Ado's work, which (accordiag to Sollier) was known to him as "The Commentary of Florts.' He does not seem to have been requainted with the work of Rabanus. "Jerome," he snys, "has studied brevity too much, Bede has left many days untouched." He endeavours to supply their debiciencies, and also to reconcile the discrepancies of various commemorations. He was the first really to popalarise the works of Ado nad the nonymous Roman, but his own book has nssumed almost as many tiorns as those of Bede or Jerome, and has bocome the source of most existing Western calendars. The interpolations and variations are fully treated in the edition by Sollier, which forms the 6 th volume for June of the Acta San:torum, und is reprinted in Migne, $P_{.}$L. exxiii.
Notker was a monk of St. Gall, who died in a.d. 912. He combined Alo and habanas. His work will be found in Migae, exxxi. 10:6.
Thus Bede wis enlarged by Floros and Rabanas, from the irst enlargement and the lenwer Roman grew Alo's work, trom the seconl and Ailo's work grew Notker's, but Usaaril's that grew out of Ado's alone became the most celebrated.
V. Metnial Martarolonies.-As the enlarged martyrelogies that we have just been considering reem to he an imitation of the Greek menologies, so metrical martyrologios may have takeu their rise from the Greek practice of reciting daily in the serviee inmbic distichs, sometimes of much beanty, describiang the triumph of each of the martyrs celebrated, followed, in the case of the ellief of them alone, by an hexameter line iixing the day of the passion. A collection of such hexameter lines, which are always sad doggerel, woull form a metrical martyrology. One such has been extracteld firom the Menarea by Godofrodus Siberus (licolcviae Gruecae Ma tyrologinm Metricum, Leipzig, 1727), who has adled the halt rhythmical monology of Christopher of Mitylene.
The little poem escribed to Bede (Patrol. Lat. xciv. 603) is hardly worth ealling a martyrology, but seems to he genuine (De sinelt, p. 1:38; Binterim, y. i. 58). Wandalbert, a monk of the docese of Treves, nt the age of thirty-tive, in or bent a.D. 842, wrote a martyrology in hevaueters, independent of Bede nan the lesser Dime. It contains many thinga not to be forma Lisownere, which he claizas to have taken trom an'hentic old looks by the help of Florus of Lyons who possessed them, but critics are suspicious ( $/$ 'atrol, cxxi. 575).

The Feiliras of Aeagus the Coldee may be called a metrical martyrology. We have here only to add to the article en that head, that it exists in three vellum MSS., two ia the Bodleian aad one in the library of the Royal lrish Academy. There is a recent paper copy in the library of the university of Cambridge, and another of the 17 th century made from an independent authority in the Burgundian library at Brassels. It differs from the Thmlaght or Tallaght Martyrology of the same Aengris and Macbruain, poblished by the Rev. M. Kelly, D.D. (Dublin, 1857), which has been generally supposed the earlier work, in giving ouly a selection of Irish martyrs and including many valuable notices coarerning those of various lagds (Forbes, Siottish C'alendars, pp. xiv-xvii).
Literature.-Our article is maialy drewn from De' Rossi (Roma Sotterranea, t. i. pp. 111-1 18 , 12!-128; t. ii. pp. iii- $\mathrm{x} \times \mathrm{xii}$ ). The preface by Baronius to the Roman Martyrology, the disseltations and aotes of Sollier (Usuardinum Mar-tyroloyium, apud Acta SS. Bolland. Jun. t. vl. in Migue, Patrol. cxxiii.), and of Fiorentini ( Vetustits Occidentulis Ecclesiae Martyrolygium, luase, 1667) are to he consulted. De Smedt (Introductio generalis ad Historian ecelesi stricam critice tractandam, pp. 127-140, 193-197, Lourain, 1876) translates De' Rossi on the lesser Roman martyrRoman martyrelogy (p. 1+1 fit), and the actual fical aad martyrology of Philocalus in his ap. pendix. He had intended to give a list of all extant calcadars and martyrolegies, but found the task toe arduous. De Sinedt states that four Jacobite calendars are edited by the Assemanis, Bibliot hecae Vaticanne MA'S. t. ii. codd. 37, 39, 68, and three orthodox Syrian calendars (ibid. pp. 18, 114, 151), one of which is taken from Miniscalco's Jerusalem Evangclis ${ }^{+}$arium (Veronn, 1861). Two more of the orthodo. Syrian are given oy Ma: (Scriptores Veteres, t. ii. pt. ii. Ipl. 46, 169). Four Coptic caleudars are pablinhel, two by Mai (ibid. pp. 14, 93), and two by Selden (de Synedriis). The secons of Sclden's' is re-edited by Ludolif; and collated with a far more valuable Ethiopic calendar of about the 12 th century (commentarius ad Historiam Acthionicam, pp. 389-436). No nncieat and tuthentic Armeniun calendars are known. De Buck has written a treatise, Des Culendriers Urientaux, in De Backer, Bibfiothè pue des écrivains do la Com, agnie de Jésus, t. iii. p. $38: 3$.

For Western Martyrologies we may refer to Binterim (lycnkü̈rdigke ten der hirche, Mainz, 18:29, t. v. pt. i. pp. 42-73). A number of monastic martyrologies and calendars are givea by Martene (Collectio Amplissina, t. vi.), and by Migne - namely, a Gallicaa calendar, Patrol. Ixni. 607 ; one by Protadins of Besancon, A.D. bis, lxxx. 411; na English calendar, xciv. 1147 ; d calendar of Molena, cvi. 821; of Mantua, uxxriii. 1257; of Brescia, 1985; two of Val. lombrosa, 1279; of Lucea, 1291; ;ne ascribed to Bede, 139:1 ; of Fleury, 1185; of Stavelo, bear Liege, 1194; of Werthen, uear Cologne, 1203; of Auxerre, 1209.

The Naples marble has been discussed in three volumes 4 to by Mazzochi and in twelve volumes $4 t_{0}$ by Sabbatini. It is the most authentic example of an early Greek calendar.

the testival is fonad in the first chapter of the Acts of the tenth council of Toledo, which was held A.D. 653. The council declares that, whereas the Feast of the lloly Virgin was kept at dillerent times in differeat places in Spain, and could not be kept in Lent without transgressing traditional rule, it should be observed on the octave before Chri tmas day. The rule to which reference is hice made is the 51st canon of the council of laodicea, held in the 4th century, which forbids the observance of the Nativities of Martyrs (a phrase which at that time was equivalent to Holy days) in Lent. ${ }^{b}$ The second reference to the festival is found in the acts of the council in Trullo, held A.D. 692, which permitted the observance of this holy day in Lent, while it coatinued the Laodicean prohibition of all others.c The date of the institntion of the festival may therefore be fixed as being at the end of the 6 th or the begianing of the 7th century. The couacil of Metz makes no mention of it among the festivals ordered by it to be observed in the year of our Lord 813 (can. xxxvi.) ; nor does it appear in company with the Purifieation in the list of festivals given in the Capitularies of Charles the Great or Ludvig (Capit. ab Anscgiso c. lheta, lib. i. § 158 ; ii. § 83).

Thic dute in the calendur is March 25th, as beiug nine months before the nativity of Christ. St. Augustine speaks of March 25 th as being the day on which it was believed that the conception of our Lord took plate, inasmuch as bec. 25 th was regarded as the day of his birth (le Trin. lit, iv. c. v., Op. tom. viii. p. 89+, ed. Migne). T'be Armenian church, which observes Jia. nith as the Nativity as well as the Epiphany of Christ, has not the Festival of the Annanciation in its caleudar.

Like the Feast of the Purification, this festival was instituted in honour of our Lord, and in commemoration of his conception ; but it proe bably pussed nore readily and quickly than the sister festival trum the list ot the Duminiean to that of the Mnrian Festivals, as the original idea is not preserved in its title (as it is in the Hypapante), except in the behiopian calendar, where it is not called the Aununciation but the Conception of Christ.
The purpuse, therefore, of the festival is to commemorrite (1) the announce, ent made by the augel Gabriel to St. Mary that she should conceive and bring torth the promised Mesiah, and (2) the conception of our Lorl which tollowed that announcement (luke i. 26-38). The place where this anomicement was nale was the house in Nazareth it which St. Mary lived. The legend of Loretto has transterred this house to Italy; the exact sjot where it took phace is nevertheless pminted out both by Gireeks and Latias, a different spot by eatch, as still existing uи J'alestine.
3. The Assumpton (Koíunars, Metántaris, Dirmitio, Patesatio, T̈ransitus, Depusitio, Digrutio, Assumptio).
Its institution.--This festival was institutel, according to the statement of Nicephorus Cal-

[^15]listus (Hist. Eccles. lib. xvii. c. 28), by the emperor Maurice, who lived at the close of the 6 th and the beginning of the 7th century 6th and the beginning of the 7th century. In the time of Charles the Great, two centuries later, its observance wns not yet universal in the West (C 1 it., $a b$ Ansegiso collect t, lib. i. § 158 , apud Migne, Patrolog. tom. xevii. p. b33, Paris, 1851). ${ }^{\text {d }}$ But it appears to have been received after deliberation by Charles, and it is recognised by his son Ludvig in the year 818 or 819 (ibid. lib. ii. c. 35, p. 547). An oetave was added to the lestival by pope l.eo IV., A.D. 847.
Its date in the calendur is August 15 th.
The purpose of the festival is to comen
The purpose of the lestival is to commemorate the assumption of St. Mary into heaven in body and soul. The origin of the belief that she was so assumed, and the steps by which it grew are as tollows:-
In the 3rd or 4th century there was composed a book, enbodying the Gnostic and Collyridian traditions as to the death of St. Mary, called De Transitu Vigginis Marice Liber. The book exists still, and may be found in the Bibliothea still, and may be tound in the Bibliotheca Patrum Maxim, (tom, ii. pt. ii. p. 21 2). The Jegend contained in it relates how St. Mary, atter her Son's death, went and lived at Bethlehem for twenty-one years, atter which time an angel appeared to her, and told her that her soul should be taken trom her thody. So she was walted on a cloud to Jerusalern, and the apostles, who had been miraculously gathered together, calried her to Gethsemnne, and there her soul was taken up into Paralise by Gabriel. Then the apostles bure her body to the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and laid it in a new tomb; and saddenly by the side of the tomb appeared her son Christ, who raised up her body who raised up her body lest it should see corruption, and reuniting it with her soul, which Nichael brought back from Paradise, had her conreyed by angels to hearea.
It will be seen that the Liver de Transitu Ahtriue contains already the whole of the story ot the Assumption. But down to the end of the ith century this story was regarded by the church as a Gnostic or Collyridian table, and the Liber de Tronstutu was condemned as lieretical by the Decretum de Lithrix Canonicis Eicch-sias. ticis et Apocryphis, attributed to pope Gelasius, A.D. 494. How then did it pass across the borders and establish itself within the chnurch, so as to have a testival appuinted to commemorate it ? In the following manuer:-
In the sixth century a great change passed neer the reatiments and the theology of the church in reference to the $\theta$ eutóros-an uniutended but very noticeable result of the Nestorian controversies, which in maintaining the true doctrine of the Incarnation iacilentally gave a strong impulse to what became the Worship of st. Mary. In consequence of this-change of sentiment, during the 6th nad 7 th centuries (or later), (1) the Liber de Trunsitu, though clased by (ielasius with the known productions

The purpose of the festival is to commemorate the birth ot St. Mary as it is recounted in the apercyphal gospels, the Protevangelion, and the Goipel ot the Birth of Mary. Nuthing whatever ts known of St, Mary's birth. We do not kaow the names of her pareats, or anything at all about her early lite. When we have stated that she was ot the tribe of Judah and descended from Davil, that she had a sister anmed, like herselt, Mary, and that she was conaected by marriage with Elizabeth, we have said all that ean be known with respect to her previous to her betrothat to Joseph. But as early as the 9ad or Brd century there were composed and disseminated anong the Gaestics. the Protevangelion, anal the Gospel of the Birth of Mary, yhich are an rpplication and adaptation of the history of our Lord's birth and childheod to St. Mary. The legead, as contained in these ayocryphal gospels, narrates that Joachim and Anna, of the ratee of David, lived piously together as hus and and wife for twenty years at Nazareth; thot at the end of this time Joachim was roughly rebuked by the high priest, and Anna bitterly Jeered at iy her maid, because they had no child; that Joachim went into the wilderness chid; that Jonchim went into the wilderness aad fasted for torty days, and Anna went into aad fasted for torty days, and Anna went into her garden and prayed that she might have a her garden and prayed that she might have a Anna, and promised her a child; and Joachim returned, and the child was born, and her name Was called Mary (Giles, Codex Apocryphus Noci Testamenti, 1Pp. 33, 47, Lond. 1847). These legends of St. Mary's birth we:e repadiated by the early chureh, and regarded by it as belonging to a bofy external and hostile to itselt. Like the legrads of her death, they crept into the chnreh legonds of her death, they crept into the ehnreh in the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries. Pope Benediet XIV, allows that "there is nothing about her nativity in Holy Seripture, and all that is said about it is drawn from turbid fountains," which he explains to mean the Protevangelion and the he explains to mean the Protevangelien uad the

5. The Presintation (Tà eiadsia tท̂s

Its institution.-The Festival of the Presentatim of St. Mary at the Temple is supposed by some to have been established at Constaatinople about A.t. 3.30. There is certain evidence of its existence there in A.D. 1150 . Bnt it did not pass iato the West iill A.d. 1375. (See 1 aunoius, heyii Nararrae Gymnasii Parisiensis IIistoria, pt. i. e. 10, p. 77 , Paris, 1677 .) It was withdrawn from the Roman calendar by Pius V., but restored by sistus V. on the prayer of

Its puppose is to commemorate the presentrtion ot'St. Mary as narrated in the Gnostic legead Which is embedied in the Protevangelion nad the Gispjel ot the Birth of Mary. 'lhe degend states

This festival, like the last, clams to have been instituted at the date of the event commemorated by it, but there is no evidence of its observance before the 9th century. Its purpose is to commemorate (1) the discovery of the supposed girdle of St. Mary dius, (\%) (aceording to the Menaeon) of Arcadius, (2) its translation to Constantinople in supposed to hive bian, and (3) a miraculous cure supposed to hive been wrought by it on Zoe the phorus Callist Philosopher, A.D. 886. 8. The Svnaxis of the Theotokos and of Joserli Her Spouse.-This festival was probably instituted, at Constantinople, it about the same date us the twe previously named festivals, though, like them, it claims a much carlier date, appeal being made to a spurious sermon of Epiphanius, supposed to have been delivered on the day. The dute in the calencler nad the purpose of its institution are closely connected. It is observed on Dec. 26, as being a contiuuation of the Christmas festival, the mind being turned on the first day to the San, and on the seconl day to the mother. The word 'Synaxis,' derived from ouváyea, me:ns in the first place an assembly of worshippers, and thence (in the preseat connexion) a commemoration festival held by those so assembled.
9. The Protection of the Most holy Motiler of God.-This festival was in-tituted in the beginuing of the 10 th century. The day in the calendar of the Russian church ou which it is observed is Oct. 1. Its purpose is to commemorate a vision which St. Andrew, surnnmel "the Foolish," or "the ldiot," said that his had in the chureh of Blachernae, Constantinuple, in which he supposed himself to have seen St, Mary, with prophets, apostles, and augels, pray.

 Its institution. - Legend Marine I'irginis). festival was institated relates that this Helsinus, who had been sent by Willin albat England to Denmark, and being eaught in a stor'm on his return, and nuldressing prayers for help to St. Mary had n vision of a grave eeclesiastic upon the waves, who promised him satety on eondition of his establishing the Festival of the Conception of St. Mary on Dee. 8. This legend is assigned to St. Anselm as its nothor in the Legenta Aurea, and the synod of London held under archbinhop Mepeham, A.D. I328, appears to have believed it to rest on his authority (Const. 2). It may be found in Migne's Patrologia (tom, clix. p. 325), relegated to the appendix of St. Anselm's works. Another form of the same lesend pots St. Anselm himself in the place of Helsinus as the hero of the story, and represents the scene to have oceurred as he was returning from England to Bee (l'etr. de Natalibus, Catal. Sanet, lib, i. c. xiii.). Passing / from legend to history we find that the festival originated in the 12 th Berory, It was at once condenmed by St. Bernard as (1) novel, (2) heterodox, (3) unauthoMen. laris, $1 ; 90$ ). In the 1 th century it was made obligatery in England by the folle wing constitation of Simon Mepeham, archbishof of Canterbory, which wax accepted by a l'rovinpialsyend held in London in the year 1328 . "That the memory* wi the Blessed Virgin Mary, more solemnly celehrated, in in be oftener and greater tavour which she in prenortion to the hath found with Gool, who ardaig ail the saints tion to be the predestinated temporal eroneepHis only begotten Son und the salvationgin of men; that by this means the remote dawaings of our salvation, which raise spiritual jors in pious minds, night inerease the devotion and salvation of all; following the steps of our venerable predecessor Anselm, who after other more ancient solemuities of hers thought tit to add that of her conception, we ordain and firmly command flat the Feast of the Conception aforesaid be solemuly celebrated for the future in all the churehes of the province " (Const. ii., Hook, Liecs of the Arohhisheps of Cunterivury, vol. iii.p. 499, Lond. $18 \mathrm{i}, \mathrm{i}$ ). p. 499, Leal. 18i,i).

The purpose of the festival was originally, quoted constitution of and and the above quoted constitution of archbishop Mepeham plainly states, not to celebrate ni immaculato or even a holy conception, but simply to commemorate the fact of the conception of St. Fary, the mother of Christ, in imitation of the Festival of the Annuneiation, which commemorate. the conceptlon of her Son. But, as St. Bernard clearly saw, its tendency from the beginning was to induce a bellef in the supernatural charactur of the eonception of St. Mary, and so to lend on to the doctrine of the Inmaculate Conception. For this reason he sharply reproved the eanons of Lyons for having adinitted it. "It has been vouchsafed," he writes, " to a very tew of then sons of men to be born holy, but to none to be conceired holily; that the prerogative of a holy conception might be kept for One only who should sinnetify nll and make a eleansing of sins, being himself the only One who eomes withont sin. It is the Lord Jesus Christ alone that was conerived by the Holy Ghost, for He alone was holy betore His conception. Excepting Him, the womble and true confession of one who silys, 'I whs shapen in iniquity and in sin dill my mother' conceive me,' applies to every one else of Adtam's enildren. Then what can be the meaning of a festival of her conception? How can a concepSpion be arad to be holy which is not of the Holy it irit, not to say, which is of sin? or how can it be regarded as a manter for festivity when it enough to ? The glorions woman will be reatly either to go without an honour which seems which didnour $\sin$ or to attribute $n$ holiness which St not exist " (Eipist. elxxiv.). The dogma which St. Bernnrd opposed was that of a holy conception of St. Mary. The idea of her immacuwate conception had not arisen in his time. This Was first proposed as a possibility by J. Duns of the 14 the end of the 13th or the beginning Dec. 8 , 1854 century, and six centories Inter, on sary for all, it was pronounced n dogma necesif they desire salvation of the papacy to believe but, like Johs the Buptist, sanctified befure her birth. From the 14th to the 18th century teaching nad belief in the Latin church wavered between a maculate and an immaculate conceptinn according as the Dominicuns or Franciso cans were most powerful at Rome. In the 19th century it was formally declared by pope Jius IX. that St. Mury, having been conceived inumaculately, was absolutely exempt from original nud from actual sid. This belief of the Latin ehureh is regneded Dy the Greek church (wee Couferace between the Abp. of Syros and the 1ip. of Hionchester, Lond. 1871), and by the Anglican church (see Bp. Wilberforee, Rome, her new Doyma and our Duties, Oxf. 1855), not only as uatrue in fact, but as heretical in its tendencies.

The day in the calendar fixed for this festival is Dec. 8 , as being nine months before Sept. 8, which was regarded in the 12th century as the Nativity of St. Mary. The Eastern churches observe it on Dee. 9 .
11. Sr. Mary at Snowe (Festum Dedicationis S. Alarice ad Aives).

Its institution.-This festival was instituted As a local abniversary, and observed in the basilica of Sta. Maria Maggiore as early, it would seem, as the 12th century. Its observance was extended throughout Rome in the $1+$ th century, and made obligatory on all Roman Christendom by Pius $V$ in the 16 th century.
Its purpose is to celebrate the legendary foundation of the church of Sta. Maria Maggiore in Rome. The Ingend says that in the 4th century Rome. The legeod says that in the 4th century one John and his wife, having no children, were auxious to devote their sulstance to St. Mary, but did not know how to do so acceptably to her, until they each had a dream telling them that they would find soow on the greund marking out the spot whereon they were to build a e.thedral. Tley weat to Liberius, the pope of liome, and fuund that he had had the same dream; and behold, the soow was lying (on the Dth of August) on the Esquiline io the shape of A cathedral. So they built Sta. Maria Maggiore. The Breviary (Aug. 5) contains the legend. It probably arose from an attempt to explain the name ct l lieses, which may itielf be the corruption of some lost word-possibly of ad Li , or or ad Livise-as the chureh was built jucta maceltun Lieiac ; or of Liber., as it was known by the title Liberiusa: or of in Esq., as it was built (1u) the Esquiline Hill. The story rests on the authority of manaceripts belonging to the cathedral body, which might easily have become dithcult to decipher in the hypse of centuries, and of Peter de Natalibus, a collector of worthless legends, who lived in the lith century. The miracle is first mentioned by Nicholas IV. in the year A.D. 1287, that is, 927 years after it way said to have taken place. Gregory XI., A.D. 13:71, and Pius 11., A.D. 1453, have given the sanction of their authoricy to it. The origiaal legend stated that the earth opened of its own accord for the foundations, on Liberius beginning to dig them. But this part of the miracle was expunged from the Breviary by I'ius $V$., while he left the part relating to the snow. The date in the calendar is Aug. 5 .

Thero was a sitter festival, called St. A1any at Martyrs, held on May 13, to commemorate the dedication of the Pantheon, or Rotuada, to 12. Tue Visitation (Visitutio Beatae Marie Virginis).

Its institution.-This festival was institutell by Urban VI. during the schism in the papacy and promulgated by a constitution of his suctcessor Bonitace IX., A.D. $1: 389$ (Bulla Bonif cili ix. apud Bollandi Acta Sunct rum, July 2) About half a century Inter, A.D. 1441, it was again established by the council of Basle, no reference being made to its previous iostitution, because Bonitace's authority was not acknowledged by all the members of the council. Ths whole of session 43 is occupied with the inatter (Conc. Busil. apud Harduin, Concil. tom. viii.
p. 1:92).
The purpose of the festival is to commemorate the visit paid by St. Mary to Elizabeth betore the birth of John the Baptist at Juttah or, it may be, Hebron. Joachim Hildebranhl snys, that "it was instituted at the council of banle to supplicate Mary to trample down the Turks, the enemies of the Christians, ns she trod upon the mountains of Judaea ou her why to her cousin" (De Priscae et Primitivae Ecelesine sacris publicis templis ao diebus festis, Helmstadt, 1652). As it Is a seriptural fact commemorated by it, the festival is retained in the Anglicnn calendar in spite of its late date. The date in the calentar is July 2.
13. Tue Espousals (Desponsatio Beatae Vir. ginis Mariue cum S. Josepho).
Its institution and purpose.-A canon of the cuthedral of Chartres, in the 1 then century, ehnrged the chapter in his will to institute A commemoration of St. Juseph, with the view of pleasing Mary. Gerson, chancellor of the wiversity of Paris, proposed to the chapter to carry out this object by using an Uffieiun Desponsationix Beatae Viryinis cuin S. Jos'pho eomposed by himself. In the 16 th century Paul III. desired an office to be prepared tor the day, and he gare his approbation to it after it hal been drawn up. The observauce of the festival was extendel by Benedict XIII., A.D. 17.25. It is of obligation in Spain, Italy, England, and in all congregations of the Jeruits. The ring used at the expoussils is said by Benediet XIV. to be still preserved at Perugia (In Fest. Desponsationis npud Migne, Theot. Curs. Compl. tom. xxi. p. 531, Paris, 1842). The date in the calcntar is dute in the calcnlar is Jan. 23.
14. The Nimbe of Maby (Festuin SS. Nominis Beatae MArriae).
This testival was instituted in Spain at the beginning of the 1 tith eentury. It was removed from the calendar by Pius $\dot{V}$, and restored by Sixtus V., on the prayer of cardinal Deza. It was made of universal obligation by Innocent XI., A.D. 1685 , in gratitude for the defeat of the Turks before Viena. Its purpose is to encourage putting contidence in the name of Mary. Its dute in the calendar is the Sumang following the Feast of the Nativity, that is sbous Sifo, 15 .

George Haller, dean of the benedu:tine monastery of Kiehach in Bavaria, assured Brusehins that he instituted it in the district committed to his pastoral charge in the year of our Lurd 1545. (See Bruschius, Cai on. Mometeriorum (iernumite, p. 658 , Sulzbaci, 1168. .) It was made of universal wbligation throughont Rumau Christendom by a deerce of Benefiet XIII., A.D. 17:7.
The purpose of the lestival is to comnamorate St. Mary in her charaeter of Mater Dolorosa.
This is the only festival in the Roman calendar which is observed twiee in the course of the year. The second conmemoration is of very late institution. Its dates are the Frilay preceding Good Friday, and the third Sunday in september.
16. The Rosary (Festum SS. Rosarii Beatue Mariue lirginis).
This fextival was first instituted on the ocension of the detent of the Turks at Lepanto, Oct, 7, 1571. As a memorial of this event Pios V. ordered that a commemoration of St. Mary of Victory should be held every year. Gregory XIII. changed the title to that of the Rosary of St. Mary, because the companies of the most Holy Rosary had been walking in proceson the say ing the Rosnry or Ponlter of St. Mary on the day of batile, Clement X . made its obgervance ebligatory throughout Spala, A.D. 1575. Leopold to make it of universal obligation, but he died befire the emperor's desire could be complied with. It was made of universal obtigation by Clement Xl,, on the oceasiua of the defeat of the Turks by l'rince Eugene, A.D. 1716. Its date in the culundar is the first Sunday in October. Its purpore is to recommend the devotion of the Rosilly or Psalter of the Virgia, which consists of the reeitation of IJO Ave Jheri's together posel, but with Nosters. This devotion is supbeen instituted sufficient evidence, to have is statel by St, Altonse Domiaic, A.D. 1210, who proved its eflicacy in the de Liguori to have ". They moreover added that they had no power over the servants of Mary, mind that many by invoking her name nt death were saved cont rary to their deserts. They concluded, saying, 'We are foreed to dellare that no one is lost who perseveres in devotion to Mary and in that of the most Holy Rosary ; for Mary obtains for those who are sinners tree repentance betore they die.' St. Dominic then made the peopla Hail Mary tovaly; and, 0 prodigy 1 at every Hail Mary, evil spirits left the body of the possessed mann under the form of rei-hot coals, so that when the Rosary was finished, he was en-

I'his festival wasiastituted in the lith century, first tor the order de Mercede, then for sprin, and then for Fratace. Its observance was extended to ull Roman Christendom by Inaocent XII.

Its purpose is to commemorate an alloged apo pearallee of St. Mary, which is sall to have callased the institution of the order de Mercede. 'The member of the order, hesldes taking the rows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, bound themvelves to redeem captives by delivering themsolves into slavery.

The dute in the calender Is Sept. 24.
The remaining festivals, the Hetr' of Citristiane, the Must Pure: Heart, the Maternity, the I'cuity, have special inasses, suuctioned by popes, and appolinted to be said In England und in the desnit coogregations, bat they have hardly yet become recognised festivals.

The S'aturday hegan to be appropriated to St. Mary's bunour by an appointment of Urban II., A.b. lu9ts. This was made of universal obligation by l'ius V., A.d. 1568.

It will be seen from the above that the two festivals of the Purification and the Annunciation were instituted as early as the 6 th century, atd that they were orighinilly festlonas of our Lard rather than of St. Nary. The Assumption, the Nitivity, and the I'resentation, which illuse trate the early Gaostic legealls of St, Mary's birth and death, belong to the 7 th and the beginnis,

MARY, &I., THE VIRGIN (IN ART), The history of the Virgin Mary in Art corresponds to that of our blessed Lord in the complete absence,

In the early ages of the church, of any representations ot her person haviog the smallest claim to autbentlelty. The words of St. Augustine (ide Trinitute, IIb, vili. c. 5) are "xpress on this point: "Neque novlimms fielem Virginis Marime;" while whit he says of the ditterent illeas furnued by dillirent persons of her lineaments, all probably widely at varlance with the truth, inullcates not only the absence of any recognined type of portrait, bust alus that pictures of her were of extreme rarity, if indeed they exintel at all.
Wheo found the Virgin Mary nplears in all the enuliest representations as a member of an historical group depuetlog a scriptural subject, such as the Aananciation, the Visitatlon, the Natlvity, the Alloration of the Migl, the I'resentation in the Temple, an:l Christ monong the Doctors, By far the most frequent is the Alloration of the Magi, which recurs in countless examples of all the varions forms of c'brintinn ort-carved on sarcophagi, seulptured on ivories, or deprictel in the mesaics of the basilicas, and the frescoes of the catacombs, thas evilearing the hold that subject had gained on the mind of $t e$ early Christian chureh. [Magi, Abomation of rine.] The Nativity without the Magi is of very rare occurrence, being only found on mhou works of art, such as coins, geans, ivories, or sareophagl [Nativity]. The Annunuiation also appears very seldom. It is represented in one of the compartmeats of the rast mosaic eomposition Rat elothes the western fice of the arch of Triumph in S. Maria Maggiore in Rome (c, a. D. (i,3). In this the Virgin, richly rubed, but nthout a nimbus, is seated in a charr, behind which two nimhed angels stand; the archangel Gabriel stands in front, while the IIoly Dore hovers above in the air, together with a second Gabriel. This mosaic also inclules two nther subjects, in addition to the Aduration of the Migi (see woodeut Angels, Vol. 1. p. 84), in which the Virgin ajpears, viz, the Presentation in the Temple, and Christ among the Doators, In all these subjects the Virgin hats her head uncovered, is without the uimbus, nad is very richly clad in a gold tove, and is decorated with earriags, necklace, and head jewels. (See Ciampini, let. Mon. vol. i. p. 207, tav. li.; D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. x xi. no. 4, S. Kens. Museum, no. 7445.) The Aanunciation is also found on the north wall of the apse of the Cathedral of Parenzo, in Istria, with the Visitation opposite to it. The Virgin is here seated, with her head encircled by a nimbus, at the door of a small gabled enttage, anl the angel stands before her. A later example is seen in the mosaies of St. Nerens and St. Achilleus nt Rome, a.d. 796, The catneomb of St. Priscilla contains a fresco, which may very probably he identified with this same subject. In this, the draving of which is excellent (see wooldut No. 1), we have a young man fully clothed, without wings or any of the later nagelic attributes, with extended right hand, addressing a seated femnle, who with downeast ejes and uplifted left hand seems to be receiving the speaker's message with devout submission. The earlier illustrators of the catacombs were far from expressing the certainty now exhibited as to the subject of this piciure, Boxia says that it is impossible to determine what story it repre-

The beatuty of the composition, and the dignity and graee of the figures, together with the treediom of their nction, so unlike the peverty and stiffuess which characterise the iater tirescoes, point to an early dinte. De' Ressi assigns it to the reign of Trajnn or Hadrian, or at the latest to the time of the Antonines, i. e. the close of the 2 nd or beginning of the 3 rd century, while Mr. J. II. the cemetery of St. Priscilln. It can hardly be placed earlier than the first yenrs of the 5 th century, though De' Rossi assigns it to the time of Ccustantine. it represents quarter-length figures of $n$ mother and child, the latter standing in tiont. clothed in a blue tunic up to the neck. The nuther stands behind, vested in a green tunic, and a pallinm falling over her arms, with her head covered with a veil and circlet of beads round her neck, and extends her arms in the attitude of prayer. Neither have the nimbus. The sacred monogram $\mathcal{F}$ on either aide is turned towarda the group. This picture is generally recognised as that of the Virgin Mary and the infant Christ, bat the identification cabnot be considered beyond question. Bottari, following Bosio, considered it merely a memorial of the persons buried in the sepulchral reeess. This idea is streogthened by the frequent occurrence of portraits in the same position in other arcosolia which are uncuestionably of that character (cf. Bosio, pp. 473, 499). lts identification with the Virgin and her' Divine Soo is asserted by Garrucci (Arti cristiane primitite, vol. ii. tav. 66, no. 1), by Marchi (p. 157), (who has some excelleut remarks on the infinite distance between the Mother and the Sun, indicated by the fact that she alone is represented as in the act of jrayer), and De' Rossi ( /mag, Select. pl. vi.), and is nccepted by the judicious Munter (Siunhililer, tom. ii. p. 128) and Wharton Marriott (u.s. pp. 28, 29). (See Bosio, p. 471; Bottari, cliii.) There is also a seated female figure with unveiled head giving suck to a naked infant, gives by Bosio ( $\mathrm{p}, 549$ ), and Bottari (tav. 180), from the , cemetery of St. Priscilla, which may be reasonably illeatified with the Virgin and Holy Child. It deserves remark that this group occupies a subordinate position in the right-hand corner of the lunette, a tall add atately matron, as an orante, identified by Basio with Priscilla herself, being the central object. But the whole subject of this lunette is obscure. Among the few uudoubted pictures of the Virgla, furnished by the catacombs, there are two of late date given by Porret. In both she is accompanied by her Son. Neither can be placed earlier than the 9th century. That from the baptistery of Valerian under the church of St. Urban alla Caffarella, a rude nad ignorant work, representa the Virgin in of blue veil over a rod tubic, holding Christ on her knees in the act of benediction. $\widetilde{M P} \overline{\operatorname{OV}}$ is inscribed above the group

The second class of representations, viz. those in which the Virgin appenrs alone, without her Divine Son, while it supplies a very large number of possible examples, furnishes very few that can be certainly identified with the Mother of our Lord. No object is of more frequent occt:rreace in every form of early Christian art, on sarcophagi and monumental slabs, on gilded glasses, in moaaics, and especially in the catacomb trescoes, than the su-called "oranti," i. e. standing figurea, with the arms extended in what was of old the ordinary attitude of prayer. These figures are of both sexes, but the females tar,rely predominate, and are represented either aline, which is the more usanl practice, or supported by a mala figure on either hand. These "oran' i " were generaily unhesitatingly regarded by Bosin, Ariaghs, Boldetti, and the earlier investigators, as memorial pictures of the individuals iuterred below. Others conslder the female "ovanti" to be bymbolical representations of the Church. This view is stated by Martigny (Eglise, p. 226, §2) as well as by Garrucci ( letri, tav. xxxix. n. 3) and is far trom Improbable. One or two are considered by Bosio to be pictures of the Virgin, though it is difficult to see on what principle he distloguishes them from the others $\mathrm{De}^{\prime}$ Rossi, on the other hand, and his translaters, Messrs. Northcote and Brownlow, have adopted the opposite rule of interpretation, and have thus enlarged the list of supposed catacomb-frescoes of the Virgin to an almost indefinite extent, and certainly far beyond what the facts admit. Dr. Northcute allows that the female oranti may possibly in some lastances have "denoted somis martyr or person of distinction buried in the principal tomb of the cubiculum where the painting is found " (R.S p. 255). But in forgetfulness of the fact that male oranti and children are often found in preciaely the same positions and with the same surronndings, and that the names of the individuals are not unfrequently glven, he speaks of this as only a "conjecture" which "may possibly be sometimes correct," but which he "feels certain is inadmissible in the great majority of cases" (u. 8.). The combination of the figure of a female orante in the same system of decoration with that of the Good Shepherd, which the former by Dr. Northcote as evidence that may be rar was inteaded for that of the Virgin, of ornamentation, on which as a conventional rule built. The dove which we from St. Agnes (Bosio, p. 461)-might be supposed to indicate the Virgin did we not find it in precisely the same combination on the closing slab of ordinary loculi, with the name of the person represented annexed, e.g. Bosio, p. 508, "Constantius Deciae conjugi qune vixit mecum anoos xxxiii." Neither are the supporting mnle figures to the right and lelt of the orante-usually, and with great, probability, identified with St. Peter and St. Paul, whose names are often, especinlly on the gilded glasses, inseribed ubove them-altogether infallible marks. Too pass from glasses to monumental slabs. A very curious example, which can hardly be plared later than the 4th century, Is found in the reypt of St. Mary Magdalene at St. Maximin in Provence (Martigny, art. lierge, p. 660 ; Mncarius, Hayioglypta, 3t; Le Blant, Inser. Chret. de lit Gaule, ii. 2i7; Fiillon, Monumens inédits sur $l^{\prime} A /$ /ostoltat de St. MI. Magd. i. p. 775). Here the Virgin is represented alone, unnimbed, in the attitude of prayer, with long hair flowing down umon her breast. The inscription, rudely incised on the slab, runs thus, "Maria Virgo Minester de Tempulo Gerosale." There is an evident reference here to the legend recorded in the apoeryphal gespels of the Virgin having spent her early geirs in holy ministrations in the Temple. (Protecung. Jacohi, \$7, 8; Evang. Pseudo-Matth. \& 4-6: Eirang. Natic, Mariae, § 6, 7.)

The earliest instance of a single figure of the Virgin in mosaic is that in the vault of the tribune of the chapel of St. Veuantius at St. John Lateran. This is the work of Byzantine artists under the Greek popes John IV. and Theodore, $6+0-6+9$. The upper portion of the mosaic gives a medallion bust of Christ supported by two nagels, immediately below stands the Virgin with her arms outstretched and the palms expandel, as the central figure, with six of the ajostles on either aide of her. Both she and they have the same aimbus with Christ and the angels. She is dressed in a dark blue tunic and White veil, with a small cross on her bosem. (Ciampini, ii. p. 107, tab. xxxi.; D'Agincourt, Peintures, xvii. 1.) Similar but rather later mosaic pictures of the Virgin as un orante exist above the altar of the arehiepiseopal chapel nt Ravenna, saved from the wreek of the former eathedral, nad in the Capella Ricen, in the church of St. Mark, Florence, broug't from the old chureh of St Peter, at Rome, dnted A.D. 703. There is also at Ravenna, in the church of Sta. Maria in Porto, a bas-relief of the Virgin as an orante (woodent No. 6), of Greek workmanship, probably of the 6th or 7th century.

No. 8. Oreolk Ban rellef al Bra. Maria-in-Horto, Llavenna (6ih
Her features are very regular and beautiful, quite of the Greek type. Crosses are embroidered on the wrists, shoulders, and knees of her tunic, and on the borders of the mantle. Her head is veiled nad aurrounded by a nimbus. The contracted forms of Mйтŋp Beov̀ are inscribed above on either side.
The condemoation of the Nestorian heress by the council of Ejphesus, A.D. 431, gave a powerful impulse to the production of pictures of "the Mother of God," which was never subsequently lost. From this period the Virgin and lofaut Christ became the symbol of the orthodox taith, which was represented in every possibie wnin, in paintings and mosaics, in seulpture, and garments, personal ornaments, and fi. There was no attempt to produce a port , ot simply to portray the ideal Ocutóros as a theological symbol. The type adopted was probably not a new one. It has been observed by Mrs. Jameson (legends of the Madonia) thint St. Cyril of Alexandria, who played se important a part in this controversy, and had so much to do in fixing the dogma, niust in his episcopal clty have become familiar with the Egyptian group of Isis nursing the infant Horus, which may have suggested the naalogous Christian subject, even as at an earlier date the Good Shepherd was derived from a classical type. It is just after the conneil of Ephesus that we meet with the first professedly authentic portrait of the Virgin-an Interesting instance of the new demand creating a supply. This is the famous Hodejptri, ('O8 $\eta$ $\boldsymbol{\gamma} \eta \mathrm{p} \rho(\mathrm{a})$, which was for so many centuries re garded with the deepest reverence by the Greeks, as an imperial palladium, and borne in a superb car or litter to the battle-field when the emperol led the army in person. It had been oxiginally sent from Jerusalem in 438 by the young empress Eudocia ns a present to her sister-in-law l'ulcheria, and was placed by the latter in the church of the Hodegi, 'Oonjru', erected by lier. (Niceph. Callist. xiv. 2, xv. 14.) The picture was on panel, $\langle\pi l$ oavid, and was asserted to have been painted from the life by St. Luke. This pieture held the first rank among the so-called partraits of the Virgin, and was repeatedly oopied as au authentio portrait. The true type is giveo by D'Agincourt (Peinture, pl. 87), by Garrucci (Arti cristiune primitive, tav. 107, fig. 3, 4), and by Grimouard de Saint-Iaurent (Art chrefien, vol. iii. pl.iv. oo. 1). It is characterisel by the true Byzantine rigidity and flatness. The ber left arm, carrying a roll in His left hented on blessing with His right. His nimbus is cruciform. hers a plain circle. from its being preserved in the church built by from its being preserved in the church built by as llachernae. The type, according to Garrucci (u. s. vol. iii. p. 13 ff ), is given on coins of Constantine XII., Monomachus (Sabatier, xlix. 12), and leo IV. (ib. xlv. 11). All these pictures and the coins of the Eastern empire exhibit the same hieratic type which established itself in Byzantine art. "This type," writes Deaa Milman (Hist. of Christianity, iii. p. 394), "gradually degencrates with the darkness of the age and the decline of art. The countenance sweetly amiling on the child becomes sad and severce. The head is bowed with a glonmy and almost sinister expression, and the countenance gradually darkens till it assumes a black coleur. At length eren the sentiment of materonl affection is effaced, both the mother and child become stiff and lifeless, the clinld is swathed in stiff bands, and has an exjression of pain rather than of gentleness, or placid infancy."

According to De' Rossi (Imag. Selectue, p. j4) there was oo fixed rule for the representation of the Virgin on the coins of the Byzantine empethe Holy Be of which she is represented with On a coin Babe, sometimes alone, ns an orante. On a coin of Leo Vl. Philosophus, A.D. 886-911, arms Jer hed and draped, with outstretched arms. Her head is noble in character, and is not nimbed. On n coin of Romanus II., A.D. 959-463, she is aimbed and crowns the emperor, an ollice she is represented as pertorming almost constantly on the imperial colns of the two next centuries. The earliest coin on which the Virgin and Child appear together is ooe of John Zimisces, A.D. 969-976. She holds against her bosom a circular nimbus, within which is the bust of the lofant
Christ. Christ.o [Money.]
A very characteristic Byanative pieture, placed hy Garrucci ( $u$, s. iii. 15, tav. 107) in the first half of the 5th century, is preserved in the church of Sta. Maria Magglore at Rome. It presents the usual type. The Virgin stands en fice, veiled, with the customary cross on the veil. She holds the Iofant on her left arm. He has the usual bonk in His left hand, and blesses with His right. Both have a simple uimbus. For a plate of this celebrated picture see Grimouard de Saint-Laureut (Art chréticn, vol. iii. frontisMiece, nod Perret, vol. i. froatispiece. See nlso Milochau, La Lierge de St. Luc à Suinte-MarieMajeure, Paris, 1862). In the early picture preserved at tha church of Ara Coeli, Rome, the child is absent. The Virgin raises her right hand in benedicting hand in benediction.
From the obliteration or destruction of Christian mosaics by the picture-hating Mussulmans, mosnic representations of the Virgin are of the extremest rarity in the East. We can, however, refer to one in St. Sophia, of which we give a cut (No. T) from Salzeoberg's great work (Altchristliche Baudenimale ron Constantinopel), taken during the temporary removal of the whitewash from the interior of the mosque. According to a very usual Byzantine type (cf. the fresco from St. Agnes, No. 3) the Holy Child is represented standing in fiont of His mother, not seated on her lap. The Virgin's face is youthful and characterised by calm beauty. She [^20]is mipjorted by St, Pnul and St. John the Baptist on either hatul. This beantiful mosalic may be anfily nseribed to the original erectlon of the cinureh by dustinian in the eth renting. The cupoln of the church of St. Sophin, nt Snionien (Theswalonica), nseribed by M. Terier to the same date ns its namesake at Constantinopie, i.e. tha midila of the Bth century, contains a mosaie of the Ascension, the Blessed Virgin and the Ajoslies being ranged ronnd the basn of the hemisphere. She alone is nimbel, and wears the conventional veil and purpla dress.d In the semidome of the apse sho is also represented, holiting the infaut Saviour (loxier, Eizlises byzaintues, pp. $142-144$, pl. x1.). A medailion pertrait of the Virgin ha blue veil noid robe, with her hands autstretehed in pruyer to the enthroned figure ot Christ, whinh hermiss over the royal door in the oarthex of St. Sophin, at Constantinoplo, belongs to the time of constantime logouat tus, 668-685. This mosaie is very intirior to the former both In design and exectition.

Tha earliest mosnie pleture of the Virgin in the West in, as we have suid, that in the chajai of St. Venantins at tho lateran, which may lo placed about $A, b .642$. Sha is entirely absent from the early mosnics of St. Maria Maggiore (e, A.d. 4:1i), except in the historical scunges of the A.D. nunciation, Presentation in the Temple, Alaration of the Magi and Christ nmong the Dustors, as weil as from those which decorated the basilican of St. P'ali's-without-the-Wails before its destruction by fire; she is not anywhere represented in the mosilics of the 5th century nt Ravenan, except na a member of the Magi group; nor does she nplear in those of St. Cosmas ami St, Damian, c. A.b. $5: 10$, or St. Lawrence, c, A.b. 578 , in Rome, Indied tho aisance of representations of the Virgin in the earlier Roman churehes is remarkabie. The earliest exampie in which we find hee occupying tue jasition of chicef dignity, tormerly reserved for our Blessed Lord, in the centre of the conch of the aive, and exchninging her primitive att it ude of prayer and ndorntion tor that of a throned

She is throned and nimbed, and supported by angels, holding her Son in her Inp, rather as n diminutive man than as an infant (Neale, Notes on Dalmati,, frontisjiece, 111. 70, 80; Eilniberger, Kunstidenhim te des östere, reikhischen Kaiserstantes, Heft 4, is ; Lohde, Der Dom ton Parenzo). The church of'st. Maria de Navicelia, or in Domnlea, built by liasehal It, c. A.D. 820, is the first in Rome, in which this new type is found. The vault of the njse is hew occupied by a colossai tigure of the Virgin in n blue robe sprinkled with crosses, sated on

Virgin. The fuce of the Arch of Triumbin is Virgin. The face of the Arch of Triumph is here richly decornted with mosnies, recalling the design of neverni of the enrlier works. Ihelow are ranged the four-ani-twent $y$ clifers in their white robes, offering their crowns in nioration. Above, ten crowned rirgias between pinim-t lees mivanee with their oflerings; an angel stands on elthor sile of tha centrat compartment. But that compritinent is not oceupied, ns in earlier times, hy Christ, or by the Noly lamb, but by a crowned and throned figure of the Virgin bearing the Child Jesus on her knecs. (Cinmpini, Vet. Mon. ii. P. 153, cxxvii. tab. 50; J'A gincourt, Peintiure, pi. xvil, no. 14; Wharton Marriott, Testimuny of the Citacomhs, p. 49.) We bave a similar representation of the Virgin crowned and enthroned as Queen of Itenven in the vanlt of the apme of St. Francenea Romatan (originally St. Maria Antiqua), rehuilt by pope Leo IV., nitd decornted with mosuics by poje Nichulas I., A.b. 858-838 (Ciampini, ii. p. Liic, e, xxvili, tab, 53), and in the cathedral of Copuan, constructed by binhop Ugo at the end of the 8th or beginaing of the 9th entury, of which we give a woodent (Cismpini, Ii. p. 165, e. xxix. tab. liv.). This place is mentluned by the Pseudo-Abdias (Vita S. Mutth.) as in Ethlopia, probably used In a very vague way. On the other hand, isidore (de orta et olitu Putrum, c. 76 ; Putrol. Ixxxiii. 153) says that St. Mat hew, after preaching in Jullaea, weut Into Maseronia, nod at last dled "in montibus Parthorum."
It cannat be definitely sild whether St. Matthew suffered a martyr's death. Clement of Alexandria, quotlog Herncleon the Gnostic, seems to acquiesce in the statement that he died a natural death (Sirom. vI. 9). Later writers generally take the other view, In accordance with the natural tendency to amplify. Not to allude at present to the martyrologies, we find Ni.ephorus (Ifist. Eccles. ii. 41 ) describing the work, sutferings, and denth of St. Matthew in Myrmene, the city of tho Anthropophagi. We meet with thls also in the Apocryphal Acts, to which we shall again refer. One other tradition nbout St. Mntthew may be mentionad here, which we are told by Clement of Alexaadria ( $P$.reding. ii. 1), that the apostle abstalned nltogether from flesh, and llied on berries, fruits, and herbs.
We need not do more than allude in the most passing way to the story of the translation of the body of St. Matthew to Brittany (where it was ronveyed trom Ethiopia in the 9 th century l), mad thence, at the expense of a startling anuch ronism, to Lucania by the emperor Valentloian. In or about the year A.D. 954 , it was renioved to Salernum (Leo Ostiensis, in Acta Sancto un, infra), where May 6 is observed as the commemoration of the translation. Strangely enough, a second finding at Sillernum is recorded in the time of Gregory VII. about A.D. 1080.

When a festival of St. Matthew first arose, distinet from the collective festival of all the apostles, it is impossible to say definitely, but it is certainly late. It is absent frotn many forms of Western liturgies, which we shall mention lielow, nad it would appear that there are tion inelow, nad it would appear that there are scarcely any sermons or honniiies tound tor this day, even in writers of the 9 th and 10 th centuries, among the few being one by Nicetas Paphlago (Combetis, Aucturium, p. 401). The day speecially nssociated with Se. Matthew in the Western church is September 21 . This testival, however, is wanting in the Leonine, Gelasian, and Gallican liturgies, nnd in the fr tionule (iothicum. It is found in the Gregorian Sacramentary in the edition of Menard (col. 130), but is obelised as doubtful in that of Pamelins, and omitted in that of Muratori. Neararl's edition also gives a mass for the vigil, but it cannot be doubted that buth masves are " later addition. Menard himself remarks (not, in toc.) that both masses, especially that for the vigil, are wantian in some of the best MSS. On the other haul, the festival is recognised in the Ambrosian Lituryy, as we now have it (Pamelius, Litur!/, Latt. i. 4ei), nad in the Mozarabic Liturgy and Breviary (Patrol. 1xxxv. 861, $1 \times x \times v i .1205$ ). We also find it in the Iatin martyologies generally, as in the Dlart. Mieronymi. Rom inum, Bede, Ado, lisuard, and Notker. The notice in the metrical mar-
tyrology of Bede is, "Undecimas cenpit at Matthatus ductor ameenns" (l'utrol. xeip. 605); that of Wundalhert (Patrol. exxl. 611): 一

* Wesprult Christo mandi quil liera vocante Undectunum Mathaens tvangelico ore ancravit."

Beskles, however, the commemoration on September 21, the Mirt. Nieronymi, as edited by D'Achery (Spicilegium, vol, iv. pp, 617 spq.), gives the mume of St. Matthew reveral thes. Thas we have on May 1, "Nat. Matthael et Jaeobi ${ }^{\text {" }}$ on May 6, "In Persidn, nat. S. Matthael npostotl et evangelistae;" on May $21, *$ " S . Matthuel лpostoli;" on September 21 (supru); ; sul on October 7, " Nat. S. Matth tober 7, "Nat. S. Matth tel evangelistne." What these multiplied commemorntlons mean, It hs very hard to say; possibly they point to the conclu-slon that we have he slon that we have here a collection of varlous parthal and local commemorations. It may be noted here that the Cdd. Hagennyensis and Vnticanus, eited by Soller among the various auctaria to Usuard's Martyrology, associate May 6 with the traditional translation of the apostle's body to Salernum (Pat;ol, cxxiv. 29). With this statement, however, though found in Baronius's Mart. L'om., we neell not concern ourselves, tor the alleged date of this translation is, ns we have seen, very late.
The calcudars of the Greek and Russian Charches commemorate St. Matthew on November If (Neale, Etstern Church; Int. povelinThe notice for this day to the Greek metrical culendar prefixed by Papebroch to the Aota Sunctorum tor May (vol. i p. biii.) is, ${ }^{2} \alpha \dot{d} \mu a \tau o v$

As regards the pseudonymous literature attributed to St. Matthew, we may mention (1) the apocryplal Latin gospel of Matthew, on the birth of the Virgin and the infancy of the Saviour, edited in part by Thilo, and fully by Tiseliendort (Evangedir Apocrypha, pp. xxv, 50). A majority of the MSS. of this gosiel jrefix two letters, according to which it is a translation by Jerome from the Helirew. It is on the authority of this it is imposibibe thespel is referred to St. Nat thew. It is impossible to say whether we are to connect this with the reference made by Innocent 1 . ( $L_{1}$, ist, vi, ud Lxuperium Tolos ınun, e. 7 ; Putrol. $\mathrm{xx}, 502$ ) to sundry nporryphal writings professing to be flue to some of the apostles, to be due to some of the apostles, among thens perhips being Matthew. The reading, however, varies between Matt hew nud Matthins, b the latter being ajparently to be preferred. (2) The acts of Andrew and Matthew [Greek] in the city of

MATTHIAS, ST., LEGEND AND FES-

 TIVAL OF: Of this apostle the New lestament tells ins nothlog beyond the fict of his election to fill the place of the traitor Judas, and that previonsly he had been a follower ot'our Lord throughont the whole of his ministry. Nor is there any ing him. It is indeed trorthy tradition conceraor the severty disciples, and this is by wo means improbable. (Eusebjins, Ilist. Eccles, $\mathrm{i}, 12$; bophronius, in the Appendix to Jerome de Vi, is Tlust. [vol. il. 9:5s, ed, Vallarsi]; Elipiphanius, i . 20; Dowtheus, Synopsis [in MI in. Bibl. P,tr. iii. $1+8$, ed. 16187 ; Ribsnus Maurus, infra.)According to Isidore (de Vitu et (ubitu Patrum, c. 79 ; Putrol. Rnbavous Maturus [ib. cx. 1133], Usuard [ib. cxxiii. 791], nad Netker [ib. exxxih 1048]). The general tenour of the Ingiage of the above would seem to imply that the apostle died a natural death.
Other witnesses, again, spenk of St. Mathias as labouring in Ethiopin (Sophronius, l.c.; Dorotheus, $l$. c.; Nicephorus, Hist. Eccles. ii. 40 ; see alse the Jfartyrology of Sirletus in Cnnisius, Thesaurus, iii. 456). We must assume, however, that we have here an exceptiunal use ot the werd Ethiopia, for the locallty is further defined (see e. g. A certain amount of preudonymous literuture in nesaciated with the name of this apostle. An apmeryphal gospel under the nume of Mathias is mentioned by Origen (I/om. I, in, Litr, vol, v, 8i, ed. Lommatzseh) and Eusabina (llist, Ievers, iii. 25): nad in the acte of a coancil held at dome in the eplaseopate or Gelusius (A.D. 49t), we find "Evangelfum (al. Evangella) nomiae Mathine "pacryphum" (Patrod. lix. 102, 175). This may, perphps, be the sume as the $\pi$ apaóbotets of St. Matthiaa referred to several times by Clement of Alexandrin. From hlo It woulid ajpear that the work was written in the intereste of some tinostio sect, for ho apeaks of the fullowers of Valentinus, Marchun, and Baxilider, boasting that they quuted the oplinion of Muthlas (Strom. vil. 17). Benides this, there wre apoceryphal acts of Andrew and Matthias, puthished hy Thilo In a sepurate firm, nud also liy I'sechendor' (Acta Apostolorun Apocryphu, pp. xhil, 18:). Thilo refers the orlgla to Leneins, "ull sietaks of the book as used speccially by the Ginastics and Manichaeans. It should be ndided, however, that it seems very doubtiul whether we should real the name Mathlins or Matthew. Ilisehemdort, following the wheat Greek MS., gives Mathins, but the other Greek MSS. and the Latio give Matthew. So also do the Syriac acts recently published by Dr. Wright. We way nld here that Innocent I. (Epist. ad Exu, erium Thensthem; Labbe, il. 1256) condemns sundy writings ascribed to Matthias und other apostles, hat referred by him to Leurins. Besides theses, we have Acts of St. Matthias extant in Latin, protessing to be transinted from the Hebrew by a monk of Treves, it would seem in the 12th century (Act: Sunct. supra, p. 447). Although this custum was never receivel by the chureh of hime (Ambron, de Siderimn, ili. 1), it prevailed firr n Gaul, Milan, mull Spain, churches, as thowe of Gaul, Milaa, and Spain, but it noon fell out of Jerume njeaks of Fnbiola as standing in public penance on this day, "quis hoc crederet public tota urbe spoetante Romanan nnte diem puscehnte stiret in urdine poenitentium?" (Hieron. Epist. 30, Epit iph. Fabiul.). The same custom is erideaced by the various homilies, "nd reconcilinndos poesaitentes," delivered "ia Coena Domini," refurred to by Marteae (Ant. Eccl. Rit. Iib, I. caj. vi. nrt. 5, § 10, tom. ii. p. 31 ; tom. i. p., 284). A letter of Gilbert "Lunicensis Episcoppes," contnimed in Ussher's E'pistuluo Hibur, nioue (E'p. $30,1.86$ ), states the custom of the hyh chureh to be that venial sins were absolyed "in capite jejunil," mortal sins "In Coeas Dimind." The penitents first assembled outside the church duins, where they heard a sermon from the bishop; they were then admitted lato the church nal heard the "missa pro reconciliatione preattentium," absolution being granted them beforethe oflertory. "In the "Ordo agentious publican peenitentiam," asslgaed in the Sacramentary of Gefinsius to the peaitents, why the deacon pleads the cause of the peaitents, which, after certhin collects, is tollowed by the "ordo ad reconciliandum poentwhen the penitent has communicated (Muration" Lit. (c) Consncration of Chrism,-The sacred oil being needed in large quantities for the anointing of the newly-bnptized at Easter, it naturally becane the custom to consecrate it shortly before that festival. Gradually the consecration was limited to one day, and by the 5th ceatury it had become the rule that the whole of the chrism that wias required for the use of the year should be consecrated on Maundy Thursday. St. Augustine also, while insisting on thating communinu gencrally, mentions that soule, to make the commemoration more atriklag, ware necastumed to offer and receive the Ibody ot the Lord after meat. on the day when the Lurd Ifimself gare llis pupper. We learu froms him nlso that in some "places there was on this day a double celcbration, "in the mornlug for the sake of those who dine, and in the evening for the sake of thowe who, fist " (Augustine, Epist. exviii. "d Januar. c. 7). The practice of an evening celebration on this day was regarded with increasing disfivolly, nad Wus distinctly prohibited by the Quiaisext or Trullan Council (can. 29), A.d. ti92, with express reference to the ahove-meationed canon of the council of Carthage (Lahbe, vi. 1155). At the ordinary celebration on Mauady Thursilay ${ }^{n}$ portion of the ceasecrnted bread was reserveld for the commuaions on Good Friday and Eister Eve, Missa Pruesanctifo -torum. "Pontifex servat de Sancta usque in crastinum " (Ordo Reminus, i. Murnteri, ii. 993).

(b) Reconcilution of Penitents.-At a very enfly time Mamily Thursilay whe appointed as the duy for the publie absolution of penitents The letter of lanucent 1. to Decentlus, bishop of Eugubium (c.7) (if iadeed it is rightly glven to hum and is not to be assigned to a hater perind) atates that the custom of the Church of liame Was to grant nborolution eit her of veaial or mortul sius only, "quinta feria nnte laschn," unlens the peaitent was nttincked by severe sliknexs (Lalbe, ii. 1217). St. Ambrose, writing to his Nlster Marcellina, names this day as the usual oue for the relaxition of penance, "erat dies que Dominus sese pro nobis tradidit, quo in ecelesia pe enitentialia relaxantur" ( fipist. 3:t ad Marcellia. ef. Hex emeron, lib. v. c. 25), and St.
(e) Other Observances. - The belle of the churches were silent trom midnight on Wednesday till tnatias on Easter Day (Ordo Roman. i. u.s.). The altars were stripped alter vespers (ibid.). There was no chanting, and the salutation "Dominus robistum," etc., was intermittell, as well is the Kyrie Eleison, and Et ne nos inducus, etc., after matins (Murateri, u. s. i. 548, ii. 992). At 3 P.M. a light was struck outside the church, and a candle lighted froln it, which was borne oa a reed in procession through the congregation to the sacristy, where a limp was kindled and kept burning till the Snturday morniag, when the Paschal taper was lighted from it (Ordo Roman. u. s.; cf. Polycarp is desired in the Ignatian cpistle to him (c. 7) to choose some ooe who may be wortly to bear the nanse of ecódponos, to carry to Syria the tidiags of his (Polyearp's) love of Christ. The word $\theta$ eorperoBuirns is used in a precisely similar sense in the Ignatian epistle to the Smyrnaeans (c. 11); and similarly Polycarp ("d Philijp. 13) spenks of sending one to be an ambassalur ( $\pi \rho \in \sigma \beta$ ev́corta). These emissaries were probably in most cases deacons of the church. Baronius (Ann. A.D. 58, c. 10x) wroagly supposes these $\theta$ (бброио to be Cursorks ( p . 521) for the summoning of assemblies. Thas, in the Euchologia we read of the patriareh going down "into the metatorium or diaconicum," and passing from it to the altar from the right-hand side. Cedresus records that when the emperor L.en the Philosepher was forbidden by the patriarch Nicolas to enter the church, in account of his having contracted a tourth marriage, he performed his devotions in the metretorium, on the right sile of the altar (Cedren. Histor. p. 483, ed. Par. p. 602). The metatorium erected by Justini:n at the church of St. Sophia, was used by him and his sucressoms as a place of
also sometimes partook of a meal (if. Theolor, Lect. Eeloy. ii. p. 165, and the other references to Byzantiae historians given by Ducange, Constantinopolia Christion, lib. ili. No, *4). Goar is of opinion that the metatorium was also used by the ministers of the church tur rest and rcfreshment, and that they there freshment, and that they there partook of a slight repast. He regards the worl, ns does Suicer (su', voc.) as a corruption of Mivaatéplov, derived trom $\mu i \nu \sigma o s$, ferculun, or from mensa, "a table." But Ducange Is probably right in regarding it as a Graecized torm of the bow-Latin "metatum" frequent in Gregory of Tuurs, Gregory the Great, and contemporaneons writers, in the sense of " n dwelling." The Greek torm $\mu \tau \tau d \tau \nu \nu$, or $\mu \in \tau d \tau o \nu$, is of not unfrequent oecur-

METATUS. The duty of providing foud andl lodging for the sovereign nad his retinue when on a jouracy, or for the judges nul others travelling on public busine travelling on public business. Under the Roman law the clergy were exempted from this obligation Cod. Theodos, xri. tit. 2, leg. 8). According to Gothofred (Com. in Cod. Theotos. vii. tit. 8; de Unere Metatus) this exemption was given to the clergy, to senators, to Jewish syangogues, and all places of worship. The capitularies of the Frank kings, on the other hand, appear to lay the burden chietly on the clergy. One reason of this undoultedly was to be tound in the frequent bestownl of fiets iumon the church, to be held by this und other feulal tenures, Thomassio ( Vet. et Nov. Accl, Diselp. iii. 1, c. $48, \S 3$ ) says that under the Roman law the obligation was considered to be a badge of servitude, but among the Franks such exercise of hospitality was esteemed no honour and a token of the alliance between church nad state.

Bishops especially appear to hate beco expected to receive the sovereign. Thomassin (ib. iii. 1, c. 39, $\S \S 1,2$ ) gives instances of farms bestowed by Charles the Great on bishops who had received him with such hospitality ns was in their power, and of punishments inilicted by him on certain bishops and abbats who had neglected to receive some nmbassadors from Persis Persia on their way to his court. This custnm appears to have brought with it certain inconreniences. A curious canon of the Conacil of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 26), reminds the reigoing monareh, Charles the Buld, that women were strictly forbidden to enter the houses of any of the clergy, nad that especially the dwelling of bishops should be free from their preseace, and implores thein not to compel bishops to turn their palaces into lodging houses for women during a royal progress. The right was also claimed for those who were travelling on public business. A capitulary of Lonis the l'ious (ii. tit. 16, ed. Baluz) sets furth that certain places bad been nppointed by himself

METROPOLITAN (Mirporon [C. H.]

 c. 5) considers Berveridge (Cod. Cun. lib, ii. of apostolical that metropolitans are either A postles founded tution, or that at least the as to put matters ine church on such a system erection of mor the be sujponsed to have conternplat must theretore which their acts ant entenplated the result to led. In suppert of this yif not necessarily, the fact that the apostlew stress is laid on vince of the empire chos in going into any proof that province in which the civil metropolis quarters, and to lound a to fix their headexnmple, Antioch was the churcis. Thus, for Corinth of Achaia, Ey metropolis of Syria, of Macedonia; and Ehesus ot Asia, Thessalonica centre, other churches from thence, as from a are collectively spurches had been tormed, they in reterence to poken of, and grouped together, fore to it. metropolis. New Testament ot the Thus we hear in the churches of Macedonia churches of Judea, the interence, therefonia, the churches of Asin. An ecelesinstical cond is drawn that a certain the chief city and the chutween the charch of province, which had churches throughout the it, was to be expected, and their origin from this, it is urged, is precisely intended. And prevail at un edrly periady what is found to tended that Titus and Timo. It is further conmetropolitans in Crete anathy in fact acted as Chrysostom is cited (Hom and Ephesus, for which lib, ili. c. 4, jiib, v. c. 23, lii, iv. ©. : Si, wheh jasages however, it may jerbaps be sulid, to not seem moversmily to mean more than that the whole was one bishopric.) Harrow, howerer, while aimitting na in fuet that the ehiof eities were usuaily selected an the first seata of churches, yet comsidern that "all ecciesiantleal presideneles and sutardinathons, or depempencles of some blahiges on others in meministration of apiritual alhits, were futroduced merely by humatu wrifnaice, and establixied by law or custon, ujon prudratial beconuts, necording to the exigeney of things." "At firat," he kays, "every hishop", ne a prince in his own chareh, did not freely necorling to his will and diseretion, with the advice of hils ecrlesiastical senate, and with the consent of his prople (the which he did use to consult), without being controllable by any other, II mecountable to any, further than his obligation to uphold the rerity of Christian profession, and to maintain fratermal commanion in charlty and peace with neighionriag charches did require." Hut "trecamse little, disjointeri, und incoherent bodies were like dust, njt to be dissijuated iny every wind of external asshult or intestine faction: nud peaceable union could hardly be retained withont some ligature of disciplise: and churches could not mutualiy support and defend eacin other without some method of intcreourse and rule of condederney engaging them: therefore, for muny geod purpeses (for udholding und advancing the common interests of Christinaity, for protection and support of each church hrom inbred disorders and dissensions, tor preserving the integrity of the fuith, for neeuring the concord of divers churches, for providing tit pastors to each church, and cerreeting such as were scamdalousiy bad or unfaithful) it was soon found needful that divers churches shoull be combined and linked together in some regular form of discipione; that if any shureh did want a bishop, the neighbour bishops might step in to upprove and ordain a fit one: that if any bishop did netoriously swerve from the Christian rule, the others might interiese to correct or void him; that if any error or schism did peep up is any church, the joint concurrence of livers bishops might avail to stop its jrogress, and to quench it, by conveaient means of instruction, repreheasion, and censure; that if any church were oppressed by persecution, by indigenes, by faction, the others might be enguged to afford eftectual succeur and relief; for such ends it was needful that bishopes in certain precincts should neavene, with intent to deliberate and resolve about the best expedients to compass them, and that the manner of such proceading (to avoid uncertaln distraction, confusion, aribitariness, dissatistaction, abl mutinous opposition) should be settled in na ordinary course, according to rules known and allowed by ali."

He then goes on to shew that as in each pelitieal proviace, there was a metropolis or head city, to which great resert was had for the dispensation of justice and other important affiars, and which usually possessed a Christian church which excelled the rest in opulency and in ability to promote the common interest ; and is also in ell meetings some one person must preside, this duty would anturally devolve in mectings of hishojes upon the prehate of the metrypolis, "na being at home in his own aeat of preslifuce mil receiving the rest under his wing," us well as on ncoobint uf his "surjaswing the rest la all alvantages answerahle for the secular mivantages of his city," Aecordingly the metropelitan bishop beame the president of the ejiscropal meetings, which nemn developed inte provineial synods, "Thus," he concludes, "I canceive the metropolitan govername wat introduced, by human eonsilerations of pulilic necessity or utilit $g$, There nre, halees, noma who think it was lustituted by the numsies, but their argaments do not seem eonvincing; ant! sach a coastilution doth nat (as I take it) well suit to the state of their times and the conlsa they took in founding churehes" (Treatise on the Роре's S"ргенинеу, Sujpos, v.).

Dr. Cure, guoted by Bingham, and apparently Blagham himself, npiear to take substatially the same view as Barrow.

Ihomassin lays stress on the fact that the principal towns heing first evangelized by the apostles, Christianity woulal maliate thenere, and diaghter-churches spring up mround the arlgimal church in the mother eity, owing it a filial obedience as sprung frem it.b

Such oledience, however, if taken In a strict sense, though well extablished in later days, was at tlrst of somewhat graduad growth. Suon after the midille of the 2 nil century, syoods were rendered jeenaliarly aecessary by the diversities of epinion which then sprang ups. And, as Harrow states, these wonll naturaily be held in the chief sity and under the presidency of its bishop."

The more frequently suth synols were held, the better defined would the dignity of the metrepolitan become, esjrecially as it woulil be his duty to eonvene them. When they came to be convened at regular Intervals, it would assume an established character as an integral part of n permanent institution.
Nor is it diffieult to suppese that in the intervals bet ween synods the president would probably be referred to, when the decrees needed either explanation or enforcement. What at first was only the influence due to his superior jositien would thus by degrees become aeknowledged ns an actual authority. Other occasions on which

* Accordiogly we find that the civil aietropolis was also the ecci-glastical metrojnilis, even when it might have beell exjected to be atherwise. Thus Cwearpa, not Jerusatem, was the seat of the metropolitan in l'alestlue. Compare canums 12 anil 17 of Chale-don.
b "Ex quibus colligitur, wi civiles metropetea in metropoles etiam ecclesjasticas evasere, id eo muxime laciun essi, quod metropoleon ecclenlae ceteras quuque prpererint fundarlintque provincias ecelesias; eo prorsus mode, quo urbis cujusque cathedralis, ceteris vieinorum oppidorum ecclestis ortum dedit, atque adco maternam in eas dominationem jure est consecuta" (Part. I. 1. 1, c. 3).
c Such ut least was the general, though not at first periaps the luvarlabic rule. For Enselius (I. E. ․ c. 23) speaks of a syont of the blahops of Pootus at which the senior bishop appears to hate presided. In Africa the rule as to metropolitans was peculiar. Whit the exception of Carihage, which seems to have been the standing metropolis fur the province of Afrtca properly to called, the senfor bisiop for the time belng of the province was m(rropolitan, whatever his sre. Such was the cuatom in Numidha and Mauretania, it is to be ubserved, bowever, that Curthage zeems to have had a kind of primacy over them. See Gieseler, Ist period, $$ 66$.

In these nynods the metropolitin would no doult preside, and exercise great intluence, but there is no proot as yet of his judging alone In matters of importance.

 were apsely held or tell into disuse. Th Thin would largely jurt of motrapmlitans.

Speaking in relation to the gtate of things in Ganl nbunt the 6th ani 7th centuries, Gulant says: "The civil metropolis was generally more wealthy, more jeprulous than the ntler tewns of the province; its blslop hal more intluenes people met around him on nll important oeve slons: his restidence became the chicf place of the provinclal council ; be convoked It, atil was the preslileat of it ; he was moreover charged with the confirmation and consecration of the newly-electerl hishops of the province; with receivlug aceusations brocught ngalnat blshups, ami the "jpieals from their lecislons, and withe carryiug them, atter having made a first exmmantinn, to the provinelal council, which nlone had the rlyht of juilging them. The archbishops uncensingly attempted to usurp the right and make a persmal junwer of it. They othens succeeled; hut, in truth, as to all important circunstances, it was to the provinclal eouncil that it njerertained; the archbishops were only charged with superintending the execution of it." (llist. of Civilisation in France, vol. 1i. p. 46, Eng. truns.)

In Spain, in the 6th century, the counell of Toledo (ean. 20) salys, "let the priosts, whether parochial or alincesnn, who shall be tormeated by the bishop, carry their complaints to the metropolitan, and let the metropulitan delay not to repress such excesses." This seems to imply n direct jersomal power, but it may be olsserved that this canun refers to unseemly exactions on the part of lalividual bishops rather than to their juticial sentences.
Fiun this time onwarl the nuthority nnd position of metropelitsus in the West were subjest to many fluctuations, and varied much in ditlerent conutries. Some uf the popes, who were jealous of nil lutermediate nuthority betwern themselves mut the diocesan bishojes, shewed a disposition to weaken the metropolitans, And the bishops themselves, with a somewhat shortsighted poliey, preterred to have their shperiop at a ilstance in Italy instead of in their own country and province, Noreover as the riperiority of the met ropolitans wats in a grent dapebdent on the preeminence of the which their see was fixed and on its amement chat racter as n metrojolis, the changes which took plice in the relative importance of towns at perions of invision and social ehange materially athected the prasition of the prelates.

It is not surprining, theretire, that in many $j^{\text {lnces the metropolitan authority should decline, }}$ or that in the 8th century Pepin should have to consult pope Zachary as to the course to be udopted for proeuring respect for metropuli-

MICHAEL THE ALCILANGEL, AND ALL ANGELS, FESTIVAL OF. It is not our province here to enter into the general question of angelolatry, it may be well, however, to call attention to the fact that in the carly Christian chureh a certain tradency to nagelworship manifestel itself: thus, tor example, it torms one of the puints in the heresy which allected the Colossian chureh, ngmanst which St. Paul distinctly protests (Col. ii. 18; cf. also i. 16). The Essenie chnracter of thls heresy, whet her or not there be historical counexion with the Eisenes of P'alestine, must not be lost sight of, inasinuch as angelology tormed an important phrt of the esoteric creed of the latter, and, itldeed, entered largely into the speculations of the Jews generally (Josephus, B. J., ii. 8.7 ; ©f. Lightfoot, Corossiuns, in lex., where a number ot illustrations are given of this point, in connection with Jews, Julnizing Christims and Gnosties. Those from the curious Ophite work, the Pistis Sophaia, into which argelology enter's very largely, may ha (sperially poted). It is interesting to observe that long afterwards, in the th century, we find a conaril of Laolieca (e, A.D. 363) in the immediate neighbonrheod, that is. of Colossate, holding it necessary to forbid the ngel-worship then prevaleut in the country (cau. 3i; ; Litbbe, i. 1503). The canon is strongly worded, bidding men not to forsisk the ehurch of God, nad invoke augels nud hold commemorations (ajryidous follow this secret idolatry nre accursed, as having forsaken the Lord Jesus Christ. In tha next century we tind Thendoret (in Col., l.c.) referring to this prohilition as necessitated by the sprend of this worship, through Phrygia nud Pisilia, and he adds that orntories (eictipoa) of St. Michael were still existing in the neighbouring districts." Oa another priat of conaesion between St. Michatel nad this region we shall subsequently dwell ut length, his alleged appearance nt Chonae, a town in the immediate neighbourhoorl of Colossae. It may be added here that the aburecited canou of the Ladicene council was, with the rest of its decrees, repented centuries after by a syood of Ais-lit-Chapelle (A D. 789), but with the reservation, "aee gominentur, nisi illorum quos hatemus in auctoritate. Ili sunt Michate, Galriel, Raphad" (Capit. Aluisyrun. can, 16; Labbe, vii. 973).
Besides such conciliar decrees, strong expressions of opinion are coutinually met with among the futhers. It is perhaps havdly fair to cite Epiphanius as jacludiug the Anyelici among his different classes of hereties, because though he meations as a possible derivation the view that they were worshippers of nagels, he contessess that he is renlly ignorant on the point b (Huer. 60 [al. 40]; vol. i. 505, ed. l'etavius). Augustise, however, says plainly enongh, "we honour [the nagels] through love, not through slavish fenr, nor do we build to them temples; for they wish not so to be hoooured by us. because they know that we ourselves, when we are worthy, nre temples of God Most High " (de Veru Relif. 110; vol. i. 1266, ed. Gnume). Again, in his Confessions (x. 42, vol. 1. 327), he says, "Whom could I find who should reconcile me to Thee? Should I have recourse (ambiandum mihi fuit) to

Again, though we can now see in the festival of Alichaelmas a recognition of the grent truth of the juint service of angels and mon nos anhe jects of a common Lord, yet it has boen juxtly pointed out that the festivuls of angeln, now mainly represented, so fur as the Western Michatl nad All Angels by the testival of St. Michat nod All Aagels on Sepit. 29, were not simply commemorations of [supposed] historic events, amely, manifestations of the archangel at some special tine and plaee, or the dellication of a chureh in his honour.
We shall contine ourselves for the present to the Western church, and speak (!) of the manifestation in Monte Gargano. This has been varionsly reterred to the episcopate of Gelasius, i.e. $49 \dot{-} 5$ A.D, (so e.g. in Anast. Pour ot these masses are ipmially assomiated with the name of St. Nichacl, and the remaining one with angels and archangels generally (rol, ii, 99, ed. Ballerini). The Gulasian Samamentary merely gives Oredtione's in semeti archanyeli Michuelis (l'atrol. Ixsiv. 1177), hut in the Gregorian is dedicatio betwilicac nameti Mishathis (col, 134, el. Menard).
( $n_{1}$ a survey of the foregoing evidence, we nee inctined to consider the most satisfintory explatnation to he that there was a Roman conmemoration originally distinct from nay connexion with the commemoration of the manifestation on Mount (Bargames, and probably of earlier alate than the alloged neprarance there. This riated with the chureh in the Vin Saliania, which, however, got thrown into the shade by the increasing tame of the commemoration on Nount church to St. Michael In Rome, to the locality of which we shall ngain reter. The presense of this chureh in the city, and the distnuee of that on the Via sallatia, may have eansed the latere to be less frepurnted, so that the more recent churen became the favourite in martyrelogies, ${ }^{\text {h }}$

It may be romark d that twice in theme masaes are aflusiotia to "lixa saerain (dicata)" to Giod ith honour of St. Michael, tmpiying, neeordang to some, the existence of several churdhes.
o it is suggested (Ieslie, not. ail Liturg. Mozarab., in foc.) thut sidpt. 30 was rally the amiversary of the dodi e thon of the church in the Vin Sularla, which was shifted to Nept. 29 to arcond with that of the dedication of the chasi proximity of the days, this seems rather far fecthed.

- There ts an aliusion to the church in Via salarta

In considering the above rlew, it will be well to bear in mind (1) that the mention of the $V$ ia Salarin ocemrs in the olilest sucrompotary ; (2) that this locality cannot at all he ruomeled with the notices of the shareh foult by dhoninnee; (i) that in some of the martyrologias we have cited the lioman commomoration romes lisst, whereas we are told that lonitime built his church som niter (non multo gest) the manitestation on Mount tiarganus; ( $t$ ) that a church of St. Mielanel was existing In Rome prior to the episcopmte of any Boniface except Bonifure 1. (ob. A.t. 42\%), whe lived long belore the alloged date of the manilisatation on Jount liarganas. lhis we know on the authority of Anastasins Bibliothecariax (80), who tells us that Symmarhus (ob, A.n, 5it ) enlarged nud improved the charch of St. Michael, so that the church, amb prosumably also the festival, were existing betore his time.

On these grounds we hold it to be at any rate rairly probable that the local loman festival is enrlice than the Apulinn. To the ingniry, however, how thr such a testival is traceable hack, it must be admitted that there is a scarcity of evidence. Baronius (.1/art, Rom., May 8, not.), who argues for the great antlyuity of the Roman Testival, eftes in evidence the Christian poet Drepanias lilorus; but he is certainly wrongr ia supposing him to be the Drepanins mentinned by Sidonius Apollinaris, and the pret in question is to be reverred to nbont a.D. 848 (Cave, Chartoph. Ecch., p. 160). Nor need we attach much weight to his remnik that in a MS, volume of sermons in the Vatican library, bearing the mames of Angustine nul others, is one of tiregury the Great for the tostlyal of St. Mirhacl. Sitil the evidence of the Leonine Sammentary is indicative of' a decidedly early date, and we probably shall not err in assuming the existence of the festival in the sth century.

We mast next refer to the chureh of St. Michael built by Boniface. This, it will be rememhered, was spoken of in the $1 /$ hert. ## MHITARY SELVICE

(see Dueange, Closs.). Sol Angustine ( $\mathrm{S}_{\mathrm{r}, \mathrm{m}}$.
 P'atro'.) says that Ibaly sorputure ln speaking of selilioses does not mean those only who ure ocoppod in artive warliare (momatio milatia), but that every whe tases the weapons at has own :proial wartare, and thos in phollod ns 1 clagnlo utitur, diguitatis sume miles describitur). In lat in writers the word has a iriple meaning: the Nilitia l'alatinalis belanging to the allarers of the palace; Cist runsis to military servioco in the eamp; and Cohortalis to elvil servieo in the provinces, (See Vintes, Not. in Soz. HI, E. $v_{1}+$; Mingham, Eerd. Ant. iv. 4, § 1.)

If nlso "pplied to thase who hold lands, possessions, or titles by temure of foudal service. 'Thus, ce.g., lle laws of the lamhorls (lib, iil. tit. $\mathcal{Z}_{4}$ c. 4) provide that no "miles" of a bishop, nhbat, or abless shall lowe his lief (benofioinms) without leing ambieted of a crime. In AugloSaxan chronishes the title "miles" is commonly used to descrile those who were attaclied in any eapary to the houshoh of a prince. For exnuples see Dmenge (ciluss.). So dvitus of Vienme, Ep, Kit. Sigrimmari, king of lhargunly, speaks of the title of patrician conforred ulow him hy the emperor Amastasius as "militiae titulos," and Gregory of 'lours (llist. Frome. iv. c. 42) speaks of the patriciate which a evrtain Mumbulas obtaine 1 from king Gumiram as n "militia." Sometmes it appears to be nsed shaply fir any sewamas given in return for service. I'lus Grefory of 'Tours (llist. Frome. viii. 39) speaks of the widow of a certain Badegilsus, bishop of Le Alans, chaiming some property which was alleged to have heen given to the see, as the hire given persmally to her husband (hate ext molitia virl mei) ; and (id. x. c. 19) speaking of the treasures left by a certain bishop Eigidias, suys that thase of them which were the produce (militia) of evil doing, were carried into the king's treasury.

Thus in erclesiantical writers the woml is often found expressing any kind of service either civil ur military. The Apostolie Cnnons (c. 82) provide that any of the clergy wishing to retain as to serve both the emperor and the church, were to be deposed, on the ground of the command, "Render nuto Cnesar" the things that are Catesir's, and to Gool the things that are Goul's." (See leveregr, Not. in toco, nhal llingham, Eccl. Ant, vi. 4, 今B.) Swomen (II. E: iv. 24) marrates that a council of Constantimople, A. D. 360 , deposed one Neonas, bishop of Seleacia, bemase he frad ahmitted to holj orders certain men who wero bound to civic ollices, modirevífevoi (see Vales, Not. in loco). A mpitulary of Comstantine ( (cod. Ley. Uffic. de lijise. ct (ler.) speaks of the curiae to which certaia men belonged as "otheia quilus militant." It is often also especially inplied to ecelesiastical service. In the Urdu homanas, c. 1 , the members of the procession that precedes the pontitl to the chureh are ordered to walk in the order of their respective ollices (partibus prout militavit). Gregory the Great (Ep, iis. 11) spenks of the servants of the churrh as "militia clericatas." St. Remigius (Sirmond, Cond, Ant, Gall, 1, 205) rpeaths of the lectors" service as "militia lectortum."

In the more limited meaning of warfare it must be considered-
I. As regards the taity. The profersion of arms in the burline diss of the chareh uypars to lave hern comsiderej with some dintrint, is sempuly eomputible with the Christhan chanteter, shere it meressitated the shodiling of blood mal taking part in eapial pmoishments. Nume of that those who hat mate protesemon of the dithth and cast nway the military lielt, nul then ere wrad to the service ond given money to he restared to their rank, shouk? ho for three years among the hearers and then for ten years among the pros st rators. liat this eanom appeare to have beporved to some particolar casa, very probably to that ot sohners whin had guitted the nrmy rather than commit idnlatry, mid then, repenting at what they hal dome, regained their position on momilitiun of oflering sameltice. (heo lingham, But, Antio. xi, c. 5, § 10 ) The tirst roancil of Arles, to recognise the furt that the protession of thristimaty whonld not be mule an excense fir equaling the dities of citigenship, by excommmatatiog those who throw down their amm th time of peace. Another readiug is "in timo of war." The Apostolic Constitutions (viil, : ite) jrovilo that a soldier who applies for baptixm shomad promise to ohey the injunctions given to solthers by Jolu the lhaptist, to do ingury to mo man, to necuse no man falsely, and to le monlent with their hite. It he gave that promise he was to to ndmilted, if he refused to do so, to be rejected.

Eeclestastion writers treat the suliject very mueh in acordane with their own fremomal temperament, the ground taken hy those who deny that a Clasistian ean continne to be a solitior behing always that some of the duties required liy a military profession are incompatible with the laws, or at least with the spisit, of Christ ianity. Tertullinn, us might he expectel, is most ontpowen and uncompromising. In maswating the yuestion whether a soldier in uniform van be mimitted to tho church, he asks in rolurn whether there can be nollier who is not obliged to take part in bloodshed and eapital punishments, and ngin inguires how a Christion can prosibly fight withont the sword which his loorl has taken from him (ile folul. c. 19). Again (de Coron. Milit. c. 11), In auswering the guestion whether warfare ln any way is a law ful ocempathon for a Christian, he contrasts the ordinary duties of a soldier with the ponition of a believer. llow, he asks, ean a son of preare make war, or he whose duty it is to mist unt Whols quaril an idal's temple? How can othe who is forbidilen to hurn incense sulmit to have his own corpe burned by military rule? The rase is dillerent, he adds, when those who wero aetmally soldiers were converted, as the soldiers who eame to John the lapitist and the believlug centurion. Ia such cases " believer ousht either to desert at once, which, he asserts, is a common practice, or to be resolute not to he compelled to perform dutien which are torbidita by the laws of his Chriveinn linith. Faith, he alds, knows not the meaning of the word eompulsion. Hut in other places he ndmits that his opinion had not beea generally actel we hy Christians. "We fill your camps," he sap̣s (Apolojet. c, 3i), "we man your tleets, an! serve tu your armies" (id. c. 42.) The well-knewn for three years, would effectually prevent the elergy fiem hearing arms.

That the clerienl oblice was hell to imply incapacity for bearing armis is also implied in the Inw of llonorius (Coul. Thend. vil. lib. So; To Viteron. leg. 1:), which forblifs anyone to enter the elerical otlice in order to excuse himself from serviag in the ramy on plea of being an ecceleslastical person. [See Puncis, Constin i or.]

In practice, however, it is evilent that these Injunctions were oceaslonally transgressed upon many pleas. It appears to have been net uncommon for monks and elergy to necompany an nuny to the fiell fer the purpose of helping it with their pruyers. Bede (H. L, ii. 2) speaks of the slanghter at Westchester of a great number of monks of Bangor who had assembled to help the army of the Britons by their prayers, and whom he calls an army (militia); and (i. 20, p. 57) of Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, who took command, on un emergency, of the army of the Britons, and defeated the licts and Scots by the werjons of prayer and praise. The transition from such wenjons to those of a moro secular kinl was easy. Theodoret (II. K. ii. 30) speaks of James, bixhop of Nisibis, acting ns general (arparirys) of the ferces of the city during the siage by Saper, and using his engineering skll! In directing the working of the machines ulon the walls ; but it is ndied that he himself took mo personal share in the defence, but remained all the time within the church in prayer: the enemy were finally discomtited without bloodshed by a plague of gants nod tlies which arrived to answer to his prager. Other elersy do not appear to have been so carcful to observe the nice distinction between advice and netion, especinlly in cases where the interests of the church were concerned. Sozomen (II. E., vii. 15) speaks of one Marcellus, a bishop of Apanea, who led a band of soldiers and gladiators agninst the pagans, nod was slain in the affray. It is added, proving that his conduct was considered meriterions, that the comneil of the province prohibited his relatives from attemptug to avenge his death, on the ground that they should rather give thanks that he was acceanted worthy to die in such a cause. Gregory of Tours (Ifist. Franc, is. 43) speaks of two prelates, Salonius and Sagittarius, whe were armour and slew many men with their own hands in battle. Boniface of Muyence (Ep. ad Zach.) asked the pope's advice about certain bishops who fought armed and shed bloed with their own hands; the answer was, that such shonld be deposed. Panl Warnelitit (Hist. Lon,folam. v. 40) applauds the bravery of one Zeoo, a deacon of Ticene, who went into battle elad in the robes of Cunibert. king of the Lombards, and was killed in his jlace.

In later days, when the chureh began to hold lands under the feudal system, it seems that in seme cases the bishops were expected to come in person to the army of their sorereign. Charles the Bald (Sirmond, Conc. Ant, Gail. iv, pp. 143145) brings a charge against a bishop named Vuenile that he had not helped him in his advaluee against the enemy either in his own person or with the furces that it was his duty to bring. Hinemar of Rheims (Ep, 26), writing to prepe Nlcholas, speaks of himself and his ellew bishopis as going with the king against thי Bretons and Normans, accorill $g$ to the custom of the kingdolll. See alsa Flomloarl ( ('itat Ilinemar. Ili. 18), The seemen colneil of Yorn, A, b, 8+4 (c. 8), when proviling that blahoris who wre weak of boaly shall sind thele forces umber commanal of one of the klag's uflicers, indicates that lt was the usimal custom for bishops to leal thelr toreces in thele own jersons.

But ellorts were continually male to keep the clergy as fir as possible from metatlly minyling in war. A eapitulary of Charles the (irent (Copit. lii. e. $1+1$; Nigne, Putrol xcvil. 814) proviles that no priest shall accomprany the army, exceppt two or at most three bishopis elceted by the others, for the purpese of prayer and beneliction, and with them chosen priests of grod haraing, and with the permission of their own blshops, who shoulil celebrate divine servier, attent to the sick, und esprecially take chre that no one lied withont receiving the haly sacriment. They were not to benr arms, nor to go into battle, nor shed blood, but to employ themselves in their proper duties. Those ecelesiastics who helil tiefs which obliged them to provile soldiers, were to seal their men well armed. nuld they themselves to remain ut home and pray for the army. Nlincmar of lheims, whatever his own practice may have been, gives very good advice upron the subject. In his epistle to the bisheps (Opp. ii. 109, ec, 4, 5) he says that the $s$ soldiers due from the possessions of the church were to be sent uniler their appuintel leaders to the help of the prince, but thas the bishops themselves were to give advice and use all their ellorts to arrest the eftiusion of hoond. The council of Mealux, A.D. 845 (c. 37), proviles that elorgy are not to earry arms on paia of losing their grade; alse (c. 47), that bishopis should sead their forces under the command of some of the chureh vassats (ex subditis et ecrelesiasticis ministris), chosen with the conseat of the orehbishop. A curious provision follows: that such leaders shomld not indulge in any ille hope of succeeding to the bishopric, unless in accordance with the provision made by Gregory the Great, for whleh see Prinots, Consent of.

But the literature of the period abounds in indications that many hishops and abbats preferred the excitement of the camp to the seclusion of the cloister or the monotuny of pastiral duty.

MILK or MILKPAIL (in ART). Milkpails are represented in the Callixtine catacomb, 6th cubiculum of St. Callixtus (Aringhi, vol. i. p. 5.57). In these two paintings the Lord spems to be shepherd and lamb, or priest and sacrifice. The lamb in any case is bearing the muletra, with the pastoral stati. It may be supposed that the ressel which often accompanies the Gimal Shepherd is of the same kind. (See Buomarroti, vi. 2.)

On some snrcophagi (see Bottari, pl. xx.; Aringhi, vol i. p. 291 ; Maffei, Verona Ill str: iii. P. 54) shepherds are represented in the act of milking their flocks. On the whele it seens more likely (see Ezeklel xxp. 4 ; Heb. r. 12, 13; 1 Cor. iii. 2; 1 Peter ii. 2) that the muletra refers to the preaching of the Gospel, than to the Eucharist.

These are dowribed $r$. Lambeelus (bibliothen lindobonensis, Vienna, 1665). D'Aglacourt gives, eophes of the Illustrations of the Vatlean Virsil which Weat woul sayg may go back to the time of Cunstantine; and these, too, are in simple rectangular form, and though both beantital mul illustrative, are nut decorutire. The last worl will be conlined throughout this article to minlatures which are connected with the writing of a jage and torm part of Its whole etject. It would seem that in almost all the early corllees the text was everything to the scribe, and all the ornament belonged to $I t$, as to a suered thing. Hence the great attention puid to gold and silver writlag, and the constant habit of enclosiag mindatures in eaplal letters, where they were brought Into unity with the rest of the page as a pictorial composition.

It is rurious, further to distiugulsh decoration from illustration and graphle ornament from miuiature, that they have by no means thourlahed und decayed altogether in the same jdice or at the same time. From the 6th to the 9 th centuries is certuinly a time of general collajse, except in the Irish, Ilebritean, and Northumbrian monisteries; and few illuminated MSS. can be priated ont as certalnly execated during that period, or until Charlemagne's revival ot art

Crurfision, from Irish Psalter, 8t, Joha'a Oulleget, Oxford.
In the 9th. But in our own country, in the 7th and 8th centuries, while mimature painting hal tillen so low as to he simply distressitg to the modern observer, extrordinary skill Was manifested in ornamented writing. "It is impessible," says Prufessor Wext wool, "to imagine ansthing more childisli than the minastures contained in the spletadid Hiberaian and Anglo-Saxon Msis, of thls jeriod, Nelther can minature be mald to have materlally improved between the 8 th , nad 11 th centurles, the drawhing of the human tigure belag rule, the extremiless singularly and awkwardly attenated, and the draperdus thuttering la ill duecthus." (See the Illustrations la Puhtery): Sicmit from the Irish psalter preservel iu St. John's College, Cambillue, und luakin, The Tho Puths, Jeet. I.)

In the present urticle we have only to deal, stiletly nueaking, with the subjeet ot ornameatal writing as to the eapital letters (heads of eapitula or ehapters), which may oot only le rubile catel or orbmented I = ers, hut contain pletures Illustrative of the text. But it $i_{s}$ dislicult to olserve this distlaction in Agglo-Siaxen, Irish, and, inleed, in V'isigothle MSS. The grotesinues of the latter often mould the letters themselvis Into conventlonal forms of bicds, flowers, and animals, ottell of great graphie vigour ; and the extruordinary carves and laterlacings of the two former are tall ot serpeutine and lace tine torms. The Jrish MSS. are ditlerent. The deliency and decision of their working is incredible (nee Pribeographis Sicru, Gossiels of Mueiel Brith Naclearnan, and Book of liells), but the miniatures dlsplay a kind of titulty nad morbid indif. fereuce to accuracy, beanty, buil all else, which is a corious numaly, ant suggests a somewhat unhealthy asceticism. It Is doulitless true that their delieacy and precision of execution were uarlvalled by continental arti-ts of their time, or indted ot any other period. There can be no doubt, also, that mbsiomaries from the celtic parts of Britain, as St, Gall and Columban, earried their arts and religion to various parts of the continent, and we mas asert with I'rotessor Westwood, that tnany os' ihe splendid curital letters of the Carolingia. perial were executed in imitation of our earlier codices;

A Merovingian MS. of the second half of the 7th century (Bast, vol, i. Necweil des Chronigue: de St. Jérône, d'ldace de Lamégo, Coll. des Jesuites) possesses epecinl Interest from the spirited work of some true seribe-draughtsmat. Its caputal letters are drawn brilliantly and exactly with the pen and withoot colour (lettres blanches ou a jour), and point to the real origin and princlples of caligraphic miniat ure very admirably, And in some of the best Carolingian MSS. the pen breaks out vigorously in all manner of grotesques. The most amusiag triumph of penmanship ever attained, we appruliend to be in an initial portrait of a moukphysicinn. [See woodeut in Gnotesque.] No oflensive or outrageous allosion or Iden seems to occur in any of these records, as might be expectel, though in the sacrameatary of the abley of Gelluue, 8th or 9 th century, there is a crucifixion, with engels, where much blood is used, and the drawing is grim and inferior. It soon recover's, however, in the Visigothic MSS., where many human and angelle figures are represented, and which may perhapa be distinguished from the earliest work by the number of beasts of chase represented in them, boars and hares in particular. One of the tormer is nnnexed. The northern taste for distortion here begins to appear in the human fignres. One example of an Itallan-Lombard MS, is conspicuous for the absence of interlaced work, and for a tendeney to geometrical artagement; which is a marked feature in the French-Lombard examples also. They are more numerous than the Italinn, but still dwell on interlacings. The

The importance of anclent minlature, as representlig nrehitecture, costume, and ceremonial, cannot be orerrated, nall the picture in Connt Vivien's evangeliary of the presentation of the work to Charlemagne is most instructive; but nctual portrnits are not wanting in some MSS, The emperor Lothaire is reprenented in his erangellary with Emma hila wife; also IIenry III. and the empress Agnes. A MS. Is said to be now in the Escurial which contains portralts of Conral the Salle and Glsela; and the Countess Matllda is depleted in her gospels in the Vationn. The existing Graeco-Latin MSS. before Jerume and the Vulgnte do not contaln any paintings, and we must pass on to northern art, especlaily for Irlsh and Anglo-Saxon minatures, Professor Westwood's two works contain, or give references for, the whole subject of early caligraphy and drnwing. His earlier work puts forth in able, and apparently quite valid, plea for the natiquity of MSS. such as the Gospels of Moell Brith MacDurnon and the Book of Kells, with that of St. Columba. They seem to date from the earller Irish or Grelic missions to the Engllsh of Northumbrin. But tho facsimiles of Irish and Anglo-Snxon minintures nad ornaments constitute an introduction to the history of fine art in Britaln, from the Roman oceupation to the Norman conquest, and throw a light on the munastic culture of that period. The chief oharacteristic of the earliest fine Irish or English is the greatly increased size nul importance of the eapitals and first lines of the text, with their pattern-ornament, which sometimes occupies whole pages, but is often emriched with miniature. They are certainly enough to prove, as Westwood observes, that from the 6th to the end of the 8th century, when art was practically extinet on the continent, a style of work, tutally distinct from eny other in the worll, had been originated, cultivnted, and brought to a marvellous state of perfection. Though British, Irish, and Anglo-Saxon pilgrims to Rome and Ravenea douhtless derived various inspirations of siwred urt from the study of the great mosaies and of the remaining MSS. Still worse, he seems never by any accilent to have looked with hope or pleasare, or in search of fresh sulject, on external mature and its beauties. Consequently, he preferred single inages of evangelists, constantly ruder und more fintastle as his cloistered life grew fainter und more morbid in its fancies. Jut in the Nativity, Ascension, and Gloritication of our Striour, and the zodiacal signs of Athelstan's psalter, we have the begianing of early mealiaeval art in England, with ull its life nid eagerlycrowded figures, and yet also with its strong stamp of Classleism or Byzantinkm. It seems in this most singolar and beantifal picture as if a later hand, more purely Gothie, had expeuted the two lower subjeets of the Ascension and Gloritication, while the others ratain n shate of classical grace in composition. greatly resembles that of the grent Syriac MS. of Rabuala; so much so, as in the mind of the Writer to eonnect the Eastern and Einglish schools of art, and form an important link between the ancient English church and the East.

The Augastinian or Bregorian-Augustinian MSS., one of which is in all probability now preservel in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, No. 286, the other in the Bodlrian Library, Uxford, claim priority in time to the Finglish, though probably not to many Irish MsS. Four miniatures, besides a large whole-page figure of st. Luke, are given from them in l'akeojr ${ }^{\prime} \neq /$ hia Sitcruc Their ornament is purely Romanu-Byzantine. They are of the highest interest, as perhaps the oldest known specimens of this kind ot Lominn fictorial art in this country or elsewhere, nad probably a few years anteriur to the Ms. of Kisbula. With the exeeption of a leaf of St. Johu's Guspel in Greek, with miniatures of the upostles, [^33]now preserved at Vienua with the illuminated Areck l'entatench of the the century, these are hel: to be the ollest existing specimens of written or pminted Roman-Christinn iconography. 'The Entry into Jerusalem, the Ralsing of Lazarus, the Cipture of onr Lord, and the Bearing of the Cross, are four out of the twelve subjects of the Cambridge MS. Three of these correspond to those so frequently repeated in the catacomb paintings. and on various sarcophagi. The initials are phain red, and the writing a tine unelal.

A remarkable characteristic, to a colourist, of the Book of liells and some purts of the Gospel of Moril lirith MaeDurnan, is the beautiful use made of ditierent tones and nppositions of blue and grean. The writer can compare it with nothing he has sean, so well as with the azures, parples, and blue-rreens of many of the mosaics of Rivenna, which, with those of Rome, my doubtless have suggested much to northern pilcrims prossassed ot' a style nod special powers of their own.

Many curions questions as to the distingaishing charateristics of Classical, Anglo-Saxon, (carolinginn, anil even Eastern ininiatures, have teen lately raised by the celebrated l'salter of Utrecht. The date of its extraordinary illustrutions seems rery doubttul, whatever may be saial of the apprarently more ancient text. There are insuperable objections to Herr Kist's view that they go back to the time of Valentinian; indeal they appear to the writer nore likely to be the work of a travelled and highly edocated penman of English, jerhajs NorthumbrianEuglish birth, employed in an early Carolingian seriptorium. He may have been a pupial of Aleuin's, was possibly a palmer from the Iloly land, nall cartainly a "Romeo" or pilgrim to Rome. The drawings seem to be all by one hasty but skilful hand, directed by a mind of intinite facility of idea, and graphia power of realising the iden once formed. The illustrations are of two kiads; ealigraphy, strictly speaking, and the pen and ink mioiatures. The MS. is a large vellum 4to. in almirable preservation, and contains the whole of the Psalins, according to the Vulgate, with the A pocryphal Psalm 'Pusillus eram,' the Pater Nose ter, Canticles, Credo, and the Athanasian Creed. All are written throughout in triple columns, in Roman rustic capitals, very like those of the Vatiean Virgil us to size (Nouv. Tr. de Dipl. iii. p. 56 , pl. 35, fig. m. 2). The eteganee of the letters resembles the Paris Prudentius (ibid. fig. vili.). The headings and Initlals are red nucials, anl the first line is also nucial, and larger than the rest of the text. By the writing, in fact, the MS., says Profes sor. West wood, onght to be assigned to the 6th or 7th century; hut for the remarkable laitial 13 ; of which this is certainly to be said, that thase who are nequainted with Count Bastarll's Carolingian facsimiles, and Professor Westwood's Saxon reproductions, will probably see that the letter unites the rich use of gold and searlet of the one with the unmistakable knot-work and ophidian form of the other.

Each psalm has its pen and ink drawing, illustrating its suliject with the inventlve vigour of the best Gothie age, and not altogether devoid of Scundinavian vehemence of treatment, These works are 165 in number. ## MINISTERIALIS or MINISTRALIS.

(1) Ministerialis Calix is the chalice used for adininistering the consecrated wina to the faithful, which was often distinct from that used by the priest in the net of consecration.
(2) Ministerialis liber is an office-book, especially an altar-book,
(3) Yope Hilary is said (Liber Pontificalis in Vit. Hil.) to have appointed in Rome " niniaistrales qui circuirent constitutas stationes;" that is, clergy who should pertorm the sacrell offices in the several churches of Rome where Stations were held.
[C.]
MINISTERIUM. The vessels and other artieles used in the ministry of the altar are called collectively "ministeria sacra." Thus Pope Sixtus (according to the Liber Pontificalis) "coustituit ut ministeria sacra non tangerentur nisi a ministris sacratis." Pope Urban 1., according to Walafrid Strabo (de Reb. Eccl. c. 24), " omnia ministeria sacra fecit argentea."

The word is also used for the Cradence-table, on which the ressels were set before they were placed on the altar. (Ducange, s. v.)
[C.]
MINISTRA. When Pliny in his wall-known letter (Epist. x. 97) speaks of two female servants or attendants, called ministrae, whom he thought it necessayy to put to torture, we see that even in those days the word designated an affice-bearer in the church; nor is there any reason to doubt that it ia used as equivalent to the ${ }^{-}$Greek $\delta$ ódoolos (Rom, xvi. 1). See Deacontess.

MINIS'TRALIS. [Ministerialis.]

MINISTRY. [Orders, Holy.]
MIRACLE-WORKING. We find a great number of allusions in early times to this pretension, generally made by the founders of new sects. Simon Magus (Acts xiii, 9) was apparently the first of thi, class of persons to come into collision with the goapel. Another instance is recorded in xix. 13-16, in connexion with the so-called exorclsts in Ephesus, The Clementine Recognitions (lib, ii. n. 9), a work of the third century, introduces him as describing himself thus; "I am able to disappear from those who would apprehend me, and, again, I can appear when I please; when I am miladed to fy , l can pass through mountalns and stones, as through the mire; when I cast myself headlong from a preeipice, I am carried as if I were sailing to the earth without harm ; when I am bound I cnn loose myself, and bind them that bound me: when I ans close shut up in prison, I can cause the doors to open of their own accord; I can give life to statues and make them appear as living men," etc., etc. Tertullian remarks that Simon Maghe for these juggling tricks and pretended mirac: as, was anathematized by the noestles and excommunieated; and that such was the invariable rule with regard to this class of men-"et alter Magus qui cum Sergio Paulo, quoniam iisdem adversnbatur apostolis, luminum amissione multatus est. Hoc et astrologi retulissent, credo, si quis in apostolos incidisset. Attamen cum Magia punitur, cajus est species astrulogia, utique et specias in govere damnatur. Post Evangelium nusquam invenias aut sophistas, aut Chaldaeos, ant incantatores, aut conjectores ant Magos, nisi plane panitos" (De ldololatriâ, cap. ix.). The whole treatise is very interesting, nod full of information upon this subject. It was written long before the author's lapse into Montanism, and it is singular that the Montanists were among the worst offenders in this pretence to superantural powers. Eusebius (Eccles. Hist. lib. v. caj. 16) quotes the authority of Apollinaris for his descrijition of their pretended miracles, and relates that they were expelled from cominuaion as being actuated by demons, It was the habit in the enyly chureh to refer all this class of impostures, even when recognised elearly as $¢$ rands, to diabolical influence. Thas Firmilian, bishop of Cnesaren, in Cappadocia, writes to Cyprian ( $F$ Pp. Ixxv.), mentioning the case of a woman who counterfeited ecst nsies and pretended to prophesy, performed many marvels-"mirabilia quaedam porteatosa perticiens"-and bonsted that she would couse an earthquake. Thls woman, he proceeds to say, after having deceived a presbyter, named Rustieus, a deacon, and many lay people, was subjected to exorcism, and so shewn to be a cheat, instead of a jerson sacredly inspired"ille exorcista iuspiratus Dei gratià fortiter restitit, et esse illum nequissimum spiritum, qui prias sanctus putabatur ostendit"-ajparently regarding the woman as merely a passive ngent; and yet, in the very next sentence, he speaks of her deceiving by "praestigias et fallacias daemonis," and of her assuming to minister the sacraments, and such like. The view taken by the chureh of such persons was, in fact, not invariably the same. Cases in which the free will of the sufferer was apparently overborne by malign influences from without (obsession), were elassed as $\Delta a_{1} \mu \nu_{i} \zeta \delta \mu \in \nu 0 i$ (energumens), i.c. possessed, and placed under the care of exorcists. They were regarded as objects of pity, and ivcurred no censure from the church, being permitted to receive the holy communion as soon as their recovery was made manifest by a time of probation among the audientes. But where it was considered evjdent that the will of the person in question was in league and co-operative with the evil apiritusl influence, i.e. in casea of the claim to working of miracles, found in conjunction with dissoluteness of life, or with heretical teaching, these were treated as involving the most grierous criminality, aud punished with the greatest MISSA, whence the Engllsh "mass," in ecclesiastical uringe originnlly meant the dismissil of the congregation. Io luter Latin this word was equivalent to miasio, as remissa to remissio. Compare asceosa $=$ ascensio, accessa $=$ accessio collecta - collectio, confessa $=$ confessio, nail many others. There appears to have beea a custom of dismissing aasemblies, whether civil or religions, by proclniming the words, "Missa est." Thus Avitus archbishop of Vienoe, A.D. 490 : "In churches, and palaces, and judgment-halls the dismissal (missa) is proclaimed to take place, when the people are dismissed from attendance" (Epist. i. ; Migne, lix. 189). Two references in Ducange shew that the word was borrowed by the Greeks for the same use, at lenst in secular places of assembly. Thus Lnitprand (de Reb. per Europ. Gestis, v. 9) says that at Constantinople it was the "custom for the palace to be open to all soon after the early morning, but after the third hour of the day to forbid entrance to every one uatil the ninth, all being sent out by a sig${ }^{\text {nal }}$ given, which is mis." In the Chronicon Puschale dilex. it is anid that Justinian, in 532, when the sedition of the factions broke out, to the paluce, and said to the seaators, 'Depart every one to guard his own house "' (p. 624, ed. Niebuhr).

11. Missa Catechumenorum. Tha word missa was used in the church in refereace to the disof Carthage catechumens. Thus, by the Council of Carthage, 398: "That the bishop forbid no God, be he Geat church and hear tha word of diamissal (missam) or heretic, or Jew, until the diamissal (missam) of the catechumens" (can. notice, after the sermout the same time: "Take the catechumens takes place: the faithful will remain" (Serm. 49, c. 8). Cassian, A.D. 424, apeaka of one who was overheard while alone to preach a sermon, and then to "give out the dismissal of the catechumens (celebrare catechumeais missam), as the deacon does" (Coenob. Invtit. xi. 15). The council of Valentia, 524 : "That the gospels..... be read hefore the mass (missam) of the catechumens" (can. 1). The Council of Lerida in the aame year decreed that persona living in lncest ahould be allowed to remain in church only to the mass (missam) of the catechumens" (can, 4). The formula of "If "If there be any, catechumen here, let him go out ") (Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 336, ed. 2). There is oo reason for thinking that they were anywhere warned out by the words which from the 8 th century at least (Ordo Rom. i. 21 , 24 ; ii. 15 ; Mus. Itui. ii.) have been usel at the dismissal of the communicants, viz. "Ite, missn est." In the Moznrabic rite, on the Wednesdays in Lent, the priest or deacon aldressed the penitents after their last prayer - "Stand in your places for the dismissal (ad missam)"(Miss. Mozar., Leslie, (99). Se long as there were entechumens these words were doubtless intended for them also, each class was to remain in its preper place until the aotice to go was given.

lsidore of seville, whe used the Mozarabic liturgy, writing in 636, snys, "The missa is in the time of the sacrifice, when the eatechumens are sent out; the Levite crying, 'If any catechunsen has been left, let him go out;' and thence the missa, because they may not be present at the sacrameats of the altar "(Orig. vi. 19). The explanation appears to be thnt, the mere ghnorant, hearing of the missa, imagined that it menat, not the dismissal of the non-communieatiog classes, but the service from which they were excluded. The pepular usage, thus founded upen error, though essentillly improper, seens to have been early, if slowly, followed by the elergy. The first instance oceurs in a letter iu which St. Ambrese describes an event then quite recent, which oecurred on Palm Sunday, 38.): "Atter the reading fof the eucharistic lessons] and the sermon, the callechumens being disonissed," an interruption occurred, after an account of which he adds, "nevertheless, I eontinued in my duty, I began to perform mass (missam facere). While 1 am offering 1 am made a ware," &e. (Epist. 20, §4). The next is in the 3 rd canon of the couscil of Carthage, A.D. 390, which forbids presbyters to reconcile penitents "in publica missa." Leo, in 445, expressed himself rgains the "custom of a siagle mass" in sinall chur ies on festivals, nt which mere desired to be "resent "than the chareh would hold at orce" (ニpist. xi. 2). Cuesarius of Arles, A.D. 002 , usell the word freely, but in the plural, from which we should gather that the usage was still unsettle:1:-" If you observe carefully, you will see that the missiae do net tnke place when the divine lessons are recited in church, but when the gits are oftered, and the bedy and blood of the l.ord are consecrated " (Serm. 80, § 2. Comp. 81, § 1). Cassioderus, 514, in Italy: "The celebration of hely masses" (Expos. Ps. 25, v. 7); and again, "Missarum ordo completus est" (Ps. 33, coucl.), where he means the order of the eacharistic office. The plural is used by Gregory of Tours, 57., as "expletis missis" (De Mir. S. Mart. il. 47), "dictis missis" (De Clor. M rt. $5^{4}$ ), ats., and by others. The idiom may have arisen from a rubric in the Gregerian Sacramentary, in an early eepy of which the order for Good Friday ends thas-"Then let him (the priest) communicate, and all the clergy; and let the dismissals take place (fiant misane)" (Pamel. hit. SS. PP. L. ii. 257). Gregery I. himself, 590 , commonly uses the phrase solemnia missarum (Epist. iv. 44, vi. 17, vii. 29). The rariety of u a age continued to the end of our period. E.g. in the 7 th century the Council of Tolede, A.D. $6+6$, nses both missas (can. 2) and missam (3); that of Autun, 670 , has "a missa suspendere" (can. 11); that of Braga, 675, solemnia missarum (can. 4); that of Telele, 69t, nissa pro requie (eac. 5). In the 8th, the Ordo Romanus, about 730, has missarum solemnin ( $$ 19$, Mus.

Itat., Mabill. tom. ii.), missa ( $24,25,26,28,30$ ), and missae ( $22,25,26,28,46$ ). The Council of Aix, 789, uses missa (can. 6), that of Frankfort, 794, solemnia missarum (ena. 50). In the 1st capitulary of Theodulf of Orleans, 797, we have nissa (cc. 5, 6) and solemnia missarum (c.. 4, 11, 46). The aceond council of Clàalens (surSaône), 813, uses solemnitates (can. 39) and aelemnia (60) missarum.
III. That part of the service at whieh commupieants alone were present has been long distinguisher' from the Missa Catechumenorum by the name of Missn Fidelium. It was not so called, however, within the first nibe centaries. In the following passage from Florua of Lyons, A.D. 837, the phrase means the dismissal of the cemmunicants: "Tuae enim (sc. pust evangelii lectionem) clamante diacono, ijdem catechumeni mittebantur ; id est, dimittebantur foras. Missa ergo catechumenerum fiebat ante actionem sacrainentorum: Missa fidelium fit pest confectionem et partici pationem" (l:xpos. missue, $\S 92$ in fiue). The service frem which the eatechumens were excluded was also very frequently called missa sacramentorum; but we are unable to find examples earlior than the 11 th century (see Sala in Bena, Rer. Lit. ii., viii. 1).
IV. The sreaking up of a congregation of monks after their offices was also callell missa. Thus Cassian says that among the mooks of the east one who eame late to prayer had to "wait, standing before the door, for the missa of the whole nssembly" (Instit. iii. 7). So again, ii. 7, "Celeritatem missae;" iii. 5, "Missa caneaica; " 8, "Vigiliarum missue." Similarly, St. Beucdict, when settling the number of psalms to be said at each office, i:s, e.!y. at matins: "But after the three $\mathrm{p}^{\text {salins }}$ are linishel, let one lesson be rend, a verse nod kyrie eleisen; et missae finat" (cap. 17). The reader will observe the plaral, as in the Gregorian Sacramentnry.
V. In the liturgy of Gothie Spain (Miss/le Mozar., Leslie, 8, 11 , et passim) missa is the name of an address to the cummunicants ( $=$ the Gallican Preface), cerresponding in position to our exhortation. "Dearly beloved in the Lerd." The origin of this usage is clear. The departure of the non-communicating classes is now tellowel by an anthem (sacrificium = the Roman "offertory "), and that ly the word missa, which now appears as a heading prefixed to the address. Before the introduction of the anthem (Notitia Eucharistic!, p. $3+2$, ed. 2) the word would follow immediately the proclamation, "State lucis vestris ad Missam," and would simply indicate that the "missa" or dismissnl of the penitents and catechnmens then took placa. When those classes of worshippers ceased to exist, it was naturally aupposed that the word was the aame of the formulary that followed it. The address now called missa is by St. Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610, called "Oratio admenitienis erga pepulum" (De Div. Off. i. 15), from which we should infer that missa retained its original meaning in the Spanish liturgy in his time. A Gallican preface In the sacramentary found at Bebio (which fir convenience we shall call the Besangon Sacramentary, as it appears to have belonged to that prevince) is inseribed, "Missa Dominicalis" (1/us. Itul. 1, 373); but as ne ether iastance o,curs ju the Oallican liturgies this may be a clerical error.

VII. The daily offices were themselves called missae, as by the council of Agde in 506: "At

In the Gelasian they are gencrally headed "Inira Actionen" (Nurat. к. s. i. $496,553,5,57 \%$, etc.), but once "Infra Cnaonem" (ibid. 659). The following example is the formula for Maundy Thursday in that stacramentary: "Communicantes, et diem satratissimum celebrantes; quo traditus est Dominus auster Jesus Christus, Sed et memoriam," etc. (Murat. i. 55:1). Other furms are proviled for Cluristmas, Easter, Ascension Day, Whitsunday. (e) A pruyer which forms 1 art of the canon begins thus, "Hnuc igitur oblationem servitutis nostrae," etc. This ulso is varied in the Gelasian nad Gregorian sacramentaries ior seasons and occasions, as for Maunly Thursday (i. 553, ii. 55 ), Easter (i. 572, ii. 67 ), Whitsuniide (i. 601, ii. 90), fur the dedication of a church (i. 613), or font ( 618 ), nte. It is also healed "Infra Actionem" (i. 553, 572 , etc.). Iu the Gelasian Missae pro Scrutinio this prayer becomes a petition for the Competentes, nad is followed by the recital of their names nad anuther act of iatercession tor them, viz., "Hos, Domine, fodte baytismatis innovandos Spiritus Tui munere ad sacramentorum tuorum plenituainem poscimus prateparari. Per." (Murat. u. s. i. $5 \pm 2$ ). In an earlier part of the canon ("Infra Caromem ") a prayer for the sponsors is also interpolated, viz. after the words "Memento, Domine, famulorum famularumque tuarum ", (i,id.). A special "Hnac igitur oblationem" was almost an essentinl part of masses for the dead (Gelas. u. s. i. 752-7.;2; Greg. ii. 218-222), and Was inserted in many votive masses (Gelas. i. $703,719,729,4,6$, etc.; Greg. ii. 188, 193, 5, 200). ( $f$ ) The (Oratio) ud Complendum, post C,munuione'n, or cad Communionem (see the Sacramentaries in Lit. Lá: 'ietus, Murat. passin). This was properly a thanksgiving after the reception, such as we find in every liturgy, and probably came from the earliest period. "When that great sacrament has been partaked of," says St. Augustine, "a thanksgiving concludes ali" "(Epist. 149, §16). (g) Ad Popul"m (Sacram. Gelus. Murat. u. s. i. $495,6,8$, etc.), or Super Populu.n (Sacram. Greg. ibid. ii. 23, 8, 9, etc.), is the heading of a final benediction found only in some missae, especially in those for Lent. The Leonind Sacramentary has no headings, but several such beuedictions may be diatinguished in it ; c. g., Prutetor (Mlurat. u. s. i. 297), Non pratjulicet (ibid. 298), Tuere (ibid.), etc. The following is oue example: "Super populum Tuam, Domine, quassumus, benedictio copiosa descendat; indulgentia veniat; consolatio tribuatur: fides sancta succrescat: redemptio sempiterna firmetur. Per" (Sacr. Leon. Murat. i. 482). In the Romanizing parts of the Missale Froncorum this collect is headed "Ad Plebem" (Lit. Gall. Mabill. 323, 5), (2.) The Milanese Miss t. (a) The cellect for the day under the name of (Oratio) Super Populom (Pamel. Lituryicon, i. 293, et passim). This was originally said before the Gloria in Excelsis (inid.), which, followed by the Kyrie, preceded the Prophecy and other lessons. It is now said after the Kyrie (Martene, de Ant. Rit. Eccl. 1.
iv. xii, : i). (b) The (Oratio) Super Sindonem. The sinton is the "fair white linen cloth" of the Englinh rubric, It was spread over the altar ufter the gosjel, and thls prayer was said over it. The following exnniple is for the eve of tho Eplphany: "Adesto, Domine, supplicationibus oostris, et populo Tuo, quem Tibi ex omnibus gentibus elegisti, veritatis Tune lamen ostende. Per Dominun " (ibid. 314). (c) The (Oratio) Super Oblitta. This has the same intention as the Roman Scercta. Befort the creed was brought into the liturgy, it always followed the ollertory anthem (otterenda), and this is obviously its right place; but now on Sunlays aud other feasts the creed intervenes, and vely nwk wardly. See Pamel. u. s. Martene, u. s. (d) The Prejace corresponds closely to that of the Roman Sacramentaries. One is provided for every holvdny. (e) In the Missa pro Baptizatis or Easter Eive a prayer is inserted "Infra Actlonem," i. c. In the canon, in whth the celebration is expressly declared to be on their behalf: "Hoc paschale snerificiun Tibi offerimus pro his quos ex nquà et Spiritu suncto regenerars dignatus es " (3:3). In the Missa for Maudy Thursday ( $3: 39$ ) there is a variation of the Communicantes bearing on the institution of the sacrament, and a prayer to bs inserted "Post Orationem Sacerlotis pro seipso," i. $e$. after the "Nobis quoque minimis et peccatoribus." These, if we mist ake not, ure the gnly proper additions infra canonem alduitted by this liturgy. ( $f$ ) Another interpolation jeculiar to the Nissa for Maundy Thursday is the Oratio post Confractorinm. This also refers to the institution. It begins thas: "Ipsius praeceptum est, Domine, quol agimus, in cujus nume Te praesentià postulamus." (g) The (Oratio) Post Communimem corresponds to the Roman formulary, called Ad Complendum in the Gregorian, but more frequently lost Communionem in the Gclasian Sacramentary.
(3.) The Gallican Missa. (a) In the Gallican church the song of Zacharias was chanted niter the Kyrie at the beginning of the service except in Lent (St. Germanus, E,rpos. Brev. in Martene, de Rit. Eccl. Ant. i. iv. iv. 1). It was called "the Prophecy " (Germ. ibid.), and was followed by a prayer, Collectio (Miss. Goth. in Litury. Gall. Mabill. 190, 251, etc.) or ('ratio (Sucram. Gallic. in Mus. (tal. i. 285) post Prophetiun, which was generally based on it, or containod at least some allusion to it. Three of those extant (Miss. Franc. Lit. Gall. 322, 4, 5) do not exhibit the conaexion with the canticle, being borrowed from the Roman sacramentaries. The first two are the originals of our Collects for the 6th and I1th Sundays after Trinity. One example occurs in the Reichenau Fragment (Neale nad Forbes, Gall. Lit. 6; see also 28). (b) The Eucharistic litany of the West went conventionally by the name of preces (Not. Euch. 301). From Germanus (u. 8.) we learn that in the Gallican church the preces were said after the lessons and homily. In saveral Missne we have a Collectio post Precem (after the Collectio post Prophetiain), which can only be referred to the litany, and the general character of these collects corresponds to that position. In the Besancon sacramentary they are headed "Oratio post Precem." (Mus. It. i. 282), ex.: "0 l.ord God, whe art both justly angry with Thy people and merciful to forgive them, incline Thine ear

In the Missal of the Franks the Praefatio (itself become a collect) and its collectio appear together under the common hendiag of Ante Nomina (Lit. Gall. 322, 4, 5), which iadicates that they are said before the ofiertory and the recital of the nanes of those for whom prayer was made. These collects are Gregorian (among them are ours for the 1st, 4th, 7th, and 10th Suadaya after Triaity), a fact which, with many others, suggests the influence under which the older Gallican forms were given prayer. Collectio post Nomina the anmes the properly had two objects. It was a prayer for the acceptance of the gitto (so far corresponding to the Roman Super Oblata), and ath act of intercession for both living and dead. E.g. "Suscipe quorum sacrificlum laudis oblatum ... Nomion in aeternit recitatione complexa scribi jubeas nominibus offere (Goth. u. s. 191); "Auditis tum Dominum deprecemur dilectissimi, Chrisficia sic viventibus ut defunctis opitulentur ad requiem" (ibid 2u1) A collect of this character is also found under the same title in the Missae of the Missale Gall. Vetus, u. s. 329, 333, 4, etc.), and of the Reichemau Fragment (Nenle and Forbes, u. s. 2, 5, 9, etc.). In the Besangoo sacrameutary, which almised, but the Gallicanea, the mane is retaieed, but the Gallican collect is supplnated by Frankish Missal i. 279, 284, 6, 7, etc.). In the and the Roman "Super Oblata" thing are gone, its proper title (Lit. Gall 31 " appenrs under ( $f$ ) The Collectio ad Pacem came next, a prave. said when the kiss of peace was given. It is properly a prayer for charity and piace, and collects to this effect appear under the name in M. Goth. (u. s. 188, 191, 4, 7, etc.), in M. Gall. Vet. (ibid. 330, 3, 4, 365), and in Miss. Richen. (i.s. 6, 10, 22, 29). In the M. Franc. the aame is suppressed and Roman collects, with no refereace in them to charity or peace, are substituted (Lit. Gall. 317, 8, 320, etc.). The true Gallican collect has almost equally disappeared from the Romadizing Besancon sacramentary, but the name has been left (Mus. It. i. 279, 284, 9 , etc.). One true example from the last-named book will serve as a specimen of all: "Cause, 0 good Jesu, Thy pence to glide into our hearts, in which is may ever preserve in apiritua! affection that

Iet. 335); "Rogamus uti hoo sherificium tua benedictione benelicas et sancti Spiritus reve perfundas" (II. Richen. 15). The Spirit is not meationed in many in which the effect of the prayer is the same: a.g. "Ut operante virtute panem mutatum in carne, poenlum versum in snaguine, illum sumamus," etc. (M. Goth, 300 ); "Desendat, Domine, pleaitulo majestatis, Divinitntls, pictatls, virtutis, benedictioais et gloriae tuae supur hune pnnem et super hune ealicem" (M. lichen. 11). ealicem" (M. lichen. 11). ( $k$ ) In the Gallican rite the fraction took phace before the Lord's Prayer, which, ns in other liturgies, came betwen the consecration and communion (Germanus, Expos. Marteoe, i. iv. xii. 1.). The Gothico-Gallican Missal, nad that oaly, gives a Collectio ad Punis Froctionem for the mass on Easter Eve. It eridently has some special history now unknown; for in it the oblation is oflered "fur the safety of the kings nad their army and all standing areund" (Lit. Gall. 251). (l) The Lord's I'rayer was introduced by a form which is always henlel in the missals, Collectio ante Orution. m Duninicam. The following is a brief exmple: "Not presuming on our merit, o holy Father, but in obedience to the command of our Lord Thy Son Jesus Christ, we presume to say" (12. Got'i. 192). Another ends thus, "supplinat to Thee we cry and any, Our Father" (M. Gall. Tet. 346). Many are addresses in which the people nre cxhorted to say the Lord's Prayer, e.g. "Let us beseech the Almighty eternal Lord, that ... He primit us to say with confidence the prayer which our Lord hath taught us, Our Father" (M. Goth. 202). (m) The Lord's Prayer was followed by a prayer with the title Collectio post Orationen Doninicam, which also varied in the several Missae. It corresponds to the constant Roman embolis, and like that is founded on the last petition of the Lord's Prayer, even beginning as that does, geaerally (not always; see M. Goth. 223, $\because 30,7$; M. Giall. jet. 346, 9) with "Libera nos." (n) The Benedictio Populi followed, which also varied with the senson. By the 44th eamon of Agle, A.D. 50b, only bishops were permitted to proaounce this. The intention of the decree was, aecording to Germanus, about 50 years later, to "guard the honour of the pontifex" (Expos, in Mart. u. s). These Benedictions are very uncer tain in their formation. In the Gothico-Gsillican Missal they geacrally consist of five distinet parts (Lit. Gall. 189, 196, ete.), but some are diviled into three (198, 219, etc.), four ( 223,228 ), six ( 192,208 ), or nine (210). In the M. Gallicamum Vetus (ibid. 333. 349, 365, ete.), and the M. Richen. (Gall. Liturgies, 2, 20) they are a continuous prayer. Zachary of Rome, A.D. 741, says that the Gallican Beaedictions "multis vitiis variantur," and that the bishops were actuated by "vainglory" in making them, "sibi ipsis damnationem authibeates" ( $E p .12$; Labbe, vi. 1526). As no such episcopal benediction can be trueed to Rome, some French writers have supposed that Zachary condemaed the practice altogether; but the strength of his language would in that case imply a spirit of intolerance which we are unwilling to nseribe to him, It seems mere probable that be referred to the length nad ambitions character of the benclistions in use. Fram Cuesarine of Arles, a.d. B 0 y , we learn that in Frace the people were in the habit of lenving church ufter the gespel, if they dif not wish to communicate (Hom. e0), Inter Serm. August. App. 28ti; see niso 281, 282). The council of Azde, in 503 (enn. 47), tho first of Orluans in 511 (cana. 26), nad the third of Orlenas, 5isk (emn. 29), forbaide them to go awny betire the benefiction. An unvarying short blessing was always pronounced here by the priest, it the bishop was not present (German, u. s.). (o) After the communion the priest said the Collectio posist Eithoristiom (M. Goth. u. s. 196, 211, 230; Giall. I'et. 331), or post Commmionem (M. Guth. 190, 3, 8, ete.; Af. Gall. Vet. 3:3, 5, 36k, 7 , etc.). This collect is often a brief exhortntion to thankfulness, perseveranee, or prayer (as MI. Goth. 190, 193, 203, etc.; Gall. I et. 3:11, 347 (where it is called Pruefatio p. Euch.), 3:0). ( $p$ ) The last proper collect is the Consinmatio Missue, which name oceurs Miss. Foth. 196, 230, $293,4,6,7,300)$. More frequently it is hended by the words, "Collectio sequitur" (M. Goth. $190,3,8,214 ;$ Gall. V. $334,350,365,6,7,8$, 372), or "Item Collectio" (M. Goth. 298), or "Collectio" simply M. Gutl. V. 331, 347, 371). Ex.: "That whlch we have taken with our mouths, o Lord, let us receive in our minds, and may an eternal remedy be made to us out of a temporal gift" (M. Goth. 190).

It nppears probuble from Gregory of Tours that in Hrance the missie fer one or more grent festivals at least were copied out of the sncrameataries, and used in that convenient form under the conrentional name of "Libellus." For he snys of a bishop that on a certain ocensinn, "ablato sibi nequiter libello, per quam sacrosancta solemaia agere consucverat, itn paratus a tempere eunctum festivitatis opus explicuit" (Hist. Fr, 1I. 2\%). An aged abbat asked to celebrate, snid, "Ocull mei caligine obteguntur, nec possum librlhum adspicere; presbytero igitar haec alteri legeala mandate" ('it. PP, xvi. 2). As the canon was part of the missa and always very short, everything required by the priest for a given oceasion, or even for a longer sensen, might be brought within the compass of a libe lus.
(4.) The Mozarabic Missa.-St. Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610, enumerates seven forms "in the order of the mass or of the prayers ly which the sacrifices offered to God are conspcrated" (Do Licel. Off. 15). His account of them is copied, and therefore confirmed by Eitherius ${ }^{\text {and Beatus, A.D. } 783 \text { (De Adozt. C'hrist; i.; } ; ~ ; ~}$ Bilioth. V.'PP. viii. 354; Colon. 1618), and is found to agree with the Hispano-Gothic sacrimentary known as the Mozarabic Misssl. We have to ebserve, however, that Isidore is speaking only of the Misss Fidelium, and that he combines prayers which we have to censider separntely, (a) There is a variable prayer called the (ratio, tounded on the Gloris in Excelsis and saill after it, coming therefore before the prophecy. It often begins with praise and ends with prayer, as, e.g. that for Christmas: "Hodio nobis thesaurus antus est . . . . Praesta nobis, Domine, per glorian antivitatis tuce a malis propriis liberari " (Miss, M.,z. Leslie, u. s. 37; comp. 20, 32, etc.). (b) Referring, as we said, to the prayers in the Missa Fidelium only, Isidere says, "The first monition a be stirred This is ahove in Pravfatio; of Inroeat recelve the liation" (is the Missate :135). Ala Alin (11, 1 the more fir to the Missa wherers or the sald sa (Isid.). ## liturgies, see Antipnon, Coms in the several proper to the Gallican liturgies the prayers "missa" of thaint's day are otten called the Sacramentary saint. Thus in the Besaacoon Missa S. Martiui Enisave Missa Sancti Stetimi, $3+9$, etc.) ; in the Gcopi, etc. (M1us. Ital. i. 292, Johnnnis Apostoli Gothico-Gallican, Missa S. Leudegarii martyris Evengelistae, Missa Saacti etc.), and in the Gallicanum vall. 262, 283,Germuni Eplscopi (ib, 329). From this nse of the worl Howed naother, the festival itself on which those prayers were sidid heing often calleni by the name of Missia. Thas in the loggulae Chuonicon unn of Chrodegang, writteu in 757, caj, 34, we have Missu S. Remedii ( $=$ Remigii) Missa S. Martiul (Migne, 89). A Derretice l'recum of 779 direets that the services which it orilers take place, Missa S. Johnnnis (Cup. Req. Fruac. I. 20; sim. in Cajit. Hit. nun. ber, Car. M. 449). In the third cupituinry of Charlemagne in 803 , a general gathering of the vassals of the empire is orilered to take place "on the eighth thefore the caleals of July, i.e. on the nutss of St. John the Baptist " (i, 304). Sim. In a law of Pepin, A.d. 79.1 (i). 54:3). St, Martin's principal feast (Nov, 11) was formerly enlled St. Martin ia the wibter, or in yeme. One example to our purpose ocenrs in the reign of C'hurlemagne, viz. in his Cajiltulary de Villis, A.D. 800 , in which it is ordered that all foals belonging to the king shall be brought to the palace ""n the mass of St. Martio in the winter" (Missa S. Martini hiemali, c. 15, ib. 3il4). This use of missa, which became very common after the 9 th century, has bequenthed to us sueh combinations ns Christmas, Martinmas, Canilemas (missa luosinum), etc.

N. In this section we propise to give the various kiads of missae (in the sense coasidered in § viii.) that were in use betore the 9 th century, and to explain the terms describing them.
(1.) Missa Cirdinclis. This phrase, which is ualerstood to mean "high mass," occurs in the Jiructld S. Berrini, ii. 7 ; Acta Bened. saec. ili. (the 8th century), i. 132: "Die Dominico horâ quấ cardinaiis missae conventus pablice agebuntur."
(2.) Missa C.rism,lis. The proper prayers used on Maundy Thurslay at the mass at which the chrism is consecrated are so called in the Gelasian Sarameotary (Murat. i. 5.54), in the ancient Rheims use of the Gregorian, the extant copy of which was written ia the time of Charlemagne (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. IV. xxii. § 3 in $\ddagger n e$, Missa Chrismale (sic) ), and in the Anjuu pontitical a little later (iid. § $8, \mathrm{n} .4$ ).
(3.) Sfissa Communis = publica (as "common prayer" with us) in Epist. Brauionis Ceesaraug. A.D. 627 (Vits S. Acmiliani praefixa): "Ut missa recitaretur coammuia injuaxi" (Acta Bened. saec, i. P. iii, 206).

Missa Communis alno meant a mass said for several jersons in common. Thus in one under that title the priest prays "for those for whom he has made up his mind to pray " living or dead, and "for all the fiithful, whose names the book of blessed predestination contains written" (Mon. Liturg. Alem., Gerbert, i. 270).
(4.) Missa Decensita. By a charter dated in the yeir 760 a grant of land was made to the church at Brioude, "ut omni tempore missae ibiidem deceasitae esse deleant" (App. Act: Vet. n. 14; Cap. Reg. F'r. ii. 1393); i.e. as it is noderstood, shall be duly and properly performed.
(5.) Missa pro Defunctis. See Obsequies.
(6.) Missa Dominicalis. This is the title of missae to be used on Sunday (Dies Domiaicus) in the Galicun Sacramentaries. Sce the missae $75-80$ in Missale Goth. (Lit. Gall. 292-299), the 36th in Gallicanum Vetus (ibid. 375) and eight missae in the Besangon ( ${ }^{(1 / \text { s. Ital. i. 365-383). }}$
(7.) Misars te E.cceptuto is the title of a missa stauling befire that tor Chrintmas Eve in the Milanese Missal (i'amel. u. s. I. thi). We are probably to muderstand with lamelias, that it is for exceptiemal use; via. when seren Sumlnys occur in Adsent, which in the province of Miina bugins on the cirst Sunday after Martimmas. Mabillon, hewever (Lit. Gull. 99), reals, Misat de Expectntt, and suggests a comparison with the "Prapmatio ad Vesperam Nitallis Domini" In the Miss. Gatll. I et. (ibia, 336); but the reading in all the ellitions, including Mabillon's own, is not l'raepmratio but l'raetatio, und the formulary which fullows the above heading is a "prcthee" in the Gallican sebse; i.e. an adidress to the people. See Thomaslus, Li er Sucran. ii. ++1 ; Nurat. Lit. Kom. 1et. ii. 706 ; Forbes, 1, all. Lit. 158.
(8.) Missa pro Gratia um actione. There is no proper missa in the old ancrumentaries that is, or could be, so described; but the holy t.ucharist was celebrated as an aet of splecial thankspiving at en early ieviow. Thus in a work of the 5 th century we read that when a woman hal heen healed at the orditary celebration "an obiation of thankygiving was nguin made for her" (De Prom. et Pruel. Dei; llim. Temp. 4; inter opp. I'rosperi). A r.ibric in the iresent Komnn Missal orders that "for thank. giving be said the mass of the most holy Tribity, or of the Holy Ghoit, or of the blessel Nary" certnin proper prnyers (Oratio, Sccreta, Pristcommunio) "heing adied voller the same ending." The Missa de Trinltate deveends from an en:ly periol, being found in the Colex SanBlaslanus of the Gregorinn Sacramentary which is of the 9 th century (Gerbert, MLIn. Lit. Aim. i. 260). The Missa de Spiritu Sancto is oaly an adaptation of the Gregorian missa for Whitsanday (Murat. u. s. ii. 90). We caunit cabnect them with acts of thanksgiving within our period; but that a special : elebration oll reenvery of health was then common may be inferred from a Narboone pontifical, the MS. of which is not muci later. In this it is snid that the patient "restored to health by the merey of God ought by no means to omit causing a mis.sn pro gratiaram actione to be celebrated " (Marteae, u. s. i. vii. iv. 13).
(9.) Missa Jejunii is the title of four lenten missae ( $2 \because-25$ ) in the Missale Gothico Gallicanum (Liturg. Gall. 231, etc.), and of four in the Sacramentary of Besanson (Mus. Ital. i. 30t). See aft er, Missa Quadrajesimalis.
(10.) Missa Judicii, the mass aaid at an ordeal. The expression forms the title of the priper prayers usel nt a trial by cold water, as appointed by Dunstan of Canterbury (Baluz, Cap. Reg. Franc. ii. 647). The missa consists of a proper antiphon, collect, three lessons (Lev. xix. 10-14; Eph. iv. 23-28; St. Mark x. 17-21), gradunl, offertory, secreta, preface, benedictio ad judicium, antiphona post communionem, and post-cummunio. The words of delivery common (with variations) to this and later forms of the kind (sce Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iii. vii. 3, $5,8,9.17$ ) are, "The Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ be unte you for probation this day." Gerbert (Disyuis. vi. iii. 3) gives in full the missa of an "Ordo ad faciendum judiciun, cum volueris homines judicio probare, vel aquae frigidae vel ferventis, aut iguit: ferri, vel voue-

A kindred practles among priosta was that of colebrating the Eucharint in attextation of their own lanueeuce. Thus Gregory of Tours relates that in order to clear himself of a charge of having slandered the queen, "dictls missis in tribus aitaribus se de his verbis exueret sacramentu" (Hist. Franc, $\mathbf{\nabla}, 50$ ). This was probably common; for in 868 it was enforced by the Council of Worms, which ordered that bishopa and ipresbyters accused of homichde, adultery, theft, anl witcheraft should "celebrate a mass for each charge and say the secret publicly and communicate" (can. 10). So late as 1077 we find Gregury Vil. using thls method to purge himseit' trom simony (Life by Bowdea, iil. 12). Nor was it confined to the clergy. The year after the Council of Worms, Lothaire the king of Lorraine recelved the mans from the hands of Hadrian in nttestation of his freedom from the crime of adultery (Fleury, Hist, du Christ. li.
(11.) Missa Legitima is a mass celebrated with all due repuisites. "We must own that to be a missa legitiuna at which are present a priest, one to reeprond, one who oflers, and one who communicates, as the very composition of the prayers clearly shews " (Walafrid, de heb. Eccl. 22). Compare the usc of the phrase " mmmunio legitima," Penitents supposed to bis dying might be communicated without the previous lsying on of hads by the bishop; but if they recovered after that, they were to recovered after that, they were to "stand in the order of penitents, that when they had shown the necessary fruits of repenfance, they might receive 'legitimam communionem,' with the reconciliatory imposition of hands" (ean. 3, Conc. Araus. A.D. 441; insented much later in Conc. Reg. Franc. 1. 138; compare Isaaci Lingon. Canones, i. 6).
(12.) Mfissa Matutina. The 4th canon of the Council of Vsison, held in 529, runs thus: "Ut in omnibus missis, sive matutinls, sive quadrigesimalib:s . ., semper Sanctus, Sanctua, Sunctus licatur," etc. The ground of the distinction is that in Lent the celebration took tinction is that in Lent the celebration took place in the afternoon, whereas generally it was et the third hour (Notitia Euch, 31-36). The to attend nrmad "sacrif, A.D. 538, forbjds men sive vespertina" (can. 29). "Eveniag" massea include those of Wednesday and Friday which, except batween Enster and Whitsuntide, wers

At a later period the ordiuary daily mass said in many mouasteries after Prime in summor and sfter Terce in winter, was called missa matutinalis; ss in the Consue, tudines S. Victuris 68, in Martene, u. s. iii. 283; Cunstit. S. Dionys, liem. ibiul. 297, 301. This earlier mass was called missa minor in contrast to the missa major or conventualis, which was celebrated with greater ritual solemaity. See Martene, de Antiq. Monach. Rit. ii, 5 .

Missa Omnimoda is again the name of a late coder of general intercession in the St. Gail codex of the Giregorian Sicramentary, probably given to the invariable portions of the anme of Gothic Spain. The lesser mise the liturgy thins it is called Liber Omnium Offersntium. The name is ajpiropriate because a considerable part of the service to which it is applied is assigned to the choir, the representative of the people; so that all the worshippers have their share in it. Whether the title wns adopited for this renson is, however, not certain. In any case it may have been suggested by the occur"ence of the werda at the oblation of the chalice: " Omuum Olferentium eorum pro quibus tibi otlertur, peceata indulge " (Miss, Muzar. 2233). The same words occur together in a Collectio post nominn of' Gothlo France (Miss. Geth. in Lit. Gall. 237); but nelther there does the context give them any conventional significance. In early times the people were sald to ofler even In the commemeration of the ancrifice of the cross after the consecration. Thus Florus of Lyons, explaiaing the Unde et memores, etc., of the canon, says, "Memores igitur Dominicse passienis, resurrectionis et asceasionls, tam sacerdotes quam plebs fideiis offerunt prseclaras . .. majestati Dei mon de suo, sed de ajus donis ac datia," ete, (De Expos, Miasue, 64). This is implied by a gynod held by St. Patrick and othar bishops, whlch order that a bishop in the dioceso of another shall "on the Lord's day offer only by partaking," i.e. as a layman (can. 30; Migne, 53, col. 826).

(16.) Missz Paschalis. The missne provided in the Gothico-Gallican Missal for four days in Easter week, viz. from Tuesday to Fridsy inclusively (Lit. Gall. 254-6), and those to be used from Monday to Fridny of the same week in the Old Gailican (ibid. 367-371) sre so called. There are also two Missae Paschaies in the sscramentary of Besançon (Mus. Itul. i. 330, 2).
(17.) Missa Peculiaris. A mass said on any private account, as o. $g$. for the reposs of the dead, was so cullied in the 8th century. Theodulf of Orleans, A.D. 797, orders that "Missae Peculiares performed by priests on Sundays be not so publiciy performed as to draw the people from the public celebrations of masses, which take place cauonically on the thind hear" (Capit. c. 45 ; Labbe, Conč. vii. 1147).
(18.) Missa Pontificalis, a masa celebrated by a bishop. We nre not aware that the phrase occurs within our range of time. The Ordo Romanus I., supposed to have been compiled about 730, which glves Hrections for an episeopai masa, is inseriber in its earliest extant copy, which is ost the: Iuth es.a'ury, Ondo Ficelemiantien Ministeril Lomanme teeclesime. (d.20.) Wissu I'rirutu is used in two sensea, It either means (1) "A mass celehrated in privato and on a precial account withont singing, and but the elork ministering, whether it be in a church or private oratory" (Merati In Gavanti, 1. 1. in diubor (icon. Oins. Pruedim. & t6), in which case it is distiugulshed from a sulumn mass ; or (2) "A mass in which the prient alune communientes" (ibict.), in which case it is opposed to a jublic: mass. A daily mass celebrated out of devotion in the curlier ages would come uader the furmer head, An examplo (in Cassius bishop of Sarni) is meutioned by Gregory I. (Dial. Ir. Sti). In neither sense does the phrase ajpear to have been in use duriug our period, See Missa Sulitaria.
(II.) Miss, Publica is a celebration at which all may be present and communicate. The expression is tiregueat in the epistles ot Gregory $l$. Thus lie "torbids that l'ublic Masses shunid ou any necount be celebruted " In a (certain) monastery ty the blaliop of the diocese, that the retirmment of the monks might not be invalled by the enncourse of people from without (iv. 4:3), nul serwrely condenas another bishop; for linving piaced his throne in a monastic church and celobrated "i'ublic Masses" there (v. +6). He orders at oratury to be " solemnly consecrated without Iublic Masses " (vii. i2), and spuaks in reprobation of a bishop who had "built an oratory in the diocese of another . . . and did nut fiear to celebrate J'ublic Masses there " (xi. 21). Aaother example from a law of Charlemagne ln 803 will sulfice. Among other restrictions lain on the chorejiwopi he forbade them to "give the benedietion to the preople in Publlci Missi "(Cap. Lety, Fיr, i. 38:2).
(ㅍ․). M/ssa Quadragesimalis, a missa to be used 111 Lent. Sce ubove, Missu Matutinu, and Misaa Je unib. A lenten missa in the Besmuçon Sacrsmentary beara the title Misse Quidrugesimalis (Mus. Ital. i. 302). One of those in the GothereGillican Missal is healed Missa in Quadringexima (Lit. Gall. p. 23t). In the last-named missal there are in all only six proper missae provided for Lent. The Gallicaaum Vetos is defective from Christmas to the great serutinium nul exhibits none (ibid. 338). There are but five in the Besancon rite. On the other hand the Gelasian and Gregorian give a missa for every day in the season, and the Mazarabic une for every Sumiay, Wedoesday, and Friday. The Ruman misne fur the werk-days in Leat are stillosel to have been chiefly borrowed from those of Dian (Pamel. Rituale, i, i3:8). The latter is peculiar in having node for the Fridays (Martene, do Ant. E'cel. Hit. iv. xviii. 21; Gerbert, Jon. Lit. Al, i. 42).
(3.1.) Dissa Quotidiuna apppars to be a missa that may be used un any day that has no proper prayers provided for it. There is an exanple (Missa Cittidi an in the Besuayun Sacrantationy (Mus. It. i. i38:). Compare Lageadis C'ittillianis (379), Lectiones Cuttiliauns ( $\because 36,381$ ), Lectiones

(25.) Missi Rumensis, i, e, horrowel from the Romun books. The old Galilean canon was very short, baling nothing moro than the recital of the institution, whlch was alled to the variable Collectio post sanctus. The first words of it (I we enim prldie quam, etc.) are frequently so alifed in the fiothico-(lalliran Missal (Lit. fiall. $189,192,5$, etc.). The Itewangun sickumeutary, huwever, had alopted the lung loman camon, which it putafier the contestatio (ree l'raraces), omitting the jost Saactus. It oceurs thus in the first missn in the book, and that missa lears the title, Missn Romensis Cuttdiama (J/us. /t. 279). As the missa retnins most of its (ialicann forms undor their nsual names (jost nomina, nd pacem, etc.), the word "Romensis" must refer to the conon almost entirely, and theretore "Cottidlana" here Indicates the dally use of that. The last miasn in the Gothico-Gailioan Mllsun has the slmilar headlng, Nissn Cottitiaoa Romensis (Lit, Qull. 300); but after the tirst collect the MS, fails us. That collect, however, being identical with one in the lsesuncuo missa heips the conclusion that the Roman canon followell ia that book alab, ond that the Gioths in Ganl, though retaining thronghout their liturgy their own mode of consecration, yet permitted an optional use of the lioman.
(26.) Miss 1 do Sanctis. At a very early period It became the custom to observe the noniversary of a martyr's death. On such occasiuns the Euchnrist was celebrated, partly as an net of Intercessiou for the soul of the deceased, and partly ns a thankful commemoration of the triunijh or truth and grace in his death. Soon the rite was oloserved in the case of other uminent Christians, and ere long, the original ground of it becuming obseured, the celebration was supposed to be in honour of the persun (in honorem j psorum,-in ejus honore; Greg. Tur, Mirac. $\mathbf{~}$. 47, 75). The story of Polycarp (A.D. 147) gives as the earllest example of such commemoration: "We deposited his remaios where it was titting, where gathered together as oppertunity serves with joy and gladness the Lord will grant unto us to celebrate the natal day of his martyrdom, both ia memory of those who have fought the good fight (for twelve suffered with hiin), and for the craiaing and preparation of those who will be called to it " (Exel. Smyrn. Epist. 18). Tertullian, A.D. 192: "We make oblations tor the dejrarted on one day in the year, for birthday gifts "( Ue Cur. 3). Cyprian in 250 orders his clergy to inform him ot the days on which any were put to death, "that he might tue able to celebrate their commemorations among the Memorials of the siartylo. . . that oblatioos and satrifices in commemoration of them might be celebrated" where he was (Fpist. 12 ad Presbyt.).

This Missa is not found in the Galasian (ilul.). gorian books. Another instance is the Gregorian super Oblata in the missae of St. Leo and St Gregory: "Vouchsafe to us, $O$ Lord, that the (ire\% this) oblation by the inmolation of which Thou hast granted that the ains of the whole world shouid be forgiven may profit the soul of Thy semant Leo (Gregory)" (ibid. i1, 25, 101). (33.) Missa in Symboli traditione. See Missa pro scrutinio.
(34.) Missa de Tempore; i.e. adnpted to some sacred diy or seasou of the Christian year. Such masses are in all the ancient missals, though the phrase is late. The Gregorian, Milanese, and Mozarabic provide missae for every Sunday in the year, as well as for the great days of Christmas, Epiphany, Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, Easter, etc. In some cases niso for the feriae connected with them. The Gallicsn rites having been suppressed by Pepin and Charlemagne towards the close of the 8th century (Lebrun, Dissort. iv. art. i.) are less methodised and full, but they are framed on the same principle.
(35.) Missa Vespertina. See nbove under Missa Ma!utina.
(3u.) Nissa lofiva, By this is now meant any mass not of the day, even though prescribed, as, e.g. the masses of tha Blessel Virgin on the first two Suturdays in Advent (Merati in Gavanti, P. i. Rusw. (ien. Obs. Prael. 66). Originally, however, it meant a celeuration at which some special blessing, temporal or spiritual, was sought, whether for the celebrant or others. This is the character of two Missne Votivae (omnimodn, singularis) alrendy cited, from the Mozarabic Missinl (see (14) and (30)). Other examples, though not so inscribed, occur in the same book; as Missa de Itinerantibus, de Tribulntionibus, pro alio Sacerdote fratre suo vivo, ue uno Intirmo, pro Intirmis (pp. 447-454). The Besnnçon Missal has four headed "Missa Votiva" for blessings on n single jerson to be named in the office (Mfus. Ital. $360-2$ ); and two others, one of which, pro Vivis et Defunctis (363), spenks of brothers, ansters, and benefactora. In the other, entitled Missa in domo cujuslibet (364), the names of the family are to be introduced. There are no missae of the kind in the other Gnllican missals with the exception of one entitled Orationas at Prac. pro legibus in that of the Franks (Lit. Gall. 316). If we except some masses for the dead, there are no Missne Votivae in the Ambrosian Liturgy, nor does the phrase appear in it. The collections under the names of Grimoldus (Pamel. ii. 388) nnd Alcuin (ibid. 517) contain votive missae, but they are not ao described. This is the case also with the Leoniun (Murat. 1. 434, etc.) and Gelasian ( ${ }^{\prime \prime}$ id. 725 , etc.) Sacramentaries. In the ancient copy of the Gregorian printed by Pamelius (tom. li.) we find neither the name nor thing; but both in those printed by Muratori (ii. 193, etc.), Gerbert (Mfon. Jet. Lit. Alem. 279 etc.), the editora of the works of Gregory published in 1615 (tom. v. 221, atc.) and others.

We find an early instance of a votive celebration of the Eucharist in St. Augustine. His presbyters were requested to send one of their number to pray in a hnunted house. "One want, offered there the sacrifice of Christ's body, praying to Hia power for the cessatlon of that trouble. Through the mercy of God it forthwith ceased" ( $D_{e} C_{i v}, D_{e i,}$ xxii, 8, 6).
XI. The Eucharist had acquired the name of missa a long time before any one phrase (auch as mlssam celebraxe, audire) was generally accepted to denote the celebration of the sacrament or lay attendance at it. The tollowing list is thought to contain all in use within our limit of time.
(1.) Missam agere, peragere. The Gelaslsn Sacramentary: "Si fuerit obiata, agendae sunt missne, et communicet " (Murat. i. 596). Sim. in two edicts of Hunneric the Vandal, A.D. 484: "In ecclesiis vestris missas agera" (Hist. Persec. land. Vict. Vit. ii. 2), "Reperti sunt contrn interdletum missas in sortibus Vandalorum egisse" (ibid. in c. xill.). We find also missam peragera ; e.g. Ordo Rom. 1., after prescribing the consecration of the cil for the sick before the end of the canon, adds, "et deinceps peragitur missa ordine suo" (c. 30 ; Mus. It. if.

(2.) Missam audire. We have not noticed this, afterwards common, phrase in the writers of the first eight centurjes. It occurs, however, enrly in the 9 th ; viz. in the 19th canon of the council of Chàlons-sur-Saône, 813: "Let families give their tithes in the place in which their children are baptized, and where they hear masses through the whole course of the yenr." The council of Paris, 829: "Sstius Igitur est illis missam non audira, quam eam ubi non licet nec oportet andire" (i. 47). It is instructive to observe that when Gratian, A.D. 1131, professes to give the 47 th canon of Agde (A.D. 506), for "Missas a saccularibus totas teneri. ... prrecipimus," he substitutes "Missna. . . saecularibus totas audire . . . . praecipimus" ( $D_{8}$ Consecr. i. 64).
(3.) Missam cantare, decantare. Bede says of Ceolfrid thnt from the day he left his monastery to go to Rome to the day of his death "quotidie missâ cantatâ salutaris hostiae Deo munus offeret" (Hist. Abbat. Wirem. § 16, sim. § 13). In 803 a petition was presented by the people to Charlemagne, praying that when the king and his lay subjects went against the anemy the bishops might stay at home and attend to their proper duties, among which are mentioned "Missas cantare et letanias atque eleemosynas facere" (Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 405; sim. 470, 5, 730, etc.). The council of Mentz, 813: "Nullus presbyter, ut nobis videtur, solus missam cantara valet recte" (can. 43). We must suppose that originally the use of the word cantare implied that the mass was sung or chanted. That this meaning was lost sight of in the 9th century is evident from the language of Amalarius and others respecting the canon: "In eo videlicet quod ista oratio specialiter ad sacerdotem pertinet....secreto enm decautat" (Amal. E, loga, 21). Remiglus of Auxerra: "Consuetudo venlt in Ecclesiâ, ut tacite ista obsecratio atque consecratio cantetur" (in the chnpter De Celebr. Miss. of Psaudo-Alcuin, Hittorp. 284).
(4.) Missam celebrare. This is in very common use from the 6th century downwards, and sometimes even of the laity; as oi the sick seeking to be haled, "Si. . . missas devote celebrant" (Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 75); even of s woman, "Celebrans quotidie missarum solemnia" (De Glor. Confess. 65). The Capitulary of Aix, 789: "Auditum est allquos presbyteres missam celebrare, et non communicare" (c. 6, Labbe, vii. 970). Theedulf of Orleans, A.D. 797: "Missam sacerdote celebrante" (Capit. 1. 6, ibul. 1138), "Sacerdos missam solus nequildquam celabret" (ibid. c. 7). See Capit. Reg mass, bat the ground of the usnge is obscurate a doubttul. Mabillon thinks thage is obseure and expression an allusion per antiphrere is in the original sense of inissa, "the peophrasim to the dismissed before are agaln celled having heen sacrifice" (Lit. Gall. 57). But cull back to the they been dismissed? it is nut from what have vious service is implied as by Gregory of prewho says of a queen of the Frunks that, after passing a night watching, the in the morning 12). He relates also of his " (Mirac. S. Murt. i. being warned by a vision that mothrr, that, would attack her house, she hearid a voleo at the same time saying, "Vide et vigila totam noctem in honore (S. Benigni) et revoca missan" (Mirac. i. 51). Similarly Venantius Fortunatus: "Verogilis in honera Sancti celebratis, fe mlassä́; mani, 60 , de pracsenti earata est " (Vita S. Germani, 60; Migne, 88, col. 472); and again of componit altare": "Mitasa revocati.....snerum will be ohserved that in all ; u. 8. col. 503). It mass performed at request is these cases a specind without donbt the person mentioned supplied the materials directly or indirectly. In thp lied instance it is said that the queen "offered many gifts." The original notion la, therefore, pro bably, to supply or furnish a mass; for "revocare $"$ often $=$ "reddere," Thus, "Euleglas of the apostles Peter and l'aul" (ihid. 2). He ordered that all who desired to be ordained priests should proviously provide themselves with "n psalter, iectionary, antiphonary, missal (missale), baptismsl office, martyrology.....and computus with cycle " (Can. de Remediis Peccatoruin, i.). Charlemagne in 789: "If there be occasion to write out a gospel (i.e. a book of the gospels) or paalter and missal, iet men of fuil age write them" (Capit. i. 70; in Capit. Ne!. ficanc. i. 68 ; vi. 371 ). Alcuin in 796: "Missas quoque relituas de nostro tuii missali ad quotidiana et ecclesiasticno consuetudinis officia" (Lp. 46, ad Monach. Velust. i. 59, ed. 1777); "Misi chartulam missalem vobis" Ep. 192, ad Mon. Fud. 256). Ladovicus Pius, 816: Bishops are to "take eare that the presbyters have a missal and lectionary or other books necessury for them weil corrected " (Capit. 28; sim. Cap. R. Fr. i. 103 ; vi. 229). A copier of books, writing about 826 to an old friend who had become archbishop of Mentz, says, "Send me sume good parchment for writing out one lectionary and one Gregorian missal" (lntto Otkero, inter Epist. Bonificianas, 138; ed. Wurdtw.). Amalarius, 8:27: "The authors of the lectionary and natiphonary, nad of the missal of which we beliave the biessed Pope Gregory to be the author" (De E'cel. Off. iv. 30); "it is found written in the ancicnt books of missals and antiphonaries" (ibül. iii. 40). There were in 831 in the monastic library of St. Riquier at Centule several books known as missals: "Tres missales Gregoriani, missalis Gregorianus et Gelasianus modernie temporihus ab Albino (Alcuino) ordinatus. . . missales Gelasiani xiz." (Chron. Centul. iii. in Dach. Spicil. il. 311 ; P'ar. 1723). The Gelasian Sacramentary (and, we may add, the Lconian) resembled the Gregorinn in condisting of prayers and prefaces only. Had Alcuin inserted the lessons and antijihons, a circumstance 80 unusual would certainly hive been noticed. They were probably distinct books for a century at least ufter his time. Thus Walter of Orleans, A.D. 867, orders his clergy to "have the church books, to wit the missal, gospel (evangelium = evangeliarium, as in the law of Charlemagne), lectionary (= epistolarium), psalter, antiphonary, martyrology and homiliary, by which to instruct himself and others " (Capitula, 7), An episcopal charge of that period says, "Let your missals, graduals, lectionaries and antiphonaries be complete and perfect" (App. ad Reginunis Dascipl. Elcl, 505 ; od. Baluz.).

ii. We do not read of Missalia Plenaria (or Plensria) befere the 9th century, but they are then spoken of in such a manner as to shew that they were neither new nor of recent introduction. A will is extant, written abont the year 840, which bequeaths "a plenary missal with the gospels and epistles" (Testam. Heccardi in Perard, Püces servant à l'Ihistoire de Bourgogne, 26). We gather from this that a plenary missal of those days did not contain the eucharistle lessous. Leo IV., A.D. 847, in some instructions to his clergy: "Let every church have a plenary missal and lectionary and antiphonary" (De Curâ Past.; Labbe. Conc. viii. 36 ; sim. Qntherius of Ferons, ind. ix. 12il; and again Admonitio Sunodislis, App. ad Regin. 1. s. 5033). The question was asked at visitations whether all the clergy were possessed of those several books, "Missalem plenarium, lectionarium, antiphonarium" (Iuquisitio 10, apud Regin. u. s. 7). The missale plenarium of a later age contained the lessons and antiphons as well as the coiliects nnd prefnces (Merati in Gavanti ; Observ. I'raslin. t. 4); but it is clear from the foregoing testimonies, though the fact has escaped Dueange, Buequillet, and others, that they were not incinied in the volume to which that game was originally given. Gerbert appears to be right in thinking that at first the plenary missal was a sacramentary which gave the missae for every day, and not those for Sundays and other chief festivais, or for other special use, alone (Dis, uis. ii. i. 29, p. 108; ii. 1, p. It 6). There was a missal of the latter kind written in the 8th century in the library of St. Gall, ard later examples are extant (ibid. 108). The missal which Alcuin mentions in his epistle to the monks of St. Vedast cited above was apparently ore of this sort. It may well be doubted whether pleasary missals in the other and later sense existed within our period. Gerbert (116) says that he never saw a MS. of that deseription belonging to the 9 th century. No Roman missal of that age contains even the ejistles and gospels. In France, however, tho lessons without the antiphons hat ocensionally been incorporated with the missae long before; for we find them in the Besanjon Sacramentary, which is assigned to the 7 th century (Mabill. MI: Ital. i. 275), though uot in the other Gallican $\mathrm{v}^{2}$ als, which date from the eighth (Liturg, Gallic. Mabill. 175), or in the Frankish which Mabillon aseribes to the seventh (dbid. 178). A very ancient Tabularium or Polyptychon preserved nt Rheims, the exact date of which, however, is not given, also points to France as the country in which the amalgamation began; for it mentions as one book, "a missal of Gregory with the gospels and lessons (=epistles)" (in Notis Balus. Capit. Lieg. Fr. ii. 1155).

Other information respecting missals will be given under Sachamentary.

MISSI DOMINICI. The word missas is frequently found in Capitularies, designiting a messenger, ambassedor, or deputy. Commissioners named by the king, with a kind of vice-regal power within certaln limita, were called missi revis. Of these there were in the Cnrulingian period two classes: (1) the ordinary missi dominici or dominicales, regules, fiscale's, pridatini principales, often called missi simply; and (2) extraordinary missi (legatl or nuneii) appointed for special smergencies. It is with the first that we are here concerned.

5. But misxiouary zesi is "essentially the child of faith," and has depended, in ail ages, on the varving spirituality of the several branches of the chorch. The great evangelising efforts of the early church were mainly thase of the West. The Thebaid, it is true, sem south ite hosts of monastic missiounries, whe penetrated the culuntry districts of the Eisat, which still remaioed suak in illolatry, even when Christianity had been acknowledged and protected by the state, and sowed the seeds of knowiedge in the region of Phoonicia, on the one side, and beyond the Euphrutes on the otier. But even before the famous churches of the East had become the prey of the nnti-Christian armies of Mahomet, lethargy and inaction, as regards Christian missions, crept over them, and the work elther ended aitogether or notorionsly declined. "One by one, that glorious centre of lig.: , knowledge, and life, which the Anthonys, the Hilnrions, the Basils, the Chrysostoms had animated with their relestial ligist, were extinguished, and disap. peared from the pages of history. Eastern monach.sm conld neither renovate the socicty which surrounded it, nor take possession of the pugan nations, which snatched away, every day, some new tragment ot the empire." (Montalembert, Monks of the West, i. 376, 377; Stanley, Liastern Church, p. 34 ; Milman, Latin Christicinity, ii. 163.)
6. And even when we pass to the West, we must not expect speedy or immedinte results. Herself scarceiy recovering from the shock of Honage, tha chorch found herself confronted with strange nations, of strange speech, and still strauger modes of life, who poured forth to fill the abyss of servitude and corruption, in which the empire had disappeared. They overran cianl, Italy, Spain, Illyria, all tire provinces in their turn. Chaos eeemed to have come back to earth, and the agitations of society needed to be uilayed, before mission work could be organized, or eren etliectually commenced.
7. But even now etforts were not wanting to leal with the invetarate paganism of the old world and the torrent of the northera invaders. From the islet of Lerins, off the rondstend of foulon, where, in A.D. 410 , a Romnn patricion, Jonoratus (S. Hilarii Vita S. Honorati, ap. Bolland, t. ii. Januar.), found a monastic home, went forth an influence, which created numerous missionary centres is Southern and Wcatern Anul, and sent bishops to Arles, Avignon, Lyons, Troyes, Metz, Nice, and many other plsces, who proved themselves at once the lights ot their own dioceses, and the leading missinnarles of their day amongst the outlying masses of heathendom.
8. When Clovis, in A.D. 493, became the single sovereign of the West who adhered to the coniession of Nieaen, it might have been expected that the work of the numerous emissaries from Lerins would have been aupplemented by the uewly kindled ardour of the Erankisi, charch.*

[^35]And for a time orthodoxy sdvanced side by side with Frankish conquests. Bat the war's and dissensions of the successors of Clovis were not favourabie to the development of Chrlstian nissions. Avitus of Vienue; Caesarius of Aries, and Faustus of Riez, proved what inight be done by energy sad self-devotion. But the rapid accession of walth more and mure rapid accession of walth more and more tempted the Frankish bishops sad abbants to live as mere laymen, snd so the clergy do. generated, and the light of the Frankish charch grew dim. Not only wera the masses of heathendom lying outside her territory neglected, but within it she saw her own members tuinted with the old leaven of heathenism, and relajsing in some instances into the old idolatries. (Perry's Franhs, p. 488.)
9. A new Influence was, tberefore, necied if the heathen tribes of Enrope were to be evangelised, and He who had said, "Behold, I am with you slway, even unto the end of the world" (Matt: ixviii. 20), did not fail His charch. He called the men who were to do the work, from two sister isles, high up in the northern seas, which had almost been forgotten amidst the desolating wars of the Contiacnt. It was in the secluded Celtic churehes of Irelaud and the Scottish Highlands that the beacon was kindled, which, in the words of Alcain, "caused the light of truth to shine to many parts
10. Three well-marked etages distinguish the missionary history of the fitth and three tollow. ing centuries:-
(a) A.D. 430-650. -While continental Europe was still agitated by the inroads of swarming tribes of barbarians, Ireland, unvisited ly strange invaders, drew from its conversion by Sr. Patrick an onergy which was simply marvellous. A burst of popular enthusiasin welcomed his preaching, and Celtic Christianity flung itself, with a zeal that seemed to take the world by storm, into battle with the muss of heathenisin which was rolling in ujon the Christian world. Columbs, the fuioder of Ionn, and the Apostle of the Albanian Scots and Northern Picts; Aldan, the Apostle of the Northombrian Saxons; Columbanus, the Apostle of the Burgundians of the Voxges; Callich, or Gallus, the Apostle of NortliEastern Switzerland and Alemannia; Kilian, the Apostle and Martyr of Thuringia; Vingilics, the A postle of Carinthia, are but a few ont of many, ${ }^{\text {b }}$ who were raised up to pour back with iaterest upon the Continent the gifts of civilisition and the Gospel. "Armies of Scots " crowded to the shores of Europe. From the Orkargs to the Thames, from the cources of the Rhine to the shores of the Channel, from the Seine to the Scheldt, the missiunary work of the "Scot" extended, nor did it hesitato to brave the dangers of atormy and icy seas, in benring the messitye of the Gospel to the Faroe Isles, und even to filu'

Here these "soldiers of Christ,"" as they loved to style themselves, setrled down, and lived and prayed and studied and thled the waste. Meu of learning, devotion, and singular missionary zeal, they soou impressed the hearts uf wild heathen tribes. Hundreds Hocked to listen to their religious instraction. Hundreds more, encouraged by their example, twok to clearing und tiliing the land. Luxeuil became the inissionary espital of Gaul, and sent out its colonies ioto Burgundy, Rauracia, Neustria, Brie, Champagne, Ponthieu; reproduced the Scottish Brechla and Abernethy at St. Gall and Bobbio, and forced the careless Frankish churchmen for very shame to rouse themselves to the duties of missionary work.
(1) The Enylish missionaries.-Thus these Celtic pioneers lald the foundstions. Exactingly ascetic, they awed the heathen by their indomitable spirit of selffe .crifice, and the sternness of their rule of life. The singular success of their missions :I Northumhria and Mercia, Essex and Suffock, was even more completely realised on the conitient; Luzeuil began with thatelied hovels, poverty, and hunger ; it ended by becoming the University of Burgundy and Frabce. But the work, great na it was, lacked the element of permanence, and it became clear that if Europe was to be carried through the dissolution of the old society, and missionary operations consolidated and noited, the rigours of the rule of Columbsnus must be softened, and a miller and more practical system must be inaugurated, before the Teuton of the German furests cout be effectually evangelised. The crisis was a momentous one, but it had already produced a Benedict. With his marvellous genius for organisation, he arose to inaugurste a new missionary era, and to give to misionaries a more definite unity of plen. [Benbilictine Rule and Order.] And now, just when they were most wanted, his disciples, the sons of the new-planted English churches, came forth to their Teutunic kiasmen. Teutons themselves, they were fitied, like no others, to be the apustles of Teutons. The monsstic missionary became the coloniser: ${ }^{k}$ The labonrs of Wilurid and WiliLIbrord, in Frisia, were quickly supplemented and absorbed by the work of the great Apoitle of Germany. What Boniface did at Fulda is a type of what the Eaglish Benedietines did overywhere. With practised eye they sought out the proper site for their monastic home; saw that it occupiod a central position with refereace to the tribes, amongst whom they proposed to labour, that it possessed a fertile soil, and was near some friendly water-course. These points sccured, the worl was glven, the trees were felled, the forest was cleared, the monastic bulldings roae. The volce of prayer and pralse awoke unwonted echoes in the torest glades. The brethren were never idle; while some educated the young, whom they had often redeemed from death or torture, others copled manuscripts, illuminated the missal, or transcribed a gospel. Others, again, coltivated the soil, guided the plough, planted the apple-tree or the vine, arranged the beehlves, erected the water-mill, opened the mine, and thur, with wonderful practical aptitude for the work, presented to the eyes of inen the klagdom of Christ, as that of One who had redeemed the bodies no less than the souls a His creatures. 4 No wonder that the efforts oi Si. Boaiface and of his enthusisatic followers attracted the hearts of the heathen tribek. "The experience of all sges," it has been remarked, "tenches us that Chriatinnity has only made a firm and living progress, where from the first it has brought with it the seeds of all humes culture, altr agh they have only been developed by degree." (Neander, Lijht in Dark Places, p. 417).
12. Thus the promineace of the monastic orders in the missionary work of this period is clearly marised. Monasticism foundel the Celtic churches in Ireland and Scotland; tled with the British churches to the fastaesses of Wales and Cumberland, from the Saxon invaders; returned with Augustine to the coast of Kent; with Aidan peopled the Farne Islands; with Columbanus penetrated the forests of Switzerland; with Bonitace civilised Thuringin and Frisia; with Sturmi cleared the forests of Buchonia, and made Fulda au outpost of civilisstion tor the Teuton tribes, with iis dom-church and schools, librury and farmsteads, the influences of which were felt for years and years afterwards. But however the seeds of the gospel may have been sown in any place, whether by the influence of a Christıan queen, or the faithfulness of Christlan captives, uniformly, in conformity with apostolic practice, the management of the infant churches wis eatrusted to a local episcopate. Sometimes a bishop headed, from the first, the body of voluntary adventurers. More often, as soon as any considerable success had been achieved, one of the energetic pioneers was advanced to the episcopal rank, and in this enpacity auperintended the staff of elergy accompanying him, ${ }^{\text {m }}$ and as soon as possible ordained a natlve ministry from amongst the newly converted tribes, and established a cathedral, or correspondiag ecclesiastical foundation. (Comp. the consecration of Swithbert by Wilfrid for the mission in Friesland, Bede, H. E. v. 11.) Such a provision had recommendations of a most practical charsc-

Still, even in the Einglish church, the mother-tongue whs never entirely banlshed from the survices. The Synoil of Cloveshoo (A.D. 747) enneted thit the priest should learn to translate and explain in the native laogunge the Creed, the lord's Prayer, and the sacred worda used at the relebration of the mass, and, in the ofice of haptinm, while indlvidual prelates insisted on the med of clergy able to Instruct their peopie in ti- tements of Christinn knowledge. (Spelman, Concilin, j. 248; Johnson, English Canons, 1. 247; comp. Bede, Ep. ad Eegberctum, §3; nad Charlemagne, Cupitul. § $14 ; 1.505$.) A short form of abjuration of Jdolatry and declaration of Christlan faith in the vernncular lunguage is preserved among the works of Bonifnce (Migne, Patrolojur, ssec. viil. 810), and the work of Uliphilas for the Goths was followed up in some mensure by Aldhel..'s version of the l'saltor (Wright, Biog. Brit. (Bede, II. E iv. 24 ; Caedmon's Paraphrase, ed. Thorpe, p. 47.)

16. One point more remains to be noticed. It is impossible to pass in revlew the missinoury history of the chureh from the sub-ipostalic ege to that of Chariemrage, whthout being struck with the slovo and gradual steps by which ench importunt triumph of the liaith wis won. The conversion of Europe, for instance, is sometimes spoken of as though it was an event of speedy accomplishment. It requires an ellirt to realise the fact that the close of the eighth century, to which our revlew has brought us, did not see even the hnif of Europe won over, even in the most nominal form, to the Cross of Christ. The whole of the grent Sondinavian peninsula, all Bulgaria, Bohemia, Mornvin, Russia, Poland, Pomerania, Prussia, and Lithuania remained to be evangelised. In mast of the countries no missionnyy had nver set foot, or If he had, was obliged to retire at once beture the furious opposition of heathen tribes, Even at the close of the fourth century, ufter Chrlatinaity had enjoyed, during more than sixty yenrs, the sunsline of imperial favour, the Christinns at Antioch, a rity which lind well-nigh greater epiritual ndvantages than nuy other, constituted only about half of the popuIation (Chrysostom, Op. tom. 1i. 567; vii. 810), and more than fifty years after the conversion of Constantinc, the cultivnted and influential clnsses of old Latin Rome still remained heathen," while the word "peasant," synunyadiliscere. other words put for it being cillaris and tistru.
Totally differeat in its origin from the mitra, the cap of women and effemionte men, is the infulu, the fillet which decked the head of heathen priesta and sacrificin! victims, it is thus defineed by servits, "fascia, in modum diadematis a quo vittae in utrague parte depeailent, quae pierumque lata est, plerumque tortilis de alho et cocco" (in Virgil. Aen. x. 538 ; see also leitore, Eitym. xix. 30, 4, where the above definition is cited). We several times find Virgil sipenising of the sacrificing priest as wearing the infuca (e.g. Aen. if. 430, x. 538). Again, the vietims about to be sacrificed, whether beasts or men, were decked with the injuli (Virg. Geurg. lii. 487 ; Lurretius i. 87; Suet. Cali,. 27). In the inst cited passage, the ense is that of a gladiator, who, having been guiity of cowardice, was "verbenutus et infulatus" prior to execution
We shall now proceed to conaider, serintim, the eases adduced of the use of aome kind of henil-dress as part of the official dress of the Christian ministry in primitive times. The earliest instance ix one which can perhaps hardiy be strictly calied a hend-dress, but is sufficientiy near to justify its prasence here, and conceras no lesa a person than the apostie St. John. The passage in question ocours in a letter sent by Polycretes, bisiop of Ephesus, to Victor, bishop of Rome (A.D. 192-202), on the subject of the Eastern controversy (Linseb. Dist. Eccles. v. 24 ; aiso cited in part, iii. 31 : cl. also Jerome, de Viris illustribus, c. 45), in which he cites the names of different Asiatio biahope and martyre who are clnimell as having held to the Asiatic practice. Amid thia enumeration we read, "Yea moreover John too, he who lay on the Lord'e breast, who became a priest wearing the golden plate ( 8 s witness and a teacher-he sleepeth in Ephesus." Betore expressing any opinion as to the meaning of this passage, we shall cite a somewhat parallei instence from a later writer, Epiphanius. The reference has hare been to Christ, as heir of the throne of David, which is a throne not only of royalty but also of priesthood. The Saviour thus stands at the head of a line of high-priests; James, the Lord's brother, being, as it were, successor, in virtue of his apparent relationship, and thus becoming bishop of Jerusaiem and president of the church. "Moreover also we find that he exercised the priestiy officc after the manner of the old priesthood; wherefore also it was permitted to him once in the year to eater into tine Holy of Holies, ns the law commanded the high-priesta, according to the Scripture. For so many before our time have related coucerning him, as Eusebius", nad Clement and others. Further, it was permissible for him

- This alfucion is perhaps to be referred, considering the mention of the ricalon thst foilows, to the above-cited letier of Polycrates. The pasnage of st. Clement, however, does not appear to be extant.
${ }^{1}$ Binterim (Denkw, i. 2. 352) cites from the proceedinge of the ejghth general council (fourth of Constantinopite, A.D. 869), from a tetter of Thendosius, patriarch of Jerusslem, to Igratiun patriarch of Constantinopte, ta which the writer eays that he sende as a present the long robe and cuperhumeral and mitre (mitra in Anastasling's Latin), adding that his predecessora had been successively decked Фépaty), an the ahove-mentioned trustworthy writers have testitied." (Huer. sxix. t; vol. i. LIt, ed. Yetavius.)
The word ritalav, it will be ramembered, is that employed by the IXXX to desigoate the Y'Y worn on the higi-jrient's forchend, and thele enn be no doubt, therefore when wo considur that the LXX would be the ordinary Bible of Polycrates and Ejiphnaius ${ }^{\text {a }}$, that the meaning intended to be conrayed is either that these apostles artunily wore on their forelieads a gold plate, in direct imitation of that of the Jewish high-ipriest ${ }^{\text {b }}$, or that the langunge is distinctly and wholly metaphorical, menalag that each of these two apostles occupied in his turn the same position to the Christinn church that the Anvanic high-priest hall to the Jewish church. The question, It in evident, must malniy turn upion the words of Polycrates, whose position, both in date and locality, would make him an importnat witness as to St. John. Here, though it is Impossible to feel positive nad manintain that St. John certainiy wore no such ornament, we feel that it is far more likely that the langunge is to be viewed as allegorical-(1) because of the allegorical character of the passage generally which see Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 345 n. (ed. 4); and (2) because the perfect participle seems very atrange, if it were merely meant to indicate that St. John was in the habit of wenring the тéraגov. If that participle points rather to "a state or condition resulting from a past act," then the statement becomes simple enough if we assume that Polycrates aims at bringing out the fuct of "the supreme apostulio authority of St. John, whose office in the Christian church wals to bear ruie in spiritual things over the spinitual Israei, even as the high-prieat of old over lsrael after the flesh" (Marriott, p. 39 n.). Oue thing, at any rate, is plain enough: if St. John and St. James, or either of them, did wear this ornament, it wna an oroament apecial to theurselvea, and ceased with them, nffecting in no sense the fu"ther uae of the church.

The next stance we shall cite is from the oration delivered by Eusebius' on the consecration of the great church at Tyre (Hist. Eccles. $\mathbf{x} .4$ ). This highly rhetorical discourse iegins with an address to Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, nad his assembied clergy, as "friends of God and prieste (lfpeis), who ase clad in the holy role that reacheth to the feet, and with the heavenily crown ( $\sigma$ eí申avov) of glory, and with the unction the priestly vesture of the Holy Ghost." Here with this sacred garb (Labbe, vift. 987). Io sny care, however, s late 9 th-century tradition such as this need not detaln us.

It masy be noted that in translating the exiract from Polycrates, Jerome renders níratov by lamina, the word he had used in the Vuigate for the gold plate of the bighpriest.

A.D. MA4; Rettherg, Kirchenpesch, Deutsihhin/s 1i. id 1t], Hurckhard is makena of "an "pontiticall intula digati" (see A"ts Sith tormin. (Het. vol. vi. 374 ), and the then pope la sald to be "aummi pontificatue infulae non incoogrutus." On all the ahove inatances it may be reinarked that while they allow us to explain them if we will of a Christian otficial hemdedrenn, they most certainly canot be considered an evtidence emm. pelling us to wuch a belief; andin the absence of bay direct truatworthy evidence from ancient pictures of tha existence of anch a hendiadress, and considering the known inter use of the terin infulir, we caanot but feel that the probatility inclines atroagly agalast thone who claim the abore series of pusaages as establishing the ancient use of a mitre.

Tivo more passages which have been cled are sbsulutely of no weight. I'he first ia a line from Ennodius, a poet of the fifth century, with reference to St. Ambrose, "Serta redimitua gestabat lucida fronte ${ }^{\text {n }}$ ( Fpig. 77; Patiol. Ixili. 818), but the context, even the follawing line alone, sorves to shew that we are dealing with metaphor sall not with fact-"distinctum gemmia ore parabat opus." Finally, in a poem (Puraenesis ad E'piscopos) of Thendulf of Orieana (ob. A.D. 821), we are met with the line, "Ilijus ergo caput reapleudens mitra tegebat " (iib. v. carm. 3, sub fin.; l'atrol. cv. 360). The whole context, however, as Marriott has plainly pointed out, is dwelling on the contrast between the aplendour of the Jewish high-priently dress and the Ejiritual chatater which nhould be the ornament of the Christian minister. This contrast is elahorately worked out, and the line immediately following the one we have quoted is "contegat et ' mentem jus pietasque turm."

On a general survey of the foregoing evidence, It may, at any rate, be anfely asserteld that no case has been at ali made out for a general use of an official head-dress of Christian ministere during the first eight or nine centuriea aiter Christ. Many of the passages adduced in favour of such a view have been shewn to be, if not quite Inconclusive, at any rate of very doubtful charneter. Hardiy one can be called definite, plain or positive. Also, if direct evidence is sought on the other side, we may again nypeal to a treatise of Tertullian we have already cited (de Coroma Militis, c. i0). The words "Quis denique patriarches ....quis vel posten apostolus aut evangelista aut episcopus invenitur coronatus?" ought to be definite enough, ns shewing the usage in his time. When, further, as we have already remarked, the remains of early Christian art, which can really be considered trustworthy, furnish no evidence whatever for the use of such n head-dress, but distinetly point the other way; we feel, that while not venturing altozether to deny the possible existence, of a lucal or temporary kind, of a mitre or headdress, here and there, we may atill fairly say with Menard that "vix ante annum post Christum natum millesimum mitrae usum in ceclesia fuisse" (Greg. Sacr. 557). Menard justly insists on the fact that in numerous Jiturgical monuments (e.q. a mass for Easter Day in the Cd. Ratoldi [ivritten before A.D. 986], where the ornaments of $n$ bishop are aevernlly gone [^39]throngh), as well as in writern who hive fully entereif into the subjeat of' C'hidntion vestments, ay fabhuus Maurus, Amainrius, Walatrid Strabo, Alcuin (l'seudn-Aleuin), there is no meatiou whatever of a mitre.

Eiven a writer as late as lve of Chartres (nb. A.D. IIIS), while describing the Jewinh mitro, makes no mention of its Cirintian equivalent, There are good grounds, however, for believing that at first the mitre was all ornament apecially connected with the fioman chureh, from whence its use spread gradarlly over Westera Cibrintenlom, though thla use hal evldently nut becume universal in lvo's time. We shail very hrietly cite an instance or two to illustrate this Roman connexlon. The following is the eurlie.t alduced ${ }^{m}$ when the archbinhop. Eberhuri of Treves was at Itome in A.D. 1049, Leo IX. phuced on hls heal, in St. Peter'a on fassion Sunilay, the loman mitre. The [rope's words in the charter are "Romana mitra cajut vestrum ine signivimus, qua et vos et succensores vest in ecclesiasticin offichs Roman, more semurus utamini." (Ejp, 3; l'utiol. cxliii. 59.j vf'. also E'p. 77, op. cit. 703, where the same privilege is granted to Adalbert, bishop of Ilnmburg. We there real of the mitre, "quod est insigne Humanorum.") Again, a few yenrs later, in A.D. 10H3, Alexander II. granted to Bureharid, bishop of Halbestaift, the privilage of wearing the archiepiscopal pallium and mitre, becaluee of his special services to the Roman aee. We cite in this case a clause of some interest, as shewing the concession of the use of the Roman mitre ns not confined to the episcopal order: "Insujur nitras tibi ne successoribus tuis ac canunicis excellentioribus, scilicet presby teris et diaconls in missarum solemnia ministraturis, subdiacouis in majori ecclesia tur et suprascriptis festivitatihus portandas concedimus" ( L'p. $^{2} 10$, I'utrol. exlvi. 1287). In A.D. J119, Calixtus II. grants the use of the "episcopalis mitra" to Godebaifi, bishop of Utrecht ( $1 . p .37$; P'atrol. clxiii. I I:30). One more example may sutfice. Peter Damian, in an indignant letter (c. A.D. 1070) to Cadalous, bishop of Parma, who was the anti-joje Honorius II., says scornfully, "habes nunc forsitan mitram, habes juxta morem Romand pontificis rubram cappam" (Epist. lib. i, 20 ; Patrol. cxliv. 242).
Any discussion as to the variation in form and material of this later mitre is quite beyond our purpose; suffice it to say that while the description of Honorius of Autun (Gemma Animae, $i$. 214 ; Patrol. clxxii. 609). In the twelfth century, still seeme to point to a cap made of linen (mit is ex bysso factan ), that of Innocent III. in the thirteenth, shews that in the case of the bishop (Hieron. Mart.).[^41]of Rome, at any rate, it waa made partly of golid and ajpproximated to ita later shape (de adcero altaris mysticrio, i. 60 ; Patrul. ceavii, 796).

It will have been observed that nothing ha been ssild as to the reatriction of the uas of the mitre to the highest order of the elergy. On this, however, It can only be remarked that, aa fir as the first eight eenturies at loast are concerned, practicalty nothing from the whole of our acanty body of evidence lo adduoble. The neation of the infula in the life of Willibald hus aumetimes been cited, but we have already neen how slight is the basia on which the whole argument in convexion with the word infula rests.
In conclusion, the practioe of the Enstern church miay be most briefly referred to. Hero the mitre, property apreaking, is unknown, and thua we find Sinteon, archbishop of Theasalonica in the fifteenth century, deelaring that all eceleslastica, patriarch of Alexand priesta, except ouly the rites without any covering on the head (Expositio de divin" templlo, c. 45 ; Patrol. Gr. elv. 71 f ; ef. liesponsa ad Gabrielem Pentapolitanum, e. 20 , ib. 8il. Relerence may be apeclilly made to Goar, Eucholoyion, p. 314). In the Armenian church, however, bishops have, it is aidensiace the edeventh century, worn a kind of mitre, appiarently in imitation of Ronse, the priests of that church weartigg a kind of bonnet.
A passing ellusion may be made here to the nitra viryinum, mentioned by Isidore of Seville, which appears to have been worn In aldition to the veil by those who made profession of virginity. Isidore remarks that such a person, "becruse she is a virgin, may display the honour of a hallowed body ' in libertate capitis' [ef. \$fougla, 1 Cor. xi. 10] and 'mitrem quasi coronam virginalis gloriae in vertice prueferat '" (de Ecel. Off. ii. 17. t1; Patrol. 1xxxiii. 807). Again, in a letter of St . Rernigius of Rheims, $\mathrm{t}_{0}$ Clovis, condoling with him on the death of his alater Atbofleda, who had died shortly after baptism, he says of her, "fragrat in conspectu Domini flore virginitatis, quo sellicet et corona, quam pro virginitate suscepit" (Ep. 1; Patrol. ixv. 965). The use of the mitra by professing virging is alluded to by Optatus (de Schismute Dimutistarum, ii. 19 ; Patrol. xi. 973 ; also vi. 4, ib. 1072, where sue Dupin's note) see Dupin's note).

MODIUS. The modius or bushel measure is nometimes represented on Christian tombs. Nartigny refers to Lupi'a Disiertations, fc., on tic Epitayh of the Martyr Severus, p. 5. tab. viii., for the best kuown example. The inseription over a Christinn named Masimiuns ssys that "he lived 23 years the frleud of all men;" and his effigy is carved on the stone $w^{i t h}$ a rod in his hand, and a bushel full of corn, fi tm which ears are springing, is placed near him. Palre Luph thiaks thle is an allusion to Luke vi, 38-the full measure, pressed down and rundigg ocer, which Masimus hoped tor in death; or to the graln of corn sown and washlag a way in earth, to bear much froit, John vii. 24. And he gives another example of the modins lu Bolletti, p . 371, from the tomb of a Christian named Gorgonius. He observes, however, very scisibly and traly, that Maximus may have been a mensor cereris angustae, or have had some connexion with the corn-trade, and quates a further instance of the modius on the tomb of a baker, one Vitalia (bitalis), dated 401. There is no reason why the survivors should not have attached the symbolism of the Lord's wheat and garder, or of His reward, to the usual signs of the busineas in which the dead had been eagaged ; and some disputes might be saved as to Christian symbolism If we consider that in primitive daya as well as nur own, devout and imaginative people asw and delighted in meanings which may have been overlocked then, as now, by peeple equally gond but more matter of fact. Martigny refera to his article, Instruments et Enblèmes representés sur les tonbeaux chrétiens, p. 324, Dict., the first part of which enumeratea emblems of the trades of the smith, woolcomber, husbandman, baker, and surgeon. See Fossor.

The history of monasticism -The history of monastieism is ono of the strangest problems in the history of the world. For monasticism ranks among the most powerfol influenecs which have shapeed the destinies

In Syria nod l'adestine each monk originally had a sepurate cell ; in Lower Eyypt two were together in one cell, whence the term "syncellita," or shezer of the cell, came to express this surt of comradeship; in tos Thebuid, under the customs of Jachomius of Tabenna, eatch cell contained three nonks. (Bened. Anian. Conc. Reyul. e. 29; Cass. Kustit. iv. 16; Coll. xx, 2; l'allai. Hist. Lins. c. 38 ; Soz. Hist. Esc. iii. 14.) At a later period the monks arrogated to themselves by general consent the title of "the religious" (religiosi), and udmission into a monastery was termed "conversion" to God. (Ferreol. Lieg. I'raef.; Smaragd. Yat. Bened. Anian. c. 56.$)$

Passages Jaudatory of monasticism abound in the Christian writers, both Greek and Latin, in the $4 t h$ und 5 th centuries. Basil of Neecaesarea, one of the founders of menasticism in Asia, and his friend Gregery of Nazianzoin, the learned Jerome in his cell at Betblehem, and the eloquent Chrysestom in the midst of a nolsy pepulace at Constantinople, poofound thinkers and meu of action like Augustine of Hippo and Theoduret of Cyrus, all vie with one another in veiteratling its praises (Basil. Constit. Mon.; Gregor. Naz. Or. 12; Chrys. l'it. Mon. ; Alng. de M/or. Ecol. 31, de Op. Mun. c. 28 , ete. ; Hieron. passim; Theoderet, I/ist. R.l.; Epiphan. Ancor. 107, etc.). The great Augustine is said to have lived in a kind of monastery with the clergy of hls cathedra!; and by his eulogies of the monastic life in hls 'Commentary on the 36th Psalm' to have won Fulgentius, bishop of Ruspe, in the 6th century, to become a roouk himself. In one enthusiastic pasisage he expresses a fervent hope that monasticism may shoot out its branches and oflshoots nll over the world (Jo Op. Mom. 28). Terome goes so far as to spoak of embracing the motastic life as a kind of second baptism (Ejp. 39, ad $I^{\prime}\left(a u^{\prime}.\right)$. And yet in the writings of those whe extolled monnsticlsm mest highly there are cautions and warnings not a few agaiust the dangers which beset it. Augustine, with characteristic insight inte the strange contradictions of human nature, describes, almost as one of the greatest of motern painters las represented it on his canvas, the recoll of a norice on first entering a monastery from the vices and inconsisteacies of some among its inmates (In Ps.c.; cf. Hieron. Ej, ai Frst. 125, ad Eustoch. 22). Fride was usways the besettling sin of the cleister. Ambition and covetousaess erept in even among those who bad renounced the world, its pomps and vanities (Hjeron. Epp. ad Rust. 125, ad Enstoch. 22; Aug. E'p. 60, ad Ilelicifor.), and sensuality assailed those who had retired, as they hoped, to a sufe distance from the temptations of the tlesh (Hieron. Ej,p, ado Rist. 125, ad Eustoch. 22). The loneliness, the silence of the cell, often brought on that toment of the over-surupmous, a religious melancholy, and sometimes downright Insimity (Hier. E'p, ad Rust. 125; Cass. Instit. v. 9). And though, as a rule, the monks were ameng the fiercest and noisiest champions of ort hodoxy, at times, in their igonrance and isolation from the church at large, they were equally zealous for the extravagant notions of heretical fanatics (Sozom. II. E. i. 12). Whaterer side they espoused, they were the fiercest of its partisuns, In retaliations on the heathen for the cruclty which they had inflicted on the chureh, in putting down heresy by force, in exterting from the civil authorities the pardon of criminals, monks were ever formest. i3y the advice of Genmadins, patriarch of Constantinople, and in conseguence of the tumults in Antioch about Peter the Fuller, Leo the Thracinn, in the middle of the 5th coutury, made an edict forbidiling monks to quit their monastories and excite commotion in cities (Milı. Mist. Lat. Christianity, i. 294). The outrages of the Nitrinn inouks agniast Orestes, the praefect, in their zeal for Cyril of Alexpodria, of Barsumas and his rabble agaiast Flavian of Antioch in the "rebber council" of Antioch, and the ferocity which would not lenve the saintly Chrysostom in pence even at the point of death, we no extraordinary instances of what the monks of the 5 th century were capable of in their theological frenzies. By a strange, yot not uncemmen incentistency, the monk in his cell listened engerly for the rumours of polemianl controversy in the world which he hal abjured, und reserved to himself the right of rushing into the fray, not as peacemaker, but to take part in the combnt. They claimed fir themselves an authority above that of bishops, emperors, councils. As in the Icenoclastic controversy, so generally they were on the side of superstition. The Egyptian menks elung tenaciously to their anthropomoruhic conceptions ot the Deity. One of them, in old man named Serapion, exclamed with tears, on hearing that Goul is a Spirit, "They have taken awaly our God I We have no God nuw" (Cassian. Coll. x. c. 3 ; cf. Ruffin. de Ver*, Senior. c. 21). Some monks in Asia Miner inculcated rigid ubstivene generally, end condemned marringe as sintinl (Soc. H. E. ii. 43, iv. 24; Con. il. G.ingr. c. A.d. 330 , ce. $1,2,9$ ). Antinomianism prevailed among some of the Mesopetamian menks in the 4th century (Epiphan. Hacres. lxx.). Augustive speaks of Manichnenn tendencles among monks (De Mor. Eccles. 1. 31).

In the 4 th century the growing reverence for celibncy aided monasticism to make its way lute almost every province of the Roman empire, the civilised world of that day. (Aug. de ilor. Eccler. 1. 31 ; Theod. Mist. Rel. 30). The elder Mncarius in the Scetic or Scithic desert, the elder Animen on the Nitrian mount, higher up the Nile Pachomius in the Thebais, treading in the footsteps of Antony, the celebrated hermit, founded enormons commualties of monks, with come sort of rude organisntion. There was muen in the monastic life thoronghly in was muen what remained among Romans of their pristiue sternness; it was a congenial reaction from the luxury and effeminacy of the day. many an instance the redeeming characteristic of the great monasteries of the West, even whila it gave the rein to an nbstruse anil bewildering disputativeness, ever evolving out of itself fresh materials for disputing. In Europe it was quite otherwise. There, even within the walls of the menastery, was the ever-present sense of the necessity and the blessedness of exertion. There, the monk was not merely a worker nmong other workers, but by his voca$t$ ion led the way in enterprises of danger and difficulty. Whatever time remained over and abuve the stated hours of prayer and study was for $m$ nul labours of a useful kind, and farming, garaening, building, out of doors and within the houne, for caligraphy, painting, &c. The monks in Europe were the pioneers of culture and civilisation as well as of religion; usually they were the advanced guard of the hesss of art, science and literature. From this radical divergence of thought and feeling, two main consequences naturally followed. A less sparing, a more generous diet was a necessity for those who were bearing the fati, ues of the day in a way which their eastern brethren could form no idea of. A more exact, a more minute arrangement of the hours of the day was a necessity for these who, instead of wanting to kill time, had $t$ economise it to the best of their ability. The closer and more systematic organisation which, from the date, at least, of Benedict of Monte Casino, marked the famasteries of the West, and the more liberal dietary which he deliberately sanctioned were admirably adapted for the Roman and the Barbarian alike in the Europe of his day. To the one, with his innate and traditionary deference for law, the orderly routine of the cloister was 10 finitely preteruble to the lawless despotism of the empire; and even the sturdy independence of tha Goth bowed willingly beneath a yoke which it had chosen for itself without constraint.

> "Ir vuth the prison unto which we doom O. selves no prison ts."

In the East the monasteries, as a rule, were larger, but less firmly administered. There the laxer system of the "Laura" prevailed more widely and lasted till a later period than in Europe (Mabill. Praeff. V. vi.). In East and West alfisa, the cootrol exercised by the bishop of the diocese over the monasteries is his jurisdiction was from first to last scarcely more than titular. But in Latin Christendom the centralising nuthority of the pope supplied the want of episcopal control, not, however, without the vices which are inherent in an overstrained centralisation.

Before the 5th century there was no uniformity of rule among the various monasteries even of one race or country. Cassian complained that every cell had its rule; that there were as many rules as monasteries (Instit. ii. 2). In some cases, under the roof of the same monastery, a divided allegiance was given to several rules at once (Mib. Annal. O. S. B. Praef. 18). All this was perhaps inevitable from the fart that the monastic life had ite origin not in an impulse given by any one directing and eentrolling spirit, but in the exigencies of the uge generally. Gralually order emerged out of this chaos. The ascetic writings commonly ascribed to Basil of Caesareia sometimes to his friend Eustathius of Sebaste, exercised from the first orer the monasteries of the East an influence which they have never lost ln thos unchanging lands where chauge is an impacty. The rule of Basil-the first written code of the sort-was popplar for a time in Southern Italy, stronghold, from the circumstances of its colonisation, of Greek sympathies, was translated lato Latin at the instance of Urseus, ubbat of Pinctum, probably near the famous pine woods of Ravenna (Mab. Ann. O.S. B. I. 15), was used in Gaul during he 5 th century at Lemovicus (Limoges) in conjunction with Cassinn's Institutes (ib. IV. 46); and won for itself the commendation of Cassiodorus and Benedict. Some European morasteries at first adopted their rules from Egypt, the mother-country of asceticism ; thus the so-called rule of Mucariue was in force in a Burgundian monastery, and the "ruld of Antony" in a monisstery near Orleans (Mab. Ann. O. S. B. I.), Cassinn was the precursor of Benedict in the arduons work of oystematieing the development of monasticism. But it is inexact to speak of "Cassian's severe and inflexible rule" (Milman, Lat. Chr. II. ii.). S.-in! - aking, Cassian is the author of no rule .. eity so entitled; he was a compiler of mater.nlc, suggestive of legislation, not a legislator himself. It was probably through his influence, in part at lenst, that many of the Gallic monasteries copied the type presented to them by the celebrated monastery of Honoratus at Lerina (Lérins), which seems to have been Itself in its commencement a copy from those great Egyptian communities, which Cassian knew well from his own personal experience, wherein the brethren, dwelling each in his little separate cell, all under ode abhat, met together at stated times for the sacred offices, and for refreshment. (Mab. Ann. O.S, B. I. 29, 30).

The npre 'oce of the rule of Benedict, first and grea $s$ in the long list of monastic reformers, was st sommencement of unifurmity in the monasterics of the West. Starting from its birthplace, Monte Casino, on the wildly picturesque spurs of the Apennines, it asserted its cupremacy in Italy before the end of the 6 th century, in the countries which are now Franca and Germany ufter the era of Winfritd or Boniface, and in Spain, where the rule of Isilore had prevailed, after the 9 th century, In the next century it was almost universally accepted throughout Christinn Eurcpe (Pelliecin, Ecc. Cnr. Pol. I. iii. 1, 4).

Like Aaron's rod it swallowed up its rivals. For a time, indeed, the more ascetic rule of Columbanus, emanating from the remote sheres of Britnin, where, kefore his misslonary labours in Gaul and westwards, he had been tinined under the rigorous tutelage of the famous Comgall, abbat of Bangor, came into conflict in central Europe with the Batedictine rule, and disputed its pre-eminence. But the followers $0^{n}$ rillumbanus never became a separate orde. The monasteries wherein his rule w solely and absolutely were never More usually his rule was combined of Benediet, as in the monasterics of Lixuvium (Iuxeuil) and Bobinm (Bobbio) In the 7th century. The most characteristic part of his rule

More than one council in the Gth centary made its enactment against monks wearing the "orarium," or stole, and against their wearing bouts or buskins instead of their own rude manials (Conc. Agath, A.s) 506 ; Cons: Aurl. I. a.d. 511; Cone. Epraon. A.D. 518 ; et. Conc. Lavedic. A.b. 361 ). Sometimes, at tirxt more usually, the spiritual wants of the monastery were sipplied by the bishop sending a priest at the abbat's request, to perform mass at stited times; sometimes by a prient being appointed to reside in the monastery ; sometimes by one of the monks themselves being ordained (Greg. M. Ejpp. pass.). On festivals the moaks usually resurted to their parish ehurch (Alteserr. Ascet.
i. 2). [Oratory.] i. 2). [Oratohi.]

One of the hardest tasks of successive popes was to regulate and aujust the rival claims of their monks and theil clergy. Gregory the Great, like his distinguished predecessor Leo, the first of the jopies of that name, neems to have laboured to prevent either party from intruding beyond its own proper province into the dutios and juiviteges of the other. He forbade monks to atliciate without leave outside their walls (cf. Leo I. lipp. 118, 119). He forbade the paruchial clergy to retreat at plensure from their cures to the quictaess and deisure of a monastery. Ile ordered baptisterites to be removed from monasteries. He discouraged clerical abbats; and he eensured the parochlal elergy, who either eutered a monastery or quitted it without their bishopis' sanction. Sometimes, huwever, he transferrel the charge of a chureh of the adjoining parochiai clergy to the mooks of the ndjoining monastery, on condition that themselves for a priest wecomondition among

But the long-standing rivairy bet ween the monks and elergy linsteil on, nutwithstanding this superfieial fission, or rather all the more aerimoniousiy, because of their being brought more trequently into eolijuion.
The right of the bishop of the rliocesn to exer eiso jurisuliction over the monisteries in his Ifty lity ought to be exercised were $n$ constant source of irritation on both sidjes. The struggie commen bishop and abont dates from the vary eouncil endeut of monnchixm; council after contlicting cloimed to arbitrate betwern their fresh oceasions clains bit was inevitable that ally. At tirst, and sute shoud arise continudistinetly res, and so long as the monk was ranger of rivalry or eollision. there was less Chalceion (A.D. 451) enacted, that the bishop of each city shonid superintend its monasteries aecording to " the trulitions of the finthers," and thit every refractory mook shonld be exconmunicited; that no monk shoulil enter the elty of Constantinopie (already the monks had caused disturbances there) without the bishop's permissy ; and that the conseuration of the monastery being secup should be the guarantee against its being secularised (Conc. Chulced. ce. 4, 8, 23, 24). vagrabuad notorions alrealy for the turbulenea of its vagaboud monks, was the first to raise the stanard of revolt. One of the abbats in the dincese of Byrsn, having been excommunicated by his own bishop, Liberatus, appented to the bishop of Carthage, metropolitan in the proconsular provinee of Carthnge (Dn Cange, Glossars. Lat. s. v Primas). At. a synod in Carthage (A.d. 525), presided over by Bonifacius, bishop of Carthage, in light of his see, sentence was pronounced in favour of the abbat. In leed, in their desire to prevent any intrusion on the part of Liberatus, the council went so far as to lay down the rule, that monasteries being as heretofors ("sicut semper fuerunt ") entirely exempt from the obllgations which restrain the clergy ("a conditione clericorum libera") should be guided ooly b their own sease of what is right ("sibi tantun. ac Deo pincentia "), and this decision was confirmed by a synoil nine years lnter, in the same Mity (Conoc. Carth. A.D. 525; A.D. 534). Mabillon thinks that this right of appeal to another bishop, lavolving for the monastery the right of choosing its own visitor, was a dispurity agminst episcopal oppression. A simiar dispute between Faustus, nbbat of Lirinensis lium (Krejus), and Theodorus, bishop of Forojuably. (Fréjus), was settled at Arles far mors equit shouhl ohey the lishop in guestions relating to their ollice as elergy, while lay monks should ohey thrir whint only; on the one humb, that no one should ollicinto in the monastery, except ne delegated by the bishop, and, "n the other, that the boshopshould never recalve any lay-brother to modimation, without the eonsent of the ahmit (lahb. Cuncil. ad. $17 \mathrm{th2}$, viil. 11. 635-65t), IJut "ven this was no final or permanemt solution wi the ever-revorring ditliculty. Councils ngain and ugan zhrough the eth and 7 th centuries reathrmed this fundamental dlatinction between monks as mouks, mad monks as clagy, but in vain. The tendency of things authally was to make the morastery within jts own demain more and more Indejrendent of its lishopp.

No new monastery could be founded without the bishop's annetlon (Cone. Chaled. A.s. 451, ©, 24; (bue. Agath. a.D. 506, e, 27) ; just as a layman needed the same permission to nrect n chureh (Come. Ilerd. A.n. 594, c. 3). It the hishop himself were the founder he mikht devote n fortioth part of his equiscopal income as endowment, instead of the hundreith part permissible for the endowment of $n$ new ehurch (Cone, Towt. A.D. 655, e. 5). But, the monastery once founded, the ehoice of a new abbut belonged not to the bishop but to the monks themselves, llut the bishop might interfere, in case of their electing a vicions abbat. They ware free to elect whom they wonld, ono of their own boly hy preference, if possible, dut, in the event of there being no eligible condidate among themselves, a stringer from another monastery (Bened. Anianens. Concord, Requl, v. s.; Conc. Ronath. A.11. 601 ; Cone. Tolot. x. A.D. 656, c. i). Nevertheless the abbat was to holit his otlice under the supervision of the bishop; he Was to nttend the bishop's visitation yearly ; if he fitiled in the discharge of his duty, he was to be admonished nal corrected, or even, in caso of gross miseonduet, depased by the hishop, not, however, without a right of appeal to the metropelitan or to a general assembly of abliats (Come. Aurel, A.d. 511, ec. 19, 20; Cinc. Ejpar. A.1, 517 , e. 19 ; Conc. Arehat. A, d. 55t, e. 3 ; Cons. R'wиня, A.D. B01). Outside their monastic precincts the bishop was supposed to hare a general jurisiliction over the monks in his dioctese, and in this why, obviously, might otten prove himself an invaluable and nlmost imdispensabl: ally to the abbat, sented within his monastery, in coercing and reclaming truants. (Conc. Aurcl. A.D. 511, c. 19 ; Conc. Archit. A.b. 50t, c. 2). Nunks were forbidileu to wabler from one diocese to another, or from one monastery to another, without commendatury letters from the bishop as well as fiom the mbbat; it contumacious, they were to be whipped (Cone. Tolct. A.1s. 6i35, e. 53; Conc. Jenet. a.d. 465 , cc. 5,6 ). The bishop's permission was requisite, not the abbat's only, for a monk to ocelrpy $n$ saparate cell apart firom the monastery (Conc. Alurel. A.D. 511, c. 22). In short the bishop was in theory, if not aetually, resjonsitile for the moral conduct of the monks in his diocese. Of course his control was more of a reality over their ecilesiastical ministrations. I'he bishep might not ordain a monk, der remeve a priestmonk from a monastery to parochial work withont the ahbat's consent, might not jaterfere to prevent a priest or deacon from taking the momavtle vaw (Conc. A!fth. Bot, e. 27 ; Cono. Roman. A.D. 601 ); might not oriain is monk who broke his vow and rolupsed to the life sercular (Conw, Aurel, 511, e, 21). Still, in iweowdance with the priaiple promulgnted at Arles in A.D. Shit) ( $1, s_{\text {s }}$ ), it was generally mimitted that the monk's vow of obomilence to his nbbat was not to supersele the cononical aberlienso of the cherk to his bishop; nad, though the foreo uf circhmstances might naturally draw the monk to his nibint and to his brother monks whenewer their peculiar rights nasl privileges wore threatened, the bishop conld always rotort etlectively by simply holding batk his hamil when calleal to give the monastery the benotit of his episeopul serviees. From the reiteruted enutions of the councila in this poriod agumst any encroachment of the bishops on the proe porty of the monasteries, it would seem nes if a werlihy monantery was sumetimes a "Nibhth's vineyard," as uld monastie writers express it, in the eyes of "a greedy or overbearing prolate. Bishops are forbiden by the enouncil of lecrida, in the north of Sjmin, A.D. 524, to seize the oflerings made to monasteries (Come. ILird. e. 3 ); torbidden to ty rannise over monasteries or moilile with their endewmonts by the comscil of linledo (Cone. Thit. iv, c. 51 ), and by the commeil of Rume, A.b. 601 (Cone. Nom. A.D. bol). Another onneil of 'Toledn in A.D. 656, ordered any boshop guilty of appropuiating a monustery fir the aggranilinement of himself or of his timily to be excommunicated for a year (Conc. Tolet. x. c. 3).

The master mind of Gregory the Great was quick to recognise tha importance of keoping the monks disthact from the secular clergy, mal, at the same time, of providing some ellicinnt, odicial supervision, agamst laxity or immorality in the monastery. Of those numerous letters if Gregory, which attest his almost whinuitous vigilance over the ecelesiastical athiars of westrin Chrixtendom, and tho commanding inthurace which made itself felt far and nenr, not :t few contain his mujudication in quarrels of nobuts with their diocesans. His personal sympathies were divided, for he had himself been an ardent and deroted monk, before becoming the head of the ecelesiastical system of Europe; and, like a true statesman, he saw that the way to make the cloister and the diocese mutually helptal, was to guard against any eontusion of the boundary-lines between their respective spheres. The otlice of the monk, he writes, is distinct from that of the elerk: (Greg. M. Ejp. v. 1); it is dangerons for a monk to leave his cell to become a priest ; a clerk once mimitted into the monastic brotherhood ought to stay there, unless $w$ momoned to work outside the walls by the bishop (E;p, i. 42). The nbbat is tirst to be elected by the monks, aml then to be furmally eonsecrated by the bishop (Ep. ii. 4, 2). On ane occasion Gregory, taking the selection of un nbbat into his own hands, sends a certain monk, Barbatianus, to be instituted abbat in the diocese of Naples. But in writing to the bishop, Gresory qualities his mandate by adding, that Barbstianus is to be appointed "if the bishop approves his life and chamater" (" si placuisset vita ac mores"). Barbatianus, as abbat, admitted iaro the mona tery without due probation a pust ulant, who soon afterwerds ran away, Gregory lidames dmong the Saxons in Fogland a similar rexult was produced by other rausem. When ('hristimuty came, the secand time, into the islasil, it eame in the guise of monachism. The monk and the missinany were one. Many of the liritinh monks had been massacred by the lomathen invalers; many had tled for safety to the pracefal und posperons monasteries of their brethren in Ireland. Shit thoir places were quickly filled by their 'Tentonic successors. Almont evary large chareh was attrehed to a monastery ; and in the fir- instance the monks were the parlah-jrients of the diwese (Milmun, Latin Chrintionity, ii. e. 4). All this gave the monasteries in England a hold over the people whieh they uever host, till their dissolution in the lith ceutury; nud as the tiegrew wenker which had grouped the monhs around the bishop of the diocene, and an the monastory becamo detached from the minster, all this strengthened the abhats in their independence. The formal exemption of monasteries from episcepal control in things secular dates from the 7th century; nal the couseil of Cealchythe (Chelsen?) a century later only aflirmed that the monks should take the bishop's nelvice (" cum consilio episcopi") in electing an abbat (Conc. Culenthens. .1.D. 787, c. 5). For all practical purposes the authority of an individual bishop in Figgland over a monastery was hardly ever more than nominal ; and in course of time the lordly aibats of the great monasteries vied in power and maguiticence with the oecupants of the greatest aees,

The history of monosticism, like the history of states and institutions in general, divides itself broally iuto three great periods of growth, of glory, and of decay. Not indeed as of the grawth were unehecked by hindrance, the glory unchryuered hy defects, the deeay never arrestesd by transient revivals from time to time of the thickering thme of life. Still the successive seatons of youth, maturity, old nge, are marked plainly and strongly en ugh. From the beginning of the 4 th century, to the clase of the 5 th, from Antony the hermit to Benedict of Monte Casino, is the nge of undisciplatued impulse, of enthusiasm dot as yet regulated by experience. It has ail the ferveur, and all the extravagance of aims too lofty to be possible, of wild lougings without method, without organisntion, of energies which have not get leurned the practical limits of their own power. Everything is on a seale of illogical exaggeration, is wanting in balanee, in proportion, in symmetry. Purity, unworldiness, charity, are virtues. Therefore n woman is to be rrigarided as a vedomous rejitile, gohl as a worthless prebile, the deadliest foe and the dearest friend are to be estemmed just nlike (e.f. Rutfin. de Jit. NS. c. 117). It is right to be humble. Therefore the nuak ents off hand, ear, or tongute, to avoid being made bishop (e.g. Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 12) and teigas idiocy, in

The period which follows, from the first Beredict to Charlemagne, exhibits nonasticism in a more muture stage of monastic acticity. The mocial iutercourse of the monastery duly harmonised by a traditional routive, with its subordination of ranks ad ofliees, its divinion of duties, its mutual dependence of all on each other and on their hend, civilined the monastic life; and as the monk how became subject to the retiaing inthenre of civilisatinn, he weat forth into th" orld without to civilise others, The conten' $n$ of aprixitual things was still proposed as ${ }^{\text {al }}$ rat et in view. But stated and regular 1 rs for e religous servicen lett luisure tor onery oceapatlons, and brainwork took its proper place alongside of manual bibour. The Benedictine rule implied, if it did aot assert in so many words, that monks are to mone themselves useful to others as well as to themselves; and the practionl result is sten in the conversion of the greater part of Europe to Christianity, and in the revival of European learning end arts among the wild hordes fiom the north, the conquerors of Rome. liute of St. Pa houmins.- When the eremite gave place to the conobite, and the solitary cell developed into a convent peopled with a numerous aociety, the need of rules for the govermment of the fraternity was immediately ielt. Regulations had to be lail down as to the dress, fomel, and dnily oceupations of the immates, as well as for their stated meetings for worship and urlinary intercourse. The hoods wre to bear the mark of the convent (c. 99). The monks were to sleep alone on a mnt sprend on the flour without a bolster (c. 81, 88). The cell door was to be always unfastened (c. 107). No one was ever to sleep in any place but in his own cell (c. 87). The rule gunirds most enrefuliy agninst the dnngers of unrestricted intercourse between members of the society. No one was to enter aouther's cell withe thecessity, or remain there when his business e.es concluded (c. 102). They were never to speak to one another in the dark, or hold one another's hands, or lie together on the same mat. No one was to go out alone (c. $5(b)$, but when two walked together they must be a cubit apart (c. 94). A monk was forbidden to anoint, wash, or shave anither, or take out a thorn for him, except by th iprovost's permission (c. 93-95). Two might ,ot ride together on an ass, or on the tilt of a waggon (c. 109). When forced to be together, as when kneading brearl, or carrying the dough to the oven, silence was to be onintained, and the mind given to meditation on Itoly Scripture (c. 116). The same rule was to be observed on board ship, nor were they to go to sleep on deck, or in the hold, nor nilow others to do so (c. 118, 119). The greatest vigilance was to be observed agninst wandering thoughts. All who had mechanical duties to perform, e.g. to summon the brethren, give out materials, or serve food or dessert, were to meditate on a portion of scripture. Whea they went to work they were never to talk on secular matters (c. 59, 60). All tattling abroad, or bringing gossip home, was strictly prohibited (c. 85, 86). The rule of Pachomins, in broal distinction to some later rules and the practice of the inajority of solitaries, is very particular in its directions about the washing of the monks'clothes. This was to be done in common, at the provost's order; the clothes were to be dried in the sun, but not exposed later than 9 A.M., lest they should get scorched. When brought home they were to be gently suppled (leciter mollicntur). If not quite dry one day they were to be laid out a cecond. There wns to be no washing on Sundays except for sailors and bakers (c.,67-73). Invalids received special care. A sick monk was conducted by the provost to the infirmary (triclinium aegrotantium), which he alone wns permitred to enter. Extra clothing and food were given to him, according to his need. He was forbidden to carry these to his own cell. He might not be visited even by relations, except by the lịcence of the provost (c. 42-47). A monk who liad hurt himself, or was poorly, but who was still about, might have extra clothing and food at the discretion of the provost (c. 105). There was to be a guest-house (xcnodochium), where all who claimed hespitality were to be entertaned wit'? due honour. Weaker vessels and women we'e not to be repulsed, hut to be received $w$ at enution in a pince apart assigned to them (c. $5:$ ). If a relatiou came to see a monk, by the specian sanction of the abbat he was allowed to go out and converse with him, with a trust werthy companion. If nuy god things were brought him to ent he was permitted to carry sweetmeats nal fruit to his cell, but whatsoever had to be eaten with bread was to be conveyed $t$ ', the sick-house, nod there partaken of (c. $5 \dot{2}$ ). If a monk had to leave the convent to see a sick relative he was bound to ouserve the rule of the monastery as to eating nod drinking (c. 54). He coulh only attent a kinsman's fumeral by the provest's leave (c. 5 ja ).
Different degrees of penance were ordained fir minor offences: breaking earthenware (c. 125), losing the property of the convent (c. 121), spoiling his clothes (c. 148), appropriating what did not belong to him (e. 149); auld hearier puoishments fur offences of graver complexion; angry uod passionete words (c. 161); falsehowi (c. 151); false witness (c. 162); corrajiting others (c. 163); stirring up dissension (c. 16.?). Any article found whose owner was unktown was to be hung up for three days before mattins, to be claimed (e. 132). A novice was first to be taught the rules of the order, and was then set to learn twenty Psalms, or two Epistles, or some other part of scripture. If he could nut read, he was to have three lessons a day, and be forced to learn to read even against his will ("etiam invitus legere compelletur"). ivery iamate of the convent was explected to know by heart at lenst the Psalter and the New Testameut ( $e .139,140$ ). If any of the beys brought up in the monastery proved idle, and careless, and refused to amend, they were to be thigged. The provost was to be punished if he neglectell to report their misileeds to the abbat (e, 172, 173).

The rules which pass under the names of the early anchorets, Serapion, Paphnutius, and the two Maeariuses, though with no claim to be regarded as the preduction of those fathers, are important as additional evidence of the character of the earliest coenobitic life. The separate ordinances in the main correspond to these of l'achomius. They supply more distient information ns to the apportionment of the early part of the day. The time between the conallision of mattins and the second hour, 8 A.s1., Was to be spent in reading, unless any necessary work had to be done frr the society. Frcm the second to the ninth hour was to be devoted by each severally to his own work, without murmuring (leejul. Patrum, c. 5, 6). Passing over the rule of Orsiesius, abbnt of Tabemne, the disciple of Pachomius (d. c. A.v. 3if8), which, as its title, "Doctrina sive tractatus" implies, is a prolix hortatory address to the members of his society, embracing all the chief particulars of Pachomius's system, not a code, aud the Re en'a Orientalis, compiled in the 5th century by Vigilanti is the deacon from the e.rlier monastic rules, which exhibit nothing deserving special notice, we come to the rules of the founders .f Cappadocian monasticism, Eustathius of Sebnste, and Basil the Great.

Rute of St. Basil.-St. Busil's mõnast:c institutions run to a considerable length. They nre comprised in his Sermones Ascetici, nuil his two collections entitled respectively Regulad fusius tractatie, and the Reynla brerins tructutas. The Constitutionee Ascetiexe printed in ;, ill's works, are assigned by the best authorities to Eustathius of Sebnste. such is would nourish the body, and whatever was put on the table was to de partaken of ; nor was wine to he rejected as something detestable, but drunk when necessary, Sutiety, however, was to be avoided, and all eatiag for the gratification of the appetite (Serm. Ascet. i. §4, p, 321 ; Fig. c. 18). No rigid naiformity was to be laid duwa as to the monount of food taken, but the superior was to judge in each case what was suthicient, with special regard to the sick (c. 19). Squabbles for the highest places at table were discreditable to a family of brothers (c. 21), If guests visited them no difference was to be made for them, but they were to partake of the ordiaary tare (c. 20). The monk's clothes should shew humility, simplicity, and cheapness, and should be characteristic of his vocation. He was to wear the same garment by day and night, and never change it for work or resting (c. 22), He was slways to be cinctured with a leathern girdle (c. 23). Silence was to be strictly observed except in prayer and psalmody (c. 13), and lond laughter was absolutely forbidjen, though a gentle cachinnation was approved of as a sign of a cheerful heart (c. 17). Nods or signs were to be used in place of words or oaths. But even these were forbidden if they indicated sullenness or discontent, or illwill towards others. When it was necessary to speak it should be in a low and gentle voice, except when rebuke or exhortation hal to be given, when a louder tone was not forbidden (Serm. Ascet. ii. p. 32i). The rejection of medicine under a false notion of its being an interfereace with the will of God is decidedly condemned. It was to be accepted as Gud's giod gift, to enable the body to render Him more ready serfice. It must not, however, be trusted to of itself, aor always resolted to on any siight cause. When the malady was dis. tinctly a punishment for sin, it was a grave grestion whether any attempt should be made to remonve it, instead of accepting it sulmissively as God's gracious chastisemeat (c.55). No one was permitted to leave the convent without the licence of the superior ( $p, 326$ ). Long journeys and protracted absences from home were to be avoided as far as possible. When for the interest of the convent it was necessary that a visit shonld be paid to a distant place, if there was one in the socicty who could be trustel to travel without harm to his own soul, and with a lvantage to those whom he might meet, he might be sent alone. Otherwise several brothers were to go together, who were to take care never to stiparate from one another, but to be a mutual eafeguard. On their return a very strict inquiry was to be made into their conduct during their absence, and suitable penances imposed if they had in any way transgressed the Jaws of the society. All idle galding about and huck tering uader the plen of business was prohibited as utterly inconsistent with the monastic Jife (c, 44). All women and ille persons were to be excludel from the convent precincts. If such presented themselves, on ao pretext was there to be any intercourse between them and the brethren. The superior alone was to question them as to their business and receive their answers (p. 322). Intercourse with relations was rarefill? getarded, an t was only io he permitted in the case of thore with whom edifying coaversation coald be held. Those who set at nought Goil's commandments were not to be admitted. All talk which could revive the memory of the mouk's former life in the world was to be studionsly shunned. A monk's relations were to be regarded as the common kinsmen of the society, not specially his own (c, 32). The necessary intercourse hetween the male and fernole members of a religious suriety was to be ordered so as to give no room for scandal. Two of ench sex were to be present at every such interriew (c. 33). Labour and rest was to be equally shared among the brothers, who were to be told off in rotation in pairs, every week, for the necessary duties of the establishment, so that all might gaia an equal reward of humility (p, 322 ad fin.). A discreet and experienced brother was to he selected, to whom all disputes were to be referred, who, if he could not settle them himself, was to bring them before the superior (c. 49). The superiar must be careful not to rebuke anyoae angrily, lest instead of delivering his brother from the bonds of his sin he bind himself (c. 50 ). If rebake was not sutlicient penance must be imposel corresponding to the offence, e.ff, exercises of humility for tha vainglorious; silence for the empty chatterers, vigils or prayer for the sluggards, hard work for the lazy, fasting for the gluttonous, separation from the others for the discontented and querulous (c. 28, 29,51 ). Other usual penances were exclusion trom the common prayers, or psalmody of the socitity, or a restriction of food. Incarceration was the punishuncut for the rebellious, who, if they continned obstinate were to be expelled ( $\mathrm{p}, 322$, c. 28). The superior himself was to receive needful warning and correctioa from the ollest and most prudent brother of the society (c. 27). The superiors of different establishments were to meet at stated times for mutual counsel as to the regulation of their societies, whea diticulties were to be discussed, the negligent rejrimandel, and suitable commendation given to those who hal fultilled their duties well (c. 54).

The liequite brevius tractatac, 313 in number, are very short decisions of questions relating to monastic life; e.!g. whether it is allowable to talk during psalmody, if a sister who refuses to sing is to be forced, whether a serving brother may speak in a louil tone, if all must come punctually to dinner, and what is to be done with thoss who come late; as well as resolutions of theolegical and moral questions, and of scriptural dificulties. The collection is valuable as helping to form a faithful picture of monastic life in detail, but does not answer to the ea of a "rule," as dealing with minor details rather than with broad principles.
The 34 Cowstitutiones which, as has been stated, are probably to be assigned to Enstathius of Sebaste, are partly addressed to solitaries, partly to coenohites, seventeen to the one, and seventeen to the other class. They are based on the same lines as the rules of St. Basil, and do not add much to our knowledge of monastic life. The duties of humility, obedience, temperance, sod imlependence of all worldly interests are expressed, and rules laid down for the regolation of intercourse with the brethren, mul with sectlars. The monk must not seek honour or diguity, or desire holy orders (c. 24); be must have no personal friendshijs (c. 29), nor private busi-tinues obstinate, she is to be reported to the superior, by whose verdict, or that of the presbyter in charge of the convent, she is to be punished (c. 8). All differences or quarrels be$t$ ween aisters are to be checked at once, and forgiveness is to be granted immediately on the expression of penitence. Any ons who is unwilling to forgive is out of place in a convent (c. 15, 16, 17). Due self-respect forbids a sister nsking pridon of those whom duty has compelled her to rebuke, even if ahe is conacious that she has used pver-harah langunge. But ahe must ask pardon of God alone (c. 18). The rule closes with an order that to do awny with the excuse of furgetfulness, the rule is to be read out aloud once every week.

The Benedictine rule has been fully treated of in a separate articlo [Benedictine Rule and Order].

The litules of Cacsarius of Arles.-Among the Western monastic rules which yielded to that most perfect order, was the nlmost contemporary rule of Caesarius, bishop of Arles (d. A.D. 542). This rule, which, in two divisione, embraces both monks nid nuns, and was n great advance upon those that had preceded it, has been censured as needlessly liedantic and minute. The censure is little deserved, at lenst as regards that for monks. That for nuns is much inferior in elasticity to that of St. Jenedict, and enters perhaps needlessly into details. But, as has been remarked, the rules "must be judged by their age, and regarded in the light of the whole epirit of monasticism" [Catsaricis, St.]. The rule for monks starta, as usual, with the perfect community of all things, No one wra to have a cell, or even a cupboard, which could be closed (c. 3). Talking was forbidden during ainging (c. 3) and at tnble, when one of the body was to read nloud (c. 9). No religious of etner sex was to atand sponaor to a child, lest it should indice too mueh familiarity with the parents (c, 10). Late comers to service were to be caned on the hand. No one was allowed to reply when rebuked by his superior (c. 11). Monks were to read to the third hour and then fulfil their nppointed tasks (c. 14), which were not to be chosen by themselves, but asaigned them by the auperior (c. ${ }^{-7}$ ). The receiving of presents or letters without the cognisance of the abbat was strictly prohibited (c. 15). The fasts were to be limited to Wednesdays and Fri lays from Easter to September. Saturday was sdded from Christmas to a fortnight before Lent. From September to Christmas, nad from a fortnight before Lent to Easter, they were to be observed every dny except Snnday, when to fast was a sin. Poultry and flesh-meat was forbidden at all times gare to the sick. No one was permitted to have anything by his bedside to eat or drink (c. 22, 24). A monk excommunicated for any crime was to be contined in a cell, in company with an elder brother, and employ his time in reading until he was bidden to come out and receive pardon ( $c, 28$ ). The service for Saturdsys, Sundaya, and fe tivals was to inelude tivelve psalms, three antip hons, and three lectious: one each from the prophets, epistles, and gospela (c. 25).

St. Cesiarius'e vule for nune is, as has foen caid, mmeh more minute and particular than that for menke. It is based upon that of St .

Augustine, the chief provisions of which it embodies almost verbntim. Among the most remarkalile additional regulations ara the following. No one, not even the abbess, was to hare a waiting-maid of ber own (c. 4). No infnnt was to be received, nor any ehild under six or seven years old, who was too young to learn to read and render obedience (c. 5). All the aisters were to perform the kitehen duties and other domestic offices in rotation, with the sole exception of the mother or superior. The cooking sistera were to have some wine for their labour (c. 12). At the rigils, to keep off alecp, work was to be done which would not distract the mind from listening to the reading. If a sister got drowsy, she was to be made to stand (c. 13). The chief occupation of the alsters was to be spinning wool for the clothing of the convent, which was nll to be made within the walls, under the superiatendecee of the provoat (praeposita) or woolweigher (hnipendia). Each sister was to aceept her appointed task with lowliness and fulfil it with modesty (c. 14, 25, 26). No talking was allowed at table. The reading over, each was to meditate on what ahe had heard (c. 16). All were to learn to read, and to devote two hours, from six to elght in the morning, to study (c. 17). All were to work together in the aame apartment. There was to be no conversation while thua engaged. One sister was to read aloud for one hour, after which all were secretly to meditate and pray (c. 18). The aistera were most solemnly charged "before God and the angels" to buy no wine aecretly, or to accept it if sent them, but to give it over to the proper officers, who ahould dispense it to the sick and weakly. Inasmuch as it was eustomary for a convent cellar to have no good wine, the abbesa was to take care to provide herself with auch as would be auitable to the sick or delieately nurtured (c. 28). The officers were to recoive their keya as a sacred trust, on the Gospela (e. 30). No men were to be admitted, except bishops and other ministers of religion commended by their age and charncter. The utmost caution was to be observed in the introduction of workmen where any repairs were needed (c, 33). Even females still in the lay habit were to be excluded (c. 34). Banquets were not to be prepared for bishops, abbats, or distinguished female visitors, except most rarely and on rery special occasions (c. 36). The abbess was not to take any refreshment alone, except when forced to do so by indisposition or any close occupation (c. 38). If new clothes wers sont to a nun, she might aecept them with the abbess's lenve, provided they were of the proper fashion and colour (c. 40). No dyeing was permitted in the couvent except of the simplest hues. The counterpanes and bed furnitnre were to be of the plaineat (c. 41). No embroldery was permitted, with the exception of sewing crosses of black or cream-coloured cloth on cushions or coverings. No male clothing or that of secular females was to be taken into the convent either for washing, mending, or any other purpose (c. 42). No silver plate was to be used except for the service of the oratery (c. 41). To the regulit, o recapitulatic is appended, contalning odditiona! zules of great partlcularity relating to diet and the duties of the cellarer and porter.

should always go together if duty called them to the town or elscwhere, who, before they set out and on their return, were to receive the solemn blessing of the society in the church. None was allowed to see relatives or friends, or to receive letters, or send letters or presents without special leave. Monks visiting another monastery were bound to live according to the law of the socicty to nvoid giving scandal to the weak (c. 22). On each occasion of the decease of a monk, the holy sacrifice was to be offered before his burial for the remission of his sins, and a genernl celebration was to take place at Whitsuntide for all the departed. The dead were all to be buried in the same cemetery, "that one place might embrace those in death whom charity bad united in life" (c. 23).

We have the rales of another Spanish house in the Rejala Monachorum and the Regula Monastica Commenis of St. Fructuosus, archbishep of Braga in Portugnl, in the 7th century (Holstenius, vol. i. p. 158, sq.). These will rewnrd examination, but space forbids our entering on then here. The most detailed rule belonging to this period is that known as the Regula Jfagistri ad Monachos (Holstenius, ib. p. 224 sq.), containing no less than dinety-five canons of considernble prolixity, each contnining ars answer to a question of a disciple. The date and country of the author are doubtful, but il ls clear that his rule is subsequent to that of St. Renedict, and various expressions and allusions render it probable that the rule was composed in Gaul. The minuteness and puerility of some of the rules shew the decay of the free s lf-reliant spirit of the original founders of monasticism.

Rule of St. Columba. - Our exnmples of monastic rules have hitherto bcen taken from Asin and southern Europe. We will conclude with the transcript of that attributed to one of the noblest patterns of Northern monasticismSt. Columba. Although, in the words of Mr. Haddan, "the nature of its contents and the absence of evidence that St. Columba ever composed a written rule, mark it almost certainly as the later production of some Columbite monk or hermit," this document may be regnrded as embodying the principles and gencral regulations of early Celtic monasticism, and therefore of great value. This rule was first printed by Dr. Reeves from a MS. in the Burgundian Library at Brussels. It is found nlso in Haddan and Stubbs, vol. ii. p. 119. The translation alone is here gived from Skene's Celtic Scotland, vol. ii. p. 508.
"The rule of Columcille here beginneth :
" (1) Be alone in a separate place near a chief city (i.e. an episcopal see) if thy conscience is not prepared to be in common with the crowd.
" (2) Be always naked, in imitation of Christ and the evangelists.
"(3) Whatsoever, little or much, thou possessest of anything, whether clothing, or food, or drink, let it be at the command of the senior and nt his disposal, for it is not befitting a religious to hnve any distinction of property with hie own free brother.
(4) Let a fast place, with one door, enclaee thee.
"(5) A few religions men to converse with thee of God and His testament and to visit thee on days of solemnity; to strengthen thee in tha testaments of God and the nurratives of the Scriptures.
(b) Aperson, too, who would talk with thee in ldle words, or of the world, or who murmurs at what he cannot remedy or prevent, but who would distress thee more were he to be a tattler between friend and foe, thou shalt not admit him to thee, but at once give him thy benediction, shonld he deserve it.
" (7) Let thy servant. be a discreet religious, not tnle-telling man, who is to attend continually on thec, with moderate labour of course, but always ready.
"(8) Yield submission to every rule that is of devotion.
"(9) A mind prepared for red [bloody] martyrdom.
" (10) A mind fortified and steadfast for white martyrdom [i.e. self-mortification, and bodily chastisement].
"(11) Forgiveness from the heart to every one.
"(12) Constant prayer for those who trouble thee.
(13) Fervour in singing the office for the dead as if every faithful dead was a particular friend of thine.
"(14) Hymns for sonls to be sung standing.
"(15) Lct thy vigils be constant from eve to eve under the direction of another person.
"(16) Three Inbours in the day, viz. prayers, work, and reading.
"(17) The whole to be divided into thres parts, viz. thine own work and the work of thy pluce as regards its real wanta; secondly, thy share of the brethren's work ; lastly, to help the neighbours only by instruction, or writing, or sewing garments, or whatever labour they may be in want of, as the Lord has said, 'Thou shalt not appear before me empty.'
"(18) Everything in its proper order, for ' no man is crowned except he strive laufully.'
"(19) Follow nlmsgiving before all things.
"(20) Take not of food till thou art hungry.
"(21) Sleep not till thou feelest desire.
"(22) Speak not except on business.
"(23) Every increase that cometh to thee in lawful meala, or in wearing apparcl, give it for pity to the brethren that want it, or to the poor in like manner.
"(24) The love of God, with all thy heart and all thy strength.
"(25) The love of thy nelghbour as thyseli.
"(26) Abide in the testaments of God throughont all times.
"(27) Thy measure of prayer shall be until thy tears come.
"(28) Or thy measure of work of labour till thy tears come.
"(29) Or thy measure of thy work of labour, or of thy genuflexions, until thy sweat often fomes if thy tears are not iree."

in orderly rows or ayenues ( $\lambda a i$ ipas). There was a common refectory, with its kitchen and cellars, to which the brethers wele summoned for their common repast by the sound of a horn at 3 p.as. ( $i+i d$. li. xix.), op to which time they fastel. l'here was a garden with its gardeners (xaxviii.). fur sick monks there was an infirmary, with a tricliniun acyretantium ( $x x_{1}$ ), and for strangers nid wayfarers a guest-honae, xenodochiun. There was also common oratory, to which the monks were summoned by a horn or trumpet. The monks slept in their cells, not in beds, but on reclining chaira. They devotel thelr time to handicrafts, chiefly the making of baskets and mata from the rushes of the Nile, but also paying attention to agriculture and ahipbullding. At the end of ti.e 4th century each of the Pachomian coenobin had a ressel of its own, built by the monks themselves. There were also artisan brothers who supplied the community with its chief neceasaries, Pallal us, who visited the Egyptinn coenobia towards tae close of the 4th century, found at Panopolis, among the 300 members, fifteen tailors, seven swiths, four carpenters, fifteen tanners, and tweive camel drivers (Pallad. Hit. Lausiac. c. 39). Each coenobium was regulated by lts own occonomus, the whole body being suboruinate to the oeconomus of the entire Pachomian confraternity ( $\delta \mu$ f́ $\gamma$ as oiкovó $\mu o s$, residing at the principal monastery, where they met twice a year uncer the presidency of the archimandrite (the "chief' of the fold"), and at their last meeting gave in an acconnt of their administration aluring the year (l'it. Pachom. § 52 ; Hieron. Procjat. in Regut.: Jachom. § 8, quoted by Neander, vol. iii. p. 318, Clark's edition). Coenobitlc institutions were iutroduced into Palestine by Hilarion, c. 328. He touaded a monastery on the Pachomian principle, near his native town of Gaza, the houses affiliated to which soon spread over the whole of Syria. Chrysostom in enrly life joined one of these monastic communities in tha vicinity of Antloch, and we learn many particalars relating to them from his writings. The monks lived in separate huts, кdi入vßai, dotted over the mountain side. They had a common refectory in which they gitrtook of their frugal evening meal of bread and water, recliaing on hay. Sernetimes they took their repast out of doors. There was also an oratory in which they assembled four times a day tor prayer and palmody (Chrysost. Homil. in Matt. 68, ti9; Homil. in 1 Tim. 14). The coevobitic system sprend rapidly in Asia. It was introduced into Armenia by Eustathins of Sebaste, into Pontus and Cappadocia by IBasil the Great, and the influence of Ephrem Syrus secured tor it an enthusiastic reception in Mesopotania, but few, if any, details of the arrangement or con-- iruction of the monastic buildings have come down to us. A ceatury later we learn much respecting the construction of Syrian coenobia, an the distinction between such institutions and a " Laura," from the life of Enthymius (d. A.D. 473), by Cyrilius Scythopolitanus, The monasteries, as we have seen, generally hed their nuclens in the cells and hermitages of distinguishel anchorets. This wha the case with those of Eilias and Martyrins (Vit Euthrm c. 95 ), and still more remarkably with the vast monastic cstablishment, called from its vewerated founder, Euthymius, which was gradually developed from the little dwellingjolace erected by hls neble Saracen convert Ashebethos, or Peter (afterwards first bishop of the Parembolae), as a token of his gratitude. Ashebethos began by excavating a huge cistern, vear which he constructed a bakehouse and three rells, and na orntory, that Euthymius might stund la need of nothlag he required. There had been no original intention of erecting either a laure or a coenobium, but such a step was rendered necessary loy the large number of Saracen converts who focked thither desiring to embrace a religious life. For their accommodation more cells were built, and a church erected, consecrated by Jnvenal, blshop of Jeru. salem (Vita Euthymii, cc. 37, 41, 42). It is evident from other parts of this biography that a liura was distinguished from a cornobium, as being a place of strlcter discipline, and therefort less fitted for a young monastic usidirant (cc. 88, 89, 91). A coenoblum, with its oratory, refectory, nad other momantic offices, and orderly rows of contiguous cells, enclosed within a high protecting wall, not pnfrequently fermed the central masas of the wide srea of the laura, with its straggling groups of cabins. Thither the nuchorets from the iaura repaired every Saturday and Suaday for worship aud insiruction, bringing with them the mats aod baskets, and other articles they had fivished, and taking back materials for the work of the next week, together with a supply of bread and water, alter having partaken of a little cooked food and wine in the general refectory (ibid. cc. 89, 90). On the elevation of Anastasins to the see of Jerusalem, A.D. 458, he ordained his eariy friead and fellow anchoret, Fidus, dencon, who, in obedience to a supposed vision of St. Euthymius, destroyed the cells of the lanra, and converted the whole estabiishment into $n$ coenolium. Anastusius supplied them with a large body of masons, and builders, and engineers, by whose labour the werk of rebuilding was comp'eted in the space of three years. The whole aren was fortified with a palisade and wall, and further protected by a strong tower, forming the citadel or stronghold of the whole desert, rising in the middle of the cemetery, on the very brink of the steep precipice on which the monavtery was bult, with the gate just below. A new charch was built, the old one being converted inte the refectory of the brethren (ibid. cc. 114-119). The tower, just described, was a very usual feature in the monasteries of the East, which, from their liability to attack from the predatory tribes, assumed the character of strong fortresses, surrounded by lofty blank stone walls, sometimes crenellated and strengthened with bastious, within which lay the monastic buildings, in some cases with the additional sccurity of a nont and drawbridge. The whole establishment was dominated by a lofty tower, near the entrance, like the keep of a Norman castle, jlaced under the patronagu of the Virgin Mary, St. Michael thearchangel, apostles, or suints, to whirh the inmates might flee for protection when the rest of the buididigs had fallen into the hands of the assailants. The ground plan of the Eastern monasteries, where the locaity permitted, was always reetanguiar, with the church or Catholicon ns the chiet object in the midst of the round. These were at tirst scattered the cells groups, and ultimately ranged side by side and connected by $n$ covered cloistered waik. The typical example of an Orien Mount Athos is a fortified enceinte encloses between three and four acres, comprising two courts, in the centre of which stands the Catholicon, surrounded by of open cloister, from which on three sides the cellis open. The refectors, which opens from the west cloister facing the church, and projects into the large outer covert, is a cruciform hall, antion. Teet each way, with an apsidal termination. The Enstern refectorics were usually spsidal recess on each a triclinium, with an with the existing each of their sides. It is so (see woodeut, vol. i. p. 377), and the plan of the now demolished dining-hali, at the Lateran was of a similar form, but much longer.
A very remarkable monastery of early date, Which preserves in the main the plan of the 7th or 8th century, though frequently subjected to hostile atticks, exists at Etchmindzin, the ecclesisstical eapital of the Armenian nation. This was founded A.D. 302 by Gregory the Illuminator, in the reign of Tiridates, who, with his people, embraced Christianity twelve yeara betore the conversion of Constantine. Within a lofty fused mass of buildinile in circuit, lies a conflused masss of buildings of different descriptions, almost a littie town, with workshops for ropising erery description of trade-arkshops for Alne coenobium of lanopolis described above一and a kind of bazanar or market for the anle of the moaastic produce. Besiles the cells of the monks on the West side of the great court there are apartments fur the Armenian patriarch, as well as for the archbishops, bishops, and archimandrites from other monasteries. A separate quadrangle to the south, with a fountain in the ceutre, is deroted to the reception of guesta. There are two refectories, one for summer and the other for winter use. The former is described as a long, low-wauited room, with oae long, narrow table running down the middle between two stone benches. There is a canopied throne for the patriarch, and a pulpit for the reader. The church is eruciform, with exceedingly short transepts, and a smali transepts, and a small apse, resembling in plan a square with tour shallow recesses (Bryce, Trunsastectasia und Ararat, p. 303 ff.).
The Coptic monasteries in Upper Egypt are aristence. Lenoir gives a plan altered now in smaller mouasteries, ahewing a quadrangnla mass of building, of which a three-nisled chuluch, terminating in shree cellular apses, and pree105 ff.)

free from moth. There was a library for the "codices," and as there was a "cellerarlua" there must have been a cellar (St. Angustine, Rejulae pro Sunctimonialibus, 10, 13, 14).

The monastic institutions for malea, established by Augustine ln North Africa, assumed nu intermerliate form, corresponding to a conshlilerable extent to the colleges of secular canons of later times, The foundations of such an institutlon, probably coeral with Augustloe, were dlscovered by Leon Renier, at Tebessa, the nncient Theveste, of whleh a drawing and descriptlon are gireo by lo Noir (Architect. Monast. i1. 1. 483, pl. 553). The plan gives an onter and inner court at different levels, the inner being the higher. The outer court is surrounded by a cloister, and has the domestle offices to the north, and a long narrow vestibule to the south. Tho laner court forms an atrium beforo the charch, a basllice of ten bays with an apse. The whole chatch and atriam are surrounded by a successlon of rectangular cells, opening on the lower level of the outer court, surrounded by a terrace walk. To the south opening from the church la a large triclinar refectory, a baptlatery, and other offices. The whole is surrounded by a wall nad towers. Lenolr also gives the gronad plan of Strassburg eathedral (ii. 480) ns built by Clovis, e. A.D. 496 . The chureh is rectangularand $t$ wo-nisled, ending square, not apsidally. To the east of the church is nn open court, surrounded on three sides by the apartments for the bishop and his clergy, partially embracing the chuch.

Monasticism io the West, after in overice lieeu almost erushed out during the mis. nion and settlement of the natlons, was ramy is St . Benedict of Nursia, c. A.D. $5299_{3}$, witcon the system was reorganised and reluesity order. "The Benedietine rule was universaly aessived, evea in the older monasteries of Gaui, Hyitain, Spain, and throughout the West-not as that of a rival order, but as a more full and perfect rule of the monastic lite " (Milman, Lat. Christ. vol. $\mathbf{j}$. p. 425, note x.). Not only were new monssteries sounded, hut those already existing were frequeatly demolished and rebuilt in accordnace with the refuirements of the new rule. One leading principle of the Benedictine arrangement was that the walls of the modastery should include withio them everything that was necessary for the material wants of the establishment, as well ns the buildings connected with their religious, literary, and social life, to do away with the necessity of the inmntes going beyond its bounds. It should contain water, a mill, bakehonses, stables, and cow-houses, etc., together with workshops for all neeessary mechanical arts (Regulae Sancti Benedicti, 57, 66). The precinet was to be surrounded with a wall with one gate, at which a cell ahould be built for the gatekecper, who was to be always on the spot to give an answer to all comers (ibid.). The buildings were to comprise an oratory (52), n refectory (38), a kitchen in which the monks were to serve week and week about (35), a cellar, superintended by a "cellerarius" (31), a dormitory large enough if possible to contain all the monks (22), a wardrobe (55), an infirmary (36), and a guest-house (50).

These rules are illustrated by the very remarkable plan of the monastery of St . Gall, c . 4.D. 820, the larger portion of which has been engraved to illuntrate tho artiele Chonch (1. p. 383). Its genernl nppearanee is tha of a town of detached houses, with streets ruaning between them, forming thirty-three detnehed blocks of building, all of which, ex eept the church, were probnbly built of wood, and were generally of one story. The ballding, form diso tinet groups. Im the centre is the church and cloister, anil the group beloaging to the distinetly monastic life; to the eist and borth the group appropristed to the education of the young, ani the care of the sick, with the abbat's house watching over the whole. To the west und north-west lies the group appropriated to hospitality; while the group connected with the grosser material wnits of the establishment is placed at the furthest distance from the church to the west nad south. By a reference to the plan it will be seen that the quadrangular cloister-court forms the nueleus of the establishment, round which the principal buildings are ranged. The two-apsed church atands to the north, that the cloister might be sunay nod warn! ; the refectory to the south, the side furthest removed from the chureh that the worshippers might not be annoyed with noise or smell, with the kitehen annexed. From the kitchen a passage lends to the bakehouse and brewhouse, nod the sleeping-rooms of the domesties. To the west, elosely adjacent to the kitchen and refectory, is a two-storied building, cellar below, and larder and storeroom nbove. The absence of the chapter-house is perplexing. In all Benedictine houses the chnpter-house opeas from the east walk of the cloister, and the entire absence of so essential an element of monastic lite throws a little doubt on the perfeet accuracy of the plan. The east side is entirely occupied by the "pisnlis," or "ealefactory," the common day-room of the monks, warmed by flues under the floor. The dormitory occupies the upper story of this buiiding, communieating by a stnircase with the scuth transept of the charch to emable the bretiren to attend the nocturaal services without going iato the open alr. A passage lends from the dormitory to the "uecessarium"-a portion of the monastic building always planned with the most delicate attention to health and cleanliness. "Above the refectory is the "vestiarium," where the habite of the monks were kept. The "parlatoriun,", where the monks might have intercourse with members of the outer world, lies between the charch and the cellar, with one door opening into the cloister, and another into the outer court. On the eastern oide of the north transept is the "seriptorium" with the library above.
To the east of the church stands a group of buildings comprising two miniature monastic establishments, each complete in itself, the infirmary devoted to the sick monks, and tha house of the "oblati" or, novices. Esch has s covered cloister, surrounded by the usual huildings, refectory, dormitory, etc., and an apsidal chapel, placed back to back. Contiguous to the intirmary stands the physician's residence, with the physic garden, the drug store, the house for blood-letting and purging, and a chamber for the dangerously sick, closely adjacent.

MONASTIC BISHOP, though not entirely unknown in the Esstern church (Sozomen, IIist. Eccl. l. vi. c. 34) eame into greatest prominence in the Westera, in the development of the eliur h's life. According to the Catholic idea of the church, the bishop is supreme in all spiritual things in his own diocese, the visible source of orders, missinn, and all snersmental graces ( $C$. Antioch. c. 9). But in differcnt ages this has received various limitations, specially from the principle of patriarchates on the one side and from that of monasticism on the other. The relation of the monastery to the episcopnte was at first that of entire anbjection (C. Chalc. e. 4 ; Paronius, Ann. Ecel. A.d. 451, § 25 ; Bingham Orig. Eccl. ii. c. 4, § 2), even to the appointment of the abbat (Justinian, Nocell. v. c. 9). But in course of time this was altered, (1) by papsl exemptions, on account, apparently at the outset, of ep ivcojal otficiousness (Baronius, ih. A.d. 598, $\S 3,6 \cup 1, \S 2$; Anglo-Sitx. Chron. A.D. 675. 963), or by regal, as by King Ini's charter to Glastonbury A.D. 725 (Wilkins, Conc. i. 80), or by conciliar, as by the synod at Herutford, a.D. 673 (Bede, Hist. Ecel. iv. e. 5), and perhaps the third council of Arles, a.d. 455 (Binghan, Orig. Eccl. i. e. vii. § 14), and (2) by the spread of Christianity through monastic agencies beyond the limits of the old Roman empire and heace outside the ordinary means of diocesam organisation. [Orders.] So long as the monastery continued under the entire jurisdiction of the blshop as head and centre of spiritual life in his diocese, he supplied the needs of its members with all episcopal offices. But when the monastery was either withdrawn from his jurisdiction, or was e-tablished prior to and practically ontside the direct ageney of the bishop, the natural relations became inverted, and while the grace of orders remained of necessity with the bishop, the jurisduction and mission passed for the time to the monastery, and the monastic bishop was under the jurisdiction of the monastic head, the abbat, whether ordained or lay. This is most trequently met with in the Celric church of Ireland and her oftshoots in Scotlad and Northumbria, where it presented itself to the venerable Bele as an "ordo Inmsitatus" (Hist. Eec!, iil. c. 4). It is also met with on the coutinent. Accorling to ecelesinstical principle the monastery required n bishop for the discharge of episcopal functions to the inmates, and if the chief officinl was the abbat, the blshop was at least one of the "tinmlly," honoured Indeed for his snered office (Adamn. Vit. S. Col. j. c. 44), though under the shbat in jurisdiction and monastic precedence; he was higher in spiritual power (Ib. i. c. 36), thongh lower in local dignity and ollicial, that is, monastie rank.

MONASTIC BISHOP

Monasticism spread rapidly from the Thebald into the Western church, its great patron in Gaul being St, Martin, the celebrated bishop of Tours (A.D. 371-397), who built monasteries at Poitiers and Tours, and by his authority and exhertation established the monastic system. When and by whum the Gospel was carried neross the Channel to Britain and Ireland is unknown to authentic history, but Pelagius introducing monasticism seems a fable (Cave, IFist. Lit. i. 291). When the Gospel is met with in britain it is radiating from monastic centres (Bede, Hist. Eccl. 1. e. 27, ii. c. 2), and it was not till the 12 th century that the monastic church if lreland had become merged in the dioces.ine Accepting the "Catalogus Sanctorum Hiberoiae, secundum diversa tempora," supposed to have been written by Tirechan in the 8 th century, and first published by Ussher (Rrit. Eccl. Ant. vi. 477-479), as embodying a certuin amount of truth regaxiing the condition of the early Irish church, as at one time purely episcopal, then monastic, and finally eremitic, we find monasticism firmly established iu Ireland at an early date. St. l'atrick, himself a bishop, founded churehes nal monasteriea, ordained bishopa and presbyters, and sprend the faith as a zealous missionary ; yet in his own church st Armagh, while bishops are recorded in an uninterrupted line from A.D. 447 to 535 inclusive, bishops and abbats are mingled from that date to the twelfth ecoutury (Fuar Mast.; Ann. Uist. ; Ann. Tijg.; Ann Clonm.; Ann. Inisf.), the obits of eleven bishops nad tourteen abbats being given between the yerrs 547 and 811 inclusive (Funr Mast.); but in the eammon lists of prelates theseareallalike treated as bishops(Wsre, Irish Bishops). So at liildure from A.D. 519 to 800 inclusive, there are recorded eight abbesses, geven abbats and five bishops, but at Bnagor from A D. 552 to 812 inclusive there is a single line of twenty-nine abbats and no bishops (Four Mast.). From this we may infer either that the obits of abbats and bishops nlike, when contemporaneons, were entered in the annals, or more probably that the leading idea was to give the abbatial succession, and that a bishop at times held the abbacy, as at. other times he was scribe and anchoret (Reeves, S. Adlamn. 3t5), yet "Affiath, bishop of Ard-Macha, and Airenehtnch Uis Faelain, abbat of Ard-Macha, died on the same night" (Four Mast. A.D. 793), and Wars has to count them both as one bishop (Todd, St. Patrich, 20 sq.; Prim. Hist. Ch. Ir. 448, Dubl. 18:1).

The first clear instance of an Irish monastic bishop is in St. Brigida's monastery at hildare, in the end of the 5th and beginning of the bth centuries. Cogitosus (lita S. hrifidac) snys in the language of probably the 7 th century, "Haec ergo egregils crescens virtutibus, ubi per faman bonarum rer:-n ad cam ab omnitus provinciis fibermine innumerabiles populi de utro que sexu contlucbant vota slbl volentes voluatarie, suum monasterlum caput penè omaium Hiberniensium ecclesiarum, et culnen pracellens omnia monasteria Sentorum (cujus Parrochla per totam Hibernienseni terram diffasa a marl

Though not so explic precision we find the sa raled in the Colum "llabere autem solet semper abbatem presb omnis provincia, et ip, inusitato, debeant esse s primi doctoris illius, qu byter extitit et monach c. 4), and the fourth a Is called a bishop (Four Doneg. Tisuum. 518; Todd, S. Patr. I's sq.; Smith and Wace, lict. Christ. Biog. "Conlacth.") Though not so explicitly yet with sutficient precision we find the same practice to have preraled in the Columban monastery of IIy. "Habere nutem solet ipsa insula rectorem semper abbatem presbyterum, cujus juri et omnis provincia, et insi etiam episcopi, ordine inusitato, debeant esse subjecti, juxta exemplum primi doctoris illius, qui non episcopus, se $d$ presbyter extitit et monachus" (Bede, Eccl. Hi:t. iii. c. 4), and the fourth abbat there, Fergna Brit, Is called a bishop (Four Mast. A.d. 622 ; Mart. Doneg. Narch 2 ; Reeves, S. Adamn. 340-341, 372). To Liadisfarne bishop Aidan was sent by the monastery of Hy (Bede, ib. iii. c. 3), and there also the abbat governed and the clergy, with the bishop himself, observed the monastic rule (Bede, Vit. S. Cuth. c. 16). When Fergil rule (Bede, Vit. S. Cuth. c. 16). When Fergil or Virgulius, abbat of Aghaboe, became abbat of Salaburg, in the 8th century, "dissimulata ordinatione fermè annorum dnorum spatiis, habuit secum laboris et coronae participem episcopum comitantem de patria, nomine Lobda, a persolvendum eplscopale officium " (Vit. S. lirg. ap. Messingham, Hor. Ins. Sanct. 331). In S. Columbanus's Irish foundation at Bobio, a slighly different practice prevailed, which points to the jealousy already arising bet ween the monastery and episcopate and onding in the frequent monastic exemptions by the popes; the bishop Was invited into the monastery as required, and was specially excluded from all power in monasWas specially excluded from all power in monastic affairs (Messingham, ib. 248). At other times a bishop-abbat directed the affairs of the monastery [ABBat], not in Ireland only but elsewhere (Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 129), and thus was the munastic bishop exercising, pro hâc vice, the monastic jurisdietion (Du Cange, Gloss, iii. 108-9).
On the contineat, mostly in excmpt abbeys and monasteries, the monastic blshop was a recognized official in the 8 th ceatury, as in the abbey of St. Denis near Parls, the nbbey of St. Martin at Tours, the monastery of Lobes or Lavies in Belginm, nod the monastery at Salzbarg in Bavaria as above mentioned ('Todrl, $S$. Patrick, 48 sq . treating the question fully with authotities ; Lanigan, Eecl. Hist. Ir. 3i. $254-5$ ). Under the Benedictine Rule there was special provision made for him; "igitur ut juaioribus praesertim fratribus omnis discurrendi occasio tolleretur ad sacros enserpiendos ordines, ad requirendom chrlsma, neve adventu episcoporum in monasteria ad sacras ordinationes explendas, quies monachurum turbaretur, plerique epitopum ad manum semper in monasteriis sive abibatem sive simplicem nonachum habere voluerunt " (Martene et Durand, Thes. Nov. Aneod. t. i. I'raef. ap. Todd, S. I'atrick, 69). In the moanstery of Munat Sinal, in the Ilth century, the abbit and 500 moaks had their own bishop (Todd, ib. $67-8$ ).

But regarding the monastic blshop a further distinction is necessary. Bishops sometimes, in the first zeal of monasticism, lived with their clergy in a quasi-monasticstate (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. vii. c. 2, §8) to assimilate the life in cities to that in the desert: thus St. Augustine of Hippo "factus presbyter monasterium intra ecclesiam mox instituit, et cum Dei servis viverc coepit secundum modum et regulam sub sanetis Apostolis constitutam" (Possidius, Vita S. Auf. c. 6; Opp. S. Aug. t. x. App. col. 260, Venet. 17:99). And when he became bishop he had "In ista domo Episcopi meum monasterinm clerieorum" (Serm. 49 de Di, ersis, t. x. 519), or bishops demitted their episcopal charges and retired to monasteries for contemplation and prayer. But neither of these were properly mniastic bishops. Again, according to Carholic rule, ordination and consecration could only be to (Bingham, ('rig. Eccl. iv. c. 6). yet in the Celtic church this rule (Conc. Chalc. c. 6) seems aever to have been closely followed, but the episcopnte was frequently conferred on persons who were emioent for learning, piety, or other personal qualification, as it was also in the Enst (Sozomen; Hist. Lecl. I. vi. c. 33-4). Heace, in the Irish annals, we find bishops without lucal designation, or named only in connexion with the place where they chanced to live at the time without being either diocesau or monastic. Again there were groups of bishops, seven heing a fivourite number (Mart. Doneg.), and also in single monasteries a large company of bishops under the nbbat, as at louth a hundred bishops under Mochta (Colgna, Acta SS. 729, c. 7). The evident etlect of this system was to multiply idalefinitely the aumber of bishops both without and within the monasteries, and to foster that restless spirit which was attempted to be checked by the synod at Herutford (c. 4 in its disputed reading, "Ut episcopi monachi don migrent de loco ad locum," Bede, Ihist. Eicl. iv. c. 5), which carried 80 many Irish bishops across to the continent especially after the monasteries began to be pluadered by the Northmen, and which cailel for the frequent conciliar enactments against the see-less bishopss, the episcopi vagi, vacantes, and vagantes, and the "Scoti qui se dicunt episcopos esse" (C. Cabill, c. 43) [Bision V.] both ia England and on the Continent. Having been trained under a different system, they came into frequent collision with the diocesan bishops, and even in the IIth and 12th centuries St. Anselm of Canterbury and St. Bernard of Clairvaux could regard the want of diocesan organisation In Ireland is $n$ scrious blot on the whole Irish church (Ussher, lirit. Eccl. Ant. iv. 523), a "dissolutio eccl-siasticae disciplinae, censurne enervatio, religionis evacuatio" (S. Bern. De I'it. Mal. c. 10),
(Du Cange, Gloss.; Fleury, Eael. Hist.; Reeves, Adamnan's Lifo of S. Columba, History of the Culdees, and Eccl. Ant. of Down, Connor, and Dromore; Tord, S. Patrick ; Mosheln, Ch. Hist.; Monumenta Hist. Brit.; Skene, Celtic Scotland, ii.; Binghum, Orig. Eccl.)

MONEY. Introduction.-The appearance of any positive indication of Christian influence on the coins of the Roman emperors hae been generilly considerel to commence under Constantino 1 . the Great, since during his reign most of the public money bears othicial marks of the new religion which he embraced. There are, however, a few isolated examples previous to his time, which are of sutficient interest to need special illustration; (1) the representation of the deluge; (2) a symbol like the monogram of Christ: and (3) the legend in Pace.:

(who reigned 153-188, according to Langlois) is satd to have been 'a holy msn, (ieposs avinp Jul. Afric. in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 149, 1); and as he patronized the Cirtstian Bardesunea, and forbade the worship of Cybele, It has been inferred that be was a Cbristian, and this Inferrace is thought 'to be strengthened by the fact that on the colna of this prince the uaunl symbola, of the old national worship are for the first time wanting and the sign of the croas appears in their place' (Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. 1. p. 111 [Bohn], following Bayer, Hist. Oer. et Edess. ex Num. illustr. lib. A11. p. 171, who figurce two colna of an Abgarus, contemporary with Severua, and bearing his heal on which e cross appess on the lina). The cross is formed in one case of flve dots (pearla), in the other the central dot becomss oval. The chrolvology of these kings ls doubtful. Neander places Abgar Bar Mann between 160-170, but it seems impossible in any case that these colns belong to bim . The cross, however (apparently of five united dots), is found on a coin of Abgarus, having tha heud of Commodus on the reverne (Langlols, Num. de l'Arménie, pl. Iv. No. 7), who may be Abgar Vilt. That which is certain about these colns is that on some colns of sn Abgar contemporary with Severus a crass occurs on the diadem, while on others we have the crescent aurmounted by a star, taken by layer and Neaniter to be the aymbols of the old national worrbip." On a coin of Abgarns and Commodus in the Billish Musenm, thore appears to be on the diadem of Abgara + or $X$, but 1 am Incifned to think with Professur Babington, that the supposed cruss on these coins of Edessa lu only a crucfform sur or ormament without suy Cliristian algulficance.On a coln of baibarons fabric of the Roman emperor Tetricus (267-273), with legend oriens avo (Cohen, Suppl. N0. 28), or of Tacitus (275-276), published by Rasitie (Ifex. vol. I. pt. It. p. 1098), there is suid to be in the fleld a cross, but in both casee it is probably a star, though it may be that these pleces were lsaned long after at the epuch of Clurixtianity. A crose to aloo given by Coben (Méd. Imp. vol. vi. pl. xv.) in the fleld of a coin of Conatanting Clilorus and Gakerias Msximian, but thls coln bas been incurrectis engraved sad described and the object is really a star (Stadden, Landb. ©f Nom. flying toward the ark, holding an olive braneh in its claws. E. (Fig. 1 ; Cabinct des Mechuilth Paris.)
The remarkable coins giving the representa. tion of the deluge were lssued during the reigns of three empercrs, (1) Scpt. Severus, 193-211, whowas at first farourable to the Christians, and whose son Caracalla had a Chrlstian nurse (Tertull. ad Scap. iv. ; ci. Spart. in Carac. 1), but who at a later period of his reign, 202, allowed a persecution to provail (Spart. in Sev. 17; Euseb. H. E. vi. c. 2); (2) Macrinus, 217, under whom the church enjoyed peace, and (3) Philip I. 244-249, whose Christian tendencies have been the source of much discussion (Mosiglia, de Relig. utriusque Phil. Aug. Diss. duae, Rom. 4to, 1741; Greppo, Notes hist. biog. etc. concern. les prem. siècles chret. Lyous, 1841 ; Milman, $H$ st. of Christianity, vol. ii. ; Lardner, Cred. vol. vii. ctc.), and who by many ecclesiastical authors has been considered the first Roman Emperor who was a Christian (Oros. Hist. vii. 20 ; Hieron. de Vir. Ill. 52 ; Chron. ed. Mai, vol. viii. p. 646 ), sa honour that more properly belongs to Constantune I. the Great (Lactant. De fals. Relig. c. 1; Sulp. Sev. Sacr. Hist. ii. 33; Luseb. Vit. Cinst. iv. c. 75; Thend. II. E. v. c. 39).

The type of these coins was by early numismatiste and scholars (Falconeri, Froelich, Hardouin, Bryant, Barrington, Milles, etc.) ceasidered to refer to the Greek legend of the flood of Deucalion, in which it is stated that Zeus had resolved to destroy all mankind, with the exception of Deucalion and Pyrrha, whilst the letters on the ark were supposed to have been either added by a forger or altered from NE 2 K [ $0 \rho \bar{\omega} \nu$ ]. Niumismatists, however, of the present century have not failed to recognise that the letters on the ark are certainly $N \Omega \in$ and that the type refers to the Noachian deluge, the figures both inside and outside the ark representing Nosh and his wife, in the latter case holding up their hands in thanksgiving for their safety. It has been suggested (Eickhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. iii. P: 137), and with much prolability, that the word $\hat{N} \Omega \in$ was placed on theae coins so that there might be no coufusion with the flood of Deacslion, in a similar manner as on the coins of Magnesia in lonia the word APГ $\Omega$ is put to show that the vessel thereon represented is the ship 'Argo,' in which history makes Jasoo and his colleagues sail in search of the golden fleece.
It is not difficult to distinguish on these coias the form of the raven from that of the dove, and the Bihle gives au nceount of the presenca of only these two birde. In the short description of the flood of Deucalion, by Platarch ( $D_{8}$ Solert. Animal. xiii. ed. Didot) there is allasion to a dove, but there is no mention of an oliva branch or of another bird. In the Chaldaean accounts of the deluge, as preservel in the fragments of Berosus and Abydenus (Cory, Anc. Fray. 2nd ed. 1p. 28-34), sonie binds were twice sent out to discover if the waters had receded, and the second time they returned with, instesd of aus olive branch, some mud on their fect; whilst in the Aseyrian uccounts (G. Smith, Chald. dat. of Genesis, 1876) it is stated that "a dore, s swallow, and a raven" wera sent forth, the two former of which returned to the ship, bat the raven did not come buck. quite contrary to that in Genesis, na alse te the subject shown on the coins. A very important feature of this tyje (Lenormant, Mel. d'Arch. vol. iii. p. 199, 1853) is the exactness with which as regards the raven, it agrees with the Hebrew text, which is quite at variance with the LXX and Vulg. In these latter (Gen. riii. 7) the raven is stated as "not returning until the water had dried from off the earth" (nal $\geqslant \xi \in \lambda \theta \dot{\omega} \nu$, ouvk tîs $\boldsymbol{\gamma} \hat{\eta} s$.-Qui egrediebatur et non revertebatur, donec siccarentur aquae super terram), whereas in the Heb. text we read that the raven "went forth to and fro until the waters were dried up from off the earth" (בivin kisy Nys " diendo et redeundo, donec areacerent aquae desaper terram," Walton, Polygott ; Kalisch, Crit. Com. ; Patrick, Com. etc.). The expression "to and fro" leaves no doubt that the ravon-a bad messenger and Noal, shose nnother, the dove -must have returned tio utervals to the ark, snd in all probability resied on its top, as iudeed it is represented on these coins.
It is alse interesting to compare the type of these coins with the representations on early Christian monuments. A paiuting of the 3rd cestury, in the catacombs at Rome (Savinien Petit, MYel. d'Arch. vol. iii. pl. xxix. Parix, 1853), shows Neah in the ark and $a$ dove holding an olire branch in its month flying towards him; Nouh's wife is not represented, nor the raven, bat one cannot fail to observe the striking similarity of the shape of the ark, ita cover, the figure of Noab and the dove. Though the raven is not found on any of the paintings of the catacombs, it may be seeu on a bas-rolief fouad at D'Jemila, in Algerin (De la Mare, Revue Arch. 1849, vol. vi. p. 196), and is here occupied in devouring the carcases.
It now remains to assign a reason, if possible, for this type occurring upon the coins of Apameia. In the first place there was a Phrygian legend of great flood relating to Annncus or Nannacus, a king whe resiled at Iconium, and who lived to the age of 300 years. When he died the tradition was that all mankind would be destroyed (Steph. Byz. s.v. 'Ikóviov; Suldas, s.v. Návvaкus), There is not much doubt that the Old Testament infuenced this tradition, and it is perhaps not unreasoanble to suppose that there is here a reference to Enoch, the father of Methuselah, who after his son's birth "walked with God 300 Years" (Gem. v. 22). Prof. Ewald indeed has supposed (Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, vol. 1. p, 356) that the city Enoch, which was built by the eldest son of Cain, and called after his name (Gea. iv. 17, 18), refers to the Phrygian city of leoainm, at which Annacus da supposed te have resided. In the second place the curious lines in the "Sibylline Books" ( (race. Sibyll. Vv. 247256, 261-267) may have actually suggested to the Aprmeans the types for these colns. They are as follows: "But Noah resting some days aent again the dowe that he might know whether the Deluge had ceased, but she flying up and down fled away, and descendlag to earth rested a little her boily on the wet earth and returned brleg. ing a branch of an ollive tree, a great sign of good newa . . . . and then presently he sent forth nother bird black-winged, and she flew away and remained on the earth. . . . . There is on the continent of black Phrygia a high and great mountaln called Arsrat. . .. . Here arise the springa of the great river Marsyas. On its lotty top the ark rested when the waters receded." The term mi $\boldsymbol{\beta}^{2} \boldsymbol{\omega}$ or, "an nrk," which occurs in these verses is of special interest, for not only was it employed by the LXX (Gen. vi. 14), by the Evangelists (Matt. xxiv. 38; Luke xvii. 27), and by the Apostles (Heb. xi. 7; 1 Pet. iii. 20), for the "ark of Noah;"but Apameia itself was called Cibotos (Strab. xii. b; Ptol. v. 2), 1robably on account of the great wealth collected there, it being a great emporlum next in dignity to "a chest" or "coffer." Moreover that the ark was supposed to rest at Apamein is testified by тé申ukay, for the river Marsyas ran by A pameia, and was also itself called Ciltotos, as testified by coins struck at the time of Hadrian (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1866, vol. vi. p. 211, pl. vi.

No. 4).

Among the various auppositions which may be brought forward to explain the appearance of this type, whether it be auggested that it may hare been produced owing to the semi-generous treatment that the Christians received during the reign of the emperors under which they were issued, it is certain that the type did not cmanate from a Christinn sect. The deep root which an ancient tradition of the Deluge-shown by the Phrygian legend, probably greatly infuenced by the Biblical account and the minute description in the Sibylline books-had taken at Apameia is far more likely to have originated these pieces. At the aame time it would be presumptuous to suppese that they might not have been designed by a Christian artist, for the worship of God had long circulated throughout Asia Minor. (For a full recount of these coins see Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1866 , vol. vi. p. 173.)

Before him a female (Ariadee?) walking to left, but looking at Bacehus and carrylog a large vine-branch covered with grapes. A:. (Fig. 2; Cabinet des Meilailles, Paris.)

This medallion was issued during the relgu of Trajan Deciua (249-251) at Mneonia in Lydin.
It will be observed that the engraver has taken care to place the monegram between two A's ( $A \underset{R}{ } A$ ) in the middle of the legend at the top of the coin, as if to call special attention to it.

Suggestions have been made (Lenormant, Mel. d'Arch. vol. lii. p. 196) that a Christimn moneyer intended to introduce on this cein the mysterious sign of the new Faith, and that though symbols of a similar character to the Christinn monogram occur upon other monuments anterior to Chris.
thanity (see § xv.), yet in this case the sign is more probably the work of a Shristlan. Moreover, that the Bacchio emblems, appropriate to the institution of the Eucharist, may also be found on the sarcophagus of St. Constance and on the mosaics which decorate the mausoleum of this princess (Cinmpini, do sacr. Acdif. a Const. may. constr. pl. xxxii. Rome, 1693). This opinion is further sustained by another scholar (De Witte, Mel. d'Arch. vel. iii. p. 172), who adds that the title $\alpha_{\rho} \rho \chi \omega \nu$ chosen by the artist in which to introduce the inesogram of Christ seems to offer a direct allusion to the domination and the reign of the Saviour.

The form of the $\Phi\left(\cdot{ }^{\boldsymbol{P}}\right.$ ) in the words 'Aффıàou and ETєфауךфdpou have been niso considered to allude to the form of the cross $(\dagger)$, but it would be hazardous to affirm this, as a similar manner of engraving this letter occurs on the coins of the Seleucidae, of Philadelphia in Lydin, and of Sardes, in the latter case on a coin of Salonina, who is supposed to have been a Christiau (see par. 3 ; Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1866 , vol. vi. p. 218) ; at the same time such a form may be seen on the top of the laharuin of certain coins of Constantine the Great to which I shnll presently allude ( $\S$ vi.).
It must, however, be remembered that under Trajan Declus the Christians were grossly persecnted ("Exstitit post nanos plurimos exsecrabile unimal Decius, qui vexaret Ecclesiam," Lactnat. de Mort. P'ers. c. 4). Fabian, bishop of Rome, the first nuthentic martyr pope, was one of the early victims (Milınnn, Hist. of Christ, vol. ii. p. I88; vol. iii. p. 329), and many persons were killed throughout the empire. Yet the quiet that the Chuistinns enjoyed during the mild reiga of his predecessor Philip, und its effects, cannot have been suddenly stopped even hy this attempt to extirpate Christianity, nad it is not therefore improbable that a Christion artist here sought surreptitious neans of protest agninst the tyranuy of the persecutors of the church.

1 may add that Tryphoaia or Cephinis, the wife of Herennius Eiruscus, son of T...jan Decius and Etruscilla, was probably coaverted to Christianity with her danghter Cyrilla after her husband's death (De Witte, op. cit.). Of this empress no coins are extant.

The explanation of the remarkable legend on this coin of Salonina (circ. 260-268) was first given by M. de Witte, who in a most interesting memoir publishad in 1852 (Mem. de l'Acad. Roy. de Belgique, vol. xxvi.; cf. Nev. Num. Belge, vol. ij. 1853 ; Mel. d'Arch. vol. iii. Paris, 185̈.3) traced the origin and names of Salonina the rife of Gallienus - earefully distinguishing her from Pipa or Pipnra the concubine;-the character of this empress, and finally attompted to show, and net without success, that she was a Christian.

It has been amply proved, in splte of many objections, that the formula EN EIPHNB or IN pace was exclusively Christian (Caredoni, Rugg. dei Mon. delle Art. Crist. Modean, 1849), that is to nay, not in vogue among the pagans, though it was used previ, asly by the Jews (Greppo, Not. sur des Inscript. ant. tireis do quelq. tombertux juify à Rome, Lyons, 1835). It was moreover a formula of Christina apotheosis, nad as such has been trented by M. de Witte, who in the papers above reterred to has supposed that these coins are commemorative, and were struck by order of Galliequs, after hia wife's death. A few years after, two finds, one in 1855 , consisting of some 4000 coins, the other in 1857, cousisting of some 25 or 30,000 coins of silver and billon, among which were some of the pieces of Salomion, with the legend afg. or avgVista in pace, proved to M. de Witte (Rev. Num. 1857, p. 7t) that these coins must have been issued before 26.5 and consequently during the lifetime of Salonina, no opinion that was shared by the late M. C. Lenormant (Rev. Num. 1857, pp. 243245), but which has not commended itself to Mr. C. W. King (Early Christ. Num. p. 49, 1873), whe whilst suppressing all mention of the authority of the two finds spenks of M. de Witte's conclusion as nn "unlucky after-t hought."

As regards the letters im $s$ in the exergue, Mr. King (op. cit. p. xlv.) is of opinion that they must stand for some title, and that Memoriae Sunctae not merely gives a most appropriate sease, but is suppinted by the Venerandae Memoriac on the coins of Constnntine ( $$$ xiii.). The fact, however, is that other letters occur in the exergue, and the same may also be found on pagan types of the coins of Salonina, and on the coins of Gallicaus, so that this hypothesis is out of the question. I am inclined to think that the letters bear some reference to the miutage or place of minting, but I am unable to ofier any satisfactorv solution.

It must be added that the late Abbe Caredoai considered (Albun, Giornale Lett. vol. xix. Rome, 1852) M. de Witte's suggestion a paradox, and did not admit his interpretation of the legend.
§ i. Chronological and Historical Sketch of the Reign of Constantina.-Previous to commencing the actual description of the coins of Constantine I. with Christian emblems, and for the better uaderstanding of their nrrangement and classification, it is necessary to give a brief chrono$\operatorname{logical}$ nad bistorical sketch of the reign of this emperor.

In the year 311, Constantine 1 ., being determined to stop the tyranay of Mnxentius, reviewed in his owa mind all considerations, nod felt it incumbent on him to honour no other than the God of his father Constantius I. Chlorus (Euseb. Vit. Const. j. c. 27). He is coasequeatly said to have prayed earnestly to God, nod whilst thus prnying with ferveat eutreaty, a most marvellous sign appeared to him from heavea. About midday, when the sun was beginning tudecline, he saw with his own eyes in the heavens the trophy of a crose of light placed above the sua, and bearing the iuscriptioa BY THIS CONQUER (TOVTS NIKA), a miracle witnessed by his whals army (Euseb. lit. Const. i. c. 28).

But doubting in his own mlad what the emport of this apparition might be, he continued to meditate till night. During his aleep the Christ of God appeared to him with the siga that he had seen in the heavens, and commanded him to make a staodard rosembling the sign and to use it as a sateguard ogginst his enemies (Euseb. Lit. Const. 1. c. 29), So soou as it was day he arose, and calling together those that worked in jewela und precieus stoues, he ant in the midst and describel to them the figure of the sign ha had seen, and commanded them to make one like it in gold and preciens atones, to which Eusebius adds, "and 1 also have seen this representation" ( lit. Const. i. c. 30).
The description of the standard of the cross, called by the Romans labarurn, is minutely given by Eusebina (lit. Const. i. c. 31. See art. Labarom, who ailys that two letters indicating the name of Christ by means of the tirst letters were placed on the crown, "the letter $P$ being marked diagonally with x ex-

Encouraged by these signs, Constnntine advanced againat Maxentius, whom he defeated on Oct. 27, 312, Maxentius bimself being drowned in the Tiher while endeavouring to esenje over the Milvian bridge. Constantioe thus became sole master of the Western empire.
Shortly after Constantine's entry into Kome, he, in conjunction with Liciuius I. his colleagne, "having first praised God aa the author of oll their auccesses," drew up a full nud cemprehensive edict in favour of the Christiana, and then sent it to Maximin, ruler in the east, who fearful of retusing, addressed a decree b commeacing lovivs maxiMiNvs AVGVsTVs, etc. (a title assumed by him after the death of Galerius) to the governors under him, respeeting the Cohistians, as if of his own free will (Euseb. 1275
The whele Roman people recelved Constantine as their beneflactur. The genate who paid aderation to the labarum (Pradent. in Symm. 49⿺𠃊 496) decreed him the first rauk among the Augusti (Lactant. de Hort. Pers. c. 44), and perhaps offered him the title of Maximus,, "quem aibj Maximinus vindicabat," to the great grief and indignation of Maximin. "Cognito deinde senatus decrete, sic exarsit dolore, ut inlmicitias aperte profiteretiar, convlcia jecis mixta adversua Imperatorem Maximum diceret " (Lactant. op. cit.). [See under 315.] Constantine erected a statue of himself in the most frequented part of Rone, aud ordered a long spear in the form of a cross to be placed in the hands of the atatue, and the following inscription to be engraved on it in the Latin language; -Br this salutary sign, time true byabol of valour, I have saved your city, laberated from the yoae of the tyrant. I have also restored the senate and homan people to tielir ancient. digntry and splendour. (Euseb. lit. Const. i. c. 40 ; H. E. ix. c. 9.) In 312-313, Constantine aed Liciulus were at Milana, where the latter was married to Constantia, the half-sister of Constantine (Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. 45 ; Vict. Epit. ; Zosim. ji. 17); and here the $t$ wo emperors issued a second edict giving liberty to the Christians in particalar, and to all men in general, to follow the worthip of that deity which each might approve, so that thus the Divioe Being (Divinitas) might be propitious to them and to a!l their subjects (Lactant. de Murt. Pers. c. 48; Euseb. H. E. x. c. 5).

Ia the meantime the impious Maximin Daze, taking advantage of the marringe festivities which were going on at Milaa, marched from Syria into Bithynia, and from thence into Thrace, Licinjus parsued bim, and in a pitehed battle at Adrianopla deteated him. Maximin tled to Miount Tauras, and thence to Tarsus, where he is said to have given glory to the God of the Christians, and enacted a fail and complete law for their jiberty (Euseb, H. E. ix. c. 10), but too late, for being seized with n violent disease, he perished miserably (313). Licinius thas became sele master of the East, and on arrivlag at Nicomedia, he gave thanks to God for his victory (gratiam fleo, cujus autcilio vicerat, Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. 48), and repeated the edict in favour of the Christians as issued by Coastantine and himself at Milan (Lactant. op. cit.).

In 315 the title of Marinus and the diadem were officially decreed to Constantine.

The title of Maximus is given to Constantine by Lumenius in hls panegyric pronounced at Treves in 3 tu (Paneg. Const. Auy. lict.), but the statement cannot be accepted as true (Ileyne, Cens. xii. Puneg. Vet. in his Opusc. Acad. vol. vi. p. 8(0). Paglus (Crit. Baron. ann. 311) gives the date as 311 on the authority of a coin having on the obverse max. and on the reverse votis V mvir. x , but Medioharbus, from whom the description of the coln is taken, is an authority of no value (Eekhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. viii. p. 94). Some modern numismatists, on the -other hand (Feusrdent, Rcv. Num. 1856, p. 249 ; Cuhen. Mel. Imp. vol. vi. p. 89), think thnt coins with this title were not struck till the end of his reign. The title was probably offered to him in 312 by the seaate, as 1 have previously stated, but it is more likely that it was officially granted to him in 315, when the triumphal arch, to conmemorste the vietory over Maxeutius in 312, was dedicated to him. - imp. Constantine distributed money to the penple as attested by hls colns (constantinvs max. ava. Bust with diadern, Cohen, Mcil. Imp. No. 160. from Welz $h$ ).

In 317 Crispus and Constantine II., the sons of Constnatine I., and Licinlus II. the sen of Licinius I., were made Caesars.

In 321 Constantlne enjolned all tha subjecta of the Roman empire to observe the "Lord's Day," snd passed an edict for the solemn observance of Sunday (Clinton, $F, R$. vol. ii. p. 91), which he calied dies Solis (Kuseb. Vit. Const. iv. c. 18; Sozomen, M. E. i. c. 8).

For nlae years there had been peace, but at last, in 323, a second war broke out between Constantine and Licinina. Two battles wera fought, and in the second Liaioius was utterly defented and obliged to sue for pardon. His life was spared at the request of his wifeConstantia, but only for a brief period, as he was put to death in the next year, 324, at Thessalonica, where he had been placed in confinement (Eutrop. x. 6 ; Hieron. Chron. ; Zosimus, ii. 28 ; Euseb. Vit. Const. Ii. c. 18; II. E. д. e. 9 ).

By this victory Constantine became sole master of the Roman world (RECTOR TOTIVs ormis on a gold coin struck at Thessalovica, Mudden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1862, vol. ii. p. 48).

On Nov. 8 of this year Constantius II. was mada Cacsur.

About 325 the combats of Gladiators were abolished, but they appear still to hare continued till as late ne 455 (Gibbon, Rom. Kmp. ed. Smith vol. iv. P. 41, note), and perhaps also the punishinent of the cross (Aur. Vict. Caes. c. 41 ; Sozomen, H. E.1. c. 8).

837. Constantine now began to fecl signs of tailing health, and visited Helenopolis, the birthplace of his mother Helena, where he is said to have for the first time received the impositlon of hands with prayer, in fact becnme a catechumen, after whlch he proceeted to Nicomedia, where he was baptized by Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, though he had inteaded to deter this rite till he could have been baptized in the river Jordnn. From these statements it would appear that Coustautine the Great was converted to Christi－ anity about the year 312，and that his colleague Licinius I．pretended to embrace the same faith at or about the same period．Still many acts of his reign nfter this date show that he acted in ansthing but a Christlan spirit．There may bo specially mentioned ：（1）the murder of Licinius I． in 324 contra jus sacramenti；（2）the murder of his son Crispus，nnd the young Licinius，a boy of eleven years of age，in 326 ；and（3）the marder of his wife Fausta $\ln 327 . \mathrm{d}^{\mathrm{d}}$ For these nad other reasous，especially because he had on his coins the inscription Sol Invictus，some have oonsidered（Niebuhr，Hist．of Ront．vol．v．p． 359 ）that he must have beea＂a repulsive phe－ nomenon nad was certninly not a Christian．＂Be this as it may，it is during the reign of Con－ stantine that Christinn emblems appenr in a marked manner on the coins and on the Roman dated tituli．
In the numismatic studies uow abont to follow， It will be seen whither Constantine the Great ordered to be placed on the imperial colange， cither openly or latently，any Christian emblems from the time when he first professed Christi－ anity in 312，or whetber he deferred so doing tili 323，after the defent of Licinius，when us ＂ruler of the whole world＂he could dare． without opposition，to inscribe upon his coina the symbela of the triue religion of Clurist．

As to the date of issue of the colns above described it is supposed that some may have existed previous to 323 ，as there are specimens of the coins of Constnatine 11．among them，and none oil Constantius II．made Caesar in that same year（Cavedoni，Appendice，p． 6 ；Garrucci，op． cit．）．The coin No．4，bearing as it does the title of Max．（Maximus），might have been issued in 315 ，in which year the Senate，as we have seen，grmated him that title，whilst the coins of Constantine I．（Nos． 1 und 2）might even be as early as 312 ，and those of Crispus and Constan－ tine Il．（Nos． 5 and 6）as early as 317．They are all probably anterior to 319 ，and certainly precede the year 323.
The first two colas are interesting as confirm－ ing the words of Eusebius（Vit．Const．i．c． 31 ； ci．Sozomen，$H_{i .}$ E．i．c．8）that Constantine， besides having the monogram placed upon the lubarum，was in the habit of wearing it upon his helinet．The helmet is sometimes orammented with pellets or stars，and the former are no doubt intended to represent gems，according to the account of his panegyrist Nazarius（xxix．5）－ ＂fulget galea et corusca lnce gemmarum divinum verticem monstrat，＂whilst according in Philo－ storgius（II．E．i．C．6）the holy sign seen is the sky by Constantiue whs surrounded by stars that encircied it as a rainbow－кal $\dot{\alpha} \sigma \tau<\dot{\rho} \rho \omega \nu$

The words victoriae lagtae may be com－ pared（cf．Caredoni，Ricerche，p． 16 ；Dis ımina， p .212 ）to the scriptural expressions＂Lactabor ego super eloquia tun：sicut qui invenit spolia multa＂（Ps，cxviii．162），or＂Lactabuntur sicut exultant viclores capta praeda，quando dividant spolia＂（Is，ix．3），and to the line of Horace（ 1 Sat．i．8）－＂Momento cita mors venit，ant vi toria laeta．＂

It was nt one time considered that the coins of Constantine I. with pagan symbois were uot entirely exciuded till 323, nfter the defeat of Licinius, but on no safe grounds, as the coins benring the names and types of Jupiter, Ifircules, and Mars never benr the titie of Maximus, bestowed ujon him in 315, from which it moy reasonably be inferred that all these coins were struck previous to 312 , when Constantine openty professed Christianity. Ono cuin, however, of the Mars type nud the title max. has been deseribed from Tanini (Cohea, Méd. Inp. No. 361), whilst there is $n$ series of coins of Crispus and Constantine II. with the trpe of Jupiter (Coheli, Méd. I"ip. vol. vi. pp. 197, 198 , Nos. 83-85; p. 234, Nos. 143,144 ), which were certninly issued posterior to 317, in which year they were created Caesars, but the type wns ant truck in nuy mint in the dominions of Constantiae, but in those subject to Licinius.
Some coins of Constnatine I. with the legend harti [or marti patri] conservatori, hnving for type the bust of Constantine (?) with the helmet adorned with the monogram, or Mnrs stinding, and in the field an equilateral cross or on his shield $\underset{K}{ }$, and others with the legend soli invicto comitr, the sun standing, nad in the field , ere supposed to be in existence (Garrucel, Num, Cost. 2nd ed. p. 241 seq. ; Rev. Num. 1806, p. 86 seq.), bit it is not clearly estabished thit the "monogrnm" is not a stir of six cqual rays; or "the equilaterai cross" the Lutin letter or numerical mark $X$ drawn sitectays. On avaidable specimens, from one of which $n$ drawing is given (Fig. 9), there is a $s y m b o l$ which rypenrs to be ucross, but it differs considerably from that on the coins previously described, and may indeed be only a numernl or a letter.
Aceording to Zonaras (Ann. xiii. 3) Constantine placed in the fortum of Constantinople the circular porphyry column brought from Rome, sad on it he put the brnzen statue of Apolly which he set up in his oun name, substituting some of the nails of the pnssion for the ruys of the san, thus nasuming with "singular shamelessness" (cf. Von Hammer, Const. und Bosp. vol. i. p. 162) the nttributes of Apollo and Christ, from which circumstance Garrucci has fouad no difficulty in supposing that Constantine "changed the hend of the stntue," aad fully iateaded to represent himself as Sol upon his cains.
Though Eusehius (Vit. Const, i. c. 43 : cf. Lactant, de Jort. Pers. c. i.) in the rhetorical language of the time, compares Constantine to the sun rising upon the earth and imparting its mass of light to all, and though in the legend soL invicto oomiti there may be the iden of the ancient Sun-god and the new Sun of lighteousness [see art. Christmas], it is doubtfui Whether Constantine would have placed the monogram of Christ beside the imnge of the Sol Invictus, or have chused himseif to be rejpresented onder the sembiance of the sun together with signs of Christıanity.
Should the coins of the Mars and Sol Invictus types be considered subsequent to 312 , in any case they must be placed before 323 , since coins of Constantius Caesar nre wanting in thls series, Similar coins exist of Crispus and Constantine II.

Of the series of these colins struck at Thenssloviea there is no coin of Constantine 1., of that otruck at London thete is no coin of Licinius I. That a coin of Coastantine I. of this series was issued at Thessalonica Is more than probable, as Iliyricam, in which Thessalonica was situnted, was addod to the dominions of Constantine in 3t, after the war with Lieinius. Why no coin of Liciains i . should oecur in this particular branch of the London series is not so clear, as coins of this emperor were probably struck there op to 3:t. It may be that the new quarrel with Lecinins had commenced, and determined Constantine not to strike any of his colleague's coins at Loodon.

The coios having the top of the staff of the labarum cnding in a cross, were admitted in the first instanco by Cavedoni (Ricerche, p. ©), who publishad from the Trisor de Numismatique (P. 131, P1. |xii. No. 8) a gold medalition of Constantine II, with the legend principi ivvenTVTis and having in the exergue the letters cons. (Constan/inopoli), and alluded to brass coins with the legend virtvs exercit. This example is not epecially pablished by Cohen (ef. Med. Imp. No. 5), and Cavedoni, apparently forgetting that he had mentioned this medallion, came to the conclusion (Appendice, p. 3) that the supposed cross on tho top, of the labarum was not in reality a oross, but only had the nppearance of one, being nothing more than small pellets indicating the extremity of tho cords or holders or other oraments at the top of the spear.

Garrueci, on the other hand, has stated (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 252; cf. Rev. Sum. 1866, p. 107, pl. iii. No. 15) that he has seen a coin of Licinius I. atruck at Aquilein, of which the form of the cross is

1 have not, however,
myself seen any specimens of colns struck at Aquileia shewing such a decided cross, and it is difien!t to say in most cases, whether the head of the spear is meant to express a cross or not. On some coins, as on those struck at Treves, Lyons, and Arles, the form appears to be $\%$, on others, especially on those issued at Thessalonica, the form becomes more a cross $\uparrow$.

Femardent, Cavedoni, and Garrucel wouls llmit the date to 330 , aupposing that the exergual letters const. refer to Constuntinople, but it has long been established that these letters should be interpreted Cunstantina, the uame given to Arles by Constantine the Grent, probably ubout 312, after the defeat of Maxentius and Maximin, when he improved the city nad made a new town on the opposite side of the river. It is called by Ausonius (Clarae urbes viii.) duplex, and the exergual lettera con. or const. (C,, nstantinu) are always preceded by a Latin diflerential letter, or accompanied by of i, it or in in the field, whilst con. or cons. (Constantinopolis) are followed by a Greek numeral ln cases where there is a differential letter (ct. F. W. Madden, Ihordb. to Rom. dium. p. 157 ; Num. Chron. N.s. 1861, vol. i. pp. 120, 180 ; J. F. W. de Salis, Arch. Journal, vol. xxiv.; Num. Chron. Ni. S. 1867, vel. vii. pp. 326, 327).
It has not been hitherto observed by any numismntist that the letter x of the werd exercitvs is on these coins placed at the top of the coin exactly betucen the two standards, whilst on the coins with the same legend and two soldiers standing, between them the libarum, struck at a later dste ( $335-337$; § xii.) the letter $\mathbf{x}$ is placed in the centre at the top of the lubarum. I am inclined to think that the arrangement is not accidental, but was epecially intended by the artist.

This rare little piece，of the amallest sixe， smaller even thas the similar coin of his father， which I have introduced here，instead of in its proper chronological place，for better illustration， is in the possession of the Rev．S．S．Lewis，Fellow， of Corpus Christi College，Cambridge，who most kindly sent it to me to see．Jt was formerly in the Wigan collection，and may be the anme as that published by Gaillard（Descript．des Mom．de J．Garcia，p．304，No．4929，pl．x． No．5）．It has been published，and an engrav－ ing given of it twice the actual size，by Mr． C．W．King（Early Christ．Num．pp．xvi．$x$ xiii． and 25 note，engraved on title－pago；cf．art． Labarom），who has allowed himself to be led away，as he says，by the＂practised（and what is greatiy to the present purpose），the unprejudiced eye of his draughtsman，＂who reads the word DEO on the labarum，which on examination turns out to be nothing more than thres pellets，as on the three pellets，as on the coins of his fathe，and which probably represent gems or oth orna－ ments of the labarum，or may be lntended for the three stars an reprenentel on the coln with the beata thanquillitas type (res 8 vi, note).

Both cuins bear the minat mark cons, which can only be Interpreted Const inturcpoli. This heing the cane, I may observe that they are the obly colns of Conatantine 1, adol his son bearing gositive Chrintian embiems lasned at the miut of Constantinople.h

Thie coin of Constantine J. was mont likely struck in 330 on the delieation of the new capitai; that of the son was probabiy lesmed after his father's death in 337 or 338 , as it is reeoried (Bibbon, Rom. Eimp. ell. Smith, vol. It. 1. $36 m$, and note 53 ) that " 4 t the persoual Interview of the three brothers, Copatantine II. the elilest of the Caesara obtained, with a certain pre-eminence of ruak, the posmennion of the nowo capitut, which bore his oun nume and that of his fither:" M. Fenardent (quated by Mr. King) would assign Ita date to the period of the eleration of Constnatine 11. to the rank of Angustus, In the last duys of his fither's lifetime, but I do nut know of noy autholity tor such a aupirasition (ct'. Sucrat. II. N. i. e. 39; Suzomen, II, E. Hi. c. 3 ; Euseb. Vit. Const. Iv, e. 6:1, 68).

The type of these pieces and the inscriptionthough the legend is by no means a new one, eceurring as it does from the time of Commodus (Cohen, Suppl. p. 484)-fidicate how "the public hope" (cf. Euseb, Vit. Const. ii. c. 29 ; iv. c. 9) was centered in the triumph of the Christian religion over the edversary of man-kind-" the great dragon, that olil serpent, calleil the Devil and Satin "'(Rev, sij. 9 ; xx, 2)aul we are tadd (Euceh. Vit. Const. Jii, c. 3) how Constantine had a picture paintei of the dragon -the tiying serpent-beneath his own and his children's feet pierced through the midille with a dart and cast futo the depths of the sea (Beina Const. orat, ad Sanct. Cuetrim, e. 20)

The spear-head on these coins ends in the monogran of Chist; on those struck at Thessnlonica, Aquileia, London, and other mints, it ends In a cross ( $$$ vi.).

§ xiv. Coins of Constintine I. and II. with cross, not previonsly alluded to.
There are certain coins of Constantine I., soma gold with legend alobta exercitvs (Cohen, Sled. Inp. No. 17, from Taniai), nome siiver with pax avovstonvm (Cohen, No. 76, from Musét de Vínure), nad of Constnatine II. ('aesar (buras) with beata thangillitab (Coien, No. 81, from Ducanye) having a cross either in the field, or on the standard, or on the heimet, but of what frrm it is inpossible to say. The first mentionel may hnve been struck between 326 ond $3: 33$; the second, as it does not bear the title of Maximus, jerhaps hefore 315, though this rule cannot be considered as absolute, as colns of Constantine $I$. were certainly struck nfter 315 without it ( $\delta$ jv.); and the third about 323 ( $\$ \mathrm{vi}$ ).
§xr. Remarks on the Forms of the Crosses adopted by Constantine 1.-There is not much doubt that Constantine did not invent the forms of the cross or monogram which appentw on hls coins. The monogram $\mathbb{R}^{2}$ may be seen on the coins of Alexander Bula, king of Syrin (n.c. 146), and on those of the Bactrinn king Hermeens (1u.c. 188-120), nnd also occurs on the coins of Trajan Decius (A.d. 249-251), forming part of the word $A>$ (kipxoveos) to which I have already referred (see Introduction), whilst the complete form of the labarum may be found on the colns of the Indo-Scythinn kling Azes (ni.c. 100), nod on those of the Bactrinn kings Hippostratus the Grent (n.c. 140-135) nud of Hermaeus (b.c. 138-120), which monogram has been interpreted Ortospina, nnother ame for Kabul (Ged. Cunninghom, Num. Chron. N. S. 1868, vol. viii. p. 203, pi. vii. Mon. No. 4bi, 太e. ; E. Thomas, Num. Chron, vol. iv. pl. viii. No. 3). The 8 mny have sometimes signified $\mathrm{XP}_{\boldsymbol{\nu \sigma} \boldsymbol{r} \pi \pi \delta \mathrm{s} \text {. }}$. It was used as an abbrevintion for $\mathrm{XP}_{\eta} \boldsymbol{\pi} \boldsymbol{\sigma} \delta \delta$, singe n collection of passages so marked might make up a $\chi \rho \eta \sigma \tau 0 \mu d \theta \in i a$. It elso stoad for XPuod́s and XPópos (Lididell and Scott, s.v. X), but it eventually becnme the Christian monogram composed of $x$ and $p$, the two first lettere of the name of XPigtús.

Suppl. vol, ix. p. 22, No. 122 ; Kochae, Mus. Kotschoubey, vol. ii. p. 309 ; Cohen, Mel. de la Repub. Rom. pl. xv. No. 30).

The form $P$ occurs on the coids of Tigranes, king $\sqrt{ }$, Armenia (b.c. 96-64); on coins of Arsaces X. XII. nad XIV. (n.c. 92-38) torming TIГPavoкepтas or Tijranocerta, the cipital of Armenia (Mionnet, vol. v. p. 108, No. 939 ; Cunningham, Nun. Chron. N. S. 1868, vol, viii. p. 196); on the coins of the Jewish king Herod I. (B.c. 38), and on the coins of Chios of the time of Augustus (Malden, Jew. Coinayc, 11. 83, 85, 87, 244). This form seems to have been that exelusively used in the Enst, nad Letronne states (La Croic ansee in Mén. de l'Acad. vol. xvi.) that he never found the $\mathcal{R}$ on any of the Christian monuments of Egypt. Its adoption was doubtless from lts athaity to the crux ansata. It is the only monogram in the Vatican Codec (4th rent.), in the Codex Rezae Cantab. (5th or 6th eent.), and in the Codex Sinaiticus (4th cent.), where it oceurs in tour places, at the end of Jeremiah, twice at the end of Isaiah, nad in the middle of the word ESTAVPWOH in the 8th ver. of chap. xi. of Revelation (Martigny, Dict. p. 416).

It was on the coins struck at Antioch (§ xi.) that Constantine first introduced the $\mathcal{P}$, about the year 335, though the same form occurs on the coins struck after his denth at lyons and (?) Arles (§ xiii.).
'fhe earliest example of the equilateral cross may be seen on the breast of or stspended from the neek of one of the kings on the slabs brought from Nineven (Bonomi, Nineveh and its Palaces, pp. 333, 414 ; (f. p. 303). At a later date its form was $f$ (De Witte, Mon. Ceram. vol. i. pl. xclii.), sometimes accompanied by globules : F , as on rases, both of which symbols may have had their origin in the sign 5 , which occurs on the coins of Gaza-frequently called the " monogram of Gazn "-n monuments and vases of Phoenician origin, on Gallo-Celtic coins, on Scandinavian monuments called "Thor's hammer," and on Indian coins called "the Swastika cross" (Rapp, Ilas labarum, etc., in vol. xxxix, of the Vereins v. Altert/umsfreundem im Rheinlande, 1865 ; Garrucci, Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 242).

The three princlpal forms of crosses in antiquity are (1) the cross $X$ called decussata. (2) the cross $T$ called commissa, and (3) the cross f called immissa. [Cross.]
The form X was doubtless an abbrevinted monogram of the name of Christ. Julian the

The eross $T$ is in the form of a Tan and appears to be a variety of the orux ansata, or "cross with a handle" found on Egyptian aud Assyrian monuments. It was sometimes used in the same manner as the $R$ in the middle of the name of the deceased, as may be seen on a marble of the 3rd century in the Callixtine cemetery with the legend IRET NE

The cross of has been generially supposed to be the kind on which our Lord was crucified, which seems further corroborited from the fact that the title of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin was placed abore his head (Matt. xxvii. 37) or oter him (Lake $x \times i i i, 38$; ef. Mark xv, 25) or over the cross (John xix. 19) and so would have a form like F

De Rossi has shown (De Christ. tit. Carth, in vol, iv. of Spicil. Solesmense, ed. I'itia, 1858) that no Christian monument of certain date before the 5th century gives examples of the cr"x inmissa, or of that which has been called the Greek + On the other hand an epitaph, which from its consular date is earlier than the reign of Constantine, proves that the Christians had a monogram composed of the letters I and $x$ ('Iñoûs, Xpiatós), thus formed K (De Rossi, Inscript. Christ. vol. i. p. 16, 1855).

The most ancient and most correet form of the monogram of Christ occurs upon a monoment of Sivaux in France, which is consldered by De Rossi (Bullet. Arch. Christ. p. 47, 1863) earlier than the time of Constantine, having the arms of the cross of great length scriptions, 1. p. 856, where it is engraved.]
This was not long afterwarda modified, and it is at the time of Constantine that the k occurs for the first time on the Roman dated tituli. There has been discovered (De Rossi, Bullet. p. 22, 1863) a monument of the year 323, which is preclsely the yoar of the difeat of Licmius, having on it the monogram $\mathbb{R}$. De Rossl has slso published (Inscr. Christ. vol, i. No. 26) a fragment with the inseription [Vi]xir . . . . 8 $\ldots$ GAL CONBS. which he thinks might perhaps be of the vear 298, when Faustur and Gallus were consule, adding that if he could only find the aussing portion and it bore the name of

It is, however, more than probable that the Gallus in this inscription was consul at a much lator date; indeed it has been saggeste: that this inscription refers to the emperor Constantius II. and Constantius Gallus caesar, who were consuls in 352,353 , and 354 (Edinhurgh Revievo, vol. cxx. 1864, p. 229). Other marbles of the years $331,339,341$, and 343 are known. In 347 the form 米 occurs, bat not for loag, for the $X$ is dropped, and thls form trgether with the old one continues in existence till the end of the 4th century. From the jth century the P disappears and the Latin cross for the Greek + take the place of the monograms, so that after 405 the $\mathbb{R}$ (at Rome at least) especially on epitaphs is entirely eclipsed, nad the plain cross is found on all monuments (Martigny, Dict. des Anti. Chrel. p. 416) excepting on colns.

The form of the cross on some of the coins of Constantine struck at Aquiloin is $\frac{1}{\Delta}$ This has been supposed by Cavedoai (Nuove Ricerche, p. 3) to be not the Latin but the Alexandrian or Egyptian, an opinion not acceded to by Garraci (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 259), and it may be noticed that Garrucel has published n coin with a square instead of a rounded top (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. pl. No. 11 ; Rev. Xum. 1866 , pl. iii. Na. 11; see § vii.). It is certainly very doubtfil it the cross on the coins of Aquileias is the crus ansata, and even Borghesi did not know what the rounded extremity could have in common with the handle of the Egyptian cross, for the cross called ansata has dot a round but an oroid top, into which the haad might be introdoced, as may be seen on existing monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, 1841, Suppl. pl. 20, 21, etc.).
As th the rounded top, Garrucci suggests (Num. Cost. 2nd ect. p. 261) that it may have been menat to allude to the sacred head of the Releemer, whlch was thus inteaded to be represented projecting above the cross, an idea mosidered by Cavedoni (Rivista, p. 216) a "whimsical fancy," as "everyone," he says, "knows that that most sncred head rested below, the beam of the cross itself." But Caveloni is decidedly wrong, as the follewing earliest uamples of the crucifix show the head above the cross beam; (1) crucifixes on a cornelinn (Garrucel, Diss, ivory of the 5 th century Garrueci, Diss. Arch. p. 27); (2) crucifix of the Syrian codex Hlorence, dated 586 by Laurentian library at Rabula (Assemnni, Bibl. Laurent the monk pl, nilii. Florence, 1742); (3) the pastoral cross and reliquary of Theodolinda, Queen of Lombardy, who died In 628 (Martigny, Dict. des 1285 §xvi. Coins of Constantine I. vith the diadem-?315-337.

Without entering into the history of the introduction of tha diadem at Rome, by the emperors, it is certain that Constantine I. was the first to unhesitntingly adopt it, as testified by his coins, and indeed he is said to have alwaya worn it. ("Habitum regium gemmis et caput Epit. 141.) perpetuo diademato." Aurel. Vict.
It has bee
vol. viii. p. $8(1)$ that (Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. diadem, p. 8(1) that Constantine adopted the diadem, wishing to liken himself to Alexander the Great, on whose coins an effigy ot a very similar character may be seen, but according to the authority of St. Ambrose (de Obitu Theod. 47, 48) the empress Helena, at the time when she is supposed to have discovered at Jerusalem, about 326, the fragment of our Saviour's cross, together with two of the nails (one of which wor hised for the bridle of his horse, the other for his diadem), sent to her son Constantine a diadem studded with gems, which has oven idencath with the iroo crown of Lombardy at Monza cathedral [Crown]; moreover the senate is said (Anonym. Paneg. viii. 25; Tillement, Const. note 33 )-probably it 315 when he was decreed the title of Maximus (see § i. under 315)-to have specially granted a diadem to Constantine.
The coin engraved (Fig. 23; British Museuni) shows Constantine with the diadem, and with his head represented looking upward toward henven, and Euseblus states (1'it. Const. iv. c. 15) that "he directed his likeness to be stamped on the gold colns of the empire with the eyes uplifted as if praying to God," adding that "this money became current thronghout the whole Roman world." It was doubtless to this coinage that his apostate nephew Julisa sneeringly ulludes in his "Caesars" when he speaks of Constantine being enamoured of the moon, upon Whom he kept his eyes constantly fixed, and from the style of his hsir and face leading the life of a female hairdresser. Constantine also had bis full-length portrait placed over the eatrance gates of hls palaces with the eyes upralsed to henven and the hands outspread as if in prayer (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. c. 15), ${ }^{1}$ though this form of adoration likewise obtained among the pagnans (Virg. Aen. i. 93; Demosth. adv. Macart. 1072).
The diadem also may be found on the coins of all Constantine's sons Caesars, and Eusebius says (Vit. Const. i. c. 18) that it was a special distinction of the Imperial Caesars.

of the divinity and cternity of the Incarninte Werd, in opposition to the Arian heresy favoured by his brother Constantius, and it may hare been struck soon after the council of Sardica in 347 . Though the letters A and $\omega$ were probably omployed perhaps cven as early as the council of Nice in 325 (art. As to the form $\omega$ instend of $\Omega$, Garrucci asserts (Hajioglypta, p. 168) that the $\Omega$ nowhere occurs on any authentic Christinn monument, and com-

Under Valentinian I. the most notable reintroduction is that of the form $P$ which is generally carried at the top of the aceptre held by the emperor (Cohen, Mfel. Imp. § xxii. Division of the Empire (395). A. The West to end of Western empire (476). B. The East to the time of Leontius (488).
A. The llest.-After the death of Theodosius I. the empire was divided between his two sons Arcadius and Honorius, ${ }^{\text {m }}$ the former taking the Eastern, the latter the Western provinces. About this time the type of Victory, holding a globe surmounted by a cross, is introduced (Arcadius, Sabatier, Mon. Byz. vol. i. p. 404 ; Honurius, Cohen, Meil. Imp. No. 24), and the Grock cross may be seen on the exayia solidi of Arcadius, Honorius, and Theodosius II. (Ccken, No. 6, Sabatier, pl. iii. No. 9). On a gold coin of Honorius struck at Ravenna, in the collection of Dr. John Evans, the emperor is represented holding a spear, surmounted by $P$, on the head of an animal which appears like a lion with a serpent's or dragon's tail.

On certain coins of Aelia Galla Placidia, wife of Constantius III., the colleague of Honorius for a few months, the $\mathbb{R}$ or a cross, is represented on her right shouider, whilst the $R$ is within a wreath on the reverse (Cohen, Nos. 1 -16 ), and the hand from heaven crowning the empress i: introiluced (Cohen, Nos. 2, 10, 11), as had also been the cas: on the coins of Eudoxia in the East.

The usurper Prisc:: Attalus seems to have dropped Christian emblems, and Rome having been sacket by Alarin who placed him on the throne, he darec to strike silver medallions twice the size of a tive-shilling piece, and gold and silver coins with the presumptuous legend invicta homa aeterna (Cohen, Nos. 1, 3-5). The usual emblems occur on the coins of John, proclaimed emperor in 423.

Valentinian III. appears to have been the first emperor who wore a crose on his diadern, if the gold caedallion is genuine (Cohen, No. 1, from Randuri), and on other coins (Cohen, No. 11), holding a cross and a globe on which Victory, he changes the ordinary captive trampled under foot to a hun in-headed serpent, a custom followed by many of his successors. The type of the emperor holding the mappa or volumen nnd a long cross was also introduced (Cohen, No. 21). His wife Licinia Eudoxin also bore the cross on her diadem on her coins struck In Italy (Fig. 29; Cohen, No. 1). A very rare gold coin of this emprens (De Salis, Num. Chron. N. S. 1867, vol. vii. ph, viii. No. 1) has the $\mathbb{R}$ surrounded by $n$ circle and the legend salys orientis felicitas occidentis. It was struck on the occasion of her marriage in 437, and she was so called because Theodosius II, had no son, and the Eastern empire secmed likely, as well as the Westorn, to become the inlieritance of his eldest daughter's issue (De Silis, op. cit. p. 206). Some coins of his sister Justa Grata Honoria bear the legend bono reipvblicaf: (Cohen, No. 1).

The usual types occur on the coins of Petronius Maximus, Avitus, Majorian, Anthemius, and his wife Eufemia, but on one coin of this emperor representing Anthemins and Leo, there is between them a tablet (surmounted by a cross) on which is inscribed the word pax (Cohen, No. 9). k On the accession of Olybrius he dared to introduce the legenil salvs myndi, engraring on his coin a large cross, though he only enjoyed a reign of about three months and thirteen days. The coins of Glycerius, Julius Nepos mend Romulus Augustus (Hig. 30), the last emperor of the Western empire, offer the usuai symbols.
13. The East.-Under Arcollius, ns already pointed out, the type of Victory holding a glove surmounted by a cross was introduced. Coins with the legend nova sprs reipvilical and the type of Victory resting on a shield were struck (Sabatier, Mon. By:. No. 17), matchiag the coins of his wife Eudoxia, with the legend salvs Ripvblicale, (sic) and the type of Victory inscribing of $n$ shicld the $\mathbb{R}$ (Fig. 3I; Sabatier, No. 3), a type that was already in vogue at the time of her mother-iu-law Flaccilla. The question of the attribution of the coins benring the names of Ludocia and Euduxia was for a long time involved in great obscurity till set at rest by the Inte Mr. de Salis (Num. Chron. N. S. 1867, vol. vii. p. 203) ; and many coins bearing the name of Euloxia with the $\mathbb{R}$, giren by Sabatier to the wife of Theodosius II., are now attributed to the wife of Arcadius.

Theodosius 1I. issued coins with the legend gloria orvis (sic) terraf. representing himself holding the labarum and a globe cruciper, aud all the coins with the aame evdocia belong to the wife of this emperor (Fig. 32).

In $45 I$ Mnrcian was proclaimed emperor owing to the influcnce of Pulcherin, the sister of 'lheodosius II., whom he married, nud who was nt this time about filty years of age. A gold coin was struck by Marcian to commemorate this event, bearing the legend feliciter numins (see Madden, Num. Chron. N.S. 1878, vol. xviii. p. 47, and "Addenda," p. 199) representing Marcian and Pulcheria, both with the nimbus, standing joining hands; in the middle, Christ, with the nimious eruciyor, standing and placing his hands on their shoulders (Fig. 33). NIKATE on those of Miehat Vll. and Maria (Sab. pl. li. No. 11).

The late Dr. Finlay has suggested (Greece under the fiomans, p, 54t) that the copprer colus of rude fabric with the EN TOTO NIKA legend were probably coined by Heraclius for the use of the troops and previncials during his Persian campaigas, to which theory, with the exception of the words "rule thbite," as these coins are no ruler than the rest of the copper eurrency, the Hoa. J. L. Warren assented, abling "that sweh a type would be peculiarly appropriate in a war agalust the erescent und the iodidels, thas reatopting the labarem metto, translated. however, and thereby shewing how essentially Greek the empire hat beeome " (Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, rol. i. p, 229). The same tope was eopied by Constans ( $641-668$ ), and an interesting account of some coins of this emperor and his sous, discovered in the ishand of Cyprus, has been writtea by Mr. Warren (op. cit. p. 42). Iharing the short reign of Theodosius III. (716) nome small silver coins were struck (Sith. pl. xxxix. No, 3) bearing the legen! AMENITAS DEI (the loving-kinduess, i.e. the grace of God) within a wreath of myrtle.

Daring the reign ot Constantine V. Copronymus, and his son Leo IV. (751-7i5), tho hand "descending from hearen" ocem's on the gold coinage (Sib. pl. xl. No. 2\%), and the form in which the hand is held! is supposed to expless the saterell letters $1 \mathrm{C}-\mathrm{XC}$ (Dici. of Chmist. Antig. I. 1, 199). The hand also oceuris on the coins of John I. Zimisces, Michael IV., Michne! V1., Alexias I. Comacaus, Joha Il. Comnenas, Manuel I. Comnenus, Isanc II. Angelus, John VIII. Palacologus, and on those of the emperors ot Trebizond. The legend InS4S XPISZUS NICA, with the type of a large cross on three steps, lirst appears on his silver coins (Sab. pl. xl. No. 25). though en a copper coit. with the ethgies ot Leo Ill. (Iend), Constantine V., and Leo IV. (Sab. pl. xi. No. 17), the letter's x N for $x$ ristus Nica may be tound. Sometimes the $\mathrm{x}-\mathrm{N}$
letters are $t$ liplicated, $x-N$ as on coins of Irene $\mathrm{x}-\mathrm{N}$
(Sab, pl, ali. no. 13). This legend was continued on the silver coins of Leo IV. (775-78i), and of Constantipe VI. and Irene ( $780-797$ ), but Nieephorus 1. Logothetes struck it on a gold coin (Sab. pl. sli. No. 14), and it is generally found on the silver till the reign of John 1 . Zimisces (969-976), on whose coins the face of the emperor is represented within a circle surroundei by the letters $\begin{aligned} & \text { I } \\ & \boldsymbol{A} \\ & \mathrm{h} \\ & \text { (Sab. [l. xlvii. }\end{aligned}$ No. 19). On some of his brass coins (Snb. pl. xlviii. No, 6), as also on those of Alexius 1 . Comaenus (Sab. pl. Jii. Nos. 18, 19), and Androaicus IV. Palaeologus (Sab. pl. Ixiii. ne. 1), the legend is $\left.\frac{1 \mathrm{c}}{\mathrm{S}}\right|_{\mathrm{KA}} ^{\mathrm{N}} \mathrm{e}$. Alexius $I$. was the first emperor who was really Greek, and Latin legends are after his time no longer to ba found on the liyzantine coinage. It was on the coins of Michael I. Rhangabe ( $811-813$ ), with the legend IhS4S XPISE4S NICA (Sab. pl. xlii. No. 3), that the worts GASILIS ROMAIOh were first introduced, "a sad acknowledgment of a rival Romanorum Imperator" (Sat. Review, June 1, 1861); aul Theophilas (829-842) on some coins of the sime legend and type (Sab. yl. xliii. No. I(1), calls himself $\Theta \in O F I L O S ~ 34 L O S ~ X P I S z 4 S$ PISTOS EH AVEO BASILEY ROMAIOh, whilst on some of the same type he iuseribes CVRIE bOHOK TO. SO JOVLO ${ }^{\prime} \in$

A. Curise,-Daring the reign of Justinian II. (i85-695), who had been deposed on aceount of his eruelties in 695 and banished to the Chersodese by Leoztius with his uose cut off', and hence his aame of $R$ hinotmetus (Pivótuntos), but who was restored to the throne togetlier with his son Tiherius in 705 , many innovatious were introduced, the most notable of which is the bust of Christ holiling the gospels and giviug the benedietion, with the legenil $d N$. InS. ChS. REX REGMAnTIUm, and on the reverse the emperor holding a long eross with the title of SGR4. ChRISZI adopted by himself. On some of the coias the emperor holds a globe (on which is the word pax), surmounted by a cross (Fig. 37; Sab. y. $x \times x y t i$. No. 2). The former legend is generally found on the gold coins, bot it sometimes oceurs on the siiver and copper, and it is nWays aceompanied by the type of Christ represented in the four following ways:-
(1) Bust of Christ facing on a cross on the coins (Fig. 37) of Justinian II. Rhinotmet as (685-695) and on his coins, with his son Tiberius IV. atter his restoration (705-711). From the reign of Lee III. the Isaurlim ( $716-741$ ), the first of the Ieonoelasts, to that of Irene ( $797-802$ ), all images of Christ, the Virgin, and Saints were abolished, though the legend IhS48 XPISE4C NIKA withont any image, as I have above shewn, was introduced during the reign of Constantine V. and his son Leo (751775). The bust of Christ facing on a eross was again produced (Sab. pl. xlii. No. 1) on the coins of Michael I. Rhangabe (811-8i3), and atter another intervil of about 30 vears, oa those of (Sab. pl. xliv. The walls are those of Censtantinople, and the type commemorntes the restoration of the Greek emperers at Constantinople after it had been under the sway of the Latins for nearly fiftyeight yenrs. Pachymer of Nicaen, whe flourished during the reign of Michnel VIII., recerds that "Michat, nfter the taking of Constantinople, changed the type of the old coins, engraving Instend a representatlen of the city," but at the same time he debased the standard of the mint, and issue 1 coins containing only 15 parts of gold and 9 of nlloy (Pachymer, ii. 343 ; Finlay, Hist. of Byz. and Grech Empires, vol. ii. p. 436). C. Saints.-The figure of a saint (generally standing) was first intreduced by Michael Vi. (1056-1057). The following are the saints and angels represented-St. Alexander, on a gold cein of Alexader (912-913; Sab. pl. xlvi. No. 3); St. Michael, on coins of Michael VI. (Sab. pl. xlix. The winjed head or body of a seraph oceurs on the brass ceins of Andrenicus I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. Ivil. Nos. 9, 10), of Andronicus 11 . and Michnel IX. (Sab. pl. 1x. No. 19; 1xi. Xo. 11), and John III. Ducas emperer of Nicaen (Sab. pl. lxiv. No. 15) very sinilar in form to the sermphim engraved in the article Angels and arcilangels (§ 14).

On some ceins of Remanus I. and Il., Constantine X., Nicephorus Focas, John Zimisces, Basil II., Manuel I. Comnenus, and Alexius III., the initial letters of the names of these emperors are so placed as in form n cross (Sab. pl. i. Nos. $54-60,63,68,69$ ), in seme cases, as on the coins of Remanus I. and 11.. taking the furm of an anchor, whilst on those of Remanus IV., Alexius I. Comnenus, nad Bandeuin (Nos. 6.5, 67,71 ), the initinls are figured around a Mallise criss.

There are yet one or two curious pieces to which 1 must allude. During the reigu of Jehn I. Zimisces (969-9i6) some brass coins or tokeas were issued (1) haring on the obverse the bust of Christ with nimbus and the letters $I C-X C$, and on the reverse the legends OWIAN - EIZEITOV - CMENHTAC OTPEФWN, and (2) on the ebverse $\triangle A$ $N \in I Z \in I-O \in \mathcal{W}$, and on the reverse $O \in \Lambda \in-$ $\omega N \Pi T \omega-X O N$, which may be interpreted These pieces have been published by Dr. Friedlaender (Num. Zcitschrift, vol. ii. Vienna, 187v); the first is in the collection of Prince Phllp of Saxe-Coburg, the second in the museum of Basle. Dr. Ficidlanader remarks that "it is curlous that the coins of smallest value are always those which remind the possessor to give Another specimen of very similar reverse type, bnt having on the obverae the bust of Christ facing with niuhosas and the legend Emanvulit (sid) was formerly in the Pemhroke Collection, and passing into the cabinet of the late Mr. Wigan, is now in the collectlon of the Rer. S. S. Leewis, who hns published and engrared it in the new illustrated edition of Dr. Farrur's Life of Christ (p. 21, ed. Cassell; Petter, and Gappin). Mr Lewis kindly sent me the piece to aee, and I must confess that I am not altogether favourably impressed with ite nppearance. I may observe that Mr. Burgon the anthor of the Peinbroke Sale Catulogue (p. 324) clnssed It among "early fabrications in copper bearing imaginary types," and stated that "the composition can hardly be regarded as genuine, but as the metnl and surface are antique, it must (if (alse) have been produced by menns of a punch and an engraving tool, principally by the former. The workers in Ni.llo in Italy in the 15th century used their tools in a manner which is almost inconceirable." If, however, there is no British Mouseum, we authenticity of the piece in the British Mnseum, we can hardly reject this one as spurious only on account of ite composition.

The two blrds (loves?) In the ere ) of the reverse, Mr. Lewis (op, cit.) suggess may "delientely symbelise the puritication." [See Madals, hielow.]
It miny be, as Martlgny has suggested (I ict. des Antiq. Chret. p. 38:3), that medals or medalliens of thi, deseription were frequently struck for suspending round the neek, ns was done with some of the verres dores with the same subject (Garrucei, Vetri, ir. No. 9).
The representation of the adoration of the lingi on buth these pieces, especially on the Intter, is somewhat similar to that on a fresco of the cemetery of Callistus engraved by Martigny (op, cit. l.c.). or to that on a fresen in the eemetery of St. Marcellinus, eugraved by the Rev. W. H. Withrow (Catucombs of Rome, p.
306.1877 . 306. 1877.) (Соmpare p. 1299.)

In conclusion I must reeord my thanks to Mr. H. A. Grueber, assistmant in the Department of Coins and Medals, British Museum, for the treuble that he has had $\ln$ superintending the casting of most of the colas here engraved, and for the readiness with which he has answered my numerous queries.

Europe, we find that, from the relgn of Honorius downwards, the gradual loss of territory to the fioman empire is marlial by the introduction of new coinages lasued by the barbarian invaders to place of that which proceeded from the inperial mints. In most eases, however, these new tssues iegia as mere initations of the W'estern or Eastern impertal colns, and it is not till long subsequent to their nequisition of a country that the barbarion nations institute distinctly reengnisable series of coins. The tiact is, that the imperial coinage bad been so long the coinage of the Roman worli that it was only gradually that the Teutonie iavaders concelved the possibility of substituting a separate coinage of their own. The leagth of time which often elapsed between the settling of these invaders in Roman territory and their first lasue of a coinage on which the name of the emperer is replaced by that of a barbarian king, is exemplitied in the cave of the Visigoths, who under Astaulf in 410 established a kinglom in Aquitania, but who did not begin a national colnare until the reign of Leovigild (573), the first king of all spaia. Inteed l'rocopius complains of the andacity of the Frankish king (Theodebert), who for the first time ventured to strike goll coins "bearing his own portrait, not that of the emperor as was [heretofore] the [universal] custom;" and adils with slight exnggeration: "the king of the Persians, Indeed, used to strike silver money of his own; but it was not lawful either for him or fur any other barbarian king to maie his gold coins with a portrait of the ruler." (bell. Goth. iii. 33.) This was about the year 544.

It is obvious that this long period of imitation must have had a great ellect upon the symbols of all kinds which appear upon coinages of the West, and aecordingly we find that the Christian symbols upon these coins are generally taken directly from the money of Constantinople. We may divide the barbarian coinages of Western Europe from the accession of Honorius to that of Charlemagne Into six distinct classes, atruck respectively by:
(1) The Vandals in Africa from Huneric to the defeat of Gelimir at Trikameron, that is from 477 to 533.
(2) The Visigoths in Spain from leovigild to the defeat of Fivderic at the battle of Guadelata, from 573 to 711.
(3) The Ostrogoths in Italy from Theodoric, 493 to the battle of Mons Lnctanus, 553. These were followed by:
(4) The Lombards, who Inelude not only the Lombard kings at Pavia, but likewise the dukes of Benevento and Spoleto, who struck coins. The coinage of Pavia and Lucca lasted from the time of Aripert, 653, down to the conquest of the kingdom of Italy by Charles in 774 ; the coinage of Benevento continued till the denth of Radechis in 955.
(5) The Merovinglans, who began to strike coins about 544, under Theodebert, king of Austrasia, and continued their issue until a new coinage was introduced by the Karling dynasty.
(6) The English, who may have brought a coinage with them into this country, but who cannot with certainty be credited with a national lissue until the time of Penda, a king of Mercia, abont 655.

MONEY

On the first and third of these six classes, the colns of the Vandals and the Ostrogoths, Chris. tian rymbols are curlously conspicuous by their absence. On the Vandal money none appears save upon some copper coins of doubtful attriintion; on the money of the Ostrugoths the unly exception is found in the large eross which aipears upon the embroidered robe on the hist of Theoduhat as displayed pon his copper eotns. and in the crosses upon some namelesta copler eving struck at lome during the time of Oatrogot hic rule, but not necessarily by the authority of the baroarians themselves.

Yet if we were inclined to attribute this want of Christlan symbols to the Arian proclivities of the Vandals and the Ostrogoths, we should find that our conclasions were defeated by the noney of leovigild, the lant Arian king of Spain. Jo seems to have alopted three types for his money, whtch, with little change, run through tho whole serjes of the eoinage of this dynasty, The tirst presents on the obverse the rude representation of a head or bust; on the teverse a cross hrussed, or raised upon thrue steps, a type which was first introduced by Tiberius ll. (574-582), and was probably adopted by Leorigild about the period of the second date. The engraved coin, which is one of Chintila, struck at Nrrbonne, will give an adequate idea of this type, for it is the jeculiarity of this series that the style and fabric of its coins varics scarcely at all during the whole period of nearly a century and a half during which they continued to be struck, The obverse reads + cinviria REX ; the reverse, Narbona riv[s] : the name of city of minting, Narbonne (Fig. 43).

This type of the cross haussee is tho only one which cain be distinctly recognised as Christian. But it is curfous that the cross is not adonted upon the coins of leovigild's catholie son Sar Hermengild. He adopts Leovigild's second type, which is also an imitative one, copied from the lictoria Augusta coins of Rome and Constantinople. The reverse represents a winged figure (Victory) walking to the right, and holding in her right hand a wreath. Around the usual Roman legend vicroria avg is replaced by the name of the king, or an attempt at the legend inclytus hex. (See Ileiss, Mon. des Rois Wisigoths d'Espayne, 11. 1. Nos, 1-3, and pl. ii. Nos. 1-3.) Now, though this coin is uadonbtedly, as far as the origin of its typo goes, of a pagan character, it is equally certain that it is impossible in the history of Christina iconography to separate accurntely the Angel from the Vietory or Nike of the Romans and Greeks; and there can be little doubt that the figure upon the Visigothic coins would have passed in these days and in popular estimation for an angel. The third characteristic type of the Visigothic coinage represents simply a rude bust on either side, and is devoid of any attempt at symbolism. In addition to the Christian types, we have on one coin of Leovigild the letters A $\omega$, and on one of St. Hermengild the legend Regi a Deo Vita, an almost uaique instance of pious instruction upon a Visigothie coin.
The Lombards may lay ciaim to more orfginality than the Visigoths, in that, upou their pieces, a most undoubted angel is portrayed, with a legend shewing that he is inteaded to represent the Archangel Michael. The engravin;

Michael at l'avia was the scene of the corronation of the Lombaril kings, and some have consideredthough without satisficictory reasony-that the now standing chureh of Sin Michele dates fron. their time. Following the obserrable tendency of midde-agg Cathelicism to prefer the cult of saints to that of angels, the majority of these churches and elties prebably becane in later days ro-dediented to seme mure human and more popular bbject of reverence.
The later lombardle ceins abanden the type ef St. Michnel and aldept for their reverses either a flower pat tern, or else the cross petent, having one limb longer than the other three. Thase of the dukes of Bencento, who form a lesser branch of the Lombarda in Italy, initate mere closely the centemporary celnage of Constantianole, generally displaying on the obverse the bust of the dnke facing, anil on the reverse the leng cross potent and hutuseéo ujon three steps, known under thily furm ns the liyznntine cross. (Stee Fig. 53.) The ceins likewise bear not iafrequently the legend sAN MICLIALA, although only in ene instance do they display the image ef the archangel. of the arehangel.
We now turn to the colnage of the Franks, which, as has been sald, begins with Theadebert, the seennd king of Austrasia, the sen ef Thierry, ond grandsen of C, wis. Dating from an enrlier period than the last two series, the imitative character of the Frankith money is much more spparent than that of the Visigethic or Lombardic coinages. All the types of Theodebert are borrowed drectly frora Constantinople with ne change but the subssitutien of the Merovinglin's name upon the obverse. The mest common, as also the most Christian, typre is that given in the engraving (Fig. 45), nnd is teken trom the eontemporary ceinage of Justinian., It afurls a goed example of $n$ Victory which has just passed through the transitienal stage and beceme an angel, while the legend on the reverse victoria avgeas still remains to betray its origin. The attitude of the figure apon these coinas, or on these of Justinian, may be comprared with that of an angel with that of an angel which is carred in ivery open A beautiful eensular diptych' of this epoch, Dew in the British Museum.
As time went on a change takes p'ace in the Sierevingian meneg, which is not paralleled in that of any other country of Eurepe. Net inmperial type, buat more and mere from the imperial type, but a ceinage bearing the nnme of no king, only that of the meneyer who strock it, and of the town where it was minted, is introduced alongside the regal issue. It seems probable that the Frankish kings never asserted the right of excluslve coinage ; but, on the contmry, that it was within the faculty of almost any liecal goldunith to strike these colns for protcular or locel purposes. Thero is no reasen to believe, as has been thought by somme, that this non-regal monay was sssued by the ant hority of a religlous see or order. Mow of the later Meroulngian enlns, whet her royal or not, are of the kind known ns trientes or trenisses, uncthird, that is, of the solidus aureus. Their type generally dypllays a hoal apon the obverse, nul on the reverse a cross of sume sort. Two coins ef the royal issue with rather peculiar syminols are engrived beneath, Figs, 46 nad 4 i. A great variet y ls ebservable in the symbols disphayed upen the Merovingian eeins, theugh they are nearily always of a religions character. The inost common dievice is a short square evenlimbed cross, which rests sometimes upoo a step or ball. The Christian menogram apprears, but is net common. The two unusual and interestiag tyies given here (Figs. 48 and 49) represent a Calvary, on either side of which a man is standing, and a menstranee raised upen three steps. They are taken rexpectively from a

Of the ecinages whereof we have been speaking, the Vandalie and Ostrogothlc belong to the period which preceded the intraduction of the genuine barbaric gold celnage into Europe, nud are-with the exception of a few coins which display the monegram of Theodorio - ceinnges in silver and eopper oaly. The meney of the Vlsigoths, the Lambards, end the Franks, which are more distinctly nationnl and barbarian issues, are almost as exclusively coinages in gold ; for when the invaders obtained full pessession of a Roman province they seem nearly to have discarded the uss of silver coins. In our own ceuntry, on the other hand, and probably also in the region of the Lewer Rhine, a silver ceinage was almost the ooly eurrency, and if some of the gold tremisses-or, as they were called here, thryms-found their way neross the Channel, their appenrance mast be regarided ns quite exceptional. This fact forms a marked eontrist between the coinage of England and that of the greater part of continental Eurape. The silver coins which were in use in England before the rise of the Karling dynasty were the scaattas, small and thlck pieces, weighing some nincteen or twonty grains: in the north however, that $\mathrm{J}_{\mathrm{k}}$, in the countries of Beruicia and Deira, n copier cosin, the stycu, anpuisied the place of the acentt. Some few of tha serattan bear the namea of known soverelgne, and in that case their date is of course determinable. The earlleat piece of this description hears in runic letters the name of f'neda, a son of Penia, king of Mercia, who reigned alont 6.35. The greater part of these early coins however are without intelligible legend. 'They bear a few letters of the lioman charncter, which seem to have been nothing but rude and ignorant copies of the legend upan some imperial coin. Their types are so numerous thit a detailed devcription of them Is imjossible; but the renler may connult the plates in Rading's Annals of the Coinaye, and in Hawkins's English Silver C'ins, 2nd ell. A great majority of these sceattas have one or more crosses upon the field, nod this thet has led aumismatists to infer that those pleces upon which no such symbol occurs were struck before the conversion of the English to Christianity. M. Dirks (Rerue de la Num. Belife, Sth series, vol. ij.), who has devoted specinl attention to this class of coins, has gone further than this, and signalisel some types as benring a distinctly heathen character, the head of Wodin, the Fenriswulf, the sen monster Jormundgandr, \&c. On this point it is difficult to pronounce with certainty. It is extremely probnble that most of the sceattas were copies, mere or less remote, of Roman coins; Mr. Hawkins in his Cuerdale F'ind has given an instance of an undoubted copy separated by a distance of nearly five hundred years from its original; therefore neither the presence nor absence of Christian symbols upon these nameless pieces can be tnken as conclusive evidence of the time at which they were first lssued.

The earllest known coin among the stycas merits particular notice. It was struck by Ecgirith, king of Northumbria ( $670-685$ ), and bears upon the reverse a radiate cross, with the legend +Lvx or, as we may perhaps read it, LVX $\times$ (Lut Christus, Christ is [my] light). (See Silver Coins of England, 2nd ed. No. 99, and Rulling, Anuals, vol. iii. [1, 28 ap.) This king, who is called "rex religiosus" by the blographer of St. Wilfred, appears to have been in his eariier days a great friead of religion and of the archbishop of York. Thn types of the subsequent Northumbrian stycas is a small cross on one or both sides enclosed by the legend, without further oraamentation or symbolism.

Towards the end of the 8th century, and after the rise of the Karling dyansty upon the continent, pennies superseded the sceattas in the central and southern districts of Eiegland, while stycas and some sceattas continued to be coined in the north. The penay usually displays a cross upon the reverse, nud this cross is treated in curious ornameatal devices; but the coin is without any other religious symbolism. Types of the early English penay may be found in the works of Hawkins sad Ruding.

Beside the royal money, coins were struck by the archbishops of York and Caterbury, by the former stycas, by the iatter peunics. The earliest of these episcopal coins seems to have been struck by Eugberht, archbishop of York, from 730 t.o 766 , conjointly with his brother Eadberht, king of Northumbria. One side reads ecobirati[ar ?]. Figure standing between two tong processtonal crosses. The tigure arems to wear a sort of threocornered hat, whilch may very probably be intended for a mitre. The other slde reads vortizuaria, and represents a figure atrading (Hawklns (luy), jo, 67, andi itul. ing, 11,3 ; the engruving in the intter, however, is very inuity).

The ether archtishope of York of whom we hare coins are, Enubaid, 740 to 796; Vigmund, 831 to 854 ; and Ulichere, 854 to 895 . Thes: colos, which are atycan, follow in type those of the contemporary Northumbrian kinga, as described just now.

The archbishops of Canterbury, whose punuias resemble in type those of the klags of Kent, nad subsequentiy those of the kings of England, aro Jacaberht, 763 to 790 ; Eithilhenrd, 790 to 803 ; Wulfheard, 803 to $8: 30$; (Colnoth, $8: 30$ to 870 ; Ethered, 871 to 890 ; Plegmund, 891 to 923.

We have anidi that when the Kirling dynasty cnme into power it introduced a new coinage of silver to appersede the old Merovingian gold money; and the latter began from that time rapidly to disappear. Pepin the Short struck denaril or peanies of a new pattern and tabric, benring no resemblance either to the current gold coinnge or to the older denarii of liome. In 781, we fiad a decree of Charles the Great ordering that the new denarii shall be current throughoult the Frankiah kingdom; and from this time it would appenr that the coining of gold almost ceases in westera Europe. The types of this money of Pepin and Charles noe as rude as they nre original. All nttempt at a face er bust is for the most part nbenioned: sometimes nothing but na inscription is given on either side, but generally the anme of the king is displayed iu a monogram disposed rousd the four limbs of a cross, somewhat like the monogrmm of the word Roms is the figure 51. Generally, too, a crose occupies the centre of the reverse, $\mathfrak{a}$ cross of a some. what vew shspe. It is the cross pattée which from this thine becomes nlmost universal ujon Europena coins, a small even-limbed crow siightly broadening towards its extromities. "We must observe the position of the cross. It hae its limbs of equai leagth, and they are siightly pate nt the eads; the cross is alatisee and detached, its limbs not touching the circlo which surrounds the field and separates tha legend. A cross of this description only appears quite accidentaliy upon the Roman mosey of the preceding centuries it appears occasionsily on the Meroringian coias ; it became nommon, sed at length indispensable on those of the Cnrlovingians, nad no other sort was used " (i.eicwel, Num. du Moyen Ayje, tom. 1. p. 87 : see Kig. 13) After his conquest of Itnly, and for the use of that country, Charles seems to have struck coins beuring his bust, represented like that ef the Roman emperors. He aiso introduced a very important type, which became common upon the coins of many succeeding emperors. It represents, probsbly, the front of the basilicu of St. Peter with the legead xristiana religio (Fig. 50). ## medals.

Medals, ns the word is commonty used by English writers," designate objerts in metal which resemble coins in general ajpearance, but which were not made to pass as money. More usually they bear devices on both sides, but occensinnally on one side only (plaques). Medais may conmemorate events or persons, or may be used for purposes of devetion, or as charma, or be eniployed for ornamental purposes, being inhaid in Christian ecelesiastieal furniture of rariona $k=$ is. But as they are commenly el under Numiso matics, this article would it under Xumisout some notice of the tew Christian medals which have come down to us from the periods embraced in this work. The following are the principal subjects represented:-
(1) Clirist as the Cioul Shepherd. A bronze medallion (+1) inches in diameter) of rough Wurk (di rezza maniera) has this most and
cient Cient subject of Christisn art on both gides. in the obverse the Shepherd (without nimbus) buskined to the left, dressed in a tunic, with buskiss on his legs, the feet bare, his right hand phaced on his head, his left hand resting on astafi upon the ground; his right heel leans on his left instep. On eithiner side is a tree, considered by Buonarotti to be a $\mid$ lalm. by I'erret (with perhaps better reason) to be an olive ; in the middle a sheep (of small size). The Shepherd is here sad, going in search of the lost sheep, intended to be represented in the distance. The reverse has two trees nearly as before, but the Shepherd (turned to the left as before) now holds no staff, but the sheep (of much larger aize) across his shoulders, holding two of its legr by either hand. This medal has been gith lego Found in the Cratacombe of Rome gilt. and figured by Buonarotti, Osservazioni alcuni frammenti di vasi antichi di vert sopra

There are other bronze medals exhibiting Christ as the Good Shepherd. One, now in the Vatican Museum, having a design on one sido ouly, gives him (without nimbus) standing to the right beneath a tree (mistico olivo, I) Rossi) ; a dog near his fect looking up: in the landscape at different heights are seen seven sheep, standing, lying down, feeding or playing; another tree halfway up the landscape on the other side. Diameter $1 \frac{1}{2}$ inches, with a ring for suspension. Considered by De Rossi to he not later than the 3rd century (Bullett. Arch. Crist. 1869, p. 42, tav. a. 1). He quotes (p. 39) Marini's MS. deseription of another moat interesting medal of this class, formerly in the collection of Curdinal Stefano Borgis, but which he has in vain endeavoured to trace. ## SECVNDINE Yiv

A variety of scenes from the Old and New Testament is combined in the following thin bronze plaque, which Buonarotti suspects was intended for a processional cross; it would he suitable enough for insertion into a paatoral staff; but was probably made for neither the one nor the other in the first instance; a casket is at least es likely to have had it thereon. Christ, as the Good Shepherd, in the centre bearing a sheep, two other sheep are at his feet. About him, in four compartments, are the following nine subjects taken from the Old Testament, having (or supposed to have) some connexion with the Saviour (see Buonarotti, u. a. pp. 1-3).
In the first one: (a) Adam and Eve; (b) Noah in the Ark, welcoming the dove; (c) Jonah resting under a gourd.

In the aecond: (d) The Sacrifice of Abraham; (e) Daniel in the Lions' Den.

In the third: ( $f$ ) Moses atriking the Rock; (g) Samson bearing the gates of Gaza.

In the fourth: ( $h$ ) Jonah swallowed up by the whale; (i) Jonah vomited up by the whale.

Diameter, 17 inch. Found in the cemetery of St. Pontianus; tirst published by Ciampini, De duohus Emblem., p. 4, Rom. 1691, then by Buonarotti (u.s. tav. 1), from which an enlarged copy is given io Perret, Catucombes, vol. vi. p. 120 and vol. iv. pl. xx. n. 7. It does not appear where this most interesting monament now is. To judge from the figures it would scem to be very ancient, perhaps even as early as the 3rd century (Fig. 56).

The Good Shepherd appears in fioe (as it would seem) on one side of a medal described below.
(2) Portraits of Christ.-These are not found nponcoinstill the reign of Justioinn Rhinotmetos ( $685-711$ ), and it ia by no means clear that all the medals which have them are not later atill. The earlieat in all jikelihood, and certainly the most important, is a masive plaque of gold, on one side of which the face of the Saviour in low relief is repreannted in the centre, the eyes being formed by garnets or by pastes in imitation of them. Around it in six compartments is the chrismn formed of $X$. and $R$ (not $P$ ), and from the transverse bnr of the cross are suspended a and $\omega$. "Ces lettres sont déconpées a jour." Ornaments in the centre are formed of chamels cloissonés. Reverse plain. Diam. 63 mill.; weight 39 grammes. Acquired in 1855 for the bibliotheque Nationale at Paris, having been found a few years previonsly at Linon in the departmeat of Puy-de-Dôme. Keferred to the Merovingina period by M. (3) Infant Suriour adorsd by the Magi.-Three medals on which this subject is represented are known, and there has been much controversy about the age of one of them; none of them can be earlier than the 5 th century, and all msy probably be inneh lnter, perhaps even lower than the period embraced in this work.

An erample of this medal was formerly in the possession of Pasqualini, who corresponded in 1601 nith Peiresc about it ; the latter thought it no older than John Zimiaces, and regarded it as a Docange, Banduri, and herein followed by perceived that it was a medal, and placed its antiquity much higher. It came into the liircherinn Museum, but has been since lost; but 1 drawing by Ménétrier made in 1629 (which ris now perceive to be about three times the size of the original), was reproduced in 1869 by De Rossi, u. s. p. 44, n. 5 . The latter considers the piece of the second half of of the first second half of the 5th century, or of the first half of the 6th. He thinks thst the money ascribed to John Zimisces (969-976), which bears so great a resemblance to this medal on the obverse, 9 was derived from an earlier prorery medal. Bo, it may have been taken from this more probable that the medal belongs to the ame general period as the copper inoney of Limisces, who first placed the portrait of the Suriour thereon; the nimbus on both (cruciform with double limbs enclosed in a circle) seems to be more artificial and later than that which surronds the Savinur on the money of Justinian II., in whase reign it appears for the first time upon the gold coinage. This later nimbus, however, is _-_.

and Paul). Another bronze medal with the same heads inscribed with their samea and various sccessoriea ia mentioned above nnder n. 1. A third of the aame metal in the Christian Museum of the Vatican, ( $2 \frac{1}{2}$ inches) engraved by Perret, bears the aame heada, but in a different style, having the chriama between them (Catacombes, vol. ii. on title-page). A small oblong medal or plaque in the Vatican of rude work, having a neck-like loop pierced for suspension, gives the head of St. Paul in intaglio with legend ses pavlvs (De Rossi, u, s. p. 44, with figure). Age uncertain, probably late (id. p. 56).
(5) Representations of other Saints,-Among the few of thia class which can be recognised is St. Laurence (Fig. 58), who is represented as being broiled on a gridiron, with his feet held by an executioner behind; in front sita a Roman officer bearing a staff, with an officer standing at his feet; sbove the head of the saint is the chrisina $(P)$, and above his body is seen his soul rising upward in hrman form (see Martigny, Dict. a. v.; Ame. ed. 2, 1877). It is crowned by the hand of God sppearing above, between Alpha and Omega. . The reverse has an oblate (?) bearing a candle, approaching a cancellated structure, arched, but open above, which ia probably intended for the toinb of St. Laurence. The Iegend svocessa vivas occurs on both sides, ahe being the person for whom the medal is made; it has a loop above, shewing that it waa intended for suspension. This lead medal, formerly in the Vettori Museum, now in the library of the Vatican, is in intaglio ( 14 inches); it is a cast from a bronze, probably of the 5th century, described by Ménétrier (De Rossi, u. s. pp. 33-37, tav. n. 8). Other medals are found with figures of saints either at full length or the bust only, about which little can be aaid with certainty. One (perforated) has a head seen in front on the obverse, the reverge bearing the ordinary chrisina with $a$ and $\omega$ in the angles. Probably of the 4 th or 5 th century. Bronze, nearly 1 inch (De Rossi, u. s. p. 41, n. 6). Another has the Saviour at length with circular nimbus bet ween two other figures (Peter and Paul ?), one of which has a staff on his shoulder terminated by the chrisma with legend zosime vivas; the other side has a shepherd between trees, with staff, dog behind. 太. $1 \frac{1}{10}$ inchea (Id, u. s, tav, n. 4). De Rossi is probably right in thinking that the Saviour here conmissions the two great apostles to preach the gospel; he holds something (perhaps a volume) in one hand towards one of them (see De Rossi, u. s. pp, 43-45). Probably about the 5th century. Another (p. 45, tav, $n$. 2) gives two figures (a woman with uplifted hands talking to a man, the chrisma above, and on the other side three men. E. $1 \frac{1}{2}$ inches. Thess are suspected by De Rossi to be Intended for St. Felicitas and her aeven children, martyred along with her; and to have been struck in Rome in their honour. E. $1 \frac{1}{2}$ inches, In the Kircherian Museum (De Rossi, u. s. p. 44, n. 6, and p. 39). These pieces may probably be of the 4th century or a little later.
(7) Cross.-A bronze piece (perforated), irregular in form, about 1 inch in diameter; has on one side a Latin cross, at the feet of which are the $\alpha$ and $\omega$ in silver, incised and worked ia niello (incise e niellate in argento). Nuseum of the Vatican, Not earlier than the 5th century, perhaps much later (De Rossi, u. s. p. 43, engraved p. 44, n. 4). Crosacs of various forms are also tigured aa accessonies on other madals, see under n .3 .

From the Old Testament we have a few acenes, such as the following :-
(8) Sacrifice of Abraham.-A plaque, re ${ }_{j}$ resenting Abraham and Isaac on the top of Mount Moriah, between trees; an angel looks down from heaven. An animal (zeant for a ram) behind Abraham. The style is peculiar, apparently very ancient. 1/ inch, bronze. (De Rossi, u. 8. p. 40, tav. n. 3.) The ssme subject is repeated on a badly preserved bronze medal, which h\%s s loop for auspension, where Isaac kneels before Abraham, who holds a knife; a ram is behind him; the legend above (now remsining) is vabicvs. The other side represents a male figure in long drapery, presenting a chslice before an altar on which are three lights, the slab being supported by spiral columns on a frame; behind him an oblate; the legend is gavdentianvs. De Rossi explains the medsl thus: Urbicua devotea his son Gaudentianus to the service of God or one of the sainta, possibly to St. Laurence; Abraham would resemble Utbicus in offering his son to God. He thinks the medal was atruck about A.D. 400 . (De Rossi, u. $\mathrm{v}_{3}$ pp. 49, 50, tav. n. 5.)
(9) Daniel in the Lions' Den.-A plaque with this device ia figured by Venuti among the inedallions of the Albani Museum (Ant. Num. Max. Mod. Mus. Albani, t. ii. p. 119). Now in the Yatican. De Rossi regards it as an ornament for furniture ( $u, 8$, p. 37). Ses also under n. 1, where this and other aubjects from the Old Testament are figured as accessories.

Of the preceding mednls those which bear the figure of Chriat as the Good Shepherd are ia all likclihood the oldest; and these (or some of them) may probably be earlier than Constantine; the gréater part perhaps of the others may be referred to the 4 th and 5 th centuries; all those, however, that bear the portrait of Christ with cruciform nimbua are later, perhape very much later.

But the fathers, SS. Athanssius, Augustine and Chrysostom, condemn the superstitious une of amulets, which prevailed in their age among some Christians; the last of whom mentiong that bronze medals of Alexander of Macedon were sttsched to the head and feet as charms ( $A d$ illuminan. Catech. ii, 5) ; now De Rossi (who reters to these authors) mentiona a bronze medal, published by Vettori, preserved in the Vatican Library, bearing on the obverse the head of Alexlien's skin (as on his silver coine), and on the ravorse the chrisma (X) enclosed in a circle. He appears to be right in thinking that this and the following are the kind of charms against which St. John Chryaostom protests. Paciaudi in 1748 first published a modal having the head and name of Alexander as before on the obverse, but bearing on the reverse an ass's colt sucking its mother, accompanied by the astrological soorpion and the legend d.n. ins xps det filivs (De Rossi, u.s. p. 61, Money). He mentions in fine (p. 62) 4 copper plate (lamina di rame), perforated for mapenaion, in the possession of Signor Lovatti, a dealer in antiques at Rome, reading on one side as follows:-In the centre an owl; about it dominys and seven stars; in a circle near the circamference, bicit te leo de tribvg ivdn Radis davir. There is a very similar mednl of red copper (Fig. 59), meant for an amulet pierced for uspension, which was found at Keff, anciently Sicea Venerea, in Tunis. It is now in the King of Holland's Cabinet at the Hague, and is rendered by Reuvens, at the end of his second letter to Letronne (pp. 29-32), as follows; the doubtful conjectures are also his.

MONOGRAM，nn abbreviation of the name Jesus Christ．The Christlan pulilio or otlieal use of this symbol is involved in norriy the same chrenological ditlicultles as that of the cross， ［Sen Cnoss．］The term Chrisma is frequently applled to it．Ita original form was certaidy that of the $X$ ，the initial fetter of oup iond name，with the letter $P$ across the intersection of its limbs，It was subsequentiy astered by enlargling the central $P$ into the form $\boldsymbol{X}$ ． A further modification，which turned the $X$ into the Egyptian T，brought the menogram into the form of the penal cross thus $F$ ．It is sug－ gested under Caoss，that though we can produce few or no instances，before Constantine，of the public use of the monogram of the name of the Lord，or the cross which symbolized His person and IIis death，both the letters and the aymbol were then in private use：so as to be fuily un－ derstood as representing Him．The distinction must be observed that the monogram，ns an ini－ tial，is only a phenetic or letter－nymbol；whereas the Cross is a graphio symbol or hieroglyph，and appeala to memory nnd a train of associations connected with the Lond＇s person，and intleed the manaer of His death，the nature of His sacri－ fice，and His whole church as a sybtein nad a kingdom．

The medification into the peunl，the Egyptian， or Thu－cross surmounted by the $P$ ，seems to date from about the time of Constantine，noll may have been produced by either or both of two causes． At that period it became snfe，and it may have beea thought both right and necessary，for Christendom to avow the Lord＇s death as a male－ factor：the reproach of the cross would then be un longer intolerable to fresh couverts，and the manner of His death had to be remembered in attestation of His perfect humanity．Hence the peaal cross of His death was raised as a stand－ ard．But this later $T$－form of the mongram reems to hnve beea especinily popuiar in the East，and in Egypt nlmost exclusirely used （Garrucci，Vetri，p．104，and Letroune，Jo la Croix anséc Éyyptienne，p．16）．It is quite poso sible that it mny have become more popuiar under Alexnadrina influence，especially atter the appenrance of Athanasius at the couacil of Nicaea．Gnarucci is decidediy of opinion that the monogram and the cross were both adopted，simultaneously and from the first，by Constantine，and considered in fact as the same symbol．In some cases the upright cross wns added to the oblique one so ns to torm an eight－ rayed star $⿻ 丷 木$ ，but the $\mathbb{X}$ menegram nud the Greek cross appear alike on coins of Constantines， published in the＂tavela d＇Aggiunta＂at the ead of Garrucci＇s Vetri．［MONEY．］He says it is certain that the $f$ monegram represented

The $A$ and $\infty$ are sometimes hung by smalt chains to the branches of the cross, or thus represented. (See Boldetti, pp. 338 and 345, and Bottari, tav rliv.) The first of these examples is somewhat rare, as representing these letters attached to the $\mathbb{R}$ monogram. They are given with another example of the anme form in a mosaic St. Curiaca (see infra) trom the cemetery of St. Cyriaca (see infra). The former of these

The monugram is often placed on the forehead of and portrait of our Lord. (See Boldetti, p. 60, and Martigny, Dict. 334.) It is found thus on the Good Shepherd and the Lamb (Namachi, iii. the Bottari, tav. xxi.; Gems, p. 718; and in the Nisuus [p. 1393]; see also Allegranzn'y pears on a g. antichi di Milano, tav. i.). It seems difficult to imagine, as is sometimes conteaded, that the monogram was nuknown or rarely used before the days of Constantioe. The habitual uso of the Cross in his time is proved by Tertullian, do Cor. Sfil. c. 3, quoted vader Cross. It may have been used privateiy or unofficiaily from the first, though perhaps ansatisfactory to Hebrew brethren or Roman catechumens. It is remarkable, however, that the monogram or cross is not mentioned in Clement's list of permitted symbols on ringa at Paedagog. iii. 11, p. 246 d . A certain use of symbolism was allowed by the aynagogue, though the use of the cherub-forms probabiy ended with the encient temple. Stilt a Christian society in which the Greek element altogether predomiwated for 300 yenrs canaot have gone on long withont the use of embiematic or speelally signilieant forms; especially where secrecy was olted an object. The passages in Apoc. vii. 2, xiv. 1, Where the sign of the Son of God is spuken. of, compared with Ezek. ix. 4, 6, suggest the idea that the monogram ls there intended, and thongh the sjeculation is not one to be pursued far, it is excns:ble. Whatever the subjective reallty of Constantine's vision may be, it is clear that he saw, or thought he saw, or sald he thought he sa:v, some emblem or sign whose meaning he and his followers well knew. There ia no reason tor supposiag that the form of the Labarum was revealed to Constantine for the tirst time, never having existed betore. In Eusebius (Vit. Const. i. $2+-26$ ) his vision is spoken of as a dream ; and it is consistent with the mysterious admixture of the atural and the providential, which constitutes what we call divine interference, that a well-known form should be for ever invested, in his minl, with divire meaning, rather than that a new one should have been invented. In fact, had the labarum been believed to be a new revelation of a divine sign of the Son of Man, it would everywhere have taken the place of the cross, on the anthority of Constantine, as tha man privileged to see it; and might have prevented the use or worship of the crucifix. The change to the upright cross in the labar-m may have proceeded naturally from the eruciform vexillum of the Roman cavalry [Labarus, F.11]. But the earlier or $\mathbb{R}$ continued in use even on that ensign; and it is certainly found, in most instances without Christian meaning, on ancient coins and medals, as in the Lydian or Maonian medal quoted by Martigny, s. v. "Numismatique," p. 454, where the letters $X$ and $P$, which form part of the legend, are united sons to form it thus $\mathcal{P}$. Sea M. Ch. Lemormant, Sigues de Christianisme sur les Monum. numismatiques du troisièinc Siecle, in Melanges d'Archélogie, t. iii. [Monvy.] In this matter, as in every other which concerns the monuments of Christian Romc, we have to lament the effects of relic-removing, collecting, and devont interpolation. Inseriptions are collected in museums, arranged and rearranged according to tastes or theories, and crosses and monograms of secondary date are everywhere found inseribed on more ancient tablets after the peace of the church, and thus the monuments will vitiate each other's evidence to the cnd of time.

Until lately the earliest certain Chi-monogram was supposed tu date A.D. 331, omitting the mutilated and doubtful fingment which is theught to present date 298. (De Rossi, Inser. Christ. t. 1. p. 29, and p. 38, No. 39.) But an earlier example than the former-as far back as 32:-has been found under the Constantinian basilica of St. Lawrence in Agro Verano. We have arready speculated on the greater importance and more trequent use of the symbol after the counci! of Nice. But this year is also the date of tie death of Licinins, from which time the aymbol begins to be engraved on coins (De Ros ai, Bullett. 1863, p. 22). In 355 it is for the first time joiaed to the a and $\omega$. Other forms nupear about 347 , the upright cross being first adeled to the Chi-rhs so as to form a kind of star; then the $X$ is withlrawn and the P remains. To the 5 th century the old and new forms go on tagether, $\mathbb{R}$ and $P$; but early $\ln$ the 6th the $?$ dlsap.

pears, and the Latin or Greek cross takes the place of the monograms. Martigny gives a very curious and jateresting instance of the fiaal transition into the cross as symbolic not only of Christ's name but of His death. The .menogram $\boldsymbol{f}$ is used in the Sinaitic Bille four times: once nt the end of Jeremiah, twice at the end of Isaiah, nad in Ajoe. 11, 8 , in the middle of the word ECTATPROH. (De Rossi, Bullett. 1863, p. 62.) However in the Western world the use of the ancient letter-symbol continued to the end of the ith century. It was revived for a time by Charlemagne, and used by couneils held under him, and even on sepulehral inseriptions. For the former, see Mabillon, de Re Diplomatica, l. v. tav. liv. lv. lvi., ed. Nap. p. 468 sqq.

On a larger seale the monogram oceurs on the exteriors and Interiors of aneient churches and basilieas. See Boldetti (Cimet. etc. p. 338), where a rude example of it with the $A$ and $\omega$ is given. It continued visible to his day sculptured over the Latin Gate of the walls of Belisarius. He found it mese trequently in the tile-mosaie in the cemeteries of Cyriaca and Priseilla, and in the tomb of Faastina, Callixtine cemetery (Boldetti, p. 339) it is cnelosed in a wreath, which may represent a crown of palm. This is carved ou a marble slab. But the sign occurs frequently in the mosaics which adorn the apses or arches of triumph in the churches of Rome and Ravenaa; as in SS. Cosmas and Damian in the former place (Ciampini, let. Monum. ii. p. 60), or in Gatla Placidia's chapel at Ravenna (ib. vol. i. tab. lxy. lxvi.). So alse on the inser walls and veil of the sanctuary (Mabillon. de Re Diplom. bk. ii. c. 10, p. 110). The eariest example on a saered building is now preserved in the Hotel de Ville of Sion, and dates from A.D. 377. It was probably often used in baptisteries; Martigay gives a woodeut from Bottari (tav, xxxiv.; Aringhi, vol. i. p. 319) of a round or ectangon building of this kind from $n$ arreophagus in the Vaticae, which bears the monogram in the ceatre of its low reof. Aa interesting engraving, as recording a very early adopition tor Christinn purposes of that form; of which the Tower of the Wiads, or Horologium, Athens, is one great example, and San Giovanni at Florence tha chief one ot the first Etrurian renaissance.

On surcophagi and funereal monuments the monogram may be said to oecur pussin ; oftea, as of uld, standing as sijnum Domini or sijnum Christi, representing simply the namo aod person of our hord (Boldetti, pp. 273, 345, 399). may atand for (Boldetti) there is produced (see bel thin brick, which localus in the ces

For exsmples on sarcophngi, there is a very rich one in Bottnri (tab, xxxvii.), Aringhi, i. p. 325, and at Bottari, tav. xxx., Aringhi, i. p. 311, it is attended (as representing our Lord) by the twelve apostles. On the bases of columas and pilasters see Bottarl, tav. exxxvi.

A small bronze figure of St . Peter bearing the penal cross-monogram, of excellent workmanship, is given by Martigay, p. 539.

For the use of the monogram on mednls and coias, see Labarum and Money. Onfurniture and utensils Martigoy refers to a wooden "pupitre," or faldstool, now preserved in the monastery of St. Croix st Poitiers, und shewn as originally the property of St. Radegund, wite of Clotaire 1., son of Clovis. The monegram is roughly carved on form symbols. (Sown, between two crosses or ernciCorm symbols. (See Cahier and Martin, Melanyes d'Archéolngie, t. iiii. p. 156.) In Garrucei (Ietri, etc. pp. 104, 5 ) reference is made to a poen of publilius O. Porphyrius to Constantine, in which the emperor is addressed as pilot of the ship of the state, nad the cross-monogenm is his helm. The object of the work is to request permission tor the author's return from exile, and he has shewn his ingenuity by disposing the verses in which he compares the emperor to the world'g helmaman in the form of a ship thus aymbolically directed. For vessels, see Le Blant (Inscr. Chret. de la Gaule, t. i. pl. 41, No. 244). Buttari (t. i. p. 102) meations n strigil which Pignorio had seen marked with it in the midst of the name of the owner. One in particular seens to have belonged to a serf of the ancient bnsilicn of St. Clemeat at Rome, being inscribed a dominicv clementis. It appears from Pigaori (Ejpist. xxiv., Spon. Miscell. 301), that the use of these collars dstes from Constantine's time. It had been originally the custom to brand runaways on the forehend; and the weariag the collar was a Christian usage of mercy, which probably lasted long into the Middle Ages. (See Walter Scott's Ivanhoe, of Gurth aad Wambr.) In nny ease in these early times, the monogram was engraved on the plate of the collar, perhaps, as Martigny aays, to remind the slive that severe punishment had been spared him in the name of Christ ; perhaps with nllusinn to the text, "One is your Master, even Christ."
Other uses of the monogram seem to hare heen that it was placed at the head of episeopal letters; was used as a mark by readers tor specially important parsanges; employed as a symbel of initiation and text for exhortation for catechumens before their baptism. In this capacity it was the custom in Milon to paiat it on n large cloth and exhibit it in the chureh. (Muratori, Rerum Italicarum Script. vol. Iv. p. 66.) Io short till the erueifir took its place, its use seems to have been ecextuaxive with that of the cross, and to have had the function of uniting the symbolical with the individual devotion of personal religion. Thus.

Aaninted, and the symbol of His person, life, and death were tormally united, at or befors the time of Constantine. A Inter monogram seems to have been constructed on the same principie from the first three letters IHC of the uame Jesus. It scems to have been derived from Byznntine usigge. The usual Lower Greck abbreviation for the Lord's name is $\widehat{\widehat{1 C}}$, and one may give caligraphers and miniaturists credit for developing it by ndding the $H$ and prerpendicular stroke, so as at length to form the HH H of inter times. Martiguy says thst St. Bernardin of Sienn (d. 1444) was one of the first who used it, and ${ }^{\text {' }}$ is is confirmed by a passage In his Life in Alban Butier (May 20), in which he is said - .ing one of his sermons to have exhibited the name of our Lord beautifully carved on a gililed panel, and incurred some suspicion in consequence. Martigny eloses his article on this aubject with one or two curious examples, of ancient date, where the $\mathbb{R}$ nod IHC monograms seem both to have been in the mind of the inscriber or sculptor. One ls in Lupi's E'pituphium Se erae, p. 137, and bears the anchor-mark, which may indiente great antiquity, with buth monograms, thus $H$. 3 . The other (p. 420) is from the chapel of St. Satyros in St. Ainbregio at Milan, where St. Vietor beara n cross in one hand and the annexed symbei (see above) in the otier. It seems intended to eombine the aneient Chrisma or Chi-Rho monogram with the initials IH, if not IHC, and the cross, so as to join both initiala and symbol in the words thcorc XPICTOC.

MONT'H. The month-reckonin $\eta$ nsed by the churci in the first century, in Palestine, was doubtless that which was foliowed by the Jews, such ns we find it in Josephus, especialiy in the Wars. Writing for Syrinn Greeks, he coustantly substitutes tor the Jewish (Babyionian) month-nanes thoss of the corresponding Macedonian lunar months, which names were intreduced into the East in the track of Aiexander's conquesta.
The corresponding lunar monthg in the Jewish, Syrian, and Macedonian nomenclaturs are as follows:-

The intercalary mouth is inserted, when necessary, het ween Adar and Nisan. Thic months are usually of 29 nad 30 days alternately.
Later, thronghout Syria, these Macedonian months were absolutely assimilated to the Reman months, in dimensions and epoeh. Thus Hypertheretneos is identical with September, Dhin with Oetober, etc. But no month-dates, iunar or other, oceur in Christian writings enrlier thnn the middla of the second century.* When such do oecur, they are constantly Julinn-Roman, or in terms of a Julianized calendar, usuaily in both together. duce the regular numerlcal count of month-dapa, as by Gregory the Great at the close of the 6th century. Of enrlier timen, there is a fragment of a Gothic calendar (4th century) in which the month-days ars numbered (Mai, Script. let. Nov. Collect. v. i. 66). In the By zaniut church, the numerienl way of dating began to be used in the 7th century. It appears, together with the old way, in the Paschal Chronicle; hut in the same century the emperor Heraclius, in a chronological writing of his, keeps to $t$. old method, which continues to be used in numerous maб⿲á入ia of later times; Geargins Syncellus (end of 8th century) employs only the new reckoning.

MOON. The moen does net appear in Aringhi's ' Index of Christian Symb 's,' nor does the present writer know of her being used as a Christian emblem until the 6th century, when the crucifixion began to be a common sulject of representation, and the sun and moon of course formed a part of it. [See Crucifix.] The latter appenrs as a crescent or lemale figure, or as either, holding or containing the other, or ns a face. In the crucifixion of the Laurer, ina MS. sle is a crescent within a round disk, and there is a very singular picture in tab, v. of that MS. (Assemini Cutalog. Bibl. Mcdic.) of a partial and total eclipse of the sun, which seems to represent the moen as a white disk and tace, and also ns a black disk markel with the crescent. See the crosses and ivory plaque, Mozzoni, sec. 8. The associations of Asiatic and Egyptian paganry may easily account for the omission of the meon frem Christian art for the first three or feur centuries. The Mithraic worships prevalent in Rome in the earlier ce "t ries must have included the moon as well ns the sun. See the Abbé Auber's Symoolisine Religienx, vol. i. p. 169. Even in the many nrabesques of vaultings in Bosio's plates, the writer :an find no use of the disk or the crescent as ornament, though in the earlier basilicas nad memorial churches, where roefs were sown with stars (as notably in the chapel of Galla Fiacidia at Ravenna), the moen may aliso have occurred. The great Apocalyptic mosaics would allow the presence of the sun and moon in the Lord's hant; as also some OldTestament subjects, as the 5th-century mosaic of Joshun in Sta. Maria Maggiore at Rome, the Vienna Greek MS. of Genesis (4th or 5th century) in a dream of Joseph (D'Agincourt, pl. xix., and compare Vatican Virgil, pl. xx.). But they seem to have been held in earlier times to be a part of the idolatrous symbolism amainst whlch Tertullian protested so decidedly in his treatise ' $D e$ ldololatrià'; and to have been necessarily banished from the Christlan Church wherever there was danger of confounding pagnn rites with her own. The moen does not occur in Garrucci's or Esonarotil's Vetri. The olnssical enthusiasm of the Carlovingian period, both English and Firank, seems to have accepted solar and lunar imagery with equal readiness, bath being now fully allowed in the crucifixtons and, ocalyptic pictures. The former Saxon worshap of sun and moon seems to have haunted the minds of northern Christianity very little, and the symbols o both seem to have heea so freely used in crucifixions as to be considered safe anywhere.

Sometimes persmificatoons occur, such as those in the Cottonian Aratus (B. Mus. Tiberius, B. 5; Westwooi, Any/los S', xxon and Trish MSS. pl. 48). There is a very interesting miniature of chariots of the sin and moon in Count Viviar:s Bible, middle 9th century (Bastard, l'eintures des Manuscrits, vol. ii ; see weodcut), and a Franco-Sixat MS, in the arme volume contains a crucifixion with a crescented Diann's head, as meen, on a medallion.

It seems impossibl 'a connect Egyptian lanar symbelisms of the si "d Isis with any Christian emblem. But a two.st allegory was connected with the idea of the moon from the days of Angustine at least. He speaks of her as representing the church (Enarr. in Ps. x.) "Luna in allegoria significat ecclesian, quod ex parte spiritali lucet ecelesia, ex parte antem carnali obscurn est. Alii dicunt non hatere luarm lumen proprium, sed a sole illustrari. Ergo lunâ intelligitur ecciesia, quod suum lumen non habeat, sed ab Unigenito Dei Filio, qui multis lecis in SS. allegoriae sol appelintus eat, illustratur." One of the latest and most benutiful repetitions or echoes of this idea is the well-known passage in the "Christian Year, beginning "The moon above, the chureh below.
The presence of the sun and moon in cruclfixions may be accounted fer as representing the darkness which prevailed at the Lerd's denth; but it seems that it gave oreasion in later days to the idea of the moon's representing the synagogue, or Hebrew church. St. Gregory the Great takes her to represent the frailty and decay of the flesh (In Evang. S. Lucie, Hom, 2.)
The Turkish use of the crescent after 1463 was the adoption of the ancient symbal ef the city of Byzantlum, which was probably more welcome to them as unconnerted with any Christian association. It is found on Brzantine coins (Niennet, Descr. des Melda:lles, vol. I. p. 378), and dates from a repulse given to Philip of

MOON, SUPERSTITIUOS OBSERV. ANCE OF. The practice of blowing horns,

"Jam nemo tobas, nemo aers fattget:  Una laborantl poterit subcurrere lunae."

It was an old custom therefore, which lingered on long after the introduction of Christianity, and was reprehended by more than one of tha fathers. A sermon attributed to St. Augustina (Serm. 215, De Tempore) details, in order to denounce and torbid, this among other superstitions practices. Ducange quotes a MS. Peenitential, which says: "Si observasti traditiones paganorum, quas quasi hacreditario jure, diabolo subministrante usque in hos dies patres filiis reliquerunt, id est, ut elementa, colores, lunam, colem, aut stellarum cursum,

MORTAL AND VENIAL SINS. The hist among the early Christion writers who makes such a distinction is Tertullian. He ranks amoug capital sins-iddolatry, blasphemy, murder, adultery, violation, false witness, fraud,which seven ba fancifully which seren ha fancifully connacts with the sevenfold dipping in the river Jordan: "Sep.

tem maculis capitalium delictorum ishorrerent, idololatria, blasphemia, homicidio, adulterio, stupro, falso testimonio, fraude " (Adv. Mitrcion. lib. iv. cap. 9). Similarly, in De Idololatria, similar list ha De Patientiá, cap. 5, after a Dominum dist, he adds: "Haec ut principalia penes parently, with him, (This woril delieta is, mp and dependent on the a general term for offences, and dependent on the particular appellative aljoined to it for tha degree of gravity to be ntwriters, on the contrary it. Augustine andlater writers, on the contrary, it is used by itself for grave crimes. Sea Pamelius's comment on this pasage, p. 147, n. 40.) In the same manner he ranks among the number of dails or litto sins anger, evil speaking, a blow struck, a vain onth, a failure to fulfil a promise, a lie caused by shame or necessity: "Quod sint quaedam delicta quotidianae incursionis quibus omnes simus objecti. Cui enim non acejdit, aut irasci inicuac, e ultra solis occssum, nut et manum inmittere, fidem pacti destroere, aut temere jurnre, ant sitate pacti destruere, aut verecundia aut neces.sitate mentiri? in negotis, in onticiis, in tentamur in victu, in visu, in auditu, quanta tentamur, ut si nulla sit venin istorum, nemini salus competat. Sunt autem et contraria istis, ut graviora et exitiosa, quare veniam non capiant, homicidium, idololatrin, fraus, negatio, blasphemin, utique et moechin et fornicatio, et si 19) alia violatio templi Dei" ( $D e /$ iudicit. c. 19). And he drsws the distinction sharply but" qua the great and the small in cap. 18, scopo aut levioribus delictis veniam ab episcopo consequi poterit, nut majoribus et irremissibilibus missibilibus a Deo solo." As to peanace there was a milder party and a more rigid; the latter msintaining that no "locns poenitent:..e" shoulij this dived to certain classes of offenders; and this difference of opinion was one of the causes of the Novatian and other schisms. [Pe.vitence.] St. Cyprian calls adultery, fraud, murder, mortal crimes ("adulterium, fraus, homicidium, mortale crimen est ") (De Bono Patientiac, e. 5), Origen declares that there are mortal sins which are not in the rank of great sins (Hom. passace evit.); but there is a doubt whether the In his should be read culpa mortalis or moratis. In his sixth commentary on St. Matthew, he tempens evil speaking, lying, idla words, intemperance, as slighter sins, nad such as murder and adultery as grenter.
St. Augustine distinguishes more accurately three classes of sins: "There are some sins so great that they are to be punished with excommunication; there are othera for which this remedy is not necessary, but they may be healed by the medicinea of chastisements ; and, lastly, there are some which are very light, from which no man is free in this life, for which we have left us a daily cure in that prayer, Forgiva us our trespasses," etc. - "nisi essent quaedam ita gravia, ut etiam excommunications plentenda sint, non diceret apostolus; congregatis vobis et meo spiritu, tradere ejusmodi daminem Satanae, ptc. agitur, non quotldianam medela-n poneret is oratione quam docuit, ut dles is, Dinitte nobis debita nostra" (De Fide et Cperi'us, cap. 26). Many other passages might be fuoted from thia fither, and all to the rame effect. Trir the above may be added that St. Crego:y (Moral. lib. xii. c. 9) distlaguiahes between peccatum and crimen, as does St. Augustine, making the first to nlean such ains as are forgiven daily, upon repentance and prayer; and the second to mean fargrant crimes, to be puaished by public penance. The general conclusiona to be drawn from these and other declarations may be stated thus:
That all sins were deadly to the soul : not merely those called great, mortal, capital, or deadly ains, but nlse these known as small, light. or venial. These St. Augustine, in the trentise last quoted, goes on to say, destroy the soul by reason of their number. They are like the small drops which till a river, or the grainu of saud which, although they are smitil individually, will oppress and weigh us down; or ats the bilge of a ship which, if neglected, will swamp the vessel as surely as the greatest wave, " lyy long calianing and never being drained."

That it was not all mortal or leadly sias, but only sids of a public and heivous nature, whici) gave public scandal, that were put to public penance for a longer or shorter time. St. Gregory Ngesen, in his Letter t, Letolus, gives a list of such publicly punishe 1 sins, waing which he mentions idolatry, Julaism, Manichaeism and heresy, magic, witcheraft, and divination; ndultery nad fornication; public and violen: robbery, and murder. All these might be put to penance of various degrees, aad then the offenier might be re-admitted; but it would seem that. penance was permitted only once, and that tiec!e were a multitude of other sins for which public penance was not imposed, which were, nevertheless, entirely distinguished from vesial or less grave offences.

Idolatry was considered, in the early church, the greatest of all ains. A letter found among the works of St. Cyprinn, and purporting to be from the clergy of Rome to him, calls it "grande delictum. lngens et supra omnia peccatum" (Ep. 31); and Cyprian, in a letter to his own clergy, agrees that it is "summum delictum"the sin against the Holy Ghost, which he whe commits "non habebit remissam, sed reus est aeterni peccati" (Ep, 10). But here he is speaking of apostates.

The councils de not, apparently, treat of this distinction specifically. There ara many provisions as to the degree of penance for particular offeoces, but no attempt at a general classification. But yet they recognized this diatinction between classes of ains, which, indeed, was one that could not be overlooked. The Conncil of Agde (A.D. 506) forbade the excommunication of persons for alight causes (can. 3). Similarly, the fifth council of Orleans, c. 2 (A.D. 549), has a provision that no person of right faith should be cut off from communion for slight causea, but only for those offences deemed worthy of excommunication by the fathers [Excommunication; Penitence]. Bingham refers to a similar provision made by the Council of Clermont in its second canon, but this is, apparently, an error.

MORTIFICATION (mortificatio, $\nu$ én $\rho \omega \sigma \cdot / s$ ).

 Under this head it is intended to give some account of the practices adopted at various times by Cbristians, to " wortify" or deaden "their members which are upon the earth." A general account of the progress of ascetic ideas has alrendy been ziven under Asceticism.I. Mortifigation in regard to Bathing, Clotiles, Shelitkr, Rest, and Food.-To chot ashas upon the heed, to abstain from bathing and even from washing, to lie on the bare grou: to wenr dirty and ragged clothing-all these nere methods of murtitication practised hy various ascetics. Jerone, for instance (Lipist. 77 ad Ocean. c. 4), describes the dishevelled hair, the sallow face, the dirty hands, the uncleon neck, of Fabiola performing her penance; of himself he says (Epist. 2: ad Eustoch. c. 7) that his limbs were acarred and rough with the use of sact: cloth, while his unwashed skin was black as that of an Ethiopian; and again (Epist. 14 (tr) Heliod. c. 10) he asks, what aeed there can b: for one who is washed in Christ ever to wath again ? I'alladlus (Lausiaca, cc. 142, 143) relates rif the anchoret Sylvadia, that for sixty years sief nepar washol, except her hands for the recentino of the Eucharist. Even at a much earlier loaiol, Hegesjppus relates of St. James the Just a Enseb. H. E. ii. 23) that he neither anointed itinself with wil nor nsed the bath. Several of the eariy rnles of nuns, aa those of Augustine (c. 12), Caesarius (c. 29), Leander (c. 10), discourage the use of the bath, as an indulgence only to be granted to sick persons. Jeroms refers (Epist. 77, c. 2) to Fabiola's deliberite preference of the poorest and meanest clothes to robes of silk, and (Epist. 54 ad Furùtm, c, 7) deliberately lays down the principle, that the fouler a penitent is, the fairer is hs "poenitens quo faedior, eo pulchrior." Some ascetics allowed the hair to grow unkempt and uncared for ; on ${ }^{\prime \prime}$, other hand, the catting off the hair of the hc. 1 was practised as an ascetic diafigurement, a very wide-sprend custom, as sa indication of mourning [Halk, Wearing or, p. 755 ; Tonsurti]. It was naturally a spascial mortification for women; in the 4 th century (A.D. 370) the Council of Gangra (c. 17) anathematizes women who cut off their hair from mistaken asceticism. At about the same period Jerome ; Epist. 147 ad Subinianum) testifies that virgins or widows on entering a nunnery offered their hair to be cut off by the superior. Optatus of Mileve ( $d e S c h i s i n$. Dontt. i, 6) and Ambrose (ad Virg. Lapsam, c. 8) blame the custom, which evidently axisted in the Western as well as the Eastern churches, of nuns cutting their hair on entrance into a convent. In the capitularies of Charles the Great (vii. c. 310) the cutting off the hair is only prescribed for penitents. Somewhat different from the purely ascetic view is the cutting off her hair by a woman to avoid the lova of a particular person (Isidore of Pelasium, Epist. ii. 53; compare Mabillon, Acta SS. Bened. ii. 592).

The early Chriatlan Fathers earnestly protest, as is astural and right, against luxury and ostent/ation in dress; but the fury of asceticios somb worns went for beyond all moderation Sume ísnatics passed their lives in absolut nakedness, like that hormit of the Sketic Desert, the sight of whom convinced Macarius that he cakes of this bund pound troy. On fast weigning together about a ance was issued fast daya only half this allowthe was isshed. In Lent we read of come of the monks of Tabennae fasting fur two, three, younger Mive diys without intermission. The younger Macarius is aisid to have taken no more than four or five ounces of breud daily (Lausiaca,

c. 20, p. 722 ) ; Ililarion to have lived from his thirty-first to his thirty-fifth year on a daily allowance of about six ounces of barley bread (Jerome, Vita Hil. c. 6); Marclanns of Cyrus, on the Euphrates, to have taken no other food in a day than his evening meal of three ounces of bread (Thendoret, Hist. Rel. c. 3). In a colder and damper clumato such excessive abstinence was, of course, impracticable. "We are Gauls," said the monks of St. Martin (Snlpic. Severus, Diatl. i. 4, §6), "and it is inhuman to compel us to live like angels." Such ectsiderations probably compelled Benedict, in drawing up his statutes for the monastery of Monte Cassino, to content himself with a moderate dietary; the scanty portion of bread on which an exceptlonal person like Macnrius subsisted was not to be the rule for a whole community. He allowed (Rcy.c. 39) a pound of bread for ench man per day, with two ditferent "made dishes" (cocta duo pulmentaria), that if any man could not ent the one he might tike the other. When fruit or fresh puise was to be had, a third course of these might be added. In case of unusualiy hard labour, the abbat might order a more generous diet. The flesh of four-footef hensts was altogether forbidden, except for the sick and infirm; fish and fowl were allowed With regard to wine, Benedict brlieved that one "hemina"-about half an English pint-of wine per day wns sufficient for each nas; but, though he allowed this, he evilen:ly preterred total abstinence (lieg.".c. 40). The rule of St. Benedict became the standard of Weatern monachism. which, however, constantly teaded to fill away from the severity of its first extate, and was trom time to time recalled to its old rigour, or even more than its old rigour, by such reformers as Benedict of Adiane.

Abstinence from wine was commonly practised by ascetics. Clement of Alexaddria (Sirom. vii. c. 6, p. 850 ) deprecates the use of wine by the Ciristinn sage, and he does also that of tlesh; abstinence from wine is one of the practices which Eusebius (II. E. vi. 3, § 12) mentions as having injured the health of the ascetic Origen. Some of the Gnostic sects abstained altogether from wine, and the Encrutites, in particular, thought it the "blood of the evil spirit."
Il. Special kinds of Mortification.- 1 . lise of the Cross. Ameng the methods of mortification must be included the stamping or impressing erosses on the flesh in a painfal manner, the expanding the arms in the nttitude of one crucified, and the bearing a heary cross of wool.
The first of these may perhaps have originated trom a literal interpretation of the expression of St. Paul (Gal. vi. 17), "I bear in my body the marks ( $\sigma \tau i \gamma \mu a \tau a$ ) of the Lord Jesus." St. Rhadeguad ( $\dagger$ 587), to take one instance, to give viridness to her conception of the Passion, used to lay a cietal cross, heated in the fire, on various parts of her body (Venant. Fort. Vita, iii. e. 21). To be "crucitied with Christ "has sumetimes been attempted by rapt enthusiasts in the most literal sense. But a more common kind of self-torture wis that of standing with outstretched arms, in the attitude of one crucified. This wns practised within our period, both ns a form of ordenl (stare vel vadere ad crucem) and as a part of monastic discipline. The way of applying the former, seems to have been that accuser and atcusel took their stand in the cruelform attitude, and the one who tirst dropped his arms was aljadyed to have failed to prove the charge or to viadicate his innocence, as the case might be. Thus, in a matrimonial case, hasband and wite were ordered "exire nd "rucem" (Capit. Iermeri 17 ; Baluze, Cupitularia, i. Itit). The remaining for lugg periods with the arms expanded, as a form of peasnce, originally a merely monastic practice, was introduced in the 8th century by the rule of Chrodegang into the ennonical life. St. Lambert (abont A.D. 700) is said to have nearly lost his life in consequence of having been comprilled to stand in the uttitude of one crucified agninst a stone cross, in the court of his monastery, during a cold winter's aight (l'it, S. Lamberti in Cansius, Var. Lertt. 11. i. p. 140). St. Austreberta is related (Vita, § 15, in Acta SS. Feb. 10) to have endured a similar penaace. More purticular precepts as to this mntter belong to a later nge. Cassian ( $\dagger$ c. 445) mentions (Collat. viii. 3) certain Egyptian ascetics whe carried nbout with them a heavy cross of wood; a practice which, he says, occasioned more langhter than respect. The practice seems to have become more common in the Middle Ages.
2. The practice of ucearing chains or ringe of iron, which has existed among Brahmins and Buddhists from a high antlquity, is found also in the Christian Church. Gregory of Nazianzus (Carm. 47) mentions menks who labeur under never-ceasing irnn fetters, wearing away the evil of their anture as their flesh is worn awar. Epiphnnius (Expositio Fidei, Opp. i. 1106 d) blames nionks who went about in public with neck-rings of iron; nad Jerome ( $E_{f}$ ist. 22 ad Eustochiurn) bids his friend beware of thase who went about barefoot, lalen with chnins, with leng hair and beard and dirty black mantle, to bo seen of mea. The hermit Apollo in the Thebaid wore chans, as Rufinus ( 1 'itae Patr. i. 7) informs us; Theodoret connot say too much of thoss chain-wearers, whose story he tells in the /Iistoria Religiosa. The well-known Symeon of the Pillar was for some time chained to the rock on which he lived by a long chain fixed to his foot; afterwards, on his pillar, he wore for thirty years a heavy chain hanging from hls neck; his iron collar, the historian Evagrius (Ifist. Eccl. e. 13) says that he had seen with his own eyes. Many other instances of men wearing heary chains or rings may be seen in 'Theodoret's Historia Religiona. See also the accounts of the Abbat Senoch of Tours, in Gregory of Tours ( 1 ithe Petr. c. 15), and of St. Radegund (Vita, iii. c. 21).

From the bth centary onward we find the wearing of chains nod the like prescribed sa s penance. Homiciles of their own kindred were sentenced either to nn oppressive weight of chsins, or to wear nn irua band round the body made from the blade of the sword with which the homicide was committed. This punishount Gregory of Tours (de Gloria Conf. c. 87) tells us was endured by a fratricide, who also bore heavy chnins. Charlemagae (Capit. Aquisyram c. 77, in Baluze, i. 2:8) in 789 thought it necessary to issue a caution against vagrants who went about in irons (nudi cum ferro) which they pretended to wear for peaance sake. Unchasto priests were not uncommonly sentenced to wear rings or boops of iron round their arms or bodies.

3. Dorlily Pain and Disfiguremont. The voluntary self-wounding of the Bual jriests and other pagan hiorophants was not altogether unkuown in the Christian Church, though it had a less orgiastic charncter. Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, In his Epistola Synodic, to the bishops of Pas stine nad Cyprus (Hieron. Opp. 1. 543, ed. Vnllarsi), reprobstes the conduct of some who, he snys, mutilated themselves with the knife, thinking that they shewed religion and humility in going about with scarred foreherd and cropped ears ; one man had even bitten off a part of his tongue, to reprove the timidity witn which some served God. Ammonius the monk cut off one of his ears and threatened to bite out his tougue; but this was not from ascetic motives, but to render himself ineligible for the othice of bishop. He was, however, in the habit of burning himself with a red. hot iron from pure nsceticism (Puitiad. Hist Lausiaca, c. 12, p. 716). Another Nitrian monk, the younger Mrcarius, is said to have exposed his nuked body fo. six months to the stinga of venomous flies to atone for the auger and impatience with which he had once crushed a fly that stang him (Lau*. c. 20, p. 722); and Symeon, the pillar-saint, to have aliowed vermin to ait into his body for a considerable time (Vita, c. 7, in Roswryd, p. 172 ). The Greek Menologion (Jan. 4) relates that St. A poilinaris of Menologion (Jan. 4) relates that St. A poilinaris of Egypt used to expose herself to the stings of gnatsani gadflies; uad Johannes Moschas (Pra/uinh Spirituale, c. 141) voluntarily exposed himselt to the stings of the countless insects of the hot Jorian valley, thinking so to escape the neverdying worm and the Hame that is not quenched. Asister of the fanmous nunnery of St. Bridget at Kildsere is said to have burned her feet over a fire which she had secretly lighted in her ceil (Vita S. Brigilae, c. 11, in Surius, Feb. 1). Martiaianus scorchec. hís whole body in the flames of a fire of sticks, with a view of counterncting unlawful passion. And these are but specimens taken from the crowd of records of self-torture which may be found in various hagiologies. The discipline of the scourge will be treated separatciy [Whirping].
4. Cold. Ascetics frequently nttempted to avo the burning passion which possessed them by exposure to cold. Thus the English monk Dritheim is said (Bede, H. E. v. 12) to have remained immersed in a stream during the recitation of many psalms and prayers. Of Jomes, the discipie of Maro, it is related (Theodnret, Hitt. Rel. c. 21) that during his long devotions in the open air he was sometimes 80 covered with snow that he had to be dug out. Similar austerities are related of many other scetics, both male and female. Abraam of arrhae is said (Theod. H. R. e. 17) to have neld fire an altogether superfluous luxury.
5. The Sirititual Exercises of ascetics will be noticed under that heading, and the ascetic views of continence under Virginity. See also Ceilibacy.

YORTMAIN. The law of mortmain which, in the Eingiish use of the term, is a law restricting the acquisition of property by permanent corporations, espechally of a rellglous character is based upon two distinct cousiderations of poliey; one that of preventing property being withdrawn for ever from the general market (that is, being grasped by the "dead hand" of an artificial legal personality); the other, that of opposing obstacles to traudulent or extorthonate impositions on the part of roligious alivisers. There is no doubt that both these lines of poliey are distinctiy represented in, if not directiy copied from, the Roman law at its rijest maturity, and the later legisiation of Christian emperors. Ulpian (circ. A.D. 200) says "we are not permitted to appoint the gods as our heirs, with the exception of those in fivour of whom either a senitus consultum, or imperial constitutions, have conceded a special privilege, as, for jastance, Tarpeinn Jove." The yolicy of this prohibition may have been the same as that by which Justininn, three centuries later, enacted that, where a testator nominated the Lord Jesus Christ as his heir or part heir and adied no limiting words, the inheritance should accrue to the church of the testator's domicile; and similarly where an archangel or martyr was nominated an heir; and where there Was no ruch church the sacred edifices of the metropolis should profit from the inheritance (L. 26 (c. I. 3)). Saviguy (System, vol. ii. b. ii. c. 2) has adverted to the real ineaning of this policy, which was to secure that the benefit and responsibility should bo vested in concrete pereons distinctily cognisable by law.

The law with respect to collegia, that is, corporate bodies consjisting of at least three persons (L. 85. D L. 16), throws, perhaps, the greatest fight on some of the aspects of early mortmain Jaw, As early as A.D. 117-138, we see that collegia could not take inheritances ualess they were specially privileged for this purpose (L. 8. C. (vi. 24)). A passage of Paulus (A.D. circ. 200) ailudes to a senatus consultum of the time of Marcus Antoninus permitting the legacies to be made in favour of collejia, supposing the collegia were lswfully constituted (L. 20. D. xxxiv. 5) , and with respect to the constitution of these bodies it nppears that a religious puriose was presumedly a legitimate obj-ct ("religionis causá coire non prohibentur; dum tamen per boc non fiat contra senatus consultum quoillicita corpora arcentur " (L. 1.D.(x|vii. 22)). Neverthe less, it appears from a constitution of one of the Antonines in Justinian's code that the corporate body of the Jews in Antioch was not reckoned a legal association, and could not sue for a legacy which had been left it.

As respects the claims of the Christian chureh to inherit, or evon to own, property, it must bave depended at first upon whether the local religions societies were or were not treated as legitimate collegia. Gibhon (c. xv.), indeed, addaces an interesting story, told in the life of Alexander Severus (A.d. 222-235), of a dispute in respect of land between the socicty of Christiane and the victualiers (popinarii), as a proof that profisty had already legally veated in the Christian church.

But it "eis wot till Constantine'a Edict of Milan (A.D. 313 , by which he restored to the Christians the property of which they had been herett in the late persecutions, that their right of

edlet prepared the way for the more celebrated ono of the year A.b, 321, by which angone "was to havo full powor of lonving by will whatever property he chose to the chureh and its govorning hombes." It was whthin tilty years of this the that the firnt unmistakeable mortmalu liw was eanated by Valentinlan the Eliler (C'inl. T'h. xrl. 20). It forbleds all sorts of ecclesiantical prrann trom enterling nu the property of willows of wards. It prevents them trom anduriolg thy benctit from the donatlon of the wife ot any wac wha, umler pretext of religion, has privately joinel himself to thein. Thu whole gift is to die so completely Iavalid that the ofleming preven onnmot taku ayything from the name galariey either by gitt or by testament. Auy attrapteit gitis lapsed to the treanary.

The next lav in twenty years later (Cond, 2h. xvi. 28). After prescribing the conditions under which a woman may beeomo a deaconess, it enacts that whe chall make neither the eliureh, tho elergy, uor the poor her loirs. Any nitempred net in violation of the law would be invalit. The following language of the law may aimost be nupposed to have supplied the policy alal the terma of an Eaglish moitmain act. "Immosi ijull ab his morien! fuerit extortum nee tacito fideleommlsso aliquid cloricis in fraudem venerabilis antettonis callida arte aut prohrosa cujusplam conhihenth deferntur; extorres siut ab omnibus quibus inhiaverant bonis: et sl quid forte per epistolam, codicillum, donationen, testamentum, quolibet deulque detegitur ergo ons quas hao annctiunu sulimovimus il nec in julicium devocetur: sel vel ex intentato is qui sibi compretere jatellegit, statuti hujus detinitione succedat." Women otlending ngainst the law are forbiden to enter a chureh or to receive the communion, and any bishop not entorcing these pemalties is to bo deposed. About two monthe lator this constitution was partially repealei, to the extent that deaconesses weru allowed to alienate movenbles in thejr lifetime. A cont ruversy subsequently arose as to the true import of this repealing statute. The emporor Marcimas held that its eflect was to sweep away all restrictions on dispositions in farour of the church. The merits of the controversy are Iueilly expounded by Gothofred ia his note to the pasnage in the Theofosian Code.

We hava the advautage of studylng this legislation in a more impressive form than is presental by the bare letter of the law, St. Ambrose writes: "Nobis etiam privatae successions cmolnmenta recentilus legibus denegantur. Et nemo conqueritur. Non enim putamus injuriam qui dispendium non dolemus" (Libel, ad Rer, relat. Sym.). St. Jerome, agaiu, writes still more explicitly: "It shames oae to confers that ddol-priests, mimes, charioteers, and harlots can take inheritauces, and only the clergy and nonks are disabled from tukiag them; and it is not by persecutors but by Christian princes that they are disabled. Not that I complain of the law, but I lament that we have deserved the law. Cactery is good; but how has the wound come which calls for the cautery? The cautery of the Jaw ls provideut and eafe; and yet even thus our avarice is not reatrained, but br secret trusts we ermale the law " ( $E p .2$, ad Nepot.). A curious allusion to the current legielation is also contained in a letter of Gregory

The detailed descrljtion given by J'aulinas of the mosaics exteuted by his direction for the basilica of St. Feilx aad the "Iasillea Fundana" at Nola early in the oth century (bjist. ad Sever. 32) iadicates polats of resemblance and difference with the subsequently recognised type. The whole representation was at rictly symbolical, and the humaa figure seems to have been rigldly excluded, so that it would speak boly to the laitlated. IIe describes the Lambs standing on the mount from which issue the four rivers typical of the Gospels, the symbel of the Father' above, the lofty cross surmounted by the crown occupyIng the chief place, which are familiar to us in other mosales. But, what we do not see In any existing mosaics, the Holy Spirit, uader the form of a Dove, was represented as descending on the symboiic Jamb; the apostles were also depicted as doves (a symbol reprorluced many centuries later in the mise of St. Clement at Rome), and in additiun to the customary sheep ns many goats appeared on the left of the Saviour, symbolizing the last judgment. We canoot sufficiently regret the loss of these very remarkabie early works. ${ }^{\text {b }}$

The catacombs present very few examples of mosaic work. There are fragnsents of a mosaio pleture of considerable size on the soffit of the arch of an arcosulium in the catacomb of St, Hermes. From the eagravings given by Marchi (Monum. delle Arti Crist, Primit., tay, xlvii., deacribed $p$. 257) we see that it must have been a very rude perfurmance, the drawing bad, nad the execution coarse. The portions remaining exhibit the raisiag of Lazarus, Daniel th the lions' dea, and the paralytic carryiag his bed, only difieriag from the ordinary catacomb frescoes in the material employed. The mosalo cubes, according to Mr, Parker (Archucoloyy of Rome, Catacumbs, p. 110), are entirely of glass paste, not of marble. Marangonl (Cuse Gentilesche, p. 461) preserves the record of an arcosolium la the cometery of St. Callistus decorated in mosaic, with our Lord seated between St. Peter and St. Panl, also sented. Two sepulchral mosaics from the same catacomb are preserved in the sacristy of St. Mary in Trustevere, one representing birds, probably, according to Mir. Parker, of the 2ad ceutury, the other, represeating the miraculous draught of fishes, of the 3rd (Parker, u. s.

[^57]Mosaics, p. 3). Two mosalo busts in circular medallons, from the cemetery of St. Cyriaea, discovered In 1056, are preserved In the Chigi Library. One repreasnta a young man, Vlavius Juliua Julinnus, with short black hafr; the other his deceasel wife, Maria Simplicia luantica. She, as one deceased, is represented in the attitude of prayer, with outstretchel hamis (De Russl, Musaici Cristiani dillo Chiese di limmi). Perret (rol, lv, pl, vil. No, 3) gives a mosale fragment, depicting a fighting cork, also irom a eatacomb. Thls seanty list comprises nearly, if not quite, all the eatncomb inowales recorded.

The earliest known examples of mowale art used for the decoration of a sincred bulldlagy are those of the 4th century, which cover the wagionroof of the circular alsle of the chureh if st, Constantia, in the inmediate vicinity of the basilica of St, Agnes, outside the walls of Liome. There is suffitient reason to believe that this edlifice was crected by Constantine tho Great either as a baptistery to the adjacent basilica (Bartisteity, sol. 1. p. 165), or after his denth as a place of sepulture for hls two daughters, Coastantia, or Constantiaa, who died A.D, 354, aad Heleas, the wife of Julian, who died A.n 360. As in the earliest Christian frescoes, the style of art seen in these mosaics is in no way distinguishable from pagan art of the same perlod. They beloag essentially to the class ot decorative jaintings, and although those who wish to do so may rend a Christlan symbolism into the vintuge seenes which cover the raults, it is probable that none such was inteaded. "They have quite the light and gily claracter of ancient pagan wall decoration, und If they mast be considered of Christian origiathe vine and vintage scenes having been frequeatly adopted as Christian emblems-they are probably the earliest Christian wall-mosaies that have been preserved " (Dr. Appell, Christian .Vosaic $P_{i}$ tures, p. 6). These mosaics form twelve equal compartments, the opposite buys haring analogous decoratlons. The grouad of the whole is white, Instead of the blue or golle which subsequeatly uaiversally prevailed. So widespread and complete has been the destruction of the earlier mosaics that the only other work which can be with any probability referred to the time of Constantine is that which decorates the cupoln of the church of St. George at Salonikn, the ancient Thessalonica. This church is on sufficient grounds assigned by M3I. Texier and Pullan to the first sojourn of Coastantine at Thessalonien (323). It is a circular billing, covered whith a dome more than 216 feet in circumference entirely lized with macaics of the most magnificent character, probably the most extensive work of the kind in anperficial area that has come down to us. According to the anthoritios just quoted this mosaic, which is one of tho very few that has survived the fury of the Iepoclasts or of the Mahommedans, covers no Jeas than 9,732 square feet, and it has been ealculated to contain more than $36,000,000$ tesserae. The light and fanciful architectural designs, vividly recalling the wall fresenes of the Bnths of Titus or those at Pomprii, which are momarkedly abseat from the majority of the Christian mosales furnish an unmistakeable evilence of its early date. The drawing, though conventional and architectonic, is goor, the arrangensent exceedingly dignified, the colouring rich and harmonious, and the whole effect of the cupola, with its gold gronnd, extremely gorgeous. The cupola is divided Into eight compartments, alternately repenting each other in general design. They present a geries of sacred edifices of fantastic architecture, veiled with purple curtains floating in the wiad, with richly plumaged birds,-peacocks, ibises, ducks, partridges, curlews, doves, sec.,-perched on the friezes, which are themselves decorated with dolphius, biz ls, pulm trees, and other naturalistic devices. Each of these buildings presents a spleudid colonarde, in the centre of which a semi-circular or octagonal apse protected by cancelli retires, or a veiled baldacehino stands, with a burning lamp hanging from the vault above the curtnined altar, the whole displaying invaluable evidence of early ritual r.erangement. On either side of the altar stands a haly personage, colossal in stature and severe in aspeet, in the variously-coloured dress of solemn ceremonial, with his hands elevated and outstretebed in prayer. (Woodeut No. 3.) The personages represented, who all bear names famous in the Greek church but less familiar in the West, are (1) over tne west door (a) Romanus, a white-bearded preshyter; (b) Eukarpion, a young dark-haiced soldier ; 2. (to S.) (a) effaced ; (b) Anadias, a presbyter; B. (a) Basiliscus, a soldier ; (b) Priscus, a soldier; 4. These magnificent and most interesting works deserve to be much more widely known and mors carefully studied. salonics boasts of another magnificent mosaic in the cupola of St. Sophia, a work of the 6th century, of which we rhall speak in ita place.

The only other ancient mosaics brenthing the spirit of classical art are those of the 5 th century, which decorate the qualripartite vaults of the chapels of St. John the Baptist and St. Jonn the Evangelist, which open out of the Lateran baptistery. These are said to have bean apartments in the palace of Constantine, converted into chapels by pope Hilary, A.D. 461-467. The Christian character of these mosnics is shewn by the nimber Holy Lamb, surrounded by a rich garland of fruit and flowers in tie centre of each ceiling; but the decoration with its graceful arnbesques, vases of fruit and groups of birds, peacocks, ducks, parraquets, red-legged partridges, and deres, and other conventional orniments, are quite in the classical style of $S t$. Constantia. The ground, however, is gilt, not white, as in that building. On the walls of the chapel of St. John the Baptist are figures of the four Evangelists. (Clampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. tab. 74, 75; Parker, Mosaics, p. 16.)

MOSAICs

What earlier in date, having been executed by the der or Sixtus III., A.B. 4:32-440, as is expressly Charlem hetter of Hadrian 1. to the emperor the most rit, belong to arkable works of early Christian art, belong to $n$ totally different school. As Lord Lindsay has remarked (History of Caristian solated; none have had i.), "none stand so on the latter ages of its development." The reason of this want of artistic relatiou with anterior or subsequent works lies probably in the fact that the artists who designed the study of formed themselves entircly on the study of classieal bits-reliefs, especially while their predecessors Trajan and Antoninus, of the bat hs adecessors had taken the frescoes of the bat hs as their models, and their suceessors Tormed their taste in Greece or Byzantium. These very remarkable mosaics ennsist of two series: viz. (1) those decorating the areh of the tribane, and (2) those ranged along the walls of the nave, oecupying what may be ealled the triforiam space. Of these the former series are much the inferior; "straggling in composition,", writes Lord Lindsay, "and poorly executed." They have, indeed, little artistic interest except as the earliest known representations of scepes frem the enrly gospel history. As such, it has been remarked that they masifest the difficulty ats elassical whools had in depieting subjects which as yet lasd no fixed type in Christinn art. The pictires accordingly exhibit no distinctly Christian characteristics, or anything that differeoces them esseatially from Pagan subjects, For the first time, it is true, we here see at the apex of the aych, in a medallion, the familiar symbol of the jewelled throve bearing the apocalyptic roll with seven seals, and above the roll a gemmed cross and crown, suppoited by St. Peter and St. Paul, with the evangelistic symbols on either side, and below it the signsture of the builder xysivs. EPISCOPVS. PLEBI. dei. But the scencs of Gospel history depictesd below are so entirely onlike the subsequently recogrised types that it is not at first sight caser to identify them. These pictures occupy the wall on either side of the arch, and are ranged in five lows. The appermost row (1) contains to the left (a) the angelic message to Zacharias; (b) the Annunciation; to the right (c) the Presentation in the Temple; (2) the second row contains (d) the Adoration of the Magi [see woodcut, article Avabls, vol. i. p. 84]; (e) our Lord among the doctors; (3) the third row gives a Jong subjeet, (f) the Massacre of the Innocents, extending to both sides of the arch; (4) in the fourth row we see, again for the first time, the two holy cities of Bethlehem and Jerusalem ; (5) the fifth, the Fsithful figured as aheep. It deserves notice that in these pictures, the only figures besides Christ distinguithed by the nimbus nre those of the angels and Herod, as if the nimbus were a conventional mark of dignity unconnected with silnctity. The Virgin Mary never has it; at any rate in the priginal design. (See Ciampini, Tet. Mom. rol. i. P. 203; Vnlentini, la Patriarc. hasilica Jitherianta, drawing irker, Mosaics, p. 15; South Keasington drawings, No. 7445.) Far superior in drnwing and grouping are the acenes from the Old Testawent which cucupy the walla of the nave. Here esques, vases coeks, ducks, and dores, are quite in antia. The e, as in tbat 3 of St. Jehn Evangelists. , 75; Parker, we recognise the apirit of the antiqne still lingering, while the distinetly religious iden is almost entirely wanting. They were originally forty-two in number, but are now only twent $y$-seven. Six were destroyed to form the arches of extrance to the Borghese and Sistive chapels, and nine, lost through neeident or decay, have been replaced by paiutings. in these, which we may regard as the first nad last effort of any extent in dramntic rejresentation, "the composition is often excellent; the attitudes simple and expressive, though they want relief, and the conception is altogether superior to The performance" (Lord Liodsay, u. s. p. 101). The series, which begins at the upper end to the left with the interview of Abraham and Mel. ehizedek, carries on the Old Testament history through the tlmes of Isaac and Jacob, anil begianing again at the same end to the right with the fin ling of Noses, parsues his history and that of Jushun to the battle of Bethhoron. "express well what they are about. One feel that the two groups are separating. Isaac blessing Jacob has almost the same pose as Raphael has given it in the Loggie; the taking of Jericho the battle with the Amalekites, also hare details which are not without a certain interest." The visit of the angels to Abraham, of which we give a woodeut (No. 4), in which three stages of the story are represented in one pieture, has a solemn dignity not unworthy of the subject (Ciampini, Vet. Mon, vol. i. tav. 50-64; Valentini u. s.; Parker, Photoyr. 1950-1966; 2038-20.58).

There are few ancient works of which the date has been more variously assigned than that of the very remarisable mosaic in the apse of St. Pudentiana on the Esquiline, perhans the moat beautiful in Rome. It has been placed at various epochs trom the end of the 4th to the close of the 9th centrary. The earlier date is with little doubt the correct one. It is true that as wo see lit now the picture has suffered too much from the hands of restorera to allow us to speak with absolute certainty on the point. But in the remarkable dignity of the composition, the freedom of trantment and correctuess of per-ppective, as well aa in the whole drawing group ing and drapery, it has all the essential marks of a living art, and points to a time when the still surviring traditions of the Pagan schools had been quickened with a new spixit. The figures do not, as in the later mosaics, atand in rigid isolation, gaziug out into vacancy, but are seatel with most calm dignity, "grouped so as to form a picture," and displayiug much variety of attitude and individuality of feature. Kugler's verliet is certainly correct, that "even if the building itself be proved to be of more recent date than Siricius, who built the church A.D. 394 , still this work at least must have been copied from one much older" (u. s. p. 41). This picture represents Christ enthroned in the centre of a semicircle of Apostles in Roman costumes (two of whom have been lost by modern repairs), each seated in front of an open portal, forming a crescent-shaped cloister with a tiled roof above which rise the roofs and domes of the heavenly Jerusalam. St. Peter and st. Paul sit on either side of Christ. Behiod then stand two female figures of singular dignity and beauty, with martyrs' chaplets in their hands, representing either St. Pudentiana and her sister St. Praxedes, or, according to Garrueci, the charch of the circomcision and that of the gentiles. None are nimbed except our Lord. Uhrist is seated on a richly decorated throne, His right hard is raised in benediction, and in the left lle holds a book inscribed Lominus Consermator Eoclesiae Pulentianac. Behiud His throne a tall jewelled cross is planted on a mount, and among the clouds which form the background are seen Evangelistic symbols of somewhat large dimensions. We give a woodeut of this rery remarkable and beautiful work (No. 5).c

Passing over the small remains of the mosaics of St. Sabina, Rome, with the singular "imagines clipeatae," and the noble figures of the churches of the Jewrs and the Gontiles, entirely Roman in type, character, and costume, c. 424 (Ciampini, u.s. vol. i. c. 21, tab. 48), and the fragmenta of the once imposing decorations of St. Paul'a outside the walls, set up by Leo the Great, A.D. 440-462, mentioned in Hadrian's letter to Charlemagne already referred to, which were almost entirely destroyed in the conflagration of 1823 to the irreparable impoverishment of early Christhas art (Kugler, u. s. p. 20; Parker, Whosaics, p. 16 ; see woodcut, art. Cifurch, vol. i. p. 371), we must now transfer our attention to Ravenna. No city in Italy, Rome hardly excepted, can shew such admirnble specimens of this art. They belong chicfly to the earliest and hest period, while the principles of classical art were still in living exercise, before the nieratical traditions of the Byzantine school had hegud to proscribe all traces of freedom and natire. Nowhere do we find pictorial decoration more intimately allied to architectural arrangements, the two being so closely connected t at each appears essential to the completencss of the other. The mosaic works still existing at liavenna-many, alas ! have perished-exhibit fuur listinct strles of art. The earliest and most classical in style and drawing are those of the lower part of the orthodox baptistery, set up by archlishnp Nena, A.D. 430 , and those which cover the whole of the interior of the mausoleum of Galla Placilia, now known as the church of St. Nazarias and Celsus, A.D. 440. inferior in style and execution, though still eatirely free from Byzantine stiffiness, are those which decorate the domes of the orthodox bajtistery, and of the Arian baptistery, which may be ascribed to the same date, c. A.D. 553 We have examples of a third mode of treatment distinct from the other two, in the mosaics of St. Yital, A.D. 547, of the chapel of the archbishop's palace, completed in the same year, and of the basilica of St. Apollinaris in Classe, bailt in A.D. 549 . "In themselves," writes Mr. Layard (u.s. p. 14), "these mosaics are deserving of the nost careful study, as belonging to the best period of early christian mosaic art. They nre especially valuable to the architect, as affording some of the finest examples of the tratment of pictorial mosaics, and of the technical foalities of the material." The Ravenna mosaics, though, as we have seen, exteading over a period of full a century, and displnying rarious styles, are evidently productions of one and the same school of art ; exhibiting, it is true, a gradunl decline from classical dignity and parity of taste, but maintainiag on the whole the same high level, both in drawing and design, as well as in harmony of

This building is internally an octagon, covered with a capola, and is brilliant with mosaics, almost from floor to roof. The most remarkable of these are the eight prophets; grand majestie figures, Iraped in white, which oneupy the spandrels of the lower tier of arches, upon an oval background of gold enclosed by acanthus leares which spresd out in lovely arabesque seroll-work. To quote a very apreeciative description, "the most remarkable individuality, not merely in tace but in figure, is preserred in each; and in ench there is a distiact exjression, life-like and full of character. fills the centre of the cupols, Christ is entirely nude, immersed in the river ap to the middle. The Baptist, hnlf mide, pours water on the Siviour's hend, on which the boly dove is deseending. An incongruous relic of paganism appears in the ferm of the river-god Jurdan, rising from his stream and offering a oajpin as an act of homnge. The mosaics of this bailding stand in the very highest rank among similar works for the richness of the ornamentation, the harmony and delicacy of the colouring, the excellence of the drawing, and the dignity of the composition. (Ciampini, Fet. Mon. vol, ii, c. 25 ; vonQuast, Raronna, taf. 1. pp.4, 5; Kugler. p. 25.) Annlogous in style, and rivalling the bajistery in the rich harmony of its ornomentation, is the maseleum of Galla Placidia, A.D. 440. This is a building in the form of a short Latin eross, each arm covered with a barrel vault, with a small cupola rising on a square lantern above the intersection. The whole interior, both walls and roof, from the height of about six feet from the floor, is conted with mosaics, which, as Messrs. Crowe and Cavalensalle have pointed out, are of special value as a counecting link both in the subjects and their treatmont between the Graeco-Roman work of the primitive Christian church, and the strictly new-Greck or Byzantine ; betwen the frescoes of the catacombs and the mosaics of the Roman churches. The chief arches are decorated with rich acanthus seroll-work (see woodcut No. 6), which also covers the lunettes at the enls of the transepts, where the bright green leaves peucilled with red and black and bordered with gold, stand out on a dark blue grount, with stags making their way through the foliage to slake their thirst at a fountain, in evident allusion to Ps. xiii. 1. The subject in the chiaf lunette facing the entrance has been varimusly explained. It represents a male figure, advancing with energetic stride, his pallium floating in the air, and bearing a crux hastata over his right shoulder. In his right hand he carries an open book. Before him to his right is an iron grate or griliron, with burning woud under it. Behind him is an open cupboard, or scrinium, containing rolla of the Gospela. This figure has been identified from the days of Ciampini downwards with our Lord, and the book is supposed to be an heretical work which Ile is about to throw into the flames. Such a representation of our Lord, however, is quite without a parallel in the whole cycle of sacred art, and it has of late, with more probability, been regarded by Garrucei and Richter (Die Mosaiken von Rarenna, p. 31), as St. Lawrence with the instrument of his martyrdom, as the gword lies at the feet of St. Agnes in the mosaic in the basilica bearing her nams at Rome. The book held by him would under this interpretation be one of the Gospels (before the restoration of 1875 the scrinium contained only three rolla, St. Matthew, St. Luke, and St. John), borne na a symbol of his office as a deacon (ef. Const. Apost. lib. ii. c. 57 ; Hieron. Epist. Ivii. ; Concil. Vasens. ii. c. 2). Very superior both iu design and execution is the celebrated, but somewhat overpraised, mosaic of the Good Shepherd in the lunette above the chict entrance. "For beauty and purity of design," writes Mr. Layard (u. s. P. 14), "which nearly approaches that of classic times, and for exquisite harmony of colour, this is one of the most perfeet specimeus of the art that can be found." lts resemblance to some of the catacomb frescoes of Orpheus is too strong to be overlooked. [Frrescoes, vol. i. p. 656.] The Saviour, represented as a beardless young man with long flowing bair, clad in a long goll tunic striped with blue, aud holding a crux hastata in llis left hand, is seated in a grassy, hilly landscape, with His sheep grazing around Him, caressing with His right hand one of the floc: that has lovingly approached 11 im ." Each o:

We have to leap over a century to arrive at the period of the execution of the mosaics of what is known as the Arian baptistery, or St. Maria in Cosmedin, said to have been built by Theodoric, and after his desth reconciled abi decorated by bishop Agnellus, c. 560 . Our limits fortill our divelling upon these works of art, which are almost exactly reproductions of these in the upper part of the dome of the orthodox baptistery. We have, as there, the brotism of Christ in the centre, with the attendant figures of the Baptist and the river-god Jordaa, with the lengthy, angular apostles in a lower zonedispropor:jonate, figures-berring crowns. (See Ciampini, Vot. Mon. vol. ii. c. 23 ; von Quast, 18; Kugler, p. 35.) '

We pass now to the celebrated church of St. Vital, consecrated in 547. It will be seen from the ground plan and section of this remarkatlo edifice (Cuunca, vol. i. pp. 375,376 ), that in its general plan it is circular, covered by a dome, with what we may call a quadrungular chancel ending in a domed apse. There can be no douht that the principal dome, together with the whole of the interior, was originally decorated with mosaics, but the whole have perished at the hands of later restorers with the exception of those of the sacrarium and apse. These are so remarkable in their treatment and so splendid in their general effect as to make us regret most keenly the destruction of the others. Although the architec* ture of the church is what was afterwards known as Byzantine, and it owed its erection to the Emperor of the Enst, the term "Byzantine" canoot properly be applied to the mosaics, "The style of art," writes Kugler, "is still of that late Romnn class already described, and we have no reason to conclude that the artists belonged to a more Eastern school " (Handiook of Painti,m, u. s. p. 34). It is evident, however, that the direct classical influence was waning, and giving place to realism. They no longer, as in the representations of which "the Good Shepherd" of the mausoleum of Galla Placidin may be taken as a type, "reflect pngnn art-tradition glorified by Christian sentiment," but either depict scenes bslonglag to their own times or sacred subjects into which the spirit of the day has been breathed, with scarcely any trace of satique feelings. To the same perlod belong the mosiales of the drapel of the archiepiscopal palace.s (Woodent So. Э.) We have here a done with the monogram of Christ in the centre, supported by four simple ad gracetinl angels, with the evangelistic symbols in the spandrels, all on a golel grouma. The sollit of each of the four sustaining arches is decorated with seren medallion heads on an azure ground, that of Christ (a very youthful bust) occupying the place of honour in the centre of the chancel arch, with three of the npostles on either side, the heads of the remaining six with that of St. I'aul, ornameating the western nreh. The side arehes erhib:t six male saints to the north, nad as many female saints to the south, with the sacred monogram in the centre. These medallions are conceired in the same spirit as those on the arch of the sacrarium of St. Vital, but are inferior in design and execution.
The mosaics which decornte the basilica of St. Apollinaris in Classe belong to a later period, c. 671-677, but they may be conveniently treated of here, as they are examples of the same school of art, and present many points of close resemblance to the earlier works. These mosaics are pronounced by Kugler to be of the highest importanee in the history of ecclesinstical art, as alinost the only surviving example, since the conflagration of St. Paul's nt Rome, of the manoer in which "whole rows of pictures and umbols were employed to ornament the interior of churches" (Kngler, u. s. p. 61). The spandrels of the nave arches offier a series of eurly Christian symbols, from the simple monogram to the Good Shepherd nad the Fishermin, while a line of medailions on the wall above eshibita full-face pertraits of the archbishops of Rarema, on the saine plan as the series of popes in St. Paul's, which are continued also along the wall of the aisles. (See the woodcut, article Citren, vol. l. p. 377.) These are modern, but aparently correct cepies. The mosaics of the apse are original, aud very remarkable. The arch of the tribune presents the familiar armugement. The ba:t of Christ, in a medallion, oceupies the cenive betwoen lis evangelistic simbols, with twelve sheap on elcier side isulng from the gatus of the two holy citice and sivatuing up the side's of the arch. Lower down are the twe archangels, Michnei and Gabriel, with heads of youthrul beauty, ench bolding the labarum. Lower still are figures of St. Matthew and St. Luke. The side walls of the apse present two very remarkable historicai compositions, evidently desigued in imitation merifices of the Old. To the south the three merifices of the Old Testament, those of Abel, Melehizedek, and Abraham, are combined in

Between the five windows of the apsie are sainted bishopls of lavenaa in pontifical robes, holling books, and blessing the people. The most noteworthy however of the series of mosaics in this elhurch is that of the Tranafiguration, which fills the conch of the apse, considered by Lord Liumlay as "perhaps the mort beantifully execute: mosaic in Ravenna." At the base of the composition, in the central positiou, Ceserved in the earlier mosaies exclusively for Christ, St. Apollinaris stands in his pontifical robes, with his arms extended in prayer, bet ween six slieep on either silde. The freedon trom the telmporary works which characterizes the conlndeed notwits at Rome is very nuteworthy. Indeed, notwithstanding its intimate political connection ditioction with Censtautinople the git-tralite dan of Ravenna seem to have continued to a inte date unnllected by the paralyzing influence whe schools of the Eastern capital, which was de-tined to destroy the lite of ecclesinstical nit, and reduce it to the almost mechauical reproduction ot conventional forms, dejending for their effect on the architentenic regularity of their arrangement and the gorgeonsness of the materials employed. The absence of Byzantine intuence here has been nuticed by Mr. Freeman; the "Ra veuna monuments all ceme together under one head; they are all Christian Roman Greek inscriptions appear over the heads of the holy personages in the mosaies (at St. Mark's, Venice), but the walls of St. Vitalis and St. Apollinaris in Classe spake no tongue but Latin" (Historical and Architectural Shetcolcs, pp. 46, 47).
Contemporaneous with the earliest mosaics at Ravenna are the very lnteresting works at Milan, in the churches of St. Lawrence and St. Ambrose. Those at St. Lawreuce are in the lateral apses of the anclent chapel of $\mathrm{S}_{\text {t }}$. Aquilinus, containing the temb of Ataulphus, the first husband of Gailla Plaeldin (a.D. 415): They may be safely ascrlbed to the early part of the 5th century, and are entirely fiee from Byzantine influence. The tribune to the left represents a pastornl scenc, where three youthtul shepherds, one aslecp, are depicted with three sheep, in a rocky landseape, under a cloudy nocturmal sky. Two dignitied tigures elad in rich gold-eoloured robes are directing the attention of the shepherds to something out of the picture. If, us Dr. Appell believes, this represents the angel appearing to the shepherds at the Nativity, it is an interesting proof of the entire absence at that early period of any recognaed type of the accue (Allegranza, Spiegazoni, \&e, tav. 1 ; South Kens. Nos. 7782, 7967). The mosaics at St. Ambrose are in the side chapel of St. Satyrus, or of St. Vector, "ad cuelum aureum," this being the origimal place of the latter saint's laterment. They nre nseribed to the middle of the 5th century, nud are of remarkable excellence, characterized by a living freelom and absence of stitliness. Before we return to Rome to trace the gradual stllfening and shrivelling up of ccelesiastical art under increasing Byzantine influence, we must cross the Adriatic, and take a survey of the mosaies of the very remarkable bnsilica of Parenzo io Istria, erected, aceording to an inacription on the tabernacle, (strangely misread by Dr. J. M. Neale, and the German authorities) ${ }^{\text {a }}$ by Euphrasius, the first bishop of the see, between A.D. 535 and A.D. 543. These mosaics bare o strong family likedess to those of Ravena, especially those of St. Apollinare Nuovo, and evidently belong to the same achool. The present state of the mosaics may be seen in Signor Fossati's work Agia Sotia. Salzenberg's plates afford an undeniable preof that even in Byzantium itself the stitfeniag influence of Byzantine pictorial traditions had hardly begun to operate in the 6 ts century. It is true that, with some exceptior. there is little attempt to prodace a pictoriait composition. The mosaics chiefly consist of majestic single figures rhythmically arranged as accessories to the architecture, looking down calinly on the worshippera below, without any indleation of action. But they are well drawn, and diaplay noae of the spectral rigidity and attenuated length which renders later liy anutine art so repalsive. The subsidlary oruamentation on the walls, panele, sotlits and spanirels of the arches is no less free and joyous. Here we have beautifni arabesque folinge, brauches of trees with clusters of truit and flowers, with stars, lozenges, triangles, and guilloche borders, manifesting the influence of a still living classical tradition. The whole interior of the church whs oricinally invested with inlaid work. The lower, portions were covered with "opus sectlle," patterns inlald in various-coloured marbles, while the upper and far larger portion was owathed, as it were, in a continuous gold sheet (we see the same, at a Iater date, at St, Mark's, Fenice), throwing up the stately sacred forms. The general arrangement of the mosaics may be seen in the section of St. Sophit, given in our first volume (Galleries, vol, 1. p. 707). Foar vast seraphs, with faces of youthful majesty, set In the midst of six overnhadowing wiags, oceupy the peulentives of the great cupola. These are still partially vlnible, their faces only beiug concealed by silver stars. The dome itself had no figares, and was simply divided by banits of conventloual oramment. The sotlits of the suar main irches supporting the donse were adoroed with full length colossal tigures of sacred pero somages within rich mosnic horders. The sotht of the arch of the apse presented on either side a traly magniticent pictare of a white-robed angel holding a glohe and a wand, with two wiags of vast leugth and breadth, almost reachiug to hls feet. The thee is characterized by a noble youthful beaty ; the hair long aud curling. The arrangement of the wall spaces within the cupola will be seen in the woodcut alrealy referred to. The six smaller figures between the second tier of wialows represent the minor prophets, thaked at cither eud by taller figures of the major prophets, Isainh and Jeremiah to the north, Ezekiel and Ianiel to the sonth. There is much variety and individuality of expression in these stately figures. Jeremiah has a very noble head, with long tlowing hair and beard. Jonah and Habakkuk arealso uoticeable. The lat ter has a very earnest face, without a beard, and with sliort hair (Salzenberg, pl. 30). A mosaic given by Salzenberg ( 1 . 31), from the Gynaeceum, representing the Day of Pentecost shews the only attempt at a regularly composed picture. The twelre apostles are ranged in a semicircle (it is noticeable that the Virgin is nbsent), the descending fiery tougues being depicted on the ribs of the half dome. A fragnent from one of the spandrels shews a portion of a group of bystanders, depicted with much graphic power. Half-ineredulous wonder is well represented in their faces. One ill-looking fellow with a geat's beard is mocking. The mosaics of St. Sophla are evidently not all of the same date. The figures of Eastern saints, Anthimus, Basil, Dionysius, Gregory Theologus, \&c., from the walls of the nave, eliew a somewhat soulless uniformity in dress form and feature, with an approach to excess of length, indicating a decline of art (ib. pl. 28, 29). The mosaic of our Lord enthroned, with the prostrate form of the emperor (Constantine Pogonatus) awkwardly poising himself on his knees and elbows at Hia teet, displays the union of excessive gorgeousaess of dress and accessories, with bad drawing sad ignorance of anatomy, which characterizes the later Byzantine works. (Woodcut No. 12.)

Another contemporabeous specimen of Greek mosaic, on a scale of which unhappily there are but few examples remaining, is the cupola of St. Sophia, at Thessnlonicn, representing the Ascension. This vast composition covers an area of 600 square yards, and is executed with s finish rarely exhibited in such works. It may be safely assigned to the middle of the 6th century. these mosaics are urgently called for. M. Didron also rejorts that the "vaults and cupoln of Fatopedi and St. Laura on Mount Athes, and of Daphae, near Athens, and of St. Luke in Livadia, are covered with mosaies," but he supplies no details.
The devastating inroads which swept over Italy in the 5th century effectually stamped out all aatlve art both in the capital and the provincial cities, The revival of mosaic decoration, as of the other forins of ecclesiastical art, must be attributed to artists from the Eastern Rome, who brought with them their technical processes and pictorial traditions. It was not, however, till a ater perind, as has been already remarked, that the rapid decline which characterizes the Byzantioe school proper set in. The mosaic compositions in Ronie belonging to the 6th century still uhibit a life and morennent which render them "in point of composition scarcely perceptibly infericr to those of the 5th, and in splendour of material by mo means 80 " (Kugler, u. s. I. 31). The finest mosaics of this class existing in Reme are those in the church of St. Cosmas and St. Damian (the Eastern physician aaints) in the Forum, built by Felix IV. A.D. 526-t30. (Wcodeut No. 13.) Here we perceive that we have finally said farewell to pintorial composition, and enter upen the system of pictorial architectonic decorations, which continued with cver-increasing formality and stiffness up to the extinetion of the art. The effect is made to depend entirely on majestic figures thythmically placed in motionless repose, striking the eye ol the worshipper with their calm and solemn grandeur, and filling his mind with revereace and awe, while "the rich play of antique decoration is lost sight of hehind the severe gravity of tigurative representation" (Litbke, History of Christian Art). which we trace a really liviog art in contradistinction to the mechanical reproduction of hieratienl forms, conforms to the typa described at the commencoment of tais article; conventional in arrangement, gergeous in colour, severe in form, and stern in expression. A colossal figure of our Lord, His right hand rajsed in benediction, His left holding a scroll, ocenpies the centre of the roof of the apse. To the left St. Peter introduces St. Cosmas; St. Paul, to the right, St. Damian, ench bearing martyrs' crowns. They are tollowed by St. Theodore to the right, gorgeously robed, carrying his crown, and pope Felix IV., the founder of the chureh, of which he carries a model, to the left (an entirely restored figure). The composition is terminated on either side by a palm tree, laden with fruit, sparkling with gold, symbolizing the tree of life. Above that to the left is the phoenix with a starshaped nimbus, typifying eterbal life through death. The river Jordan is ibdicated below Christ's feet, as it were dividing heaven from earth. A frieze encircling the upse bears twelve sheep, drawn with much truth aod fadividuality of expression, advancing from the two holy cities to the Holy Lamb, who, with nimbed hend, stands on a hill, from which issue the four rivers of Paradise, which, as well ns the Jordan, have their names inscribed. The arch of the apse presents the usual symbels on its face. In the ceotre the Lamb, "as it had been slain," on a jewellel altar with a crass behind nud the seven sealed book on the step; on either side the golden candlesticks, two angels, and the evangelistic symbols, two of which, as well as the throng of elders below offering their crosses, have been nearly obliterated by repairs. The only nimbed figures nec Christ and the angels. "The figure of Christ," writes Kugler (u.s. p. 32), " may be regnrded as one of the most marvellous specimens of the art of the middle nges. Countenance, attitude, and drapery combine to give Him an expression of quiet majesty, which for many centuries atter is not found agnin in equal beauty and freedom. The drapery especinlly is disposed in noble tolds, nad only in its somewhat too oronte details is $n$ further depniture from the antique observable. The saints are not as yet arranged in stiff parallel forms, but are ndvancing forward, so that their fignes appear somewhat distorted, while we already remark something constrained and inanimate in their step. . . A fecling for colour is here displayed, of which no later mosaics, with gold grounds give any idea. The hends are animated uud individual. . . still far removed from any Byzantiue stiffiness." (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol, ii. tab. 15, 16 ; De Rossi, Musaici Cristiani, fuse. v.; Fontana, Musaici delle Chiese di Roma, tab. 3 ; I.übke, History of Chvistian Art, vol. 1. p. 319 ; Parker. Photojr. 1441-1445; Sonth Kens, No. 7805.)

A very decided decline in art, though still preserving some traces of the nacient Roman manner, is manifested by the mosnics of St. Lawrence without the walls bullt by Pelagius II. (A.D. 577-590). The apse was destroyed when Honorius 11I. (A.D. 1210-1227) reversed the orleatation, and erected $n$ leng nave where the apse had stood, and the only mosaics remaining are on the back-side of the arch of triumph. They are too much restored and altered to be of much value in the history of art. Christ is here sented on the globe of the world, holding a long cross; to his right stand St. Peter and St. lawrence bearing similar crosses, and St. Pelagius, a diminutive figure, presenting his church. On Christ's left stand St. Paul and St. Stephen, and St. Hippolytus bearing his martyr's crown. Vitet remarks that the sarage ascetic aspect of Christ resembles that of an Oriental monk, (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. ii. c. 13, tab. 28 ; l'arker', Mosaics, 1p. 20-22.) "Stunding on the bonndary line between the earlier and later styles" (Kugler, u.s. p. 59), but shewing a very decided tendency to Byzantine trentment, are the mosaies of St. Agnes, the work of poje llonorias, A.D. 625-638. The picture, limited to three figures, is a strong contrast to the crowded compositions of later times. Here, for the first time, we have a humna snint occujylag the central place hitherto reserved for Christ, The Divine Hand holds the crown nbove her head. 'The execution is coarse, and the design poor. The forms are stiff and clongated, and the attitules conventional, while an attempt is mnde to compensate for deficiencies in art by richness of colour and gorgeousness of costume. St. Agnes is attired with a barbarous splendour in a dark purple robe embroidered with gold and overloaded with gems, as is her jewelled tiara, while strings of pearls hang from her enrs, rominiling us of the Empress Theodora at St. Vital's. Her red cheeks nre mere blotches, and the figure is outlined by heavy dark strokes. A sword lies at her feet, where flames are bursting from the ground, symbolizing her martyrdom. To her right Honorins presents his church; to her left pope Symmachue holds $n$ book. The ground is of goll, which by this time hal become the rule, seldom departed from (Ine Kossi, Musaici Cristiani, fasc. iv.; Fontnna, u.s. tar. 8; D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. 17, No. 2 ; Parker, Photoyr. 1593; South Kens., No. 974). The mosnics which decorate the apse of the oratory of St. Venantius (A.d. 632-642), attached to the Lateran baptlstery, depart somewhat from the ueual type. Christ and the two ndoring nagels are reduced to lusts, upborve on gaudy clouds. Below, not composed into a picture but stupding motionless side by side, are rangel nine full-length figures, the central one being the Virgin ns an "orate" (the enrliest exnmple of her representation, not in an historieal subject, In a lioman mosaie). To her right are St. Paul, St. John, st. Venantius, and pope John IV., the builder of the oratory, of which he holds $n$ model in his hand ; to her left St. Peter, St. Joho the Baptist, St. Domnius, and pope Theodore, by whom the oratory was completed. The frieze nbove the arch has the usunl symbelical representations; in the spandrels below are elght till-length figures of saints, four on each slde, some having crewns, others books. The exccution of the whole it coarse, and the design tastetess. We must pass rupidly over the remaining Roman mosaics in which Byzantive formalism gradually crushes out more and more of the life of art. Those of the small nitar apse attnched to the round church of St. Stephen, on the Coelian Hill, a.b. 642-649, display in the ceutre a richly jewelled eross between the standing figures of St. Primus and St. Felieinnis, with a medallion head of Christ on s upper arm (recalling the analogous

A solitary tigure in mosaic, that of St. Sebastian, over a side altar at St. Pietro, in Vineoli, belungs to the same period of art. The saint appears, not as in later art as a yoothful halfuaked Christinn Apollo, but as an old man with white hair and beard, in full Byzantije costame, with richly embroidered trousers bare legs and sandals. He holds his martyr's crown. His countemnnce displays stern resolution. The figure is stiff and lifeless. Some fragments of the mosaies put up in St. Peter's by John VIL., A.D. 703, removed when the basilica was rebuilt, still exist. A figure of the Virgin, with pulifted hands as an orante, is preserved in the Hicci chapel, in St. Mark's, at

The circular church of St. Theodore, A.D. 772 795, contains a well-cxecuted picture, which "is chiefly interesting to us as one of the earliest specimens of the copying of old mosnies" (Kugler, u.s. p. 4I). Christ in a violet robe, with long light hair and a short beard, holding a cross in his left hand, is sented npon a blue starry globe. St. Peter on the right is ln troducing St. Theodore, both being exnet copies of the corresponding figures in St. Cosmas and St. Damian, St. J'aul, on the left, introduces nnother youthful snint. Both are oflering their crowns on an embroidered mantle to Christ. The unmenning draperies indicate the rapid decline of art. 'l'he largest and most magnificent of the works of this period are those in the church of St. Praxedes. Nowhere, except at Venice and Ravenna, do we find so wide an extent of mesaic decoration in the some building. Not only the portions usually so ornamented, the apse and its arch, but a seeond arch crossing the nave, and a side chapel, that of St. Zeno, with its vaulted roof, are similarly vested. "The etfect of this grand work," writes M. Vitet, "is most imposing, the effect entirely of decoration, independent

The degrading intluence of the Byznntine art traditions were, howTree, too potent to allow the imitator to copy faithfully, He has roproduced the gencral form and lost tha apirit. The execution is rude, and the gergeousness of the colouring ouly increases the barbaric effect. The figures are stiff attenmited and ungular ; the countenances meagre 0 and ascetle; the drapery formed only by $n$ few dark lines. The sheep in the frieze are "like children's toys; small horses of wood badly cat"(Vitet). The arch of the tribune preserves the decorntion in a degraded form which bns almost entirely perished at St. Cosmas and St. Damian. (Woodent No. 14.) The front of thenreh of triumph represents in the centre the heavenly Jerusalen, within whose gates stands our Lord, too diminttive for effect, nttended by angels and saints, while below $n$ multitude of the redeemed approach in solemn procession "clad in white rohes, and with jalm branches in their hands." The simultaneous action of so vast a crowd is not without solemn efrect, but the whole displays conmonplace thought and feebleness of execution (Ciampini, tom. it, tabs, 47; Fontana, Kugler, ${ }^{\text {ta }}$ De Rossl, Musaici Cristiani, fusc. v.; kugler, pt. i. p. 67; Crowe and Cavalcaselle, 1506, 1507; South Kens, No. 976). Virgins, busts, and sacred symbole, ranged side by side on a glittering gold ground, with no attempt at combined pictorial effect. The vault exhibits in the centre a halflength figure of Christ upborne by four angels, apparently copied from the cciling of the arehiepiscopal chapel at Ravenna. The most iuteresting portion of these decorations is the Holy Lainb on a mount, from which issue the four stresma of Paralise, at which as many stags are drinking. The window nbove the side door is framed in double rows of medallion portraits, "which are merely rude enricatures" (Kugler, u.s. p. 68). (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 26, tab. 48, 50; Parker, Pholo/r. of the apse of St. Cecilin, in Trastevere, where the subjects and arrangements are nearly the same, nud which in rudeness and "multiplicity of figures correspond pretty much with those at St. Praxedes." We have "the same forgetfulness of the human frame, the aame dispurity between the ruchness of the costumes and the deformity of thase whonre elothed in them" (Vitet). (Clampini, vol. ii. c. 27, tab. 51, 52 ; Parker, Phoo togr. 1706.) To Paschal also we must ascribe the rich musaics of the apse of St. Mary in Nisvicella, or in Domnica, where, for the first time in existing Christian Koman art (the example at Parenzo is three centuries earlier), we find the Virgin Mary enthroned with our Lord on her lap, not as an iutant, but as a dwarfed man, tnking the chicf place in the composition. (Woodcut No. 15.) Kugler ealls atteation to the richness of the foliage decoration, usually proseribed by the moroseness of Byzantine art. The musaics of St .

Mark's, erected by Gregory IV., A.D. 82S, are, according to M. Vitet, "unquestionnbly the most barbarous in Rome," in which "all respect for any kind of rule, all antiquity of expression, all notion of order and benuty have disappeared. The mengreness of the figures, the lengthening of the bodies, the stiff parallelism of the draperies, cannot be carried farther." The subject, Christ nttended by apostles and saints, with the usual accessories, calls for no remark (Ciampini, tom. 3i. c. 19, tab, 36, 37). The cnthedral of Capun possesses mosaics of the snme school, which deserve fuller deseription and illustration (Cinmpini, tom. ii. c. 29, tab. 54). The chicf subject is the constantly repeated one of Chrint and His npostles, with the river of Paradise gushiug out at their feet. "The figures in their stiff yet iafirm attitudes, and still more in the unmeaning dispesition of the drapery, display a decided Byzantine influence" (Kugler, w.s. p. 66). On the walls on either side of the apse, at the epringing of the arch, are the pictures famous for their ecelesiastienl and politial sig. nificance. To the left the enthroned Snviour bestows, with His right hand, the keys on St. Sylvester and with His left hand the Vexillum on the emperor Constantine each kneeling at His feet, as the symbols respeetively of the spiritual and temporal power. To the right St. Peter, similarly enthroned, places a crown on the hend of pone Leo III., with his right hand and with His left gives the Vexillum to the emperor Charles the Great (Ciampini, tom. ji . c. 21, tab. 39, 40 ; Wharton Marrlott, Testimony of Catacombs, p. 95, pl. 6 ; Vestiarium Christ. pl. 32, 33 ; Parker. Photogr. No. 761). At the church of St. Nereus and Achilleus, rebailt by Leo III., A.D. 796, the mosaics of the apse have perished, but those above the arch remain, and are remarkable as representing historical scenes instend of the ususl symholical and apocalyptle suinjects. bla taller stature, and the awkward prostrate figures of the three apostles beyond. Further the left is the Aununciation, and to the right the Virgin and Child accompanled by an angel, less ungraceful than the other figures. The whole composition strikingly indicaten the low atate to which art had fallen at the end of the bth century (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 20, tab. 38). The last mosaic to be noticed in this period is that of the church originally called St. Marla Antiqua, then changed to St. M. Nova, and rededicated in the 16th century to St. Francesca Romatua, the name by which it is commonly boow. In this work there is a strange mixture of good and bad, with some novelties of trestmeat, indicating the introduction of a new influence. The chict figure, ns at St. Maria in Navicella, is the Virgin attended by saints, with our Lord on her lap, throned, and now for the first time crowned. The nttempt at pictorial composition is entirely given ap, and architectural composition ja substitated tor it. tural composition is substituted for it. The figures are, nccording to the arrangement with which we become afterwards so familiar, for the first time placed each uuder the arch of a cantinuoas areade, supported by columns. A sort of tabernacle, in the torm of a cockle shell, spreads over all the upper part of the mosaic. The drawing is very bad; the figure of the Virgin, "one of the most hideous that cau be imagined" (Vitet), the cheeks simply red blotches, the tolds of the drapery merely dark strokes, poorly compensated for by the Oriental magnificence of the costunnes, especilly that of the chief figure. The garlands of foliage, however, display a certnin grace alien from the usually morose rigidity of the Byzantine achosl. Iudeed the whole composition iudicates rome original power and freedom of thought on nart of its designer (Ciampini, tom. ii. c.
:53). With the Imperial power the art
osaic was transferred from Rome to en. Charles the Great summoned the artists to decorate his new basilica, for the enichment of which rich marbles and pillars were transported from Ravenan. Ciampinj (tom. ii. c. 22, tab. 41) preserres the design of the apse, which is very unlike the asual coaventional type. In the centre is our Lord enthroned, holding a book with an angel on either side. Below are seven small figures of the ellers rising from their throues, aud casting their crowns at our Lord's feet. After the 9 th century, during the fierce struggles of contealiug tactions, by which the unhappy land was reut asuader, mosaic ceased entirely in Rome and in Italy generally. Its first revival was in the republic of Venice, where we find its earliest examples in the church of St. Cyprian at Murano, and on a most extensive ccale and with the utmost gorgeousness of character at St, Mark's. These, however, nere outside our chronological limits. The nut was much later la its revival in Rome itself, where the earliest examples, evidently the work of Byzantiue artivts, helong to the 12th century. We may specially mention those of St. Mary, in Trasterore A.d. 11301-1143; St. Clement, A.D. 12500 1274 ; St. John Lateran, A.D. 1288-1294; the apse of St. Mary Major's, of the same date, and the etternal mosaics in the facade, A.D. 1292-1307.

tomary for widows to lndulge in displays of excessive grief, In a dissuasive agalast second marringes omong this elass, he adverts, though without direct censure, to the rending of the hair over the corpse, lacerated cheeks, "livore foednta ubera," the mouraer "coelum jpsum alulatibus rumpens," ns ordinary expressious of sorrow on the part of widows (Migue, xI. 305). The authority of St. Chrysostom is emphatienlly pronounced agaiust such excesses. In aldressing so nudieuce, he says, "Theaceforth therefure let no one beat the breast, or wail, or Impuga Christ's vietory. For IIe conquered denth. And why dost thou, $O$ mouruer, weep without measure? This state ( $\tau \delta \pi \rho \hat{a} \gamma \mu a)$ is but a sleep. Why dost thou lament and utter cries? For if even the Geatiles ("E $\lambda \lambda \lambda \eta{ }^{\circ} \mathrm{s}$ ) werg wont thus to do, it in evident allusion to Matt. ix. 24, кal кaтe siroi). But if the faithful dishonour themselves by such practices, what excuse can they piead? For how canst thon expect to be forgiven who actest thus fooiishily, and that too when Christ has so long been risen and the proofs of His resarrection are so elear? But thou, as though seeking to magnify thy offence, bringest houghe-mayst add fuel to thy grief and stir up the furance of nffiction; and heedest not the words of St. Paul, 'What concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?'" (Humil. 31; Migne, Serics Graeci, ivii. 374). This passage can hardly be noderstood otherwise than as inplying that the practices condennaed were prevalent in the Chureh in Chrysostom's time. The fiual conelusion of the honily is that the Christian ought not to mourn for the relative who has been removed from tha calamities of life, nor even, with the prospect of future rennion, to grieve over a temporary separation. The passage is quoted in confirmation of his own view by John of Damaseus in his Sacra Parallela," De mortuis, et quod eorum causa non sit lugendum " (Nigne, Series Graeca, xcvi. 543); see also a sermon nttributed to Chrysostom by the Benedietine editorss (ib. xl. 1166), in which the conduct of Horatius on receiving the intelligeace of his son's death (Livy, ii. 8) Is cited with approval.
St. Jerome holds aimilar language. In writing to ons Julianus, a man of wealth, who in the lapse of a few days had not only lost his wife and two dnughters by death, but also a considerable portion of his property through an invasion of the barbarians, he snys, "laudent ergo te alii … quod laeto vultu mortes tuleris tilinrum, quod in quadragesimo die dormitionis curum lugubrem vestem mutaveris, et dedicatio ossium martyris candida tibi vestimenta reddiderit, ut uniressa sentiret, uniremsa sentiret, sed ad triumphuin martyris eaulsares; quod sanctissimam conjugem tuam oon quasi mortuam sed quasi proficiscentem deduseris" (Epist, cxvii. Migne, xxii. 794).
It is, however, unquestionable that by many comewhat different views were held, A passage in one of the Apostolical Constitutions, belonging, it is conjectured, to the pcriod interveuing between the age of Cyprian and that of Chrysostom, shews that a more definite and formal observance shews that a more definite and formal observance
cated by the Church, though the passage probably indicates the practlce of the East rather than of the West [Arost. Congr, p. 125]. A short religious service, whereby it was dexigned not so much to lament as to commemorate the decenser, is here directed to be held on the third, ninth, and fortieth days after the day of death, the anniversary of the day to be observed by a distribution of alins to the poor. 'Enireneifow of eis dud $\mu \nu \eta \sigma \iota \nu$ aivoû (Const. Apıst. viii. 42 ; Cotelerius, i. 424). The repetition of such observauces on the ninth day (correspouding to the Greek Evara, Lat, novendiulia) appears to have had only pagna precedent, and is accordingly condemned by St. Augustine, who considers that the obserVance of the other days is in conformity with Scriptural usage. "Nescio utrum inveniatur alicui sanctorum in Scripturis celebratum esso luctum novem dies, qued apud Latinos Novendial appellant. Unde mihi videntur ab hac consuetudine prohibendi, si qui Christianorum istum in mortuis suis numerum servant, qui magis est in Gentiliun consuctudine. Septimus vero dies auctoritatem in Scripturis habet: unde alio loco seriptum est, Luctus mortui septem dierum; fhtul autem omnes dies vitne ojus (E.celes. xxii, 15). Septennrius autem numerus propter sabbati sacramentum praecipue quietis indicium est ; unde merito mortuis tanquam requiesceutibus exhibetur" (Quaest. in Heptaterch. i. 172; Migne, xxxiv. 596). St. Ambrose, iu his Uratio de cbitu Theodosii (ana. 375), snys, "Ejus ergo prineipis et proxime conelamavimus obitum, et nunc quadragesimam celebramus, nssistente sacris nitaribus Honorio priacipe; quia sicut snnctus Joseph patri suo quadragiota diebus humationis officia detulit, ita et hic Theodosio patri justa persolvit. Eit quia alii tertium diem et trigesimum alii aeptimum et quadragesimum observare consueverunt, quid doceat lectio consideremus." He then quotes Gen. 1. 2, and adds, "Haec ergo sequenda solemnitas quae praescribit lectio;" quoting agnin Deut. xxxiv. 8, he says, "Utraque ergo observatio babet auctoritatem."

Tertullian (de Coront, c. 3) speaks of offerings in memory of the departed, "obiationes pro defunctis," as customary on the anniversary of their death ; and Evodius, bishop of Uzala, in 414, when giving an account of the obseyuies of a yonag Christina, says, "per triduum hymnis Dominum coliaudnvimus super sepulchrum ipsiua, et redemptionis qacramenta tertio die obtulimus" (Epist, clviii. Migne, xxxiii. 694). This paasnge is adduced, apparently with little reason, by Martiguy (Dict. des Antif. Chrét, art. Devil) as evidence that offerings for the repose of the soul of the departed were authorised by the church.

The contrast of Christian to pagan sentiment In reiation to the subject is perhaps strongest in the manifestations of joy andl exultation [BURIAL of the Dead, p. 252] with which the relatives and triends followed the body to the grave. These demonstrations were, however, widely different from the spirit in which some barbarous nations (e.q. the Thracinns, the earlier Inhnbitants of Marselles) often conducted their funeral rites.

The latter indulged in naseemly riot and revelry. The feeiings of the early Christlans resembled rather those of the nacieat Clmbrl, who were wont to rejoice over frieads fullen la bnttle (Amm. Marcell. II. vi. 2), nad sueh demonstrations nppear to have been confined to (a) the olisequies of a martyr, $(\theta)$ those of some distingulshed benefactor of the Chureh, $(\gamma)$ these of at eceleslastic of superior ank nad emiaent plety. Jerome, speaking of the "uneral of Fabiola, says, "totiua urbls populus nd exsequias coagregnbat ; sonabant psalmi, et nuratn tecta templorum In aublime quatiebut Alleluin" (Migne, xxii. 466). A iecree attributed to pope Eutychianus directs that no martyr shall be interred without n purple undergarment (sine culubeu purpureo), the emblein of his service in the enuse ois his divine Master (ib. v. 158-161). Gregory of Tours, in recording the burial of St. Lupiciaua, siyss, "celebratia missis, cum summo honore gaudiopue sepult us ent." The office for the burial of a bishop in the time of Gregory the Great appears to have lacluded the singiag of the Hallelujah (Nigne, Ixxviii, 478,479); add the singiug of hymas when couveying the dead to the place of interment seems to have beea no invariable necompaniment. Victor Vitensis, in deseribing the condition of the faithful during the occupation by the Vaudala, nan. 487, says, 'Quis vero sustivent, ac possit sine lacrumis recordarl, cum praeciperet nostrorum corporn defunctorum sine solemnitate hymnorum, cum silentio ad sepulturam perduci" (I/ist. Fersecut. Fand. I. v.; Migne, lviii. 5). The Pseudo-Dioaysius, which may be regirded as of some authority with respect to the theory of tine Eastern church in the 5 th century, inculeates the obser vance of distinctions in the fuamern rites of the unconverted and of the righteous, correspendiag to the sentiments proper to their differeat careers. Their lives have diblered, and so their manner of encountering death must differ. The righteous mana, who has not given himself' up a slave to corrupt passions and crimianl excesses, is filled with joy at the prospect of completing his course of trial. Similariy, his relatives, oa his completion of that course, proaounce him the victory, hopiag that they themselves may come to a like end. These sentiments find, in turn, fitting expression in the netual rites [Buriai, p. 254]; Obsequiles (De E'ccles. Hierarch. c. 7 ; Migae, Series Graeca, iii. 263-265).

Undue parade and excess of adornment are censured by St. Jerome. Writing to the mother of Blaesilla, a convert who had died shortly after her conversion, he says, "ex mue parantur exequiae, et nubilium ordine prneeunte, uureum feretro velamen obtenditur. Videbntur mihi tunc clamare de coelo: non agnosco vestes, nmictus iste non est meus; hie ornatus alicaus est" (Nigne, xxii. 177). The langunge of St. Augustine (de Cieit. Dei, i. 13) is that of one who looks upon details of ceremoninl of this character as of little or no importance. At the third oouncil of Carthage (A.D. 397), at which he wha preseat, the practice of placing the Eucharlst between the lips of the defunct was condemped. The ceremony of biidiag the deceased farewell, probably by the kiss of pence, was condemaed in the bth century at the council of Auxerre.

The cuatom of remainiag within doors, secluded from soclety, during the firat week of mourning Is traced by Buxtorf (Lex. Chald. Talin. ad v. Luctus) to Jewlsh precedent. Uader Valeatlnian and Theodosius, it was cancted that a widow marrying again within a year from the time of the death of the husband "probrosis lnusta notis, honeatioris nobilisque perroane et decors et jure privetur, atque omyin quac de priaris maritf boais vel jure aponsaliorum vel judicio defuactl conjugis consecutn fuerat, amittat et sciat dee de nostro beneficlo vel nauotatione sperandum sibi esse subsidinm " (Cod. Thieodusianus, ed. Hanel, ili. 8). This lnw is evidently a reflez of Roman rather that Christian sentiment (see Ovid, Kasti, iii. 134; Zedler, Universal-Lexicon, s. v. Trutuerjahr).

The tolliag of the bell at the time of death, which is regarded by some as a timdition from pagaalsm, and deslgned originally to drive away evil spirita, does not appear as n Christhin usage before the 8 th century [Onsequies of the Dead], and wat more probably intended as a signal for prayer.

MUSIC.-For the first thousand years of the Christian era, the antique Greek eystem of music was adopted, with but few aiterations, and those chictly modifications of the compass of the acaic, and of the notation. In the article on Ambrosian Music, the matter (so far as chants are concerned) is taken down to the 4th century. Through the influence of St. Ambrose, all music but that consisting of a dintonic sequence of notes [see Canon] was diserrited; the other methols had been consilierai prefas: able, perhape on account of the dilliculty in performing such music, or from verniaiscences of an Oricntal origin ; and with the subseqnent irruptions of the barbarians, which mont have operated very seriously against the cultivation of any but ecciesiastical music, they becamg obsolete.
Gregortan Citant.-It was observed by St. Gregory, a great musician of his time, thut the Ambrosian chants, handed down traditionally to a great extent, had become corrupted; he therefore subjected them to revision, and added other modes and scales to those four which St. Ambrose lad retainei. This was dune by taking away the upper tetrachord from the Ambrosian scales, and placing it below the lower tetrachord. The octaves thus furmed were called from the previous scales, with the prefix hypo (ini), thus: Hypodorian, Hypphrygian, tiyioiydian, and Hypomixolydian. They were aiso called Plaga, while the four origianal ones were called Authentic. Thos in the Tourrius Reginonis Prumensis (midilie of 9th century) we find theta called "Authenticus protus; ii. Plaga proti; Tonus tertius autenticus: Tonus quartus, plaga doutori; Differentie v. toni autenticus tritus; Differentie sextl toni piagn triti; Differeatie vii. toni autenticus tetrarchus; Incipiuat siii. toni plaga tetrarchi." Thns we have the Dorian scale (tirst mode):

and the Mixolydian scale (seventh mode):

But it seems that the compars of chants was expected to be confined within fire or six notes, and those which are genernlly aceopted as typieal examples in the odd modes are certainiy bit so much within such limits as those in the even modies, whieh points to the supposition that St. Ambrose's chants had become so altered that the originala were probably forgotten in most instances: in the first mode, for exomple, $b$ fat is generaliy found, whereas it is not in the scale, and certaialy some very early coples of chants in this mode have assigned the b without any indication; It is, however, haril to imagine but that it was aung $b$ flat. It inust beborne in mind that the system of chanting being a monutone with an ornamental end, there are in every one of these scales two important botes: the Dominant, or preveiliag note on which the psulin was sung, and the Flaal, on Which the chant was made to end. These, in the Ambrosina modes, are respectively: Proti a, D; Deuteri $\mathrm{c}, \mathrm{E}$; Triti e, F; I'etrardi d, $G$. In the pligat modes, the same finals, D, E, F, G, were Lept, and the dominants placed lower, $F$, $A, a$, c. The first mode approximates the most nearly treffect to our modern minor mode: the fifth, to our major mole with Its fourth sharpeued; the uventh and eighti, to our modern major mode. The sixth, although it consiats of the Dotes now forming the natural seale of $\mathbf{C}$, is really in the toality of F. Our modern use of the terms suthentic and plagal, as appitied to cadences, sems detived from the eeveath end eighth modes, Which are authentic and plagal, from takiag the donimant and fiaal in each of them and placing 1 common chord on them in succession. The suthentic (or add) modes will appear to have their finals as the lowest note in the scules; ometimes, but rarely, melodies written in them bare been found to descend a note below thls : whereas in the even plagel modes the senle itself descended below the final, and the melodies follom exceeded a fifth above it; whence the line, "Vult descendere par, sed scandere vult

There ts very liftle direet evidenea in the frst eight ceaturles as to what the chants were, but a gaod deal of inilirect evidence fron various tracts of the eunturies immediately following, in many of which the nuthor spenks of the chiats as having come down to him from great antlquity. The great munical epoeh that parts meriaeval musio from the antigue is that of Guido Aretinus (IIth century): nad he nsserts that there was a musical usage of 200 years aud upwards at his titne.
It appenrs that a distinction was drawn in the accommodnting of chants to the psaluns, the introits, the commuaions, and tho resionsories. Ail these ajpenr in the Tomarius Reginonis Prumensis (9th, ecatury), anif with the beginaings apjear the musical notation, which presents an nppearance more like shorthand writing than naything else; a kind of attempt to reader visible the piteh of souads. Thesosiume appenr also in Guino Aretians, with notntion eubstnatially the same ns our prosent one; so nlso in the Intonarium attributed to abbat Gildo and believed by Gulio Aretians to be his. In some of these npuears a more elaborate form, appropriated to the Cuntieles Magnificat and Benedictus. Jhe various forms of beginning the natiphons were eulied Differentiae, anil these had appropriated to them different "eadings" of the psaim-chunt. One nutiphon, ingeniously chosen to fix the mode, is given as a specimen, with a paeuma at the ead of it, and iatenilel to be committed to memory : and these have, in the Tontrius Reginonis, been added by a luter hand.
There are five differentiae of the first tone in Regino: nine in abbut Oddo, and tweive in Guilo Aretinus. The fuilowing is the description given in the last-nansed author:

> Protus adest, drnta formarum nexus habents
> Que moduin oectunt autentum undique totumi

Oddo gives six endings, viz. the first, fifth, sixth, and sevenith of these ; one whicit is substantinlly identical with 111., and one with which IV. would be idcuticai if the three last notes are written in error for $c, b$, a. Regino specifes six differentiae.
The eighth mode (plagis tetrardi):

Oddo recognises three differentine, the first of which is identical with 111. above, the third is the ending commonly known and nearly identical with IV., and the se:ond is " the Peregrine Tone:" why it should ever huve been classed under the eighth mode is inexplicable to the writer; lie thinks it naturnily belongs to the first: the beginnings of antiphons given in Oddo are certuinly more akin to those of the first mode than to the eighth.

must be intended to refer to the virintion between $b$ flat and $b$ natural. Perhaps however Guido would not include this chant under the eighth mode in consequence of its using a $b$ flat. In Regino three differentiae of this tone are reeognised.
As stated above, the endings of the tones were not taken arhitrarily (as is dove so commooly at the present time), but depended upon the beginniag of the antiphon used with the psalms. In the works here cited, a list of antiphons occur uoder each differentin, some of which are supplied with masical notation, and the others apparently left for the cantor to sing in like manner.
Thas in abbat Oddo, in the first tone, when the antiphon began on D , the first ending given above was used, thus:

Of course in the Intonarium of abbat Oddo, the music was indicated hy a notation different from the modern oue: although it appears with the stare and notes, these must have been added by Guide Aretinus when he revised, or edited, tie work. And at the head of every tone or, mode, before the antiphons, occur the words NONANNEANE, or NOEACIS; with aome slight rariations: these are supplied with musical characters, and appear to be artificial words to assist the memory of the singer in making the proper inflections, something after the manner of EPOVAE $q . v$. .) : the former of these belong to the wathentic modes (first, third, fitth, seventh) the latter to the plagal modes.

It appears also that occasionallyo the modes in Antiphons were changed, i.e. nn Antiphon would begin in one mode and end in another. This is what is called in Euclid commutation or modulation ( $\mu \in \tau \alpha \beta o \lambda \eta$ ), for example changing from Dorian into Phrygian, or the like. Thus in the Tonarius Reginonis Prumensis, under the first tone we find to the antiphon "Domine sslva nos, perimus," the note "Finit[ur] iiij tono;" nad under the 2nd tone to "Cum indurerent" and "Primum audisset Job" is the note "Ton. $\mathbf{j}$ poteat esse." And ao in Guido Aretinus, "Sunt preterea plurime antiphonarum que hujus videntur formule [third tone] cum sint ex autento proto et prima voce: sic est Pulchra es et inter quas quidem auteati deuteri faciunt, non bene tonorum semitoniorumque positionem intuentes: vel ideireo eas deuteri faciunt quidam quibusdan D, E, F, et G, finalea constitute in omnibua omnino modis vel vocum tropis indillerenter et inprovide sint." Again under Tone 6: "Iste due communiones que sequantur, i. o. Panem de celo et Anima nostra proprie sunt de quiuto tono et de secunda differentia. Multa responsoria sunt ex isto modo que magis finiuntur in tetrardo quam in trito, sicut est E'go sum id quod sum." So J. M. Neale (De Sequentiis ad H. A. Daniel Epistola) mentions some MSS. containing a list of sequences \&c., in which oceurs the word "Frigdola," applied to melodies, as some other adjectives are in the MS. : of which he says, "Frigdula vel Friudora facilius agnoscit etymon: idem enim vult atque P'hrygo-boricum, i.e. Tonus primus mixtus cum tertio." One of the best known examples of this practice is the old melody of the Te Deum, usually attributed $\frac{0}{0}$ St. Ambrose; which is in the third and fourth modes combined: and this fact would lead us to conelude that the melody had undergone some change since St. Ambrose's time, as the fourth mode was not then in use, ualess indeed the tradition of it may have rariel, which is quite possible, and may have had some weight in inducing St. Gregory to add the four plagal modes.
The chief authors used here are those mentioned, and reference has been made also to later ones, such a& St. Bernard (Tonale), Peter de Cruce, Walter de Odyugton, John de Muris, H elbaldua, &e., preserved in the collectinas of nbbe Gerbert and M. de Coussemaker. Nivers (Paris, 1685) which the writer has in valn endeayoured to meet with : it is mentioned in Sir John Hawkina' History of Music as the most exhaustive book on the subject published up to that time, and seems to have been pretty well known then.

Musical Notation.-During the first six centuries of the Christian era the Greek musical notation was in universal use, and iadeed the knowledge of it was kept up as late as the time of John de Muris (c. 1320). This notation wss exceediagly complicated, being at first sight purely arbitrary, and searcely reducible to any law. This is the more extraordinary, as some justances can be observed which indicate the acquaiatance possessed by the ancieats with the property of the outave which has caused sounds separated by that interval to be now called by the same name. Referring to Sinith's lictionary of Antiquities it will be seen that the different modes, Dorian &ie., were ultimately, at any rate, nothing more than transpositions of the 'greater aystem ' of two octaves :

and they were determined by the piteh of the Proslambanomenos, the lowest note, an octare below the Mese.

These are mentioned in Euclid's Introductio Hitrmonica. But the most important work for this purpose is the tract of Alypius, published by Meibomius amongst the Antiquae I/usiane Auctores Septem: this consists of a short prefuce, a mere résumé of Euclid's Intriductio, and a catalogue of all the notes in every mode. There were five principal modes, the Dorian, Iastian, Phrygian, Aolian, and Lydian: these had for their Proslambunomeni yespectively

The writer has combined the wholeset, without this disadvantage ; but it was impossible to introduce them here without interfering with the convenience of the book,
The fuliowing notes, being those of the diatonio Dorian mode, are given as an example.

This ends at the Hypate hypaton of the liypodorian mode, and, therefore, must have been ia use betore the Proslambanomenos was added to the scale. The first nute, A, is the Nete diezeugmenon of the Jastion mode, or Nete synemmenon of the Aeolian, and also in their deyivatives, The sound is not in the Lydtan or the Phrygian mods at all; the Dorian employs B, the Hyperdorian both, and the Hyperphrygian B. The remainIng inverted letters seem to have been alopted tor the Hyperboleon tetrachord, which would obriously have been added to the lyre at some Inter period.

The law of this seems fairly evileat, the niternatives arising from different moies. The order, it will be perceived, is precisely the cortrary of the modern one; probably it was devived from the positiou of the lyre, and the hand of the performer on it. The highest nute but one of the original tetrachords, beiug called $\lambda i x a y o r$, would seem to indicate that the highest string was played by the thumb, and the others by our first, second, and third fingers, and this insite onc "position" of the hand, which would be "shifted" for another tetrachord; the lyre would be held on the left side of the perfermer, and the letters of the alphaiet wouid follow the order of the fingers of the right haul. The most celebrated author (in musical reapects) of the early centuries is Boethius; unfurtuately his work, Do Musica, was left incomplete; in his time evidence is fortheoning of a modification of the notation in the direction of simplicity ; atill the old notation was preserved, and in some cases the letters were joined together, thus $\mathbf{Z}$. There appear to be some errors ia the text of Boethius, owing probably to jasufficient acquaintance with the potatiou, sod clerical errors in the MS.; as the symbols in some cases do not agree with Boethius's own decription of them. One deserves notice: the Parhypate hypaton of the Lydian mode is dekribed rightly as $\beta$ imperfect, yet it is given in four different plnces in Boethius as BL; and appareatly this has been copied by later writers. These seem to have contented themselves with ose symbol only in the pairs; thus Huebaldus

But in nnother place Boethina gives a larger system, combining all the three genera, and giving the relative lengths of the strings producing the respective sounda.

His deseription of this is, "Sed itn ut quonam trium generum est faciends partitio, nervorum que modus literarum excedit numerum, ubi defecerint literac, easdem geminamus versus hoe modo, ut quindo ad Z fuerit usque perventun, itn describamus reliquos nervos Bis A , i. e. $A A_{\text {, }}$, et bis B, i.e. BB." He assigns A, O, nud Li. , nnd a tew more, but some errors would seem to have crept into the table from whence the alore is obtained.

It appenrs from Walter de Odyngton that the double octnve of the diatonic genus at one time, used the letters from $A$ to $S$, the Proslambanomenos being $A$, and the rest up to the Nese $\mathrm{B}, \mathrm{C}, \mathrm{D}, \mathrm{E}, \mathrm{F}, \mathrm{G}, \mathrm{I}$; the synemmenon notes l , $\mathrm{K}, \mathrm{L}$; and the diezeugmenon and hyperboteon $\mathbf{M}, \mathbf{N}, \mathbf{O}, \mathrm{P}, \mathrm{Q}, \mathrm{R}, \mathrm{S}$. This would make K and L. Identical with $N$ and $O$. But it would seem that this was soon reduced to the fifteen. Accordingly we find Jerome de Moravia describo Ing the cight modes as foliows:
${ }^{\text {" Let }}$ Lhe double octave he $A, B, C, D, E, F$, G, H, I, K, L, M. N, O, P. Then-and anothar onn must be added, from If to P which was done by Ptolemy."

The next development is due to St. Gregory and arises from a further perception of the qualities of the octave as alluded to above, in reppect of the accented Greek symbols for the apper notes; if the synemmenon tetrachord be diminated, the notes from the Mese upwards are ach an oetave above thome from the Prosianbanameans; and when performed they produce an simest identical effect. The idea may have been auggested by the accented Greek notes; anghow St. Gregory made those from the Mese become roplicates of the preceding ones, by wigalng to them the same letters; this rejected all the ietters beyond the firat seven ; the ootes from the Proslambanomenos to the Lichanos moson, inclusive, being written $A, B, C, D$, E, F, G; from the Mese to the Paranete hyperboleon $a, b, c, d, e, f, g$ and the Nete hyperbolien isseif aa. This notntion is sometimes used at the present day, and the writer has had to emuploy it here. It is obvious that this can be continued further, and, indeed, is the basla of our present numenelature. If the synemmenon tetrachord be re-introduced, it requires the note nest to a to be a semitone, not a tone above it; accordingiy, in the course of time, the letter beloaging to this received tw forms, "quadratum" and "rotundum," W and $b$, aceording as the diereugmenon or synsmmenon tetrachord was to be used; these were olso called $b$ "durum" and b"molle," and the former became written 4 . This is the origin of the German nomenclature of H for the note a semitone below C , confining B to that a sernitene above A (e.g. J. S. Bach's fugne en his own name:

und also of tha terma "dur" and " moll" applied to the major and minor tonality. It will be at once seen in the key of $G$; it is also the origin of the symbol b, and the French term beinol, precenato.
Accordingly we find Walter de Odyngton giving the compass of the modes, thus: "Dorius. CDEFGabhod; Hypodorius Plaga prothi, rabCDEFGab; Phrygius, CDEFGahe de; Hypaphrygius Plaga denteri, A BCDEF Gabhe; Lydius, EFGabbedef; Hypolydius Plaga triti, BCDEFGabod; Hypormivolydius $\Gamma \mathrm{Gah} \mathrm{cdefg}$; Mixolydius Plage tetrandi, CDEFGabhede." (The $\Gamma$ In the lest but one should apparantly be F.)
These letters were written over or under the Tonds to be suag; there was no method of indiating duration of sound, that being entirely dependent upon the "quantity" of the syllable. Thus, from Jevome de Moravia;

Ad antiphonam vero nos qui vivimus commaniter tafis differentia datur :

Ancther method of notation appears to have been in considerable use about the 8th and 9 th centuries, invented npparently to diminish, if possible, the number of tha nrbitrary symbols employeri. For this purpose the system of tetrachoris was employed, but they were all disjoined by a tone from each other, giving the

The writer has here used the modern atave of five lines, nat the medern forms of sume of the clefs; there ly no differenco in princlije between these und thelr predccessors, nad the music is much more easily rend.
Mlsic, Curisitan Use of,-We nre left n good deal to cunjecture to what extent maslo was used, or what forms it took. The first intimation Is that of St. liul (E.phes. v. 19; Col, iii. 16). in which he recognises three distinct klods of composition; jusilins, hymas, nad these it would seem most reasonalle to sujpmese to be the I'salms of itavii, original compusitions in ntunans, and more irregnlar compositions, such ns the chortses in the Cireck phays. Each of these would reguire a somewhat diferent muslcal treatment, whough all of them would be little else than recitative. (Vide II vanss.) The first of these would be fitted with a monotonous chant having na ending, as shewn nbove; the second with something more like a rhythmlenl tune, and the third whth a meloly similar to those of the natijhons. It is commonly believed that St. Amirroso tuok a melody that hidd been in use in pugan rites, and adapted it to his Alvont hymn "Creator nime siderum," which melody is still in use, though with some varieties of reading; and it is ensy to see that for such conpesitlons the example would be followed. All the corly writers assign to St. Ignatius the introduction of antiphonal chanting; "A quibus vel quando cepuit natijphona dici, Igaatius Antjochie Syrie tertins post Apoutoium Petrum Episeopus, fut et jam (etham?) cum rpsts degebat afostolis, ridit vislonem angelorum, quorrodo per antiphonas Sancte 'Irinitatl dicebant ymnos.

Accordiagly we tiad these forms appearing to the liturgies: the thirty-third psain is specified in that of St. Clement, and the twenty-third and others in St. Jnmes's. But the presence of a choir is recognised, and a part assigned them, Lit. St. Mark:
 $\tau \dot{\tau} \nu \chi \in \rho o v \beta ⿺ \kappa \delta \nu,-\sigma \dot{v} \nu$ aùтoîs í $\mu \nu 0 \dot{\nu} \nu \tau \omega \nu$ ка।

 ásout́vou. Accordingly provision is made for a choir in the early clsurches. Neale (Introduction to Translition of Primitive Liturgies) gives a ground plan of the churel ot St. Theodore at Athens; in it the choir are placed under the trullus, or dome, which position was maintaiped up to the 12 th ceatury. A very early ode is still extant, $\phi \hat{\omega} s i \lambda a \rho \delta \nu \dot{a} \gamma i a s \quad \delta \delta \xi \eta s ;$ but it is not known whether the music of it has been preserved. The use of the church of Alexandria in the 4 th century is shewn by an account in the Geronticon of St. Pambo, abbat of Nitria (apud Gerbert); he had sent a disciple there for some purpose, and the disciple regretted the ignorance of singing in the monastery: 'A $\pi \in \lambda \theta$ doves $\gamma$ do тpordpia" (vide Canon of Odes). The abbat thought his disciple departing from primitive simpiicity. From anotier work of uncertain Aate, but of great antiquily, preserved by Gerbert, the Institutio Patruin de modo psallendi sive cantandi, we find three kiads of chanting recognised, according to the nature of the day, whether a prinelpal festival, a Sunday or raiat's day, or as ordinary day: "Tres ordiues melodiae in tribus distinctionibus temporum habesmus, verbi gratia, in praecipuis solempnitatibus toto corde et ore omaique affectu devotionis; is Dominicis diebus et majoribus festivitatibus sive natalitiis sanctorum ... multo remissius; privatis autem diebus ita palmodia modulatur nocturnis horis, et cantus de die, ut omnes possent devote psallere et intente cantare sine strepitu rocis, cum affectu absque defectu." Aud the nature of this chant, as similar to the Gregorian chant, appears also:"syltabas, verba, metrum, in modo et in figem versus, id est, iuitium, medium, et finem, simul incipiamus, et pariter dinuttamus. Punctum aequaliter teneant omnes. In omni textu lectionis; psalmodiae vel cantus, accentus sive concentus verborum (in quintum suppetit facultas) non negligatur, quia exiade permaxime redolet iutellectus. Scire debet omnis cantor, quod literae quae liquescuat in metrica rite, etiam in Neumis musicue ritis liquescuat." This last shews that the musical rhythm conformed to the poctical, elisions and crases being made when necessary; and probably that the system of one note to a syllaLle was adopted; in this case Neuma (q.v.) would mean

It does not sppear that the early British church used any music in the services; from the few remains of the old churches that have come dowa to us, it would seem that no prorision was made fur e choir: this is remarkalle, so far as the Cambrian part of the British church is concerned, since they had an order of bards, snd were skilled in the harp. According to Joha the deacon, certain singers came with St. Augustine to Canterbury, and the church's song (more Romano) became known in Kent; and in several instances we find from Bede that exertions were made to spread this ove. England. Thus when St. Paulious became bishop of Rochester he left behind him in the diocese of York a deacon, James, a skilled musician, who lived at Catterick, and taught the Roman or Cantuarian method of church song. "Qui, quoniam cantandi in ecclesia erat peritissimus, . . . etiam magister ecclesiasticae cantionis juxta morem Romanorum seu Cantuariorum multis coejit exsistere." (Bede, ii. 20.) And the custom of usiag music in the church servica begnin to be geaerally spread over England at the accession to the see of Canterbury of archbishop Theodore (A.D. 669), "Sed et soaos cantandi in ecclesia, quos eatenus in Cantia tantum noveraat, ab boc tempore per omnes Anglorum ecclesias discere coeperuat; primusque, excepto Jacobo, . . cantsndi magister Northnahumbrorum ecclesiis Eddi cogaomento Stephanus fuit, invitatus de Cantia a reverendissimo viro Wilfrido" (Bede, iv. 2); and the archbishop filled up the racant see of Rochester by aauther musician, Putta; " maxime modulandi ia ecclesia more Romanorum, quem a discipulis beati papas Gregorii dilicerat, perttum" (ibid.): a few years afterwards this bishop abandoued his see, and haring received an appointment from the bishop of Jichfield of $s$ church and glebe, propagated church music: "in illa solum ecclesia Deo serviens et ubicunque rogabatur ad docenda ecclesiae carmiaa divertens." (Bede, iv. 12.) About this time Joha the precentor of St. Peter's, Rome, was seat by pope Agatho, and received by Benedict Biscop into his monastery at Wearmouth for the purpose of teachiag church music, and was very much resorted to. "Non solum autem idem Jonnaes ipsius monasterii fratres docebat, verum de omnibus pene ejusdem provinciae monasteriis ad audienduin eum, qui cantandi erant periti, confluebant. Sed et ipsum per loca, ia quibus docerrt, multi invitare curabant." (Bede, iv. 18.) From this we may fairly iafer that the Cantus Gregorianus soon became nat uralised in Eagland so as to create an Anglican tradition of it, of which there is reason to suppose tinces have desceaded to this day.

The same use was professed in France and Germany, but iad become corrupted. Gsbrisl Nivers (quoted by Sir John Hawkias, Hist. Music) asserts that in consequence of pope Stephen II. coming to Pepin, king of France, a number of singers who had accompasied him propagated the church-song in the Gregorian manaer over France generally; but after the death of Pepin, the purity of the aong was not maiatnized. Instruments,-Whatever evidence is forthcoming, is to the efliet that the early Christians did not ase musical instruments. Varions causes would operate: the porerty of a considerable portion of the church, the frequency of persecution, but chiefy the assoeiations, theatrical and iodecent, with which the musicnl instruments lide were attainable were nssociatcd. (v. DIAPSALMA). But at a later peried, after the disrup-tion of the empire, and the re-organisntion of society, such causes not existing to society, such causes not existing to any extent, the feeling against instruments ceased the feeling against instruments ceased to exist; ond we find that organs were introduced into charches and in some cases other instruments also. Thus it apperrs, from the above reference to Gabriel Nivers, that the choir that accompanied pope Stephen II. inte France syread over that country not only the knowledge of the Roman pliai-song, but also the use of instruments. Orgas deserve a separate notice.
Hurmmy-Whether the nacients were acquiated with harmony has been much disputed:
the writer, following the writer, followiug most of the eminent masicins, is strongly of opinion that they were

It has been already noticed that John the precentor of Rome lived at Wearmouth for some time and taught music; and it has been conjectured that the inrention of this kind of harmony (or its introduction into England) is due to him. The writer thinks that the system deseribed by Giraldus may meana no more than that the meloly was not sung in octaves, at least at the time of John, whaterer it mas have become niterwards. If this be true, the practice of harmony in church music is due to the church of home.
The writer is aware, nnd thinks he ought here to mention, that Sirr F. Ouseley (a good authority) belleves harmony to be an invention of the northern tribes of Europe; but he is not ac quainted with the evidence for this belief: and Professor Macfarren (Lectures on Harmony) con-trasta trasts the peoples of the South and North in respect of inventive power of melody and harmony. Those whe advocate the opinion that the anclents were acquninted with harmonr, consider a strong point of evidence to be the number number of veices and instruments collected together on sereral public occasions: but as the writer is not satisfied with this, he thinks it more likely that hrrmony was a discevery of the learned musiciang, whe had had the experience of their predecessors for centuries, duriug which many advances had been made in the science of music, and that the inventive powers of the people hare little to do with it: ind in this view it is certainly most likely that such a discovery should have been made, or nt least pursued, chiefly at Rome. It is rather difficult to imagine barbarous trihes inventing harmony while civilised people were ignornat of it and studied music all the while. Certainly townrds the ninth century, the the ninth century, the practice of producing octaves, fifths, or fourth simultaneously was known, und in the former twe cases it was Called 'symphonia,' snd in the Iatter 'diaphenln.' The terms 'succentus' and 'concentus' are also ised as synonymous with 'symphonin.' Regino p Prumensis nliows the use of surien'us in betaves and fifths, but he prolibits diaphony: Hucbuldus ncknowledges both. Thus for a 'sympheny' of octares nod fitths we should have, in the fifth tone-

and for a diaphony of fourths, we should have

The ancients always consldered the fourth a concord; and it is a satisfactory interval in melody; probably for this reason the experimeat of singing in fourths as well as in fifths and octaves was tried, and found unsatisfactory : wherefore it was called diaphony, a term used by the anclents as contrary to $\sigma \nu \mu \phi \omega v i a$. This is donbtless the reason why the fourth is now considered a dissonance. Harmony appears to have extended no further than this before the time of Guido Aretious.

MYSTAGOGIA ( $\mu v \sigma \tau \sigma \gamma \omega \gamma(a)$ would natu. rally, mean the conducting or finitiating into mysteries. It is, bowever, commonly tused by the Greek fathers as a term for the sacraments themselves, regardad as conducting to higher life. Thus Chrysostom uses the word $\mu v \sigma \tau a \gamma \omega$ rim fur Bapt ism, ífà $\mu v \sigma \tau a \gamma \omega \gamma$ la for Holy Communion, крaтोp ти̂s $\mu \nu \sigma \tau a \gamma \omega \gamma$ ias for the cup in the Lord's Supper (Suicer, Thesaurus, a، v.). MYSTAGOGUS ( $\mu \nu \sigma \tau a \gamma \omega \gamma \delta s$ ) is, , S Suidas has defined it, "a priest, an lnitlator into myse teries." Hence the Lord Himself is described as seting as Mystagogus to His disciples (Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 40, p. 659). A $\mu \nu \sigma \pi$ tipiov is properily a rite to which none but the initisted can be ndimittel. Hence baptism, to which in early agea men were not commonly admitted without a catechumenate of some length; and the Holy Com* munion, to which none could be admittel without baptism, nad of which the most sacred portions were concealed from the profane [Disciplina Arcani], naturully came to be called $\mu v \sigma \tau$ hpia. Thus Chrysostom on St, John xix. 34 (Hom. 85), speaking of the water and blood, says that from these are derived the mysteries of bnptism and the Jord's Supper. Gregory of Nazinnzus (Orat. 39, p. 632, ed. Paris, 1630) calls the ministers of baptism oiкov $\mu$ мovs тov̂ $\mu \nu \sigma \tau \eta p l o v$; and (Orat. 44, p. 713) says that Jesus in the upper room partook of the mystery (кoivaveî тov̂ $\mu v \sigma \tau \eta \rho i=u)$. NAMES (Influencé of Citristianity on). The origiu and meaning of names, a subject long regarded as too capricious and nrbitrary in character to ndmit of scieutific treatment, has received considerable elucidation from recent phitological research both in England and on the continent. Very slight investigation suffices to aher that religion, whether pagan or Christian, firaishes a most valuable clue to such inquiry. The present niticle is restricted to the comparatively limited field presented in the uomenclature of Christian nations during the tirst eight centuries, nad to an endeavonr to determine how fir that oomeuclature was modified or remained uamodified by Christian influences.
For this purpose, it will obviously be of primary importance to ascertain how far the early Christian theory required from converts the assumption of n new name at the ordinance of haptism. On this point the evidence is somewhat coutlictiug, but generally it would seem that the practice wos comparatively rare uatil after the period of persecution. In the first and second enturies, it is to be remembered, the ancient gentile relations, which transferred to an adopted member of a gens the pracnomen, *mm, and cognemen of his ndoptive father, gradunly ceased to exist. So early as the reign of Trajan we find instances in the Fusti of the disignation of consuls solely by their cognomin: or agnomina; and in the second and third centuries such instances are numerous: Sometimes a consul is designated only by his cognomen or u7n man, and sometimes by all his names. Thus (1.0. 83) colleague in his ninth consulship (1.n, 83) bpluars now ns Rulus, and again as Q. Petilius Rufus; the colleague of Ihilippus in the reign of Honorins is sometimes Bassns, sometines Anicius Aucheuins Bassus. Gradually, howerer, the Roman form of nomenclature almost futirely disappears; though even so late as the 6th century we tind Fulgentius, the eminent dirican bishop, bearing nlxo the names Fabius Ciermont, $\ln$ tha preceding sidonius, bishop ot Ciermont, In tha preceding century, bore also the anme Apollinaris.
The influences that successively determined Chribtian practlce, were-(1) indifference, origi-noting in the causes above mentioned, with regard to adoption or family names; (2) the fiecdom conceded by legislative enactments; (3) the removal of detcrrent considerations such as existed during the persecuting age; (4) the express exhortations of the teachers of the church to a change of practice ; (5) the venerntion of relics. Of these intluences ( $t$ ) and (2) were shared in common with paganism, and belong to the first three centuries; (3) (4) and (5) ara connected with the subsequent period only.
(1.) The letters of Cyprian illustrate the prevalent indiflerence of his age. In defandt of motives like those which had formerly existed in adopting a Roman name on admission to the rights of citizeaship, the proviacial contented himselt with Latinising his native name. We find, for example. Cyprian referriug to n tellow bishop by the name of Jubanauns, a provincial name with a Roman termination. (Migne, I'atr.
iv. 1:29.) Ja the same correchen iv. 1:29.) Jn the same correspondence we fiad in letters written on behalf of different ehurch communities, nad signed by their leading members, names of signataries such as Saturninus nod Felix, repeated with addition of alter or iterum alter (i/nid. iv. 158), where it is evident that the employment of the nomen or praenomen would have ellictually prevented any contusion.
(2.) Ju the 3rd century it was dectared lawtu! by the state for nny citizen to lay aside his mame and assume niny other he might wish. This enactment, first promalgated in the reign of Caracnlla (d.D, 212 ), and sanctioned by succeeding emperurs, is thas re-enacted under Dio. cletian and Maximin :-" Sicut ill initio, nominis, cognominis, praenominis recognoscendi singulos impesitio libern est privatis : ita eornm matatio ipnocentibus periculusio non est, Mutare itaque nomen, vel praenomen sive cogoomen sine aliqua fraude licito jure, si liber es, secuadum ea, quae statuta sunt, miuime prohiberis: nullo ex hoc praejudicio futuro. S. 15. Kul. Jan. A. A. Conss." Justiniani Codex, ix. 25 : Corp. Jur. Civil. (Lipsiae, 1720), ii. 396.
(3.) Uniler ordinary circumstances, the Christian of the first three centuries nppears to have shared in the prevalent inditlerence with respect to names, and to have baptized his chilinen with little regard to the significance of the particular name bestowed; the expression of St. Ambrose that our nucestors were wont to coin nanes on definite principles, - 'apul veteres nostros ratione donina componebantur" (Migne, xvii. 47), is contirmed by the language of St. Chrysostom, who says that the Jews made the names giren to their uft'spring a means of moral training and nn incitement to virtue, and bestowed thein not as men did in his day, carelessly nad as chance might ràs mporचropias mooívtes (Migne, $S$, G. liii, 179). It may be observed that thls latter pissage is alone sutficient to discredit the spurious Arablan canon of Nicaea (Mansi, Concilia, ii. 961), quoted by Martigny, which represents the church ns having ulready, in the curly part of the 4 th century, torbidilen the faithful to give their childreu names other than those distinetively Christian. There is, however, good reason for inferring that prudential motives niso deterred Christians from ussumlng names significant of their change of faith, nlthough in times of persecation, when compelled openly to arow their religion, they often changel a pagan for a scriptural name before undergoing a martyr's death. Procopius of Gaza, who wrote in the nist half of the bth century, reters to this as no uncommon practice under sueh circumstances. "One," he says, "called himself Jacob; another, Israel; another, Jeremiah; another, Isainh; unether, Diniel; and having taken these names they realily weat forth to martyrdom " (Comment. in Isuiah h, e. 44 ; Migne, $S$. ( . Ixxxvii. 2401 ).

(4.) The example and taaching of the fathers proves that from the carliest times the teachers of the church did not share io the prevalent indifference. St. Cyprian assumed the namo of Caecilius in addition to hls own, as an acknowleigment of gratitule to one to whom he owed his conversion. Euschins took the name of Parnphili frem that of the martyr Pamphilus, whom he held in special veneration. It is, however, In the 4th century, when Christianity had received state reagnition, that we first fiud evideace of a desire on the part of the leaders of religions opinion to molify the custonary practice. St. Chrysostom, in the Homily above quoted, distinetly censures the prevailiag fashion of giving a chilit his fither's or grandfather's name without regard to the import of the name itself. Such, he says, was not the eustom in ancient times. Then especial care was taken to give enildreu names which should not merely incite to virtue those who received them, but also serve as admenitions te all wistom ( $\delta, \delta a \sigma k a \lambda l a$ фidogopias d $\pi$ dans) to others, and even to after generations. "Int us not, therefore," he concludes, "give chance names ( $\tau$ às túxovaas $\pi \rho o a \eta \gamma o p i a s)$ to children, nor seek to gratify' fathers, or grandtathers, or these allied by descent, by giving their names, but rather cheose the names ef holy men conspleuous for virtue and for boldness before Gol." (Migne, S. G. liil. 179.) At the same time he warns his hearers against aseribing any efficacy to such names, nll justifiable hope on the part of the Christian being grounded upon an upright life. We fiad, from nother discourse, that the practice he recemmended was already sometlmes observed. The parents of Antioch, he teils us, gave the name of Meletius (an eminent bishep of that city, who dled 381) in preference to any other name, each thinking thereby to bring the suint under hib own roef (Migne, S. G. 1. 515).

But notwithstanding seme eminent exceptions, there can be ne doubt that, pricer to the 4th century, such practice was rare, a cenclusien supported by the evilence afforded by the early Christian epitaphs. The Martyrologies alse present us with many names (as will be seen from the subjoined lists) which reflect not merely the secular asseciations of paganism, but even its religieus culture. Martyre often encountered death bearing the names of these very divinities to whom they refuse to offer sacrifice. It has, Indeed, been sought to qualify the evidence derived from Christlan epitaphs, by conjecturing that, in order to prevent cenfusion, only the original name was inserted in the inscriptlon, and that in these instancee where we are presented with a sceond name,-T.g., Miscula quue et Galutea (snn. 383, De Kossi, 1. 112), Asellus qti at Murtinianus (Naringoni, Cose Gont. 458), and in the well-known one of king Cendwalla, Hic clepositus est Ceuducalla qui et Pitrus (Bredae Hist. Eccles, v. 7),-the second name is that ennferred at laptism. Against this theory Le Blant, however, quotas the equally notable instance Petrus qui ct Bids mus (Ruinart, Acta Sincerv, 1r. 501). Balsamus, aecording to the Acta, ob being asked his name, replied, "Nomine pitris, Balsamus dicor, spirituali vero nomine, quod in baptisme accepi, Petrusclicer." Other instatcen, e.g.; Matrima quae Jovina (Marangoni, Acta San ti liet., 88). Vitalis qui et Dloscurns Asclepins (Mai, Coll. Jat. v. 14), where the second name is direetly derivel from the pagan mythology, are equally adverse to such a therry.

(5.) While the customs and associations which had once given interest and importance to mames gradually disappeared. other cireumstanees begna to invast them with uew signifieance. Forment among these must be placed the superstitious veneration of relics. As the presence of a supposel fragment of a body of a saint was believed to secure his protection tor the locality whers it was enshrined, the inhabitants of the distriet sought te prove their reverence for his memory by assuming his namo. In later times, with the adoption by each country of a patron saiat, the same principle became still further extedded. St. Jahnes (San Diego or Lago) in Spana. St. Andrew in Scotland and Holland, St. Martia in France, and St. Maurice in Switzerlaul, are some of the more notable instances in which a name (in some cases that of au nitogether mythical oharacter') became the fivvourite national designation for the individual. In those countries which were among the last to embrace Christianity, this prineiple is to be seea yet. more widely extended. Here the ndoption at baptism of a Christian name was the nsual prsetiee. In the 14 th century, Ladislas Jagelion, duke of Lithuania, on becoming a convert to the finth, persualed many of his suhjects to follow his example. In consequence of their numbers they were baptized in companles, the same name being given to all in one company. All the men la the first company wore named Peter, and all the women Cathorine; in the secoud company, the names given were laul add Margaret ; and so on. (Salverte, i. 171.)

A considerable stimulus to the interest aftachIng to names was imparted, in the 7th century, by the chapters on the subject in the Etymoluyine of Isidere of Seville. He taught that all scrijtural names had been given with a pregaiat reference to the part or future carger of the individual, and in a lengthenel enumeration assigned to each name a meaning (oiten erroaeous) expressive of that inlividual's character er esperiences. To the influence of his treatise, we may nttribute the fact that in the 8th centary, with the revival of letters in Frankland, it became a not uncommon practice tor men of eminence to assume a literary alias. Churles the Great, and many of his courtiers, were atdressed in more tamiliar intercourse, by ether than their baptismal names, seriytural names being generally adopted. Charles probably was ied to assume the name of David, from the erropeous meaning glven to it by Isidere, "fortis manu, quia fortisstmus in praeliis fuit." (Yigna, 1xxxii. 323.)

The sect to which Minucius Felix refers (c. 8 ; Migne, iii. 259) as " latebrosa et lueifugax natio," appears to have included many of tha servile class, though, where the master hlmself became a convert to Christianity, their enfranchisement almost necessarily followed. Tertullian, in uddueing examples to shew how ineffectual was the retornation of eharacter that fillowed upon conversion to protect the Christian froms the odium attaching to the name, takes as one of his iagtances tho convarted slave (dpol. c. 8 ; Migne, 1. 281). [SLIVERY.]

Two martyrs buaring the name of Servus suffered under Hunneric in the ith century ; one at Carthage (Ang. xvii.), the other at Tibur (fec. vii). In the Lioman Martyrology we fiat Servilius (May xxir.) Servilianus, a m. under Trajnn (Apr. xx.), and Servulus, am, at Adrumatum (Feb. xxi.). This last name also oceurs ou a Roman marble of the year $+2+$ (De Rossj, .277 ). Other exunpies are Bernacle (Boldetti, 55); Ber .nelis ( 1 abretti, viii. 140) for Vernacla; Verma (Maflei, 353); Vurnacia (Act. A. V. 95 ); Vernacla (Le Bhant, i. 119); Verancolo (Bosio, 418); Verbacala (Boldetti, 54); Serbulus (Reines. 987); Servilianus (Mai, v. 406); Servuli (Bosio, 213).
( $\pi$ ) Diminutires, expressive of endearment, nad chietly bestowed on fernales, are common to pagan and Christian usage. Augustula (Narehi, 30 ) ; Capriola (l'erret, v. pl. 75 ); Castula (Doni, xx. 91) ; Catullina (Act. S. Derivatives from $\Theta \in \delta_{s}$ are frequent; many, however, appear to have been transmitted from juganism. Theophilus was the name of a Greek poet of the Middle Comedy, and tho individunl ado culled by St. Luke must evidentiy have been so called prior to his conversion to Christianity ; one of the last high priests was also so named. Thekla, the feminine of Өeokत $\bar{\eta} s$ (aiso a pagan of se), is said by tradition to hav been a discipla of St. Paul at Ancona. In most of the jagan names of this clasa the word probably denotes moreiy a high degree of excelience. OEOTEKNE and ©EOKTICTE (Marinl, Alb. 98) are j, robably distinctively Christian ; ns also Theopistes, $m$. (Sept. xx.). Townds the close of the 4th century, the name of Mary, preceded or followed by another, is occasionaily to be met with. livia maria in pace (De Russi, i. 143) ; MAPIE I\$INI, Iphinne for Rufimae (Act. S. V. 77). It occurs, also, in two inseriptions given by Perret: maria in pace (v. c.) am maria fecit fllate ciricie (ixiii. 2.1). De Boissieu ( $\mathrm{p}, 885$ ) gives the epitaph of one Murit Vornerabilis, a centenarian of Lyons in the 5th century. A marbie of the cemetery of SS. Thruso et Saturninus (Act. S. F. 89) gives the name of Anun, but this is yet more rare.
The following are instances of apostolic names :-ADdreas (Vermiglioli, 589) ; ANDPEAC (Oradn. 428, xlte.) ; Johamnes (Marini, Pop. 9.51 ), luidart, passim; with the commencement of the 5 til century the name becomes of more common occurrence (De Rossi, i. $\mathbf{2} 78,280$ ). Pauius (Act. S. V. 105; De Rossi, i. 191); \$んAY10c naraos (Act. S. V. 73); Paula (ib. 103). Petrus (Marchi, 27 ; Hubner, n. 135n); пETPOC (Oxam. ib. xlvi.), with its derivatives Petrius (Act. s. V. 129) ; Petrouia (Montfancon, Iter Ital. 118); Thomas, extremely rare, occurs in the year 490 (De Rossi, i. 398; Hibner, n. 178). Osann. (485, xi.) gives us the derivation from Stephanus of CTE\&ANINOC.

Among names taken from the Old Testament, that of Susauna is not uucommon: svssanna (De Rossi, i. 196); Rebecen is found in a Roman epitaph of the 4th century (De Rossi, ib. 96) reveccae innocenti. Many names of martyrs ure of this class: Moyses, at Alexandria (Feb. xiv.); Samuel and Daniel, in Mauritauia (Oct. xiii.); Tobias, at Selaste under Licinius (Nov. ii.).

The European races which remained unsubducd by the arms of the Einpire, or but imperiectly subjugated, ofler certuin roints of contra,t which may be briefly noted. Amoug the Celts there is discernible, on the part of the early converts, a feeling of deeper reverence and humility in the ndoption of sacred names. The pretixes of $\mathrm{Cr}^{2} / \mathrm{e}$ (the companion or vassal), Ceur (the frien I), Cuilleaci (the bandmailen), and giolla, the modern gillie, and macl, a diselple, denote nothing more than relations of reverent depmitence. St. Michae! was the object of widespread devotion; henee Cear Mlehad, now Carmichael. In many Irish families of the old Ceitic biond Gilln Christ (Gilchrist) appears to have beea a Christion name (Petrle nui Stokes, p. 97). Gillesping (Gillespie, cspiug = episcorpas) belonged to the line of Diarmil. 'Ihise names of fuar porthern proprietors in Domesulay lionnGhliemicel, Ghilanier, Ginillepetair, and Ghile-bril,-probably attest the presede of a Celtic elenent attracted by the illustrinus fouadation at Lindinfarne. The name of Mary, which gralually spread in the Latio church, after the 4th century (Northcote and Brownlow, Il. S., $\mathrm{pp}, 25+-7$ ) is wantiog, a point illustrative possibly of the divergence between Celtic nuld hatio Christinnity ; it is not until the I2th century that wo find the name of Mailmate " servant of Mary" (Petrie and Stokes, 59). Maelcalum (Malcolm) bears tentimony to the veneration in which the memory of the ajostle of lona was held.

Among the Teutonic races on the continent we findiourselves on less firm ground. Matly names compounded with that of the Supreme Being were assumed in pureiy pagan times, and it is often a matter for doubt whether the pretix that belongs to names of this character does not really (ienote a name of the numerous class commencing with gund (war), a class conceivel it a very diflerent spirit. Other names, ngain like Theodoric, Theu lebert, ete., ofler a deceptive but unreal nopearance of athinity tu Greck Christian derivatives, Converts appear to have re tained their names unchange I; Ereda (? Freda), Brinca or Bringa, Uviliaric, Trasaric, Sedaignuchus, occur as those of Gothie Christians ( Nectul, Christian Inser. p. 21); in the opinion of Schottel (Teuts ho Huxbisprache, p. 1031) it was not until after the death ot the emperor Friedrich 1I. (nnn. 1250) that, under eecle.instical intlucnces, Germany began to ndmit a certain intusion of latin elements in her nomenclature. Pott, however, recognises a Christima element in proper names like Trabyott, hakegitt, Guttlo' (? 'Deum Inudn'), ant in thmily bames such as Kenneqott, l.ebgotl, Gottleber, regariling them as origiually imperntives, dictated by pinus sentiment. To Ilerand Merrgott, which sume have derived from the pagan Dioss (e.g., Dious Augustus, Di us Antiochus, etc., combined with the equivalent for ©cós), he attrithutes a lise origin (Die Personenn im n. pp. 94-:98).

An interesting illustrution of the importance of this subject wili be found nt p. 879 , in the account there given of the name Veronicn-an example of the manner in which a tulse etymulngy has sometimes in turn given rise to the fabritation of legend.

NAMES, OBLATION OR RECITAI OF. I. The Offerers.-It was a very early rule in the church, that when the bishop recelvel any gifits for the peor, he should inform them "whe the donor was, that they might pray for him by name." This precept was in the origional text of the Apostolical Constitutions, belog found Is the Syrine recensien as weil as in the late: palated Oreek (llinnsen, Analecta Anti-Nicaeni, ii, 133, 2813). When converts were numerous this could hurdly be carried out otherwlse than by a publio notice in church, and if this was done in the case of eflerings for the poor, it would soen be done for other efferings. Such is the jrobable erigin of the recitnl or "oblation" of the names of the offerers in the Liturgy. If a git were brought on behalf of the sluk or otherWise sullering, or of one decensed, then it was their name, not that of the persen whe brought It which was offerei. In any case the publication of the name wha uaierstood as n reguest for the prayers of tha church on behalf of the persen mimed.
St. Cyprian ubes the phrnse "nomen efferre" of the living, when, cemplaining of the too easy absolution granted to the lapised, be says, "While the persecution still continues, ere the peace of the church itself' is yet restered, they are almitted to communiente, and their name is offered " (Ad Presbyt. Eip. 16). When he forwasded n charitable colleetion. When he forwarued a charitible collection to Numidia, he gave the bishops thare tributors, and of the other bishops, and of the priests, who had nssisted iu making it, "that they might bear them in mind in their petitions, and make a return tor their goed work in sacrifices and prayers" (Preces, Ad Januar. Ep. 2.). St. Jerome speaks more than once of this practice, which applears to have had its evils ater the conversion ot the empire: "The oames of the olderers are now pubicicly recitad, and the rejemption of siss is turned into praise" (Comment. in Jercin. ii. i. 1t'); "The deacon recites is the churches the nimes of the offerers, 'She ofters so much,' 'He has promised so much,' and ther take pleasure in the applause of the people, in Ereh, vi, xviii 5-G) tormanting them" (Comm. was of an enduring kind, as the erection or nalowneut of a church, the name was recited (Hum. every celebration. Thus St. Chrysestom (Hum. aviii. in Acto Apost. 5), addressing the wader of a church, "Is it a sinail thing, tell me, for thy name to have a place perpetualiy in 695 , decreed that "the nnmes of those by Merida, it is certain that charches have been built or tho are declared, or who have been deciared, to bare given anything to the sail holy churches, hhall, it they are living in the body, be recited before the altar in the time of mass; but that, if they hare departed or shail depart from this life, their names shall be recited with those of the eithful departed, in their order" (can. 19). The publication ot the names of the dead, when an ofiering was made for them, is tound in Atrica in that "no oblary. Thus St. Cyprian, ordering wleep" of one who had broken for the filling church, gives ns the reason that one whe had lane so did "not deserve to be naned at the ultar in the prayer of the priests" (Epist. ad Mary 15 ).

In the Moznrabic Missal the Post Nomina follows the names of a long series of coufessors: "Let the presbyter say, Our priests offer na oblation to the Lord God. . . Making a commemoration of the most blessed apostles and martyrs, the glerions hely Virgin Hilary, Athanasius, Nartin, Ambrese at rest, tine,"'&c. (46 ans, Nartin, Ambrose, Augusfor the recital of thes). There is no direction others, but atter the Post of the offerers or constant form after the Post Nomina, the following is said, "Let, from which the practice appears, life of the livie presbyter say, for Theuart the rest of the living, the health of the sick, and the rest of the faithtind departed, for evor and ever" (Leslie, 4). Se of' the Post Nomina itself, St. lsidere, 610, says, "Effunditur pro offerentibns sive pro defunctis fidelibus" (De Eccl. Off. i.
The later Roman rule and the reason for it wore, as we learn from Pseudi-Innocent, as follows: "Thou mayest know of thyself, of thine own good sense, how superfuous it is for thee to mention the name of him whese oblation thou efferest to God (though nothing be hid from Him) previously; (that is), befere the priest makes the prayers (Precess), and by his petitions comuends the oblations of thoso whose aumes are to

Hence the origin of the Commemoratio pro viris before the consecratlon, and the Commemorutir, pro defunctis after it in the Roman eamon. In both, the priest may still eall up aileatly the names of any for whom he deaires to pray (Ritu* Celebr. vili. 3; 1x. 2); but when the change was first made, the ennon wanatill mad, and therefore the names would be recited, aloud. See Notitia Eho'uri-tici, ed, 2, p. 565, In the Vatican MS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary, priated by llooea ( $0, p$. Greg. V. 63 ; ed. 1615 ), the former commenoration runs as followa: "Memento, Domine, famulurum fanularumque tuarum, Ill. ef Ill. et ombium cireum astantium, quornm Tibl fides cognita est et aota devotio, qui Tibl offerunt hoo sacribicium lnulis pro na suisque omnibus." The Eligian codex renembles this (Menard in O,p. Greg., ed. Len. iii. 3). In the margin of the Othobonian, and In every vacant space about the pages, are many names of the living who sought the prayers of the church, expecially of the sick, as well as of deceased persons (Murat. Lit. Kom. Vet. 1. 73; II. 2). One of the Cologne MSS., used by Pamalius, inserts after "tuarum," in the margin, "et eorum quoruin nomina ad memoraadum conscripsimus, as: super sanct om altare Tunm scripta adesse videntur" (Riwale l'I'. ii, 180). In tho canon as given by Amalarius (Eolojae do Off. Miss. in fine) we have, after "tuarum," "Iiforum et Illarun [Ilic domina vivorum memorentur, si volueris ; sed non dominlea die, nisi certía diebus], et omnium," ete. Sim. a Saltaburg Pontifical, cited by Martene (Aud. Ecel. /it. J. iv. viii. 15). The old Ambrosian eanon here resembles the old fioman, but coutains an ndditional clause which has lueen horrowel by the later Roman : "Nemento, Domine, famulorum famularumquo Tuarom [1l]orum] et omnium circum adstantium quorum tibi fides cognita est et nota devotio, pro yuibus T"bi offerimus vel qui Tibi offerunt," etc. (Murat. u, s. I:33).

There is no Commemoratin pro Mortuis In the Gelnsian canon (Murnt. i. 697), nor in several copies of the Gregorian, Gerbert mentions three in which it is altogether wanting, and three others in which it has been supplied by later hand (Mon. Vet, Lit. Alemunn. 1. 236). Only in one copy, it is believed, does a memorial of the dead occur in the canon both before and after the consceration; viz., in the Rhenaugen MS, of the 8 th century (it.self shewn to be a copy of an earlier) from a transcript of whieh Gerbert prints. The former of these commemorations, which immediately follows that for the living is as follows: "Memento etiam, Domine, et animarum fimulorum famularumque tuarom fidelium Citholicorum in Christo quiesceatium, qui nos praecesseruat, iforwm et illarum, qui per elcemosynam et confessionem Tibi redduat vota sua" (ibid. 23:3). The soond memorisl efter the consecrstion, in this MS, is, "Nemento etiam, Domine, et eorum nomina, qui nos prasecennerunt cum Higuo filel et forminnt in nomno pacta." With this ngrees to the letter one Cologne MS., from which Pamelins jriats (1.182), the Rumunising Frankish and Hevnoun Minaly (Murat. H. 694, 779), aad the canun girea by Amulariun, but the last naned idds, "tit recitantur nominis. Dein post jutm revititi fu: rint dio t," etc, In othera the prayer begins thus: "Super Diptycha" (Cod. Votio, lineca), "Mementn etlam I)omine famulorum (N, Cerb, Cui, 2 ; Dimel. u. s.) famularumque (N, Corf. Col. 2) Jinarum (III. Rocea and Cort. Eli,. u. H. 4 ; Jllormon et Thirum (with several namea in the margin), Cordex Vistio. Dibl. Murat. II. 4) qul turs pacis." All thene proceed thua, "I $\mathrm{j}_{\mathrm{m}} \mathrm{m}$, Inmine, et omnibus in Cliristo quiescentlbua, lscumr refrigerli, lucls et fincis ut ladulgean dejrecamor, per," ete.

The Councll of Alx in 789, uniler the influence of Charleinagne, adopted the Intur rule of Jimma as expreshed by Previlo-lnawcent (cra. 54 ; xue also Cone. Francof. A.d. 794, ean. 51 ).

The early Ambrosian canon lill nut commemo. rate the departed (Murat. w.s. 134), but sn mo. varying prayer, introduced st an unknown period, was anili wecretly after the oblations were set cu the altar, but before the Offerent, Creed und Super Ohlatum, in which both living nal deal are prayed for: "Receire, holy Trinity, thin oblation which we offer uate Thee .

- for the heslth and aafety of 'Thy servanta and handmallens X., for whom we have promised to implure Thy ciemency, and whose alma we have receivel, and uf all faithfal Chriathas, both living and departel " (Pamel. u. s. 1. 298)

The ilturgien of the East do not shew expressiy where the names of offerers were published, but there is evory renson to think that it was done whea the diptycha were read. St. Mark thua refers to offerera In a jrayer before the adaphora, whilch, following immedhately the diptyohs of the dead, Intercedes for them anil for the living also: "Recelve, O God, on to Thy holy, supercelestial, and intellectual altar, the gratness of the heavens, through the ministry of Thy archangels, the thank-offerings of those that ofler the sacrifices and oblations, of those who desire to offer much and little, secretly, and openly, and are not able; and of those who have this day otlered the oblations" (Renaul. i. 150). In St. James these intercessions come after ths consecration. As the offerera are mentioned immediately after the diptychs of the living (compare Assem. Codex Lit, v. 43 with 85), we infer that their names had also beea recitel at the name time. The clause in St. James is, "V cuchsafe also to remember, $O$ Lord, them who hare this day offered these oblations on Thy holy altar, and these for whom each has offered, or has in mind, and those whose names have been now rend unto Thes " (u. .43 ). The diptychs of the desd follow. In St. Besil, which is derived from St. James, the dijitychs of the living and dead are read before any of the intercessions are said. The following is the reference to the offerers: "Remomber, $O$ Lord, those who have offered these gifts unto Thee, and those for whom, and by whem, and on account of whom they hars offered them " (Guar, 171). This is not preserved in St. Chrysostom, nor in the Armenian, which is also derived from St. Basil. Perhaps it waw thought, when all oblations but those of bread

 $P_{\text {tradi }} u s$.) (1) The word first of all menns the plant called giant-fenael, which was used as a cane ; then it means a cane or stati, and even a surgeon's splint. In Christian ecelesiology it wns used to designate the vestibule of $n$ church. The reason of this application is given in a passage of Procopius of Caesarea (circa 527) in deseribing the church which the empreror Jostinian built at Jerusalem in honour of the Blessel Virgin. "A great quantity of colomns, immense ln size and in colour resembling in flune of fire, anplort the church ( $\tau \delta \nu \nu \in \omega$ ) on every side, some below and some nbove, and some about the cloistcra ( $\sigma$ Toans) which surround the whole precinct (iepov), excent on the side which is turned towards the Next there follows a kind of cloister ( $\sigma$ tod $\tau i s$ ) named nfter the nnrthex, I suppose, from its not being made wide." (Procopius, de Acdificiis, lib. v. cap. 6, ed. Dindorf in Corpus seriptoum IIstoriue Byzantinate, vol. iii. p. 323, Bonn, 1838.) It is lajd down by Hofmann (l.e.e. Univ. s. v.) that the length of the narthex was the whole wilth of the church.

Another etymology, unnoticed by Binghnm and others, but exclusively relied on by the Etyinologium Mngnum, and the Lexicon of Zonaras, connects the word narthex with $\nu \in f=y$
 ed. Gnisford]), because it was on a lower level than the body of the church (see a long note upon the subject by the commentator on the C ncordins Regularum of St. Benedict of Anianum, temp. Charlemngne, ed. Migne, Patrol. Cirsus, tom. 103, p. 1010). This however does not appear to be in accordance with the fact. For it will be seen lower down, that in some eases the narthex was the receptacle of the female part of the congregation, and that that receptncle was upon a higher, not a lower, level than the body of the church. [Nave.]
The word is used sometimes of $n$ part within the church, and sometimes of one without; but it always means a part of the charch further from the altar than the part where the taithful were assembled. Hence it was a place for the catechumens. Near them the

 the narthex. The entrance from the narther to the nave was, according to Beverilge, by the "beantiful gates" [Doors, p. 573], near which, as the most honournble part of the narthex, the Audientes stood. The communiention of the narthex with the outside whs through the "great gates" ( $\mu \in \gamma$ ádai $\pi$ ú $\lambda a 1$ ). The place of the Citechumeni in the narthex was near these last gates. The Energumens or possessel coming between the Catechumens and the Audientes.
A passage of St. Gregory Thammaturgns shews distinctly that in his plan the narthex was within the gate of the church. He says that the Audientes were to do thelr part "within the gate (of the church) in the narthex," (Evס001 Tins Sce a discussion of the several views in the commentary of Du Cange upon Paul the Silentiary, cap. 81.

Leo Allatius wrote a tract upon the narthex, in which he refutes the opinion that the narthes was in the porch, nond shews that it was inside the church, near the door, and that it was the place where the Catechumens, the Energumens, and the Yenitents wers gathered.

Du Cange (Gloss, Graec. s. v. 986) points to a distinction (and possibly to some solntion of the discrepancy amongst writers) between monastic ant non-monastic churches; and he nffirms that in the latter class, the narthex was outside, not inside, the church. In monastic churches, a dise and the had to be made between the fraternity churches wers divlied Internally into three parts : (1) the Bemn (Sacrarium) with the screen; (2) the vads, for the monks, with ralls separating

As to the distinction between monastic and nonmonastic churches in the East, Magri (Hierykricon, s. v.) gives a different account, which he says depeads upen his own observation. The aasthex, he says, in monastic churches serves for lay monks, and in seenlnr churches for womed. In the latter ease it $i$ a fenced off by grilles and rails.
A senrch has been made in vain for any tranaription of the Greek word by ang of the earlier Latia writers. It appears to be always translated by porticus, atrium, or some kindred word. Biagham, indeed (Antiq. viii. cap. 4, s. 2), while ne claims great antiquity for the thing,

It is affirmed, indeed, by Hofmann (Lexicon Cnit, s.v.) that the narthex was by the Latins called Paradisus. This, however called Paradisus. This, however, seems to be trictly the name for the cloistered court, which ia some of the older basilicas atoed in front of the entrance to the church proper. In the view of some writers narthex was the name appropriated to that side of the quadrangular cloister which sluntted on the church wall. It is not till the 6th century (Greg. Turon. lib. 2, c. 21)

NATALE, also Natalis, dies natalis, natalitia; nste in the language of the early church, the

Pagi (on Baronios, ann. 67, n. 2:3) contends that the natalis of a martyr in the that the natalis of a martyr in the calendar is mrely his actual death-day, but commonly that Ithe translation of his relics, as in time of ful the very day of the snint's martyrdom, that they might hold an assembly on thit day (Acta Ion. c. 6). Cyprinn, too, (Epist. 37) required that the death-dnys of such of the faithful ns died in prison should be communicated to him, in order that they might be commemornted by an oblation on that day. In this way were formed Calendars and Martyrologhes. Cere. endars of this kind were also common nmong pagnns. In the records, for instance, of the collegium of Lanuvium, published by Nommsen (de Cullegins, p. 112), we find the denthedne (de Cullegiis, p. 112), we find the denth-dnys which were to Be celehrated by members of the substitute some such name as "C "Cubstitute some such name as "Callisti" for "Caesenni" and we have at once a Christian entry. [Compare MARTYR, pp. 1123, 1127.]

In inscriptions, Natale or natalis is very common. common.
To take two examplea out of a multitude; the inscription sanctis martyribvs tibvrio \| baleriano et maximo qvorvm || natales [natalis] est xviif. kalendas Maias tells us that the death-day of the martyrs Tiburtius, Valerianus and Maximus was on the eightecnth day before the calends of May; and the inscrip)tion parentes filio mercvrio fecellrvnt qui vixit anN. V. et mesis vili. || Natisin pace invs Fabrv, that the child Mercuriua was "born in peace "-i.e. died-on the ides of February (Mamachi, Origines, ii. 230; Marangoni, Actary. lict. p. *8). It was in accordance with this feeling that the anniversary of a Christian's death-day was celebrated with the rejoicing which generally accompanies a birthday [Cella Memoriak]. It will be obscrved in the two inscriptions given above-and the same is the case with all inscriptions of that antiquitythat ne year-date is given; it was sufficient to mark the day on which the anal mark the day on which the annual commemoration was to be held.
The natalia of distinguished persons naturally aeen came to be used themselves as dates. Thus in an inscription given by De Rossi, Studentia is said to have died on the natale of pope Marcellus (Jan. 16).
In precess of time, the werd natalis came to mean little more than an annual festival, and was applied to commemorations to which in the strict sense it was inapplicable; thus the Kalendurium Buchervanum (Ruinart, p. 617) has "VIlI. Kal. Mart. Natale Petri de Cathedra," for the festival of the Chair of St. Peter. And the word was also not unfrequently used for the anniveraary of the ordination of a bishop. It designated alse, with a certain appropriateness, the anniversary featival of the foundation of a city.
The day of the Institution of the Lord's Supper is called Natalis Calicis, or Dies Nutalis Eucharistiae. [Maundy Thersday, p. 1160.] Lord Natalis Domini is the birthday of the Lord in the fesh [Christmas Day, p. 356]; the entrance into the life of this Worlid Joun Barrist [p. 881] is also a festival.

NATIVITY, THE (in ART). It has been remarked in a previous article (Mary, the Virgan, in Art) that while the Adoration of the Magi is ode of the commonest subjects in early Christian art, the Natlvity, with the contemporaneous gospel fact. the Adorntion of the Shepherds, is one of the very rarest. Indeed it canuot be aaid to belong to pictorinl art at all. It does not once appear in the innumerable catacomb frescoes. It is equally absent from the mosnics of the basilicas and churches. The oaly examples of the subject are sculptural, and must be looked for on minor works, such as sarcophagi, ivories, and gems, and even bere it is by no meaas frequent.

The representations of this scene generally follow one type. We usually see the Divine Child wrapped in its swaddling bands as the central object, lying either in n basket-work manger, or on a tall stool, vested with hangings. The Babe is sometimes recumbent; but more usunlly the head and shoulders nre raised without any suppert, $\ln$ supposed allusion to Matt, vili. 20, Luse ix. 58. The star appears above. The virgin inother sometimes lies on a rude couch as a newly delivered woman, either ebore or below the Infant, on which she lays her right hand, sometimes sits by the manger. Joseph, when present, is seated at its foot, rapt in thought, his head resting on his hasd. The ox and the ass, the traditional accompaniments of the nativity, in allusion to Isai. i. 3, Habak. iii. (ef. Baron. Annot. 1. \& 3 ; Tillemont, 1. 423) eppear either behind, or at the head and foot of the manger. The shepherds, with curred staves in 'their handa, atand by adoring.

The represcatations of the nativlty on sares. phagi are vare. The pediment of that whlch forms the substructure of the pulpit of the brsllica of St. Ambrose at Milan, offers an example. The divine Babe lies on a bed, unattended, the star restiag on Its head, while at ita feet couch the ox and the asa (Allegranza, Monum. di Milun, p. 63, tav. v.; Martigay, Dictionn.

p. 89 ; woodcut No. 1). We find the arme subject very rudely portruyed on a sarcophagus nt Arles, ligured by Millinn (Midi de la France, pl. Ixvl. No. 4). Christ here lies on a wickerwork cradle, to the left of which His mother is seatel, nad on the right stads one of the shepherds with his right arm extended, holding his pastoral stnff in his left hand. The ox and ass are seen in the background. Jozeph is alssent. In a compartment below we fiad the three Magl, with Phrygian bonaets. The ox and ass are also represented in adoration on a sepulchral fragment assigned to A.D. 343, given by De Rossi (Inscr. Christ. Rom. i. p. 51, No. 73). Here the Infant lies on the grouad, and we have two shepherls standing with hands outstretched in adoration. The scene is similarly represented on two Roman aarcophagi (Aringhi, i. p. 615, ii. 355 ; I3ottarl, tar. Iexxr. aud exciii. ; Bosio, pp. 327, 589). The former, of which we give a woodeut (No. 2), ls a double suliject ; the left-hand half representiag the Adorntion of the Magl. It will le noticed tast one of the shepherds klsses h/s hand In token of worship. On the sarcephagi it is not st all unusual to fiad, by a continuation of tha two subjects, the accessories of the nativity, the ox and the ass, together with the swaduled babe and the manger, forming part of the Adoration of the Magl. (Bottarl, tav. xxii., lxxxv., lxxxvl. $;$ Aringhi, 1. pp. 295, 617 ; Bosio, 63.)

The nativity is a somewhat frequent subject on iveries. The great collection of Gorl (Thesaur. vet. diptych. vol. lii.) preacats several examplea. He gives the ivory sheath of a knlie (tab. x.) on one side of which are carved acenes from the opening of the Gospel history-the Annuacistion, Nativity, Adolntion of the Magl, Presentation ir the Temple, and on the other side scenes from the Passion. search has benn made in vain for any trace of similar desecration within the period embraced in thia Dictionary ; unless Indeed such a jrohibition as that in the 42 nd of the African canons be taken as a proof that a habit was growing in Atricn of converting the body of the church into a banquetiag hall. (Labbe, vol. II. p. 1070, ed. Parls.)

The plang of an early church that hava been worked out from ancient writers by Goar and our own lenrned Bishop Beveridge ditfer from each other in aeveral respects; but they beth agree in assigning the nave as the place of the Ambo or Pulpit. Not only were the Script ure Lessons read from this pulpit, but it was aometimes (not always) used for preaching, so that seme of St. Chrysostom s fumous harangues ware delivered from it. A ph.rase of Socratea the historian shewa why the nave was chosen as the lucality for it. He says (Hist. lib. vi. cap. 5, circa med.), thrit St. Chrysostom had iop. in the habit of preaching from this position, "for the sake of being completely heard."

Some idee of tlio size which a pave sometimes assumed in early. days may he gathered from the description given by Evagrius Scholasticus of the church of St. Sophia at Constantiaople, wioich was built by Justinian in the fitth century. "The leugth from the door opposite the sacred apse. whercin the function of the bloodless aacrifice is selebrated, $u_{1}$; to the apae itself; is a hundred a:cd rinety teat (this probably ineluded a Narthex as well as a Nive); and the brendth from porth to soutt! is a huudred and fitigen feet." (Evagr. Hist. lia. iv. cap, 31.)

An early charch, whish is lescribed to us is that built in the time ofkink Childeric over the sepu'chre of St. Martin, at Tuurs, by Perpetuus, the fiftia bishop of the aee from St. Martia himself. lis tetal lenget was a hundred aud sixty feet, its breadth sixty feet, and its helght forty-five feet. Its nave had twenty windows and tive doors. (i.reg. Turon. Hist. Franc. lib. ii, cap. 14.) Another church of the aame period was thet of Arverne. It was a hundred and fifty feet long, sixty feet wide, ninl fifty feet high. This church likewise had eight dours of which Mabillon (De Liturgiáa Gatlicanâ, lib. i. cap. 8) cenclules that tive were in the nare, that is co say, three in the western façade, aud oue upon each aide.

It is aisated by Herike that the word Navis was first used to designate a part of a church by the Latin writers of the ninth and tenth centuries. He does not gire the pasages upon which he relles; but unlesa he reters te other passagea than those which are given by Du Frevoe, 3. v. 'Navis,' or by Magri (Hierolexicon), it is perhapa open to question whether the date should not be placed still a little later. See his view in Herzog's Real-Encyklopüdie, art. - Baukunat,' p. 731, dear the end. [H. T. A.]

NECROLOGIUM. The book in which were entered the names of the dead for whom prayer was made in religious houses. It was a survival of the primitive dirpycus, but admitted generally only the names of members of tha heuse, of ita benefactors, and those with whom the commnnity had entered inte a compact for mutual intercession.

Thia book had no settled name within our period, and aftorwards it was variously called uecrologium, obitarium, obituarium, liber ebitarius (all Late nediaeval), Kialendarium (as, e.g., in a letter of commuaion between the monks of St. Remigius and those of St. Benignus, "We de for their dead as for our own ; except that briefs are not sent, nor are they put in the kalendar among our ewn people," Literse ad incundan Suffrayiorum Sucietatem, v., in Mabill. l'roofs are numerous of the use of necrologia, though not under a fixed name, within our periokt. Thos, necording to Berle, a boy liviug in a monastery was told in a vimion (about A.D. 6 Ris) to direet the monks, "quaerere in suis codicibus in quibus defunctorum nunotatn est depositio," for the day of St. Oswald's death, 642. The prese to whom he told this nccordingly "zearched for it in his year-book" (nanali; Mist. Eccl. ir. 14.) Bede, who died in 7is, to Ealdred, the bishop, and the monks of Liudistane: "Wheu 1 am dand deign to pray and celebrate masses for the redemption of my seul, as for one of your own family aud house, und to write my nime among your own" (lita Cuthberti, praef. 2). Bonifice, in 752, writiug to an abbat: "We pray that you will enuse to be celebrated helptial priyers and innsses for the souls of our hrethren, fellow-labourers in the Loml, who have tallen nsleep, whose aimes the bearer of this letter has made known to you" (Eyist. 100, ed. Wïrdtweiu). In 755, king Alhred promises Lullus of Nentz that he will, In return for prayers to be offered is his diocese for the king, his queen, nend severnl of his frieals and kin, undertake that prayers shall daily be offered lo all the monasteries in his dominions for Lullus, nad others whose names he had sent to the king. These names, he stys, in general terms, would be committed "perpetuis literarum monumeutis," from which we infer that no specific name for the monastic obituary was known to him ( $E$, ist. 108 inter Epp. Bonif., see also $115,121,127,160$,
From the expression "year-book," used by Bede, we might infer that generally the name of a deceased person was read out of the necrology once a year, viz., on the nuniversary of their death. This is confirmed by doeumentary erideace; as e.g., by the "Litterae Societatis" between two monnsteries in France (Act & O.S.B. snec. 11. 1093): "Nomina vero defunctorum fratrun Stabulensis coeuobii Martyrologio Solemaiacensi per singulos dies. eum sudrum fratrum anaiversariis recitabuntur" (cited by Martene, do Antiq. Monach. Rit. 1. v. 27). But other days might be fixed by special eovenant or injunction. Thus Bertinm of Nans (u.s.263): "Somen meum ac sacerdotes illorum (suprascriptorum locorum) in libro vitae jubennt ascribere, at per siggulas festivitates recitari."
The names for the day were read from the necrilogy in the chapter of the monks after prime. They came after a lesson from the marturologs (properly so-ealled), and were followed by the usalm De Irofundis, with a suitnble prayer (Bı口a, Rer. Litu'g. II. xiv. 2). De Moleon (le Brun Desmnrets) found this custom surviving among the canons of Notre Dame at Ruuen, th the middle of the last century (Voyages Lituriniuts, 282).
When the notice of a denth was sent for entry Is a necrologium, the document was called Brave or Brevis (Litterae N̄ocictıtis, i. v. u.s.) or Liber Rotularis (IInriulfus, Chronic. Centulense, iii. 9, 18 Spinil. Dacher, ii, 316 , ed. 2).

NECROMAN'IIA 'Barb. Nigromnntia' two methods of divination by means of the dead, of which we read within the Christian era. The Juvenal (vi. 551):- Thus,

" 1'ectora puillorum mirsbltur, ex a catelit Interdum et pueri."

Dionrsius, of Alexandria, affirms that Valerian at the instance of nu Eyyptinn arehimage, "slew miserable boys, sacrificed the children of unhappy parents, and divided the newly born entriails" (Euseb. Hist. vii. 10). Eusebius relates that Maxentius "at one time opened the bodies of pregnaut worren, at unother searched the viscera of newly boru iofants " (De Vita Cunst. i. 36 ; sim, Hist. viii. 14). Theodoret shys that nfter the death of Julian, if was found that he had just before, iu $a$ heathen temple, drawn nil murder the lattle from the liver ot a woman, murdered for that purpose (Hist. Ecch. 1ii. 20i). Julian, the heatls us that during the reign of other pluces " female, and inspected children, both male and iii. 13).

The secend method was to raise the souls of of dead, nud obtain direct nuswers from them. Of this we read much more trequently, Thns, Justin Martyr: A.D. 140 , appeals to "neeromancies and inspections of incorrupt boys and the cilling of humin souls," as a testhnony to the conselousness of the soul after death (Apol. i. 18). In the Recognitions of Clement (jerhups about A.D. 180) the writer, who spoaks in the first person, represents himself as considering whether, in the search of truth, be shnil go to Egypt, the chief seat of such studies, and by gifts induce a priest there "to bring up a soul from the iower regions, by that which they call necromancy " (i. 5 ; sim. Hom. Clem. i. 4 ; De Gest. Petri, 5). These " animarum suscitiones" were alleged as a counterpoise to the appenrance of angels, as believed by Christians (ibid. viii. 53). Tertullian, eiting the Greek historinns, saya that "the Nasmmones endeavoured to obtain oracles ot their own, by staying at the sepalchres of their fathers;" and that, "the Celts spend the night with the same object among the tombs of men ot valour" (lie Anim. 57). Constantius, in a lnw of 357, denounces those "qui manibus accitis nudeut ventilare" (Codex Theod. ix. xyı. $D_{e}$ Malcf. 5), where the last word is understood of the motions and gesticulations (beating the air) with which the necrumancer accompanied his incantation. Ammianus relates that Maximin, a high official afterwards put to death by Gratian, was reputed to have in his service (about 368) a Sardinian, who wns "exceedingly skilful in bringing up harmful spirits, and obtaining the presages of ghosts" (Hist. axviii. 1). Prudentius, A.D. 405 (c. Symm. 1. p. 249 ; ed. 1596):

" Murmure nam magico tenues excire flguras, Atque sepulchrales scire Incanture favilles, Vitîi itidem spollare allos, ars noxia novit."

This kind of Necromancy, which was often calied $\psi u x a r j w \gamma i a$, was thought to be most succassful when the answer came from the soul of a person murdered for the purpose. Thus in the Recognitions of Clement aiready quoted, Simon Magus is made to state that his power depended on the aid he received from the soul of "an uncorrupted boy slain by violenve," which he "cailed up and made to assist him by adjurations unutterable" (ii. 13; sim. iii. 44; Hom. Clem. ii. 26; Gest. Petr. 27). The soul immediately on denth was supposed to have many new powers, and among them "prescience, on which account it was calied up for the purposes of Necromancy" (Recogn. ii. 13). Tertullian, who recognises the practice (Apol. 23), says that n peculiar maliguity, and, therefore, readiness to assist in evil, was ascribed to bouls early and violently parted from the body ( $D_{e}$ Anima, 57 ). St. Chrysostom speaks of a popular belijf that many of the $\gamma$ o $\eta \boldsymbol{T} \in \mathrm{s}$ took and siew children that they might have their soula to help them efterwards" (Hom. 28, § 2 , in S. Matt. viii. 29); and seys that " many of the weaker sort thought that the souls of thase who had died a violent death became demons" (De Lazaro, Conc. 1i. 1). Ammianus saya, that one Pollentinans, in the time of Valens (A.D. 371), hnving cut the foetus from the womb of a pregnant woman yet alive, and "having called up the Manes below, presumed to inquire nbout a change of government" (List. xxix. ii. 2). Here it is probably meant that this dreadful rite gave him power over otiner deperted spirits, or over the infernal gods themselves. See St. Augustine, ds Civ. Dei, xviii. 53.

When apparitlons end responses were said to be granted to the necromancer, Christian writers were unanlmous in replying that, supposing it to be true an evil spirit personated tho soul invoked and deceived the magician. So the author of the Recognitions (iii. 49), Tertullian (daemones operantur sub obtentu earam, De An. 57), St. Cnrysostom (Hom. 28, in S. Mutt. § 2), and others.
From the 6th century downwerds, the word necromancy appenrs to have been used vaguely to denote any pretended exercise of supernatural power. Thua Gregory of Tours, A.D. 575, speaklug of one who nfiected to cure diseane, says that he "sought to mock men by the delusinn of necrumantio device" (Hist. Franc. ix. 6). Adhelm, 709, says that St. Peter went through the provinces extirpating from the root the deadly wild vines of the Simoninn Necromancy" ( $D_{e}$ Laud. Virg. 25). The sume writer (ibid. 24) calls the "spirit of divination," of Acts xvl. 16, a "spirit of necromacy," and again (50) spplies the term to arts by which the reason of a person was supposed to be atl'ected. The following is the epltuph of a married woman, "Hoctavie coojnge neofite blsemus maritus fecit" (Grut. P. 1053 m. 7). Other lastances of female neophytes occur in several collections, as, e.g., in Gruter, p. 1054 n. 1 (3 years), p. 1057 n. 6 (a wife). The last ls called "legltima neophyta." Does thls mean that she died atter the eight daya, and se had tulfilled all the special ebservancea jropesed on neophytes? Sometimes they were said to have died in albis. For example, "Hic jacet puer nomene Valentinno qui vixlt anno iii. et mie ses et dies xyl. et in albls cum pace recessit" (Le Blant, Inscript. Chrét. de la Gaule, i. 476, who also refers to Fabretti, Inscr. Antiq. Explic. pp. 377,735 ). It is reasenably inferred that such persons had, as a rule, receired cllaic baptism. [Sick, Vibitation of the.]
II. It frequently happened in the enrly ages that the fittest person for the office of bishop or prest in a vacant church was one who bad not passed tireugh the lower orders, or at least not threugh all of them. At first it is probable that Juymen and inferior clerks were ordalued priests and bishops freely in such cases; but at leagth the liberty became an occasion of ambition, and was restraised by the canons, in accordance with the injunction of St. Paul ( 1 Tim. 3il. 6), from whom also the name of neophyte (in this use of it a term of repreach) was berrewed to describe the premature ruler of the church. The earliest prohibition occurs in the 80th of the so-called "pestelic canons. "It is net right that one whe has come out of paganism and been baptized, or who h:a left a sintul course of life, should forthwith be ordaned a bishop. For it is unfit that one who has not yet given proof of himself should be a teacher of others ; unless, indeed, this take place through the grace of God." The council of Nicaen, 325 , premising that this "rule of the church" had beea often broken, "either from necessity or becnuse men urged it, ao that they led men but lately come over to the faith from paganism, and in the catechumente for a short time, to the spiritual laver, and further prometed them as soon as bnptized, te the episcopate or presbyterate," decreed that such practices should be tolerated ne louger (can. 2). The Arabic canens of Nicaea dejose both the ordniner and the ordained in such a case (can. 12, vers. Ecchell. Hard. Conc. 1. 480). The council of Sardica, 347, torbade any one to be made a bishop who had not befers "served as reader and deacou and presbyter; . . . for so he weuld with reason be regarded as a veophyte" (can. 10). The council of ladicen, of uncertain date, but probably abeut 365: "Persons lately illuminated (i.e. baptizel [Baptism, § 5 ; rel. i. p. 156]) must not be prometed in the hieratic order" ( can. 3); which is thus rendered by Dionysius Exiguus, A.D. 533 ; "Nen oportet neephytum promeveri ad ordinem sacerdetalem" (Hard. i. 782 ).

Gaul seems to have been notorious for offences ngainst this law of the church. Gregory I. in 598 says to queen Brunichilda, "their ottice has there, as wa have understood, come to be such an object of andition, that bishops (ancerdotes), which is too grieveus, are at once ordained out of laymen "(Epist. vil. Ind. II. 115). Instances of thit are fonnd in Gregery of Teurs: "Nicethus tamen ex laico, qui prius ab Chilperico rege praeceptum elicuerat, in Ipsa mbe (Matiscensi) episcopatum adeptus est" (IIst. Franc. viil. 20). Again: "Laban, bishop of Enuse, died this year, whom Desiderius succeeded from a layman, though the king had promised with sn oath that he would never oxdain a bishop out of the laity. Sed quid pectera homanai non cogat nuil snera tames " (ibid. 22)?
The Apestelic canon, it will be ebserved, makes an exception in fiveur of those who, like Tlinothy ( $1 \mathrm{Tim} .1 .18 ; \mathrm{iv} .14$ ), were supposed to receive aeme diviae attestation to their fitness. Cyprian, Athamasius, Nectariua, and Ambrose are insthuces, The first named had indeed been biptized and made deacon and priest in auccessien, but all ia so short a time, that his biographer says ef him "Judicio Dei et plebis favore ad offichum sacerdetil, et eplscepatus gradum (A.D. 248), adhuc neophytus, et ut putabatur, nevellus electus est " ( 1 ittr auct. Pontio, Opp. Cypr. prief. 3, ed, Fell.). The ceuncil of Neocaesarea had in 315 forbldden even a priest to be ordained under thirty years of age (can. 11); yet only eleven years after that, the great Athanasius, In obedience, it was believed, to a divine intimation conveyed through his dying predecesser, who called, out his name repeatedly with his last breath, was ordained bishop of Alexandria at the age of t wenty-eight (Sozom. Mist. Ecel. hi. 17). Nectarius was net baptized when, in 381, he was chosen to succeed Gregery Nazianzen at Censtantinople; but was then "initiated hy baptism), and while yet clothed in the typical dress (of the neophytes) was declared bishop of Constantinople by the commen veice of the sy nod," then assembled in that city (Sezon, vii. 8). Nor was St. Ambrose mere than a catechumen, whea (A.D. 574) the people of Milan insisted on his beceming their bishop; but, "being baptized, he is said to have filled all the ecclesinstical offices, nad on the eighth day he was ordained with the greatest tiveour and joy of all " (Vita a Paulino conscr. § 9). Some twenty years later, referring to these circumstances ind to his great unwillinguess to accept the office, he ssys: "Nevertheless the bishops of the west approved - y ordination by their judgment; those of the east by their example nlso. And yet a nenphyte is forbidden to be ordnined, lest he should be lifted up with pride;" but (he urges) if there be a sultable humility, the defect is healed, "utij causa non hueret, vitium non imputatur" $(E$ ish, 73 ad Eccl. Vercell. § 65).

So early as the end of the 2nd century, T'ertullian (de ldololatr. c. 14) has to lament the countenance given by Christians to the old jras. tices at this season (nobis Saturnelia et Janurine et Brumae et Matronales frequentantur, munera comaneant, strenae consonant, luxus, convivia constrepunt), which they excused to themseives as merely civiland social observances, nowise pagan superstitlons. Petrus Chrysologus (c. 433), Serm. 155, protests similarly: "Dicit nliquis, non suni haec sacrilegorum studia, vota sunt haec jocorum; et hoc esse nuvitatis laetitinm non vetustatly errorem, ease hoc anni princlpium, non gentilitatis offensam. Eiras homol nonsunt haec ludiera, sunt crimina." How long and enrnestly the protest against this conformity of Christigns to these old-established customs was kept up by the church may be seen in Homilies of St. Chrysostom (A.D. 387), in Kuleruias, t. 1. 697, nid de Luzaro, $\mathrm{i}_{2}$ ibid. 707, in the opening of which he calls the feast of the Calends toptiv батaviкím ; Asterius Amnsenus (cir. 400) in Kalendas, p. 55 ; St. Augustin, Serm. 198, de Cal. When the 25th December had tome to he generally received as the day of the Nativity [Cumastmas], the Calends of Jubuary a oulired a Christinn character, nud Dionysius Exiguus dntes the years of his ers (our a.d.) a Circumcisione Dumini. But the churches long shrank frow making the New Year's Day of Christians the same with that of the heathen, and it was deemed preferable to commenc: the year a Natioitate ( 25 th Deceniber), an epoch which continued in use far into the middla nges. Others, however, found it more suituble that the year should begin 25th March, which, If 25th December was the day of Christ's Nativity, would be the day of the Conception, the oala $\sigma d \rho \kappa \omega \sigma$ os, the Incarnation. Hence "ie epoch ab annunciatione, or a conceptione. These two epochs were further recommended (in the astronomical point of view) $\mathrm{t} j$ their suprosed colncidence with the bruma (25th Uecember) and the vernal equinox ( 25 th March). But, aceortiog to an ancient Latin traditlon, the Pasoion befiel 2.5th March. St. Augustid, de 7 rin. iv, 5 : "Octare Kal. Apr, conceptus creditur. Christus quo 6 passus. Natus traditur octavo kal. Dec." IJence, perhaps, the epoch a resurrectione (or a pussime) Christi, was originally Intended for the fixed date, 25 th March. Bede relates (de Temp. rat. c. 45), that in Gaul, at first, this was kept as the day "quando Christi resurrectio fuisse tradebatur": and Zeno of Verona, cir. A.b. 360 , Serm. 46 , speaking of this as the day of the resurrection says, in his mystical way, "Hem sui successor itemque decessor, longneva semper actata novellus, anni parens annique progenies, antecedit sequiturque tempora et saecula iufinits." Certain it is, that the dating of the years of eur Lord from Easter-the moveable fenst-(inconvenient as it wrs, as so shifting from yenr to yesr, that any Julian day within the pasehal limits, say ist April, might fall twice in the same yesr or not at al] ") prevailed far into the middle ages, in France down to the sixteenth century. In this reckoning, the first instunt of the New Year was signalised by the consecration of the tapers in the night preceding Easter morning. (Du Cange, s. v. Cereus l'uschalis, nnd Mabillon de tie diplom. ii, 2:3-6.) In Spain and Portugal the years were dated from the Annunciation down to the fourteenth century, in Ge'many down to the eleventh, then from the Nativity. Concerself, the English, in Bede's time, began the year with 25th December ; stter the thirteenth catury, with the 25th March, which continued to be the legal civil reckonirg dowu to 1752 . In ltaly, besides the ecclesiastical epoch, Ist March (see above), 25 th March was the customary ciril epoch, with this curious variation, viz. thas in one reckoning (Calonlus Pisanus) a given yeir of our Lord was made to begin on the 25 th March NiCAEA, COUNCILS of (Nicatena Con(cilia). There were two councils held at Nicaea, the metropolis of Bithynia, both general ; the firnt and the last to be received as general by the Eastern and Western churches nilike; the first under Constantine $I$., and the second under Constantine VI. (1.) The first met A.d. 32.5, in the consulship of Panlinus and Julianus, so fir nill are ngreed, and there was a law publiahed by Constaatine, dated Nicaen, May 23 (x. Kal. Jun. in 1. Cid. The ned. ii. 3, with Godfrey's note), shewing that he was there then. According to Socrates, who prochronologieal got his information from the chronologieal notices affixed to it in a work he cails the Synodicon of St. Athanasius, it met three days earlier, or May 20 (i. 13). It was guing on when the emperor celelirated his 20th anniversary (July 25) accorting to Clinton, on which day he invited all the bishops present to a banquet, as we learn from Eusebius (lit. Const. iii. 15). This covers the date prefixed no its creed in the nets of the fourth coancil; and it was closed some time subsequently te thisa note to the Cresconian collection says, just a month later, or August 25-by a speoch from him ( Il .21 , comp. Pigi ad Baron, A.D. 325, n. 4). All the principai documents relnting to it may be seen in Manst'n Concilia or Beverligen's Si,molion, vol. Ii. in each case. Ot nuthentle and contenipurary documents relating to it, inloud, there are bat few; of nocryphal, in bewilidering host. As it was the first of ita kini, we cannot basurprise I that lt acta were not writted down at the time, an was ntterwirila customary.

There was no book kept of the acts of the first or even of the accond coun. cil, as there was from the third onwards, Only what was agreed upon in common, was committed to writing, anil subseribed to by all, ma Euseblus sitya (lit. c. lif. 14). In thly ilmited class were comprehended only the creel, canons, and synodical letter. As Valeslus well observes, had anything more been extant, St. Athanasius woulit never have been at the pains of recailing so many partifulars of what passed in reply to his frien l, but would hava toll hlin simply where he conld find them recorded. The 'Copies of the Nicene Councll' (l $\sigma a$ ), transmitted A.D. 419 to the Afrlean charch from Constantloople, contained no more than its creed and cinons, Its synodical letter Is extant In Socrates an 1 Theodoret (1.9), as are two letters issued by the emperor at lts elose. His clrculars in convening it have not been preserved; but af we may trust to what Eusebius tells us of thelr substance ( 1 'it C. Jih. 10 ; and Vales. ad l.), his own letter to Chrestas, blshop of Syrneuse ( $t . H^{\prime} . \times$ x. 5) for assembling the conacil of Arles, may serve to illistrate their form. The letters of Euseblus to his own diocese, besldes hals lite of the emperor, and of St. Athanasius to hla friends and to the Afrlean bishops are first-class nuthorlties also for what passed, as far us they go, though from opposite sides. What Socrates calls the 'syoodicon' of St. Athanasius is not now extant, nad, being only mentioned and quoted by Socrates, cannot be placed on the simne footing with his acknowledged works. For anything like certainty we must be content with what we can glean from these.

The emperor, Euscbius tells us, wrote Gattering letters to the bishops everywhere, begging them to meet at Nichea with all speed ( Iit. C. iii. 6). St. Athanasius tells the Atricions (1. 2) that bishops to the number of 318 came. The council has gone by the name of the 318 ( $71 \eta$ ) Fathers ever since, though other necounts of its numbers had been current. It met in a church (otkos eúkтиpios), one of the largest then known, nad situated in the very midst of the palace ( 'iti, $C$. iii. 7 nad 10), whither its members could ndjourn easily, when the emperor desired their presence. A solitary plane-tree marks its site still; nad within the village charch of 1 s-nik is a rude picture commemorative of the event (Stanley's E. C. p. 121). But if we may trust the envors of Gregory IX., they were received, A.d. 1233. In the actual cliurch in which the event took place (Mansi, xsiii. 280 sq.). The causes which led to it were threefold; the heresy of Arius, the schism of Meletius, and the moot question of keeping Easter. The first of these whs the newest and most absorbing of all; but who suggested the novel experinent of a geucral council for dealing with it? The council of Antioch. A.D. 272 , at which its then bishop, Paul of Samosata, was deposed, had been the neareat approach to a general council in earlier times ; and this had been preceded by a number of amaller meetings, as we learn from kinsebliua ( $E, / / 1$. vil. 28), nol so grew out of them in dre course. But that of Nicaea, the aame authority tells un (Vit. C. lii. B), was the net of one man and "Gorl it was," ways the emperor, "on whove suggeation I neterl In summoning the blshope to moet in such numbers" (Sou. I. 81). It was "by the grace of Goi, and the ploty of the empuror In assembling us out of different clties and proo vinces, that the great and holy synol come together," way they ln recounting Its issues (ib,). No two accounts of the same thing coulit be more consistent. Later writera fanjstedi on mupplementing them with a gloss of their owa. sulpitius Severas, Indeed, argued from contemporary facts, when he talked of the conacil originating with Hosius of Cordovn (ii. 40); the fathers of the sisth council nrgued from the usnges of their own tlmes slmply, when they taikel, in their prosphonetic addresh, of its having been assembled by pope Silvester und Constantine. Silvester, of course, concurred in assembling it, so far that he rent representatives thither, being unable, through old nge, to attend in perma. They who "filled his place" were preshyt ras, aveording to the same authorlty $\mid$ and they subseribed second. Hosius, designating himself merely bishop of Cordova, subseribed first. II subucribed first at Sardica similarly. No lesk a witness than St. Athanasius attexts this last (Apol, c. Arian. 49 sq.) ; and the 'Prisca vernio' makes him head lts list of subscribers st both. He was revered on both siles even then; he wis in the highest firvour of any bishop nt court now ; he must have been the olidest blshop, by fir, present at either, if, as St. Athanasius sars, he was 100 yenre old, and had been bishop wure than sixty years, A.D. 357, when his lapse twis place. Hence, the order in which bishops shuald sit at general conncils being as yet undetermined by rule, he who was the most nncient would be placed first, as Eusebius expressly says had ben done hy Paimas (E. II. v. 23), and was a costenn in Africa mueh later (Can, Afric. 86 ; comp, st, Aug. Ep. lix.) ; ndd to which, that Hosits had been a canfessor under Maximidiau, as he sars himself: Persons talked of him, said the Arvins - at least this is what St. Athanasius puts ioto their months-ns one who presided at syouts; whose lefters were respected every where, who bai formulated the Nieene Creed (Ep. oul Sol. $\$ \div 3-*)$, Taking all these fncts into consideration, it is ditficult to conceive that Euselinas can mean any but Hosius whea he tells us that the bishop wha "sat first ln the right row" delivered the opening speech (Fit. C. i1is. 11); especially when it is remembered that Hosius had been the ouly blshop personally noticed hy him in enameratiag those present, only three chapters earlier, and also that the very next thing we are told, atter this antiee of lim, is that the bishop of the reigning city was oot present, but that his phace was filled by his preshyters, who were the next to subscribe after Hosius. Again, there is proof positive from Eusebius of Hosius having acted for Constantine several times before (E. H. x. 6 ; I'st. C. ii. 6.3 ; comp. Soc. i. 7), but no contemporary proof whatever of his having ever acted for pepe Silvester. If Eusebius ind defirered the opening speech himself; he would not have left us to learn this trom Sozomea, nor would

The openlog apeech made to him on their part has not beta preserved; his answer has. It was n short nhortation to pence, delivered in Latia, nod interpretel into Greek as he spoke. When he had traished, he let the "presidents of the coun-eil"-in ether words, the bishops-spenk. As there were muititudes prevent besides bishops, there can be ne mere doubt that this is what lovebius means here by that phrase, than that bishops frequently went by that name. Endless discussione between them ensued, tho emperor atiog the part of moderator all through, cenraidg with them in Greek, to dixpiny his haillarity with their own langunge, though he hed previensly spoken in Latin, and getting them to be of one mind and opinion on ail the disputed peints at iast. They gave due proof of this in their ereed aud ennons-Eusebius tells the fithfut of his diecese-and St. Athanasjus vouches for his neceunt (Ve Dec. Syn. First, the creed $\forall$ his own church of Caesarea, nad, therefore, probabiy that of the church of Jerusalem also, which he had received from hils predecessors, had fesod himself aver atechumen, had taught nad prefesed himself ever since, whs reeited before the maptror, and found substantially correct ; then, war additions to it having been agreed upen, it mas published in the name of the ceuncil. The emperor, he teilis his people, put a aense on thila woril which he conid admit ; and it was, no doubt, for having got thin word Insertad, that St. Athanasius eredits his rival with having firmulated the creed itnelf. The new and the old cread agreed in this: that they commonced "Whe (not 1) believe," and ended with n mimple profession of beliet in the Holy Ghost. To this, in the new one, was subjoined an nathema; but, instend of being cemmeneurate with the creed, it was ceufined, as all subsequent anathemas of general councils were, to the maintainers of the particular heresy then condemned, in thls case the Arian. All the bisheps present subscribed to the new fermula, eays Socrates, except five says Theodoret, exeept two ; and these failing to under the anathema subjoined to it, and refusing to condemn Asjus, shared his exile, decreed by the emperer. The numes of those who subseribed are net extant in Greek, except in the short Ilst of Gelasius (Mansi, II. 927), whleh ls purely fictitious. But iwe the proclain their from the merer. Bit we raust not couclude with the mere existeace of the latter, and without further proot, with bishop Hefeie, that twe Greek charch" ever attributed "more than twenty canons" to this congcil, still less ever quated other canons as Nieene, "by mistake," which were not Nicene, as pipes Zosimus, Innocent, and Lee did (ib, $360-372$ ).

The canon meriting attentien most is the sixth, being the priacipal of those framed with reference to Meletias, whose ense, the bishope in their synorlical letter may be supposed to say, engaged them next atter Ailus. Meletius had ordained priests and deacons in dioceses outside his own, (Hefele, \& 40). The cous ot his sole diseretion (Hefele, §40). The council deprived him of all power in consequence, but dealt more ledientiy with his tollowers; and to prevent any similar irregularities in future, passed its fourth, fifth, and sixth canons. Of these, the fourth orders that the consecration of a bishop should, in general, be the aet ot all (the bishops) of the province (in which the racant see was situate); or, if that could net be, that the absent (bishops) aheuld express their assent in writing, nnd three together in every case to lay hands on him ; yet ao that the ratification of all that took place should, in every province, be given to the metropolitna. In other words, ao long as the bishopa of the province were consenting prarties, the consecrntors no fewer than three, and the metropollitan confirmed their act, it was not indispensaible that the consecratora, when circumstances would have made this Inconvenient, should be of the same province. Such, at least, was the interpretation put upon it by the fathers of the second general council (Theodoret, E. IF. v. 9, near the end). This catou, again, It will be seen at a glance, must refer to the same act throughout; that one act, namely, which bishops alone, who are the only persons mentioned here, could perform. Consequently, the interpretation given to it by the finthers of the aecond Nicene council, in their third canon, is irrelevant, and need not be noticed, except so far as this-viz. that the provinclal bishops in consecrating a new bishop, confirmed his election, and their metropolitan, in approving of his consecration, confirmed both. But this is the only refereace to his election which this canon contains. The fifth canon, simllarly conceros another episcopal act relevant to this case. Meletius haviog been for his offences excommunicated by the bishops of his province, it is ordered that the canon interdicting any that have been excommunicated by some from being received by others (Can. Apost. 10), should rule cases of this kind; but that enquiry might alwaya be made whether any persona had been excommunicated unfairly by thelr bishop, synods of all the bishops in each province are directed to be held $t$ wice a year, in the apring and antumn, for that purpose. The sixth canon is not merely concerned with episcopal acta alone, but with episcopal acts only between bishops and their metropolitun, in other words, with eplscopal jurisdictlon. Had it, therefore, been alwaya desigaated by its proper title "bishops and their metropolitans"-the only persons named in it, and the latter the highest dignitaries known to the church as yet-ita meaning would have remained clear. As it is, few subjects have provoked a wider or a wilder literature. Moreover, the first half of the canon enacta merely that what had long been customary with respect to ench persona in every proviace, should become law, beginning with the province where thls priaciple had been infringed; while the second half declares what was in future to be received as law on two pointa, which custom had not as yet expressly ruled. "This is plajo to all, that if auy become bishop without consent of hia metropolitan, the great synod has defined that he ought not to be blshop. But shouid two or three, from simple contentiousness, oppose what has been agreed upon in common by all, and ia in accordance with eccleslastical lnw, and reusonable, let the vote of the majority prevail," that is, become law. Nobody disputes the menaing of this last half; nor, in fact, would the meaning of the first half have been questioned, had it not included Rome. "Let ancient customs pre. vail"-or become law -" in Egyit, Llbya, and Pentapolls "-prorlaces then subject to the Augnstal prefect, and in which Meletius had been creating distmbances-" so that the bishop of Alexandris should have the power (which he has by custom)over all these . . . and in like manner at Antjoch, and in all other provinces, let the churches be maintnibed in their privileges." No. body cna dispute the meanling of this either, as it stands. Nobody con maintain that the bishops of Antioch and Alexandria were called patriarchs then, or that the jurisdiction they had thea was co-extensive with what they had afterwards, when they uere so cailed. "Since this is usunl nlso for the bishop in the (capltal) city, Rome." It is on this clanse, atanding parentheticaliy between what is decreed for the pnrticular coases of Egypt and Antioch, and in consequence of the isterpretntion giren to it by Rutinus, more particulary, that so much strife has been raised. Rufinus may mak low as a iranslator, yet, being a nutive of Aquilein, he cannot have been igoorant of Roman ways, nor, on the other hand, had he greatly misrepresented them, would his version have waited till the seventeenth century to be impeached. What is called the "Prisca versio Latina" cau* not dispute, though it tries to disarm his jaraphrase by a gloss of its own, his beiag " Ct apud Alexandrium et in urbe Roma vetasta consuetudo servetur, ut vel ille Aegypti, vel hic suburbicariarum ecclesiarum sollicitudinem gerat;" that of the "Prisca verioio," which is undoubtedly the later of the two, by sume fint yeara according to Gieseler, § 91: "Antiqui moris est, ut urbia Romae e $\quad$ inscopus habeat principatum, et auburbicaria loca, et omnem provinciam susm (al. sua) sollicitudiae gubernet?" Moreorer, the title given to it in this version runs as follows: "De primatu ecclesiae Romanae vel alitruin civitutum episcopis." "Suburbicary churches" were the churches of the suburbnn or "suburbjcary places," or "regions," over which the jurisdiction of the city praefect extended (Cave, Ch. Gort. iii. 2-3), embraciag a circuit io every direction to the hundredth milestone. The bishop of Rome, therefore, stood at the head of the bishops of those churches in heathen times, and before the regular institution of metropolitans. This was one fact ; afterwards it was a fact no less, that his jurisdiction became commeasurate with that of the city vicar, aad was apread over ten provinces: 1. Campania; 2 Tuscany, with Umbria; 3. Picenum; 4. Sicily, 5. Calabria, with Apulia; 6. Lucanin, with the Bruttians; 7. Samoium ; 8. Sardinia; 9. Corvica; 10. Valeria. Those ten provinces the 'Prisea versio' cnlls " omnem proviaciam sunm;" which, accordingly, went no farther northwards than the gulf of Spezzia on the west coast, and the mouth of the Rubicon on the east, leaviag the sces of Aquileia, Milno, and Ravenna, sinilar centres in their own neighbourhood of the seren northern provinces to which the jurisdiction of the vicar of Italy was then confined (Papcirol, Notit. Dign. ii. 2). The composition of the Roman syood at oae time bore testimony to its original, at another to ita exteaded limits; and now and then its dimensions were ealarged exv ceptionally, as will be pointed out uader that hesd. The authority which this cooncll obtained everywhere gave rise to continual tanperings with ita decrees, or with its history from interested motives. Nine-tenths of such tamperings, at least , anve their origin eannot in the Latin interest; and if to the origin eannot be bronght bome positively to the popes themselves, it caanot be denied that internolae been foremost in using them. The interpolation of the sxxth canon, as hat been

tiond tioned in it Rome had the first place, Alexandria the second, and Antioch the third. The Surdican canons were first eited sa Nicene by popes Zosimus, Innocent, nad the ssme Leo. The preface to the Nieene conncil in the Pseudo-Ividorinn collection was penned in their interest. The reventy-first of the Arabina canons, secording to one version of them (Mansi, ii. 1005), was framed in their interest. Pope Silvester, of course, learnt from his presbyters all to which his assent had been given through them, and received from them a copy of the synodical letter addressed to the church of Alexandria, for whose apecinl benefit the council had met. But the council addressed no letter to him, nor received iny letter from him in particular. Later ages invented three such letters, in which his confirmation of the acts of the council is asked and impurted, sad they are still extant (ib. 719-22). As if this was not enough, a third Roman synod, in addition to a first and second, of still more ambitious purpose (ib. 551 and $615-32$ ) was feigoed to hnve been held, in which he anathematised oll who dared to contravene the Nicene definition (ib. 1081). Pope Adrian $I$ is the first who quotes or refers to these docunienta. One more point may be mentioned, in conclusion, as having sn interest for English readers-viz. that probnbly the eariest MS. of its kind extant ("cui, nullum nlind simile inrenire uspiam preserved the Ballerinal themselvea of it) is one ${ }_{100-2 \text { ) }}$ pred ing the Bodlainn archives (Justellus, cript of thag a fine and nearly complete transof the Nie old Latin, or pre-Dionysiad, version It meas Nicene and other canons, in three parta. apecting them are vague and conflicting: nnd it might be shewn on similar evidence, that a Iatin tranalation of these canons was anpplied by the Niece Fathers to Pope silvester hinself. Again, how comes it, if so mnny cut nod dried versfons of the Nicene canons were thus onrly made, that not oae is ever cited at length, either in these rerstons or any other, by memhers of tho Atrican or of the Roman Cisureh, or by nny Western synod, in pre-Dionysinn times: to say nothing of these versions belag unkaown to Dionysios himself, by whom the African code was tirst brought into notice? It contrasts with the first councii in that its acts are extant and fili a voiume, to aray nothing of their having been transinted by Anastasius, the lioman librurian, and dedicated by him in a preface of singular laterest to pope John Vill, ; while those of the first were nut even committed to writing.

To understand its deerees, some jrerious phases of the contest nbout imnges must. be recalled. The emperor Leo lil., surnamed the fasurian, had taken $n$ vioient part ngninst imnges and their defenders, which hid been bitteriy refented in his own capitai, and still more by pope Gregory II., who chitilenged him in two fiery letters to attempt similar measures in Italy, The emperer replied by confiscating ail the papal domains Ia Apulia, Culabria, and Sicily. His son and grandson following in his steps retained them. But his great-grandann was a minor, In dependence upon liis nother, and she, yieding to the instances of the retiring jantriareh Paui, and ot the new patrinich 'lumains, took steps for reversing nll that had been deereed ag:unst images in a council held under his gramifather Constantine, surammed Copoongmus, a.d. $75+$, and which then passed for the 7 th cuncil. She wrote, therefore, to pope Adrian I. in their joint uames a.D. 784 , inviting him to $n$ conacil which she proposed assembling at Constantioople for thit purpose; but her letter remained unamswe red fur two years. At length, A.v. 786 , two preabyters nrrised from Rome to Le present at it on beinif ot the pope. Even then, the council had no sonuer met than it had to ba closed on account of the disturbances to which it gave rise. The year fillowing it was transferred to Nicaea, where its proree.ilngs occupied no mere than a month, as has been said. According to the lists given in Blansi, 260 bishops or thelr rejresentatives attended ita first netion or sesslon, auil 310 subseribed to what was defiued at its 7ih and last. The firat place was assigned to the legntes of tha pope, though presbyters. Thrasius, who hul just baen ajpiluted patriarch, whilo yet a luyman, by the civil power, at soconl, nind was the ehief speaker threnghont. Two presibyters, representing the patrincehs of Antioulh aud A fexandria, who were kept awny by the Saracens, sat next. The see of Jorusalem, being vicant, was not represented. The vest, with very few exceptions-and none further west than Italy-came from tho enst. At the request of the bishops of sieily, Tamslus opened proceodings in a short apeech. The imperial letter, or Sacra, was then read, in which reference was made to hia conserration, to the petition that had been made by him for $n$ councll, and to the steps which had been taken for assembling thls. Lnstiy, several bishop: who had attended the iconoclastlo conncii under Copronymus, or been consecanted by thowe that had, on confessing their errora, and professing the faith of the six provious councils, wers received.

At the eccond action, two letters from pape Adrian were read; one to the empross nud her son, the other to Taraslus. The first hegins with n faitering reference to the exnltation of the Roman see by the first emperor toustnutiru and his mother, together with his recovery from ieprosy through pope Silvester, whone beta are then quoted in favour of Images, alpipimented by other nuthorittes. Aftr . wards, If Annatasius, or rather the anonymous somebody who professes to record his words, is to be irustel, the pepe commented on the consecrntion of Tarasius, and on his being styled oecumenieal jutriareh in pasanges which the Greeks 6uppressed, and concluded by protesting against the detention of his rights and jatrimony, contrasting with it all the provinces and eities and provinces which he had just received in perpetuity from Charlomngne, besides what he had regained througit him from the Lombards. But ali this la suspicious, being oniy preserved in a latin version, and in any ease aheuid be compned with a letter written to Chariemagno by the enme pope nine years hefure (Cod. Carul. S.p. Ix.), for the marked ntistention from any reforence to the contents of the papal archives In one, and the palmary reference to the donntion of Constantine preservel there in the other. Even If genuiue, the Greeks night weil have ouppressed this jassange, no general council having ever been askeil before to occupy itself with such subjects. The letter to Tarnsius is sald to hive been similarly mutilated; but in thls case the Latin version contains nothing of any sort which la not fiund in the Greak. The pope merely speaks in it of the synodical epistle reccived from Turasina announcing his electlon and coataning his profossion. As this last was in entire harmeny with the fnith of the slx previous councils, and had takea the right view of images, he wonld not insist on the twofold blots of his electionat least, if the patriarch will engnge to do three things: (1) to get the pseudo-symod againat images condemned; (2) to seek union with the Romas aee to that extent as to maks profession uf his devotion to it as head of all the churches of God; (3) to get imnges reatored by an imparial edict to their accustemed places in all the churches of the cepital and thronghent the

Its memthe pranco calied penental or eighth kexsinan at 23, when tha detinition was ayuin remil out, this time in the hearing of the empress and her son, who were presen, and twenty-two canoman pnased. Of these the first insiosts on the observance of the canans by nli, but seems to point rathre to dogma than discipline. If it is held to souftirn all the ennons of the six jrevipus eunncils, it must, of conrse, be understuod to contirm tho Trulliun or Quini-sext canoons, The second ordains that no bishap, shall to consecruteif who has not athoruagh knowlengo of the D'silter, the cunous, nud Ilvily Scrijture in genernal. The third deelares ull ulpointments of bishopss by the eivil pawer voili, an lueing contrury to the canons. Thus Tarasins eflectuatly birred hls own cuse from Lecoming a precedent. The fourth and difth are strong against sinuouy. The sixth renews the ruie that a provinelai eynoid alaull be hedd nt lenat once a year. The seventio ordinins that any listhoj; couscerating a charch in finture without rellcs of tho siints simill be deylusel. The eighth decrees ngninst receiving any Jews who are not sinceto converts. The niuth orilers that aill boaks agninst innages shinld to brought to the residence of the patriarch at Constantinople, and there stowed awny with all other heretical works. Any lishop, jirient, or dencon concealing such books is to be depased, and nny monk or layman annthemstlsed. The remuining thirten, being of less connequence, may be passed orer.
Anastasius is illowed to have translated these canong, whether he translated the procecolings of the eightl session or not, which some deny. The Lntin verxion, which used to be thought auterior to his, omits them certninily. Bur if the titleea civen at the end of his preface are his, it in plaiu that he looked upon the elghth session a one with the seventh, and anch ls, apparently, the view which Theophanes, who was preseot, takes of it in his Chronographia. The other pieces in connection with It, also given in Latln and Greek, are: 1. A complimentary speech addressel to the councll by Eplphanlas, deacon of the chureh of Catama, in Sichly. 2. A letter from Taraslus to pope Adrian, tersely descriviog the conacil, which "by placing a copy of he Gospels in its midst, constitated Christ its tiuad, nul by causing the letters of the pope to be read first in order, constituted him its eye." 3. A second, and still more remarkable letter from the same to the amme, bristles with denundations from Serlpture, the canoas, and tho fathers, figalast simony, thas not merely throwlag light njon the fourth and fith canons passed nt this coancil, but suggesting that they may have been as much nceded just now for the West as the Easi. 4. A letter from the same to an anchoret dignitary, anmel John, anoouncing and expounding to him thedecrecs of the Conuneil. The latter standing last In Mansi, which purports to have been aldressed to the church of Alexandria by this council, was probebly written to bring about its commanoration in a later age. It now standa for commernorntion in the Greek Menology on Oct. 12, and Is there said to have been attended by 367 fathers. For the letter written in defence of It by jope Adrian to Charlemague, which Mansi prints last but one, see 'Councll of Franifort.' (Mansi, xil. G5l ad. f. and xili. 1-820; Beverilge, Synod II. 165-9; Hefele, III. 410-57.)
