WHEAT

TABLING OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT SIGNED AT WASHINGTON

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to take this opportunity of tabling three copies in English and French of the recent exchange of notes dated April 24, May 20 and June 27, 1942, between the governments of Argentina, Australia, Canada, United Kingdom and the United States. This exchange of notes brings into effect as of June 27, 1942, the memorandum of agreement initialed at the final session of the wheat committee held at Washington between July 10, 1941 and April 22, 1942.

For the convenience of hon. members I suggest that the document be printed in Votes and Proceedings. There are about thirty type-written pages.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): In view of this document being tabled to-day, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce having said yesterday that he might make a statement, is he prepared to make that statement now?

Mr. SPEAKER: That might come on the orders of the day.

STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) suggested yesterday that if the international wheat agreement should be tabled to-day I might make a 44561-273 statement on it. In tabling the agreement the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has announced that it will be printed in the Votes and Proceedings, which I think obviates any necessity for any long statement on my part, particularly in view of the fact that some time ago a statement was given to the press which received very wide distribution in Canada. However, I might very briefly refer to a few of the important points covered in the agreement, for the benefit of other hon. members, perhaps not as diligent as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, who may be inclined to follow it up.

The Washington wheat conference was held between Great Britain, Australia, Argentina, the United States and Canada. A convention was drafted which it is hoped will ultimately be agreed to between all wheat exporting and importing nations. Realizing that no general conference could be held at the present time or possibly for some time after the cessation of hostilities, the five nations participating in the Washington meetings have agreed to implement the terms of the convention as far as possible until it is ratified by all interested countries.

The main points of the convention agreed to be made operative between the five countries are:

The relief pool-article 6, page 6-of not less than 100,000,000 bushels of wheat: Canada, 25,000,000, the United Kingdom, 25,000,000, the United States, 50,000,000, and Argentina, Australia, Canada and the United States such further amounts as may be agreed.

Control of production—article 2, page 2—so as to not exceed domestic requirements plus the basic export quotas and maximum reserve stocks provided for in the convention.

Control of stocks—article 3, page 3—providing for Canadian year-end stocks of not less than 80,000,000 or more than 275,000,000 bushels.

Export control of wheat and flour-article 4, page 4-providing for Canada to have 40 per cent, Argentina 25 per cent, Australia 19 per cent and the United States 16 per cent of the total volume of international trade in wheat and flour after allocation of quotas to other exporting countries not now parties to the present agreement, and allowance for exports from governments not party to the agreement.

REVISED EDITION

International Wheat Agreement

Price control—article 5, page 6—providing for basic minimum and maximum prices to be fixed by the council from time to time. Until the convention is agreed to or by other countries which may participate, it is provided in paragraph 6 of the memorandum of agreement that it shall be fixed by unanimous consent between the five nations, and until so fixed shall be the last price negotiated by the United Kingdom for a bulk purchase of wheat from its principal country of supply.

Administration, which ultimately is to be by a council of one or more delegates from each contracting country, with a permanent secretary and if necessary an executive committee. In the meantime, until the full convention comes into force, administration shall be by equal representation of each of the five countries.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO ARRANGEMENTS FOR 1942 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I wish to direct a question either to the Minister of Agriculture or to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the possibility that a large crop of wheat may be harvested in the west next month, and the reported shortage of storage facilities, will the appropriate minister inform the house what the government intend to do with regard to quotas, delivery arrangements and storage payments for the 1942 crop?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This question should be placed upon the order paper.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

PROCLAMATIONS—TABLING FOR PERIOD JANUARY 7 TO MARCH 31, 1942

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to table, in English and French, volume 6 of proclamations and orders in council from January 7, 1942, to March 31, 1942.

These volumes are now being published quarterly instead of half-yearly as heretofore. [Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

HONG KONG COMMISSION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF FURTHER COMMUNICA-TION FROM COLONEL DREW

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I understand that Colonel Drew has sent another communication to the Prime Minister. I wonder if he will be good enough to lay it on the table.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I decline to lay the communication on the table for the same reason that I declined to lay the previous communication on the table. I might add, however, that as my hon. friend is aware, he has received a copy of the communication, as have also the leaders of the other two groups in the house.

CZECHOSLOVAK REPUBLIC

ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE OPENING OF LEGATION IN OTTAWA—TRIBUTE TO CZECHOSLOVAK PEOPLE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Canadian government has agreed to a proposal of the government of the Czechoslovak republic to enter into direct diplomatic relations with Canada by the opening of a legation of the Czechoslovak republic in Ottawa. Doctor Frantisek Pavlasek, who has represented his country as consul general of the Czechoslovak republic in Montreal since 1936, has been appointed by his government as the first Czechoslovak minister to Canada. I am sure that Doctor Pavlasek's promotion to the rank of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary will be warmly welcomed by his many Canadian friends.

It is entirely fitting that a minister of the Czechoslovak republic should join the other ministers who have been appointed to represent in Canada the allied governments which are now in London. Nearly two years ago the Canadian government recognized the government which had been established in the United Kingdom under the presidency of Doctor Edward Benes. That government is recognized in a full sense as the government of the Czechoslovak republic and as being in its juridical position identical with the position of the other allied heads of states and governments in the United Kingdom. The governments of the United Kingdom and of the United States accredited ministers to the President of the Czechoslovak republic some time ago. While the Canadian government does not at present propose to accredit a Canadian minister to the president of the Czechoslovak republic in London, we are glad to receive a minister of the Czechoslovak republic in Ottawa. The question of the permanent exchange of ministers between the two countries is to be deferred until after the war.

I should like to take advantage of this occasion to express again the profound admiration and deep sympathy of the government and the people of Canada for the Czechoslovak people, who are proudly and valiantly enduring the most bitter oppression in their long history. The free peoples of the world, enured though they may be to reports of nazi persecution, have been shocked and horrified by the brutal executions and repressions which followed the assassination of Heydrich. The destruction of Lidice, with the indiscriminate execution of its male inhabitants and the systematic purge of the leaders who have remained in their own country, are unforgettable additions to a long tale of terrible suppression. Their spirit of resistance has not been dampened by these barbarous outrages, and we can feel sure that they will endure these trials with high courage until the hour of their liberation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SECRET SESSION TO BE HELD ON SATURDAY, JULY 18

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I notice that the press interpreted the vote of yesterday on the motion of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) as a decision by this house that there should not be any secret session. Such as a matter of fact is not the case, nor was it the intention. The motion that was voted on yesterday was a motion for the house to adjourn. Just why hon. gentlemen opposite supported that motion in the way they did I have yet to understand. However, hon. members will recall that I stated that before the government could decide on the question whether or not it was advisable to have a secret session it was desirable that the minister who is primarily concerned should have 44561-273 before him such information as it was thought would justify the calling of a secret session. Since the return from Collingwood and Midland yesterday of my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), he and I have gone over the matter together and we both feel that in the light of some of the things which were said in the course of the discussion yesterday afternoon, and as well in the light of representations which have been made to him, it would be advisable to have a secret session of the house. I would now announce that to-morrow morning the first order of business will be the holding of a secret session to discuss or consider the matter of urgent public importance which was the subject of the motion by the hon. member for Gaspé.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Would the Prime Minister be kind enough to tell us whether it will be possible for hon. members of the house to obtain any information to-morrow morning during the secret session, with regard to the opening by the allies of a second front, or is the discussion to be limited to the question raised by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I stated that the discussion would have reference to the question raised by the hon. member for Gaspé, but if my hon. friend wishes to bring up the question she has just raised, I will be prepared to make such answer as it may be possible to make to it.

GASOLINE

USE OF TRUCKS BY FARMERS AND THEIR FAMILIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in connection with a matter which has been previously mentioned in this house, following representations made by various public bodies in the western provinces, including, I believe, the government of the province of Saskatchewan. The question is whether or not a final decision has been arrived at by the government on the question of the relaxation of the rule preventing farmers and their families from using trucks for transportation purposes, subject, of course, to conformity with gasoline and rubber regulations.

Labour Conditions

Mr. SPEAKER: I think this is a question which should be placed on the order paper. Already it has been the subject of discussion, not in this but in a similar form, and since it is a question having to do with a declaration of intention on the part of the government, I do not think it should be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If I may be permitted a word, I believe a decision should be reached by the government; representations have been made, and I suggest, with the utmost respect, that this is a matter of very great importance to many farmers in the western provinces.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must say that I am not impressed by the argument that the question should be answered now. I think it certainly is a question that should be placed on the order paper.

MILITARY CAMPS

FIRE AT BARRIEFIELD—REPORTS AS TO EFFICACY OF FIRE-FIGHTING APPARATUS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): The other day the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) asked whether a report he had heard was well founded, to the effect that the available fire-fighting apparatus at Barriefield military camp had proved useless on the occasion of a recent fire. I want to say to him—and I only mention it now in order that it may be on the record—that the reports I have received indicate that the available fire-fighting apparatus operated most efficiently. I shall be glad to show the hon. member a copy of those reports.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EMPLOYMENT IN INDUSTRY OF WOMEN OVER THIRTY-FIVE YEARS OF AGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Labour based on a letter which reached me from Vancouver this morning, from which I quote:

In Vancouver there are many munitions workers available and anxious to play their part. The age limit of thirty-five years for war emergency training excludes hundreds of efficient women. I have written to Hon. Mr.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mitchell, but his reply is that all training is sponsored by employers. That can hardly be the case. The government pays so much per week per student while training, and should have some say regarding the selecting of students. This is total war, or should be, and every woman should be working, regardless of age. The above unit have a membership of three hundred, all skilled in the manufacture of munitions, yet to date only sixteen of them are in the plants, due to my personal efforts and contacts. If you can do anything—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is reading a long letter in support of his question, which is in somewhat the same category as one already asked this afternoon. I should regard that as a notice to the minister to make reply to-morrow or at such other time as he may see fit.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would rather get it out of the way now.

Mr. SPEAKER: A question improperly asked may not be improperly answered.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Vien in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Resolution 1, part I.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With regard to what was the defence tax, is it the intention to tax labour which receives less than the minima of $660 for single and $1,200 for married men under the new regulations?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is intended to collect the tax at the source, as was done previously?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How much money was collected last year under these regulations, from persons who, as it turned out later, had not reached the minimum requirements for taxation?

Mr. ILSLEY: The information is not available at the moment, and I am doubtful whether it would be possible to get it. To answer the question it would be necessary to tell the hon. gentleman not only what was refunded because it turned out that the person paying was earning less than the minimum, but also the amount which should be refunded, and that information is not complete.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is the very point I am making-the fact that those who are getting less than the minima are being taxed by the government, and the money which they are paying is being held by the government. The machinery by which they can recover the money is so complicated that most of them just let it go. I undertook to follow up a case to see what the procedure was and what possibilities there were of getting these refunds. When the taxpayer inquired of the department, the dominion income tax division sent him a long form which he had to fill out. He had to give his name and address, the names and addresses of all his employers during 1940-and he had worked for several; he had to state whether he was married or single or a widower, the number of his dependents or dependent children, grandchildren, and whether they were wholly dependent on him; the number of dependent brothers and sisters under twenty-one; the reasons for his claims; particulars of income, gross salary, wages, bonus or other compensations; the value of board, subsistence and so on; gross dividends, gross interest-most of these chaps do not get very much of that-various deductions; the names and addresses of the persons making deductions at the source; the amount collected by each, and so on. He had to state what the gross income was from each of his employers. Many of these workers do not keep an accurate record so that they do not know what their employers have deducted; all they get is a cheque at the end of the week. He has to give the total income from these sources, one-half of the amount taxable for 1940, at 2 per cent or 3 per cent as the case may be, less credit for national defence, and make out a complete disclosure of total income from all sources for 1940, and so on. He has to state the name and address of his wife.

The form is so long and complicated that by the time this fellow got through with it he was not sure whether the information he gave was correct or not. He made out the form and sent it in, and so far he has not heard anything about it. He finally received a letter on July 28, 1941, referring to his request for refund. The department sent him the defence tax brochure with a full explanation, but since then he has received no information. I wrote to the inspector of income tax at Regina on April 30 of this year, and the last word I had was that nothing had been done in the matter.

If the government does not intend to tax these people receiving the lower incomes, there should be some method by which the return of the tax could be facilitated. If the Income War Tax Act intention is to tax them, then there should be an impost in the form of a tax. Most of these chaps do not mind paying the tax; they have been without work so long that they are glad to get a little pay. If the government does intend to tax them, then I suggest that it should be made plain to them; otherwise the machinery for making the refund should be simplified and made easier than it is at the present time. I contend that there must be at the very least $2,000,000 taxed from these people who are receiving less than the minima. That is my estimate of the amount which these people are being taxed, and I suggest that something should be done in this matter. Either they should be taxed openly, or the return of the refunds should be facilitated.

Mr. GIBSON: This is a very difficult problem. We have men who have been employed for short periods at high rates of wages; consequently the national defence tax has been deducted from the amount they received, and when they claim a refund those deductions must all be checked. The employer's returns must be checked with the claim which the taxpayer files, and that takes a certain amount of time. I know there are claims numbering many thousands, which will all have to be checked, and it cannot be done very quickly. It is necessary to secure the information that has been asked for in order that the claims may be thoroughly checked before refunds can be made of the amounts refundable. So far as the income tax department is concerned, every effort is being made to get ahead with these refunds as rapidly as possible.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I realize that, but it seems to me that the machinery is too heavy for the amount of money involved. This man's refund does not amount to more than nine or ten dollars, and he would rather let it go than bother about it. That is the very thing I am pointing out. These people are not bothering about it; they are paying the tax. I do not know whether it is worth while keeping the machinery going if you are going to search through all the records.

Mr. GIBSON: If we did not check a claim for a nine dollar refund, we would have a great many nine dollar claims.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have a few observations to make along the same lines as those made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) when he opened the discussion on this resolution, particularly that part of his remarks relating to the burden placed upon married men. There seems to me to be too great a difference between the position of the married man and the position of the single man, particularly in the lower income brackets. In the case of the married man with no children there is a tax credit of $150. I do not think anyone will argue that the tax deduction should be sufficient entirely to support a wife or children, because in that case it would mean they were being supported at the expense of the bachelor and the other taxpayers of the country. I am not saying that my hon. friend suggested that, but the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), in giving his figures the other night of 36 cents a day, did intimate that that was the amount one would have left to support a wife.

I want to deal with the effects of these tax schedules upon married men in the lower income brackets. The leader of the opposition referred to men in the $1,200 to $1,700 bracket as forming the backbone of this country and said he felt that married men in this category were being terribly penalized by this budget. There seems to be widespread misapprehension among members of this house, and certainly among the people of the country, as to the effect of these new tax schedules upon married men in the lower income brackets. I have made some calculations covering incomes from $1,500 to $2,500. While I have not the exact figures, I think it is fair to say that 75 to 80 per cent of the married men in this country would come within that salary range or lower. In making my calculations I have taken married men with one, two, three, four, five and six children. I realize that in my own province of Quebec families are much larger than that, but I thought that that would be a fair basis to work upon. I found the results of these calculations rather striking. In making them I excluded the compulsory savings portion of the tax, because the taxpayer gets that back. If he is paying insurance premiums or making principal payments on a house, he can claim those as a reduction. Hon. members will agree that if we are to check inflation there must be a substantial reduction in the spending by the people in these lower income groups. On the other hand, on grounds of equity, everything should not be taken away by taxation; they should be able to look forward to spending that or using it when the emergency is over.

It will take just a few examples to illustrate my point. A man with one child and receiving $1,500 per year pays less in cash under the new rates than he paid under the rates last year. This year he pays $54.60, while last year he paid $55. It is true the difference is slight, it is much greater in other cases, but the fact is that he does pay less. A married man with two children and receiving $1,700 pays less this year than he paid last year. A man with an income of $1,900 and having three children pays less than he did last year. A man with an income of $2,100 and having four children pays less than he paid last year. A man with an income of $2,300 and having five children pays less than he did last year, and a man with an income of $2,500 and having six children is in the same position. Married men in the salary range between $1,500 and $2,500 are actually paying less than they did under last year's schedules, depending upon the number of children they have. There is another point to consider. Last year a provincial tax was payable in some of the provinces; these have been eliminated under the agreements between the dominion and the provinces.

With the permission of the committee I should like to place this table upon Hansard. It is quite short, and it sets out in dollars and cents just what men in these income brackets will have to pay depending upon the number of children they have up to six. The impression seems to have been created that the low income man, the family man with children, is being discriminated against in this budget. I am satisfied that that is not so, that the reverse is true. It is a tough budget, but this is a tough war. If the budget is to be accepted by the people as a whole, and I hope it will be, it is necessary that they should be satisfied that it is fair and equitable. The minister and his advisers are to be congratulated upon doing what they have done to see that the married man with a relatively low income is given real consideration. The table is as follows:

Net Tax Only (Excluding Compulsory Saving)

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am surprised at the results of the hon. member's computation. First of all, I am glad to find him in agreement with me in connection with the disparity between married and single men. I shall endeavour to analyse the figures which he has placed on Hansard, but I wonder if he has seen an article which appeared in the current issue of the Financial Post entitled "Bachelors Get Budget Breaks." This article contains a long table which is divided into three categories. First there is the percentage increase in taxes, then the total increase in taxes, and then the total taxes at 1942 budget rates, excluding post-war refunds. That is working it out on the same basis as my hon. friend. I shall examine with care the figures he has given, and in the meantime I should like to have an expression of opinion from the minister on the point raised by the hon. member. If I could have the permission of the committee I should like to have this table put on Hansard, for its informative value. It may not be correct.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know, but it is all right to put it on Hansard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I will hand it to Hansard:

BACHELORS GET BUDGET BREAKS

Most significant complaint raised against the new budget is not the size of the gross tax bill, bound to be overwhelming in the face of Canada's commitments, but in the apportionment of the burden. Herewith the Financial Post presents one facet of this pressing problem; the disparity in the tax increases imposed on those with children as compared with single or childless taxpayers.

Two key facts come out of the accompanying table: the tax jump is, in all brackets except the $2,000 incomes, uniformly higher as the family responsibilities increase; and the percentage increases are higher in the lower brackets. Latter fact is largely attributable to taxation in the higher brackets having already approached saturation levels, but note that the married man with four children at $4,000 a year has had almost four times as big a percentage tax boost as the single man with $35,000.

For comparative purposes, dollar tax rates and increases for 1942 are included.

I had hoped that when we met to-day the minister would make some statement in reply to the observations I made in the budget debate, as well as in the committee stage, with respect to this feature of the budget and with respect to the normal tax. It would be interesting to hear what the minister's reactions are. I did not, of course, analyse all the resolutions, because that would be a hopeless task to attempt at one time, and I thought we could only deal with it in chapters. I trust that we can deal with the whole matter in an orderly way, and that the discussion will not be allowed to get out of bounds as it has done in the last day or two, because if we go on in that way we will not get through.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to prepare a careful statement on one or two points as to which I think there is quite a widespread misapprehension. but I have not had time to do it. I have some figures here, though, on these important points which I shall present to the committee, and I shall do it slowly and systematically. I shall not answer all the questions which the leader of the opposition asked the other day, but after we have finished with this phase I can deal with the other questions he asked.

I want to deal first with the question whether we have increased the burden disproportionately on the low income groups. It has been said in the press, by the leader of the opposition, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, and by others, that the proportionate increase is greater on the lower income groups than on the higher income groups.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does not the chart indicate that? Mr. ILSLEY: Taken just in that way, that is true, but it is of no importance, of no significance; it would have to be that in any increase in taxation. For instance, if you are taxing a man at the rate of 10 per cent and you raise his income tax by 50 per cent, you have taxed him at the rate of 15 per cent. But if you are taxing a man at 70 per cent and you increase his rate by 50 per cent you are taxing him at 105 per cent, which is impossible and absurd. Therefore, to apply that criterion.

What is the right criterion to apply in determining whether increases have been progressive; that is to say, whether they have been a little heavier or much heavier as the income goes up? The officials of the department, the experts, tell me that the fairest criterion is this: to take the increase in tax expressed as a proportion of what the taxpayer has left this year before the increase takes place. That is to say, each of us has an income, each of us pays a tax under the old rates, and we have left in our hands after paying that tax a certain amount. If when the new and higher rates come along, the . increase in the tax which we all have to pay rises in proportion, expressed as a ratio of the amount we have left, then you have effected a real progressive increase. You have increased the tax more on the higher income groups than you have on the lower income groups. That is the fairest criterion, and I think the generally accepted one.

Applying that criterion I have here a table that I shall place on Hansard to illustrate the progressive character of the proposed changes in income tax. The table is as follows:

TABLE TO ILLUSTRATE PROGRESSIVE CHARACTER OF PROPOSED CHANGES IN INCOME TAX

Increase in tax and minimum savings requirement expressed as a percentage of the income remaining after present tax is paid

It would take a long time for me to go through all these figures, because it is quite a table, but I will take the tax alone and read a few figures to the house which will leave no doubt as to the very carefully worked out progressive character of these increases in income taxation.

Let us take a single man having an income of $700. The percentage of the increase in tax to what he has left after his present taxation is a minus quantity, minus 2 per cent; that is a decrease. At $850, the increase in the tax is .1 per cent; at $1,000, the increase is .4 per cent; at $1,250, the increase is .4 per cent; at $1,500, the increase is 2.3 per cent; at $1,750, the increase is 3.9 per cent; at $2,000, the increase is 6 per cent; at $2,500, the increase is 7.5 per cent; at $3,000, the increase is 8.8 per cent; at $4,000, the increase is 10.4 per cent; at $5,000, the increase is 10.7 per cent; at $7,500, the increase is 11.2 per cent; at $10,000, the increase is 11.1 per cent; at $20,000, the increase is 17.7 per cent; at $30,000, the increase is 22.2 per cent; at $50,000, the increase is 30.1 per cent; at $100,000 the increase is 44.8 per cent; and with an income of $500,000, the increase is 68.6 per cent.

Now take the married man. There we begin with the married man who has an income of $1,250 because there is no tax unless the married person earns $1,200.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Normal tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: Either normal or graduated. Take the married man with an income of $1,250. The percentage of the increase in tax to what he has left after his present taxation is a minus quantity, minus 2.1 per cent; with an income of $1,500, there is an increase of 2.4 per cent; and so on down the table.

The next objection was that we have treated the married taxpayer unfairly as compared with the single taxpayer, and that is probably the most telling point, if it were valid, that has been made in the press and in the house. Let me, as I did before, confine myself to tax increases alone, leaving out compulsory savings. I will put this table on Hansard:

INCREASE IN TAX ALONE

(AMOUNTS ROUNDED TO NEAREST DOLLAR)

| Transa | Ciaula | Married | | | | |
|---------|--------|-------------|---------------|------------|------------|--|
| Income | Single | No children | 2 children | 5 children | 8 children | |
| $1,250 | 5 | -25 | - 6 | _ | | |
| 1,500 | 30 | 34 | -10° | | | |
| 2,000 | 101 | 56 | 47 | | _ | |
| 2,500 | 151 | 126 | 102 | 30 | | |
| 3,000 | 202 | 184 | 119 | 122 | 17 | |
| 4,000 | 319 | 289 | 218 | 237 | 210 | |
| 5,000 | 396 | 378 | 327 | 269 | 372 | |
| 7,500 | 570 | 555 | 517 | 430 | 438 | |
| 10,000 | 712 | 682 | 636 | 542 | 420 | |

Looking at this table, it will be seen that the single taxpayer with an income of $1,250 has had his tax increased by $5; the married man, without children, and with that same income, has had his tax decreased by $25; the married man with two children has had his tax decreased by $6. I admit that that is just a little out of line from what the proper principle would be, but slight departures are necessary in the application of the formula; that cannot be avoided. There is just one other difference in this whole table. The single taxpayer having an income of $1,500 has had his tax increased by $30, and the married taxpayer by $34: that is the second failure of the formula to get ideal results and. as hon. gentlemen will note, it is the last one. The married man with $1,500 and two children has had his tax decreased by $10. At $1,750 the increase for the single man is $58, for the married man without children it is $36, and for the married man with two children it is $5. At $2,000 the increase for the single man is $101, for the married man without children it is $56, and for the married man with two children it is $47. At $2,500 the increase for the single man is $151, for the married man without children it is $126, and for the married man with two children it is $102. At $3,000, the increase for the single man is $202, for the married man without children $184, and for the married man with two children, $119.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just there: does not the single man with an income of $3,000 pay $1,064?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I believe so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much did he pay on his 1941 income? [Mr. Ilsley.] Mr. ILSLEY: That is, including the compulsory savings. We do not know how much of that he will pay the government. He may not pay anything.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is $824.

Mr. SLAGHT: The minister is speaking of the increase as so-and-so; is that over last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Over last year. The point I am trying to make is this. The argument has been that we have pooled these two categories and in some way have done an injustice to the married man; that we have narrowed the spread between the single man and the married man. That is not so. With the exception of the two instances which I gave, in every case we have widened the spread. We have increased the tax more on the single man than we have on the married man, and still more than on the married man with two children.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would not that depend upon whether you were pretty bad last year or not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, if it is an attack on last year's rates, that is another thing, but I thought it was an attack on this year's rates. Assuming that last year's rates gave a proper relationship between the single and the married man, we have done even better for the married man, and still better for the married man with children this year, on the lower categories. I will go along. At $4,000 the increase for the single man is $319; for the married man, $289; and for the married man with two children, $218. At $5,000 it is $396 for the single man, $378 for the married man, and $327 for the married man with two children. At $7,500, it is $570 for the single man, $555 for the married man, and $517 for the married man with two children. At $10,000 it is $712 for the single man, $682 for the married man, and $636 for the married man with two children.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the minister goes on, do these figures allow for the exemptions? Is it the net result which the minister has been giving us?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. The hon. member means, exemptions for the children and everything?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I have taken the married man; he is taxed on a different basis from the single man, and then the married man with two children has certain deductions or exemptions for his children.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is all included?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is all included. In regard to this table which I said I would put on Hansard I merely gave the figures for single men, married men, and married men with two children. The table carries it out to the married man with five children and the married man with eight children; this will give further information and bear out the general proposition which I have stated.

Let me now give the difference in figures. This is the difference in the tax payable by the single person and the tax payable by the married person, the married person with two children, with five children and with eight children. The difference last year between the tax payable by a single man and a married man with children, at $1,500 was $142; the difference this year is $150.

Mr. MacNICOL: Over last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Let me say it over again. I am giving now the difference last year in the tax payable by a single man with $1,500 and a married man without children, at $1,500—

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the difference between last year and the year before?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I am taking the difference last year. I am talking now purely about the tax for last year as between the single and the married man. At $1,500, the difference between the tax on the single man and on the married man without children was $142; this year it is $150. The difference last year, at $1,500, between the tax on the single man and the tax on the married man with 44561-2743 two children was $182; this year it is $318. The difference last year, on the same income, between the tax on the single man and on the married man with five children, was $217; the difference this year is $367. The difference last year, at $1,500, between the tax on the single man and on the married man with eight children, was $217; this year it is $367. I have similar figures for the $2,000, $2,500, $3,000, and $5,000 levels. The differences that I have been giving for this year are the differences in the total take, including the compulsory savings.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that complicates the situation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not if a person just thinks about it a little. I have here also the difference in tax. If any hon, member thinks it would be better to leave out the compulsory savings entirely and take the tax I have the figures here for that. With a minor exception the same result is obtained, that the difference between the tax on the single man and the tax on the married man last year and the tax this year has been widened.

An hon. MEMBER: Will the minister put that on Hansard too?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I will put that whole thing on Hansard. Here are the figures:

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister contend that his figures answer the point I made, that there is not sufficient distinction between the bachelor and the married man, having regard to the latter's duties and responsibilities? That is the point of my argument.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what the test is that one applies. We tried to preserve as much tax advantage this year for the lower categories as they had last year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister means he has tried to preserve the same ratio?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Let me explain what I mean by that. In the taxes for last year there was a $400 exemption in the graduated tax for each child. The first or lowest rate was 15 per cent; that would give a tax advantage to a person in that income rate of $60 for each child. We thought it would be a little harsh perhaps to start at the lowest so that we took the second lowest, which was 20 per cent. The people who have incomes of-I do not know exactly-$2,500, let us say, to be in the 20 per cent class, got a tax advantage last year of $80 a child. This year, therefore, we put in the graduated tax a tax advantage of $80 a child. That gave a greater tax advantage than last year to the $1,000 man, to the $1,500 man, to the lower income people; but it gave a smaller tax advantage to the taxpayers with incomes of say from $2,500 or $3,000 up.

It must be borne in mind that a person paying on an income of $100,000—I shall just have to take figures that will not be accurate —might have a tax advantage of perhaps 80 per cent. He would have to have a pretty big income to have that, but let us say 70 per cent; there would be many married men who would have a rate of 70 per cent, and with $400 off for a child they would receive a tax advantage last year of $280.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not very much. In the case of an income of $500,000 it would be 98 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may not be very much. These people in the higher income groups are all flattened down so that they do not get any more tax advantage than men in the lower income groups.

An hon. MEMBER: They do not need it.

Mr. ILSLEY: We flattened the whole thing right along the line. We have given the poor man a little more tax advantage than he had last year and the richer man a little less, but we have given the same deduction right across the line.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. GREEN: Would it not have been fairer if it had been calculated on the lowest taxable rate of this year's budget, which is 30 per cent? This exemption of $80 works out on a basis of 20 per cent. It does not help much to refer back to last year.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only reason we took the 20 per cent rate this year instead of 30 per cent is that we are giving back half of it. We are giving the taxpayer a certificate for a return of half after the war.

Mr. GREEN: But he cannot eat the certificate.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have to raise a lot of money in some way, and if the people did not let us have it in this way we would expect them to lend it to us voluntarily. We would have to get it, that is all, or we could not finance. And a great many are lending. It is to catch the man who does not feel any obligation to lend that we have made him lend this money by the compulsory savings feature. That is why it is fairer to take 30 per cent in taxes than 20 per cent.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that the minister consider that feature, whether it would not be wise to make it on the basis of 30 per cent, which would give everyone an exemption of $120 for a child.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman suggest that we give no money back? That is what goes with it.

Mr. GREEN: I was going to ask whether or not one of the tests applied in drawing up this budget was the amount of money a person will have left to live on. It seems to me, from the explanation given to-day and from the general frame of the budget, that little consideration has been given to that aspect of it. Where the tax has been increased so greatly the exemption for the people with the lower incomes should have been increased also, so that they can at least get by. That is the test—what a person has left to live on; and I doubt very much whether it has been used in drawing up this budget.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: The budget allows a married man to deduct $150 for his wife?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: If the wife is working and has a separate income, that is also taxed. Does that deduction of $150 still apply to the man's income?

Mr. ILSLEY: By the amendment of which I gave notice the other day the wife can earn as much as she likes without its affecting the deduction of $150 from the husband's tax. That does not apply to investment income of the wife, but she can earn as much as she likes. The way the budget was at first, if she earned more than $660 she was taxable as a single person and the married man lost his exemption; he also was taxable as a single person.

That was on the theory that the $150 deduction from the tax of the married man was made in order that he might support his wife; that if he was not supporting his wife he did not need it, and therefore we did not allow it. In actual working out, it means that married women had a great incentive to stop work when they had earned $660, and not on any account to earn more than that, because if they did they immediately increased their husband's tax bill by at least $150, and I think something additional under the graduated tax. Therefore they started to leave industry, and I think some of the government departments, and there was a great uproar in the country about the folly of the government in framing a tax scheme which would make it desirable for married women to leave industry and the government service when we needed the services of everyone, as we do to-day. We had to cut that out in order to give the married women some incentive to remain at work. I do not want to raise grievances for people, but of course the person who has the grievance now is the single woman, who sees working beside her a married woman who has a husband to support her, and whose husband is getting an allowance on the assumption that he has a home and is supporting his wife when actually he is not supporting her, because she is working. But we cannot help it; we have to get these people to work and keep them at work, so that we had to make that change.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Generally speaking the wife who works is either doing a double job, looking after her work and looking after her home, or employs extra help, perhaps a maid or a nurse for the children. I think if she is maintaining a home and working as well, any objection might be answered in that way.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will get plenty of letters from single women, as I have in the past, complaining about this favoured treatment of married women.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would it be all right for the minister to table some of those letters?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I think I could table them all without embarrassment. But if we get any complaints in this connection I will send an excerpt from Hansard of the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman).

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to come back for a few moments to the question raised by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden). So far as I am concerned the answer given by the Minister of National Revenue was far from satisfactory, in regard to the refundable portion of the tax. This portion is to be deducted at the source, but the minister says no scheme has been worked out as yet with respect to allowances, and his answer would lead anyone to believe that this was a rather difficult job. That may be so with regard to the individual who is working for a small organization, or who is employed on a farm on a seasonal basis, or something of the kind, but the regulations definitely make provision for allowances in regard to the portion of the tax which will be returned, provided that a certain part of the income is devoted to mortgage payments, hospital bills or insurance premiums. I do not see that there would be any difficulty in having most of the workers in Canada register their mortgages with their employers, as well as their insurance premiums. These are fixed obligations; they know what they will be at the first of the year, and the deductions do not begin until September. The employer is making the deduction and the return to the department, and there would be no additional expense or clerical work involved if the employer were given to understand that it was part of his obligation to advise his employees to register with him their mortgage and insurance obligations. Of course the hospital end of it is something they will have to take care of themselves.

I am not so much concerned with the income tax provisions of the budget. I think anyone who has sufficient income to have any difficulty in figuring out his tax at least is not going to be in want. I should like to clarify a statement made by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) which might be misleading, though I do not think the hon. member meant it in the way it reads. He said that 75 per cent of the married people in Canada would be in the income bracket of $1,500 per year.

Mr. ABBOTT: What I really meant, if I may interrupt, is that 75 per cent would be in that bracket or lower.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mostly lower.

Mr. GILLIS: I should think the statement would be correct if the hon. member had said 20 per cent, but if he means less than $1,500 he would be correct. The groups about which I am concerned are those affected by the normal tax. I believe the exemption of $660 is too low; I think it should be raised to $750. I believe the exemption of $1,200 for the married man, for normal tax purposes, is too low; I think that should be raised to $1,500. This tax is deducted at the source, and it affects everyone in the low income groups. People in that category are merely getting a subsistence at the present time, and nothing should be taken below $1,500 and $750, as the case may be.

This tax cannot be properly discussed without relating it to wage rates and the cost of living bonus. I am not going into the question of wage rates, but a large percentage of the workers of Canada, particularly those in the non-essential industries, have already suffered a 15.2 per cent drop in their standard of living on account of the war. They do not come under the cost of living bonus arrangement; it concerns only those employed in the war industries. There are many people who are said to be in the non-essential industries, though they are not non-essential; for if they were they would not be employed to-day, therefore I think the expression "nonessential" is misleading. They are catering to and caring for the needs of the nation in war time; they are essential, or they would not be there. Their wage rates have remained unchanged; they have not been given the benefit of the cost of living bonus, though the cost of living has increased by $15 \cdot 2$ per cent. They were excluded from that benefit under order in council 8253, though I understand some amendment has been made since that time, providing for some increase in the cost of living bonus over the last basic period, which was October, 1941. I think the Department of Finance should understand, with respect to this normal tax, that it affects particularly this group which already has made a sacrifice equal to a lowering of their standard of living to the extent of 15.2 per cent. I believe that situation could be overcome by increasing the exemption as I have suggested. If you cannot amend the wagefreezing regulations to take care of these people, you could give them compensation by increasing the exemptions that apply under the normal tax.

Then there is another category which I think should be considered. Last evening the Ottawa Journal stated that the minister was considering some adjustment in the tax arrangements affecting the married man, as well as some modification of the income tax as it applies to officers serving in Canada. I am not particularly concerned with officers [Mr. Gillis.]

as such, but I think the tax as it applies to them at the present time is unjustifiable. I imagine that in exempting officers serving overseas, or those on ships on the Atlantic, or those in Newfoundland, and so on, the department went on the assumption that the men serving in those theatres were exposed to a certain amount of risk for which they should receive some compensation, and this tax arrangement was made accordingly. I see very little distinction or difference to-day between the officer serving on the east or west coast of Canada and the officer serving in England. They are merely standing to against the time when they shall go into action. Their duties are just as strenuous as the duties of those in the old country. It is a stand-to. They are not engaged in actual combat in either place, and the tax arrangement has placed the lower ranking officers, from captain and lieutenant down, in the position where some will revert back to the ranks in order to get clear of this burden. I have a letter from a man on one of the coasts who resigned his commission two weeks ago on the ground that if he reverted to the rank of warrant officer it would result in enhancing his financial position.

I submit that there should be some readjustment with respect to officers, and I was waiting for the minister to say something in that regard. If the Journal is correct, I submit that the minister should make a statement to offset the impression that exists. These are two categories that are discriminated against. The question of risk should not be taken into consideration. A man may be in action on the east coast or the west coast before a man goes into action in the old country. Men who are on the naval patrol boats on the coast are exempt, and so are the officers on the training ships off the harbours. But the officer who is responsible for organizing the defences on the coasts, working twelve and fourteen hours a day-and most of these men work such long hours-are obliged to pay income tax and therefore suffer a considerable cut in their pay. These two matters should be rectified.

There is another point that should be considered. As regards the return of hospital expenses, that is a justifiable arrangement, and there is a group of workers in Canada in most of the plants who come within this category. They maintain insurance schemes of their own. They contribute to the maintenance of benevolent associations, hospital protection and so on, and doctors' fees. They are making a contribution of perhaps ten dollars a month maintaining these services for themselves. In the event of sickness or surgical operation they are protected, but actually they have a financial outlay that should be taken into account in connection with any taxing arrangement. It is not possible for the Minister of Finance to keep his finger on all these matters, but in his taxing arrangements, I submit, if they are to be equitable, all these factors that eat into the economic life of the people should be considered.

There is another aspect of the cost of living bonus which is not much discussed but which is important. A man has five or six or seven children going to school. He alone is working to support them. There is one cost of living bonus going into that house. Next door his neighbour may have five or six grown boys and girls, all employed in plants, and five or six cost of living bonuses are going into that house. I suggest that the cost of living bonus arrangement is not equitable. It is not handled fairly.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would the hon. member suggest that when a wage structure is established it should be on the basis of the number of children? He knows the classical answer of the labour people, that you should pay the same wages to the single man because he is saving to get married. If the hon. member carried his suggestion to its logical conclusion he would base wages on the number of dependents and children.

Mr. GILLIS: You cannot give a stock answer in this case. We are discussing a budget, and we are not living in normal times; we must therefore take abnormal action. If we were living in normal times and the entire economy of the country were devoted to taking care of the citizens of the country, a proper wage structure would be the family allowance. But in making taxing arrangements now I think the matters I am attempting to describe should be taken into consideration in order to avoid hitting one group much harder than another. There are non-essential workers who have suffered a 15 per cent decrease in the standard of living by reason of the fact that they do not come under the cost of living bonus. Such people should not be taxed in the same proportion as those in other industries who have been compensated for the increased cost of living.

This was what I rose chiefly to say. Had the minister made some statement with regard to the question of officers, and as to the manner in which exemptions. are to apply, as outlined by the Journal—apparently they knew more about it than the minister did—I would not have taken up the time of the house. I would ask him specifically to consider raising the exemptions in the case of the normal tax from $660 to $750. That is only $12.50 a week or $750 a year, and with taxes coming out of that there is not much left to live on. The sum of $28 a week is not much to maintain a family when all other expenses are taken into account. The amounts of $660 and $1,200 in the normal tax are far too low. If the suggestion I make were adopted it would do much to encourage many of these people in the lower income groups to accept the other taxing arrangements.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no exemption on the normal tax.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, there is an exemption.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is on the graduated tax.

Mr. GILLIS: There is an exemption below $660 on the normal tax.

Mr. BENCE: One point mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton South I must take issue with, and that is the suggestion that life insurance should be registered with employers at the beginning of the year. In my judgment the personal affairs of employees are their own business and that of the administration; it is something between them and the government and no one else. Employees with whom I have discussed the matter, and, I believe, the majority of employees throughout Canada, would take that position. There is going to be considerable difficulty in collecting these refundable payments, which are not to be paid back for some considerable time. After all, as has been pointed out, that money is required to meet obligations at the time it is paid to the employee. When the insurance premium or the mortgage payment is due it has to be paid, and if a man has to wait for months before he can get his money he will be put in a difficult position and in some instances lose his life insurance.

Mr. GILLIS: That is what I was trying to overcome.

Mr. BENCE: The money is taken from him and repaid afterwards, as I understand. He is not allowed to keep, at the time his monthly pay cheque comes in, the amount that would be refundable under the provisions of section 7. He has to wait to get that money back. I do not think the employee should be put in the position of revealing his personal affairs to his employer. A scheme like this might be worked out. The amount of the tax which covers that portion, with the exception of the amount taken by way of compulsory savings, or the refundable portion, could be taken off month by month, whenever pay-day comes around. The portion that is refundable could be paid at the time the income tax return is made out. I believe there will be considerable difficulty if people are not allowed to have this money to take care of obligations. I have other suggestions to make in connection with resolution No. 7.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think we had better take them up resolution by resolution. My hon. friend and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) have been discussing resolution No. 25. When we reach that resolution we will have a discussion on it. The two points of view expressed are important, and my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, will be prepared at that time to discuss the matter of procedure.

Mr. BOUCHER: Has the minister considered explaining the tax by showing what an individual will have left after paying the tax and the compulsory savings? This is something which is of interest to the people. There is one class of taxpayer who is paying on life insurance, on annuities and perhaps on a mortgage, and he is given certain exemptions from his compulsory savings. On the other hand, to many young married people who are just starting out in life to raise a family, a home is most essential, but these schedules will give them "exemption only on payments on mortgages which were in existence before the budget was delivered.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is covered by resolution No. 7.

Mr. BOUCHER: It has an effect on this resolution, because we should consider what is left to the individual. In many areas of Canada there is a shortage of houses, and every inducement should be offered to persons newly-married to buy houses. If we knew what would be left to persons in the various income groups after they had paid all taxes, we would be better able to discuss this matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon, gentleman will turn to page 3582 of Hansard he will find the taxes on various incomes, and then it is just a matter of subtraction.

The CHAIRMAN: I find myself quite unable to link up some of the remarks that have been made with resolution 1. I have allowed some latitude in the hope that it would shorten the discussion later, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I followed with a great deal of interest the remarks last night of the [Mr. Bence.] hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who was very critical of this tax. The hon. member and many others seem to find it difficult to realize that about a million and a quarter of our Canadian people are now either in the armed forces or working in munitions industries. It is physically impossible to carry on a war of this sort without making a great many adjustments in our national life. We must face the fact that to a greater extent than ever we must see more and more of our consumer goods diverted directly to war purposes and less and less available for civilian use.

The hon. member for Broadview contended that this income tax would take away all incentive, that the people would be left with very little. I should hate to think that when the session is over hon. members who have professions will refuse to do any work because they will be compelled to pay the government 50 cents or more on every $1 that they earn. I should hate to think that people who are in the favoured position of being able to pay an income tax are going to rest on their oars because the government has found it necessary to impose taxes of this kind. As I said before, there is no easy way under the sun to carry on a war of this sort.

Members of the minister's own party have offered criticisms regarding the methods he is using to finance the war, but if they were in his position I am sure they could not devise any scheme which would make it easy for the Canadian people to maintain a million and a quarter persons in industry and in the war services. The hon. member for Broadview said that people would have nothing left. I was interested in the table placed on the record this afternoon by the minister, and I commend him for accepting the suggestions made by members of this group on former occasions. On other occasions we have suggested that it is not the amount of tax that the individual pays that matters; it is the amount he has left after the tax is paid. I appreciate the difficulty the minister must have in steering a course midway between our point of view and the point of view of members like the hon. member for Broadview.

I have prepared a table showing the amount per day that is left to a Canadian this year as compared with what he had left last year, assuming that there are six days in the week and fifty weeks in the year. All my figures are for single persons without dependents. A man who had an income of $1,000 last year paid a tax of $87 which left him $3.04 per day; his new tax, plus the refundable portion—we must remember that the refundable portion is imposed so that he may not use consumer goods—amounts to $172, which leaves him $2.76 per day. That is the reduction in his standard of living. A single person who had an income of $2,000 last year was taxed $340, which left him $5.50 per day; this year he is paying a tax of $601, which will leave him $4.66 per day. A man with an income of $5,000 last year paid a tax of $1,332 which left him $12.22 per day; under the new tax he will pay $2,128 which will leave him $9.57. Again there is a drastic reduction. With an income of $10,000, he paid last year a tax of $3,600 which left him $21.33 per day; under the new tax he will pay $5,112 which will leave him $16.29 per day. With an income last year of $20,000 he paid $9,105, which left him $36.31 per day; under the new taxes he will pay $11,829 which will leave him $27.23 per day. With an income of $30,000 last year he paid a tax of $15,082, which left him $49.72 per day; this year he will pay $19,196, which will leave him $36.01 per day.

With an income of $50,000 he paid a tax last year of $28,392, leaving $72.02 per day. The new tax will be $35,703, leaving $47.65 per day. With an income of $100,000 he paid a tax last year of $64,347, leaving $118.84 per day. The new tax will be $81,137, leaving $62.87 per day. As the minister has pointed out, there is a steep increase there. The man who is privileged to have an income of $500,000 paid, last year, a tax of $411,720, leaving $294.26 a day, and this year he pays a tax of $473,104, leaving $89.65 per day, which still is a lot of money.

I should like the minister to continue this policy of taxing heavily those that have the money available. I know that it is going to make drastic changes in the way of living of Canadian people, but who is there who can expect to find himself at the end of the war in as favourable a position as he was at its commencement? Those in the highest income brackets are citizens to whom Canada has been very kind, and no sacrifices which they can make, financial or otherwise, will be too great to see to it that Canada assures those in our armed forces-and we must do this-that they will have better equipment and better food than ever before and that those in our war industries shall be assured of adequate food, shelter and clothing. While it is true that so far those in war industries and those at home, with the exception of the farmers on the prairies where the income has been derived largely from wheat, have been able to enjoy a higher standard of living than they have ever known before-and it is a serious reflection on our economy before the war-we cannot expect that state of affairs to last indefinitely. Sooner or later we must face up to the fact that those in civilian life will have less to spend, and we must be prepared to have our standard of living restricted, as the minister is proposing to do by the drastic tax increases he is making this year. When the budget is brought down next year I hope that those in the higher income brackets will be prepared to make even greater sacrifices than the present resolutions call for.

Mr. O'NEILL: Mr. Chairman, there is one thing I should like to say at the outset, and it arises out of the speech which was made by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) on Wednesday night in this chamber. In reply to the hon. member, page 4270 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance said:

If my hon. friend believes that, then he has no confidence in the financial policies of the administration. He should not be a supporter of the financial policies of the administration, because his attack is upon fundamentals.

Since 1935, and for a considerable time before that, I have been pretty well in agreement with the principles expressed by the hon. member for Parry Sound the other evening, and quite naturally I took that remark of the Minister of Finance as applying to myself as well as to the hon. member for Parry Sound. There may be some merit in the suggestion that now is not the time to discuss any change in the monetary policy of this country, but I do not think there can be any doubt that there must be a change from the present-day way of doing our financing. I had not intended to say anything about the matter at this time, but since the question has been raised, and in view of the remark that was made by the Minister of Finance, it is up to me to say something about it.

During the election of 1935 I expressed views very much the same as those expressed here the other night by the hon. member for Parry Sound and by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer). I expressed those views on the public platform everywhere in my constituency. I was supported on that platform by some of the most prominent members of the Liberal party, not only in the west but in the east, and they raised no objection to my voicing those opinions. Those opinions were also voiced by me to the Liberal party before I received the nomination. If there were any objections to those opinions, that was the time to make them, and had objection then been made, they should never have given me the nomination.

Mr. HOMUTH: The Prime Minister himself was pledged to that platform, was he not?

Mr. O'NEILL: If we can judge by what was being said at the time, I believe the hon. member for Waterloo South is quite correct, because the Prime Minister said that the credit of the country would be used for public need.

For a great number of years prior to this war, young men and young women of Canada were going round the country looking for a job. Men were riding the rods on the freight trains. But as soon as the war breaks out we find we have plenty of money. I cannot see where there is any more money or credit in the country to-day than there was in those days. I cannot see why it is not possible to raise huge sums of money for an emergency of any kind, whether it be a war-time or a peace-time emergency. It does not appear to me to make any difference whether the emergency be an earthquake, a flood, a depression, or a war. If money is required to feed and clothe our people, you should be able to get it, and I believe that you can get it. But I do not believe that you can go along eternally financing the way we have been doing.

The orthodox argument is that raising money by bonds and paying interest on them is perfectly right and legal, but that if you raise money by bonds and do not pay interest on them, that is no good. I cannot see that it makes a particle of difference. I cannot see that argument at all.

I have not changed my mind with respect to the ideas I held in 1935. As a matter of fact, as the years go by I am becoming more and more convinced that the opinions I held at that time were sound. I believe that the Minister of Finance is making a wonderful job of our financing, and I did not get up here at this time to try to embarrass him. Far from it. But there are some things which I think should be taken into consideration.

I am very much in agreement with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) that we should not tax people with incomes as low as $660 and $1,200, for single and married respectively. In 1940 I advocated that the minimum incomes that should be taxed should be $750 and $1.500, for single and married respectively. I still hold that view. You have to tax the majority, and it is true that the great majority of the people are in the low income brackets. But when you start taxing very low incomes you are taking money that is required for the very essentials of life, and you are running down the physique of the nation. I do not think there can be any question about that. When this war started and we called up young men for the army, we found that a very large percentage of them were not fit for service because they had been undernourished. Many of them were rejected because they had bad teeth, and the only reason they had bad teeth was that they did not have money enough to pay a dentist. These conditions obtained because of malnutrition, and when you get down to taxing people in the low income brackets the same thing will go on.

I am rather disturbed that something has not been done to grant a bonus to old age pensioners and to people on fixed incomes of this kind. Definitely the cost of living has gone up. The increase has been taken care of as regards wage earners in some brackets not in all of them. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South pointed out, in some of these categories the cost of living has gone up 15 points, so that they are being penalized in addition to the new taxes which they will have to pay. Some consideration should be given to people with fixed income of the type of old age pensions and mothers' allowances.

The wartime prices and trade board is of necessity a part of the present method of financing, and I believe that in principle it is sound. But I have in my hand a copy of the Merritt Herald, a small paper circulating in a part of my constituency, and it has these headlines on a news item:

So that there is a fixed price on meat, but apparently no fixed price on cattle. This cattle buyer came in this fall when the wartime prices and trade board had fixed prices, and when the rancher's cattle were sold he was beaten out of $500. It seems to me that there should be some way to control the packers.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not believe that this matter comes under resolution 1. The resolution proposes a certain scheme of taxation on incomes, and I cannot see how it can be extended to cover the subject now being discussed by the hon. member.

Mr. O'NEILL: I must abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I do not know whether the subject which I want to deal with has already been discussed, because I have been on the Defence of Canada regulations committee and have not been able to attend the sittings of the house.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order which I raised was not in respect of whether or not this matter had been discussed. The point of order is that resolution 1, with respect to income tax, is not capable of being extended to the subject matter now being discussed by the hon. member.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, the packers' and ranchers' position.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, the packers' and ranchers' position.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But monetary reform is.

The CHAIRMAN: Oh, yes; I allowed the discussion on monetary reform. My ruling is that the reference to packers is not relevant to the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. O'NEILL: I have not been able to get a copy of these resolutions because enough of them have not been printed. I had one in my desk, and somebody took it and substituted a French one. We should have an opportunity somewhere, I believe, of discussing matters of this kind. When and where will that opportunity be given?

Mr. ILSLEY: There was a budget debate, and that was concluded. There was a request that some latitude be given on the resolutions, and much has been given, but last night it seemed to be the wish of hon. members pretty generally that we confine our discussion strictly to each resolution as it came up. That is what I hoped we would do. Certainly that was the feeling of the committee last night. Now the hon. gentleman asks where there will be an opportunity to discuss the beef question or the price-ceiling policy. I cannot think of any at the moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under the war appropriation bill there was ample opportunity.

Mr. ILSLEY: On the war appropriation bill we had a long discussion, and I do not think there is anything unreasonable about adopting the principle that some discussions in a session have to end. The session will go on forever if that is not the case. There have been several opportunities of discussing the wartime prices and trade board and the price ceiling, and I do not know of any more.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member was in order in discussing under resolution 1 any question of financial policy, although I personally had hoped that that discussion would be over last night. On this question of the exemptions, the hon. member is quite in order in discussing the reduction from $750 to $660 and from $1,500 to $1,200.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL: I do not want to violate the rules, but there are several questions which

Income War Tax Act

I thought could be properly discussed at this time. One of them is the price ceiling. I am quite in agreement with the principle of a price ceiling, but certainly if there is a price ceiling there should be a price floor. There is not, and these fellows can pay as little as they like to the cattle raiser, who is not permitted to sell his cattle over a certain price.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I must raise the point of order myself. I agree with the chairman. This committee of the whole is discussing the income tax resolutions. We are on resolution 1, which sets out the scheme of income taxation, with rates, and so forth. I cannot see any connection whatever between a discussion of the price of beef and that resolution, and I think I shall have to take that position.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I speak to the point of order? The hon. member for Macleod stated to the Minister of Finance, with the concurrence of probably 95 per cent of us, that we would not speak on the budget, in order to facilitate it. But to hon. members from British Columbia, one of the most important things is the price of beef in so far as the wartime prices and trade board is concerned, and I think, under the pledge given the hon. member for Macleod, any hon. member from British Columbia should have the right to discuss the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. FAIR: I do not think that applies solely to British Columbia. The hon. member for Macleod is from Alberta, as are a number of us, and I think we should have every right to speak on these questions now, because they affect directly and indirectly the incomes of a number of those who will be compelled to pay income tax.

The CHAIRMAN: Standing order 58, paragraph 2, is quite clear. The Chairman, when an objection is raised, and there was one in this case, is bound by the rules of the house. I must now confine the discussion to resolution 1, Income War Tax Act.

With respect to questions which were raised on currency, I have been able to connect them somewhat with resolution 1. The government proposes certain ways and means of raising money by way of income tax, and certain hon. members suggested other ways and means of providing the same revenue, that is, by the issue of currency. There is a certain connection between the two. But the fixing of a ceiling price on beef is certainly irrelevant. Mr. O'NEILL: I am not going to question your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I will say that when the budget was passed we were given to understand that we would have the greatest latitude in discussion in committee. I think we are not being given quite the latitude we were led to believe we would be given.

One question is, a taxpayer on his income tax may deduct from the refundable portion the amount he pays on a mortgage on his home—

Mr. STIRLING: That comes under resolution 7.

The CHAIRMAN: That will come later.

Mr. O'NEILL: With all these committees and other things it is impossible for one to be here all the time. I came here and I have listened to everything under the sun being discussed for seven months, and now when I have something that I want to discuss I am told it will be discussed on another day. How shall I know when that day is here?

The CHAIRMAN: If hon. members will permit us to reach resolution 7, there will be an opportunity.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I want to identify myself with those who have protested against the income tax levied on the lower incomes. I realize that the job which the Minister of Finance has to do is to finance this tremendous war undertaking of the Canadian people. In other words, he has to weld this whole nation into one great war machine. But it does appear to me that by the imposition of income tax on incomes in the lower brackets, particularly $660 and $1,200 for single and married men respectively, he is to some extent defeating his own purpose. Already it is apparent that these low income people. those who are contributing so much to the production of war material by working in our factories, on our farms and so on, are not able to maintain the standard of health to make continuous employment possible.

As far as the people of my own constituency are concerned, I do not think there will be any high proportion of them who will be called upon to pay income tax, because unfortunately their incomes are not high enough. The few who will be called upon to pay will come in the very lowest brackets.

I noticed a little while ago, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of June 26, that Doctor A. S. Lamb, the director of physical training in McGill university, made a startling statement. He said that the cost of the air training plan during 1941 was $225,000,000, but the cost of sickness in Canada for the same period was $250,000,000. When you realize that by taking money out of the income of those people in the lower brackets you are going to increase, as I think undoubtedly you are, the amount of sickness among the people of our country who are working on the production of war materials, you will find that this money will have to be paid out again to care for them in sickness, and the war effort will be slowed up by the loss of working time. I cannot see that the minister is any further advanced by taking money from these groups; in fact I think he is defeating his own purposes, for what he gains in income tax he will lose by having to take care of them in sickness as well as losing their time from production.

There is only one thing that matters to-day, that is production for our war services and the prosecution of this war to the maximum limit. It appears to me that if these people were exempt we should in the long run be far better off and the minister would not be out of pocket but would perhaps gain by it.

I have in my room a clipping from one of the papers, I think it was the Montreal Gazette, an advertisement which appeared perhaps two or three weeks ago asking for a housemaid and parlourmaid. It said, "comfortable home for two girls, two adults in the family, no children, five other servants kept." If we have in this country two adults without children-and possibly this situation could be multiplied many times-who are still able to enjoy seven servants to take care of them, perhaps the minister could go to those income brackets and still find further money. His object in the budget is to finance the war. We hear so much about trying to take from our people their surplus money so that they will not spend it on luxuries and things that do not matter, yet we still find certain groups in this country who car afford to keep seven servants to take care of .wo people. I would say incidentally that the Minister of Labour should have something to say about that; the two young women, instead of being kitchenmaid and housemaid, would be better off in a war industry.

As to raising money from these lower income groups, this tax will impair the health of the nation to such an extent that it will be detrimental to the war effort and in the long run will not help the minister in financing the war.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the family mentioned by the hon. member, I think it highly probable that that household is being supported out of capital largely, and if that is the situation, a process of redistribution of wealth is going on that will in the course of time do some levelling.

With regard to the other and perhaps more important question as to whether the $660 and $1,200 limits are too low, all I can say is that in Great Britain a single man starts to pay at $489.50, that is on the assumption that a pound is worth $4.45, which is the official rate of exchange. He is living in a country where the cost of living is, I think, as high as it is here; it has certainly gone up a great deal more than it has here since the beginning of the war. The married man in Great Britain starts to pay at $939.

With regard to the United States, the present law is $750 for a single person and $1,500 for a married person, which has been advocated here to-day. The treasury proposal for the new tax this year is $600 for a single person and $1,200 for a married person. The committee of ways and means has been considering the proper rates and exemptions and has recommended $500 for the single person—

Mr. BLACKMORE: In the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, in the United States; $500 for a single person and $1,200 for a married person. Therefore we are not out of line with other countries, and I do not think we are out of line with the necessities of the case. To raise the exemptions as requested would mean very large losses in revenue as compared with our present proposals. Those would be very important changes from the point of view of revenue. The level of $660 and $1,200 is an uncomfortable one, I admit; but this is an uncomfortable time, a time when sacrifices are asked for and expected and when sacrifices will be assumed. The main point I wanted to make was that we are not out of line. We are not nearly as low as Great Britain, and in the case of a single person we are not as low as the committee of ways and means has recommended in the United States, while in the case of a married person we are on the same level. There may be some changes in the form of taxes which make the comparison not strictly fair. I do not know: but what I have said is accurate, that they start to pay at that level in Great Britain, and will start to pay at that level in the United States.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I do not know about the United States, but I do know that in Great Britain they have a national health scheme. There, when people in the lower income brackets become ill through lack of essential foods or otherwise, they have a scheme which takes care of such people. In this country, however, we have nothing to take the place of that system, and I cannot help feeling that a tremendous loss of time will be experienced by the people in these low income brackets, resulting from insufficient food, anxiety, lack of sufficient time for leisure and rest, and so on.

Mr. ILSLEY: The national health scheme in Great Britain is supported out of taxation which is in addition to the income tax. In other words, there is a special levy for the national health scheme, and therefore they are paying for the advantages of that scheme.

Mr. MacNICOL: In addition, it is contributory.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I noticed in the press yesterday and again to-day several articles in which it was stated that the provisions with regard to compulsory savings and the income tax schedules might be amended. If the minister has those amendments in mind I wonder if he would not save a great deal of discussion by announcing them now. He said there would be an amendment with regard to officers in the armed services, and suggested that discussion on this matter be deferred until that amendment was introduced. If he has other amendments to offer I think he might announce them now, and I believe he would thereby save a great deal of time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think we would save any time. I have no further amendments to resolution 1, part I, and as we come to the next resolutions, if I have amendments I will move them.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): My point was that on resolution 1, part I, there has been a great deal of discussion with reference to the other resolutions, particularly the general deductions.

Mr. ILSLEY: There should not be.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are two or three representations I should like to make with regard to part I, and the first has to do with subsection 1 (c), in which certain changes have been made. Paragraph (c) as it appears in the resolution deals with "an individual, other than a married person, who maintains a self-contained domestic establishment," and so on. The changes are the insertion of the words "other than a married person" and the word "wholly". In other words, the paragraph deals with an individual who maintains a self-contained domestic establishment and who actually supports therein one or more individuals wholly dependent upon him. I am wondering why the paragraph was altered by adding the word "wholly". Then I would point out that a change has also been made in paragraph (d), which reads:

a minister or clergyman, other than a married person, in charge of a diocese, parish or congregation, whose duties require him to maintain at his own and sole expense, a self-contained domestic establishment and who employs therein on full time a housekeeper or servant.

What was the necessity of adding the words "other than a married person" to the provision as it previously existed? I would also point out that in subsection 2 (i) the exemption for a child, a grandchild, a brother or a sister is now determined by whether or not that person is wholly dependent on account of mental or physical infirmity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps we could deal with one at a time.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the words "other than a married person", that is merely a change in wording which does not alter the sense. The case of the married person is covered by paragraph (a), and then paragraph (c) covers an individual other than a married person.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But the act as originally drafted provided for a married person.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is thought to be a little improvement in the wording. With regard to the word "wholly", that is in section 91 of the national defence tax provisions of the Income War Tax Act. This just adopts the wording of the national defence tax section rather than the wording of the graduated income tax section. I do not know whether it would make any difference; I should not think it would.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I come now to subsection 2 (ii), where provision is made for a parent or grandparent of a taxpayer, wholly dependent on account of mental or physical infirmity. I suggest to the minister that there are many taxpayers throughout the country whose wives have no independent incomes, and who are to-day supporting one or both of the parents of their wives. I know of two instances of this kind; I have had letters from these people during the last few days, and there seems no reason why a man who is willing to support his parents-in-law in order to relieve them from the necessity of accepting public charity should not be entitled to the same exemption that is accorded a taxpayer who supports his own parent or grandparent. Would the minister give consideration to extending the right of a taxpayer to claim exemption in cases of this kind.

Mr. ILSLEY: This matter of the in-laws is an old question, which has been brought up, I think, at every session for the last twenty-five years. I am not familiar with the standard argument on it, though I know the request has always been refused. Exemptions for dependents are confined pretty largely, if not wholly, to dependents in connection with whom there is an obligation to support.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course, there is none in that case.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. That, I think, is the reason.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the reason is the desire to restrict it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary East and also by the hon. member for Vancouver South in reference to exemptions of officers in Canada on active service from payments of income tax. During the debate yesterday the suggestion was made that there is no exemption in the United States or in Great Britain in so far as service men are concerned, the general principle being that, subject to the exceptions set out in the act as at present constituted, all should be required to pay income tax. But we in this parliament have departed from that principle in that we recognize the right of exemption of our officers and men overseas as well as of those men in the service in Canada and officers who are actually engaged in the navy or in the air force, requiring them to be at sea or in the air from time to time. Therefore, so far as the general principle is concerned, I submit that having departed from it in one particular and having regard to the representations that have been made as to the anomalous results which flow from imposing the income tax on junior officers who are on active service, whereby they receive less than their noncommissioned officers, the exemption should be granted. I want to add to that something which has not been brought up before, and that is that the women who are in service in Canada and overseas in connection with the navy, the air force and the army, should be exempt. Women in the army or in various services, whether overseas or in Canada, do not appear to be exempt under the act, certainly not as the statute now stands, and I would suggest that when the minister does bring before the house the amendments which he has said he intends to propose regarding officers in the services in Canada, the matter of exempting women in service in the various forces should be provided for. The effect of the amendments which were passed in 1940, allowing for the exemption of men in service in Canada, is discrimination against officers in junior ranks, to such an extent that from one end of the country to the other complaints are being received. It is not as though the men who hold commissions are financially better off than many men in the ranks. I remember during the last war, in the rein-forcements from Canada to the Princess Patricias, and in the Western university battalion, there were university professors in the ranks, and students were their officers. I point that out to show that there were then and are now no school-tie qualifications for officers in Canada's democratic army. The result of the law as it now stands is to discriminate against those men who, either by promotion or, in any event, by orders given by superior authority, are required while on active service to remain in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or to return to Canada.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Or to return to Canada, as the leader of the opposition suggests, in consequence of orders they receive. I do not think I have any other representations to make. Will the minister take into consideration particularly the question of exempting women who are now a part of our armed services, both in Canada and overseas?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether they are exempt or not now, but just on principle, I am always greatly interested in these demands from members for forgoing very large sources of revenue, and I wish to speak frankly now, because I am in a position where I have to and where I can. I have to say what I think regardless of whether it meets with approval outside this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Whether it is popular or not.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I am going to do that, and I will invite a little frank response, which I know I shall get from the hon. member for Lake Centre who has just resumed his seat. He has based his request for exemption of officers in Canada on the ground of discrimination, and he assumes that the only way in which that discrimination can be removed is by the removal of taxation. I have asked the officers of the department to tell me how much that will mean in loss of revenue, and the estimate, while it is not at all close, would be between $15,000,000 and $25,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As regards the officers?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, under the present rates including refundable savings.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is an astonishing statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but there are about 20,000, I believe. Does this feature of the matter worry hon. members, and do they think it would worry the public?-not that what worries the public is what guides us, but we are putting taxes on poor people in this country down to very low levels. We are putting very heavy taxes on men with medium incomes, and very, very heavy taxes on men with higher incomes. Does the discrimination between the taxation on civilians and the taxation on officers in Canada worry anybody? It does me, because I know that hundreds, and I think thousands, of civil servants have enlisted. In a great many cases they are doing non-combatant work, although they are members of the active forces. They are accountants, auditors and so forth and are doing a great deal of work of that kind; and as I say, there are thousands and thousands of them. For the most part their pay and allowances are considerably larger than they were in the civil service. I had a list prepared from one department showing the very large increases in pay. We refused permission to a great many civil servants to enlist. We have kept them in the civil service; we work them to death, or nearly to death in many cases, and we load on their backs these various taxes because we are asking them to make sacrifices. But they see across the way their former associates with uniforms on, and now we are asked to take the taxes off the latter altogether. Does that worry anybody? I should think it would, and yet nearly every hon. member rises in his place and advocates it. Take the girls who have enlisted. As I say, I do not know whether these non-commissioned officers and privates among the girls are free from income tax or not. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, and perhaps he is correct.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is not in the statute.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman makes a fervent appeal; he ask that these people be relieved of taxation. I do not know upon what he bases his argument, but I suppose it is on the ground that they should be treated the same as non-commissioned officers. Consider the stenographers who are in uniform, and the cooks and other women who are performing many types of duties. When everything is considered these women, even though they receive only two-thirds of the private's pay, are receiving more pay than the grade one stenographers. Think of the thousands of grade one stenographers here in Ottawa crowded into any place they can get. Many moving appeals have been made because these girls are being asked to pay $20, $30, $40 or something like that.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is a crying shame.

Mr. ILSLEY: Unless we tax these lower paid people we cannot get the amount that we require. Does it worry anyone that these girls in uniform should be relieved completely from paying a tax? I find it hard to understand the great lightness with which hon. members talk about throwing off fifteen, twenty or twenty-five millions; they talk of doing away with all discriminations, and there are some, eliminating them at the expense of the rest of the overburdened taxpayers. While I must admit that I look at the matter the other way I do find it hard to understand this attitude.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister asks if we are worried. While I may not have received as many representations as the minister, I have received a good many and have given a great deal of consideration to this matter. I had intended to say something in the address which I made on the budget. Almost immediately after we got into the discussion on this resolution the point was raised by the hon. member for Calgary East. I thought he was jumping into it just a little too soon, but I knew we were bound to reach the question sooner or later. There is a wider picture to be considered. My information is that everybody in the United States pays, whether they are in or out of the country, provided, of course, that they come within the taxable brackets. The same thing is true in the United Kingdom.

Mr. ILSLEY: They get a little more pay when they are outside the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the principle of their taxation is that they all pay. I want to discuss this matter in the light of all the circumstances and as judicially as possible. I think the minister wants a frank expression of opinion from the members of the house who are not looking particularly for votes. I am not dealing with it from that angle. It is quite popular to espouse the cause of cutting taxation; I have done a lot of it in days gone by, but I never found that it got me many votes in the final result. We have departed from the principle in a particular instance, and the operation of that departure has caused hardship. There has been a terrific increase in the rates of taxation imposed upon some of these men. There is a discriminatory effect upon the junior officers, up to and including majors, I believe, as opposed to warrant officers.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it just includes captains.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is probably correct, but I was told that it included majors. These junior officers up to and including captains are now taxed at such a rate that they actually receive less than warrant officers. That is an invidious discrimination. There are men who enlisted for active service and who have been sent back to Canada. I believe all officers are subject to direction to go anywhere, there is no such thing as a home army officer. Those men who have been overseas and have been brought home are subject to a tremendous impost because of a move they have made against their wish and desire. They want to stay overseas, but they have been ordered to come back to do service here. Those men are entitled to some consideration.

But there is another large array of men who are now in the armed services who hold relatively high ranks and who have never dreamed of going overseas. Many of them got into the army because they could improve their positions. Why should they escape? The minister tells us that $20,000,000 is the aggregate amount of money to be collected from all, including the class of soldier who never thought of fighting. I have no sympathy for men like that, men who probably bothered everybody they knew to get transferred from a peace-time department into the Department of National Defence and be able to occupy an office in that department and wear a uniform. I have no sympathy for that type of man at all. If he does not like his job, let him resign and go back to his peace-time occupation.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is not a chance in a million of his doing that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think there will be. I suppose it would be almost impossible to lay down a general rule, but I understand the departmental experts have tried to establish a general principle so that this particular class shall not escape. This particular class of army officer, made up of men who are not soldiers, who are simply bookkeepers or paymasters in uniform-we have seen some of them around-will escape if we make an alteration. If it is humanly possible to differentiate between these men and those who are actually in the fighting services, it should be done. Consideration should be given to the man who is sent back from overseas for instructional purposes, and to the man sent out to the coast to help defend the coast.

Mr. GREEN: And the man who is there now.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the man who is on the coast now. These men are in a different category from the men on Slater street.

Mr. REID: It might help if you did not put them in uniform.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is probably where we made the mistake. Go to the Jackson building and you see crowds of them.

Mr. MacNICOL: Saluters.

Mr. HOMUTH: There are forty in one office, and not one of them saw service in the last war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a tremendous army of them doing administrative work, men who never expect to be off the ground in the air force, or on the sea in the navy. Why should we not tax them? They are probably better off than they were in civilian life, and they never expect to fight. It is on the principle of sacrifice, that men may have to give up their lives, that we have exercised the right of granting exemption from income tax. Why cannot the officers of the department make a differentiation between these men? If they will do that, it will solve the problem.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is absolutely impossible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be so, as an administrative problem. I ask the question. If the minister says that that is out, then he has a situation where he will not give satisfaction to anybody.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Subury): But I think another effort ought to be made to deal with the matter. I thought the minister had an amendment to make. We must wait to see whether it is a solution or not. But there is no doubt about it that there are two diametrically opposed principles operating there. One class ought to have relief, and the other class should not. If you agree with me, let us grapple with it on that basis. Let us tax the one, and not tax the other. Surely the problem is not insoluble.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What justification has the minister for taking the stand that women in the ranks in the armed services in Canada and those who go overseas and are being sent overseas to-day, in the medical corps and otherwise, should not be entitled to the same consideration that men are receiving under the law as at present? Mr. ILSEEY: I do not think there is much.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is there any justification?

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the justification for discriminating between a stenographer in uniform and the one out of uniform? We are going to do some discriminating whatever we do. The attitude I object to is always taking the ground that we should eliminate certain discriminations which would cost the treasury money and throw additional burdens upon the taxpayer. I admit that whatever we do in this case there is going to be discrimination. I am going to propose an amendment, but I shall not have it ready until Monday. In the meantime I think we have plenty of work before us this evening. I know the amendment will not be satisfactory to everybody. It will be satisfactory to some. But it is going to be the best I can do under the circumstances. But do not, just for the sake of avoiding discriminations, throw out millions in taxes and think the problem is solved as simply as that, because that just creates other discriminations and, when it comes to the higher incomes, frightful discriminations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Take the case of the women. Why is it necessary to enlist women as stenographers? Can they not be taken on as civilians in these departments? I know there is a great attraction in the uniform for the feminine eye—

Mr. HOMUTH: The air force uniform.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have often wondered why so many people were enlisted in the air force who were never intended to do anything but administrative work. I was in the Jackson building within a year and was astonished at the number of young men there doing, not administrative work, but just purely clerical work—

Mr. CARDIN: Messengers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): — messenger's work. Those people should not be in uniform at all. That sort of thing should be reserved for civilians, and those boys should be put on ground crews or they should be looking forward to doing national duty in the fighting forces. We have many of those fellows in the air force and, by the same token, in the navy, men who never took their feet off dry land. But they are all in uniform. I have wondered why we enlisted so many men who never get into action and never intended to get into action or who—this is a fair statement—under the system which governs them find it impossible to get into real action. I will give the case of a young lawyer, keen and anxious to go overseas. He is chained to a desk helping to keep records. Somebody, of course, has to do that; it is very important to keep records. But here is a man who can do valuable work as a fighting man, and yet, because he has some qualifications as a lawyer and is a good office man, he is just chained to a desk keeping records.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Should that man be taxed?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He does not want to stay in Canada; he wants to go overseas. If he were back in civilian life practising his profession he would be taxed much more heavily.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): There are many men in his position in the forces to-day who would go overseas if they could, but they are held back for some particular reason.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know; the whole thing is so difficult that it is impossible to lay down a general rule that will give satisfaction to everybody, and I think the minister will agree with me there.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Is it not better to err on the generous side?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am agreeable to that principle, but not if it is going to cost the nation $25,000,000. That is a huge sum. I can scarcely believe it is that large, but the minister says so. His officials have made the estimate, and I must accept it because I have no evidence to the contrary. Certainly, be generous, but I do suggest that it is a good principle to follow that you must be just before you are generous.

Mr. GREEN: Did the minister say there were 20,000 officers in Canada? Would he mind repeating the figure?

Mr. ILSLEY: The number of commissioned officers in Canada in the three services is 24,499.

Mr. GREEN: Does that include the reserve?

Mr. ILSLEY: I took it for granted that it did not include the reserve. It was not made for the purpose of including the reserve, and I am pretty sure it does not.

Mr. GREEN: It seems very high. The minister has said that between twenty and twenty-five million dollars would be lost in taxation if these officers were exempt. That would amount to about one thousand dollars per officer, which again seems very high. The history of this matter, the committee will remember, is that when the national defence tax was imposed two years ago there was quite a battle staged in the house to bring about exemption from the tax for all the men in the active forces, in the navy, the army and the air force, but at that time the minister would not go the whole way. He taxed the officers and exempted those in the ranks. and that is why the act appears in its present form. I thought at the time, and I still think, there is too much of a tendency here to focus attention on the staff officers that we see around Ottawa. For every man you see here who is in a very nice spot-and some people think he is having a life which is too easy-there are a hundred out in the districts who are there ready to do a job. ready to fight and ready to die. I do not think it is fair to let our views be based entirely on what we see here in Ottawa. We must look beyond and see these men who are out in the various units.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask a question: Is readiness to fight, readiness to do one's duty in that way, a ground for relief from taxation?

Mr. GREEN: I think that the idea of the house two years ago was that these men who are prepared to die for us should not be subject to income taxes, and more particularly the national defence tax. That was the basis on which the house passed the exemption in 1940, and so far as I am concerned that still holds good. I do not think these men should be taxed even if it means a loss of $20,000,000, and I think that is a very much exaggerated figure.

Mr. ILSLEY: What about the reserve army? They are prepared to die—

Mr. GREEN: The reserve army are in an entirely different category. They are serving only at night; they are not on a fulltime basis.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are prepared to defend themselves and, if necessary, to die. Is that a ground for exempting them?

Mr. GREEN: They are in an entirely different position from the active army.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are different, but not on that criterion.

Mr. GREEN: Their pay is very, very small, at any rate. It is not a matter of their being forced to live on their pay, which really does not amount to anything at all. Some of them in the final result do not get anything. But I do suggest that no one wants to see the exemptions which are now in effect taken away, and if there must be taxation then let there be exemption up to the basis of the present exemption, or in other words exemption right up to the pay and allowances of a first-class warrant officer. His pay and allowances are exempt now, as well as the cost of his rations; let the exemption for these officers start at that figure. It should be possible to work it out on some such basis as that. I never could see why you tax the cost of the rations and why you tax the dependents' allowances which are paid for these men.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the rule which is applied to civilians.

Mr. GREEN: There is too much of this trying to keep these men in the same classification as civilians. We should get away from it. They are not at all in the same classification as civilians; they deserve entirely different treatment. I think the minister could work out some scheme which would solve this problem, perhaps along the line which I have suggested. Let us not focus our attention on conditions here in Ottawa; if the men here are not doing proper military duty, they should be put in civilian clothes.

Mr. ILSLEY: On the question of keeping them in civilian life, the much-abused treasury board tries to do that so far as the civil service is concerned. When persons in the civil service are proposing to take a commission in the army and discharge substantially the duties they discharged before, their cases have to be reported to treasury board, and a great many differences arise between treasury board and the various defence departments as to whether they should be permitted to put on uniform. It has been my unpleasant duty often to take the side of the controversy of trying to keep them out of uniform, and in most cases it has been a losing battle. The arguments advanced are, that they are going to work with men in uniform; that they must have authority; that they must be in a position to uphold their side in a discussion, and that others have been put in uniform.

Mr. HOMUTH: Churchill never was.

Mr. ILSLEY: Considerations of discipline are advanced. It is said that they must go; maybe there is no intention of their going anywhere but Ottawa, but they can be sent; and so on. Well, it is just a perpetual headache trying to fight these cases, and I usually lose out. If I do not lose out it is another black eye to treasury board, because treasury board is trying to control things it does not know anything about.

Income War Tax Act

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Of the 24,000 commissioned officers in Canada, I wonder whether the minister could tell us how many are in a medical category which would make them acceptable for overseas service. When I introduced this discussion I had considered this matter; and I do not think officers who are not qualified for overseas service by reason of not being medically fit, and who are just holding down civilian jobs, should be exempt from taxation. But if a man has offered his services, his services have been accepted, and he is medically fit for overseas service and of the proper age, I think he is entitled to a great deal of consideration.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Every officer is liable for overseas service.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No.

Mr. HOMUTH: He has to be physically fit.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): When I asked for exemption I was limiting my request on behalf of those who are medically fit for overseas service. I do not think those who are not in that category are entitled to such consideration. Could the minister give us any idea as to the number who are medically fit?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I cannot.

Mr. BOUCHER: While we are on this point, I wonder if the minister has considered the matter of compulsory saving as far as this particular class of people is concerned. It seems to me there is some divergence of opinion with regard to what is fair with regard to the taxation of soldiers going overseas, soldiers returning from overseas, the ladies, and the soldiers who are here in Canada. But it seems to me that it would be pretty sound policy to embark on a system of compulsory savings, even in excess of that under the present act, for the soldiers in that particular position, so that the government could have the use of the money during the war. The spending power of the soldier in Canada would be reduced and the rehabilitation problem would be greatly facilitated by the soldier having that reserve coming to him when the war is over. In all these questions we have been discussing for the last fifteen or twenty minutes, I believe a very interesting sphere of research would be along the line of a policy of compulsory savings, even in lieu of taxation to a great extent.

Mr. GREEN: If I may interrupt on that just for a moment; if such a suggestion were adopted it would strike at the root of all the legislation to help soldiers, the general plan of which is that the government will help the soldier to become rehabilitated; that is certainly the responsibility of the government. This plan of compulsory savings, on the other hand, is the civilian's way of helping himself to become rehabilitated after the war, and I would argue just the opposite way to the hon. member for Carleton—that the refundable portion should not be charged against the soldier.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I would associate myself with the hon. member for Vancouver South in that regard.

Mr. LEDUC: Nobody has more sympathy than I have for the rank and file of the soldiers who are in uniform, but I quite agree with the leader of the opposition in the remark he made this afternoon about these men holding office here in Ottawa. I do not know how many there are. I know some people who have been working here in Ottawa ever since the beginning of the war. They are wearing uniforms, and we do not know for whom we should have respect. It is about time we should know whether a man is an impostor or not.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to say a word as to the officers. It is all very well to say that these officers should not pay any income tax, but I do not see why they should be treated differently from warrant officers. A warrant officer class B has a net income of $2,167.25: living allowance, $480; trade pay, $263.75; salary, $1,423.50.

An hon. MEMBER: How many warrant officers are there in the army?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not know, but why should you stop at a warrant officer; why should you not tax him just as you do a lieutenant? A second lieutenant gets $1,551.25 plus separation allowance of $540; his tax is $470. Therefore, he has a net income of $1,620. The difference is between $2,167 and $1,620. You can go all up the line. Take a lieutenant, his net income is $1,773.60. He receives $1,825 pay and $540 separation allowance, and the tax amounts to $591.

A captain gets $2,372.50, plus separation allowance of $600. His tax amounts to $871, leaving his net income $2,101.50.

The least that I think should be done is that the separation allowance should be free from tax. All these officers are willing to go over-[Mr. Green.] seas. Not only that; a great many of them are separated from their families; in many cases they have to maintain two homes, and the separation allowance is hardly adequate at the best. In addition, the officer has to contribute to the cost and upkeep of his mess. Yet he has to pay 70 cents a day income tax.

Let us take some other men in the service. Take our dollar-a-year men. They can deduct all their expenses, while the man in the army cannot. Men who for various reasons are put in the army cannot deduct any living allowance. When the war is over, the man who is in the army is going to be at a tremendous disadvantage when he comes back into civilian competition. It seems to me that in all fairness he ought to have some opportunity to build up something for the future.

I have a letter from an officer who says:

Most of the officers known to me have taken advantage of the generous offer by the banks and borrowed the money from them and paid last year's tax in full and face the twelve monthly payments from March, 1941, to March, 1942. In most cases we have assigned pay to our wives as pay cannot be assigned directly to the bank. If the finance department start taxing our pay at the source next September most of us will be most seriously embarrassed. There are very few officers that I know that have not scaled their living down to the limit and most that I talk to are seriously considering applying for permission to leave the service as they feel they cannot carry on.

Many of them have commitments for war bonds and war savings stamps. I do not say that they should have total exemption, but there should be some way of getting them some exemption, something that is free from taxation. I hope the minister will give this matter his closest consideration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The amendment refers only to earned income?

Mr. ILSLEY: Of married women, yes.

Mr. KUHL: Just a few words by way of relating the necessity of this increase and these imposts to fundamentals. The other day the Minister of Finance, in replying to the hon. member for Parry Sound, made this statement:

We are talking about realities. This is not a question of money at all; it is a question of things and people. It is elemental. We are just confusing it if we think it is a question of money.

I wish to say a few words from the point of view of realities. The minister, as the financial adviser to the government, the government as a whole, and the country as a whole, would make a great deal more progress if the minister actually carried out the ideas implied in that statement. He seems to imply there that, after all, money is a secondary consideration, and from the point of view of providing money I agree that money is a secondary consideration. It is the cheapest commodity on earth to obtain, nothing but paper and ink. As far as procuring money is concerned I agree with the minister if that is what he implied, that money is a secondary consideration. I agree that the all-important factor, whether we are considering war-time or peace-time requirements, is the men and the materials available.

From the point of view of the necessity for the increase in the income tax on the lower incomes I believe everyone will concede as a fundamental that no country, neither Canada nor any other part of the empire, nor any of the united nations, can make its most effective contribution to the war effort unless the people at home who are working in the industries, as well as those in the armed forces, are in the best state of health. I believe everyone will concede that workers in industry, and in fact anyone doing work of any kind, can do his best and contribute his maximum only if his standard of living is such that he enjoys the best of health and can work at the highest possible efficiency. If there is any factor contributing to the impairment of a man's efficiency in this war work, then I say that factor, whatever it may be, whether it be an increase in the income tax or any other kind of impost, is doing a decided disservice to the war effort, and is actually subversive. If we are going to contribute the maximum in all fields of production, then surely the first fundamental we should establish is that every individual worker should be allowed an income which will permit him to work with the greatest possible efficiency. Does this budget promote that efficiency on the part of the large majority of the workers in this country? If one may judge from the remarks that have been made by many hon. members, the imposts contained in this budget will not bring about that result. Many people will be denied health services. Many will be denied even some of the necessities of life, some of those things which contribute greatly to their ability to produce. Therefore, from the point of view of realities, surely the minister must admit that in connection with these lower income brackets this budget does not promote the greatest war effort.

Let us now consider the matter still farther from the point of view of realities. Men and materials, as the minister has said in the past and as we in this corner have said many times, are the fundamental considerations. If we have the men and the materials, then we have nothing to worry about. Surely no one will deny that we have not the wherewithal, as far as food or clothing or shelter is concerned, adequately to take care of our war workers. These things are not beyond our reach; they can be produced, for the physical essentials are here. It is just a matter of apportioning to domestic requirements the maximum we feel we can afford to devote to those purposes; and surely we cannot afford to apportion to our living standard any less than will give all workers a decent standard of living.

As far as the money angle is concerned, the same reasoning holds true. This budget is going to bring about a great increase in our national debt. After all, what is our financial system? Is it anything more than an accounting system? The debate that took place yesterday and the day previous in connection with the question of national money was very interesting; but in all that has been said with regard to the issuing of national money I I believe too much emphasis has been laid on the question of currency. Currency is a very minor part of our monetary system, It amounts to possibly less than 5 per cent of the complete operation of our financial system, while by far the greater part of that system is carried on through bookkeeping transactions which are the simplest things on earth to perform. The costs that are involved in operating the financial system are being met from day to day, in the same manner that we are meeting the real costs of the war. We provide from day to day all essential labour with which to produce the munitions of war at home. Those in the armed forces are jeopardizing their lives, sometimes losing their lives, and munitions and supplies are being blown up. But from the physical point of view the costs are being met from day to day. Does that not apply with equal force to the matter of finances? After all, the money we use is created simply through bookkeeping transactions, with a little depreciation in connection with bank equipment and buildings, and some clerical work. This work energy is being provided from day to day by those engaged in the banking business. All the physical requirements, all the essentials, are being met from day to day in our banking system. Consequently, as the minister has suggested, from the point of view of realities we are meeting all costs, physical as well as financial, from day to day. Therefore I see absolutely no reason why there should be any debt in connection with Canada's war effort, and of course that also would apply in peace time.

Now a word as to the need for securing funds from those in the lower income groups in order to finance the war effort. From the point of view of physical realities I see absolutely no reason for that at all. After all, the money system is merely a monetization of the real wealth that exists in the country; and the reason why the government has been obliged to obtain funds from the chartered banks, in addition to what has been taken from the people in the form of taxation and war savings, is simply that there is never sufficient money put into circulation completely to monetize the actual wealth of the country. It has been our constant contention that when the funds in circulation, the money paid out in the course of production, whether during peace time or war time, is insufficient to monetize all the goods, then additional money ought to be obtained from the Bank of Canada or from the government's monetary set-up, at cost. The fact that the government is going to be obliged to borrow $1,228,000,000 during the ensuing year indicates that there is not enough money in existence, to begin with to monetize the complete production of the nation. Consequently I cannot see that it is anything but reasonable to suggest that the government itself should bring about this monetization at cost, rather than put the people as a whole into debt for the amount of this monetization plus the interest rates that are charged. I feel therefore that until this field is explored and utilized to the fullest possible extent, the people of Canada can never make their maximum contribution to the war effort.

Mr. LECLERC: I hold in my hand something that may prove to the exponents of easy money what easy money means after all. I have here a menu from a dining car plying between the United States and Mexico, and here are some of the different prices on that bill of fare: Fried fillet of fresh fish, tartar sauce, chopped beef steak, et cetera, $1.20 in American money—this is printed in English and in Mexican—or $6 in Mexican money. The next item is $1.15 in American money or $5.75 in Mexican money.

Mr. GRAYDON: Plus the tip.

Mr LECLERC: The next is $1.10 in American money or $5.50 in Mexican money; and the 85 cent meal, in American money, is $4.25 in Mexican. When you have to pull out a $10 bill every time you have a meal with your wife you realize that easy money goes as easily as it comes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): When the national defence tax is deducted from the employee's wages now he is given a slip showing the deduction, but on that slip the man's name is not shown nor does the name of the firm appear.

[Mr. Kuhl.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that that is not correct.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is the man's name on it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): How long does it take to get the refund? I understand that there are some cases that have been pending for about eight months.

Mr. GIBSON: I have already given one answer to the question of refunds. They are made at the end of the fiscal year after the returns for the entire year have been filed. There are a great many returns filed in April. The man's return has to be compared with the employer's, and sometimes with the returns of three or four employers, and it takes a good deal of time to get all the refunds checked and ready for payment. It is a new branch that has had to be built up, and actually it has not been working as rapidly at first as we hope to have it working in the future. It has taken some time to get these refunds made, and it will be a considerable time before the great mass of them can be paid.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I can understand that it will take a lot of work to get the branch set up, but in the meantime the workers are suffering a hardship. If the employer knows that the employee is not making, in the case of a single person, $660, or, in the case of a married person, $1,200, does he have to deduct the amount, or can he pass that up, or does he make the form as at the present time?

Mr. GIBSON: I am not quite clear whether the hon. member is asking about what happens under the national defence tax, or whether he is inquiring about the new budget?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The same situation exists under the new budget.

Mr. GIBSON: If the hon. member does not mind waiting, that will be dealt with under resolution 25.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are we still on resolution 1?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I call the attention of the minister to the fact that while he answered part of my allegations with respect to this resolution, he did not give the reason why there has not been a complete amalgamation of the two taxes. I asked whether it was not possible to combine the two taxes, to have refrained from bearing so heavily on the low income group, and to have achieved a more simplified and logical tax structure. I suggested that the reason why he had not done so was that he was thereby enabled to strike more heavily at the lower income groups. What has he to say about that? Why did he not make it all one tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: The graduated rates would have to be higher to get the same amount of money if it were done on the other principle.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then that supports my theory, that you are striking at the lower income group?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a rather hard way to put it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps it is rough, but it is probably true.

Mr. ILSLEY: The fact is that if we had abandoned the national defence tax, quite a number of taxpayers who had been paying small sums would not be paying anything. The national defence tax principle was pretty well accepted, and we did not think we would be justified in abandoning it.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask in what position the man finds himself who, having been in receipt of a salary and having incurred certain commitments with regard to life insurance, and having paid them for a few years, decides, as the result of a call of duty or because he is pressed to a training camp, to enter the army. He receives $39 a month. It is obvious that he cannot still continue to keep up his commitments on his life policies. In what position does he find himself under this budget?

Mr. ILSLEY: That man is evidently a private and he is not taxed on his service pay. On his ordinary income, if he still has an ordinary income—

Mr. STIRLING: The presumption is that the salary he has been enjoying ceases.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then he is not taxed.

Mr. STIRLING: But he cannot carry out his obligations. He cannot maintain the life insurance to which he has committed himself.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there no assistance forthcoming? Is that the death of that man's insurance policy?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Income War Tax Act

Mr. WRIGHT: When you get into the higher age groups you find that many of these men who took out policies of considerable amounts at the age of twenty-five are being drafted now into the army as privates, and their policies will lapse unless provision is made. Is no provision being made by the government to protect these policies?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not a taxation question at all.

Mr. WRIGHT: I know it is not a taxation question, but it is a question that arises.

Mr. ILSLEY: The government has not undertaken to keep insurance on a person's life in force.

Mr. WRIGHT: In certain cases difficulty would arise because of the taxation.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I can appreciate quite readily that the minister is finding difficulty in obtaining money. When the taxation budget was brought down a year ago the minister said definitely that the purpose was not to obtain revenue; that it was to prevent inflation. He has changed his attitude, because he states now that we must have increased revenue. In fact, he went on this afternoon to explain that it was necessary to increase the taxes upon incomes in the lower brackets, especially those of girls and stenographers, in order to obtain this great amount of money. Some members of the opposition criticized the minister quite severely because he had not raised the tax on certain incomes, because he had not exempted officers and so on, but the strange thing is that while some of these old, hide-bound Conservatives who cannot see any further than their noses are ready to criticize the methods adopted by the minister to raise revenue, they have nothing to offer in their place. My hon. friends over here are so steeped in old conservatism that they will never get out. The only hope we have is that they die off, but I do not want to wish that on them. It is one thing to criticize the minister, as they have done quite freely, and it is-

An hon. MEMBER: Constructive criticism.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Constructive criticism! I never heard anything constructive come out of your outfit yet. You are quite ready to criticize the minister, but I challenge any one of you to show him where he can get the money. Very few Liberals have the ability —not exactly the ability, rather the nerve to rise in their places and say what they think about the need of a change in our monetary system. Those who have expressed their ideas in regard to the need for a change in this system deserve a great deal of credit, whether or not the minister is ready to follow their suggestions. If we are finding difficulty in meeting this budget, we shall have still more difficulty in meeting the next one. The minister will have a much harder time raising money next year than he had this year. He will be compelled to go into the field of monetary reform.

The policy of the government in connection with this niggardly way of financing the war is interfering with our war effort. I made this statement before, but the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) ridiculed me. I said that because of government policy the production of this country was being held back. After having had a little more experience during the last few weeks, I am ready to repeat that statement with much more emphasis. The method used to finance the war is one of the things that are holding back our war effort. If it had not been for our antiquated methods of financing we would never have been caught the way we were in regard to our defences. As one hon. member has said, we should be careful that we are not beaten because of the antiquated measures we are adopting.

I say in all earnestness that the minister should consider most seriously the suggestions made in regard to the expansion of credit through the Bank of Canada. In that way he could increase our war effort and would not have to tax the really low income brackets and take away the livelihood of these people. That is just silliness and tommyrot. It is interfering with our war effort; it is interfering with the health of the people, and without question it will interfere with production, not only on the farm but in the factory. When the Conservatives discuss this question I hope they will indicate some way in which the minister can raise money. Even the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) admits that he might have been wrong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I stated that you could do it to a limited degree, but beyond that limit you should not go.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What is the limit?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No one can tell. If I knew the limit, I would advocate it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If the leader of the opposition is that far along in the elementary study of finance, he has made a little progress. He admits now that he was wrong yesterday and this afternoon when he was criticizing the hon. member for

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), but he now says that you can expand credit to a limited degree. Let us expand it to that limited degree, and then to that extent we shall not have to take the last penny out of the poor fellow's pocket. When we have gone that far I am sure that the leader of the opposition will find that it has done no harm, that in fact it has done a great deal of good, and he can then pursue his studies a little further and advise the Minister of Finance accordingly.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): When this resolution was before the committee yesterday I expressed an opinion with regard to payment of income tax by officers who are still in Canada. I have listened to the arguments advanced since that time, and I am still strongly of the opinion that some relief should be given to these men. At the present time all ranks other than officers are relieved from payment of income tax, and I trust that that will be changed.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister has stated that at a later stage an amendment will be introduced but that the nature of the amendment had not yet been determined. There is a rule of the house with regard to repetition, but I am not addressing myself in this connection to the hon. member. I think this subject has now been covered quite fully, and I should like to invite the committee to consider the amendment and resolution 1.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The amendment was before the committee this afternoon, and a great many hon. members took advantage of that occasion to express their views about the payment of income tax by officers. I have taken up very little of the time of this committee, and I feel that I should be allowed to express my views on this subject.

I noticed that the Minister of Finance stated that he proposes to bring down an amendment. It will be of no avail for me to address my remarks to the committee after that amendment has been brought down, because everything will then have been decided. I wish to express my views now, so that, for what they are worth, the minister will have the benefit of them.

This afternoon it was stated that many officers never expect to leave Canada and that many of them were holding down cushy jobs. That may be so. I believe the leader of the opposition referred to the case of a young lawyer who wanted to go overseas but could not, and had to sit behind a desk in Ottawa or some other place. The hon. gentleman intimated, although he did not definitely say so, that this man, in his opinion, should pay income tax. That is what I gathered from his remarks. I would, however, point out to the committee that even if that man never goes overseas he has given up his profession and, when the war is over, he will have no practice to go back to, whereas other lawyers who are not in the armed forces are carrying on as usual. True, they may not be making much money; nevertheless they have their practice and, after the war is over, they have a job, while this lawyer who is sitting behind the desk has no job to which he can return.

I would also point out that all officers except those who are in a low category are liable for service overseas. They have no option if they are fit. They cannot volunteer only for home service. If they are needed they will be sent overseas. I believe that every officer in the armed forces, in the army, navy or air force, who had a job before the war and gave up that job, is making a sacrifice and that some consideration should be given to them in the payment of income tax.

I am fully aware of the difficulties with which the Minister of Finance is faced, and I know he is trying to find a solution. When I spoke in this house several weeks ago I stated that I thought the Minister of Finance was one of the greatest finance ministers this country has ever had, and since he has brought down his budget I have had no reason to change that opinion. I want to say to my hon. friends opposite or in any other part of this house that if I think any member of this government or any member of this house is doing a great service to his country, I shall not hesitate to tell the house of the great service which is being rendered. It is all right to say nice things about members after they have passed out of this house or gone to their great reward, but so far as I am concerned I am going to say good things about them while they are here.

It was stated this afternoon that if officers are relieved entirely of the payment of income tax, the coffers of this country will be depleted to the extent of probably $15,000,000. The hon. member for Vancouver South suggested to the Minister of Finance that officers should be granted an exemption equal to the pay which a warrant officer would receive.

Mr. GREEN: And allowances.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The pay and allowances which a warrant officer would receive. I joined with my hon, friend this afternoon in that suggestion, and I am still in accord with him. I trust the Minister 44561-275 of Finance will be able to grant such an exemption. However, if he should feel that that is going too far, I have a further suggestion to make. I suggest that all non-commissioned officers should continue to be exempt from payment of tax and that all officers in Canada pay income tax to the extent only of 50 per cent of what a civilian earning the same amount would pay. That would deplete the coffers of this country by only $7,500,000.

While this country is spending billions of dollars, is it not fair to give some consideration to these officers? I know as well as other hon. members that some officers have better jobs to-day than they had in peace time, but I also know that if these officers were not in the armed forces they would, with conditions as they are to-day, be making just as much money outside as they are now. I also know there are many officers in the army, navy and air force who will never go outside Canada but who have made great sacrifices. I think of auditors and, in particular, of doctors, who have given up great practices, and of dentists, and if I were not a lawyer myself I would add lawyers. There are many, many men who are making a financial sacrifice in addition to leaving their home and family, and surely we can give them some consideration. It would not cost us much, if my suggestion were adopted, just 50 per cent of what they would normally pay. That would be welcomed by all of them; it would raise their morale, and be a great thing for the armed forces of this country.

Mr. MARSHALL: Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to make a speech but to ask a question which comes under subsection 2 of resolution 1. First I should like to quote from a letter I have received, and then ask my question. I quote:

Have a problem in request to tax exemptions for our two girls, Joan, age 12 years, and Joyce, age 9 years, who have been with us as our sole charge since they were about two years old. The girls have no other home, no one else is getting exemptions for them, and we cannot see why we should be penalized for taking care of them. The Edmonton office admitted we of them. The Edmonton office admitted we should be entitled to exemption but as the act reads they could not allow it, but advised us to take it up with the tax commissioner, Ottawa. We could furnish you with a sworn affidavit to the effect that if we had not taken care of them, they and their mother would have been on relief all these years. In fact their father was on relief quite a few years. We are advised that the only way we can claim exemption is to legally adopt them. This we hesitate to do on account of their mother's state of health. as she is in rather a nervous state of health, as she is in rather a nervous condition.

Is a case of this kind covered by subsection 2 of resolution 1?

REVISED EDITION

Mr. GIBSON: No, that case is not covered. The letter has correctly stated that exemption can be made for children only if they are the taxpayer's own children or children legally adopted. Expenses incurred in such a case as my hon. friend mentions could be treated only as charitable donations, and not as expenditures entitling the taxpayer to exemption for children.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Paragraph (h) of section 1 of resolution 1 refers to:

Estates having income taxable as provided by subsections 2 and 4 of section 11 of this act; Nine per centum of the income.

To what does this refer? I have not the act before me. I have not looked this up and I was wondering just what it was. Normally estates would not pay this tax, would they?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, there is no $660 exemption or $1,200 exemption. Whatever the income is, it is taxable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is this section 11 of the act?

Mr. ILSLEY: The heading of the section, which consists only of section 11, is this, "Income from estates and trusts", and the marginal notes are:

Income from an estate or accumulating in trust. Trusts for unascertained person. Trusts in favour of the same beneficiaries. Accruals to date of death. Income capitalized. Accruad earnings received after death. Income capital-ized, how taxed. Life beneficiaries.

It provides for taxation of estates; that is all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As I understand the law, when the income is received by an estate it is allocated to the beneficiaries: the trustee or the executor files a return, and the amount allocated to each beneficiary is attached to that person's income, and he pays a tax, does he not? Is there a deduction now before anything is allocated?

Mr. ILSLEY: When there are unascertained beneficiaries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what I want to know. If there are ascertained beneficiaries this does not apply, but it is taxed in the hands of the beneficiary.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister elucidate a little more the answer he made to the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Marshall)? I thought I heard him mention that the money spent on the bringing up of children that were not legally adopted was some form of charity.

Mr. GIBSON: I used the expression that it was a charitable donation. I did not mean [Mr. Marshall.]

that it was exempted, as a charitable donation, from income tax. It is treated as charitable work, private charity, which a man is carrying on which is not entitled to the exemption.

Mr. MacINNIS: If the same family put these children in an approved children's home run by a church or some such organization and made a contribution of a certain amount on a charitable basis to that home, would the family be entitled to deduct that from the income tax, or would it be a non-deductible charitable donation?

Mr. GIBSON: If they were paying the board and lodging of that child in the home it would not be an exemption, but if they were making a donation to the home for the general purposes of the upkeep of the children in the home it would be a charitable exemption.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is the very point I want to make. Why the difference? Here these people are willing to give those children a home, but on account of certain circumstances they do not want to go through the process of legal adoption, and they are not allowed any income tax deduction because of this expense. Yet if they put the children in a home where they have just institutional care and make a donation to that home to the same extent as they are paying now for the upkeep of the children, they are allowed to deduct the amount from their income tax. Surely there should be some way to meet a situation of that kind. It does not seem to me to make sense, in a civilized society.

Mr. GRAYDON: Following the line which was adopted by the hon. member for Vancouver East, may I ask this question? Is not the present tax structure in connection with the head of a household who has, for instance, one or two children of that type, more harsh in its application than it was previously? As I recall it, under the previous income tax provision there was an exemption of $1,500 to start with. Now the householder has only $660 by way of exemption. Let us suppose that he had two children who were not his own, who were not legally adopted, and who did not come under the government's evacuation arrangements. Previously at least $1,500 of his income was actually exempted before any income tax was paid; now he has only $660 as an exemption. It may be said that as a married man he has an allowance of $150: but actually, at the rate of, say 30 per cent. the difference there would be a matter of $300, roughly speaking, instead of $150. Therefore it seems to me that he is in a much worse position under the present arrangement than he would have been had the exemption remained at $300. I should like to have the minister's explanation because this is rather confusing to me.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that I understand the question. It is true that there has been an exemption for a married man, or a single man under certain household or other conditions, of $1,500, and now the provision is that the tax shall not reduce his income below $1,200. If the hon. gentleman will put his difficulty again, I shall try to follow it more closely.

Mr. GRAYDON: My problem is this. Under the previous taxation arrangements a man was allowed $1,500 exemption. Now he is allowed $660 exemption. The difference between $1,500 and $660 is $840. Roughly speaking, 30 per cent of that would be somewhat less than $300. But actually what he is allowed off the tax under the present scheme is $150, whereas under the previous scheme he was allowed about $290. Having regard to the point which was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East, the present rate of tax bears rather hardly upon the man if he is keeping one or two children for whom he is not able to get the $28 or the $80 reduction, as the case may be, for a child who is either adopted or his own.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does it come to anything more than this, that it would be better for him if he could get a reduction in respect of children that are not his own, provided he is keeping them? Is there any more point to the objection than that?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, because he is really paying a good deal more; at least his exemption does not mean nearly as much to him under the present legislation as it did under the act of last year.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not see that it has any bearing whatever on the question which has arisen about foster-children. It is a different matter altogether. It is a harsher measure, we know that, but it does not have anything to do with this other question.

Mr. GRAYDON: It has this to do, that when a man is in that income bracket-the situation is much the same with regard to officers of the army-when you are taking so much more off the married man with one or two additional children to keep, it is not an easy thing in these days to take care of one or two extra children for whom you cannot get any additional exemption. The problem becomes more acute.

Income War Tax Act

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no doubt it does; the heavier the taxes, the harder it is for a taxpayer to take in and keep children for whom he cannot get any exemption.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The exemption is based on legal liability or obligation. That is the trouble.

Mr. MARSHALL: Am I right in assuming that those who take in children from the British isles are allowed exemption under this paragraph?

Mr. ILSLEY: Some of them.

Mr. MARSHALL: It says here:

(iii) a child under eighteen years of age maintained by the taxpayer in Canada under a cooperative scheme sponsored by the govern-ments of the United Kingdom and of Canada or any of the provinces of Canada, for children brought from the United Kingdom under a government plan, or under twenty-one years of age, and likewise maintained, upon proof that such child is a student at a secondary school, university or other educational institution.

It seems to me that this case would be more or less parallel and would come under that section.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. The committee will remember that two years ago or last year we had a hot argument about whether we should permit evacuated children generally to be treated as children for the purpose of tax reduction, and I took the ground that this should not be permitted to any greater extent than that section covers. One of the reasons I gave was that if we opened the door wide we would have to upset the practice, to change the law, that had been in force in Canada ever since the Income War Tax Act was enacted in 1917, namely, that foster-children are not treated as children for tax deduction purposes. I said that practice was very firmly established and that we would have to hold to it; that there were reasons why we should. Evidence is difficult to obtain; abuse is possible; exchanging of children is possible and all that sort of thing. I may be wrong about that, but at any rate it would be very difficult to check on the matter, and it has always been felt that the principle of the exemption is legal liability. If a person wishes to be kind-hearted and do a charitable deed, that is not sufficient ground for getting an income tax deduction. Many kind acts are done; taxpayers support relatives whose health is bad; all that kind of thing is done, and no deductions are made for that. Nothing has been more firmly established in our income tax law than the principle that only children of the taxpayer and adopted children come within the terms of the section.

We did think we could go the length we did by passing the section the hon. gentleman has just read, that is, with regard to children who come under a scheme sponsored by the the governments, children who presumably are for the most part poor, whose parents have no means and whom the government in a sense has asked the people to take. We thought we could go to the length of making a limited concession in respect of those children. We were pressed very hard to go much further. but I said we could not go further without opening it up to all foster-children in Canadian homes, something that we had never done. There are thousands of them, tens of thousands, in every province of Canada. My hon. friend's request simply bears out the contention I made; he is basing his argument on that limited section about sponsored children. I do not think it is a valid argument. He would have a very much better argument if he went the whole way with evacuated children. The British government has since released money for those who have money to send-

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In a limited way, £3 a month.

Mr. ILSLEY: —and had we allowed that as a deduction we would have been in this position, that Canadian taxpayers would be getting an exemption for those children and getting something from their parents at the same time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the question of allowance for a common-law wife ever arisen, and what is the position?

Mr. ILSLEY: The question has arisen, but no allowance is made.

Mr. MARSHALL: A point that I think is overlooked is this; these people are perfectly willing to take out papers for these children, but on the advice of the doctor it is not deemed advisable to do so. If they took out papers they would get full exemption under this section. The only thing that bars them from doing so is that the doctor believes that the issue of such a certificate would be detrimental to the health of the mother of the children.

Mr. BOUCHER: The Minister of Finance said this afternoon that it has not been the policy to grant exemption to married daughters whose parent or parents live with herself and her husband, whereas it is granted to the son whose parents live with him. I believe a serious wrong is created there. Any person who has practised law can hardly help coming to the conclusion that as a rule the daughter is more willing and anxious to look after her parents, and the parents as a rule are more happy with a daughter than with a son. That being the case, you have the situation whereby the married daughter taking in and supporting her parents cannot through her husband get exemption under the Income War Tax Act, but the husband can get exemption for his parents. In these days when we are going into so much social legislation I believe that is a relic of the past which we should soon obliterate. I wonder whether the minister has any more reason than that stated this afternoon when he said it was just that they had not done it in the past.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no obligation to support a mother-in-law. In nearly every province, in many provinces at any rate, there is an obligation to support mother and father.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no common-law obligation. Has the minister met the alimony case, the man who is divorced, who has an income of, say, $10,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly have.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do you allow that alimony payment as a deduction?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Such a man who has married again is in a very tight spot. I think he ought to have a little consideration; that should be allowed as a deduction.

Mr. BENCE: I was going to say a word on that point. It seems to me most unfair that when a man is divorced and is supporting his ex-wife by order of the court, he should not be allowed to deduct, for income tax purposes, the amount paid in alimony. If that were done, the ex-wife could be required to file an income tax return as a single woman, as she should, and she would have to acknowledge receipt of that income in making up that return. In many cases the man has married again, but still he must pay a very high tax on the $60, $70 or $80 a month he must pay his former wife. I am not thinking of it so much from the point of view of the husband, though I believe he is in a very bad spot. In the cases with which I have become acquainted, the husband has defaulted in his payments because he has not been able to make them, and in those cases it is the former wife who suffers, and accordingly I believe she should be given as much consideration as the husband.

Mr. ILSLEY: I agree that there is a great deal of injustice to the husband, and perhaps indirectly to the wife, under the law as it stands now, and much consideration has been given some method by which the law might be changed. However, I am not in a position at the moment to say whether or not an amendment to meet the situation will be proposed. The matter is still under consideration.

Mr. GREEN: What is the law in Great Britain and the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: In Great Britain the law is that if the payment to the ex-wife is made under an order of the court, it is allowed as a deduction from the husband's income for the purposes of income tax, and it is taxed as income to the wife. In the United States I believe the law is the same as ours.

Mr. GREEN: Have they not changed it this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are trying to, but I do not know how they will get along. I should have completed my remarks about Great Britain. If the payment is under a separation agreement instead of an order of the court, then the husband is taxed on the full income, and the wife not at all.

Mr. GREEN: Why has Canada followed the United States law rather than the British law in this case?

Mr. ILSLEY: There has never been any other law in Canada. Perhaps they are following us; I do not know. We just do the same; that is all.

Mr. GREEN: I really think it is an impossible situation, with the tax so greatly increased as it has been this year. After all, our law recognizes divorce, and once the parties are divorced they are entitled to marry again. In some cases that have been brought to my attention the husband has remarried and had children by the second wife, but is forced to pay income tax on the alimony that he pays the first wife, and I suggest that the position is absolutely unfair.

Mr. ILSLEY: I agree that it is, in a great many cases.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Where a widower has young children, and requires the services of a housekeeper, is any allowance made for that housekeeper?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, there is none.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not rise to pose as an expert on the question of alimony, like those of my colleagues who apparently have made a close personal study of the matter; but when the hon. member for Vancouver South suggested that we in this country had followed the policy of the United States I was reminded of the minister's very mild boast during the course of his budget speech as to the way the United States had followed his price-ceiling policy, and I was wondering if this was another evidence of that reciprocity about which through all the years this government has been so proud to boast.

I should like to point out to the minister that according to the answer to a question tabled yesterday, some 7,920 children have been brought here from Great Britain since the outbreak of war. Of these I believe all but 189 came prior to or during 1941, and therefore the stream of immigrants of tender age from that quarter has apparently pretty well dried up, I presume because of transportation and other difficulties. It does seem to me that in connection with the income tax, even though the minister has refused similar requests in previous years, in view of the acuteness of the financial stringency of some of our people in the very low income brackets who are looking after these British guest children, this year he might well give further consideration to this matter. If the arguments used in former years in support of exemptions in respect of these children had any strength at all, the minister might well take into consideration the tremendous increase that has been brought about in the income tax and do something with respect to these evacuated children who have been brought to Canada. There are less than 8,000 of them, and I think it would be an extremely nice gesture on the part of this government, and would not cause any great drain upon the treasury, if some consideration could be shown the people who, often at great personal sacrifice, are looking after these guest children.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to ask a question in connection with officers in the armed forces, and I do not see any other clause under which I may do so. I remember a discussion which took place about a year ago in regard to the different treatment given the air force and the army in this country, and I believe at that time it was pointed out by the minister that those who were undergoing flying training certainly were exposed to greater danger than those in the army. Since then I have been told that any administrative officer of the air force who has done 100 hours of flying during the year is exempt from payment of income tax. Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Then I think that is most discriminatory. I believe the army 4362 officers of this country are just as much entitled to exemption from payment of income tax as are the administrative officers of the air force, who are not attached to the air crews and who do not undergo the dangers which are faced by those who are actually undergoing training. I was very much surprised to find that these administrative officers, who are in no way connected with the air crews but who fly for pleasure, or perhaps even for business, from one point to another in Canada just in order to put in their 100 hours in the air, were given this treatment. I think it very unfair, and I wanted to point this out now because I was not sure whether there would be another opportunity. The minister says that is a fact, and now I hope he will take this matter under consideration and remove this discrimination in any amendment he may bring in. I think the army officers should be given at least the same treatment that is given the administrative officers of the air force. I repeat, that sort of thing is most unfair and most discriminatory, and I can see no reason at all for any such ruling.

Income War Tax Act

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want to be clear on this. Does the minister mean that the administrative officer flies the machine himself or rides as a passenger?

Mr. ILSLEY: He rides.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Well, I was not going to say anything in connection with this matter; I was going to take any abuse coming from the Canadian Legion in British Columbia for not saying anything, but now I am going to say something. I could take some time, since many speakers have taken twenty minutes or so to pay unnecessary compliments to the Minister of Finance. I realize that he is an excellent man, though he has taken twothirds of my income, and I had none to start with. I also believe that this budget, naturally, was drawn up by the minister's advisers, because of course he cannot do all this work himself. I am, however, most certainly of the opinion that none of those advisers are married men, to start with, and that very few of them are veterans of the last war, certainly not of the front line.

I cannot understand such a ridiculous suggestion as has been put forward. Some of the petticoat army of the Royal Canadian Air Force administrative forces have been riding across Canada, back and forth, to check up on mess rooms and canteens, and it is suggested they ought to get exemption from income tax, when men are running risks daily on the east and on the Pacific coasts. [Mr. J. A. Ross.] We shall hear something about this in the secret session to-morrow. This morning I saw some pictures-I hope they were not faked-of the defences on the Pacific coast where our officers and men are training, and I am to understand now that other men who never saw France or Germany and will never see it, and who in most cases never had any intention of ever seeing the front line when they joined the army, are to get exemptions. It is ridiculous. I take back the silent criticism I made with regard to the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), and I think all returned soldiers in this house should register their protests against the proposal. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) deserves credit for bringing the matter up. I cannot see any justification for the exemption. I do not know what the privileges of cabinet ministers may be when the budget is under discussion, but I warn the government that they had better never put me in the cabinet because if anything comes up concerning returned soldiers they will hear from me, even if I am fired the next day.

I am expected to go back to British Columbia next week or the week after and endeavour to build up an active army by means of what is probably the wrong method, the voluntary system, because the government will not adopt the selective compulsory service method. I am to endeavour to get men to enlist to face terrible casualties, which are surely coming as soon as the second front starts. I am expected to build up a reserve army to defend the coast. What inducement have I to offer men to join the army in that province to-day, when one young man of twenty-seven and another of twenty-eight, both single and both medically fit, are acting on the personnel of the selection committee of the civil service in connection with the wartime prices and trade board in British Columbia? I have another inducement to offer young men in my riding-I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not here to hear this-when they realize the situation of one particular farmer whom I might mention. He has two boys, one of whom is missing over Germany, the other still serving over there, their mother being sixty years of age and the father over that age. This is the first time in their lives these elderly people have had to get out and milk cows. That is the inducement I have to offer men to join up. Yet I am to endeavour in that district to secure volunteers for the army. This parliament is supreme, and I warn the members of this house that, in my opinion at any rate, there is no justification for them to go back to their ridings, and certainly no returned soldier member has any justification for going back to his riding, to try to convince the people there that as a private member, or in any other capacity in this House of Commons, he has done his duty by the men who are making the supreme sacrifice, or who will shortly be called upon to make that sacrifice on our behalf, so long as such members stand back and permit such a ridiculous, nonsensical, idiotic class of legislation to be placed on our statute books. I do not know what more I can say against it, but certainly it will not carry except on division so long as I am a member of this house.

Mr. ILSLEY: To a great deal of what my hon. friend has said I listened with agreement, which is more than usual. I did not learn until recently, a few weeks ago, of the practice which apparently has arisen—I do not know how extensive it is—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Fairly extensive.

Mr. ILSLEY: -- on the part of administrative officers of the air force of "flying in" their income tax. When I did learn of it I thought it was scandalous, and I still think so. The basis of it is this, and it will give hon. members an idea of the difficulties and the dangers of trying to meet what appears to be a meritorious claim without thinking of where it will lead the government. The members of this committee will recollect that about two years ago, I believe, members on the other side of the house, and perhaps on this side too, although I do not remember, made very strong appeals on behalf of our forces overseas, and non-commissioned officers and privates in Canada, and said that they should be exempted from income tax and national defence tax. That met with the usual acceptance from members of the house who did not feel that such persons ought to pay. Accordingly the government drafted a pro-vision for insertion in the Income War Tax Act among the exceptions. This provision in section 9 of chapter 34 of the Income War Tax Act reads:

The following incomes shall not be liable to taxation hereunder:

(t) The service pay and allowances of

(i) warrant officers, non-commissioned officers and men in the Canadian naval, military and air forces while in the Canadian active service forces, and

(ii) commissioned officers of the said forces while on active service beyond Canada, or on active service in Canada, whose duties are of such a character as are required normally to be performed afloat or in aircraft.

The reason for exempting "commissioned officers of the said forces while on active service beyond Canada" was that it struck Income War Tax Act members of the house and, I believe, a great many of the public, that it would be undesirable and not in accordance with public opinion in Canada-I was going to say public opinion of the generous Canadian people-to tax men who were fighting in France, as we thought these men would be doing at that time. It was felt that public opinion would not be in favour of their being pressed for income tax returns, having a national defence tax deducted from their salaries, and so forth. Therefore that exception was agreed upon as a proper one, although I may say parenthetically that there is no such exception in the United Kingdom or United States law. At any rate, we put it in the Canadian law. As soon as that was agreed upon, a little reflection convinced us that if men in France were to be excepted, or men in Great Britain, equally the men doing duty in the navy on the Atlantic ocean, with all its perils and dangers and fatalities, must be given the same privilege. Then it was said that if we did this for men on the ocean we should do it for the patrols out over the ocean, the airmen who go out in all kinds of weather; and if we did that we could not draw a distinction between them and the men who are flying in Canada, some of whom crash, and undergo considerable Consequently this provision was risks. drawn up:

Commissioned officers of the said forces while on active service beyond Carada or on active service in Canada whose duties are of such a character as are required normally to be performed afloat or in aircraft.

That section was carefully drawn, and there seemed to be good reason for every word of it. That is the law. What did it mean? What is meant by "duties of such character as are required normally to be performed afloat or in aircraft"? There had to be some classification, and that was an extraordinarily difficult thing to do. Conferences were held between officials of the Department of National Defence for Air and the Department of National Revenue, and finally it was agreed to take the average number of hours flown by those flying in one year, I think it was 1940. That worked out in the neighbourhood of 200 hours, and in order to err on the side of generosity, as we have been urged to do to-day by the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) and others, and leave no chance for criticism on the ground of niggardliness, the 200 hours were divided in two and 100 hours was fixed as the standard. If an officer had flown 100 hours or more he would be deemed to be an officer whose duties were of such a nature as are required normally to be performed in aircraft.

This apparently gave some of the administrative officers in the air force bad ideas, and I understand that they are flying around rather freely. I do not want to say anything that I should not, but the fact is that they are "flying in" their income tax. I do not mind saying that to me that is scandalous. We do not ordinarily associate that kind of activity with our fliers, and they certainly should not be able to qualify in that way. I do not think the section requires any amendment, but I certainly think an administrative change will have to be made in order to avoid this abuse. I think that administrative change can be made. I just wanted to say this, because it is not often that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) says something with which I agree.

Mr. EDWARDS: The minister's observations have answered largely the matter to which I was going to refer. Be it said to the credit of one officer whom I know and whose duties were such that he had to fly, that he was unwilling to be a party to this practice or be suspected of flying out of his income tax, so he refused to turn in his flying hours for the last several days. In contrast, I do not think I can do other than raise my voice in protest against those in the air force who are known-this comes from the air force itself rather than from the public-to be carrying out the practice referred to by the minister. I think we can rely upon the minister and the officers of his department to see that this is taken care of by suitable regulations.

I am wondering if all hon. members who have spoken in regard to the situation with respect to payment of income tax by officers have not had such representations as they have received from officers of the rank of major and below. These representations have been prompted by the fact that their sergeants and warrant officers, classes 1 and 2, were in effect receiving a greater compensation on account of the innovation of this income tax. May I say that I have yet to meet a Canadian officer in our army, navy or air force who has protested to me, or to any of my friends with whom I have had conversation, about his obligations to pay income tax. I have heard from numerous officers of their willingness and readiness to contribute financially toward the payment of this war. I think it is wonderful that such a tribute can be paid to the officers of our three active services.

Such complaint as now exists arises as a result of the discrepancy between the three upper ranks of the non-commissioned officers and the lower brackets of the commissioned officers. This applies in the army and air [Mr. Ilsley.] force, but I am not sure whether the same observations can be made with regard to the navy. I have been told that sergeants and warrant officers are refusing promotion in the army and air force because such promotion would mean they would loss $200 or $300 a year. I do not think there would be any vocal resentment by these warrant officers and sergeants if they were brought into the income tax field. I think that is the fair and reasonable way to deal with this matter.

At the outbreak of the war many men came forward and volunteered their services. They took this action in the light of their known incomes and their prospects for promotion in rank. These men cannot make financial adjustments such as the civilian at home can make. I think it is absolutely unfair to increase their income taxes from year to year. Two years ago these men gave up their professions and businesses; they sat down with their wives and families to figure out what they could do, whether or not they could get along, and now the government comes along and raises the ante on them by way of income tax.

Mr. GRAYDON: Replying to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), the minister gave a schedule of exceptions with regard to forces afloat. Will those include merchant seamen, or do they apply only to the naval forces?

Mr. ILSLEY: Just to naval forces.

Mr. GRAYDON: Without reflecting on the perils of the service which anyone on active service is risking, and it may be much more dangerous before long, our airmen who are flying over Germany and our men who are serving in the merchant navy are almost in a class by themselves so far as actual danger is concerned, and if the minister has in mind at any time making further exceptions I trust that he will not forget the men in the merchant navy who have to undergo the greatest perils of almost any branch of the service, military, naval, air or civilian. We have all seen the appeals that have been made throughout this country on behalf of the men in the merchant navy, and I am sure that the minister and everyone else is convinced that they are carrying on a service for us for which they can never receive an adequate reward. But if any further exceptions are in contemplation I would plead with the minister not to forget the men in the merchant marine.

Mr. GREEN: That is a very important point. The bill that has already passed this house for the reinstatement by employers of their men who have served in the armed forces applied also to men in the merchant navy, and they are also covered for pensions, not by the Pension Act but by order in council.

We have this situation on the Pacific coast. All of the Canadian Pacific Empress boats have been taken over for troopships as well as some of the boats running between Victoria and Vancouver. Just to-day I received a letter from a lady who said:

I personally know of two cases, one a survivor of the Empress of Asia and the other an injured member of the crew of one of the other Empresses, who soon after their return to Vancouver after serving fourteen months in the war zone received a request for payment of income tax for the year 1941.

She goes on to say:

This is an injustice. These men are as much in the firing line as the navy.

I think that situation should be met by some change in the act. The merchant navy is really the fourth arm.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not be frank if I said that I would give the matter favourable consideration, because to do so would be entering upon a road the end of which we would never reach. The men in the merchant navy are running terrific risks and giving marvellous service, but I cannot admit that as a reason for income tax exemption. They are not being paid by the crown. We know nothing about their rates of pay, bonuses and things of that kind. They are paid by private employers. The reason given repeatedly in arguments that have been made for exemptions for certain members of the forces has been that we were paying them money to fight for us and that we should not take part of it back. That does not apply at all to members of the merchant navy. If we start assessing degrees of danger and risks assumed by Canadians who are not in the employ of the government at all-

Mr. GREEN: What about the men who will serve on the new merchant ships we are building? Are they not going to be employed by government companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be a government company, but it is still a company. I am simply saying that members should not try to push the government step by step, because that is what it amounts to, right along the line of extending income tax exemptions because they are impressed with the risks or dangers that people are running. I have already told the story to-night of what happened in connection with the exemptions that we did insert in the act contrary to the practice of Great Britain and the United States, and now we are being pushed still further. We have heard 44561-276 speech after speech to-day urging us to extend exemptions to a great number of officers here in Canada, and now we are being asked to go outside our own armed forces and consider those in private employment or in the employment of corporations on account of the risks they run. Next we shall be asked to extend exemptions to someone else who runs just as much risk, and next perhaps exemption may be sought for people who live on the coast instead of in the interior. That is a road to which there is no end. I may be thought to be lacking in sympathy. I am not at all. I am tremendously impressed, as we all must be, with the splendid service the men of the merchant navy are giving, but let us recognize it in some other way than by shooting our revenue system all full of holes, just causing it to disintegrate.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister talks about being pushed along step by step. Perhaps my eyes are deceiving me, but if this is the minister I think it is, he has not been pushed very far on matters like this in all the time I have been here in the house, and I give him considerable credit for that. He is one minister who does not get pushed around very much. To-night, however, I think he is feeling a little sorry for himself when he makes the statement he has just made. While I have every sympathy for his position, surely we as members representing the people have a right to bring to the minister's attention the plight of people such as those in the merchant navy, and no matter what the minister may say I do not apologize for raising my voice in this house on their behalf. I am sure the minister would not ask me to do so, and yet that was implied in the remarks he has just made. The minister may not have been impressed by the arguments that have been advanced, and evidently he does not consider them convincing. But at the same time I do not think he should by implication suggest that they are matters which should not be brought to his attention; for the House of Commons is the one place where members can bring before the government grievances, complaints, suggestions and constructive criticism. Perhaps the words the minister used did not express just what was in his mind. I would hope that he would welcome suggestions such as are being made here to-night, and made in good faith, not with the idea at all of making the government retreat in some direction not in the public interest. If the minister is going to retreat on this question, it will be the first retreat I have ever seen him make since I entered the house in 1936.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have listened to the discussion all afternoon and thus far this evening, and I have found that there have been objections to almost every impost proposed in this budget. I have found no one who has given the budget his full approval. I take that as evidence that the whole tax structure is too severe. Of course the minister will say that he must have the money, thereby indicating that there are two points of view which are clashing and that we have not found the right way of doing the thing. I just wish to say that the minister has not allowed for the needs of a people at war. This afternoon he cited the income tax of Great Britain and the income tax of the United States, and indicated that the Canadian income tax structure is no more severe than theirs. Even so, we can understand why the British income tax should be severe, why purchasing power there would have to be limited rigidly, because there is a shortage there of all kinds of goods, a shortage of resources. But that is not true of Canada. We have plenty of man-power and plenty of woman-power to produce all the goods and services that the people of Canada can use, as well as provide all we need for our allies and for the conduct of the war. To say that simply because Great Britain's income tax has to be severe, therefore Canada's has to be, is to draw a false conclusion.

Just to show that there is altogether another side to this question of the needs of the people, I propose to read into Hansard a little statement which is found in a publication, Labour, coming over from the United States. In the issue of July 14, 1942, I read the following:

The American Federation of Labor has estimated that a family of five must have an income of $44 a week, at present prices, to live in "health and decency," and of at least $30 for "bare subsistence."

Figures like that make all the minister's remarks in extenuation of his income taxes look like so much piffle. The minister said in his budget speech that he had in mind a standard of health and decency. During my reply to the budget speech I asked a question which was designed to see if the minister had formed any conception as to what constitutes a decent standard of living, but the minister had no conception, or at least he was not prepared to take the house into his confidence with respect to what his conception was. The advisers to the minister seemed to have no notion whatsoever as to what constitutes decency in regard to a standard of living in Canada.

This tax structure is so severe that the suffering and deprivation which it is going to [Mr. Graydon.] necessitate for a large percentage of the Canadian people is so great as to be a disgrace to the minister, and to render an effective war effort impossible—and "impossible" is the word. I think that all hon. members need to do is to multiply $44 a week by fifty-two and compare that with what the average family will have left when the minister has finished with them this year, or to multiply $30 by fifty-two, to see how disgraceful this tax structure is.

It will be said that we must have the money. I am not going to enter into a discussion of this subject on this occasion. The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) deserved well of his country the other night. It was a noble and courageous thing for that man, in the position he occupies in his country and his party, to rise in his place and make the declaration he made, and he would not have made it if he had not believed it to be true. I say that when that hon. member, with all his intelligence and experience, has become convinced that what he advocated on that occasion is true, that may well constitute a warning and a challenge to every hon. member in this house.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did you not hear the reply of the finance minister?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes; the reply of the finance minister was childish.

Mr. MacNICOL: It was a masterly address.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The finance minister's reply was childish. I am not going to take the time to go into it, but there simply was no complete argument or answer to the hon. member for Parry Sound; and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) completely devastated every argument the minister advanced.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a wonder that they do not join you.

Mr. BLACKMORE: True. It is easy to make smart-Aleck, foolish wise-cracks. To make a sound and factual argument is another and a different matter.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the hon. gentleman say that the two hon. members did make sound factual arguments?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Most certainly! The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was unanswerable. I say that the hon. member for Parry Sound did his country a great service on that occasion. He pointed a way which would provide Canada with a means of escape from the dreadful situation of economic slavery into which we are being driven.

Up to the present time there has been some pretence on the part of ministers of the crown that they believe in the principle of equality of service, equality of sacrifice. On every occasion here this afternoon and all day yesterday it was shown over and over again that such a thing as equality of service, equality of sacrifice, has simply completely departed from the minister's mind. It is no longer a guiding principle.

I want to repeat this one remark. Something must be done to find a way in which the war effort of this country can be carried on without such a ruinous system of taxation, and I testify, Mr. Chairman, that the system can be found, and that if hon. members do not find it, instead of indulging their time in smart-Aleck wisecracks, they will stand condemned before all generations that follow us in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: I merely have a question to ask; I shall be very brief. Recently in front of this house we saw a battalion of fire-fighters parade before going overseas. I believe that that unit is now overseas and that one or two battalions are to follow. In what position will they be in comparison with officers of the regular army? They are going into very hazardous work in London and in other cities, fighting fires; they are called overseas fire-fighters. Will they benefit by any of the exemptions which are accorded officers of the regular forces?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are not covered by the section, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are not enlisted men.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought they were enlisted men.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. GREEN: They are not in the army.

Mr. MacNICOL: They were enlisted here under direction of the military authorities. Is not Huff, the chief commander, an officer in the Department of National Defence?

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand they are not members of the forces. They are not members of either the army, the navy or the air force.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Therefore the statute does not apply.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. HANSELL: I have not spoken on this budget. I think it is the first budget presented luring my short experience in the house on 44561-2763 which I have not spoken. Perhaps that is because the taxation is so drastic that—well, I just choked when I began to figure out the taxes. I usually write to my wife several times a week, and when the budget was brought down and I began to figure out this income tax I did not know what to write. Accordingly I scratched only a little note, and it went this way:

Dear Sweetheart:

This is only a short note as I am too full for words.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame!

Mr. HANSELL:

I want you to know that you are the best wife a man ever had. Right up until now I have always considered you my greatest asset. But I have been figuring out the meaning of the new budget and I find my good friend Mr. Ilsley, through some sort of money magic has changed you from an asset into a liability.

I am sorry sweetheart; you are just as beautiful as ever, just as lovable, and I haven't changed towards you. Nothing has changed except the figures, but figures don't lie—not these figures.

With all my very best, Your loving husband.

I have not had an answer.

It does seem to me that there is a great deal of merit in the proposal that we should use our own credit facilities to create our own money. Of course the country and this house are well aware of the position this group takes. I do not claim to be an expert, but I have common sense enough to know that a hen scratches and a duck swims. There is one thing about which I have been very much concerned and puzzled. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance one question. He may not want to answer it. The question is, Is it possible for a millionaire to get any more sugar in Canada than a poor man? We might say no, that sugar is rationed, so he cannot get any more. Assuming the minister says no-that has to be his answer or else the rationing system is all haywire-my next question is, Why could you not ration practically everything in time of war? Then people could buy only so much, and what great difference would it make then whether we were taxed at all? What difference would it make then if we all had a fair amount of money and we create the money that we need with our own credit facilities without going into such tremendous debt which some day we shall have to pay, for there is going to be a day of reckoning some day.

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver Centre), agreed to.

Resolution 1, part I, as amended agreed to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does that mean that we are carrying?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City): All of resolution No. 1, I take it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I thought it was the whole section down to the middle of page 3, including the graduated rates of tax. That is resolution 1.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, no.

Mr. BOUCHER: Looking at the wording of the resolution it does create some confusion. There is I in Roman numerals for "normal tax" on the first page. Then you come to the figures 1, 2 and 3 in brackets which are definitely part of that. Later you come to II in Roman numerals, and again you come to the figure 2 in plain figures. The numbering is confusing.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Macdonald—Brantford City): Resolution 1 extends down as far as "$69,925 upon income of $100,000; and 85 per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds $100,000." That is resolution 1. Shall resolution 1 as amended carry? Carried.

Resolution 1, part II, agreed to.

Resolution 1 as amended agreed to.

2. That the exemptions of $1,500 and $750 shall be reduced for the purposes of the graduated rates to $660 for all persons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This, I think, raises the whole question of the principle upon which tax exemption should be based. The old principle has been abandoned, and by resolutions 3, 4 and 5 a new principle of deduction from tax has been adopted. I adverted to this in my speech on the budget on June 30 last, as reported at page 3792 of Hansard, the second column. I do not want to put that again on the record, but there is a very substantial difference in the basis of this deduction. With reference to resolution 4-

That in lieu of the deduction of $400 from income for each dependent child or grandchild there shall be allowed a deduction of $80 from the tax payable under the graduated rates.

---and that in the case of a married person under resolution 3, or a person heretofore entitled to exemption equivalent to that of a married person, there shall be allowed as a deduction an amount of $150, I hold the opinion that the old provision was preferable. Perhaps that is because we are accustomed to it. That may be the psychology of the thing. But on mulling the matter over, I would ask, is this as advantageous to the taxpayer under the new increased rates as the old deductions from the amount of taxable income were on the then existing rates, or how does the matter stand?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is just about impossible to give an answer except to get out the schedule and see what the taxpayer is taxed this year and last. I put a schedule on Hansard with the budget speech for that purpose, and comparisons have been made since and published in the newspapers. There has been a decrease in pure tax in some of the lower brackets, but for the most part of course the tax is increased to a considerable extent. As I explained this afternoon-I think the leader of the opposition was present-the flat $150 is better than $750 deduction from income on account of a wife in the lower income groups but not as good in the higher, the same as with the children. One hundred and fifty dollars is 20 per cent of $750, the tax advantage of having a wife, if I may put it in that way. Accordingly, if a person were paying 20 per cent, his advantage was $150 last year. If he were paying 15 per cent, the lowest rate, it was not that much and by being married he is getting a bigger tax advantage to that extent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are going to adhere to this?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, I think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then let it go.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently the basis last year was that the married man was allowed an exemption $750 higher than that of the single man. That was the basis last year, was it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: This year, for some reason or another, the minister has converted that to a basis of allowing a fixed amount to be deducted from the tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: Then I suggest that the exemption should be figured on, at least, the lowest tax rate paid this year, which is 30 per cent; that you should allow 30 per cent on the $750, which would be $225 which might be deducted from the tax, rather than $150. I do not see what last year's tax has to do with the matter at all. It seems to me that it should not be brought into the picture, but that the exemption should be based on the rates of this year.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would, I believe, cost twenty-four or twenty-five million dollars to do that. If there were 400,000 married men in Canada and you allowed an exemption of $215 per wife instead of $150, that would be an additional $65, which, multiplied by 400,000 would come to something like $26,000,000. But I will not put my argument on the basis of cost, for in connection with a few of these items we might have less revenue instead of more if we accepted some of the suggestions that have been made. This is the most expen-sive change suggested yet, but the answer I should like to give is this, that if we were keeping the 30 per cent that might be all right, but we are not. We are giving back half of it, in the lower brackets, and then the returnable portion tapers down to less than half as you get into the higher brackets. Therefore I think it would be entirely unfair-

Mr. GREEN: Why was the basis changed?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what I should like to know; what was the reason for changing the basis? Was it to get more money? Is that about the size of it?

Mr. ILSLEY: The process of preparing a taxation scheme is a long one. Formula after formula is devised to get perfect progression and to achieve justice as between single and married persons, as well as to get the revenue desired. All those factors go into the making of a new income tax schedule. Here the difficulties were very great once we decided to retain the national defence tax principle and to combine the national defence tax with a graduated tax; it was extremely difficult to combine all those factors. The results seem to be such that every objection can be pretty well answered, except the one objection that the tax is very heavy. You cannot answer that; it is heavy. I do not try to answer that; I admit it. But I think I have a pretty reasonable answer to every criticism on the grounds of discrimination, or unfairness as between groups, or anything like that, and this formula gives those answers. It incorporates the principle that the tax advantage will be equalized for poor and rich. The poor get a little greater tax advantage by reason of having a wife or by reason of having children than they did last year, while the rich get considerably less tax advantage than they did formerly. It is arguable as to whether or not that change is correct. It has some very interesting implications if it is thought through, but it was thought through, I think from every point of view. It was decided to adopt the principle; we have adopted it, and I do not see that any reasonable objection can be taken to it. If we are to convert the formula into terms of tax advantage, there is quite a lot to be said against giving the very wealthy man a tax advantage of $300, perhaps, for having a child, and giving a poor man a tax advantage of only $60. Now each receives a tax advantage of $80. At any rate, there it is.

Mr. GREEN: The same thing is true of the exemptions in respect of children?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The motivating factor was the necessity of getting more money, and this is the means that was taken?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is one of the most important factors of all, is it not? That is the main factor in these tax increases?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, it runs into a great deal of money. It is the biggest single item, I should think.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is very important, certainly.

Mr. MacINNIS: Considerable criticism has been offered with regard to the minister's methods of raising money. I have heard it said several times that he levied this or that tax because he had to get the money. I think we must admit that he has to get the money; that the taxes must be heavy because the revenue must be obtained, and under those circumstances the only consideration we can press for is that the tax shall be equitable. We have said many times, and now I think for the first time it has been admitted in this house, that not what a man pays but what he has left is the criterion of his sacrifice so far as taxation is concerned. For years I have maintained that the figures of $1,500 and $750 were too low, to start with. I doubt very much if those who worked out the formulas on which these tax schedules are based would like to carry on with an income of only $750, which now has been reduced to $660. We must remember that in spite of price ceilings and all that sort of thing the cost of living is going up. Not only that; a person who to-day has an income of $660, or any similar income in wages, has innumerable deductions made from that income which were not made a few years ago. I was shown a slip that came in a pay envelope some little time ago, and it showed eight or nine different deductions. There was a deduction for unemployment insurance, another for the purchase of war savings certificates, another for a contribution to the Red Cross, and deductions for this, that and the other thing. The result is that the worker does not get $660 at all, but much less.

In other years the amount raised by taxing these low incomes has been very small indeed. Early in the session I asked a question with regard to these matters, and the reply to that question may be seen in Hansard for March 23, 1942, at page 1512. My first question was:

1. How many persons in the calendar year 1940 paid income tax on, (a) incomes of more than $750 but less than $1,000; (b) incomes of more than $1,000 but less than $1,500?

And so on. It appears that it was impossible to give me an answer as to these low incomes, but my question was answered as the number of persons paying on incomes up to $2,000, and the total number of persons for the calendar year 1940 who paid income on that amount was 127,954. These 127,000 persons were assessed in income tax slightly over a million and a half dollars. This shows the large number of people in this country who are receiving incomes of less than $2,000. When we were talking about the excess profits tax the minister said that he found it politically necessary-I do not mean in the party sense-to allow the exemptions on excess profits tax as an incentive to more economical production. These are people who have a great deal more than what they get out of these profits. They get in some cases quite high salaries, and they want a further incentive. What incentive is left to the wage slave working for an income of less than $1,000, less than $700 in many instances, and less than $500 in many other instances? Of course, the latter are not taxed directly in income tax on $500, but as soon as the individual reaches $660 he is taxed. This exception of $660 is too low. The exempted amount should be the same as it was last year and the year before, namely $1,500 for married persons and $750 for single persons.

Mr. QUELCH: When the wife is living with her husband and has an income of less than $660 it is exempt from taxation. But are there any conditions under which that income would be added to her husband's? If not, what is there to prevent the husband from transferring certain property to his wife in order to evade the income tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: The transfer is not recognized for income tax purposes. There are carefully drawn sections in the Income War Tax Act in that regard.

Mr. QUELCH: As of what date?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has been there many years. [Mr. MacInnis.] Mr. QUELCH: If the property had been transferred to the wife before this taxation became heavy, would that transfer be allowed?

Mr. ILSLEY: There have been amendments since the beginning of the Income War Tax Act, and any transfer made after the passing of the relevant section is not recognized.

Mr. QUELCH: Under any other conditions the wife's income is not added to that of the husband? If she derives it from property which is left her by will or which she acquired by purchase in her own name, then that income is not under any conditions added to her husband's? In Alberta the income of the wife is added to the husband's, and I know of many men, including myself, who have been paying on their wives' incomes in the belief that the law was the same as it is in Alberta.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it a joint income in Alberta?

Mr. QUELCH: Where the wife has property in her own name and gets an income of less than $660, that would be added to the husband's income, but federally it is not?

Mr. ILSLEY: We do not do it here because we would have to get returns from every married woman, no matter how small her income might be. The married woman with a $10 income would have to make a return.

Mr. QUELCH: In Alberta the husband merely includes it in his income.

Mr. ILSLEY: He includes it in the return of his income?

Mr. QUELCH: Yes. Federally, he does not have to?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has been the law that gifts to a wife from her husband, from which an income is derived, must be included.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That is regarded as his income.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No matter when the gifts were made?

Mr. ILSLEY: After the passage of the act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I always thought that was very unfair.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If the wife's income is less than $660 she is not required federally to turn in an income tax return.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That a married person, or a person heretofore entitled to an exemption equivalent to that of a married person, shall be allowed as a deduction from the tax payable under the graduated rates, an amount of $150.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City): There is an amendment which has been already moved. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver Centre) agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

Resolution 4 agreed to.

5. That a deduction from the tax payable under the graduated rates be allowed a taxpayer to the extent of 20 per centum of the amount actually contributed for the support of a dependent parent or grandparent, or a brother or sister under eighteen years of age or eighteen years of age or over and dependent on account of mental or physical infirmity, or under twenty-one years of age, upon proof that such brother or sister is a student at a secondary school, university or other educational institution; provided that the maximum credit herein shall not exceed $80.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The same principle is in the law now, but the amount is changed.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is based on the $80 deduction from the tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Resolution agreed to.

6. That one-half of the total taxes payable by a taxpayer under the normal rate of tax and the graduated rates of tax shall be refundable to a taxpayer provided, however, that such refund shall not exceed Eight per centum of the income of a single person, or $800, whichever is the lesser; or Ten per centum of the income of a married person, or $1,000, whichever is the lesser; plus One per centum of the taxpayer's income for each dependent, or $100, whichever is the lesser.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In the case of a married person, suppose the wife had an income and the husband had an income; would so much be allowed out of each income, or would it be a straight $1,000 for the two of them? The deduction would be made on each income?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is right.

Mr. SHAW: First I should like to say that I believe the minister is imbued with considerable courage when he introduces a policy of enforced savings alongside of an anticipated system of voluntary savings. I have no doubt the minister has had a number of headaches in connection with matters financially, but I anticipate further headaches for him when he undertakes to operate these two systems in competition one with the other.

On a previous occasion in this house I stated that there was an aspect of the savings policy with which I took issue. I know as a fact that during the past couple of years employers have made contribution to the voluntary savings almost a condition of employment regardless of the circumstances of the individual. Some of the committees which have functioned in connection with this system of voluntary savings have in many instances made the extent of one's contribution a barometer by which his patriotism should be judged. In my estimation such practices are not commendable in any sense. Unless definite instructions are given to these "icers, I visualize this condition becoming m 'h more critical under the combined systems of enforced and voluntary savings. Those in the lower income brackets who will be called upon to make compulsory contributions towards a post-war credit, if we may call it that, will find that as much if not more pressure will be put upon them by these committees. Unless these committees refrain from carrying on the practices now in effect, some very unsatisfactory conditions will occur.

I am afraid we do not properly differentiate between taxation and compulsory savings. I have always contended that the one is immediate taxation and the other is deferred taxation, much more vicious than heavy immediate taxation. This compulsory saving is looked upon as a post-war credit. In other words, it is considered as a nest-egg which may be drawn upon during some period following the cessation of hostilities. In Great Britain they have had these two policies in effect, that is, compulsory savings and an excess profits tax, a portion of which is refundable. The industries in Great Britain undertook to label these refundable taxes, to use the minister's phrase, as assets, but the organized accountants of Great Britain refused to accept them as such in the ledgers of the companies. I should like the minister to explain the principle whereby the organized accountants in Great Britain have refused permission to the companies there to consider these returnable taxes as assets.

Mr. ILSLEY: The returnable taxes which were not recognized as assets were that part of the excess profits tax to be refunded after the war. It was not the tax upon the individual at all.

Mr. SHAW: The same principle would apply to the individual.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not at all, because there were certain conditions attached to the 20 per cent of the excess profits tax. The first year the 20 per cent tax was imposed it was provided that 20 per cent would be returned under certain conditions. I do not know whether those conditions were the same as the conditions suggested by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) for the return of 20 per cent of our tax, but they were probably something similar. Those conditions destroyed the returnable portion of the tax as an asset. The accountants contended that if the 20 per cent was to be returnable only under certain conditions, if it was to provide employment or to be used to create capital goods, a building or something of that kind. then a company would not know whether they could qualify for the return and therefore it could not be called an asset. The government found that this fact was having a deleterious effect upon production and they backed away from that position. Under this year's budget they are returning it without any strings attached. When I had to make my budget this year I gave careful consideration to whether strings should be attached to this 20 per cent, and I decided finally to take the responsibility of attaching no strings. I knew it would be said in the house that this would be used to pay dividends and bonuses, but I decided that I would have to take that position and would have to meet these arguments as best I could. It was either the companies' money or it was not, and I decided that this 20 per cent would be considered as the companies' money. Perhaps that answers the question of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SHAW: I am sorry to say that it does not. I understand there are no strings attached to the returnable portion in Great Britain this year. If there are no strings attached, why cannot that portion be regarded as an asset?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is.

Mr. SHAW: No, it is not. I believe the organization of chartered accountants in Great Britain dictates the policy in this country, and in May of this year this organization refused to allow the returnable portion to be entered as assets on the books of the companies, even though there were no strings attached to that returnable portion.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was since the budget? Mr. SHAW: Yes. [Mr. Ilsley.] Mr. BENCE: Was that not because it was not assignable?

Mr. SHAW: I am trying to get an answer, and the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence) has questioned me. As I say, immediate taxation and compulsory savings are merely different forms of taxation; compulsory saving is a deferred type of taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would not be the reason at all. Has the hon. gentleman the report, because I think the reasons must have been given?

Mr. SHAW: I have a section of the report which I shall read.

Mr. ILSLEY: There must have been some conditions imposed even this year. That would be the answer.

Mr. SHAW: Let us make it abundantly clear that there were no conditions attached. I quote from The Accountant, which is recognized as the weekly organ of chartered accountants and accountancy throughout the world, this extract which is reproduced in the Western Producer:

. . . we sometimes wish that the chancellor of the exchequer when making budget announcements would help us all be a little clearer in the mind about the effect of contributions which are enforced through taxation. The famous "post-war credit," which is still as vague as ever, is a case in point. This is constantly represented to taxpayers as a benefit which will come back to them in the future. We think that the accountancy profession has rightly treated this benefit by ignoring it when evaluating the assets of commercial concerns....

Mr. ILSLEY: Whose words are these?

Mr. SHAW: I am quoting from The Accountant, the subtitle of which is "The Recognized Weekly Organ of Chartered Accountants and Accountancy Throughout the World." I proceed:

It seems incredible that the intention can be to pay it out in money but even if it were so disbursed at a future time, that could only be done by increasing taxation in parallel, thus redistributing as a burden on a possibly different body of taxpayers the payments made by their predecessors.

I am quoting that, Mr. Chairman, for this reason, that we in this country are wont to look upon immediate direct taxation as being something entirely different from taxation which in fact becomes compulsory savings or deferred taxation.

I go a step further and say that we might just as well look upon all taxation, including that which is not returnable and that which is, as being taxation. I do not think we should differentiate between the two. The only thing is that we pay the one to-day and the other to-morrow, with interest. Therefore when we talk about looking forward to the post-war years and the savings we shall have accumulated by virtue of this legislation we must bear in mind that our taxation following the war must be paralleled with our debt. In effect we are going to pay ourselves back when the war is over.

I think the same principle that applies to corporations or to any business applies also to the personal income tax on individuals. Therefore let us regard this thing in its true light and regard it as being one further condemnation of the financial system. The Western Producer, in commenting upon the extract I have read from The Accountant and I think it is only fair to say that the Western Producer views matters with a good deal 'of thought and consideration before printing anything—has this to say in an editorial of July 9:

The devices to which orthodox finance is being driven-

Mark these words:

-to save itself in these critical times serve only to expose its true nature to every intelligent observer. It is every day becoming clearer that the effort to maintain and fortify the financial system is proving an incalculable hardicap in the whole war effort and not less harmful in undermining the confidence of the people in the sincerity and singleness of purpose of those responsible for the conduct of the war. Mr. Ilsley's innovation which some master of irony has called "compulsory saving" is only one step in many which lead to the inescapable conclusion—if the war is to be won our whole financial system must be recast. I think those is a good deal of meet in that

I think there is a good deal of meat in that paragraph, and I trust that in the remarks which I have made the Minister of Finance will find it possible to agree with me. The facts are rather difficult if one should undertake to refute them.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister proposes to increase the revenues through the principle of compulsory savings. I do not agree with that, and for this reason. The people in the lower income brackets, from whom the minister has told us on several occasions he expects to get a tremendous volume of revenue, are going to be forced to lend their savings to the government at 2 per cent. This compulsory savings feature means that all the people within the low income brackets will be able to buy no more victory loan bonds or war savings certificates, because they are being compelled to turn over to the government a certain portion of their earnings by way of com-pulsory savings. When the minister comes out with another victory loan, as I presume he will some time this year, he will have only one class of people from whom he can raise the money, namely, those with a sufficiently large income that they have money to spare to invest in victory bonds, and they will be able to invest their money in victory bonds at 3 or $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Three per cent.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But the man with a small income who is forced to loan his savings to the government will get only 2 per cent on his loan.

Mr. ILSLEY: Because it is for a shorter term.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Why force the man with a small income to take 2 per cent, while the man with the high income can buy victory bonds and get 3 per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because we think 2 per cent is a fair rate for a short term.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But you are forcing something on him that he does not wish to do. You are compelling him to take 2 per cent whether he likes it or not, and you are giving the other fellow the opportunity of getting 3 per cent. The walthy man gets 3 per cent when he buys victory bonds, but the man with the small income is forced to turn his savings over to the government and take only 2 per cent. Why does the minister not take the opposite stand and say: "On the compulsory savings we will give you 3 per cent, and on the voluntary loans, we will give you 2 per cent." There would be more sense in that.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, there would not be.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You do not give the little fellow any option. He is compelled to turn in his savings and take 2 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only reason why we do not take it from the big income man at 2 per cent is because we take it and keep it from him.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You do not do that on the victory loan. You give him 3 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: To the small income man we pay back after the war as much as half of what we take from him, but to the big man we pay back only a very small percentage of what we take from him, and the limit we return to him is $1,000. My hon. friend, if he argues it out, cannot make this out to be a favour to the rich. I assure him of that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I think it definitely is a favour to the rich.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know he will try to.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Resolution 6 provides that the returnable portion shall not exceed 10 per cent, or $1,000, whichever is the lesser. But in the one case the man with the low income is forced to invest his savings at 2 per cent, while the other fellow can put his surplus savings into victory bonds and get 3 per cent. Furthermore, by this taxation, you are putting the little fellow into a position where he has no money to invest in victory bonds and he is forced to take 2 per cent on his compulsory savings.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are you in favour of interest-free loans?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No, I am not, in that instance, because I say that in one case you are barring the little fellow from investing at 3 per cent any money he might have left over, and I do not think that is a fair deal.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want any more of this than is necessary, to get abroad. I expect a certain amount of it; it is part of my lot in life. But just consider what we are doing here in the budget. Forget about the victory bonds for a moment; I will come to that in the second stage. In this budget we are agreeing to return as much as one-half, in the lower incomes, to the little man. As for the big man, from whom we are taking a large percentage of his income, we are keeping nearly all; we are not paying him 2 per cent; we are not paying him any per cent. We are returning very little to him in proportion to what we take.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, the excess profits?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that is the returnable proportion. The proportion of the total taken from the small man which we return is 50 per cent, and the proportion of the total taken which we return to the rich man is about 10 per cent, or rather it runs away down, far below that. There is a limit of $1,000. If we were favouring the rich or treating the rich as well as we treat the poor, proportionately, we would be agreeing to return half of what we take from the rich man and pay him 2 per cent; but instead of that we are keeping all but a small proportion.

My hon. friend says, "Oh, yes, but the rich man is going to be able to save more money and buy victory bonds; the poor man is not." To begin with, I do not agree with that. But let us assume that it is so.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Where will you sell your victory loan, then, if you put another one out?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: We will sell war savings certificates and small victory bonds to the small wage-earners. My hon, friends may say that we won't, but we will.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But a lot less than you did before, because your field is so much narrower.

Mr. ILSLEY: You can cry "defeat" all you like, but we are going to do it, and we know how. However, before eleven o'clock I want to deal with this victory bond argument. Let us say that the small fellow is not going to buy any war savings certificates and victory bonds, but the higher-income man is. I do not admit that that is so, but for the sake of argument we will agree that it is so. Is it unfair to pay the man who does buy victory bonds 3 per cent? That is, is it unfair to pay 3 per cent for ten- or twelve-year money, and 2 per cent for two-year money? Is that unfair? I know it is going to be argued that it is. But we have borrowed money from the banks at 15 per cent; we have borrowed money from the banks also at two-thirds of one per cent. That is what we pay the hated banking institutions. Why? Not because the banks are generous or anything like that, but because it is short-term money and because it is not worth as much as long-term money is. Two per cent is a fair rate for money for that term. We have to take some little chance there; we cannot get the thing so scientifically correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But you are forcing him to take that small rate.

Mr. ILSLEY: But we are forcing the big fellow to let us keep the money and not return it at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But there is this distinction—

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, well, forget it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You cannot dismiss it so easily, though.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not dismissed it easily. I have worked it out.

I think I should correct a statement I made to the hon. member for Peterborough West. I do not know that I understood him correctly. I think he asked whether the 10 per cent would apply to both the income of the husband and the income of the wife.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If they both had income, would they both be allowed to deduct the 10 per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think not. It is not clear. I think the one would be 10 per cent and the other would be 8 per cent. Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this under resolution 6?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was going to ask that question, to be clear. Where the husband and wife both have income, they are treated under resolution 6 as if they were single persons. Would they be both entitled to only the $800, or under the 8 per cent rate?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to think about the matter between now and Monday, but I believe the implication of another amendment is that, as regards earned income, she is regarded as a single person and he as a married man. That would give him 10 per cent and the wife 8 per cent.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That refers to earned income?

Mr. ILSLEY: That refers to earned income, ves.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): But supposing it was invested income, it would be ten?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I think it would be eight.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): On all?

Mr. ILSLEY: On all.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then this item would have to be changed in the resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: In the bill. That is right.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): But I think that should be definitely clear now.

Mr. ILSLEY: We will make it clear.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Make it fair enough.

Mr. ILSLEY: Make it one thing or the other. I think it should be ten and eight.

Mr. QUELCH: One point I should like to ask the minister about relates to the purchase of bonds. In view of the fact that the minister and various bodies have stressed that one of the purposes of the bonds is to withdraw purchasing power from circulation, I can never understand why we have adopted the policy of encouraging the chartered banks to lend money to people to buy these bonds. A lot of pressure is brought on people to buy bonds by borrowing money from the banks when it is very well known that these people - Income War Tax Act will not be able to repay the loan. I know places in the west, in the drought area, where banks have put up 90 per cent and the farmer 10 per cent, and in many cases the farmer has not been able to pay the 90 per cent, with the result that the bond remains in the custody of the bank. There are cases where people who bought bonds were not in very good shape to do so, and consequently they have had to sell them back. Would it not be advisable to make these bonds non-negotiable for the duration of the war, or if they have to be sold back, they might be sold only to the Bank of Canada; otherwise are we not defeating the very purpose which the minister had in mind?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, we do not encourage people to borrow money from the banks to buy bonds if they cannot pay the money back, but we do encourage people to borrow for the purchase of bonds money which they can pay back.

Mr. QUELCH: Has the minister any record of how many purchases of bonds have been defaulted upon, and in how many cases the bonds have had to be bought in by the banks?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. QUELCH: Is it not true that for the first three months the rate of interest is the same; that is, the amount charged to the borrower is the same as the rate of interest on the bond, but after that the rate of interest is increased, so that if, after the end of, say another three months the individual cannot pay off the loan, he is bound to relinquish his bond, or give up the deal, because he is paying a higher rate of interest than he receives on the bond?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no doubt that in the victory loan campaign people were asked to use their credit with the banks to make sure that the loan "went over the top". I do not know how far that has gone. Some people absorbed them out of other savings. What I objected to was that there was a slight scalping of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent, which the people just absorbed, but afterwards the things went into the investing institutions.

Mr. QUELCH: Is that a sound practice? Does that not defeat the very thing which the minister is trying to accomplish? I consider that when the minister has obtained every cent that he can by taxation, and every cent that he can by the sale of bonds apart from the practice of lending money to buy them with, we have then reached the point where, if the money obtained in that way is not enough to meet government expenditures, some other method should be used. If we are going to create money we might just as well have it created by the Bank of Canada instead of the chartered banks, provided we adopt ways and means of preventing the chartered banks from using that new money as a basis for further expansion of loans.

I want an answer from the minister regarding that practice of obtaining money to buy government bonds by borrowing from the chartered banks. In the old country at the end of the last war it was found that the financial institutions owned 70 per cent of the government's bonds.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In 1939 we had an exhaustive investigation into the question of money and all that sort of thing. All I have to say is that all this "funny money" stuff gives me a pain. The point is this, just before we sit down—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I want the minister to listen to me for just a minute. The average working day of every individual is divided into various categories; that is, so much of your work you do for the support of your family, so much for the support of your church, so much for the support of—what shall I say? —pleasure, so much in support of your municipal services; it is divided up like that. One of the things we have neglected all these years is the defence of our country, and now we are paying for it. You cannot get away from it. Right at the present time every single one of us—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City): Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Just one second. Might I finish?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City): With the unanimous consent of the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City): I regret that the hon. member has not the unanimous consent of the committee. It is eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Saturday, July 18, 1942

The house met at eleven o'clock.

WAR EXPENDITURES COMMITTEE

Fifth and sixth reports of special committee on war expenditures.—Mr. Fournier (Hull).

SECRET SESSION OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the secret session of the house to be held this day be not reported in the official report of the House of Commons Debates and that at the conclusion of the secret session a report of its proceedings be issued under the authority of Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

The house went into secret session.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Progress reported.

At the conclusion of the secret session, the following report of its proceedings was issued under the authority of Mr. Speaker:

"A secret session of the House of Commons was held at 11 o'clock a.m. on Saturday the 18th of July, 1942. The sitting was devoted to the question of coastal defence in Canada. The situation was explained by the three Ministers of National Defence.

J. Allison Glen,

Speaker."

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 6.19 p.m.

Monday, July 20, 1942

The house met at eleven o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Seventh report of special committee on war expenditures.—Mr. Fournier (Hull).

Third report of special committee on reconstruction and reestablishment.-Mr. Turgeon.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*INCOME TAX-ARREARS FOR 1940 AND 1941

Mr. HAZEN:

1. How many persons have failed to pay any part of their 1940 income tax?

2. How many persons have paid only a portion of their 1940 income tax?

3. How much of the 1940 income tax remains uncollected?

4. How many persons have failed to pay any part of their 1941 income tax?

5. How many persons have paid only a portion of their 1941 income tax?

6. How much of the 1941 income tax remains uncollected?

7. How many persons applied to the banks for loans to pay their 1940 income tax?

8. How many persons applied to the banks for loans to pay their 1941 income tax?

Mr. GIBSON: I have given a good deal of consideration to this question. I would say that it is almost impossible to give an answer to the first part of it, because of the impossibility of saying with any degree of accuracy that every person has filed a return. Our officers are investigating at all times, and the numbers vary from day to day.

With respect to the second part of the question, we have found that returns are not always accurate, and they are being amended. Therefore it is impossible to say accurately the number of persons who have made full payment.

With respect to the third part of the question, I would point out that this information cannot be given with any degree of definiteness until final clearance is given in respect of each taxpayer. The same answer would apply to parts 4, 5 and 6. The hon. member will realize that the number of accounts for 1940 amounted to 663,000, and for 1941 to 920,000, and to answer these questions for any given date would entail going through the records of all those returns. In my view the labour involved would be completely wasted because the information obtained would be good for perhaps only one day, and would not be entirely complete even for that day.

We have no information with respect to parts 7 and 8 of the question, in which the hon. member has asked how many persons applied to the banks for loans to pay their income tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I realize that there is a good deal of force in what the minister has said. I would not suppose that questions 7 and 8 could be answered, but what I think the hon. member who has asked these questions wants is the relative proportions of the 1940 and the 1941 income taxes that are in arrears, so as to be able to form some estimate of what the situation may be in respect to the tremendously increased personal income taxes for 1942. If there is no appreciable number of taxpayers who have failed to pay and we had that information, it would give us some indication of the attitude of the country.

Mr. GIBSON: An indication could be given as to what is in arrears, that is, in proportion to the returns already made, but these have not all been finally checked, and any figure given could not possibly be accurate.

Mr. HAZEN: I thought the Minister of Finance should have information of this kind before him when he came to make up his last budget. He should have known how many people were behind with their 1940 taxes and how many had not paid. He should have known how many were behind with their 1941 taxes and how many had not paid. He must have had some idea about how many people had had to go to the banks in both years to borrow money to pay their income tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: I could not get that.

Mr. HAZEN: I think that information should have been available to the minister when he came to frame his budget for the present year. It may be impossible to answer the question in the form in which it is put, but, if I may be permitted to say so, I have sometimes thought that the 1942 budget has gone altogether too far. We have to maintain in this country at this particular time some buoyancy among the people on the home front. We have to keep the home fires burning brightly, and if you adopt a policy, and it is possible that this 1942 budget will have that effect—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. member cannot enlarge upon the matter. Question No. 6 must be considered as having been answered.

*PENSIONS-NORTHWEST FIELD FORCE OF 1885

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have any applications for pension been received from the members still living of the 1885 Northwest field force? If so, from whom, and when?

2. What action did the committee on pensions take on this matter during the sessions of 1941 and 1942, when it was last before them?

3. How many veterans of this force (by provinces), are still living?

4. Are any of them said to be in need of some federal financial aid or assistance?

5. Will any action be taken this session to grant them the same treatment as veterans of the South African war receive?

6. What study has been made of the question?

7. What relief or action will be afforded?

Mr. RALSTON: I suggest that this question be made an order for return except as to question No. 7. In answering that question I would say that announcement as to any action to be taken will be made in due course.

GASOLINE RATIONING-MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. PURDY:

1. Has any gasoline been shipped from Nova Scotia or New Brunswick to Ontario or Quebec, since May 15, 1942?

2. If so, what were the qualities and grades of gasoline involved?

3. When will all points in Canada be given the same gasoline ration?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2. Answered By No. 1.

3. It is impossible at this time to state whether the gasoline coupon value in any particular district will be raised, lowered or maintained.

CANADIAN COMBAT VETERANS' ASSOCIATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. GREEN:

1. Were instructions given to a certain investiator by the name of Young, employed at Shaughnessy hospital in Vancouver, to visit the secretary or any other officer of the Canadian Combat Veterans' Association of British Colum-bia, Incorporated, to make inquiries regarding the activities of such association, or any other inquiries?

2. If so, by whom were such instructions given and upon what date was such visit made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. Yes.

2. By the pension medical examiner on the instructions of the Canadian pension commission which desired that a routine report with respect to the status of the association be obtained. The report bears the date of May 14, 1942.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD-MRS. IRENE SPRY

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. What position, if any, does Mrs. Irene Spry occupy in the wartime prices and trade board, and was she appointed by the civil service commission, and on whose recommendation?

2. What is her salary, travelling expenses, and other allowances and what duties does she perform?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Mrs. Irene Spry occupied the position of economist with the wartime prices and trade board. She was appointed by the civil service commission. She resigned effective June 30 and is now on the staff of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited.

[Mr. Ralston.]

2. While with the board, Mrs. Spry's principal duty was to keep the board continuously informed on price control, supply and rationing problems in other countries. In addition, she prepared the quarterly summary of the board's activities, the monthly article for the Labour Gazette and supervised the preparation of news summaries and correspondence analysis.

Mrs. Spry's salary was $3,000 per annum. She received no travelling expenses or other allowances while in the employ of the board.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD

Mr. BLACK (Chateauguay-Huntingdon):

1. When was the Canadian farm loan board organized?

2. How many first mortgage loans have been made by the board from date of organization to March 31, 1942, and what was the amount loaned during that time?

3. How many of these loans have been retired or paid off by borrowers?

4. How many securities have been acquired by the board for non-payment of mortgage obligations?

5. Of the securities acquired by the board, how many were acquired by, (a) quit claim deed, (b) foreclosure or sales proceedings?

6. Of the securities acquired by foreclosure, how many were acquired on account of abandonment of their farms by borrowers?

7. How many loans were outstanding on the books of the board as at March 31, 1942?

8. Out of the number of loans outstanding as at March 31, 1942, how many borrowers had their mortgage obligations paid in full in accordance with the terms of their contract?

9. How many second mortgages have been made by the board since its organization and the amount loaned?

10. How many second mortgage loans have been paid off or retired by borrowers from the board from date of organization to March 31, 1942?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. January, 1929.

2. Loans, 23,797; amount loaned $43,475,104.

3. 1,954.

4. 510.

5. (a) 251; (b) 259.

6. 50.

7. 21,333.

8. 17,077.

9. Loans, 7,916; amount loaned, $4,355,827.

10. 2,969.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD-D. M. LEBORDAIS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Is D. M. LeBordais employed by the wartime prices and trade board? 2. If so, what position does he hold and what are his salary and expenses? 3. What previous positions did he hold be-tween 1925 and the date of his appointment?

Questions

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes.

2. Mr. LeBordais is a director in the retail trade administration with particular reference to matters affecting independent retailers for which he is specially qualified by reason of his two years' service with the retail merchants association of Canada immediately prior to the price ceiling. His salary is $3,500 per annum. The total amount of expenses paid to Mr. LeBordais is $68.85.

3. 1926-1927, employed by the Toronto Daily Star; 1927-33, with the Canadian National committee for mental hygiene; 1933-38, a free lance journalist; 1938-39, staff writer for the Canadian Magazine, Toronto; 1939-41, organizer and public relations officer for the retail merchants association of Canada.

AIRCRAFT INDUSTRY--MORALE BUILDING CAM-PAIGN-MIGHT'S DIRECTORIES LIMITED

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. On what date was the contract let to Might's Directories Ltd., Toronto, Ontario, for the sending of letters to aircraft workers in the morale building campaign?

2. What is the total amount to date that has been paid to the said company? 3. Was the contract let by tender?

4. If not, why were other companies engaged in similar work not given an opportunity to tender?

Mr. HOWE:

1. December 6, 1941.

2. $7,682.74.

3. No.

4. Might's Directories Limited submitted an original proposal. It was not a case of buying a certain quantity of paper and printing: it was a proposal to buy an original plan of twelve suggested letters plus paper, printing, envelopes and the service of the establishment in the maintenance of lists and the distribution of letters. That the price was fair and reasonable is indicated by the fact that the total amount paid to date covers 180,000 pieces of mail, or less than one-half cent per letter including distribution and delivery.

RADIO BROADCASTING-CAPTAIN LACOSTE

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Why was Captain Louis A. Lacoste pre-vented from securing the wider audience for his broadcasts over the C.B.C.?

2. Will the government state its reasons for preventing Captain Lacoste giving these broad-casts over the C.B.C. to his French-Canadian compatriots?

Mr. THORSON:

1. I am informed by the C.B.C. that Captain Lacoste's application to broadcast over the C.B.C. was considered in the same way as other similar applications and was declined. The qualifications of radio commentators are continuously reviewed and decisions taken in the light of assessment of suitability.

2. See answer to No. 1. Since the matter was solely for the C.B.C., there was no reference of the matter to the government and no action taken by the government.

*VICTORY BONDS-WAR SAVINGS CERTIFICATES-DOMESTIC LOANS

Mr. FONTAINE:

What is the total amount loaned to the government by Canadians since the beginning of the present war by, (a) victory bonds, (b) war savings certificates, (c) loans without interest, (d) any other method of contribution?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am passing in an answer to this question which merely refers the hon. gentleman asking the question to page 3633 of the appendix to the budget speech. I hope that that will be satisfactory. If not, perhaps he can speak to me.

The answer is as follows:

Details of loan flotations since the outbreak of war to March 31, 1942, will be found on page 36 of the appendix to the budget speech of the Minister of Finance.

BRITISH WEST INDIES SHIPPING SERVICE

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Is the government giving consideration to supplying steamship space for the export of Canadian farm products to the British West Indies?

2. If so, when will the service be available?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

The government, through the Canadian shipping board, is giving constant consideration to the problem of supplying steamship space for the carriage of Canadian products including farm products, to the British West Indies. The amount of space allocated to the service is limited by the demand for vessel space for equally or more urgent purposes.

2. A limited steamship service is now in operation and every effort is being made by the Canadian shipping board to supplement this service having regard to other urgent demands for vessel tonnage.

*DISTILLERIES-SYNTHETIC RUBBER AND HIGH * TEST GASOLINE

Mr. HATFIELD:

Will the government consider taking over 50 per cent of the capacity of the distilleries in Canada for the distilling of alcohol from wheat for the purpose of making synthetic rubber and high test ethyl gasoline?

Questions

Mr. HOWE: The government is arranging to take over a certain amount of the distillery capacity for making a component of synthetic rubber. I think this is about all that can be said at the moment.

*1942 WHEAT CROP

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

What arrangements are being made for the 1942 wheat crop with regard to, (a) quotas, (b) delivery regulations, and, (c) storage payments to the farmer?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Preliminary regulations in connection with the handling of the 1942 wheat crop were provided by order in council, P.C. 1802, dated March 9, 1942. It is impossible to reach any definite decision in regard to quotas and delivery regulations until we have some more definite idea of the size of the crop to be handled. Discussions are now being carried on in Ottawa with the chief commissioner and members of the wheat board, and as soon as decisions are brought to finality I shall be very glad to make an announcement to the house. If by storage payments to the farmer the hon. member refers to farm storage, there has been as yet no decision on this point.

*CANADIAN FORCES-OPTOMETRY

Mr. COTE:

1. Does the government intend to give any recognition to the profession of optometry in the three departments of our national defence?

2. What opportunity is there, at the present time, for a graduate of a school of optometry from any of our Canadian universities, to serve in his capacity as such in, (a) the army, (b) the air force, (c) the navy?

Mr. RALSTON: Answering the first question, I would say that the policy in connection with this matter will be announced in due course. The second question should stand as an order for return.

*STORAGE FACILITIES FOR WHEAT AND COARSE GRAINS

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What arrangements, if any, are being made to give financial assistance to farmers to provide storage facilities on their farms for wheat and coarse grains of the 1942 crop?

2. What storage rates will be paid for holding grain on farms

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No arrangements have been made in connection with the matters covered by the first question. I have just given an answer covering the information asked for in the second question.

[Mr. Hatfield.]

*WHEAT BOARD-FIRST 1942 QUOTA

Mr. PERLEY:

When will the wheat board announce the amount of the first quota to be delivered from the 1942 crop?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The information asked for by the hon. gentleman has just been given by me in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden).

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PENSIONS-NORTHWEST FIELD FORCE OF 1885

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have any applications for pension been received from the members, still living, of the 1885 Northwest field force? If so, from whom, and when?

2. What action did the committee on pensions take on this matter during the sessions of 1941 and 1942, when it was last before them?

3. How many veterans of this force (by prov-inces), are still living?

4. Are any of them said to be in need of some federal financial aid or assistance?

5. Will any action be taken this session to grant them the same treatment as veterans of the South African war receive?

6. What study has been made of the question?

HONG KONG COMMISSION

Mr. BRUCE:

1. How many days or portions of days were occupied in the sittings of the Duff commission on the Hong Kong inquiry?

2. What was the total cost of this inquiry (give details)?

3. Did Mr. George A. Campbell, R. L. Kellock and H. F. Fowler submit an itemized account for their services and expenses in connection with this inquiry?

4. If so, give full particulars of each account as submitted by each of said counsel? 5. What per diem counsel fee and allowance did each counsel receive?

6. What official in the Department of Justice approved and certined said accounts as proper and reasonable?

7. Have any of these three counsel been engaged on other government investigations or work during the past four years? If so, (a) specify what work, (b) at what period, (c) what fees were charged?

IMPORTS OF BANANAS

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. How many cargoes or part cargoes of bananas were imported into Canada from January 1, 1942, to date?

2. What is the amount of bananas that have been imported into Canada through the United States from January 1, 1942, to date?

Questions as Orders for Returns

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS-INTERNMENTS

Mr. BENCE:

1. How many persons are incarcerated as a result of orders issued under the provision of section 21 of the defence of Canada regulations?

2. Of this number how many are British subjects?

3. What number of the said British subjects are such subjects by birth and what number are such subjects by naturalization?

4. Have the naturalization certificates of any of such persons referred to in questions 2 and 3 been revoked?

5. Have the naturalization certificates of any persons convicted under the defence of Canada regulations been revoked, and if so, how many?

CANADIAN FORCES-OPTOMETRY

Mr. COTE:

What opportunity is there, at the present time, for a graduate of a school of optometry from any of our Canadian universities, to serve in his capacity as such in, (a) the army, (b) the air force, (c) the navy?

MILITARY SERVICE-FAILURE TO REPORT

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. How many of the men in each military district of Canada who were called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act failed to report?

2. How many prosecutions of the men who failed to report have been instituted in each military district?

3. What is the percentage in each military district of those who failed to report?

PLEBISCITE-COSTS

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What have been the payments to date on the cost of taking the plebiscite vote, (a) printing, (b) advertising (stating agents and amount paid them), (c) broadcasting, (d) Ottawa head office expenses, (e) expenses in constituencies, (f) total payments to date?

2. Have all accounts and expenses been paid?

JAPANESE NATIONALS

EVACUATION FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA COASTAL AREA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour—and perhaps I should have given him notice—whether the work of removing the Japanese from the defence area in British Columbia is continuing, or has been brought to a standstill. How many have been removed, and how many are still there? I was told that the city of Vancouver is full of Japanese, that they have had their motor cars taken away from them, but that they have practically monopolized the taxi service in the city. Apparently they have all kinds of money, and are burning it up on gasoline and all that sort of thing. There is a good deal of dissatisfaction out there, as reported to me, over the failure to get these people removed. I am told that in the United States they moved, within six weeks, 100,000 Japanese from the defence area in the state of California alone. The army did it, and they did a grand job. Those Japanese are out in the desert now.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is another of those questions of which notice should be given.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it need not be answered to-day.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

"O CANADA"-NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the end of the session is, I hope, near, and I should like to call attention to two statements which have been promised by the government, in the hope that we shall have them before the session closes.

The Prime Minister, replying to a question by the hon, member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) on July 8 in connection with the national hymn "O Canada", said: "A statement will shortly be made." Then, the Minister of Finance promised to make a statement in connection with the continuation of the National Housing Act. He said as quoted in sessional paper No. 171B:

This matter is receiving the consideration of the government, and the Minister of Finance has advised the members of the House of Commons that he will make a statement on the government's policy regarding housing at some future date.

I should like to remind the government of these two promised statements.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): That is correct.

SUGAR

REPLACEMENT OF LOST RATION CARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Reports have been made to me from Vancouver that the controller of sugar rationing has given instructions that ration cards lost are not to be replaced. I cannot understand an order of the kind being made, and I suggest that the minister should look into it at once.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I am not aware of such an order, but I shall be glad to look into it.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

REQUEST FOR FULL REPORT ON FINANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): I would ask the government if they will comply with the request of my committee that the auditor general make a full report on finances so as to avoid many of these questions that are being asked on various problems. I have reference to a report such as they used to have in former years.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): This is a matter on which a statement is to be made before the close of the session.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD

EMPLOYMENT OF MALE PERSONS BETWEEN THE AGES OF EIGHTEEN AND FORTY-FIVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I would ask the Minister of Finance if he can let me have an answer to question No. 5, which has been standing in my name on the order paper since June 9. I should like to get the information this week.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Yes, I think I can get the information by then.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EMPLOYMENT IN INDUSTRY OF WOMEN OVER THIRTY-FIVE YEARS OF AGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): On July 17 I started to read a letter on which I proposed to base a question to the Minister of Labour regarding the employment of women in munitions work in Vancouver. Your Honour saw fit to cause me to stop reading the letter and indicated that the minister would have an opportunity to answer the question later. I wonder if I might have that question answered.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I thought the hon. member intended to put the question on the order paper. There is no government regulation under the war emergency training programme which prevents the training or employment of women over the age of thirty-five, but it does sometimes happen in particular industries that the employer himself, as a matter of internal policy, restricts employment to women not over the age of thirty-five. Every effort is being made by the government, through the war emergency training programme, to move as many women as possible into industry. I should like to correct the [Mr. Howe.]

impression that has got abroad in western Canada that there is any government regulation that has for its purpose the preventing of the training or employment of women in industry over the age of thirty-five.

[Later-in committee of the whole:]

WAR MATERIALS

AUTHORIZATION OF MOTOR TRANSPORT FROM UNITED STATES IN BOND THROUGH CANADIAN TERRITORY

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): With the consent of the committee, I should like to make a statement which I would normally make when the Speaker was in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: I assume that the minister has the consent of the committee.

Mr. GIBSON: As this is for the information of hon. members, with your consent I should like to make this statement before releasing it to the press. An order in council has been passed under the War Measures Act authorizing for the duration of the war the transportation of United States war materials between United States points, through Canada, by motor truck in bond. This action has been taken as a result of urgent requests from the United States government, which represented that where a shorter route was available through Canada the movement of war materials would be expedited and considerable savings made in the use of gasoline and rubber. The necessity for such movement of war materials was inquired into by the board of transport commissioners, who, after a thorough investigation, recommended that for the duration of the war the permission requested be granted.

A consultation was held between representatives of the dominion government, the United States government and the province of Ontario, at which arrangements were entered into by which the movement of war materials in bond through Canada by motor truck could be supervised and controlled. The present measure, being under the War Measures Act, automatically expires at the end of the war, and is limited to war materials only. Regulations are being prepared to control the movement of such goods. These regulations will not apply to United States army vehicles, which are already permitted to enter or pass through this country free of customs restrictions.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): It this not a complete reversal of the whole governmental position? Does the minister think that once a privilege like this is given it will ever be terminated?

Mr. WARD: Why should it be?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Ask the members of the railway unions what they think about it.

Mr. GIBSON: This was discussed fully with the union bodies, and I think the feeling is general that as a war measure and so long as it is restricted to war materials, and that no stops to make deliveries are permitted when passing through Canada, it will meet with approval.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not questioning the policy; I am pointing out the condition.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Do I understand that the railways are already handling so much freight that they cannot handle this traffic?

Mr. GIBSON: That is not the situation. The railways are not working to full capacity. The board of transport commissioners made an investigation and it was found that certain war materials were already being handled by truck, but these trucks were going along the south shore of lake Erie. It was to divert this traffic along the north shore and save about 100 miles in driving that the permission was sought.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Were there any public hearings?

Mr. COLDWELL: When this matter was discussed in the house before I think it was made clear by the minister that to some extent the decision would depend upon the ability of the railways to handle this type of traffic. As I see it, the thing we have to guard against is that this shall not be regarded as vesting an interest in our roads, and that only war materials shall pass through this country in this way. I think we are all aware of the fact that for a number of years a certain group of truckers have been trying to get permission to cross Ontario in order to shorten their route. After the war our railroads will not be overburdened with traffic, and I think we should protect our own traffic facilities and not permit any United States trucking interests to become established in this country.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

PROVISION FOR SETTLEMENT ON THE LAND OF VETERANS OF THE PRESENT WAR

The house in committee on Bill No. 65, to assist war veterans to settle upon the landVeterans' Land Act

Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre)-Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1-Short title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that the minister give a brief review of the changes which have been made in this bill since it went to the special committee. It will be recalled that there was some debate on the bill as originally presented. The bill has now been amended and reported from the special committee, and has been reprinted, and I believe there have been some substantial changes. The name has been changed, but I do not attach much importance to that. The suggestion is that the name has been changed to keep this scheme distinct from the Soldier Settlement Act, both in name and in main principle. It would appear also that eligibility for assistance under the act has been somewhat extended.

On the question of administration, I notice that it is the intention to keep the director-I believe that was in the original act-and the matter is put under the Minister of Mines and Resources, although I saw a suggestion somewhere that, as this was for the benefit of veterans, it should be under the same jurisdiction as other veterans' measures. The minister might explain, though not, I suggest, at great length, what the changes are. I would ask him to give his attention to section 16, on the question of an advisory board; just what does he intend to do under that? There is to be an advisory board of three members. The chairman shall be a county or district court judge of the province in which the board operates. One member is to be named by the Canadian Legion, and another by the chairman; that is to say, the government will name two and the legion will name one. In connection with these advisory boards, has consideration been given to the naming of practical men versed in the problems of the agriculturist? While 2 county court or district court judge might be a first-class presiding officer, I question whether he would have any practical knowledge which would be of great benefit to an advisory board. Why should a man of judicial education be a member of such a board? I do not know that he could add greatly to the sum total of the knowledge which an advisory board ought to possess in connection with a matter of this kind. Perhaps the minister will tell us just what are to be the functions of this advisory board.

Anything else in relation to the matter I should like to reserve until a little later. I want to say at once that I understand the report of the committee was practically unanimous, and there is no intention on my part to hold up the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be very glad indeed to accede to the request of the leader of the opposition. All these changes are shown underlined in the reprinted bill submitted by the select committee. They do not in any way alter the main provisions of the measure which has already been given first and second readings by this house.

I need not detain the committee with a description of the proposed measure, because this is already to be found on the record, on April 20, 1942—when the house approved the resolution permitting the introduction of the bill.

May I say at the outset that the select committee which considered this measure, and which has carried on its deliberations under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Queens, has given the most thorough study to all the clauses of the bill, as well as to the probable effect of its various provisions and the general implications of the measure. The committee approached this problem from an entirely non-partisan point of view, and the thanks of the house are due to the members of the committee and its chairman for their excellent work.

The main changes which have taken place in connection with the measure relate to:

1. The inclusion of Canadian seamen in receipt of a disability pension;

2. Provision to include commercial fishing equipment in lieu of live stock and farm equipment;

3. The setting up of advisory boards;

4. Provision to enable the director to set up advisory committees to advise as to qualifications of veterans and selection of lands; and also

5. A provincial advisory board to advise the director when cases of rescission are pending.

Turning to the bill itself, the following comment may be made as to the preamble. There was some discussion as to the necessity for such an elaborate preamble. The committee felt that the preamble ought to make it clear that the proposed enactments of the measure did not restrict the terms of the measure to full-time agriculture, and that a veteran might secure a holding and be assisted in settlement even though he had other employment. Furthermore, since it has been decided to include our heroic merchant seamen under the terms of the bill in certain circumstances, it seemed desirable that the bill [Mr R. B. Hanson.] should clearly indicate the committee's intentions.

The definition of "veteran" has been broadened to include, under section 2 (d) (iii):

"a British subject who was ordinarily domiciled or resident in Canada at the beginning of the said war and who is in receipt of a pension in respect of a disability incurred while serving upon a ship during the said war.

Until the war is ended, it would obviously not be in the public interest to encourage our merchant seamen to leave their present employment in order to take up land. Nor, at this stage, are we able to define with reasonable justice what kind and what extent of service in the merchant marine should be considered to qualify a man as a "veteran" for the purposes of this act. Accordingly, for the time being only, the definition of "veteran" was limited, in the case of merchant seamen, to one who had incurred a disability, and it was thought wise to indicate in the preamble very clearly the reasons for the use of the language that has been employed in the bill itself.

The preamble is also useful in calling attention to the fact that the bill is intended in the main to cover the case of the veteran who has limited financial assets rather than the veteran who possesses considerable capital.

As already indicated in the preamble, the committee recommends in section 2—the interpretation section—that British subjects ordinarily domiciled or resident in Canada at the beginning of the war and who are in receipt of a pension as the result of a disability incurred while serving upon a ship during the war, should be eligible under the act.

The other amendment in the interpretation section relates to qualification, where it is made clear that the qualification by the director is in respect of the capability of the applicant as a prospective settler.

Turning to section 9, the committee have added a subsection 2, which reads as follows:

The director may, in a case of a veteran deemed by him to be qualified to engage in commercial fishing, contract, subject to the provisions of this act and regulations thereunder, for the sale to such veteran of land and improvements thereon, building materials and commercial fishing equipment up to a total cost to the director of $4,800 subject to the same conditions set forth in subsection one of this section with the words "commercial fishing equipment" substituted for the words "live stock and farm equipment" wherever they occur therein.

There is also a slight change made in section 7, enabling the director to purchase commercial fishing equipment in order to conform with the general proposal of the committee.

Representations were made to the committee that many young men had enlisted in the services-many of them in the navy-who would wish to return to their previous occupation as fishermen. It was felt, therefore, that a veteran who was a qualified fisherman, and who acquired land and a home near coastal or inland waters, and would derive his livelihood from fishing, should receive consideration in respect of commercial fishing equipment, and that such equipment would be of more assistance to his rehabilitation than the purchase of live stock and farm equipment. It is believed that this amendment will commend itself to the good sense of this committee as being in line with the general policy of rural settlement and rural home ownership envisaged by the act.

Turning to section 16, the amendment suggested by the special committee would provide for the setting up of a provincial advisory board in each province, appointed by the governor in council, comprised of three members, the chairman of which shall be a county or district court judge of the province in which such board operates; one member to be nominated by the Canadian Legion, and one other member who, together with the chairman, shall be named by the director, to whom would be referred the question of rescission of contract in the case of a veteran who may have defaulted in the performance of the terms of his agreement. The reason why a county court judge was suggested was the desire to follow the procedure largely followed in the board of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and to give the veterans personal representation on the committee. It was felt that the final word in regard to rescission might very well rest largely with an outside independent and neutral body.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is to review the case of any man in default, to determine whether he should go on or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What power will the board have? They will have no power to reduce indebtedness?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They will be in the capacity of making a report to the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; to the director. Representations were made to the committee by various ex-servicemen's organizations and others suggesting that some such board should pass upon the question of rescission before finally closing out the contract which a veteran may have with the director under the proposed act.

Turning to section 34, it will be observed that the special committee suggest an amendment which would authorize the governor in council to appoint regional or provincial advisory committees to advise the director in respect to the qualifications of veterans, the selection of lands, and such other matters as may be referred to the committee by the director. It is appreciated, by all concerned with the selection of settlers, that the qualifying committee is a most important body. No matter how eager an applicant may be. it would be unfortunate to qualify unsuitable candidates, and it has been emphasized strongly in debate in this house, especially by the leader of the opposition, that the qualifying committee should assure itself of the suitability for settlement, not only of the veteran but of his family.

A great deal of experience can now be mobilized to apply proper criteria to the selection of settlers, and so far as it is humanly possible to do so, to eliminate unsuitable candidates. Those who have studied this bill will recognize that it does not aim to encourage speculative or the promotional type of land settlement and, in the main, its provisions are designed to meet the needs of the young men who have left our farms to serve Canada. It is intended that they should have a reasonable start, based upon their qualifications and their determination to live on the land.

On the other hand, throughout Canada, in cooperation with the provincial departments of agriculture and the universities, agronomists have made great progress in soil surveys, and there are now available maps and data which should be used to the full in the selection of farm properties upon which veterans will settle. Advisory committees in which will be included soil and other experts, are contemplated by this proposed amendment to the bill.

With these proposed amendments the bill has, therefore, been reported to the house, and the special committee have also called the attention of the house to certain recommendations which they ask the government to take into consideration, apart altogether from the specific provisions of this bill. These recommendations have already been reported to the house, and I need not, at this stage, offer any comment upon them.

There is one point, however, in respect of the coming into operation of this act, which will, I know, be appreciated by the house. It will take considerable time to set up the machinery and committees, and to begin the selection of farm properties which might be suitable for settlement. In war conditions there are difficulties of transport because of rubber and gasoline shortages, but also it must be recognized that the securing of staff, while the war is on, is none too easy.

The soldier settlement board now undertakes, in rural communities, a great deal of investigational work for the government, much of which is occasioned by the war. I trust therefore it will be understood that time must elapse in which an organization will be built up to carry the administration of the act. Indeed, the very purpose of bringing the bill before the house at this time is to establish the lines upon which the administration will operate and to enable a start to be made in organization, so that this service to discharged and later demobilized men may be built competently.

Inquiry will be made at once as to the status under this bill of those already discharged from the forces. It will be observed that the bill describes as "a veteran" a former member of the forces who has been overseas or who, not having been overseas, has had more than a year's service in Canada. While there are at present upwards of 50,000 discharged men-I believe there are 52,000-the number of those who would thus be eligible and who would be able to qualify is not great. On the other hand, it is recognized that each month there are upwards of 2,000 discharges, and inevitably the number of those who have been overseas, or who have had more than a year's service, will grow. But in any case it cannot be expected that much settlement would take place under the act until 1943.

In conclusion may I say that the bill in its amended form, as recommended by the special committee, should commend itself to the house as one important foundation stone in the structure of rehabilitation measures now being built to care for the veteran of the present war. I have never in my experience seen a committee that worked so well and gave so much consideration to a constructive issue.

Mr. STIRLING: I did not hear what the minister said about the coming into operation of the act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Probably by proclamation.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I agree with the minister in congratulating the chairman upon the excellent job which he did as head of the committee. I think that all the members of the committee gave their very best to its work, and it was certainly an investigation which, while very pointed at times, was nevertheless conducted on a non-partisan basis. It was a small committee, consisting originally of fifteen members. One of them was a gentleman in the army, and another could not attend, but on the average, of the remaining thirteen members, there was an attendance of eleven at all our discussions, and we held many meetings. We had a good many fine presentations by various organizations and individuals throughout Canada.

As has been stated, it was the purpose of the dominion government to provide a measure of financial assistance to veterans, upon their performance of the prescribed settlement conditions, in order to permit of their engaging in agricultural pursuits, either as a full-time occupation or as a part-time job coupled with some other employment.

May I say at the beginning that if it were not for the fact that I have some faith in the future, and a hope that agricultural parity will eventually be established in Canada, I would not have been able to support the bill even in principle. In the great nation to the south of us, the United States, there has been parity between agricultural and other products for a year now, and under the Washington wheat agreement of June 27, 1942, signed by the Argentine, Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, the representatives of these nations have recognized the basis of a parity price for wheat which will return a fair remuneration to the producers as well as being fair to the consumer. On the basis of these agreements, and having regard to what has been done in the United States, I think we may hope that we are doing these settlers justice by establishing them on the land, because we hope that they will be able to carry on under parity prices, in the future at any rate. As I say, if it were not for that hope I for one could not have supported the bill.

This bill is distinctive. It is different from the soldier settlement act, both in name and in principle. It provides for the granting of a loan, and refers to ex-service men as veterans rather than settlers. In connection with section 5 of the act, I have felt some concern because in the early years, under the old act establishing the soldier settlement board, the municipal authorities had very many difficulties owing to tax arrears. I remember our western municipal union executive having to make trips to Ottawa on several occasions to have these difficulties ironed out. I am happy to say this was taken care of under section 5, which reads: 5. The main purpose is to establish the legal entity and corporate powers of the director.

Subsection (6) of this section is a recitation of the relative subsection which appears in the Soldier Settlement Act, giving taxing authorities the right of recourse to the land itself for taxes duly assessed. In order to avoid conflict with the British North America Act with respect to the taxing of crown property, the director remains a corporation sole but not an agent of the crown. Any attempt to deprive the taxing authorities of the right of recourse to the land for recovery of taxes would undoubtedly meet strong opposition. In practice it is just as well for people established under such an act to realize from the start that they must pay taxes.

I was pleased to see that that point has been so covered.

The matter of agricultural training is covered in section 6. It states:

6. The director may make provision for-

(a) the placing of veterans with selected farmers for practical instruction in farming;

(b) the supplying of instructors and inspectors to assist veterans with information and instruction in farming, or arrangements to this end with federal and respective provincial departments or the extension departments of Canadian universities or accredited agricultural schools or colleges.

Section 7 deals with the acquisition of lands and other property. It provides that:

7. The director may, for the execution of any of the purposes of this act,

(a) purchase by agreement, at prices which to him shall seem reasonable, or

(b) in any other manner acquire by consent or agreement from His Majesty in the right of Canada or from any province or municipal authority, or from any person, firm or corporation;

I think that is very well covered.

Section 9 has to do with the sale of land to the veteran, and I think the various clauses of that section deal with it very well.

Section 10 points out that the veteran is deemed a tenant at will, that is:

Every veteran holding or occupying land sold by the director shall until the director grants or conveys the land to him be deemed a tenant at will.

Various safeguards are taken under that section and section 11. Section 13 provides:

13. The direct r may make advances to a veteran to enable the discharge of encumbrances on farm land which is owned and used by him as such, for the purchase of live stock and farm equipment and for the effecting of permanent improvements, of amounts not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of three thousand two hundred dollars, but subject to the following conditions:

(a) advances for all purposes shall not exceed 60 per centum of the value of the land as established by the director; Section 15 deals with the interest rate, fixing it at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; which is a very great improvement over the old soldier settlement act.

Section 23 provides that:

23. Loans or advances authorized by this act shall not be made to persons who obtained loans or advances under the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act, and who are indebted to the director of soldier settlement.

At this particular time.

In section 34, one in which I am very much interested, it is stated that:

34. The governor in council may appoint regional or provincial advisory committees to advise the director in respect to the qualifications of veterans, the selection of lands and generally in respect to such other matters as may be referred to any such committee by the director; and the director with the approval of the governor in council, may make regulations prescribing the number of members and the composition of each committee, the tenure of office of such members, the remuneration and expenses to be paid or allowed such members and generally the conduct and performance of such committees and the members thereof in the execution of their duties.

A great difficulty under the old soldier settlement board was that the authorities allowed these settlers to settle on a great amount of sub-marginal land. We cannot take too many precautions to prevent a repetition of settlement even in small numbers on sub-marginal lands, because it is detrimental both to the settler and to the country as a whole. We must guard against that at any cost. I should like to recommend that to avoid such difficulties our regional or provincial advisory committee should include a provincial soil expert from the university of that province, a representative of each provincial municipal organization of the province -because I do not know of any organization which would be more interested than the municipality in which the settler is placedand a member of the provincial command of the Canadian Legion. Without their approval no settler should be settled on any land.

I think this committee made certain recommendations to the soldier settlement board. I should like to ask the minister if we may refer to them now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I see no harm in referring to the recommendations of the committee, but of course they are entirely separate.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think I would save time by making reference to the recommendations with respect to adjustments in the old soldier settlement board. They are to be found in Votes and Proceedings of Friday, July 17.

No. 1 provides that the director may grant the settler an extension of time, not exceeding twenty years, for the payment of his indebtedness. I think that is very proper.

No. 2 provides that the rate of interest to be charged from and after the standard date first following the coming into force of the section in respect of any agreement between the soldier settlement board or the director of soldier settlement and any such settler or person shall be $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. That is on the same basis as the new settlers under this act, and as I think it should be.

No. 3 deals with the setting up of an adjustment committee. I think it was the view of the committee that the objective of this committee should be, as stated in this clause, of establishing an equity for the settler, if feasible and practical, provided that the settler is in personal occupation of the land and that such agreement had not been terminated, rescinded or assigned. The committee felt that there should be certain safeguards, that the settler should carry on for a term of years, because while this is a matter of government policy some of us felt that these settlers, provided they are a going concern, should have an equity established of at least 30 per cent in their land and property. Naturally that will be a matter of government policy, but there is a sound argument why this equity should be established. Only last week we had the premiers of the three prairie provinces here negotiating with the federal government for the relief of western farmers in regard to debt legislation, and I think many of those settlers are those in difficulties under the soldier settlement board. In many of the last ten years the yearly income of prairie farmers in general in the three prairie provinces has been less than one-third the average income of 1926 to 1929, and still remains $100,000,000 lower than in any year from 1926 to 1929. Over 70 per cent of the soldier settlers who are in difficulty are in this group of agriculturists for which the premiers of the three provinces are trying to obtain adjustment. I think it is only just that the government should see that these settlers who are still carrying on should receive an equity of 30 per cent in their property.

I was quoted in the press as having said that we should first eliminate the misfits. I made that reference in the kindliest terms. I consider I should be a misfit in many callings. In making that reference I have in mind about 10 per cent or slightly more who might be termed misfits under the soldier settlement board to carry on as able farmers. They should be taken care of as suggested in this recommendation:

4. The committee strongly recommends that in those cases where it appears to be the desire of a settler to remain in occupation of his farm home there be developed a closer degree of cooperation between the director of soldier settlement and the war veterans' allowance board to the end that the settler may continue to occupy his present home at modest cost, on a basis whereby the settler can cooperate by assigning a portion of his allowance for this purpose.

This means, in simple terms, that the state owes some consideration to those who have become physically unfit to carry on, and that they should be provided for. I have not assumed, of course, that they would be forgotten. I believe this takes care of those whom I may have improperly described as misfits. They have been provided for, with the idea that they would not be able to carry on farming operations, and should be taken care of by another department of government. I am sure that under the provisions of the bill they will be looked after.

In my view this new bill No. 65 is a good one. There have been compromises on one or two points, and we have made many changes. The result is a good piece of legislation; and with a future parity in agricultural production we shall have done something worth while for agriculturists who are now serving in the armed forces, and who upon their return to this country may come under the operation of the act. I hope that those men will not be disappointed in this undertaking.

Mr. SENN: I wish to register my approval of the main features of this bill, and the principle underlying it. This is a most important reconstruction project, and one which has some distinct advantages over the old Soldier Settlement Act. I believe the main features of the bill are somewhat similar to those in the old act, but in preparing this measure we have had the advantage of profiting from the mistakes made not only in the provisions of the old act, but in its administration. There is the further advantage that land values to-day are much lower than they were when the old act came into force and purchases were made. Live stock prices, too, are lower. On the other hand it is only fair to say that farm machinery necessary for the operation of farms in these days is more expensive than it was when the old Soldier Settlement Act began to operate.

This measure has for its purpose the settling of soldiers on the land. I believe it aims to establish an equity in lands which soldier settlers get. It is to be a reasonable equity, or one which will enable the soldier to carry on with a fair chance of success. If properly handled I believe the soldier will be able to succeed. His success, however, will depend to a great extent upon two main factors, the first of which is the settler himself and his family relationship. It should be considered whether the settler is industrious and has business ability. The success of his venture will also depend upon whether his wife will be capable of carrying on on a farm. The second factor upon which success will depend is the administration of the act. The administration will have to watch most carefully the selection of settlers. There will have to be careful supervision of the selection of land.

I believe it is section 34 which makes provision for the setting up of committees to assist the director in the selection of lands. In his brief observations the minister pointed out that maps and certain other data are available to the settlement board, and that this information will make it more unlikely for them to fall into the error of settling soldiers in areas which do not offer a reasonable chance of success. In my view there are certain drought areas in which soldiers should not be settled under any circumstances. Although it is possible that some of these areas may come into production again, settlement there would be too great a risk.

Another consideration which is important is the control which should be exercised over increased indebtedness. As the bill is now drafted the soldier should have at least a 50 per cent equity in his land, plus stock and implements. I voiced the fear when the bill was first discussed in the house, and also in committee, that the sum of $1,200 is, to say the least, little enough to provide stock and equipment on a farm, if that farm is to be adequately managed and cultivated. If a soldier lacks funds of his own it will be necessary for a soldier to go deeper into debt before he can adequately furnish his farm with stock and implements. The director should have some supervision over the amount of indebtedness which can be incurred by a soldier settler who has to purchase stock and equipment in addition to that furnished by the department.

I admit of course that a soldier settler cannot expect to begin operations on the same basis as a man who has farmed all his life, and who, by his hard work and industry, has gathered round him a good farm equipped with stock and implements. There will have to be careful supervision and careful judgment by the soldier himself if he is to be successful, despite the favourable start he is given under the measure.

I agree with the main features of the bill. I hope it will pass without too much discussion or criticism, and I wish the director every success in his supervision.

Mr. MacNICOL: In what I have to say I shall be brief. First may I congratulate the minister, and in doing so I believe I am not using too strong a word when I say that he has sincerely tried to do something for the soldiers who will return. What is now being done is perhaps better than what has been done before. I wish him every success, and I have no criticism to offer.

On several occasions I sat in the rear of the committee room and listened to the deliberations, and I concur in what has been said about the committee. I like, however, to make my own investigations, and for some time I have prepared material which would enable me to add a word or two constructively when the bill was under consideration in the house.

I have visited many areas and have inquired particularly why farmers in those areas had to abandon their farms. It struck me that that was a most important inquiry to make in respect of earlier land settlement schemes. Just why did so many farmers leave their lands? In the course of my investigation I made a survey of the land settlement scheme which followed the revolutionary war. As most hon. members are aware, that scheme was put into operation in the counties along the north shore of lake Ontario. I found that the principal reason for the abandonment of farms was that many of the lands were wholly unfit for farming. I have no doubt that under this measure the director will make an effort to see that the settlers are put on lands on which they will have at least a fair chance of succeeding. I should hope that under no consideration should a settler be placed on land which from the very outset would give him no chance of making good.

The next great land settlement scheme was that which followed the Napoleonic wars, and affected part of Carleton county, chiefly the western section, the county of Lanark, and perhaps the northern section of Frontenac. Anyone who has read the very excellent book written by the late Senator Haydon will know that under the land settlement scheme which followed the Napoleonic wars the soldier settlers were given outright considerable quantities of land, depending on the ranks they held in the army. My own people were awarded several hundred acres of land. There again too much of the land proved unfit for farming. If anyone will go to the neighbourhood of Watson's Corners in Lanark county he will see a hundred acres of rock. There is much good land there too; I do not mean it is all like that. In the early days this land was covered with the finest of pine. When the returned soldier saw all this pine he was satisfied to accept the land. He went in and settled, but in due course he had to leave. We should make certain that the returned soldier is placed on land of such quality that he will have a chance to make good.

Mr. McILRAITH: Does not the hon. member think that the county to which he has just referred is a pretty good county?

Mr. MacNICOL: I did say that much of the land was good. If my hon. friend has visited Watson's Corners—

Mr. McILRAITH: I know the district quite well.

Mr. MacNICOL: -he will see that the 160 acres on the left side of the road is almost solid rock. Of the 200 acres that were awarded to one of my people, 160 acres proved to be solid rock with only 40 acres of arable land. A returned soldier should not be placed on land like that. The farms to which I have immediate reference have been abandoned, but I did say that there is much good land in Lanark county; on the whole it is magnificent. No one in this house knows that county better than I do, because my people settled there in 1820, and I have covered the whole territory. I feel confident that the minister will see that every returned soldier is given a chance and is not placed on land similar to that awarded to some of the soldiers following the Napoleonic wars. Many of the famous families of that day settled therethe colonels, the majors and so on; but much of the land has since been abandoned.

The next scheme was that which followed the South African war. In that case the governments of the provinces gave the soldiers the land outright. In Ontario the returned soldiers were given 100 or 200 acres in the county of Muskoka. Here again some of the land was good, but much of it was simply rock and water. A man cannot farm on rock and water. Without any desire to criticize the bill, I suggest that the director see to it that the soldiers are placed on land that will give them a chance to make good.

The next scheme was put into force in northern Ontario following the depression. I called on a number of people who had been sent up there, but when I returned a year or two afterwards I found many of them gone and the farms abandoned. In that case the people were settled too far from markets. A man was given 200 acres of land, and after spending a year or two attempting to break it he would find that he had only five or ten acres in a state of cultivation. He became disheartened and left the land. If a hundred or more families of returned soldiers are placed in a new area my suggestion is that the land should first be cleared with bulldozers and tractors in order that they may have a chance to produce something the first year or two.

I was greatly impressed by what was done in connection with the settlement of Sudetens in British Columbia. These people were brought here in 1939 and were placed on 23,000 acres of land under the charge of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In my humble opinion the Canadian Pacific deserve unstinted praise for what they have done to assist these Sudeten farmers.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is the legion of British Columbia in accord with that?

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not considering the matter from that point of view. I am thinking only of the soldier. I want him to have a chance right from the beginning. Many of my own people are soldiers, and perhaps some of them will want to go on the land. The Sudetens were given the land outright, or they owned it within a short time after they went on the land. It was first broken up for them by bulldozers and then cultivated by the use of cooperative ploughs. They were shipping 70 hogs every two weeks, 75 cans of milk every week, and many cattle and so on. I have confidence in the minister and feel sure that he will see that the returned soldier is placed on land which will give him a chance from the very beginning. Many times in the past they have not had a chance, because of the land being poor, because of lack of transportation facilities and roads, or because of the lack of markets.

The most glaring example of lack of roads and markets is in the section north of the Peace River. This is fine land, and some day there will probably be a large settlement there. I ask the minister to make sure that before men are placed on land, roadways are constructed so that they may have free access to and from their land. Then some scheme should be undertaken to see to it that the produce can be got to a market.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That matter is covered, if not specifically, at least inferentially, by section 35.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have no doubt that what I have said in that regard would have come under the minister's observation. I am satisfied that every member wants the returned soldier to be placed on good land, with the proper roads and markets. If markets are too far away, some plan should be instituted whereby the commodities produced can be taken to a market. This would not be done to injure other farmers; it would be done to render a service to the returned men. I cannot help but feel that this committee and the country will support anything the minister may decide upon to give these men an opportunity to make good.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to bear out the statement of the minister and of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) with regard to the able manner in which the chairman of this committee conducted the proceedings. I should like also to comment upon the earnestness of the manner in which the committee went about its work. The committee have as a matter of fact made several major changes in the bill, largely, I think, because of the men who were on the advisory committee which was appointed by the department to assist in drafting the original bill. On that advisory committee were some seven departmental officials, and five men who represented land companies and mortgage companies, and the two great railways which have large amounts of land available for settlement. But on that committee there were no representatives of agriculture, and no representatives of the men who settled under the old act. Some 25,000 men settled under the old act, and some 3,000 or more of them have paid off their indebtedness. Surely the government should have appointed some of these men to the advisory committee, because they knew the actual conditions under which the settlers have operated over a number of years under the old act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We had the deputy minister of agriculture on the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT: But he is not a representative of organized agriculture. I deprecate the government's attitude in that regard—the assumption that when they appoint an official of the Department of Agriculture on a committee of this kind they are appointing a representative of agriculture. If agriculture is to be truly represented on these committees, the representative must be appointed by the organized agriculturists themselves, by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and other agricultural bodies.

The committee which considered this bill has certainly made some improvements in it as it was originally presented to the house. The bill has two objects. We are, first of all, to have a smaller settlement scheme under which men who have part-time employment shall be given small holdings on which to live and construct a suitable house, and it is proposed that these settlements shall be in districts where part-time employment is available. That is a good idea, but I do not think settlement should be restricted entirely to territory adjacent to industrial districts. I know farming districts in western Canada where around almost every town small holdings have grown up naturally. The provisions of this part of the bill should be extended to include other than industrial areas. This form of settlement should not be on too large a scale, of course, but there is a definite place, both in eastern and in western Canada, for settlement on a small scale around our larger towns and cities.

This part of the act will not be brought into effect, I presume, until the war is over, because we have not the material with which to construct these houses. I suggest that in the meantime the government should have able architects draw up forty or fifty plans for houses, and that when the war is over we do not place the construction of these houses in the hands of large contractors who will build them in a more or less wholesale manner.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but that matter has already been discussed with the dominion housing administration.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am very glad of that. I believe we should adopt a scheme somewhat similar to that in which St. Francis Xavier university of Nova Scotia is interested, and that these settlers, wherever possible, should gather together in study clubs to look over the plans for houses, and assist, under supervision, in the actual construction of their own houses. I do not think there is anything that has more of a tendency to hold a man in one place and to promote stability than for the man himself to assist in the planning and building of his own house. The government should bear this in mind when introducing this part of the scheme when the war is over.

The other part of the bill deals with those who are engaged in full-time farming. Since history began there has been a land settlement scheme after almost every great war. The hon, member for Davenport has mentioned a few of them that we have had in Canada. Go back through Roman and Greek history and you will find that after the Roman and Greek wars there were land settlement schemes in those countries. It is only natural that men who have left offices and served in the army for three or four years hate the thought of going back into an office, and when land settlement schemes such as this are available they naturally wish to settle on the land, whether they are suitable for farming or not.

At the present time agriculture in Canada is in none too prosperous a condition. Over the past ten years no other industry in Canada has been so much in the doldrums as agriculture, and it seems a wrong idea to me for us to say now that when the war is over we are going to turn thousands of our soldiers on to farms unless we make provision for the marketing of their produce. The minister in introducing this bill said that approximately 35,000 men have already made application to settle under these provisions. During the investigation by the committee the minister was questioned by the hon. member for Haldimand as follows:

Mr. Senn: It is not intended to limit this to 35,000?

Hon. Mr. Mackenzie: No, that is only a guide.

Mr. Senn: Is there any intention to limit it at all?

Hon. Mr. Mackenzie: Of course, I could not be definite at the moment, but this present bill is based upon an estimate in regard to the financial commitment of 35,000 of $80,000,000 of which $34,000,000 is a direct gift to the settlers. We will have to go much further before this bill is through.

Mr. Senn: Yes, I think so.

Hon. Mr. Mackenzie: We have 33,000 who have already signified their intention through the surveys we have made, and of course, when the surveys are complete we will probably have nearly 100,000 who want to signify their intention to go on the land.

If it is the intention to settle anything like that number of men in agriculture, the idea is entirely wrong. We have a committee of the house which is making a thorough study of reconstruction. They are agreed that before the war agriculture was not in a prosperous condition, and that further settlement and the further development of agriculture at this time without some definite knowledge of whether there is going to be a market for what is produced is not good. In that connection I should like to quote from the evidence given before the reconstruction committee by Doctor James:

There is, however, another problem underlying all of these in the field of agriculture, a problem which is causing concern here and abroad. Agriculture, during the last fifty years, has been greatly mechanized. I have already said that I am not a farmer, but even a layman realizes that a farmer with a tractor and appropriate equipment is able to look after many more acres of land than is his predecessor with two horses and a plough. We are able, with a steadily diminishing agricultural population in Canada, the United States, Argentina, Great Britain and most other countries, to produce a greater quantity of agricultural products; so that we must obtain some clear idea of the number of people that are necessary to meet our agricultural demands and the number which can attain a decent standard of living, with reasonable prosperity and comfort, through farming. On that aspect of the problem, the committee on reconstruction has instituted a rather comprehensive study which comes under the high-sounding name of "contemporary demographic trends in relation to the agricul-tural development of Canada," by Professor W. D. Hurd. The purpose of that study is to find out the exact distribution of population between town town between town and country, the per capita production and the consumption of those popula-tions, and to attempt the very difficult task of estimating the optimum production of a the best size of farm and the most farmer. reasonable size for the agricultural population that Canada needs.

The government, having that committee at work, should take its findings into very serious consideration. I am afraid that if we are going to settle under this scheme a lot of settlers who have not had agricultural experience, and who have been engaged in other industries, but who are to be sent to work with farmers until they have a knowledge of farming, we shall be making a mistake. Men who come from agriculture and have had experience of it should be the ones to be placed back in agriculture, under conditions which will give them a reasonable chance of success.

The hon. member for Davenport said that we must place these men on good land, not marginal land. The director is going to have difficulty in obtaining good land, in proper economic units, for $3,600. In western Canada to-day a section to a section and a half of land is the only economic unit. You can give a man there a quarter section with clear title, and twenty years afterwards he will be mortgaged and in debt to the extent that he will have no equity, because a quarter section is not an economic unit unless a man can obtain other land to work along with it. That is one reason why only men who are engaged in agriculture and who have their relations similarly employed and able to give them assistance other than they can get through the board, have a reasonable chance of making a success under this scheme.

I feel very strongly on this particular point, and I believe the government should be, and will be, very careful in the selection of settlers to take up land under this scheme. Your director has had the experience of the past twenty-two years under the old soldier settlement board; he knows the conditions that exist and the problems that will face the board under the new act. I sincerely hope he will take those into consideration and will limit the numbers to be settled under this scheme to those who can be successfully absorbed into agriculture, and to those who have a reasonable chance of success.

Included in the recommendations made to this house on July 7 by the committee were some which certain members would like to see included in the bill. The first was the advisability of adopting a system in which the annual payments to be made by the settler under this measure will be adjusted in accordance with the relation of the prices of the commodities that he has to sell to those that he has to buy. Personally I think that is a very important recommendation, and one which should have been incorporated in the bill. For a settler to be successful under this legislation he must obtain a parity price for his products. The reason which was given for not doing this was that the government felt that they could not apply the principle to one class of farmer unless they were prepared to adopt it for agriculture as a whole. I believe that this principle should be adopted by the government so far as agriculture is concerned in this country, and that it would have been a very good change to incorporate that recommendation in the provisions of the bill. We talk of a new order, of what we are going to do when the war is over; but when it comes to putting something definite on paper we seem to be very slow about doing it. The government would have been justified in including such a clause as this, especially since the returned men affected by this bill are going to make very great sacrifices for us who are staying at home.

Another recommendation made to the government was that settlers under this legislation be given the first option on the purchase of tractors, trucks and any military equipment suitable for farm use when disposition is being made of them after the war. I have no doubt that the government will take into consideration that recommendation, which is a very good one.

Third, that at a later date this act be so amended as to make provision for persons having had service on ships and who are not in receipt of disability pensions. I do not think any comment is needed on that; the committee were unanimous about it.

Fourth, the advisability of placing the administration of this act under a new department which would deal exclusively with all matters pertaining to ex-service men and women. It was the general feeling of the committee that the old soldier settlement act was placed under the Department of Mines and Resources for a definite purpose, namely that this department had control of much of the available land which was to be used for settlement. To-day that condition is changed; the land is largely under the control of the provinces, and there does not seem to be any sufficient reason why the administration of the present measure should be under that department. In the opinion of the committee, with which I thoroughly agree, it should be administered either by the Department of Pensions and National Health or by the Department of Agriculture. There is much to be said for placing the administration under the Department of Agriculture.

Under this act the director will have a wide range of power, and he can, if there is proper supervision, make it a success. His attitude will have a large bearing on the effects of the legislation. I sincerely hope he takes into consideration the matter of establishing at some time, under the act, cooperative farming on some scale at which he deems will be successful. The settlers under this bill will have a much greater chance of success if a number of them are working together than they will as individuals, each trying to carry on his small show with inadequate capital and inadequate equipment, which would reduce his chances of making good. Twelve hundred dollars will not procure a decent line of equipment to farm either a quarter-section or a half-section of land in western Canada, but $4,800 would buy an up-to-date line of equipment which would farm effectively a section of land. The director should give serious consideration to the establishment if possible of some form of cooperation among the settlers, especially in the earlier days of settlement, until they become more self-sufficient.

Under the act, the settler must insure his property. I know that under the old act much more was paid out in premiums than was ever drawn by the settlers from the insurance companies. I suggest that the government give serious thought to some form of group insurance of the property of settlers instead of turning it over to the line companies as was done under the last act. There is also the question of the dower right of the widow in the land. This is taken away, and the director will find after two or three years, when the settler dies and the widow is left, that the settler has no equity in his land so that the director will have to dispossess the widow of the land. It is not going to go over very well with the general public, and I would ask the director to consider seriously the matter of group insurance of married settlers to the amount that the board have an interest in the land, so that when the settler dies his widow or family will have clear title to the land. This is important, and it should receive serious attention. Personally I think the government should organize a company and themselves go into insurance to that extent. If they do not see fit to do this, I urge upon them that they make an arrangement with one of the regular companies for group insurance for settlers to the amount of their indebtedness to the board.

The CHAIRMAN: I would direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that, so far, this discussion has been most irregular. It is in direct violation of standing order 58, subsection 2. Under the short title of a bill, according to the rules, it is not permissible to renew the general discussion of principle which has taken place on the second reading. A practice has developed whereby, sometimes, to expedite the second reading of a bill, an undertaking is given that general discussion will be allowed in committee on the short title. I observe, however, that when Bill No. 65 came for second reading, a very extensive debate took place and no undertaking to widen the discussion in committee was made. I therefore find it very difficult to apply the rule, if a discussion which should have taken place and which has taken place on the second reading were allowed to be repeated in committee on clause 1. Unless there is unanimous consent, it is my duty to remind hon. members of rule 58.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I entirely agree with your observations, Mr. Chairman; there is no question that they are quite right according to the rules. However, I suggest that by consent of the committee it might expedite the final passing of the bill if we had a short discussion on the short title—only by unanimous consent, of course.

Mr. QUELCH: A great deal of credit is due to the chairman of the committee that investigated this matter for the admirable way in which he conducted the sittings. Generally speaking, I am heartily in accord with the various sections of the bill. It is a very great improvement on the bill introduced at the end of the last war for the purpose of settling returned men on the land. Nevertheless, I do feel that the success of the bill will depend to a very large extent upon the type of agriculture that is maintained after the war. If we are to have the same type of agricultural policy that we have had from the close of the last war until now, I am satisfied that the majority of men that are settled under this measure will fail to become established. So far as the administration of the act is concerned I think it will be very necessary that every sympathetic consideration be given to the soldiers who have settled under the act. [Mr. Wright.]

Generally speaking, under the old act, in its earlier stages, the men undoubtedly did receive that consideration, but on the other hand it seems to me that in later years the soldier settlement board had been adopting a hardboiled attitude towards the men.

It was suggested in the committee that the settlers should be entitled to a parity price; at least I should say that it was felt by many members of the committee that this should be done. It was also suggested that their payments to the board should be adjusted on that basis. Section 1 of the recommendations in regard to this bill, reads:

The feasibility of adopting a system in which the annual payments to be made by a settler under this act will be adjusted in accordance with the relation of the prices of the commodities he has to sell with those he has to buy.

While quite a large number of members of the committee felt that this was a sound principle, we did not press for its inclusion in the bill because we looked upon it as a matter of national policy; that is, that it applies not merely to soldiers but to all farms at the present time. We felt, therefore, that as it was a question of national policy rather than merely a policy in regard to soldier settlers, it would not be well to include it in the bill. I remember when the bill was before the house for discussion, prior to its being sent to the committee, the Minister of Finance emphasized the fact that the reason so many soldiers had failed under the old act was to be found in the highly inflated prices they had to pay. Of course, there is a great deal of truth in that, but it was not merely the inflated prices they had to pay. The trouble was that prices were allowed to fall to a very low level. If the inflated prices had been allowed to fall only to a fair level, the results would not have been so disastrous; but prices were allowed to go down to a very much deflated level, a level so low that it was absolutely impossible for soldier settlers to recover costs out of prices.

That applies to all agriculturists as well as to the soldier settlers. There are many people who believe that it would be unwise to engage in any large land settlement scheme in view of the fact that before the war we had large surpluses of agricultural products, and no doubt after this war we shall have the same situation. On the other hand prominent dietitians have told us that if the people of this country were using a healthy diet the consumption of dairy products could easily be doubled. But no doubt we could, by further mechanization, easily maintain the level of agricultural products to satisfy that diet without any increase in the present settlement. Therefore I agree that it would be a mistake after this war to engage in any large scheme of settling people on the land. Nevertheless, since 30,000 soldiers in the forces at the present time have signified that they desire to be placed on the land, we must do everything in our power to satisfy that desire. No doubt before the end of the war there will be more than 30,000 soldiers wishing to go on the land. When we make provision for placing these men on the land it is up to us to see that everything that can be done to make that settlement a success shall be done. I believe this bill paves the way for such a settlement. But as I said before, unless we see that a sounder agricultural policy is maintained in the future than we have had in the past, I am afraid the consequences will be similar to those which followed the last war.

The preamble of the bill states:

And whereas the great majority of prospective veteran settlers have limited financial assets and the lack of such assets has proved to be the main obstacle in the fulfilment of settlement contracts and to the acquirement of farm home ownership;

This is going to be one of the main stumbling blocks to the success of this bill. The bill requires that a settler must pay down 10 per cent of the cost of the land at the time of his settling. He may be in a position to put up 10 per cent of the value of the land, but if he does so he will probably find it very hard to provide the money necessary to furnish the house, especially if he is a married man; and we know from past experience that if a married man has to settle under conditions that are not satisfactory for a congenial life, matrimonial troubles are likely to ensue. The committee gave a good deal of time to that point. They felt that it would be possible to overcome the difficulty. I think the same provision was in the last measure, and the difficulty was largely overcome.

I should like to deal briefly with the other sections of the recommendations. Section 2 provides that:

Settlers under this act shall be given first option on the purchase of tractors, trucks, and other military equipment suitable for farm use when disposition is being made of the same after the war.

The committee will remember that after the last war certain corporations bought up most of this equipment, and it was resold at a satisfactory profit. The committee felt that tractors and trucks should be made available to settlers direct instead of being sold through any corporation, thus bringing about a considerable increase in prices.

Section 3 states that:

—at a later date this act be so amended as to make provision for persons having had service on ships, who are not in receipt of a disability pension.

The feeling of the committee was that men in the merchant marine would be as much entitled as soldiers to consideration under this act. But it was pointed out that these men will be required at sea for a number of years after the war, so that it was not considered advisable to bring them in at this time. If they are suffering disability they will be taken care of. No doubt at a later time the act will be amended to make possible the coming of these men under its provisions, when their services are not longer urgently required at sea.

Section 4 states that:

The advisability of placing the administration of this act under a new department which would deal exclusively with all matters pertaining to ex-service men and women.

I think we all realize that soldiers are more likely to get sympathetic consideration under the department of pensions than under any other branch, and it was pointed out that in all probability a new department would be formed later on to deal with returned men. If that should be done, then we felt that this act should be brought under the administration of that department. Soldiers settling on land undoubtedly will require sympathetic consideration if they are to succeed. Agriculture as a whole has carried on under tremendous difficulties during the past twenty years. Soldiers face further difficulties in addition to those of civilian farmers. If they are to succeed it is essential that every consideration be given them in connection with the obstacles they have to overcome.

As several hon. members have referred to the recommendations regarding settlers under the old act, perhaps I might be permitted to say a few words in that regard. While I have stated that generally speaking I feel well satisfied with this bill, I cannot say that I am so well satisfied with the recommendations regarding settlers under the old act. Whether or not these recommendations will be satisfactory will depend entirely upon the way they are interpreted. The recommendations may mean much, or in some regards they may mean nothing.

Section 3 of the recommendations reads as follows:

3. The minister may with the approval of the governor in council appoint a committee of not more than three members to be known as the adjustment committee at such rate of remuneration as the governor in council may fix and allow and for a period of not more than twelve months with powers to review and confirm or reduce the indebtedness of soldier settlers whose agreements with the director of soldier settlement were the subjects of proposals formulated under the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act prior to October 1, 1939, or in the case of such other soldier settler as may be recommended by the director, with the objective if feasible and practical, of establishing an equity for the settler; provided that the settler is in personal occupation of the land and that such agreements have not been terminated, rescinded or assigned.

Exactly what is meant by an equity? If the debt of the soldier settler is reduced one dollar below the value of the land, that is an equity, but no one would suggest that such action would overcome the difficulty of that man becoming reestablished. At the present time about 3,800 men under the old act have an equity of less than 16 per cent. The loan companies in Canada recognize, generally speaking, that a man must have an equity of around 50 per cent in his land if he is ever to be able to repay the debt. The new act places the equity at 33¹/₃ per cent. Many of us felt that in dealing with the settlers under the old act we should give them an equity of at least 331 per cent. What does this recommendation really mean? I hope the minister will later define what he considers should be the guiding principle in giving that equity.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out that, except in a very casual way, reference to former legislation is not in order. On second reading of this bill an exhaustive comparison was made of this new legislation with the old act. I shall have to draw a line somewhere. Let us not neglect the real issue before the committee.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. PERLEY: This morning a number of bouquets were passed around, to the minister, the chairman of the committee, and the committee generally. I want to associate myself with what hon' members have said in this regard. I was not a member of the committee, but I tried to keep in close touch with what was happening. I read the reports, and I think the committee did a splendid work. There were only thirteen members, two of whom are in the army. The eleven who remained have a splendid record of attendance. I think this idea of smaller membership should be applied to the other committees. The agriculture committee has [Mr. Quelch.]

a membership of about fifty, which makes it almost impossible to do the work as efficiently as this committee has done its work.

This morning the minister referred to the amendments that had been made to the bill in committee. As the bill was thoroughly discussed in the resolution stage, it is not necessary to go into that now. The bill should go through the remainder of its stages rather quickly. It will come into operation by proclamation. It is a most important measure. It may be regrettable that the house will not have more time to study it, but we want to get through. I hope that the bill will prove more satisfactory for the returned soldier than did the previous soldier settlement scheme. The minister said this morning that from 50,000 to a possible 100,000 men may be placed on the land. In order to make this scheme a success there will have to be proper supervision and selection of both the men and the land.

I think it was the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) who said that there is a future for agriculture. We are all coming around to that way of thinking. The hon. member referred to the agreement reached by the five leading wheat producing nations in connection with parity prices for the producer, particularly the wheat producer. I believe this house is more or less in agreement that some arrangement should be made with respect to that.

I should like to refer briefly to what happened after the last war. I was going to say that at that time men were placd promiscuously on the land. There certainly were not proper investigations with regard to the suitability of the land, the nearness to markets, and other conditions. That is one reason why that scheme can be considered to have been more or less of a failure. A number of settlements were set up in the west, particularly one in my own constituency known as the Piapot soldier settlement. This land was part of an Indian reserve. It was practically covered with bush. The men located there did a wonderful job, and the minister's officials will vouch for my statement. During the good times in Canada, from 1920 to 1930, these men established homes and proved themselves to be a credit to the country. In 1930 they ran into difficult times, and many of them went back. But I do want to pay a compliment to those men. If proper supervision is provided, and care is taken in selecting the land and the men, we will have a number of similar settlements in this country in a few years.

The financial assistance of \$3,600 for land and \$1,200 for stock and equipment is not any too much. If this is the only assistance to be given, I do not think any farm should be larger than a half-section. The interest rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent seems to be reasonable. Section 23 of the bill reads:

Loans or advances authorized by this act shall not be made to persons who obtained loans or advances under the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act.

It would seem that some injustice is being done to the veterans of the last war. A number of veterans of the last war who have been on the land left their homes and their families and enlisted in the present war. I understand that the subcommittee recommended to the main committee that consideration should be given to these men, and I trust that the minister will see that they get a square deal. I could cite many injustices which have been done to these men. I have in my office the records of many cases in which these men, and especially their wives, have been treated unfairly, and if I had the time I would place them before the committee. I know of several wives who have had to give up a portion of their allowance to pay the interest that was owing to the government under the agreement. That is unfair.

The selection of the land is dealt with under section 34. It is, of course, important that the land should be carefully chosen. I should like to see on the advisory committees a real dirt farmer representing the farmers and the young men who will settle on the land under this scheme. Under the old scheme many soldiers settled on the land at a valuation out of all proportion, even at that time. I hope that under this scheme, care will be taken to arrive at a proper valuation of the land.

This land settlement scheme will be a success with proper administration, guidance for the settler, and proper supervision. These are the important things to consider. I could say a good deal as to how the last soldier settlement scheme was administered, but I will content myself with saying that administration is the all-important thing, and given that, and guidance and proper supervision, I trust the scheme will be a success. I shall watch to see what is really done under this act, because, Mr. Chairman, it will not be long before it will come into force. Already some 52,000 soldiers, the minister has told us, have returned, and some of them are about ready to make their application to come under this scheme.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think I represent and have the right to present the views of the Canadian Legion in British Columbia. As the only representative in this house from British Columbia of the Canadian Legion, may I say that we are in accord with this 44561-278 bill, but we are not in accord with the settlement of any colony, as a colony, be it returned soldier or otherwise, after this war; because so far in the Dominion of Canada no colony that we have ever settled as a colony has been satisfactory. That cannot be disputed. I include in that, English, Irish and Scotch and particularly the Scotch, because I happen to be of Scotch descent myself and think they are the finest people in the world. But settling any people as a colony does not work.

I have no quarrel with this bill, and I have no quarrel with the committee. I think it was a wonderful committee and I think this is a wonderful bill. However, the chairman was a maritimer, and they do not know anything at all about British Columbia.

Under the bill as it stands the soldier settler is entitled to $3,600 for land and improvements, and $1,200 for live stock and farm equipment. In the riding of Fraser Valley, which I represent, and which is a dairying and poultry-raising riding, it is impossible to establish yourself, either in poultry or in cattle raising, with an expenditure of only $1,200. I hear some asides from my friends to my left of the legal profession who know nothing about farming. The increase in the price of dairy cattle in 1941 over 1940 was $9 in British Columbia. Nobody can tell me that a man can establish himself as a dairy farmer, with the necessary stock and equipment, on $1,200. Therefore the Canadian Legion of British Columbia-I have been ruled out of order, Mr. Chairman, before, often enough-

The CHAIRMAN: I must confess that I should rule the hon. gentleman out of order now, were it not that, from the start, the procedure on this bill has been most irregular. I cannot mete out to the hon. gentleman any treatment different from that which has been accorded to other hon. gentlemen who have preceded him and who were also out of order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I shall try to confine myself within proper limits.

I am not finding fault with this bill, but I want to point out as emphatically as I can that in British Columbia you cannot start dairy farming, pay for your cattle and equipment, with only $1,200. That is obvious.

There are several other points in this bill on each of which I should like to speak for forty minutes. But there is one item on which I speak with full authority and with the full knowledge of the returned soldiers in British Columbia, and that is the capital required. It is obvious that $1,200 is not sufficient for a man to start up dairy farming.

Under this bill as amended a settler, even though he has made 90 per cent of the payments on his farm, is still regarded as a tenant. That is provided by section 10, and he is not entitled to be elected as a reeve, alderman, councillor or anything else. I am sure that the leader of the opposition will agree with me when I say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He can be a member of the House of Commons.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: From what I have seen, anybody can be a member of the House of Commons. This provision in section 10 may not mean much to the leader of the opposition, but it does mean much locally.

There is another point which I wish to bring before the committee. Under this amended bill, as I understand it, the municipality may sell a soldier settlement farm if municipal taxes are in default. Prior to this amendment they could not do that. Some hon. members present may not come from what we call organized territories, but it is a serious thing to a municipality that under the bill, as I understand it, you cannot sell that particular piece of land for the benefit of the municipality. The municipality has to supply schools, hospitals, and so on; yet it is entitled to no protection. That is my interpretation of the new bill, although I may not be correct. Certainly it was in the old act until it was amended.

Under section 10, as I understand it, the soldier who establishes himself in a particular district is not eligible to become reeve or alderman unless he has paid off the entire charge. He is treated as a tenant.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Tenant at will.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The leader of the opposition says he is tenant at will. I do not know just what that means, not being a lawyer.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That does not prevent him from acting as the hon. member stated, in my province; he may act under agreement of sale.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That depends on the local law.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am getting advice around here from such distinguished men from the maritimes and Manitoba that I am going to lose the line of my own speech. I do know this: probably for the first and last time in my life I agree with the leader of the opposition, and, certainly, with the hon. member for Souris, who, I thought, put up an excellent story in connection with returned soldiers' problems so far as this bill is concerned.

There is another thing to which I wish to draw attention, and I am bringing it up now because I want to expedite this bill as much as anybody else does. I think that someone from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture should be on these boards. I have every respect for the Department of Agriculture under the present minister, I think we have an excellent system, but I would point out that the farmers have suffered owing to the fact that the wartime prices and trade board have overawed or overstepped the Minister of Agriculture. As I understood the hon, member for Souris, he suggested that, instead of a practical man from the Department of Agriculture, a practical farmer should be appointed on these boards. A suitable body from which to pick a representative is, I think, the federation of agriculture.

There are a number of other things to which I might draw attention. I am not criticizing the soldier settlement board of the past, but I am very much interested in these two points. Personally, and I believe I speak for my riding, I am absolutely opposed to colonies. I do not care of what class or of whom they are composed. Second, in British Columbia there is no place where you can buy cattle and equipment for $1,200 and support your family or even pay your debts. You could not even go into debt properly with a borrowing like that. We think that sufficient leeway has not been allowed in that respect. Again, under the bill as now drafted, the land does not become the property of the settler even though he has paid 95 per cent of the cost; he is still subject to tax sale, and, as I understand the bill, has no recourse other than to this board, even though he may owe no more than 5 per cent.

Mr. REID: It is not my intention to delay the passage of this bill, because I spoke when the bill was first introduced. I have one remark to make before asking the minister two questions. I want to place myself on record as being opposed to the imposition of any interest charge whatever on the land. Most of the difficulties encountered by soldier settlers under the old act were due to the fact that the interest charges mounted up to the extent that in many instances, years afterwards, the soldier settler found himself owing more than he did when he first went on the land. I still advocate the Australian plan, where a soldier in going on the land knows exactly what he will pay, and his debt does not increase; he has the incentive of paying so as to acquire title to the property. However, the committee did not deal very long with that question, and I am merely placing myself on record, pointing out where the great difficulties were in the past.

The first question I want to ask the minister is this. The soldier settlement board, I understand, have been making a survey of the Japanese property in British Columbia. Will this property vacated by the Japanese be made available for occupation by returned men? Many choice pieces of property are involved, and most of us from British Columbia are particularly interested in this settlement of the Japanese-vacated lands. We are interested from two points of view: that our soldiers may not return after their war service and find once again orientals holding special pieces of property in the province; and that, if soldier settlers are given the right there, there will be no great incentive for the Japanese to return to British Columbia after hostilities cease.

My second question is this. Of late years we have been passing legislation dealing entirely with those who have been unable to pay. That is all to the good. But there has been a class of soldier settler whose position and case no one has so far voiced. I am thinking of the man who scraped every last cent he could, who denied himself the necessities of life, who, with his wife, struggled along to pay for the property. I have in mind a case in point. A soldier settler went on a piece of property in 1924 and is still struggling to pay for it. He said when I was back there, "Mr. Reid, is nothing to be done for me? Do you want me to collapse like some of the other boys have done, and go before the farmers' creditors arrangement board? I can't get one cent of reduction. My wife and myself have struggled and denied ourselves all these long years, yet no encouragement is given by the government and the country for us to carry on." Are we going to do anything for that class of settler? I make no apology for raising my voice on behalf of these people. Is there to be any court or board set up to review these cases of long years ago? Some of them will not be able to pay this side of the grave, although they have been endeavouring to do so. Some attention should be given to that type of soldier settler.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The second question raised by my hon. friend deals entirely with the conditions of settlers under the soldier settlement board, which, as he knows, is not under my jurisdiction. But a committee of the house did review conditions under the soldier settlement board, and made certain recommendations to this house which will be considered by the government as soon as possible.

4456:-2783

As to the first question of my hon. friend, regarding the survey of lands previously occupied by Japanese in British Columbia, it is almost impossible at the present moment for us to make a definite statement of policy in the matter. As a result of surveys to be made we must first of all know the nature, quality and value of the land available, and an ultimate disposition of the matter will depend upon the policy finally decided upon by the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The question of alien enemy property is clear now. The minute Japan came into the war the property of Japanese nationals automatically came under the jurisdiction of the custodian. As to the property of persons of Japanese origin who are now Canadian nationals, that is another thing.

Mr. FAIR: I wish to call the attention of the leader of the opposition once more to the fact that he is the man who is advocating that this house should get through its business in a hurry, but no one has talked more and said less than he.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is an offensive statement. I leave it to the judgment of the committee if I do not contribute more to the discussions in the house than the hon. gentleman who is now on his feet.

The CHAIRMAN: The language the hon. member used is offensive. Hon. members should not indulge in such language.

Mr. FAIR: I did not get what you said, Mr. Chairman. I am a long way from the chair and I did not hear your remarks. When this bill was introduced some weeks ago I intended to say a great deal more than I did, and much of what I should like to say I shall reserve until a subsequent time. However, two things are necessary if this bill and the soldier settlers themselves are to succeed. The first point I had in mind was that no system can succeed unless agricultural prices are such as to bring cost of production. This has not so far been recognized by the government. No matter what this bill may contain, no matter what the government may think it is doing for the soldiers, the fact is that they cannot succeed unless that aspect of the matter is attended to.

Another point I wish to bring out is that the administration of the act will have a good deal to do with the success or failure of the soldier settler. I understand that in large part the business of the committee was conducted in camera, and for that reason we are not able to bring here a good deal of the evidence that was given to the committee. However, from statements that I have from members of the committee and others I gather that everything is not as it should be with the administration. During the years I have been in this house I have received many letters, and I have read letters that have been written to the press of western Canada, in which I am particularly interested, showing that a number of settlers have lost faith in the present director of soldier settlement. Perhaps the director is not acquainted with what these soldiers have to go through.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are on section 1 of the bill. I submit that the discussion now going on with regard to the conduct of the director is entirely beside the point. The hon. member should be asked to desist.

Mr. FAIR: I am dealing with the administration of the act, and I am following exactly the line that has been followed by several members this morning.

The CHAIRMAN: I shall have to apply the rule sooner or later, and, I fear, sooner than later. The whole debate has been out of order. I do not wish to appear to be partial. I wish to treat all hon. members equally, but the difficulty is to know where to draw the line. I have already quoted several times standing order 58, which provides that at all times the discussion must be strictly relevant to the section of the bill before the committee. I do invite the cooperation of all hon. gentlemen and ask them to limit their remarks, as much as possible, to the subject matter under discussion.

Mr. FAIR: This morning the minister in charge of the bill suggested that a good deal of latitude be given and the members of the committee gave their consent. I believe the Chair takes direction from members of the house, and I suggest that I have a perfect right to say what I intended to say. It is only a very few words.

The CHAIRMAN: Provided it is confined to something which has a direct relevancy to this particular section of the bill.

Mr. FAIR: I did not intend to take onethird of the time I am taking if there had not been these interruptions. All I wanted to say was that we have some farms, some fairly good, perhaps some poor ones, or some of medium quality, on which some of the [Mr. Fair.] high officials in charge might have been placed for a period of twenty years, alongside a number of old soldier settlers. In that way they could have gained at least a little appreciation of what the soldiers have been going through, and we would have had a more sympathetic administration of the act.

Mr. SHAW: There are one or two observations I have to make which have been inspired by a communication in the form of a resolution which I have received from the Bowden branch of the Canadian Legion in Alberta. But before I read this communication, may I say that farming conditions in that district are generally regarded as favourable. The majority of the members of the Bowden branch of the Canadian Legion are hard-working, energetic farmers, many of whom settled under the soldier settlement scheme, and they have been operating thereunder for approximately twenty years. Many of these settlers, before settling on the land, fought in the mud of Europe to preserve the right to live, and most of them have been fighting in the succeeding twenty years for the same right, though they are not sure yet whether they have attained that right or not. The resolution reads:

Whereas the dominion government is establishing another soldier settlement scheme to rehabilitate servicemen when discharged from the service;

And whereas the last settlement resulted in an enormous percentage of complete failures and a very considerable number of those still operating their farms are hopelessly in debt;

And whereas the proposed scheme is undoubtedly an improvement on the last it still is tying an interest-bearing debt on the settlers which past experiences indicate will ultimately prove disastrous:

Therefore be it resolved by Bowden branch No. 83, B.E.S.L. that no interest be charged to any scheme of rehabilitation, land settlement or otherwise.

Be it further resolved that before constituting any new settlement scheme we strongly urge that steps be taken to see that settlers still operating their soldier settlement farms be eased of some of their burden of debt so that they have a reasonable chance of obtaining title to the land within a few years.

I believe we all welcome this new land settlement scheme in principle. I dare say it will be discovered before long that a certain number of changes will have to be made in it. However, I feel that we should give our support to the general principles of the scheme. One suggestion that has been made of which I do not approve is that these persons be established in settlements next to industrial centres where they might take part-time employment. That is interfering with labour people who have no other way of making a livelihood except by their labour. Moreover, to admit that your settlers will have to go into industry for part-time work is an admission that the scheme is not self-sufficient. I cannot support the suggestion unless it is clearly understood that should that be done it would be for the express purpose of enabling such settlers to take part-time employment the provisions of the bill. Section agreed to.

On section 2-Interpretation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I notice the definition of land is:

elsewhere because they cannot get along under

(b) "land" or "lands" includes granted or ungranted dominion, provincial or private lands . . . and all rights or interests in, or over, or arising out of, and all charges upon, land or lands as herein defined.

What about mineral or oil rights?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My information is that they would not be involved where they run with the title.

Mr. EVANS: Has any consideration been given to settling on the irrigated lands of western Canada which are being developed under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): These lands will be considered with other lands as long as suitable schemes can be devised within the compass and scope of the proposed legislation.

Section agreed to.

On section 3-Appointment of director.

Mr. SHAW: One point about which I am considerably exercised is with respect to the appointment of such officials as supervisors under the soldier settlement board, sometimes referred to as field men. Does the Civil Service Commission of Canada make these appointments, or does the director of soldier settlement make them? Furthermore, if an appointment has been made by the civil service commission, has the director of soldier settlement authority to override the appointment? If the recommendations of the civil service commission are not proper recommendations, we had better do something with the civil service commission and their examiners. I am not criticizing them or saying there is anything wrong with them, but if they have examined the candidate, either orally or by written examination, and the candidate rates at the top of the list and is subsequently appointed by the civil service commission, what authority has the director to upset the whole thing and have the man discharged, as was done in a case in my constituency a year ago?

Veterans' Land Act

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that these appointments will be made in the future, as they have been in the past, by the civil service commission. As to the second question, any dismissals that are necessary are within the terms and conditions and provisions of the Civil Service Act. I have no personal knowledge of the case referred to by the hon. member, but probably the opinion of the director was sought by the civil service commission. All these appointments and dismissals are within the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out that the question the hon. member is raising would come under section 4. We are now on section 3.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Whether a bill of this kind will succeed or fail is largely dependent on the attitude of those administering it. The soldier settlement scheme after the last war was a dismal failure, as has been proved in this house on several occasions. I believe the records show that not more than about 10 per cent of the soldier settlers have established homes of their own on the land. For Saskatchewan I think 10 per cent would be high. Of the 10 per cent who are still on the land, very few have established complete equity in the land, or have been able to pay off their indebtedness from the proceeds of their years of toil. Investigating numerous cases I have found that those who have been successful in paying off their indebtedness have had outside source of income. I have in mind the settlement around Stockholm. About twenty-five settlers went there after the last war, and to-day there are three left, bitterly disillusioned. I have had difficulty in understanding the attitude of the director-

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I must with reluctance rise to a point of order. There is no administration provided for the carrying out of the bill we are now considering. The hon. member is discussing the administration; that I think is not germane to the provisions of the measure now before this committee.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Section 3 has to do with the appointment of director and employees. I am trying to point out how important it is that these men be in sympathy with the men who are placed on the land. I should like to impress upon the government, whatever department administers the act, that the attitude of the sons of these men who took up land under the old scheme is such as to drive them away from a land settlement scheme for veterans. The fact that at the present time there are only 30,000 men in the armed forces who are thinking of going back to the land is proof of the failure of the old scheme.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not correct. It was 30,000 out of 200,000 among whom a survey was made. There are 500,000 in the fighting services at the present time.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Well, 30,000 out of 200,000 is about 15 per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The percentage is 16.6.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What I have further to say as to administration under the old act can be reserved for another time. But unless the director takes into consideration the health of these men, the assistance they have, and looks upon this as a scheme to establish men on the basis of a decent standard of rural life, the whole scheme will fail.

Mr. PERLEY: Is there a possibility that the director of the soldier settlement scheme may be the director under this measure? If so, there should be some consideration of his salary. There should not be two salaries, and it would not be amiss to set out the director's salary in the section.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member's suggestion will be carefully considered at the proper time.

Mr. PERLEY: We should have some assurance. One man should not hold two positions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not the minister entrusted with the administration of the act. All I can say is that my hon. friend's observations will be noted in the proper quarters.

Mr. MARSHALL: I find myself in agreement with hon. members who say that the success or failure of the scheme depends entirely upon the manner in which it is administered. I would ask the minister a question in connection with the explanation given opposite page 3, where it is stated:

This section makes provision for the type of administration. It recommends administration by a director responsible to the minister, rather than administration by a board. Very great responsibility would be vested in the director, and it is deemed wise to establish direct contact between the minister and the director responsible for operations.

What is the advantage to be gained by the act being administered by a director rather than by a board?

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend will recall that in its early stages the old act was administered by a board. The change was made from a board to a director on the theory that a director responsible to a minister of the crown would set up a closer connection with parliament as such than was possible under the old soldier settlement scheme.

Mr. DONNELLY: I notice that one of the duties of the director is the purchasing of agreements of sale, or the buying of lands. In my opinion this is one of the most important provisions in the measure, and it was a failure to carry out this provision properly that practically ruined the old soldier settlement scheme. Too high prices were paid for land. Upon the return of the soldiers to Canada the government decided to buy lands, and they paid two or three times the proper amounts. I hope that under this measure it will be seen that right and proper prices are paid.

I do not know of any more difficult procedure to-day than that of valuing land. I know what I am talking about when I say that it is almost impossible to find a man in western Canada who will put the same value on land as will some other man. You will find the soldier settlement valuator out on the bald prairie, or in the southern part of Saskatchewan, which is known as the bald prairie or the short-grass country, valuing land as low as $10 an acre. Then you may call in a representative from the Saskatchewan farm loan organization, who may value it at $20 an acre. Then you may call in a man from a mortgage company who may value it at $25 an acre. And so we find the same piece of land valued at all the way from $10 to $25 an acre. Each man has a different opinion as to what the land is worth. The value of land depends on whether one is going to get a crop; it depends also on the price one will receive for his wheat. It depends, too, on whether you will reap your crop. Taking all these factors into consideration it is at once apparent that land is worth what one can get out of it, and that is all. When one is placing a value on it he has to be careful about what he is doing. If not, many settlers will go out into the country and find themselves unable to pay for their land.

A man cannot be expected to begin the production of wheat on the $3,500 he is to pay for the land. That is not enough capital to buy land to become a wheat grower. As I have pointed out before, wheat growing is a specialized form of farming, just as much as are the growing of apples or the raising of dairy herds. Ranching or the raising of cattle is also a special kind of farming. This amount of money may be all right for farmers in the northern part of the province, where there are bluffs and mixed farming. But a man is not going to be able to buy enough land with $3,500 to start up wheat farming. He would have to put crop in one half and summerfallow the other half if he is on the bald prairie. The result would be failures such as we have had in the past.

In my part of the province very few soldiers who settled are now in that vicinity making a success of farming. In the last ten years I doubt whether the soldier settlement officials in my district have collected enough money from soldier settlers to pay their own salaries. We do not want that to happen again. This is why I dread that there may be failures such as we had after the last war. When I talk to men in my district they say, "Oh well; any soldier settlement scheme on lands in this district is bound to be a failure". That is the view held by many people, and that is why I say to the minister that if he approaches a scheme of this kind with the idea of putting people out on the bald prairies to grow wheat, he is going to have trouble.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Several times during the debate it has been stated that the last land settlement scheme failed. It did, in a most outstanding way. There are two main requirements for success on a farm; the first is the farm itself, and the second is the farmer. I believe much of the failure of the last scheme was due to the quality of land bought and supplied to the farmer. The farmer may have had his faults, but the low grade of land purchased at the time of the last scheme was perhaps the chief explanation of the failure of that scheme. Obviously the amount of money which can be invested is limited. As soon as it is learned that the government proposes to buy land under a scheme of this kind, every farmer with a gravel pit—that he calls a farm—rushes to the board and tries to pan it off. They did that with much success at the time of the last scheme.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In Ontario.

Mr. ROEBUCK: In Ontario, and, I presume, everywhere else. I am not competent to describe the type of land on which a soldier should be placed, but I am satisfied that those who did buy land under the last scheme were not more competent than I am.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): I do not think that was true of Alberta.

Veterans' Land Act

Mr. ROEBUCK: It may not have been true of Alberta, but from what I have learned about land settlement in the past I am inclined to think much of the failure was due to the miserable quality of soil those people were asked to cultivate. I see in this measure no provision against a repetition of that failure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is a selection committee.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Well, if they are anything like the last selection committee they are not much of an insurance policy. I hope they will be very different under the present minister. I suggest that the government of Canada should never invest money in farm lands on the recommendation of a director selected by the civil service commission, without having a report respecting the purchase-possibly two or three reports-from the dominion agricultural authorities. This bill should make it necessary that there be a recommendation by men who know land, who are experts in land, who know what crops can be grown suitably in a locality, in connection with any land to be settled by these soldiers. The first essential should be a report by somebody who is not too close to the picture, who is not taking part in the negotiations, who would be responsible for saying that the land is suitable for the purposes for which it is to be used. No purchase should be made until such a report is obtained from a disinterested expert.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think this discussion should be under section 9.

The CHAIRMAN: I was just going to draw the hon. member's attention to that. Will hon. gentlemen cooperate with the Chair so that we may proceed in an orderly fashion?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have one suggestion to make, and I do not know whether this is the right section under which to make it. My question has to do with the administration of the act in the future. Governments will change, and—

The CHAIRMAN: Section 2 states that "minister" means the Minister of Mines and Resources.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): All undertakings having to do with soldiers should be under the control of one department, and that department should be headed by a minister who is an ex-service man. That is why I suggest the Department of Pensions and National Health as it is now constituted.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Officers instructors and other employees.

Mr. SHAW: Subsection 1 of this section reads:

The director may from time to time, subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Act, attach to his service such officers, instructors, clerks, stenographers and other employees as the execution of the purpose of this act may require and at such salaries as the governor in council may approve.

We have a civil service commission to administer the Civil Service Act. I do not know whether I am using the right language, but the civil service commission has in its employ several dozen examiners. Calls are sent out for applications to fill vacancies that exist and candidates meet at certain places to take either a written or an oral examination. From what has taken place in certain cases—I do not apply this to the soldier settlement board alone -I must conclude that the civil service commission will be obliged to call in the director of soldier settlement, who will approve or disapprove a man whom the commission may believe to be a suitable appointee. It would appear that the director of soldier settlement can override the civil service commission. If the director of soldier settlement is not consulted before an apointment is made, and he is not satisfied, all he has to do is to raise objection, and a man who has been appointed by the commission may be bounced out on his head, even though the appointment has been made after the commission has taken into consideration his qualifications, his physical condition, and his period of service in the war.

If that be true, why in the world do we spend hundreds of thousands of dollars every year on a civil service commission? Why are we sending civil service examiners from coast to coast at great expense to the people of Canada if their decisions can be overridden by some official at the head of a department? A very important principle is involved. If the civil service commission make appointments, let their decision stand. If the heads of departments-I am not speaking of cabinet ministers-are to make the appointments, why have this camouflage of a civil service, civil service examiners and a civil service commission? It will take a certain amount of explanation before I shall be satisfied in this connection. If I were to give the particulars of a certain case I would be ruled out of order; therefore I shall not ask any question as to a particular case about which I am greatly exercised. I should like to know whether the civil service commission are going [Mr. J. A. Ross.]

to appoint field supervisors, for example, or will that be done by the director of soldier settlement?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They will be appointed by the civil service commission. I regret that I am not familiar with the case mentioned by my hon. friend, because it is not in my department.

Mr. SHAW: Some minister is going to be made familiar with the particulars of this case. Does the director of soldier settlement sit in with the civil service commission when they are considering applications? Must an appointment meet with the approval of the director of soldier settlement before it can be made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend is dealing with the Soldier Settlement Act, of which I have very little knowledge. I cannot really answer his question with regard to administration. We are dealing with the future, and I am just answering questions which have to do with the future.

Mr. SHAW: I appreciate the position in which the minister finds himself, but it is important to determine to a certain extent what is going to happen in the future. The minister should examine into this.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to look into it. Will my hon. friend be kind enough to give me the particulars privately?

Mr. SHAW: I have no objection to that.

Mr. WRIGHT: We have one minister introducing a bill which is to be administered by another minister. The result is that we are not getting the information we should get. The minister who is to administer the act is not here.

The CHAIRMAN: We are not discussing the Soldier Settlement Act; we are discussing Bill No. 65. To a question put to him, the minister answered that this bill dealt with the future. I do not believe it is in order to press the minister for information in connection with the administration of another act which is not before the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am simply pointing out that we have a minister introducing a bill which will be enforced by another minister.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister has answered the questions put in connection with the administration of the bill now before the committee. No hon. member has the right to inquire from a minister with respect to another act not now before the committee.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think it would have been the proper procedure to have the minister present who will have the administration of this legislation. If the Minister of Pensions and National Health wants to sponsor the bill, it is quite all right, but surely the minister under whose jurisdiction it will come should be present.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The government as a whole will be bound by any answer that I may make to any question asked. I can assure my hon. friend on that point. When I stated, as the minister in charge of this bill, that appointments will be made by the civil service commission, I am responsible, and so is the government, for that declaration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us clarify the position. Section 4 gives the power to the director to employ, subject only to the applicable provisions of the Civil Service Act, all the temporary staff that may be needed at the inception and perhaps the most active stage of this scheme. The government has the power under the Civil Service Act to appoint temporaries. That is exactly the power that is being vested in the director under section 4. The civil service commission will not appoint these temporary employees; they will be appointed by the director. That is the principle involved in this section. I wonder whether the members understand it, and if they do understand it, do they approve the principle?

Secondly, under subsection 2, "all such appointees shall perform such duties and functions as the director may prescribe." Somebody, of course, has to prescribe the duties and functions of these temporary employees. But subsection 3 provides that officers attached to the present soldier settlement board are to be sloughed off and put under this act. The whole object of subsection 3 is to give the power to do that. It says:

Notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, the Civil Service Superannuation Act, or any other act, a civil servant, who, at the time of his appointment or employment under or pursuant to the provisions of this act, is a contributor under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act. . . .

And so forth. By some process the civil servant is to be sloughed off from the one department and put into the other. That is contemplated by subsection 3, and we might as well understand it. Do we approve the principle? I think hon members ought to understand the intention of section 4 before we pass it. The minister may say that all appointments are to be made by the civil service commission, but, with all due respect, that is not correct. The appointment of temporaries will be made by the director, subject only to the limitations in the Civil Service Act, which are mighty little with respect to temporaries.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is of universal application, with the exception of transfers of civil servants from other departments to this new department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If civil servants can be transferred now from one department to another, why the necessity of subsection 3 of section 4? It is to preserve their rights, I suppose.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But it means more than that. I think the minister ought to tell us exactly what it does mean.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It means exactly what I said. All appointments, with the exception of transfers, are made by the civil service commission, within the terms of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will it be possible, as under the old act, for the director to override appointments made by the civil service commission?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am giving only my personal opinion, but I think the only exception would be where the director thought a person was not suitable or technically qualified. He could then make representations to the commission, where the ultimate decision must rest.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: After the commission has made an appointment and the man has been told to report, will it be possible for the director to override their decision?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The civil service commission establish an eligible list. Then they consult the officials of the department concerned, who may make representations as to whether or not in their opinion the person chosen is suitable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister must know that under the Civil Service Act, after the civil service commission has given a candidate a certificate, he may be rejected by the department. That has been done a thousand times in the last few years. They have to show cause, of course, but I have known cases where a man has been rejected because the department wanted to get somebody who was a little further down on the eligible list. That is a negation of the principle of the Civil Service Act. I point this out so that hon. members will understand what the power is, what the practice is, and what the ultimate result may be.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is exactly what happened in the case my hon, friend referred to a few minutes ago.

Mr. SHAW: I have only one observation to make in this regard. I must conclude that the authority vested in the civil service commission exists in theory and nowhere else. It is time that this house should demand an examination into the operations of the civil service commission—not that I am criticizing that body, but to find out what authority they have and what interference they must put up with in order to remain civil service commissioners.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The note to section 4 says that this section contemplates employment of temporary staff. What period of time does the soldier have, after the war is over, within which to indicate that he wants to come under this scheme? Is it one month, six months, a year, or a number of years?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no limitation whatsoever.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Should there not be some indication of that in the bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Other means will be taken to advise those who might wish to become applicants.

Mr. WRIGHT: What publicity is to be given to the fact that this enactment is in existence for the benefit of the soldiers, so that they may start to acquire the 10 per cent that is necessary to come within the provisions of the act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We have already distributed small cards amongst those in the service, but as soon as the bill is approved steps will be taken to see that its contents are thoroughly publicized amongst those serving Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If hon. members will look at section 24 of chapter 22 of the revised statutes of 1927, which is the Civil Service Act, they will observe that appointments are to be made on probation. It says:

The deputy head-

That would be the director in this case: [Mr. R. B. Hanson.] The deputy head may, at any time before the expiration of six months, reject any person assigned or appointed to any position under his control or direction, or he may extend the period of probation within which such person may be rejected for another six months; and the cause of rejection, or the reason for extending the period of probation, shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission.

2. Where a person is rejected, the commission shall thereupon select another person to take the place of the one rejected.

3. The commission shall, after investigation, decide whether the name of a rejected person shall be struck off the list as unfit for the service generally or whether he shall be allowed a trial in some other position for which he may be eligible.

So that any deputy minister can frustrate the appointments made by the civil service commission. Let us have that clearly understood.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): For cause.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It must be for cause, but one cause is pretty nearly as good as another. He can invent a cause. I know of a case where that was done two or three times until the right man was obtained. That is, of course, an abuse of the principle of the legislation.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Was he a good Tory?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, it was for another reason—imagine what you like. I am pointing out what the legal position is. There is no doubt about it.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Director to be a corporation sole.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It does appear to me that this is setting up an entirely new principle, the creation of a corporation sole as a crown company or crown agency. What is the reason for it? The soldier settlement board was set up under a statute; it was a corporation, and the conveyances of land were all vested in it. I suppose the only difference between that creation and this, is that this is a corporation sole. It is putting very wide powers in the hands of one man, the director. I suggest that it is a departure and rather a questionable practice. I suppose provision is made elsewhere in the bill for someone else to be appointed immediately if the director dies. Where is that section?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I inform my hon. friend that the director of the old soldier settlement board was made a corporation sole in 1935, when my hon. friend himself was in the ministry.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was because the scope of the act had been narrowed so little. This is going to be on an enlarged scale.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The principle is the same.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is. I am not sure that I approve the principle, notwithstanding what may have been done in 1935. However, I simply call attention to the fact that this is establishing a legal entity as a corporation sole and defining the powers of the director. It could not be done, I think, in the right of the crown; it could not be conveyed to the crown. I agree it has to be done by some holding body.

Mr. MARSHALL: I want to come back to the question of the power that has been given to one individual as a director. The question is premised upon a recommendation which was submitted to the committee by the provincial committee for reestablishment of veterans in Saskatchewan. It says this:

We also feel that every effort should be made to eliminate any suggestion of political influence or favoritism in the acquisition of the lands and we fear that if the director, and that means the minister, is the sole arbitrator, that, no matter how well he does his work, nor how free the selection may be from the influences suggested, there will always be room for the suspicion that such influences were effective and such suspicion will give ground for agitation later on.

Were any other representations received, either by the minister or by the committee, with respect to this matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. I read that very carefully. In fact, it is an excellent representation which was sent down, I believe, by Brigadier-General Ross, who was chairman of that committee in Saskatchewan. That was made to a committee of this house before additional provisions were added to the bill as it was introduced and sent to the special committee, one dealing with regional and advisory boards, and the other dealing with provincial boards, with regard to the right and power of rescission. I am quite sure these provisions meet the objections which were raised by the Saskatchewan committee.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What does section 5, subsection 6, mean in so far as British Columbia is concerned? Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It means that any land acquired by the director can be assessed by the taxing authority just the same as any other land can be.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: So that there will be no misunderstanding, is it confined to the realization of taxes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The powers vested in the director here are extensive. "For the purposes of acquiring, holding, conveying and transferring—any of the property which he is by this act authorized to acquire, hold, convey or transfer" he is granted full powers, and the section establishes in him a legal entity and corporate power to handle the whole of the property. Under subsection 4 he shall have an impress seal inscribed with the words "The director, the veterans' land acts". It appears to me that this power would be more appropriately vested in the minister, would it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; my hon. friend will find, if he looks in the old act, that the same powers were vested in the director of the soldier settlement board, as the result of consideration by various committees, in days gone by. I have here in parallel columns the old act and the present bill.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The coat of arms, I suggest, should include a scale with a pound of flesh and Shylock's knife, that is if it is to represent the same administrator as under the Soldier Settlement Act.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Under section 5, subsection 6, what will be the standing in connection with municipal taxes, and the hedging and ditching taxes so far as the provincial government is concerned?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that any taxes of any nature whatsoever assessed by a properly constituted taxing authority will be a charge against the land.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I can add something to that. Under subsection 6 any land which is vested in the director is made liable to taxation, and recourse may be had to the land itself. But the taxes are not a debt of the director and therefore he could not be sued by any municipality for the amount of a debt. Is not that the distinction? Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was asked by my colleague the hon. member for Yale who has had to go out for a moment, to inquire if any plan has been established for the acquisition of the land. How are the lands to be acquired? Will a survey be made? Under the old act—I suppose we can constantly refer to that because of the experience under it—

The CHAIRMAN: Section 7.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it will become germane to section 5, subsection 1. A soldier would see a piece of land which took his eye, we will say, and he felt he would like to have it. He brought it to the attention of the authorities, and if other things were equal he usually got that piece of land. Will the soldier have anything to do under this legislation as to what particular piece of land will be bought for him? In other words, putting it on a principle, will he have the right of exercising choice—which, of course, is a very important factor in all our lives?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My information is that the soldier will have a certain right to choose, but subject to the land which he desires being approved by regional committees, who will undertake a close inspection of the values and suitability of the land, and the soil itself. Really it is a commingling between his choice and that of the committee.

Mr. STIRLING: The question my colleague asked is one I wanted to ask. Will the minister describe the plan the government is going to form in buying this land? Are the regional committees to be asked to look over this section and that section and indicate which properties are suitable for the purpose, and then is the government going to buy, and say to the returned man, "You can choose from these"?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My information is that it is contemplated that some land may be acquired before operations are actually undertaken, but not in every case. Conditions would vary in every province; they would vary in British Columbia and the prairies, the maritimes, and Ontario. Although blocks of land might be acquired, no plans have yet been developed.

Mr. STIRLING: That is the real answer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have not developed a plan at all?

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In the event of there being a question as to priority of taxation as between the federal government, in this settlement scheme, dykes and drainage, and municipal taxation, who would have the priority? For example, if there is principal. or principal and interest of a certain amount, to be paid to the federal government, and there is a certain amount to be paid to the provincial government for dykes and drainage, and also municipal taxation, say, $25 in each case, what would be the situation? I know it is hard to answer these questions, but that is what we are here for. Let us say there is $100 to be paid out. The farmer has to pay $25 to the federal government in principal and interest, $25 for dyking, $25 for ditching, and $25 to the municipality. Will he lose his farm if he does not pay them all?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I regret I am not familiar with all the details of the situation.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You should be.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If the land were acquired under the conditions mentioned by my hon. friend, the tax would have to be assessed and paid. There is no priority that I know of.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is not clear to me. I am not finding fault, but I want to find a way out. The farmer has a certain amount of revenue from the farm. He has to find a certain sum for dyking and ditching, for municipal taxation and for principal and interest to the federal government. I am not referring to the old act, but as I understand this new scheme he has to pay to the federal government, in the form of principal and interest, a certain amount, on the $3,600 or whatever it is, and he also has to meet taxation. In some places in western Canada there are ditching and dyking taxes and municipal taxes, all of which have to be paid. There is only a certain amount of revenue. How can the farmer pay all these if he has to pay the federal government also? Suppose the federal government's bill called for $100 and he had only $100; would he pay all that to the federal government and disregard the provincial government and the municipal authorities, and if so would he lose his farm in consequence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member is discussing a matter which comes under section 15. I wonder if he would wait until we come to that section.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I shall be delighted to deal with it then.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What the hon. member is trying to elucidate is this. A crown impost usually has priority, but this property is not the property of the crown, legally speaking, and I think they would be on a parity. I venture that opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The point is that under section 15 the director has the right to pay taxes and assessments and collect again from the soldier settler at the rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest.

Mr. MARSHALL: Will the director assume the taxes from the time that land is acquired?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Training and instruction in agriculture.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under section 6 is it intended to use existing facilities for training these farmers, or has the government some elaborate scheme—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no other scheme.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May we take that as an accepted statement, that no new costly and elaborate scheme will be set up involving a substantial outlay—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury) : - in placing veterans with farmers for instruction. I assume that will mean courses of instruction at local agricultural schools, which I think are very good. Subsection (b) certainly contemplates setting up a staff of instructors and inspectors to assist the veterans with information and instruction in farming. They would be travelling instructors, I presume, and arrangements will be made with the respective provincial departments or the extension departments of the universities. This gives the director pretty wide power. And what about the question of assistance while the veteran settler is undergoing training? Is provision being made for him under some other authority?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is taken care of in order in council P.C. 7633.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the one referred to on the opposite page.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The post-discharge order. I have not the full information by me at the moment, but benefits have been paid under these classifications, under that order, and I shall be glad to give the amount expended and the number of beneficiaries up to the present time. The question was asked some time ago. With regard to the training of men, the idea is to have real practical training with farmers already established, and the supervisors referred to are supervisors who will give advice and help after the settler is on the land.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it contemplated that there shall be a great army of inspectors and instructors all over the country?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, it is quite possible that the government will have dozens and dozens of inspectors throughout the country. I can see a flock of people who will want jobs under this act—and they will not have to be appointed by the civil service commission, but by the Minister of Agriculture. We know what that means.

An hon. MEMBER: Adding to the machinery.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Part of the political machine.

Mr. WRIGHT: I wish to make just a few observations, not on what the section contains, but on what it implies. It is implied in this section that we shall establish on the farms men who have no practical knowledge of farming and we shall have to send them to practical farmers to receive instruction. With agriculture in the state in which it has been for the last ten years, I do not see why we should take men from other occupations and establish them in farming under government assistance. One might as well train a thousand barbers and set them up in Canada with government assistance when we have plenty of barbers already. Until there is definite indication that there is need of more men in agriculture, I protest strongly against this particular section. If there is need for these men in agriculture it is all right to send them to practical farmers to receive instruction, and they would probably be better instructed in farming in that way than in any other. Under this section these men, if they have been engaged in agriculture, should receive a short course in the agricultural college during the winter months. On that short course they should be taught some standard system of bookkeeping.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is involved in the section.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, but in this course some standard system of bookkeeping should be taught to these settlers so that they will be able to keep a set of books to which the director and officials of the department can have access so that they may know exactly the financial situation of the settler and be able to show him where he was making mistakes or could improve. A definite mistake is being made if we intend under this bill to establish a lot of men in agriculture when there is no need for agricultural products.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the basis of the veteran's right to training?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that the basis would be, first, his application to become established as a settler; then the judgment of the officials of the board as to whether he was ready and suitable, on the advice of selection committees and others, to take immediate possession of land that was available. If he was a man with an agricultural background but slight experience he might have a course in an agricultural college in the winter, or a short practical course on the farm.

Mr. MARSHALL: Section 6 is more or less a joke. I should like to read what is said at page 2 of the report regarding the qualifications of these individuals to settle on the land. Mr. W. S. Woods is giving evidence before the committee:

Much has been said about the necessity for being rigid in the qualification of those who are accepted for settlement. I agree that qualification should be strict and should be carefully done, but am inclined to think there is a tendency to attach too much importance to a background of actual experience.

In my judgment, farming is a matter of temperament as well as experience. I have encountered settlers with a long background of experience who have not made a success, and have also encountered many with limited experience who have made first rate farmers once they acquired the requisite knowledge.

That is not all. He says:

The suitability of the wife is just as important, if not more important, than that of [Mr. Wright.]

the man and should be taken into consideration when qualifying men for settlement under the new act. Unless she is going to be a real helpmate to him and is temperamentally suited to farm life she might well be the cause of failure of the enterprise.

So that it is not a matter only of how well he may be trained or how excellent his knowledge of agriculture may be; he must have the proper temperament, and also his wife must be suited to farm life. Then, to wind it all up, he says:

It is felt that with an overhead debt not exceeding two-thirds of the cost of the land and improvements, or one-half the cost of the land, improvements, and stock and equipment, with an interest rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent and given reasonable luck, the men established under this measure have at least as good a chance of success as the average farmer.

He must have the education and temperament; his wife must be suitable, and he must have a certain amount of luck. These are the qualifications of the supermen who are to be placed on the farm.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am inclined to agree that this does not look so good. It seems to me the government is leaving the way open to get out of a lot of headaches arising from conditions that will exist when this war is over. When men came back after the last war one of the best ways the government had to get rid of them was to push them off on a farm. They were permitted to stay there as long as they could eke out an existence, and in a great many cases that is about all it was. You cannot take men who have no desire for farming, no inclination along that line, put them on a farm with an instructor and make farmers out of them. Nor can you send them to an agricultural school for six months and expect them to get anywhere, unless they are agriculturally inclined. Perhaps to a limited degree the section may be applied effectively; but certainly if it is the intention of the government after the war to send a lot of these men out on farms, give them agricultural instruction and undertake to make them worthy farmers, the government is going to find them in a very difficult position before many years. Unless these men are inclined to farming they will never make it go with a little training. As the hon. member for Melfort pointed out, what are you going to do with all these farmers when you get them on the land? Even now we are producing a surplus of all these things, and when the war is over there will be a great influx into the farming field; what will you do with the produce? Prices will be so much reduced because of increased production that it will be a miracle if the government is able to sustain the market and sustain these men on a decent standard of living. It would be more sensible to endeavour to expand industry and make more provision for returned men to develop in industry.

Mr. MacNICOL: You cannot do that under a free trade government.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Now we have the big industrialists saying "we do not want these men—"

Mr. MacNICOL: No, we want them.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): "--push them out on the farm where they can starve without so much noise."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are not suggesting that for a moment.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The thing must be looked at from a business point of view. There are too many farmers now; that is why the farmers are not organized, why they are not getting decent prices for the things they are raising. If farmers cannot make a decent standard of living in these times when they at least have a chance of sending their produce outside the country, what are they going to do after the war when you have thousands upon thousands of these men pushed on the farm? They will be raising a great amount of farm products; prices will drop, and then where will they be? Unless the new minister is a wizard on this job it will result in the same financial condition as prevailed after the last war, and that is not a desirable situation. I am afraid the results of this provision are not going to be as rosy as the minister contemplates.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If all these predictions that there is no future for agriculture in Canada are accepted, of course you might as well wash out this or any similar measure. I am glad to know that two hon. members on this side have declared to-day their belief that agriculture has a future in Canada. If it has not, what is to be the future of Canada? Agriculture has a future in this country and it should be the government's policy to see that it is bright. It has not been done under present conditions, and one of the reasons is the suddenness with which the government clamped down its price ceilings. It froze agricultural products at an uneven level, and there is not enough flexibility to allow that to be evened up. That is one of the main complaints I have about government policy. It froze agricultural prices at a relatively low and uneven level. If you want confirmation of that, compare prices of agricultural products in Canada and in the United States.

Take wool, for example. We are being asked to raise more wool in Canada. Look at the price!—frozen at 25 cents, while across the line it is 41 cents. I know that the principle for which I am contending is a good one. I do not attempt at this time to lay down any principle for the rehabilitation of agriculture, because this is not the proper time to do so. But I do say that if we are going to take a defeatist attitude with regard to agriculture the bill is washed out.

There is something in the point made by the hon. member for Melfort, that until such time as agriculture can be made more profitable in Canada we should not take men away from other vocations or occupations and put them on the land unless they know something about what they are going to do. You cannot take a clerk from a drygoods store, send him to the war and then bring him back and make a farmer out of him. You cannot take people from London, place them on farms in New Brunswick and expect them to be successful, no matter how much assistance they may get from the government. You cannot take a lawyer from his office and make a farmer out of him; no one would argue that for a moment.

The minister should declare the government's intention. In establishing this policy is it the intention of the government to invite people who have had no experience in agriculture heretofore to go on the land?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that in a large degree this scheme should be limited to farmers, sons of farmers, or those who show that they have not only a desire to go on the land and a love of the soil, but also an adaptability to that kind of work, and whose records show that they have already had some background and experience in agriculture. The scheme should not go beyond that stage. If the minister will give some assurance that that is the intention—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the intention.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If that be so, then I suggest that the government should adhere to that policy, and should not invite to go on the land or try to make farmers of people who are not suited to that type of work. It should not put square pegs in round holes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This point was discussed in committee, and unless I have misunderstood the minister, he said it was not the intention to take under this land settlement plan any one without agricultural background or experience. Is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That was my understanding; otherwise I would have disagreed violently with those sections. There are a great many young men with agricultural background, men who have been raised on farms but who as yet are not efficient farmers. I believe it was Professor Hope who pointed out in a detailed survey across the country that under present conditions not more than 2 per cent of our farmers are operating on an efficient basis. If before becoming settlers some of these young chaps could be placed with efficient farmers, under the scheme set up by the Department of Pensions and National Health, they could learn a great deal about efficient farming methods.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before getting their farms?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes. They might receive their training either through that scheme or from the agricultural colleges. If the present 2 per cent of our farming population could be increased to any appreciable degree it would be a step in the right direction. I agree with what was said by the hon. member for Melfort. If we can increase the small percentage of our farmers who keep books, and who know exactly what their losses or profits have been, we shall have done something worth while. It is my understanding now that no one without agricultural background or experience will be brought in under this scheme. If that plan is carried out it will be worth while, and we shall be assisting our young farmers to become more efficient producers.

Mr. PERLEY: The point raised by the hon. member for Souris is worthy of consideration. I would be opposed to any extensive scheme for the training of men to go on farms. To a large extent the future of agriculture depends on land settlement, and if after the war we expect men to come from Great Britain to settle on our land, we should certainly, however, give consideration to our own men first.

I agree that the method described by the hon. member for Souris is the best one for the training of farmers, and I say that because I have had some experience along those lines. In the early days from ten to fifteen men were employed on my father's farm. My father, who was a former member of the house and of the senate, had a scheme under which he got young men from the maritime provinces and some from England to spend a year or two on his farm. Those men were employed at reasonable wages, and some of them are now my neighbours, and the best possible farmers. They came from England without experience in farming, but they learned. Many men who have not had actual farming experience could be placed with good farmers throughout Canada, and I know many farmers would be pleased to take those men and give them a course in farming for a year. Such a course would be to the advantage of the men, and during the term of their instruction they would would receive reasonable wages. I believe that procedure would prove more beneficial than any training scheme possible of development. Mr. MacNICOL: How many instructors and

Mr. MacNICOL: How many instructors and inspectors are there in the 106 farms operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway at Tupper, British Columbia? I believe they have about 23,000 acres at that point. I venture to say there are very few inspectors or instructors.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed they have only one inspector.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would this scheme call for a greater proportion of inspectors? I believe the farmers who have settled on the railway property did not have farming experience. They had worked in factories in the Sudetenland, and were brought out here to these farms. I understand the Canadian Pacific Railway have trained them to the point where they are fairly efficient farmers. They are making good, and seem to be satisfied.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Purchase, et cetera, of lands, buildings and other property.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I note in the section the words "and commercial fishing equipment". I render thanks to the minister and the committee for not forgetting the man who for a long time in Canada, and especially on our eastern coast, has to a large extent been forgotten. People from the west talk about the trials and tribulations of western farmers in time of drought. I should have liked them to see the conditions of the fishing population of the maritime provinces in days gone by. Last summer in August I interviewed a fisherman at Passamaquoddy Bay who told me that up to that date his total catch takings had been less than $25. I said to him, "How can you live?" He said, "I cannot go on any longer."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Was he a lobster fisherman?

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; he was a sardine fisherman. It was not the fault of the price or of market conditions, because there was a market at the big cannery at Blacks Harbour for his catch. The fact was that the fish had not arrived; I have seen them delayed until the fall of the year.

There is another fisheman there, known as the shore or line fisherman, the price of whose products for many years has been so low as to be most discouraging. How can he hope to maintain his family? I have watched the catch of those shore fishermen go to the factories where it is processed, filleted and sent to the markets across the country. Not so long ago for a large-sized haddock in my own city I paid 87¹/₂ cents. I just could not believe the grocer when he told me the price of the fish, because I had bought salmon for less than that. It was a large sized haddock weighing seven or eight pounds when dressed, but I venture to say that the shore fisherman did not get more than five or six cents for that fish. There is a considerable spread between the price paid to the primary producer and what the consumer has to pay. I do not know how you are going to handle the situation. The fish goes from the fisherman to the factory where the processing takes place. There is a considerable loss in processing, and then the fish is packed for consumption. There are also transportation costs and retailing costs. The spread is terrible, but I do not know any way in which it can be overcome.

I know there has been a most substantial enlistment from the eastern provinces, and I want to give credit to the committeeperhaps more credit is due to the committee than to the department-for including this class of person and providing for his rehabilitation in the business he knows best. It may be that there will be considerable loss in connection with this. I do not know, but time and experience will tell. These men are as much entitled to be rehabilitated in the business they know best and to which they may desire to return as any young farmer or farmer's son who wants to go back to the land. They form a substantial part of our population, especially in constituencies which front on ocean waters.

I want to send out this warning. Great care will have to be exercised in the expenditure of this public money to prevent loss. Fishermen's equipment is very perishable property. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier) will agree with me in that. One storm may ruin the whole thing, and the government must be prepared to accept a substantial loss in connection with this proposal because of circumstances beyond the control of the fisherman-settler, if I may so term him. Nevertheless I am prepared-I was going to say, take a gamble, but it is not quite as bad as that—to see the country back these men and rehabilitate them. As I say, however, the greatest care must be exercised in seeing how much money is expended. There is provided in the bill a limitation of $4,800, with $1,200 for equipment. This does not necessarily mean that each man will have to have the maximum. Is $1,200 enough for a fisherman's equipment? Will his home be included in the $4,800? In the case of the farmer, $3,600 is provided for land, improvements and building material, and $1,200 for stock and equipment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This equipment would compare with the live stock on the farm.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose it is to be allotted on the theory that $3,600 would be for his home and $1,200 for his equipment. Along the bay of Fundy, $3,600 will buy a very fine fisherman's home, but in these days of power boats and expensive nets and other equipment, $1,200 will not go very far. I am not qualified to express an opinion or to speak dogmatically, but I would think that there should be a little leeway; that the one might be extended and the other reduced.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If there were two returned soldiers, I should think they could get along very nicely with $2,400.

Mr. POTTIER: I approve heartily the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). This is a step in the right direction, one of the things that we seldom see. The fisherman is now being placed in the same category as the farmer. I have been here for a number of years and have heard a great deal about the farmer being a person who is developing our natural resources, and he has been placed in a privileged class. The magnitude of the farming resources of Canada has brought that about, but there is no reason why the fisherman should not be in the same class. He is an important citizen. While the fishing industry may not be quite as extensive as farming, it is just as important in so far as the individual is concerned. I commend the government and the committee for developing this policy.

Mr. NEILL: I am inclined to agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) with regard to the division of the money. Three thousand six hundred dollars would buy a house out of proportion to the value of the gear, because $1,200 at the outside will not buy very much gear if it includes a boat. I notice section 7 refers to commercial fishing equipment, and I should like to know if that is defined anywhere else in the bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not think it is.

Mr. NEILL: A year from now this may be defined by some official as meaning not a boat but only a net or something of that kind. It should be defined.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): As I recall, that point was discussed by the committee, and the committee declined to make any specific allocation as between boats and equipment. They preferred to have a lump sum allocated for fishing equipment, whether it be boats or gear or part of the one and part of the other.

Mr. NEILL: Is the minister certain that the words "commercial fishing equipment" would include a boat? If I were asked what fishing equipment was I would say it was the gear used on a boat, not the boat itself. A boat is not equipment. It is like a car which you buy and put equipment on. Furniture is the equipment of a house, but does not include a house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was certainly the intention of the committee that that should be included. The definition drawn up by the drafting counsel referred to boat as well as to gear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The same equipment as a truck would be on a farm.

Mr. NEILL: I can understand that the committee intended that, but a year from now will these actual words on this page mean that? Can the minister guarantee that the words "commercial fishing equipment" include boats?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I can, and I will see that the regulations cover the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. STIRLING: It is not at all clear to me from this wording that a fisherman's house is covered by the section.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The drafting was intended to cover that. Section 9 provides $3,600 for a home as apart from live stock and equipment, and then provision is made to substitute "commercial fishing equipment" for "live stock and farm equipment" in other sections of the bill. The same benefits go to the settler who is a fisherman as go to the settler who is a [Mr. Neill.] farmer. If the hon, member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) will look at subsection 2 of section 9 he will see that the point he raised is covered.

Mr. WRIGHT: This is the section under which the director may purchase land. In most of the provinces extensive surveys of different soil types have been made, and I want to recommend to the director that these be considered in the purchase of land. No land should be purchased which does not come within the first two most productive types of soil. It will mean a lot to the success of this scheme if the right type of land is purchased. While we cannot put all these provisions in the bill, I do not think that point can be stressed too much. Land should not be purchased unless it comes within the better types of soil as surveyed by the various provincial departments.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall see that the suggestion of the hon. member is carefully looked into.

Mr. MacNICOL: Section 7 reads in part: The director may, for the execution of any of the purposes of this act,

(a) purchase by agreement, at prices which to him shall seem reasonable, or—

I hope that anything I said this morning advising against rocky or swampy farms being purchased on behalf of soldier settlers will not be taken as a reflection on the county of Lanark to which I referred, because otherwise, if the director were not thoroughly awake to the opportunities in Lanark county, he might not direct his eyes toward it as a suitable county in which to buy farms on behalf of the soldier settler. Let me say at once that there is no finer agricultural county than Lanark and no more magnificent agricultural townships than Ramsay, Drummond, Dal-housie, Lanark, Beckwith, Bathurst and many others. I had no intention at all of intimating that the county of Lanark had very much rocky land in it because, as a matter of fact, it is a fertile and prolific county. I was simply urging that the soldier settler be placed on land where from the very beginning he would have a reasonable opportunity of winning out, and of course, he could not do that on a farm of 100 acres of rock, of which unfortunately there are a few not only in Lanark but in other counties as well.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Section 7 provides that the director may by agreement purchase land at prices which to him seem reasonable. I recall a section which said that prices must be agreed upon by a judge of the county court and a representative of the legion. Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The committee to which my hon. friend refers, on which sits a county court judge, is the committe dealing with a rescission of contract. If the director decided to have a contract rescinded, the committee would review that decision. Then under section 34 regional or provincial advisory committees may be appointed to advise the director in connection with the selection of lands and the suitability of the applicant.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I was simply asking for information. On page 5 of the bill, under the heading "Acquirement of lands and other property," section 7 provides:

The director may, for the execution of any of the purposes of this act,

(a) purchase by agreement, at prices which to him shall seem reasonable, or

(b) in any other manner acquire by consent or agreement from his majesty in the right of Canada or from any province or municipal authority, or from any person, firm or corporation.

I do not want to see again the unfortunate policy that was followed in soldier settlement after the last war, and as I understand section 7 of this bill and subsequent sections, if the director cannot agree to a certain price for a piece of land, the question is submitted to a committee composed of a county court judge and a representative appointed by the Canadian Legion. Am I correct in that? In other words, the soldier may have an idea of what a certain piece of land is worth and the director may have his idea. There should be a body, consisting of a county court judge, a representative of the Canadian Legion, and so on who would more or less be a check on the director. I understand there is such a provision in the bill. Am I correct in that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The only section that would give the director the discretion to consult in regard to prices would be section 34, which provides for the setting up of advisory committees to advise in respect of the selection of lands and other matters of that kind as may be referred to such committees by the director. No doubt he would consult such a committee as to the fairness of prices in any particular region.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In other words, sections 7 and 34 are tied in together. Am I correct in that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They would be in practice, yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Sale of land, et cetera, to veterans.

Veterans' Land Act

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There has been considerable discussion whether the $1,200 was sufficient for stock and equipment. While there is plenty of room for argument, the decision of the committee was that this settlement scheme was to be, first of all, a way of life for the returned men and their dependents, and second, a business undertaking. I hope that under this bill—this was agreed to in committee—where three or four or half a dozen settlers in a community—I am not advocating community settlement—desire to cooperate in purchasing power equipment, it will be possible for them to do so. Is provision made for that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that in practice the administration would have to be more or less certain that these men would be prepared to cooperate in agricultural development.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Such a provision is very important. The hon. member for Wood Mountain said this afternoon that he hoped there would be no more settlers in his part of the country who would be expected to produce wheat, because they would be failures. The hon. member for Melfort pointed out that the soldier settlers would not have enough money to buy the necessary equipment. I do not think we should put settlers on the land with the idea of expecting them to produce wheat in the future as it has been produced in the past. I made reference this morning to the wheat agreement at Washington from which I should like to quote article 11 (production control):

1. The governments of Argentina, Australia, Canada and the United States of America shall adopt suitable measures to ensure that the production of wheat in their territories does not exceed the quantity needed for domestic requirements and the basic export quotas and maximum reserve stocks for which provision is hereinafter made.

That is something we should keep in mind when we are drafting legislation of this kind. Then article 111, dealing with stocks of wheat, provides that Canada's minimum should be 80 million bushels and its maximum 275 million bushels. This is a four-year agreement, and if we farry it out we shall have to change our agricultural set-up in this country, whether we like it or not. That is something we must keep in mind, and I am glad to have the assurance of the minister that a small number of farmers will be able to cooperate in the purchase of power equipment to reduce their overhead.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the $1,200 mentioned in paragraph (c) part of the $3,600 mentioned in paragraph (a), or is it additional ? Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is additional.

Mr. MacNICOL: In other words, a total of $4,800?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The idea was this. The hon. member for Haldimand raised the point in the committee that a man might not take up a holding worth $4,800, but might take up one costing $3,600, and yet he might need $1,200 for equipment.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is very important. Could the total for land be $3,600 and the remainder of the $4,800 go for the purchase of equipment?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That was not in the bill as introduced, but that is exactly the change that was made by the special committee.

Mr. QUELCH: The explanatory note on the page opposite section 9 states:

It will be observed, however, that there is no ceiling as to the cost price of land if the veteran is in a position to pay all costs in excess of $3,600. There will probably be very few such cases, but it was not felt that the veteran with considerable capital of his own should be held to a $3,600 farm.

I understand from that, that if a soldier had saved and had in the bank $4,000, there would be nothing to prevent him from acquiring a farm valued at $7,600. In other words, he would put up $4,000 and get the board to put up $3,600. Is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that that is the situation.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Veteran deemed a tenant at will.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: This section reads: Every veteran holding or occupying land sold by the director shall until the director grants or conveys the land to him be deemed a tenant at will.

What does that mean? A man may be a tenant in a municipal area for some fifteen or twenty years, contributing his full share of taxation, yet having none of the rights of municipal occupation. That is the position of a tenant. You know, Mr. Chairman, what I mean by "municipal occupation". For once I am correct in my legal terms. He cannot be a councillor or reeve or alderman. Why he should want to run I do not know, but under this section he cannot.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This section is particularly necessary in respect of administration, to obtain payments from production on the farm without starting proceedings for cancellation of the contract; to protect the administrator or administrators upon advances made for taxes, and to administer a separate farm if he has to absent himself therefrom.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I appreciate very much the legal expression given by the minister, but it does not mean a thing to me. I will try to put in as plain English as I can what I am trying to get at. As I understand it, $4,800 is the total amount the soldier can borrow. He may pay back $4,600, but so long as he still owes $200 he is still living in Russia, Italy, or some gestapo country where he has no rights from the government. I do not think the minister or committee has realized what the section means. It may not mean much in unorganized territories, but in certain organized territories in the far west it means a great deal. A man may borrow $4,800 from the people of Canada, because he fought on behalf of us and enabled us to live under these conditions; he may pay $4,600 back, and yet-and I am sure hon. members with municipal experience will bear out what I say-he is debarred from being the elected representative of the people of his district, the district in which he has paid his taxes year in and year out, for some twenty-four years, because he is still a tenant at will. I do not think that is the intention of the minister or his department. Under the old Soldier Settlement Act there had to be a payment of $500 on account of, not amortization or interest, but principal.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not going to attempt to answer for the minister, but I think this chiefly revolves round provincial legislation. In my province—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): All over the dominion.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): —this will be an equivalent to an agreement for sale; is that not right?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Well, in Manitoba, where property is held under agreement of sale, a candidate for municipal office simply makes a declaration that he is the owner of the property and has an equity of $500 in it, and that is all that is required. I do not know what the law is in British Columbia, but certainly we in Manitoba are covered, as are most provinces, by that legislation. But it is definitely a matter of provincial legislation.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I may be emphasizing this a great deal. I am not worrying about running for reeve or councilman; the next time I run it will be for Prime Minister. But whatever the law may be in Alberta or in Manitoba, that is not the law in British Columbia. I cannot see why any veteran of this war who borrows $4,800 and pays back $4,600 has to go to the house of Farris or some legal firm to prove he is entitled to run. It is beyond my ken; I do not approve it at all, and I want the minister to tell me. If he can assure me that that is not the intention of the section, I am satisfied. As I understand the section, however, the man will still be a tenant, and I defy the hon. member for Souris or anyone else to tell me that any man who is a tenant in any province can run for the office of reeve or mayor.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This section is word for word the section in the old act. It has been there for twenty years; the matter has been decided in the Canadian courts, and it has always been held that it has nothing whatever to do with the right of a candidate to run for office. His right is determined, as my hon. friend directly said, by provincial legislation and regulation. There is no imperilling of anybody's rights with regard to running for office, and the hon. member for Fraser Valley is in error if he supposes that there is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This provision is put in for the protection of crown property, and I do not think it has any bearing except incidentally upon the civic rights and obligations of the tenant. I am not going to give a dissertation on the different tenancies there are, but under a tenancy at will a man is legally in possession but may be turned out without notice upon certain defaults. It is a pretty summary process under the landlord and tenant acts of the various provinces, but I would hesitate to suggest that the crown could relax this right.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will ask one question, and then it will be on record. Will a veteran holding or occupying land sold by the director under Bill No. 65 have the right at such time and prior to such time as he completes his payments, to run for any municipal office provided he has complied with all the laws and regulations in so far as they come under provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The answer is, subject to the proper qualifications which are dictated or directed by the statutes of the various provinces. This bill has nothing whatever to do with the right to run for office.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Title, et cetera, to remain in the director.

Mr. NEILL: Under subsection 2 of section 11 provision is made for a man holding some of this stock that the government has bought for him being enabled to sell it; how he should sell it and so on. Apparently no provision is made to ensure what I might call the continuity of the live stock. Perhaps he is running close to the border-line; he has not much equity left and he wishes to sell off the older stock. He may be entitled to do so, but if he does get permission to sell it I would point out the explanation that is given on the right-hand page opposite section 11:

In some cases release of title to a chattel would be followed by taking title to a replacement—in others it would not, depending upon circumstances. This, however, is an administrative detail to be covered by regulations.

For the protection of the crown and also of the settler should it not be provided that the department might give permission to sell certain stock, such as a mature pig or cow perhaps, on the understanding that the settler should replace it? If you do not make some provision of this sort, the man is liable to sell off all the stock and leave the crown in the lurch.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the position, I am told, and it will be specifically provided for in the regulations but not under the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wonder what they will do to overcome a case such as the one that was known as the Duncan Marshall bull act in Alberta—a rather notorious matter. How will they cover such a situation? Is it intended to take a chattel mortgage, or will title automatically vest in the director as a corporation sole?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The title will vest in the director. It will be sold under lien agreement.

Section agreed to.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Director may make advances under certain conditions.

Mr. QUELCH: It is hard to understand how this will work. There seems to be something in it contrary to section 9. On the page opposite section 13 the following appears:

This section simply makes provision for a long term loan at a low interest rate, all of which is repayable, as there is no provision for a conditional grant where the loan is made on the security of land owned by the veteran. It is felt that provision for the grant in such cases would go beyond the need-for-rehabilitation aspect of the whole bill. Cases may well arise where a veteran possessed of property worth anywhere from $6,000 to $10,000 needs a loan of say only $2,000 to facilitate resumption of ordinary farming operations.

The settler has a place worth, say $6,000, and he owes $2,000 on it. Why would he not be entitled to turn that half-section over to the settlement board, obtain a loan of $2,000, pay off the mortgage and get $1,200 for stock and equipment? He has an equity of only $4,000. Under section 9 I asked this question. If a settler had $4,000 in the bank, would he be entitled to buy a place worth $7,600 and obtain $3,600 from the board, putting up the $4,000? In answer to that question the minister said yes. Why should he discriminate against the settler who has $4,000 tied up in land and say that he cannot come under section 9, but that the man who has $4,000 in the bank may do so? There is rank discrimination. The minister is saying that where the $4,000 is in the land the settler cannot come under the benefits of the free grant, but where that money is in the bank in the form of a deposit he can get that benefit under section 9. He can get an outright gift of $2,400 under certain conditions, whereas under section 13 a man in a similar position cannot get a grant at all, but can get only a loan. I repeat, there is rank discrimination. Could the settler evade it by doing this? If he had a half-section worth $6,000, with a mortgage of $2,000, could he sell that half-section for $6,000 and then buy it through the settlement board, obtaining $3,600 and paying the remainder in cash? He would be doing the very thing to which I referred under section 9. Where is the dividing line between permission to a man to come under section 9 and compelling him to come under section 13? Under section 9 he gets an outright gift of $2,400 under certain conditions, whereas under section 13 he does not get any gift but has to pay back every cent with interest. There should be some clarification.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We debated this in the committee for three days, and it was decided that this is the way it should appear in the bill. I would refer the hon. member to section 23:

The director may decline to purchase land for or resell land to a veteran who, for the purpose of qualifying for assistance under this act, has made a voluntary sale or transfer of land or property suitable for his reestablishment under the provisions of section thirteen.

That is a partial answer; it is not complete, I admit.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the exact difference between the two? Under section 9 the land is sold to the veterans up to a limit of $4,800. Does the soldier make any contribution at all?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Ten per cent of the land value, $360.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has to pay that 10 per cent and that is all?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the direct contribution of the government under the scheme?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Take the maximum for land and buildings, $3,600; add stock and equipment, $1,200. That is $4,800. The settler pays $360 and on contract $2,400, 50 per cent of the cost, or $2,760, over a period of twenty-five years, and equity given by the government of $2,040, making $4,800.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So that there is a grant of $2,040 by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a free grant.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the maximum.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the hon. member (Mr. Quelch) refers to advances on security of the land owned by the veteran, and apparently he has raised the question of discrimination. There would appear to be some discrimination.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think there is myself, but the committee went into the question thoroughly and we decided that it could not be corrected in any other way.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Director may require insurance policies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is the usual clause.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT: With regard to insurance, will the government consider the question of insuring the veteran's property under some group insurance scheme rather than by the method which has prevailed in the past? There have been many premiums paid in excess of collections made, and I think there is a point there where a considerable saving might be made to the settler without any additional expense to the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The government has already considered the question with regard to fire insurance but not the mortgage aspect of it. I shall be glad to bear the hon. member's remarks in mind.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Director may pay taxes, etcetera.

Mr. NEILL: This section deals with the payment of taxes. It has been well said that the most expensive way of borrowing money is to fail to pay taxes. It is far better to borrow from a money shark than to obtain money by delaying to pay taxes. Conditions vary in certain provinces and municipalities, but let us say that the taxes for the year 1942 were due in February or March, perhaps in April. If they are not paid by a certain date, generally six months afterwards-about June-10 per cent is often added, and in some instances, 6 per cent. A few months later they add another amount, in some instances 6 per cent and in others, 10 per cent. That is all in the one year. On top of that you have a $10 fee for holding a tax sale and interest on the taxes as well. Our idea should be to help these poor fellows out. I say "poor fellows" because anyone who is struggling to make a living on the farm is up against it. Let us try to help them. The section says that if the veteran fails or neglects for one year to pay, the government can step in and pay, but you have to wait a year. The result is he will not pay at the proper time to take advantage of the discount. Then he runs up against 10 per cent plus 6 per cent and a tax sale, and the government comes in and redeems, but it is all piled on the settler. The government practically own the property anyhow. Let the government pay the taxes at the reduced rate, charge it up and collect it if they can; if not, charge it on the land; that is what it comes to in the long run. But do not put the settler in the position that he is going to drag on and incur this tremendous expense, and then the government pay it and charge him. Let the government pay it in the first place at the reduced rate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Of course this is the section we have had in the old act for many years. I am informed that in actual practice the director will probably step in and advance the payment in order to enable the settler to avoid a tax sale. Mr. NEILL: But he cannot; the government has no authority. It says, if the man fails or neglects to pay for one year the director may pay. He cannot lend him the money until it is in default for a year.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The actual procedure in British Columbia is that if a soldier settler does not pay his taxes, the title being in the crown, obviously he cannot be sold out. In order to protect their interest the soldier settlement board pay the taxes. But they do not pay interest or penalty anywhere in British Columbia. If the soldier has to pay, he must pay the penalty and interest. Follow that through; if the soldier cannot pay his taxes this year or the second year, in our province after two years the property automatically goes to tax sale, and to protect their equity the soldier settlement board must pay. But they pay neither penalty nor interest; yet they charge that up to the soldier and he has to redeem his land. Say the taxes are $100, the penalty $10 and the interest $8. He has to pay $118 to redeem his property. But the soldier settlement board have paid the municipality only $100.

They have the same thing only to a far greater extent in dyking and ditching taxes in our province. In the reclaimed area 76 per cent of the farmers are in that category They have to pay that; the soldier settlement board does not pay it, but the soldier automatically loses his farm. Obviously the soldier settlement board do not let it go so that they lose the title to the municipal or provincial government, but they pay neither penalty nor interest, whereas the poor soldier in order to save his home has to pay that.

What I suggest is this. If the government or the board are protecting the legal title, which they should do, there is yet no reason why that should be charged to the soldier who pays up. He must keep his payments up, including taxes and principal and interest, to the land settlement board. What I maintain is that the land settlement board do not pay that to the municipal or provincial authorities; they pay the principal but no interest. Therefore I cannot see why when the soldier, in order to maintain his title to his property, must pay the taxes he should pay something that the soldier settlement board have never paid.

Mr. MARSHALL: I have had considerable experience as a municipal secretary in levying and collecting taxes in Alberta, and I cannot agree with the hon. member who has just spoken.

Mr. MacNICOL: He was speaking about British Columbia.

Mr. MARSHALL: I know. It is true that perhaps ten or fifteen years ago there was considerable difficulty experienced by municipal bodies in the collection of taxes from soldier settlers, but after representations were made by municipal organizations an agreement was reached whereby the levying and collection of taxes affecting soldier settlers was greatly improved. I have also had a good deal of experience with soldier settlers and their contracts, and I have yet to find where any concession whatsoever on taxes which have been paid was not passed on to the soldier himself. The arrangements which are now operating are very satisfactory indeed.

I cannot understand how any soldier settler is being charged 10 per cent on taxes. In Alberta we levy penalties twice a year, 4 per cent on December 15 and 4 per cent the following July 15. It works out about $$_4^4$ per cent for the year. But if the soldier settlement board have been forced to pay any taxes and any discounts are given, those concessions in every instance that I have investigated were passed on to the soldier settler.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct all over Canada.

Mr. MARSHALL: I think that is correct.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I believe I was correct in what I was trying to say, and I think I have just as much knowledge in the matter as the hon. member who has just spoken, and certainly more than the minister has in this connection. May I clear the point I was trying to bring out. I am not insinuating that the soldier settlement charge is an extra tax. But I do ask the minister to show me any case in British Columbia where the soldier settlement board paid interest and penalty either on municipal taxes or on ditching and dyking. Of course they did not, and it is nonsense to say they did. I did not insinuate that the soldier settlement board charged that on to the soldier, and I want to make that clear.

The minister is not aware of the situation, and certainly his officials are not, when he tries to tell me that the board paid either interest or penalty on ditching and dyking taxes in British Columbia. I know that is nonsense, and it has never been done in the last twenty years. It has never been paid in connection with municipal taxes. I did not say they charged it up to the veteran.

But let me point out the difference. There is a tremendous difference in the fact that the soldier has to find that penalty and interest. I am sorry that the minister and his adviser have not told me what it amounts to. The penalty and interest amount to

[Mr. MacNicol.]

$4.57 an acre of tax on dairy farm land. That fact about British Columbia is not advertised, possibly because of modesty. Apparently British Columbia has not advertised the fact that milk is supplied to Vancouver at a price cheaper than to any other city on the north American continent. A tax of $4.57 an acre is paid on that dairy farm land.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Section 15 provides that the director may pay such rates, taxes or assessments; all moneys so expended by the director shall become a charge. Therefore it would be irrelevant under that section to refer to what may have taken place in other circumstances.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What about the future? I will quote from page 9 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has been referring to circumstances which are not covered by the section now before the committee.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am referring to section 15, which states in part:

... until so repaid the amount of such payment shall be added to the sale price of such property or shall become a part of the principal secured by any charge, mortgage or hypothec in favour of the director, as the case may be.

I am now talking about the future. If I am not allowed to talk about the soldier who won the last war, I would talk about the soldier who is winning this war. I am talking about facts which are facts, and which cannot be controverted. I say definitely, with all due deference to you, Mr. Chairman, and speaking as a soldier member of the house, that the soldier settlement board or the federal government do not and never have paid the penalty or interest charge on dyking and ditching in connection with either government or municipal taxation, and that the soldier has had to pay those charges.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That statement is absolutely not in accordance with the facts, as I am advised by the officers of the department. If the director receives any concession whatsoever from the municipal authorities he passes that concession over to the soldier settler.

The suggestion was made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that I consider an amendment. Possibly we would meet his objection if we were to strike out the words "for the period of one year" in the first and second lines of section 15. Would that be satisfactory?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should think it would.

Mr. NEILL: It could be adjusted by regulation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: The penalty goes on at midnight, but it could be arranged. The hon. member for Fraser Valley has mentioned something about concessions granted by the municipalities. I do not know about that. I can hardly credit the suggestion that in the event of a default the province will turn round and take it off.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My colleague will move the amendment.

Mr. MULOCK: I move in amendment:

That the words "for the period of one year" be deleted from the first and second lines of section 15.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Leaving it entirely in the hands of the director.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section as amended carry?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No. If necessary I rise to a point of order. My understanding is the minister said that my statement was absolutely incorrect, and I should like to know if he is challenging what I have said. In other words, he suggests that I am not telling the truth. I make the definite statement that the settler does not get the benefit, and I make the further definite statement that the soldier settlement board does not pay the penalty or the interest on dyking or ditching. The minister said that that was not correct. If I am wrong I will withdraw, and if he is wrong he will have to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If I were wrong I should be delighted to withdraw. But I am only giving the information I have received from those in charge of the administration of the act. They say that where the director obtains certain concessions from municipal authorities the benefits from those concessions are passed on to soldier settlers. That is the statement I made, and it was made on the information I received. I must trust to those officials who guide me in the matter.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not satisfied with that at all. I said definitely that the soldier settlement board do not pay penalty or interest.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are not now discussing the operations of the soldier settlement board. The clause provides for what 44561-279 the director may do when a veteran fails or neglects to pay taxes. The hon. member has made his statement. The minister has stated the facts according to his information. It would be irrelevant to go on debating a statement of facts extraneous to the section now before us. We must come back to the section before the committee. Shall section 15 as amended carry?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I declare it six o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: We have still one minute before six o'clock. Shall section 15 as amended carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, I do not agree that it is carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN: Those in favour will say "aye".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

The CHAIRMAN: Those opposed will say "nay".

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Nay.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the "ayes" have it, and I declare the section as amended carried.

Section as amended agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 16-Advisory boards.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This bill as drafted is one of far-reaching importance. It will depend for its success upon the selection of the land, of the settlers who are to go on the land and of the personnel who will administer the legislation. However well these selections may be made, there are bound to be defaults. I think this section and the succeeding one could very well be taken together because they cover the results flowing from such defaults. As I read the sections, they place the entire power in the hands of the director.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the desire of the committee that sections 16 and 17 should be considered together?

REVISED EDITION

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think the hon. gentleman is quite correct because they are interlocked.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not think this parliament has been asked under any other statute to confer upon any one person the comprehensive powers which this bill confers upon the director. I am not going to go into the sections except to refer to them in connection with the argument which I wish to advance. Sections 6, 7, 8 and 9 give unlimited powers to the director. Section 3, subsection 1, shows the extent of the power which the director has, in that he is made responsible only to the minister for the administration of the measure. Again, the extent of his powers is shown in section 37, which states:

The director may, with the approval of the governor in council and subject to the provisions of this act, make regulations prescribing:

(a) qualifications necessary in order to entitle veterans to the benefits or assistance or to any particular benefit or assistance under this act.

As the bill stands, the director is supreme, subject to no law or any control known to law. Section 16 provides for the setting up of provincial advisory boards which are to be comprised of three members, the chairman of which shall be a county or district court judge, one member of which shall be nominated by the Canadian Legion and the other member, together with the chairman, to be named by the director. In other words, not only does the director control the operation of the legislation without any control being exercised by the statute, but when there is a default the board that decides whether or not proceedings shall be taken is in turn appointed by the director.

Section 17 shows the extent of the powers given to the director. He is given the right, without any recourse to the courts, without any formal reentry or retaking, to "rescind such agreement, repossess and resell or otherwise deal with the property as authorized by this act." I contend that this is placing too much power in the hands of the director. One of the pronounced trends of recent years has been the establishment of administrative boards, but these boards should as far as is practicable be subject to parliament and subject to control by statute. As this bill is at present drafted, the position is that the director can do what he pleases, refuse whom he will the benefits of the measure, disallow an application, allow an application although a person is not entitled thereto, remove a person from the land without recourse to law and without that individual having the right that the application of the rule of law should accord to him.

[The Chairman.]

I suggest that there should be a provision whereby the advisory boards would be appointed by the governor in council instead of by the director, and that any person settled under the provisions of this bill shall have the right of appeal to the courts of the land. I repeat that I know of no other measure that has been brought before us wherein such absolute powers are placed in the hands of one administrative officer, free and uncontrolled by parliament or by statute. I suggest to the minister that if an appeal to the courts is not to be allowed, an amendment along the lines of the amendment suggested by the Canadian Legion should be brought down. The suggestion of the Canadian Legion was as follows:

The bill should provide, either a section similar to section 69 of the Soldier Settlement Act, or a committee of review to examine all cases where settlers appeal rescission proceedings, this committee of review to be composed of three members, two of whom shall be entirely independent of the Veterans' Land Act administration.

I should like to know the reason why such absolute powers are placed in the hands of the director. I can understand that he must have wide powers to administer the measure, but it is difficult to understand why he whose ruling will be appealed from is permitted to have that appeal heard by a body set up by himself. It is necessary, having regard to the exigencies of war, to appoint administrative boards, controllers and authorities of that kind, but I submit that the necessities of war do not justify parliament legislating such absolute powers to an individual in connection with civil matters after the war is over. Instead of our attitude being the approbation of the placing of such comprehensive powers in the hands of one individual, I think it should be so to legislate as to control the controller to the end that absolute power should not be placed in the hands of one man.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With much of what my hon. friend has said I agree. As a matter of fact we thought in the committee that we had gone even farther than the request of the Canadian Legion. As my hon. friend knows, under the old act rescission first of all took place. It was effected by the director himself, and then there was an appeal afterwards to the district court judge. Under the provisions of this bill, I would not say we are more generous, but I think we are more fair to the settler. Before rescission takes place, this reviewing committee will act. My hon. friend objects to the fact that two of the three members are appointed by the director. If there is any virtue in having these appointments made by the governor in council, I have not the slightest objection in the world to that. We honestly thought in the committee that we were going farther than the request of the Canadian Legion as contained in the memorandum. I consider that this bill which makes provision for the rescission to be reviewed before it actually takes place is far more equitable to the settler than the old provisions where, after the rescission had taken place, he had the right of appeal, and possibly all the expenses of the appeal.

In regard to the point whether the director or the governor in council should make appointments, I have not the slightest objection to an amendment if that provision is troubling anybody in this committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Lake Centre has made an indictment of the principles underlying the powers of the director in administering this measure. Here is a director not responsible to parliament, responsible only to his minister—and even that responsibility is not stated in very clear terms—with power to spend $100,000,000 of public money.

The power to deal with the rescission of the contract before the actual event makes that provision an improvement over the one in the old act. But can you imagine any judicial body, with a member appointed by the director himself, set up to review decisions of the director? The appeal should be to a body entirely removed and apart from the director, and he should have nothing to do with it.

Just let us review the whole situation. Here is a director appointed by the governor in council, under section 3, subsection 1. He is responsible, not to parliament, but to a minister, and is an officer who has wider powers, I think, than have ever been given to any peacetime controller in so far as the quantum of public money which he may expend is concerned. He is given greater powers than any of the controllers appointed to-day under the War Measures Act-and the bill now under discussion is a measure which is to operate after peace returns. I do not think very much will be done under this measure in war time. It is a gesture to the soldiers of the country, and the legislation will not become effective until after this war is over. I know that 52,000 soldiers have been discharged from the armed forces, and the minister says that he has already had a considerable number of applications, but this is a rehabilitation measure which will have its greatest effect after the cessation of hostilities, and not now. After the budget has been given effect to, I do not think there is going 44561-2793 to be such a tremendous amount of money available, to be diverted from war taxation, to put this scheme into effect.

But I do suggest to the minister that the position and powers of the director should be fully reviewed before anything is done under this legislation, and that, notwithstanding the consideration which has been given to this bill by the special committee. I am sure they could never have taken into account the tremendous powers that are being vested by this bill in one man. Why, prior to the war, in peace time, we would never have thought of giving one man the powers that are being given the director under this bill. It must be that our judgment is being warped by war conditions, or we would never give the director, whoever he might be, all the powers that it is proposed to give him under this bill. Look at the powers given under sections 7, 8 and 9, and then look at the powers conferred by section 37, the last section referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Under section 37 the director is given powers of legislation which should be reserved for parliament and for parliament alone. Surely there should be greater safeguards. The mere publication of the regulations in the Canada Gazette and the tabling of them within fifteen days after parliament meets is not good enough. That is informing the public after the event. Regulations with respect to certain matters are necessary, of course, for instance regulations as to forms of agreements, notices and other documents essential to the operation of the legislation.

An hon. MEMBER: Also paragraph (a).

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, no. Paragraph (a) is not procedural, as is paragraph (g) dealing with forms of agreement. That sort of thing in paragraph (g) could properly be the subject matter of regulations made by the director and subject only to the approval of the governor in council. But look at paragraph (a):

(a) Qualifications necessary in order to entitle veterans to the benefits or assistance or to any particular benefit or assistance under this act.

Is parliament going to vacate its functions and say that the director, instead of parliament, shall say who is to have this assistance and who not? I call upon the members of this house to study this bill and the implications of section 37, paragraph (b), for instance, dealing with the manner in which applications for purchase and sale may be made, and so on.

This bill gives altogether too much power to any individual, and I call upon the minister to shear the powers of the director. Here is a man who is going to handle $100,000,000 of the public money. Parliament should have some authority over him. Who will audit his accounts? How are we to know whether this money has been properly expended or not? What provisions are there in this bill which call for public control of public money? I put that principle to the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The same as there have been for years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Because we have sinned, let us sin some more—that is all that means. There is a principle at stake here, and the longer we submit to the soporific influences of war, the further shall we go in abdicating our functions as a parliament.

. Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The old act was not passed in war time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know very much about the old act, but we are dealing now with a situation that we have within our jurisdiction, and we should not let it pass out of our jurisdiction until we have anticipated the evils that may occur. The fact that something was done ten or twenty years ago is no reason why we should repeat the error.

The principle of this bill is good; the objective of the bill is good, but the methods are reprehensible because they violate the principles of responsible government. We are vacating our functions. My friend here, the hon. member for Lake Centre, has on his desk a file almost six inches thick of orders in council which override acts of parliament. How many people in this house or in the country know how much legislation that was deliberately passed by this House of Commons in days gone by has now been set aside under the authority and powers of the War Measures Act without the public knowing anything about it? How can there be any stability to law in this country or certainty as to what the law of this country is when this power is taken and used, sometimes necessarily but, I venture to suggest, many times unnecessarily? Many times there were passed while this house was in session orders in council about which parliament should have been consulted. This is a deliberate affront to the parliament of Canada, and would not be tolerated for one minute by this House of Commons if we had a sense of our responsibility as representatives of the people. Let us turn back, if we can. These powers and jurisdictions and authority rest, under the constitution of our country, in the parliament of Canada, and not in any committee of the cabinet. There are members on both sides of the house who must be seized of the danger of such a situation. What does it mean? It means that not only are we thrown into a totalitarian state but that we are proposing to perpetuate it by passing an act of parliament such as this which may go on for fifty years. It is a complete abdication of the functions of parliament to allow this director to legislate in matters respecting the expenditure of public money. Why, if a Conservative government were to offer a suggestion like that—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —my hon. friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health would raise the roof in denunciation of any such principle.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is their phraseology.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that may be true; all right. I accept the minister's statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You had better.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, if that was wrong, it does not make this right. The Soldier Settlement Act was amended and amended and amended, and I warrant you that the original Soldier Settlement Act did not in its inception give anybody as wide powers as this.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Ten times wider. There was no appeal at all, and no judge.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is all right; the minister has just one little leg to stand on—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Two or three legs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and that is, he is going to the advisory board before the event of rescission rather than after. I am not so much concerned about that one detail or any detail as with the general purview and principle of this bill. I object, and the people of Canada if they know will object, to the tremendous powers which are going to be given to any one individual without any control over him. What financial control will there be? I put this question to the committee: what control will there be with respect to the purchase of properties and the disposition of applications for properties?

An hon. MEMBER: Political control.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not saying that. I am raising a question to stimulate interest in this matter, and I think the hon. member for Lake Centre has done a great service by raising it here. I intimated the possibilities under this bill, a little while ago when we were on section 5 dealing with the corporate powers of the director, and the power he has to appoint all the temporary employees of this board. I suggest to this committee that that is a violation of every principle which should obtain with respect to the expenditure and control of public money, and on that principle the measure cannot be defended. I have not anything more to say at this time, but I believe the minister should review that whole position.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I wish to say that as a member of the committee I did not understand the meaning of this section as it now reads. I am not a lawyer, and I never. for one moment thought anybody could select the judge who was to make the ruling; I imagined you had to ask the court to appoint the judge. I remember a discussion on this matter to the effect that the legion should appoint a representative and that the chairman was to be the county court judge. I assumed that the court would make that appointment. But subsection 1 of section 16 reads:

There shall be a provincial advisory board in each province appointed by the governor in council, comprised of three members, the chair-man of which shall be a county or district court judge of the province in which such board operates, one member to be appointed by the Canadian Legion and one other member who, together with the chairman, will be named by the director. the director.

That, to me, is almost unbelievable. I never thought of the director appointing the district court judge along with another member. I thought that either the director or the governor in council would appoint one member and that the court would be responsible for the appointment of the judge, the chairman. Certainly I would never approve that section as it stands.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I wish to say a word about this, because there was discussion in the committee on this very section, and it was deemed advisable by every member to have a county court judge appointed as chairman. The question then came up, which county court judge should be appointed; would it be safe to leave the appointment to the whim of any organization such as the legion?

Mr. MacNICOL: Or the chief justice?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Or should we name the judge now? It was the opinion of the committee that those who were in charge of administering a measure such as this would know the type of judge that should be appointed to deal with questions of this kind. In every province, as is well known, there are certain judges who know something about rural conditions and about the problems that confront soldiers and are familiar with acts such as the Soldier Settlement Act; on the other hand there are county court judges in all the provinces who would not be suitable or proper appointees for the hearing of appeals from the director in cases of this kind. The committeee arrived at the conclusion that the proper person would be a judge, who would be selected after people concerned with the welfare of soldiers in the various prov-inces had been consulted. I see nothing at all unreasonable about that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Except that he is named by the director.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): The director is more closely concerned with the direct interests of the soldiers than a body in a particular province. He is the man who has the welfare of the soldiers at heart, and as I have said, if you are to have a county court judge, it is desirable to have one who would be familiar with the regulations and provisions of this legislation and know something of the cases with which he would have to deal. If you left the fate of the settler to the decision of any county court judge; if you said that any such judge might exercise jurisdiction in the particular county in which the lands in question were located, in one part of the province a soldier settler might get one sort of treatment and in another part he might have an entirely different kind of treatment meted out by a different judge with wholly different views.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that is not what is contemplated here. There is contemplated here a provincial advisory boardit says so-in each province, and one chairman out of the province, and he is to act throughout as the provincial chairman of the board. Why not name him through the governor in council? They are responsible.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): They name him, but they take the recommendation of the director; they would approve it.

Mr. MacNICOL: How would the director know who the best judge was?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): He would be a judge appointed and holding office in the province. The director only suggests his name to the governor in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It does not say that. It says he shall name him.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Yes, but the appointment shall be by the governor in council. They can dismiss the director if necessary, or they can suggest some other appointee. I think in the interest of the soldiers' property some provision such as this is advisable, rather than to allow one particular settler in one part of the province to be dealt with by one judge, and another settler in an adjoining district to be dealt with by another judge actuated by different principles. You would have the same question arise as has been brought up here in connection with appeals under national war services.

Mr. WRIGHT: In the discussion in committee of this particular clause I think it was generally agreed that it would be much more satisfactory to have one judge act for a whole province rather than have each county court judge act separately. But I think we owe thanks to the hon. member for Lake Centre for having brought out this point. Under this bill a tremendous power is vested in the director; in fact you might term him a dictator instead of a director. He could become a dictator if he were a certain type of person, and I think we should have some restrictive clauses in the bill. Under this section the governor in council should appoint the judge and one member, and the legion should have the appointment of the other member. I am not familiar enough with the law to know what financial checks we as a parliament have upon the director. The management of the Canadian National Railways have to report to the committee on railways every year, and the accounts are checked by that committee. I think under this measure that the director should report to some committee of the house each year, and the accounts could then be checked.

Subsection 2 of section 16 provides that:

The director . . . shall, upon due notice to the veteran concerned, refer the question of rescission in any case to the advisory board of the province in which the land concerned is situated, for its advice as to whether the default in performance of the agreement warrants the director in exercising the powers given him. . . .

After the board has decided that the circumstances do not warrant the director in making [Mr. W. C. MacDonald.] the rescission, can the director still make it? There is nothing here to prevent his doing so. The finding of the board should be final. The director should not be given power to override a recommendation of the board.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Of course, after this machinery has been set up, the director could not rescind any decision of the board.

With regard to the rather unexpected tirade of the leader of the opposition, I fail to see the connection between his fulminations against orders in council having the effect of overriding statutes, and the section which is before us. The point made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is a good one. If it would satisfy the committee to insert the words "governor in council" in lieu of the word "director", I do not see any objection. They would probably take the advice of the director in any event, if they had confidence in him. Therefore there is no objection to amending the section in that regard. But why summon up all these sinister, potential inequities which the leader of the opposition seems to conjure up in connection with what was a constructive proposal adopted by a non-partisan committee of the house? I cannot understand that at all.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the life of the advisory board to be set up?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They would be appointed by the governor in council and would be there until they resigned or were dismissed for cause or for any similar reason. They would normally function as any ordinary boards function, during pleasure. They would probably have only limited expense accounts, and it would not be highly remunerative—the same as boards of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With regard to the Canadian Legion, it says that one member is to be nominated by the legion. Is that the provincial command?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It would be by the national organization in Ottawa, I should think, in cooperation and consultation with the provincial command.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I presume this is correct, and I want to have it straight. I am quoting from volume 2, H-M chapter 116-199, pp. 1559-3092. Not having a legal mind I do not know much about this. I made a definite statement and was directly contradicted by the minister, and I wish to be corrected if I am wrong. If I was wrong I am prepared to withdraw what I said, and I expect the minister to do the same if he is wrong. I presume that this statute is correct—it came from the library—and I am quoting chapter 119, page 3019. I am sorry to take up the time of the committee, but the minister and I were in direct contradiction on the facts and one of us is wrong. We cannot both be wrong, and I am prepared to withdraw if I am. As I say, I expect him to do the same.

The CHAIRMAN: The point raised by the hon. member is out of order. We are discussing Bill No. 65, to assist war veterans to settle upon the land, and any reference to the Soldier Settlement Act is irrelevant.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not speaking at all about the Soldier Settlement Act Under section 16—

The CHAIRMAN: What is chapter 119 to which the hon. gentleman refers?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am trying to read it.

The CHAIRMAN: What is the title of the act to which the hon. gentleman has referred?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It says, advisory board-

The CHAIRMAN: What is the title of chapter 119 to which the hon. gentleman has referred?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Revised statutes of British Columbia—

The CHAIRMAN: I declare reference to another statute absolutely out of order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Might I ask the minister a question-

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The discussion is on sections 16 and 17-

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask the minister a question under section 16?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Would it meet the objections of my hon. friends if we substituted "governor in council" for "director"?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You will have to change the phraseology a little bit.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In subsection 1 of section 16 it is provided that one member is to be nominated by the Canadian Legion. Would you put "named" instead of "nominated" there?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The effect is the same.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The amendment should make it clear that the governor in council appoints the chairman and one member. If that could be worked out, it would be all right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Will the hon. member allow me to have the amendment moved now?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think you will have to have it properly drafted first. Under subsection 2 of section 16 all that the director does with respect to this advisory board is to go to them in a given case, before taking any action or proceedings under subsection 1 of section 16, and after due notice, and "refer the question of rescission to the advisory board of the province in which the land concerned is situated, for its advice as to whether the default in performance of the agreement warrants the director in exercising the powers given him under the said subsection or as to the remedial conditions to be fulfilled by the veteran, in default of compliance with which rescission of the government may ensue." There is nothing that says that the advice shall be binding on the director, and that is a weakness in the section. It ought to be taken care of.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That was the intention of the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But it has not that effect in law, I am satisfied about that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Strike out "who, together with the chairman".

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would ask my colleague to move that we delete all the words in lines 15 and 16 of subsection 1 from the word "who". In other words, delete the words "who, together with the chairman, shall be named by the director."

Mr. GARDINER: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There should be some provision that the advice shall be binding on the director, because this does not go that length.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was the intention of the committee to do so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But I am sure that in law it does not go so far. He can disregard the advice. I do not say he would. This is only an advisory committee. He refers the matter to them only for advice. There are no operative words that make it compulsory to take the advice. Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not think there is any question that the advice of the committee would be completely binding.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not in law. I suggest that it is permissive, not mandatory, the way it is now.

Mr. WRIGHT: With regard to the question I asked about the director reporting to a committee of the house each year to review the financial set-up, the director is going to spend in the first years under this bill millions of dollars of public funds. There should be some accounting to a committee of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I entirely agree. In the first place there is accounting to the treasury officers, and I think the suggestion that there should be a report and, if necessary, a committee of this house to review in every year, is a good one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the financial control?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I understand the system at present is that there is a complete audit by treasury officers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that is not parliamentary control. As this bill stands there is not a dollar that can be legally spent. There must be an appropriation. Where there is an appropriation there must be a report back to parliament. Treasury control is not good enough. There should be parliamentary control. The minister should accede to that principle.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Does my hon. friend suggest a report back to the house within a certain number of days?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to think that over.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The explanatory note relating to section 7 says:

This section is intended to be broad enough to enable the director—by estimates approved by the minister and passed by parliament—

If that were in the bill, not merely in an explanatory note, it might clear up that difficulty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is showing the intention, but that is not the law.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is elementary that the estimate must be passed by parliament. What I think my hon. friend means is a special report to parliament within, say fifteen days of parliament convening, in which case parliament has an opportunity of reviewing all expenditure, by discussion either in committee of ways and means or in a special committee of the house, which I think is proper and highly desirable.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the Chairman read the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Gardiner has moved that the words in lines 15 and 16 at the end of paragraph 1 of section 16, reading "and one other member who, together with the Chairman, shall be named by the director" be deleted.

Mr. NEILL: Then the board will consist of only two people.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The Minister of Justice recommends that we leave out all the words after "Canadian Legion". It has the same effect. It will be three members in any case.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: With reference to subsection 2, which states that "default in performance of the agreement warrants the director in exercising the powers given him under the said subsection or as to the remedial conditions to be fulfilled by the veteran, in default of compliance with which rescission of the agreement may ensue", can the government collect interest and penalty on dyking and drainage tax and the director authorize that but not remit it in the event of collection to the municipality concerned? The reason why I ask this-I made it clear before, I will put it in another way-is this. Has it been the practice of the department in the past to refuse to pay any interest or penalty to the municipality concerned?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order. The question of the hon. gentleman has nothing to do with the contents of subsection 2.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It states, line 23:

. . . the director is exercising the power given him under the said subsection or as to the remedial conditions to be fulfilled by the veteran, in default of compliance with which rescission of the agreement may ensue.

The rescission of the agreement may come about by default of payment of penalty or interest on dyking or ditching tax. I think I am quite in order.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman is out of order. The section provides for a procedure to be followed by the director under certain circumstances. It does not deal with the powers of the director, but simply the procedure which the director must follow. The remarks of the hon. member are therefore out of order.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Subsection 2 merely says that the director, before taking any action, shall refer the question of rescission in any case to the advisory board for its advice. It does not state anywhere that he shall act on the advice of the board, and it leaves the director the chief high commissioner, without any control over him. I suggest that there should be some provision to make it mandatory upon the director to take the advice of the board. Otherwise the board is of no use.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That point was discussed some time ago, and on behalf of the government I gave my personal assurance that in every case the director would act upon such advice. If this is not placed in a mandatory fashion in the statute, it certainly will be impressed upon the director that he shall act on the advice of the board.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: May we have the assurance that the advice of the board will be made public, so that we may find out whether or not such advice will be acted upon, or will this be in camera?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would not say that at the present time. There might be some difficulty in making such matters public, because they might involve the disclosure of the private affairs of a soldier on land. That is one difficulty which occurs to me offhand. However, I believe I am acting reasonably when I give my hon. friend the assurance he has been given.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The word "advice" seems to denote an opinion without the exercise of any compulsion upon the director, regardless of what that opinion may be. Would not the substitution of the word "consent" or "decision" for the word "advice" cover the situation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The word "consent" would be all right. Would the hon. member like to have it that way?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, I think so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Then I shall leave it to one of my colleagues to move the substitution of words.

Mr. GARDINER: I move:

That the word "advice" in line 21, section 16 (2) be deleted and the word "consent" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to 44561-280

On section 17-Director may rescind agreement in case of default.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Section 17 states:

If any instalment mentioned in any agreepaid or if the veteran makes any other default paid or if the veteral makes any other default in performance of the terms of such agreement, the director may, subject to the provisions of section 16, without any formal reentry or retaking and without resort to proceedings in equity or at law, rescind such agreement, re-possess and resell or otherwise deal with the property as authorized by this act.

Terms of agreement of sale usually call for annual payments. I am sure the present director of the soldier settlement board knows that for a number of years it has been absolutely impossible for men operating under the old act to make payments each year. In many years incomes have not been sufficient to meet interest payments. This section makes no provision for looking after the equity of the veteran. His case is brought forward, and if he fails in his payments in any one year the director has complete power to go to the board, ask for a rescission and close the man out. There is some further provision in subsection 2 of section 19 with regard to payments, but the provision now under discussion seems a very hard one indeed. Experience of the past would surely suggest at least that some clause should be inserted to soften the blow, and there should be some consideration of the fact that in some years there is not sufficient return from agricultural operations under the soldier settlement scheme to make it possible for a man to make his payment. That is the situation, unless, of course, a man is receiving a pension from the government for the loss of a limb. In such event he would be able to make payment out of his pension. Then perhaps he could take the money from his wife's separation allowance, if he has enlisted in another war.

I suggest that there should be some provision in the section to take care of those cases where incomes are not sufficient. The board should have the power to take official notice of the fact that an income has not been sufficient to warrant the making of any payment. It would seem wise under the section to cancel any interest payments in those years. The farmer's labour goes for nothing in a year in which he is dried out, frozen out or rusted out. There are many things which can happen to a crop; and to compel a man to live up to the letter of the law and make his payments every year under such conditions is unfair and unjust. That is one of the factors which has caused the ruin of the old scheme.

REVISED EDITION

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: When section 17 makes reference to "the provisions of section 16" I presume it is referring to the county court judge who is to act as chairman of a provincial advisory board. Appearance must be made before such board before any final decision is made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I presume the effect would be the same in connection with dyking or ditching taxes?

The CHAIRMAN: Carried?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No; I asked the minister a question.

The CHAIRMAN: I shall have to repeat the ruling that I have already given. This section provides for the procedure to be followed under certain circumstances. The question of penalty discussed earlier is irrelevant under this section. Shall section 17 carry?

Section agreed to.

Section 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Surplus to be paid to veteran.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I find in this section the expression "if and when such property is resold." I presume this concerns new land sales, and has nothing to do with the old scheme.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Correct.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It states:

If and when such property is resold by the director any surplus remains in excess of the balance of cost price outstanding and interest at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per centum and expenses of taking over and reselling the property, the director shall pay such surplus to the veteran.

In the event of the interest rate being reduced, who will get the benefit of such reduction? Second, in the event of any provincial or municipal legislation which will carry interest or penalties, will that be credited to the soldier?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The answer to the first question is that no one can tell at the present time. It will depend upon the policy adopted by parliament in days to come. With regard to the second question I have said about twenty times this afternoon and evening that the matter is governed by provincial legislation and has nothing to do with the provision in section 19. [Mr. Castleden.] Mr. CASTLEDEN: May I point out what can happen under section 19, where a property is sold out. We will assume that the soldier's debt amounts to about $2,400. If over a period of years he has paid off $1,500 or $1,600, and if the property is sold for $1,200, the farmer receives no payment for the equity he has acquired over that term of years. That is the condition, because the section states:

If and when such property is resold by the director any surplus remains in excess of the balance of cost price outstanding and interest at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per centum and expenses of taking over and reselling the property, the director shall pay such surplus to the veteran.

It seems to me only fair and just that if a veteran has paid $1,600 out of a debt of $2,400, and the property is sold, his equity to the extent of two-thirds of whatever the selling price may be should be recognized. This section appears to look upon the matter as a hard business deal into which the government has put money it is bound to get out again. The equity of the veteran is not recognized at all, and in my opinion this is unjust.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon, friend is entirely wrong. The settler undertakes to pay only two-thirds of the cost under this most generous legislation, and there will be no right to anyone to have the complete cost refunded.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I did not wish the complete cost. What is the maximum total to which any veteran can be indebted to the board?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is $4,800.

Section agreed to.

Section 20 and 21 agreed to.

On section 22-Conditions for sale.

Mr. MacNICOL: This section reads:

The director may sell any land which is at his disposal for sale,

(a) as a site for a dairy factory, cheese factory, fruit preserving factory, or creamery, or for any educational, religious or charitable purpose, or for any other purpose in the public interest.

What is the full import of this section? Will such land be sold by public tender or by public auction?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am told that offers to purchase are being made continuously to the officials in charge of the administration, and this section is for purely illustrative purposes. There is nothing limiting in the phraseology of the section, but the land could be disposed of for the reasons mentioned.

With regard to the second point raised by my hon. friend, these things are done by negotiation between the officials of the board and the parties in question.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the land is to be sold would it not be just and fair to advertise it by block number or description so that anyone might tender for its purchase? Why should the director be allowed to dispose of it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am told that any land that reverts to the department is always advertised for tender before it is sold.

Section agreed to.

On section 23—To whom loans may not be made.

Mr. PERLEY: Is there not discrimination against the returned man of the last war in this section? If he is in the army now or has re-enlisted, should not some consideration be given to him so that he can adjust his present debt and come in under this scheme?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am sure my hon. friend has been too busy to follow the proceedings of the special com-That committee decided to keep mittee. the two pieces of legislation entirely separate. My hon, friend may recall that the first terms of reference authorized by this house dealt only with this bill now before us for consideration. The question mentioned by my hon. friend came up for discussion before the special committee, and we came back and asked this house for additional terms of reference in order to discuss the special problem of old settlers under the Soldier Settlement Act. We received those powers. Three or four reports were made by the committee, the first reporting this bill as amended, the second reporting on certain other considerations affecting some of the provisions of this bill, and the third making certain recom-mendations with reference to the amelioration of conditions of settlers under the Soldier Settlement Act. We must keep the two completely distinct and separate. The report of the committee with regard to the old settlers is now before this house and will be before the government for such action as it is deemed wise to take.

Mr. PERLEY: According to this bill it is not being considered at all?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

44561-2801

Veterans' Land Act

Mr. NEILL: The minister rather contradicts himself. He says that the two pieces of legislation are to be kept separate, but section 23 provides that there are to be no dealings under this bill with anyone who is indebted under the Soldier Settlement Act. That is in direct contradiction to the suggestion that we must keep the two bills entirely separate. However, that is a small detail. Section 19 of this bill provides that where certain circumstances exist, where a settler can put up a hard-luck story, can refer to acts of God and misfortunes and so on, the director may refund his initial down payment in whole or in part. I was going to compliment the government upon that section because it is most generous. A settler starts out with the payment of 10 per cent. Then the government finances all the rest of it, takes all the risk, and if the settler cannot make it stick, they will give him back his original money. Nothing could be more liberal than that.

However, that having been done in connection with men who would come under this new legislation, it seems to be rather harsh to enact section 23 which will prevent settlers under the Soldier Settlement Act from qualifying under this bill. This new legislation provides that a man cannot be charged more than onethird of the cost and the interest rate is 31 per cent, whereas the old settlers had to struggle along and pay 5 per cent, at the beginning at least. In spite of various loan reductions many are still unable to make it stick. Conditions were very hard, stock was selling at three times its economic value, and they were handicapped in every way. Why not give these men who have suffered misfortunes similar to those detailed in section 19 another chance? A man may owe the government $150 on the old deal, but many of us who are in business have given a man credit although he owed an old bill. We wanted to give him a fresh start. Why not give the man who has gone to the front again, or even if he has not, another chance? Why should an old debt he held against him? You are going to make it easy for the men who come under this bill, so I think in all fairness you ought to treat the others the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask my hon. friend if he has read the recommendations of the special committee in connection with the old soldier settler. If an old soldier settler wishes to surrender his security, he will be eligible for the benefits of this legislation, but the two systems of loans must be kept entirely separate. Comprehensive recommendations have been made by a committee of this house which have not yet been acted upon. We want to keep the two things entirely separate.

Mr. NEILL: Section 23 will stop that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. PERLEY: Surely a man who is overseas should be able to come under this legislation if he wishes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He can come under it, but he would first have to surrender his security. It is necessary to keep them separate.

Mr. NEILL: That would be like my saying to Tom Smith, "I cannot lend you any money because you owe Jones some money." Through no fault of his own, because of misfortune, a man may have fallen by the wayside, and he ends up by owing the government a sum of money, large or small. There is probably no chance of recovering that, and the government knows it. That man enlists and goes overseas, and when he comes home I think he should be treated on the same basis as the other man who went overseas for the first time last year. The minister says that the two are separate, but section 23 says that no advance shall be made to anyone under this measure if he is indebted under the old Soldier Settlement Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If he gives up his security under the old act he would be eligible under this measure if he serves in the present war.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not think there should be any trouble over this, because that matter was discussed by the committee and recommendations were made. There is no reason why the man referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) could not adjust his affairs in order to bring himself under this bill.

Section agreed to.

Section 24 agreed to.

On section 25—If immediate relative is occupant and vendor.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This section goes a long way. It reads:

The director may decline to sell land to a veteran whose parents or other immediate relative is the occupant and vendor of the land to the director and is not incapacitated by reason of age or other disability or if for any other reason the director considers such transaction not in the public interest.

To that there can be no objection, but the latter portion of the section, I submit, again places the director in a position where he could discriminate if he chose. It is just that sort of thing that should be provided against in the statute, but the section says:

. . . or if for any other reason the director considers such transaction not in the public interest.

That is going too far. It is placing the director in the position of being able to decline to sell land to a veteran for the reason given in the first part of the section, and then it goes on to say "or if for any other reason" the director considers it not in the public interest. I suggest that the minister give consideration to the deletion of the words beginning with the word "or" in line 21.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If we did that it would deprive the treasury of all protection, but if my hon. friend wants to limit the powers of the director we could insert the words "with the consent of the governor in council." To strike out the words beginning with "or" in line 21 would be opening it up rather widely. If my hon. friend thinks the director is being given too much power, I shall be very glad to amend the section by inserting the words "with the consent of the governor in council", or "with the approval of the advisory committee". Would that be more satisfactory?

Mr. GARDINER: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the words "with the approval of the advisory committee" be inserted in line 22 after the word "director."

The CHAIRMAN: The section as proposed to be amended would then read:

The director may decline to sell land to a veteran whose parents or other immediate relative is the occupant and vendor of the land to the director and is not incapacitated by reason of age or other disability or if for any other reason the director with the approval of the advisory committee considers such transaction not in the public interest.

Mr. NEILL: It does not make very good grammar the way it reads now. The words "with the approval of the advisory committee" should be inserted earlier in the section so that it would read: "or if the director with the approval of the advisory committee" and so forth.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think it is all right. It would read "or if for any other reason the director with the approval of the advisory committee considers" and so forth.

Mr. REID: Does this mean that if a man on the land wants to sell it to his boy, and the director considers it inadvisable, he would have to secure an order in council before he could refuse?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Under the old act there were many abuses which this is intended to correct. My hon. friend the member for Lake Centre took the objection that the director was being vested with too wide powers. We are trying to correct that, and I think we have corrected it satisfactorily.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 26 agreed to.

On section 27-Wife or husband of purchaser not entitled to dower or curtesy.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the significance of the words "by the curtesy of England"?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I anticipated that the hon. member for Davenport would ask that question and I have a memorandum on it as follows:

Where a man marries a woman seised of land in fee-simple or fee-tail, and has by her issue born alive capable of inheriting the land as heir to her, notwithstanding the issue may after-wards die, yet if the husband survives the wife he shall hold the land during his life. Coke explains that "he is called tenant by the curtesie of Pachad because this is used in no other of England, because this is used in no other realme but in England onely". If land is given to a woman and the heirs male of her body, and she marries, and has issue a daughter and dies, the husband is not tenant by the curtesy, because the daughter by no possibility could inherit her mother's estate in the land.

Where a married woman is entitled to an equitable estate of inheritance to her separate use and does not dispose of it by deed or will, the husband is entitled to equitable curtesy.

By the custom of gavelkind a man may be tenant by the curtesy without having any issue. And by the special custom of some manors the widower of a deceased female copyholder is entitled to a customary curtesy.

Copyhold enfranchised under the Copyhold Act, 1894, is, except in the case of a husband married before the enfranchisement, subject only to such curtesy as applies to freeholds (section 21).

Under the Settled Land Act, 1882, section 58 (1) (viii), a tenant by the curtesy has the power of a tenant for life.

I trust that makes it clear to my hon. friend.

Mr. PERLEY: Why did the minister anticipate that the hon. member for Davenport would be the only one who would ask that question?

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister knew that the member for Davenport would be on the job.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, exactly.

Mr. NEILL: Was that not abolished long ago-dower or curtesy? It surely does not apply to Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am advised that this section is necessary.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): It is doubtful whether this parliament has the right to enact that no wife of a veteran shall be entitled to dower. Is that not a provincial matter? Has the minister considered that point?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Frankly, no, I have not. I have been advised by the legal officers guiding the committee, but before the third reading I shall be very glad to look up the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. STIRLING: Must "curtesy" be spelled in that way?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is spelled both ways in the legal dictionaries.

Sections 28 to 30 inclusive agreed to.

On section 31-Persons may be appointed to hold inquiries.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is a rather wide power to give to the director, to hold inquiries under the Inquiries Act. That power should be vested only in the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If my hon, friend would like to have the words "governor in council" substituted for "director" in the first line of the section, I am agreeable.

Mr. GARDINER: I move accordingly.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 32 and 33 agreed to.

On section 34-Advisory committees.

Mr. PERLEY: This is a very important section providing that the governor in council may appoint regional or advisory committees. I would suggest that a practical farmer should be appointed to these committees. It is important that there shall be some practical advice with respect to the operation of this section. Some practical farmer should be on the committee to advise as to the selection of land, the qualifications of the settler and so on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have no objection, if that appellation has any particular significance. If my hon. friend wishes an assurance that this will be done, I shall be glad to give that undertaking, but I doubt whether the term "practical farmer" has any significance.

Mr. PERLEY: It is to make sure that there is someone with practical experience on that committee to advise on the matters I have mentioned.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The appointment is left to the governor in council, and I think my hon. friend may accept my assurance and also that of my colleague who is in charge of the administration of the bill, that that will be done. But from the point of view of legal draftsmanship it would be impracticable to insert it in the phraseology.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Quite a little has been said about the type of land that should be settled on, and in discussing this matter this morning, as I also did in committee, I believe the minister and his adviser agree that probably there should be appointed a soils expert. The soils experts of the universities of the prairie provinces know a good deal about farming, and they have analysed the soils of their respective provinces. I also suggested as a suitable representative someone from the unions of municipalities of the provinces. I believe that an appointee of these bodies would also be a practical farmer. One member also should be appointed by the provincial command of the Canadian Legion. I am in accord with the suggestion of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and other hon. members that, if possible, practical farmers should be appointed on this committee:

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Which committee?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The advisory committee under section 34. I have just offered three suggestions, and I believe that if the advisory committee included a practical farmer nominated by the federation of agriculture it would be all to the good, and would increase public confidence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I still think, with all respect to my hon. friend, that we cannot define "practical farmer" in a statute. I think he can accept my assurance that the proposal will be followed out in practice.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not asking that that be included in the bill, but would ask that it be kept in mind in appointing the committees.

[Mr. Ian A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Section 34, line 6, after providing for the appointment of the regional committees, says:

. . . the director with the approval of the governor in council, may make regulations prescribing the number of members and the composition of each committee.

What is the meaning of the words "the composition of each committee"? What is the significance of those words?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I imagine it would mean exactly what has been discussed a minute ago—one who would represent practical farmers, one the legion, and another some active public interest.

Mr. WRIGHT: In the United States, under the agricultural adjustment administration, they have carried on a lot of rehabilitation of farm lands among share-croppers in the southern states, and advisory committees have formed a very important part of that scheme. Not only have they advised with regard to the land; but being local men who were acquainted with the peculiar conditions of farming in the districts in which they were appointed, they have continued to act in an advisory capacity to the men who were taking up the lands under the act. I think that is something which the director should take under consideration. The men on these committees being practical men, as the minister proposes they shall be, their advice would generally be accepted by the veterans, and the effect in the community would be very good.

Section agreed to.

On section 35—Minister may enter into agreements with provinces.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I notice that subsection 2 provides:

The agreement shall contain such proviisons, conditions and limitations in regard to such settlement as the minister and the province may mutually decide.

I assume that this clause means that the minister and the provincial government may enter into agreements to the mutual advantage of both governments and the soldier settler; is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That being so, I assume the minister will take into consideration the best interests of the soldier, and under that section, he may, in doing so, consider the penalty and interest in regard to dykes and drainage; am I correct? Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be very glad, Mr. Chairman, to see that the dyking and ditching referred to so often by the hon. member will be considered by the director in British Columbia when these matters are being dealt with.

Section agreed to.

On section 36—Fine and imprisonment where no penalty prescribed in act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to know why subsection 3 is worded as it is:

Every land inspector, field supervisor, official, employee . . . who knowingly or negligently makes any false or deceptive statement in any report . . . shall be guilty of an offence. . . .

Does that not go rather too far—to penalize officials of the department who through neglect or negligence make a false report?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is taken word for word from the old act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It goes a long way. First it says it must be "knowingly"; then in the alternative "negligently". It means this, that if any official of the department makes a statement that is not true, even if he did not know the statement was not true but did not investigate the matter fully, he would be guilty of an offence, and the penalty is very heavy. It practically makes every civil servant in the employ of the director the guarantor of the truth of the statements which he makes in his returns.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Here is section 63, subsection 3, of the Soldier Settlement Act:

Every land inspector, field supervisor, official, employee or servant of the board, and every agent engaged by the board or acting for it or on its behalf, who knowingly or negligently makes any false or deceptive statement in any report, return, appraisal, statement or other document respecting or referring to any real or personal property. . . .

And so on. It is exactly the same thing.

Section agreed to.

On section 37—Director may make regulations.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the minister elaborate a little on subsection 1, paragraph (i)?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed it refers to those still in the service. They might be veterans, and an arrangement might be made for their settlement while they are still serving but before they are finally discharged.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): As a result of the observations of the leader of the opposition the following is suggested by the law clerks, which I will ask one of my colleagues to move as section 38:

38. A detailed account of the financial commitments entered into and the expenditures made under authority of this act shall be laid before the House of Commons of Canada during the first fifteen days of the then next session of parliament.

I think that meets the point raised by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. CRERAR: I so move.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Vien in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on resolution 6.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): On Friday night the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asked a question about resolution 6. He wanted to know whether, in the event of a man and his wife both having incomes, they were taxed as single persons and whether the refundable part would be 8 per cent or 10 per cent. Was that the question?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No; that is not quite the question. It says 10 per cent of the income of a married person, or $1,000, whichever is the lesser. Would each be allowed 10 per cent? Previously, the husband could deduct from his and the wife could deduct from hers. It would be one or the other who would deduct so much, and in regard to the defence tax, each had a deduction. Now it is doubtful, owing to the change, making the wife, in the case of an earner, the same as a single person, whether this would apply or not.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is intended to make this comply with the other resolution. One gets into complications in discussing this subject. For instance, part of the income might be earned and part might be derived by investment income. I think the only thing I can do is to see that the section of the bill is carefully drawn, and we can discuss it under the bill. But it would not do, it seems to me, to allow 10 per cent to both the man and his wife. If the wife is taxed as a single person and the man is taxed as a married person, the husband should have 10 per cent returnable and the wife should have only 8 per cent.

Mr. FRASER (Peterbrough West): I have brought this matter up because I know an automobile salesman who last year had an income but who this year has had that income taken from him by the wartime prices and trade board. The wife is earning more than the husband this year, and in that case she would have 10 per cent deducted and the husband 8 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the husband's income?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This year he gets about $1,000 and the wife about $1,100.

Mr. ILSLEY: The husband would not be taxable if he is earning only $1,000. As a result of the amendment I proposed to resolutions 1 and 3 the wife is entitled to earn more than $660 without depriving her husband of his exemptions as a married man. Since a married man is not taxed unless he makes at least $1,200, that man is not taxed. The wife would be taxed as a single woman, and in that case the amount returnable should be 8 per cent instead of 10 per cent. However, I will give the point careful consideration.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This is something which will be a sticker for the accountants throughout the country. It will have to be made quite clear.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I said $1,000, but I have not the letter here. I believe it is a little more than that. I think he has an income of $100, after the $1,200 exemption.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister brought down a resolution in relation to soldiers?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not yet.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What resolution is that?

Mr. ILSLEY: It will come at the end.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are on resolution 6 now. Has the minister formed any idea as to what he will do having regard to the effect that this resolution may have on the voluntary saving plan?

Mr. ILSLEY: My intention is to see that voluntary lending to the government is sought after and encouraged as in the past, and I hope and believe that we shall be able to get very large sums from the Canadian people under the voluntary method. The national war finance committee has fifteen or twenty thousand workers. There are plant committees in nearly all factories in Canada, and if committees are not formed among the workers of these plants they have access to the plants. As soon as this legislation is passed and the regulations are made under it, so that the procedure is known, it is my plan that the workers in the organizations of the national war finance committee will see that workmen and employers are fully informed of the procedure that must be adopted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is with respect to deductions?

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to deductions and offsets against the deductions which will be provided for in resolution 7, that is the payments to pension plans and on mortgages and life insurance premiums. It will be explained that in some cases the pure taxes, the taxes that are not refundable, are no higher this year than last, and in some cases they are actually lower. The impression has been created that this puts terrifically heavy burdens on the people. It does, but not impossible burdens. I received one letter from a woman who wrote that it was going to be impossible for her and her husband to carry on and raise their family under this budget, and it turned out that she was not taxable at all. A large amount of education of the public will be necessary. The publicity has all been in the direction of burden and weight and oppressiveness of taxation, whereas with a great many persons, those who have offsets against their compulsory savings, against the refundable part of the taxes, the tax burden will be only slightly greater than it was last year, and in some cases, the very low brackets, it will actually be less. When these facts are explained to workmen, if they are explained with clearness and enthusiasm and the necessities of the case pointed out, my expectation is that they will not cancel their war savings certificates, and they will continue to buy them and perhaps small bonds. In one case 350 workmen in a particular plant said they would have to cancel their war savings certificates because of the burden imposed by this budget. A representative of the war finance committee went to them and pointed out that they were entirely wrong about the weight of the taxation, and the whole 350 withdrew their cancellations. Therefore there is a great educational task to be performed. We have a great organization, Mr. Spinney's organization, which will have to perform that task. If the job is done well, I believe we can preserve and extend the voluntary lending to the people and extend the government and at the same time get the somewhat larger taxes imposed by this budget, and get a large volume of compulsory savings in the case of persons who are not saving otherwise.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not wish to say any word that would in any degree retard the principle of voluntary saving; I said so in the remarks I made on the budget. But I felt that this compulsory saving, especially with respect to the smaller taxpayer, was imposed on the theory that the voluntary saving plan had not yielded the result that the nation had expected and had the right to hope. I think the figures given some time ago as being less than $100,000,000 a year would bear out that presumption. Have there been in fact many cancellations?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give the figures of redemptions, but certainly redemptions have been substantial.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Over what period?

Mr. ILSLEY: They cannot be redeemed until six months after the certificates are bought. They started as soon as they could start, but they were small for a while. The more war savings certificates are held by the public, the larger the amounts presented each month for cancellation will be. The national war finance committee have the figures and follow them with great care from day to day as to the number presented for redemption. Naturally it is undesirable to have that redemption going on. The compulsory saving will put an end to that; that will not be redeemable until after the war. But I would not say that the voluntary system has failed. The figure the hon, gentleman has given is correct; that is, it has run at a rate of less than $100,000,000 a year for war savings certificates. In addition, however, there are the purchase of small denomination bonds, and a great many of those are kept by the persons who buy them. I have not the figures of sales of those.

The main reason for this feature, however, is that there are many people—I have not the figures—who do not feel any obligation to save.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the reason for this?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; it was considered that it was only fair that everyone who has an income of a certain size should save something, and not allow their neighbours to do the whole thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister intimated that redemptions had increased. Have there been many cancellations of the arrangements whereby subscriptions poured in automatically through the banks?

Mr. ILSLEY: I could not say. That is one of the important plans for the sale of war savings certificates. I could get that information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is automatic almost.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; it is an order given to the bank to take so much out of the account each month for the purchase of war savings certificates.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister outline in greater detail the steps taken by his department to discourage the redemption of these certificates? If they are being redeemed in large quantities it is going to defeat their purpose. I have not seen much in the way of advertisements to discourage the redemption of these certificates. What is being done?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what steps have been taken. In a speech or two I have made I have pointed out that a person is withdrawing the support he has given his country when he redeems a war savings certificate. I know that after the last victory loan campaign billboards were used urging the people to keep the bonds that they had bought. That did not apply to the war savings certificates. I am not sure what advertising has been done or whether it was thought a good plan to advertise and tell people not to present their war savings certificates for redemption. I know in the early months, perhaps in the first year or so of the war savings campaign, we felt that we should not say anything to the effect that redemption was discouraged, because there had been some propagandaperhaps that is not quite the correct wordin certain localities to the effect that war savings certificates would not be redeemed. If the government came out and said, "Do not present them for redemption," it would look as though we were afraid of having them presented for redemption.

That view was held for some time, and it was considered that we should abide by our contract. We sold the people war savings certificates, and we said that if they were presented at the end of six months they would be redeemed without interest. There is no interest payable if they are presented then. The longer they are kept, the more interest accrues, and the higher the rate of interest received by the holder. It was felt that we should take a businesslike stand.

Income War Tax Act

Later it was pointed out, however, that to sell war savings certificates or bonds was harmful to the war effort, and harmful to the financial effort of the government and the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand this is the only resolution under which the method of deduction may be discussed. Of course the resolution itself is entirely silent as to what method will be pursued. Will the minister say whether a method has been determined upon, and what it will be? In that connection we would have to discuss resolution 7 along with resolution 6, because there is a question of life insurance and superannuation payments.

I would understand that large corporations like the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, which are perhaps the greatest employers of labour in Canada, outside the government itself, will be faced with a tremendous undertaking if all this money is to be deducted at the source. The private situation of each individual taxpayer liable to taxation would have to be divulged. Has the minister decided on a method by which the deduction is to be made?

Before he answers that question would he give the committee an idea of what the cost of the war savings campaign has been. He has pointed out that 20,000 or 30,000 people worked on the campaign, and it would seem to me that if they were full-time employees the campaign would be an expensive one.

Mr. ILSLEY: I could get the figures, although I have not those figures before me. When I referred to the 15,000 or 20,000 persons I pointed out that they are not engaged solely in the sale of war savings certificates. There were two separate sets of persons working on the sale of government securities. There were those who worked on the victory loan campaign, and there was the war savings organization. That was the condition up to some months ago, when they were merged into the national war finance committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At the time of the last loan.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The national war finance committee is now a continuing organization, and the workers are not war savings workers only. They are workers who are ready to do anything in a campaign for the sale of bonds. It is all one organization. It will be understood, of course, that nearly all these people are voluntary workers; for the most part they are not paid. Only a very [Mr. Ilsley.] small number were paid workers. In the victory loan campaign they were paid a commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Bond dealers are all paid, are they not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there not a superintendent of each division, district or province?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In my own province there is a full-time man who operates on salary and expenses.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has now enlisted nearly all the bond dealers in this war savings certificate idea. They must receive commissions. Employers usually do it for nothing, and many workers do not, I understand, ask for commissions. But I am wondering what the percentage of cost would be, in relation to the objective attained. When the minister gets $100,000,000, how much does it cost? Does it cost 2 per cent or 3 per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to get that information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What method has been set up to deal with deductions?

Mr. ILSLEY: I might point out that I had the figures as to the costs in connection with war savings certificates up to last fall. When I went to the western provinces to talk to war savings workers I had the figures, and they were surprisingly low. However, I do not remember those figures offhand, and they would be out of date to-day anyway.

I believe the plan for deduction at the source would be more properly discussed under resolution 25.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Possibly so. I withdraw my question at this time.

Mr. JACKMAN: How much does the minister expect to raise this year by way of war savings certificates? Could he give the committee a rough estimate?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not discussed the matter lately with the national war finance committee. Naturally plans change and estimates vary from day to day. Mr. Spinney is now in western Canada, and then of course the budget gave a bit of a jolt to the national war savings committee organization.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Naturally. Mr. ILSLEY: And that has to be overcome. Mr. JACKMAN: The minister has to raise $1,800,000,000 on top of taxation to pay for war and ordinary costs. About how much does he think he can raise through the sale of war savings certificates during the year, in view of the present budget? The minister must have some estimate in mind as to how he is going to raise the $1,800,000,000 through various methods. The sale of war savings certificates is one method, although perhaps not the main one. Certainly it would be an important subsidiary method of raising revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give any estimate of that kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the objective?

Mr. JACKMAN: The roof is $1,800,000,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not in a position to state the objective. I have not taken that amount, broken it down and said, "We will get so much this way and so much that way."

Mr. JACKMAN: It might be well if you had.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a case of spending whatever the country is capable of spending on war, doing everything the country is capable of doing, and then of adopting some financial method or another to see that that cost is met. It is not a case of deciding how much we can afford to spend, or how many dollars we can raise, and then adapting our war effort to that number of dollars.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would that not be a fairly wise thing to do?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what you have to do in private life.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is what is done in business, and what perhaps has been done by governments in former years. But from the very beginning our decision has been to do everything the country was capable of doing, no matter what the cost, and then finance it some way or another. We have been able to to do it so far.

Mr. JACKMAN: I believe everyone agrees with the minister that so far as the war is concerned what is physically possible is financially possible. But when one gives consideration to that very general statement, a statement to which one happily subscribes, he becomes puzzled to know how, under our present financial system, we are going to carry it out. Has the minister consulted with any of his technical advisers as to just how we can carry out that principle of what is physically possible being financially possible under our present system? Looking at this budget and the impositions that are being placed upon the people, it would seem to me that if we are going to maintain the integrity of our financial system and preserve it for the postwar period we are coming quite close to the end of our tether. There may be some other means of raising money or credit, and I should like to have enlightenment on that if the minister is prepared to give it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is an ambitious programme that the hon. gentleman has put before me, to outline the way of making the financial effort approximate the physical effort. This is a very general question, a question that has been discussed time and time again in the house. The hon. gentleman knows what we are doing; he knows how we are meeting the cost of the war. We have been able to do it to date and expect to continue to do it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By the same method?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: It is reassuring to hear the words of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman). The practice of selling bonds to the chartered banks and war savings certificates to the government will probably increase, and I think the minister should do everything possible to stop this. One way for him to do it would be to make a broadcast emphasizing the importance, as he has done in this house, of these bonds and war certificates and emphasizing the fact that their sale is for the purpose of curtailing the spending money of the people. He should point out that when bonds or savings certificates are sold to the banks or the government that purpose is defeated and that if the people persist in the practice, the government will be forced to increase taxation. If the government could make that statement, it would go a long way toward preventing that practice, and at the same time it would not hurt the sale of bonds or certificates.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps we could do more along that line than we have, and I shall be glad to consider the suggestion. Two or three suggestions have been made to-night that we should appeal to the people not to dispose of their government securities. I never know just how effective appeals to the people are. Some of them are successful and some are not, but certainly I am in accord with these sentiments. I do not like to see those who buy our war savings certificates redeem them, and I do not like to see those who buy our bonds sell them to the banks. I think the people should understand that it is their duty in so far as they possibly can to keep the certificates that they have bought from the government until after the war.

Mr. GREEN: A few moments ago the minister said that he was not declaring any objective in the sale of war savings certificates. Is he preparing to do away with objectives in the sale of victory bonds as well?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. GREEN: Will objectives be set for each province and each community?

Mr. ILSLEY: Our plans are somewhat unsettled at the moment and have been since the budget. I do not know just what our programme will be, and I cannot say when the next victory loan campaign will take place.

Mr. GREEN: It is a continuing campaign now, is it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but there may be special campaigns superimposed upon the continuing campaign. If there are, undoubtedly there will be objectives. When the hon. gentleman says that I said—

Mr. GREEN: I thought the minister said that; I do not want to put words in his mouth.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said that at the moment I could not say what the objective would be for any particular period of months. We have to get this budget working, get squared away. It would be idle to deny that the institution of a system of compulsory savings and the fitting into that of a voluntary plan of savings is one of the biggest tasks that this or any other government has ever undertaken. I thought the institution of price control in Canada was the most difficult thing that we had undertaken up to the moment, and I think it was. I think that programme presented problems which seemed more impossible of accomplishment than anything we had ever undertaken. But this is almost as difficult. We are reaching the position where it will require intensive work by thousands and thousands of people in order to obtain a right frame of mind on the part of the men and women of the Dominion of Canada. If they think they cannot do these things; if they say they cannot do them often enough and spread that sort of thing, it will have a damaging effect upon morale. That can be counteracted by enthusiastic workers who are in the national war finance committee organization by the thousands. As I said before, my ambition is to have these people who have access to all factories, who are in all country districts, who are everywhere, explain what the government has to do and to show the people why these heavy taxes have been imposed, to demonstrate that they are not as heavy as might be thought in a great many cases. I want them to sit down whenever possible with people and try to get them to lend their money to the government to the extent of their ability. If that is done in a thorough and enthusiastic way, in the spirit of a crusade across the country, we can get very large sums of money, and we can make a success of the tremendous job of financing that is ahead. That is what I have in mind, but it is going to be difficult and will require the cooperation of every person.

Mr. HAZEN: Reference has been made to the war savings certificates which the government has asked people with small incomes to buy, by means of extensive advertising, loan campaigns and, in other cases, I am sorry to say, by high pressure methods which I do not think can be justified. On the back of these certificates it is printed in small type that they are not transferable and that the government reserves the right to require ninety days' written 'notice of any application for redemption before maturity.

It seems to me that these regulations should be modified. They discriminate, perhaps unintentionally, between the rich and the poor; they result in hardships, and in certain circumstances they open the door to abuses that should not be permitted. In addition, to my way of looking at the matter, they discourage the sale of these certificates.

I know of no better way of bringing this matter to the attention of the committee than to relate a personal incident. A young man, a labourer, came to my office when I was home some time ago and produced six of these war savings certificates and asked me if I would lend him some money on them. I told him that I was not a banker and that the best thing he could do would be to go to the bank and get a loan, depositing the certificates with the bank as security. He said that he had already gone to the bank and had been told that the bank was not in a position to lend him money on them, that the regulations printed on the back of the certificate prevented the banks from making such advances. He told me that he had to have the money, that he was in desperate cir-cumstances. His baby had died; the funeral was to be that day, and he had to have funds. That was his position.

To my way of thinking that was a shocking situation brought about either by government cupidity or by lack of regard for the everyday men and women of this country to whom these certificates have been sold. The government had taken this man's money and given him certificates which he thought were a giltedged security but which he found were absolutely useless to him when he was in dire need. Had he been a rich man and bought a bond or two, he could have taken the bonds to the bank and deposited them, and would have received a loan immediately. But he was a poor man and had only war savings certificates. Consequently, when badly in need of money he was unable to get it.

This means that we have one law for the rich and another for the poor. It is class distinction by order in council and should not be permitted to go unchallenged. I protest against it. I wrote to the Minister of Finance about the harshness of this regulation and suggested to him that the regulation should be amended to enable the banks to advance money on these certificates in case of necessity. I must confess that I was disappointed at his answer. He appeared to be perfectly satisfied with the regulation as it stood. In consequence, I am obliged to bring this matter to the attention of the committee this evening.

Not only is the regulation harsh; not only does it discriminate unfairly against the smaller investor, but it offers an opportunity to money-lenders and avaricious persons to take advantage of those in dire need, and I am informed that they are being taken advantage of. The man who brought these certificates to my office would have been glad to take half their value for them if the money were handed to him immediately. There are many holders of these war savings certificates who must find themselves in somewhat similar circumstances, desperately in need of money for some special purpose.

The regulation provides that these certificates are not transferable, but there are ways and means of getting round the regulation. I know of nothing to prevent the holder from selling these certificates at less than their value, signing his name in the space provided for that purpose on the back of the certificate in order to obtain payment at or prior to maturity, giving as his address the address of the purchaser, and then giving the purchaser a power of attorney to enable him to endorse his name to the cheque when received. The regulation should be amended so as to enable the holder of these certificates to obtain an advance on them at a chartered bank in case of necessity, and I hope that other members of this committee will support me in having this change made.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman has allowed one incident which has appealed to his sympathy to colour his whole judgment of the matter. He has not shown any appreciation of the underlying principle here. He should remember that war savings certificates are the one form of security that I know of which is free from income tax, and therefore it is very important that there be no accumulation of those certificates in the hands of anyone, banks or otherwise, because they then would hold them free of income tax, and we would have the very evil against which members of this house have inveighed time after time, and properly so. It is for that reason that the purchase of war savings certificates by any one person is limited in any one year to $600 in face value, $480 cash value. If they were transferable, of course they would just be picked up and held in large blocks by persons in the higher income groups, and then we would have the scandal of wealthy people evading income tax.

Mr. HAZEN: They can pick up bonds.

Mr. ILSLEY: The interest from bonds is subject to income tax.

Another reason why these war savings certificates are not transferable is that the government is most anxious that when persons buy these certificates they hold on to them. In fact, a member of this house who has a good understanding of these matters was speaking to me just a few nights ago and suggested that we issue bonds that could not be transferred until after the war. Otherwise he said the bonds would drift into the hands of the chartered banks, and that would be a bad thing because it would be inflationary. I pointed out to him that the bond dealers and others selling the bonds always insisted that their transferability was one of the selling points and that if we wanted our victory loan campaigns to be successful those who were selling the bonds would have to be in a position to say to the prospective buyer, "If you get into a difficult situation you will be able to sell your bond and get your money." But that has never applied to war savings certificates for the reasons I have given, and I do not think it should apply to them. If they were transferable the result would be that they would be transferred. You would sell a lot of war savings certificates to workmen in the plants, and in many instances they would hold them for less than six months, sometimes for only a week, and then they would go out and sell them to somebody else and spend the money, which would be directly contrary to what we are trying to teach the people of Canada to do.

The hon, gentleman wrote me about this. I did not explain these considerations fully to him in reply because they had been fully explained publicly time and again. I would have thought that instead of raising issues between rich and poor here to-night and saying, "if you were a rich man you could have held a bond," he would have appreciated the fundamental principles underlying this matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister not think, having regard to the fact that this is going to be a long war—I do not think we need disguise that from ourselves—that we have now arrived at the peak of what we can take in taxation from the people of this country? I saw a chart prepared by his department the other day, and it would be illuminating to the membership of this house if that chart could be reproduced on a small scale, showing as it does in a graphic way what the taxation is, how the curve goes up from nothing. I hold the view that we have gone about as far as we can in the personal income tax field.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. gentleman said that a year ago.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No. I did not say that a year ago. I challenge the hon. member to find any words of mine that we had gone to the peak.

Mr. NICHOLSON: "About" as far.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I did not say even that. I knew we would have to go further. I said there was inequality in the tax a year ago. That is what I laid stress upon. I think some of the inequalities have been ironed out. That chart rather convinced me of that somewhat against my preconceived ideas. Yet a number of inequalities still exist. But that is not the point I want to make now. I think we have reached the peak of personal income tax in this country. I do not know how I am going to pay mine if I have to pay one-quarter on the 15th day of September.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are going to change that date.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should hope so. I am waiting for that resolution to come up. I have had difficulty enough to pay the tax in twelve monthly instalments. I still have two to pay on the 1941 tax, and by the way, I do not know whether I shall have it paid then, because I have not got my assessment.

I just complete paying my income tax for 1941 on August 31, and if on September 15, two weeks later, I have to pay one-quarter of my 1942 tax, I shall just be out of luck, I shall have to go to the bank; and I cannot use my war savings certificates, of which I have tried to take the maximum every month since they started. I wonder if the minister has not arrived at the time when he is asking the people to go as far as they can in the payment of personal income tax. I have received reams of letters of protest against the taxes under this budget. I have some of them here; I am not going to spread them on the record although I have authority to do so.

I received a letter from a young Anglican clergyman who has a parish in the province of Quebec. He receives a stipend of $1,500: he has a free rectory on which he is charged a rental valuation of $250 per annum. I doubt if it is worth that much, because it is in a small village; but he has to pay on $1.750. He has to keep a conveyance of some sort to meet his appointments-a horse in the winter, a car in the summer. He has to send his children away to school, because in his locality the schools are quite inadequate. I do not know whether the minister knows the situation in the province of Quebec, but in small communities there is quite a dearth of educational facilities under the Protestant school commisssion for children such as his.

Mr. ILSLEY: How many children has he?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think he has two, if not three. I have not his letter with me; I wish I had; I could read it to the minister. On top of that, the clergyman of such a parish has repeated calls for a little charity. He is a "mark," if I may use that term of a man in his position. He has to give; he is handing out all the time. I told him I did not know what could be done for him. He is in the category of an artisan earning $150 a month, and if he is given consideration the other fellow has to be given consideration; yet he has-I say this not disparagingly toward anybody-undoubtedly a little higher standard to keep up. The only thing that I can suggest should be done for him is that he should have his rectory free of income tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would not do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know the difficulties which that would create. The minister says that this budget is not increasing the burden; I submit that it has greatly increased the burden.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me tell you about this man, when you get through.

An hon. MEMBER: He gets no allowance for travelling expenses, either!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I understand the innuendo. There are only a few people in this country who get their travelling expenses free of taxation. I am not going to refer to that.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

An hon. MEMBER: The dollar-a-year men.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want to refer to them at all. Here is the position of a man who seems to me to be in a pretty tight corner, but I do not know what could be done for him without a reaction clear across the country. I suggest to the minister that as far as personal income taxes are concerned this country has reached the peak. People should not be asked to make further sacrifices. I have tried to examine the figures put on the record by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott), and I must confess that the result he has arrived at is contrary to what I understood or was told was the position. I have not made any computations myself; I did not feel capable of doing it; and I have not anybody to do it for me. I am not arguing the case for the rich, but I think I am voicing the sentiment of the many thousands of people in the lower tax groups who are called upon to pay personal income taxes when I say we have reached the pinnacle of what we should do. I will tell the minister what I think he should do. I do not think he can pay so much of the cost of this war through the present taxpayers; that the future generations for whom we are fighting will have to assume their part of the burden as well, and a larger part than they are doing to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: They will have plenty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are paying a substantial part of the expenditure on this war. The minister made great claims in days gone by as to the percentage of war costs we were paying. They were large, but as the war bill increases those percentages will decrease; and I contend that future generations, if we are to have a future at all, must sustain their part of the burden of this war, and that too much of it should not be loaded upon this generation. Frankly, I cannot pay my income tax out of my current revenue and keep up anything like the position I have had throughout my life. I am willing to cut that down; I am cutting it down now in every way I can. But there are hundreds of people in my position, and what we have to do is resort to the savings made over a long time. Well, if it has to be that, it will have to be that. But I suggest that he and his experts should explore other avenues of raising money to pay the costs of this war than taking so much through income tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the first place I want to answer what the hon. gentleman has said about the Anglican clergyman, the young rector in the province of Quebec. I am glad he brought that up, because it is an example of just what I am complaining about, and have been tonight, that people are afraid of this budget away beyond what is justified. That young man, if he has two children—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Three, I think.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can only go on the basis of two now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that will illustrate the point.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us assume he has two children and has an income of $1,750. For last year his tax was $48; for this year, under this budget, his tax is $53.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Plus his savings.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; he is paying $5 more in taxes, but in addition to that he is being asked to save $52. If he has life insurance or anything of that kind-and the probability is that he has—he can deduct that up to $50. If he has not, it will be a surprising thing. Therefore that man has gone to all the trouble of writing to the leader of the opposition, and having his case brought forward in parliament as a typical case, because he is paying, if he has two children, $5 more under this budget than he paid last year. That is exactly what I have been talking about. I have received letters from persons who said that under this budget they were crushed and could not carry on, and we have worked it out and found that they do not pay any tax. The exemptions use up the whole thing. It must be borne in mind that in the initial stages those who have been paying national defence tax get credit for the tax paid from January 1 to September on the tax they pay from September 1, which relieves their burden very considerably.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Only for this year.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I have not taken that into account in what I have said about the Anglican clergyman. He would have a credit. He will be paying less than he did last year. I think the hon. gentleman had better write and tell him to cheer up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will send him a copy of Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am certainly amazed at the words of the leader of the opposition in the remarks he made—at least those that I heard. I shall refer in a moment to what he said, but as the matter of taxation appears to me we are in a war and that war has to be fought and paid for. Certain people are doing the fighting and certain people doing the paying, and the only way in which we can tell whether we who are doing the paying are doing much or little compared with those who are doing the fighting is to compare our respective positions. The leader of the opposition referred to the fact that he could not pay his taxes out of his present revenue and that he would have to draw on the savings of a lifetime. Do my hon. friends when they talk about this war understand that men are falling in flames from the sky every day men whose lives have not yet really begun? What are my hon. friend's savings of a lifetime compared with that sort of thing? Those are the things that are important, and if we are sincere in our talk in this house we shall have to discuss matters from that point of view.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The two things are not comparable at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: Of course they are not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why bring it up?

Mr. MacINNIS: I say that my hon. friend's savings of a lifetime are not—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The two positions are not comparable at all, and you cannot make a comparison between them. I admit that the sacrifice of a soldier cannot be measured in terms of dollars and cents, but if we are to have anything left in this country, then I say, do not tax us too heavily.

Mr. MacINNIS: Can the young man who is taken into the army say, "If you are to have any people left in the country after the war, do not take us away"? Every word the leader of the opposition said is based on "our property"; "You are taking our property away." Not a word about the lives of the young men which are being taken away and which it is advocated should be taken away more completely—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I deny that, I will not let that go unchallenged. The minister has to have money, but I say he has gone the limit in one method he has devised and he must devise some other method. Page the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) as to the other method.

Mr. MacINNIS: But the leader of the opposition does not accept the ideas of the hon. member for Lethbridge. He says we should borrow money. Well, if we can borrow money, surely the money must be here. Either that, or we are going to allow people to create money and then lend us that money at so much in interest. It is one of two things: either the money is here to be borrowed, or it is not here, but it can be created and we can borrow that created money. If we borrow created money, I submit that the government can create the money for itself at no or very little cost, and without paying interest. If the money has to be borrowed, we have to find it in one of two ways. As I say, either it is here and we borrow it from the people who have it. or it is not here and someone creates it, and for the privilege of creating it we pay them interest forever. That is the position we are in

We are taxed heavily, but we have not begun to sacrifice in this country. Let us compare our sacrifices with what is going on in the desert in Egypt to-day, and we shall have some understanding of what we are paying and what others are paying. There is only one thing that is important in this matter of taxation, and that is that the burden should fall as equitably as possible on the whole population. In so far as I think the minister is taxing equitably I shall support him. When he is pressing too hard on people whose incomes are already too low I will protest, but only under those circumstances.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to follow up the case of the rector. By September 1 he will have paid $32 of the $53 tax in national defence tax since the beginning of the year. For the next twelve months his actual rate of taxation will be less than half the rate he has been paying on national defence tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is only for this year.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but just think of it.

Mr. BOUCHER: If the minister checks up he will find that clergymen in the last year have not been granted exemption for mileage in their travelling, whereas other professionals have been granted that exemption. There is a discrimination there. The doctor or the business man, the commercial traveller, is allowed exemption in that respect, but I do not believe the clergyman is receiving that exemption. The work of clergymen calls for a great deal of travelling in their cars if they are to render proper service to the community, and that is something that might be looked into by the minister.

Mr. JACKMAN: When we are talking about the value of the rectory in relation to the rector's stipend, it does strike me that there may possibly be some discrimination between the Protestant religion and the Roman Catholic religion. In some ways the Roman Catholics may be more efficient in carrying on the work which they do, and I refer particularly to the fact that, owing to celibacy in the Catholic church and the fact that the priest probably does not have a private income, he is not a taxable person. How, therefore, does the department tax the dwelling in which he lives? On account of there not being celibacy among the Protestant clergy they have their own homes, either provided by the church or out of their stipends and they then have to pay a tax on the value of that house. Is there discrimination between the Roman Catholic religion and the Protestant religion with regard to the manse or rectory which the parson or the priest enjoys?

Mr. ILSLEY: Rather than hold up the committee I think the answer will have to be given to-morrow or later, because it seems to be rather a long story.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is satisfactory.

Mr. MAYBANK: Is it the definite intention and desire of the government to discourage individuals from purchasing dwellings? I raise that question because of the date fixed as to when a mortgage will entitle a person to exemption from the refundable portion of the tax. Is it the definite intention to discourage the purchase or building of dwellings?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not see any objection to the purchase of dwellings. Building is different; that is using materials. The government does not desire to see any more of that than is absolutely necessary. It is not the definite objective of the government to discourage the transfer of property.

Mr. MAYBANK: It is rather difficult to accept that statement. Of course I am not suggesting that the minister is deliberately giving a wrong answer. But it is pretty nearly impossible for a person in the middle income brackets to be paying the amounts required under this refundable section, and also to commence the purchase of a home. I should think the great majority of people in the middle income brackets will be exempt from this clause, taking a certain percentage of their income, I think it is about $480 for the $5,000 man. I should think most people in that class would be exempt from that requirement; they have life insurance or are buying a home. But many people who were about to buy homes will not be able to pay the $480 to the treasury and also a similar amount on the purchase of a home. If this provision is left as it is, unquestionably, it will chill the alienation of property for the purchase of homes because the people in the middle income brackets or, indeed, in others, cannot do both. Therefore it does give rise to the thought that there is a definite intention to prevent it.

In the land titles office at Winnipeg in May there was a certain number of transfers of property registered, let us say one hundred. On examination of the transfers it was quite apparent that 90 per cent of them were for homes. In June that 100 will be 125, and in July more, possibly 150. In August, after this budget has become known, there will be practically none, because people will realize that they cannot meet the obligation of this budget and also buy that dwelling. By fixing a date as the last day upon which mortgage payments will mitigate the impost of this tax you practically tell the people, "You cannot buy a home; you may have intended to for some years, but now you cannot." I do not wish to be overemphatic about the matter, but I am quite sure that in every city in Canada there were a great many negative decisions made for the month of July and it will be the same for August. I do not think there will be a home purchased by people of the type of whom I have been speaking; I do not see how they can do so. I do not believe it is necessary to fix the date in the way that it has been done. If the desire is just to have the money saved, then whether a home is bought on June 14 or June 30 the money is still saved and it will also be available. although not in the same hands, for future loans. Many thousands of people who have been looking forward to the time when they could purchase a home will be able in spite of the budget to do so, and the government's plans will not be interfered with at all. It might even stimulate the buying of homes. Perhaps that is not desired by the government.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is not.

Mr. MAYBANK: At any rate you cannot stimulate it to the point of doing any damage to the alienation of property, because this mitigation of the impost is only as a result of money payments on homes. It does not apply if I want to buy two or three houses as an investment. It applies only if I am buying a place for my own dwelling. Therefore I cannot see how the government policy can be injured by leaving it open to have such payments apply on a home bought from now on equally as to a home already bought.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would give a very great stimulus, an undesirable stimulus, to the sale of property for residential purposes.

Mr. QUELCH: The discussion during the past few days has taken an interesting turn as far as the subject of money is concerned. But I cannot understand the attitude of the leader of the opposition. He is apparently criticizing the heavy taxation under this budget, but in the past he has consistently attacked the idea of the creation of money, and there is no alternative. The only alternative you might say is borrowing money from the people who have it, but if any people during this war are making large amounts of money they are the people who should be taxed.

The pay-as-you-go policy is no easy way. If you are to have that, and that is what I believe the committee wants, there is no easy way to accomplish it. We have never at any time contended that the pay-as-you-go policy is easy. We have always emphasized the fact that during a war there is bound to be heavy taxation, and I am not criticizing this budget on account of its being heavy, although I think in some respects the burden should be more evenly distributed.

But the stand this group has taken is that after you have raised the taxation to as high a point as you can without endangering the efficiency of the people and after you have allowed the people to put aside a little for a rainy day, then to the extent that the revenue so derived fails to meet the government's expenditures the services of the Bank of Canada should be utilized. That is the time that you should have the creation of credit, but not until you have applied taxation in war time to a point at which any increase in taxation will endanger the efficiency of the people.

I do not wish anyone to suggest that this group is advocating an easy way of financing the war by the creation of credit without taxation, because at no time have we advocated that policy. I think that the trouble brought about by the people selling their bonds to the banks is a result of the ignorance that has been caused by the type of propaganda circulated by the orthodox press and by the banks. The banks and the orthodox press have continuously told the people that the [Mr. Maybank.] banks can lend only their depositors' money. The people therefore feel that if they go to the chartered banks and borrow money they are merely borrowing somebody else's money, and consequently not increasing the amount of money in circulation.

When the minister replies I suggest he should point out that when the people take their bonds to the bank they are not borrowing somebody else's money. They are borrowing newly created credit, or money that has been created by the chartered banks. Therefore, when they sell their bonds to the banks the amount of money in circulation will be expanded by the amount that the bank lends them. If the minister would explain that to the people he would remove a great amount of misunderstanding. I do not believe that the great majority of people in this country to-day realize that when they take their bonds to the banks and borrow money from the banks the amount of money in circulation is being increased by the amount they get. They have been told in the past that it is merely a question of making a loan of money already in existence. I suggest that the minister do a bit of educating in that regard, and probably through such action dissuade people from selling their bonds to the banks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask a question before this resolution carries.

Mr. QUELCH: Does the minister not agree with the accuracy of my statement in connection with the action of the banks in creating money?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall look at the hon. member's statement. When he was speaking I did not think much exception could be taken to what he said, but I am careful in underwriting statements that are made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why is there a limitation of $1,000 in resolution 6? Why has that maximum been fixed?

Mr. ILSLEY: Just good judgment; that is all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is purely arbitrary.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Resolution agreed to.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE 191. General administration, $1,019,035. Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

PUBLIC EXPENDITURES

PRESS REPORT AS TO MEASURES OF SUPERVISION AND CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): In the Ottawa Citizen of last evening appears an item entitled "Cabinet now studying scope of authority to be given new control." The article goes on to state:

Steps are being taken for a more rigorous control of government expenditures and particularly the elimination of needless extravagance or waste.

I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if the report appearing in last evening's press, to the effect that it is proposed to establish a new supervisory authority in order to exercise greater control of governmental expenditures, and particularly to eliminate needless extravagance, is correct? If so, when may formal announcement of this proposal be expected? It may be recalled that on more than one occasion I have made reference to the setting aside of the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act and to the terms of the order in council under which that was done. Apparently this has not been sufficient and it has not worked out properly. There has been great waste and extravagance. Is the government alarmed over this situation? If so, it is a very helpful sign.

Mr. CRERAR: Where has there been great waste and extravagance?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is evident everywhere.

Public Expenditures

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend should not make a statement of that kind without giving an instance of it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All you have to do is to read the debates of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Speaker-

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have the floor.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is as good as anyone at interrupting in the house. When the hon. gentleman makes a statement that there has been great waste and extravagance, he should be able to give at least one specific instance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not going to do that now, but I shall give the minister references to Hansard where this has been pointed out. What I want to know from the Minister of Finance is when we may expect a formal announcement of this new proposal, how far it will go, and whether it will be retroactive?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The report is completely unauthorized so far as the government is concerned. A specific proposal for the watching of a certain class of expenditure was discussed informally in the government some time ago, and it may be that one of my colleagues, not myself, will be in a position to make a statement before the session ends. I would point out that that proposal will have nothing to do with expenditures dealt with under the amendment to the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act to which my hon. friend has referred; it will be of a different character altogether. I assume that that is what the article refers to, but as I have not seen or read the article I do not know.

MILITARY SERVICE

QUESTION AS TO SELECTION BY LOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National War Services with reference to the programme of calling up men for service under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Is it the intention of the government that the selection of men who are to serve as a result of these calls shall be determined by lot?

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): The system of selection by lot will not be effective in time for the calls in August. Whether the system will be effective for later calls, I am not yet certain. The whole question of calling men by lot is under reconsideration.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAYING OFF OF MEN IN PROVINCIALLY OPERATED MINE IN NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour based upon a telegram which I received this morning from the secretary of the mine workers' union at Inverness, Nova Scotia, pointing out that 150 men are idle at that mine as a result of changed conditions brought about by the provincial government, which are the operators of the mine. The wire is lengthy, and I sent a copy of it to the minister. Has his department any knowledge of the situation, and if so, what steps are proposed to be taken to remedy it?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I appreciate my hon. friend's sending me a copy of the telegram, but as I have been under pressure this morning I have not been able to read it. So far as the department is concerned we have no knowledge of the situation except from the telegram. I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I also received a telegram in connection with this matter. It would appear that these miners had a contract with the provincial government, which contract has been altered entirely without any notification to or consultation with the miners. One hundred and fifty men have been thrown out on the street because of the non-operation of one shift. It does seem to me that at a time when coal is needed so urgently, it should be demonstrated that there is some justification for this action. Will the Minister look into the whole situation and make a statement?

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to do that.

CANADIAN ARMY

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF SULPHA DRUGS IN ARMY KITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence, in view of a report I saw in the press that sulpha drugs are being included in every man's kit in the United States army, whether we are doing the same thing in this country?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I shall be glad to make inquiries. [Mr. Thorson.]

TAR SANDS-SYNTHETIC RUBBER

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE TO INVESTIGATE AND REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Will the government consider appointing, when the house reassembles, a committee of the house to investigate the progress that is being made in the development of the Athabaska tar sands and in the manufacture of synthetic rubber in Canada? They are most important questions.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Vien in the chair.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

7. (1) That the total taxes payable by any taxpayer under the normal rate of tax and the graduated rates of tax shall be reduced by the amount paid by the taxpayer in respect of

(a) payments into any approved superannuation, retirement or pension fund or plan, paid as a term of employment and not repayable during the continuance of such employment;

(b) premiums on life insurance policies in force prior to the twenty-third day of June, 1942;

(c) principal payments on a mortgage on one residential property, provided such mortgage was registered and in effect prior to the twenty-third day of June, 1942;

Provided, however, that such reductions shall not exceed the amount of the refundable portion of the tax as provided for in resolution 6 above; and the said refundable portion shall be reduced accordingly:

(2) That in the case of a taxpayer over sixty-five years of age with income less than three thousand dollars, the total taxes payable under the normal rate of tax and the graduated rates of tax shall be reduced by the refundable portion of the tax as provided for in resolution 6 above, and the said refundable portion shall be eliminated accordingly.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I have certain amendments to propose to this resolution and I shall submit them to the committee in a moment. Before I do so, however, there is a statement that I would like to make in reference to "income tax flying", so-called, to which I referred on Friday night. Exception has been taken to that statement by the officers in the Department of National Defence for Air, who have asked me to bring to the attention of the committee certain information.

There seems to have been some impression created that I was making a general charge against the administrative officers, but if you will look at page 4363 of Hansard, you will see that I used this language:

I did not learn until recently, a few weeks ago, of the practice which apparently has arisen —I do not know how extensive it is—

Mr. Ross (Souris): Fairly extensive.

Mr. Ilsley: —on the part of administrative officers of the air force of "flying in" their income tax—

And so forth. I thought I made it clear that I did not know how extensive it was, and I did not say or intend to say in the remainder of my remarks anything at variance with that statement.

The Department of National Defence for Air have asked me to bring to the attention of the committee the number of administrative officers who had more than 100 hours of flying in the year 1941. Before I do that I want to review briefly the arrangements that were made.

The provision that certain incomes shall not be liable to taxation, including incomes of commissioned officers of the said forces while on active service beyond Canada or on active service in Canada whose duties are of such a character as are required normally to be performed afloat or in aircraft, was contained in the budget of June 24, 1940, and the first official determination of the principle that was to be applied is contained in a memorandum to inspectors of income tax, memorandum No. 67, issued by the commissioner of income tax on December 24, 1940. That lays down the principle that one-half of the average flying hours will be taken as a basis, and that if an officer flies one-half or more than one-half he will be treated as coming within the exemption. That was the rule laid down in December, 1940.

I learn that in September, 1941, the air force notified their officers that the half of the average had been determined for the year 1940 to be 115 hours. The sentence in the routine orders of September 12, 1941, which is relevant, reads:

The service pay and allowances of all officers who flew in service aircraft at the rate of 115 hours or more during the calendar year 1940 were exempt from 1940 dominion income tax. Officers are cautioned that no agreement has been reached respecting similar exemption for 1941.

The rule applicable to 1941 and subsequent years was determined in March, 1942. The memorandum issued by the commissioner of income tax determining 100 hours as the correct figure for 1941 and subsequent years was issued on March 7, 1942, and a few days later the members of the air force were notified by the Department of National Defence for Air that those who flew 100 hours or more in 1941 or in subsequent years would be exempt from income tax, and that is the rule in existence at the present time. The general and routine orders of the Royal Canadian Air Force referring to that bear date March 13, 1942.

The number of officers at Royal Canadian Air Force headquarters and command headquarters on the strength on December 31, 1941, was 1,011, and of those, 48 officers flew more than 100 hours for the year 1941. Of those 48 officers, 13 were on the non-flying list and 35 were on the general list.

It has been thought desirable by the Department of National Defence for Air that this statement be brought to the attention of the committee.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What is meant by "command headquarters"? Would there not be other administrative officers throughout Canada who came under that ruling?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure about that. I tried to get just that information, as to whether there would be any officers other than those at command headquarters and at Royal Canadian Air Force headquarters who would be considered as administrative officers. I am sorry that I am not in a position to give a definite answer to that question.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If that is followed up I think it will be found that there are administrative officers at the various fields or centres throughout Canada who come under this exemption, and not only do they come under the exemption but they receive flying pay as well. They get it both ways. I do not think that this gives a true picture. I should like the minister to check up and see if there are not more administrative officers included throughout Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry I am not in a position to argue the matter or to assist my hon. friend. The information which was handed to me was this, and I am passing it on to the committee exactly as it was given to me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had never heard of this system of "flying in" income tax, and I was inclined to agree with the minister when he characterized it as scandalous. Now it would appear from the limited information which the committee has received from the minister that the practice is not very widespread. That is all to the good, but I think we should have the additional information which the hon. member for Souris has requested.

I thought, when the provision was put in the legislation a year or so ago with respect to those in the air force whose duties required them normally to fly, that it was a fair provision and was not open to very much abuse, if, indeed, to any. I do not see now that the regulation was framed on a true interpretation of the provision of the statute. If a man's duties are not normally to fly, if he is an administrative headquarters officer, he is not called upon to fly every time he goes upon an inspection trip; he can travel by ordinary means of transport as the rest of us. If he flies for the purpose of "flying in" his income tax, as has been stated, of course that is reprehensible. I assumed and the public assumed that the men who went up in the air in the course of their normal duties would be exempt, but no one else. I think the interpretation which has been given to the section by the department goes too far, and it should be corrected.

Mr. DONNELLY: When the average of 115 hours was arrived at, who were put in that class? Were a lot of men put in who do not do any flying at all, or was it only fliers?

Mr. ILSLEY: Just those who flew.

Mr. DONNELLY: Well, it does look to me as though 115 hours is a very low average, because that means only about an hour every three days.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was half the average.

Mr. DONNELLY: The flying officers whom I see think this is away too low, that it should be 500 hours, and that if we put it at about 500 hours we would get only the real fliers. When it comes down to 115 hours almost anybody can qualify. The figure is away too low.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Where an officer in the air force has a substantial personal income outside his remuneration as such, does the exemption apply to the total income?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, simply to service income.

Mr. BENCE: How many of the fortyeight were permanent air force men, and how many have enlisted since the beginning of the war?

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman mean pre-war?

Mr. BENCE: As I understand it, there is a category of officers in the air force known as permanent air force men. A return was [Mr R. B. Hanson.] brought down in this house in connection with the increase in rates of pay since the beginning of the war, and I was asking how many of the forty-eight came in the category of what are known as permanent Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry I have not the information. With regard to the amendments, resolution 7 is an important one, and I have received a great many representations for extension of the list of offsets. The term "offset" may not be the best, but probably it conveys the idea. The original intention was to permit payments on the principal of mortgages on the residence of the taxpayer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that intended to include a farm?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the residence is on a farm, yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does it apply to the whole farm, or only to the piece of land the farmer is living on?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would apply to the whole farm to which the mortgage applied.

Mr. DONNELLY: A man may be farming a section and a quarter of land, but living on one quarter and having four quarters elsewhere. Does it apply to the four quarters, or only to the one he is living on?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the mortgage were on all the land, the principal payment on the mortgage would be included in the offsets. In those circumstances there would be no way of making a separation.

Mr. PERLEY: But with two sets of buildings and two different mortgages?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would apply to the mortgage on the residence.

Mr. MacNICOL: On the farm on which the residence is built?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. As I started to say, it was originally designed that the offsets would be three in number only: payments of principal on mortgages on the residence; payments of premiums on life insurance policies which were in force on June 23, the date of the budget—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Prior to June 23?

Mr. ILSLEY: Prior to June 23, the date of the budget; and third, payments into certain pension and superannuation funds. A very large number of representations have been made in favour of the extension of this list. I have decided that some of these representations are well founded and some are not.

4450

Perhaps the most expeditious way of getting what is now proposed before the committee is to read the resolution as redrafted. The amendment will be:

That resolution 7 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

1. That the total taxes payable by any taxpayer under the normal rate of tax and the graduated rates of tax shall be reduced by the amount paid by the taxpayer in respect of—

(a) payments into any approved superannuation, retirement or pension fund or plan established prior to the 23rd day of June, 1942 (or if established subsequent to the said date, approved by the Minister of National Revenue), and paid by the employee as a term of employment or in connection with membership in a trade union.

(b) premiums on life insurance policies or annuities or other instalment savings contracts of a type which in the opinion of the Minister of National Revenue are such that the premiums cannot be postponed without substantial loss or forfeiture to the taxpayer, provided such policies, annuities or contracts were in force prior to the 23rd day of June, 1942, and one-half of the first year's premium, and the whole of subsequent years' premiums, on life insurance policies of a type not more expensive than insurance on the whole life plan, taken out by the taxpayer subsequent to the 23rd day of June, 1942, provided that the deduction by the taxpayer in any year with respect to the said date shall not exceed $100.

(c) principal payments on a mortgage or agreement for sale on or with respect to one residential property, provided that such mortgage or agreement for sale was registered and in effect prior to the 23rd day of June, 1942, or, if not so registered, was to the satisfaction of the Minister of National Revenue in effect as an enforceable obligation of the taxpayer prior to the said date.

(2) That in the case of a taxpayer over sixty-five years of age with income less than $5,000, the total taxes payable under the normal rate of tax and the graduated rates of tax shall be reduced by the refundable portion of the tax as provided for in resolution 6 above, and the said refundable portion shall be eliminated accordingly.

As regards clause 2, the income figure previously was $3,000.

The reasons for this amendment have already occurred to hon. members who have listened to it as it has been read.

With regard to the pension plan payments, it was considered unfair to limit the offsets to those already established, and it was considered desirable to bring in pension plans of trade unions. With regard to life insurance policies, it was deemed advisable to add annuities or other instalment saving contracts, provided that the premiums could not be postponed without substantial loss or forfeiture to the taxpayer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That depends on the contract.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. They will not all qualify by any means. If the payments can be dropped and resumed again without substantial loss or forfeiture to the taxpayer, they will not qualify.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister regard that as a workable proposal?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, completely.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why limit it to the whole life plan?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not limited to the whole life plan with regard to existing contracts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But new contracts.

Mr. II.SLEY: With regard to new policies, I do not think we should go the whole way urged by the life insurance companies and agents and by certain members of this house, because by legislation we would be giving a very great impetus to the sale of life insurance, which would be in a sense class legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would that be true if the amounts were limited?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what we have done.

Mr. BENCE: Would you consider the face value of the policy instead of the premiums?

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish hon. gentleman would not be so much interested in this, but just moderately interested. On the other hand, there is much weight in the argument used in this house that young persons getting married should be permitted to insure their lives to a moderate extent and have their payments qualify as offsets. Therefore this provision, which is a restricted and limited provision, permits new policies to qualify, provided that they are not more expensive than the ordinary life plan, provided that the offset in a particular year shall not exceed $100, and provided also that only half of the first year's premium may be used as offset.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, the agent's commission is out.

Mr. ILSLEY: Otherwise, what happens is this. Ordinarily the agent gets fifty per cent, and in the first year instead of getting an alternative form of saving we would be getting a payment about half of which would be saving, inasmuch as it would go to the insurance company, while the other half would be simply a transfer to another taxpayer who might be just as much a spender as the person who paid it. Therefore we felt we should limit the offset in the first year to one-half the first year's premium. Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Should not that be "premiums"—plural? There might be several policies.

Mr. ILSLEY: The limit is $100. With regard to mortgages and agreements of sale, the registration date has not been insisted upon as the only proof that the agreement of sale or mortgage was actually entered into. The Minister of National Revenue is given power to permit those mortgages and agreements of sale, not registered prior to the 23rd day of June 1942, if he is satisfied that they were in effect as enforceable obligations of the taxpayer prior to that date.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mortgages are usually registered, but many agreements of sale are not.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, although there is sometimes a delay in registration. But whether the mortgage is registered or not is determined by the mortgagee and not the mortgagor, and to that extent the resolution as drawn put the mortgagor in the hands of the mortgagee not for the future, because it does not apply to the future, but with respect to the past.

The second part of the resolution I read raises the limit for elderly taxpayers from $3,000 to $5,000. It was found that quite a number of persons over sixty-five years of age are rendering war service and doing war work and in receipt of incomes in excess of $3,000. Assuming that the compulsory savings of such persons are not available, or will not be available to them because of death or something of that sort, it was found that it would pay them to give up their job.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not a very high ground to put it on.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the second time we have done that, and I cannot remake human nature.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): With reference to the question of future life insurance policies, the minister says he does not want to have any discrimination, but to my mind there is discrimination when you limit the amount of premiums which might be paid by the policyholder on future policies taken out. Many young people, and older people as a matter of fact have a regular budget in regard to life insurance policies, and I do not see why they should be stopped from completing their budget. In fact, they are continuing the budgets which they have. After all, it is far better for them to have life insurance policies which will protect their dependents after their death than just a few dollars in the way of savings under the budget plan. Not only that, but the money which they pay to the life insurance companies is available to the government for borrowing. All life insurance policies issued to-day contain a war clause. That is an important factor that should not be lost sight of. That war clause provides that if the policyholder is killed on active service or in the performance of duty on service in this country even, the beneficiary is disqualified from collecting. The $100 does not do anything for him, because if he goes on active service on the coast, where he is still subject to income tax and still has to pay extra premiums, he has to pay for the war risk, so that the $100 will not cover it. I see no reason why there should be discrimination between those who have not completed their budget for life insurance and those who want to finish their budgets for that purpose. It is discriminatory all the way through.

There are many ideas abroad about how much agents get. I suggest first of all that on ordinary life insurance policies with the regular companies the largest commission paid is fifty per cent. I suggest to the minister that before this amendment is agreed to, because of the impetus which it will probably give to the sale of life insurance, some consideration ought to be given to the commission which is paid to the agents. Instead of fifty per cent a smaller rate of commission might be paid. It is far better for a man to have life insurance than to have a few dollars saved which will be returned to him later. If the members of his family are not protected by life insurance the government will have to take care of them. The legislation we have now is discriminatory; it hits at the whole question of saving-not compulsory saving, but saving.

As I have to go to another committee I should like to be permitted to say something which may be a little out of order at this point. It is in connection with the question of deductions on account of illness. As the minister probably knows, there is an organization known as Associated Medical Services, which to my mind has done a very fine job. It is a contributory scheme. There is a monthly payment starting with $2 for the head of the family, $1.50 for the wife, $1.25 for the first child and $1 each for the rest of the children. Some arrangement should be made for an allowance in respect of payments made under that scheme. What actually happens is that if illness strikes some member of the family, and he is sent to the hospital under this scheme, he gets what is called semi-private attention. There are no bills for the patient to pay. As a matter of fact under this scheme a baby can be brought into the world for about $30. That is something I know, because I have a grandchild. This is a splendid scheme for people of the middle classes. But under the budget provision they will not be able to deduct anything from their tax in that regard. The matter should have careful attention with a view to giving exemption to people who subscribe to this plan. In the old days a family might go along for many years and all of a sudden be struck with a catastrophe and have a tremendous amount of doctors' bills to pay. Under this plan, that can never happen; a man pays for his medical services each month, and that is all he has to pay. I suggest that the taxpayer be allowed as an exemption the amount he pays month by month, or if that is not possible, the Associated Medical Services should be allowed to render him a bill on which he could get a reduction in his income tax.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Resolution 7 to my mind is a very necessary provision. It takes care of some of the complaints which naturally arise in regard to taxation pro-All across the country those who posals. have objections to urge make them known, but rarely do those who are prone to do a little research try to find some way by which the tax can be increased so that the minister may get a little more revenue. That perhaps is a failing of our present civilization. I am strongly of the opinion that at this very serious time taxation should be on a basis similar to the old-fashioned freight rates. All that the traffic will bear should be put on our Canadian people-all of us, at this time. In the case of freight rates there is competition and waterborne traffic, and they have to soften the rates, but the Minister of Finance has not much competition in the field of his administration.

With that basis for my remarks I get on the band wagon with everyone else and inquire with regard to certain deductions. But I ask the minister to realize, along with that, that I am thinking of where else he can get revenue, and I bring to his attention a matter which to my mind is very serious. I should like to see this resolution stand until we reach resolution 26. I ask this because I want the minister to give consideration to a few observations that I am going to make with regard to two other matters which should be studied if of necessity we must have certain deductions made. The first is a matter that has already been more or less discussed; whether or not another provision is added to resolution 7 is something that can be taken under advisement.

Much has been said about the married woman without children or dependents who during war time finds herself out earning money as well as her husband. Alongside of 44561-281 that I should like to put the position of the married man with anywhere from two to half a dozen children who is doing his duty to posterity and the country. You do not find him asking for any particular exemption because his wife is not able to go out and earn money. If a married woman has no children, is not doing much for the country, and goes out and earns money, perhaps she should bear some of the cost of the country, and if you are going to make any deduction on her behalf consider the housewife who is raising several children, and the man who is providing the bread and butter for that household. That is the first matter which I would ask the minister to consider, if he feels disposed to amend this clause.

The second point also I consider important. The citizen who, perhaps through his own diligence and application to business and hard work and initiative in a country such as Canada, where opportunities are open to one and all, when he gets to the years fifty to sixty finds himself with a substantial estate, thinks of those he is going to leave behind. The average man wears out faster than the average woman. There are more widows in Canada than widowers. A man likes to think he has left his family with some security. For example he might feel disposed to leave his wife as executor and administrator of the estate and provide her with an annuity of $10,000 a year. Say the wife is about sixty years of age. What condition obtains if there is an annuity of $10,000 a year, and the man passes on, leaving his wife to administer the estate? I will send these figures over to the minister. I thought he might give some consideration to the point I am about to raise, before we reach resolution 26, to see if there is any way of meeting the case I am going to cite. In his will a man provides for an annuity of $10,000 a year. The first charge or assessment against that annuity, of course, is the income tax. I have had my figures checked by the department, though the chief has been so busily engaged in the house that I have not had an opportunity to submit them to him. Subject to this reservation I submit these figures for the minister's consideration. As I read the act, the tax would amount to $4,575. For succession duty purposes the value of the wife's life interest would be $109,750, on which the dominion succession duty would amount to $7,808. In the case of the provincial succession duty, in Ontario at least, the value of the wife's life interest would be $136,500, on which the provincial succession duty would amount to $14,300, a total in succession duties of $22,108. Under the statute as it now stands, these succession duties are payable over a four year period; so that the widow, in administering the estate, divides this amount of $22,108 by four, which means that she will have to pay $5,527 annually in succession duties. This is a case of the type which is very common throughout the country, where the capital is maintained intact and on the decease of the wife the children become the beneficiaries. So that the widow finds that she must make an annual payment for the first four years after her husband's death of $5,527 in succession duties, plus $4,575 in income tax, a grand total of $10,102, from an income of only $10,000. In other words she has to go out and rustle to find another $102 in addition to her income, in order to meet her requirements each year during that four year period.

Let us look at a case where the estate is larger; for example, where a life income, not an annuity, of $16,000 is provided for, and the estate totals $400,000. We may figure that the interest on the investments made by the husband would average 4 per cent, so that the income would total $16,000. In this case the income tax would amount to $8,025; the succession duties, payable over a four year period, would amount to $25,668 to the Ontario government and $18.749 to the federal government. making a total of $44,417. Dividing this amount by four would give an annual payment of approximately $11,000. When you add the income tax of $8,025 it will be seen that the annual payment during the first four years would amount to $19,129, while the widow would have only $16,000 at her disposal, so she would be short $3,129. I realize that the principal remains, but if the principal is dissipated of course the value of the estate is reduced, and to that extent the children, the ultimate beneficiaries. suffer.

I bring up these matters at this time because these deductions are made under resolution 7. I am not asking for any additional deductions in these cases; I am not asking that estates made up of assets amounting to a quarter or a half million dollars should be relieved of the necessity of making a proper contribution to the dominion treasury. Just in passing I might say that I am of the opinion that it might be bad business to leave an estate of $400,000 to four children, but there must be hundreds of wills which were drawn up in days gone by all over Canada, disposing of estates running over $100,000, and I am drawing particular attention to the present provisions of the income tax laws because they are going to place the widows of these people in a very serious position. Through the requirements of the succession duty acts, plus income tax, these widows are going to find themselves owing the government money each year during the four year period following the decease of the testator. Through this sounding board I want to say to the people of Canada: Check very carefully the wills you have made in days gone by. Check them in the light of the present succession duties, not only those obtaining in your own province but those being collected by the dominion government; and check them particularly in the light of the income tax regulations now prevailing. Make up your minds that you must distribute a good part of your capital in order that your estate may be able to pay to the treasury the moneys which will be demanded, and also in order that your dependents, and particularly your widow, may be provided for. As it stands now a person with an estate of $100,000, who made a will perhaps ten years ago on the basis of the taxation prevailing at that time, may find to-day that his widow will be left destitute and entirely without income, if she is to carry out the law as it stands at present.

I am bringing this information to the attention of the minister in order that he may check it. I should like to see in resolution 7 some provision which would permit of the distribution of capital under wills and similar documents drawn up prior to the imposition of the present income tax regulation. If that is not done, the minister will be faced with a large number of cases of distress; and as I read the income tax act amendments he will not have any discretionary power either to help these families or to help himself. He will find the widow, the administrator of the estate, in a bankrupt condition, and he may not be able to collect the full measure of the succession duties and income tax, because the money just will not be there.

I do not know whether the minister is prepared to answer this point at the moment. If he is, well and good, otherwise he might feel disposed to let resolution 7 stand until a later stage of this discussion; for I am satisfied that it would be in order to discuss this matter under resolution 26, which is a review of all the income tax regulations.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to support the request which has been made that this section should be allowed to stand, until at least after the noon recess, so that we may have an opportunity of considering the important amendments that have been presented by the minister. I believe most of the points I had noted down are covered by these amendments, but I am not certain, and I should like to have an opportunity of reading them before discussing the resolution.

Resolution 7 stands.

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

8. That the refundable portion of any tax exigible under any enactment founded on these resolutions shall be repaid to the taxpayer or to his legal representatives, after the cessation of hostilities between Canada and Germany, Italy and Japan, and in the following manner: The refundable portion of the tax in respect of income of 1942 shall be repaid at such times and in such instalments as the governor in council may determine but not later than the end of the second fiscal period of the government commencing after the said cessation of hostilities; the refundable portion of the tax in respect of the income of 1943 shall be repaid at such times and in such instalments as the governor in council may determine but not later than the end of the third fiscal year of the government commencing after the said cessation of hostilities and so on in respect of the refundable portion of the tax on income of successive years.

The date of the cessation of hostilities shall be deemed to be the date of a proclamation issued under the authority of the governor in council declaring that, for the purposes of the said refund the war no longer exists.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The rate of interest to be paid on the refundable portion of the tax is 2 per cent. I believe the minister has partly anticipated the question I intended to ask when he says that the usual going rate on short-term obligations is 2 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not going to quarrel with that; I think perhaps the minister is right. The trouble is the indeterminable time of repayment. It seems to me that the time should be made a little more specific. Has the minister given consideration to that? The resolution reads:

That the refundable portion of any tax exigible under any enactment founded on these resolutions shall be repaid to the taxpayer or to his legal representatives, after the cessation of hostilities between Canada and Germany, Italy and Japan, and in the following manner:—

I assume that that means after the cessation of all hostilities, not just after the war with the German reich or with Japan.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The resolution continues:

The refundable portion of the tax in respect of income of 1942 shall be repaid at such times and in such instalments as the governor in council may determine but not later than the end of the second fiscal period of the government commencing after the said cessation of hostilities;—

That leaves a large discretion with the government, but I suppose they have to have it. The resolution continues:

-the refundable portion of the tax in respect of the income of 1943 shall be repaid at such times and in such instalments as the governor in council may determine but not later than 44561-2812

the end of the third fiscal year of the government commencing after the said cessation of hostilities and so on in respect of the refundable portion of the tax on income of successive years.

Is it necessary to retain this money so long? If a man who has a refundable credit dies, his estate would be held up for at least two years after the cessation of hostilities. Provision should be made to cover such cases. This money might be necessary to pay the succession duties on an estate. This money would be taxable for succession duties by both the province and the dominion. Could there not be a little more generosity with respect to the return of the money in cases of need? I realize that the amount to the credit of any individual taxpayer will not be very large, the highest amount in any one year being $1,000. If it goes on for, say three years, the amount would not exceed $3,000. Why should it not be possible to have a refund made sooner in cases of hardship or necessity?

Mr. ILSLEY: There might be no objection to a provision that it shall be refunded in the case of death. Whether that should be discretionary with the governor in council or provided for absolutely can be considered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not care how it is done. It is only the principle I am concerned with.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On page 45 of the plan of Lord Keynes it is stated that provision should be made for the release of part of the amount of the compulsory savings for payment of death duties, and also for the purchase of new life insurance or endowment policies, but particularly for the release of such amount as may be necessary in the case of temporary emergencies to meet illness, unemployment or special family expenses. Taxpayers, particularly those in the lower income brackets, might very well find themselves unable to meet certain emergencies. The leader of the opposition has mentioned the difficulty that might arise from the fact that repayment is not to be made until after the war, and he mentioned that estates could not be wound up before this money had been received. I suggest that provision be made that in the case of the death of a single person there be a return to the estate of sufficient money to cover funeral expenses. Many people invest in war savings certificates because they know that should they find themselves in difficulty they will be able to cash them. I do not think many of these certificates have been cashed, but the fact that they can be adds to their attractiveness. I suggest that there be some amendment to provide that the individual may withdraw part or all of these forced savings in order to meet certain emergencies. I realize that there might be some difficulty in carrying this out, but possibly the power could be placed in the hands of the minister and the emergencies could be designated by statute. If that were done I think it would go a long way toward meeting objection to this legislation. The government based this system upon the Keynes plan, and, according to the author of that plan, in order that it may be workable there should be a provision for payment to meet unforeseen occurrences.

Mr. ILSLEY: My understanding of the Keynes plan is that it recommended larger payments to the treasury than we are providing for under this budget. Of course the larger the compulsory savings are, the more important it is to provide against hardship in emergencies. The amounts here are so small that a large part of the reason for making provision for emergency disappears. When the British government adopted the principle of the recommendations they did not make provision for the return of money in this, that and the other emergency. I doubt whether we should do it here. We could go so far in trying to meet every possible emergency in the lives of individuals that we would forget the state. At the moment the state is the important unit, and the aim of the government is to take this money away from the people and keep it until such time as it would be better for the nation for them to spend it than it is at present. I do not think we should be too meticulous, when the amounts are comparatively small, in attempting to meet every emergency that may arise.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is not a question of being too meticulous. The government is asking the people of Canada to make financial sacrifices never before equalled in the history of this country. The people are willing to do so, and all I am asking is that in case of emergency, consideration be given to the welfare of the individual to the end that no greater harm shall be done to the individual than is absolutely necessary to carry out the desires and wishes of the Canadian people.

With a view to having the whole picture I am going to ask the minister what proportion of the war savings certificates which have been voluntarily purchased by the Canadian people, have in fact been cashed. This would indicate whether any advantage is being taken by the people of the opportunity that is available to them. I am sure that no one in Canada, realizing what the conditions are, would endeavour to take advantage of the government were it to make such provision as I have indicated for emergencies that may arise.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to get that information.

Mr. MacNICOL: The last sentence of resolution 8 reads:

The refundable portion of the tax in respect of the income of 1943 shall be repaid at such times and in such instalments as the governor in council may determine but not later than the end of the third fiscal year of the government commencing after the said cessation of hostilities—

The fiscal year of the government ends on March 31. Suppose a proclamation bringing hostilities to a close is issued on April 15, 1945. Would the three-year term then begin after March 31, 1945, or March 31, 1946?

Mr. ILSLEY: The first fiscal year after the cessation would be April 1, 1946.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would be after April 1, 1946, that the three-year term would begin?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With respect to the date of cessation of hostilities, this provision would appear to be different from that contemplated under the War Measures Act. Should not that be criterion? The date of the cessation of hostilities is pretty well established in the War Measures Act and in the minds of the Canadian people, and I would have thought that that would be the proper date to use in this legislation. There would be certainty then. What is the objection to that?

Mr. ILSLEY: The objection is that the date fixed under the War Measures Act does not necessarily coincide with the cessation of hostilities. The order in council passed under the War Measures Act sets the date of the cessation of hostilities for the purposes of the War Measures Act, which may be considerably later than the actual cessation of hostilities, as it was in 1918. The armistice took place on November 11, 1918, but the War Measures Act continued to operate until 1920, I think.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Until after the peace treaty.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was not necessarily related to the signing of the peace treaty, if my recollection is correct, although I may be wrong. I have had occasion to give consideration to this problem twice before, one of the occasions being the introduction of the War Exchange Conservation Act. In that act is to be found a section something like this, giving the governor in council power to fix by proclamation the date of the cessation of hostilities for the purposes of the War Exchange Conservation Act. That date may be different from the date set under the War Measures Act. The other occasion was in drawing up the agreements with the provinces. There was considerable discussion between the provincial premiers and treasurers and myself as to what should be done. Suggestions were received, and finally a provision for fixing the date of the cessation of hostilities was drafted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is another date, apart from this one and the one fixed under the War Measures Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The provinces all have an interest in the date, and provision is made for calling a conference with the provinces to fix the date if there is any difference of opinion regarding it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There could not have been much unanimity about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was important. No one can tell what the conditions in the world will be, and opinions will possibly differ as to the date of the cessation of hostilities. We did not think the provinces should be put in the position of being in the hands of the dominion. The dominion might wish to continue the agreements, or to terminate them, and therefore might arbitrarily fix the date too early or too late. Provision was therefore made for the settlement by conference of any differences of opinion between the dominion and the provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who is going to settle it if you cannot agree?

Mr. ILSLEY: The final decision is left to the dominion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It must be.

Mr. MAYBANK: Is it the clear intention of the government, in connection with the refundable portion of the tax, to deny to the individual the ordinary right of assignability? Will the refundable portion be assignable or, on the other hand, will it be similar to war savings certificates, which may not be assigned? I do not know whether these refundables, if they were assignable, would be a very good purchase, but it does seem probable that as time goes on there will grow up a traffic in them. I know that in no case would the government be bound by such an assignment. If John Smith wants to pay off a $240 debt and assigns to me refundables to that amount, the government cannot be bound by that contract. I cannot come in and file the assignment and ask the government to pay the money. But as between

Income War Tax Act

John Smith and me a binding agreement can be made, unless such a contract be clearly against public policy. I can make a contract with John Smith under which he will undertake, for the payment of the debt, to get this money when the proper time comes, and if he does not fulfil the contract, I can sue him for damages. I would have an enforceable contract. I might not have something on which I could realize-that is not the point -but the contract between John Smith and me would be enforceable so far as the judgment was concerned. Again, I could take some sort of pledge, or perhaps a bond, from him to ensure fulfilment of his contract of assignment. It would seem to me that the only thing to prevent that will be some clear declaration, if we can make it, that the assignment of these refundables is definitely against public policy; then the courts will not enforce any such agreement as I have been referring to. This will run on now for several years, and it ought to be clear whether it is non-assignable because of its being in the interests of the country to have it so.

Mr. ILSLEY: These are not to be assignable. These certificates will be like war savings certificates, not transferable.

Mr. MAYBANK: How is that to be prevented?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, if trafficking in these certificates develops in such a way that the holders of them are being taken advantage of, it might be necessary to take some steps or make some statement. I should not like to anticipate that so far in advance.

Mr. JACKMAN: Are you going to issue them in bearer form?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, they will not be bearer certificates. They will be receipts which will be redeemable by the government, but the government will owe the person himself and no one else.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They will be some form of evidence of indebtedness?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has not yet determined what form they will take.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will they not be as between two parties assignable in law unless it is prevented, but be a nonenforceable assignment against the crown? I think that would be a correct statement of the position.

Income War Tax Act

Mr. MAYBANK: They are unenforceable against the crown in any event.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not see how you can prevent their being assigned.

Mr. ILSLEY: A chose in action is not assignable if it is unenforceable against the debtor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes; a chose in action is always assignable. Whether it is enforceable is another question altogether. But a chose in action is assignable as a general principle unless there is some statutory provision which prevents it.

Mr. MAYBANK: I think the minister will agree with this. We are speaking of this being a chose in action—this particular certificate or receipt or whatever it is. There is nothing to prevent John Doe from entering into a contract with me under which at the appropriate time he will ask for this money as evidenced by this chose in action.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. MAYBANK: Unless it is definitely against public policy for him to make that contract with me, I can, by appropriate action in the court, enforce that contract. I do not know whether I can get a decree of specific performance; it would seem more likely that what I would get would be a judgment for damages if he did not keep the agreement.

Mr. ILSLEY: In other words, you have no security.

Mr. MAYBANK: In other words, then, as far as we have gone, it is enforceable. I mean, as soon as you can get a judgment of the court you have enforced your contract. Now, getting away from the law and looking at the facts, you may not be able to enforce it because the fellow may not have anything, but that does not alter the fact that you have enforced your contract. Many a man enforces a contract to the point of getting a judgment; he has the very best thing that it is possible to have wherewith to get money, so it would appear. The only thing which would prevent that sort of proceeding would be some binding declaration by this government-even though property and civil rights are involved I am inclined to think it can be made by this government-that it is definitely against public policy to make assignments of these or traffic in them in any way. Again, a contract of this sort can certainly be made: with the same man I can make an agreement such as I have mentioned and I can take a mortgage upon his home. That mortgage will contain a provision that unless he carries out that contract his mortgage will [Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

be null and void. Likewise I can get other kinds of bonds from him. There is a great variety of ways in which I can deal with this man, and unless it is definitely against public policy I can have my contract enforced in court. All I want to do is to get the point settled.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, the minister made it quite clear that as far as the government is concerned they are to be on the same footing as war savings certificates. I do not know that we can go much further than that. They will not be any good as collateral security. I think you have to deal with the matter in a practical way. The minister has made that statement, and so far as I am concerned I am not going to pursue it any further. But I want to ask him whether the refundable portion of the income tax, and also of the excess profits tax will be shown on the books of the nation as part of the net debt of the nation. As these credits are established, the obligation to repay increases, and the amounts should be shown as part of the general debt structure. That will be done, I assume?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: One question arises out of what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said. What would be the position of a person who went into bankruptcy and had a considerable amount of refundable moneys in the hand of the minister? Is any provision being made for a situation such as that? If not, there will be considerable difficulty should an assignment be made.

I should like to have a statement from the minister in reference to a suggestion I made a while ago, that in certain emergencies a person should be permitted to withdraw from the department a certain amount of the enforced savings.

Mr. ILSLEY: The administrative difficulties would be very great. See the position the government would be in: it would have to set up some kind of welfare bureau to determine when a person ought to have his money back, and when he should not. That, in my judgment, is going too far. But I should not like to say that no consideration will be given to it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What about the question regarding provision being made in cases of bankruptcy?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know. I shall have to think about that. These are not assignable. Somebody will have to wait until the time comes for the money to be returned. Whether that goes to the assignor or to the official assignee I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They would have to prove title. I do not think that the minister can undertake to legislate for every conceivable contingency, although bankruptcy is one of the probables. I should think that in the legislation the ministry might take discretionary authority to deal with a necessitous case on its merits. If that is done, the minister will be open to numerous applications, but perhaps it will be justified by the circumstances of the applicant.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has just drawn my attention to another aspect of this matter. Suppose a company under the Excess Profits Tax has $100,000 to its credit. If I understood the discussion which took place between the minister and one of the hon. members from the west, in which the latter read from a statement of an association of English chartered accountants, they do not in Britain list that in the company's balance sheet, as an asset of the company. I would have thought it was a correct item of asset in the company's balance sheet, but it may be that there is some limitation over there which we have not in our statute here. Is it not the intention of the government that this should be not only a credit of that company in the books of the nation, but an asset of the company which should be revealed in its balance sheet? On the assumption that it is $50,000 or $100,000, what is the effect of that credit, standing in the books of the nation and in the balance sheet of the company, with respect to earnings? Will it be taken into acount in respect of earnings under the income tax act as capital in reserve? What is the position there? Perhaps the hon. member would elaborate his position. It is an important point that ought to be cleared up.

Mr. KINLEY: I have only one thought in mind, and that is that it be established as an asset of the company beyond peradventure. A company might have paid $100,000 or $50,000 in refundable taxes and it is important to know whether that is a real asset. There is this feature about it. The income tax payer gets 2 per cent on his money; the industrial company gets no interest on its money. It is important to know what your assets are in order to establish the stability of the company.

Mr. JACKMAN: The suggestions of the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) are worthy of consideration. I agree with the minister that we do not want another welfare bureau set up, but there are certain points that might be considered in order to stimulate savings, which the minister is so anxious to get. The minimum savings requirement is really an alternative for those who will not voluntarily subscribe to war savings certificates, and so in a measure the two are on all fours. The remarks I have to make refer particularly to war savings certificates, but by the same token they have reference to the minimum savings requirement. Industrial insurance is a very big factor in Great Britain and the United States, and to some extent in Canada. Very large companies sell insurance policies for a few hundred dollars, sending their agents around every week to collect a few shillings or so, and that is similar to the method we have of subscribing to war savings certificates by means of factory payroll deductions. I read in the Economist six or seven years ago that in the past the cost of operating these industrial insurance policies has been, even in the most highly regarded companies, as high as 50 per cent of the gross premium. It seemed an absurd situation for the protection afforded, but the appeal which was made to the workers, and to which they responded, was that they would have enough money to ensure themselves decent burial. Hon. members may not realize, because of their own situation, just what is the fear of a person in humble circumstances of not being properly taken care of on his passing from this earth, but it is a very real fear on the part of a great many people, and that was the most compelling reason for the subscription to this industrial insurance, which amounts in the aggregate to hundreds of millions of dollars.

I believe a forcible appeal could be made through the war savings certificates and carried into the minimum savings plan, if they were made cashable on a person's death to pay for funeral expenses. There are perhaps other emergencies which might entitle them to be cashable. This may mean setting up a certain amount of welfare machinery in relation to the war savings certificate campaign which would also deal with the minimum savings requirement item, but it might be worth while to stimulate selling. It would result in raising money for the crown. We realize that war savings certificates are of definite short-term maturity, yielding 3 per cent, tax free. The minister, as a gesture towards having these made available for a person's death costs, might have a renewal clause inserted at the same rate or at a rate to be fixed at the time of maturity of the present term, extending it a further ten or fifteen years, or for whatever period might best suit the case. If there is anything to be learned from the selling of industrial insurance policies, the same principle could be used in the selling of war savings certificates, carried through to the minimum savings requirement plan.

Mr. ILSLEY: The suggestion will be considered. The war savings certificates are redeemable after six months now. If the holder dies his estate gets them.

Mr. JACKMAN: I believe that in the dominion there is provision for civil servants to take advantage of some fund to which they subscribe whereby they get a stated sum, $500, payable within twenty-four hours after the death of the contributor. Death is one of the great emergencies requiring immediate funds. Funeral expenses must be taken care of. The necessity arises in far more cases than those of us who enjoy middle-class circumstances realize unless we get into a humble riding, such as a part of mine is.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be impossible to set up an organization that would be prepared to cash war savings certificates within twenty-four hours after the death of a person. It would involve the establishment of a large number of local offices.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It could be done through the banks.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not answer the leader of the opposition and the member for Queens-Lunenburg, who asked whether the returnable part of the excess profits tax will undoubtedly be an asset of the company. Subject to the one qualification that it is not to be negotiable, not to be assignable, or transferable, it is in every respect an asset. I have tried to make that abundantly clear. What the chartered accountants would say about it I do not know. I do not know why they do not consider the refundable part in Great Britain an asset.

Mr. JACKMAN: Certain conditions have to be specified in Great Britain and therefore it is a contingent asset.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what I surmised. The member for Red Deer, speaking the other night, referred to an editorial in a chartered accountant's magazine in England which said that chartered accountants had decided not to regard the refundable portion there as an asset, and I felt that there must be conditions there not in existence here. This matter was carefully considered and I dealt with it fully the other night. Our first intention was to attach conditions, but of course the more conditions one attaches the less incentive there is, and I felt that we would have to stand on one principle or another. Either [Mr. Jackman.] this was the company's money or it was not. I have tried repeatedly to make it clear that this 20 per cent is the company's money.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is one other condition, and that is that there shall be no indebtedness to the crown. That does not interfere with the question whether or not it is an asset. That goes to the question of refundability.

Mr. SHAW: As I pointed out the other evening, I believe the explanation given in the editorial in the chartered accountants' magazine was to the effect that when the war is over the increased debts would necessitate parallel taxes which would increase the liability of a corporation to such an extent that this returnable part of the excess profits tax would be offset by that increased taxation. That is the only explanation they gave. Apparently the accountants of this country are going to regard the refundable part of the excess profits tax in the same light.

Mr. ILSLEY: I listened as carefully as I could to the passage which the hon. member read, and I did not take the meaning from it which he ascribes to it. I do not think that is what it means.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was disappointed to hear the minister say that consideration is to be given to the suggestions made by the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Lake Centre to the effect that under some circumstances it might be possible for war savings certificates and compulsory savings to be made available at death or in the event of other emergencies. The minister should make it clear that this money will not be available to the individual until the war is over. I am disturbed by the large number of complaints made by hon. members when the minister proposes to change our normal way of living. It would be very easy if we could carry on as in peace time and still fight the kind of war that has to be fought. We must remember that ten years ago Hitler started to make drastic changes in the way of life of the people of Germany, and they have now become hardened. We have to make the changes very suddenly. This is one of the methods the minister is using to prevent inflation. It is unfair to ask the state to take the responsibility of looking after funerals, which would amount to making provision for the cashing of war savings certificates in the event of death; because everyone who had war savings certificates would naturally think that death in his family was an emergency. The minister should make it definite now that these amounts that the Canadian people are not going to be allowed to spend at the present time will not be available to them until the war is over. I hope that consideration will be given to introducing changes so that the proceeds of war savings certificates will not be made available for the purchase of consumer goods while the war is on.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am disposed to agree with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. He has the same approach that I have. The only reason I said consideration would be given is that I hate to take the responsibility, when serious suggestions are made, of abruptly dismissing them and saying I will not give them consideration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These proposals are not made for the purpose of confusing the issue. They are real cases.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some questions were asked about war savings certificates and redemptions. Sales to December 31, 1941, amounted to $110,890,104. Sales to June 30, 1942, amounted to $154,242,804. Six months has elapsed since the sale of the war savings certificates making up the former figure. Therefore they are subject to redemption after June, 1942. Redemptions up to June 30, 1942, have been $8,701,488. The percentage relation of that figure to $110,890,104 is 7.85. The sales during 1942 were not subject to redemption until after June, 1942.

Resolution agreed to.

9. That the refundable portion of any tax paid by the taxpayer in the twelve months preceding the first day of September in any year shall bear interest at the rate of 2 per centum from that date and shall be payable when the refundable portion is repaid.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The rate of interest is 2 per cent. The minister previously stated that the rate was based on the going value of short term money. The rate on war savings certificates is substantially better, and they are refundable and not taxable.

Mr. ILSLEY: They run for seven and a half years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But after a certain period they bear some interest.

Mr. ILSLEY: At a lower rate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be the answer.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask a question that is not related to this resolution but which I should like the minister to take into consideration and answer some time before these resolutions are reported. What progress has been made in fixing standard profits for depressed industries? I have been told that the board of review has not adjudicated upon even one-third of the cases before it. If that be so, should not some additional agency be created to speed up the work? Predicated on that statement the situation is very disturbing to those concerned. If there are several hundred such cases and they do not know what to do until their standard profits are determined, it is unfair to them. The question may be based on an entirely erroneous impression, but I should like to have some statement as to the position at a later stage.

44561-282

Resolution agreed to.

10. That where, under any existing or future contract or arrangement, a capital or principal sum is payable by instalments or otherwise, without providing for interest, or with interest at a nominal rate only, the minister in his sole discretion may by regulation or otherwise determine what part of the capital payment represents interest, which shall be deemed to be income for the purposes of this act;

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This provision seems to me to vest an arbitrary authority in the minister. In the case of a mortgage it would depend, I should think, on the terms of the contract. In the old-fashioned mortgage that we country lawyers used to draw there was no amortization scheme or anything. One contracted to hire say $10,000 at 5 or 6 per cent, payable half yearly for a specific period of time. There no difficulty would arise. But under the very elaborate system of mortgages that the loan companies use, the repayment of principal is spread over a period of years. The same is true, I think, under the housing plan sponsored by the dominion government a few years ago. What is contemplated here? Is it to be based on some arbitrary arrangement, or will the contract itself be taken into consideration? Under these instalment mortgages an accountant or actuary should be able to spell out exactly what is meant and arrive at it with mathematical certainty. Here it is left to the minister, and I do not think he ought to be given full authority. There would be no appeal, in any event.

Mr. GIBSON: The object of this section is to close the door to tax avoidance, which is possible when arrangements are entered into whereby payments of capital are made without interest being paid at all. Cases of the kind have come to light, and it is to provide that a fair rate of interest will be deemed to be included in those payments, so that a man may not buy a property and over a period of ten, fifteen or twenty years pay so much in the way of capital payments, without interest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We will say in the case of a family arrangement, or a business?

Mr. GIBSON: Well, when a purchaser is buying property and possibly paying a slightly lower price, paying it all in capital payments, because the vendor will not have to pay income tax on the mortgage interest. In that case he might be willing to accept a slightly lower sum, in order to avoid the payment of income tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be a system of tax evasion?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes, and the resolution is to provide for that.

Mr. BENCE: Does the minister mean to say that he will arbitrarily fix a certain proportion of the capital payments, which will be taken to be interest, even though there is no actual calculation of interest at all?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. BENCE: As I understood the case the minister mentioned a few moments ago, when the vendor of a piece of property receives only capital payments, of course he does not have to pay any income tax thereon, nor does the man making those payments. May I suggest in connection with real estate that the tax calculated should be on the income from the property, presuming the property is in use? A building may be purchased under an agreement of sale and no interest charged, it being merely a capital expenditure payable over a number of years; nevertheless that property is itself earning income on which income tax can be charged. It does seem to me wrong in principle to say that merely because a man decides he shall not have interest on his capital investment, the minister may arbitrarily charge interest or say interest is chargeable on it.

May I ask the minister another question. Would this section be applicable to dominion government annuities, for instance, where a capital sum is repayable over a number of years, either for life or for a term certain? Would that be separated in the same way, so that we might tax these annuities?

Mr. GIBSON: They are taxable.

Mr. BENCE: Yes, but by way of both principal and interest, because, as I understand the reason, prior to this it was difficult to determine the amount that should be put in for interest and the amount that should be put in as return of capital. If the minister is given this authority, will he be able to say in connection with these annuities that a certain portion is the repayment of capital and a certain portion is deemed to be interest? Will he be able to segregate these items in such a way that income tax may be charged only on the interest, as I think it always should have been charged?

Mr. ILSLEY: These are such interesting matters in theory that the discussion just goes on and on, but I cannot help discussing this matter a little. Let us suppose there is the sale of some real estate for $10,000, the amount being payable in ten annual instalments. That, I think, would be held to be not an annuity; it would be held not to be the exchange of capital for income. If property of a different kind is bought, such as a dominion government annuity contract, I think that would be held by the courts to be an exchange of capital for income. To draw the line between the two classes of transaction is very difficult. There are a great many English and American cases, and probably Canadian cases as well, drawing a distinction between the exchange of capital for capital, and the exchange of capital for income. If the transaction in its true nature is an exchange of capital for income, the income is taxable in England and is taxable here. But if it is merely an exchange of capital for capital, as I think would be held to be the case if I sold my house to the hon. member for $10,000 payable at the rate of $1,000 a year, then that $1,000 a year is not taxable. That would be the way for me to sell the house when income tax rates are very high, because then I would be avoiding the payment of income tax, though essentially neither of us ever intended that I should go without interest on the money that is unpaid. It is absurd to think that I would. I have charged the hon. gentleman $10,000, payable in ten annual instalments, instead of perhaps $7,000 with interest on the unpaid balance. But had I charged him $7,000 and interest I would have to pay income tax on the interest as it came in year by year. This provision is designed to prevent a practice of tax avoidance which is beginning and which undoubtedly will spread if we do not assume that in a certain class of transaction there is an element of income in the money received by the vendor.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of National Revenue said that an example would be that of a man selling his land at a lower price than it was really worth. But the Minister of Finance says it would be the opposite.

Mr. ILSLEY: He could afford to make a discount because of his avoidance of the income tax. The hon. gentleman is talking about one thing; I was talking about another.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Where the mortgagor might voluntarily forgo interest payments, for the purpose of keeping the tenant or mortgagee in possession of the premises in order to secure the maintenance of those premises, and where the payments would be sufficient only to look after depreciation and the lowering in value of the property, as I view it there is nothing in this provision to force the mortgagor to write into his assets interest which he never expects to collect. There is nothing in this provision to force the mortgagor to write up the interest which would ordinarily be payable, if the concern were a going organization? There is nothing to force him to write up interest which he never expects to collect?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): He cannot be forced to write up interest which he never expects to collect and which really is not in the property? That is clear?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is clear.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. JACKMAN: This resolution gives the Department of National Revenue wide powers to look into existing or future contracts where part of the money that the taxpayer receives is in the form of income. It is merely for the purpose of assuring the taxpayer what his position is that I speak. I have in mind particularly the soldier insurance contracts issued during the last war. The quickest time in which a beneficiary can get the money is over a period of five years. Part of those payments are in the nature of interest. I suppose there are many forms of fraternal benefit contracts as well as contractural rights under insurance policies where you have a similar clause. There is no lack of bona fides or attempt to evade taxation, yet strictly speaking a small amount of interest is contained in the amount which a person may receive. I think there should be certainty in this regard and perhaps some consideration will be given to naming more specific types of contracts.

Income War Tax Act

Mr. McNIVEN: As I understand it, since June 15, 1940, annuity contracts issued by the dominion government have been subject to taxation. Recently I was consulted by a client who had a dominion government annuity issued prior to June 15, 1940, another government annuity contract issued subsequent to June 15, 1940, and also an annuity contract issued by an insurance company. The first contract issued prior to June 15, 1940, was not subject to taxation, but the second one issued subsequent to that date was. The insurance company annuity was subject to taxation only in so far as interest was concerned. It seems to me that a dominion government annuity contract should not be placed in a less favourable position than an annuity contract issued by an insurance company. Would the minister have power under this section to remove that anomaly?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall look into it. I did not know that any distinction was made at the present time, and I am surprised to hear that there is.

Resolution agreed to.

On resolution 7 as amended:

HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Mr. amendment extends the items which were intended to be included in subsections (a), (b) and (c) of section 7, subsection 1, and it enlarges the scope somewhat. I am glad to see that the minister has included as deductible the premiums on life insurance policies which may be put into effect after June 23, 1942, but I suggest that the extension is very limited. It limits the amount to $100 a year. Does not the minister think that that is a cheese paring concession? I have had a flood of letters from young people, especially young officers who want to provide some protection for their families. They will be hit pretty hard if this exemption is limited to $100. I suggest that the minister enlarge the scope to include other types of insurance and to increase the amount. I do not blame him for not allowing more than 50 per cent of the first premium. The other 50 per cent is said to be the agent's commission. I doubt whether the commission to a life insurance agent on a policy issued under the whole life plan runs to 50 per cent, but I am not sure. Subsection (a) of the new resolution reads:

(a) payments into any approved superannuation, retirement or pension fund or plan established prior to the 23rd day of June, 1942 (or, if established subsequent to the said date, approved by the Minister of National Revenue), and paid by the employee as a term of employment or in connection with membership in a trade union. The phrase "as a term of employment" has a limiting effect. I suggest that the minister could have let this apply to payments into any approved superannuation, retirement or pension fund or plan, and omit that limitation.

Mr. COTE: As I understand this resolution, only the taxpayer living in a property which he owns is entitled to deduct principal payments on his mortgage from his compulsory savings. Will the owner of a duplex who is living in one of the two sections be treated the same for compulsory savings purposes as he is for income tax purposes? I understand that the owner of a duplex who occupies one half is allowed only half the charges on the property for income tax purposes. Will he be allowed to offset the principal payments he makes on his mortgage against his compulsory savings tax to the full amount or only half?

Mr. ILSLEY: The full amount.

Mr. COTE: That is, the owner of an apartment building containing twenty-five or more apartments will be allowed the full amount of his principal payments?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, up to the limit provided in the tax. He cannot deduct an unlimited amount.

Mr. COTE: He can deduct up to the amount of the compulsory savings? I point this out because it seems to me that justice is not being done to the small property owner. In my riding most of the small property owners are wage earners who have invested their savings in small properties. If they have two properties and do not inhabit either of them, they are not entitled to deduct anything from their compulsory savings because they do not reside in either of the properties.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not correct. I may have misled the committee this morning. An offset is allowed of the payments on one residential property whether the taxpayer lives in it or not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought residence was a condition precedent.

Mr. ILSLEY: I thought so myself.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does that apply to a farm in the same way?

Mr. COTE: The owner of a very large apartment house would be deemed, then, to have a residential property for the purposes of this section.

I should like to make a few remarks for the benefit of the class of taxpayers whom I would call small property owners, and who I think are the soundest part of our middleclass society. Consideration should be extended to them in the case of a second or third small property which they may own. During the last depression this class was decimated; many small properties under mortgage were foreclosed because principal and interest payments were not met and those who survived the depression did so only by increasing their mortgage in order to get sufficient capital to meet the carrying charges on their property. Consequently they have had no chance to improve their position. They find their incomes frozen to-day by the price ceiling which the war time prices and trade board has imposed on rentals, which have been based on the level of last October, but there is no such ceiling on the charges on the property, and municipalities and school boards have all the necessary power to increase property taxes. Nor has the interest rate on mortgages been frozen.

In passing, may I suggest to the minister that something should be done along that line. I know a great many small property owners in Verdun and Montreal who have to pay up to 7 per cent interest on mortgages. It is within the jurisdiction of the government to fix a level for interest rates, and I plead especially that the interest rate on mortgages should not be higher than 5 per cent. A ceiling should be put on mortgage interest.

As I have said, the situation of the small property owner is not very good. His rental income has been frozen at a certain level, while the charges on the property keep on increasing. Some consideration should be shown to this class of society. I do not know what would be the best way of meeting the situation, but I feel that some alternative should be provided in this section. One would be to provide that principal payments made on a mortgage on one or two or three small properties up to a certain limit of municipal valuation may be deducted from the compulsory savings tax. The small property owner with a certain equity in two or three properties, say of a total value of $25,000, would then have the same treatment as the owner of a big apartment house the value of which may be as high as $100,000. For these reasons I ask the minister to keep this class of taxpayers, the small property owners, in mind when considering paragraph (c) of this resolution.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to add a word to what I said this morning, because I think the minister has overlooked one consideration in connection with life insurance, and to me this seems the most important of all classes of savings. I quite appreciate what the minister says, that to extend paragraph (b) to include premiums on new life insurance policies would give an impetus to the selling of life insurance. But I know of nothing that has more merit than the taking out of life insurance. The money paid in life insurance premiums is the soundest sort of savings. Once a man gets a life insurance policy he hangs on to it as long as possible; it is the last thing he will let go. After all, the government will get the money it requires from life insurance companies through the purchase of bonds and through borrowing. It is only a matter of one per cent difference in the interest rate. I do not think it is right to discriminate between people who have already taken out life insurance and those who have not yet had the opportunity of filling their budget so far as life insurance is concerned, especially when they are people who are extending themselves as far as they can in this war. If they happen to die the government is going to take their money from them in some form or another, and if they have no life insurance they will have no cash left. I cannot emphasize that too strongly. Many people seem to think that life insurance companies are a kind of great big octopus, but as a matter of fact the life insurance companies are performing a public service par excellence, and the life insurance agents deserve a great deal of credit as well. I cannot refrain from condemning this discrimination which is made by this legislation.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Paragraph (b) says:

(b) premiums on life insurance policies or annuities or other instalment saving contracts of a type which in the opinion of the Minister of National Revenue—

And so forth. Would that include contracts for victory loans which have been made with different firms that a man works for? A number of workers have taken out contracts with their firms that they will buy so much in victory loans during the year; they are paying $5 a week or $10 a month. If those are not included, these people are going to feel the pinch.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are not included.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Well, do you not think they should be, just for this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not think so.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): "Annuities"; that will include government annuities?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am doubtful if government annuities will qualify.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Well, what annuities will qualify?

Mr. ILSLEY: Those that cannot be postponed without substantial loss or forfeiture to the taxpayer.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No matter what annuity you have, when you stop payments you are going to lose money on it.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not government annuities. You can pick them up any time.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes, people may pick them up any time, but does the minister think they will?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I don't know about that. A lot of people do.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This tax will have to continue for some years. There are also investors' syndicate contracts.

Mr. ILSLEY: The test is laid down here: it will be whether the premiums can be postponed without substantial loss or forfeiture to the taxpayer.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Well, would it cover them?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a matter for ruling by the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does he know?

Mr. ILSLEY: He will when he reads the contract. He will know better after reading the contract than I would know without reading it.

Mr. BENCE: The amendments which have been proposed by the minister meet the greater number of the objections which I have held with respect to this section. I am not at all satisfied, however, with the language which is expressed in paragraph (c) with respect to the matter of residential property, or with respect to the statement which was made this morning by the minister, as I understood him, that if the mortgage covered residential property it would extend to any other property which that mortgage happened to cover. I know of many cases where residential property is covered by a mortgage which also covers a number of sections of land. Under this provision, as interpreted by the minister, the taxpayer will be allowed to make the entire deduction within the limits.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. BENCE: I have no particular quarrel with that. But a man may own a farm, having no other occupation, and having no residence on the particular farm. A man may happen to live in the limits of a village; his farm adjoins the village, and his buildings are on the farm, but he has no residence on it. Under the provisions of this section that would not come under the interpretation of "residential property", because he has no residence on his farm.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. BENCE: He should be entitled to the reduction far more than a man whose mortgage happens to cover his residential property and, say, ten sections of land.

Mr. ILSLEY: Ordinarily this is not intended to cover investments in mortgages as a business investment. In the great majority of cases it will apply to a man's own residence, not to property in which he has invested.

Mr. BENCE: According to the statement which the minister made this morning it would, in some cases. But I am not so much concerned about that as I am about the man who has a small farm and does not happen to have a house on that farm, so that he rents at a nominal figure a house in an adjacent village; yet his whole farming operations are carried on at this particular farm. Surely some adjustment should be made in his case; he is just as much entitled to it as the other man.

Will the minister explain to the committee the principles underlying the decision which governed his conclusion that insurance policies should be restricted to those on which there is a premium of $100? It seems to me the reason why he brought this in was that he wanted to give people the opportunity of taking out a certain amount of protection for the sake of their families or their families to be, and he reached the solution, I assume through means in which the Department of Finance is interested, by limiting the actual amount which can be deducted under this refunding proposition. But if he carries out his principle to the logical conclusion he should have determined it on the face value of the policy on the whole life plan, because after all a man of twenty-five can purchase much more insurance with his $100 than a man of thirty-five or a man of forty. If he carried out his principle to its logical conclusion he would have decided that $5,000. say, was a fair amount of protection, and a man would be entitled to take out that amount of insurance and deduct the premium which was chargeable on the whole life plan.

Mr. ILSLEY: That may be logical. It is complicated; I do not know how it would be stated. The rates would be different for different companies; one could not say.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is the same plan.

[Mr. Bence.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I don't know. They will vary.

Mr. JACKMAN: The more expensive the plan the more savings element there is in it.

If I may say so, I think that this amendment to resolution 7 is much worse than the original draft, although the original draft required in my humble opinion certain changes. I do not know what the philosophy of the minister is behind this whole minimum savings requirement in respect of resolution 7. I assume that where the taxpayer is saving money, which in turn goes for the most part to the government, as it does under insurance policies and many annuity contracts, the taxpayer is to be given some allowance for that saving, because he cannot save on every hand, and it works an injustice on those who have been provident and who have contracts or are about to take out contracts, as against others who do not do any saving of their own but in their old age throw themselves on the community for relief. I think that the minister should take a more liberal attitude in regard to the savings of individuals.

I was struck by the suggestion of one of the two ministers that payments under a dominion government annuity might not be considered part of the minimum savings requirement. Here is a case where the money actually goes from the individual direct into the treasury of the dominion, and yet it has been suggested that such payment will not be allowed as an offset against the minimum savings requirement. The minister owes a great deal to the policyholders in insurance companies, because that is where he has to look for a large amount of new money to help finance the war. He should do what he can now to stimulate that, because the war, in the opinion of many of us, will last for some years yet, and he will have his accrual of income next year, with all the pressure that insurance companies exert to keep up their collections. He should be very thankful indeed for the premiums which are payable now by reason of contracts entered into in years gone by.

That argument does not bear so strongly on the case of a man who buys a house and perhaps gives a mortgage back when he does it, but nevertheless pays money over to some person else, and that money is at least theoretically available for investment in government securities. I think of one case where a house was sold and the total purchase price was paid in cash. To-day that money is awaiting investment in government bonds, because, in the opinion of most of us, owing to taxation measures, controls, et cetera, government bonds are the only security in which one can have any confidence at the moment. So that even where a house is purchased, money is released which will be available for investment in government securities, and the government will get it—which is the prime object that the minister must surely have in mind.

With that general background I wish to discuss paragraph (a):

Payments into any approved superannuation, retirement or pension fund or plan established prior to the 23rd day of June, 1942 (or if established subsequent to the said date, approved by the Minister of National Revenue)....

Is it not sufficient to leave the first part of the clause, namely payments into any approved plan, and delete the cut-off date? What is added by it, under any legal interpretation? Going further the paragraph says, paid as a term of employment. Most of the large companies that have a superannuation or annuity plan dislike inserting a provision in the employment contract that employees must subscribe to or come under the terms of an agreement as a compulsory measure. There are always one or two per cent of the people who do not want to come under any compulsory scheme, while 98 per cent are more than delighted to take advantage of the opportunity which the large companies provide. If you make it a term of the policy you imply something which is binding, and you make more difficult unanimous endorsement of it by the employees. As the minister knows, no person likes being told that he must do a certain thing.

I am also told that the unions do not like to have employees told what they should do about saving money. They do not object to employees coming under a superannuation or annuity scheme with a corporation with which they work, but in the United States this has caused a great deal of trouble where there has been an element of compulsion. In the original draft it was provided that the amount should not be repayable during term of employment. That has been withdrawn in the amendment as submitted, and I think it was a good change, because there are times when even those who would like to adhere to the savings plan which the company has in vogue are faced with an emergency in which they require money in a hurry. I suggest that in paragraph (a) all the words be struck out after the word "plan". It must be approved by the department, and that should be sufficent protection.

As regards paragraph (b), "premiums on life insurance policies or annuities or other instalment saving contracts of a type which in the opinion of the Minister of National Revenue are such that the premiums cannot be postponed without substantial loss or forfeiture to the taxpayer," that changes the whole aspect of the proposal as contained in the original budget resolution. Is everyone who holds an insurance contract to have to request the Department of National Revenue to pass upon it? I do not suppose the ordinary insurance policy will be greatly prejudiced if the policyholder lets it ride two or three years. Many of us during the depression had to let many policies ride because we could not meet the current payments, but we took them up afterwards and paid interest on them. We paid six per cent compounded, but that did not destroy the effective value of the policy. The paragraph goes on "and onehalf of the first year's premium, and the whole of subsequent years' premiums, on life insurance policies of a type not more expensive than insurance on the whole life plan." I understand the reasoning for the one-half of the first year's premium. Personally I should not have advocated anything more than this, or I might say that I should not have been dissatisfied if the minister had said the first year's premium. It should be borne in mind however that these life insurance agents are going to keep on. They will get their living out of the insurance business, and it is sufficiently good to support them. I do not know that it is necessary to put in the one-half, but I raise no particular objection to that. But it says the type of insurance must be no more expensive than the whole life plan. I fail to understand the reasoning of the department in putting that in. When you take the whole life plan, or cheaper plan, you are paying the minimum amount of premium in the form of savings. It is the pure risk of death which you pay for. When you take out an endowment policy the major part of the premium is really a savings contract, and that is what the government wants. It wants money which will in turn flow into the treasury through subscription to victory bonds. I do not understand the reason for the restriction as to insurance costing not more than the life plan.

Then we come to the bottom of paragraph (b) where it says it shall not exceed $100. That is an unnecessary limitation. It fails to provide very much insurance, and many young men who are entering the services will want to take out policies for more than that, particularly when, as mentioned this morning, $100 will not carry very much insurance, when you have to pay a very high percentage to-day to include the war risk in it. I see no reason why there should be a limitation of $100. It should be whatever the minimum savings requirement is on the man's income, which in most cases will not amount to more than a few hundred dollars at the outside.

Mr. ILSLEY: To begin with, the phrase "term of employment" is not very accurate. It is not intended to meet a condition of employment. It is intended to cover cases where the employee would not qualify for participation in the plan unless he were in fact an employee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is an unfortunate expression.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. There was a struggle over the language. First it was "condition of employment" and then "term of employment". The idea was to get away from condition of employment. All that was intended was that the plan must be participated in by employees as such; that is to say, they would not be able to participate in the plan if they were not really employees.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will be taken care of in the bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is satisfactory.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why the cut-off date?

Mr. ILSLEY: In regard to (b), the hon. member is right in construing the language as he has, but there again it was intended that it should be read as if there were a comma or a semicolon after "policies" in the first line, so that the words "of a type" and the words which follow qualify annuities and other instalment saving contracts alone, and do not qualify life insurance policies. In other words, we have not whittled down the terms of the resolution as found in Hansard and in the ways and means resolutions so far as life insurance policies are concerned.

Mr. JACKMAN: It does not apply to life insurance policies?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. The words "of a type which in the opinion", and so forth, are not intended to apply to or qualify life insurance policies. They are intended to qualify annuities and other instalment saving contracts. The clause is to be read as if there were a comma or semicolon after "policies".

Mr. JACKMAN: It does not include dominion government annuities?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. JACKMAN: And yet the money goes to you.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. ILSLEY: May I deal with the other points of detail. The suggestion made by the hon. member, and also by the hon. member for Saskatoon City, is that instead of looking at the amount paid by way of premium one should look at the amount of insurance. But that would mean that the income tax department would have to go behind the receipts and ascertain whether they actually represented premiums on more than the amount of policies permitted, which would give rise to administrative difficulties of considerable importance, of which there are going to be plenty anyway. I do not think we can go too far into making these provisions logically complete and correct in every particular when administrative difficulties are thereby multiplied. This $100 provision is reasonably good for the average person.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is the reason for the dominion government, annuity being excluded, that 4 per cent is allowed on it? Or is there a more general reason?

Mr. ILSLEY: The reason is that which I stated—that the contract is such that there is no penalty for dropping the payment for a number of years.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is forming a good habit, though, which does the government a lot of good.

Mr. ILSLEY: But there is no substantial loss or forfeiture to the taxpayer.

Mr. JACKMAN: That idea of substantial loss or forfeiture was not in the original draft. It must have been a belated thought on the part of the department. No one else would think of it. Why is that brought up now? It seems to me unfortunate and unreasonable.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not a belated thought. I mentioned it in the budget speech. That brings me back to the difference in principle between my hon. friend and myself. He is off on a different tack altogether from the one I have taken. In the budget speech I said—Hansard, page 3580:

Allowance is to be made, however, in this refundable portion of the tax for certain types of savings already being made by the taxpayer under contract, which the taxpayer cannot cease making without substantial loss or danger.

That is the principle which underlies this whole clause. We do not mind getting this money, apart altogether from stimulating the laudable habit of saving. But if we permit every kind of saving to be used as an offset we shall not get any money. While that may be my reason in part, hon. gentlemen last night wanted to know how we were going to finance the war. This is one of the ways. The reason we are making these concessions to the taxpayer is that we felt there would be some person who would already be loaded up with obligations to save, obligations which perhaps they could not continue, or not wholly, unless we made some such concession. But let us not proceed on the assumption that no one shall save anything over and above the total amount provided for by this budget. The Canadian people have to save more than the amount of their taxes and these compulsory savings if the war is to be financed. I am afraid that a good deal of the discussion has gone on the assumption that unless certain savings were allowed as an offset they would no longer be made. A great many have to make savings in addition, even if they have no offset at all. They will be expected to pay their taxes and pay this refundable tax and make savings over and above that. This is not intended to be a list of worthwhile savings, all of which will be allowed as offsets because they are worth while; it is only intended to be a list of the obligations which cannot be dropped without serious loss and danger to the taxpayer. We have tried to keep it to that.

We have made an exception in favour of the young man who wants to insure his life. Strong pleas have been made that there are powerful social reasons why some insurance, some protection is desirable. It may be that we have got mixed in our principles a little there; I do not know. But I do not see how in the total there is any sacrifice of savings feature in the payment of premiums on ordinary life policies as distinguished from In endowments more money endowments. comes back to the person who actually pays it in; in the case of ordinary life policies it comes back to the estate. It may not come back to the same person, but it comes back in the same proportion, or practically the same, as the other.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I agree so far as that is concerned, but there is another point. There are many people who might not be able to get insurance on the whole life plan because of physical disability. That is why I do not like this $100 clause. It certainly is discriminatory. One man, on account of premium than he otherwise would.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one administrative difficulty that I should like to take up with the minister, in connection with deductions that will be made from the pay envelopes by the employers, beginning in September next. According to the Canadian Press of July 9, as a result of some conference that took place between the commissioner of income tax—

Mr. ILSLEY: May I interrupt? This is a very important subject and it comes under resolution 25. I must ask that the discussion of this matter be deferred until we come to resolution 25, when my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, will make a statement.

Mr. DUROCHER: I concur in the remarks of the hon. member for Verdun so far as taxpayers are concerned. I am not fully conversant with real estate conditions throughout the country, but I am familiar with those in my own town. What he has said about taxes having been increased in Montreal and Verdun is quite true. We had a revision of real estate values in Montreal a short time ago, and while some assessments are down, others are up, and some have to pay more this year than last. Besides, the rate of interest has not been adjusted. This is a matter we tried to adjust some time ago with the federal government, and we were told that it was under the provincial government. We went to the provincial government and tried to have the rate made 5 per cent, and from them we got just the opposite answer-that this was a matter for the federal government. So that for a time we were between the devil and the deep sea. But the Minister of Finance has given us a loophole now, and we want to take advantage of it. Since we have mixed up in provincial affairs to the extent of telling our people that they shall not do this and that, and in particular that they must not raise their rents, it seems to me we could tell the trust companies and the money lenders that they must adjust their interest rates to a certain level, which I think should be 5 per cent. This would be only fair for the small property owners who in 1932 and 1933 were asked to make all kinds of sacrifices because poor people could not pay their rents. All organizations, government as well as private, were clamouring that we should be human, that we had to be Christian. We were human and we were Christian, and we kept for months tenants who could not afford to pay their rents. But there was humanity on the one side only those to whom we owed money, or the governments to which we owed taxes, did not, I am sorry to say, show much sympathy for the small property owners. Some of them suffered to the extent of losing all they had, the savings of a lifetime, and they were put out of their houses. That was accepted all right; no one made any great protest. Now something else has come up; just when we might have a chance of breaking even, we are stopped by the price ceiling. We do not object very much to that, but if you can put a ceiling on rent we ask why you cannot adjust the rates of interest at the same time so that at least we may make both ends meet. Just now we cannot do that, with the heavier taxation.

School taxes are also higher, and municipal taxes have gone up. We have to be satisfied with a limited revenue, and after meeting our expenses we do not receive the legitimate returns which those investments should bring us. As a matter of fact I do not believe there is a property owner in Montreal to-day, especially among the small property owners, who can realize three per cent on his investment. Everything goes for taxes, repairs and other expenses. Some of us have been fortunate enough to be able to renew mortgages with trust companies, but in such form that we are not left anything in liquid assets. As hon. members are well aware, we can make new arrangements, but every trust company, every insurance company with whom we have to deal, I would not say exact their pound of flesh, but at least exact quarterly payments, so there is not a small property owner who has five cents in the bank as revenue from his property. We have to pay out the money often before we get it in. Most tenants are paying their rent in a legitimate and regular way, but many of them got far behind during the depression; they owed so much to the grocer, the butcher, and in other ways that we are getting only very small amounts against arrears, which are not much help to us. So that while we are well pleased with this provision in paragraph 7 (c), I again ask the minister whether he could not use the same instrument that he is using in connection with the price ceiling on rent in order to put a ceiling on interest rates as well. Such rates should be in accordance with the revenue from the property, and in no case should be more than five per cent. I understand that the provision now under consideration applies to only one residential property. Often people will buy two or three adjoining properties, but I understand that this provision applies to only one.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DUROCHER: And the other two do not come under it?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; not the second or third.

Mr. DUROCHER: In that way some of these people are hard hit. They will not get any more revenue from the second and third properties, but they will have greater expenses. I support the request of the hon. member for Verdun that this matter be looked into and some help given, if possible, to the small landlords, particularly those in Quebec. [Mr. Durocher.]

We have heard a good deal abut Quebec being different from the other provinces, and in some respects that is so. In Ontario there is a moratorium which is still in existence, but the moratorium in Quebec will not operate after September 1. Then we will be called upon to pay the full amount of our mortgage, or at least a substantial portion of it. I know that I tried to obtain a renewal of some mortgages from firms that have previously lent me money on property, but they were not prepared to grant those renewals unless I could pay quite a substantial sum of money. We cannot pay more than we earn; and with the high taxes we will be called upon to pay this year-with which as a general rule people are not finding too much faultwe shall not be able to pay other things. We should receive assistance from the government in this respect, so that we may not lose the savings of a lifetime.

Mr. FAUTEUX: I concur in the remarks of the hon. member for St. James. I have received representations from many people in my own constituency, which adjoins that of St. James. As has been stated already, we have thousands of small property owners who during the depression had great difficulties in retaining their property, and I may add that it was because of their generosity that many people were not forced out on to the streets during that period. The owners of many small houses, renting at $12, $15 or $20 a month, did not receive any money at all from their tenants; they were obliged to try to collect something from the city, or from charitable organizations, in order that these people might be left in the houses. Then when the war started and business became better. at the very moment that people were able to pay, the ceiling was placed on rents. I do not blame the government for that; I believe it was a very good thing, but the fact is that those people have not had a chance to get their money back They are very nervous now, with all this new taxation, and they wonder how they are going to be able to pay for repairs, make payments on their mortgages, and so on. Under this provision we are allowed to deduct the amounts we pay on the mortgage on the property where we live, but we cannot do that in connection with other property. I just want to draw the attention of the minister to these facts, and to say that if it would be possible to do anything to help these small property owners, it would be a very good thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I might answer the hon. member for Verdun, the hon. member for St. James and the hon. member for St. Mary. It must be understood that it is not the object of this resolution to provide an offset against the compulsory savings in regard to payments made in the course of business dealings, that is, business payments. If I invest my money in residential property and derive income from the property by receiving from it more than enough to meet the mortgage interest, the repairs, the insurance and so forth, what I have left is business income, and the interest which I pay the mortgagee may be deducted from the receipts.

Mr. FAUTEUX: No, payments of principal.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct. In any event it was not the intention of the resolution to go into the field of business investment. Any payments on principal in that connection are payments made to acquire capital, which is business capital intended to be the source of income in the future. The intention of this provision was to protect an entirely different kind of property, that is, the property in which a person resides. We did not put it in that way, because it would have been difficult perhaps to deny an offset if someone moved out of a house and went to live in some other place. For simplicity of administration we are allowing one residential property per person. It is merely accidental that the residential properties which are business investments are in the same category as the farm the hon. member for Saskatoon City is worrying about. That is, it is a business investment.

Mr. BENCE: Oh, no.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes it is.

Mr. BENCE: Not like the case I gave the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: The farm is certainly a source of income for the farmer.

Mr. BENCE: It is what he lives off.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what the business man lives off. Because of administrative difficulties we extended the privilege of this offset to mortgages on farms. It would have been difficult to confine it to mortgages on residences. Nearly every farmer who is carrying a mortgage has the mortgage on his farm on which his house is located. You could not separate the part of the mortgage that applied to the house from the part applied to the farm. The farm is part of his business assets, his capital.

Mr. BENCE: Has the minister thought that a man might move a shack or makeshift building on to a piece of property?

Mr. ILSLEY: You do not legislate with those eventualities in view. He would then have two residences, and he could only apply the mortgage interest in the case of the one.

Income War Tax Act

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the amendment is an improvement over the original resolution. To the extent that I disagree with it I am not going to suggest any wide modifications, because if we keep on broadening it there will be nothing left of the savings part of the income tax. I wish to support the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) in the suggestion he made in connection with paragraph (b), which deals with premiums on life insurance policies or annuities or other instalment savings contracts. I cannot understand why annuities and savings contracts should be modified or need to have the approval of the Minister of National Revenue. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Rosedale, most likely these annuities would be government annuities, and the payments made thereon would go directly into government funds, while the premiums on life insurance policies would go to the life insurance companies. If the minister cannot see his way clear to delete all the words after "contracts" in the second line to "provided" in the sixth line, I suggest that he put a comma after "annuities", and then he would be excluding only instalment contracts. I think both these suggestions are reasonable, the last one particularly so.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister has said that a comma should go in after "policies" in the first line, and the subsection would then read:

Premiums on life insurance policies, of a type which in the opinion of the Minister of National Revenue are such that the premiums cannot be postponed without substantial loss or forfeiture to the taxpayer.

Do I understand that it will be within the power of the minister to state that the premiums should not be paid or that there should be no offset or reduction if in his opinion it did not affect the loss of the policy or the forfeiture of the policy?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. PERLEY: Some policies have been carried by business men to protect their estates in case of death and have been in force for a number of years. If a policy is paid up to date the minister can decide that there would be no loss or forfeiture to the taxpayer if the payment is postponed and the premium is entered as a charge against the policy?

Mr. ILSLEY: Those words do not apply to life insurance policies.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Cote) and other hon. members have referred to subsection (c). There is hardly a town in the west where you will not find farmers who have left their farms to come Income War Tax Act in to town to live. In some instances a man may own three or four farms and be interested in other businesses as well. One such man is mayor of the town, and another is reeve of the municipality. I know of such a man who has no mortgage on the house he occupies in town. One case I could cite is that of a man who runs a hardware business, and another is that of a man who operates an elevator for a grain company and lives on his farm. Can these men get a reduction for the taxes they pay and the interest on their loans and any principal payments? Can these things be taken into consideration in the statements they make? A man may obtain revenue from a business or from a farm; he accounts for that, and then he may want a reduction or an offset. I do not think the amendment is quite clear.

Mr. ILSLEY: Allowance is given for principal payments on the mortgage on one residential property.

Mr. PERLEY: A man owning three farms with buildings on each can claim only on the one?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. PERLEY: Many farmers in western Canada who have done a great deal to build up the country will be working under a great handicap.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so at all.

Mr. PERLEY: In Indian Head there are at least twenty men in that position.

Mr. STIRLING: Some weeks ago I took up with the minister the question of the Investors Syndicate bond, and if I understood correctly the reply which he gave a little while ago to the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) the holder of such a bond will have to send a copy to the Minister of National Revenue and obtain his opinion as to whether it comes within the wording of this resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. STIRLING: What would be the position of a man who some years ago borrowed $10,000 on a life insurance policy or some other security and undertook to repay it at the rate of $100 a month; will he be able to apply those payments to the graduated tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Repayments on loans on policies are not allowed.

Mr. STIRLING: The question has been raised as to credit being allowed on the purchase of war bonds and war savings certificates, and it has been suggested that the government should give consideration to permitting a percentage of these purchases being used in this way. This would prove an added incentive in connection with the minister's great desire that the purchase of war savings certificates and bonds shall continue.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have decided after careful and lengthy consideration that we cannot and should not permit payments for war savings certificates or government bonds to be allowed as offsets.

Mr. ROWE: I urge upon the minister that he give that point further consideration, because I think the argument made by my colleague is sound. I agree that the principle of this resolution is entirely in keeping with what I and others urged during the budget debate, and I realize that if the door is opened too wide the merit of the compulsory savings feature may be destroyed, and it would not have the effect which the minister desires. But I do urge upon the minister that he reconsider the matter, in fairness to the men who are working for small or moderate wages and are buying war savings certificates.

The war savings certificate is the type of investment which the man who is working in industry and the young child at school buys as a voluntary and cheerful contribution to our whole war effort. The man in the higher income brackets buys victory bonds. It is the wage earner who buys war savings certificates. I realize that the minister is endeavouring to guard against certain dangers, but it must have been an encouragement to him to see the magnificent response that was made by the workers in industry to the war savings campaign, when factory after factory employing from 600 to 800 or 1,000 employees, within eight or ten days after the war savings campaign was under way, made a 100 per cent contribution to the campaign. If war savings certificates are not to be allowed as an offset to the compulsory savings it will be impossible for many of these people to continue to buy war savings certificates. The minister, of course, if he will not reconsider. will be able to collect and put into the treasury an equivalent amount to that now spent in the purchase of war savings certificates, but in the one case it is being done voluntarily and in the other it will be done by compulsion. I hope the minister will reconsider.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The hon. member who has just taken his seat has emphasized the amount that has been contributed in war savings certificates through the voluntary efforts of industrial workers. Has the minister taken into consideration, in his refusal to allow war savings certificates to be an offset in the compulsory savings features the fact that hundreds of thousands of workers in this country are almost compelled by their employers, as a condition of employment, to buy war savings certificates? In numerous industries pressure amounting almost to compulsion is brought to bear on the employees to buy these certificates, and there is going to be hardship if that pressure is kept up and no exemption is granted for war savings certificates.

Would the minister also make clear to us just what the position is with respect to government annuities in relation to paragraph (b). That is the point which was raised by the hon, member for Vancouver East.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that government annuities would qualify, for the reasons I have given. I am absolutely certain that I will not permit war savings certificates or bonds to be exempt, because that would be destructive of the whole principle of this resolution.

Mr. ROWE: I did not mention bonds.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, war savings certificates. The doors are wide open for any form of worth-while or praiseworthy savings. But to permit savings to go in here which can be discontinued without substantial loss or forfeiture or danger to the taxpayer—I cannot consider it for one minute. We have made provision here for two or three forms of offsets in order to relieve hardship, but we shall still have to ask people to buy war savings certificates and bonds. That is the principle, and it is the principle we shall have to stick to.

Mr. COTE: If a taxpayer owns more than one property, do I understand the minister to say that he may choose between those properties when taking advantage of paragraph (c)?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. COTE: Whether he lives in one of these properties or not?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. COTE: So that he is not restricted to the property in which he lives?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Did I understand the minister to say that no deduction would be allowed for repayments of loans on life insurance policies?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Suppose a man raises a loan against his life insurance policy to carry on his year's operations. Is he not allowed to count that as a deduction within that year's operations?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not allowed as an offset against compulsory savings.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): But under section 16 he is allowed certain deductions for losses in revenue during the preceding year. Why should not a loan on a life insurance policy be allowed as a deduction when he borrows the money to carry on his year's operations? I know many people in that position.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us wait until we get to that section. That is a different subject altogether.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What arrangements has the minister made with life insurance companies in regard to receipts for policyholders? Are the companies going to use a different form of receipt?

Mr. ILSLEY: No arrangements have been made.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It would not be right for the policyholder to send in to the government the receipts he receives from the life insurance companies, because on many of the old policies it is stated that the receipts must be attached to the policy.

Mr. ILSLEY: There may be some arrangement for duplicates; I do not know. But that can be discussed under resolution 25.

Mr. NICHOLSON: A point has been brought to my attention which I have taken up with the Department of National Revenue, but they were not able to give me an answer. The department is interested in having payments under the home improvement plan continued. Is any provision made here to have those payments allowed as an offset to the compulsory savings?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, they will not be allowed as an offset.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The amendment states that the amount that can be deducted from compulsory savings in respect of life insurance is limited to $100.

Mr. ILSLEY: For future insurance policies, not for the past.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What will be the maximum amount of principal payments on a mortgage or agreement of sale? The difference between $100 and the 10 per cent? Mr. ILSLEY: The $100 does not come into it at all there. The offset is limited only by the amount of the compulsory savings for that person.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In regard to the life insurance premiums it says that the deduction since the said date shall not exceed $100.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is on new policies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I gather that the minister has turned a deaf ear to the plea I made in the course of my budget address for allowances for old debts?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I should like to know why the deadline for principal payments on a mortgage is fixed at June 23—why young people who buy houses after that date cannot be granted the exemption.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are voluntarily assuming new commitments, and it would be an encouragement to the mortgaging of property. We are relieving persons from commitments that they have already entered into, almost exclusively.

Mr. McNIVEN: The minister made such a brilliant exposition of his budget proposals and has defended them so skilfully, and at the same time has been so courteous in his replies to the numerous questions, that I hesitate to intrude now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, do not be afraid of him.

Mr. McNIVEN: I know the leader of the opposition will not regard that expression of opinion as fulsome flattery, because in his own budget address he concurred in a sentiment with regard to the finance minister in almost identical terms. I am glad that the minister has placed an agreement for sale on the same basis as a mortgage, and I was also glad to hear his defence of the amendment as to life insurance policies. But there my appreciation comes to an abrupt close. I regret exceedingly that the same consideration is not shown to annuities.

The annuity, particularly the dominion government annuity system, is one of the greatest social experiments ever embarked upon by any government. Introduced in 1908, it has grown steadily, and has for its objective provision by the individual for his old age. Now, the dominion government annuity comes squarely within the exception provided for in the amendment. As I understand a dominion government annuity, any amount can be paid in at any time, and the amount which is at the credit of the contract on the maturity date will be paid out over an extended period of years. So that the individual holder of an annuity will not suffer any material loss. But the principle behind this feature of the proposal was savings, and the annuity has brought about much of what was expected of it. Not so very long ago, one man out of every two reaching the age of seventy was dependent upon a relative or upon public charity for his support. As at December 31, 1941, there was at the credit of the dominion government annuities the sum of $156,053,072, and in the same period the dominion government has paid out $231.040.-821.82 as its share for old age pensions. The number of old age pensions being granted has increased, but it has not increased proportionately. What I mean by that is that the logical intention of those who introduced the old age pension scheme has accomplished results. I was hopeful, therefore, particularly inasmuch as the money comes to the dominion government, that the minister would recognize the moneys paid in under the dominion government annuities scheme as part of the compulsory savings plan.

I am likewise a believer in insurance. I always have been, so much so that when I was a member of the Saskatchewan legislature back in 1923 I introduced a resolution to require every young man on attaining the age of twenty-one to take out a thousanddollar insurance policy. I believe in insurance; I believe it is necessary as a protection and a means of saving money. There are certain policies which carry with them the right of loans, and during the depression years loans granted on policies have steadily risen. In 1939 the loans standing against policies in Canada amounted to $246,940,020. Loans reached a peak in the year 1933, having steadily decreased in volume and amount from that year to the present time. Nevertheless there still stands against the policies of Canada the sum of $246,000,000 which I mentioned a moment ago. Canadian policyholders are making an honest and substantial effort to reduce the loans on their policies. but they have not been able to do so to the extent which could be desired; for I find on looking at the insurance records for 1939 that there were lapsed and surrendered policies to the value of $383,595,970, made up in this proportion: lapsed policies, $165,303,531; surrendered policies, $218,282,619. The total lapsed and surrendered policies amounted to 63.8 per cent of all the insurance written in 1939. This means that policies to the value of $218,000,000 had to be surrendered because the loans or premiums had exhausted the cash surrender value of the policies, and the protection of Canadian homes was reduced to that extent.

Mr. JACKMAN: It kept people off relief.

Mr. McNIVEN: Possibly for the time being it kept people off relief. At the same time it deprived Canadian homes of that protection. The point I am making, on which I have written to the minister, is that payments made on account of policy loans designed to protect the policy and put it in good standing, thus creating a nest-egg as a reserve for a Canadian home and as protection for dependents, should be allowed as a deduction from the amount required to be paid under the compulsory feature.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The minister says that he wants the people to continue buying war savings certificates and government bonds, but most of those in receipt of moderate incomes will have very little money to put into war savings certificates and bonds after they pay these taxes. I call the attention of the minister now, as I have already done to some extent, to the effect of these increased taxes on the wage earners of the mining districts of Yukon. To begin with, the cost of living in that territory is 100 per cent higher than it is in other parts of Canada. I mention a few necessary items that go to make up the cost of living. Flour, vegetables, meat, eggs, fuel, cost twice as much in the Yukon as in other parts of Canada. Fruit up there costs 200 per cent more than it does outside, and electricity costs 500 per cent more than in other parts of the country. The government recognizes that expenses are high in Yukon and makes provision for its employees up there by giving them, as part of the remuneration or salaries, what is termed a living allowance; and normally the living allowance of the government salaried man in the Yukon is $1,500. The people in sheltered positions may be able to meet the increased taxes, but I doubt if the ordinary salary or wage-earner can do it.

The total exemption for all persons under the taxes now about to be imposed is $660. By resolution 2 it is provided that the exemptions shall be reduced for purposes of the graduated rates to $660 for all persons. The cost of moderate board and lodging in Canada, taking the very minimum of $35 a month, represents $420 a year, which would leave the taxpayer $240 for clothing and other necessities. That would take up the whole of the $660 exemption. But in the Yukon you cannot get board and lodging in the mining districts or settlements for less than $900 a year. That is $240 more than the exemption allowed on the taxes, and if the exemption throughout the dominion.

outside the Yukon, is barely $660, it ought to be $900 up there. The cost of living, taking reasonable board and lodging, cannot be had there for less than $900, and in addition to that, such essentials as clothing and other necessities will cost any man $240, so that to be fair the exemption there ought to be at least $1,140. Let me quote from a couple of letters I have received in the past twenty-four hours from that country. One writer says:

People living where most of the necessities of life are somewhat cheaper than in the Yukon realize how drastic this tax is to their economy. In Yukon it means annihilation. It means wholesale migration of those who are able to move, and for those unable to leave the country it means defaulting in taxes. The latter is evident when it is proposed to collect taxes from September next through until August, 1943.

Another letter states, describing the conditions since the additional taxation has been announced:

I have it that over fifty-three families in Dawson have made reservations to date for transportation to outside places during this summer and early fall, excluding the families who have already gone.

That is what it means. Either they have to get out of that country or they must be given fair exemption from their taxes. The work of the wage earner up there is seasonal. Men can earn wages for six months of the year-high wages, it is true-but they are idle for the next six months because during that period placer gold mining cannot be carried on. But notwithstanding the fact that for six months of the year a man earns no wages, from late October to the following March, under this budget he will have to pay taxes throughout that idle period. It is a financial impossibility. I do hope the minister will realize the importance of the situation so far as that part of the country is concerned, a territory which has produced so much wealth for the dominion and which has been such a good market. I hope he will find some solution for this problem.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There are many people who have taken out policies on young children to care for their future education. Will those policies be allowed under (b)?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is referring to children?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes. I have two small children, say, and take out a policy on each of their lives to ensure their future education. Would I be allowed deduction in that case—or any family man in a like position?

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish my hon. friend would allow that to stand until the bill comes in, when it can be raised again. It has received some consideration, and I do not know that I have come to a decision. The same applies to insurance policies on the wife of the taxpayer. I should be inclined to think they ought to be allowed, but I cannot give an undertaking. I wish to give more consideration to the question and deal with it on the bill.

M. ROSS (Souris): The same applies to a joint policy on the man and his wife. If the minister is getting an answer to that question I wish he would answer at the same time the question in regard to annuities for children.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): If the premium is $1,000 the exemption will only be $100?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is for new policies only.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): But I am speaking of old policies.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. It goes up to the full extent of the compulsory savings.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Under resolution 6 it is provided that one-half of the total taxes payable by a taxpayer under the normal rate of tax and the graduated rates of tax shall be refundable to a taxpayer provided that such refund shall not exceed 10 per cent of the income of a married person, or $1,000, whichever is the lesser. It may be a great deal less than $1,000. Then resolution 7 provides that the total taxes payable by any taxpayer under the normal rate of tax and the graduated rates of tax shall be reduced by the amount paid by the taxpayer in respect of premiums on life insurance policies in force prior to the twenty-third day of June, 1942. But if the premium paid is $1,000 he does not get exemption for more than $100 according to that wording. It says:

Provided, however, that such reductions shall not exceed the amount of the refundable portion of the tax as provided for in resolution 6 above; and the said refundable portion shall be reduced accordingly.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no limitation to $100 in respect of premiums on policies taken out before the date of the budget.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Only on new policies since the budget.

Mr. COTE: Does subsection (c) cover a mortgage registered prior to June 23 last but afterwards renewed?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, we shall have to make provision for renewals of mortgages.

Mr. COTE: It is the same mortgage but a different deed of obligation. [Mr. Ilsley.] Mr. ILSLEY: That will have to be provided for. Anything else would be unreasonable.

Mr. COTE: I did not hear the minister's reply a few minutes ago to the hon. member for York South about the case of a young couple building a home after June 23. It might be possible for the Minister of National Revenue to reserve a certain amount of discretion about these cases, as he does in the case of mortgages not registered by June 23.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not dare open that up.

Mr. JACKMAN: Before the section carries we should have a clear statement from the Minister of National Revenue as to whether or not the premium which is paid on an ordinary simple life insurance policy will be an offset against the minimum savings requirement.

Mr. GIBSON: A new or an old one?

Mr. JACKMAN: An old one.

Mr. GIBSON: It is, up to the amount of the allowable deduction.

Mr. JACKMAN: I did not understand it distinctly, because the section in the amended draft talks about those which cannot be postponed without substantial loss or forfeiture.

Mr. ILSLEY: Those words do not apply to insurance policies. I made that clear several times.

Mr. JACKMAN: They do apply on an annuity?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GLADSTONE: The amendment provides in clause (b) for new life insurance to the extent of premiums amounting to $100. The minister has thereby placed a restriction on the amount of new insurance. Not having the amendment before me I do not know if there is any restriction as to the amount of premiums that can be regarded as offset on insurance in effect prior to June 23.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. GLADSTONE: There is an offset allowed on premiums on very small policies, and that offset continues. Some men in this country I presume have policies for $500,000 or $1,000,000. Does the amendment propose any restriction in that regard? In section 15, relating to medical and hospital deductions, the maximum allowed is $1,000. Where there is a restriction of that kind, and also as to the amount of new insurance that can be placed, the minister could very well place a limit on the offset for insurance in effect prior to June 23, 1942, by adding, for instance, in subparagraph (b), after the word "premiums", the words "to an amount of $1,000".

Mr. ILSLEY: It cannot be more than $1,000 anyway, because that is the limit of the refundable tax. It is therefore the limit of the offset.

Resolution 7 as amended agreed to.

Resolution 11 stands.

12. That any pension granted to any member of His Majesty's military, naval or air forces or to any member of the military, naval or air forces of His Majesty's allies, for any disability suffered on active war service by the pensioner or any pension granted to any dependent relative of any person who was killed or suffered any disability while on active war service in the said forces, shall be exempt from taxation.

Mr. McNIVEN: Will the minister make some explanation of this resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is self-explanatory. It simply says that disability pensions of members of the forces are not to be taxable.

Mr. HANSON York-Sunbury): That is, pensions of the last war and this war?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. McNIVEN: Then a pension payable because of the last war which has been taxed since the year 1932 is now exempt?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. McNIVEN: Thank you. That will bring great satisfaction to many deserving people. The minister is to be commended for that progressive step.

Mr. COTE: This resolution mentions only pensions granted to any member of his majesty's forces, for any disability. The pensions granted under section 21 of the Pension Act are granted not on account of any disability of the veteran, but sometimes in lieu of a disability allowance, and on compassionate or meritorious grounds. I have in mind the case of a widow in my constituency whose husband died some years ago with disability below 50 per cent. In his lifetime he was paid a pension, but from the moment of his death the widow loses the pension because the disability was below 50 per cent. In view of the fact that this veteran had served in the South African war and the last war, she was granted a pension on compassionate and meritorious grounds. Is such a pension covered by this resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is intended to be. I will take care of that in some way in the bill. I never had any intention of excluding the meritorious clause pensions. Income War Tax Act

Mr. STIRLING: It is meant to cover service pensions as well as disability?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This includes all pensions, even in respect of service in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: All disability pensions.

Mr. GREEN: The wording of the resolution does not make that quite clear. It is restricted by the words "on active war service." In the last war the insurance principle was in force so far as pensions were concerned, and even if a man were serving only in Canada, if he suffered a disability he got a pension. That insurance principle is not applicable in the present war, I understand, unless a man goes overseas. I take it from what the minister has said that if the veteran of the last war is getting a pension it does not matter whether he served only in Canada or whether he served in England or France, he will be eligible for this exemption. Is the position the same with regard to men serving in the forces in the present war?

Mr. ILSLEY: I had better give this more thought. I do not want to embark upon a course that is going to extend step by step to all kinds of pensions, including service pensions and all that sort of thing, because if we do that we will be in confusion. My intention was to exempt the pensions that are ordinarily payable under the Pension Act, that is, disability pensions, whether the man left Canada or whether the disability was incurred in Canada or not. That was my intention, and I do not know exactly the significance of the words "active war service". Is not a person on active war service if he enlists for active war service?

Mr. GREEN: I think the exemption should be based on the Pension Act; that is, if a soldier is entitled to a pension under that act, then he should be entitled to exemption under the Income War Tax Act. If the minister will word his section in that way I believe he will avoid a great deal of difficulty.

I should like to impress upon the minister again the position of some men not now covered by the Pension Act. First there are the merchant seamen. While they are not covered by the Pension Act, they are covered by a special order in council. Only yesterday in a bill that went through this house, the Veterans' Land Act, provision was made for these merchant seamen. That was just one more bill in the legislation being passed by this house which recognizes that the merchant seamen are entitled to the same consideration as the men in the navy, the army and the air force. I was greatly impressed by a dispatch appearing on the front page of the Ottawa Citizen yesterday morning, under the heading, "His Majesty sends thanks to brave men of two navies." The dispatch reads in part as follows:

"On this day of thankful remembrance for the services of the officers and men of the royal navy and the merchant navy, I wish to express once again the heartfelt gratitude of the peoples of the empire to the brave men of the two navies, on whom so much depends and on whom we place our unbounded trust."

I suggest that to bring this legislation in line with other legislation passed by this house, the men of the merchant navy also should be granted exemption. Then there are two other very small groups; first, the firemen who are serving overseas, and who I presume will be covered by order in council in respect to any injuries they may receive, and second, the men in the auxiliary services overseas, who I believe are covered by order in council but who do not get this exemption. I suggest that all these classes should be included in those receiving the exemption.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give that matter consideration before the bill goes through.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health just how far this principle of insurance in relation to soldiers is carried, and whether it extends to the Aleutian islands. Do men serving there obtain this benefit? I noticed recently that one of our men lost his life in that area. Do they come under the insurance, or do they not?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What were the conditions surrounding the case?

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not know; I am just asking as to the general principle. The man was killed in the Aleutian islands.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That would be a theatre of actual war. The definition of a theatre of war was broadened very much by the pensions committee last year, and doubtless that would be a theatre of actual war. It is outside Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think the pension commission has discretionary power to grant pensions to anyone killed on active service in this dominion, has it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, if death is due to service—I have forgotten the exact phraseology of the act, but I think it says if injuries or death "arose out of or were directly connected with" military service.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): For instance, we had quite an argument the other day about the accident that occurred recently in the canal [Mr. Green.] here, as to whether or not the dependents of those men would be entitled to pension. I am quite sure the commission has power to grant pensions, and that they would do so.

Resolution agreed to.

13. That any amount received as compensation, other than compensation for loss of time, under any workmen's compensation legislation of any of the provinces of Canada in respect of any injury or disability incurred or in respect of any death, shall be exempt from taxation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, you went so quickly after we passed resolution 7 that we hardly had time for any comment, or for any questions we wished to ask the minister. Would you mind if I referred back to resolution 7?

The CHAIRMAN: That has been carried.

Mr. ILSLEY: We discussed resolution 7 during half the afternoon.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not think it is fair for the Chairman to move so quickly that an hon. member has no chance to comment.

The CHAIRMAN: Unless there is unanimous consent I am afraid the hon. member cannot refer to resolution 7, which was discussed for quite some time and which has been carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is not a question of how long it was discussed; it is a question of whether or not there is further discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not a question of how long the discussion took place, but it is a fact that resolution 7 has been carried.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If a workman or any other person were to receive damages in an action at law, altogether outside the workmen's compensation legislation, would that be looked upon as income? I should not think so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Generally speaking it is not regarded as income.

Resolution agreed to.

14. That any employer may deduct as an expense an amount up to 5 per centum of his payroll, under limitations to be prescribed, paid as contributions to any employees' superannuation or pension fund or plan, excluding therefrom, however, portions in respect of salaries over $6,000 per annum.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When are the limitations to be prescribed? Apparently the ceiling has been set at $6,000, but I should like to know by whom the limitations will be prescribed—by the governor in council, by the minister, or by the commissioner. And have not payments to superannuation funds always been deductible by the employers as expenses? I think they have been, and if not they ought to have been.

Mr. ILSLEY: Before coming to that point I should perhaps give the explanation for this resolution. It relates to a deduction from income by employers in respect of contributions to superannuation or pension funds on behalf of their employees. The present law allows the employer to make a deduction of up to 5 per cent of the remuneration of any employee, or $300, whichever is the lesser.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is limited?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It has been found that in cases where the employees may be well along in years, the amount which the employer actually contributes in order to provide such elderly persons with pensions is at a rate higher than 5 per cent. In the case of younger employees the percentage figure is normally quite a bit below 5 per cent. It is proposed to amend the law and provide that the total deductions in respect of all employees' shall not exceed 5 per cent of the employer's payroll.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the average of the whole?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and at the same time the limit of $300 is retained in respect of the deduction on account of any one employee. Apparently that is the limitation that is to be prescribed. The resolution also provides that in calculating 5 per cent of the payroll, the amount of any salary in excess of $6,000 shall not be taken into account. Safeguards will be introduced to prevent abuses under this arrangement. There are other limitations to be prescribed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the portion in respect of salaries over $6,000. That is not quite what the minister said. If the salary is over $6,000, no part of that is to be allowed. Or is it just the part up to $6,000? It must be remembered that these men are getting superannuation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The amount of the salary in excess of $6,000 per annum is not to be taken into account.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the amount up to $6,000 is to be taken into account?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution 14 agreed to.

Income War Tax Act

15. That a taxpayer shall be allowed a deduction from income in respect of medical expenses in excess of 5 per centum of the income of such taxpayer, incurred and paid by such taxpayer in the taxation year, or paid in the taxation year and incurred within one year prior to the date of payment if such payment is made to any qualified medical practitioner, dentist, or nurse, registered under any dominion or provincial legislation or regulation, or public or provincially licensed private hospital, in respect of any birth in the family of, illness or operation upon, the taxpayer or his spouse, or any person dependent upon the taxpayer, in respect of whom the taxpayer would heretofore have been entitled to an exemption and if the said dependent is resident in Canada, provided that the allowance in any taxation year shall not exceed the sum of

(a) $400 in the case of a single person without dependents, or

(b) $600 in the case of a married person or a person entitled to an equivalent allowance to that of a married person; plus

$100 in respect of each additional person (not exceeding four) dependent upon the taxpayer for support;

Provided, however, that the maximum deduction hereunder shall not exceed $1,000; and provided further that the said amounts are substantiated by receipts and that such receipts are lodged with and at the time of filing the taxpayer's income tax return;

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think it would be a good idea if the minister would state what provision he has made to enable people to pay debts which were contracted as a result of the experiences of their family life. If I had been permitted, I was going to suggest under resolution 7 that a stipulation be added to allow deductions of moneys paid on old debts. Since resolution 7 has carried, perhaps some provision can be made under this resolution. Quite frequently as a family goes forward in its development, bills accumulate for dental services, for books, for groceries, for clothing and other things of that sort and which become an indebtedness against the family. At times these become a difficult burden to carry. So far as I can see, no provision is made for the man with old debts. I know of people who have had debts outstanding for six, seven and eight years. They have been trying to pare these down out of their incomes. In many cases the debt accumulated throughout the depression. Just as soon as conditions appear to be a little better and the householder is able to get employment and hopes to pay off his debt, in comes the minister and appropriates the money with which the man expected to pay off his debt. Has the minister given any thought to making provision for that?

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly gave it consideration, and I decided it would be utterly impossible to introduce that principle into our income tax law. We certainly cannot have a law under which people may incur debts instead of paying taxes. The hon. gentleman may say that that is all very well for the future, but what about the past? Similarly I am firmly of the opinion that we cannot make provision for the payment of debts before the payment of taxes to the government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Under those circumstances is the minister prepared to devise something in the nature of a moratorium to relieve people of the dreadful burden which they bear with respect to debt? A man may owe a number of small bills totalling $200 or $300. He has gone to one of these small loan companies about which we heard so much two or three years ago and has borrowed the money with which to pay these bills. The loan company is in position to harass him; it can take him into the courts and generally make life unbearable. Should the war last six, seven or eight years, this man will be constantly harassed and dogged into his grave by the loan company. Is he to have no means of relieving himself of this burden?

A small grocery store or a merchant in a town, or even in a city like Ottawa, may have a number of bills outstanding. The total of these bills may be sufficient to endanger his solvency. The minister has put on a tax structure which prevents a large percentage of this man's debtors from paying their debts, thereby rendering it almost impossible for him to recover his solvency. Is the minister going to give that merchant a chance to recover his position?

Mr. ILSLEY: The moratorium would not help the merchant.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the moratorium will not help him, then something else ought to be done. Otherwise there is grave danger of many merchants in the three prairie provinces being forced into insolvency because of the budget taxation structure. Large numbers of people have been utterly disheartened because they can find nothing in these income tax provisions but a death-knell for their hopes of getting out of debt. Their situation is completely hopeless. I do not think the minister can afford to ignore a situation like this because there are too many people affected. There is too much of our morale at stake.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Many working families in Canada cannot afford to employ a registered nurse when they have illness, and must rely upon a practical nurse. In such a case would a certificate from the doctor be sufficient to bring them under this resolution?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: My view is that we cannot let in the practical nurse, because anybody could qualify.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Most working people cannot afford to employ a registered nurse at $7 per day. I submit that they should come under the provisions of this resolution if they are able to obtain a certificate from the doctor as to the employment of a practical nurse.

Mr. COLDWELL: I mentioned this matter in my speech on the budget. Perhaps I speak from some personal experience, because I know what it is to have an invalid in the home over a number of years and what that does financially to anyone who is thus handicapped. I know also that it is impossible, even with a fairly good income, to employ the services of a registered nurse over a long period of time-it simply cannot be done. I support the plea that has just been made. A large number of persons have had members of their family ill for extended periods, and some consideration should be given to them. There are many people not as well off as the members of this house, and some consideration should be given to those who are under such a financial burden. I know it opens the door wide, but in my opinion a good case can be made out for the home in which it is impossible to employ a registered nurse but where some provision has to be made for additional help on account of prolonged invalidism or sickness. While the minister said a few moments ago that he could not give consideration to this, I am urging still that some consideration be given to cases of the kind to which I refer.

Mr. STIRLING: I want to read to the committee two paragraphs of a letter from a clerk in a city:

My wife has been totally confined to bed for two years. Being an arthritis case the medical expenses for doctor's services are not heavy and would not exceed the allowance of $100. But I have to engage a nurse at $30 per month and my drug store bill is $20 per month. Thus I am paying $600 a year without counting nurse's maintenance.

The bill allows me nothing whatever unless I engage registered nurses. This is not only entirely beyond my income possibilities but would necessitate the employment of two individuals to get the same attention.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to present another picture. I know an electrical engineer who after long years of steady work and thrift had saved a considerable amount of money. He lived with his mother, who had the great misfortune to break the head of the femur of her right leg, which as everyone knows is a very serious accident for an elderly lady. Loving his mother as he did, this man sent her to the private pavilion of the best hospital in the city and gave the very best attention for her. Her case required three nurses a day-the General hospital, Toronto, has three eight-hour shifts for nurses. On account of her age this lady was laid up for a long time. Her leg had to be kept up so that the two pieces of bone would grow together again, and they did. The hospital made a wonderful job of the fracture, although it took quite a long time. This man told me that his bills for hospital and medical expenses were over $3,000, nearer $3,500. An allowance of $1,000 on income tax would not be very much in a case of that kind, and I have been wondering whether the minister, if any such case was brought to his attention, might not feel, upon the advice of medical officers, that some further allowance should be made. The particular case I speak of is long past, several years ago. I am speaking of the future, and I am wondering whether the minister would not, in such cases involving a large expenditure, make a greater allowance than $1,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: Was the man's income substantial? Would the $1,000 deduction not bring the taxpayer below the taxable class? I am just asking; I do not know.

Mr. MacNICOL: This man was an employee in one of the large iron and steel plants. His salary was not large, but he was a steady worker and a thrifty man, and he saved as much as he could, so that he was able to pay the hospital and medical expenses out of what I might call his capital savings. He would not have been able to pay the bills out of his income.

Mr. ILSLEY: From what the hon. member says I do not think a greater allowance than $1,000 would have been of any use to him. Under this-I am not making a ruling on the case by any means-he would get $1,000 in addition to his other deductions. Perhaps I am wrong in that. Perhaps the limit is less than that. At any rate it does not make very much difference. The hon. gentleman is talking about a principle, whether there should be an upper limit or not. If there is no upper limit it opens the door to some abuses probably. I can understand that there might. be cases of wealthy persons suffering perhaps from some nervous trouble or something of that sort whose medical expenses might run up to fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. I do not think those expenses should be allowed. I think there should be an upper limit.

Income War Tax Act

Mr. MacNICOL: Most other folks would have sent their mother to a public ward or to a hospital where she would not have received as good attention, but this man almost worshipped his mother, and that is why he sent her to the best hospital and provided the best attention for her. If the minister felt satisfied that a greater allowance should be-made in cases of that kind than the sum mentioned here, I would be satisfied. I am not asking that the maximum amount of $1,000 be raised. I am suggesting that the minister in his discretion might grant further relief in cases of that kind which are brought to his attention.

Mr. ILSLEY: There must be a limit to the discretionary powers that are thrown on ministers and officials, or the situation will become impossible after a while. That would be the case if the Minister of National Revenue had to check the bona fides of claims for medical and dental expenses and try to decide whether the bills were excessive or not, and whether they were really necessary or not. The situation would become hopeless. This is a new provision. We have had nothing like it in our law in the past, and it may turn out from experience that it is not generous enough. I do not know.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It is a good start.

Mr. ILSLEY: At least it provides against serious, calamitous operations and that sort of thing in families. It provides some relief, and that is all it is intended to do.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Could not a proviso be inserted in the bill covering the engagement of practical nurses where the man's income was $5,000 or less? Then it would not cover the rich.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think this resolution is a step in the right direction. I approve the principle. Much has been said this afternoon of obligations that have had to be incurred by people for medical and hospital and nursing bills with which they are unable to catch up. In the west, in the very tough years-I am speaking from municipal experience-the municipality would employ practical nurses on the certificate of the local health officers, and I am wondering if the minister could not add a few words to this resolution to cover the engagement of practical nurses who were certified to by the local health officer. He is a responsible citizen appointed by the local government, and he could issue a voucher. That worked with us in the municipalities out west in the tough years, and was of decided assistance to our people because often registered nurses were impossible to obtain. Would the minister consider adding a few words to cover the engagement of practical nurses?

Mr. McCANN: I think the minister is to be commended for putting a provision like this into the Income War Tax Act, allowing an exemption for medical, nursing and dental expenses. A large number of people have experienced terrible hardships by reason of excessive bills through sickness. If this results in the men of the medical profession being paid their fees more regularly, from their point of view I suppose it will be considered good legislation. However, I would point out to the minister that, in being so specific as to the type of nurse, he is taking away from a great many people the advantages of this exemption. Nurses are becoming increasingly scarce. As all of us know, a great number are in the armed services. Hospitals are finding it increasingly difficult to get sufficient nurses to carry on, and throughout the country they are becoming so busy that in many institutions there is not bed room for those who make application for hospital services, so that it becomes imperative that many families have medical attention and nursing service in their own homes. I can readily see where there could be an abuse of this provision if the term "practical nurse" were used, because probably a man who had somebody ill in his home would engage a maid to do maid service and some nursing. I think the wording should be amended so that the exemption would apply if one has a nurse employed full time, and not necessarily a nurse who has received her degree from a province and has become registered in that particular province. There are plenty of people in the nursing service who have never been registered, yet who continue to do nursing. Take, for instance, midwifery; that is nursing of a particular kind, utilized to a great extent in many parts of the country, particularly in the rural areas. Therefore it would be too exact to specify that the nurse must be registered; you would deprive the great majority of people of any value attaching to this exemption. I ask the minister to give that phase of the question his close consideration.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What is the hon. member's opinion about the local health officer's certification?

Mr. McCANN: I do not believe that either doctors or health officers should be in the position that they have to certify. After all, in an income tax return one has to rely on the honesty and good faith of those who are making the return. If a man under particular circumstances has somebody in his home for whom he has excessive medical, nursing, or dental fees, he is not the type who is likely to put in a claim for an exemption which is other than bona fide. The medical profession should not be put in the position of having to give a certificate as to whether nursing services were required.

Mr. HOWDEN: I understand that for the last two or three years many of the large hospitals have been training practical nurses, who get practically the same training as registered nurses but are not required to take the same studies. Most of these women, all of whom are young because they are accepted only at a certain age, are really trained practical nurses, and they leave the hospitals with practical nurses' certificates. I believe that these semi-professional women should be taken notice of in this legislation, because they give excellent service, and the fee required by them does not begin to compare with the fee of the regular trained nurse.

Mr. COTE: I agree with hon. members who have so well pleaded the cause of the unregistered nurse. I should now like to draw the attention of the minister to the expenses incurred for the services of registered optometrists. In Quebec and all the other provinces there is provincial legislation which regulates the practice of optometry; and since the privilege is extended in respect of expenses of medical practitioners, dentists, and nurses registered under any dominion or provincial legislation or regulations, I would ask that the same treatment be given optometrists. I believe that lack of suitable glasses is just as likely to debar a man from work as is sickness. In my province it is the duty of the optometrist to examine sight and prescribe the wearing of suitable glasses. I believe that this type of professional man should be added to those already mentioned, since he is duly registered in each province and his practice is regulated by a distinct provincial statute.

Mr. GILLIS: I, too, think the minister is to be commended for much that he has done in this particular resolution. But with respect to the provision mentioned by several hon, members for lowering the category of nurses, I believe there is much justification for that course. In many homes there will be found persons who have been invalids for years. It is not possible for the family to pay the expenses of a registered nurse; nevertheless a nurse is necessary; and, as the resolution stands, it would mean that many people who have been keeping an invalid in the home on this basis will have to discontinue it, and shift the member of the family who happens to be sick to a hospital or a home, with the consequent breaking up of the family. I think the minister could well consider the representations made by the hon. member for St. Boniface. If the hospitals are turning out practical nurses who can be hired at a much lower rate and will perform the necessary services in that category, I think this recommendation should be given consideration.

There is another matter to which I would call the minister's attention. Dentistry and all these other services are provided for. After you go through all that you die, and I wonder whether the minister has given any consideration to this angle. Any of us may have relatives who are not carrying insurance; there is a death in the family; you may be called upon to bear the expenses, and you can run into a bill of $300 or $400. Funerals are more expensive than hospitals. There are many people who do not carry insurancesome through prejudice, others because they cannot afford it-nevertheless when the time comes for them to shuffle off this mortal coil somebody has to pay the burial expenses. Did the minister give any consideration to exemption in case of funerals where there is no insurance to cover the cost?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Why is the deduction limited to expenses incurred during the taxation year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Otherwise old bills would be brought in for several years back.

Mr. BRUCE: I should like to lend my voice in support of the hon. member for Cape Breton South when he said that the exemption should be allowed for a practical nurse. I think it is an undesirable discrimination to say that the nurse must be a registered nurse. There are many poor families and even some who are not so poor who have to employ practical nurses, and I think the minister would be well advised if he would consider exempting payments to such a nurse, provided the doctor gives a certificate that she is thoroughly qualified, although not registered.

Mr. GRAHAM: For brevity's sake I am just putting myself on record as supporting the suggestion that the minister sympathetically consider the possibility of widening the definition of "nurse" under the circumstances referred to by the various members. I think the minister would satisfy the committee if he would say that before the actual bill comes down he will give that proposal sympathetic consideration.

Mr. JACKMAN: First of all I support the suggestion that if at all possible there be an exemption with regard to practical nurses.

Income War Tax Act

As the resolution is now worded it defeats its purpose. Very few people, even among the well to do, can afford a trained nurse for any length of time. As soon as the critical period is over, they have to resort to practical nurses, and that cost may run for months or during the whole lifetime of the patient. I would advocate as strongly as possible that that provision be worked out if it is at all feasible.

There is a second point. It is not specified whether the 5 per cent applies to gross or net income. Surely it must apply to net income, because that is the only real income one has.

Mr. ILSLEY: What does the hon. gentleman mean by net income—after marital deduction?

Mr. JACKMAN: Suppose a person has $5,000 gross. He must spend $250, as I read this, before he is allowed to deduct extra medical expenses from total income.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. JACKMAN: When you get into the higher brackets, the man with an income of $20,000 has to spend $1,000 before he is allowed the deduction. Under the present budget, he gets, not $20,000 but only $9,000, so that I contend he should have to spend only $450 before being entitled to the deduction if his medical expenses exceed that. We must be realistic about this. It is what is left that one has to spend, and 5 per cent of the gross income may be a very large amount. I suggest that it should be taken off the net income.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is certainly no intention of regarding income as income after payment of taxes. That is what the hon. gentleman suggests it ought to be?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes. Does the minister not think that is fair?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is one other small point. If I remember rightly, in the income tax returns there was a slight change in the wording in regard to claims of exemption for children. Formerly, if a child was born during the taxation year the claim was allowed but under the present wording that is not possible, although I stand corrected if I am wrong.

Mr. GIBSON: There is no change in that. If a child is born even on December 31 exemption is given for the whole year.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the minister not allow this resolution to stand until after this sitting to see if something cannot be done with regard to my suggestion in connection with practical nurses?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am willing to give it consideration, but I think the resolution had better pass and consideration be given before the bill is brought down.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That would be satisfactory.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to leave the impression that I am very favourably impressed by the arguments about practical nurses. The member who made the strongest impression upon me was the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden). If there were some test; if, for instance, there are nurses who are registered, having certificates, that might guard against abuse, but the other suggestions do not appeal to me. I do not think we should depend upon the certificate of a provincial or municipal officer or a doctor, or anything of that kind, because that would leave the door wide open. Many hon. members have suggested that, but it would invite widespread abuse.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I suggest that the minister limit it to incomes of $5,000 and under. That would help to some exent.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not like that sort of thing if I can avoid it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister consider some measure to alleviate the distress of people who are deeply in debt, particularly those in the income brackets between $2,000 and under? The matter is so serious that it merits careful and sympathetic consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: It must be borne in mind that the Minister of National Revenue in the administration of the act sometimes has to make concessions to taxpayers in individual cases, not pressing for payment when he knows that in all common reason it would throw the taxpayer into bankruptcy. That is part of the ordinary administration. I do not think, however, we would be justified legislatively in doing anything about persons in debt. It would be out of the question. We cannot make provision for everything in legislation.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not think I made the point as well as I might have with regard to the 5 per cent, as to whether it related to gross or net income. The resolution as it stands has a delimiting feature. The maximum deduction is $1,000. The minister surely knows—and I am speaking not for those in the low bracket particularly, but for those in the higher brackets-that there are people who cannot live on their income despite the fact that they have been trying by various means to avoid drawing on capital. The minister himself does not want people to draw on capital. They do not want to do it. If they have a large income, half or more than half of it is taken from them. Suppose that a man's income is $20,000. He has to spend $1,000 before he is entitled to the exemption. It does not apply in the same degree to the smaller brackets, and where there may be a good deal of sickness in the family it may create a real hardship among the class which is already doing its share and more than its share. In any event it is not open to substantial evasion, because there is that limitation of $1,000 which applies to the poor man as well as the formerly wealthy man.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not so greatly concerned about persons who have capital and can meet exceptional medical expenses out of it. That is what people have done in the past from time immemorial. When people had money saved up and were faced with hard times through illness they had to use some of their savings, and from that there arose the saying about saving against a rainy day. This is provision for the small man who has no capital, and has not enough income and is saddled with an exceptional amount of medical expenses.

Resolution agreed to.

16. That the revenue losses in any business, of the immediately preceding year, may be allowed as a deduction.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the definition of "revenue losses"?

Mr. ILSLEY: Operating losses—losses on profit and loss account.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: For the last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: For 1942.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will be deductible for the 1943 payment?

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I suppose "business" includes farmers or anyone operating such a set-up?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): For the previous year they could deduct a loan on insurance, or a bank loan, which had taken place the previous year and which they were not able to meet then?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; this does not apply to a loan in 1941. It begins now; it is for the future. We cannot go back and determine losses in previous periods; we have no way of doing so. It means losses; when the hon. gentleman says "deduct a loan", that may not be a loss.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the minister any idea as to what extent this will affect the revenue for 1943?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Not very greatly I think; not many people are making losses.

Resolution agreed to.

17. That contributions not exceeding $500 to any one registered prospecting syndicate searching for base metals or strategic minerals, but not exceeding $5,000 in the aggregate, and payments not exceeding $5,000 by any corporation in respect of its own prospecting expenses for similar minerals, may be allowed as a deduction from the income of any taxpayer, provided that the tax saving under this act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, shall not exceed 40 per centum thereof in each case.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have the engineers and geologists of the Department of Mines and Resources decided that $500 is a fair amount to allow for a single prospector, or $5,000 to a firm having many prospectors out. I know firms that have a large number of prospectors out. Is that a reasonable amount?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not intended to be. This $500 is not estimated to be the costs of a syndicate doing prospecting or even of the prospector. A contribution of $500 by any person is allowed as a deduction if it is a contribution toward the costs of a prospecting syndicate.

Mr. MacNICOL: But a contribution of $500 for the operations of one prospector?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, one contributor.

Mr. GREEN: As this resolution reads it does not apply to a contribution to a prospector as an individual; it is a contribution to a prospecting syndicate.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: Is there to be no exemption for money advanced to a prospector?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has to be a registered syndicate. I understand the registered syndicate employs the prospectors.

Mr. GREEN: In how many provinces is there provision made for registering the syndicates?

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member want me to get some information about the provinces that register syndicates?

Mr. GREEN: Yes. 44561-283

Income War Tax Act

Mr. PERLEY: It relates to the search for minerals. If a person contributes $500 to a search for oil and gas, would that come under this provision?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is not covered.

Mr. PERLEY: If a person, instead of contributing to a syndicate, contributes to an incorporated company for the same purpose, does he get the deduction?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not covered by the resolution. I think that the kind of minerals referred to here are found by prospecting and that the prospecting is carried on pretty generally by syndicates.

Mr. PERLEY: If an individual who does not tie up with a syndicate or company decides to drill a well prospecting for oil or gas, he does not get anything under this resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that is not covered.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister asked that resolution 11 stand. What was the idea?

Mr. ILSLEY: I wanted to get some more information. We have had strong representations that we should not pass this, but I am not convinced, and I wanted to get a little more information before I put it before the committee, because some hon. members will make the same representations that have been made to me, and I wanted to be in a position either to answer or admit their soundness.

Mr. GREEN: Why is this exemption to be restricted to a prospecting syndicate? Surely there should be some provision made for contributions to individual prospectors.

Mr. ILSLEY: This was an arrangement worked out some months ago—I made a statement about it in the house at the time—with the metals controller, at the instance, I think, of the metals controller and with the knowledge and advice of the Department of Mines and Resources and also the prospectors' association, of Ontario, I think. It was thought advisable to confine these advances to bodies that could be controlled, whose books could be audited, bodies of recognized standing. I do not know that it would be appropriate to recognize contributions to individuals.

Mr. GREEN: The point to be made clear is whether similar provision is made for prospecting in other provinces. I do not believe this plan would work out in British Columbia; as far as I am aware it would not. Some plan should be inaugurated which would enable prospecting to be done in the other provinces on the same basis. I understand the purpose is to find new metal deposits. It is not a matter of helping some people; the purpose is to find new metals. That purpose should be kept in mind in drawing up the provisions; in other words, what is the best way to get prospectors out in the hills in each of the provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: We acted on the advice of people who seemed to know about it, and we understood that in every province where prospecting is practicable, facilities exist for the registering of prospecting syndicates.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): I do not know of any registration of syndicates in Alberta.

Mr. EDWARDS: With whom are they registered?

Mr. ILSLEY: The provincial governments, I am told. I shall have to get more information. I was going on the advice of people who know, the metals controller and the Department of Mines and Resources. This was carefully worked out with them. I think hon. members will find that there are facilities for registering these syndicates in all the provinces where prospecting is done, but I will find out more definitely.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As far as these mining and prospecting syndicates are concerned I think they are in existence in practically every province. When a prospector is sent out, provision is made whereby those who grubstake him register what is called a syndicate agreement, so that when the prospector returns and registers the claims those who advance the money will be assured of registration. The regulations are practically the same in every province. Originally they were dominion regulations. I am sure they are in effect in British Columbia; they are in Saskatchewan and Alberta. It is the only way protection can be accorded to those who bona fide send out a prospector with a view to locating mineral deposits.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. GREEN: The minister has promised to get some information.

Mr. QUELCH: Is gold classified as a strategic metal?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. GREEN: No. I understood this resolution was to stand until we got certain information.

Mr. ILSLEY: All right; let it stand.

Resolution stands.

[Mr. Green.]

18. That the deduction provided for by section 7 of the said act under which a taxpayer is entitled to deduct from tax the amount paid under part III of the Special War Revenue Act, be repealed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What will be the effect of repealing this section?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is quite a long story. This resolution is related to the proposed amendments which were discussed the other day, regarding taxes on insurance premiums. The premium taxes provided for under the resolutions in question were not to be allowed as a deduction from income tax, and this resolution provided the amendment for disallowing the deductions. That is the whole story. If I remember correctly, there is a provision at the present time providing for the deduction from the income tax of fire insurance companies of the amount paid in premium tax, and we have changed that. The fire insurance companies are to pay straight income tax without the deduction, which means that they pay exactly the same amount. provided it is in profits. They do not pay the same if it is in losses.

Resolution agreed to.

19. That salary and other periodic payments payable to non-residents of Canada who are residents of a country which imposes a tax of a similar nature shall be subject to a tax of 15 per centum at the source.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the Minister of National Revenue tell us when refunds may be expected from the United States government? At the first of last year the rate they charged was $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; then it was increased to $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and later cut down to 15 per cent. When will the difference between 15 per cent and $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent or $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent be refunded?

Mr. GIBSON: I understand that if the company which deducted the tax has turned it over to the government of the United States, application must be made to the United States government, and I was given to understand that it would take several months before such application could be dealt with. I could not say definitely how long it will take the United States government to make these refund's.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is it the company that made the deduction that has to apply to the United States government for the refund, or is it the individual?

Mr. GIBSON: If the tax was still in the hands of the company that deducted it because I believe they turn in their taxes to the government only about once a year—the company would pay it out. If the company has already turned the tax over to the United States government, then application would have to be made to that government.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): By the individual?

Mr. GIBSON: By the individual—the shareholder or whoever would be entitled to the refund.

Mr. ESLING: Does this section have reference to the discrimination, in connection with the remittance tax, in favour of film producers?

Mr. ILSLEY: This has reference to the same section of the Income War Tax Act, which relates to the tax on film rentals, but it does not deal with film rentals.

Mr. ESLING: But it is the section to which I referred the other evening, under which for some reason rentals or revenue from motion picture films is singled out from all other payments, in that the tax paid is only 10 per cent instead of 15 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. ESLING: Those rentals amounted to $12,600,000 this year. Then the agencies were allowed to deduct $3,000,000 for distribution expenses, leaving almost $10,000,000 net; and it does not seem to me that any syndicate or concern or aggregation of agencies that can take in a clear $10,000,000 is in such necessitous circumstances that it should request the government to single out its remittances and reduce the tax from 15 per cent to 10 per cent, while all other sums remitted to any other persons having investments in Canada must pay the higher rate. Only to-day every hon. member from British Columbia received a telegram charging that the motion-picture agencies were endeavouring to squeeze out the independent theatres by increasing their charges for these films, notwithstanding the fact that the price control board fixed the rates at a certain level last September. Those protests will go to the wartime prices and trade board, and eventually to the minister, but I am emphatic in my protest against this consideration being given the film agencies. They are making enough money as it is; yet in every case since 1936 some special consideration seems to have been given to these people. Will the minister tell us why that has been done. We shall lose half a million dollars in 1942 as a result of this sympathetic treatment of these film agencies.

Mr. ILSLEY: This matter is not strictly covered by the resolution, but I know the hon. gentleman's views on this subject. I listened very carefully to his remarks the other night, when he urged that we were not justified in 44561-2832 imposing a rate of less than 15 per cent. I am very familiar with this matter; it has been under consideration several times, as the hon. member says, and certainly last year, when we raised the rate from 5 per cent to 15 per cent, I was satisfied that this rate would be unjust in regard to film rentals. The statements of the companies were submitted to us, and as far as I could ascertain there could not be anything wrong with those statements. The argument they advanced was that if this tax, which is a gross tax, were levied at the rate of 40 per cent or perhaps even 50 per cent or 60 per cent on the net earnings of these companies, it would yield much less than is paid under the 10 per cent tax on the gross rentals, that is, on the proportion of the net earnings which would be allocable to the Canadian business. We may have been misled; we may have been fooled, but I have no reason in the world for thinking so. The film companies certainly consider that this rate is entirely too high in the light of their net earnings.

Mr. ESLING: Well, Mr. Chairman, these must be the net earnings.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, this is the gross income remitted.

Mr. ESLING: But from the gross income they have been allowed a reduction of $3,000,-000 to cover all the expenses of distributing these films, which expenses include the cost of the film and the cost of printing. Three million dollars is quite a large sum to cover such expenses. It covers not only costs of distribution, but the pay of every employee in the seventy-three agencies. These agencies represent the moving-picture producers in the United States who send their films here.

Mr. ILSLEY: The real costs are in connection with manufacturing the films in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN: I have allowed some latitude, but I am afraid that the question being discussed by the hon. member does not fall within the scope of the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. ESLING: With all deference to you, Mr. Chairman, it is the 15 per cent tax on remittances to residents of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN: Not corporations.

Mr. ESLING: These people are singled out for great preference. I merely asked the minister why this is done and he does not tell us.

Mr. GREEN: On the point of order, the minister has stated that this resolution deals with the particular matter to which the hon.

Income War Tax Act

member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) is referring, and therefore I submit that he is directly in order.

The CHAIRMAN: I understood the minister to say the very reverse.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be an amendment to the section. These salaries and other periodic payments do not include the periodic payments to which the hon. gentleman is referring.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, I am not quite certain whether you ruled out any reference to the tax on non-residents on this clause, but there was one point I wanted to raise with the minister, if I may.

In 1941 the tax on non-residents was increased, as the minister said this afternoon, from 5 to 15 per cent. There have been a number of people in Canada who have not been very well satisfied with the taxation of non-residents who make their income largely in the Dominion of Canada itself. I realize, at least I think I do, some of the difficulties we face in imposing a tax on these non-residents which will be in some measure commensurate with what should be placed upon them. It would appear from the information I have that non-residents take out of Canada about $300,000,000 of profits and interest from investments of one kind and another. I am not sure that that figure is absolutely accurate, but it is the latest figure that was given to me. As opposed to that, Canadians owning investments outside this country have brought into Canada something like $35,000,000. The discrepancy between the two is very great. The non-resident taxpayer, in the opinion of a good many business people in Canada, gets off rather lightly compared with the heavy increase in income taxes that we have to pay.

Has the minister given any thought to the question whether, now that our income tax on residents in this country has been raised to such high levels within the past few weeks, we are not dealing just a little too leniently with the non-resident taxpayer who does not live in Canada, and who gets off almost scotfree compared with the taxation our own people have to pay? The tax of 15 per cent on non-residents is very small having regard to the taxes our own people are called upon to pay. I know there must be some answer to that; nevertheless a good many people in this country are concerned lest we are missing a splendid opportunity at least to increase our revenues, when they are so badly needed, by imposing a heavier tax on nonresidents.

Mr. ILSLEY: A year ago we raised the non-resident tax from 5 to 15 per cent, and automatically the tax in the United States went up to $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and later was raised by congressional action to $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. We then made an agreement with the United States by which this tax in both countries was reduced to 15 per cent, which is the present level.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was the basis of that convention, was it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Our traditional policy has been a low non-resident tax. Before the war it was considered good policy to have a low non-resident tax to encourage investments in Canada. The same considerations do not apply now to anything like the same degree. However, 15 per cent is a substantial tax as a gross tax. It is not a tax on net income but is a gross tax which is taxable against a person who has no income abroad. He is taxed, nevertheless, 15 per cent on what he receives in Canadian income.

Mr. GRAYDON: In the debate last year the minister mentioned the item of rent. For instance, he said that the non-resident taxpayer paid on the full amount of rent he received and was not allowed to deduct tax or mortgage interest from that.

Mr. ILSLEY; We started out to do that and then found it was too severe altogether.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And had to back up.

Mr. ILSLEY: And had to back up, as the leader of the opposition says.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should have remembered that. It was one of your retreats, and they are rare.

Mr. ILSLEY: Exactly. I think the $300,000,000 which my hon. friend mentioned must include payments from Canadian subsidiaries to United States parent companies. We deliberately refrained from placing a tax on such payments, although there is a 5 per cent tax on remittances from United States subsidiaries to Canadian parent companies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These Canadian subsidiaries pay a tax here, of course.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The argument for no tax on these remittances is pretty strong because the earnings of these Canadian subsidiaries are taxable at our excess profits tax rates.

4488

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is much care taken in checking up to see how they arrive at their profits? Bookkeeping is a wonderful art, and if you know how to handle a situation you can cover up a multitude of sins. Are their accounts audited regularly by competent auditors?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is an income tax problem.

Mr. JACKMAN: I suppose the minister is familiar with the case of some people in the United States who derive a very small income from Canada. Perhaps they were formerly residents here. The tax of 15 per cent, plus the 11 per cent discount on exchange funds, does create a certain hardship for these people. Their own tax in the United States is probably a good deal less than 15 per cent, or their income may be so small that it is not taxable at all. I presume the minister has considered such cases. I do not know that anything can be done on behalf of these people. I merely point out to him that resolution 19 seems to impose a severe penalty on people living in the United States, probably former Canadians, who derive their income from Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the answer to the hon. member for Peel.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no objection to the answer coming from an authoritative source. I feel more confident about that answer than about some I have received in the last few days.

There has been some question as to the amount of income which goes out of Canada into the United States. Has the minister any figures on that?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the figures.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On balance the transfer is very much against us, is it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ESLING: Prior to the dinner recess I referred to a matter of which the chairman questioned the relevancy. The minister intimated that it had something to do with this resolution, although it is not specifically mentioned in it.

The minister brings down a budget to raise funds for the conduct of the war, and this resolution places a 15 per cent tax on remittances to non-residents of dividends, interest, royalties, rentals and so on. Here is a specific case of remittances for the rental of films. I presume the minister must have a good reason for discriminating in favour of these film agencies, which have $10,000,000 to remit, when the tax is reduced from 15 to 10 per cent in their case. To-day every member for British Columbia has received telegrams protesting against these very agencies raising film rentals to independent theatres, apparently for the purpose of putting independent theatres out of business and getting control of them. But aside from all that, this tax remains; you are raising money; you are asking people to buy war savings certificates, and you are giving to these big picture producers this year and every year thereafter $450,000 by way of exemption of tax. It does not seem unreasonable for one to ask why.

Mr. ILSLEY: I told the hon. member why. There is not a flat rate of 15 per cent on everyone else. Receivers of real estate rents in the United States from Canadian properties are taxed 15 per cent on their net, if I remember correctly, not on their gross. An exception was made in their case because of very strong representations in this house and out of it. Among others, I remember, the diligent hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) urged that the tax was entirely too great.

Mr. GREEN: Not on films.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I did not say that. I said, on real estate rents. The point I am trying to make is that this is not the only exception. For a number of royalties and the like, 15 per cent is an appropriate rate, but representations which were made certainly convinced me that it was an excessive rate in this particular case. Anyone is entitled to his opinion about this. If the Canadian business of the United States motion-picture producers is regarded as so much velvet to them, as surplus business, export business, we might be justified in putting a very high tax on them. But they have always contended, and I think with considerable justice, that that is a very unfair basis on which to impose the They have said that we should have tax. some regard to their net position, and they have pointed out that this 10 per cent tax is much higher than a 40 per cent tax would be on their net earnings if an allocation of a fair proportion of their net earnings is made to the Canadian business.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be a question of fact.

Mr. ILSLEY: Their facts, I think, are correct on that. They appear to be represented by reputable counsel, at any rate; they show us all the figures; and on the net basis, if we convert this into a tax on the net income, it would be at a terrifically high rate. It is away high now.

Income War Tax Act

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Having regard to the excess profits tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what its equivalent is on a net basis, but it would be very high. The matter was carefully gone into, and I came to the conclusion that 15 per cent would be harsh.

Mr. PERLEY: What is being done about the large United States grain companies known as the "Big Three"—the Dreyfus company, Bungé, and the Continental-with headquarters in New York? They have offices in Winnipeg, and as the minister knows, during peace time they did about 50 per cent of the exporting of Canada's wheat. Even now, I am informed, they are doing a con-siderable business in Winnipeg, not only as exporters, but generally, and they must be making substantial profits. Is there any check on the amount of business they are doing and the profits they are making on Canadian business? If there is, has the minister any way of ensuring that these companies pay a tax comparable with the business they are doing in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what the situation is. It is my recollection that the point came up when I was Minister of National Revenue and that the ruling was that they are not doing business in Canada in such a way as to be taxable.

Mr. PERLEY: They exported at least 70 per cent of Canada's wheat in 1938 and a very considerable amount in 1939, and I understand that even now they are exporters on a large scale. Consequently they are certainly doing business in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is a lot surer of it than I am. The practice about the taxation of principals that are doing business by agents in Canada is well settled, but I should not like to say exactly what treatment these grain companies have received.

Mr. PERLEY: They are members of the Winnipeg grain exchange and of the clearing house, and they have their offices there.

Mr. ILSLEY: I see.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the department look into the situation now? They may have Canadian subsidiaries; I do not know. Maybe they have merely agents in Winnipeg, but if they are doing a substantial portion of the export trade as well as a general grain trade, it is up to the department to examine the position with care.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. MAYBANK: What is the present status in connection with payment of income tax, of the pools? Is that sub judice, or has a decision been made?

Mr. GIBSON: I could not give a statement as to what is being done with regard to any individual taxpayer. We have had an opinion of the Department of Justice, and the matter is receiving legal consideration at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is where it was a year ago.

Mr. GIBSON: Well, it has progressed beyond that.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister explain why United States subsidiaries operating in Canada do not pay a 5 per cent withholding tax, whereas Canadian subsidiaries operating and perhaps fully owned in the United States have to pay a withholding tax on the part of the United States government? Is it because Canada is normally a capital importing country and we want these investments?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have the right to impose a 5 per cent tax under a convention. We just do not do so, as a matter of policy.

Mr. MAYBANK: I want to follow up my question a little further. I realize that the minister cannot say what any particular taxpayer is paying, but in the way his answer was given it amounted to about this, "we came to a decision last year." The answer did not mean much more than that.

Mr. GIBSON: What do you mean by "we came to a decision"?

Mr. MAYBANK: What I wanted to know is whether it is clear that the wheat pools are taxable. If a decision has been reached to that effect, has it been appealed; is it before the courts? I should like something more than "we came to a decision a year ago." That is a year ago; we ought to be able to get a little farther than that.

Mr. GIBSON: I do not quite understand what the hon, member is referring to when he states that we came to a decision last year.

Mr. MAYBANK: I was quoting the minister.

Mr. GIBSON: Well, the investigations were in progress last year; I do not know that there is any particular secret in the fact that we are going ahead assessing the various pools, and possibly the question will come before the courts whether they are or are not cooperatives.

Mr. MAYBANK: Well, that is what I want to get. The matter is still sub judice?

Mr. GIBSON: I imagine it will be before the courts for final decision.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What the minister has said is that a year ago the matter was under decision. Since then it has been decided to assess them. I assume that the pools are repelling that position and that the matter will have to go to the courts.

Mr. GIBSON: That is probable.

Resolution agreed to.

20. That the tax payable by all persons other than corporations shall be paid by quarterly instalments during the six months immediately prior to the close of the calendar year and the six months immediately subsequent to the close of the calendar year

(a) as to the six months, July to December, one-quarter of the estimated tax on or before the 15th day of September and the 15th day of December each year, having regard to the previous year's income and applying the current year's rates, and

(b) as to the six months, January to June, one-half of the tax (after deducting therefrom the previous two quarterly payments) on or before the 15th day of March and the 15th day of June each year, having regard to the income and applying the rates of the taxation year.

This shall be applicable to the tax on income of the calendar year 1942 and each year thereafter.

Any additional tax found due over that estimated or declared by the taxpayer shall be paid immediately upon assessment, together with interest at 5 per centum after four months from the close of the calendar year.

This instalment method of payment shall not apply to persons whose tax is being deducted at the source in respect of salary or wages, and whose salary or wage constitutes three-quarters or more of his income;

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the minister explain why he has changed payments this year to quarterly for the individual and monthly for the corporation, and why he has made the last payment June 15 instead of August 31?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have an amendment to propose to this resolution which changes some of the dates of payment. The amendment is:

That resolution 20 be amended by changing the dates for quarterly payments provided in paragraphs (a) and (b) from the 15th day of September and the 15th day of December in paragraph (a) to the 15th day of October and the 15th day of January, respectively, and from the 15th day of March and the 15th day of June in paragraph (b) to the 15th day of April and the 15th day of July, respectively; and that resolution 20 be further amended by adding to the end of the final paragraph thereof the following:

"Such persons shall file their income tax returns on or before the 30th day of September in the year following the close of the taxation year."

That makes two important changes with regard to those who are paying in four instalments. The dates are made a month later throughout than the dates mentioned in the resolution, and another very important change is that so far as the yearly return is concerned, instead of its being made on the 31st day of March as at present, it will be made on the 30th day of September at the end of the instalment period.

Mr. GIBSON: I move accordingly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is to be the general rule. I think the taxpayers of the country will be obliged to the minister for the change, because in my view the payments were coming too thick and sudden. If we are to have until October 15, it gives us a month longer in each case. I am wondering why the minister has made it necessary for corporations to pay on a monthly basis but is making a change with regard to personal incomes from the monthly basis, which I at least found so satisfactory, to the quarterly basis. Why should not a taxpayer have the right of election? Why has the method of last year been discarded altogether and the quarterly basis adopted? I do not think the delay in the filing of income tax returns until September will help him materially. It is the question of payments and how rapidly they are to be made that bothers most of us, and I wonder if the minister would take this into consideration and answer first this question: Why should corporations be allowed to pay income tax by monthly instalments, whereas individuals in certain categories-this applies only to individuals in certain categories-are required to pay by quarterly instalments? I should think those individuals who desire to pay by monthly instalments should have the same privilege extended to them as to corporations. Personally-and I think this would be true of a good many other small taxpayers-it would be very much more advantageous and easier to pay by monthly instalments than quarterly. You can budget so much more easily. There may be an administrative reason; I do not know. Has the work doubled, or has it greatly increased? Under the present system a man paid in the four months of 1941 a relative portion of his assessed tax. Then at the end of the year he made up his assessment and arrived at what balance was due, and he paid it in eight monthly instalments. We are still paying on these and shall be until the end of August. That position was a fair one, and it made it easier to pay. I wish the minister would tell us why the change has been made. That will be the first question.

Mr. GIBSON: There is nothing to prevent the taxpayer from paying on the monthly basis as heretofore.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will be in the statute?

Mr. GIBSON: No, but the income tax department will always take payments on account. He is required to pay at least quarterly but monthly payments can be made if desired.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thanks for that. The provision is then that the taxpayer will have an optional method of paying. He may pay in twelve monthly instalments if he chooses. In that event he would have to go on the same formula as last year, or he could make quarterly payments if he desired.

Mr. GIBSON: We are not even restricting him to monthly payments. He can pay as often as he likes, provided he pays the required amount within the quarter. We do not care if he pays every two weeks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has to pay a quarter at least by October 15. He has just finished paying for 1941, and he will have September and half of October to pay a quarter of the whole.

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a little severe. He has to pay in six weeks a three months' period. On this basis he would have to finish by July 15, and that is six weeks ahead of what he is doing this year. The whole thing has been moved up by several weeks.

Mr. GIBSON: There is overlapping.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will make it difficult.

Mr. MacNICOL: Moving the date from September 15 to October 15 will certainly help many people. In the cities on or before September 15 the last instalment of city taxes will just have been paid; the water rates will be due, and the householder has either put his coal in for the winter or is putting it in, so that the month's grace will help. But I wonder if even October 15 will not handicap a good many. There are some who would like to pay all at once, but the discount does not make it worth while. Is it one per cent where the taxpayer pays all in advance?

Mr. GIBSON: There is no discount.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then there will be no advantage in paying in advance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not a bit.

Mr. MacNICOL: What about the farmer? I am connected in one way with a farm, but it does not affect the farm I have in mind. Farmers' crops may be harvested by October 15, but they will not have been disposed of by that time. How will the farmer pay even on October 15 before receiving from the government, as in the western provinces, the allowance with respect to wheat, for instance? The fall payment on machinery will be due. I sincerely hope that the income tax will not work to the disadvantage of the whole country as so many seem to think it will. It certainly will come very hard on most people, advancing the payments from March 31 as they have been making them in the past, to October and January, at a time earlier than they formerly paid their taxes.

Mr. PERLEY: I am sure the minister will appreciate the plea made on behalf of the farmers by the hon. member for Davenport. He is always on the job, whether it is farming. mining or anything else. The change in the dates of the quarterly payments will be of some assistance, but I should like to have seen the first made November 15 at least, and the second, February 15. Western members can verify the fact that the farmer will not have much return by October 15. This year the season is late; expenses have to be met first; the quota on the first delivery may be very small, not many farmers will be able to take advantage of the first quarterly payment on October 15. Would the minister consider making it November 15? I have no objection to April and July.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to endorse what was said by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, particularly with reference to this year. If the minister will discuss this matter with his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, he will find he is having difficulty right now with his wheat board in trying to work out some arrangement whereby the coming crop can be marketed. There will be a tremendous shortage of help this fall, and even in a normal season October 15 is very early for the farmer to make his first payment. This is going to be an abnormal season. There is a great shortage of help on the prairies to take

Special War Revenue Act

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are there any changes?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are a few provisions additional to the resolution. They are administrative, for the most part, and will be explained by my colleague the Minister of National Revenue. I was asked to consider many changes. I cannot remember them all, but they have all been considered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Articles purchased by instalment payment but not delivered—I do not know what clause that would come under.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the retail purchase tax section, I suppose. I will bear that in mind and mention it when we come to it. I do not know how far I should go in drawing to the attention of the committee changes which have been made, but I want to do so, so that it will not be said that anything important was changed without the committee having been advised. There is a change made in the definition of "company", and in subsection 2 will be found paragraph (b) defining or interpreting the term "company".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, insurance company?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. A change has been made with reference to companies all of whose business is the insuring of churches, schools, or other religious, educational or charitable institutions. The situation in the past has been that a mutual company which insured farm property to the extent of at least 50 per cent of its business was free from the special war revenue tax of one per cent on the premium. But that exemption did not extend to companies whose business was wholly the insuring of churches, schools or other educational or charitable institutions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are there such companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where?

Mr. ILSLEY: Parish mutuals, in the province of Quebec. When we prepared the resolutions we substituted a 3 per cent for a 1 per cent tax on those institutions, although there had never been any provincial tax on them. The result was clearly unjust. The whole question was then whether in preparing the bill we should remove the 2 per cent that we had inadvertently imposed in the resolutions, or whether we should relieve them altogether. Well, if their business is wholly— 100 per cent, not only 50 per cent as in the case of the farm mutuals—the insurance of churches, schools or other religious, educa-[Mr. Ilsley.] tional or charitable institutions, it seems to be a reasonable thing to remove it altogether. That is what is done here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it a large business, and would the amount of revenue be important?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is very small. I think there are only two which have been brought to my attention. I believe there are arrears due from one of them and they never knew they were taxed. We shall have to collect the arrears, but I do not think it makes much difference.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The total premium income of two small parish companies would not be very much.

Mr. ILSLEY: They might not be so small. I do not know just what it is, but my impression is that it is not a very serious matter.

Mr. LOCKHART: Does that enable the setting up of new companies which may be relieved too?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, if there are mutuals formed, 100 per cent of whose business is the insuring of these institutions there will be no tax on their premiums.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What steps do you take to ascertain that it is a 100 per cent, that their operations are limited to this business? Is there any inspection? Does the superintendent of insurance make any examination of their books?

Mr. ILSLEY: He has to ascertain the facts in some way or other.

Mr. SENN: Do I understand that there is no tax on farmers' mutual fire insurance companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is none if 50 per cent of their business is the insurance of farm property. That exception was inserted some years ago, at the instance of the late Mr. Cayley, who was the member for one of the Oxfords. He pressed very strongly that farm mutuals be relieved, and they were relieved.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And that is maintained here?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is maintained here, yes.

on raw leaf tobacco there was an advantage of 25 cents a pound to the producers of that commodity, that being the amount of the duty on manufactured tobacco when there was no duty on the raw leaf. It became necessary to raise the duty on manufactured tobacco to 35 cents a pound, and it was felt necessary to maintain the old relativity by imposing a duty of 10 cents a pound on raw leaf tobacco. This still left a spread of 25 cents a pound. In this budget we are increasing the duty on manufactured tobacco to 51 cents a pound, and have increased the duty on raw leaf tobacco by 10 cents a pound. This increases the spread between manufactured and raw leaf tobacco to 31 cents a pound. It would give a great competitive advantage to raw leaf tobacco if we left the preference in favour of that commodity at 41 cents a pound, which is what the hon. member is advocating.

Mr. HOWDEN: Is this an excise tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is what we call an excise duty. The difference between an excise duty and an excise tax is that the duty is payable before the goods are released. While the committee may not be interested in the outlays of the manufacturing companies, it must be remembered that their initial outlay is simply enormous. We have had strong representations against our adopting the duty principle in regard to the manufacturers, because it forces them to have many millions of dollars tied up for substantial periods. They must pay the money to the government before they can sell, before their product can be released, and their money is tied up for months, sometimes for longer periods. I am afraid that it would be a violation of the principle applicable to competitive business if we left too great a spread between the tax on raw leaf and the tax on manufactured tobacco. Raw leaf tobacco is a competitive product because people put it in their pipes to smoke. We did not think we could go any further in increasing the spread.

Mr. HOWDEN: Have the local growers any tariff advantage over American tobacco?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a heavy duty on importations.

Mr. HOWDEN: Then they will still have some advantage?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member was not complaining about imported tobacco. I think there is sufficient protection against that. He was referring to the heavy outlay which the small man has to make to put himself into a position to sell.

Mr. HOWDEN: I gathered that the farmers get only about 10 cents a pound for their tobacco, and if this tax is going to run it up to 20 cents, it would seem to be a poorpaying proposition for them.

Mr. ILSLEY: The farmers were selling tobacco to the manufacturing companies. I do not know what the price was, but I remember that we discussed it at length before the price spreads committee some years ago. It is away below the duty.

Mr. FERLAND: What was the revenue from the tax on tobacco during the fiscal years 1940 and 1941 from the month of August?

Mr. ILSLEY: The quantity of Canadian raw leaf tobacco sold for consumption and the duty collected since the inception of this item was as follows: For the fiscal year 1940-41 from August 1, 1940, rate 10 cents per pound, quantity in pounds, 1,754,173, and excise duty collected $175,417.40; for the fiscal year 1941-42, rate 10 cents per pound, quantity in pounds, 3,458,006, and excise duty collected $345,899.30.

this type of tobacco, but that was removed by the Liberal government in 1923. When the new tax of 10 cents a pound was imposed in 1940 I made representations to the Minister of Finance and some other ministers of the crown against the tax. At the same time, at my request, the premier of Quebec, Mr. Adelard Godbout, made representations. Then, the farmers' organization, L'Union Catholique des Cultivateurs, and some other interested organizations, made their representations. However our requests were not met. The answer to our protest was that the raw leaf tobacco industry was amply protected through the higher taxation on manufactured tobacco. Last year's tax on Canadian raw leaf tobacco was 10 cents a pound, and on manufactured tobacco it was 35 cents a pound. To-day under the present scheme the tax is increased on all Canadian raw leaf tobacco from 10 cents to 20 cents a pound, and on the manufactured or cut tobacco it is increased from 35 cents to 51 cents a pound. Then, there are increases to the extent of a few dollars a pound on other types of manufactured tobaccos, and on cigars and cigarettes. Of course the difference between the tax on Canadian raw leaf tobacco and that on other types is very great.

This great change in taxation is not helpful to the situation faced by the tobacco growers in my district of Quebec. The tobacco industry in that province has been developed under special conditions, and to-day the majority of small dealers cannot carry on their trade. Many of them have been put out of business in the last year. The reason is that some of these people were engaged in the distribution to consumers of pipe tobaccos. Those small dealers have only small capital, and have not had sufficient money to buy their tobacco, to prepare and steam it and put it on the market. They have not had sufficient money to advance to the government to cover the tax. To-day only those tobacco packers under licence are permitted to buy, prepare and steam tobacco. If a dealer wants to buy 5,000 pounds of tobacco he must first pay at least $500 to the farmer. Then he must spend another $500 to prepare and steam the tobacco, and to distribute it to the consumer. Then, on 5,000 pounds at 20 cents a pound he must advance to the government $1,000, making a total of $2,000 expenses before he may expect to receive any profit. From these facts it is clear that those poor, humble dealers who used to make their living by dealing in tobacco cannot afford to invest such large sums of money, and have had to go out of business.

There is a further reason for our objection to the tax. The growers of tobacco in my [Mr. Ferland.] district in Quebec used to produce from 5,000,000 to 7,000,000 pounds of big and small types of tobacco each year. That tobacco was distributed in great part by the small dealer. As I pointed out earlier, those who held the monopoly were not greatly interested in buying these types of tobacco. It is probable that the tobacco trusts found there was not sufficient profit in that business, and therefore in the past they bought only a small proportion of the production.

If the farmers lose their markets because of the new tax and the restrictions imposed under the new regulations they will have no market at all. Last year, when the tax was only 10 cents a pound, the farmers were forced to reduce their production, and with the imposition of this new tax they are facing a crisis. I consider it my duty to protest against this tax. It seems to me that the Minister of Finance could find some other method of raising revenue and be able to leave this tax at 10 cents a pound. The new tax of 20 cents a pound is unfair and unjust to the farmers of my district and of the province of Quebec. It is not a liberal way of dealing with a group of farmers.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is only one item in the Excise Act, and I think it could be more appropriately discussed when we are in committee of the whole—I mean by myself; I am taking no exception to my hon. friend's speech.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2-Schedule.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What are the comparable rates on spirits in the United States, Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand?

Mr. ILSLEY: I gave the rate proposed in the United States, which is higher than the present rate. My recollection is that the proposed rate is $6 per gallon, but I am not sure about that. It is either $6 or $7. I shall try to get the correct information before this goes through. In the United Kingdom the rate under the new budget is £6. 17s. 6d. I have not the rates for Australia and New Zealand. Our rate must be governed to a certain extent by the United States rate, otherwise there might be a flow of smuggled spirits northward.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Ferland) raised the question of the duty on raw leaf tobacco. Some relativity must be maintained between the duty on manufactured tobacco and the duty on raw leaf tobacco. Before any duty was placed drink only good liquor, prohibition would not be necessary. Of course abuse is wrong. Why not use moderately the good things that come from the soil or that nature gives us, provided that one is reasonable and does not carry it to excess? Therefore, sir, it seems to me that those who are in earnest in preaching not only prohibition but temperance should see to it that in the first place the liquor is not adulterated. Liquor should be prepared according to the formulae that have been deposited with the Department of National Revenue. That department keeps a check on the manufacture of liquor, and I do not see why the same check is not maintained on the advertising of liquor. It seems to me that if the Department of National Revenue is to be strict in imposing upon the manufacturers of liquor the obligation to conform very closely to the formulae that have been accepted by the proper officials of that department, then the Department of Pensions and National Health should exercise the same care with regard to the advertising of all liquor and all concoctions. But it does not.

What is essential in order that people may not be deceived? It is to see that a thing is advertised as it really is. Let me quote an example; let us take gin. The formula for gin is standard. Gin is a product which comes from the distillation of grain; afterwards redistilled with aromatic herbs. A few years ago the department here issued an order to the effect that any liquor which was not manufactured according to that formula could not be called gin; but after strenuous efforts had been made on behalf of another concoction, it was decided that a new name would be given another product, which was called compound gin. Compound gin is not at all the same as gin. It is made not of grain alcohol, but of molasses alcohol; and molasses alcohol is a product that comes of the thresh of sugar cane, after granulated sugar has been extracted from it. Originally all that thresh was thrown away as refuse, but now it is redistilled and the socalled molasses alcohol produced, which is then used in cold mixing. Well, I hear that this cold mixing is the way the "cariboo" was made during prohibition. It is not done in stills but in large containers, and then it is mixed with a syrup of aromatic herbs; I do not know whether or not those include dandelions.

I am very much surprised that in spite of the fact that I have repeatedly brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, he has not taken it as seriously as he should. You know, sir, when after work a man stops at the liquor store to buy a little refreshment he feels some superiority over the other fellow because he thinks he is buying imported gin, Geneva gin, which is the Holland name for it. He goes to the store and asks for a little flask and goes away with it, and the only satisfaction he gets is in reading the label. But that label is false, because it describes that concoction as gin, while it is not. We see the word "Holland" on the label in big letters, but it is not made in Holland. We see the word "Rotterdam," but it is not made in Rotterdam. It is a concoction made right in Montreal from the refuse of sugar cane. Therefore I hope the minister will see to it that this product is advertised as it should be, not as it was in years gone by, when John de Kuyper gin was real gin. Now it is not. I hope the minister will take the matter seriously and see to it that in future this concoction is advertised as compound gin, so that people who buy it will know that it is not the imported product.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the hon. member what effect it has on the human race?

Mr. FULFORD: Are there not other manufacturers in Canada who sell their products under the name of Geneva gin? I think there is a firm called Melcher's, is there not? I am not sure.

Mr. POULIOT: As the hon. member knows, I have no right to speak again.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind hon. members that this is the motion for second reading. We are not in committee.

Mr. LECLERC: Perhaps it would be more interesting if we had a sample of the different gins.

Mr. POULIOT: I had a sample once, but it was an empty bottle.

Mr. C. E. FERLAND (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, in rising to oppose this amendment to the Excise Act I wish first to express my deep regret that the tax on Canadian raw leaf tobacco has been increased from 10 cents to 20 cents a pound. I protest again against this excessive tax on the Canadian natural product, for which in my district the farmer is paid only 10 cents a pound. I believe the new tax will give the coup de grace, the final stroke, to the tobacco industry in my district in Quebec. The constituency of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is the largest centre of production of raw leaf pipe tobacco in Quebec, and in that district there has been a high development of production and distribution.

Our Quebec tobaccos have been popular throughout Canada, and pipe smokers know very well that the tobacco produced in my district is of the best. During the first great war a tax of 5 cents a pound was placed on

Labour Conditions

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAYING OFF OF MEN IN PROVINCIALLY OPERATED COAL MINE IN NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), and the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. McGarry), asked me about the adoption of the single shift system at the Inverness coal mine at Inverness, Nova Scotia. I think this should be stated, that I received no copy of the telegram except through my hon. friends. I requested the provincial authorities of Nova Scotia to furnish me with the necessary information to enable me to reply.

The mine in question is owned by the government of Nova Scotia. Those responsible for the operation of the mine reported a serious situation due to absenteeism. For example, for the period from January 2 to July 10, 1942, with a labour force of 312 men. they reported that during 152 working days approximately eight thousand shifts were lost by the employees. On the night shift of July 7 a number of men were off work. On July 8 the miners did not turn out for work because of the annual horse races, and the mine was idle. On July 9 the miners did not turn out for work, and again the mine was idle. On July 10 some men were off on the day shift, and on the night shift more than 25 per cent of the total working force of the miners failed to turn out. The absenteeism was causing loss of production, and the cost of operation was excessive. For these reasons the management decided to single-shift the mine, and worked out a programme that would increase production and bring about more stabilized and uniform conditions.

The majority of the men belong to the United Mine Workers of America. I know that it has been stated to some hon. members that the change in working conditions was a breach of a contract with the union. However, the provincial authorities are of the opinion that no breach of contract took place, because the district executive of the union have been told verbally on more than one occasion that the change might be necessary unless the serious condition of absenteeism was overcome.

As to the effect of single-shifting the mine, there are, as I indicated, 312 men on the payroll. Of this number 237 are at present employed, leaving about 75 men immediately affected. The management believe that the absorption of all the men will take place [Mr. Ilsley.] very shortly if the cooperation of the working force is obtained and production can be increased.

It appears that the quality of coal is not as good as it was formerly, and the management are faced with the necessity of increasing the output or considering closing down the mine.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister take the responsibility for that statement, or is it just the information which he has received from the government of Nova Scotia?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is a statement I have received from the government of Nova Scotia.

EXCISE ACT, 1934

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 110, to amend the Excise Act, 1934.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): There is I think a disposition on the part of everyone in this house to expedite the passage of these bills, in order that we may finish the other business of the session. I am not going to make a speech on any one of them, least of all on this one. But since the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is in his seat, and this is the bill which deals with the question of the increase in the excise duties on liquors, and having regard to the debate which has taken place in this house on at least two occasions with respect to the question of the consumption of liquor in Canada, I desire to ask the Prime Minister if he and the administration have given any consideration, other than that indicated by the Minister of Finance, to this great national problem in war time?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government has been giving very careful and repeated attention to the question. I agree with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that it is a great national question. So far as I personally am concerned, anything that can possibly be done to control the liquor traffic will be done. But as the hon. gentleman knows, the matter does not rest entirely with the federal government; there are other governments that have control. Certainly I think that at any time, and most of all in war time, every effort should be made to restrict the liquor traffic as much as possible.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Temperance is a great virtue. But a wine-taster who was my guest some years ago told me at dinner that if everybody would

POSTAL SERVICE

REGULATIONS RESPECTING PARCELS AND NEWS-PAPERS MAILED FOR OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): Yesterday the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) made an inquiry in regard to change in regulations as to parcels to be sent overseas by mail. In regard to gift parcels for civilians in the United Kingdom, these parcels were first restricted in 1941, when, at the request of the British administration, a maximum weight of five pounds was imposed. Recently the British administration advised that these regulations permitting the importation of gift parcels not exceeding five pounds gross weight are now applicable only if such parcels are not sent more frequently than once a month.

It will be noted that the orders restricting the sending of gift parcels were issued in order to conserve shipping space for more urgent supplies. There has been no change as regards the weight limit of parcels to our soldiers, which remains at eleven pounds.

Mr. REID: Are there any restrictions on newspapers?

Mr. MULOCK: In order to ensure that all available ocean transportation space is devoted to war essentials, it has been found necessary to take steps to reduce the volume of newspapers to civilians and to the troops in the United Kingdom and other transatlantic destinations, as well as to destinations in central and south America, Bermuda and the West Indies.

Effective August 10, complete newspapers or periodicals will not be accepted from the general public for transmission to such destinations. People who formerly sent newspapers or periodicals to destinations affected by this restriction are being requested to forward clippings of special interest instead. Publishers have agreed to cooperate, and the question of newspapers and periodicals mailed to subscribers at the destinations referred to is at present under consideration.

Further information in respect to this matter will be given through departmental publications, the press and radio.

APPOINTMENT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE UNDER WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. A news item over the radio yesterday stated that the wartime prices and trade board had appointed an advisory committee to deal with the beef situation. Will the minister state whether that is correct, and also see that the names are brought down at the earliest possible day? The estimates for agriculture will be up in the course of a day or two.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will get that information and present it on the orders of the day to-morrow.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Could the minister get it for this afternoon? Agriculture may be up soon.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will try.

Columbia (Mr. Mayhew) was paired with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Marier). Had the hon. member for Jacques Cartier voted he would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. COTE: I was paired with the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. DUROCHER: I am authorized to say that the hon. member for Victoria, British changed since the beginning of the war I do not understand that language. When he talks in that language he can mean only one thing, that you might just as well win the war ten years from now as win it now.

That is an entirely wrong attitude to take. I therefore do not rise in defence of the stand that this group has taken ever since the war began. We will contend for that stand, for it is the only stand that can be taken in time of war.

As I listened to the speeches to-day I could not help thinking that in this chamber, which has sometimes been called the highest court in the land, the game of politics is now being played. I declare that this issue of conscription has been the political football of this country ever since the war commenced, notwithstanding anything that anyone can say to the contrary. It was so in the election of 1940; it was so in the plebiscite, and it is so in this debate. Politics, politics, politics! When somebody talks politics the house applauds; when anyone talks regular basic common sense no notice is taken of it, or else we are incapable of knowing what it means. As I listened to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), I did not hear all his speech, and as I listened to the Prime Minister, it took me back to my school days and I felt like saying, "Now boys, boys, boys, do not fight like that."

What is the issue? To my mind the issue is to put into practice now what the people said should be put into practice when they put a little X mark opposite that word "yes". That was the vote of the people. That was the voice of democracy. When the people speak with a voice as loud as they did that day that should end all debate. When the people speak that should be the last word. But what have we seen displayed in this house? I think there have been nearly one hundred speeches made in an attempt to explain what the little X mark meant after the word "yes". The voice of the people expresses the will of the people, and the will of the people is supreme. When they voted "yes" that was the "go" sign for the government to put all they had into this war. That needs no explanation; it needs no debate. Then what have we been talking about? We have simply been vying with one another in making it a political issue. We of this group refuse and have refused to play politics. If it had not been for the vote about to be taken, and all other groups having spoken, we would have remained silent. We refuse to play politics in time of war.

There is one thing that bothers me. I have not been able to understand what the [Mr. Hansell.]

Prime Minister means when he talks of coming back to parliament for this vote of confidence. I am sorry I have to take this attitude, but almost every time the Prime Minister speaks I have to regard it as having some sort of political significance. Perhaps I am not right in that; I hope I am not too suspicious. I am not an old hand in parliament; I have been here only since 1935, but somehow or another-I cannot explain why-when some proposal is made by the Prime Minister I wonder what political dodge he is up to. He now proposes to come to parliament to ask for a vote of confidence. What does that mean? Almost everything we vote on here is a vote of confidence or no confidence, depending upon the way the vote goes.

There is something else which I do not understand, which I cannot think my way through, for I like to be as logical as I can. The Prime Minister says, "We will come for a vote of confidence in this administration." Well, you know, if I were certain that this was a parliament of the people I could believe in the veracity of his action in that regard; but this parliament, I maintain, is no longer a parliament of the people, whatever we may say about it. This is a parliament of parties; we may as well make up our minds to that at once. When the Prime Minister comes to this parliament for a vote of confidence, I think I know what is going to happen. The whips are going to begin to crack, to whip members into line, and when the vote is taken we know how it will go. I fail to see where that is a vote of confidence. To make my illustration clear, let us suppose that the three opposition groups in this house refuse to vote confidence, but that the large Liberal majority votes confidence. Will the Prime Minister say that is a vote of confidence by parliament?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why not?

Mr. HANSELL: Certainly that is what he will do. It will be a vote of confidence by his own party; of course it will.

Some hon. MEMBERS: By the majority.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, elected by the people of the country and whipped into line by party politics. I cannot help thinking that this whole debate could have been settled by the Liberal party itself. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what I think should have taken place? Of course I may be blamed for not having recommended this to the leader of the opposition, but do you know what I think he should have done when the resolution preceding this bill was brought down? He should have said to his party, to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, and to this meantime the population of Ontario had increased and was larger than the population of Quebec, and they asked, not equal representation, but proportional representation, and for the sake of national unity the province of Quebec again consented. As a matter of fact, we have not even proportional representation, but that is something about which I shall have to speak on some other occasion. In 1939, when war was declared, the province of Quebec was asked to consent to participation, again in the name of national unity, and the province of Quebec consented to participation, but on the express condition that there would never be any question of conscription. Now in the name of national unity Quebec is again asked to consent to conscription, notwithstanding the pledge that had been given in 1939 to that province. Well, there must be a limit to sacrifice, always at the expense of the province of Quebec.

Reference has also been made by the leader of the opposition to privileges enjoyed in the province of Quebec by virtue of the British North America Act. Let me say that these are not privileges but rights.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did I use the word "privileges"? I said "contractual obligations."

Mr. RAYMOND: They are rights. There was a contract in 1867, and I dare anyone in this house or anyone outside it to cite one fact to show that the province of Quebec has not fulfilled all its obligations under the British North America Act. In the province of Quebec French Canadians are the majority, and we have always fulfilled our obligations and always respected the rights of the minority. Unfortunately, however, I do not think the same can be said of all the other provinces.

This afternoon the hon. member for Trinity said that in a democracy the majority should rule. I agree entirely with that principle. In a democracy the majority should rule, but may I add that the majority should never abuse its powers, and when a pledge has been given by the majority to the minority it is sacred. In this case a most solemn pledge, so qualified by the Prime Minister, was given by the majority to the minority. Think of it! We are now asked to pass a bill to conscript men to go and fight for a broken pledge. It has been said that the government has been released from that pledge. That is not a fact. The government has not been relieved from its pledge because the pledge was given to the minority. I have only to refer to the compromise made in September, 1939. Mr. Lapointe, speaking in the name of the province of Quebec, said this, when war was declared. I am quoting from page 68 of Hansard of that date:

The whole province of Quebec . . . will never agree to accept compulsory service or conscription outside of Canada. . . .

Provided these points are understood, we are willing to offer our services without limitation and to devote our best efforts for the success of the cause we all have at heart.

This is the condition which has been asked of the majority for our participation. It was agreed to, and the Prime Minister has said that it was the most solemn pledge that had ever been given to a group. When they say that the plebiscite has relieved the government from its pledge I say no, because the pledge was given by the majority to the minority, and the province of Quebec has voted almost unanimously against relieving the government from this pledge. But to-day we are asked in the name of national unity to relieve the government from its pledge when the population has refused to do so; and because the province of Quebec is refusing, some people treat the province of Quebec as a disloyal province. Since when has disloyalty consisted in asking someone to respect their pledge? Is it not the one who wants to violate the pledge that is disloyal?

I am not going to insist any more, but I wanted to say to the house before this bill passes that if it is passed it is passed at the price of a broken pledge.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I would not rise to take part in this debate but for the fact that we of this group have remained silent. We have not yet spoken to this bill, and therefore it behooves us to say just a word before the vote is taken.

As I sat here and listened to the debate on this bill as well as on its resolution stage, but more particularly to what I have heard to-day, I have been convinced of one thing, that there are political parties in this house that have something that they have to defend. I come to you this evening, Mr. Speaker, and I say that the only wise stand that could ever have been taken in time of war from the very beginning, from the time Canada declared war on Germany, was a stand for an all-out war effort. That is the stand that this group with which I am affiliated took in those days. It is the only stand that needs no defence. It is the only common-sense stand. It is not a political stand. We tossed politics to the wind in those days; we went out to this country as all parties went out, but we went out and told our constituents that war was war. There are no degrees in war. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) speaks of things having

Mobilization Act-Mr. MacInnis

A great many things have happened since 1939. I could believe far more in the sincerity of the Prime Minister in many of the things he said if he had not cheered the canards of the leader of the opposition earlier this evening. But if we have changed our position, so has the Prime Minister. As late as March 30, 1939, he said, as reported in Hansard at page 2419:

We have tremendous tasks to do at home, in housing the people, in caring for the aged and helpless, in relieving drought and unemployment, in building roads, in meeting our heavy burden of debt, in making provision for Canada's defence, and in bringing our standards of living and civilization to the levels our knowledge now makes possible. There is no great margin of realizable wealth for this purpose; we must, to a greater or less extent, choose between keeping our own house in order, and trying to save Europe and Asia. The idea that every twenty years this country should automatically and as a matter of course take part in a war overseas for democracy or self-determination of other small nations, that a country which has all it can do to run itself should feel called upon to save, periodically, a continent that cannot run itself, and to these ends risk the lives of its people, risk bankruptcy and political disunion, seems to many a nightmare and sheer madness.

That was in 1939. My right hon. friend referred to-night to Munich, and said that at the time of Munich he told his cabinet that if war developed at that time Canada should go into the war. Yet eight or nine months later he said that for Canada to take part in these foreign wars was sheer madness. Was the right hon, gentleman on that occasion currying favour with the province of Quebec? If he wants his protestations of sincerity to be taken at their face value, he should not cheer or pound his desk when the leader of the opposition in his ignorance casts aspersions on this group. I may say that since this war began we have advocated one thing only; we have demanded that if we are going to conscript men and use men's lives in winning this war, we should conscript the wealth and the industries of the country to fight the war. I want to tell the Prime Minister that there is not a group in this house, neither his own members, nor the official opposition, nor the group to my left, who have been more careful not to embarrass either himself or his ministers in the carrying on of the war than the group which sits behind me in these rows of seats. I challenge him to bring forward one instance where we have said or done anything that could possibly embarrass him. We did not do so because we realize the importance of winning this war.

I regret having to take up the time of the house to discuss these matters to-night, but unfortunately the leader of the opposition [Mr. MacInnis.] had to be answered. The statesmanship shown by the leaders of the two major groups in the house this evening is something that should give the people of Canada food for thought. We have an amendment before us which would delay this bill going into action, even such action as is offered by the government. Since its only purpose is to delay the measure, this group will vote against the amendment.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I had not intended to take part in this debate on the third reading of the bill, but in view of certain observations made this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), I wish to make a few remarks. I have already expressed my views on the principle of the bill, and I have also stated my reasons for opposing it. I do not intend to repeat them. But let me say this. If before hearing the speeches delivered by the Prime Minister and most members of the cabinet I had the slightest hesitancy about opposing the bill, after listening to those speeches that hesitancy would have disappeared entirely. The speeches delivered by the Prime Minister and most members of the cabinet have demonstrated that this measure is inopportune; that conscription is not necessary, and that they do not foresee when it will be necessary. Yet we are asked to vote for this conscription bill.

I have no hesitation in supporting the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) that there should be a six months' hoist, because it is the logical consequence of all the speeches we have heard this afternoon and on previous occasions. Reference was made this afternoon by the leader of the opposition to national unity. It is not the first time that we have been asked in the province of Quebec to make sacrifices for the sake of national unity. For the last hundred years national unity has always been achieved at the expense of the province of Quebec. Let me recall a bit of history. In 1840 when the Union Act was passed the province of Ontario had a debt of $6,000,000, and Quebec was asked to assume responsibility for that debt in the name of national unity. At the same time the population of the province of Quebec was much larger than the population of Ontario, and the province of Quebec was asked to give equal representation in parliament to the province of Ontario in the name of national unity, and we consented. In 1867, when the British North America Act was passed the principle of equal representation in the parliament was no longer good, because in the a failure so complete that it should demonstrate the impossibility of that to anyone, even to himself.

In his speech this afternoon he raked up past history. To-night the Prime Minister took some time to point out the changes which have taken place since this war began; how almost everybody had changed their ideas on the war. The leader of the opposition referred to the statement on External Affairs made in 1933 in the Regina manifesto. He pointed out that in that statement we said we would take part no more in imperialistic wars. The Prime Minister pounded his desk in approval.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is this an imperialistic war?

Mr. MacINNIS: That appears to be the position of my hon. friends. Let us see what was adopted as our foreign policy in 1933. I doubt if the leader of the opposition has ever read it. Pointing his finger at the government side benches he said, "Did you ever read it?" If he has read it, he does not understand it. This section in the programme reads:

A foreign policy designed to obtain international economic cooperation and to promote disarmament and world peace.

That is the kernel of the statement. We then elaborated it by saying:

Canada has a vital interest in world peace. We propose, therefore, to do everything in our power to advance the idea of international cooperation as represented by the League of Nations and the International Labour Organization. We would extend our diplomatic machinery for keeping in touch with the main centres of world interest. But we believe that genuine international cooperation is incompatible with the capitalist regime which is in force in most countries, and that strenuous efforts are needed to rescue the league from its present condition of being mainly a league of capitalist great powers. We stand resolutely against all participation in imperialist wars. Within the British commonwealth, Canada must maintain her autonomy as a completely self-governing nation. We must resist all attempts to build up a new economic British empire in place of the old political one, since such attempts readily lend themselves to the purpose of capitalist exploitation and may easily lead to further world wars. Canada must refuse to be entangled in any more wars fought to make the world safe for capitalism.

Let me tell this house that we have not departed one iota from that statement.

In September, 1939, when war was imminent, when we were called here to attend the session of parliament which was to decide whether Canada should enter into the war or not, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation called together its national council—the only political party in Canada which gave its members an opportunity to decide before they came into parliament as to whether we would participate in the war or not-and after two days' discussion the national council came to the conclusion that, although there might be certain imperialist factors connected with the war, the issues at stake were such that we were not unconcerned as to which side should win, and because we were not unconcerned as to which side would win we favoured participation by Canada in the war. Referring to imperialist wars, unfortunately we have, in the past, engaged in imperialist wars. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), speaking on this bill at an earlier date, said that if this had been another war like the Boer war he would be opposed to participation; and if this had been an imperialist war like the Boer war the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would have opposed it, regardless of what the consequences might be.

The leader of the opposition talks about his desire to win this war, and he makes the welkin ring telling us how necessary it is to sacrifice everything in order to win it; yet, during the discussion on the budget resolutions the only thing he seemed to be concerned with was that he and those whom he represents should keep what they have. It was a fine thing to send our young men to give their lives, and it was also the correct thing to make the young men of future generations pay for the war, as long as his "savings of a lifetime" were not touched. Let me tell my hon. friend that unless he understands better than he seems to do now what is at stake in this war he will wake up some fine morning and find that, in the winning of the war, a world revolution has taken place wherein the savings that he and the privileged classes of the world have piled up will have disappeared, but in their place will come security for everyone; because those world changes are the issues at stake in this war. I do not, however, expect the hon. gentleman to understand that.

The leader of the opposition was not satisfied with calling attention to our foreign policy statement, which I have demonstrated is a perfectly good statement. He had to refer to a statement supposed to have been made by the leader of this group to the effect that he would rather see his son dead than have him join the army. I am not sure whether my hon. friend put it in just those words, but that was the import of his statement. He, however, failed to tell the house, though I have no doubt that he knows it, that the only son of the leader of this group is to-day in the armed forces.

them what they voted for. They want total war, total conscription, and this is what they voted for and got. The Prime Minister is reported at page 4014 of Hansard as having said:

I intend, therefore, if the time should come when the government decides that it has become necessary to send overseas men who have not volunteered for general service, and I should be in office at the time, to ask my colleagues to join me in seeing that parliament is immediately informed of the government's decision.

I skip a few lines:

I intend, at the same time, to see that, before the administration assumes the additional responsibility of enforcing its decision, hon. members are given an opportunity, not for any second debate on the question of conscription, but of showing their confidence or want of confidence in the administration.

My hon. friends want total war; they want total conscription, and they got another delay. And they voted for it. No wonder they are sore. My particular purpose in rising to-night was to refer to the statement which was made by the leader of the opposition, and which was cheered by the Prime Minister, that this group in voting against the amendment to the National Resources Mobilization Act did so in order to curry favour with members from the province of Quebec. There is not a particle of truth in that statement. But if there should be, why did my hon. friends to the right vote for a bill which they despised? I will tell the house why. They voted for it because they were afraid to be found voting with what they called the "nationalists" from the province of Quebec. That was the reason. We did not vote against the bill for any such unworthy purpose. Our position and the position of my hon. friends opposite from Quebec are as far apart as the poles. The leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), put the case quite clearly and beyond the possibility of a doubt when speaking in this debate on July 7. The hon. member is reported at page 3997 of Hansard as saying:

What should this house do? In our opinion, this house should decide now, at once, without further delay, for total mobilization of industry, of wealth and of man-power. But what are we doing under this bill that we are discussing? We are merely allowing the government once more to postpone its decision on one phase of the mobilization that I have mentioned, and that not the most important.

That is not what my hon. friends from Quebec want. There is no similarity between what my hon. friends from Quebec want and what we want. They do not want this bill at all; they do not want mobilization of manpower, of wealth, of finance, of industry—we want conscription of all of them. How can my hon. friends of the official opposition then [Mr. MacInnis.] say that we voted against the bill in order to curry favour with the nationalists from the province of Quebec?

Mr. GRAYDON: Who said that?

Mr. MacINNIS: Your leader.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then it must be right.

Mr. MacINNIS: If it is, it would be the first right thing he ever said in his life. The leader of this group went on to say:

I want to make it very clear, as I said on June 11 when this measure was under discussion then, that we do not propose to be parties to this kind of political manoeuvring, for such it clearly is. We shall make our protest to-night by casting our vote against this measure.

My hon. friends to my right were parties to that political manœuvring. Indeed, the whole procedure leading up to this bill, the plebiscite and the amendment to the National Resources Mobilization Act is about as clever a bit of trickery as was ever perpetrated on the people of this country. Several times to-night the Prime Minister said that he wanted to make it perfectly clear where the house stands in this matter. Does any hon. member know where we stand at the present time or what our position will be when we come back to this house if the government undertakes to give effect to the powers taken under this bill? No one knows. and the longer the Prime Minister talks about it the less clear everyone is in regard to it.

The leader of the opposition was not satisfied with the position he had put himself in by supporting a bill that he did not want; he went another step this afternoon. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) —I am not quoting his words—said that this was one of the worst bills ever introduced in a democratic parliament. The leader of the opposition said that he was in almost perfect agreement with the hon. member. Yet he voted for that "worst" bill, and his followers voted with him.

The leader of the opposition pretends to feel concern over the political fortunes of this party because we voted against this bill. He should not worry over our affairs; he has enough to do looking after his own party. However, he should not even worry much about the fortunes of his own party because those fortunes are all in the past. Referring to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation he said it was impossible to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. I shall take the hon. gentleman's word for that, because no one is in a better position to give an expert opinion on that subject. All his political life he has been figuratively trying to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. He has ended with to this house for an expression of confidence at any time, undue time will not be consumed in debate. Hon. members will be given within a certain period of time, a chance to show where they stand and that will be a period of time which the people of this country will deem reasonable and sufficient for the purpose. I hope that is clear so that the country and hon. members will see there are not any delays whatsoever. Once the decision of the government is reached the government is going to proceed immediately and rapidly with the question of confidence and in carrying out to the full the intent and purpose of its decision.

I have spoken at greater length than I had intended to speak. My hon. friend closed his remarks with an appeal for unity at this particular time of war. I am not going to make that appeal in my own words, but, like my hon. friend, I should like to leave a few words with hon. members at the close of this long and very important debate. The words I wish to leave to-night are words which interpret better than any I have ever seen anywhere else what I believe to be the real inner meaning and significance of this great struggle.

I doubt if the people of Canada as yet begin to realize, not only the scope of this war, not only the terrible character of it, not only the rapidity with which it is encroaching upon the very confines and coasts of this continent. I doubt if they realize, or have yet fully realized, what this war really means to mankind.

Of all I have read on the subject, no passage has impressed me more than one I came across written by a young Canadian woman now in her thirties who, for some ten years or more suffered as an invalid. This young lady, Audrey Alexandra Brown, was born in Nanaimo, and is now living, I believe, in Victoria, out on the Pacific coast. I give these words to the hon. members to-night as words to be taken into the hearts of all, excepting none. I give them as words to be kept constantly before us to help us realize the character and the magnitude of the task it is our duty to seek to meet:

There is no place for separatism and dissension among us now, if there ever was. For it is plain that mankind has come to the crossroads. It is easy to cast back to Genghis Khan or the dark ages and declare that nothing is happening now which did not happen then. It is easy, it is comforting, and it is a lie. Certainly, brutality and force are not new among men. It has always been true that, as the Psalms have it, "the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty". Men who are little more than savages can be expected to behave as beasts. But never before in history has a nominally civilized, a nominally Christian nation deliberately made the profession "Evil be thou my good". This war is unlike all other wars, for the deformed monstrosities that sheltered in darkness have crawled out of that darkness and openly challenged the world for the possession of its soul! They no longer fight under cover, they flaunt in steel. For Germany to win this war would not mean merely a re-drawing of boundaries or a shift in sovereignty. It would mean the destruction of the free spirit of man.

There can be no stronger plea for national unity.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed a rather unusual spectacle in the house this afternoon and evening. Before the dinner recess the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) took occasion to castigate all and sundry in the wildest terms. In this he was cheered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). However, the leader of the opposition had a good dinner and returned in much better spirits, and made a perfervid plea for unity.

The Prime Minister drew this contradiction to the attention of the leader of the opposition and then proceeded for an hour and a half to do the very same thing, in turn ending up with an ardent plea for unity. It is a terrible spectacle at this time, coming from the two leaders of the two major parties in this house.

I would not take the time of the house in commenting on this procedure or in speaking in this debate had it not been for the fact that the leader of the opposition said certain things which we just cannot let pass. Speaking earlier to-day, the leader of this group (Mr. Coldwell) made reference to the statement of the leader of the opposition that the Prime Minister had looped the loop three times, and that in that he was supported by the official opposition. I believe he added that later there had been another loop.

In any event this is what the leader of the opposition said on July 7, following the second reading of the bill, and as reported at page 4017 of Hansard:

Before the motion is put, Mr. Chairman, if I may, I should like to make this statement. Because of the speech that was made by the right hon, the Prime Minister to-night concluding the debate and at a time when no one else could reply, a speech in which it was indicated that the government has looped the loop three times . . .

That statement was made after the leader of the opposition and his party had voted with the government that had looped the loop. Consequently the opposition also looped the loop. I am not a bit surprised that the leader of the opposition and his followers are feeling sore over the position in which they have become entangled. I am now going to show and the end of this year there could not be a debate on it, even if some hon. members might wish to have one. Every hon. member knows that His Honour the Speaker would immediately rule out of order a second debate on conscription, even if this house would tolerate it. It would be against the rules of the house, so there is no use in anyone seeking to make out that I am trying to have a second debate on the question of conscription, that I am going to take a long time in order to get this matter settled. This matter will be settled to-night, I believe, as far as this House of Commons is concerned. Then this bill will go to the senate and later will be given assent by the governor general. That will settle the question of the power the government will have, and according to my policy already stated the decision will be settled by the administration under the power given to it by this legislation.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is a very different thing when a decision has been reached which places additional responsibilities on the ministry, responsibilities which must be viewed by any wise ministry in the light of all that has gone before; in the light of all that has taken place during this debate in this House of Commons; in the light, as my hon. friend the former minister said this afternoon, of what is going to be the result of the enforcement of that policy not only in the immediate future but for all time to come; I say when all that responsibility is added to the responsibility already on the shoulders of the ministry, I think it very desirable that this House of Commons should say whether it is prepared to give its support to the administration to carry on with that extra responsibility, or whether it is going to withhold its support just at the time it is most needed. That does not mean a matter of taking any time. I will not delay to look up his words. but my hon. friend the leader of the opposition said something to the effect that I was going to ask for a second debate on conscription.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite right; that I was going to put through conscription by closure.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; a vote of confidence by closure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; my hon. friend said conscription by closure. I will quote his words, so that there may be no mistake about it. Here is what my hon. friend said, as reported at page 4550 of Hansard:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Later in that speech of Tuesday, July 7, the Prime Minister indicated that the debate would have to be curtailed. Well, who will do the curtailing. There is only one way to curtail debate in parliament, and that is by invoking the rules with respect to closure. Consequently, what the Prime Minister said on July 7 was that the action of his government in imposing conscription would be submitted again to debate in the House of Commons, but that closure would be applied in the debate, and the motion or resolution put through under closure.

There could be no clearer words than those. My hon. friend says he did not use them, but—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then what did he say?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The record will speak for itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why did I look up the reference, if it was not to make perfectly sure?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The right hon. gentleman was wrong in his first reference, and I think he is wrong in the second. I will leave it at that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I find I was right in my first reference, because he said:

What the Prime Minister said on July 7 was that the action of his government in imposing conscription would be submitted again to debate in the House of Commons—

I did not say anything of the kind.

-but that closure would be applied in the debate, and the motion or resolution put through under closure.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): "Resolution put through under closure."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was closure in reference to the question of conscription.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; the resolution of confidence would be put through under closure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now my hon. friend is taking exception to the resolution of confidence being put through under closure. And yet he says he is so sure of his ground he is prepared to vote want of confidence immediately. I ask my hon. friend if there could be any more absurd attitude for a leader to take than this, to say that he has not confidence in the ministry, but will require weeks of debate if necessary to prove that there is anything in it. That is what it comes to.

I want to make perfectly sure at the present time that, so far as I am concerned, coming Now that it has been trumpeted all around the world to our disparagement, and every nation, friend and foe, is waiting to see what is the true resolve and conviction of the House of Commons, it must go forward to the end.

The most effective statement made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain during the course of that speech was when he reminded the house that they had two alternatives; they could dismiss the present government or support it, but they had no right to impair its efficiency and reduce its prestige abroad by a process of "sniping." That is exactly where we are at the present time, and I am saying to members of this House of Commons tonight that none of them have a right to continue to undermine confidence in the government that is carrying on the war unless they are prepared to put some other government in to take its place; and they have no right to do what they can to seek to destroy the Prime Minister of the country in his own eyes, in the eyes of his fellow-citizens and in the eyes of the world, unless they have someone whom they can put in his place and who is prepared to take the responsibility that is mine at this time.

On a previous occasion, after he had been in Washington before, Mr. Churcill found that the same thing had happened. His back had hardly been turned before a small, vociferous group began to make charges against the Prime Minister for having done this, for not having done that, and the like. He came back and found his strength impaired, his prestige lessened, and what did he say? He addressed the House of Commons on January 27 and asked for a vote of confidence in himself. He said:

From time to time in the life of any government there come occasions which must be clarified....Since my return to this country I have come to the conclusion that I must ask to be sustained by a vote of confidence from the House of Commons. This is a thoroughly normal, constitutional, democratic procedure. A debate on the war has been asked for. I have arranged it in the fullest and freest manner for three whole days. Any member will be free to say anything he thinks fit about or against the administration or against the composition or personalities of the government, to his heart's content, subject only to the reservation which the house is always so careful to observe about military secrets. Could you have any higher expression of democracy than that? Very few other countries have institutions strong enough to sustain such a thing while they are fighting for their lives.

After two days of debate a division was taken, and Mr. Churchill was supported by 464 votes to 1. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not expect any such support.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You would hardly make a comparison between yourself and Prime Minister Churchill, would you?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is my gallant and wise friend saying?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is on Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to make one thing perfectly clear—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The Prime Minister asked what I said. I asked if he was making a comparison as between himself and Prime Minister Churchill.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Read the history of the last war, 1914-18.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The last thing in this world I wish to do is to make comparisons between myself and anyone else, let alone Mr. Churchill. No one knows better than I do the burden that Mr. Churchill is carrying and the magnificent manner in which he is carrying it. He is a noble example to all of us, and I am seeking to follow his example; not to compare myself with him but to follow his example: to do the best I possibly can in the position which I hold, for the time that I may hold it, but also realizing that I cannot pretend to carry on the duties of leadership of a government in time of war efficiently or effectively unless I enjoy the confidence of the members of the House of Commons. That is all I am asking for.

Now let me make one thing perfectly clear, so that there will be no mistake about it. I notice that some sections of the press have interpreted my remarks to mean that I was coming back to parliament to get approval of the decision of the government. I cannot make it too plain that when this bill passes both houses, as I believe it will pass, and is assented to, the government will have been given by parliament power to conscript men for service overseas. That power will rest in the government. It will be there. The policy of the government is to exercise that power when it believes it necessary to do so, when it is necessary to resort to conscription to make Canada's war effort more effective. When the decision is made by the government -if and when it is made-that settles the matter as far as conscription is concerned. Conscription will have been enacted; the government will have declared that it is necessary for the carrying on of the war. There will be no question of referring that matter to parliament at all. And may I add this, that if that should happen between now view, if it is the view of the cabinet, I wish to be able to come to this House of Commons and say: The cabinet has reached this decision; the next step will be to enforce it. Before that next step is taken I want this House of Commons to declare whether it has confidence in me as the head of the administration that is to carry out this policy of conscription or whether hon. members prefer to have another government in the place of the administration now in office. That is my conception of carrying out my responsibility to parliament.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite keep saying over and over again, as the leader of the opposition said to-night, "I have no confidence in the Prime Minister; a lot of us have no confidence in the Prime Minister; we reserve our right to vote as we think best on the motion of confidence," but can you think of anything more ridiculous than when they are offered that opportunity the tenor of their words is, "Oh, for goodness sake, do not give us that opportunity; we don't want it; we don't want to have to vote on an expression of confidence or otherwise." I say the people of this country will want to know two things: first, whether the head of the government that is carrying on this war has the confidence of the majority in this House of Commons. and second, where the members of this House of Commons stand, each one of them, not by their words but by their vote, on the question of the course that may be thought necessary by the administration in the winning of the war. And I intend, if it lies in my power, to see that this House of Commons gets that opportunity, so that the people will know exactly where each and every one of us stands.

Let me say this in conclusion. If I propose a course in this parliament, immediately some hon, gentlemen opposite find fault with it. If the Prime Minister of Britain, Mr. Churchill, who is all-powerful in the support he has, proposes a course, of course he is applauded for it by the same hon. gentlemen. They say that was the right thing for him to do.

Mr. JACKMAN: National government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that is where we come pretty much to the crux of the whole situation. My hon. friend belongs to that little group of Tories who feel that nobody else is able to carry on a government unless they are members of it. May I ask my hon. friend this question, because he was elected on the basis of national government. Who was it raised the question of national government in this country at the last general election? It was his leader and the members of his party. So keen were they on national [Mr. Mackenzie King.] government; so strongly did they believe that national government was the cry that was going to sweep Canada, that they actually struck out their old time-honoured name of Conservatives and called themselves national government candidates.

Mr. JACKMAN: I ran as a Conservative candidate, supporting the policy of national government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend ran under a leader who ran as national government leader and who said that national government was the policy of his party, and all hon. gentlemen opposite know it. I simply mention the matter because if national government has been anathema ever since, hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible, because they are the ones who put the issue to the people and got the answer from the people themselves.

Now I come back to the example of Mr. Churchill. I ask this house to listen to these words and to ask themselves whether they might not have been spoken by myself tonight after this long debate as giving expression to much that has been said in the course of it. Less than three weeks ago Mr. Churchill returned to Great Britain from the United States. While he had been away a handful of his opponents had been directing different charges against his administration, doing what they could to undermine the confidence of the people in his administration. This is what Mr. Churchill said in his first great speech in the house after his return:

This long debate has now reached its final stage. What a remarkable example it has been of the unbridled freedom of our parliamentary institutions in time of war.

Everything that can be thought of or raked up has been used to weaken confidence in the government; has been used to prove that the ministers are incompetent and to weaken their confidence in themselves; to make the army distrust the backing it is getting from the civil power; to make workmen lose confidence in the weapons they are striving so hard to make; to represent the government as a set of nonentities over whom the Prime Minister towers and then to undermine him in his own heart and, if possible, before the eyes of the nation all this has poured out by cables and radio to all parts of the world, to the distress of all our friends and the delight of all our fores. I am in favour of this freedom which no other country would use or dare to use in times of mortal peril such as those through which we are passing, but the story must not end there, and I make now my appeal to the House of Commons to make sure that it does not end there.

And later.

Do not let the house underrate the gravity of what has been done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That does not answer my question with respect to conscription for service overseas.

An hon. MEMBER: But it answers his.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the matter of putting conscription for service overseas into force, should that become necessary there will be no delay in conscripting or training men. Exactly the same number will be called up by exactly the same method, regardless of geographical sphere of service. If the supply of volunteers fails there will be no question of starting a new system; all that will be required will be to extend the scope of service of men already called up and trained. That is the answer to the question as to the effect of delay in putting this system into force.

I wish to make perfectly clear my reason for saving that I desire to come back to parliament and inform parliament of the decision which may be made and why I would seek an expression of confidence before undertaking to continue as head of a government that is to administer conscription for service overseas. I have been careful in what I have said to speak for myself alone. I can speak only for myself as to the course I shall take if I have a certain responsibility, but I do say this, and I say it most emphatically, that no man, I do not care who he is, could carry on a government in time of war unless he had the confidence of the House of Commons, expressed in a reliable majority, behind him.

There have been in the course of this debate many things which have given me reason to feel that the degree of confidence in my ability to carry on up to this particular point, which I know I have enjoyed very greatly, particularly from men of my own party and, I believe, in large measure from many hon. gentlemen opposite, may not be as great in me as one qualified to administer conscription for overseas service. If that is the case let me say that I do not wish to assume any obligation that hon, members of this house have not full faith in my carrying out to the letter. May I say this to my fellow-members of the House of Commons: I have shirked no responsibility of any kind since this war came on that I believed to be in the national interest. I have not hesitated to ask this House of Commons for any measure that I thought was essential in the national interest.

I do not expect ever in my life—in the remainder of it—to have any obligation to assume which will be comparable with the obligations I have assumed in the past, when it fell to my lot to go into the council chamber and advise my colleagues—yes, at the time of Munich—that if Hitler made a move against Czechoslovakia, at that time I would advise that this country should go to war against him. When I made my position known to my colleagues in the cabinet a year before the present war, I realized the kind of conquest he was bent on. And when war came against Poland I again told my colleagues that I believed this country should enter this war at the side of Britain and fight this oppressor of mankind, this man who is seeking to gain the conquest of the world and to destroy freedom. I had had deep searchings of heart before that time. I was taking a very grave responsibility when I came into this chamber and asked this House of Commons to support a policy which would carry Canada into the war. I had taken the greatest responsibility that any human being on earth can take, that of bringing his own country into the war. I did not shirk that responsibility because I believed it was in the interest of our country that we should take that step. And after three years of war I ask my friends in this house to-night whether they think I was wrong in taking that step at that time. I feel exactly the same about this matter of conscription for overseas service. Up to the present time I have not felt it necessary to conscript men for service overseas because our Canadians were doing honour to themselves and to their country by enlisting for training for service anywhere in larger numbers than we could prepare them. But I say to-night that, with the world situation what it is, with the situation between Germany and Russia what it is at this moment, the situation in Egypt what it is at this moment, the situation on the Pacific as we know it to be at this moment, I would be derelict to the responsibility which I bear to the country and to my fellow-members if I did not say to them that I believed it was absolutely in the interest of the country that the government should have power to take any step at any time that it deems necessary, so long as it takes that step in the light of its responsibility to parliament. Now I know there are some hon. members who do not attach the same significance to those words that I do. But I attach very great significance to them. When I say that what I wish to do I wish to do in the light of my sense of responsibility to parliament I am not talking about the shadow of responsibility; I am talking about the substance of responsibility. If I am persuaded that it is necessary and desirable to resort to conscription of men for overseas service, I am going to support that view. But the minute I support that

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not catch what my hon. friend said, but I notice he could not sit still anyway, and had to rise and make an interjection. May I say to my hon. friend that what I will do when the time comes will depend upon what happens at the time and what I think best in the national interest.

While I am dealing with remarks of some hon. gentlemen opposite may I refer to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Dienfenbaker). The hon. gentleman made a statement which affords a reason why I think it is important that not only this house but the country should know what confidence there is in the present administration. I am glad to observe that the hon. member has just come in. Speaking on July 22, yesterday, as reported at page 4566 of Hansard, he said:

The Prime Minister says, "we will wait until conditions get worse and then, after we decide as a government to bring into effect conscription for overseas service, parliament will be called." Surely with conditions as they are to-day all over this world no one can say that they could be much worse.

I was astonished when I looked at Hansard this morning and found that those words which my hon, friend attributed to me appeared in quotation marks. I challenge him to point to any place at any time where I used words such as he has in quotation marks in Hansard to-day.

The Prime Minister says, "we will wait until conditions get worse and then, after we decide as a government to bring into effect conscription for overseas service, parliament will be called."

There the quotation ends.

An hon. MEMBER: He was dreaming as usual.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was not dreaming; he was doing something else though, and he knows it. I ask my hon. friend to rise now in his seat and tell me if I ever used words such as those.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I say no. Those words are placed there in parenthesis, and I say to the Prime Minister that with the conditions we face to-night all over the world I cannot understand the type of address which apparently he is trying to make to the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The words are not in parenthesis; they are in quotations, and I say that those quotations are not justified. I have made no statement of the kind—never at any time—and my hon. friend knows it as well as anyone else. I should like to know who put those quotation marks there. However, let us pass that over. The serious part of my hon. friend's statement, [Mr. J. A. Ross.] perhaps the most serious, is not putting those words in quotation marks, but in attributing to me any statement that we will wait until conditions get worse and then decide. Is there any justification for an expression such as that? When I have said that we would wait until the time came for putting in conscription, I have not said that we were waiting until conditions got worse. I have said that we were waiting until conscription is necessary, which is a very different thing. And I have made no other statement than that.

My hon. friends opposite a year and a half ago were saying that it was necessary to have conscription for overseas service. At the time I said it was not necessary, and from that time until the present they have been repeating that statement and I have been replying to them. It was not necessary for the reason that up to the present time more men have been offering for overseas service than it was possible for the government to train and send overseas. That is a very different thing. Suppose we had conscription for service overseas in force at this hour. I think I am right when I say that not an additional man would be called out, not one more man would be receiving training at the present time, not one man more would be sent overseas at the present time, for the simple reason that we have more men ready to go overseas to-day than it would have been necessary to raise by conscription to meet the situation at the present time.

Mr. HOMUTH: We have conscription now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said, for overseas service. If we had conscription for overseas service at this moment, we still have more men offering to go voluntarily than we are sending across the sea now. May I ask my hon. friend who has interrupted me whether this is what he proposes-that we should take men who are called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act to serve in Canada and send them overseas in preference to men who have volunteered to serve anywhere, who are waiting to go overseas, and who wish to go? Unless that is what he means there can be no force in the kind of argument which hon. gentlemen opposite present.

Mr. HOMUTH: May I answer the question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. HOMUTH: I contend that our camps are filled to-day because we have conscription in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not a question.

administration, that I should know whether I have a solid following in this House of Commons and in the country.

I am not going to spend time reading many extracts from the press; I get quite enough of them, morning, noon and night, when I pick up certain journals. But I am going to read a paragraph from one editorial which appeared shortly after I made the speech I did in this house on July 7, in which I said that I thought it would be necessary to have an expression of confidence from the House of Commons. ask hon. members in listening to this paragraph from this particular editorial whether they believe that, if this kind of thing is given currency day in and day out in different parts of Canada, it will be possible for any man who has responsibility to carry on in time of war. I quote from the Toronto Globe and Mail of July 10, 1942:

It is bad enough for our Prime Minister to be revealing some of the earmarks of a dictator and trying to suppress the privileges of parliament,—

This is at the moment when I am saying to hon. gentlemen opposite that, before seeking to enforce this decision, I intend to come to parliament and give hon. members an opportunity of saying if they have confidence or have not confidence in myself and the government. At the moment I am saying this, the Toronto Globe and Mail comes out and says that the Prime Minister is—-trying to suppress the privileges of parliament, of which he has been such a vociferous champion, but there would be some toleration for dictatorial methods if they were promoting the country's war effort and enhancing its prestige abroad. But the lamentable feature of Mr. King's tortuous and thimble-rigging courses which have been brought into high relief in the late debate is that they have now done irretrievable damage to the reputation of this young nation in the outer world. The valour of its sons in the last war had set the seal upon Canada's claim to full nationhood and given her a place of honour and influence among the nations. But to-day our Prime Minister, by assiduous and discreditable pursuit of partisan ends—which he has the effrontery to deny—at the expense of our solemn obligations has dragged that good name in the dust and frittered away the high prestige which heroic youth had won with precious blood.

I ask hon. members, if a leading publication in the largest city in Ontario can issue that sort of thing to the people of the province at a time of war, how can anyone expect that a man who has the least self-respect would be willing to ask the country to have him continue in office if he thought the people believed that sort of thing about him?

As a matter of fact, I think I know pretty well the confidence the people of this country have in me, and I am not afraid to go before $44561-292\frac{1}{2}$ the people at any time. That brings me to the answer to the question of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross); and by the way, I should like to quote what he said, because it is very much to the point. What did he say yesterday? It is found in Hansard at page 4565:

Mr. Ross (Souris): Just to follow up this question which the Prime Minister has just answered, is it still the intention, if the order in council he has mentioned is passed, that before it can become effective he shall consult parliament for a vote of confidence, as he stated in one of his speeches on the second reading?

Mr. Mackenzie King: I shall have something to say about that a little later on.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I think it has a distinct bearing on these sections, because I know, as one of the members of this house, that many people throughout the country, especially in the armed forces, have not very much confidence in the government as constituted with the present leader; they pin their faith to the ministers of the armed forces.

My hon. friend nods his head. Well, if there is not much faith in the present leader of the government, the sooner he knows it the better. I can assure my hon. friend and every member of this house that any time they wish to have a vote of want of confidence I am willing to give them the opportunity, and the moment such a vote carries no one will leave office more quickly than your humble servant. What did my hon. friend say this afternoon? He began to tremble in his seat after he had heard that possibly there was going to be a vote of confidence. He had been uneasy about it ever since he asked me the question this afternoon, what was I going to do if, when the vote of confidence took place, it should prove to be a vote of non-confidence-would I go to the governor general and ask him to have one of my colleagues lead the government, or would I go to his excellency and ask for a dissolution of parliament. My hon. friend was a little bit afraid of a dissolution, and yet he and his leader yesterday spoke about myself as the one who talks about trusting the people. But the moment we come anywhere near the people, my hon. friends, and those who think like them, begin to get very anxious indeed.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't be a child.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister does not-

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Just a minute. The Prime Minister has referred to the question I asked him this afternoon, and he said I was trembling from fear. I wish to deny that statement, and I invite him to Souris if he resigns. That was the speech of the Minister of Agriculture.

-we cannot ever expect in my opinion to have military service overseas-

That would be compulsory service, to use his own words.

-regardless of what the people may demand.

If that is the view members of this house have, do they not believe it is about time that an opportunity should be given to them to say whether they have or have not confidence in the administration that is to have this extra responsibility?

My former colleague, speaking in the first debate, gave one strong reason why parliament should know immediately the decision was made and before further steps were taken. Speaking on June 11, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères said, as reported at page 3275 of Hansard:

It is not to be applied by act of parliament, as it was in 1917, with the regulations attached to the bill and presented to parliament. No; it is to be done by order in council, and it may very well be that the order in council applying conscription, forcing the boys of Canada to fight anywhere in the world, will be kept secret.

That is a rather serious statement or charge to make. It will be rumoured about the country that there is going to be so much secrecy in this matter that the order in council applying conscription, authorizing the boys to fight anywhere in the world, will be kept secret. There is one very effective way of answering a charge of that kind, one that cannot be denied, and that is that the minute a decision is reached by the government to resort to conscription for service overseas this parliament will be advised of it, and that course is the one which will be taken.

I might quote from many speeches which have been made by hon. members on this side. I shall mention only one, but I give it as a reason why amongst others I think it is necessary that I should know if and when the time comes whether men of my own party are going to support me if it falls to my duty and obligation to have to enforce conscription. I read here from the words of one of my personal friends, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou), who, speaking this way, and very feelingly-and I take no exception to what he said, but I feel sorry that he found it necessary to say it-remarked, as reported in Hansard, June 29, at page 3759:

When speaking on the plebiscite, I stated that I had faith in my leader and in his cabinet. I must say that I have now lost that faith. I truly believed that I could trust the Prime Minister of Canada.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Then he says later on, speaking of my former colleague:

He too had faith in the government. Having been deceived, he had enough courage to resign.

As I said, I am not surprised that the faith of some of my followers may have suffered-I will not say, a shock, but at least that it has been a little difficult for them to understand some things. The really great things of life, the important things in life, are often not to be understood by any individual act; it is the life as a whole that counts, it is the future as well as the present and the past that have to be taken into account; and in taking the action which I have taken in regard to this matter I have had in consideration above all else the national interest and the problems which men from all parts of this country have to face in their several constituencies. If I have not sought to proceed as hon. gentlemen opposite think I should have proceeded, and a year and a half ago taken steps to put conscription into force immediately, whether it was necessary or not, it is because I have known only too well that such course would have been the most disastrous that the leader of any government could take at any time in this particular country. I say to the hon. member for Rimouski that I believe he will live to see his faith restored, by the events of the coming years. In the light of the possibilities of the future, he will come to see very clearly why I have taken the course I have in the past and in the present.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Even if we lose the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I wish to make perfectly clear is this. The responsibility of being a member of a government at a time of war, to say nothing of having the responsibility of being head of a government, is the greatest responsibility which can be put upon the shoulders of any man, and no leader of a government and no government can carry on the duties of government in time of war unless absolutely sure of its following in the House of Commons. This is the position that I feel the present administration has come to, or more particularly that I myself have come to, at the present time, after three years in which hon. gentlemen opposite, some of their press and some of their friends have been doing all they possibly can to undermine the administration, and to cause not only the people of Canada but the people of other countries to lose faith in myself as leader of an administration in time of war. Now that we have come to a crisis I feel it is absolutely necessary, if I am to carry on longer as the head of the a method. Then on June 10 my hon. friend said, as reported at page 3251 of Hansard:

"Trust the people" is an old cry of the Prime Minister. He has never been willing to do that in connection with the conscription of man-power in this country. He has never been willing to trust the people. Yet there is no man in this country, no man in the whole history of Canada, who has played upon the principle of trusting the people more than has the present Prime Minister. In respect to one vital matter, which affects the liberty of the subject, he legislates in the secrecy of the council chamber; he is afraid to trust the people. If we pursue our present course we shall have only the theory of selective service on the statute books; we shall not have its application.

I wonder how my hon. friend would have rung the changes in this house on that declaration if I had not declared that I was going to see that this parliament was informed of any decision this government had made as soon as it was made and before action was taken to carry out the enforcement of the order itself.

Not only is it the leader of the opposition, but the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) has been equally strong in his language. Indeed, both of them repeated to-day their objection to not having parliament fully informed on these matters, even to the extent of having parliament legislate again upon them. On May 28 the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party used these words, as appear at page 2862 of Hansard:

The decision as to whether we are going to compel men to surrender their lives or their property in the interests of this dominion and of our war effort with the united nations is not the responsibility of the military authorities; it is the responsibility of this parliament. And I agree that under no circumstances should the government take unto itself powers that ought to lie in this chamber.

When we are dealing with the futures of the young men of this nation, this is the place where the decision should be taken, to the very last degree.

Suppose a decision were taken and parliament not informed until action had been taken to send men overseas? Would there not be a repetition of the remarks I have just read? Would not this parliament and this country be told over and over again that I, of all men, had been one who sought to do everything in the secrecy of the cabinet council and to ignore parliament altogether? Speaking on June 11, as reported at page 3259 of Hansard, the hon. member said:

We have no right to give a blank cheque to the government to do nothing, or to make regulations for the conscription of man-power, which may be no better understood or more equitably administered than the regulations already in effect and about the meaning of 44561-292 which there is no general agreement by the Department of National War Services which is charged with their administration. Under the circumstances my colleagues and I do not propose to give the government a blank cheque to do by order in council what this parliament alone should do.

I draw attention to one word used there because it is significant. It is not merely action taken by order in council; it is the administration with respect to which my hon. friend wants to have some word to say.

Mr. COLDWELL: The administrative regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As to how they would be administered, yes. Then I come to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who is reported at page 3333 of Hansard as follows:

We have a right to know how the act will be administered;—

If you are going to know how it is going to be administered, you will want to know what ministry is going to administer it. That is the first step. That is what I am proposing that this parliament shall know. The hon, member continued:

--we have a right to know its mechanics and its provisions. We have a right to see that under these regulations favours will be denied, that favouritism will not be permitted, so that there will be honest administration.

Again a question of administration. That seems to be the important question in connection with this particular measure. Here is a statement which I quoted the other evening and to which exception was taken by the hon. member for Lake Centre on the ground of its not conveying his true meaning. I am going to give it the meaning he says he intended to convey. He was speaking on June 15, and I quote from page 3329 of Hansard:

Up to the present time the only two ministers who have spoken in this debate on behalf of the government have been the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), both of whom have consistently opposed military service overseas, and from whom, having regard to the speech to which we have listened to-day, we cannot ever expect in my opinion to have military service overseas regardless of what the people may demand.

When I read that the other evening my hon. friend said that he had not meant military service overseas, he had meant compulsory military service overseas. What is the charge being made against me at this time by one of the leading followers of my hon. friend opposite? It is:

. . . having regard to the speech to which we have listened to-day—

Mobilization Act—Mr. Mackenzie King

An hon. MEMBER: Come to the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —to the reason my hon. friend gave for seeking to make his long speech of yesterday. He said that I was seeking to introduce some new formula— I think that is what he called it—and that he was taking exception to my so doing. Just what was it to which my hon. friend was taking exception? So that the record may be clear on the point I think I had better read to the house what I said on July 7 respecting the new matter, as I understand it, which my hon. friend said I had introduced at that time. I quote now from Hansard of July 7, page 4014:

If the need should arise for sending overseas as reinforcements men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act, the procedure should be as open and aboveboard as it can possibly be made. Unless it is understood that parliament will be informed in advance, all kinds of suspicion will be aroused and all sorts of rumours will be in circulation from day to day.

The right of the public to be informed of the decision of the government before it is enforced was set forth clearly in the address I made in opening the plebiscite campaign on April 7. Speaking on this very matter in a nation-wide broadcast, I said:

"The people of Canada are not going to hesitate to take any steps which they believe to be necessary for the preservation of their freedom. They are certainly not going to hesitate to adopt any measure needed to preserve their national existence, but they will wish to know, and they have a right to know, that before any step is taken, that step is necessary. This is particularly true in the case of a measure which has been the subject of bitter controversy and the source of disunity in the past."

And this is the new matter:

I intend, therefore, if the time should come when the government decides that it has become necessary to send overseas men who have not volunteered for general service, and I should be in office at the time, to ask my colleagues to join me in seeing that parliament is immediately informed of the government's decision. If parliament is not in session, I would do whatever lies within my power, to see that parliament is informed as soon as possible after the decision has been reached.

I intend at the same time to see that, before the administration assumes the additional responsibility of enforcing its decision, hon. members are given an opportunity, not for any second debate on the question of conscription, but of showing their confidence or want of confidence in the administration.

May I ask wherein does any part of this new material not relate to the question of procedure on the very matter contained in the bill which the house is discussing at the present time? Suppose I had said nothing about my intention of informing parliament of the government's decision before seeking its enforcement? What would hon. gentlemen opposite have said? I have to consider what I am going to be face to face with if I fail to take a particular course as well as what I am going to be faced with if I take a particular course. Hon. gentlemen opposite know there is no single subject to which they have directed their opposition toward myself during the last two or three years to a greater degree than in alleging that I was not carrying out what I professed to believe in, namely, the responsibility of the executive to parliament; that I was continually ignoring parliament: that I was doing everything by order in council. There is not an order in council that the government has passed, I believe, to which hon. gentlemen, either in particular or in general, have not taken some exception. They talk about everything being done in the present administration simply by order in council. Yet when it comes to the most important order in council that will be passed during the life of this parliament, these hon. gentlemen say that I am taking a mistaken course in coming to parliament and informing parliament about that order in council before action is taken to enforce its provisions.

I just want to remind hon. members of what some of them have said on this matter during this debate. I am considering now just exactly where I would be if I had not made the statement that I was going to inform parliament immediately the government made its decision; that I was going to seek to get from this house an expression of confidence in this administration if it was to carry out the enforcing of that particular order. I have in my hand a copy of the speech made by hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, on May 28 of this year. I am going to read only a sentence or two which will help to illustrate the quotation I would have been faced with had I taken a different course. My hon. friend said, as reported at page 2861 of Hansard:

Let parliament take the responsibility; let parliament pass upon such regulations. The whole theory of doing these things by order in council is wrong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is as to the regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The emphasis has been on doing things by order in council. The order in council which will be passed will be an order putting into force regulations that are already known. The essence is that they will be put into force by order in council. My hon. friend also said that he did not think we could get the same spirit of equality if this sort of thing were done merely by order in council, and he objected to such I should like to know what government would survive that did not anticipate in advance all possibilities, and seek to provide against them in every way at its command. I know what the cry would have been if we had failed to take this step. There would not have been an incident of any kind, of an adverse nature, which would not have been put down to the fact that the government had not taken the power to conscript men for service overseas even if that should be considered necessary.

What government could stand against a charge of that kind?—that it had not been willing even to take power that might be necessary to save the country in a world situation such as we are facing at the present time. I say that no government would have been true to the country that would have tried to avoid its responsibility in that way. But we are taking the responsibility, meeting every situation as it comes, and seeking to discharge our responsibilities to the best of our ability.

Oh, yes, let me say a word about leadership. There has been quite a little said yesterday and to-day about leadership. Something was said about leadership in the province of Quebec. Of course my hon, friend the leader of the opposition could not help getting in the same old jibe that his party has kept up from the beginning of the war—that this country is not getting the leadership that it needs at the present time.

May I just remind the house that the ink was hardly dry on the order in council which set out the declaration of war between Canada and Germany when we were told-and I think it was by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce)-that while the present leader of the government had been a very good leader in times of peace, was in fact a splendid leader in times of peace-though I did not hear that said very often by hon. gentlemen opposite in times of peace-he was not the man to lead the country in a time of war. From that day to this, every few weeks and months one sees evidence of a new drive, that we had better have a change in leadership, and so on and so on. Everything that has been possible for the opposition, the opposition press or the opposition public to do to belittle the leader of the government in this period of war, they have done, most of them without any reserve whatsoever.

They talk about publicity. For example, they complain about Canada's publicity in the United States. They say that our publicity in that country is poor, and that the people over there do not appreciate our war effort. Well, where does the United States get most of its Canadian publicity from to-day? It gets it from the press which reports the utterances of my hon. friend, utterances like those of yesterday. How can we expect to have a proper impression of Canada's war effort out of what these gentlemen have been seeking to have it appear, when they have, in large part, a monopoly of the press, and use press agencies to help to send these speeches abroad?

My hon. friend talks about leadership. May I say to him that there are some things which speak for themselves, despite anything anyone can say, or any construction one may seek to place upon them. For twenty-three years I have held the position of leader of my party. In that period of time I have had the pleasure—it was not altogether a pleasure, but a pleasure, in part—of seeing seven different leaders from the Conservative party sit opposite me, and for the most part they were in opposition.

This leader, who is not much good, at least has had the satisfaction of having seen no less than seven Tory leaders come and go, and seek to put him out of the leadership of his party! May I say to my hon. friend that, very fine in some respects as his own leadership has been, I do not think it has been altogether a bed of roses for him. I do not think it has been a magnificent triumph in the eyes of his own following, if what I read sometimes in the press is correct.

But speaking of leadership, my hon. friend, after referring to some proposed course of mine, said, "What a spectacle!" Well, I have witnessed many spectacles in my experience in political life, but never before have I witnessed the spectacle of a political party which had to have two leaders, one in the house and one out of the house, neither friendly with each other, and neither carrying the support of his own party. That is the spectacle we have had for many months past in the case of the party which my hon. friend leads in this house.

An hon. MEMBER: When Rome burns!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is the hon. gentleman who preaches to the house about leadership! This is the gentleman who says that the country has not the kind of leadership it needs! Well, thank the Lord it has been spared this two-headed brand of leadership—and that is what exists, so far as the party opposite is concerned.

Mr. GRAYDON: "If Hitler were only a Tory, what a licking we could give him!"

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I will not repeat what is being said by some of my friends around me, there may be attributes in Hitler that are not far removed from those of some of the party opposite.

May I come now-

friend and former colleague well knows, which account for the fact that this government had included in the speech from the throne the statement that it was desirable for the government to have the power for which we are now asking in this present legislation. Let me read the clause as it appears in the speech from the throne:

The government is of the opinion that, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should in this connection and irrespective of any previous commitments—

That was with respect to methods of raising men for military service overseas.

--possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise.

My ministers accordingly will seek, from the people, by means of a plebiscite, release from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

Those were the circumstances. It was not the agitation on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, but the fact that it was recognized by the government, as indeed it was its duty to recognize and to act accordingly, that instead of being a European war this was a world-embracing war, and that unless the enemy could be defeated in other parts of the world the last phase of the war in all probability would be fought out on Canadian soil.

I say to my hon. friend and former colleague that if he is at all doubtful as to that being the view which he himself held, I would recall to him what he said in his broadcasts to the people of his own province during this very session. Here may I pause to say that I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite have appreciated or sought to appreciate in any way the service that was rendered by my former colleague at that time. They have been ready to find fault with him in one particular after another, but they have been very quick to forget the noble service that he and his fellow ministers from the province of Quebec rendered at the beginning of this war, when they made clear to the people of their province why Canada should enter this war unitedly. They have been very quick to forget that when gentlemen belonging to their own party sought to divide the province of Quebec and to have the government of the province take a different stand, my former colleague and his fellow ministers from Quebec were the ones who spoke to their people and gave them the reasons why they should stand solidly behind this government in its policy of prosecuting the war to the utmost possible extent.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Speaking on the plebiscite, here are the words which my hon. friend used in addressing the people of the province of Quebec:

It is your war; the war of every one of you. They are deceiving you in saying this is England's war. It is the war of our civilization against dictatorship. It is the war of those who are dear to you and of your way of life against a system of terror and slavery.

Those I am sure were the motives which actuated my hon. friend when he agreed, with other members of the government, to our seeking power to take whatever course might become necessary in order to meet a future situation. And he added:

A member of the Quebec legislature said a few days ago that he hoped that the present war would make Canada an independent nation. But if Canada were to-day an independent nation, we would surely be engaged in the war.

Speaking on April 9, in another broadcast, my hon. friend said:

To my fellow citizens of Quebec, I wish to say simply, without weakness and without shame, that it is better not to run the risk of isolating ourselves. We wish others to show confidence in us; let us then show confidence in them. Let us not speak only of rights; let us think sometimes also of the obligations which guarantee those rights . . . and No will lead you nowhere and assure you of nothing. With the rest of the country let us provide for our defence everywhere in order to keep away from us both the black peril of infidel Germany and the yellow peril of deceptive Japan.

That was the world vision which my hon. friend had and shared with all of us, and which I believe he still has. I mention it only to bring home to all hon. members of this house the fact that the government, in pursuing the course that it has taken and in seeking the power that it is seeking by this particular bill, has been motivated solely by what was most in the national interest and has had its course, as must be the case in all matters that affect the lives of men, influenced by the course of events in the world about it. We are not in the same position to-day that we were in three years ago. What country in the world is in the same position to-day that it was in three years ago? Who will venture to say what position this or any other country is going to be in a year from to-night? Knowing the rapidity with which the enemy has made headway in all quarters of the globe; seeing what he has done in Europe; seeing the strength of his forces in Russia at this very hour; seeing the battle that is taking place in Egypt; witnessing the conquests of Japan as we have witnessed them in the past few months; having had U-boats in our own rivers and having had our own shores attacked, who will say where we are going to be in relation to the enemy a year from to-night?

the electorate that they would do their utmost to prevent conscription for service overseas ever becoming an issue in this country at this time of war. It was not I alone; it was all parties, including that of my hon. friend. He was returned to this House of Commons in an election in which on this question of conscription for overseas service his own leader took exactly the same position as I did.

When I saw that it was necessary and desirable in view of changed conditions in the world for the government to have the power it now seeks, I recognized that a certain pledge had been given, I then said that before any action could or would be taken it would be necessary for me to go to the people of this country and ask them to release me and all others from commitments made, so that my hands and the hands of all might be free for any action it might subsequently be desirable or necessary to take. But my hon. friend who talks about betrayal said to me here, and to this house, that the thing I ought to do was to break, to ignore that pledge and go ahead and by force and might of majority put through conscription regardless of any pledge given. When he talks about betrayal, what is that but betrayal? Wholesale betrayal of the entire nation is what my hon. friend was advocating. Should his conduct in office be the same as his advocacy in opposition, if he had been in the position I am in to-day, he would have carried out that betrayal.

May I say a word about the change in world conditions. Here may I speak more particularly of what my friend and former colleague the hon, member for Richelieu-Verchères said this afternoon as to the government's action being the result of agitation. I have in my hand the speech from the throne which was delivered at the beginning of the present session. My hon. friend was a member of the government at the time. With much of what he said this afternoon I am in entire agreement and most hearty accord; particularly is this so of what he said about the necessity of a majority being careful how it exercises its powers and of not ignoring the rights of a minority. But may I say to my hon. friend that I cannot agree with him when he says it was agitation which caused the government to make its policy, las announced in the speech from the throne at the beginning of this session, one of seeking the power which we have sought in this legislation. The reason was-I am sure that on reflection my hon. friend will recall-the changed condition of this world war. At the beginning of the present war nearly all persons in Canada believed it was going to be a second European war. Hon. members need not refer to speeches I have made in the past about whether troops would cross to Europe or not; they need only look in the British Hansard to see what members of the British parliament said about there not being another war in which Britain would send expeditionary forces to the continent. The leader of the opposition need only look at what his predecessor, Mr. Bennett, said in this House of Commons about no more expeditions being sent from this side to Europe. After the last war there was an intense feeling throughout the country that if the nations of Europe were going to continue to quarrel among themselves, they would have to straighten out their own quarrels. When the present war broke out there were many people who did not begin to have any appreciation of its probable scope and extent. It required not merely education but also time, vision and experience to bring home to the public of this and of other countries the true nature of this conflict.

It was under those circumstances that this government led this country into war, or rather took the responsibility of recommending to his majesty that he declare that a state of war existed between Canada and Germany. At that time the belief was that for the most part the conflict would be wholly and solely within Europe. But what occurred between then and the time the speech from the throne was prepared this year? Between that time and the preparation of the speech from the throne the whole scene had completely changed. Practically all of Europe had been overrun by the conqueror. Poland and Czechoslovakia had been invaded and crushed. Denmark and Norway were under the heel of the aggressor. Belgium was conquered. The Netherlands were conquered. France had collapsed. Jugoslavia had been overrun. Greece had been overrun. Armies were in conflict along the border of Russia. The whole situation in Europe had changed completely. War was being carried on in Africa. But there was another circumstance which was most important. In addition to the war in Europe and in Africa, war had broken out on the far side of the Pacific. Japan had entered the war; she and Germany had both declared war on the United States, and before this house met this year Japan had made her strength felt in a powerful way in the far east. If I am not mistaken, by that time the Netherlands East Indies had been overrun; Singapore had fallen, and Australia was in danger of being invaded. These were the circumstances in which this house met at the beginning of this session. These were the circumstances, as my hon.

Mobilization Act-Mr. Mackenzie King

out and tell the people what the situation is, but if you make conscription a political issue you will retard its adoption.

A political issue is what the hon. gentleman opposite and his friends have made this question from the very beginning.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HOMUTH: You have had twenty-five years of training.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can prove pretty quickly the truth of what I have just said. This afternoon when my colleague the former Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin) was speaking on this question of conscription and how it had come to the fore he said that it had been largely the result of agitation, agitation on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite and their press in different parts of the country and others who represent them or for whom they speak. The result of agitation! My hon. friend described my course yesterday as a tortuous course, that first one step had been taken, then another and another in order to bring conscription more and more to the fore. It was this course he was describing as tortuous yesterday. But today when my hon. friend and former colleague comes out and says that the steps leading to the present bill were the result of agitation, and in so doing hands a bit of toffee to the opposition party and their friends, hands what I think the children call "an all-day sucker," my hon. friend grabs this thing and takes the whole credit to himself, implies that he has been the one who from the start has led this agitation and helped to make a success of the issue of conscription.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I said he did me too much credit.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but my hon. friend took it all to himself. The moment what had been, when he was describing my course, a tortuous course, when my hon. friend was told it had led to a certain result it became a series of progressive steps. Progressive steps the stages are described when he has had to do with a course followed; a tortuous course when I have had anything to do with it.

What were some of the adjectives, phrases and epithets he used in describing this so-called tortuous course of mine? First he said I had sought all along only to preserve my political position, then that I had sought only the consolidation of my political position. That is all the credit he gives me as leader of the government in dealing with the question of the progress of the war and the measures necessary for it, that my whole aim [Mr. Mackenzie King.] and purpose have been to consolidate my position politically, to consolidate the position of the party politically.

Then he went on to speak of my course as one marked by procrastination, a course marked by appeasement. Next he referred to my method of speaking as casuistry, and finally, running out of epithets in that direction, he began to talk about twisting and turning and opportunism and indecision and timorousness, a comedy of errors, a lack of courage, and political expediency. These epithets ran all through my hon. friend's speech as his means of seeking-what? Of seeking to undermine confidence in the government and its leader at this time of war and great peril, for no purpose other than the political benefit he thinks he himself is going to be able to derive therefrom.

There was something that I must confess I was surprised at my hon. friend saying. I can understand some of the epithets he used. I was surprised when my hon. friend not only sought by his different utterances to create the impression that there was lack of unity in the cabinet; that there was lack of unity in the party; that there was dissension in the ranks of my followers, and after having tried to sow that sort of seed he turned to hon. members on this side of the house and said to them that some of them felt that I had betrayed them. But he added-and let me use his own words so that there will be no mistake-"And they have every right to think that he has betrayed them." Well, I say to my hon. friend that I think he will live to see the day when he will greatly regret having accused me of seeking to betray anyone and, most of all, members of my following in this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères said, that he had been betrayed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He did not say I had betrayed him. I noted his remarks very carefully. He said there was a time when certain people might think they were betrayed, a very different thing from my hon. friend accusing me of betraying anyone.

What did my hon. friend advise me to do? I had made certain pledges. His party, the party of which he is the leader, had made certain pledges—the same pledges. All hon. members of this house know well that at the beginning of the war the parties generally saw the seriousness of the kind of political discussion that would arise once the question of conscription for service overseas came to the fore, and all parties were united in saying to request but for the plea for unity we have had from him to-night and the fact that before preferring his request he had his speech all prepared and knew what was in it. From beginning to close, it was the strongest effort he could make to help to destroy me in the public life of the country. The whole purpose of the speech, from beginning to close, was an effort to destroy confidence in this administration. Yet he says we must win the war. How are we to win the war, I ask my hon. friend, if there is to be no confidence in the ministry carrying on the war? It would be all very well if his words ended with their utterance and were not reported. But what happens? What the leader of the opposition said is sent broadcast not only throughout this country but throughout the world. It is taken up by the gentlemen of the press gallery and sent to the different countries of the world, to the United States, to Great Britain, even to our enemies. What impression do they get from the speech delivered yesterday? What is the impression anyone would get who listened to that speech or who may have read it to-day? It would be that the Prime Minister of the country was not deserving of the confidence of parliament; that he did not enjoy the confidence of the people; that Canada's war effort was being rendered infinitely less effective than it should be on that account. Yet my hon. friend takes exception to my wishing to have some expression of confidence on the part of the house before I continue to add to the responsibilities I have carried during the last three years.

My hon. friend speaks about our having been at war now for three years. I wonder if he realizes what load has been on my shoulders for these three years of war. A little later on he may reflect with regret upon some of the words he used yesterday afternoon concerning the manner in which I have sought to discharge the duty I have to our country.

What was my hon. friend's pretext for the speech he made? He said I had introduced some new matter in the speech I made on the second reading of the bill, and therefore it was necessary and desirable for him to intervene in the committee stage to make the kind of speech that should have been made on the second or third reading of the bill. Well, my hon. friend knows as well as I do, to begin with, that the new matter, as he calls it, which I introduced was not new in the sense of being something which was not wholly relevant to the subject under discussion on the second reading. He knows also that all he had to do was to ask His Honour the Speaker whether in any way I had infringed the rules by introducing new matter 44561-2913 into my speech. In that event he could have taken exception to it and so exposed me. But his speech was not occasioned because of any new matter. That was a mere pretext. Indeed, the whole of his speech had nothing to do with new matter. It was all old matter, the repetition of things he has been saying over and over again by way of attack upon myself and upon the government ever since we have been carrying on the duties of a government in this period of war.

Let me remind the house of some of the things my hon. friend said when he spoke. I made a note at the time of some of the references he made to me, and I propose to quote from them to the house on this occasion. But speaking of old matter, if I wished to refer to old matter I think I would not have much trouble in embarrassing my hon. friend. He was eloquent this evening about his convictions on the matter of conscription-how he has always believed in conscription; why this parliament should believe in conscription; that it is necessary for the winning of the war, and so on. Here is a little bit of old matter, the record of a speech made by the hon. gentleman, as reported in the Montreal Daily Star of October 30, 1941, just three months before the present session started. What did my hon. friend say then as to conscription being all-important and, above all else, being the thing for which all members of this parliament should stand? I quote:

"I have been urged to declare for conscription of man-power," Mr. Hanson said, "what would happen if I did? Immediately the Conservative party in parliament nailed conscription to its masthead, we would consolidate all those forces that have been opposed to us since 1917 and they would be marshalled against us."

This is the hon. gentleman who now says that conscription is the thing that everyone should agree upon, the hon. gentleman who says that he has never made a political issue of it; but he then said that the Conservative party, if they were to nail conscription to the masthead, would immediately have all the other forces marshalled against them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the Prime Minister read that part in which I said that I tried to avoid its becoming a political issue?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will read the whole of it. My hon. friend said:

Conscription is bound to come to the front more and more insistently, but it must come from the people themselves. To make it a political move would defeat the very purpose of those who have it in view, . . . Our sense of citizenship must be such that we will go came to the realization that there was a great possibility that this war might be lost. Then came the period when Britain herself was in danger, when all that stood between us and a horde of Huns who might pour across the Atlantic ocean was the British navy; when in fact and in deed our front line of defence was overseas, and when I thought, and all people who think as I do were driven to the conclusion, that the war must be kept away from these shores if it was humanly possible. Then came a recession of the danger of invasion of Great Britain and after other developments in June, 1941, when the main danger to Britain seemed to have receded, came the invasion of Russia. When we were in Great Britain in September of last year, talking to great men of that nation, I felt day after day a sinking of the heart when I was made to realize that possibly Russia could not last very long, and I recall with what gratitude and praise we looked upon the defence of the gallant Russian nation in repelling the invasion of the Hun. With 1942 came the renewed invasion of Russia, and to-day we hear over the radio and read in the newspapers stories of the splendid struggle which our allies over there are making. But it has been impressed upon me, as, I am sure, it has upon the minds of every one of us, that there is still great danger that this war may be lost.

Has that no lesson for us, for all of us? Well, to me it has this lesson. This is my final word in this debate, and I may not have another opportunity during this session to impress these views upon my fellow members and upon the people of Canada. To-day the danger of losing this war is as great as it has been at any time in the last thirty-three months. If Russia should collapse, millions of nazis may be turned against the western world, and the British empire and the united nations in general may thereby be put in dire peril.

I appeal to my fellow citizens in this country of Canada, to my fellow members on all sides of this house, to Canadian men and women of whatever racial origin they may be, to unite to repel the common foe, because a nation divided against itself cannot stand. We should not allow ideas which have grown up upon erroneous premises over a period of years to blind us to the significance of presentday events and the potentialities of the immediate future.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, my last word to the membership of this house to-night is this. No matter what our political differences may be; no matter what our opinions may have been on the war effort of this government in days gone by, when this nation is in as dire [Mr. R. B. Hanson.] peril as I believe it is to-day, and when the united nations are in as dire peril as I conceive them to be, let us forget past differences, party politics and partisanship. Let us unite as never before so that we can say to our children and our children's children: when Canada was in peril, the Canadian people united₄

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has just made an eloquent plea for unity. He has said to the hon. members of this house: Forget all past differences, no matter what the record of the government may have been in its war effort; no matter what political differences there may have been between us; the danger in the world to-day is so great that men of all parties and all classes should unite, forget the past, andif I understood him aright-devote their entire energies simply to the winning of the war. That was fine eloquence; it was a noble appeal. But may I say to my hon. friend that if he had begun his remarks of yesterday with those words and had followed them up in accord with the significance of words of the kind, his utterances would carry much greater weight than they do at the moment.

May I remind the house of yesterday's proceedings. My hon. friend came into this chamber with a carefully prepared address. It was typewritten. He had evidently given considerable thought and preparation to it. He knew that the proceedings in committee would not permit of his making a prolonged address without the consent of all members of the house; and having in mind his desire to get on the record this carefully prepared statement, he made an appeal to the house and asked that he be given unanimous consent. I think I can say quite honestly that if after objection had been raised by members in different parts of the house I had not myself risen to say that I would support my hon. friend in his request, the opportunity which was accorded at that time would not have been given him. Having been given the oppor-tunity, the first thing my hon. friend said was, Oh, yes; I appreciate the kindness of the Prime Minister. No doubt he has been in a similar position himself and appreciates the difficulty of such a situation and is therefore helping me to meet it, or words to that effect.

May I say to the hon. gentleman that I have been in many positions, but I cannot recall that at any time in my life I was in the position where I asked a favour of another man in order that I might have an opportunity to knife him as strongly as I could. I would not pay so much attention to my hon. friend's help the cause that we believe in, heart and soul. When we did so we were not playing politics as they were.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no difference between the two parties at the top.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) says there is no difference between the two parties at the top. I would hope that in essence, with the possible exception of a few members of the cabinet, we are all thinking alike about this war and the absolute necessity of winning this war if we are to survive. I invite my old friend, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères to come along with us and get on the band-wagon for victory. No one wants to crush him or his compatriots. We want equality of service. That is all. And I think the only way to get it is by the draft method. My fear is that conscription will come in this country, but that it will be too late to be effective.

I had intended to put on the record the position to which he referred in connection with what was done under the Military Service Act of 1917.

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): Mr. Speaker-

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hear the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix) saying something. I am wondering what he has ever done to help to win this war.

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): I have done more than the hon. gentleman has.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wonder what he has done to help to win this war. We never hear his voice raised in this house in approval of any measure that would in any degree help to win this war. There are many people in this country who are influenced by him, but I am glad to know that there are very few in this house who pay any attention to what he does or says.

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): I know who you are.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to conclude before the dinner recess what I had to say, but owing to what occurred in the house this morning and this afternoon I found myself unable to do so. I confess that when I came into the house to-day I had intended to participate, to only a 44561-291 very limited degree, in this debate on the third reading, because I thought I had covered all the issues very thoroughly on the second reading and in the course of the remarks I made yesterday in the committee stage. I desire, however, to say something with regard to the Prime Minister's proposal for a vote of confidence, and I shall do so now, and then as rapidly as possible conclude what other observations I have to make.

In my view, the Prime Minister's proposal to return to the house for a vote of confidence in the event of his decision to impose conscription for service overseas is nothing but a sharp political manœuvre. The Prime Minister knows full well that a majority of both parties in this house would support an honest, straight-forward and direct system of compulsory service without any limitation, but he seeks to deflect that vote upon a question of high principle and of great national importance to a vote of personal confidence. He has told us that the vote will not be one on conscription because he will have settled that decision; he will come back for a vote of confidence, and I interpret that to mean a vote of confidence in himself and his government. I tell him here and now that I have not that confidence in him or in his administration, and I reserve the right to vote as seems most expedient in the national interest when the time arrives. I have no confidence that this administration will forsake the policy of appeasement and temporizing which has characterized it since the day war broke out; and until I am convinced that there will be a complete and absolute change in both the policy and the attitude of the administration, and particularly of the Prime Minister, I shall reserve the right to vote confidence or to withhold it.

I do not propose to take time to reiterate the position to which I adhere. I believe that the immediate and full enforcement of the true principle of compulsory selective service without geographical or other limitations is an urgent necessity if Canada is to make an adequate contribution. I shall not cease to urge my point of view on every possible occasion. I shall not cease in my endeavour to arouse public opinion in this country to that necessity, and to try to drive this government into action which I believe to be such a vital necessity if we are to have, what the Prime Minister has so frequently promised, total war waged by total effort.

We have been at war for nearly three years. For nine months of that period of time the war seemed to the people of Canada a very remote affair. Then came Dunkirk, when those of us who were following intensely the situation that the state says I shall do. Further, I do not think there is a member in the house who, if the state in its urgency says, "We want you somewhere else to do a job," would refuse to do that job. I believe that the Canadian people as a whole, irrespective of race, irrespective of any other consideration, are willing to make every contribution they possibly can, every contribution it is humanly possible for them to make, if they are shown the way.

I would wish that the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who is a man of some parts, a man well versed in the history of this country, would endeavour to understand the point of view of some of the rest of us, as I have tried to understand his point of view and that of those with whom he is associated in thought. If we could get together sometimes and discuss these matters we might have a better understanding. But I am afraid the floor of the House of Commons is not perhaps the best forum in which to arrive at conclusions, or get together in our ideas.

I should like to say a word with respect to our position in this matter, and the position of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. When the Prime Minister made his statement with regard to returning to the house for a vote of confidence I took occasion to say that the government had looped the loop three times. I meant that. It was not a very eloquent expression, but it was expressive of what I believed the position to be. This morning the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) stated that he largely agreed with what I had said, but suggested that the official opposition were looping the loop with the government.

If he means that we were urging the government along toward the goal of total war, he is right. We supported the government in its effort to free itself from the silly pledge that it made before and during the election. We helped the government to put over the plebiscite, to get an expression of the views of the people of this country, if not with respect to conscription at least with respect to releasing them from the pledge they had given. By the same token, I wonder if the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did not come along with the Prime Minister and myself on that occasion. He did. I heard his speech, and I read it afterwards. He was travelling in the same direction as we were.

Then came this vote on the mobilization bill. On the specious ground that by this bill the government was not proposing to conscript wealth, and in order to curry favour with certain parts of the electorate of this country, these hon. gentlemen of the Coopera-[Mr. R. B. Hanson.] tive Commonwealth Federation voted against the second reading of this bill. I want to say to the hon. member who is not at the moment in his seat—

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the hon. gentleman will have to withdraw that statement. It is a reflection upon the members of this group, and he has no right to make it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member can put his own interpretation upon my remarks, but unless Mr. Speaker says that it is a reflection, I have nothing to withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think there is any reflection in what the hon. member has said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By the same token, he reminded us that this was the ninth anniversary of the Regina meeting. Have any hon. members ever read the Regina platform? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) knows what it was. It was an irrevocable statement that never under any consideration would they or their party participate in any foreign war. There is not any doubt about what attitude those gentlemen took in the days right up to the war. Shades of Mr. Woodsworth! Would he have done anything else? I listened to him speak in this house for years. We all know what his philosophy was with regard to war. He was sincere in holding those views, but I am doubtful about hon. gentlemen who have eleventh hour conversions when they think it is popular. There is not very much consistency about these hon. gentlemen who are now out for total war. Where were they two years ago, three years ago or nine years ago?

There is an old saying that you cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. I am not going to apply that to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, but I am going to say that you cannot take an isolationist, you cannot take an anti-conscriptionist, you cannot take a non-participationist, you cannot take a man who says he would rather see his son go to gaol than go to war and make him a good participant in this war overnight. I want to say to my friends of the Cooper-ative Commonwealth Federation that they got off on the wrong foot when they voted against this mobilization bill. If they ever had any hope of becoming a great party in Canada, that hope was buried when they voted against this bill. I know my hon. friend charges me with tailing in behind the government. We did not tail in behind the government because we wanted to help them especially; we did so because we wanted to Then the time came, he said, when, driven on by those who, he claimed, had ulterior motives to serve, driven on by those who wanted to capitalize their positions, this government began to change until to-day, after tortuous steps, one by one, we are now in the position where we have compulsory military service, or have it with the exception of the last one step.

I deny that anybody who has advocated national military service has had any ulterior motive. I appeal to hon. members; I appeal to the hon. members on the Liberal side who spoke in support of conscription, and ask them if they advocated it from any ulterior motive. I appeal to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) whom I see in his seat. Does he advocate compulsory military service from any ulterior motives, or does he advocate it on the broad principle of the national interest? Surely that is the only reason why any of us has ever advocated that position. I was a long time before I brought myself to the position where I advocated it. I thought public opinion had to be educated to it. I thought the urgency of the situation had to be driven home to the minds and hearts of the people of Canada. I did feel that in days gone by there had been maleducation in certain parts of Canada, and if the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères is responsible for that position, then he must take his share of the responsibility. I do not think he is attempting to escape from it. I think he, as a citizen of his province, will take the responsibility for anything he has advocated in the past.

We do not all think alike. I respect the opinions of those who do not think as I do. This is democracy, we cannot all have our own way. I speak to this opposition group. and to the other minority groups in the house, and I ask them: How often have we had our way in this House of Commons? We believe in the principle of majority rule, and I was glad to hear in the final words of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères a declaration of his adherence to that principle. Let me say to him that he is following in the footsteps of the greatest leader the Liberal party ever had. If Sir Wilfrid Laurier were here to-day he would advocate the principle which he laid down in a speech in the House of Commons in 1917 and which at least on one occasion I have quoted.

Enough on that point. The hon. member paid me, I think, perhaps, too high a compliment when he intimated—although he did not say it in so many words—that this government had been driven step by step to the position they are now in through the efforts of those of us who advocated first one step, then another, then another, and then another until we have arrived at the present position. I do not believe I have been wholly responsible for those successive steps. But his testimony was to the effect that we have done that, and I accept the compliment. I have not anything to retract for any part I have ever taken or for what I have urged upon the government of the country in the interests of total war for the salvation of civilization. I shall never retreat from the position I have taken.

If I have advocated by constitutional means one progressive step after another for Canada in this war for civilization, I have done so first of all out of a sincere conviction that I was advocating the right thing. Second, I have done so because I believed the government should be told what the public generally, aside from their own political group, was thinking. I have attempted to voice public opinion for the information of the administration which has the responsibility of carrying on the war.

Was that a duty? I think it was. If I did it, however inadequately, I have no regrets. If I had anything to do with the four months training plan, I have nothing whatever to recall. If the hon. member has any quarrel with or suggests any betrayal in connection with those who were called in under the four months training plan, then I say his quarrel is with his former friends who concealed as fully as possible their real intentions when they started this mobilization legislation.

I said yesterday the Prime Minister had always yielded to public opinion. In that connection I would point out that in the progressive steps which have been taken by this nation under his leadership he has yielded, in each instance, to public opinion. I believe that before this war is over, perhaps before many months, the Prime Minister will go further in yielding to public opinion, and we shall have at last total war by total effort.

Mr. POULIOT: What do you mean by that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just what I say—total war by total effort, and it will not be confined to man-power alone. We may have to go the limit in everything. What brooks it if we lose this war? What brooks any of our positions if we lose this war?

Mr. POULIOT: Why don't you drive a truck in England?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If it is necessary for me to drive a truck in England, or anywhere else, I am entirely willing to do so. I am entirely willing to do anything

Mr. CARDIN: On that point I do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you. I can only conclude that he was referring to propaganda undertaken and carried on in the province of Quebec in various ways and manners unknown to me, which would have the effect of undermining his position and that of those who think as he does, and of propagating the position, the circuitous position, which this government has taken and which I exposed yesterday in the debate during the committee stage of this bill. I was struck with one statement made by the hon. gentleman, which I regretted to hear him make, when he issued the challenge or made the assertion that no one would crush Quebec. I ask him: Who is trying to crush Quebec?

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): You.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not trying to crush Quebec. I want to say that Quebec has played a great part in the history of this confederation. Without Quebec, confederation could not have been possible. With Quebec and the other provinces, Canada has arrived at the stage where she now is a great nation. Quebec has shared those responsibilities. Under the terms of the union the people of Quebec have been given privileges which are embalmed in the British North America Act, privileges which no one in this parliament with any sense of responsibility has ever tried to take away. That question has arisen many times. Many times leaders of every political party in this country, I care not what its colour, have assured the people of the province of Quebec that the contract of confederation would be kept; and no one has been more assiduous in attempting to keep the provisions of that contract than has the historic Conservative party in Canada, which made them possible. Therefore I say to the hon. member in all kindness that if he had any references to me or those who are associated with me when he mentioned the attempt to crush Quebec, I deny the allegation and repudiate the suggestion. I say to him that in order to make good that argument he will have to turn his face to his former friends, and I think by very logical reasoning he can do that. A pledge was made to his people by the Prime Minister of this country, from which during the course of the past six or seven or eight months he has been trying, by every circuitous route open to him, to escape. If the hon. gentleman has any complaint with regard to the way in which his people are being treated, he should turn his face to his former leader or his present leader, I do not know which to call him. As for us and our course, I will say this, that since we became convinced that [Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

compulsory national service was necessary in this, the greatest of all wars, we have been absolutely consistent in the course we have sought to pursue. We have not advocated that policy in favour of any class, in favour of any province or in favour of any racial element. We have advocated that course because we believe it is in the national interest; and every part and parcel of this country is part of the body politic and should so consider this situation.

During the course of his vigorous remarks the hon. gentleman indicted the present bill. He said it was the worst law that had ever been placed upon the statute books of a democratic country, and with that statement I am to a very large degree in agreement. Why? It was an emergency measure. It never should have been used as a substantive law. It was only enabling in its scope. It was to give the government power to do certain things, power which a government ought to have in case of an emergency; and that emergency not having arisen but the situation having grown more and more grave from day to day and month to month, the government of this country should have brought down in parliament a detailed measure dealing with the question of compulsory national service in every field of human endeavour. It should have brought that measure into parliament so that we could have passed upon it section by section, stage by stage, power by power, and should not have reserved to itself the power to legislate by order in council. That was the indictment which the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères made against this bill—the power to do things in secret that should be done in public-and I have made a similar indictment on every occasion I ever had to refer to the matter. His indictment was with regard to the power to do clandestinely that which should be done openly in parliament by the representatives of the people, in the democratic way.

The hon. member says that if we adopted what I have advocated, national selective service, there would be no one left to conscript. I deny that statement. I have said that if we are going to have a total war effort in this country every man should be allocated to his job-the farmer, the artisan, the fighting man. That could have been done; yes, it could have been done very much easier two years ago. It could have been done much more effectively two years ago than it can be done to-day. But this government would not do it. The reason is absolutely plain-it was endeavouring to protect its political position. No one knows that better than the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères.

| JULY | 23, 1942 | | | 4609 | |
|------|----------|-------------|--------|----------|-------------|
| | M | obilization | Act-Mr | . Hanson | (York-Sunba |

The minority cannot rule; but let me say to the majority of this country, which according to the hon. member for Trinity should rule—and he asked that we should recognize the sovereignty of the majority—I do recognize the sovereignty of the majority in Canada, and the province of Quebec will submit to the legislation that is going to be passed. But if the minority cannot dictate its view to the majority, that majority should hesitate, should pause, before setting its iron heel upon a minority.

We are fighting this war, according to the Right Hon. Mr. Churchill and other leaders, for, among other things, the protection of minorities and for the rights of small nations. Let us not abuse their representatives by laughing at the expression of their opinions and criticize bitterly when they are expressing the views of their compatriots, the people they represent in this House of Commons.

My good friend the hon. member for Trinity in the course of his remarks, which are always interesting, because he is a very sincere man and a very broad-minded man, recalled to us an old saying, that the stone may hurt but not the words. Let me add to his saying, which is true in a sense, that if stones can hurt the physical body of a person, words and actions are often more harmful to the soul, and that the wounds of the soul are much more difficult to heal than the wounds of the physical body.

Exercise your authority, you members of the majority, but with kindness, not in Hitler's or Mussolini's way. Exercise it in such a way that the feelings of those upon whom you exercise it by the force of numbers are not hurt too deeply.

The people of the province of Quebec are law-abiding citizens. They have proved this in the past; they will prove it in this instance. When the law is enacted, although it is the worst law that has ever been passed by a democracy in Canada, we will submit. We will obey the law. There will be no trouble. We might remember the occasion, but just the same we will obey the law. We will in all sincerity try to do the best we can to accommodate ourselves to the situation which is going to be difficult as a result of what we have been promised not only by our leaders but by the leaders of all parties in Canada.

I know that my position is going to be misunderstood. It is already misunderstood in my own province. There is a veil of silence which is being used to conceal the activities of the representatives of the province of Quebec who disapprove the government. You have only to look at the newspapers and you will see that when one of the members opposing the government on that issue makes a statement it is hidden on the fourth, fifth, sixth, sometimes the twenty-fourth page of the newspaper, if it is reported at all. But when an argument is made in favour of the government by somebody who is ready to swallow the law there is no letter in the printing room of the newspapers too large to advertise the proclaimed great speech that has fallen from the lips of a supporter of the government. That is propaganda which is not any more commendable than the propaganda of Hitler, Stalin or Mussolini. It is propaganda which in a large part is being paid for with public money. It does not give the true significance of what is happening in this house, but it is intended to discredit those who have the courage of keeping their word and frankly and openly stating what they think.

You say, "Well, the majority has spoken." Yes, the majority has spoken—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If it is the wish of the house that the hon. gentleman should proceed, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to give way to him.

Mr. SPEAKER: With unanimous consent the hon. gentleman may proceed.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Speaker, realizing the difficult position in which I was placed, you and the house have been kind enough, in one instance already, to allow me more time than is permitted under the rules to an ordinary member. I do not want to abuse that privilege.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think we have all listened with more than ordinary interest to the address of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), who has just resumed his seat. He showed, I think, all or nearly all of his old time vigour; he showed his ability to speak extemporaneously, and he marshalled his arguments with much of the power I have seen him exhibit in former days. I should like to say, however, that with respect to certain portions of his remarks he said either too much or too little. I confess that with respect to certain cryptic utterances which he made I did not under-stand the innuendo, and I hoped that he would enlarge, to a degree at least, upon the position which he says obtains in certain quarters in the province of Quebec. I hope that at least he is absolving me and those whom I represent from any participation in the position to which he referred.

they had come to form part of French nationality; they had become French citizens by heart and culture.

There is another good friend of mine, a man to whom I listen attentively when he speaks, because he is refreshing. His speeches remind me of the debates I heard in this house when I first came here thirty years ago. I refer to the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). I regret not having waited, when I made my speech on the second reading of the bill, until the hon. gentleman had spoken, because he supplied all the material that was necessary to justify the speech I myself made. It is only in the conclusion that we differ. He made the strongest speech that could be made against conscription, but he made it in support of a conscription legislation.

Nothing has been shown, nothing has been indicated to us to prove that it is necessary at the present time to have such legislation on our statute books. We have been told that it will place our position in a better light before our allies. Well, if our allies are in such a state of mind as to be satisfied because we have on our statute books legislation which most of the ministers have said will not be applied, our allies are very easily satisfied. It would have been better to make them a gesture of good understanding, otherwise, for example, to shake hands with them.

Before condemning the province of Quebec for the attitude she is taking, and the members from that province on this very important issue, the members of this house and the press of the country should look around the world a little and inquire what is happening in other countries which to a certain extent are in a position similar to that in which Canada finds herself to-day.

Can you seriously condemn the attitude of the people of the province of Quebec when you absolve by silence what has happened in Northern Ireland? Are they not in a danger zone, exposed to attack? Is not the south of Ireland exposed to attack, with the very important maritime ports which they possess and which they have so far refused to permit England to use? Are they not in danger of being attacked, much more so than we are in Canada? Who is condemning, who has been condemning them in this house? Who has had the courage, during the debate on the second reading and even now, to raise his voice against the attitude of Ireland, north and south? Nobody. But the good old goat of the province of Quebec has to bear the burden, has to be punished; the fight has to be carried against the province of Quebec as it was carried on in 1917 for the benefit of people we know.

What about the position of Australia? Australia does not have compulsory military service for overseas. We have been told that they sent a number of soldiers overseas who have been fighting gallantly in Libya and elsewhere. That is true, and they deserve all praise for it. Nevertheless, in Australia there is no military service act that provides for service overseas. Legislation of that kind was defeated in the last war, and it has been defeated in the present war as well.

Then we are told that the best method of avoiding invasion in Canada—it is a dream is to fight the enemy on the ten or fifteen or twenty or twenty-five points where the war is raging in Europe and in Asia. Where is the front to-day? Is the front more in the British Isles than it is in Libya? Is the front more in the British isles than it is in Russia to-day? Certainly it is not.

Australia did not have compulsory military service for overseas, and they sent soldiers to fight in other theatres of war. Did that prevent them from being attacked? No. They were attacked just the same, and they were attacked probably with more success, because a large number of their soldiers, their sons, have been scattered all over the world. They are thinking of bringing them back to Australia in order to defend their own land.

I do not see any weight in the argument that we must go and defeat the enemy elsewhere. Where? There are ten points in Asia and Europe where the enemy is having successes at the present time. Where is the front we are going to choose to send our men when we apply the military service law?

The province of Quebec is unable, as she was unable in 1917, to force her opinion on the majority of this country. She has no intention of imposing her views on the majority of the Canadian citizens if they want to have conscription. But I contend that the province of Quebec has the right—and I have exercised it and I do exercise it at the moment without any fear of any kind—to express her own ideals in the councils of the nation. If we cannot do it the way we are accustomed to argue things of that kind according to our temperament, according to our mind, as I said a moment ago, let us say good-bye to confederation and let us say good-bye to democracy.

But I feel that there is in this country a majority capable of understanding the point of view of the province of Quebec and ready to listen to those who represent her in this parliament and to concede to them the liberty of expressing, in the way they like, their point of view on all the problems that are being discussed in this House of Commons. That is all that we ask.

[Mr. Cardin.]

I have a thousand times reason to say that this House of Commons is not master of itself; it is obeying, it is working according to the wire-pulling of a small group in our country who is trying to serve their own interest, to better their own personal position and have their own way under the cover of the war. Some also want to have the province of Quebec pay for her attitude. I have heard some insulting speeches in this house, and I have read insulting editorials in certain newspapers. Some have said, "Let us finish the war, and then we will deal with Quebec." Well, let them come. They will not do it. At the bottom of their hearts they are too much of the slacker kind to risk it. They hide themselves behind their desks, where they write editorial columns slandering citizens of a province which has been doing much more than they have been doing themselves individually or their families, for the prosecution of the war. We are not afraid of them. We are citizens of this country, and there is no majority in Canada that is going to wipe out the minority of the province of Quebec.

The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) read to us a few editorials which have been published in certain sections of Canada. He could find some in my own province, and I could find some, written, not in the same way, but in a more insidious fashion though none the less effective, in the French language, as a result of paid propaganda. A campaign is going on in the province of Quebec against myself and other representatives of the province who have voted against the bill, this according to our consciences and our convictions. We are misrepresented in our province, but these misrepresentations reach only the surface. There is going to be a day of reckoning in Quebec.

Some who were afraid at the difficult time of the plebiscite to show even their noses outside their doors to help us in trying to have the people of Quebec vote "yes", are now the bravest men on earth. They never miss an opportunity to dictate to federal members what they should do. They suggest to them to submit, submit like good little boys and good little angels, because something dreadful might happen if they do not.

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): Godbout!

Mr. CARDIN: That is the kind of propaganda which we have witnessed, not only in the English provinces, but in the province of Quebec itself.

We have been told that if our people are reluctant to submit to conscription, it is because we lack leadership; that proper leadership, to borrow the expression of some hon. gentlemen, has not been given to our people. What about leadership in the other provinces? What about leadership in other sections of the country? The leaders of the province of Quebec as a whole compare favourably with the leaders of any other province, and French Canadians have no reason to be ashamed of the standing and the orderly attitude of their leaders.

I suppose I come under the condemnation of those who say that we have had the wrong leadership in Quebec during the last twentyfive years. I suppose that the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe also comes under that condemnation, and also the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. What Sir Wilfrid did and said is in Hansard. It has been cited on many occasions. He did what we are doing now; he opposed compulsory military service for overseas. And mark you, what the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe and I did in the province of Quebec was done with the approval of our leader and of all our colleagues in the government of which we were then members, and also without criticism from the leaders of the other political parties in Canada.

In fact for the last twenty-five years the leaders of all political parties have themselves or by their recognized supporters, advocated the same policies which I myself advocated during that period—opposition to compulsory service for overseas.

When I tried to explain the position in which French Canadians find themselves in comparison with English-speaking members of this house, I was taken to task by a very good friend of mine, a man for whom I have the greatest respect, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore). He tried to establish that my claim that we were the first to open this land to civilization was wrong. He contended that of the number of people speaking French at a certain period of history only 5,000 were not Normans, and he said, if I remember rightly, that he was a descendant of the Normans. Well, following that line of reasoning, I could say in all friendliness to my hon. friend the member for Ontario, a very learned and most respectable gentleman, that he could have by the same process, traced his origin right back to Adam and in that event, he might have placed himself among the Jewish race. When the Normans came to Canada they were then a part of France and they came to Canada not as Normans but as French. They came to the new France as the subjects of the King of France. They came as Frenchmen and not as Normans, because in the course of years

Mobilization Act-Mr. Cardin

Another objectionable aspect of this bill is that it is retroactive. It constitutes a breach of faith with the young men who were enlisted forcibly for service, in Canada only, under the mobilization act which was placed on the statute book in 1940. When that measure was before the house, and when it was before the country afterwards, it was understood that it meant enforced military service only for the defence of Canada in Canada. When we forced the young men to enlist under the mobilization act we promised them it would be for only one month, that after one month's training they could return to their occupations and need not worry until the time would come when Canada would be in danger. Some people then said that one month's training was ridiculous, but not very many said it in 1940, when the mobilization act was passed. After it was on our statute books, after our young men had been enlisted by force, after they had been sent to the training camps, it was argued that one month was not enough; that they should have four months' training. As a result of that agitation the training period was changed from one month to four months.

After these young men had been brought into the camps on the understanding that they would have to stay there only four months, whereupon they could return to their occupations, another agitation was started by certain military authorities, and certain other people in an effort to crush the province of Quebec .- Let me here serve notice upon these people that it will take greater strength and more courage than they possess to crush the province of Quebec. As I say, an agitation was started against the four months' training, saying that the advantage would be lost if these men were not transferred to the regular regiments. It was argued that the country would lose the benefit of their four months' training. Can it be said that those who received military training in the European countries years ago, for six months or for a year and who were called to the colours only two or three years after as a result of war, were of no value in France and in the other countries where they had military service?

Nevertheless we were told that the advantages of four months' training would be lost because these young men would return to the farm and to other occupations and would be no good as soldiers in the defence of their country. We acceded to that agitation; we acceded to the wishes of the leader of the opposition and his friends and the agitators in Toronto, the minority of which we hear from so much, and of which we are so much afraid in parliament. The trainees who had IMr. Cardin.] been told they would be trained for only four months had to resign themselves to serving until the end of the war and to being transferred to the regular training centres all over Canada.

This legislation deletes section 3 of the mobilization act, which limits its effect to service for Canada in Canada. We are now saying to those young men who were told by the registrars that they would have to serve only one month, who were later told they would have to serve four months, who were later told they would have to serve for the duration of the war in the active force of Canada: "Forget that you were called to defend Canada on the soil of Canada; you are going to be kept where you are, and if one day the governor general in council deems it advisable that you should go overseas, you will have to go overseas whether you have been called up for a month, for four months, or for service in Canada during the war."

This retroactive feature is the worst thing that can be placed upon the statute books of our country. It was always with the greatest hesitation that any government took such a step in the past. Yet we have it to-day in a legislation dealing with life and death.

We are breaking faith with the young men who have enlisted, and with the people of Canada. For what reason? I have listened very patiently, as I thank hon. members for listening to me, to all the speeches which have been delivered in this house; and everybody in the country knows now that threefourths of the members of the present cabinet have said that conscription is not necessary; that we do not at present need to have recourse to compulsory military service for service overseas. Quite the opposite; we need the men, all the men that we can enlist to work in the shops preparing materials of war.

We have at present nearly one million men in the industrial establishments of Canada producing materials of war, and a quarter of a million more will be required to manufacture war equipment and provide other instruments necessary for the prosecution of the war.

From the opposite side of the house, as soon as hon. members had advocated a policy of conscription for service overseas, practically all of them, one after the other, inquired with anxiety about the situation of the farmers in their respective constituencies, and demanded that the regulations should be applied in such a way that the farmer should not be interfered with. That is the spectacle we have been witnessing in this house.

on this bill, and to press my strong opposition to the principle embodied in it. If I needed any justification I should need only to count the pages of Hansard on which appear the speeches of representatives from other provinces on questions relating particularly to those provinces and the interests of the electors they represent in the house. We have listened patiently and with pleasure to the numerous and extended debates on the grain question, because we believed that it was the right and privilege of hon. members from other parts of Canada to explain fully their points of view, in order that they might be understood by the government of the day, and that their proposals might be considered. On many occasions hon. members from all parts of the house and representing all shades of political opinion have enjoyed the liberty of speaking, as long as the rules of the house permitted, on any matter of importance to their constituents or the provinces they represent.

I say it is unjust for any member to stand in his place in the House of Commons and blame those who have spoken at length on such an important question as this—the most important that parliament has had to consider. We have the right to speak our minds. If that right were denied to us, we might as well say good-bye to that pact of confederation in which we are all equal partners. We might as well say good-bye to democracy, and apply to this land the theories we are fighting against in Europe and elsewhere.

I have no apology, to make, nor do I propose to offer any, when I say that the law we are at present enacting is worse than the law enacted in 1917 by the Borden administration, and supported afterwards by the Union government. This law gives more power to the present government and to the governor in council than the law of 1917 ever gave to the government then in office.

At that time we had a statute, a law, before us. It gave as many details as could be given in a piece of legislation, and there was provision left for regulations in respect of less important matters. But the main principles were embodied in the statute, and were not left for a proclamation or an order in council to determine, as is the case with the measure we are now discussing. We have been told that this bill is enabling legislation. Yes; it is enabling legislation, giving the government power to do everything which pleases the government, at any time which pleases the government, and to act at any point or under any circumstances which in its opinion may seem favourable or justifiable.

Mobilization Act-Mr. Cardin

I listened the other day to the speech delivered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) when the bill was in committee. I regret to say he did not take advantage of the situation as he should have. True, he used certain strong words, but the general trend of his argument was only a praise and an approval of what the government had done, and an expression of support of the legislation before parliament.

He could have done more than that. He could have claimed for his party a partnership in that legislation, because to-day we are faced with this legislation because of agitation which has been raised—and I am not afraid to say this—by his friends, and by the press supporting his friends and his party in the country. That is why we have the legislation before us to-day.

Almost every step that has been taken up to the present in the prosecution of the war has been taken as the result of the threat of a motion or amendment being moved by the opposition, and because of the fear that such a motion or such an amendment, if proposed, would destroy to a certain extent the strength of our party in the House of Commons. That is the position. I do not need to be afraid to speak my mind; it is not at my age that one should be afraid to speak his mind.

This measure goes a long way beyond the proposal made by the leader of the opposition in the speech he delivered in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Anyone who reads the proposals put forth at that time by the leader of the opposition must be convinced that the kind of conscription he was proposing was less extensive and less effective than what is embodied in the legislation at present before His proposal started out with providing us. exemptions for farmers, for men working in war industries, and for men working in industries related to the war effort. It was only at the end that he took up the question of military service in any theatre of war. If the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition had been put into practice, there would have been nobody left to conscript. He wanted a selective service that would provide for agriculture, for war industries, and for those civil industries which are necessary for the welfare of our economy. Then, after all this, he proposed to provide for the conscription of men for service in any theatre of war. I repeat that the bill now before us goes far beyond the limits of the suggested selective service or supposed conscription proposed by the leader of the opposition when he spoke on the address.

COMMONS

Mobilization Act-Mr. Ross (Souris)

scription were prepared to leave to others the task of doing for Canada, their homes and families what they refuse to do for others and even for their own country. That is a groundless statement, to say the least. The Prime Minister should be the last man to use such language. He was not talking that way when he solemnly asserted that not a penny of the increase in the estimates was intended for anything but the defence of Canada, and solely of Canada. He was not talking that way when he promised, in the following terms, that Canada would not participate in outside wars. Let me quote his words:

We shall probably never again see the day when large bodies of infantry have to be dispatched overseas.

The Prime Minister also said:

We must choose between minding the affairs of our own country and trying to save Europe and Asia.

The Prime Minister was not talking that way when he gave the unconditional pledge that he would never enforce conscription, as evidenced by this solemn statement:

Let me say that so long as this government may be in power, no such measure will be enacted.

The conscription measure.

Is there anything more blameworthy than to fail to keep so many promises, than to break so many pledges? Is there anything more apt to foster doubt, distrust and hatred as regards constituted authority? What more despicable doctrine than one founded on contradiction and falsehood? What greater threat to the very existence of our laws and constitution than the implicit acceptance of error and deceit triumphant over truth? I maintain that such an evasive attitude is more harmful to our war effort and to the morale of the Canadian people than the most nefarious doctrine and the most pernicious policy.

In conclusion, I have the honour of seconding the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy).

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I shall take only a few moments, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to repeat that at the present time we have a very unfortunate man-power situation on our hands with respect to agriculture, industry and the armed forces. I should like to endorse the remarks of the hon₄ member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) who argued this morning for immediate action in respect to this conscription bill now before the house.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a question, which I may not have the opportunity of asking at [Mr. Lacombe.] another time. In the course of his remarks on this bill the Prime Minister stated that when the cabinet considered conscription necessary an order in council would be passed, parliament would be consulted and would be asked to vote confidence in him, and I think he added without debate. That does not seem feasible to me, though I suppose it might occur if he could muster enough votes in his support through the party whip. However, I think he might explain to us, when he speaks on the third reading of this bill, what would be the implications of a vote of no confidence in a party administration, at a time like this, under war conditions. That is to say, suppose there were a non-confidence vote, would it mean a general election in the country at this time? Or, on the other hand, would he do what Mr. Chamberlain did in Great Britain, and call upon one of his colleagues, as Mr. Churchill was called upon, to form a government and carry on under the present conditions and difficulties?

As he is the sponsor of the bill I trust he will make this implication quite clear to us in his discourse on the third reading of the bill, and more particularly since he has already intimated that at some future day we may be called upon to vote confidence or nonconfidence in him without debate.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Richelieu-Verchères): Mr. Speaker, I desire to avail myself of this last opportunity to express my opposition to the bill which stands now for third reading. I shall express my views in the course of only a few minutes, but I wish to say that I do not feel the necessity of offering any apology for taking part in the debate, despite the fact that some hon. members during the debate on second reading said it was rather prolonged. I claim that all representatives of the people in the House of Commons are entitled to express their views, whether or not it prolongs or delays the proceedings. If we have not the privilege and the advantage, within the rules of the house, of stating our own views and giving our own opinions on questions which arise in the house, then I ask myself: What are we fighting for in this war? No hon. member of the House of Commons has any right to protest against the discussion having been prolonged, because all hon. members who had views to express had the right to voice them on the second reading, and to make their sentiments known. They expressed at the same time the opinions of the electors who sent them here as their representatives in parliament.

I have no apology, I repeat, for standing in my place a second time to stress my views promises, broken with its past? I trust they will not remain deaf to this appeal in favour of cooperation, of a sacred unity in unmasking those who prefer colonialism to autonomy, slavery to freedom.

Will they remain faithful to the Prime Minister and this conscriptionist government or, following Laurier's example, will they prefer honesty, truth, courage and honour to power? Let them remember that the stand of the present government is a cynical denial of Laurier's career, the man who, almost an octogenarian, travelled through the whole of Canada, from one ocean to the other, in order to fight the Borden conscription measure in 1917.

Mr. Speaker, if there were a sixth reading of the bill provided for in the Canadian or British constitutions, I would still oppose this unfair and arbitrary conscription measure.

Will the year 1942 see a majority of the members of parliament sign their names to this heinous conscription law, without a mandate to do so from the Canadian people? Will the present generation remain indifferent, unconcerned or powerless witnesses of the repetition of the frightful deed perpetrated twenty-five years ago by a government censured by the Canadian people, dogged and removed from office as public enemy number one for over a decade?

Woe unto those men who, without due consideration, are on the point of repeating the criminal error of 1917. Woe unto those flatterers and imposters who, during the plebiscite campaign, sheltered in the radio studios, broadcast falsehood to mask their treason. Woe unto all the crooked and false politicians who foment misunderstanding and doubt in our so-called sacred democracy, while our soldiers are laying down their lives to safeguard it. Mr. Speaker, woe unto all those disciples of Voltaire whose motto is: "Lie and keep on lying, it's bound to bear some fruit."

But I say that nothing, absolutely nothing, will come of this conscription measure or of its sorry and hypocritical authors save strife, hatred, doubt, distrust and defeat. Before another year has passed, Providence will rescue our country from the deceit, lies and treason to which it has fallen a victim. In this energetic and pathetic fight for Canadian liberties, we shall show the same tenacity, eagerness, courage and patriotism that have ever guided us in all the various disasters that have assailed our beloved country.

One last word. It was easy to foresee that the mobilization act contained all the elements of conscription for overseas service. The previous stand of the government was reason enough for anyone to understand the menace that this mobilization act, which I energetically opposed on June 18 and 19, 1940, constituted for the Canadian people. A positive proof of this lies in the Prime Minister's statement to the effect that conscription has been on our statute books ever since June 21, 1940. I thank heaven for having foreseen the dangerous stand taken by the government in June, 1940, as I had previously forecast, in September of 1939, the misfortunes which would befall our country. Participation and mobilization were the fatal stepping stones to conscription.

Are those who refused to support the successive amendments I moved in connection with participation and mobilization now satisfied with their stand, their abstention and their work? The events of the near future will give a forcible answer to that question fraught with so many direful consequences.

Mr. Speaker, who mentioned in this house or on the hustings the matter of a sacred contract? Who was simple enough to believe in the government's sincerity after what happened in parliament in 1937, 1938 and 1939, when the defence estimates were increased? I flatly refused to concur in those estimates. I knew that they were not for the defence of Canada but for participation in war. Who could reasonably draw another conclusion when the government rejected my repeated requests that the Militia and Defence Act be amended so that Canada might not have to participate in outside wars? The people of this country will judge, and history will confirm, that those who joined the advocates of imperialism and conscription in accepting participation and mobilization, are responsible for the enactment of conscription. They will vainly try to conceal their anti-Canadian stand. The people shall be made aware of all facts. We are going to enlighten them by every possible means. We have too long delayed doing so, although for a very lofty motive; the desire for concord and harmony. There is something loftier and greater than that motive; it is the triumph of truth over error and the welfare of this country. That is the principle for which we will fight alongside all true Canadians who may join our banner. We do not care for the shameful desertion of some or the cynicism of others. A surging torrent will sweep all that away. The wave of Canadianism which is now rolling over the country will sweep the remnants of a government dominated by a military and financial imperialism which is planning the downfall and ruin of Canada.

The Prime Minister stated in this house on July 7 last, that the opponents of conunited nations, I subscribe to it, and I believe that all hon. members would subscribe to it. But I do say in all sincerity that any member or group of members is taking a very grave responsibility in voting against this bill on the basis that their particular brand of conscription must come first, otherwise, they are not prepared to give the administration the power that might mean the difference between victory and defeat. Such a stand will not help the soldiers, the sailors and the airmen of this country when the testing time comes; and when that time comes, in its strongest point it will be support on the field of battle that is needed and not quotations from political speeches either in this house or outside.

I am opposed to the stand taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his last speech on this question when he said in effect that if conscription for overseas service is enacted it will not be put into effect until a vote of confidence has first been obtained from this house. The people have voted in favour of giving power to the administration. Members of parliament have voted in favour of giving the power to the administration, and nothing further is placed in the way of giving effect thereto. If the Prime Minister wants to return to the house for a vote of confidence at any time, that is his privilege: but I say to him that it should not be a condition precedent to his acting expeditiously in the matter of sending troops for overseas service if the circumstances warrant it.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): I want to say a few words in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy).

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, this measure is odious, anti-national and anti-Canadian. It is destructive, unjust, arbitrary and calamitous. This I intend to demonstrate in a moment. It is a challenge to public opinion clearly expressed on March 26, 1940, in favor of a free and voluntary policy. Parliament holds no other mandate than that it received from the Canadian people at the last general election. This mandate was never revoked. The plebiscite campaign was nothing but a fraud perpetrated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who squandered public funds for this purpose and conjured up an alleged majority which never existed. Never has an administration shown itself more wasteful and extravagant. Never in the history of Canada has there been a government more prodigal and less concerned with the public interest.

What is happening to our finances, our agriculture, our trade and our national resources? Our entire national heritage is being ruthlessly sacrificed by the present government, now more detested than the Borden administration ever was. Why is this? Because the Borden government, although just as colonial, just as imperialistic and conscriptionist, was more open, more loyal, more honest in its dealings than the King administration. Because the Borden government never reached the degree of duplicity, hypocrisy and cynicism attained by our present ineffable administration. Past masters in the art of trickery, they are proceeding step by step. They stated at first that we would not participate in the war. Then came participation. They declared that such participation would be free and voluntary. Then our youth and resources were mobilized. That mobilization was allegedly proceeded with for the defence of Canada and of Canada alone. And now, by changing our Mobilization Act into a conscription measure, they are preparing to send overseas our sons already mobilized under the law. In this supreme hour, I shall make a last stand against conscription, in order to save what may yet be saved in this orgy of expense and carnage and blood. I earnestly urge the hon. members of this house to think of Canada's future, to think first of all of organizing her defence.

I implore my hon. colleagues to bar the disastrous path down which the government is treading and to cry out with us: "You shall not pass!" On behalf of our Canadian youth, of the survival of our agriculture, our trade, our industry, our fisheries, our national resources and our living strength, I pray for the earnest support of my hon. colleagues to give the death blow to this conscription measure which threatens to demolish the defence of Canada and the very existence of the nation. Yes, let us give the death blow to conscription which the people have damned for over twenty-five years. We have no right to rush headlong into the abyss. We have no right to sacrifice our sacred heritage, in defence of which we would gladly give our lives, for the sole benefit of other countries who will become the graveyard of our national defence. It would be an infamous crime to sacrifice the physical, moral and spiritual wealth of our land to a military and financial imperialism which is planning our ruin and our downfall.

In closing these remarks, I launch a third and last appeal to my fellow members of the Liberal party. What ties could be powerful enough to bind them still to a government that has broken its solemn pledges and think of the situation of the French Canadians in such an event? It seems to me that that should be considered too.

The outlook, as it appears to me, is so full of dangers of all kinds, of uncertainties, and of threats of all sorts, that in the midst of so much confusion and such a great division we members of parliament should not take the terrible responsibility of adopting this legislation at the present time. The situation is developing every day, and I think the government would be justified in looking over the situation again and postponing the adoption of this measure. If the bill is passed at this time, now that we are threatened with a division which is not likely to heal, with this religious war going on, and the bogey that has been set up against the Catholic church, unless it is stopped right away, trouble may start at any time. I am afraid of that. I think the government should look over this matter once more before plunging along a course of which the end cannot be seen. The curtain between to-day and to-morrow is too thick.

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I did not speak on the second reading of this measure because I supported it, and because I subscribed to the sentiments expressed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) when he made his speech on the second reading, and I believed that all that was necessary was the casting of my vote when the motion was put to the house. I did not feel that it would add anything to the seemingly endless repetition which went on in this house for some weeks. But in view of the circumstances, and of the situation which has arisen as a result of some of the speeches that were made, and of the last speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I wish to make my position clear, and to do so as briefly as possible.

I supported this bill because I could do nothing less. The administration, whether rightly or wrongly, believed that its hands were tied, with respect to having a full-out war effort, in one particular, and that particular was in respect of the sending of men for service overseas. It decided by way of a plebiscite to obtain the opinion of the people on the question whether that restriction should be removed, and the people of Canada voted in favour of its removal. My constituency voted in favour of the removal of that restriction by 16,710 to 2,074, and in my opinion it voted in effect for the passage of the very legislation that is before the house to-day. I am bound to assume therefore that when they cast their vote they believed that I as their representative would take that stand in this house and would vote in favour of any legislation that might be brought forward to remove that restriction, for which purpose the plebiscite was taken.

I have no apologies to make for voting in favour of the bill. I am consistent in the stand I have taken, and I do say that neither I nor the members of His Majesty's loyal opposition have, in the words of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) this afternoon, in any manner, shape or form looped the loop. How anyone whose constituency voted in favour of the removal of this restriction can get up in this house and vote against it surpasses my understanding. Out of twenty-one constituencies in Saskatchewan, twenty voted in favour of removing the restriction, and I say at least to those twenty members that they are in duty bound to their constituents to support this measure in the house. I believe that those were the wishes of my constituents, and I propose to adhere to their wishes and to free the hands of the administration in this particular.

With respect to the conscription of wealth, my position was made clear some time ago.

I have repeatedly stated that we should do everything without reserve, and when I say without reserve I mean the complete and total mobilization of material things as well as of man-power. As I said before, one of the worst things that could happen to the morale of the Canadian people would be to leave, in the minds of those who are giving their husbands, sons, brothers and sweethearts to the service of the country, the idea that those who have material wealth are not prepared to put all in the balance in order that we may emerge victorious from this struggle. I adhere to that enunciation of principle as being a sound and proper one.

One can put almost any interpretation one chooses on the principle of the conscription of wealth. One can insist that no matter how far we go, it is still not conscription of wealth -many people in this country to-day believe that we have conscription of wealth-but I do say that this is no time to be indulging in risky experiments. This is no time to indulge in anything that might react unfavourably to our war effort, and this is no time to be adamant about getting one's own way with respect to one's own political philosophy. We have too much at stake for that state of mind to govern our actions in this house. I will say this, however. If it is shown that the extension of the principle of conscription of wealth in any one particular can save the life of any one man in the service of the country; if the extension of the principle of the conscription of wealth in any one particular would expedite the victorious conclusion of this struggle, on behalf of the policy which will unnecessarily upset that balance, and hinder one or other of the allimportant phases of our war effort.

As I have said, I think those statements are a true expression of the ideas shared by the first school of thought among the members of the cabinet. I wonder how the second group, which is not half as large as the first, can impose its views upon the larger group? No proof has been given of the necessity of sending more troops overseas, especially when one keeps in mind the threats we are facing just now, the needs of our war industries, the needs of agriculture. I cannot understand why that group should stick so firmly and so stubbornly to the idea of conscription for overseas, because it will change the whole situation in this country and waste the service which can be rendered by individuals under the present circumstances.

This second school of thought, which is quite radical, is followed by the ministers of national defence. It looks to me as though they are rather for European defence before they are for our national defence. That is quite paradoxical. They represent the military opinion, and their ideas are backed up by another school, which is far worse-what I would call the imperialistic school. I do not want to say anything which will destroy the confidence and respect we should have for our military authorities. Everyone recognizes their gallantry and the importance of the task they have undertaken in the defence of this country. But as military men they have ambitions, and their ambitions should be controlled so that Canada will not go to another Hong Kong or make more mistakes such as those which have been made in the past, not only by Canada but by other nations.

I wish to read a letter from a man for whose memory there is much respect. On March 12, 1885, Sir John A. Macdonald wrote to Sir Charles Tupper from Earnscliffe, Ottawa, as follows:

My dear Tupper,

I have your notes of the 18th and 27th on the subject of sending Canadian troops to the Soudan. I wrote you a hurried note the other day on this question, and have both before and since talked it over with my colleagues, and we think the time has not arrived, nor the occasion, for our volunteering military aid to the mother country.

We do not stand at all in the same position as Australasia. The Suez canal is nothing to us, and we do not ask England to quarrel with France or Germany for our sakes. The offer of those colonies is a good move on their part, and somewhat like Cavour's sending Sardinian troops to the Crimea. Why should we waste money and men in this wretched business? England is not at war, but merely helping the Khedive to put down an insurrection, and now that Gordon is gone, the motive of aiding in the [Mr. Roy.] rescue of our countrymen is gone with him. Our men and money would therefore be sacrificed to get Gladstone and Co. out of the hole they have plunged themselves into by their own imbecility.

Again, the reciprocal aid to be given by the colonies and England should be a matter of treaty, deliberately entered into and settled on a permanent basis. The spasmodic offers of our militia colonels, anxious for excitement or notoriety, have roused unreasonable expectations in England, and are so far unfortunate. I dare say that a battalion or two of venturous spirits might be enlisted, but 7d. a day will cool most men's warlike ardour.

Our artillery batteries are not enlisted for foreign service, and could not be ordered to the Soudan. The Fenians are beginning to show signs of life again in the United States and there are so many unemployed there that they may become dangerous again. They threaten to invade Canada if she sends troops against the Mahdi. Most of this is nonsense, but we can never calculate on what these people may do. If there should be a row with Russia, we shall have to send our men via the C.P.R. to Vancouver, but I fancy that threatened storm will blow over.

We are dragging on slowly this session. The government is too old.

Your sincerely,

John A. Macdonald

If Sir John A. Macdonald was right in what he said at that time, we are well-justified in saying the same to-day. The threat of war puts Canada to-day in a far greater danger than it was at that time. Canada needs all its man-power and all its resources to organize its own defence just now. The country is facing a division which may lead us—where? I do not know; just the thought of it affrights me.

I will quote another opinion which is more recent. It does not come from a traitor; it is not the letter of a traitor, as the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, quoting from an Edmonton newspaper, says he is accused of being, with the fifty-four who voted against the second reading of this bill. This sentence is from a speech of the late Lord Tweedsmuir in 1937:

Canada is a sovereign nation and cannot take her attitude to the world docilely from Britain, or from the United States, or from anybody else. A Canadian's first loyalty is not to the British commonwealth of nations, but to Canada and Canada's king, and those who deny this are doing, to my mind, a great disservice to the commonwealth.

There is another point, Mr. Speaker, which I do not think has yet been brought up by anyone. Has anyone thought of the falseness of the situation in which we would be placed if French Canadians were forced to go to fight overseas, if the Canadian army were called to invade France, and if France should resist such invasion? What do you the Canadian public fully realized how difficult the situation is, how necessary it is to do everything possible to defend our country, it would be suicidal instead of being helpful; it would impair our effort rather than help it.

On June 17 the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) is reported as follows, at page 3411 of Hansard:

In my opinion the imposition of conscription for service overseas at the present time would definitely be hurtful to the war effort. The people of Canada are much more concerned with the achievement of results than with the application of theories, and the action of the government will be governed accordingly.

He added at page 3412:

Furthermore, our war industry programme contemplates and involves heavy man-power requirements. So does the programme for essential agricultural production. I shall not deal in detail with either of these programmes, except to say that the man-power necessary for their performance cannot be withdrawn from the essential purposes of war without hurting those purposes.

It is the duty of the government to allocate man-power in accordance with the needs of the war purposes of Canada and the war objectives that I have mentioned.

This is a serious opinion, and I suggest it should not be disregarded.

On June 22, as reported at page 3507 of Hansard, the Prime Minister has this to say about threats upon Canada by the Japanese:

It is as critical a situation in the middle east as has arisen since the war commenced. There have been as well evidences in the past fortyeight hours that in this world-encircling conflict Canada is coming more and more into the zone of immediate danger.

The Prime Minister is reported on the same page as having said:

It only goes to bear out what has been said so often that no one can take too seriously both the immediacy and the extent of the danger with which all parts of the world are confronted, and at this time our own part in particular.

That is another opinion which should not be ignored. On June 25 the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is reported on page 3682 of Hansard as having said:

I believe that steps will have to be taken in the very near future to see that the heavy industries of this country are provided with sufficient men so that we can produce the necessary supplies according to plan. I sometimes wonder whether we have not tried to do too much for a nation the size of ours.

In recent weeks I have received many visits from industrialists who are anxious about the shortage of labour and its effect on war production.

I draw the attention of the house to this statement because I think it is one that should be considered most seriously throughout Canada. I should like to quote another minister. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had this to say on Monday, June 15, as repoorted on page 3324 of Hansard:

Under any such provision, if the Japanese were able to force their way to the Alaskan boundary we would have to stop at the Alaskan boundary if our men raised under the act were able to drive them back to that point, and we would not be able to cross the boundary. It will be recognized therefore that some change has to be made in that particular at the present time. As the Prime Minister stated in this house

As the Prime Minister stated in this house it does not necessarily mean that we shall be sending troops overseas immediately. I believe he even went so far as to suggest that it may never become necessary to do so. We shall have powers under the legislation as it will be enlarged to do certain things that must be done immediately, and, on the other 'hand, to give consideration as time passes to the question whether other things should be done. In this regard it was emphasized to the house the other day that it would be inadvisable for this house to have to take action on two different occasions in order to get authority to do these two things, one of which ought to be done immediately, and the other of which may never be required to be done.

I quote the language of the Minister of Agriculture in order to recall to the house that that is the opinion of the first school of thought I have spoken about. They do not believe in conscription for overseas; they admit it might be of no use. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) had this to say on Friday, June 19, as reported on page 3492 of Hansard:

What some people seem to forget is that warfare to-day does not consist of hurling huge masses of men against each other, with the balance in favour of the greatest number. Today war is mechanized, highly technical, and demanding individual initiative in the use of the weapons that are provided. The best weapons in the world will be useless unless the men using them are prepared to use them bravely and intelligently. Under these circumstances it would seem to be obvious that so long as a volunteer force can be maintained in the field it will be a more effective fighting force than one partly or wholly composed of conscripts.

I come now to the opinion expressed by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), and I think this also should be considered seriously throughout Canada. He said on Tuesday, June 16, as reported on page 3373 of Hansard:

But, as I have already pointed out our manpower pool is not unlimited. We have encountered many shortages as the gap between supply and demand has become narrower. With the additional demands, which are continuous, the gap is constantly narrowing further. It follows therefore that if we are to continue our vast programme of war production and at the same time meet the requirements of the armed services, it is essential that we maintain a sane balance, and that we do not adopt, on emotional rather than on logical grounds, any

I need not remind you of what has been said throughout the country, or what has appeared in many newspapers and magazines, but I hold in my hand the July issue of Protestant Action. I need not quote from it, because if I did so I think it would be harmful to our national unity and our war effort, but I should like to send it to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and ask him to be good enough to look at it, because it will give him some idea of what is going on in the religious field.

The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group (Mr. Coldwell) has well pointed out the weakness of that religious discussion throughout the country. I should like to congratulate the hon, member on the admirable speech he made in the house this morning and on his truly Canadian spirit. I think he spoke as a real democrat, a real Christian and a real Canadian. I should like also to refer to the speech concluded just a few moments ago by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), which was made in such a sober manner that I think it should be underlined. If all hon. members and others speaking on the question of conscription, or any other matters we have to discuss in this country; if all those who are writing about different matters and public questions, were using calm and sober language, I believe that we could proceed with the discussion of any of our problems, and that our national unity would not suffer at all from such discussions. Unhappily it has not always been that way.

I believe I should say a few more words about the religious fight that is going on just now, because I am wondering where it is going to lead. Another question is to be discussed in a few days, namely, the lifting of the ban against the Communist party, and the establishment of consulates in Canada. Under present circumstances it is most unfortunate that these questions should be brought up. To come down from helping Russia in its struggle against our common enemy, an enemy which is also threatening us, to permitting infiltration into this country of Russia's philosophies and doctrines, is a long step, and we should be very careful in taking it.

The division as to policy in Canada which has existed for a long time has grown worse and worse because of the religious and racial fight which has been carried on for some time in the press and throughout the country. There are many indications that that division exists right in the House of Commons, right in the midst of the cabinet, and on the very question of conscription for overseas service. There seem to be two different schools of thought in the ministry, one of which would [Mr. Roy.] appear to be more Canadian, and would seem to share the opinion that Canada needs all its man-power to take care of her war production and her national defence, which, if I may say so without giving information to the enemy, is very weak or non-existent at the present time.

I should like to quote a few opinions from ministers who hold the first view to which I refer. I quote this from the observations of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) as they are reported at page 3658 of Hansard:

I do not think it is. Japan realizes that the final reckoning, no matter what temporary conquests he may make in Asia, will be with the nations of the North American continent and the British empire. It is quite probable that she may try to invade this continent by way of the Aleutian islands and Alaska before we have mobilized our utmost strength. If the Japanese meet with success in the Aleutian islands, and if for the time being the balance of sea-power in the Pacific should shift in their favour, I believe it quite possible that they may make an actual landing in force on the upper western coast, fortify their positions and try to hold that part of this continent until such time as they can bring up additional troops, munitions and supplies of all kinds, in the meantime fortifying their harbours and constructing airports to use in their drive southward along the Pacific coast, west of the Rocky mountains, and protected by them.

Those attacks must be stopped before they reach Canadian territory.

That is the opinion of one of the ministers. On the same page he adds this:

May I make it quite clear that I am not advocating the sending all of our troops overseas; that we would leave our coast lines undefended, or that we should not build up our coastal defences in every possible manner. But the fact remains that we in Canada are going to be in a desperate position if the time ever comes when we must defend this country with the forces that can be raised from eleven and a half millions of people, without help from other members of the United Nations.

On July 6 the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), as reported at page 3945 of Hansard, quoted the following from Toronto Saturday Night:

From its inception the war has been hammered home to Canadians as an empire war. We are far less Canadian than we were in 1939. The words "British" and "empire" occur in almost every sentence of the war news and the newscasts. Practically nobody has stressed the fact that this is a Canadian war, which Canadians are fighting in order to save the Canadian way of life for the people of Canada.

At a later point in his speech the minister said:

We have raised an army which is a credit to our country without having recourse to compulsion, and it is my hope and wish that we shall never have to resort to compulsory measures to fill the ranks of our army. Were such a method instituted at the present time, before world; and when we consider what Canada is doing and what has been done for us over there, to keep the enemy from our shores, we should thank the Almighty that we have had such a country to protect us and permit us to go about our business in the way we have done so far. Let me tell you what the mother country is doing for Canada and the world at the present time. Mr. Lyttelton, the minister of production, in some places met a rather hostile lot of criticism in the press when he came on a recent visit to Washington, where he went on business with Mr. Roosevelt. But he made a radio speech and told the people the truth, and here is what he said about the mother country and what Britain is doing now to save the world and keep the empire together:

We are producing tanks, "jeeps" and other mechanical vehicles at the rate of 257,000 a year. This is an increase of 350 per cent over the rate in the last quarter of 1940.

We are producing 40,000 big guns a year and supplying them with 25,000,000 rounds of ammunition. We are producing millions of small arms each year and supplying them with 2,000,000,000 rounds of ammunition.

We have increased our production of aircraft 100 per cent above the rate achieved during the last quarter of 1940.

We have increased our production of merchant ships by 57 per cent over the last quarter of 1940, even though we thought then that we had reached the limit of our capacity.

He went on to tell listeners that of a population of 33,000,000 between the ages of 14 and 55, some 22,000,000 were either in the armed forces, in industry or in civil defence. Over 50 per cent of the ships which used to bring in food are now directed to supplying allied armies, and every available acre of land has been turned into farm land. Rations are alike for all. In short, he said:

When John Bull wakes up in the morning he finds that the minister of labour has called him up for work in factories, if he isn't fit for military duty. The food minister has taken all variety and spice and most of the volume of his breakfast, lunch and dinner, and the President of the Board of Trade has given him so much and no more clothing. His wife is working in a factory, and the treasury takes his money. War savings absorb his surplus income, which cannot be spent because there is nothing to buy.

We are pouring approximately 60 per cent of our national income into war. There is no "business as usual" in Britain. There is no production as usual in Britain. There is no profit as usual in Britain. We have thrown everything we have into this war, and we will never quit.

That ought to be an example to the people of this country. Why do our nine provinces not pay her tribute?

Mobilization Act-Mr. Roy

I believe this mobilization act will be a flat failure, because it does not commend itself to the wisdom or judgment of the country or of the "yes" voters. During the course of his remarks to-day, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) said that a few years ago most Canadians took the stand now taken by Quebec. I say that has not been the policy of the Conservative party. Since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald this party has been for the mother country first, last and all the time, in peace and war alike, because when Britain is at war Canada is at war also. That is our policy. This Conservative party has never failed in its duty to the empire and the motherland. We shall never fail as long as we are a party of Canadian citizens owing so much to the mother country. In that one connection alone the hon. member for Trinity is incorrect.

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my comments on the situation which has been brought about in this country by this legislation, and its significance to the welfare of Canadians and the prosecution of the war, I should like to inform you of the amendment I intend to propose. I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe):

That the word "now" be left out and the words "this day six months" added at the end of the question.

I have several reasons for moving this amendment. I am wondering with great anxiety whether Canada is going to be wrapped up in this whirling world where there is nothing but downfall, destruction, confusion and darkness, or if we are going to escape this dreadful fate. I should like to make a short analysis of the situation with which we are confronted just now.

Canada seems to be very badly divided, and I am wondering what is going to happen if the situation remains as it is or grows worse. The first cause of the division now existing in Canada is fundamental, finding its basis in the ideals held by two definite groups in Canada. One ideal is "Canada first"; the other seems to be best summed up, from what I have heard in this house during the course of this debate, in the words, "I am for the British empire." I believe these two formulas give a perfect picture of the two definite ideals which are held in this country. If the discussion had been kept within the limits of these two ideals, the situation would not be half as bad as it is to-day, but it has gone far beyond these limitations. The issue has become a racial fight; in the last little while it has become an open religious fight.

both before and since, as to duties—considering all these omissions one can only marvel that the popular response has been what it is, and that the confusion was not many times worse.

Many people forget that. As I said before, it is of the greatest importance that there should be no censorship. The people should be told the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth of this war, and of the grave peril now facing us. They should be told the facts, and we should build up on the worst of the facts. We have no divine right to win this war. Some think it is going to be an easy task. It is not; it is the most difficult the world ever saw, and the result is yet in the balance.

People forget that great empires do not usually crumble in a stand-up fight. If this empire goes down it will be the end of religion, civilization, and freedom, not only for Canada but for the rest of the world. That was something that our forefathers did not forget, because they read the scriptures. After all, history repeats itself. They knew the bible; they read the classics, and they learned from them how empires come and go. This British empire has gone on for many years. The Roman empire was the greatest the world had ever seen, and ours has been almost a pattern of it. We resemble it in peace and war alike. In that connection that great textbook writer, H. A. L. Fisher, said what is as true to-day in relation to Canada as it was to the fall of Rome:

That great structure was not brought down to the ground by frontal attack, but by a process of infiltration extending over a hundred years.

Infiltration of men and loose thinking at a time when the Romans themselves had given up the will to power. Bryce, in his great work, "The Holy Roman Empire," had described the same decay:

And thus when the final movement came, and the German tribes slowly established themselves through the provinces, they entered not as savage strangers, but as settlers knowing something of the system into which they came.

Bryce also described for us how the latterday Romans paid lip service to the conception of empire, even when the power had dissolved; how the great dominions acknowledged the name of Rome even though Rome had neglected them and even though they had become independent or under the influence of other great powers. In the years before the war we had forgotten the great historian Gibbon, in his chronicle of Rome's ills brought about by disarmament, reliance on the good will of others, weakening of purpose at home, and demoralization of the people by the dole of bread and circuses. [Mr. Church-] That chronicle makes sombre reading at a time like this. Here you have the finest people in the world giving up its armament, reducing its navy, and all that kind of thing. As a result of that disease we have to face a world where you do not know where you are going. We may as well be frank with ourselves regarding the British empire. Remember that we have already made alliances with two other great imperial empires, Russia and the United States. If we fail as an empire-and we are not getting very much support at the present time-do not forget that Britain then and her dominions and also the people of Quebec and the other eight provinces will have nothing to say in connection with the peace terms. Russia and the United States, which like Britain may not be imperialistic in the sense that they want to grab territory, but they are imperial in the true sense of the word, namely, that they want to become world powers, to have a just say in the peace terms and to be a big power in the new world to come. Unless we are attached to this great empire, are we going to have anything to say about the peace terms?

If this empire falls-and we are not a great distance from it at the present time-it will be a very sad day for religion and freedom of speech and thought in every province of the dominion. A great Scot and a great soldier said something about the detractors of the mother country. For the first two years of the war she bore the brunt of the fight alone for civilization and the world. If it had not been for Britain, after Dunkirk we should have the axis forces in this country: not only Canada but the United States would have had to seek peace long ago. Let us remember the lesson of history as pointed out to us by Professor Macneile Dixon, a great Scot like yourself, Mr. Speaker. He said:

Civilizations arise, and continue to exist and all history is witness to the truth—when conditions are hard, only when they are continually threatened, only when they are determined to maintain and defend their rule. They decline and fall when the external pressure is removed, or the inner spirit decays. . . If an individual or a people ceases to believe in itself, its aims and ideals, others with firm aims and beliefs will climb into the saddle. The decline and fall of England, which will rejoice our enemies, will not be England's decline and fall only, but of all for which she stood, and not till then shall we know the extent of our miseries. I, at least, am not of the opinion that humanity, justice, freedom, no, nor Christianity, will be the gainers in that fall.

Those words are true to-day.

In conclusion I want to point out just one or two things. Britain has been attacked and slandered as never before, all over the civilized is an attack on the government. There has been more or less criticism of this bill throughout the country. In Ontario the mobilization act is not equitably enforced. A gentleman named Elliott Little, a controller, acting over the head of parliament, said at a Rotary club luncheon in Ottawa, that he will call up 250,000 men in order to get 25,000 required by the department. What has he to do with the mobilizing of men? Is he a parliament in himself? A black-out is wanted on some of these controls. I submit that there should be a black-out on all these speeches which we are hearing daily all over Canada because they are doing real harm; they are injuring recruiting. They are preventing the Minister of National Defence from doing his duty. There is no equality of treatment. How long will it be before the facts come home to the people? We do not know how close we are to dictatorship here.

So far we have lost the war; we have not gained any victories. The situation is desperate. We have had a string of reverses-Norway, Dunkirk, Greece, Crete, Libya, France, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Luxemburg, North Africa, Hong Kong, Singapore, the Malay peninsula, Burma, the Dutch East Indies and Pearl Harbour. If that is not enough to make this country war-minded, I am afraid we shall have to wait until the enemy comes up the St. Lawrence river and begins to destroy us. We have no royal or divine right to victory. Ever since this war began Canada has been living in an atmosphere of romance which the government itself has created, because this government has been slow to do anything at all until it has been forced into action by public opinion. We are not war-minded yet, or aware of how close we are to defeat. We are told that plans are now being made in connection with Bill 80: but can anyone tell us, before we are called back to parliament, what the objectives are, and how many men will be obtained? No one can tell us that, because, in my opinion, the government does not govern. It has never governed from the very start of the war. Hon. gentlemen opposite are merely conducting a Liberal war and they will never succeed as long as they do that. They have no policy. no objectives, no strategy. This bill shows that there has been no policy in regard to the raising of men.

As I say, the government waits until it is driven by public opinion to move one step, and this mobilization act is merely a tactical manœuvre that does nothing but embarrass the war effort. There is no such thing as home defence. The countries I have named were looking for home defence, and what happened? They were invaded. What then? The loud-speaker, the gestapo, the whip, the trampling of feet, the concentration camp. If the enemy came up the St. Lawrence they would carry away hundreds of thousands of farmers and citizens of the province of Quebec into Germany as serfs and slaves. If this country is invaded, the people will face a slavery worse than death; yet we sit here day after day doing nothing about it, and seven months is wasted with no results. History will condemn us as facing the worst war of all history, with such a brutal, savage foe, and doing nothing about it.

It is clear from the speeches of the Prime Minister to which I have referred that the bill has been changed so that even the authors do not know it with the new features in speeches read into it. We have spent three months on it and got no result. Why has the army failed?-and in my opinion the army is the most important arm. I do not blame the present minister; he took charge of this department only comparatively recently. In the British House of Commons, soldiers and the finest airmen in the world, members of parliament, admirals of the navy, rise up and discuss in public what is to be done in the war. Everyone in warfare Pitt made mistakes; makes mistakes. Napoleon made mistakes. Is there any government that has not made mistakes in this war? They are making plenty in Washington. But in these countries you can criticize the government; you can disagree with the minister without indulging in any personalities, because he is only an individual. He did not cause the war any more than the leader of the opposition did. In our present leader of the opposition we have a gentleman who in the country at large will in my opinion occupy a very high place, because he has done his duty as he sees it, fearlessly, and is a believer in Britain and her empire.

We are the worst informed people in the world regarding this war, because the people have not been told the facts. That happened away back in 1915 also. I looked up a number of addresses made by a very great soldier, F. S. Oliver, who in 1915 wrote about the duty of any government to let the people know the truth and the facts before it was too late because it would be an aid to recruiting. Here is what he said:

Considering how little, before the war began, our people had been taken into the confidence of successive governments as to the relations of the British empire with the outside world; how little education of opinion there had been as to risks and dangers and means of defence; how little leading and clear guidance

Mobilization Act-Mr. Church

The rules and regulations that will be passed under Bill 80 will be far worse than the bill itself, if we are to judge by such rules and regulations as we have had in the past. Here the government proposes a lottery system, although the criminal code definitely declares that there shall be no lotteries in the country. They are illegal by the code, but the government is going to institute a haphazard method of calling up men. They are going to leave it to chance, like a poker game or horse racing. They are going to allow someone to draw from a hat the men who are to be called up, those who are to render service and to make the sacrifice, while right next door there may be someone else who is not called up and who may not serve at all in a lottery plan-such a farce!

I can tell the government that the people —the "yeś" voters—are very much disappointed throughout the country. I voted "yes" on the plebiscite, but if I had known as much as I know now about this bill I would have voted "no", because I voted on principle. The people are greatly dissatisfied with the way in which the act has been enforced all along and they are dissatisfied with what is proposed in this bill and the if, as and when, and lack of finality. The bill before us was based on the plebiscite. In my opinion that plebiscite should never have been taken. It was simply an afterthought, something forced upon the country. We know what statements were made as far back as 1939.

On March 30, 1939, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) set out, in a debate in which I took part, what he declared was the position of the government in this matter. At that time I was called a Jeremiah because I predicted what would really happen and what in fact has happened. Well, I would much rather be called a Jeremiah than be called Ethelred the Unready. At that time the Prime Minister said that never again would Canada send an expeditionary force across the seas. He said that it was unthinkable that we should be sending a force overseas every twenty years if war broke out in Europe and that the danger to Canada was minor in degree and secondary in origin. In 1940, in the course of a debate in which I participated, the right hon. gentleman said that no conscription for overseas service was the policy of the government. On November 12, 1941, the cry was, "No conscription without consulting the people." On February 23, 1942, it was "No conscription for overseas until voluntary recruiting has failed." Well, voluntary recruiting did fail; it was at its lowest ebb at that time. The Prime Minister said that parliament would decide. Then on June 10 we were given [Mr. Church.]

to understand that conscription might not be necessary—after the plebiscite vote had been taken. Then we have the situation as stated to us on July 7, that it is not conscription but conscription if necessary; and "if, as and when" is read into the statute, although it is not in the statute. Now it is said that there may not be any conscription at all, that parliament will be called again before anything is done.

We have been here since last November and the government has made no real effort to raise men. You cannot fight a war in that way. I said in 1937, 1938 and 1939 that the government was simply waiting until the enemy decided to attack us. I asked then, "Are we to wait until war begins and until the enemy sails up the St. Lawrence, or comes on land, sea and in the air, and seizes the citadel and proceeds to destroy us?" I can say to the people of Quebec, and I have been friendly to them for many years, that they have been the victims of politicians ever since the South African war, and indeed before that time. They have not been given the facts, I see many able members on the government benches and I think they will agree with me that it would have been far better if they had disclosed all the facts to the people and simply told the truth. Truth seems to be the first casualty in this war, and self-respect is the first victim of neutrality. I am very much disappointed with Bill No. 80, and I doubt that much will be done by this government to get men under it. We have heard it said in this house in the past few days that we are not to criticize the government. We must not have any inquests, postmortems, or recriminations, and even constructive criticism is not wanted, because it is regarded as an attack on the government. But that is not so. Suppose the people in the old country took the same view of the constructive criticisms that have been given by nearly 137 members of the British House of Commons from the first of July on. Why, there would be no improvement whatever in the war effort. But it is not so, and constructive criticism is not intended to be an attack on the government. If we are to accept that principle, then this house, and the opposition especially, will cease to perform its parliamentary functions and parliamentary government will be at an end.

I do not want to see parliament lose the technique of an effective opposition, or of constructive criticism, but something is certainly wrong with the way in which the government is carrying on the war effort. There is something wrong when experienced ministers and members express alarm at the state of affairs and are told that criticism of this kind the hands of our government as rapidly as possible, but I wish it to be understood that I am not taking the power away from parliament and putting it in the hands of the executive with any idea of delay. This action is being taken by those who agree with me, not for inaction but for action. I hope to see the government of Canada adopt a complete, genuine measure of compulsory selective service at a very early day, as soon as is reasonably possible.

Mr. McGARRY: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether conscription of wealth is included in the United States draft law?

Mr. ROEBUCK: The hon. member asks me whether conscription of wealth has been included in the law of the United States in association with the draft system, and the answer is no.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish for a few moments only this afternoon to discuss certain features of Bill 80 as they apply to the conduct of the war and the objectives of the government during this, the most fateful year in the history of civilization.

Every day, every minute, every hour brings us in Canada closer to the war, not only on our back and side doors but on the Pacific and the Atlantic, and especially in the good province of Quebec, which is in a most dangerous position. Our session here has lasted nearly seven months, including last November, and the main part of the time has been taken up with only secondary matters, because the war is primary, nothing else matters unless we win. We of the house are supposed to be together for war. Everybody should forget the party system. We are not here to advance, during the war, any of those doctrines in domestic matters which might at another time be important.

Now what have we regarding this so-called mobilization act? The government is back to where it started. It has no system; it never had any system since the war started so far as the army is concerned. I do not like to hear some hon. gentlemen blaming those who are in control, because that is not the way they proceed in England. In England they can criticize policies without indulging in attacks upon individuals. I received this morning from a friend in the House of Commons, London, a copy of the British Hansard for the three days' public debate on the war, which contains as much in a day as all our Hansard in a week. You find there, rising in their places on the government benches, men who are home for a week's leave, members who have been on the ocean, commanders, admirals, major-generals, all men serving in the war. What do they do? They tell the government in what respects they think the government is wrong, and ask it for a total war effort, and attack in public the conduct of the war without offence to anyone, or any objection.

This bill, before it can function, must overcome an antiquated circuitous mobilization system which we should never have had. We made our mistakes right at the beginning of the war, by starting to mobilize men in a circuitous fashion. In this bill there is no such thing as equality of service or equality of sacrifice. The people back home in the constituencies are very much disappointed with the stand which the government has taken on this question. It is all topsy-turvy, with changes every week-end; it is a case of here to-day and away to-morrow. We started off in connection with this bill by proposing a certain policy. If from the start the voluntary system had had a chance, with some of the money which is now being spent, $4,000,000 a day, and is expected to rise to $10,000,000 a day-I say that if one iota of this money had been spent properly the government would have had all the men it wanted. But they allowed volunteer recruiting to dry up as the first and second year's men were not wanted with the result that the people have got tired of the system.

The province from which I come is important to the dominion from a recruitment point of view. The old province of Ontario seems to have been singled out unfavourably by those who have administered this act, although I do not say it was done designedly, and our youth have been sent right across Canada from Vancouver to Halifax, when they could have taken all their training and received all their education at home. Take the case of my own constituency, which, by the way, has done better, proportionate to its population of 60,000, than any other riding I know of. When one goes up the street one finds that all its young people have gone to war under the voluntary system. Elsewhere we find others who can go before the boards which are operating all over the country and get off, and some get a commission in a day. I would never put a judge on one of these exemption boards; that is where a mistake was made to begin with. They should leave the judges to perform their proper functions. Some men are getting exemptions while others cannot get it so that the whole system is unfair, unjust and inequitable. There is no such thing as equality of service or of sacrifice. If there were no one would complain.

of selective service is better than the voluntary system. It is a fairer and more effective system, and I have come to think that perhaps in the end it is kinder than the voluntary system with which we have had so much experience.

There are special circumstances which have intervened to delay the recognition of these facts in some portions of the province of Quebec. I pause to say that this is not to be interpreted as meaning that the province of Quebec or any portion of it is inferior to the rest of Canada in its love for Canada, in its hatred of conquest and oppression and in its determination and courage to fight for the defence of Canada whenever Canada is attacked. I pay that tribute to the province of Quebec.

But this is a democratic country. We in this chamber may differ on many subjects, but I hope we do not differ on the fundamental principle of the sovereignty of the majority in a democracy. When the people speak and their speech is carried into effect in accordance with our constitutional methods-for instance. a bill passed in this house-then the rights of the minority merge with the rights of the majority. It is true that the rights of the minority should be respected-but once a measure has passed into law in this country, the minority submits. We all obey the law. I suggest that this will be the attitude of the province of Quebec, of all sections of that province, on this as it has been on all other occasions. If the government, so soon as this power is placed in its hands, will proceed courageously to do the things which will benefit the war effort, the people of the province of Quebec will show what good Canadians they are. Many of us may be surprised at the way in which they will join with the rest of Canada. at how they will show themselves to be Canadians, ready to observe the law as it is, although they have opposed and criticized and denounced it in advance.

There has been comparatively little said during this debate from the English standpoint as compared with the oratory of the French Canadians. But I honour you gentlemen for that. You have been doing your duty in opposing this measure; you have done it vigorously; you have done it eloquently and you have done it well; but once the measure has been passed by this parliament of Canada then remember you are Canadians. The principle changes, and I take it that you will observe the law as it stands.

My submission is that if the government will take the nettle firmly in the hand there will be little trouble. It should take the action that is demanded by the circumstances. If it will adopt a system which meets with the approval of the vast majority of the people, it will do a great service to the people of this country.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. ROEBUCK: There is very little that I wish to add to what I have already said on this question, because it is not my intention to attempt to review the arguments pro and con with regard to conscription—they are age-old arguments now. But there is one point in connection with one of the newer aspects of the problem to which I would like to call attention.

Canada's relations with our great neighbour to the south are of vast importance, not only to Canada herself but to the world. Now the United States is democratically regimenting its people for war and it has adopted a complete system of compulsory selective service. It is most important, I submit, that Canada should line up with these people in appearance as well as in fact, and I submit that this can never be quite so while they have a compulsory draft system and we have not. It is true that the size of our army is greater than theirs on a percentage basis, and it is equally true that our production of armaments and of supplies to Great Britain and our other allies bears at least favourable comparison with that of any other nation on the allied side. We have been engaged in this war for very nearly three years, and the United States has been formally engaged for a period of only about seven months. There are arguments aplenty to justify our position, but, Mr. Speaker, arguments fall on deaf ears when there is some division of the common effort in which we appear to hold back. If we are to march in unison with our great neighbours to the south it is essential that we should adopt the same measure of step. These good reasons-our relations with our neighbours to the south, our position in the allied camp, the credit which we may receive from other nations, our allies and othersjustify the people of Canada and the government of Canada adopting without further delay a complete system somewhat similar to that in effect in these other countriesa complete, compulsory, systematic selective service as a method of recruitment.

I am going to vote on the third reading of this bill as I did on the second reading. I approve the bill. I hope to see power go into probably bring about unity rather than disunity. Therefore I urge upon the government, as soon as this bill has been passed, that it adopt, by such methods as are in its hands, a complete and full system of compulsory selective service. I think that it is approved by the people generally in Canada not all of Canada, it is true, but by the great majority in Canada. I should like to see the government abolish the limitations upon the service to be obtained from those at present us have one army, one cause, and let us proceed to one victory.

Recently in the house the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Durocher) quoted a statement I had made some time previously in which I had said that I conceived it the duty of a member of parliament to represent in the house the wishes of his constituency. And therefore, and for other reasons, I advocated at that time what I am expressing more fully now. The hon. member said I had inadvertently expressed a principle as useful to those who came from constituencies which voted "no" in the plebiscite as to those from constituencies which voted "yes". There was nothing at all inadvertent about my statement. The principle I then tried to make clear applies with equal force to you, my fellow members, who came from constituencies which voted "no" as to me, from a constituency which voted so overwhelmingly "yes". I conceive it to be the duty of a member of parliament to be the duty of a member of parliament to obey the will of his electors. If we do that, we then hold parliament up as a mirror to the country. The will of the majority just naturally prevails. We shall all have done our duty, and, in this instance at least, progress will result.

Burke has been quoted as the authority that a member should do as he pleases, irrespective of the wishes of his constituency. Some hon. member says "hear, hear," but I for one am not prepared to follow Edmund Burke as an authority on democracy. Edmund Burke entered the British House of Commons in 1765 by grace of Lord Rockingham, who was at that time head of the whig landlord party in England. He entered parliament for the pocket constituency of Wendover, controlledabsolutely controlled-by Lord Verney. That is, he represented a rotten borough. While in the house-and I say this to his honour-he championed the rights of the American colonies, and in so doing won the approval of the commercial interests of the city of Bristol. At the following general election the people of that city did Edmund Burke the honour of electing him to the house from a real constituency. It was after his election, not 44561-2903 before, that Burke laid down the principle which has been quoted so frequently in succeeding years, the principle that the member is not a representative or a delegate from his constituency, but is there by some right to exercise his own good judgment. Then Burke proceeded to put his ideas into effect in practice as well as in precept.

Perhaps hon. members may be interested in knowing what happened to Burke. Well, he escaped defeat in the city of Bristol at the next general election by withdrawing from the contest. He proceeded to secure representation in another rotten borough. I am not likely to follow Burke as an authority on democracy. I look upon myself as a servant of my constituency; I am not its master.

While I am on this point let me say a word to my fellow-members who are French Canadians. I think I understand the attitude of the province of Quebec in connection with the question now before the house. I sympathize with hon. members in their difficulties, but they are not the only ones with difficulties. I think I can understand the attitude of a large section of the province of Quebec. In my judgment, that attitude is not vastly different from what was the attitude of all Canada only a few short years ago, say before the sending of a contingent to South Africa. There was a time when practically all, not all, but practically all Canadians were opposed to Canada becoming involved in non-Canadian wars. We disapproved in those days, and perhaps some of us do to-day, of the petty nationalism of Europe. We held in contempt the conscript armies of Europe. We admired the free armies of Great Britain.

At that time Canada was engaged in carrying on her own business. We were clearing the farms, we were building highways and railroads, we were building great cities, we were constructing a Canada. That was our destiny at that time. As a boy I remember the indignation with which a farmer neighbour of ours referred to the movement which he said was intended to "make soldiers of our boys." Much has happened since those days. There has been a development of public opinion in this country. We have all changed: We Canadians have been driven from that position by the irresistible logic of world events.

I think I have been a consistent Liberal; at all events I have been an enthusiastic and determined Liberal. But even I, in company with many another, the British of Great Britain and the Americans of the United States, have come to the conclusion that a well devised and reasonably enforced system

Mobilization Act—Mr. Roebuck

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I would hesitate to enter again upon a discussion of the problem that is before us on the third reading of this bill if I thought it would lead to a general debate and a repetition of the arguments we have heard already, pro and con. But I call Your Honour's attention to the fact that I did not complete my address on the second reading of the bill, not because of any discourtesy but perhaps, shall I say, a want of courtesy or lack of courtesy extended to me on that occasion. Therefore I feel there are things I wish to say, which it is my duty to say, and which I beg the indulgence of the house to permit me to say now.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has just said that the world situation demands action on our part. With that statement I agree. Then he added that in this bill we should not hand over to the government power to take the steps proposed, but rather that these matters should be brought to the floor of the house in detail so that every phase may be examined and passed upon by this house, and that, in addition, there should be joined to the conscription measure a further measure providing for the conscription of wealth. He seemed to object to the passing of conscription until he is satisfied upon all points of the financial programme of the present government. Well, it does seem to me that a procedure such as that suggested by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would hardly be in keeping with his statement that world affairs demand action; because were we to follow out that programme I do not know when we would be through with this measure.

I sympathize with the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in his protest against extravagant attacks made as a result of the actions of himself and others in this house. The use of violence in language will not get us far in Canada; and the imputing of false motives to members of this house leads to confusion rather than to clear thinking. I join in his protest against the calling of names against those with whom we disagree. But perhaps I may comfort the leader of that party with just a word from Mother Goose. The old lady said that "sticks and stones will break your bones, but names will never hurt you." We can therefore pass statements of that kind, and perhaps the least said the better.

The very purpose of this bill is to give into the hands of the government the power to bring in a conscriptive measure in this country. The principle has been laid down by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King): "not necessarily conscription, but conscription when necessary". With that principle I agree. I have always agreed to it. That is the stand I took in 1917, in the general election of that time, when I was a candidate supporting Sir Wilfrid Laurier. But the statement of principle still leaves open for consideration and decision the further question as to those conditions which will make necessary the passing of conscription. And I do not agree with the test that has been laid down. It is intimated that the one and only test of the necessity for the introduction of a selective service compulsory system is that the voluntary system has failed to produce either an arbitrary quota or sufficient men to provide reinforcements upon some formula that may be devised.

That is not the only test, and I submit to my fellow members in the house and to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is not the best test. Were we to wait until voluntary enlistment has failed we should be waiting on failure; we should be adopting a policy of defeat, a most inadvisable thing to do. Were we to wait until we could no longer secure men by voluntary enlistment for our forces, and then introduce a measure of conscription, we should make it assured that we would have from that time forward a full complement of unwilling men. And by doing so we should probably lay the foundation of failure, and we should certainly encourage the failure of the system which we might then adopt.

I submit it would be a terrible blow to Canadian morale and to the prestige of Canada were we publicly to admit that our young men will no longer voluntarily join our armed forces, and that it has been necessary for us to adopt some form of compulsion in order to induce our young men of soldier age and qualifications to maintain our army abroad. That would be a jar to the credit, morale and reputation of Canada.

In my opinion there is more in a compulsory selective draft system than the compulsion. There is the machinery provided for the selection of men who should go, and, almost as important as that, there is machinery for the selection of the men who should not go. I fancy that one is almost as important as the other. At the present time there are young men who are struggling with their consciences, wondering whether it is their duty to enlist, arguing about it and so on, young men who are perhaps being insulted by their neighbours for not enlisting, who, in the very nature of things, should not enlist. A general, complete system of selection would relieve those who should not go, as well as give a definite invitation to those who should go, and I think in that way would prejudices—that I would rather go down to defeat than achieve victory in this province or elsewhere on the basis of race and religious prejudice. I say that again now.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask a question? Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Will not the hon. gentleman admit that on one occasion I did go down to defeat in opposition to that kind of campaign?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, I will give the Minister of Agriculture credit for that.

Mr. McNIVEN: And the Liberal party.

Mr. COLDWELL: But I just want to point out that apparently among his followers in western Canada and the newspapers which support or have supported him, there is a fundamental change. And I will tell you why; because the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is a growing power in the west. They have tried during recent years to throw Russia at us. We have never had any association with the Communist party. Those who know me know that the Communist party had no use for me, because I have never tolerated their philosophy or their methods, and I do not intend to do so. To-day the Russian people are putting up a magnificent resistance. Russia is no longer a bogey, so that these people, some of whom have maintained power by various methods, by playing one end of the country against the other, now must find a new bogey. That new bogey, in the English-speaking part of Canada, is Quebec Catholic isolationism. That is what they are doing, and I say that so far as we are concerned we will have no part in it. I venture to suggest that those who are writing these stories know differently, that those who are writing these stories know perfectly well that I have sought no support from any member of this house representing the province of Quebec or any other province, and that members of this house have not sought my support, whether they come from the province of Quebec or any other province, on any understanding whatsoever. I venture to say that those who are writing these stories know this statement to be true. I try and have tried to be honourable in this house and elsewhere in my dealings with the public. My sincerity has been questioned. Well, I will let my record throughout the long years stand as a test of sincerity.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that we believe this war demands a total mobilization of all our resources, and until we have that total mobilization of all our resources we have no right to take the lives of our young men alone. But if we take all our resources, then we have . 44561-290 that right. I want to make that position plain, and for that reason I have made these few remarks on that score, and I would add a word to those newspapers with which I have disagreed but which I have always respected. I have respected the Manitoba Free Press. I get the Regina Leader-Post every day and enjoy reading it, and hitherto I have had nothing but fair treatment from the Saskatoon newspaper. But just let me say to them and those who write for them, that they are placing their feet upon a slippery road when they try to raise this question anew in Canada. We have seen this country bedevilled by a lack of national unity. We have seen this country bedevilled by religious and racial prejudices, and here we are in the middle of a war, with a group of newspapers that ought to know better and ought to have some sense of responsibility, deliberately stating that which is untrue in order to further the interests of those whom they believe they are supporting. With that, Mr. Speaker, I leave our record in this matter to the judgment of this house and the judgment of this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment moved by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) reads as follows:

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instruction that they have power to amend it by allowing a full exemption to farmers' and fishermen's sons as well as persons employed in agriculture and the fishing industry.

I find that on February 19, as reported on page 722 of Hansard, an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), which reads as follows:

That all the words after "this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers" in the amendment, be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(a) did not deem it proper to advise Your Excellency that the government should adhere to its commitments and the terms of its mandate against conscription for overseas service which it received from the people of Canada at the general elections held on March 26, 1940;

(b) that the farmers, farm employees, fishermen, fisheries employees and all persons engaged in industries connected with agriculture or with war industries, should be exempt from military service."

In other words the amendment then voted upon and negatived by a division of the house was exactly the same amendment as the one now moved. I refer to citation 403 of Beauchesne, which reads:

An amendment once negatived by the house cannot be proposed a second time.

As a result, I rule the amendment out of order.

Mobilization Act-Mr. Coldwell

We voted against the second reading of the government's bill on the ground I have stated. We supported the budget, it is true, in spite of our dislike of some of its features. We supported that budget because in this war we have never denied at any time the funds that the government needed to carry on the war.

May I say that I resent the kind of campaign that is being carried on by Liberal papers in western Canada, not only against this group but against all those who for various reasons sought to oppose this measure. I have here a copy of the Edmonton Bulletin of July 8. I am advised by legal men that if we wished we could bring suit against this paper for libel. It is a distinct libel on parliament. The heading of a front page editorial is, "Fifty-four were traitors." Then it goes on to say:

When second reading of the bill to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act—an amendment to permit the conscription of Canadian man-power for conscription overseas—was passed in the House of Commons last night, forty-six Quebec Liberals, two Quebec Independents and six C.C.F. members voted against it. It is hard to believe that there are that many traitors in the country.

traitors in the country.

And the editorial ends up with these words: All this constitutes treason. And they are traitors.

The Edmonton Bulletin is a Liberal paper, and that is the kind of editorial that the Liberal papers are putting across western Canada to-day.

When we turn to some of the other Liberal papers, we find for example the Regina Leader-Post, which describes our vote with the Quebec members by using the expression, "the C.C.F. and pea-soup,"—employing any term which they thought would raise prejudice against people who come from another province and with whom we happened to vote on this occasion. The Prime Minister, who has led the Liberal party through these years, has always professed to be anxious to promote national unity. The men who have followed the Prime Minister in western Canada, the papers that have supported him faithfully all through these years, are to-day endeavouring to destroy national unity. They realize, as I realize-

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he suggesting that Charlie Campbell's papers have always supported the leaders of the Liberal party in the west?

Mr. COLDWELL: No; I am not, because Mr. Campbell has operated papers in two provinces, papers with different political affiliations. He loops the loop too, when it suits [Mr. Coldwell.] him. But the papers to which I have referred, the Regina Leader-Post, and the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, which I am just about to quote, have been the most consistent supporters of the Minister of Agriculture, of the Prime Minister and of the Liberal party that we have in Canada.

What does the Star-Phoenix say? In its issue of Saturday last, July 18, it discusses the secret session. Hon. members know that on many occasions I urged the holding of a secret session before the hon. member for Gaspé asked for it in connection with the St. Lawrence situation. I had already asked that before the house adjourned we have a secret session to discuss the war situation generally. I am not going to divulge anything which took place in the secret session, but I can say that the discussion was not confined to the St. Lawrence basin or to the defence of our eastern shores. Yet because I joined in asking for that secret session, following the request of the hon. member for Gaspé, a request joined in also by the leader of the opposition, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix said:

A second interesting point is that Mr. Coldwell, C.C.F. leader, while admitting he did not know much about the St. Lawrence, nevertheless lined himself up with Mr. Roy. It may be remembered that Mr. Coldwell and his C.C.F. members, a few weeks ago, voted with the Quebec anti-conscriptionists and antiwar members against conscription of men. Here quite evidently is another turn in C.C.F. policy, a turn which lines them up with the Quebec anti-conscriptionists, isolationists, and anti-British group.

In the neighbouring column of the same edition we have another statement. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) had made a speech on this matter in Saskatoon, and this is the comment of the Liberal Saskatoon Star-Phoenix:

Unfortunately Mr. Douglas did not clarify this contradiction in policy or explain the new brotherhood of C.C.F. and Quebec Catholic isolationism.

So we see that the Liberal party in western Canada is not only going to try to arouse antipathies on the basis of the war, but is going to do again what has been done before to the bedevilment of this country-raise the religious issue as well in opposition to us. And say this-the Minister of Agriculture must know it-that nine years ago, to this very day, I believe, shortly after the manifesto of our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation had been adopted by the national convention in Regina, I addressed a public meeting there. I was then the provincial leader of the movement. Among other things I said-because we had had a terrible experience in our province in the raising of racial and religious because they lacked food and munitions. Would we be foolish enough to organize the defeat of our armies by ruining agriculture?

Let us not forget that our agricultural production received a severe blow last year. It was reduced by approximately 38 per cent. In all the provinces many old or sick farmers had to abandon farming because compulsory military training deprived them of the necessary labour to operate their farms. How many dairy herds were led to the abattoir because of the want of foresight and of the disastrous policy of the government with regard to agriculture, which I have so often condemned in this house? The beef situation, the rationing of butter, and all similar restrictions, could be easily avoided if the government would for one moment have regard to the misfortunes of agriculture and give back to the land the farm hands who are so necessary to its operation.

I desire to move, seconded by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy):

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instruction that they have power to amend it by allowing a full exemption to farmers' and fishermen's sons as well as persons employed in agriculture and the fishing industry.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I regret very much that at this stage of the session it is necessary for one to be in several places at once, as it were, so that it has been impossible for me to follow the debates in the house during the past few days. Even now there are members, including myself, who should be attending a meeting of an important committee which is reaching the report stage. However, I wish to say a few words before the bill is voted upon.

I believe we made our position abundantly clear on the second reading of the bill on July 7. I stated then, and I repeat now, that the grave war situation which faces the United Nations requires action and not further delay; that this house has the responsibility, to the country and to the people who sent members here to take all the decisions that may be necessary to safeguard the nation and to promote the common cause in which we are engaged, and that the house ought not to evade its responsibilities by allowing the government to adopt any measures without its approval, scrutiny and consent. To act otherwise and by order in council is in my opinion against all the democratic procedure which a democratic parliament should follow.

We have said too, ever since the war began, that if and when we had conscription it should involve not only the conscription of manpower for service in this war, but the conscription of industry and wealth on the same terms, on the same basis, and at the same time as it was proposed to conscript manpower for any of our war purposes. The amendment proposed by the bill provides only that the government now shall have the power to conscript men for service overseas. Had the government in the months that have gone by used the mobilization act, which is on the statute book, to conscript industry and wealth on the same basis as men have already been conscripted in this war, the situation from our point of view would have been entirely different from what it is at the present time. This bill merely delays decision on the important question now before the country and before us. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), following the address of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) immediately before the vote on the second reading was taken, said that the government had looped the loop three times. I think that statement was correct. But the thing that surprised me was that the official opposition had looped the loop with the government an equal number of times by voting with it.

Every phase of the regulations made under this bill ought to be placed before the house. Instead of a bill of this description, amending the mobilization act, we should have before us a measure which we could discuss and consider and criticize. We know perfectly well that there has been no uniformity in the enforcement of the National Resources Mobi-We know lization Act across the country. that in Saskatchewan, for example, as I have said before, certain interpretations have been given by the board in that province which differ radically from interpretations given in other provinces. If we are to have equality of sacrifice, then we ought to have uniformity of enforcement in order to achieve some measure of equality. Therefore I say also that industry and wealth ought to be treated in exactly the same manner as we are treating man-power.

It has been said, of course, that the budget is conscription of industry and wealth. Is it? Look into the budget. We tried to amend it recently so that the excess profits tax would be 100 per cent. To-day 20 per cent is refundable; 20 per cent may be used by industry when this war is over as deferred dividends. There is no conscription of profits, even in the budget. Although in some respects it moves in the right direction, as I said in the budget debate its incidence is particularly heavy at the bottom; it is heavy in the middle brackets, but as you move upward the percentage of incidence of taxation grows less. By no stretch of the imagination can that be called conscription of either industry or wealth.

Mobilization Act-Mr. Lacombe

refrain from sacrificing uselessly any of our national resources. The future will prove that we are justified, at this very grave moment, in requesting an exclusively Canadian policy. Before all, we must endeavour to live through this tremendous disaster which has fallen upon the world. We shall not attain this end if we weaken our own defence with conscription for overseas service.

Speaking in this house on July 24, 1917, Sir Wilfrid Laurier made the following statements—Hansard, pages 3727 and 3729:

I have my views upon conscription. They have not changed. It is not a pleasure for me to find myself at variance with so many of the friends I have around me; but I thought and still believe that a measure of conscription, under the circumstances, was an apple of discord, and I could not accept it. That is all I have to say upon that point.

cord, and I could not accept it. That is an I have to say upon that point. But I may be asked: what is your policy; it is not sufficient for the opposition to say "nay" to any proposition, what is your policy? Sir, I laid my policy before parliament upon the second reading of the bill. I asked that a referendum should be had and the judgment of the people taken upon this question. . . . But when the conscription measure was proposed I had to oppose it, and why? Because, presented as it had been presented, before the country, it had been made an instrument of coercion.

It is a denial of those principles of democracy which we hold dear and sacred. I oppose this bill because it has in it the seeds of discord and disunion; because it is an obstacle and a bar to that union of heart and soul without which it is impossible to hope that this confederation will attain the aims and ends that were had in view when confederation was effected. Sir, all my life I have fought coercion; all my life I have promoted union; and the inspiration which led me to that course shall be my guide at all times, so long as there is a breath left in my body.

The inspiration, sir, which led Sir Wilfrid Laurier to that course should be the guide of his successor, the present Prime Minister.

The results of the plebiscite held on April 27 last are not at all conclusive. The government must have a very clear and precise mandate to propose such an exceedingly serious measure. It lacks the mandate to do so. The question, "Are you in favour of or against conscription?" has never been asked of the people of Canada. Sir, we want no more hypocrisy. We are fighting to preserve whatever good and praiseworthy elements are still left in democracy. According to the very words of Laurier, we are fighting to maintain government of the people, for the people and by the people.

Why not be loyal, honest and frank with the people? Why not frankly tell the electorate what we intend to do? The tremendous sacrifices of the population of Canada in the war effort deserve something more noble than electoral pledges, corruption and lies.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

Why repeal section 3 of the mobilization act? Is it because Canada has not fulfilled its duty, all its duty, in this war? Absolutely not. Canada's population is only 11,500,000. In spite of its small population our country has organized eight divisions. Over 130,000 men are in the Canadian air force, and more than 33,000 men in the Canadian navy. The Canadian navy has convoyed more than 9,000 ships, and Canada has overseas a well-trained and fully equipped Canadian army. Who believes that Canada has failed in its duty in this war, when the Canadian air force and the Canadian navy are fighting on all fronts in the world? Who will assert that Canada is doing nothing for the prosecution of the war, when the Canadian people pay a tremendous income tax and are sending gifts of munitions, foodstuffs and billions to England?

It is a tragic joke to hear these extremists asserting, in order to serve better their conscriptionist feelings, that Canada has not fulfilled its duty. I protest as firmly as I can against such cynical statements from those who believe that Canada must ruin its own defence, all its natural resources, all its income, all its farming community, in these extremely serious times. All the sacrifices made by the people of Canada in this war constitute a solemn assertion that our population does not require conscription to fulfil its duty and all its duty. Conscription will ruin not only the defence of Canada but also the magnificent war effort of our country. Conscription will be a disgrace, a downfall, considering the most generous help which this country is giving to the united nations.

We are still asking, Mr. Speaker, that farmers, farmers' sons and fishermen be exempted from military training. I need not recall to this house all the arguments I have advanced to this effect. Food production in Canada has decreased to such an extent that all kinds of restrictions are imminent. In a country like ours it would be absurd to ration farm produce. The food required by our armed forces and our civilian population should and will remain plentiful in Canada. Our immense natural wealth is hardly developed. Cultivated lands represent but a very small part of our national domain. How can we explain, then. that the government will not adopt the strong measures which alone will enable our farmers. farmers' sons and farm hands to return to the land? By all means we must keep our army and civilian population from starvation. We must prevent rationing, which necessarily engenders anaemia and apathy, the diseases which are the source of all weakness and which defeated the nations that are now dominated by the axis powers. They were subdued

The idea that every twenty years this country should automatically and as a matter of course take part in a war overseas for democracy or self-determination of other small nations, that a country which has all it can do to run itself should feel called upon to save, periodically, a continent that cannot run itself, and to these ends risk the lives of its people, risk bankruptcy and political disunion, seems to many a nightmare and sheer madness.

I never used such language. Although I have never boasted of it, I should like to refer to an honour which was paid me, one that I prize very highly. It is a letter which I received from the Imperial Veterans' Corps in Ontario precisely at the time the Prime Minister complained that we were obstructing to an extent injurious to the defence of Canada. This letter is written on the letterhead of the Imperial Veterans' Corps in Ontario. It is dated Toronto, March 10, 1937, and reads:

J. F. Pouliot, Esq., M.P.,

Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:

Referring to an article in the press recently reporting your comments regarding honorary colonels in the Canadian army, I am glad to convey to you the approval of the members of this organization, who at a general meeting went on record as being opposed to honorary colonels in the armies, as it was unjust to men who gave their all to the empire during the years 1914-18. The meeting commended you for your action.

I am, sir,

Yours respectfully, Arthur F. Wright, Secretary.

This incident was reported in the Toronto Telegram as follows:

Corps Opposed Honorary Rank for Canadians. Forty new Members Join Imperial Veterans' Corps at Fourth Battalion Club.

Imperial Veterans' Corps, meeting at the fourth battalion club, Yonge and Queen streets, went on record as being opposed to honorary colonels in the armies in Canada.

Presided over by the president, J. Gibson, 40 new members were initiated into the corps, with past president Eric McLellan officiating. The new members were welcomed into the association by the president.

J. Lees, representing the federation of ex-service men, gave an interesting address after which a vote was taken and carried that the imperial veterans affiliate with the federation.

imperial veterans affiliate with the terms of the soldiers", referring to the quotations of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, Liberal member from Quebee, in regard to honorary colonels in the armies. Mr. Pendock was of the opinion that "honorary colonels not only did have a demoralizing and degrading effect on Canadian armies, but are unjust to the men who gave their all to the empire in 1914 and 1918."

When a motion was passed that a letter be sent to Mr. Pouliot commending him for his attitude, the crowd roared approval. To conclude, I regret very much that those who are in favour of conscription for overseas appear to be suffering from a disease which is described medically as follows:

Presbyopia—an imperfection of vision in which near objects are seen less distinctly than those at a distance.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): The bill for conscription has reached its final stage. It is now up for third reading. At this decisive moment we are still standing up to fight it. Many times in this house and at public meetings I have asserted that as long as I lived I would oppose this disastrous bill for conscription. I shall not fail in my task. I do not care about the attacks and treachery of those who should be the first ones to support us. Before history and the country they must bear the responsibility of their hesitation.

On July 7 the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) asserted that he did not intend to allow another debate on conscription should he decide to call the members together to ask for a vote of confidence. I protest against these tactics. They are worthy of a dictator. I protest with the same energy as that with which Laurier protested when he opposed prorogation and the gag applied by Borden in this house in 1917.

The Prime Minister and this government can no longer be called Liberal, because every day they are getting farther away from Laurier's doctrines and are trampling upon the principles which he defended during his whole life. On several occasions I have warned the government against its negligence in protecting Canada and its eagerness to adopt an external policy which would prove disastrous for the defence of our own country. Instead of establishing conscription, could the government not fulfil its first duty towards Canada, that is, to protect our shores and our territory? Otherwise it will be responsible for abandoning Canada to the enemy. The government is now in possession, since the secret session, of precious information concerning the defence of Canada. When the enemy is really at our door, we must organize, before all, the defence of our country. We must not sacrifice elsewhere anything which may be necessary for the protection of Canadian territory. Why was defeat brought down upon the conquered. countries? If we study the misfortunes of most of our allies we shall find that the main cause of their defeat was a lack of wellorganized resistance against the enemy. The fate of every country subdued by the enemy will exemplify this statement. That is why it is the first duty of the government to organize the defence of Canada and to

Mr. POULIOT: I will send the clipping to the minister.

Mr. RALSTON: I said Pearl Harbour.

Mr. POULIOT: This is the extract:

Defence Minister Ralston gave the House of Commons word late yesterday that the Japanese have made only one actual attack on the United States naval base at Dutch harbour, Alaska, correcting information he gave the chamber earlier that there apparently had been three.

I do not need to quote more. I shall give this to the Minister of National Defence. He may be kept busy reading it, and it will be good for him.

Then, there is another argument—Oh, he will not read it. I am not surprised. He will not learn anything. There is another reason given by the government to persuade the Canadian people that we must have enlistment for overseas service. They say they have private information. What is the use of having diplomatic envoys in all the countries of the world when they are not better informed?

During the special session of 1939 I asked a question of the Prime Minister, which is reported at page 117 of Hansard. At that time I asked if the high commissioner in England had the same opportunity as ambassadors to discuss matters of state with the official representatives of other countries. What was the answer given? It was said that he does not have official relations with the ambassadors of other countries, but that he was getting his information through the dominions office, drop by drop. That was not information. It was propaganda which was conveyed through the dominions office to Mr. Vincent Massey and then to Ottawa.

I admit that Mr. and Mrs. Massey have done a great deal for the soldiers overseas by way of the establishment of hospitals, and so on. But they are the most imperialistic crowd in the world. Besides that, what is said about the British war office? We have heard how it has been described by Lord Fisher, by Sir Roger Keyes, by Somerset Maugham and by others who have seen the operation of it. They have shown what brains there are in the British war office.

According to a dispatch of July 30, 1940, and according to a news item of the same date from Mr. Cummings, which is published in the Ottawa Citizen, the British war office was denounced because of red tape—and that is not surprising. What is the real reason for conscription in this country? Why is the defence of Canada forgotten? Why is the future of this country put aside and destroyed? I have the answer in a recent news item from the Canadian Press. I believe the date is June 27. The translation is as follows:

Captain Harold Balfour, under secretary of state for air, has declared to the house in London that the raid made by more than 1,000 air units would not have been possible without the help of men who had graduated in Canada.

I interrupt my remarks to refer to the official report of the standing committee on railways and shipping. I shall not send a copy of this to the Minister of National Defence because he would not read it. What I said has been denied by the minister; therefore I shall read to the house the question put to the minister and his reply. I am sorry I cannot read all the questions and answers. I quote from page 141:

Mr. Pouliot: I understand that such jobs cannot be filled by the patients of the Lady Grey hospital or the Lake Edward sanatorium —they cannot become brakemen or firemen and you cannot expect men who are unfit for military service to be brakemen and firemen on a train, can you?

Hon. Mr. Ralston: I would have to leave that with the railways; it is a railway question.

It is impossible to get any information from his department. If the minister does not know what is going on there, I am not going to instruct him.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not what my hon. friend said.

Mr. POULIOT: I object. This is my time.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend-

Mr. POULIOT: I object. Sit down.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not care-

Mr. POULIOT: I know you do not care; you do not care about the Canadian people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am addressing the Chair and I do not want to be interrupted. What makes me doubly sorry are the remarks of the Prime Minister not long ago in connection with objections raised by some members of parliament in 1936, 1937 and 1938 when the estimates of the Department of National Defence were before the house. He said, as reported at page 4009 of Hansard:

In 1937, in 1938 and in 1939, some of these hon. members opposed the preparations for the defence of Canada because they maintained that Canada was in no danger. If I interpret their words aright, they are still prepared to overlook the designs of the enemy, and to discount his strength, despite the fact that his design of world conquest is increasingly clear, and despite the continued success of his arms.

I never used language as strong as that of the Prime Minister. Here is what he said in 1939, as reported on page 2419 of Hansard:

Mr. POULIOT: I want the minister not to interrupt me.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is making a statement with regard to procedure. I want him to produce the proceedings and the minutes of the railway committee in which I made any such statement, that the railways decided who should be called for military service and who should not. Then I should like anything the hon. member has to substantiate the procedure which he now alleges takes place, in which the Department of National Defence itself decides on the matter of deferment. I say both those statements are incorrect.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I will ask the Clerk of the House if he will kindly call for the reports of the railway committee, which are downstairs, and particularly volume 3. I have little time at my disposal, Mr. Speaker, and I am always surprised when the minister jumps up like a jack-in-the-box when I am speaking.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will stick to the facts,

Mr. POULIOT: There he is again, like a jack-in-the-box. It is impossible to develop an argument when one is interrupted all the time either by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser) or by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who seem to be Siamese twins. I will not stand for it any longer, sir; I hope and trust you will apply the rule very strictly to everyone, because here we are all the same. No hon. member is more important than another, and a private member has the same rights in this house as the Prime Minister or the leader of the opposition, under the guidance of Mr. Speaker.

I was very sorry when I was called to withdraw the word "pompous" as applied to brass hats. But I was not surprised when the Minister of National Defence described as "futile" the very important question which stands on to-day's order paper as No. 3, and which has not been answered since June 12. To describe brass hats as they should be described I will use the language of a great Englishman, no less a man than Admiral Fisher. I take this description from the Montreal Gazette of November 26, 1941:

Brass Hats in Black Uniforms

Toward the end of the third act of The Devil's Disciple, George Bernard Shaw makes General Burgoyne say to his stuffed-shirt major: "Take it quietly, Major Swindon; your friend the British soldier can stand up to anything except the British war office." 44561-2893 That was some thirty-five years ago. About ten years later, the late great Admiral "Jackie" Fisher delivered a broadside which Judith Robinson dug up and quoted in last week's News; when the generals rebuked him for encroaching on their territory by preparing anti-zeppelin defences. Admiral Fisher replied: "Gentlemen, I have the responsibility of protecting the admiralty from German bombs. You at the war office are safe—the Germans will never bomb that establishment."

And what does Sir Roger Keyes, D.S.O., C.M.G., hero of Zeebrugge, say? These are his words:

Brass hats at Whitehall have frustrated every worth-while offensive action I have ever tried to make. They have succeeded in thwarting or delaying execution until we either have been forestalled or actions have been taken too late for success. Until the staff system is thoroughly overhauled we will always be too late for everything we undertake.

I regret not to have the time to read the article in the Gazette in full. However I hold in my hand another editorial, this time from a Tory imperialist paper in Ottawa, the Ottawa Journal, which quotes no less an Englishman than Somerset Maugham:

I can sum up the cause of the collapse of France in very few words. The general staff was incompetent; the officers were vain, illinstructed in modern warfare and insufficiently determined; the men were dissatisfied and half-hearted. The people at large were kept ignorant of everything that they should have been informed of; they were profoundly suspicious of the government and were never convinced that the war was a matter that urgently concerned them; the propertied classes were more afraid of bolshevism than of German domination; their first thought was how to keep their money safely in their pockets; the government was inept, corrupt and in part disloyal. Is it a miracle that France was defeated? It would have been a miracle if she hadn't been.

Mr. Maugham concludes:

The scum will be swept away. There are men in France who have integrity, patriotism and courage, thousands upon thousands of them.

Another argument is that the National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940 will have to be changed so as to permit our men to go outside of Canada for the defence of this country. Is it necessary? My answer is no, because the Prime Minister stated in the house on February 27 that trainees could be sent to the United States, and that the pledge of no conscription for overseas was not a barrier to that.

Then on June 5 the Minister of National Defence declared that the Dutch Harbour action brought the joint scheme of defence into effect. That is another reason used by the government.

Mr. RALSTON: Pearl Harbour, not Dutch Harbour.

Mobilization Act-Mr. Pouliot

According to the Ottawa Journal of February 24, a young Belgian artillery officer declared that nazi four-motor bombers now stationed in Norway could make the trip easily from Norway to Canada, and that Canada was within range of bombers from Norway, and that Canadians should not feel that they are safe from the horrors of war.

Now, sir, you know very well that it is important to protect this country, not only for the safety of the Canadian people but also to safeguard and protect all ways of communication by preventing the landing of supplies. Our ways of communication by water and by rail are vital to the help that we are giving and that we may give in the future to the allied countries. Therefore this country needs adequate protection.

Is it believable that although the mobilization act of 1940 was designed for the protection of this land, nothing of importance yet has been done in that regard? What about the suggestion that we should improve the military roads that are so vital to our communications? What about the suggestion with regard to mobile units? These suggestions have joined the one I made, in regard to the picture of his majesty in the recruiting booths; they are in the waste-paper basket of the Minister of National Defence.

Then, sir, there is another reason for which it is important that we change the present policy of the Department of National Defence. I take this from the words of the Prime Minister himself, in reply to my suggestion, a suggestion which I was the only member of parliament to make, with regard to recruiting a regiment in my own constituency for the defence of this land. Here are the words of the Prime Minister as they may be found at page 922 of Hansard for June 19, 1940:

I pointed out to him that in doing that he might be making the greatest mistake possible with respect to the national interest; that, to win this war, we might wish to keep at work in the forests the men who are now working in the forests, to provide the timber which will be required for docks and wharves and required immediately; that the men who are working in the factories may be a thousand times more useful to the government of this country in giving their skilled labour to the manufacture of aircraft, munitions, or other weapons of war than they could possibly be in lining up and presenting themselves for military service; equally that on the farms, if we are to perform what will be expected of us, we shall need all the production that can be effectively and rapidly carried out on the farms of our country.

It was precisely on account of that very statement by the Prime Minister that I wrote the Minister of National Defence on May 16, 1941:

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Eleven months ago, the Prime Minister pointed out to me that in doing voluntary recruiting for the defence of Canada, I might be making the greatest mistake possible with respect to the national interest.

Would there be no mistake possible with respect to the national interest in doing it for overseas service? In other words, how can I do, at your request and for another country, what I have been precluded to do by the Prime Minister for our native country?

Several arguments have been used with regard to the establishment of conscription in this country, as though it were to be a new move. It is not a new move. Conscription was commenced precisely two weeks after I wrote that letter to the Minister of National Defence. It was established by and in virtue of order in council P.C. 4759, dated Friday, June 27, 1941, when all avenues of employment were closed to men of military age who were not already called for training. In the advertisements for positions, published by the civil service commission, one paragraph reads as follows:

Order in council P.C. 4759 of June 27, 1941, provided that no male person of military age shall be appointed to the public service unless he is ineligible for service in the forces. Military age has been set as from 18 to 45 years inclusive. Among successful male candidates within these ages, except veterans of the great war of 1914-18 or the present war, only those will receive appointment who, after examination by an army medical board, have been declared unfit for military service.

Since then that order has been made much tighter. Now the only men who can secure employment in war industry of any description, including the railways, must be unfit for service, or either under or over the military age. So that we see boys of sixteen and and seventeen who have to go far from home in order to get work to help their families, and no man who is fit for military service and of military age can secure employment even in a war industry. I did put a question to the Minister of National Defence when he appeared as a witness before the committee on railways and shipping. He told me that it was up to the railway to decide whether or not a man who was called for training was indispensable to the railway. I know what happens. A notice is sent to the trainee by the registrar, and the trainee has to pass on that notice to the foreman of the shop. The foreman of the shop sends it to the head office of the region. The head office of the region sends it to the Department of National Defence, where a postponement is either granted or denied. Then it is returned by the military attaché to the registrar with the black ball of the Department of National Defence; and how is it that the minister-whether there are any new regulations in regard to sending parcels to England in view of the shortage of boats? If so, what are those regulations?

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): The hon. member sent me notice of the question a moment ago. I shall be glad to give a statement to-morrow.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT TO SERVICE OVERSEAS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): My only hope to-day is, Mr. Speaker, that although you were born in that great country, Scotland, you are a Canadian at heart; and my deep regret is, sir, that some of those who were born in this country are not as good Canadians as you are.

I shall not insist on bringing to your attention some facts that would have been qualified by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) as an outrage on parliamentary practice; I mean the railroading of this bill in committee of the whole last night. But, sir, under the shadow and protection of the Chair when you sit in it I feel more secure to express freely my views about this bill, which is of the utmost importance for this country right now and also for the future.

The fact that some of us are opposing this legislation does not mean that we are disloyal Canadian citizens. It means that we have the right, inasmuch as we are members of this house, even more than the conscientious objectors, the Jehovah's Witnesses and all the cranks whose views are to be expressed freely if the report of the committee on the defence of Canada regulations that was tabled this morning is adopted. It means that members of parliament have the right to express their views in this house freely, without fear or favour, and thinking only of the public interest of the Canadian people.

We French Canadians are not disloyal. We have the utmost respect and the greatest admiration for Their Majesties the King and Queen. This is the reason why as a private member of parliament I have suggested that a good likeness of His Majesty the King, who is the commander-in-chief of the Canadian Army, should be in all recruiting offices. But when I offered that suggestion I realized once more that the Minister of National Defence had not understood what I had said in plain 44561-289

English. I was referring to recruiting booths or offices, and he in his reply mentioned messes. He said on May 6—Hansard, page 2202:

The hon. member for Témiscouata asked about having a picture of the king and queen in the various messes. He spoke of His Majesty as commander-in-chief. That is an error.

The minister added that he would take the suggestion into consideration. My suggestion of having a picture of His Majesty the King, the commander-in-chief of our army, in all recruiting offices has joined all other representations that have been made to the Minister of National Defence by any private member; they can be found in his old wastepaper basket.

Well, sir, taking into account what has been said by the leader of the three branches of the army, I want to mention in the first place that early in April General Brown said:

The reserve force may have to fight and it must be ready to fight as soon as possible.

After all, there is no more war overseas than there is here now, and we may have some here sooner than they have, in view of the threats to our coast.

That was the view of the army, the militia. What was the view of the navy? Here it is in an interview published in the Evening Telegram, Toronto, of March 25 last:

U-boats may try raiding St. Lawrence in summer, Canadian admiral warns.

Three services defending maritimes ready for visits by Hun craft, is assurance.

The word "ready" is used.

By J. H. Fisher, Telegram staff writer.

Ottawa, March 24.—German submarines may attempt sinking merchantmen in the gulf of St. Lawrence, this summer, Vice-Admiral P. W. Nelles, chief of the naval staff, and Rear-Admiral G. C. Jones, in command at Halifax, said to-day in an interview relating to east coast naval operations.

These top-ranking officers in the Canadian naval service declared that it would be quite feasible for enemy U-boats to venture into the gulf in the hope that they may be able to pick off a cargo vessel, but they indicated that the three services defending the Canadian maritimes are ready for any visit of this nature.

And you know, sir, as all hon. members do, that there have been sinkings by enemy submarines on several occasions. The interview continues:

"It is a practical proposition," Vice-Admiral Nelles declared, and Rear-Admiral Jones explained that with the coming of the longer days the opportunities for the U-boats will increase. He added, however, that the longer days will also make it easier for the air force to detect and attack these rattlesnakes of the sea.

What was done for the protection of our waterways and of our shores by the navy no one knows.

REVISED EDITION

Hong Kong Commission

6. Are they married or single? 7. What medical category are they under for military purposes?

8. Were their appointments approved by the Canadian Legion or any other military organization?

9. Have they been called up for military service and received postponement? 10. If not, when will they be called up? 11. Is this a class of work that could not be done by men over military age, or veterans? 12. Have any veterans' organizations been asked if they have any men with the necessary qualifications available for these positions?

13. Were applicati ns called in the usual way for these positions?

14. Why was order in council No. 4759 ignored in these appointments?

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION-EXAMINERS-QUES-TION OF EXEMPTION OR POSTPONEMENT

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. How many persons now in the employ of the the civil service commission, examination branch, are between the ages of 17 and 45?

2. Have any been granted military exemption postponement from order in council P.C. or 4759?

3. Have any of the following been called, and granted exemption or postponement, and if so, granted exemption or postponement, and it so, when were they called, why were they exempted or postponed, and for what length of time was the postponement granted: J. C. Rutledge, Leslie Smith. Rex Boyd, Carson Jones, Gordon Doherty, Richard Moore, Harold Irwin, C. E. Rice?

4. What are the ages of the above mentioned, and on what dates did they enter the civil service commission as examiners?

5. Were they married or single prior to July 15, 1940?

NURSES

QUESTION OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE-SHORTAGE OF REGISTERED NURSES THROUGH ENLIST-MENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. In view of the very serious shortage of registered nurses owing to the number of nurses going on active service with the military forces, will the government consider giving financial assistance to young women who wish to enter training for professional work and to graduate nurses who might do administrative work on the teaching staff?

Mr. SPEAKER: That question should be placed on the order paper.

[Later:]

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I wish to table order in council P.C. 72/6073, which provides for a grant of $115,000 for the training of nurses.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

HONG KONG COMMISSION

QUESTION OF LEGAL OPINION ON REFERENCES IN DEBATE TO EVIDENCE TAKEN AT INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice by reason of the discussion which will take place on the question of the Hong Kong inquiry. Is it the opinion of the Department of Justice that, or has an opinion been secured, whether or not, any reference to the letters written to the Prime Minister and to the leaders of the various parties, in so far as those letters contain references to the evidence taken by the commission, would render the persons making such references liable to contempt of court before the commissioner on the inquiry, or whether or not the extraordinary powers conferred upon the commissioner terminated with the bringing down of the report by the commission?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a question which really should be placed on the order paper, but in view of the statement made yesterday by the Prime Minister I will leave it to the minister in charge to answer.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): This question is important and pressing in view of the fact that we are to proceed to-day with the discussion of the Hong Kong report.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will leave it to the minister to reply.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): The hon. member sent me a notice of the second part of the question beginning, "Has the government secured a legal opinion from the Department of Justice or elsewhere, ... " and as the hon. member read that part of the question and as I received it from him, the answer would be in the negative: no opinion has been secured. The hon. gentleman inserted, before that portion of which he gave me notice, the words-if I got them correctly-"Is it the opinion of the Department of Justice or has the government secured legal opinion from the Department of Justice or elsewhere?" The answer to that is that the matter has not been considered by the Department of Justice.

POSTAL SERVICE

REGULATIONS RESPECTING PARCELS MAILED TO ENGLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would the Postmaster General tell the house

Questions

906 and 802 of the cadastre of the parish of Pointe Claire, and if so, what was the price paid?

2. Has the same A. G. Houghton sold this property to the C.N.R. for one dollar and other considerations, and if so, what are the other considerations?

3. Has the C.N.R. rented the same property to the air force for the erection of a manning depot at Lachine, and if so, for what period and at what price?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Mr. C. G. Houghton, a Canadian National Railway property department official, acting for the Canadian National Railways, purchased the property in question in consideration of $6,000.

2. $6,000.

3. Part of the said property and some adjoining land, previously owned by the railway company, has been leased to the Department of National Defence for the duration of the war and one year thereafter, at annual rental of $1,500.

CANADIAN NAVY—COOPERATION WITH FREE FRENCH FLEET ON ATLANTIC COAST

Mr. CHURCH:

Is the Canadian navy cooperating with or giving any assistance to the Free French fleet of General de Gaulle, on behalf of our allies, and aiding the good work of the Free French fleet in protecting Canada and the United States in the Atlantic, St. Lawrence gulf and islands in the neighbourhood?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Stand.

Mr. CHURCH: Can the minister not answer these questions?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I can give an oral answer now. The Canadian navy is endeavouring to cooperate with any navy or any unit of any navy of the allied nations.

Mr. CHURCH: That is not an answer; it is only an excuse.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The answer is yes.

DUNDURN, SASK., MILITARY CAMP

Mr. BENCE:

1. Is the military camp at Dundurn, Saskatchewan, being used to the fullest extent of its facilities for the training of troops?

2. If it is not being so used give the reasons therefor?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. The military camp at Dundurn, Saskatchewan, is at present being converted from its former use as the site of an engineer training centre and a machine gun training centre, to that of an armoured corps training centre which will train reinforcements for reconnaissance units. When this conversion is completed the present facilities for the training of troops at the latter camp will be used to their fullest extent.

2. Answered by No. 1.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—BITS AND PIECES WORK IN MANITOBA

Mr. MACKENZIE (Neepawa):

Under the bits and pieces programme, what value in work has been given out or sublet, (a) in the province of Manitoba, (b) to country shops outside Winnipeg?

Mr. HOWE: The bits and pieces programme was instituted by the industry and subcontract coordination branch of the department. This branch does not give out work or negotiate subcontracts. It assists government purchasing branches and prime contractors in finding production capacity where contracts or subcontracts may be placed. Statistics are not available in the Department of Munitions and Supply to permit an accurate reply to this question.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

RECOGNITION OF WORK OF CANADA'S MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. CHURCH:

Why is not more recognition given in naval announcements to the good work done by Canada's merchant marine on the seven seas and on inland lakes and waters of Canada?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

MAJOR J. S. YUILL

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Is Major J. S. Yuill employed by the government in censor work?

2. If so, for what period has he been employed?

3. What salary is he paid monthly?

4. What were his total monthly expenses in (a) 1941, (b) 1942?

5. What have leen the additional expenses in connection with his duties?

6. What have been the total salary and expenses paid to date, stating date of employment?

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION-R. JONES AND C. MOORE

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. Are Mr. R. Jones and Mr. C. Moore employed by the civil service commission as examiners in British Columbia or elsewhere?

2. If so, what salaries do they receive and when were they appointed?

3. What qualifications have they for this class of work?

4. Are they under 30 years of age?

5. What are their respective ages?

ambassador in a day. We have seen the mistakes which have been made in this war. The lack of a good diplomat practically caused the war.

Mr. POULIOT: Will this resolution have a retroactive effect for the benefit of some men who have been in the diplomatic service, but who are not now in it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The estate of one person will be affected. As my hon. friend is aware, Mr. Loring Christie, who was for some years in the Department of External Affairs, died while at his post as minister in Washington. He was, while in the service, contributing to a superannuation fund. But all the benefits his estate would have derived, had he continued on in the civil service, are lost unless the provisions of this act can be made applicable to his estate. He left the civil service at the instance of the government to take the post in Washington which, in the large sense of the word, is a civil service post, certainly a public service post. The committee will, I think, agree it would be unfair to his widow if the estate were to be deprived of the benefits which otherwise would have accrued to it, had he been permitted to continue his contributions to the superannuation fund.

Of course the contributions which would have been made will have to be made to be refunded to the treasury before any benefits can accrue later. Mr. Jean Desy's is another case in point. These are the only cases which would be retroactive.

To-day Mr. Desy is minister in Brazil. During the years he was in the Department of External Affairs he was contributing to the superannuation fund, but when appointed first to Belgium and later moved to Brazil he ceased to contribute to the fund and ceases to get any benefits from it unless opportunity is given to him to restore the amount to the fund which he should have been contributing right along, and to continue to contribute in order to secure the benefits accruing at the end.

, Unless we are to be deprived of drawing from our permanent civil service for men for these diplomatic posts, something of this kind is absolutely necessary. Moreover, it is wholly right.

Mr. POULIOT: Would it not benefit another ex-minister, also?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; those are the only ones I know of.

Mr. POULIOT: What about Brigadier Vanier.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Brigadier Vanier's position is covered, I believe, by the fact that he is entitled to draw a pension under the provisions of some act of the Department of National Defence. He is not affected by this bill, so far as I know.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 120, to amend the Department of External Affairs Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, July 23, 1942

The house met at eleven o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Second and final report of special committee on defence of Canada regulations.—Mr. McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River).

Sixth report of standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Weir.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.

GIMLI, MAN., AIRPORT

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has an airport been built at Gimli, Manitoba?

2. Who has the contract?

3. What amounts have been paid for, (a) fencing, (b) clearing the land of brush, (c) excavating, (d) surfacing, (e) erection of buildings?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. Construction now under way.

2. Bird Construction Company.

3. (a), (b), (c), (d) Accounts have not yet been received covering actual expenditures. The projected cost of aerodrome development is $1,113,500.

(e) The estimated cost of the proposed buildings is $1,276,600, but the contract has not yet been let.

PURCHASE OF LAND IN POINTE CLAIRE PARISH, QUE.—RENTAL TO AIR FORCE FOR MANNING DEPOT

Mr. MARIER:

1. Did Mr. A. G. Houghton purchase from Ames Dawes Realty on the 7th of May, 1941, a farm bearing the following numbers: 197-198Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will make the same explanation at this stage that ordinarily I would make on the motion for first reading of the bill. This explanation is one which will be found in the explanatory note forming part of the bill which will be introduced later.

Under the existing constitutional practice, appointments as ministers plenipotentiary, as consuls general and as consuls are made by His Majesty the King. Since the beginning of 1938 there have been three appointments of Canadian permanent civil servants as ministers plenipotentiary and three appointments as consuls. The Department of Justice has ruled that, upon appointment as a minister plenipotentiary a civil servant ceases to be eligible to contribute to the superannuation fund, and there is some doubt as to the position of permanent civil servants who are appointed to consular posts.

In the case of the appointments as ministers plenipotentiary, the appointees were placed upon a lower salary scale than that which had been established for persons appointed from outside of the civil service with the understanding that they would be eligible or made eligible to contribute to and to receive the benefits of superannuation. There is one instance in which a permanent civil servant so appointed has since died.

It is therefore necessary to amend the Department of External Affairs Act so as to ensure that civil servants performing duties which involve appointment by His Majesty the King will not lose their status as permanent civil servants and also to enable such civil servants or the estates or the widows in appropriate cases to refund the appropriate percentage of their salaries for the period between the dates of their appointment and the coming into force of this act or, in the case of a deceased person, the date of his death.

In a word it means simply this that where appointments are made from the permanent civil service to diplomatic posts, if the appointees had been contributing to the superannuation fund, unless this amendment is passed to the Department of External Affairs Act they will lose all the benefits of that fund. This is to enable an appointee from the service to a diplomatic post to have refunded to the treasury the amount he would have to make by way of contribution to get the benefits of superannuation at the end of his term.

Mr. CHURCH: I see no necessity for any of these vast expenditures on external affairs, especially when there is a war on. This committee passed a draft estimate, and after it was passed a very large sum of money was run up by the government and the Minister of External Affairs in opening many of these new agencies which were already covered by trade commissioners.

We should have some economy in these matters connected with the Department of External Affairs. Many of these are only amateur diplomats who have had no training for their work. So far as this department is concerned, they are not functioning in the way they should be. I have in mind the one in Eire, and several others. It is bad enough in a time of peace to have divisions within the empire, but in a time of war it is even more fatal.

Some of these envoys and ministers plenipotentiary are causing untold strife among the dominions, and in addition to that they are interfering with the conduct of the war. Let us consider Washington, for example; we have a small expeditionary force there, in which there are representatives of the army, the navy, the air force, and even the women's army. They put on all the airs and manners of a nation of 75,000,000 people. Australia and New Zealand have not gone to that extent. Those people are here to-day and away to-morrow, because they will be changed with every change of government. So far as I can see, they have done little or nothing in Washington compared with what they should have done.

I am absolutely opposed to the extension of the principle of envoys and ambassadors, and the disregard of the fact that we are a nation of only around 11,000,000 people. I am opposed to this extension of the application of superannuation to these diplomats. This matter should be considered when the estimates are before the committee, and should not be put through in this form. There should be a vote before the committee of supply, and yet we have not had a dollar voted by that committee. This is the 114th day of the session, and yet we have not considered one item in the Department of External Affairs.

Out of respect for the Prime Minister I do not wish to delay the progress of the resolution. I believe, however, we should pay heed to the handwriting on the wall and try to reduce our expenditures, because after all is said and done a man cannot learn to be an Mr. STIRLING: I suggest that third reading be delayed until to-morrow.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. POULIOT: I am ready.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 77 reads:

All amendments made in committee are reported by the Chairman to the house, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report the bill is open to debate and amendment, before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the house.

Mr. STIRLING: May I direct your attention to citation 811 of Beauchesne, which in the latter part states:

The Speaker formally puts the motion for the second reading of the same, and if it is carried he says: "When shall the bill be read a third time?" and the answer generally is "next sitting of the house."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the hon. member has stated the matter correctly when he says the answer generally is "next sitting of the house," but as a matter of right the house would be entitled to third reading at the present time.

Mr. STIRLING: That is so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: However, I presume that if we proceeded with the third reading to-night we should not be able to conclude it, and in the circumstances I would regard it as preferable to proceed with the third reading to-morrow. In the interval between now and eleven o'clock we might get a few more of the departments into committee of supply, so that we may be able to proceed with them later on.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Next sitting of the house.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Normal services.

180. Cadet services, $659,000.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

47. Departmental administration, $417,106.

Item stands.

Mr. STIRLING: That gives the government two more departments in supply, which makes ten departments now open. Surely [Mr. Pouliot.] that should suffice for the present, considering that hitherto the examination of only one department has been carried on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend understands that on Thursday, Friday and Saturday the rule is that a department must have been called previously, or its estimates may not be taken up. We are trying to conclude the session this week, I understand, though I do not know that we shall be able to do so.

Mr. STIRLING: Not a hope.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But I would submit to my hon. friend that there is really nothing to be gained by not having all the departments in at once.

Mr. STIRLING: Oh, no; I do not agree with that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then let us get in at least two more to-night.

Mr. STIRLING: I understand that someone on behalf of the government spoke to the leader of the opposition and mentioned two or three departments. I do not think I could possibly agree to more than another one, which would make eleven.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

259. Departmental administration, $194,450.

Item stands.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will not agree to any more?

Mr. STIRLING: No. That makes eleven.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): We have a few minutes left. I wonder if the house would allow me to proceed a stage with the resolution having to do with the application of the Civil Service Superannuation Act to certain diplomatic or consular representatives. I should like to introduce the bill based upon this resolution. This is a very simple matter.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the Prime Minister proposing to make a statement in explanation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I shall make a statement.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPLICATION OF CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT TO CERTAIN DIPLOMATIC OR CONSULAR REPRESENTATIVES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

as for the defence of Témiscouata, and I would ask you to tell the hon. member for Fraser Valley not to bang his desk.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will look after the member for Fraser Valley myself. When did I bang the desk?

Mr. POULIOT: If I was mistaken in thinking it was the hon. member for Fraser Valley I apologize.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member had better apologize and try to keep order a little more.

Mr. POULIOT: If what I have said is not absolutely according to the facts I am the first to offer an apology.

We think of Great Britain; she gives us a great example, an example of national defence which is real national defence. The British isles are now called an impregnable fortress. There are many Canadians over there who are there for the defence of that country. How is it that those who are always prone to call themselves good Britishers are not following the example of Great Britain in having the same thing done in Canada as in Great Britain, in making Canada a fortress? Some will say that it is impossible. Even a member of parliament has gone to the United States to tell the people there that the war should be decided outside this continent. I do not recall now his exact words, but that was the meaning. Now we shall hear some say that we have to defeat the enemy wherever he is, and the farther away the better for this country. That theory could be accepted only if we had a certain guarantee that Canada would not be invaded by the enemy before the end of this war. That guarantee cannot be given. It cannot be given by the Minister of National Defence. It cannot be given even by the Prime Minister. When I asked him that very question at the time the Scharnhorst and the Gneisenau had been getting out of French ports, I got no answer. I was told that my question was inconsiderate, that no one should ask such a question. How is it that there is such a blackout of intelligence, not to realize what the situation is now? We have the enemy right at our doorstep, and the admission of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services that German submarines have been sinking allied vessels in the St. Lawrence. It seems to be enough. It is not considered at all.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the sections 2 and 3 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried. Mr. POULIOT: No, sir. The CHAIRMAN: Those in favour will please say "aye".

Mobilization Act

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

The CHAIRMAN: Those opposed will please say "nay".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the ayes have it.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On the title.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Title agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. POULIOT: No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN: Those in favour will kindly say "aye."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

The CHAIRMAN: Those opposed will kindly say "nay."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the "ayes" have it.

Mr. POULIOT: This is a most unusual procedure.

The CHAIRMAN: Not at all.

Mr. POULIOT: It is worse than closure, because with closure you can at least speak for twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the "ayes" have it.

Mr. LACOMBE: On section 3, Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN: Section 3 is carried.

Mr. LACOMBE: Section 3 is not carried.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry, but it' is carried.

Mr. LACOMBE: It is not carried.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been carried. Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to speak on the third reading.

the question now, because we are entitled to know whether the working or the operation or the application of the act of 1940 has been successful. What I find strange is that as soon as something is decided by this house, as soon as some legislation is passed by the house in one direction, the opposite is done. The purpose of this legislation was the defence of Canada within its own boundaries, and it was after the fall of France that the government decided to establish conscription for home defence. But it was never for home defence; the object was to bring boys to camps where they were submitted to high pressure in order to induce them to enlist for service overseas.

I listened with interest and sorrow to the remarks of the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier). He is one of the best debaters in this house, and he has sugarcoated pills. But he knows very well about what happened at Cornwall, though no one objected to his remarks. He knows very well that there was no camp in regard to which the complaints were so numerous. I do not want to be unfair to anyone; I do not want to be unfair to the commanding officer of that camp, because perhaps he was following closely instructions he had been receiving from higher officers in the Department of National Defence and was bound to execute those instructions. Nevertheless I had numerous complaints. I have not so many friends in that part of the country as the hon. member for Stormont, but I have seen young soldiers coming from that camp at Cornwall who told me that the difference between rice soup and rice pudding was that little raisins were floating in the rice pudding, and so on and so on. But that is of no importance whatever. These are frugal men, and they do not insist so much upon the quality of the food that is offered them. Still they were subjected to a thing that is the cause of divorce; I mean mental cruelty. Those who were unwilling to enlist for service overseas were treated differently; they were made to wash the floors and so on. They had no better treatment than was accorded the winner of the Victoria Cross whom I brought to the committee the other day and who was cleaning spittoons in the house. I regret very much that during the last twenty-five years no one has taught the children what a hero is and who were the heroes of the last war. There were published some expensive books which nobody read; but the little boys and girls in the schools were not told of the prowess of the men, which was the honour and glory of the heroes of that war.

There is now another call for recruits. I have here a large French newspaper, the largest in America, La Presse of Montreal, [Mr. Pouliot.] and on the front page of the second section there is a news item of wide interest. Not only 15,000 recruits are to be called, not only 25,000, but 100,000 are to be called shortly, probably before the end of the year. I will translate that news item, which is of wide interest:

Thirty thousand recruits will be called in Quebec.

Of the 100,000 young men who will be called in service from August, in the whole dominion, it is believed that approximately 30,000 will be from the province of Quebec, we learn from an official source to-day. Medical classes A and B, and the classes from twenty to thirty years of age will be called. We have already observed that some young men of the twenty-year class have already received their notice.

The need of men in the army is more and more urgent and it is on account of that that there is such a call en masse. Nevertheless, if we consider that 30 to 40 per cent of the recruits are refused as unfit for military service, that number will not in fact be so large.

To come to what I said in the first place. after the Minister of National Defence went to London in the winter of 1940-41 and spent some time there, he undoubtedly made a pledge on behalf of this country to the British government. What was the number of Canadian men that he pledged to Great Britain on that occasion? No one knows. I have asked, but I have never obtained that information. The minister referred to it at one meeting at which two federal members were present, in the railway committee room of this building, some time after the adjournment of this house. Not only were we not informed of the number of men that had been pledged by the Minister of National Defence, but we were never informed as members of parliament that the Minister of National Defence had pledged men to Great Britain on that occasion. He told it at a meeting where there were many officers and only those two members of parliament; no other member of parliament was there, and I am surprised that my colleague and I have been kept in ignorance of what was done in England by the minister during that winter.

The number of men requisitioned by the Department of National Defence is twice the number that was required after that trip of the minister to Great Britain. What were the other commitments of this government or of any other member of this government to the British government with regard to the sending of men from Canada to Great Britain? We see that a certain number of men are called at certain periods, but we do not know the basis for that call.

Mr. Chairman, what I am saying now is just as much for the defence of Fraser Valley

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman has the floor. Will he kindly address the committee on sections 2 and 3?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir. As I have already said, the case is different with the department for naval services and the department for air on the one hand, and this department of militia on the other hand, because the minister for naval services and his colleague the minister for air indulge in recruiting in the normal way, by posters, certain propaganda and so on, but it is not at all the same system which binds the Department of National War Services and the Department of National Defence. If the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services—and I regret that his colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air is not here at present -needs men, the only way for him to get those men is through propaganda, by putting advertisements in the press that we need men for the navy. Similarly the Minister of National Defence for Air will advertise that we need men for the air force. But the Department of National Defence proceeds otherwise: and when it has not enough men, those fellows who are high-ranking officers, and many of whom have never been to any theatre of war either in the last war or in the present one-a fact which I am not going to withdraw, because it is established in a return and is well known to all hon. membersmay make a requisition in the same fashion as they requisition for Bren guns or anything else: "We need 2,000 Bren guns; we need 2,000 men, 10,000 men, 25,000 men, 30,000 men." They do not consider the effect of that order on men from the farms, from industry, lumberjacks, and so on. As the Prime Minister pointed out to me, in June, 1940, they do not consider at all the effect of taking those men away from their occupations, from the munitions plants, from railways, from the munitions plants, from tan-ways, from everywhere. They do not con-sider that at all. They say, "We need so many men and the men must come", just the same as they must have their Bren guns, or caps or uniforms or long coats or anything else. That is one thing. Another thing I want the Minister of Another thing I want the Minister of National Defence to tell this committee is what pledge he made in London when he was there in the winter of 1940-41; what pledge of men, Canadian men, not to the British army but to the English army; I would say first to the English army, and in the second place to British army. The minister may say that I do not know my business, but I take the trouble to read the publications of his department, and I have enough friends in the army who inform me Mobilization Act about what is going on. In fact he has never denied specifically any statement I have made with care and with proof in hand. During the last war there were four divisions, and it took all the man-power of Canada at the time to fill those four divisions. We are now making a war effort which is much more considerable than that of the last war. I am credibly informed that we have eight divisions, and therefore the number of men who are expected to fill those eight divisions should be twice as many as those who filled the four divisions during the last war. This may be denied, but I know that it is true. Therefore, since we had 600,000 men under arms during the last war, and since we nearly exhausted the man-power of our country at that time, if we double that man-power effort now the number of men required from this country in the three branches of the armed forces will be at least 1,200,000. It is impossible for us to send that number of men overseas when there are practically none to defend this country now. The Prime Minister stated in reply to one hon. gentleman opposite that the time was not ripe to submit the question of confidence to this house, and I maintain that it will not be opportune to do so unless the defence of this country is completed and assured. Therefore the government will have ample time to consider the matter, and I hope that no such order will be passed before the population of Canada is defended as it should be. Some of my hon. friends opposite and some on this side of the house are of the opinion that it should be done right now, and they have expressed their views in that regard. I respect such views when they come from one like the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray), who is a returned man, who went through the last war. I cannot conceive how anyone who is not a veteran of the last war and whose children are not all serving under the colours can say that he is in favour of conscription of others for service overseas. But conscription for home defence is the duty of every born Canadian and of every man born outside Canada who has made Canada the country of his choice.

Mr. CHURCH: Will the hon member permit a question before he concludes? Would he object to adding to the notices to be sent out in Témiscouata county a clause that the whole bill is dedicated to the honour of Ethelred the Unready?

Mr. POULIOT: I agree with my hon. friend on that; nothing is done with regard to defence. It is proper that we should discuss Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, should this chamber be subjected to a continual tirade by any hon. member reflecting on the headquarters staff or the officers in charge of his majesty's forces?

Mr. POULIOT: I think the point of order is childish.

The CHAIRMAN: I think an hon. member can under sections 2 and 3 state why he is or is not in favour of these provisions. These two sections refer to the National Resources Mobilization Act. There is sufficient connection between the bill before us and the National Resources Mobilization Act to justify references with respect to the general administration of that act. But I would call the attention of hon. members to the desirability of restricting such remarks as much as possible. We are not called upon to pass the mobilization act anew.

Mr. POULIOT: It is most difficult, Mr. Chairman, for anyone to make an argument when he is subjected to interruptions from hon. members who have not read the rules shortly before rising.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are now on sections 2 and 3, and my ruling has been given.

Mr. POULIOT: I know that. I am just explaining the difficulty I have now. I am not complaining about the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand, but I think we should proceed with the study of sections 2 and 3. These sections purport to remove the restrictions which were imposed by the act to the effect that no mobilization of man-power for service overseas could be ordered. Under this bill, if it is enacted, these restrictions will be removed. That is the gist of these two sections, to which the remarks of hon. members should be directed.

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot do so, sir, unless I show how that mobilization is effected now.

The CHAIRMAN: I must confess that I cannot see how remarks about the mummies of Egypt and the brass hats, and comparisons between high officers of the Department of National Defence and the mummies of Egypt, can help the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I will not continue.

Mr. RALSTON: I will ask that the hon. member be ordered to withdraw.

Mr. POULIOT: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RALSTON: I am getting entirely sick-

Mr. POULIOT: Well, be sick, and go. [Mr. Pouliot.] Mr. RALSTON: —of hearing a man who knows nothing about service overseas—

Mr. POULIOT: I know more than the minister does, because of his total ignorance.

Mr. RALSTON: —rising in his place and talking about men who have served overseas. The army council is composed of four men all of whom have seen service overseas, and is headed by the chief of the general staff, who has a Distinguished Service Order and a Military Cross to his credit.

Mr. POULIOT: What about the V.C. who works here?

Mr. RALSTON: It is about time that remarks of this kind ceased, about men who are serving their country well and faithfully.

The CHAIRMAN: It is out of order in any debate in the house to make offensive remarks with reference to His Excellency the Governor General, judges of the high court, or other high officials of the crown.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is citation 305.

The CHAIRMAN: Therefore I think the hon. member should eliminate from his speech any such remarks, particularly when these high officers are not here to defend themselves.

Mr. RALSTON: I ask that the hon. gentleman be requested to withdraw his remarks.

Mr. POULIOT: No, sir.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not care whether my hon. friend says "no" or not; I am not interested.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not going to withdraw for John de Kuyper gin.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order which has been raised, I must ask the hon. member to withdraw the offensive remarks he made concerning high officers of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. POULIOT: To my great humiliation, sir, I bow to your decision. Now I want the minister to sit down. I have the floor, and I do not want to be interrupted by anyone, especially by those whom I have to inform about the working of their departments especially, John de Kuyper gin.

This is the way in which requisitions are made for national resources, material and men. The officials of the Department of National Defence, and by that I mean militia only if the hon. gentleman cannot speak to answer my questions, Mr. Chairman, will you please tell him to keep silent when I speak? regulations, 1941", which were drafted in virtue of the mobilization act. Section 8 in those regulatons gave the minister power to extend indefinitely for the duration of the war the training period of conscripts, draftees or recruits.

Mr. RALSTON: The service period.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, the service period. In virtue of the first two orders in council it was training that was required from the conscripts; afterwards it was service. This means that the extension had been made by a stroke of the pen by the minister. The regulations passed by order in council gave him the discretion to act as he wished. Since the orders in council were made public by insertion in the Canada Gazette, why did the minister not proceed in the same manner in announcing his decision regarding the extension of training from four months to the duration of the war? I understand that the order of the minister appeared in the Canadian army orders but was not made public to the Canadian people. In fact that decision of the minister was first announced by Colonel Panet in Montreal, two days, I think, before the minister mentioned it. Why did the minister not inform the Canadian public of his decision earlier, and in the future will orders in council passed by the government by virtue of the mobilization act appear only in army orders or will they be published in the Canada Gazette as soon as they are made?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon, friend was referring to the four months training?

Mr. POULIOT: I am speaking of the two orders in council, one extending the training from one month to four months, and the other extending the four months training to the duration.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot throw my mind back to say just how the announcement was made, but I know that it was made in the most public fashion possible, either by a statement issued to the press or at a press conference. I have a very clear recollection that one change that was made, and I think it was this one, was announced in a statement made by the Prime Minister himself. I think it was in connection with the four months training that the Prime Minister issued that statement, and I have a half-recollection that it included an indication that the men called up would remain in the army after the four months training for the duration.

Mr. POULIOT: The order in council of March 18, 1941, related to the four months training, but it was only in the following summer, on July 2, that the order regarding service for the duration was signed by the minister. I would tell the minister that I remember the circumstances very well, because that summer I made a scrapbook of what the minister had done and of things pertaining to his department. I remember distinctly that the first announcement of this order was made by Colonel Panet in Montreal, and it was two or three days afterwards that the minister confirmed what Colonel Panet had said. The first news was given by Colonel Panet in a somewhat haphazard manner. I know that my memory is correct, and I could substanti-ate it by evidence if I were strong enough to bring my big scrapbook to the committee to-morrow.

Another thing which one has to understand well is that the position of the three war departments is not at all the same. Those who enlist in the naval service or in the air force do so voluntarily. They are volunteers, sailors or airmen as the case may be, and therefore the Department of National War Services has nothing to do with the Department of National Defence for Air and the Department of National Defence for Naval Services.

It must also be understood, as indeed it is understood by every hon. member, that the Department of National War Services is the feeder for the Department of National Defence, to bring in more men for that department, men who did not enlist voluntarily in the army. The Minister of National War Services thus is the milkman for the Minister of National Defence, and he brings in cream, butter, eggs and milk, and in a very nice way. Men are requisitioned by the Department of National Defence, and that requisition for men goes to the Department of National War Services in the same way that requisitions for material from the Department of National Defence go to the Department of Munitions and Supply. The Department of Munitions and Supply is the feeder in material just as the Department of National War Services is the feeder in manpower and woman-power.

To understand it all well one must remember that the old school tie is strong at headquarters. I see my hon. friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), who was in the Department of National Defence for some time, smiling broadly. He knows I am telling the truth. One must also remember what is a mummy. A mummy is an old Egyptian person tied up in tape, and it is the same thing with the brass-hats in the Department of National Defence. They are like old Egyptian mummies tied up in red tape. others. By way of illustration may I give the impact of the agricultural regulations which were enacted and made effective as from March 24. The impact is greater in some areas than it is in others, and affects the pool of manpower to a greater extent in one administrative division than in another.

Mr. GREEN: But how many notices will have to be sent out in order to get 25,000 men?

Mr. THORSON: I was informed that in the Toronto division, for example, for the July call approximately 20,000 notices had to be sent out.

Mr. GREEN: To get how many men?

Mr. THORSON: To fill the quota for administrative division B located at Toronto.

Mr. GREEN: What is the quota?

Mr. THORSON: About 2,400 or 2,500 men.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I noticed in a press report not long ago that in one province it was necessary to call 10,000 men in order to fill a quota of 600; is that correct?

Mr. THORSON: I would prefer to have the actual figures before me. However, the figure varies in different administrative divisons by reason of the facts I set out a moment ago.

Mr. CHURCH: How many of the 25,000 would be allotted to each province?

Mr. THORSON: The requisition comes to the Department of National War Services from the Department of National Defence, and it is broken up into very great detail, indicating the various training centres or depots to which the men are to report. The desire is to fill the training facilities of the various centres as efficiently as possible. If there are not enough men available in one administrative division to fill the requisitions for the various training centres or depots in that particular division, then a call is made on a neighbouring division.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would the minister give some further explanation of the point raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre wherein he stated that higher age groups are resorted to in some military districts than in others, when the call is sent out. A short time ago the Minister of National War Services stated that the pool of available men in administrative district C, covering that portion of eastern Ontario located around Ottawa and, I believe, a portion of Quebec, had been raised to a higher category. I understand [Mr. Thorson.] that was done along with one or two other divisions in the dominion. I believe at the present time men in this division in their early thirties are being called, while in other divisions they are not being called in such high categories. I can appreciate that where there is some difference in the available men, the ratio of allotments for men required for military service may vary. But in this particular area, administrative division C, we have an agricultural district in which we are suffering from a great shortage of help. I know that in my community large quantities of hay will not be harvested because of the shortage of farm help.

That is a critical condition. If the department goes ahead and calls up men in their thirties, up to the age of forty in this division, it is going to leave a very critical situation, one which is even more accentuated than it is now. It is critical now, so far as farm help is concerned. I should like to have from the minister a more detailed explanation than we have heard to date as to why such a situation should exist.

Mr. THORSON: The reply to the hon. member is exactly the reply I made to the hon. member for Vancouver South. As the pool becomes less in any one division, naturally the age groups called go up.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would the minister explain why the department raises the age group in a particular division instead of exhausting the already existing age group in another division, and filling up the quota in that way?

Mr. THORSON: Every single man or widower without child or children from twenty to forty in every part of Canada is subject to the proclamation.

Mr. BOUCHER: Subject to the proclamation, yes; but not actually being called. The result is that in some districts higher age groups are being called, while perhaps in a neighbouring district a smaller age group has not been exhausted. I should like to have an explanation of that point.

Mr. POULIOT: I hold in my hand a copy of Hansard in which orders in council were explained by the Minister of National Defence for Air, a colleague of the Minister of National Defence. By P.C. 4904 of September 17, 1940, the period of thirty-days training was ordered, and that order in council was published in the Canada Gazette. By P.C. 1910 of March 18, 1941, the thirty-day period was extended to four months, and that provision was also published in the Canada Gazette. Afterwards there were some regulations described as "reserve army special Mobilization Act than to the two sections now before the committee. The general administration of the act will come up for discussion at another time. I do not believe the remarks of the hon. member are sufficiently relevant to the two sections now before the committee.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not think the points of order raised by the Chair this evening were well taken, because my understanding of this bill is that it amends the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

The CHAIRMAN: In one particular.

Mr. MacINNIS: Very well. Section 2 of this bill amends section 2 of the 1940 act, and in discussing section 2 of Bill No. 80, we must discuss it in relation to the other part of this section of the National Resources Mobilization Act. Otherwise section 2 taken by itself does not make sense and has no substance. Sections 2 and 3 which the committee, I think wisely, have decided to consider together, make a whole; and everything contained in section 2 of the National Resources Mobilization Act is, I submit, a proper subject for debate at this time.

The CHAIRMAN: It might be shorter to listen to the remarks of the hon. member.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. However, I do not wish to debate the matter further. I will take it up, possibly in a more satisfactory way, with the Minister of National War Services.

Mr. THORSON: I shall be very glad to satisfy my hon. friend as to the situation now existing.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not think the Prime Minister replied to the question of the hon. member for Lake Centre with regard to the intention of the government in the matter of the lottery. The remarks of the Prime Minister on March 24 were so distinct that I know a great many people in Canada have been wondering when the lottery system was going to be commenced. The right hon. gentleman said, at page 1566 of Hansard:

In other words, the age limit for compulsory service has been raised from 24 to 30. It has also been decided to select the men to be called up for service by drawing lots over the whole field of those who are subject to the proclamation. As soon as the necessary administrative arrangements have been worked out for this plan of selection by lot, a detailed announcement will be made by the Minister of National War Services.

Has the government decided to give up the method of choosing by lot, or when does the Prime Minister expect it to be commenced?

Mobilization Act

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The information I gave to the house at that time came to me from the Minister of National War Services, who is in the house this evening and who, I understood intended to make some reference to the matter. I would ask him to do so now.

Mr. THORSON: I informed the hon. member for Lake Centre that the system of selection by lot would not be in effect for the August call, and that I was not sure whether it would be in effect for subsequent calls. When the Prime Minister made the statement about selection by lot he further stated that detailed plans with regard to the change from the former system would be announced by the Minister of National War Services when the administrative details had been worked out. I have found that the administrative details are more extensive than I had at first imagined. Furthermore, the call for the month of July, and the proposed call for the month of August, are substantial calls, and the various administrative divisions are concentrating their attention upon the important work of filling the requisitions that come from the Department of National Defence. The question of working out the administrative details, which are quite complicated in connection with the system of selection by lot, is being put aside for the time being. Whether it will be desirable to put such a system into effect in the light of all the circumstances and in the light of the heavy call is, as I indicated in my reply to the hon. member for Lake Centre, a matter which is under consideration.

Mr. CHURCH: Will the minister withdraw the lottery principle altogether?

Mr. THORSON: I indicated in my reply to the hon. member for Lake Centre that the question was under consideration.

Mr. CHURCH: You cannot beat Hitler with lotteries; he will beat you every time at that.

Mr. GREEN: Is there anything in the press report that in order to get 25,000 men it will be necessary to call 250,000?

Mr. THORSON: There has been some misunderstanding of the situation. The number of men who will be available in any particular division will depend upon the manpower pool still left there after all the various factors, such as voluntary enlistments which have already taken place in a particular division, and deferments or postponements for one reason or another, have been taken into account. I indicated earlier in reply to certain questions that the man-power pool available in some divisions was less than in done by a committee. I realize that it could not be done now, but I suggest that when we come back again such a committee be set up. They could also consider the regulations passed by the wartime prices and trade board. There is a great deal of misunderstanding in connection with those regulations, and it would help a great deal if they were considered by some committee of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The last part of the hon. member's remarks was rather reassuring, where he spoke of having a committee at another session. I have a certain sympathy with his outlook and would be inclined to consider carefully in the interval what steps might be taken to meet his wishes. But I would not think it advisable to attempt such a committee at this session.

Mr. GREEN: Yes; I realize that, and said so.

Mr. CHURCH: Many will be called but few chosen. Hitler may arrive first.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is a matter I want to bring to the attention of the Minister of National Defence, and I must do so to-night for fear I shall not have another opportunity before the session ends. It has been brought to my attention that certain employers are notifying their employees that under these war services regulations the government has made arrangements with them by which the government accepts the categories in which the employers place their employees in priority for calling them for service. If the minister would like to have the point made with a little more clarity, I should be glad to read a letter sent to each of its employees by a large company in British Columbia.

Mr. RALSTON: I know of such a suggestion from the Department of National Defence with respect to the reserve army. I know of no such suggestion from the Department of National Defence with regard to the active army. It must be some suggestion from the Department of National War Services or one of its boards, because I do not think the Department of National Defence has made any arrangement of the kind. Perhaps my hon. friend is dealing with the reserve army; is he?

Mr. MacINNIS: No; it affects all services. The first category is A, covering employees who the management consider should be available to the company at all times and who should not join the reserve army, A.R.P. or other civilian protection organizations.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the point; it is the reserve army, the A.R.P. or other civilian organizations. It has nothing to do with the active army.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. MacINNIS: Then there is the next category, B: employees who may join outside organizations other than the reserve army, but whose services with such organizations should be available only outside regular working hours. Then there is category C: employees who may join any of the services, active or reserve, but who, before doing so, should give their immediate superior proper notice. Then the last paragraph reads:

Telephone service is a vital necessity in every phase of military and civilian war activities and this is recognized by the government, who have left it to the management of the company to arrange for the retention of adequate trained personnel to maintain service.

The companies concerned, I am told, are using this agreement with the government or with the Department of National War Services, however you like to put it, to discriminate as between employee and employee. If they have one employee who has been active in trade union work they put him in category C, even though because of age, physical condition and for other reasons he should be in one of the other categories. I have these examples before me. This is a very dangerous and serious situation, when one employee finds himself discriminated against because of his labour activities; finds himself in such a category that if and when he is called, the company will make no effort to have his services retained, while another person who may be younger and more physically fit will have the company intercede on his behalf. I want to tell the ministers concerned that this is having a very serious effect on the morale of those working people who are likely to be called for military service.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to hear more about this, because if it has anything to do with the active army I am very much interested. May I say to my hon. friend that so far as I know there is no tribunal with any power to make any decision with regard to whether or not a man shall receive a postponement as far as his services in the active army are concerned, except the boards appointed under the department of my colleague the Minister of National War Services. If any other body is doing that or attempting to do it, it is acting absolutely without authority, as I understand the situation.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should be glad to furnish the information I have to both the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of National War Services.

The CHAIRMAN: I should like to point out that the remarks of the hon. member have been directed more to the general administration of the National Resources once and for all what this government will do, in a voice that will be heard all across Canada. Let them tell the people that delay and procrastination and expediency will no longer be considered as necessary elements in Canada's war effort.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): That is the speech of a leader!

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): A few minutes ago I asked the Prime Minister two questions. I am satisfied with the answer to the first, but far from satisfied with the answer to the second. The Prime Minister gives, as the only reason for not bringing down some bill containing these regulations, the element of time. He said nothing to refute the advisability of having such a bill. It seems to me that the argument of time is not a very strong one. The government started moving in this direction in June, 1940; in the speech from the throne in January of this year they intimated that they were going to ask the people to release them from certain moral obligations. The government have had these regulations under which men have been called up now for nearly two years. Surely it would not have been difficult to have these framed into a bill and have it brought down in the house during this session. It seems to me that the time of members of the House of Commons is not nearly as important as the effect on the morale of the people of Canada if we proceed to conscript human life in this country on the basis of a series of regulations administered by a series of boards, each of them administering and interpreting the regulations in their own way, with various age groups called up, and different bases upon which postponements and exemptions are granted. As the war progresses, the feeling between different parts of Canada, whether justified or not, that some parts are being discriminated against and some favoured, is bound to rise. It seems to me that the few days or even weeks it might take to pass such a bill would be fully justified by results.

As a matter of fact, the party of which the Prime Minister is leader fought its most heated political battle in 1917 around this very issue, when it refused to give the Union government of that day power to conscript human life by regulation, and insisted that the clauses and conditions under which men would be called up should be placed on the statute books. The Prime Minister says that what the government want most is with all possible speed to get this power. That does not jibe very well with the statement he made on July 7 that they propose to refer this matter back to parliament for a vote of confidence, and if parliament is not sitting, to take the few days to call parliament together. If he is going to have time to call parliament and refer this matter back for a vote of confidence, he certainly could find time to bring a bill down in this house and, if necessary, refer it to a special committee and place something on the statute books that will be uniform, standardized, so that the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific will know that the same conditions, the same responsibility, the same obligations, rest equally and equitably upon all Canadians and that there is no loophole for possible discrimination, favouritism or partisanship. The feeling that there is such a loophole is bound to occur in war time unless every possible precaution is taken against it. It seems to me that it would be in keeping with the tradition of the government's party to bring down such a bill and thereby assure the people of Canada that the conscripting of human life is done on the most fair and equitable basis possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is this difference between the situation in 1917 and that to-day. In 1917 all the regulations had still to be framed. To-day we have regulations that have been in existence since the National Resources Mobilization Act was passed. The act has been on the statute books now for a couple of years; the regulations have been framed; action has been taken under them; they are known, and what is perhaps most important of all is that the years have brought experience in the framing of regulations, the benefit of which could not have been obtained in any other way. The regulations that will govern hereafter will be, as I said a moment ago, to all intents and purposes the same regulations, only made applicable over a wider area. Therefore the necessity for any legislative enactment setting out the regulations at this time is entirely different from what it was in 1917. It is correspondingly unnecessary.

Mr. GREEN: In connection with the suggestion of the hon. member for Weyburn, does the Prime Minister not think it might be wise if a special committee were set up whose duty it would be to consider such regulations as are passed from time to time under the National Resources Mobilization Act?

An hon. MEMBER: No, there are too many committees.

Mr. GREEN: Those regulations affect the lives of hundreds of thousands of Canadians and affect them drastically. It would go a long way toward doing away with misunderstanding if the representatives of the people in this house were able at least to go over the regulations carefully. This could very well be system in order to distribute the call equitably across the dominion. My question is this—and I submit that it is relevant and one on which the people of Canada have a right to have information: How is this act when amended going to be carried into effect? Here we are in the month of July calling up 25,000 men, not on the basis of population in the various provinces, but in a haphazard manner, and in the month of August, 15,000—

Mr. RALSTON: It is the other way about; 15,000 in July and 25,000 in August.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, 15,000 in July.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not call them. The Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) is not here at the moment, but they are called on the basis of population.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will come to that in a moment. There will be 15,000 in July and 25,000 in August—

Mr. POULIOT: And 35,000 in September.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What the number will be in September we do not know yet. The minister says they are being called up according to population. I have here a return brought down on July 20 in answer to a series of questions which I asked over six weeks ago in order to ascertain the position of affairs in so far as the man-power situation in Canada was concerned. This is the question I asked:

Has a survey been made by the government with a view to ascertaining how many men are still available for military service in each of the foregoing classes?

That is the classes from eighteen to fortyfive years of age.

If so, who made the survey and when was it made?

How many men were estimated to be still available for military service by provinces, military districts and/or administrative divisions in each of the said age groups?

Surely, after nearly three years of war the government should be in a position to tell the people what it will do with the powers that are being given under this act, what its plans are, how many men will be allocated to agriculture, how many to industry and how many to the armed services of the country. Yet here is the answer given by the government:

The question of the number of men available for military training in the age groups subject to proclamation is under continuous consideration by the registrars of the administrative divisions and the mobilization division of the Department of Natonal War Services. It is not possible to say definitely at any given time how many men are still available for military training in each division until after the necessary deductions have been made for voluntary enlistments, persons rejected on application for enlistment, men unfit for military service, men essential to war industries, persons wholly or mainly employed in agriculture within P.C. 2252, persons whose military training will be postponed as conscientious objectors, et cetera, in the national interest, et cetera.

That is the answer of the government to the people of Canada-it reveals no planno survey. No one knows what will happen when this act is amended, who will be called, how many will be called. There is continuing uncertainty and delay. I ask the government to tell the people to-night-not next September, October or December, but to-nightwhat they may expect, what the plans of the government are, and whether the main effort of this dominion will be concentrated, in the armed services, in agriculture or in industry. Surely it is time that this government, having had ample opportunity since March 24, should give a better answer than was given yesterday by the Minister of National War Services. When I asked him if the lottery system would be brought into effect, he said, "The question is being given reconsideration". Does that mean that a decision was made that it would not be brought into effect and that the matter is now being reconsidered? The Minister of National Defence says that they call the manpower of this dominion according to population-

Mr. RALSTON: I said I did not make the call, but I assumed or understood that that was so.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then why is it that in certain districts in Ontario, according to the return brought down here yesterday, they are calling men from twenty-five to thirty years of age, and that in other parts of Canada they are not calling them beyond twenty-three and twenty-four? Is there any equity or equality of service in that? I ask the government to-night in the interests of the morale of this country, in the interests of the men in the services, in the interests of the people as a whole, to announce its policy and plan definitely once and for all.

The Prime Minister says we will wait until conditions get worse and then, after we decide as a government to bring into effect conscription for overseas service, parliament will be called. Surely with conditions as they are to-day all over this world no one can say that they could be much worse. I ask the government—not in a critical sense, there has been nothing critical in the words I have spoken to-night—I implore the Prime Minister and the government to tell the people in the form of an act. To introduce further legislation at this session would help to defeat one of the main purposes of this legislation, namely to get into the hands of the government, as soon as possible, the power which it is desirable it should have at this particular time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Just to follow up this question which the Prime Minister has just answered, is it still the intention, if the order in council he has mentioned is passed, that before it can become effective he shall consult parliament for a vote of confidence, as he stated in one of his speeches on the second reading?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall have something to say about that a little later on.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think it has a distinct bearing on these sections, because I know, as one of the members of this house, that many people throughout the country, especially in the armed forces, have not very much confidence in the government as constituted with the present leader; they pin their faith to the ministers of the armed forces.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, it is because of hon. members like my hon. friend who has just spoken that I have felt it absolutely necessary to have an expression of the confidence of this house before I undertake to put into force any conscription act with respect to service overseas.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As soon as these amendmen's are passed, those men called to service under this bill will, subject to proclamation, be available for service overseas, subject to further submission to parliament, or whatever the scheme is which the Prime Minister intends to follow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no submission to parliament with regard to conscription. Let me make it perfectly clear that, so far as coming back to parliament for any purpose is concerned, there will be no coming back to parliament for a second debate on conscription, nor will there be any coming back to get the approval of parliament of the decision made. When the government makes its decision that decision is made, and it will be carried out either by this government or by some other government. It will not have to be approved by parliament first. The question whether or not a ministry headed by myself will enjoy sufficient confidence in the minds of hon. members of this House of Commons and of the people of this country to administer conscription, once it has been decided that conscription for service overseas shall be enforced, is a separate matter, and it is a matter on which I shall wish to have an expression of confidence.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The point I was coming to is this. As soon as these amendments are passed, all men will be called up and will be subject to service overseas.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right, once an order in council to that effect is passed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Once an order in council is passed, as the Prime Minister says. Then the matter of the call-up of these men becomes very important. Parliament places the power in the hands of the government to determine when and if these men shall be sent overseas. The time has come for the government to place before this house the plans it has in reference to the calling up of men. The present scheme of calling up men is working a detriment to industry and to agriculture. It is not distributing the sacrifice fairly across Canada by provinces and according to population. Some months ago, on March 24, the Prime Minister announced, when he referred to orders in council in reference to man-power that had been passed, that a proclamation was being issued. I quote from page 1566 of Hansard:

A proclamation is being issued making liable to call for military training and service all men born in the years from 1912 to 1921, who on July 15, 1940, were unmarried or widowers without children. In other words, the age limit for compulsory service has been raised from 24 to 30. It has also been decided to select the men to be called up for service by drawing lots over the whole field of those who are subject to the proclamation. As soon as the necessary administrative arrangements have been worked out for this plan of selection by lot, a detailed announcement will be made by the Minister of National War Services.

The Prime Minister recognized on March 24 last that the scheme of calling men then in effect and still in effect was not such as would fairly distribute the call across the dominion, and announced that, in order to carry into effect the scheme he had in mind, the lottery system would be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. member is too far afield. Sections 2 and 3 are not capable of supporting the line of reasoning he is now developing.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What I am trying to find out and what the people of Canada want to know is this. What is this government going to do with the power when it is given it? How will the scheme be administered? On March 24 the Prime Minister promised the establishment of the lottery second reading, I should like to ask two questions arising out of the second objection, the matter of requisitioning human life by order in council. The first is this, what is the intention of the government with reference to this order in council? For instance, will it be an order in council which will place all men that have been or are likely to be called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act on an active service basis? In other words, will there be an order in council wiping out the distinction, so that we shall no longer have two armies in Canada, but one, or is it the intention of the government merely to pass a series of orders in council calling groups of men from the army in Canada, the garrison army, into the active army. It is important that we should know what the government intends to do. If the government intends to do the latter, it means really piecemeal conscription, and it seems to me that the government must have some intention in mind now as to their policy. In that regard, do they intend to take the entire National Resources Mobilization Act force and place it on an active service basis, not necessarily sending it overseas, but wiping out all distinctions, or do they intend merely on a piecemeal basis to call a unit here and a unit there, pass an order in council and send such units overseas?

Second, in view of the fact that this is enabling legislation, will these men continue to be called up for active service overseas on the basis of the war service regulations at present in existence? I doubt if many hon. members know fully what these war service regulations are. They have been amended from time to time. Orders in council have been frequently passed. On March 24, the Prime Minister tabled orders in council Nos. 2250, 2251 and 2252. The last order in council said this:

A board-

That is the national war services board.

-subject to the approval of the minister, may make rules not inconsistent with these regulations for its guidance and to govern its procedure.

I am not going to repeat what has been gone over so often, particularly when the national war service estimates were up, but it is common knowledge that the rules passed by these boards, that is the sets of interpretations issued by them, vary from military district to military district. These regulations are open to various interpretations in various places. I am sure there is hardly one hon. member from a rural constituency who has not come across the fact that men have been called up since March 24 who were totally ignorant of the fact that order in council 2252 had been passed; they have been called up despite the fact that they were bona fide farmers on farms on March 23. Apparently the board has paid little or no attention to that unless the man was in a position to make his plea on the basis of that order in council.

I should like to make an appeal to the government. It seems to me it would be much more satisfactory to everyone concerned to incorporate all these regulations and orders in council in a bill, bring it down to this house, have it passed by this house, and leave the proclamation of it until such time as the government decides to pass the order in council placing men under the National Resources Mobilization Act on active service. The act could then be proclaimed, and the men who were subject to call would know what their responsibilities were, what rights and privileges they had, who had the right to exemption and who had not. It would be there in statutory form; it would be the law of Canada, and above all it would be uniform for the whole of Canada. There would be no feeling that it varied from province to province, and that there were different interpretations of regulations in one province as against another.

My questions are, first, how the government proposes to deal with this matter by order in council, and second, whether it would be possible to put these regulations into a bill and have it passed by this house and proclaimed when and if this government decides it is necessary.

Mr. CHURCH: This is all shadow-boxing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the government decides that it is necessary and advisable to resort to conscription as a method of raising men for service overseas, an order in council will be passed dealing with members of the forces as a whole. It will not be a matter of passing a series of orders in council, but one order in council will cover the entire force. That, I think, answers my hon. friend's first question.

As to the second, what he proposes is further legislation at this session of parliament, the introduction of an act which will amount to a military service act or something equivalent to it. My hon, friend will realize that that would mean a second debate, which would resolve itself into going over, time and time again, very much the ground already covered, notwithstanding that at the present time we have the existing regulations in reference to the calling up of men under the mobilization act. Any regulations that will be passed with respect to service overseas, I should say, broadly speaking, would be similar if not wholly identical. I cannot see wherein it is necessary to embody all these regulations

Mr. CARDIN: Where is that restriction in the bill?

Mr. RALSTON: The restriction is that the power is given to the governor in council by the bill, and not to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. RAYMOND: At the present time is an order in council required to send overseas those who have enlisted voluntarily?

Mr. RALSTON: You do not need a special order in council for that.

Mr. RAYMOND: But their expenses have to be paid.

Mr. RALSTON: The order in council is passed when the war appropriation bill is enacted. Then the treasury board makes certain allotments to the Department of National Defence for certain specific purposes, and out of these moneys are paid the transportation costs.

Mr. RAYMOND: But you will require an order in council to send them overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: That is all we require now. The act as it stands now authorizes the governor in council to call upon person's and property for any purpose within the scope of the act, subject to this, that the government cannot under the present powers require persons to serve compulsorily outside Canada. The governor in council has passed an order in council requiring men to serve but has placed a limitation in the order in council similar to that which is contained in section 2, to the effect that they shall not be required to serve outside Canada. After this section 2 is repealed, if the governor in council takes action to require them to serve overseas, then that is effective, but not on the action of the Minister of National Defence, not until the governor in council has actually authorized it.

Mr. CARDIN: In that case there would be no necessity for an order in council to send them overseas. The order in council, as I understand it, is to call up the trainees by classes, and once they are called up they come under the Department of National Defence and are in the same position as the volunteers.

Mr. RALSTON: It depends, of course, upon the terms of the order in council which is to be passed under the terms of the unrestricted measure. I cannot forecast what the terms of the order in council will be. An order in council might be passed giving the Minister of National Defence power to call them and to prescribe the service they shall be called upon to do, or it might reserve that to the governor in council. One would think that the order in council would provide that those called up shall be liable for service anywhere, and that liability would be actually put into effect on the order of the Minister of National Defence. That is exactly the procedure which prevails now in regard to calling up trainees for service in Canada. At the present time the governor in council by order in council prescribes that men who are called up under proclamation are subject to the order of the Minister of National Defence as to their training, duty and service, but there is a limitation that they shall not be required to serve outside Canada. If a new order in council were passed under the unrestricted measure, I would assume that that restriction would be left out, and under those circumstances the Minister of National Defence would have power to order them overseas, but only after the governor in council has made the decision and formally executed that decision by an order in council.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Sections 2 and 3 of this bill provide only for the words which are to be deleted. It seems to me that in order to discuss the meaning of these two sections properly we have to realize how they stand when the words proposed to be deleted are taken out. Section 2 will then read:

The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, requiring persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of His Majesty in the right of Canada, as may be deemed necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the defence of Canada, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community.

Actually what happens, apart from the promise made by the Prime Minister, which was contingent upon his remaining head of the government, is that when Bill No. 80 is passed by the house the government will have complete power for the conscription of all the resources of Canada for service anywhere in the world.

I should like to direct two questions to the minister who is piloting the measure through the house. The group with which I am associated here raised two objections to this piece of legislation: first, that it did not provide for the conscription of wealth and industry, and second, that the terms and conditions under which men would be called up for service overseas were not being set out and that the conscription of men would be by order in council. Leaving aside the first objection, which I think was dealt with adequately on the graduating class. In the month of June, out of a graduating class of 329, no less than 121 were French Canadians. In attendance at[•] that time at the school were 1,106 officers, 305 of whom were French Canadians.

The committee will remember that the officer in command of this school is none other than Colonel Milton Gregg, V.C., the Sergeantat-Arms of this house, who came back from England with a distinguished military record. The chief instructor at that school is Colonel Blais, a distinguished French-Canadian officer.

I should like to say a word or two with reference to army instruction manuals. A special organization under the direction of the general staff has been set up to translate all military literature previously published only in English, and now more than 100 manuals which heretofore had not been translated into French are available in French to students of the various army training centres.

Recently the minister announced the appointment of Major-General P. E. Leclerc as the commander of the 7th division. That appointment was well received all across Canada. I hope that the minister will be able before long to announce another such appointment.

The 7th division will have an all French-'Canadian brigade group consisting of an artillery regiment, engineering company, signal sections, three infantry battalions, one machine-gun battalion and field ambulance, army service corps and ordnance units. This brigade will be commanded by Brigadier J. A. Leclaire, who has recently come back from England with an excellent record.

During the year 1942 one bilingual infantry battalion, the Sherbrooke Fusiliers, has been incorporated into the 4th armoured division. A French-Canadian battalion will hereafter form part of the army tank brigade of the second Canadian army. The army programme for the present year includes the formation of the following French-Canadian units: A regiment of medium artillery R.C.A., a battalion of engineers, five field batteries R.C.A., a searchlight battery R.C.A., five infantry battalions, an ordnance corps unit, a field ambulance, a general hospital, a provost company and a forestry company.

My hon, friend the member for Témiscouata asked a moment ago about the training centre at Cornwall. That training centre is commanded by a French-Canadian officer.

Mr. POULIOT: A French-Canadian officer who does not speak a word of French.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend apparently is not in possession of the facts. Colonel [Mr. Chevrier.] Larose, whom I know personally, the officer commanding the training centre at Cornwall, speaks French fluently.

The roll of French-Canadian regiments on active service in Canada and overseas already constitutes an impressive representation. It follows from this that French Canadians are playing a more and more important part in the army. It is unfortunate that the treatment meted out to them in this war was not accorded to them in the last war and since, because had that been done we would not have had what is happening at the moment. French Canadians in the Canadian army are on the way to writing in the military annals of Canada a page that forever will be to their pride and honour. Had it not been for the sympathetic understanding of the Minister of National Defence, this could not have been accomplished. Again I commend him heartily, and I have every reason to believe that any inequalities which may now or hereafter exist will be made to disappear.

Mr. RAYMOND: I should like to have some information from the Minister of National Defence with reference to the trainees who have been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. When this bill is passed there will be two classes of trainees, as indeed there are at the present time: those who have enlisted voluntarily for service overseas, and those who have been called to a training centre under the act. I understand that there is a difference between these two classes, that those who have been called up under the mobilization act cannot be sent overseas. What will be the difference between these two classes when the bill is passed. Will those who have been called up under the mobilization act one month ago or two months ago or six months ago be liable to be sent overseas as soon as this bill is passed, like those who have enlisted voluntarily for service overseas? I should like to know exactly what their status will be.

Mr. RALSTON: The governor in council would have power under this amendment to make them liable to be sent overseas, but the passing of this bill does not make them liable. There has to be one further step, a decision to send them overseas and action by the government to put that decision into effect.

Mr. RAYMOND: But the Minister of National Defence, once this bill passes, will have the right to send them overseas just as if they had enlisted voluntarily?

Mr. RALSTON: Not until the government has so decided.

which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of May 25. This article quotes General McNaughton from somewhere in England, and reads as follows:

Lieut.-Gen. McNaughton, commander-in-chief of the Canadian army overseas, disclosed in an interview that there has been a gradual increase in the number of French-Canadian officers in responsible army posts. "Obviously", the general said, "we cannot form overnight among the French Canadians as many leaders as we would wish but, gradually the number in responsible posts is increasing. I have always had in mind a plan to which I firmly adhere, that of including within the framework of commands a number of French-Canadian officers in proportion to the number of French Canadians in the Canadian army."

Paying tribute to the work of the soldiers of French Canada, the army chief said, "I assure you that the French-Canadian troops are well entrenched and they are acquiring military polish in marvellous fashion".

"It goes without saying that at the start, certain Canadians of the French tongue encountered some difficulty in expressing themselves in English and in understanding thoroughly what they were being taught", Gen. McNaughton said. "But, in one way or another, we adapted ourselves to this situation."

"Thus, advanced military training is given in English, but when it arises that a French Canadian has trouble understanding the instructions, he is given a preparatory course in order to help him complete his training with the same facility as his English colleagues. In this respect, it must be said that we have received all the necessary sympathy and encouragement."

I presume the sympathy and encouragement to which General McNaughton refers are the sympathy and encouragement he has received from the department.

Next I would point out to the committee that there were set up in a number of important centres across Canada civilian committees composed of prominent French-Canadian citizens whose duty it was to seek out—

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to a point of order. Has this speech anything to do with sections 2 and 3? I suggest it has not.

Mr. CHEVRIER; This speech has to do with section 3, because it concerns persons who will hereafter serve in military units overseas. I am speaking at the moment of those who are being prepared for that service.

The CHAIRMAN: It is permissible for an hon. member to state his reasons why he believes sections 2 and 3 should be enacted, and the reasons for which he favours those sections. The general principle of the legislation cannot be discussed, but the member may say why sections 2 and 3 of the bill would properly carry out the principle indicated on second reading. The ruling is not debatable, of course, but I would point out to the hon. member for Broadview that when I ruled him out of order he was discussing •the principle of the bill, which should have been done on second reading.

Mr. POULIOT: If one hon. member has the right to say he is for it, we must have the right to say we are against it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: When the point of order was raised I was pointing out that civilian committees were set up, and that prominent French-Canadian citizens had accepted it as their duty to seek out officer material, make recommendations and find out what qualifications the men possessed. It was then up to the district officer commanding to approve or reject the recommendations. In military district No. 3, Kingston, I am happy to say that eighty-two young French-Canadian men have been selected because of their qualifications to be sent to advanced training schools.

Then, again, it is important to know that a special school for these young men was opened at St. Jerome, in the province of Quebec. At that point young potential officers are given one month's basic training. If they qualify after that time they are sent to the cadet wing of the school, at which point they are given another month's training similar to a sort of pre-training for officers. In both instances it is to be remembered that these young men receive their instructions in the French language from French officers and French instructors. They receive it in their own language. If they are found to be up to standard they are sent to the officers training centre at Brockville, where they receive four months training. Again they receive the training in French, if they are unable to understand English. At that point they mingle with their English-speaking compatriots from all across Canada. Besides the Brockville training school and the preparatory school at St. Jerome, a bilingual school for non-commissioned officers was set up at Megantic, in the province of Quebec. This school has the task of supplying Frenchspeaking instructors for military training. centres in eastern Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick. The number of these instructors is proportioned to the number of French-Canadian soldiers. In the officers' training centre the proportion is even higher.

In Brockville the staff is made up of both French- and English-speaking instructors, so that language is no handicap either in the classroom or at the examination table. Last March, as the house probably knows, at one graduation exercise at the officers' training centre in Brockville, French Canadians constituted more than a quarter of the total dignity of that high calling, our ancestors have turned a savage wilderness into a glorious empire; and have made the most extensive, and the only honourable conquests, not by destroying but by promoting the wealth, number and happiness of the human race.

This is the darkest hour of the war. During the seven months we have been sitting here talking about what changes might be made in the mobilization act, what has been happening in the world? Up to date we have lost the war, with all the defeats we have suffered on land, on sea and in the air. Even before we adjourn the enemy may be up the St. Lawrence. A great Frenchman, Sir Etienne-Pascal Taché, said:

If this country ever ceases to be British, the last shot for the preservation of British sovereignty in America will be fired by a French-Canadian.

On the monument to Wolfe and Montcalm in Quebec this inscription may be seen:

Valour gave them a common death, history a common fame, and posterity this common monument.

We must get back to those principles. What is the mother country doing for us to-day? We all know that but for her and her fleet and air force this bill would not be necessary; we would have someone in here, the axis powers, who would not consider referendums, plebiscites and all that sort of thing. As Mr. Lyttleton, the British Minister of Production told the people of the United States, when commenting on the help they are giving Canada and the United Kingdom, the mother country is producing tanks, jeeps and other vehicles at the rate of 257,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry, but I cannot follow the hon. gentleman. I must apply standing order 58.

Mr. CHURCH: I have a great deal of respect for your ruling, Mr. Chairman. Therefore I may have to make the remainder of my observations on third reading. I do not wish to interfere with the rules of the house.

Mr. DONNELLY: I should like to ask a question arising out of one of the remarks or questions asked by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères. Is it not a fact that many men from Saskatchewan called under this legislation are sent to other provinces? Are not some sent to Quebec, some to Ontario, some to Manitoba and some to the other provinces?

Mr. RALSTON: That is so, and for the same reason, namely, a matter of accommodation. As I said before, we try as far as possible to accommodate the men of each province in basic training centres. Sometimes [Mr. Church.] the accommodation is more crowded in one province than in another, and therefore adjustments are made accordingly.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should like to make one or two observations concerning a group of persons required to serve in the military forces and outside the territorial waters of Canada by virtue of the repeal of section 3, as well as a few observations concerning the group which heretofore were required to serve within the territorial waters of Canada. In other words, I should like to say something concerning the treatment of and the part played by French-Canadian officers and men in the army, the treatment received by them at the hands of the Department of National Defence, and particularly the treatment received by them at the hands of the minister of that department.

Mr. POULIOT: Speak about the Cornwall camp.

Mr. CHEVRIER: During the debate on the bill much was said about conscription. I do not intend to speak on that subject, because perhaps too much has been said already. But little-perhaps too little-has been placed upon the record as to the treatment accorded our people at the hands of the Department of National Defence. Many facilities have been accorded them, and I should like to commend the minister for what he has done in that respect. I should like to say to him how appreciative my people are of what he has done, and I say to him further that he deserves the commendation of all thoughtful French Canadians.

At the outset of the war the people of my race flocked to the colours in the same proportions as did the people of other races. Unfortunately I believe on that occasion some injustices were committed. I refer to the fact that officers in the army were not given ranks in proportion to the number of men who had enlisted. At the moment I can think of certain regiments in eastern Ontario which, after they had mobilized, were sent overseas, and in which to-day few if any French-Canadian officers are serving. I am happy to say, however, that while the position has not been entirely remedied, the department has taken cognizance of it and has by several methods attempted to remedy an anomaly which should never have existed.

I should like to place on record a number of things which have been done to help our people, and to assure the French Canadians that the army belongs to them just as mucn as it does to those of English descent. In this connection I would quote from an article see a total war effort. The government should get on with the war, because men are needed. Since eight o'clock we have had several hon. gentlemen raising various points in connection with this bill. We cannot defend the St. Lawrence by raising points in committee here. As you know, sir, but for the British fleet the enemy would have been up the St. Lawrence long ago, and we would have experienced what they have suffered in all the low countries of Europe; the gestapo, the loud speaker, the whip and everything else.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe the hon. gentleman is speaking to the principle of the legislation, and that would not be in order. We are now on section 2, and we must limit the discussion to the provisions of this section.

Mr. CHURCH: I have great respect for the Chair, but I wish to speak to the principle of the bill—there is one in each section of it—and I gave up my right to do so before the vote was taken on second reading, at the request of the government whip, in order to accord more time to the right hon. Prime Minister. I do not wish to claim any special privilege in that connection, but I do want to speak to the principle involved in section 3.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on section 2. The hon. gentleman cannot speak to the principle of the bill. If he has any remarks to make in connection with section 3, would he please wait until we reach that section?

Mr. CHURCH: I will speak on section 2 if you wish, because the same principle is contained there. Under section 2 the National Resources Mobilization Act did not raise an army, and no one knows that better than hon. members of this house.

The CHAIRMAN: Would it be more convenient for the committee to discuss sections 2 and 3 together? They are somewhat linked together. Is it the pleasure of the committee to take these two sections at the same time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

On sections 2 and 3 together—Special powers of the governor in council—limitation in respect of service overseas.

Mr. CHURCH: That is what I was proposing to do, Mr. Chairman, to take sections 2 and 3 together, because now section 2 is out and section 3 is the only one remaining. The principle contained in section 3 is whether you are to limit this measure to home defence and the territorial waters of Canada, or whether it is to extend to Europe, 44561-2883

Mobilization Act

Asia and everywhere else. That is one question, but that is not the question before the people to-day, according to the principle contained in section 3. After the vote was taken on the second reading the Prime Minister said, "We are going to amend this act, but we are going to keep a string on it. We will do so-and-so if, as and when it may be necessary." Then two or three weeks later he added another string, when he said that before this principle could be extended he would have to come back to this house for a vote of confidence, and that parliament would decide in the end.

I want to point out to the hon. members from the province of Quebec that history always repeats itself. The enemy came up the St. Lawrence once before, in 1774, and appeared before the citadel at Quebec.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, please. The hon. gentleman is not discussing the phraseology of sections 2 and 3, as to whether they properly carry out the principles approved by the house on second reading. He is making a speech which would have been in order on the motion for second reading, but under standing order 58 it is not in order in committee.

Mr. CHURCH: Probably I should have spoken on second reading, but if I am ruled out any further I can speak on third reading. I would have spoken for only a very few moments if I had not been interrupted, but if necessary I can complete my remarks on third reading. I do not want to urge this point, but I was promised that I would have an opportunity to discuss the principle of Bill No. 80 when we came to consider section 3.

How are we going to raise an army under the existing legislation? What is the use of blaming the Minister of National Defence, trying to make him the scapegoat, when neither he nor anyone else could get an army under section 3 of this bill? I would defy any minister of the crown to do so, the way his hands are tied by this legislation, with all the strings, the riders and the provisos which were added to section 3. This is not what the people voted for. They voted for a total war effort, and they are not getting it. I just want to remind my colleagues from the province of Quebec that history always repeats itself. Let me refer to a great authority on military affairs, a great statesman and a great friend of the province of Quebec. In 1774 Edmund Burke, referring to the necessity of sending an army then from the motherland to defend the citadel of Quebec, said:

We ought to elevate our minds to the greatness of that trust to which the order of providence has called us. By adverting to the delete those words from the original section 2. That is the only question now before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: I admit it, sir. The very purpose of section 2 is to withdraw one part which was essential in the section and which submitted the operation of section 2 of the act of 1940 to the provision contained in section 3 of that act, forbidding the sending of our men overseas. The point that is vital and of the utmost importance is precisely the way in which the trainees-call them trainees, draftees, recruits or what you will-are treated in the camps so as to induce them by hard pressure to enlist for service overseas. This is disguised conscription, much worse than open conscription. If we are to have conscription, let us have it in the open way, without concealment, without hiding, without hypocrisy, without high pressure to force those who are called up to enlist voluntarily for service overseas. My contention is that section 2 will be useless, because we already have conscription, not in the statute book but disguised conscription by members of the Department of National Defence, a large number of whom have never seen any theatre of war but who decide upon sending others to the firing line. That is what is being done. The first example should be given by those very men. At times I have been interrupted by hon. members in high standing who said I was not speaking reverently enough of those who were shedding their blood for this country. I was not speaking of them but only of people in the Department of National Defence at Ottawa who have shed their blood only by scratching their fingers when tying red tape.

I should like to have something definite, something clear. I do not want any member of the government to state that we have no conscription, because we have disguised conscription, which I cannot bear. If conscription is necessary, let them take the responsibility for it, although I do not think conscription for service overseas is necessary. But be men; do it in the open. Do not do it by the backdoor; do it by the front door. That is the way to do it. What I cannot stand is the statement that we have no conscription, that everyone is a volunteer for service overseas, when this pressure is put upon them. Although the minister says he does not know about it I know it is true. I know the instructions come to the officers commanding and then are communicated by the officers commanding of the various districts to the colonels or commanders of regiments. That is the way it is done, in virtue of those orders from Ottawa.

[The Chairman.]

The CHAIRMAN: Order. These remarks would be in order on the estimates of the department, but they are hardly in order when determining how we could best carry out the principle of the legislation adopted by the house on second reading. Is it proper that the words "subject to the provisions of section 3 hereof" be struck out? It is not the principle of the legislation we are considering. The committee must decide whether it is expedient to strike out from section 2 the words "subject to the provisions of section 3 hereof."

Mr. CARDIN: On the point of order; the striking out of the words referred to from section 2 is what really matters in the bill. When those words are struck out of that section the government will have the power to conscript for military service everywhere in the world, and I submit that on that very section all the questions relating to mobilization can properly be discussed. When that section is amended it will provide for the government the power by order in council to take the goods and property of any individual and force him to give his service to the country anywhere the government may decide. Therefore I think this is the proper time to discuss all questions pertaining to this matter.

The CHAIRMAN: I agree with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman, except that we cannot discuss here, in general terms, the principle of the legislation. The principle has been decided upon on second reading. The committee has to decide whether section 2 of this bill is carrying out, in a proper way, the principle that the house has adopted.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to discuss section 2 which links up with section 3 of this famous mobilization act which in many respects has failed to mobilize an adequate army. Section 2 begins:

Subject to the provisions of section ${\bf 3}$ hereof. . . .

Section 3 relates to limitation in respect of service overseas. The original section reads:

The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

That is to be struck out by this bill, and the only question before the committee to-night is that amendment.

There was a referendum preceding this bill. I do not wish to go into the merits of the question to-night. I have a great deal of sympathy for the government, and I know everyone on this side of the house wants to have been issued up to date, the so-called trainees, after they have reported in district No. 4 or No. 5 in Quebec, have been scattered in certain sections of Canada, particularly in Ontario?

Mr. RALSTON: I would not say it is a fact that most of the trainees have been scattered.

Mr. CARDIN: In the province of Quebec at present is there any training centre in operation where trainees are receiving their instruction as a whole under French-Canadian officers?

Mr. RALSTON: If I remember aright, there are thirteen basic training centres in the province of Quebec, and most of them are under French-Canadian commanding officers.

Mr. CARDIN: What are the reasons to justify the sending of a trainee from the province of Quebec to a military centre in Ontario?

Mr. RALSTON: There may be cases in which the training centres in Quebec are full or in which the particular training centre to which the man has to go, an advanced training centre, does not exist in Quebec; just as, the other way about, there are certain training centres in Quebec which do not exist in other provinces—machine-gun and forestry training centres, for example.

Mr. CARDIN: I can understand the answer in regard to advanced training centres, but what about the young man who was called last week, say, and was sent, as soon as he reported to the office in Montreal, to Camp Borden in Ontario?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend at the moment, but if he will give me the individual case I will find out. Generally speaking, basic training takes place in the province in which the man is, unless the training centres are full or there are not sufficient facilities or accommodation.

Mr. POULIOT: What are the instructions that are given by the Department of National Defence regarding the treatment to be given on the one hand to those who have volunteered and on the other hand to the trainees?

Mr. RALSTON: The general effect of the instructions that are given is that there is to be absolutely no difference in treatment between the two classes.

Mr. POULIOT: Is it not true that instructions are being given, with or without the knowledge of the minister, by his own department to the effect that trainees who have not 44561-288 volunteered should mix with the soldiers who have volunteered, in the companies and different sections of the regiment, and shall not enjoy the same leave and the same treatment as those who have volunteered, in order to exercise pressure on the trainees to force them to volunteer; moreover, that instructions have been given to General Panet to the same effect and that he gives, transmits or communicates the same instructions to the other commanding officers within his district? Is it to the knowledge of the minister that such things happen?

Mr. RALSTON: Is this cross-examination, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. POULIOT: I will not let it alone. It is impossible.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend addresses the Chair he can ask his question. I do not know that there is any need for these ferocious motions toward me. In the first place my hon. friend asks if it is not true that those instructions were given with or without the knowledge of the minister. Obviously, if they were given without the knowledge of the minister I would not be able to speak of them. As far as I know there were no instructions of that kind or to that effect given, but I want to say I would be very much surprised if the trainees, as my hon. friend calls them, that is the "R" recruits, are not mixed in with the other soldiers in the camps. I see no reason why they should be kept separate. The very purpose of the basic training centres is that every one in them shall be trained in the same way, and that would be one reason for making no distinction rather than for putting the "R" recruits in a platoon or a detachment by themselves.

As far as the other question is concerned, I have no knowledge of any such instruction.

Mr. POULIOT: Well I have knowledge; I know it is done, and I will inform the minister, if he does not know what is going on in his department because he is so busy as Minister of Finance that he does not care about the duties of Minister of National Defence.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have drawn attention of members of the committee to standing order 58, subsection 2, which I hope is well known by this time. The purport of section 2 of the bill is to remove from section 2 of the act the words "subject to the provisions of section 3 hereof". Therefore the committee has before it a section the effect of which, if it is enacted, will be to sense to thrust this house into another debate and to go over all this again, and I do not think that the membership is in the humour to stand for it. Besides, I do not believe that anybody will be convinced by arguments on this new amendment even if it is in order. I am not open to conviction, for my mind is made up, and I am going to vote as I did before.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Chairman, with reference to the remarks of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, may I say that you have already given your decision on this amendment when you maintained it in principle before the house a while ago. I believe the rule is that we can amend a clause of a bill either by striking out some of the words or by adding to it. This is what I am doing; I am adding something to clause 2, and it has the meaning which has been explained by the hon. member for Témiscouata. I hope the amendment will be maintained.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question? A point of order is raised on an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Gaspé. The amendment reads as follows:

Provided that this act do not come into force until it has, by means of a referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada.

This amendment is, in my opinion, inconsistent with the scheme of legislation which has been referred to the committee after second reading. We are in committee stage, and the committee must take the scheme of legislation as submitted after second reading. I shall cite May, Twelfth edition, page 371, and note in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 781:

An amendment must be relevant both to the subject matter of the bill and the clause to which it relates; it must not be inconsistent with any previous decision of the committee; it must not be such as to make the clause which it proposes to amend unintelligible . . . it must not be based on schedules or other provisions the terms of which have not been placed before the committee.

The amendment has the effect of submitting the bill to a provision, namely a referendum, which is not within the scheme submitted, and therefore it would be inconsistent therewith.

Further, I would point out the difference between the amendment presented at this stage of the proceedings in committee of the whole and the amendment proposed in 1917 by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was presented in the house on the second reading of the bill before the principle of the bill had been adopted by the house. Once the house on second reading has admitted the principle and has referred it to the committee, we cannot accept, in committee, an amendment which would be inconsistent with the general scheme which has been referred to us and which is not subject to a referendum. This legislation is to enable the government, if and when it so decides, to mobilize the man-power of Canada for certain military service, even overseas. An amendment subjecting that legislation to the formality of a referendum would alter it materially and fundamentally. In my opinion this reason in itself is sufficient to support the point of order raised. But subsidiarily, I would point out that if this amendment were enacted the act would become ineffective unless a referendum were held. Therefore it would destroy the effect of the act unless a referendum were held. If a referendum were held, it would entail a very large expenditure of money. I would quote from Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, page 524:

The committee cannot agree to any clauses involving payments out of the public funds (z), or imposing any dominion tax or charge upon the people.

Undoubtedly an expenditure of money is involved if a referendum is held, and if a referendum were not held, it would negative the principle of this bill. I must hold that the amendment is out of order. Is the committee ready for the question? The question is on section 2 of the bill.

Mr. CARDIN: As the law stands at present, what is the status of a man called under the mobilization act which we are trying to amend by this legislation? After a man has received his notice and has reported to the officer to whom he is called to report, what becomes of him and under what authority does he pass from that moment? Does he not pass as a matter of fact under the authority of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows that the proclamation is passed at the instance of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson). The man is then ordered to report, and he reports to the training centre. After he is examined he becomes subject to duty or service as may be designated by the Minister of National Defence. He therefore does come under the Department of National Defence after he has passed his examination and has been regularly enrolled.

Mr. CARDIN: Is it not a fact that most of the young men who have been called under orders in council or proclamations which various grounds this amendment to section 2 is out of order, and I think it is out of order at any stage of the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, I have followed closely the argument of my hon. friend and learned confrere in support of his contention that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé is out of order.

One of his contentions is that the amendment should not have been moved to section 2. Well, what is section 2? Section 2 of this bill seeks to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, which is chapter 13 of the statutes of 1940, by striking out in the first line thereof the words "subject to the provisions of section 3 hereof." Section 2 and section 3 of chapter 13 of 3 George VI, which is the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, are one and the same with regard to the kind of military service imposed by the legislation of 1940. Section 2 of that act is proposed to be amended by striking out in the first line thereof the words "subject to the provisions of section 3 hereof."

To understand section 2 we must read section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act, which reads as follows:

The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

And if the limitation in section 2, worded as follows—

Subject to the provisions of section three hereof.

—is struck out, it means that the special powers conferred on the governor in council in virtue of section 2 may be used, not only for the exclusive defence of this country within this country, but also for sending men overseas, and it shows the way—

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry, but I cannot observe any close connection between the remarks of my hon. friend and the point of order. Is my hon. friend discussing the point of order?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. It is not my fault; it is on account of the fact that the law has been so badly drafted.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The point of order is not the law. A point of order has been raised that the amendment proposed is inconsistent with the principle of the bill as referred to this committee after second reading, and, furthermore, that it would negative this bill and would entail an expenditure of money. Those are the points raised to which the hon. member should now direct his attention. Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir. I always abide by what you say. I am arguing in favour of the legality of the amendment of the hon. member for Gaspé, although personally I am not in favour of that amendment, with regard to the matter of principle.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman is talking of the merits of the amendment.

Mr. POULIOT: No, no.

The CHAIRMAN: Well, the hon. member is stating that he is not in favour of the amendment. This is irrelevant to the point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, but I was not arguing on that, I was merely mentioning it for a moment. What is a referendum? I think I shall be perfectly in order in quoting the definition of "referendum" in a book which is the dictionary provided for the needs of the house. It is the "Concise Oxford Dictionary," and lies on the table, and therefore the definition of "referendum" which is contained in this dictionary, kept here for the use of all hon. members, is the only one which can be acceptable in this connection. Here it is, at page 981:

Referendum. Referring of certain political questions or of such questions under certain circumstances to the electorate for direct decision by a general vote on the single question.

The hon. member for Gaspé explained the reason why he suggests that the matter should be referred to the people by referendum. I cannot touch on that now. But the definition of "referendum" is as I have read it. He said that Sir Wilfrid Laurier made a similar amendment when the Borden government was in power, at the time that Sir Wilfrid was leader of the opposition, and the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) remarked that that was altogether different because Sir Wilfrid had moved that amendment on the second reading of the bill. Well, this is not the reason. Everybody knows that such an amendment may be moved at any time, and this time is just as proper as the time that Sir Wilfrid judged proper to move a similar amendment, twenty-five years ago.

In conclusion, sir, I submit that there is nothing in the rules of the house to prevent the hon. member for Gaspé from moving such an amendment at this stage of the bill, and therefore I submit it should be submitted to the opinion of the committee.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to say just a word on this issue. I have been looking through Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, and I cannot find the law that I wanted, namely the law of common sense, but I do not think it is practical common principles of the bill. It is only a short time ago, namely on February 9 last, that the principle of conscription was condemned right in the midst of conscriptionist Canada, right in the community of the so-called group of two hundred in Toronto. That was the time when the man who represented the idea of the principle of conscription presented himself for election in the constituency of York South, on a platform of conscription for overseas service.

Well, there were no French Canadians there, but the population in that constituency voted against the conscriptionist candidate, and for the man who opposed conscription for overseas service. That was the situation in a constituency where the group of two hundred were very strong, and yet the population rejected conscription by a heavy majority.

There are many other reasons why this measure should not be enforced without the consent of the people of Canada. It seems to me that the result of the plebiscite has been interpreted throughout the country as an approval of conscription. I do not believe that is so, and there are many others throughout the country who believe as I do.

In the first place, through the pledges of the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the cabinet, over the radio and in the press Quebec was told that the plebiscite did not mean conscription. Is there anyone in this chamber to-day who will deny that? No, I do not think there is. It meant no conscription. In any campaign among French Canadians in Quebec it was urged that there would be no conscription. I believe I might venture to say that had it been put to the people as an issue of conscription for overseas service there would have been far fewer "yes" votes given not only in Quebec but throughout the rest of Canada.

At this time when Canada is threatened by enemies on both coasts and when our allies are asking for more and more food, more and more supplies and ammunition, more and more weapons, is it wise to look only at one thing with both our eyes instead of looking at the question more objectively? If we send our most able young men overseas, our war production is going to suffer. We cannot expect to raise an army as big as the armies of other countries which are not producing half as much as we are. We cannot do that and at the same time produce in such large volumes as we are producing. We cannot do that and continue to support the armies, of other countries with what they need. That would be a little too much to expect from a small population of 11,500,000.

At six o'clock the committee took recess. [Mr. Roy.]

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order with reference to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy), which I did not have an opportunity of seeing before the dinner recess but of which I now have a copy before me, I submit, without any desire at all to impede the hon. member, that on several grounds the amendment is out of order.

In the first place I would submit that it is not a proper amendment to section 2 of the 1940 act, the National Resources Mobilization Act. Section 2 of the bill is merely a restrictive amendment to section 2 of that act. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Gaspé for a reference to the people is not an amendment to section 2 of the bill. The hon. member quoted in support of his amendment the amendment moved by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to the Military Service Act of 1917. That will be found at page 2403 of Hansard of that year, and it reads as follows:

That the further consideration of this bill be deferred until the principle thereof has, by means of a referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada.

That amendment was moved on the second reading of that bill and not by way of an amendment to a specific section of the bill. My hon. friend now moves an amendment to section 2 of this bill, in these words:

Provided that this act do not come into force until it has, by means of a referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada.

I also submit that the amendment which I have just read has the effect of an expanding negative, and that if the referendum were held it would involve the expenditure of public money.

The hon. member has quoted the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to the Military Service Act, but that amendment dealt with the principle of that bill and not with a specific section, which is quite different.

The principle of this enabling legislation has been before the people; the people have already conferred enabling authority upon the government, and therefore I submit that the amendment moved by my hon. friend is quite different from that moved by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1917, when the principle of the Military Service Act had never been before the people. The principle of this enabling legislation has been before the people, and the people have conferred the necessary authority on the government. This is purely enabling legislation. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that on these

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. gentleman misinterprets the rule. He should have resumed his seat when the hon. member interrupted him.

Mr. POULIOT: I thought I heard a sound, Mr. Chairman, but I saw no one, and that was why I had to stand up.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, please. We are on section 1.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): I am glad the hon. gentleman made that statement in the house.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on section 1, the short title.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not impressed by noise, but I would ask hon. members to let us proceed.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are on the short title.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir; and you will admit that I have remained within the limits imposed by the Chair, and have not infringed upon them. I want to conclude, but I trust that the committee realizes the importance of the bill now before us, and that we shall not be disturbed by any buffoonery or anything of the sort. I do not blame anyone; that sort of thing suits some people, but I take this matter seriously, as everyone should. We must know where we are. That is my request, and I believe other hon, members share my views in that regard. We shall see in due course what may have to be said if our request for a more precise and more comprehensive title is not granted.

Section agreed to.

On section 2-Special powers of the governor in council.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Chairman, before I proceed with my remarks on this section of the bill, I will read the amendment I intend to propose. I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), that the following words be added to section 2 of the bill:

Provided that this act do not come into force until it has, by means of a referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada.

No doubt the older members of the house will recognize this amendment as the one moved on a similar occasion by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. If Sir Wilfrid Laurier was right in 1917 in moving this amendment on the ground that compulsory service for overseas was a denial of the most sacred principles of democracy, then surely we to-day are hundreds of times more right in taking the same course under present circumstances.

It may serve some useful purpose to recall that since 1917 election campaigns have been fought on this very question of conscription for overseas. In every campaign this principle has been brought before the population, and they have been asked to condemn it again and again and again. On many occasions the Liberal party, and in the last election campaign the Conservative party, have asked the people to condemn the principle of conscription for overseas.

If it was not right to enforce conscription for overseas in 1917, and after the people have been urged to oppose it so many times since that year, then surely we cannot laugh at them now; we cannot laugh at their common sense. We cannot forsake that sentiment we have created and supported for so long a time. That is why I move the same amendment to-day. Moreover, recent campaigns have created stronger opposition than was found to the measure of 1917. We have always been supported in the stand that the enforcement of a compulsory measure of service for overseas was a denial of the principle of democracy. We have been supported by declarations of the leaders of all parties. This applies not only to the Liberal party. A few moments ago the leader of the opposition recalled the declaration in speeches of the Prime Minister. May I point out to the right hon. gentleman that in 1926, at a time when he was Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen declared in Hamilton with respect to the opposition to that measure from Quebec that that province should not be ignored, and that if ever Canada were placed in a position where she had to decide whether she would go to war with England or the empire, such question should be referred to the people by referendum.

So it is that for twenty-five years the population of this country has been taught to oppose that measure. Leaders of different parties, and chiefly the Liberal party, have urged their arguments against that principle. Therefore to-day we cannot forsake this sentiment which for so long has been supported by Canada's political chiefs and leaders.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Bring yourself up to date.

Mr. ROY: Bringing myself up to date I would say this, that conscriptionists are not in the majority in this country. We must keep that in mind. As was proved a few minutes ago by the leader of the opposition, most members of the cabinet are against the you who are masters of language, you have never received such an ambiguous title for any piece of legislation.

Hear this again: "The National Resources Mobilization Act Amendment Act, 1942." It is like a German name that covers a long space in a book. It should be drafted more clearly. It should read, "an act to establish definitely conscription for overseas service". Then we would know what it is. I know it has been the practice to call things by other names than their own and to change the dictionary. One example of that was the word "draftee". We did not hear the word "draftee" or the word "conscript"; we heard the word "recruit", a word that was improper. The real word was "draftee" or "conscript", because the man was conscripted either from the land or from industry. But it was not permitted to call the conscript or the draftee a conscript or a draftee; he was not that, he was a recruit, which, of course, meant the same thing.

Mobilization means conscription. Consequently, why not use that term? I am not in favour of conscription, but if this bill is for that purpose, why not call it so? It would satisfy hon. members on both sides of the house who are in favour of that, and every Canadian citizen would know what it means. We have already wasted about two months of this session in arguing about the plebiscite. I do not see why we do not have better drafted legislation. This draft is bad, this draft is wrong; it may mean anything, and it may mean nothing. Why not call things by their names?

Some hon. members want conscription. If it is at their request, as the leader of the opposition stated a moment ago, that this legislation has been brought down, well, does this satisfy them? By changing the short title of the bill and calling it "the bill that came at last to establish conscription for overseas", it would not be ambiguous any more; it would be clear. I wonder whether the government will take the responsibility of a bill which will be as clear as crystal and which people will understand as being what it really is? The Prime Minister has often said that he has great respect for parliament. It is a feeling that honours him, a feeling that honours all those who are true to the undying principles of British parliamentary life. Here we are in a game of hide-and-seek; we are legislating for what we think will benefit the people and the country at large. Why try to describe things otherwise than they are?

This has gone on long enough. We must come down to brass tacks, we must separate the chaff from the good grain, so that we may [Mr. Pouliot.] know where we stand. At the present time we are in a fog so thick that it could be cut with a knife. We want clarity; we want legislation with a meaning, whatever it is. It seems only fair, Mr. Chairman, to ask for something which those learned in law as well as those who have never studied law may understand, provided they know how to read. The legislation that is on our statute books, the legislation that we find in the Canada Gazette, is an abomination in regard to the way it is drafted. Who does it? No one knows. For a bill as important as this, the first conscription we should make is that of the most skilful brains, the most skilful men who understand that the law of the land applies to all those within the boundaries of the land and all those within the possessions of a country outside its natural boundaries, which, of course, is not our situation.

My first appeal to the government is to ask them to reconsider this section and to call things by their proper names. Either this bill means conscription for overseas, or it does not. If it means conscription for overseas, let us have a title that will truly describe the bill.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): If I may ask the hon. member a question, if the bill means conscription for overseas will he support it?

Mr. POULIOT: Each thing in its turn; my hon. friend will see later on what I have to say on the matter. His question was very short, because if it had been longer he would have been called to order by the Chair. I think it most unfair of the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, to ask such a question when he knows very well—

Some hon. MEMBERS: What was the question?

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot repeat it; I am precluded from doing so by the Chair. It was most unfair of the hon. member to ask that very short question, in contravention of the decision of the Chair, when he knew very well that the member for Témiscouata, who always abides by the decisions of the Chair, could not answer it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): If the hon. member cannot answer that question he should discontinue his speech.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret that the hon. member for Northumberland—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member has the floor. The incident is closed.

Mr. POULIOT: Since the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, has interrupted me, I presume I am allowed forty minutes more.

adequacy of our reinforcements for overseas. The reply was, to say the least, unsatisfactory —unsatisfactory in the sense that we were not given the ratio of our trained reinforcements to the active army overseas available to fill the places vacated when the casualty lists begin to pour in, as pour in they will, when the Canadian army gets into action. When that day comes, reinforcements in trained personnel will be required in ever-increasing numbers.

My fear is this, that while we are told we have adequate reinforcements for the time being, yet we shall not have them when they are most urgently required. That was found to be the case on other occasions. If, then, this testing time comes and we do not have the necessary reserves, it will be said of Canada that she did too little, too late. To me, the supply of adequate reinforcements properly trained when the testing time comes is of supreme importance. It will be too late then to apply the principle of conscription. As the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services said during the course of the debate, there is nothing wrong with the principle of conscription. Most of us, I think, will admit that apart from certain considerations obtaining in Canada, as a result of the education given to our people in the last twenty-five years, it is the only proper system to use. It is democratic; it is equitable; it is just and fair. I was curious to hear and read the arguments of certain of those members, including some members of the administration, who opposed the principle of conscription and who suggested that conscription had become a symbol of total war in the minds of those who urged its adoption. Mr. Chairman, nothing could be further from reality. It is the one thing Canada has not done, the one thing which she has delayed doing to provide for total war. The provision for ample reinforcements is the most necessary duty for Canada, for without that everything else fails. Therefore it is not a symbol; it is a necessary vital instrument of war. Its adoption in order to achieve that vital objective should not be delayed. It would be shameful to have history record that in this one vital factor, when the testing time came, Canada failed to send adequate reinforcements.

There is another factor about this situation with respect to our army, and that is what I have termed the anomaly of two armies, one volunteer and one drafted. I do not propose to restate that position. But I do say that from an administrative point of view the position must be almost intolerable. Those who are within the sound of my voice, who know what the position is, will know exactly what I mean. I have myself no special 44561-2873 information, but I am told that the difficulties created by the present position are almost insuperable.

But the one great argument in support of this principle, the one great reason why I appeal to the government not to delay the settlement of this question, is the wholesome fear I have that we have not adequate trained reinforcements overseas, and that the voluntary system will not provide them. We are now diverting the stream of man-power into other channels, necessary, but not as vital, weighed in the balance, as reinforcements for the army when action comes. I fear that we as a nation may fail the gallant lads who are now overseas prepared to do battle with the enemy wherever he may be found, if we do not prepare now by the only obvious method to support them to the limit.

No, conscription is not a symbol of total war. It is a vital living necessity for total war.

Mr. POULIOT: I have the bill here, and I shall have no other opportunity—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would point out that the leader of the opposition had unanimous consent. If it is desired that the debate should be general—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No. No.

The CHAIRMAN: Otherwise the hon. member will be confined to the propriety of the short title, covered by section No. 1,

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir. I will abide by your decision, and I will stay within my confinement. Since there was a little interval on account of the long speech delivered by the leader of the opposition I shall have to read this section again. The short title is:

This act may be cited as The National Resources Mobilization Act Amendment Act, 1942.

Well, sir, I find this a redundant title. It looks like a conundrum. It seems to me that in order to be fair to all those who are or who are not familiar with the law of the land and who desire from the bottom of their hearts to understand the meaning of the legislation, this title should be changed. At the present time it is obvious that this title will be the joy of all those who would like to argue pro and con, for and against. One will say that it means conscription for overseas; others will say, "no, the time has not come yet, you will have to wait a little. It does not mean that".

All I ask is clearness and lucidity in legislation. I have been praying for that for years and years, but my prayers have never been heard. This time we have this conundrum. Think of that, you who are well-read in law maintain the solidarity of his party and of his own position. He has now announced that we are to have conscription on the "if, as and when" principle. Parliament is to be asked to give a vote of confidence. More delay: more shelving of responsibility on a vital issue, and by a government which has in the past two years, usurped more power and assumed more arbitrary control of our lives and property than any other government in all our history. Surely the time has arrived when we should do away with temporizing. Why should the government not be forthright on this question-say it will or it won't? Then we would know where this administration stands.

I pause now to put this query to the three defence ministers, one of whom only is in his seat to-day, having regard to their utterances in this chamber on the debate on the second reading of Bill 80. How can they as self-respecting men, after what they said in that debate, accept this latest chapter of the Prime Minister's policy? I put it to these hon. gentlemen, and I put it to them jointly and severally to declare themselves during the course of this debate, and before this bill becomes law, as to just where they stand. The country expects it of them. How can a cabinet, having regard to the principle of cabinet solidarity, accept this latest addition to this "Comedy of Errors" without a voice of protest from these three hon. gentlemen, followed by action? Let us have an end of all this twisting and turning. Let us be men and meet the issue squarely, man-fashion. Let us say that we will or we won't. The whole nation awaits the announcement of these three defence ministers, and it should not be delayed for another day. The statement of their position, having regard to what the Prime Minister said in his last speech, is long overdue.

What does this vote of confidence mean? It means just another unnecessary pledge which ties the Prime Minister's hands and will prevent him from ever putting complete compulsory national service into effect. What will be the verdict of history if our soldiers overseas meet disaster while the Prime Minister fiddles away with another political move which means delay and is definitely lacking in courage and decision? Let us end this farce. Let us face the situation and be done with political shadow-boxing and political expediency.

Then, on this question of coming to parliament on a vote of confidence. Is not that debatable? Such a motion or resolution involving confidence in the government cannot be put through without debate if any single member of this house wishes to discuss the subject. Under the rules of the house anyone has an absolute right to discuss the subject. The Prime Minister knew this when he made the statement, and all his talk about getting through without debate is just so much eyewash. It was done, I verily believe, so as to give an appearance of getting things into conformity with what he had said in his previous speeches. Any motion involving confidence in the government is debatable, and it would be utterly outrageous if it were not so.

Later in that speech of Tuesday, July 7, the Prime Minister indicated that the debate would have to be curtailed. Well, who will do the curtailing. There is only one way to curtail debate in parliament, and that is by invoking the rules with respect to closure. Consequently, what the Prime Minister said on July 7 was that the action of his government in imposing conscription would be submitted again to debate in the House of Commons, but that closure would be applied in the debate, and the motion or resolution put through under closure.

I suggest that the time has come for the Prime Minister to state his case, his position, his proposal, in language which conveys his real meaning and that the country shall have some finality on this question. Heretofore, up to this point, we have had a flood of words and the most skilful concealment of the real intentions of the administration. I wonder what he himself and his followers, who have for nearly thirty years denounced conscription with bell, book and candle, who have also denounced closure with all the anathemas at their command, will think of conscription put through by closure, under the Prime Minister himself. Just fancy that spectacle in this house, you who have read the debates here.

During the course of the debate on the second reading of the bill I did not debate the question of conscription. I thought I had done so effectively in the course of my remarks in the debate on the speech from the throne. On that occasion I argued the case for national selective service, including service for overseas, with all the vigour at my command. I realized then, as I do now, that compulsory service for overseas is only one aspect of the whole question, but in my view it is a vital question; for without efficient, well-trained man-power all our other efforts for carrying on total war are nullified. No matter how well equipped our army may be, if it is lacking in adequate, well-trained reinforcements, near to the scene of actual action, it cannot long remain in action.

It will be recalled that on more than one occasion I interrogated the Minister of National Defence on this vital question of the whatever lies within my power to see that parliament is informed as soon as possible after the decision has been reached.

I intend, at the same time, to see that, before the administration assumes the additional responsibility of enforcing its decision, hon. members are given an opportunity, not for any second debate on the question of conscription, but of showing their confidence or want of confidence in the administration.

In following this course, I hope it will be agreed that I am fulfilling the spirit of an earlier undertaking given to parliament on February 25, that "when we find that we cannot raise the required numbers of men for enlistment overseas by the voluntary method, and it is absolutely necessary to raise more men by other methods, then we will make our decision, present it to parliament, and have it discussed on its merits." The debate on the merits of conscription has, of necessity, come on the present bill. What really is important hereafter is that the government's decision should immediately be presented to parliament, and that the government should be prepared to stand or fall on its decision.

Let us analyse that proposal. His proposal and undertaking is that although this bill, when passed, meant the authorization by parliament of compulsory selective overseas service, he would not actually give effect to the measure by introducing and implementing the policy of conscription until he had again come to parliament and made known his intentions of putting conscription into effect and asking for a vote of confidence. He rather indicated, too, by portions of his speech that this vote would have to be without any debate.

The progressive positions which the Prime Minister has assumed on this whole subject matter may be summarized as follows:

1. March 30, 1939; September 8, 1939; June 17, 1940: no conscription for overseas under any circumstances while his government remained in office.

2. November 12, 1941: no conscription for overseas, without consultation with the people.

3. February 25, 1942: no conscription for overseas until the voluntary system has failed and it is absolutely necessary to raise more men by other methods—and until parliament has at that time debated and decided upon its merits.

4. June 10, 1942: conscription is not now necessary and may never be necessary, but parliament should decide the issue now and enable the government to act at once without reference to parliament and without a second debate, if it should become necessary.

5. July 7, 1942: conscription is not now necessary and may never be necessary, the policy being paraphrased in the words, "not necessarily conscription, but conscription if necessary"; but if the government should 44561-287 decide it is necessary, it will come to parliament for a vote of confidence prior to enforcing it.

Trust the government, the Prime Minister has said. After everyone thought parliament had settled on a principle which would stick, we had the last rabbit out of the hat—no conscription without a vote of confidence in the government! What a spectacle of twisting and turning. Did the country ever see or hear of the like before? What leadership! Talk about shying at hurdles! Never in the whole history of responsible government has the world witnessed such an unholy spectacle!

Mr. POULIOT: Would the leader of the opposition kindly repeat that sentence?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, the hon. member can read it to-morrow.

I ask this question: what is to be the next contortion? What is to be the next and last rabbit which the Prime Minister will pull out of the hat? Will it be no conscription without the consent of the conscriptee? I have more than a suspicion that the Prime Minister would go that far if he thought it would be effective. Again, what a spectacle! The Prime Minister would have it appear that at all times during his career he has avoided the extreme view on any great public issue. I think in the main that is correct; at all events, it has served him usefully in the days that have gone by. I think he has always waited until public opinion has crystallized. I assert that he has not led public opinion, that he has been led by public opinion and that he has taken what may be termed the opportunist course.

Mr. BLAIR: That is responsible government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not responsible government; that is opportunist government. He has always been susceptible to pressure of public opinion, and he has never done more than public opinion obliged him to do.

To-day national unity which he sought to preserve has been proved to be illusory, and party unity is shattered. He seeks now to restore it by temporizing once again. Will that method restore either national unity or even party unity?

Many times the theme has run through his speeches that when parliament was through with the plebiscite bill and the amendment of the mobilization act, all further responsibility would be on the government. Then comes this great afterthought, this boxing of the compass, this exhibition of indecision and procrastination—in the interest of what? Party unity—one last valiant attempt to

REVISED EDITION

Mark these words well:

-the place for it to be fought out is on the floor of this parliament.

Is it not abundantly clear from this sentence that at that stage in his progress away from his previous pledges and policies and toward the ultimate goal, it was the intention of the Prime Minister and the government that when freedom of action was received as a result of the vote of the people the government would take its decision, bring it to parliament and stand or fall by that decision? There can be no other logical inference from that language, and that is confirmed by the Prime Minister's own words of February 25, 1942, at page 832 of Hansard:

When we find that we cannot raise the required numbers of men for enlistment overseas by the voluntary method, and it is absolutely necessary to raise more men by other methods, then we will make our decision,—

That is, the government will make its decision, and:

--present it to parliament and have it discussed on its merits. . . . We are simply asking to be given freedom to make an untrammelled decision and to come to parliament with that decision.

That was another step. Beyond peradventure, it is clear from this declaration that what was to be brought to parliament was the question of the implementation and the enforcement of the compulsory method for military service overseas, not the principle involved.

This was the situation as it stood until the time the Prime Minister moved the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the mobilization act, on the tenth day of June last Speaking on that day on the second reading of the bill, the Prime Minister quoted his own words of February 25, above referred to, and then went on to say at page 3234 of Hansard:

Unless the question of conscription for overseas service is to be twice debated, that, as I see it, is the stage we have now reached—

That was an admission that there had been a departure at least.

The government is making its policy with respect to the raising of men for service overseas fully known. We are presenting that policy to parliament, and, as I have just said, we welcome the opportunity of having the whole question discussed upon its merits.

Now I wish hon. gentlemen to note these words:

Also, it will, I think, be generally agreed that discussion on so important a subject should not be left to a time of crisis. As between debating the issue now or later on, obviously the wisdom and advantage is wholly in favour of the earlier moment.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

He goes on in another place:

As I already have said, I am certain that with war on every side, hon. members of parliament would not wish two debates upon the subject of conscription when one should suffice, and I am even more certain that the people of Canada would not view with patience any such action on the part of their representatives.

In other words, the Prime Minister stated on February 25 that when the voluntary method failed to raise the required number of men, he would at that time present his decision to parliament and have it discussed on its merits. What happened? He came to parliament on June 10 and stated that "conscription for overseas service is not necessary at the present time. Moreover, it may never become necessary." Nevertheless he asked parliament then and there to decide the issue. What a contradiction! Those two positions are not compatible. They are illogical. There is no sequence to them. He was practising the same old policy of procrastination and appeasement. No wonder the words that I used in this house on June 10 with reference to his position, as set out in the quotation from Gilbert and Sullivan's opera, have been so greedily seized upon and approved by the general public of this country.

On July 7, winding up the debate on the second reading of Bill No. 80, he invented and brought forward a new formula—a pure compromise between his two positions of February 25 and June 10; and he put forward for that formula the claim that it was in fulfilment "of the spirit" of his earlier undertaking of February 25. Could anything better illustrate the type of casuistry in which the Prime Minister indulges?

I say with great assurance that the formula presented by the Prime Minister in his concluding speech was a new one and constituted an undertaking entirely distinct from and additional to the proposals of the bill and, indeed, definitely at variance with what he had said in his speech in moving the second reading of the bill. He introduced new matter in his reply, and he introduced it at a time when he knew there could not be any effective reply.

In that speech of July 7, the Prime Minister made the following statements, to which I direct particular attention, as recorded in Hansard at page 4014:

I intend, therefore, if the time should come when the government decides that it has become necessary to send overseas men who have not volunteered for general service, and I should be in office at the time, to ask my colleagues to join me in seeing that parliament is immediately informed of the government's decision. If parliament is not in session, I would do forces overseas. Once again I wish to repeat my undertaking, frequently given, that no measure for the conscription of men for overseas service will be introduced by the present administration.

This was the third occasion on which he had given this pledge, this arrangement as it has been termed, this agreement, this gesture of appeasement to his followers in certain portions of Canada, those loyal followers who believed him when he made that statement but who now find themselves in the position where some of them are of the opinion that he has betrayed them. These men, even if we do not agree with them, are entitled to be given the credit at least of consistency.

Mr. POULIOT: Who are they?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am looking at one of them now. They believed in his pledge. The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) has reaffirmed this position on more than one occasion. He believed in that pledge. He believed in that arrangement, and he referred to it in his speech. They believed in the pledge of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister had taught them to believe that that would be the course his party would pursue. And they have every right to think that he has betrayed them.

I shall not traverse the events which intervened between June, 1940, and January, 1942. My colleague, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) put on record on July 6 a statement of our position, and of the progress of events in relation to this question of man-power. Those were the progressive steps which we advocated and which one by one we have succeeded in having the administration adopt.

From all I have said it is quite clear that down to January last the Prime Minister's position was that under no circumstances, in no event and for no reason whatsoever would he or his government while in power enact or promulgate legislation for compulsory service for overseas. I should say, however, that in November last there was an indication of a change of front-not a vigorous, manful declaration of a change of policy, which, in the light of two years of disastrous retreats and defeats, would have been understandable, but a veiled intimation that he might consult the people on such a change of policy. I want to read his words to the membership of this house and recall them to their minds. On the twelfth of November, 1941, as recorded at page 4321 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said this:

But so far as conscription for service overseas is concerned in the armed forces of Canada, that question was submitted to the people of Canada at the last general election, an election which was held in war time, and in which the leaders of all political parties made their statements to the electorate, and the people of Canada decided against conscription for overseas service.

And now, Mr. Chairman, will you please note the Prime Minister's concluding sentence of that statement:

So far as I am concerned, without any consultation of the people on that subject, I do not intend to take the responsibility of supporting any policy of conscription for service overseas.

It will be seen from that, I think, that already the Prime Minister was wavering, and there was reason why he should waver. But he still refused to assume the responsibility which devolved upon him and which, I submit, the correct practice under our constitutional system demanded. He would "consult the people." He must have had this thought in his mind when, in January of this year, in the speech from the throne, he announced the plebiscite. Was this the consultation he had in mind in November? I think I am justified in asserting that it was. True, the consultation was not in direct form. But in the light of subsequent history, is there anyone outside the ranks of the ministry who does not now believe that the people were being consulted through the medium of the plebiscite? To argue otherwise, in the light of subsequent events, is to insult our intelligence. The people in Quebec who voted "no" had no other thought in mind. They believed then, and the vast majority of their representatives here in this house believed, that they were voting against conscription for overseas service. I may be pardoned if I repeat for the purpose of this argument that portion of the speech from the throne in which are found these words:

The government is of the opinion that, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should in this connection and irrespective of any previous commitments, possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise.

In that paragraph is stated in clear terms an express departure from the principle so often enunciated by the Prime Minister. Subject to his responsibilities to parliament and, I should add, to parliamentary support, he desired for himself and his government complete release from his commitments—in relation to what? In relation to one thing and one thing only.

Then, in expanding that statement during the course of his speech on January 26 last, at page 48 of Hansard, the Prime Minister made this declaration:

If the issue of conscription for service overseas is to be fought outnow that peril is upon this nation and upon the whole world, those chickens have come home to roost. Banquo's ghost now haunts the Prime Minister, and he is driven from pillar to post to protect his own position and to preserve the position of his party. Time truly has wrought many changes. But through all these changes it is clearly visible that the Prime Minister's desire is to preserve his own political position and that of his party.

Let me review his position in these later years. In a debate on foreign policy held in this chamber as recently as March 30, 1939, the Prime Minister made this declaration, a declaration of isolationism, in the following terms, to be found at page 2419 of Hansard:

The idea that every twenty years this country should automatically and as a matter of course take part in a war overseas for democracy or self-determination of other small nations, that a country which has all it can do to run itself should feel called upon to save, periodically, a continent that cannot run itself and to these ends risk the lives of its people, risk bankruptey and political disunion, seems to many a nightmare and sheer madness.

These words were not uttered by an isolationist in the United States; they were uttered. by the present Prime Minister of Canada. No wonder that John MacCormac, in his recent book "America and World Mastery", characterized the right hon. gentleman as the "king of isolationists". Isolation for Canada in relation to any of Britain's wars was the guiding star of the Prime Minister all through his tenure of office as Prime Minister down to the month of September, 1939. He held strenuously to the view that what happened in Europe was no concern of ours. He was preaching then what he had practised all his life. He was preaching what the little Canadians, to whom his appeal was directed, believed in. All the time he had in mind the consolidation of his political position. And on March 30, 1939, in the same speech on foreign policy, he took occasion to make a pledge to the people of Canada, and especially to his followers in Quebec, in the following terms as they appear at page 2426 of Hansard:

The present government believes that conscription of men for overseas service would not be a necessary or an effective step.

I call the attention of hon. members to this sontence:

Let me say that so long as this government may be in power, no such measure will be enacted.

This pledge was reiterated by the Prime Minister when he was speaking in the house in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, at the special war session on September 8, 1939. At page 36 of Hansard his position is reported as follows:

I wish now to repeat the undertaking I gave in parliament on behalf of the government on March 30 last. The present government believe that conscription of men for overseas service will not be a necessary or effective step.

Note well these words:

No such measure will be introduced by the present administration.

That was on September 8, 1939, and it was a reaffirmation of his previous position.

In the light of subsequent events, in the light of what has happened since that time, what a silly pledge that was! Nobody will recognize that fact more fully than himself because he has been trying to extricate himself from just such a position for two full years. What a futile undertaking that was, when we consider that to-day we have the full principle of compulsory military service for overseas or anywhere on the statute book of this country, and by the direction of the right hon. gentleman himself, and the party which supports him in this house!

In June, 1940, a little over two years ago, after the evacuation of Dunkirk, at the direct instigation of myself and my colleagues the mobilization act was introduced.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I say that, and I can prove it. However, I shall not pause to do it now. Emphatically it was an emergency measure, copied, with one striking limitation, from the legislation passed by the British parliament the month before. It was merely enabling legislation. It never was intended in itself as a substantive measure. But with the exception of that limitation, it, together with the Militia Act and the War Measures Act, constituted, and to-day after the passage of this bill will constitute, the fullest possible power and authority any government ever obtained from the representatives of a democratic nation. And mark you well: it embodied within its ambit the principle of compulsory military service. We on this side of the house accepted the limitation, with some misgivings, but on the theory that half a loaf was better than no bread.

In introducing the bill the Prime Minister went to infinite pains to make it clear that he adhered to the traditional policy of his party on this question of compulsion for overseas service. Indeed I think he went out of his way to do so. On that occasion, June 17, 1940, he spoke, as recorded at page 854 of Hansard, as follows:

The bill to be introduced to-day in no way affects the raising of men to serve in the armed have to endeavour to exercise my rights under section 3. But I do submit that in my position I should be allowed to proceed now.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, go on.

The CHAIRMAN: Does any hon. member desire to speak to the point of order? If the rule is not suspended by unanimous consent, I must hold that under section 1 there is only one matter to be discussed, and that is whether the words, "The National Resources Mobilization Act Amendment Act, 1942" are a proper short title for this bill. If I departed from the rule, which is binding upon the Chairman, where should I draw the line? Under section 3 the leader of the opposition might perhaps speak to the matters to which he has just referred. Therefore I will now read section 1.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then may I ask for the unanimous consent of the committee? I am asking that, and I am wondering if this committee will refuse it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will support my hon. friend's request.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thank my right hon. friend; I think perhaps he has been in the same position himself.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the leader of the opposition leave to speak generally under section 1?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to thank you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee, and particularly the Prime Minister. I have no doubt that he has found himself in the same position on other occasions.

For several weeks this house debated the second reading of this bill. On June 10 the Prime Minister made one of his lengthy addresses in which, stripped of a mass of redundant verbiage, he stated the position of himself and his government as being "not necessarily conscription, but conscription if necessary," and announced that the principle of conscription would be debated then and there, once and for all. I replied to that speech on the same day, and exposed with all the power at my command the hollowness and what I considered the sham, the shadow-boxing and the practice of political expediency which it protrayed. I will say without fear of contradiction that every word I said then was justified. If I needed any confirmation of that view it was to be found in the speech delivered by the Prime Minister in the house on Tuesday, July 7, in winding up the debate on the second reading of this bill, a speech to which at the time there was no opportunity for reply, in which he reviewed the position and made what I considered to be a definitely new proposal and undertaking entirely distinct and additional to the proposals of the bill itself, and indeed definitely at variance with what he had said in his speech in moving second reading. I intend to have something further to say in this regard later on.

The house will recall that immediately after the vote was taken the Prime Minister moved the house into committee of the whole on the bill, and that I then and there took the floor to analyse the Prime Minister's change of attitude. What followed is a matter of record, against which I shall not cease to protest. I had intended at that time to protest the proposal of the Prime Minister that he would seek to have any vote of confidence in his government in connection with this matter passed without debate, or with very limited debate. I was denied that opportunity then, but I assert here and now that any such motion of confidence is debatable, and every member of this house has the right to debate it. Otherwise there would be a flagrant violation of the basic privileges of parliament. I shall have something further to say about this particular topic later on in my remarks. but I cannot refrain from observing that only by invoking closure can the Prime Minister limit debate on such a motion. If he does so, then we shall witness the spectacle of the leader of the Liberal party, who has always denounced the principle and the operation of closure, who has always denounced conscription for overseas service as a monstrous policy. inimical to national unity, coming to this House of Commons announcing that policy and invoking the rule of closure to throttle debate upon it.

I now propose, Mr. Chairman, to review the rather tortuous course of the Prime Minister with respect to this question of compulsory military service for overseas, or rather shall I say the principle of national selective service for overseas or anywhere. It is a well known fact which cannot be denied, that for nearly twenty-five years prior to this war the Prime Minister and his principal lieutenants preached the doctrine that he and his party would never, under any circumstances, no matter how grave or perilous, resort to the principle of compulsory military service for overseas. It was the one theme which in season and out of season was preached by him and his lieutenants to the people of Canada, and in particular to the people of the province of Quebec. And now that disaster has come;

Personally I am not concerned. My only difficulty is always to apply the rule impartially to all hon. members, once an irregularity has been allowed.

Mr. POULIOT: We all agree that subsection 2 of standing order 58 is the rule that binds us in our discussion in committee as we are sitting now. What is the item or clause under consideration? It is the short title of the bill, which reads thus:

This act may be cited as The National Resources Mobilization Act Amendment Act, 1942.

The bill which is now before the committee is to amend an act the purpose of which was to mobilize all the resources of this country. Therefore my contention is that at the present time, since general discussion is permitted with regard to the real purpose of the bill, any hon. member should be allowed to discuss the operation of the act that it is now proposed to amend, not only with regard to man-power affecting the three armed services, but also with regard to the mobilization of all other wealth that we have in this country. Moreover, any hon. member is entitled to criticize the operation of the former act, or to approve it, and thus any hon. member has the right and privilege to express his opinion on the principle of amending the former act and on the purposes of the amendment. The more so because when the matter was discussed here in this house many divergent views were expressed; this has the effect of taking off all limitations to the discussion of the matter, provided that an hon, member discusses the mobilization of man-power and all other resources of this country. Moreover-

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I should like the hon. member to limit his remarks to the interpretation of standing order 58. We are now on a point of order as to whether, on the short title, a general discussion can be permitted.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly, sir; I do not want to go further. I was just giving that as an illustration of the wide scope of discussion under the rule. Moreover, I submit that the subject matter of any discussion allowed by the Chair, either when Mr. Speaker was in the Chair or when you, sir, were in the Chair, could be referred to, provided it was while this bill was under discussion on second reading. The reason is obvious. It is the very same bill, and although hon. members are not permitted to refer to former speeches while asking questions on the orders of the day, they are surely allowed to refer to statements made on the second reading of the bill, and to take advantage of them to ask questions of the government, or even of the leader of the opposition or any other hon. member.

Therefore, without discussing the merits of the bill which is now before us, I bring to your attention the two points. The first reason why the scope of the discussion is unlimited, provided that the mobilization of man-power or of other resources is the subject of discussion, is that the bill has been drafted in such a way that it is impossible to know what it means; therefore we can know this only by asking questions. We have to get some understanding before voting. If the bill is read and nobody knows what it means, it can be interpreted just as that story about the bible. A clergyman was reading the bible and speaking about Eve, the wife of Adam. Turning over two pages at once, he said, "She was covered with tar both outside and inside". That of course referred to Noah's ark. The same might be said about the interpretation that could be given to the bill. Therefore, sir, I hope you will be very broad in allowing discussion.

Mr. McIVOR: Speaking to the point of order, I have tried to keep as quiet as possible on this matter because of the length of the former debate, some six weeks or more, and it is putting a heavy load upon the whips to try to keep a quorum in this house to listen to those who want to make more long speeches on this issue. I do not wish to advise the chairman, but I think he would show wisdom by hewing close to the line and allowing nothing to come in that is not relevant.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point of order, I think I understand the rule. What I proposed to say would be entirely referable to section 3, which is the repealing clause, and if I must proceed under that section I shall be content to do so. But I thought that for convenience, and following the practice which has come to be almost universal, I might be allowed to do so on the short title. A moment ago I was not allowed by you, Mr. Chairman, to proceed. I am not finding fault with that, because certainly I have no great desire to see a prolonged debate upon this matter, but there are certain things I think should be said. I can say them under section 3 if necessary; for I have no doubt that under that section anything and everything would be in order that could be said about this bill at any time. If the committee will not grant me the indulgence of making my remarks on the short title, then I shall a day or a week or a month. You have to take a proportion of the profits for a year when the profit and loss account is made up, when the statement is prepared, and that must apply in the case of these companies.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT TO SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 7, consideration in committee of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940—Mr. Mackenzie King—Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1-short title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to make some observations on this section at this time, and as they will be of some little length I crave the indulgence of the committee in doing so.

The CHAIRMAN: I wish to call the attention of the committee to my difficulty in applying the rules. Standing order 58 is binding on the Chairman, and unless there is unanimous consent to suspend it, I would be unable to apply it equally to all members if I allowed the hon. gentleman to proceed. Under this rule no general statement may be made, either by the leader of the opposition or by anyone else in committee. The rule states that the debate must be strictly relevant to the clause before the committee. By unanimous consent, the short title clause has often given occasion for a general discussion on the principle of a bill, but this can take place only by unanimous consent. If at this moment the leader of the opposition made a general statement, where should I draw the line, and how could I prevent other hon. members from engaging in a general discussion?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not desire in any respect to challenge the interpretation which you, sir, put upon the rule. If it is necessary to do so I shall ask the unanimous consent of the committee while I make this speech, because for obvious reasons the position in which I find myself arises out of what took place here on July 7, when the Prime Minister, in closing the debate on the second reading, made a new and what was to me a startling change of policy.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The remarks of the leader of the opposition raise another fundamental question of procedure, and a point of order. The leader of the opposition is referring to the debate which took place not in committee but in the house on second reading of the bill. On the second reading a general discussion developed which lasted several weeks, and before the Prime Minister concluded the debate His Honour the Speaker drew the attention of the house to the fact that the speech of the Prime Minister would conclude the debate. Then a vote was taken. References to that debate, concluded by a vote in the house, would be out of order in committee.

Standing order 58 is not ambiguous. It does not give rise to the application of canons. It is in clear language. Subsection 2 of standing order 58 states:

2. Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. Mr. ILSLEY: There are many on which no tax is collected, because the total income is not taxable. It is below the exemption.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: The other amendment is:

(f) Resolution 11 shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of July, 1942, and to apply to one-half of the profits of the calendar year 1942 and to the profits of all subsequent years and fiscal periods ending after June 30, 1942, and prior to June 30, 1943, the said enactment shall be applicable to that portion of the profits in any such fiscal period which the number of days therein after June 30, 1942, bears to the total number of days of such fiscal period.

That is the royalty company tax.

Mr. GIBSON: I so move.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Vancouver South asked a question based on this resolution. His question was: How is it that it is only payments to prospecting syndicates out of the profits of years which end in 1942 which may be used as deductions from income for income tax purposes? That may be a mistake, or it may not be; I will look into it before the bill is brought in. It may be that all the payments of companies whose years have ended before this in 1942 that are expected to be made have already been made. This prospecting programme has been under way for some time, and perhaps, as regards companies whose fiscal years ended, let us say, on March 31 or since, it was not planned that payments made in their new year, that is their year ending in the calendar year 1943, were to qualify. But I shall have to look into that. It was a plan worked out by several departments-the metals controller, the mines department, the finance department, and so on, and if there should be an alteration we will make it in the bill.

Mr. GREEN: When was the minister's previous announcement made?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am told it was on April 30.

Mr. GREEN: Then these companies would have no way of knowing before April 30?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. It looks as though it should be changed; I will admit that.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): The minister stated in reference to resolution 11 that these royalty companies would be required to pay half the profits made in 1942. If it is left that way it is going to lead to a great deal of confusion. If the minister would say that all profits since July 1, 1942, would be taxed, it would simplify matters a great deal, because the profits made prior to July 1 have already been distributed and are now in the hands of the holders.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what this means, I think.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): That is not what was stated. The minister said, as I understood, half the profits for the year 1942.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will read it again:

Resolution 11 shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of July, 1942, and to apply to one-half of the profits of the calendar year 1942. . . .

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): You say, "onehalf of the profits of the calendar year 1942." If you would say, "all profits made since the first day of July, 1942." it would mean a good deal less bookkeeping.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think you can get at profits for a month or a week.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Yes; the profits are paid monthly, as the oil is sold. It is sold every month and the profits are divided every month among royalty holders.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are those the profits for the month?

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): On July 1 they pay the profits for the June operations.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will look into that. The way we deal with companies generally is to consider that the profits are for the twelvemonth period or for the fiscal period.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Yes, but these are peculiar companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: Can profits for a day be determined?

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Oh, yes. Oil is sold every day.

Mr. ILSLEY: What are the expenses allocable to that day? Somebody has expenses.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): I believe they allocate the expenses every two weeks, or every month, anyway.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman knows a good deal more about this than I do, but surely there are times of the year when there are special expenses, large expenses, lump sum expenses, and these would have to be spread over a fiscal period of some kind. What about depreciation? What about depletion? Do those not apply in this case? My point is that unless you have a fiscal period of some duration—it might be six months or twelve months—you cannot determine what the profits are. You cannot determine the profits for It cannot continue to pay that dividend because of the increased tax in the budget, because of the increased costs of operations, and because its rates are frozen under the price ceiling scheme.

Would it not have been less disturbing to industry, more just, and even equally effective in raising revenue for the treasury— I am putting it on that principle as well as the other—if a normal tax of 18 per cent, as against 30 per cent in the new budget, were collected and a 100 per cent Excess Profits Tax Act, with no rebate, enacted? That is the theorem I am propounding.

Under the present budget, those earning slightly more than standard profits are the hardest hit. Thus a company earning 1563 per cent of standard profits under the last budget would have 94 per cent of standard profits available for dividends. Now such a company only has 70 per cent, while companies prospering most from the war recover 20 per cent of the profits liable to the 100 per cent tax. Thus, moderate profits are reduced by taxation from 94 per cent to 70 per cent, but taxes on the higher bracket profits are increased only from 75 per cent to 80 per cent-that is, 75 per cent as against 100 per cent minus 20 per cent credit, equalling 80 per cent.

It is true that the total income of the government from corporation taxes, including the rebate, is greatly increased under the present budget; I admit that. But personal incomes, and therefore personal income taxes, will be greatly reduced through reductions in dividends. Personal income taxes will go down. They are bound to do so if the lead given by the two banks to which I have referred is followed all along the line, as I fear it may be.

Deducting rebates, which are forced savings, the net taxes which the government will receive may very well be much the same as in the past year, or even be actually reduced. And whatever the merit of forced saving for the individual, it has not the same merit for the corporations. What they have invested in rebatable tax will reduce by the same amount their ability to buy government bonds. That is a factor to which I have not heard previous reference. These people will be expected to buy government bonds, and how can they do both? Pledge their credit, I suppose. Many of them have had to do it in the past. Even if they never would buy bonds and, by the present scheme, are compelled to help finance government expenditures, this only means that their position with their bankers has been changed.

They will have to lean on their credit with the banks to a greater degree than they would without the 20 per cent. It has not meant that there has been more money made available. A corporation, unlike individuals, does not let money burn a hole in its pocket.

I hope the minister will read over these observations, because they do state some truths. It is too late to give effect to these principles in this budget, but I am hopeful that by the time another budget comes around, if the minister is in his present position, he will think seriously over the statement I have made and the principles I have endeavoured to enunciate.

Mr. ILSLEY: This resolution, Mr. Chairman, requires certain amendments. The first is:

That resolution 26 be renumbered resolution 28, and that paragraph (a) thereof be rescinded and the following substituted therefor:

(a) that paragraph (a) therefor: therefor:
(a) Resolutions 1 to 10, inclusive, and 12 to 15, inclusive, 20, 21, 26 and 27 shall be applicable to the income of the 1942 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and to all subsequent periods.

Mr. GIBSON: I so move.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the effect of these changes? I cannot follow them.

Mr. ILSLEY: The effect of this change is simply this. Resolution 11, the one about royalties, is left out, because, as I stated this morning, we do not propose to apply this tax on royalty companies in fiscal periods ending in 1942; we intend to start it at July 1, 1942, to apply from then on. Also we have put in resolutions 26 and 27, which relate to the alimony and to the members of the armed forces.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister undertook the other day to explain whether or not there was any discrimination in taxation on residences occupied by ministers of various religions throughout Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The value of the residences occupied by all clergymen is taxable; that is about all I can say. In a good many cases clergymen do not have enough income to be taxable.

Mr. JACKMAN: In the case which the leader of the opposition put before the minister the other evening there was very definitely a tax on the value of the rental. I asked whether there were any residences occupied by ministers, of various denominations, which were not taxable. I did not say theoretically taxable. I mean, is there any tax collected on them? the service, or at a later time. If to make that suggestion is an offence, then I am guilty. But I believe I would be doing those men a very great service in the long run.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I say to the hon. member for Souris that the private, single, who is overseas, and is on deferred pay for ten months, upon his return will have to his credit, plus rehabilitation, exactly the amount of the 16 per cent required under the land settlement bill.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I had reference more to the married man who has to assign a portion of his pay. His wife and family are using that money to live on. He will need assistance more than the single man.

Mr. ILSLEY: The figures I gave for incomes did not include subsistence. For all the officers I mentioned, in order to get at their incomes, subsistence would have to be added. Out of quarters it is $1.70 a day. Some are considerably higher than that. That means adding to the incomes I gave $620 a year.

Mr. GREEN: For a comparatively small number. Take the men in the battalions and batteries defending this country to-day. They are all in quarters. They are with their units.

Mr. ILSLEY: They get subsistence.

Mr. GREEN: They get rations.

Mr. ILSLEY: Rations in lieu of subsistence.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution 27 (new) agreed to.

Mr. JACKMAN: Mr. Chairman, I wish to revert to the previous resolution, having to do with alimony, which was introduced without advance notice, so that we could not possibly examine it thoroughly.

The CHAIRMAN: It was carried. We could revert to it only by unanimous consent.

Mr. JACKMAN: I ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is all right with me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry. The former resolution 26 is renumbered and becomes 28.

28. That any enactments founded on

(a) Resolutions 1 to 15 inclusive, 20 and 21 shall be applicable to the income of the 1942 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and to all subsequent periods:

(b) Resolution 16 shall be applicable to the income of 1943 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods;

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

(c) Resolution 17 shall be applicable only to the income of the 1942 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein;

(d) Resolution 18 shall be applicable to the income of the 1941 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods;

(e) Resolution 19 shall be deemed to have come into force on the 24th day of June, 1942, and shall be applicable to all payments made on and after the said date.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is the last resolution, Mr. Chairman, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it appropriate that I should make just two or three general observations on the budget resolutions before they are reported. They may not be exactly pertinent to personal income tax, but it is too late for me to make any observations on the excess profits tax.

A day or two ago I asked for some information with respect to the progress that had been made in fixing standard profits for depressed industries. I have not yet received that. I was hoping the minister would give me the information before these resolutions were reported.

It is becoming increasingly apparent, if one watches the trend of the stock market quotations and of events themselves, that this budget will have the effect of compelling wholesale reduction of dividends. Only this morning I saw an announcement that two of the larger banks had reduced their dividends from eight to six per cent. The reason for that, I apprehend, is that no company can now retain or dispose of more than 70 per cent of the standard profits. No company will take the risk of disposing, by way of dividends, of all the profits which it is allowed to retain, and hereafter less than 70 per cent of standard profits, so long as the present high level of taxation is maintained, will be distributed.

Mr. GILLIS: Sabotage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; I am just pointing out the effects of the budget on dividend payments because of the high taxation imposed. I am not saying whether it is right or wrong. I have my own opinions about that. But I think it will be accepted that the statement I have made in this regard is correct. The evidence is accumulating that the minister is going to get less in taxation from sources which should pay and have been paying a substantial amount of money. That will be true of industrial concerns and true also of public utilities. I know of one public utility company which I am sure cannot go on paying its moderate dividend of 5 per cent.

Income War Tax Act

from day to day an amount would be added to these men's pay. It should not be taken away from them by income tax. That, it seems to me, is the proper position parliament should be taking at this time, because when these men return to Canada the problem of rehabilitation for them is going to be much greater than that which will face those of us who are in the civilian population. It will be a great deal more difficult than the problem faced by you or by me as we sit in this chamber. Those men have been lifted out of their civilian occupations and have been put in entirely different positions. Perhaps they will remain in those positions for three or four or five long years, years which will be taken from their lives-and a good many men in this house who came through the last war know what that means.

Instead of our debating how much we are going to take away from men in the armed forces, we should be debating how much we are going to add to their incomes from day to day, how much we are going to put aside by way of war savings certificates or some other such method. In any event a substantial sum should be put aside so that when these men come back they will have a stake in this country, and something worth while to return to.

That, it seems to me, is the proper perspective which we as members of parliament should have. That is the way in which the minister should be tackling this whole problem and coming to grips with it this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out, first, that the question of pay for officers, noncommissioned officers and men is not now before the committee. Second, the question of exempting, to a certain extent, officers or others in the armed forces from the operation of the income tax has been debated ad nauseam, and it is not proper to repeat an argument which has already been made often. If the minister cannot agree to hon. members' suggestions, then the only remedy is by way of vote. It is my duty to draw hon. members' attention to this question of procedure.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, your ruling has robbed the committee of a very good speech. However I shall have to content myself with something less. I had some good ideas as to how we might get the meat out of the nest-egg after the war is over, but I shall not enlarge upon them.

It is a bad principle to try to increase a person's income by exemption from income tax. If we have adopted the principle of taxing the incomes of persons in the armed forces, and if after we have applied the tax equitably, as it is applied to all other people, it is found that the income of one class is too low as compared with that of another class, the proper way to get over the difficulty is to increase the income—not to increase it by exemption from income tax. I object to the principle of raising a person's income by allowing tax exemption. That is not a proper way to do it. Neither is it fair to the minister to be continually pressing for exemptions of this kind. If incomes are not high enough, let us take the proper procedure and make them high enough—but not by exemption from taxation.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to support what has been said by the hon. member for Peel. With reference to the ruling of the Chair I would point out that we are debating the savings provision. In that connection I would agree with the minister. On Monday a bill was passed which, since its passage, has given me some concern. We have now in our armed forces many men who are agriculturists and who, upon their return, will wish to take advantage of that bill. They must be in a position to pay down 10 per cent, or they will not be permitted to avail themselves of the advantages offered in that legislation. I believe the minister is justified in setting up a savings clause, as he has done. But I do not think it goes far enough. He will probably have to take the advice offered by the hon. member for Peel, and do something more to enhance the pay of our men in the armed forces. It may have to be done by saving for them, so that when they come back they can get off to a good start. Many of the finest young farmers in the country are in the armed forces, and if something is not done to save money for them they will not be able on their return to Canada to come under the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act. They will not have funds sufficient to pay the required 10 per cent. The savings clause is all to the good and should be enlarged upon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In my innocence, and being somewhat old-fashioned, and a great believer in the virtue of thrift, I seem to have got into some little difficulty with some of my friends. I was not suggesting that there should be increased taxation, as such, on anybody. What I was saying was that probably in the case of these warrant officers, the only group of non-commissioned officers to which the minister referred in his table, some provision for compulsory saving might well have been made. They might well be asked to pay it in, and have the amount returned to them with interest upon their discharge from Mr. GREEN: Why was it not possible to give these officers an exemption equal to the pay of the sergeant-major, and then tax them on everything over that? Why could this not have been done?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, that would be an exemption of $1,600 of income from taxation in regard to everyone on service in Canada, would it not?

Mr. GREEN: Why could that not be done?

Mr. ILSLEY: There would be a terrific loss of revenue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the minister give consideration to having these top N.C.O's. save something also, and in that way equalize the condition?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They get much more than I thought they did, and I would not be opposed to imposing upon them the necessity of saving something and lending part of that money to the country.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wholly agree.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why should we not do it, then? That would level out the position and maintain the distinction. Surely there are not so very many of these men. I should not think nearly as many as there are junior officers.

Mr. ILSLEY: You would have to apply that to all non-commissioned officers, of whom there are some 66,000. I am in favour of that being done, but I do not know that the army or the navy or the air force are in favour of it. When they do come to the conclusion that it should be done they can defer the pay and equalize the cash position.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They can do it now?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not know whether my leader was referring to all non-commissioned officers or just to warrant officers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was thinking of the warrant officers.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is a discrepancy, and taking all things into consideration the warrant officer is much better off than the junior commissioned officer, who is senior to him, so that there might be some justification for some action of this kind. But I would not want it to be felt that all non-commissioned officers below that rank should be included.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had reference only to the man in relation to whom the figures were given.

Mr. GRAYDON: I find myself in a very unusual position; that is, in disagreement with some on this side of the house and also with the minister in respect to the question just raised.

Mr. ILSLEY: The latter is not unusual.

Mr. GRAYDON: No, it is not, and there are very good reasons why that should be so. But I wonder if we have the proper perspective of this whole matter. There is such a thing as not being able to see the forest for the trees. Do we realize that at this moment we are discussing the question of imposing taxation upon the men of our armed forces. when they are fighting to preserve the very system of taxation that now exists in this country? I believe we are following the wrong principle. If parliament wants to preserve its prestige we should not attempt to tax our men in the armed forces. I cannot agree with my good friend and leader. Sometimes he disagrees with me; and certainly I disagree with him on this point. So far as warrant officers are concerned, I do not believe we should tax anyone in our armed forces who is not now taxed.

I repeat, it seems to me we are following a wrong principle. It is all very well for us to say that this will allow some brass hats to go free of income tax. But that is not the principle about which we have to be concerned. If there are brass hats who should not have positions in the armed forces of our country, then it is for the Minister of National Defence to reduce them to the proper rank. If they are getting too much money now, surely it is not the job of the Department of Finance to see that through income tax they are brought down to their proper level. Surely it is not for that department to bring about this result by some savings scheme.

I offer what seems to me a tenable argument, namely that as best we can we should preserve the morale of our forces. I do not believe that morale can be preserved if we indulge in long debates about taxing what they get by way of pay and allowances, whether they be in Canada or somewhere else. When we take this position with respect to the men in our forces we in parliament are belittling our position. I believe I am on solid ground when I say-and I mean every word of it-that the government ought not to tax the pay of these men; it should be setting up a first-class nest-egg scheme rather than taking something away from them. There should be some such scheme under which

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister deduct from those figures the refundable tax these officers have to pay? That is the only way to arrive at the actual income they will get.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not admit that, and I have proceeded on the opposite principle, which I think is the right principle. And I do not agree with the doctrine that it does not make any difference whether men save or not, no matter where they are. There is just as much reason for saving in the case of men in the army as anywhere else. I know the hon. member does not agree with that; he proceeds on a different principle altogether, but I am expressing my views, and I think they are sounder views. If the hon, member had advocated that there be some deferred pay for non-commissioned officers, he would have been on much sounder ground than he is in saying there should not be any saving for commissioned officers. That is what I think, but I will not press those views because that is not for me to say.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do the figures the minister has given represent what is left after the tax and compulsory savings are taken away?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: No, they do not.

Mr. ILSLEY: As soon as hon. gentlemen subside I will give those figures; I have been trying to give them for some time. The net income, after tax and savings are deducted, of the top N.C.O. is $1,533; of the second lieutenant and pilot officer, $1,427; of the lieutenant and flying officer, $1,454; of the captain and flight lieutenant, $1,604, and of the major and squadron leader, $1,849. That is for single men.

Mr. GREEN: So that in two cases they are still getting less than the N.C.O.?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but they have an asset. They are saving that money and drawing interest on it, and our effort should be to get the non-commissioned officers to save, either voluntarily or compulsorily, so that they will have savings also. That is my opinion.

Income War Tax Act

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In reference to the question raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Lambton West, if these flying instructors, when seconded to the elementary schools, are classed as civilians for income tax purposes, I think that is very unfair. I would doubt that they were so classed; I should think they would still be protected, because they are only on loan. I should like the minister to clear up that point. With respect to the question just raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South, I think there should be some greater distinction between the warrant officer and the commissioned officer. The present situation will lead to difficulties in the army in matters of promotion, and so on, because a commissioned officer has certain undertakings and obligations he must discharge, about which the warrant officer or N.C.O. does not need to worry. I do not think we have the proper distinction there. I differ to some extent with some of the opinions that have been expressed here. I quite agree that everyone should be encouraged to save something, but I do believe the distinction created by this taxation between a warrant officer and a commissioned officer is very unfair and will lead to difficulties in the armed forces. Perhaps the minister would clear up that matter of the flying instructors who are seconded to elementary schools, because I think it is very important.

Mr. ILSLEY: Before the bill comes in I will find out the interpretation. My impression is that under the interpretation, since they are paid by private employers, not by the government, they are therefore taxable.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister give the figures in connection with married officers and married non-commissioned officers?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The figures are as follows:

| Married—No children | Top N.C.O. | Second Lieut. Pilot Officer | Lieutenant Fl. Officer | Captain Flt. Lieut. | Major Sqn. Ldr. |
|--|---------------|--------------------------------|---------------------------|------------------------|--------------------|
| Net income after tax deduction only Net income after deducting tax and savings Married—One child Net income after tax deduction only | $2,013 | $2,080 | $2,080 | $2,399 | $2,719 |
| | 2,013 | 1,871 | 1,843 | 2,102 | 2,370 |
| | 2,157 | 2,224 | 2,236 | 2,628 | 2,952 |
| Net income after deducting tax and savings Married—Two children | 2,157 | 2,011 | 1,962 | 2,285 | 2,552 |
| Net income after tax deduction only Net income after deducting tax and savings | 2,301 | 2,368 | 2,402 | 2,859 | 3,189 |
| | 2,301 | 2,177 | 2,151 | 2,468 | 2,736 |

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, these are not civilian instructors.

Mr. GRAY: They may be seconded one month, they may be brought back to a service flying school the next month. They are not like Trans-Canada Air Lines pilots, who make that their livelihood; they are seconded to that school by the Royal Canadian Air Force and therefore are subject to the rules and regulations of the Royal Canadian Air Force. They are entirely different from pilots in the T.C.A., who are pilots of their own choice.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are they exempted by the resolution?

Mr. GRAY: I do not know.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think we should change the resolution. If it is wrongly interpreted, we should interpret it correctly, but the moment we begin to change it to deal with civilians we shall never end.

Mr. GREEN: I have not had an opportunity to read the proposed amendment, but as I understand it, the effect of the change is that whereas at the present time an officer is taxed on his pay and his dependents' allowance and on a portion of his subsistence allowance—or I presume where he is in a mess that really means he is taxed on a portion of the cost of his rations—

Mr. ILSLEY: He is taxed on 70 cents a day.

Mr. GREEN: He is not taxed on the full cost of $1.70 but on 70 cents a day. I understand the proposal is that now he will not be taxed on this 70 cents a day.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: For three hundred and sixtyfive days in the year that comes to $255.50. So that the amendment means that he will be taxed on $255.50 less than he has been in the past. According to my calculation, that means that for normal tax the sum of $17.85 will be saved, and on the graduated tax, taking it at 30 per cent, which is the lowest rate—actually some will be charged at the higher rate, I presume-it comes to something over $76. So that the amendment will mean that he will save something less than $100. I am not sure that these figures are correct, but I think they are approximately right. Then there is the further provision to be made, that if that still leaves him with less income than a sergeant-major he is not to be taxed so that his income is lower than that of a sergeant-major. But there is this exception, that the refundable portion of his tax can still be taken from [Mr. Ilsley.]

him, so that in effect he will still be getting less than a sergeant-major. I submit that the refundable portion should not be taxed against an officer. The reason for levying that tax is to set aside a fund which the man, civilian or officer, can use to help reestablish himself after the war. The duty of reestablishing these officers rests with the Canadian government Officers and men in the forces are entitled to be reestablished by the government. They should not have to pay the refundable portion of the tax at all. I suggest to the minister that that should be dropped, that they should not be asked to pay any of the refundable portion of the tax, putting them in the same category as people over sixty-five years of age who do not have to pay the refundable portion.

As I understand it, the general result of this change will be that the sergeant-major and the lieutenant and the captain will all be getting about the same pay.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that is not right.

Mr. GREEN: Or very close to the same.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a long way from that.

Mr. GREEN: I cannot see how the saving of $100 in the tax can put the lieutenant and the captain above the pay of a sergeant-major, because with those ranks, in the army at any rate, the discrepancy now is far more than $100.

Mr. GIBSON: That is only part of the saving.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me answer the hon. member for York South. A second lieutenant and a pilot officer will have a tax benefit of $369 by this proposal if single, and $338 if married with no dependents.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain how it is that the lieutenant and the captain will not be reduced to the pay of a sergeantmajor?

Mr. ILSLEY: I give the net income after tax under this proposal. The top non-commissioned officer in the army and the air force will get $1,533.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that a warrant officer?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

An hon. MEMBER: That is single?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I am talking about single now. The second lieutenant and the pilot officer will have $1,551. The lieutenant and the flying officer will have $1,600; the captain and the flight lieutenant will have $1,794; the major and the squadron leader will have $2,075.

4536

Mr. ILSLEY: It would mean that the commissioner of income tax or someone else would be picking out officers and taxing them while other officers would not be taxed. It would create hard feelings.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a question of doing it properly.

Mr. ILSLEY: General rules must be applied in matters of this kind.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one group I would bring to the attention of the minister. As a result of changes recently effected, particularly in connection with the operation of elementary flying training schools, quite a large number of sergeant pilots are being transferred from time to time to the elementary flying training schools as instructors. They are doing as dangerous work as they would do if they remained in the service of the air force in Canada. The only difference is that during the time they are with the elementary school they cease to hold their official rank in the air force. They are seconded to the school and they proceed with instructional work; yet under the terms of this amendment they would not be entitled to any exemption. These young men, if they were transferred to the service training schools as sergeant pilots, would be exempt, but because of the fact that they are sent to elementary schools operated by private individuals they are treated as civilians for the time being and cease to enjoy the rights that would otherwise be theirs. I do not think it would be unfair, and it would not change the principle in any way to include these men. They are not serving in the elementary schools because of their own wish or desire, but because they are carrying out orders. Some are sent overseas, some are sent to instructional schools for further training, others are sent to the service flying training schools as instructors, and in all these eventualities they are exempt. But because of the fact that, pursuant to discipline, they are seconded to elementary schools, they are denied exemption. I suggest that consideration be given the question of including these young men in the exemptions. I might point out an anomaly in the air force that should be done away with. It is that, non-commissioned officers, while serving with commissioned officers, receive a dollar a day less flying pay than the officer.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not taxed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But when they are in the elementary school all of it is taxable as the bill now stands, and there is a considerable number of young men in this classification. They have all the danger and none of the glory. I suggest that this resolution be so altered as to exempt non-commissioned officers who are seconded to elementary schools.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Can the minister give us a rough estimate of the difference which resolution 27 will make in the pay of a second lieutenant in the army and a flying officer in the air force?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have some more information in a minute. I have it here but it has to be worked out. With regard to the observations of the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), representations have been received from instructors in the elementary training schools to the same effect as those he has made. Unless we adhere to the line between members of the service and those outside we can never adhere to any line. I have also had representations from the pilots of Trans-Canada Air Lines, who contend that they are just as much entitled to income tax concessions as those who are in the forces. They do not go the length of saying that they should be entirely freed from taxation, but they say they should be given some consideration, that their tax should be lessened to some extent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do they not get very high pay?

Mr. ILSLEY: They admit that they get high pay, but they say that even so it is unfair for them to pay taxes if those who fly in the air force are not taxed. If we go among civilians and begin exempting them from income tax I do not know where we shall stop. I do not know what the end will be if we lay down risk and danger as a justification for exemption from income tax. In that case, what about workers in explosives plants?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not service?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is restricted to service now, but the hon. member for Lake Centre is asking that it be extended to those in civilian employment who have been in service.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, the minister has not followed me. I am speaking of the non-commissioned officers, sergeant pilots in the Royal Canadian Air Force, who complete their course and receive their wings and are seconded to civilian schools. They enlisted for service in the R.C.A.F.; they are still sergeant pilots, but they are not doing military duty during the time they are in the civilian schools.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is exactly what I said.

harm in going the whole way and freeing subsistence altogether. That is what we are doing, and it will mean a considerable concession to the whole range of officers. But I do not think we can free dependents' allowances from taxation, because that is part of the income of the officer. It is paid to him or paid on his account to his dependents; it is certainly part of the same sort of income on which anybody else is taxed. This is the resolution:

That the following resolution be added as resolution No. 27:

27. (a) That subsistence allowances received or deemed to be received by commissioned officers of the armed forces serving in Canada shall not be taxable income, unless such allowance exceeds the rate of $1.70 per day, in which case the excess over $1.70 per day shall be taxable income.

(b) That the payment of tax, exclusive of the refundable portion, as calculated under the provisions of the foregoing resolutions, shall not reduce the income of any commissioned officer serving in the armed forces in Canada below the level of $1,600 if not in receipt of allowances in respect of dependents, and below the level of $1,600 increased by the amount of the allowances in respect of dependents payable to the highest rank of non-commissioned officer in the same service and having the same number of dependents.

That is the proposal. It will mean a somewhat substantial reduction in the taxation of the lower commissioned ranks.

Mr. GIBSON: I so move.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much loss of revenue?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure. About $4,000,000, I think.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That, of course, is a substantial sum, and to that extent it is relief of these lower-taxed officers. Has the minister given any consideration to the suggestion I made—I am free to say it was the only one I could think of on the spur of the moment-that officers in Canada who it is never contemplated will go outside Canada, and who are actually not fighting men, should be recategorized in one classification, and the others in another?-because I think it was the intention of parliament that fighting men were to be given consideration. I shall not go over the ground which was traversed here by many hon. members in regard to the men who have been brought back from overseas. I am thinking of my friend Major-General Ganong, who has just been brought back with the rank of major-general to take command of the eighth division, and wondering how he is going to fare.

If a concrete illustration were desired, take the position of a high ranking officer of the [Mr. Ilsley.] air force, we will say the man in charge of an air station, say in Newfoundland, and his opposite number in Canada. Assume that the pay is around $10,000; is there not an advantage to the man in Newfoundland of over $3,000 as against the man in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have seen that stated. I have not checked on it, but the minister can correct me if it is wrong.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not wrong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a substantial amount in the high brackets. As to the other suggestion, what would be the difference between the officer commanding in Newfoundland with $10,000 a year, as opposed to the man in Canada with the same rank and salary? What would the man in Newfoundland save over the man in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a matter of taking the tax on $10,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is about $4,500.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, for a married man with two children.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We will assume that in both cases. Would not the man in Newfoundland be $3,000 better off than the man in Canada? It is an anomalous situation.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be $3,346.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well. there is a man, a high ranking officer in the air force, but of a rank junior to the chief of general air staff. He may be in a combatant area. I do not know whether you would call Newfoundland a combatant area or not. I would want $3,000 more to live in Newfoundland than in Ottawa; nevertheless he is a soldier and he has gone where he has been sent. I still think that this would perpetuate a great discrimination. I will not argue the point further. But could not the minister give some effect to the suggestion I made? If it was not worthy of consideration, all he has to do is to say so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not say it is not worthy of consideration, but I feel it would be absolutely impossible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of administration?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have to draw the line.

4534

Income War Tax Act

Mr. ILSLEY: The new resolution 27 relates to the members of the forces. This, of course, is a question of great difficulty. The main practical difficulty created was this, that with the high rate of taxes certain commissioned officers after payment of tax were left with less net income than non-commissioed officers, and therefore, it was thought, non-commissioned officers would hesitate to accept promotions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was one aspect of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that was the main difficulty to overcome. Of course, the imposition of the higher rate of taxes accentuates the difference in tax treatment between those serving overseas and those serving in Canada, which would tend to a preference for serving outside of Canada or on the ocean, or qualifying for exemption as a flying officer. But we did not feel that there was any way in which we could overcome that. There would be one way, and that would be to remove income tax from officers in Canada altogether. That was advocated by certain hon. members, but it would be extremely costly. As I told the house, the cost under present budget rates, including compulsory savings, would be between fifteen and twenty-five million dollars, according to our estimates. Moreover I do not think that to do so would be in accordance with the sentiments of the house or of the public. It is not done in Great Britain or in the United States. Recent concessions in the latter country have gone a very short distance. So that we felt we had to dismiss that suggestion.

Another thing we might have done was to tax officers overseas, and tax non-commissioned officers, and even privates. Naturally we shrank from that course; because we have started the other way, it is very difficult to make a change of that kind, and probably it would have a detrimental effect on the morale of at least some of the troops. So that we thought we could not do that. There has been no demand of any magnitude or consequence on the part of the officers in Canada to be relieved of taxation. Some of them have felt that the present rates are pretty high, but the great bulk of representation has been that they do not wish to avoid taxation. We therefore had to work out a system which would leave untaxed the non-commissioned officers and privates, leave untaxed the officers overseas who are now untaxed, and at the same time soften to a certain extent the disparity in tax treatment between the officers in Canada and those overseas; also do away with the marginal problem, the problem of that dividing line between non-commissioned officers and commissioned officers. The formula which has eventually been adopted, and which, although open to objection from several points of view, is the best I have been able to devise after a great deal of thought and work, is to free subsistence allowance up to $1.70 per day from taxation. The surplus over $1.70 will continue to be taxed, but freeing up to $1.70 will free practically all subsistence from taxation, which will be a concession to all officers who are now taxed; and then to provide somewhat roughly, as the committee will see, that the payment of tax-I am not referring now to refundable tax-shall not reduce the income left to any officer below the income which the high noncommissioned officer receives. That is the general principle which has been applied.

Of course it will be readily apparent that if this is applied strictly there will be variations in tax credits, so to speak, to officers as between the different services, and moreover it will tend to level the amount of pay left to officers of various ranks. I thought when I started that the effect of it might be to make the amount of pay left to the major, the captain, the first lieutenant, the second lieuenant and the warrant officer, the same, which would be most undesirable. By working at this we have been able to get rid of most, although not all, of those difficulties, and what we have done is this. We have taken the pay of the warrant officer, who is not receiving trade pay; he is the non-commissioned officer receiving the highest pay. Pay varies between the three services. It is higher for the highest warrant officer in the navy than it is for the other two services; it ranges from fifteen hundred and some dollars to seventeen hundred and some dollars. So that we have taken the rough average of $1,600, and we are going to ask the committee to provide that the taxation which is imposed on the officers will not reduce the pay of an officer below $1,600 -that is, for the single officer. For those who are married, dependents' allowances must be added.

Mr. GREEN: Will they be taxed on dependents' allowances?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes. What is freed is the subsistence. Hon. members have contended that there is something anomalous about taxing subsistence. Of course there is not, according to ordinary taxation principles, but the treatment of the taxation of subsistence has not been logical here. The subsistence allowance for an officer is ordinarily $1.70, and the income tax division has been taxing only 70 cents, deducting $1 from the subsistence. Having gone that far, there is not much had taken out an insurance policy on young children in order to create a fund for their future education. I also referred to annuities on young children, and joint policies for man and wife. The minister was going to give an answer. Is it now ready?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I shall give it on the bill.

Mr. GREEN: In the present resolution No. 26 I notice in paragraph (c) that the exemption given in respect of prospectors is applicable only to income of the 1942 taxation period, and fiscal periods ending therein.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Why is it only for one year? As I read the latter part of the paragraph the result would be that if the fiscal period of a company ends on June 30 that particular company would not receive the benefit of the exemption.

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct. I should like to deal with that, however, when we come to it. There are other resolutions which come first.

Resolution 17 agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON: I move:

That the following resolution be added as resolution No. 26:

resolution No. 26: "26. That in the case of divorced persons or persons separated as to bed and board by judgment or decree of a competent court, or by a valid and binding agreement, and who are in fact living apart, any amount paid by one consort to the other under the terms of such judgment, decree or agreement, for the support of such consort and children, if any, shall be considered the separate income and taxable in the hands of the consort receiving such amount. The amount so paid shall not be allowed as a deduction from the income of the consort paying the same, but he shall be entitled to deduct from the total taxes payable by him on his total income, including the amount so paid to his consort, the amount of taxes payable on the alimony or separation allowance by the other consort as if it were her sole income as a single person with such children (if any) of the marriage as dependents as are in fact in her custody."

Mr. JACKMAN: That does not follow the United States practice.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Could the minister answer the question I asked last night at eleven o'clock, as to whether the administrator or executor should encroach on the capital, in the event of succession duties and income tax being higher than the income?

Mr. ILSLEY: I looked at the hon. member's question, and will consider it when the bill is brought down. I have not had time to go into it in detail, but I shall do so later.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I have had the opportunity, thanks to the minister's consideration, of trying to analyse this proposal during the lunch hour. As I understand it, first, the alimony is to be taxable in the hands of the recipient; second, there is no deduction from the income of the one paying the alimony, that is the alimony is not a deductible expense or charge; and third, the tax paid by the consort is to be subtracted from the tax paid by the payer of the alimony. That, as I understand it, is the proposal. I have no considerable amount of anxiety for people who find themselves in this position, but I am wondering whether this is really very much of a concession. I hold in my hand a copy of the Wall Street Journal of July 15, which contains a special digest and analysis of the new revenue bill as presented to the House of Representatives at Washington on the fourteenth of July. This is what it says with respect to this subject:

Those paying alimony get a break under the terms of the bill. They can deduct payments in determining taxable income. Those receiving alimony must report it as income and pay taxes on it.

It goes on to say:

The reason for the change is simple. Taxes and alimony were exceeding 100 per cent of income in some instances.

Is there any possibility of that occurring here? I shall not labour that point. I think the minister has made a concession to these people, of whom I would not suppose there were many. In one instance of which I had heard, the tax would have been tremendous, and this will be some little alleviation. Of course, the crown is not losing much, if any, income tax at all. There may be a lower rate on the income paid by the consort.

Mr. GIBSON: The reason for this resolution not being along the lines adopted in the United States is that if the person paying alimony is permitted to deduct it from his income for taxation purposes, the total amount of tax paid by two consorts who were separated would be less than that paid if they were living together. Under this proposal the person who is paying the alimony calculates his own tax as heretofore, but he is allowed as a deduction from his tax the amount that the person receiving the alimony is required to pay under this resolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is exactly what I said.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution 26 (new) agreed to.

4532

that so when we look at the agreements which have been reached with such large corporations as International Nickel under the War Exchange Conservation Act, under which tax exemptions are granted. For proposed construction amounting to about $34,000,000, taxation allowance for depletion and depreciation of $5,000,000 is allowed annually to this corporation for five years. Then there is a similar agreement with the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company, granting that company similar exemptions in connection with the construction of a dam amounting to about $9,500,000, extended over a period of years. Then we find that the government will not grant tax exemptions to individuals who want to undertake this work, and to me this seems very deplorable. It has gone so far that a good many people in Canada are beginning to feel that the only thing left is to nationalize all the resources of this dominion.

There must be expansion in these days, and the greater the expansion we can obtain the better it will be. The National Resources Mobilization Act gives the government power to mobilize all the resources of this dominion, and nothing should be allowed to interfere. In times of peace these companies operate the natural resources of this dominion on the basis of securing profits for themselves. The natural resources of our country should be used for the benefit of the individual needs of the people of Canada and our allies. Conditions are too serious to permit the profit motive or any other motive to interfere with the rights and privileges of our people. Leases should be set to one side if they are hindering our development. Let us get our natural resources into industry to produce the sinews of war.

The government would do well to consider every avenue which would assist individuals and corporations to increase production. Let us have this production and do not let anything interfere with it. Every field should be opened and every development encouraged.

Mr. GREEN: I was born and brought up in a mining district of British Columbia where silver, lead and zinc are produced. My memories of that Kootenay country are of prospecting being carried on by means of the local merchant or some such person grubstaking the prospectors. It was largely in that way that the whole country was opened up. I have known many of those prospectors and have been out to their mines with them. They are the finest possible types of men. It is a tragedy that they are being completely shoved out of the picture; that no provision is being made to help the individual prospector. Merchants in small towns, local bank managers, perhaps local high school principals or men of that type, are not the kind who are going to try to cheat the government. On the contrary they are the backbone of our citizenry, and I suggest the government should not let a difficulty in auditing stand in the way of extending exemptions so that the individual prospector may be sent out into the hills. I am quite sure he is more likely to find a prospect than the employee of the big mining company who is perhaps sent out on salary, and has not the same incentive as the prospector. There would not be many claims for exemptions, and I suggest the principle of granting the same privileges to the individual prospector as are granted to the associations or companies is a sound one. It will be found that some of the big mining companies will send out fifty to a hundred employees and then come in with exemption claims for each.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not to exceed $5,000.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, that is right. There is a limit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the resolution carries there are a few brief observations I should like to make.

Mr. ILSLEY: Before the hon. member begins may I point out that there are two additional resolutions to be proposed. One of these relates to alimony, and the other to the members of the armed services. The one relating to alimony will be resolution No. 26 and the second one will be No. 27. The present No. 26 is to be renumbered 28, and is to be amended so as to provide for the royalty company tax taking effect on July 1, 1942.

I suggest that the alimony resolution be proposed now, because I have an idea hon. members would like to see it. The situation is one of extreme difficulty. I am not referring of course to the situation of the persons themselves, but rather to the way of meeting the tax. It is almost impossible to decide upon a satisfactory solution. My colleague will move the resolution now, and we could proceed to discuss it at three o'clock.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why not give us both of them now?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give the other one, no.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Even if the resolution is to be renumbered I would point out that I asked the minister a question yesterday with respect to the head of a household who Income War Tax Act a return in connection with the arrangements made between the government of Canada and the Metals Reserve Company of the United States. The answer I received was that a letter of intent had been drawn up by the Metals Reserve Company, Washington, addressed to War Supplies Limited, Ottawa, recording in general terms an agreement with a view to formulating and carrying out a joint programme designed to increase Canadian production of copper, zinc and lead, and other strategic and critical metals and minerals required for the common war effort, but that as yet the agreement has not been signed. According to authoritative United States newspapers an advance has been made to the Aluminum Corporation of Canada totalling $50,000,000, in order to provide for a further extension of the production of aluminum in Canada. So that there is great need for the production of zinc, lead and copper.

When we are prepared to spend millions in order to encourage the greater production of these minerals, of which to-day there is an ever-increasing shortage—in fact in regard to the production of certain munitions we are fast approaching the limit of our production because of this shortage—what loss would there be to the treasury if we permitted any merchant in a district adjacent to a mineral area—and this would apply only to such merchants—to advance the sum of $500, or whatever sum the merchant might choose, as a grubstake to an independent prospector? There is no reason why there should be such a concentration of authority in the hands of corporations.

When I listened to the argument in regard to oil a short time ago I wondered if the time had not come when we as members of this house should call upon the government to decentralize many of these controls. With regard to oil and minerals, everything is falling under the control of a few corpora-tions, due to the fact that we have this system of controllers representative of the great interests. To-day the position is that a man who wishes to go out and produce oil cannot do so. Even when individuals join together in a syndicate they cannot do so, because first of all they must have the consent of the oil controller or someone connected with him, in order to secure the necessary metals and machinery required in the production of oil. The result is that instead of an increasing development of our natural resources, minerals, oil and the like, under these war-time controls we are placing power in the hands of a few corporations to the detriment of the people as a whole. And while there may be some reason for the sort of regulations we have made in connection with oil production, at least something should be done in regard to the production of minerals which will enable the individual to work.

Recently I was in Kirkland Lake which has one of the greatest mining developments in Canada, one of the most unusual places one could visit. There I saw several mines, all in a line. The first mines there were not found or discovered as the result of a great corporation development. They were the outcome of the fact that there were prospectors who were prepared to take a chance and merchants who were prepared to finance those prospectors and give them a chance. And they went ahead against the opinions of geologists and others who ought to know, and prospected that area which I suppose to-day produces more revenue, for its size, than any other place in Canada.

The same is true in Saskatchewan. In northern Saskatchewan there are areas awaiting development, and they are being held back only because of the fact that they have come under the control of certain corporations or syndicates who believe it is in their interest to begin development, complete the assessment work, secure title and then go elsewhere, not proceeding with further development until such time as copper and other basic metals will return a profit sufficient for their purposes. Look at the situation to-day in connection with mining. A prospector stakes out an area. He discovers a worthwhile find, and those who finance him are able in a few years to obtain title, by doing the assessment work. Then they have absolute control for twenty years, whether or not they continue that development. Under resolution 17 the minister has gone a certain distance toward recognizing the need for further production of these basic metals, and I do not think there would be any administrative difficulty in extending this provision to cover the individual prospector, financed by the local merchant.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wish to support the plea that some advantage should be extended the individual prospector. The history of the development of the natural resources of this country would indicate that the tendency has been to hand over the resources of this dominion to a few people, a few privileged syndicates. Not to allow individuals to secure tax exemptions of this kind is certainly a move in the wrong direction. Particularly is from prospectors is that the young prospectors are in the armed services. The old prospectors are all joined up with syndicates and have been working for them for years.

I have been in a number of syndicates. They were formed by a few people who put in perhaps $500 each. An agreement is drawn up with the prospectors who go out, and the agreement is registered. In other instances a number of persons get together, a syndicate is formed, and they generally send out these older prospectors. In many cases you will find it is just a personal agreement drawn up with the prospector.

Mr. GREEN: Will this section be broad enough to cover the merchant in a mining town who grubstakes a prospector to go out for six or eight weeks?

Mr. ILSLEY: The individual prospector? I should not think so.

Mr. GREEN: Why should he not be entitled to the exemption? The tendency seems to be too much to give all the advantages to the big operating companies and no consideration to the little fellow who is helped out by his friend who keeps a store in a mining town. Why should not that exemption be given to the storekeeper or anyone else who is willing to find the money to enable the prospector to get out into the hills?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be pretty hard to check the eligibility of the applicant for the deduction. This is an important concession that the taxpayer is getting.

Mr. GREEN: Then the only reason this little man is not given that help is the difficulty in checking or auditing?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: There are income tax offices in the different centres across Canada, staffed by efficient civil servants. These men have to make checks and audits in every town in Canada anyway; why could they not look after the auditing of these comparatively few cases where a man advances money to a prospector?

Mr. ILSLEY: The merchant would be allowed to subtract $500 from his income for taxation purposes in consideration of having given it to someone who, he says, is a prospector and went prospecting. He did not find anything, but he was away quite a while—he was a prospector. Now, was he? If so, was he a prospector who had a reasonable chance of finding something, and did he look where a qualified prospector would look? I do not know how the income tax people are going Income War Tax Act to check up on that. One thing we do know is that we will get tax on $500 less of that merchant's income.

Mr. GREEN: How are they in any better position to check the prospector who is working for a prospecting syndicate?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because of their standing.

Mr. GREEN: That prospector may go out and sit under a tree and eat his beans and bacon all summer and find nothing, yet the syndicate is entitled to exemption. There are just as many opportunities for bad faith there as with the prospector sent out by an individual. I do not think it is right that these privileges should not be extended right down to the individual, that they should be restricted to the large companies—because that in effect is what this will be doing.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it is not large companies at all. Prospectors' syndicates are not large companies.

Mr. GREEN: But it extends also to the larger companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: Also, but it is not limited to them.

Mr. GREEN: In many cases it is not good for the country, because these big companies will hear of a find in a certain spot and will send out twenty-five or thirty of their employees and stake the whole countryside. That results in freezing the individual prospector out of the picture. The old prospector who opened up British Columbia is being pushed right out of the picture by these large companies, and by refusing to give this exemption in his case the dominion government is furthering that course. That is what has been going on for some years.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The justification for this section would be a desire on the part of the government to increase the production of certain basic metals. I understand that is the reason for the exemption which is given.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So far as the western provinces are concerned the main discoveries that have been so far made, the original one at Flin Flon, the one at Goldfields and the one at Yellowstone in the northwest territories, were the result of the activities of independent prospectors operating with the benefit of grubstakes given to them by individuals in the manner outlined by the hon. member for Vancouver South in reference to British Columbia. The other day I asked for Mr. ILSLEY: Before the resolution carries, I should say that it is intended that this taxation shall apply only from the first of this July.

Resolution 11 agreed to.

On resolution 17:

Mr. GREEN: The minister was to get some information.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not get along as well as I hoped in obtaining this information. The memorandum from Dr. Camsell is as follows:

My information with regard to the facilities for registration of prospecting syndicates in the provinces is incomplete but I am informed by the companies branch of the Secretary of State department that such facilities do exist in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta. There seems some doubt about British Columbia, but certainly no facilities exist in the maritime provinces or in Saskatchewan. The opinion however is expressed by the companies branch that it would be as well to allow the clause to stand as presently worded and if the necessity should arise for registration facilities in provinces that do not now have them these provinces would not delay in setting them up.

A telephone call is now being put through to the British Columbia officials, but they may not be in at the moment.

Mr. GREEN: My objection to the resolution is the use of the term "registered prospecting syndicate." I have checked the British Columbia law and I can find no such animal as a "registered prospecting syndicate" in that province. Provision is made in our mineral act for mining partnerships. Properties staked for a mining partnership, are registered in the name of the partnership, and to that extent I suppose there could be said to be a registration of the partnership. But I assume the idea is to give this exemption to any prospective organization which can be properly checked.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Under those conditions I suggest that the minister should put in the words "mining partnership or other similar association or organization," so that there will be no question that these partnerships in British Columbia and in the maritime provinces are covered by the legislation. The wording here is too narrow. It does not cover the minister's intention so far as British Columbia is concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I should say that there has been no complaint about the statement I made in the house, which I am fairly certain used this language, "registered prospecting syndicate," and the prospectors of British Columbia—some of them at least—have organized themselves or made plans to take advantage of the arrangement. This arrangement is an old story now. I announced it in the house several months ago, and this is the time when they are doing their prospecting, or are supposed to be.

Mr. GREEN: They are all out on the hills now, I guess.

Mr. ILSLEY: I saw an item in the press this morning indicating that there was some hitch about it, but it was not on any such ground as has been mentioned. I suggest that the resolution pass and that we take pains with the language in the bill. I am told that the bill is not yet printed, although it is drafted. When we get further information from the Department of Mines and Resources we can frame the bill accordingly.

I now have another memorandum here which says that Mr. O'Meara of the companies branch has just telephoned to say that he talked to Doctor J. F. Walker, deputy minister of mines in British Columbia. Doctor Walker assured him there are facilities in the laws of the province of British Columbia for the formation of prospectors' syndicates. They either can be registered or there is a second type that can be formed without registration, but in any event there are registration facilities. The result clearly is that the resolution in the terms in which it was read to him would be workable so far as British Columbia prospectors are concerned.

The hon. gentleman says he thinks the terminology is wrong, that while there may be prospectors' syndicates they are not called that in the statutes of British Columbia.

Mr. GREEN: That is what I understand. Our mineral act is forty or fifty years old. It is a codification of our mining law, and the terminology used in it has been used for so many years that it would not be wise to introduce new terms.

Mr. ILSLEY: We will see that proper terminology is used in the bill.

Mr. GREEN: As long as the amendment is wide enough to cover these prospecting partnerships, that is all that is necessary.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the bill as drafted is probably all right anyway. The words used are "in one association or syndicate," and then it is limited to associations or syndicates which are registered. However, I will check that.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I think the reason the minister has had no letters Mr. O'NEILL: The argument in the committee this morning is the finest I have heard for a long time in favour of government development of natural resources.

The CHAIRMAN: I should like to point out to the committee that we have now laboured this point pretty extensively. When a point has been made, and repeated, and when a minister has taken the position about it which is taken by the minister who is in charge of this measure, the only method is not to labour the same argument by repetition; it is to take a vote if the committee is not satisfied. Furthermore, it would be quite out of order to bring under this resolution the question of the national ownership of natural resources, or any subject of the kind.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): I had intended to reserve what observations I have to make with regard to this matter until the presentation of the bill so that we might know exactly what the bill calls for. However, in view of the course which the discussion has taken there are some comments which I think I should make now.

The present regulations of the department do not in my opinion provide for the writingoff of pre-production costs as fast as they should be written off. It takes seven years now to write off pre-production costs. The first crude oil well in Turner Valley was discovered in 1936, and by 1937 there were twenty-five wells in production. Six of these wells are out of production, so that they cannot write off preproduction costs. They will have to pay this income tax out of capital. That should not be so. The returns from all but six of the companies are insufficient to allow the companies to write off pre-production costs out of income. Production is too small, so that all the companies but six will certainly have to write off pre-production costs out of capital, and it may be that some of the six will have to write off pre-production costs out of capital too. This is not as it should be. The companies should be allowed to write off pre-production costs more quickly than they are allowed to do at the present time.

In this connection I wish to direct the attention of hon. members to what Alberta laid down in 1941. There the officers of the department were close to the industry, familiar with what was going on; they could see what would be fair and reasonable, and this is what $44561-286\frac{1}{2}$ they did in that year. The regulation is not very long; I will put it on Hansard:

Government of the Province of Alberta

Treasury Department Income Tax Branch

Administrative ruling No. 6 A.

Re: Allowances for recovery of development costs and depletion of oil and gas wells.

For the year 1940 and subsequent years the allowances for recovery of development costs and depletion of oil and gas wells will be as follows:

1. Development Costs. Development costs, including the cost of drilling unproductive wells in the year 1940 and subsequent years, will be allowed up to 33¹/₃ per cent thereof per annum, provided that where a company or "operator" disposes of interests in production for the purpose of financing development the amount received through the disposal of such interests will be deducted from development costs for the purpose of computing the allowance.

2. Depletion. An amount for depletion will be allowed equal to 25 per cent of the net income from production after deducting therefrom the development allowance. The net income for the purpose of computing the depletion allowance will not include such income as rentals, interest or other investment income.

Geological survey and other exploratory costs will be allowed in the year in which incurred.

Owners of interests in production, "Units of Production", etc., will continue to be entitled to an allowance of 25 per cent of the amount received as set forth in ruling No. 6.

E. C. Shaughnessy,

Superintendent of Income Tax. Dated: June 12, 1941.

It will be seen from this that pre-production costs could be written off in three equal yearly payments under the regulations laid down by the province of Alberta. Of course, these regulations now have no further application because the income tax is collected by the dominion.

Under section 89 of the Income War Tax Act, in the case of metalliferous mines, it is provided that the income of a company derived from any metalliferous mine "shall be exempt from the corporation tax for the first three fiscal periods established by the minister hereunder following the commencement of such production." That makes quite a concession in favour of metalliferous mines. Gold mining has had certain concessions up to the present time. Those concessions given under the statute are now expiring, but that industry has had these concessions so far. I submit that the petroleum and natural gas mining industry should receive very generous consideration at the hands of the government in view of the great need for oil at the present time. Any further remarks I have to make with reference to this matter I shall reserve until the bill comes down.

assistance is necessary in order that sufficient drilling of new wells may take place to maintain or extend the production of oil in Canada and if the Minister of Mines and Resources certifies that such drilling is in oil-bearing areas which give reasonable prospect of yielding producing wells. The provisions of any such agreements granting special tax credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion shall be effective notwithstanding anything contained in the Income War Tax Act or the Excess Profits Tax Act.

I suppose the argument of the hon. member for Calgary West is that that is not applicable to a new company—they have to be operating.

Mr. EDWARDS: I understand that only a producing oil company, that is a company which actually has a flowing well from which it derives revenue, receives some offset if it goes out and prospects in what we call a wild-cat area, or new fields. But here you have a person going out and prospecting in a new field. He starts from scratch, with no resources, with no producing wells behind him on which to set off depreciation or allowance for which that section provides.

Mr. FAIR: I do not think the minister can fairly accuse me of any form of pretence. If a company is guaranteed profits I am not objecting to these profits being taxed. In this particular case, as the hon. member for Calgary West has pointed out, men are engaged on a wild-cat venture, sinking their money without any guarantee of return. If when returns are guaranteed it is definitely provided that taxes will be collected on their profits, and if all companies are treated alike, I have no objection whatever. But I do say that mining companies are getting benefits which other companies are denied.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Has the minister gone into the question of what percentage of new wells has been opened by royalty companies compared with the other types of company during the last three or four years? I am really concerned, as the hon. member for Calgary West expresses himself to be, with respect to increased production. We can easily discourage the movement so seriously that it might not recover for a considerable number of months. We should be very discreet before we do anything which might discourage them. What percentage of wells in 1941, say, or 1942, was developed by royalty companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I was wondering whether the 90 per cent estimate was a little exaggerated, or whether it is not enough.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think consideration should be given to extending the same privileges to royalty companies that are not already in [Mr. Ilsley.] business as to those that are. That can be done by order in council. The section is just as the hon. member for Calgary West says, but I do not think we should refrain from taxing these organizations simply as a matter of encouragement to the business. I do not see why this method could not be extended to timber companies or any other companies. As the hon. gentleman says, it was not invented as a means of tax avoidance, because at that time the tax on corporations was very low, but the increase of the tax has given this type of organization a tremendous advantage.

Mr. EDWARDS: Would the minister consider taking, instead of a percentage of the net profits, a percentage of returns from the well as such, on the same basis as the royalty itself operates? At least there would then be certain security; the royalty holder would know what there was ahead of him. He knows at the present time that royalty, if any, is payable to the provincial government; royalty, if any, is payable to the antecedent leaseholder, and if he knew for certain that the dominion government was taking a percentage of the production of that well, it would be helpful.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why would it not be just as good for him if he knew that the dominion government was taking a percentage of the profits?

Mr. EDWARDS: Because he has no means of knowing what are the profits or what are the expenses of operation. He does not know what has actually gone into the well. When he is buying a royalty he is buying a percentage of what that well produces, not of what some company declares is a dividend or a profit on the well.

Mr. O'NEILL: To my mind the committee has developed this morning a splendid argument in favour of government development of natural resources. In view of the fact that there is a definite shortage of oil, and the further fact that British Columbia has advocated government development of these natural resources, will the dominion government give or has it given any thought to such a procedure on the part of the dominion?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the question is one for my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I am not sure whether there is any direct government prospecting activity or not.

Mr. O'NEILL: Government development of oil wells has been advocated by British Columbia.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not myself know of any.

taking 40 per cent—that makes 50 per cent, and probably the intermediate leaseholder takes another 10 per cent. What is there left on which the investing public may gamble or speculate in the hope of any return at all from their investment? It is not good enough, and it just will not be done. A royalty company cannot get any concession under existing legislation for wildcat exploration, because the legislation now in effect is applicable only to producing companies as such.

Mr. CHURCH: What is the meaning of the words "royalty company, association, or other body" in the first line of resolution 11? Are all these royalty companies, associations and bodies private organizations which pay income tax on the proceeds of their operations? Are they all privately owned? The minister promised last session in connection with a private bill related to this same matter and on the estimates, that a study would be made of the question of public ownership of oil and gasoline. Has any study been made, or will a study be made in the coming recess with a view to allowing groups of small municipalities to cooperate in the development and sale of oil and gasoline? The gas and oil industry is only in its infancy in Canada. These words "royalty company, association, or other body" should be extended by law to enable any group of small municipalities to operate wells on properties in their localities, under public ownership. It is only within the last seventyfive or eighty years that science has discovered the power inherent in oil, gas and falling water. I would ask the minister what study was made in the recess or will a study be made to give a group of municipalities power to go into this industry on a public ownership basis as was done in connection with falling water in Ontario?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I do not understand the suggestion. Is it proposed that a study be made of the question whether municipalities may cooperate in an association for the development of oil on a royalty basis? Is that the suggestion?

Mr. CHURCH: I mean that they could enter the business under public ownership if they were so empowered by legislation, and do better than private ownership has done.

Mr. FAIR: The holders of these royalties are subject to double taxation. When they invest their money they receive nothing until this 40 per cent is taken; then if they are lucky enough to get into the higher income tax brackets they are taxed again and this second tax runs over 37 per cent. I understand that 90 per cent of the new oil fields are being tested out by these companies financed by royalty holders, and no concession is granted to them, while large concessions are granted to other large oil companies which are taking very little chances in development work.

Mr. ILSLEY: It takes a proposal like this to get certain members to understand that double taxation is a feature of our system. We hear members like the member for Battle River urging us to put higher and higher taxes on corporations, not worrying himself at all about double taxation, although double taxation is there to just exactly the same extent and to no greater extent than is proposed with regard to these royalty companies. These royalty companies may in a sense be cooperatives, but they are certainly commercial or industrial profit-making organizations, and how on principle we can justify side by side the existence of two forms of commercial or industrial organizations, one subject to 40 per cent or the higher excess profits tax, and the other subject to no taxation whatever as a commercial organization, I do not know. Take the companies which are exploring for strategic minerals and other metals; none of them is free of taxation. Under the relief provided by section 89 of the Income War Tax Act, the companies discovering new mines -and a few years ago we badly wanted them to discover new gold mines; later, new strategic mineral mines-are not relieved from taxation; they are relieved from excess profits tax but they pay the corporation rate of income tax of 18 per cent. I think the sound thing to do in regard to these royalty companies is to put them on the same basis as other commercial or industrial organizations so far as taxation is concerned, and then extend the same kind of assistance, special assistance, depending upon the circumstances, to them as you do to the other organizations. I think that is open to us under the War Exchange Conservation Act. The amending act assented to on June 14, 1941, provides as follows:

The governor in council in order to increase or conserve Canada's supply of foreign exchange may, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, enter into agreements with individuals, partnerships or corporations to grant assistance by way of special tax credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion under the Income War Tax Act and/or the Excess Profits Tax Act, if, in the opinion of the governor in council, such assistance is necessary in order that an expansion of the exports of any individual, partnership or corporation receiving such assistance may take place or that the exports of any such individual, partnership or corporation may be maintained at levels higher than would otherwise obtain, or, in the case of any individual, partnership or corporation operating an oil well or oil wells, if, in the opinion of the governor in council such encouraging production, in fact. But the section of the Income War Tax Act originally applied to gold and other metalliferous mines, and I do not know that I would care to extend it to oil wells.

Mr. JACKMAN: The winning of the war is of first importance.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If we need the oil wells as much as we need the mines, we should do it.

Mr. ILSLEY: We would have to consider a great many other things we need just as much as we need these.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But oil is very important.

Mr. FAIR: Could we not transfer these benefits from gold mines to the oil fields? We can do without gold, because wedding rings and commodities of that kind seem to be the only uses for gold in these days. We are not using it as a base for our money. We would be well advised to transfer to the oil companies some of the benefits extended to the mining companies.

Mr. EDWARDS: If I understood the minister correctly, the provision means that 40 per cent of the production of every oil well is to be taken by the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Forty per cent of the profits.

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, of the profits. How is a royalty holder going to know what he is buying, if he owns a one per cent royalty? I am very much disturbed as to what the effect of this legislation is going to be on the oil industry. The one thing about which we are most agitated is the production of oil. The exploration and development of new oil fields in the one and only actual oil field in Canada, and probably in the British empire as it is at the present time, is of great importance.

These royalty companies, as such, deal primarily in the exploration of possibly one well. They are not big operating companies as we know them. They are not the type of company which comes to the minds of ordinary citizens when they think of oil companies. The people of Canada generally and the government owes a great deal to the initiative and enterprise of the investing public who have invested their money in these royalty companies. It is they who have extended the Turner Valley field both north and south-not the recognized and old-established oil companies which have sold shares to the public. This system of financing oil wells, contrary to the general impression, was not devised to escape taxation, either provincial or federal, but by reason of the fact that speculation in shares such as takes place in ordinary industrial companies has militated against the successful exploration and development of our oil resources. When the investing public bought a one per cent royalty in a well, they knew that for every hundred barrels of oil that came out of the well they got one. The investor was not dealing with the company. His money goes into a trust company, to be paid out as the well is developed. The money received from any oil produced from that well goes to the trust company and is paid direct to the investor, and the investor is not at the mercy of any manipulation by company directors. If the investor buys a one per cent royalty he gets one per cent of the proceeds from the oil sold from that well, or he can take the oil itself if he wishes.

But where is he going to be under this proposal? I foresee that this legislation will completely dry up individual initiative, and the royalty method, which has proved more successful than any other method of financing the exploration and development of our oil resources in Alberta, will be done away with. You buy a royalty in a well, not a fractional interest in a company as such, and no royalty company will be able to get any advantage from the concessions being granted under the exchange control act because they are not producing companies as such. They are companies organized to develop one particular well or one particular lease. They are essentially cooperative in nature and in purport and intent. It is a cooperative venture. Suppose you have bought a one per cent royalty. You know that you have a one per interest in the production of that particular well, and not in a number of wells. We have recognized in our legislation in this house throughout the years that favourable consideration should be given to cooperative enterprises as such, and this form of enterprise is essentially cooperative. Cooperatives as such have heretofore been free from taxation. A royalty company, from its very nature, is cooperative in spirit.

I would ask the minister to consider the matter further. I am sure, from such information and knowledge as I now have of the oil industry in my province, that this legislation will kill the enterprise and initiative which has resulted in expanding that field. Suppose you buy a one per cent royalty in one of these wells for two or three or four or five thousand dollars, as many people of Ontario and Quebec have done. Costs of development are excessively high, and generally speaking the life of a well is not more than four or five years. The provincial government is taking ten per cent of the actual production, and now this government is coming along and in effect Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): In answering the hon. member for Battle River the minister pointed out that under agreement no concession is granted in connection with gold mining and other metalliferous mines. Concessions have been granted to gold mining companies by statute, and section 89 of the act we are now considering grants certain exemptions to metalliferous mines. So that they have been getting concessions which the oil producers have not been getting.

Mr. ILSLEY: Since 1936. That is an old policy. There was freedom from taxation for the first three years of operation.

Mr. JACKMAN: Resolution 10, Excess Profits Tax Act, deals with that matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: The provision runs out this year so far as gold mines are concerned.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): But they have been getting those concessions despite the fact that the oil industry is much more important at this time.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is being discontinued on gold.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): It is being discontinued on gold, but not on the other metalliferous mines?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the country considers the bringing into production of new oil wells a procedure which would help the war effort, I suggest that some greater credit be given them by way of tax exemption. If the successful wells are to be taxed 40 per cent, such a tax will be a great hardship and will discourage the bringing in of new wells.

Let us take the example of a syndicate which drills two wells at a cost of $200,000 each. One well may be a dry hole, but the other one may produce. The one which produces will pay 40 per cent, the government taking no risk whatsoever in connection with capital loss involved in dealing with the dry hole. This is just another example of controlled economy as against free economy. Who will risk his money in the hazardous enterprise of oil wildcatting in Alberta or anywhere else in Canada and be entitled to receive only 60 per cent of the profits, if there are any, while at the same time receiving no offset against loss on wells which do not prove productive?

Resolution 10 under the Excess Profits Tax Act provides:

That the income of any company derived from the production of base metals or strategic minerals shall be exempt from taxation hereunder if the company first came into production during the period of three years commencing the first day of January, 1943, and such exemption shall extend to the income of the first three fiscal periods of twelve months each of any such company following commencement of such production.

There is an example of a provision made by the government when it really wants something brought into production. There is in Canada a dearth of strategic minerals, and here the government is making a reasonable concession, one which will induce private enterprise to go out into production, because they are going to get exemptions for three years under the Excess Profits Tax Act. They will still remain subject to the 18 per cent provision—I believe that is the correct percentage—

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: —which is a bearable tax, although perhaps it should not be there. Nevertheless a company can go on and still suffer the payment of that tax. There is no such provision for oil companies. There is also a shortage of natural gas in Ontario. The wells now in production are being rapidly depleted by the companies which do the servicing of industries and provide for domestic heating, because all the gas is being used for war purposes—that is, all except the absolute minimum required for warmth in the winter time.

I know of a syndicate which wishes to spend $50,000 or more in a search for additional wells in southern Ontario. It has a well-formulated plan for the development of certain properties in that area, but it is being held back because of the heavy taxation that is staring them in the face. Surely if the production of oil and gas in Canada is helpful to the war effort, then at least for the next three years they should be included in resolution 10 under the Excess Profits Tax Act whereby they would be freed from any taxation above 18 per cent of any earnings they make.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In view of this provision in the Excess Profits Tax Act, in which it appears that some companies are getting consideration, and in view of the fact that we are in need of an increase in oil production, the minister would be well advised to consider making some concession to oil companies in that connection, as he has done with other companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: We make special agreements with them. It is just a question of judgment as to how far we should go. The throwing off of a tax undoubtedly encourages production. It is a very popular way of taxable at 40 per cent before being distributed, and they will buy the royalties on that basis.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The point has been brought up that these royalty companies are going to be more harshly treated than the share companies. Is there any way in which a share company, through its holdbacks, is given any preference over a royalty company? There seems to be an idea that there is discrimination as between the royalty companies and the share companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot think of any way in which there will be discrimination. The same rules will apply with regard to depletion and depreciation. The rate will be the minimum rate applied to incorporated companies, and I cannot think of any discrimination against these organizations implicit in this proposal.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not mean to suggest that there is discrimination, but that statement has been made. I could not see where the discrimination existed, and I asked the minister as a matter of information, because I think if there is any discrimination as between the share companies and the royalty companies it would be unfair. The minister says he does not know of any.

Mr. ILSLEY: The method of operation of the royalty syndicates is to treat each well as a separate unit, and some wells may be good while others are bad. There might be a tax advantage to a company because of the difference in practice. That is, the organization investing in one well will perhaps either lose a good deal of money or make a good deal of money. If it loses money it gets no advan-tage; if it makes money it is taxed at the rate of 40 per cent. Another company may have some paying wells and some losing wells, and it would offset the losses of the losing wells against the profits of the paying wells; therefore, on the entire number of wells, if they paid at the 40 per cent rate they might pay the government a smaller sum than would be paid by a group of royalty syndicates. But these syndicates choose to operate one well at a time, for their own reasons, and I do not know that we can help it if they do. If they want to do it in some other way, as a company, they may do so. That is the only discrimination or possible discrimination that I can think of that is implied in this proposal.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Could not the royalty companies reorganize in some way?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know enough about it to be able to say whether they could or [Mr. Ilsley.] not, but I do not think it is a difference that we should recognize at all for taxation purposes.

Mr. FAIR: Have any concessions been made to mining companies opening up new mines during the past two or three years? If so, what have they been? With this information we can make a comparison between mining companies and oil companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under the War Exchange Conservation Act the Minister of Finance is authorized to make agreements with persons drilling for oil by which special depreciation or tax credits may be allowed to encourage these persons to drill. Under that authority agreements have been entered into with some of the companies.

Mr. FAIR: My question was in connection with gold and other minerals. What concessions have been made to those companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, there are no concessions to gold mines; no agreements have been made with them.

Mr. FAIR: Have any been made during the past two or three years?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no. The Excess Profits Tax Act has a special provision for persons producing gold and oil, and if the hon. gentleman will read that act he will see what that provision is. That was all explained thoroughly to the House of Commons and debated at the time the reasons were given. But no agreements have been made under the War Exchange Conservation Act to encourage the production of gold. Agreements have been made, I do not know just how many, to encourage the production of other metals, notably nickel, and several agreements have been made to encourage the production of oil, but not gold.

Mr. PERLEY: If an individual who is not associated or connected with any company or syndicate decides of his own initiative to drill for oil or gasoline, to what concessions or deductions would he be entitled?

Mr. ILSLEY: He is just as eligible as a company for any concession under the War Exchange Conservation Act. Nobody is entitled to anything; it is merely a matter of the minister's discretion. Different agreements are made with various applicants. This is one of the most difficult matters in connection with the operation of the Department of Finance.

Mr. PERLEY: An individual would have to take it up directly with the department.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

of the oil fields in the hands of the large companies, or what he terms the world petroleum cartel. But as the minister stated, they will now understand what the tax will be, and I assume from what he has said that he intends to protect independent companies that are financing on royalties, to that extent anyway.

Mr. ILSLEY: To that extent, yes.

Mr. FAIR: Three days ago I received a resolution in connection with this matter from the Vermilion board of trade. Vermilion is one of the parts of Alberta in which quite a quantity of oil is found, and the board of trade of that town believe that the little operators or investors are being discriminated against. I believe the minister has a copy of this resolution. It reads as follows:

Whereas in the province of Alberta exploration for petroleum has heretofore to a large extent been financed by the sale of preferred royalty certificates, which represented an interest in the production of any petroleum from the well in respect of which such certificates were sold;

And whereas the said certificates are sold upon a condition that all of the proceeds of the net production from any discovery shall be paid to the certificate holders until such time as such certificate holders have received the return of their investment in full, the proceeds thereafter being divided between the holders of such certificates and the owners of the remaining interests in the well, in proportion to their holdings;

And whereas heretofore the production of the well required to be paid to the certificate holder was not subject to taxation until it reached the hands of the certificate holder, when it became subject to taxation in the same manner as other income;

And whereas unless some differentiation between other taxes payable at the source and the tax at source is provided for, the deduction of royalty tax at source will alter the situation and royalty certificates, owing to the hazardousness of the venture and great possibility of no return in a great many instances, will cease to be an investment sufficiently attractive to enable further development to proceed by public financing.

Therefore, be it resolved that in the opinion of the Vermilion Board of Trade, of Vermilion, Alberta, some provision ought to be made in the revenue act whereby royalties from petroleum and/or natural gas ventures are not subject to taxation in respect of sufficient of the first net production to return to the owners of such certificates their full capital investment, and thereafter a rate of taxation lower than that imposed upon other securities ought to be imposed, in order that exploration for petroleum production may continue upon an increased rather than an abated schedule.

And further be it resolved that the owner of a well, who has invested his own money in exploring and bringing in the same, should be entitled to have a return of the moneys expended in drilling operations from production prior to the imposition of a tax upon the production. And further be it resolved that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Minister of Finance and to such other persons as in the opinion of the president and secretary may be advisable.

Passed at Vermilion, Alberta, this 17th day of July, A.D. 1942.

That is signed by Mr. Richardson, the secretary-treasurer. My information is that 90per cent of the new oil fields have been financed by royalty owners. It would seem that under these proposals some hindrance will be placed in the way of the development of new fields and further advantages handed out to the large oil companies.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Would it not avoid a great deal of difficulty if the minister would impose a straight production tax, right at the well bead?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. That suggestion has been made, but I do not think the dominion government should adopt it. The provinces have been insistent, generally speaking, on their exclusive right to tax directly natural resources, such as timber or minerals or anything of the kind; and when we entered into the dominion-provincial agreements their right to impose taxes in that field was expressly preserved. While now I believe the Alberta government would be willing and perhaps desirous to have us put on an output or production tax—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It would save a lot of trouble.

Mr. ILSLEY: -instead of a profits tax, it would constitute an exception in our taxation system, and I would not care to go into that field. The representations which were made to me were in favour of certainty. They said they did not object to the rate of the proposed taxation; but they thought the investors should know that each unit of oil produced would bear a certain rate of taxation. That will not be the case under my proposal, but I cannot see anything uncertain about my proposal because the profits of the enterprise will be determined on the same principles as the profits of an incorporated company conducting a similar enterprise are determined. There will be the usual depreciation and depletion, and so forth, and then whatever profits are left will be taxed at 40 per cent, just as a corporation would be taxed if it were paying the minimum rate. I may say that most of the companies are paying at the minimum rate of 40 per cent, rather than the 75 per cent or, as it will be hereafter, the 100 per cent rate, so that I cannot see anything uncertain about the tax. The investors will know that any profits they make will be fund or plan. Apparently doubt exists as to whether payments to the civil service retirement fund are covered by the amended resolution. It will be recalled that the retirement fund is on a different principle from the civil service superannuation fund. It has been suggested to me that payments made to the retirement fund are not deductible under this resolution. This would be a most unfortunate discrimination. I ask the minister to give some consideration to the question and perhaps clarify it. I understand there are five thousand people affected by this, and they think they are being discriminated against. I leave that idea with the minister in order that consideration may be given to these persons, whose position is not dissimilar in principle from that of those who pay into the superannuation fund.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was intended that the retirement fund would be covered. The words of the resolution were "approved superannuation, retirement or pension fund or plan", and the amended resolution does not change those words.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister thinks the word "retirement" covers it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is the understanding.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the understanding.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That clarifies the position.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on resolution 11.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister said yesterday he would make a statement on this resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: This resolution effects an important change in the law and makes this type of commercial or industrial organization taxable in all respects as if it were a corporation. My knowledge of this type of organization is not very extensive, but I understand that it was invented in Oklahoma or one of the oil producing districts of the United States. The United States tax these organizations and we do not. Some years ago I think there was a case on their taxability; the government lost it, and they have gone along without any corporation tax. There is of course an individual tax, but with the increased corporation rates the apparent discrimination between a company drilling for oil and a syndicate financed by royalties drilling for oil is very considerable. We decided that the time had come when they ought to be taxed. Strong representations have been made to me that to tax these syndicates, simply putting them in exactly the same position as companies, would result in much difficulty in financing. The argument that has been used is that when it is proposed to drill for oil and a group of investors are asked to put their money into the venture and in exchange for their money to take royalties, there ought to be some certainty as to the taxation; otherwise, with our present excess profits tax, there might be great discouragement to investment.

The discouragement would arise in this way, that these are new companies, at least from now on they would be new syndicates, and the investors might very well ask: "What is the taxation going to be?" The only answer the person attempting to sell royalties could make would be: "Application will have to be made to the board of referees and a standard profits base determined. If that is high enough, there will not be any 100 per cent tax. but if it is not high enough, there may be." To an investor that would be a very discouraging answer. As we need oil and would like to see greater developments in that respect, I have decided that there should be incorporated in the legislation based on this resolution a provision that in no event will the tax be more than 40 per cent. That will be the minimum rate for incorporated companies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister said, "Not more than 40 per cent" and then said, "that will be the minimum."

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, it will be 40 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will be the maximum?

Mr. ILSLEY: It will be 40 per cent. The reason I said "not more than" is it might slip to 100 per cent on part. That is an eventuality which I think should be avoided.

So far as I can see, that meets the argument of those who desire certainty. The submission to me has been that a corporation tax should not be imposed on these organizations, but that there might be an output tax, a natural resources tax. I pointed out that we have conscientiously and consistently avoided imposing such a tax. The provinces reserve that field to themselves, and so far at least we are quite content to have them do so. I should not want to start in that way the imposition of taxes on natural resources.

Mr. PERLEY: I think the minister has made it plain that he has come to an understanding with them as to what their position is. I had a telegram from an independent company which is financing on the sale of royalties. They felt that if the tax went through as proposed they might be put out of business, and it would leave the development a security service for the whole of Canada. I hold in my hand a certified minute of a meeting of the treasury board approved on that day. It quotes from a long memorandum submitted by the Minister of Justice, in which he recommends, under the authority of the War Measures Act, fifteen different proposals. I do not propose to read them all, but No. 1 reads:

There shall be a security service for the whole of Canada under the control of the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

No. 2 provides:

Canada is to be divided into control areas, covering ports, landing fields and any entry airports, as well as railway and other transportation centres, as decided by the Minister of Justice.

The estimated cost of this establishment is one and a half million dollars, as set out in the order in council or the minute, and is to comprise a force of about 700 men. What has developed in recent months or weeks which has made this necessary? I think a statement from the minister would be reassuring to the country, because the establishment of this force is bound to become public knowledge and the people should be informed as to why it is being set up. I had thought that we had an adequate intelligence service in Canada, not only in connection with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police but in connection with the three armed services. Apparently that is not the case, notwithstanding the fact that the mounted police force has been increased by several hundreds in recent months. Possibly the real objectives of establishing such a force in this country are not apparent from the order in council. I invite the Minister of Justice either now, or at a later day, to give the house and country the underlying reasons for the establishment of this force.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Perhaps it would be more satisfactory if the explanations required in this regard were supplied when the estimates are being voted to provide for the service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is being provided for now out of moneys already voted through the war appropriation bill. If the Minister of Justice will look at the terms of the order I am sure he will see that it is so.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The estimates for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will have to be considered by the house and I had thought that it might be a convenient time then to give such information as can be given publicly in respect of this new security service, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It will have to be.

ACCOUNTANTS AND AUDITORS

QUESTION OF STATUS IN RELATION TO CIVILIAN OCCUPATIONS OR SERVICE IN ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): May I direct a question to the Minister of National War Services, arising out of a recent competition invited by the civil service commission. It is competition No. 42-936. This matter is of the utmost importance, because I have had three letters to-day from chartered accountantsand auditors who are doing tremendous work in connection with the endeavour to facilitate small industries throughout the country. This invites applications, the salaries running from $1,920 to $3,000. Three persons have written to me to-day asking whether they should! apply or should carry on their civil occupations, or whether they will ultimately be-found a better place by serving in some auditing branch of the armed forces. They are in a quandary as to what to do: they do not know whether to apply for this or wait until some direction is given, or whether they will eventually end up in the army. I think the matter should be clarified.

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): I am not familiar with the details of the civil service competition to which the hon. member has referred, and without knowing more about it I am unable to answer his question. The Department of National War Services regards accountants generally as being in a very important classification. They have been listed under section 15 of the national war services regulations. I shall be glad to look into the matter with a view to answering the hon. gentleman's question if I can.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Vien in the chair.

11. That where any royalty company, association, or other body is organized for the purpose of drilling for and operating oil or gaswells whereby the production belongs not to the company but to the investors in the property, the production shall be deemed to be for and on behalf of the company and the incomeof the company shall be deemed to include the proceeds secured from the sale of the said oil or gas, less necessary expenses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have passed the amended resolution 7(1)(a), and I have no desire to return to it, but a question has arisen this morning upon which I would ask that the minister give a ruling. Resolution 7(1)(a) relates to the payments into any approved superannuation, retirement or pension few days ago. I read it yesterday. That was the first time I had a chance to read it. I will make a statement within a few days.

Mr. CHURCH: The war committee has nothing to do with housing, as I see it.

THE PLEBISCITE

COST OF TAKING VOTE-INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): On April 29, a question regarding the cost of the plebiscite was asked by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) and was passed as an order for return. On June 3 a question asked by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) on the same subject was passed as an order for return. On several occasions these two hon. members have asked when they might expect the return, but no return has yet been forthcoming. Realizing that all accounts might not have been paid, the hon. member for Cumberland placed another question on the order paper, asking for payments to date. This question should immediately have been answered. But instead, it was passed on Monday last as an order for return. I think we are entitled to have this information presented to us at the earliest possible day. I ask the Secretary of State to bring down the information to-morrow. There certainly should be no difficulty about doing so in respect of the last question asked by the hon. member for Cumberland.

With regard to the interruption of the Minister of Mines and Resources the other day in connection with extravagance, may I page the plebiscite in answer to him.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Each of these proposed orders for return was submitted to the chief plebiscite officer. I am of course completely in his hands as to the expense. If I remember correctly, there were 32,246 electoral booths required in connection with the plebiscite; there was also the overseas vote and the active service vote. It takes some time to coordinate an answer which will give the total cost. I could of course give a statement of the amounts paid to date, and I shall be glad to expedite that return as much as I can possibly do so.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PERSONNEL LISTED IN DEFENCE TELEPHONE DIRECTORY

in the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témisouata): Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand [Mr. Ilsley.]

the orders of the day for to-day, and I am greatly surprised that question No. 3, which bears the date of June 12, has not yet been answered. It is a month and ten days since that question was put on the order paper. It is the easier to answer because the minister has already given the totals of all these particulars, and if the totals were right it is undoubtedly very easy for the most efficient staff of the headquarters to answer the question at once. I am sure that I shall be lucky in following the example set by the leader of the opposition and asking for a reply to-morrow.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I may say to my hon. friend that there is no chance of a reply being given to-morrow, and, further, that that question is taking its usual turn in connection with the business of the Department of National Defence. I am not going to give instructions that other work which is far more important should be made subsidiary to the answering of questions of this kind. If the house will take the trouble to read the question it will find out how much detail is involved and how futile the work is after it is all done.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I protest strongly against the words of the leader of the opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: The more futile he calls them the more important they are to the public and the press.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope the hon. member does not attribute the answer to me.

Mr. POULIOT: No, but the leader of the opposition is the power behind the throne in the Department of National Defence; therefore I may be excused.

SECURITY SERVICE

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT-REQUEST FOR EXPLANATORY STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct the attention of the Minister of Justice to a subject matter which I have discussed with him. It is in reference to the creation of a new force in our services under the provisions of order in council P.C.85/6073. I do not ask this question in any critical sense at all, but merely for the purpose of information. On July 14 this order in council was passed establishing view with Mr. Vining at the time, before he presented his report. As a matter of fact I have not had an opportunity to discuss its representations with Mr. Vining since this report was received. I think it is well that the house should know the facts as to there having been no endeavour on the part of the government to pigeonhole the report, but rather the wish to give it the careful study which it merits.

Mr. CHURCH: Why not drop it? The people of the United States resent it. Britain tried it for two hundred years and failed.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Vining occupies an important position in the industrial and commercial life of Canada. He was appointed, as I understood it, to survey the situation with relation to our publicity in the United States—a very important subject and one which has not received the attention it should have received in the long months that this country has been at war. He was sent down there, as I understand it, for a definite purpose. He has made a report. It must be of a constructive character, and unless there is something highly confidential in it, it should be tabled.

I do not know why the government is always seeking to reserve to itself reports of this kind, which are ordered in the public interest. I do not think any harm can be done by publishing this report. Only on the basis of giving away secrets which might be of service to the enemy should the government be deterred from producing documents such as this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows that it would be quite impossible for a government to carry on its business if there is to be nothing in the nature of confidential reports between officials and the government, or persons appointed by the government for special missions. In the nature of things Mr. Vining, to make his report as comprehensive as the government hoped it might be, found it necessary to get personal opinions from a number of individuals, some of whom have distinctly stated that they would not wish to have their identities known. It is not any desire on the part of the government to keep documents secret, but it is a desire on the part of the government to have information and inquiries serve the best purposes in the best way, and that can be done only by respecting the wishes of people in the matter of information which might not be elicited from them otherwise.

As to what my hon. friend has just said about publicity being a difficult problem, 44561-285 there is no question as to that. The government of every country has had this same problem. There is no single problem that has occasioned so much discussion and difference of view and debate and rearrangement as has publicity in Great Britain, and equally in the United States, and it is not surprising that it should have been a difficult problem here. I assure my hon. friend that the government is as anxious as he is, indeed more anxious, to have Canada's war effort as widely and as accurately known as possible.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. CHURCH: A waste of money.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO ERECTION OF HOSTEL IN OTTAWA FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State or the Minister of Finance if any progress has been made in connection with the proposed erection of a hostel for government employees in the city of Ottawa. This matter has been up on several occasions for several months, and apparently no progressive step has been taken yet beyond the inquiry stage. I think the time has arrived when something definite should be announced.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Perhaps it will be appropriate if I answered the leader of the opposition in connection with this question. It has been decided to erect a residence for the lower-paid girls in the civil service. I will have a statement to make, I trust, within two or three days in connection with that residence, but in the meantime the decision has been arrived at to erect it.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GENERAL SITUATION

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a question. Would the minister make a statement on this, the 114th day of the session, on the general housing situation, especially as regards the continuance of the act for another year? On the 34th day of the session I was promised a statement, and this is the 114th day.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I have to make a statement before the house adjourns. The report of the committee of the House of Commons which dealt with the situation, and dealt with it very comprehensively, was presented to the house only a interests in this area, with full power to submit reports on the treatment of Canadian prisoners-of-war and civilian internees.

2. See answer to question 1.

3. The representative of the protecting power in charge of Japanese interests in Canada has requested permission to visit camps and settlements where Japanese nationals in Canada are situated.

4. Yes.

5. Mr. P. E. Schwartz, consul-general of Spain. Spain is the protecting power in charge of Japanese interests in Canada.

6. None.

7. Permission was granted for a member of the Japanese community in British Columbia to accompany the Spanish consul-general as translator and assistant.

AIR RAID PRECAUTIONS-GASOLINE RATIONING

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Have the gasoline rations been increased or promised to any A.R.P. workers in Ontario, and to what extent?

2. Have the gasoline rations been increased or promised to any A.R.P. workers in Nova Scotia, and to what extent?

Mr. HOWE:

1. A.R.P. workers in all parts of Canada are entitled to apply for inclusion in category B if the head of their local civilian defence committee is prepared to certify that extra gasoline is required by applicant in discharge of their A.R.P. duties.

2. Answered by 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—CONTRACTS AND FINANCIAL ENGAGEMENTS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What is the total value of contracts awarded by the Department of Munitions and Supply for, (a) Canada, (b) United Kingdom, (c) allied nations?

2. What is the amount of the financial engagements undertaken by Canada on the United Kingdom account by reason and from the date of our participation in the war?

3. What is the amount of similar engagements undertaken by Canada on behalf of allied countries?

LIFE JACKETS AND FLYING SUITS-KAPOK AND MILKWEED

Mr. McNIVEN:

1. What quantities of kapok were imported in the years 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942 from (a) Java, (b) other countries? [Mr. Mackenzie King.] 2. Is the floss from the milkweed a suitable substitute for kapok in the manufacture of life jackets and flying suits required by the navy and the air force?

3. Is the milkweed a product of Canada and will the government subsidize its growth, as has been done in Michigan?

GLUE

Mr. McNIVEN:

1. What quantities of glue were imported in the years 1938, 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1942, (a) from the British isles, (b) from other countries?

2. What is the estimate of Canada's requirements of glue for the years 1942 and 1943?

3. Has the government authorized the annual export of 1,000 cars or any number of cars of dry prairie bones suitable for the manufacture of glue, to Consolidated Chemicals Industries Inc., of San Francisco, California?

4. Has the government contracted for the purchase of glue for war purposes from said company, and if so, in what quantities and at what price?

5. By what agency is the glue so purchased distributed or sold in Canada and upon what terms?

6. Why was a plant for the manufacture of glue not established in western Canada?

PUBLICITY IN THE UNITED STATES—REPORT OF CHARLES VINING

Mr. CARDIFF:

For a copy of the report made by Mr. Charles Vining with respect to publicity in the United States of America.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, this report is a confidential report prepared as such for the government. It contains a number of references to persons not only in Canada but in the United States, and was not intended for publication but for the guidance of the government in considering this whole question of publicity. Therefore the report cannot be tabled—certainly not at present.

I should like in speaking of the report to draw attention to an editorial which I read in one of the local newspapers, dated July 8. It is headed "Vining Report Pigeonholed." There is a statement in the editorial that "his report"-that is Mr. Vining's-"is in the hands of Mr. King," and it goes on to say what is recommended in the report, and the name of a certain person is suggested as the one who is to be the head of some new department. This editorial is dated July 8, and I have noticed in other papers of Canada editorials based on this particular editorial. I have in my hand at the moment Mr. Vining's letter to me transmitting his report. As a matter of fact it is dated July 10, 1942, and was not received by me until July 11. I had no knowledge whatever of anything the report contained. I had not had any personal inter-

Questions

2. How many men from Gaspé were members of the 1st battalion of the Royal Rifles of Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the hon. member to drop this question, more on the grounds that it would take a great deal of time to compile the information and would establish a precedent which I think the house would not want to see put into effect. The Royal Canadian Air Force advises that its enlistment records are not classified according to constituencies. To tabulate this information would require a review of the record of the entire strength of the Royal Canadian Air Force, and the time and work involved would seriously retard the normal work of the division.

In regard to the army, a compilation to answer question 1 (b) is not at present available. It would take several weeks to compile it, and if compiled for Gaspé a precedent would be established on which members might base demands for similar information with respect to the other 244 constituencies.

Question dropped.

VICHY CONSULATES

Mr. FULFORD:

1. Has the government any check on the activities of the former consuls of Vichy France whose offices were ordered closed?

2. Where are these consuls now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All French consular offices in Canada were closed at the end of May. The former consul general in Montreal, and the former consul at Vancouver will be leaving Canada as soon as the necessary travel arrangements can be completed. The former consul at Winnipeg and the former vice-consul at Montreal are presently employed by the French legation in handling consular business which has been transferred to the legation since the closing of the consular offices. In their present capacity they have neither diplomatic nor consular status. The honorary consular agents of France are practically all British subjects who have been continuously residents in Canada.

PRICE CEILING-FLUID MILK

Mr. PURDY:

1. Is the ceiling for fluid milk still fixed at one cent per quart higher in Saint John, New Brunswick, than in Halifax, Nova Scotia?

2. What price is paid for fluid milk by the distributors to the producers in, (a) the Saint John district, (b) the Halifax district?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The ceiling price for fluid milk at Halifax is 12 cents per quart; the ceiling price for fluid milk at Saint John is 13 cents per quart. 2. The price paid by distributors to producers in the Saint John district is \$2.45 per one hundred pounds of milk having a minimum test of $3\cdot 8$ per cent butterfat; and in Halifax district \$2.25 per one hundred pounds of milk having a minimum test of $3\cdot 7$ per cent butterfat.

The above prices are for milk delivered in the cities of Saint John and Halifax respectively, and are taken from the latest orders of the New Brunswick and Nova Scotia milk control board, which were approved by the wartime prices and trade board.

CANADIAN PRISONERS IN JAPAN—JAPANESE NATIONALS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. REID:

1. Have any representations been made by Canada asking that a representative of the Canadian government be allowed to visit Japan with the view of finding out at first hand how Canadian soldiers and citizens, now prisoners of Japan, are being treated?

2. If so, has any intimation been made by Japan that a representative of the Canadian government would be allowed to make such an inspection?

3. Have any similar representations been made on behalf of Japan in connection with Japanese nationals in British Columbia?

4. Is there a representative of Japan at present in Canada making an investigation into conditions affecting Japanese nationals at Hastings Park work camps and other places where Japanese nationals are being located?

5. If so, what is the name of the Japanese representative and to what country does he belong?

6. How many such representatives, if any, have been permitted to enter Canada for this purpose?

7. Are there any Japanese nationals or of Japanese origin accompanying the representative on his tour of inspection?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Representatives of the protecting power in charge of Canadian interests have been in touch with Canadian nationals in Japan since the outbreak of war, and reports have been received both through these official representatives and through the local delegate of the International Red Cross regarding conditions in the internment camps in Japan.

The Japanese government have not yet permitted representatives of the protecting power to visit Hong Kong, which is still designated a "zone of military operations." An International Red Cross delegate has been allowed to go from Shanghai to Hong Kong to assist in the distribution of relief. Strong representations have been made to the Japanese government that a Swiss representative be permitted to take charge of Canadian

(c) Resolution 17 shall be applicable only to the income of the 1942 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein;

(d) Resolution 18 shall be applicable to the income of the 1941 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods;

(e) Resolution 19 shall be deemed to have come into force on the 24th day of June, 1942, and shall be applicable to all payments made on and after the said date.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Paragraph (a) of this resolution reads:

Resolutions 1 to 15 inclusive, 20 and 21 shall be applicable to the income of the 1942 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and to all subsequent periods.

The question I raised this morning pertained with a greater degree to 1942 taxation than perhaps the taxation of any previous year. When the minister is framing the bill I should like him to give consideration to giving the power to the minister to permit an administrator or executor of an estate, whose income from the estate is not sufficient to pay income taxes and succession duties, to encroach on the capital to the extent necessary to pay these taxes, at least to the extent of the difference between taxation at the date the will was drawn and the date of probate, or allow the entire succession duties to be paid out of the estate.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I look at that question and perhaps answer it to-morrow? There are two or three resolutions which have been allowed to stand, including the royalty and prospecting resolutions. I do not think we can finish them to-night. I think this resolution should stand also.

Resolution stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

CANTEEN FUNDS

Fourth report of special committee on canteen funds.-Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City).

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DR. T. T. SHIELDS

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

Is it the intention of the Minister of Justice to take steps for the internment of Dr. T. T. [Mr. Jackman.]

Shields who recently pronounced the following words: "The Roman Catholic church has done everything possible to discourage enlistments"?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This question deals with the same matter that was mentioned in the question to me by the hon. member for St. Mary, on June 12 last, and which appears on page 3302 of Hansard.

The matter involved has been and still is under investigation by the department.

MARQUIS, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. What is the name of the postmaster at Marquis, Saskatchewan? 2. When was he appointed? 3. By whom was he recommended for the position?

4. Is he a veteran of the great war?

5. If not, did any veterans make application for the position and what are the names of such persons?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. Office vacant due to death on 3rd April, 1942, of J. E. Jenner. Mrs. Hazel Stewart, former assistant, is acting postmaster.

2. April 4, 1942.

3. Placed in temporary charge by the district director of postal services, Moose Jaw.

4. No.

5. Yes. E. A. Brown, the present postmaster at Prendergast, Sask., a non-resident.

SYNTHETIC RUBBER-SARNIA PLANT

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Is the government constructing a plant at or near Sarnia, Ontario, for the manufacture of synthetic rubber from petroleum products?

2. Is this process a cheaper process than the manufacture of synthetic rubber from wheat?

3. If not, why is this process being used?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes, in southern Ontario.

2. As synthetic rubber has not been produced on this continent in commercial volume by either process it is impossible to answer this question.

3. It is proposed to use both processes in the government programme for the production of synthetic rubber in Canada. Butanol produced from wheat will be shipped to the southern Ontario plant and there converted into butadiene, the principal ingredient of Buna-S rubber. The butadiene at this plant will be synthesized with styrene into Buna-Srubber.

CANADIAN FORCES-GASPÉ ENLISTMENTS

Mr. FULFORD:

1. What are the total enlistments from theconstituency of Gaspé, (a) in the navy, (b) in. the army, (c) in the air force? operator. He might have to wait for a period to find out whether he could make the contribution himself. No matter how we approach the situation, there will be great difficulty. As I say, for the last three months the government has refused to place farm wages under a ceiling, as has been done with other callings.

Mr. TUSTIN: Do I understand the minister to say that this national defence tax and the deductions for compulsory savings are payable three days after they are taken from the payroll? Is that not an innovation to the practice in connection with the national defence tax which was deducted each week but payable on the 15th of the following month? Must the employer send in a cheque every week?

Mr. GIBSON: Three days after the pay date, but not more often than once a week.

Mr. TUSTIN: This will mean three times as much work for the employer in making up statements, issuing cheques, and sending them in to the income tax collector.

Mr. ROY: Could the minister not make other arrangements for the collection of the income tax at the source in order to avoid trouble in making refunds at the end of the year? This practice is quite expensive for the government, and it is inconvenient for people to have to wait for their money when a refund is due. Why could the employer not start to make deductions just at the period when a man has earned, if he is single, $660? If a man is making $100 a month, deductions from his wages should not be made before he has worked for seven months. In industries such as lumbering and fishing many employees do not work all year, and certainly many of them do not work for seven months at $100 a month. The government will be obliged to refund income tax deducted at the source, and this could be avoided if the employer were allowed to check the wages of a man and permit him to work for a certain period before starting to make the deductions. If a married man is making $100 a month, it will take him a whole year to earn $1,200, and he would not be taxable.

Mr. ILSLEY: We discussed that before this evening, and I think the tax will have to be collected on the income as earned. I do not think a measure of judgment can be allowed the employer. He may have reasons for thinking that a man working for him will not earn the minimum during the year, but the only reason the government can recognize is the rate of pay which an employee is receiving. If an employee is not receiving the minimum rate his employer need not make a deduction. That has been the case in the past, and it will continue to be the case. The hon, member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) has asked that I prevent the impression from going out—is that the main question?

Mr. JACKMAN: It is the main request. It was not a question.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was asked what I thought was a question of law, and I gave what I thought was a correct answer. The hon. member raises a question of desirability or policy, and he would like me to say that I think it would be most undesirable for any employer to undertake to pay the national defence tax, whether he be a farmer or anybody else. I should like to give that some consideration. The hon. gentleman may be perfectly right about that; it might be undermining the structure, but it occurred to me that it would apply to only a small class of employees, those who are not under the wage ceiling, and perhaps it would not be as serious as he says. However, he may be perfectly right, and I shall try to consider what the implications will be.

Mr. JACKMAN: The question is, on whom is the incidence of the tax? I tried to get figures from the government; I had a question on the order paper as to how many employees of the government or employees of government-owned corporations have their income taxes paid by the government. I have not had a complete return as yet, particularly in regard to one large government-owned institution. I also asked about how long a time can lapse before a claim for national defence tax should be made. How soon do you have to send in forms? I do not suppose one per cent of the people who are entitled to rebates on national defence tax have ever put in claims. I have never seen a form. Is it a period of twelve months, or would the statute of limitations apply, as the leader of the opposition suggested?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no statute of limitations.

Mr. JACKMAN: I asked the Minister of National Revenue how he would work out the case where a person had several sources of income. A man is in the 30 per cent bracket, but any one of the three sources would require more than 15 per cent to be witheld. I am trying to find out about the administration.

Resolution agreed to.

26. That any enactments founded on

(a) Resolutions 1 to 15 inclusive, 20 and 21 shall be applicable to the income of the 1942 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and to all subsequent periods; and to all subsequent periods; (b) Resolution 16 shall be applicable to the income of 1943 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods; pay the income tax deduction which normally would be paid by a hired man, instead of having the hired man pay it himself?

Mr. ILSLEY: That would, I should think, be equivalent to a gift to the employee in the amount of the deduction, and perfectly permissible.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there anything wrong about it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not see anything wrong.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then that is the whole question.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the minister the figures showing how many taxpayers there were in the dominion last year who received less than $660 or $1,200 as the case may be?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, we have not those figures.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Or any approximation of them?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. On this question of refunds I may say that in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942, there were 46,522 refunds of national defence tax.

Mr. TUSTIN: How many applications?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: These were from people who earned less than the minimum?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know, but 46,522 refunds were made.

Mr. JACKMAN: I believe the minister has just given expression to a principle which is fundamentally unsound, and to a practice which should be stopped right away. That is, that any employer can pay the tax of an employee and have it considered equitable in the eyes of this statute.

_Mr. ILSLEY: Not where there is a wage ceiling, of course.

Mr. JACKMAN: I was not speaking of wage ceilings. If you allow that principle to go out from this house you will find that all kinds of employees will demand and insist that their employers, who already are burdened by their own taxes under this and previous acts, pay the national defence tax for these employees. You cannot admit that principle for one moment, because it affects not only factory employment but domestic service, farm employment and all sorts of service. If an employer pays the tax-on the wages of the employee, certainly that is an addition to the income of the employee and there must be a tax on the tax paid. Therefore you never catch up with yourself. The minister should be clear on this matter and should not answer as he did without adequate contemplation, or without sufficient opportunity to give the matter thought.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is technically correct there, about its being an addition to the income. Of course the wage ceiling applies to practically all employees in Canada, and where that ceiling applies this could not be done because it would be a violation of the order relating to the stabilization of wages. When I gave that answer I had in mind farm labour.

Mr. JACKMAN: Are you going to allow employers to pay that tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: They cannot pay it without violating the wage ceiling, where there is one.

Mr. JACKMAN: Well, of course the wage ceiling does not apply to a great many classes of employment as yet, as the minister is aware. I do not know about seasonal employment in the canning factories and on farms, but certainly it does not obtain in domestic service and in many other branches of employment. If this principle is allowed to stand it will cause all sorts of hardship. I know there are places where the employers do pay the tax in order to keep their people in employment, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle mentioned. We even see advertisements in the newspapers to the effect that persons will accept certain rates of pay, pro-vided the tax is paid by the employers. It is astounding what some people will demand, when they know their employers must pay heavy taxes before they can pay wages, and therefore I hope the minister will not allow this principle to stand. I should like to ask also how much time may lapse before a person who has had the national defence tax deducted from his wages may reclaim that tax from the department, after he finds that he has not come up to the minimum.

Mr. ILSLEY: Any time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): How often must the employer turn in these deductions to the government? What are the periods? I should like to know, because I want to follow this up.

Mr. GIBSON: Within three days after the close of the pay period.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The minister has said that there is no price ceiling on farm wages. For many months we have been trying to have regulations passed in that connection, and this is going to prove rather difficult for the farm in this case. I have a hired man, have had him all the summer, I pay him $60 a month, he served me with notice that if I deduct from him in August he is going to quit."

True, he cannot go into industry because farm labour is frozen by order in council. "But," he says, "I am going to lose my man at a time when I need him in the worst way. He can get much higher wages from farmers nearby." I may say that I thought of telling him to pay the tax himself and say nothing about it to the government, but that would only increase the man's wages as far as the farmer was concerned. What can I say to him? I should like an answer from the minister, because I have received many similar inquiries.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not believe it is in order to ask questions like this, and crossexamine the ministers as though they were witnesses. The ministers explain the provisions. They are not here to tell any hon. member how to reply to a consulting elector.

Mr. PERLEY: I think many electors would be pleased to get a statement from the minister.

Mr. CHURCH: Under the principle of this provision the government is just as bad as the government of Germany. The principle there is that might is right. I can say this to the government, that this whole budget is interfering very seriously with industrial conditions in this country. The government is now going to collect this tax at the source. So far as I know that never has been done anywhere except in British Honduras, where that principle was adopted. In my opinion the government is making a great mistake, because the people will not have the money with which to pay the tax. In the second place, the burden, as collector, is now placed upon the employer as well as the employee. From what I understand, the government or the state will have to bury a lot of people because of this budget. One undertaker, as a result of this budget, told me that he wanted the cash before he would bury a person in the cemetery. The hospitals also want cash. I do not know where it is going to end, because the government puts in its hand and takes the total amount of the tax first, and as a result all the others will have to wait for their money. In the end I believe the government will lose a great deal of money by this confiscatory method. We are here in Ottawa; we do not know the feeling in our constituencies. I have seen this principle adopted in other countries, and always it has brought about reduced revenues. I think the minister should pay attention to the handwriting on the wall. The people cannot pay these taxes. It is all very well for the minister to smile; there will be less smiling after this budget has been in force for a year. The undertaker will also act for the authors of the budget.

Mr. GRAYDON: With great respect for your ruling, Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN: It is not subject to debate.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not going to debate it; I am going to make a statement in order to be clear on the matter. I want to say this, that whether the Chairman realized it, or whether the minister realized it, the question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle is being asked all over the country.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, please. The hon. gentleman cannot refer to the ruling or to the question that was asked and declared out of order. The matter before the committee is not an exchange of correspondence between an elector and a member of parliament, or the answer that may be given by a member to any question asked. The matter before the committee is the budget resolutions, and I invite hon. members to limit their discussion to those resolutions.

Mr. GRAYDON: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I should like to ask the minister a question, not based on any letter I have received but in order to obtain advice on this particular point. Let us say a farmer in western Canada has a hired man and that hired man says that if the tax is deducted in August of this year he will quit. The farmer wants to know what to do. This is not by way of letter; there is no correspondence. This is a hypothetical question which I think I have a right to ask the minister, because it involves a most important principle.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. gentleman cannot put a hypothetical question-

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: I am very serious; and at this time of night, when we have such important matters before the committee, I hope hon. members will cooperate in order to expedite the work. I have ruled out of order any question which is not strictly relevant to the section now before the committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then I will abandon my former method of procedure in favour of what I hope will be a better one. Let me ask the minister this. Is it in order for a farmer to these factories know full well before the season begins that their employees with few exceptions are not going to earn that much money. Let me give one example. A factory employing 130 employees, seasonal workers, last year had three employees who earned enough to be liable for national defence tax. In spite of that there had to be 130 entries and the tax deducted from these individuals, and I ask the minister, how many of them got a refund, or how many of them will ever get it? I protested before that it would take a great staff in the office of the minister to see that these refunds were made, provided applications were made for them. As the minister may know and as I am sure hon. members will know, there is not one applica-tion in a hundred made for such refunds; the government obtains and keeps a good deal of money that actually belongs to the employees, money which is not due the government under the statutes of this country. The minister could do a great service if he would to-night instruct his officials to go to work and set up some scheme that would be simpler and would get the same results in the end, so that the tax would be collected when it was payable and everyone in the country would be able to understand it.

Income War Tax Act

Mr. JACKMAN: This resolution still is not clear in its application to all classes of taxpayers. Supposing a person receives income from three or more sources, as a good many people do. If I recall correctly, on the personal income tax return form there are seven or eight sources of income listed. If a person is not properly subject to any withholding for minimum savings requirements by reason of paying enough in insurance premiums and so forth, will he have to give each one of these sources of income evidence to disclose that he is not subject to tax as far as the income from that particular source is concerned?

This resolution also envisages a withholding of part of the income tax from month to month. How are you going to indicate to an employer, or to the dominion government here, that you should have a certain amount withheld from you? If your income is $4,000 you are in a certain bracket. If you are getting $1,000 from another source, that employer knows only about the $1,000. Have you to make a revelation to each of four or five companies who may pay you a $100 director's fee, for instance, what should be withheld in income tax before the payment is made to you? What has the government in mind there? As the leader of the opposition has said, it is not fair to ask people [Mr. Tustin.]

to indicate to all sources from which they may derive some income exactly what their total is. Surely, as in the past the government will rely on the filing of income tax forms to clear up any small or even large balances that may be owing. A person cannot very well escape paying what he justly owes to the country.

Mr. FAIR: Does the minister intend to send out instructors to make bookkeepers of farmers? He has told us that he had difficulty in understanding this income tax business himself. I am wondering as to the case of farmers who require help for a few days at harvesting or something, what kind of job they will make of calculating these deductions and what kind of return they will send in.

Could some other system not be worked out whereby this difficulty would be remedied? In many instances farmers hire their neighbours for a week or ten days at threshing time and then have to deduct national defence tax, which they are not entitled to pay because in many instances these men would not have, in the year, an income of more than $400 or $500, all told. Yet they were compelled to pay the national defence tax. Indications this year are that the tax will have to be calculated at a very high rate compared with what it will actually be, because when the harvesting or threshing season comes along, men will get perhaps $4 or $5 or $6 a day, and after that time they are lucky if they average $1 a day. The minister should take cognizance of the injustice being inflicted in those cases.

Mr. QUELCH: Would it not be possible to adopt some simple procedure whereby an employee would have proof that the employer had sent in the amount of money he claims to have deducted, because as hon. members have suggested there will be some employees who will feel that money is being taken from them and not being sent in? Could not something in the way of a duplicate receipt be adopted so that the employee could see that the employer sent in the money?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes, that receipt could be given each pay-day, or by large employers who have regular payrolls it would be given possibly at the end of the year; but if any man left their employ he would be given a receipt showing the amount deducted from his pay while in the employ of that firm.

Mr. PERLEY: How shall I reply to a letter I got last week from a farmer? I have the letter in my office. He says, "Will you find out from the minister what I am to do that some better means should be found of returning deductions that have been made from income to those who have not received taxable income. Some better means should be devised than those that have heretofore been in effect. I am satisfied the government has hundreds of thousands of dollars—

An hon. MEMBER: Millions.

Mr. MacINNIS: From figures I have seen of the incomes of those up to $2,000, I would not say that. Some way should be found, and if the workers realize that every cent they pay to the government, or every cent deducted from their pay, if not properly deductible, will be returned later on, there will not be any great difficulty. The leader of the opposition suggested last year that every employee should have a card and that when he worked for a particular employer he would mark the wages received and the deductions made, and he would take that card to the next employer, so that that would give at the end of the year an account of wages received. I do not think it is impossible to do something of that sort, and I am sure it would bring great satisfaction both to the government and to the taxpayers concerned.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): As this resolution reads, it applies to all salaries and wages paid by the employer to residents or persons in Canada. Does that apply to daily wages? Take, for example, farm and seasonal help. Does it mean that this fall when a farmer hires a man for a few days in connection with the harvest in the field he will have to go through all this red tape and make deductions similar to those which would have to be made throughout the year and which would put the man in the income tax brackets? Is that right?

Mr. ILSLEY: The same rule has to apply as in the case of the national defence tax.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Well, you are certainly balling things up properly in this country. I do not know where we shall end. Imagine a farmer in the west who sees no possibility of getting his harvest in with the help available. He brings home some help from the town, and he is required to go into all these details that are proposed. I do not see how you can expect him to do this sort of thing; it is not possible. I do not know where it will all end.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I offer a suggestion in line with what the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has said. The Minister of National Revenue suggested that under this resolution the government intended to draw up a schedule whereby the employer would know what he should deduct from the employee's pay envelope, and it occurred to me that there is a simple way of getting round what I maintain is a great abuse in regard to taxing these people, hundreds of thousands of them being below the taxable level. To-day they are paying taxes and in some cases getting no refund. I was wondering whether it would be possible, when the schedules are drawn up, to put in a regulation to this effect, that until a single person receives $660 he shall not be taxed, and no married person shall be taxed until he receives $1,200. After the person has received the taxable amount the deductions could be stepped up.

Mr. GIBSON: The tax has to apply on payments made at definite rates. A man might change employment once a month. The employer simply deducts the tax from any salary paid at the rate of $660 a year or higher in the case of single men or $1,200 in the case of married men.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understand that, but could the employer not find out whether that man has yet received his $660, and until such time as he does receive it he would not be taxable.

Mr. ILSLEY: It must be deducted as it is earned.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is happening now is that it is being deducted as it is earned. The man probably gets employment for six months at $100 a month, and if he does not get employment for the rest of the year he gets no further income but still has paid his tax and cannot get it back.

Mr. TUSTIN: I agree with the minister that this is a hard budget. But I go farther and say that it is the most complicated piece of legislation I have ever seen in my time in this house. How the minister expects the average individual to be able to figure out this tax is more than I can understand. I want to repeat what I have said for the as two or three years with regard to seasonal work. I have protested on behalf of the seasonal workers each year since the national defence tax was put into effect, and I protest again to-night as strenuously as I can. In my constituency I have thousands of people who work part time at seasonal work in the canning factories. It has been the policy of this government to insist that the employers deduct the national defence tax from these people if they were earning at the rate of over $660 a year. The employers in 4508 organizations for the operations of which I am responsible, the national war finance committee, with its fifteen or twenty thousand workers, is going to employers, employers like the hon. member for Northumberland, New Brunswick, who says he does not understand this, I do not wonder that he does not: perhaps I do not understand it too well myself, but it can all be made perfectly clear. Tables will be put in their hands: they will be told how much they shall deduct, and when they can give effect to statements of workmen about principal payments and payments to pension funds and insurance schemes. Their cooperation will be invited, and the cooperation of the workmen will be invited. It may be that we should have had them in, but there is no time to do everything in this world. The government must make some decisions itself. and it has only twenty-four hours in the day in which to act. We made that decision and we worked out this plan, which is a fair plan. It is open to the objection of the employee who does not want his employer to know that he has a mortgage on his house or that he has a life insurance policy, but though the employer will know that, it is not going to do any great harm. Is it a great sacrifice to ask the workmen of this country to make, when you consider the sacrifices which people are making in other parts of the world? We should not magnify out of all reason all these little discomforts and inconveniences and sacrifices.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): After that scolding by the minister I have just this to say, that I have shown this government as much cooperation in its war effort and in relation to this very budget as I could be humanly asked to give. I put myself in the judgment of the membership of this house if I have When I object to certain not done so. theories which are advanced in relation to one detail the minister says I am making a dreadful speech and I am upsetting the whole ideas of the public. I resent that sort of thing; I do not have to take it from the minister. If necessary, I will fight back. Usually I am a fairly pacific kind of a man. Sometimes I may simulate rage, but, frankly, even now I cannot get very much enraged over the minister's scolding. If I were twenty years younger or if this had happened twenty years earlier, I might be flying across the floor, but I am not doing that any more. I do not want to be open to the charge that I am hindering the government's war effort; but I say this, and say it with great sincerity, great honesty of will and purpose, that a human being has a dignity to preserve, not least in relation to his own private affairs. One of the things we are fighting for is the personal rights of the democratic citizens of this country. Government regimentation in Canada is going beyond all bounds in certain respects. I can only give the honest reaction of my own mind to a proposal of this kind. If I am wrong, well, I am sorry. I think there is a large measure of truth in the position I took and I have nothing more to say about it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was not present during the first part of the discussion, but I agree with the principle of deductions at the source as far as ordinary employees are concerned. Persons of this class have said to me that they would rather have it this way than go to the trouble of making returns when they keep no records of wages or other income received during the year. Section 25 provides for regulations which will be determined by the governor in council as to the manner of collections and deductions. I have given the matter a little thought, and I believe that persons making an income of over $660 should be compelled-possibly that is the intentionto make a return at the end of the year. In that return the employee could make any disclosures that might be required which he did not wish to make to the employer. I am not greatly concerned about the objections to the worker disclosing certain information to his employer because I am satisfied that during the last ten or twelve years, at least from 1930 to 1939, many hundreds of thousands of workers throughout the country had to bare their very souls not to the inspector of income tax, not to their employers, but to busybodies who came round to find out everything they possessed and their prospects of possessing. They had to give all that information before they could get a bite to eat. This is no worse than that, and the occasion that demands it is much more imperative than the situation that existed between 1930 and 1939. I think the situation could be met by making the deductions in this way. It will help the person drawing a small income, because such persons live close to their incomes, and at the end of the year there are no savings left from which a lump sum can be taken. It would save them the trouble and the worry about where income tax payments are to come from. If arrangements were made so that at the end of the year each would make a return disclosing anything that needed to be disclosed, it would meet the situation.

I think it may be in order under this resolution to point out to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has to disclose some of his private affairs to his employers.

Mr. ILSLEY: What he owes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, are they entitled to know it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not all that he owes, of course.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, a part of what he owes. It is all done in an endeavour to make the tax collections easy and free of cost to the government, and to avoid any loss.

Mr. GIBSON: No, it is to avoid overcollections necessitating refunds to the taxpayer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And, in a degree, a few refunds. It is, of course, a practical matter. There is a principle there. I am not going to labour the point; it is getting late and we want to go away, but the objections have been pointed out. This the objections have been pointed out. government will reap a great deal of unpopularity from this proceeding. I cannot imagine anything more likely to turn up the nose of a self-respecting man than to pry into his private affairs any more than is absolutely necessary. I object to the underlying principle. I object to anybody knowing any more about my affairs than the necessary minimum. All of us have to yield to the force and authority of law; that is one of the theories upon which democracy is based; but there are certain standards of ethical conduct which we like to see observed, and this is a violation and breach of some of those standards.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, Mr. Chairman, we shall have to go out and do what we can to counteract the effect of that speech, if anyone reads or listens to it. This is not an authoritarian government trying to perform a bureaucratic act; it is the outcome of the harsh necessities of the present situation. If the hon, gentleman knows of any better way to do this I would like to hear it. He certainly has not told it to the committee to-night; all he has done is to use very harsh and very—

Mr. JACKMAN: -true-

Mr. ILSLEY: —bitter language, which, if taken seriously by workmen throughout this country, will make them sore. It is undoing the work which the government is trying and properly trying to do. The unauthorized announcement of the alternative scheme came out in the press. Immediately we received a deluge of protests from people all over the country who said, "Why cannot I simply file a statement of my life insurance premiums, the payments of principal instalments on my mortgage and my payments on pension schemes, so that I shall not have this money deducted from the amounts due me for the greater part of the year and have to await a refund?" That seemed sensible. The workmen of this country have not all this excessive pride which the leader of the opposition says he has as a member of parliament.

Income War Tax Act

Mr. JACKMAN: You would be surprised.

Mr. ILSLEY: What hurt is it going to do to a member of parliament, even the leader of the opposition, to divulge to the comptroller of the treasury the fact that he has some life insurance, or that he has a mortgage on his property? If there is, which I do not believe there is, how much is that for him to do in a time like this? Here we are, with a terrible war raging round us, with awful reverses in foreign countries; and in this House of Commons, which goes on day after day, the leader of a great party rises in his place and says that his freedom must not be interfered with to the extent that he shall tell a government official how much life insurance he has. That is total war, is it? Certainly we have to do some of these things. I get rather tired of having the government lectured about its duty to wage total war and to regulate the people where it is necessary. A colleague of the leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Danforth, in a dramatic peroration said, "Lead us, and tax us, and do this and that and the other to us."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): "Give us leadership."

Mr. ILSLEY: "For heaven's sake, lead us." Now we have worked out a budget which is a hard budget, but we have gone to all kinds of pain and trouble to take into account the peculiar individual situations of the taxpayers of this country, not to bear on them with undue hardships, not to weigh them down with great burdens when they have savings commitments and situations of that kind. We have considered plan after plan to make this taxation as just and as easy as possible for them, and we finally decided that this, all things being considered, is the best plan for them-as the hon. member for Rosedale says, by far the best plan for them and the best plan for the government. We are entitled, I think, to a little more cooperation than the kind of speech that the leader of the opposition has just made. Of course you can find something wrong with everything. But one of the It was not a case of the government seeking an interview with the employers to ask what would suit them. As a matter of fact, the method then suggested was not adopted.

Mr. O'BRIEN: The Minister of National Revenue has spoken of the method to be followed in collecting this tax at the source. The employee must disclose to the employer his deductible commitments, so that the employer may comply with the law. I can understand that, so far as big business is concerned, but in the maritimes and in New Brunswick particularly, perhaps more especially in my constituency, business is carried on very often through small employers, jobbing contractors, logging contractors and the like, and it will be utterly impossible for these logging contractors to know what is required. I am quite sure that the employee himself will not know. First of all he will attempt to seek guidance from his employer. If the employer cannot guide him, which I am sure he cannot, because after sitting here in this house and listening to the discussion I could not possibly advise my own office as to what is required, then who is to guide him?

Again, I think the minister is basing his idea on the employee being a factor in a large business where his employment continues from day to day, but in the maritimes, and in my constituency, there is a floating labour population. In fact it has been said that there are three crews, one working, one coming and one going. Men may drift in. work a day or two, and then if the food does not suit them or the working conditions do not suit them or they become homesick, they may quit after working one day or two or three days. If the employee has to make a declaration to the boss in the camp, it seems to me that we shall require the coinage of some new money in Canada, something perhaps in mills, so that the employer can deduct from the man's pay what it is proper for him to deduct after one day's work. The system is so complicated that while it may work in the big plants, the tax cannot be collected through some employers as business is conducted in the maritimes. The only possible solution I see is that on a certain day each year every human being in Canada who is seeking employment must be given a number and a book of some sort.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Regimentation.

Mr. O'BRIEN: We have reached that point in our regimentation where individuals have become almost like boxcars and have to have a number. The individual will then carry that [Mr. Gibson.] number with him in his book with a declaration as to his standing in the social order in this country. Then there can be no argument about the matter.

As it is now, if the employer tries to guide his employee, the employee will quite naturally think the employer is prying into his business and becoming impertinent. I do not think it is fair for the government to force that responsibility on the employer. If we are to be regimented, each person must have a number and a book in which to keep his records. It seems to me that we have reversed the idea of government. It seems now that the people are made for government, rather than government for the people. If we have reached that point, we must use sensible methods in carrying this idea into practice. It is all very well for gentlemen to sit in an office at Ottawa and decide that because they need a vast amount of money, therefore it can be easily obtained through the employers of this country by a process of arithmeticaddition, subtraction and multiplication. It is not, however, so easy as that. Unless the system is simplified, a great many employees are not going to pay this tax because they do not know what it is all about, and a good many of their employers do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the position with respect to members of parliament? A member of parliament paid national defence tax on his indemnity as if he were an employee. The statute, I think, justifies that. The tax was deducted by the accountant of the House of Commons, and there was no question about it. But now the rates are graduated, and what is going to be the position? Are we employees? Have we to disclose to some person—I do not know what body vet—

Mr. ILSLEY: I would say it would be the comptroller of the treasury himself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what the minister has in mind? Well, I object to disclosing to any comptroller of the treasury my private affairs. It is bad enough to have to do it to the commissioner of income tax for whom, of course, personally I have a very profound respect. He is, however, my taxing master, and I do not know that we ever greatly love taxing masters. I object having to disclose to the comptroller of the treasury my private affairs, just as the conductor on my railway train tells me that he does not want to have to tell the Canadian Pacific Railway Company how much he has by way of investments. Why should he have to?

Mr. ILSLEY: Just the insurance, and the principal—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I continue:

5. The employer must tell his employee what return he is making concerning that particular employee early in September, so that the employer and employee returns will conform.

I assume that is correct.

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The next is:

6. An employer must make a return on each employee whose salary or wage is three-quarters of such employee's total income.

Is that correct?

Mr. GIBSON: The employer does not know anything about the employee's total income other than his salary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is threequarters of his total income.

Mr. GIBSON: The employer files a return showing what is paid to the employee, but the employer has no knowledge as to whether the salary he pays to the employee is threequarters or the total amount of the income of the employee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to go a little farther. It says:

The most important feature of to-day's announcement is that deductions from pay envelopes include approximately one-third of the refundable portion of the tax, and not the full amount.

The budget provides that taxpayers may offset the refundable or compulsory savings portion of the tax by deducting payments on life insurance premiums, superannuation fund payments and payments on principal of mortgages.

That has been enlarged upon to-day. It goes on to say:

The national revenue department has decided on requiring the employers to deduct approximately one-third of the refundable portion of the tax and the balance will be adjusted between the taxpayer and the income tax office after deduction of the insurance premiums, superannuation—

And so forth. Is that a true statement of the position that has been arrived at? If not, how is it going to be done, so that the public may know?

Mr. GIBSON: That one-third suggestion was discussed—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And abandoned.

Mr. GIBSON: —and abandoned because it would not work out fairly to some taxpayers. It meant that those who would be entitled to a refund would be paying one-third of the refundable portion and then would have to wait for a refund later. Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the position now?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Under the scheme announced this evening every employee is subject to his employer knowing practically all his business.

Mr. GIBSON: No, no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The employer will know what insurance his employee carries, what principal payments he is making on a mortgage or agreement of sale. He will know to what superannuation or pension fund the employee is contributing.

Mr. GIBSON: He knows that in most cases already.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: He knows the latter, yes. But this whole business is a startling intrusion upon the privacy of the employee by the employer. I have no objection to it if the labour men of this country have been consulted about it, if organized labour has given its approval, but according to the press announcement on July 9 those who were consulted at the conference were representatives of the larger employees only. They met with the income tax officials. The question I now ask the minister is this: Have the representatives of labour, the great labour bodies, been consulted? If they have been consulted and are agreeable, there can be no objection because the scheme now outlined removes many of the difficulties and anomalies of the scheme that was announced previously.

Mr. GIBSON: There has been no interview with any organized body of labour, although the matter has been discussed with various individuals and we have reason to believe that the method which has been adopted is preferable to the one first suggested, of making some partial deduction. That would not work out fairly in every case.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This affects the private affairs of several hundred thousand employees, and surely if there was one case in which the representatives of labour should have been consulted, not unofficially but officially, this is the case, because unless you get the cooperation of labour this will be entirely unworkable and will result in the necessity of setting up a rebate board here in Ottawa, which will require many additional hundred employees being added to the ranks of the civil service.

Mr. GIBSON: The government did not invite representatives of the employers to come to Ottawa and discuss this matter, but some of them came on their own initiative and asked how it was going to be worked out. Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has to pay it?

Mr. GIBSON: Unless he has filed with his employer a statement showing that his refundable disbursements are equal to or more than that amount.

Mr. JACKMAN: One hundred per cent of the minimum savings requirement will be deducted currently from the payroll?

Mr. GIBSON: Unless some evidence is given to the contrary.

Mr. JACKMAN: I wish to congratulate the minister upon that, because that is a more satisfactory method as far as the taxpayer is concerned, and the government will not have to whistle for the two-thirds remaining unpaid.

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): The minister is forcing the employee to disclose to his employer his private business. Under the existing regulations, income tax matters are considered secret, and this seems to me to be discrimination against the employee.

Mr. GIBSON: I admit that that is a regrettable feature. If the employee objects to making any disclosure to his employer, it is possible that he can file his receipts with the income tax department and have the income tax department notify the employer what the total deductions are to be. That would be a more cumbersome way of handling the matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There will be some objection to this, especially among the higher paid men in the trade unions. The railway men are going to object to this; make no mistake about that. I have heard from some of them already. Let us consider a test case in connection with a member of parliament. A member of parliament has an indemnity of $4,000 a year. Will he have to disclose to the Clerk of the House of Commons or to some other officer of the house what his offsets are as against this tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not in keeping with the dignity of a member of parliament that he should have to do that. Is it in keeping with the idea of the income tax that he should have to do that? I ask these questions of the members of this committee in a searching way to try to arrive at a test as to whether this is a proper method. What about the ethics of this thing? What about having to disclose your private affairs? The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. McKinnon) has put his finger on the [Mr. Gibson.]

vital objection, the disclosure of the private affairs of the employee. I object to telling anyone my private affairs. I must disclose them to the income tax authorities so far as I have taxable income, but they do not get a bit more information out of me than is necessary. If they demand further informa-tion, I am bound to give it, but they have to query me about it. There is a principle underlying this, and on behalf of the taxpayer I object to it. Just think of the whip that is over his head. If he does not yield, he must pay the whole thing and wait, God knows how long, to get his refund. Some of us will be dead before the refunds are paid. There are thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands of refunds under the national defence tax that have not been reached yet.

Mr. JACKMAN: How far back do they go?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not think the crown would take advantage of the statute of limitations, but they do in other matters. I am wondering if some other method could not be devised to overcome the difficulty. From the report which appeared in the Ottawa Evening Citizen of July 9, I rather assumed that another principle has been decided upon. Here are the main points that were delineated there:

1. Deductions from the pay envelopes of the employees at the source will start with the first pay-day in September.

Is that being adhered to, or is it to be put back to October 1 because of the amendment?

Mr. GIBSON: The first payroll after September 1.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The first pay-day in September. The next main point is:

2. Deductions over the year until August 31, 1943, will cover the entire portion of the income tax of the employee that is kept by the government and approximately one-third of the portion refundable after the war.

Is that a correct statement of the government's position?

Mr. GIBSON: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The next is:

3. The employee must file his tax return by September 30.

That is correct.

4. The employer must file a statement of salaries and wages of his employees by October 15.

Is that date still being adhered to?

Mr. GIBSON: That is the date.

Income War Tax Act

and these tables will be approved by the governor in council and sent out to all employers.

The question now arises as to the refundable portion of the tax. That is what gives the greatest difficulty. It is proposed now to require the employer to deduct the full amount of the tax and the refundable portion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The whole of it?

Mr. GIBSON: Except where the employee files a return showing his employer that he intends to pay or expects to pay so much on life insurance, so much in capital payments on his mortgage, so much to a pension fund. The total of those payments will be sent in to the employer, who then will be able to see at a glance how much is deductible each month from the wages of that man. This will reduce refunds to the minimum; it will take as nearly as possible only the amount of the tax payable by the employee. We realize that this places an additional burden on the employer, and every effort will be made to minimize that burden as much as possible. The employer will not be required to have the actual insurance or mortgage receipts. All he will require is a statement from the man himself, and eventually the employee will file with the income tax department the actual receipts on which he bases his claim to those exemptions.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Supposing an employee hesitates to give the information. Are you going to force him to do so?

Mr. MacNICOL: This question may be out of order, but I am sure the minister will not mind answering it. As the owner of several buildings I occasionally have to employ plumbers, steamfitters, roofers, painters, carpenters and so on, to carry out repairs. I give out all work of that kind by contract. Do I have to deduct, from any cheques I may give any contractors, anything in regard to income tax?

Mr. GIBSON: No; those are payments made to a contractor. In that case the man is not an employee.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I do not want to ask a question; I just want to offer the Minister of National Revenue a suggestion. I have in my hand one of the little slips that are put in the pay envelopes of the workmen, and on that slip there is nothing at all to say that the man may be entitled to a refund. Many employees know that if their income does not amount to $660 or $1,200, as the case may be, they are entitled to a refund of the tax paid, but there are thousands who do not know that. I believe something should be printed on these slips indicating this fact, and I believe also something should be printed on the back showing that the employer makes an accounting of this money to the government, because some of these people feel that their employers are gypping them. There is a general feeling to that effect among certain classes of employees. I know of two men who left one employer and went to another because the first man was making the deduction from their wages and the second employer did not, though of course he should have done so. I believe there should be something printed on these slips to show that refunds are made if the wages do not go over certain figures, and also that the deductions are forwarded to the government.

Mr. GIBSON: We will take that suggestion into consideration.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have a question to ask, because the announcement made by the minister to-night is quite different from the announcement which was made by the department on July 9.

Mr. GIBSON: That was not made by the department.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The announcement that came out from Ottawa stated:

Methods of collecting income tax imposed in the new budget from salaried persons and wageearners have been agreed upon at conference between income tax officials and representatives of larger employers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was officially stated.

Mr. GIBSON: It was not officially stated.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says that that announcement did not come from any government source.

Mr. GIBSON: That is right.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is it correct to state that an order in council will be passed to provide that no portion of the refundable tax will be deducted from the wage-earner?

Mr. GIBSON: The order in council does not cover that point. The order in council sets out the amounts which the employer is to deduct when the salaries are at certain given levels; it is really just a table that will be approved by the order in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that include the forced loan part?

Mr. GIBSON: It includes the forced loan, but it also shows the amounts that a man is entitled to deduct for the refundable portion.

Income War Tax Act

government give them any consideration at all for the extra clerical help that will have to be provided to do this work? Surely the government in collecting this money will not put the whole cost on the employers. That is not fair. They are being taxed very heavily now, and to make them pay all this extra cost of doing the government's tax collection is not fair. We have carried that principle to the limit.

I say it is not satisfactory to do this by order in council. The provisions should be in the bill. I want to make that clear. The minister had months before the budget was brought down to deal with this matter. These regulations should be ready and should be in the bill. We in this house are entitled to pass on the merits and the details of the government's proposals in relation to the administrative methods. Altogether too much is being left to be done by order in council and by regulation. The government can almost change the law by regulation.

I venture to say that the regulation relating to the "flying in" of the income tax was never justified by a proper interpretation of the statute, and I am shocked to think that a regulation was passed and a ruling made which would allow that sort of thing to be done. The statute referred to a man's normal employment in the air force, if it was flying or related to flying, but other men get round it by flying 100 hours or so as passengers. That never was the intention of parliament; yet the regulation allows it to be done. No wonder the minister said it was a scandal, and I entirely agree with him.

The regulations should not be made by order in council. They should be brought down here, so that we might have a chance of passing upon them. Parliament is entitled to that. This is a taxing measure, and the crown has no right to tax the subject except by clear and express language. That is a primary principle of law; and the method by which the crown taxes a subject should be the subject of discussion and decision by parliament, not by order in council or by a regulation, drafted by no matter how competent a commissioner of taxation. It is not fair to the subject that it should be done in that way. We as the representatives of the people have a right to protest against that method, and I do so to-night with all the force at my command. Bring down the regulations in the statute; let us have a look at them.

Mr. GIBSON: This section does not authorize the government to amend the tax rate by order in council.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not the rate.

Mr. GIBSON: It enables the government to determine what portion of the tax should be deducted at the source. The reason for that is this. If it were decided to deduct 100 per cent of the tax payable on any given date or at any given rate of pay, the taxpayer might have more deducted than eventually he would be required to pay.

I should like now to make a statement as to how we propose to handle this collection at the source, because it is a very difficult problem and one that has given us a great deal of concern in working out. Some time ago an interview was held with various groups of employers to find out how it could be best handled from their point of view, and the suggestion was made that only a certain portion of the refundable tax should be collected at the source. Some publicity was given that suggestion, but the statement that came out in the press was not official; no arrangement had been entered into, and it was realized that one problem would be this, that possibly those with higher incomes would not have any refundable portion coming back to them, that they would have exemptions which would equal their refundable portion, so that if we should deduct at the source anything at all in their cases, they would be having taxes withheld from them which they would be entitled to claim as refunds later on, and that would be a hardship on these taxpayers.

The way it is planned to work this out is this. First of all, tables will be prepared showing the various salaries that employees may be receiving, $12 a week, $13 a week, $14 a week, $15 a week, and so on. Then the table will show what tax a single man would pay per month on that salary; what a married man without children would pay; what a married man with one child would pay, and so on. Then the employer can see exactly what tax must be deducted at the source for each employee. In making up that chart we do not wish to have it show exactly 100 per cent of the tax payable, because it is realized that in some cases the rates of pay may vary during the year, that charitable donations will have to be deducted later on, and so on. Therefore it is proposed that perhaps 95 per cent of the tax-though this is not the definite figurewhich the employer will be required to deduct, will be shown; and that is the amount that is to be determined by the governor in council. This will show what portion of the total tax is to be deducted at the source, is a rate of 7 per cent. That is now being raised to 10 per cent. Have we done anything else, anything we should not? I think that is all we have done.

Mr. JACKMAN: Last year I presume we changed it so that a man could no longer give away half of his income. If you took your gross income, and took the tax off, you could then give away half your net income. That was changed last year I think, and now it stands that no one can give away even $500 to a poor relative without its being subject to 10 per cent tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: Surely the hon. member is wrong. Subsection 8 of section 88 is untouched. It starts with these words:

The provisions of this section shall not apply to the following:---

Subparagraph (g) still stands, which is the subparagraph to which the hon. gentleman is referring. Those are not touched. Subsection 8 is not changed at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What has been changed is the rate on gifts other than those included in the exemptions?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is right.

Amendment (Mr. Gibson) agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

25. That commencing after the 31st day of August, 1942, all salaries and wages paid by any employer to residents of, or persons employed in, Canada shall be subject to a deduction at the source of such portions of the taxes authorized herein as may be determined hereafter by the governor in council.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I again protest most vigorously against the dominion or any other authority interfering with an employee's pay envelope. I know this is war time and we have that interference while the war is on, but I want to put on record now that legislation which forces the employer to take from the employee's pay certain moneys not only is annoying to the employee but upsets the whole family status. The wife does not really know what the husband is earning; she is not sure what all the deductions are. We will stand it while this war is on, but we ought to be very careful and regard an employee's pay envelope as something almost sacred. In many cases employees are renting a house or living accommodation from the employer, and something is taken off for rent. Very often carloads of fuel will be brought in, perhaps a little cheaper than the individual could buy it, or at any rate it is easier to finance by having a dollar a week taken off the pay. Then you have pension and superannuation fund deductions, and many institutions have group insurance arrangements paid in part by the employer and in part by the employee. During the last couple of years we have had the national defence tax. That is now replaced with a combination of national defence tax and income tax, and there is unemployment insurance. The average employee and his family circle are so confused that they do not know where they stand. The good wife has to be almost a chartered accountant to keep track of the husband's earnings. He might be in a better position to filch some pay before he takes it home. We are breaking down that old feeling which many of us who have earned wages and taken home a pay envelope have that this is something which should not be interfered with. I merely want to put this on record for the days to come, so that we may get back to some sound condition in regard to the employment of labour.

Another condition that obtains to-day is this. The line of demarcation where an employee must pay national defence tax is $23.04 a week. If a man is earning 62½ cents an hour for an eight-hour day, or $5, you will find employees laying off on Monday. They will work just a sufficient number of hours to reach the taxation point. With labour as scarce as it is at present, there is not much you can do about the matter. You cannot dismiss them. You are short of labour.

They will go farther. This has obtained within the last fortnight. They suggest to the foreman and the foreman to the superintendent, "Why cannot the office just pay me the minimum so that I shall not have to pay tax, and then hand me a bonus afterwards?". That is due to the method we are forced to adopt in order to collect this taxation. I put that on record for the benefit of those who are charged with the administration of the income tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This resolution provides for the deduction of the income tax on salaries and wages at the source. As the resolution is drafted, the deduction at the source is to be of such portions of the taxes authorized therein as are determined hereafter by the governor in council. I object absolutely to that. It should be specified in the statute, so that we may know exactly what it is, so that employers and employees may know what it is. It should not be juggled around by order in council which may be repealed at a moment's notice and new regulations made.

The hon, member for Danforth has protested about interference with the employees' pay. No employer wants this trouble imposed upon him. The big companies do not. Will the Mr. TUSTIN: Of course that could be done, but I remind the minister that this is July 21 and it will be difficult. I doubt very much if the legislation will be completed by the end of July.

Mr. ILSLEY: The companies have had notice of it since the budget.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions 22 and 23 agreed to.

24. That commencing after the 31st day of August, 1942, all dividends and registered interest paid by any debtor so residents of Canada shall be subject to z deduction at the source at the rate of 7 per centum.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have an amendment:

That resolution 24 be amended by adding the following as subsection 2 thereof: "That commencing after the 30th day of

"That commencing after the 30th day of June, 1942, all interest paid or credited by any bank, trust company or other person lawfully empowered to accept money on deposit shall be subject to deduction at the source at the rate of 7 per centum if such interest is equal to the interest on $100 or more for a full year.

Mr. GIBSON: I so move.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that not covered by implication in the resolution as it stands?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is to make sure that deposits bearing interest with a bank or trust company, shall be treated the same as dividends and registered by the bank.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): An additional source of revenue is being taxed. Do you not now have to include in your income tax all interest received on savings account?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And pay on it the regular rate you have to pay on your other money?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This just provides for deduction at the source within certain limitations?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And if it does not run to $100 in the full year they do not deduct it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is right.

Mr. JACKMAN: By leave of the committee I should like to say a word with regard to section 22. It has been represented to [Mr. Ilsley.] me that there are a large number of people who support relatives or connections who are unable to keep themselves, chiefly old people, and these taxpayers have been in the habit of giving to such persons from $500 to $1,000 a year, all of which is subject to income tax. There is a special gift tax, and if you give away $500 or $1,000 to anyone it is subject to a tax of 10 per cent. There are a number of well-to-do people who support relatives or old connections of the family and give them $500 or $1,000 toward their upkeep. Under this gift tax there is no exemption as formerly. No matter how small the gift is, there is a 10 per cent tax. It is a hardship on a number of people who are already doing what is virtually a charitable act in keeping certain persons off the public relief rolls.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not know that the exemptions were removed.

Mr. JACKMAN: There used to be exemptions.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but I did not think they were removed.

Mr. JACKMAN: You cannot give away $500 now.

Mr. ILSLEY: The commissioner tells me that the exemptions of $1,500 and $400 are not inappropriate because of the change in the form of the income tax. The deduction is from the tax now instead of from the income. I am not very familiar with it myself, I must admit.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not know how the circumstances can be met without undue hardship to the donor. Can a well-to-do man support an invalid aunt or some other elderly relative, giving that person $500 or $1,000, without being subject to the special gift tax, besides paying income tax on his income? Can he give these old people some money without paying that gift tax as well as the ordinary tax? Formerly a person could, in any one year, give up to half his net income free of tax. Now that is done away with, or is there an allowance for a small amount of money given away to children or other people, without its being subject to the 10 percent tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Has the hon. gentleman the act before him, section 88? As I read this resolution the schedule of rates which is to be found in section 88 of the Income War Tax Act is repealed, and the schedule found in the resolution is substituted therefor. In the schedule as found in section 88 I find that on gifts up to and including $5,000 there in order to make a payment in 1942, if he were in a position to prove absolutely to the minister that he has no income this year?

Mr. GIBSON: At the present time the taxpayer is required to file a return and pay a tax on the estimated amount of income of the previous year. That is for the purpose of giving him a basis to work on, so that if he paid up to that amount and it is less in the first two quarters than the tax eventually amounts to, he is not penalized. In the case cited by the hon. member, since there is not going to be any income, the man would not pay any tax, because he knows definitely that there will not be a tax payable. But if he is wrong, and eventually finds that he is taxable, since he has not made payments he will be liable for interest and penalties for not having made his quarterly payments.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister say whether or not he would allow 5 per cent on overpayments in case his estimate is higher than the actuality?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. We cannot do that.

Mr. JACKMAN: I have heard of a few very remarkable cases in the past in the Department of National Revenue, where taxpayers have overpaid the tax they were entitled to pay, and the only offset which the department would give them, after admitting their contention, was that they would keep the amount as a credit against future taxes. That is not the way to do business in this or any other country. In the United States, for instance, you used to be allowed, if you are not still allowed, 6 per cent on overpayments, and if you had underpaid you were charged 6 per cent. The rule worked both ways. Surely the government is not going to charge 5 per cent on an underestimate and refuse to allow 5 per cent on an overestimate. To be fair is not a cardinal sin, though it seems to be regarded as such by the administrations of both finance and revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer is that that cannot be allowed.

Mr. JACKMAN: The answer is no?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is the answer. With regard to the statement that the Department of National Revenue refuses to make refunds, and keeps overpayments, I am informed that that is not the case.

Mr. JACKMAN: It has been the case. I heard of another the other day.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be suggested to the taxpayer, but if the taxpayer says "no, I want my money back", he gets it.

Amendment (Mr. Gibson) agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

21. That the tax payable by a corporation shall be paid by monthly instalments during the six months immediately prior to the close of its fiscal period and the six months immediately subsequent to the close of its fiscal period.

(a) as to the first six months, one-twelfth of the estimated tax, having regard to the previous or anticipated current year's income, applying the current year's rates ,and

(b) as to the second six months, one-sixth of the tax after deducting therefrom the previous six months' payments having regard to the income, and applying the rates of the taxation year.

This shall be applicable to the tax on profits of fiscal periods ending on and after 31st December, 1942.

Any additional tax found due over that estimated or declared by the taxpayer shall be paid immediately upon assessment, together with interest at 5 per centum, after four months from the close of the fiscal period.

Mr. TUSTIN: Will the minister state how this tax on corporations can be figured out or carried out under the present wording of the resolution? It states that the first six monthly payments shall be paid in the six months before the close of the fiscal year of the company. A great many companies end their fiscal year not later than December 31. We are now near the end of July, and I was wondering how the tax can be figured out.

. Mr. ILSLEY: I did not get the point of the criticism. Will the hon. gentleman state it again?

Mr. TUSTIN: I was not criticizing; I was merely asking a question. Section 21 provides that the tax shall be paid by monthly instalments during the six months immediately prior to the close of the fiscal period, and the six months immediately subsequent to the close of that period. It is now near the end of July, and a great many companies close their fiscal year on December 31 or sooner. How can the tax be worked according to this resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer will be found in the second last paragraph:

This shall be applicable to the tax on profits of fiscal periods ending on and after 31st December, 1942.

Mr. TUSTIN: But how are you to begin now to make payments, or do payments not start until after December 31?

Mr. ILSLEY: What would be the difficulty about estimating the tax for the year and paying one-twelfth of it at the end of this month?

Mr. TUSTIN: I do not have that clear yet. Am I to understand that the last payment of the six would be made on December 31?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

from the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Souris and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle will have to fight their own battles.

To change the subject for a moment, may I have an answer to the query I put to the minister with reference to sole proprietorships? On what basis are they to be taxed this fiscal year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give the answer to-morrow.

Mr. GIBSON: In answer to the question previously put by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser), arrangements will be made whereby the taxpayer who shows that he has made payments of insurance premiums and principal payments on a mortgage will be able to reduce his quarterly payments accordingly. That will be worked out by the department.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is starting with the first payment, is it?

Mr GIBSON: Starting with the first payment, so that if he estimated that he was entitled to a reduction of the full amount of the refundable tax he would not have to pay any of the refundable portion of his tax with his quarterly payments.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is all right, and I think the public will be quite satisfied with that. I asked another question, with regard to the insurance receipts. The reason why I mention that is that many income tax payers who at the present time are paying premiums to insurance companies might not get their insurance receipts, or they might not ask for a duplicate. I therefore believe that the sooner instructions are issued in connection with that, the better it will be not only for the government but for the income tax payer.

Mr. FAIR: I was amused a little while ago to hear the Minister of Finance making fun of the hon. member for Souris, but perhaps if that very small percentage of farmers who will pay the tax could hire lawyers to make up their returns there would not be any of them paying income tax for the past year. I subscribe to the arguments made by the hon. member for Souris and others along the same line. I know. it is impossible in almost all cases for the farmer to make payment before, at the earliest, October 15, because experience has taught us that a large proportion of his purchases is made on credit. People go to machine-shops and get repairs and twine, and to the grocery store and run up grocery bills, and naturally those bills have to be met first. Because the farmers have not been given the cost of production, I think the government, who after all are responsible, should not be as hard as the Minister of Finance tells us he is going to be.

Mr. PERLEY: In reply to the Minister of Finance, and having in mind the nice spanking he gave the leader of the opposition and one or two other hon. members on this side, I want it distinctly understood, and I think my reported remarks will bear me out, that I was making a plea, not only for the farmers who happen to be in the income tax list, but generally for business in western Canada. I included all the business men and named various organizations. The minister's statement was not deserved by us. Furthermore, I do not agree, even if only a hundred farmer's paid last year, that we should not put forward their case as well as that of any hundred men in any other part of Canada. I wish, however, to make it quite clear that I was making a plea for business in general in western Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Did I understand the Minister of Finance to say that there were not more than between one and two hundred farmers who paid income tax in 1941 in Manitoba?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I said I did not have the figures for 1941. The figures I had were for 1939 or 1940.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Even if that were correct, I do not think it conveys a true picture. While the minister flatters me in suggesting that probably I got my leader excited, I think he overdid the picture a little, and I should like to follow it through. I represent the business people of my riding and that part of the province as well as the agriculturists, and these business people are called upon to arrange credit for the harvesting of the crops. Many of them will probably have paid income tax also in 1941, and you ask them to file a return and commence paying on October 15. They have to provide some method of financing our farmers to take this crop off, and you are placing an impossible burden upon them. The difficulty applies, not merely to the farmers, but also to business men located in the prairie provinces who supply twine, tractor fuel and other materials necesary for harvesting the crop. I think the matter deserves a little more consideration than the minister has given it.

Mr. QUELCH: I have in mind the position of a grain farmer who may have his total crop destroyed by hail. In western Canada that is quite a common occurrence. Supposing the farmer had paid a small income tax in 1941; would he then have to borrow money would have to make a twelve-months adjustment, and a very big adjustment, within a period of six months. I said that it was not fair to the taxpayers of this country, after their personal budget had been completed and half a year had gone by and half their expenditures had been made, and half their income had been earned, for the minister then to turn round and impose as onerous a tax as this and expect the taxpayers to step up to the line, go through the whole formula on the dot, and pay taxes very much higher than were thought of the year before. It is only fair that the minister should give consideration to the man who has to dig down and get this money, and the western farmer is in that category. It does not affect the farmers in my part of the country. I only wish they were receiving enough income to pay income tax, because then they would be that much better off and would be making a profit out of their operations. I am pleading for the western farmer who is in a different position and is entitled to consideration, and one of the basic reasons why is the fact that this government delayed bringing down the budget for six full months. They have not yet brought down certain information which we asked for and ought to have in connection with income tax payments. I should like to know just what defaults there are in income tax payments. There will be more if you crowd the taxpayers of this country too hard.

If hon. members will look at this resolution they will see that when the assessment is made it is payable right on the dot. We used to have thirty days after the assessment was made in which to pay our tax, but now it begins to bear interest of five per cent before the assessment actually reaches the taxpayer. He is assessed on one day and the notice is sent out on that day. The interest begins from that day before he actually receives his assessment. That thirtyday provision should be restored. Anybody is entitled to thirty days' credit without interest. This is crowding the willing horse too far, and I protest against it in the name of the taxpayers of this country, and especially in the name of the western farmer. I see hon. members on all sides of the house nodding assent to what I have been saving. The minister should have a heart.

Mr. ILSLEY: When my hon. friend gets violent like this, I have to reply. To begin with, I am very happy to hear that there is such a large number of farmers in the west who had taxable incomes in the year 1941. When I heard the hon. member for Souris talking about his neighbours who are going to be so terribly embarrassed this fall, I remembered that they can be embarrassed only if last year, in 1941, they had taxable incomes.

I have been trying to find out the number of farmers in Manitoba who submitted incometax returns for the year 1941 and have not been able to get it, but a year or two previously the number was from one to twohundred for the whole province, and I would very much doubt, having in mind the speeches I have heard in this house from the hon. gentleman and his hon. friends if there is any considerable number of farmers in Manitoba who had taxable incomes in 1941.

The hon. member for Souris has painted a very pathetic picture and has the leader of the opposition all excited about these wealthy neighbours of his who are going to be embarrassed this fall because it is going to be hard for them to get help, and who are going to have a big crop and a lot of bills to pay, so that they will not be able to get out and pay these big income tax instalments-based on 1941 income, it must be remembered-by October 15. Surely, if the speeches we have heard from all over that side of the house, including the groups in the corner, have presented the facts, this problem is one of infinitesimal dimensions, and I would advise my hon. friends on this side of the house, and others, not to allow this inflammatory appeal of the leader of the opposition to get them too excited, because, after all, it does not amount to much this year. If this year there are a lot of taxable incomes among the farmers of western Canada, and perhaps of eastern Canada; if they are coming into the income tax-paying groups in a big way, and if we find that there is some inconvenience,. then next year we may have to make a change. But I do not want to make an exception in favour of the farmers of western Canada. If I do I shall soon hear from the farmers of eastern Canada, and then therewill be others with equal claims for exceptions to be made in their case. Other occupational groups as well as the farmers, have friends in this house, and they will be coming along too, once this date is pushed back. We need the money. We want to count on its coming in. We want it paid on the 15th day of. October.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You want it on the 15th day of October, but the laws of the Medes and Persians are not immutable. A little while ago you changed the date back one month, and as far as I am concerned, I am very thankful for that change. I am afraid after the spanking I have just received be able to get anything by that time, and neither can the farmers. I do not see how it would make much difference to the department or the government if these dates were moved on a month, and it would prove of great assistance to the west.

Mr. ILSLEY: These payments are distributed evenly over the tax year, and it is important from the government's point of view to have these coming in regularly.

Mr. PERLEY: You could extend April and July another month, and conditions would not be any worse than they are now.

Mr. MacNICOL: If a person is paying a quarter of his tax on October 15 and the next date is January 15, he could pay all the remainder on that date if he wished?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister said that under this item he would let us know what kind of insurance or mortgage receipts the government will require, whether they will have to be in duplicate or triplicate.

Mr. GIBSON: The regulations are to be based upon the resolutions, and the resolutions have not been passed yet.

Mr. SENN: Is there any good reason why the first payment could not be made in January and then the other payments at three month intervals for the rest of the year? If private individuals could put in their income tax returns then, it would save a lot of bookkeeping.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman would understand the reason if he knew how hard it is to keep in funds. We need money, and we need it all the time. We need it regularly, and we need it early rather than late.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The point is you want to be able to count on having so many millions on a certain date. No doubt many people are going to be embarrassed in this connection. I think in justice to their constituents the western members who know the situation much better than I do, should support the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) and the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). The farmer will be facing a real hardship if he cannot change his crop into money.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Not only is this going to create an individual hardship, but it will be an impossibility. Any one conversant with the methods of financing the harvesting of crops in the prairie provinces will realize the difficulties. It is very difficult for many [Mr. Perley.] farmers to finance at the banks, and it will be still more difficult this fall on account of the fact that we shall be able to deliver only a small quota at threshing time. In most sections all available space for the storage of grain will be filled.

There is another difficulty created by the fact that the budget was brought down as late as June, in the middle of the year. I know neighbours of mine who have overobligated themselves already for this year's obligations. They have bought equipment and assumed other obligations which it would be very difficult for them to fulfil under normal conditions this year, and now you impose a tax upon them which it will be utterly impossible for many of them to pay on the 15th of October. All the expenses of a grain farmer come in the harvest months-his binder twine, tractor fuel, everything-and our credit is not very good with the dealers in these times. It is a real hardship to arrange finances to take off the crop under normal conditions, and here you impose this tax which the farmers must pay by October 15, by which date most of them will not have completed their harvesting operations and cannot estimate their income. That is not only a hardship, but in the majority of cases it will be utterly impossible for them to pay, and I plead with the minister and his staff to give consideration to them.

I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Haldimand that the first payment should not be asked for until January 15, when a man can make some estimate of his year's operations. I would go farther than the member for Qu'Appelle and say that the first payment should not be made until January 15.

Did I understand the Minister of National Revenue to say that there were two distinct sets of forms to be filled out, one by the salaried man in September, and one by the business man in March?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Then there should be a distinct division made in the matter of payments too, because I repeat it will be an utter impossibility for many of the farmers to make payment on October 15, and I plead with the minister to give consideration to the agriculturists of this country who will be placed in an impossible situation if this resolution goes through as it stands.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister brought down his budget on June 23. On June 30, I replied, and pointed out that he had delayed bringing down the budget for a period of six months; that half the calendar year and half the fiscal year of most people had expired, and that in consequence people here. I believe the Department of National Revenue will have to give the matter some consideration.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I think practically every hon. member has received from one to twenty letters dealing with this point. Something should be done about it at once, because the people are worried. This is a very drastic tax. The people are willing to pay it, but they want to pay it in the easiest possible way, so that they may not be affected any more than is necessary.

Mr. GIBSON: The hon. member has mentioned the case of a man in receipt of an income of $2,000. Apparently this would be a married man without dependents, whose tax would amount to $231 with the refundable portion amounting to $200, making a total tax of $431. The hon. member asked if a man turning in insurance premium receipts totalling $200 would then pay only on the balance of the non-refundable tax, which would be $231. When the man makes his first payment on October 15 he cannot say definitely that his income is going to be $2,000, or we cannot expect definitely that that will be his income for the year. Consequently we do not know what the refundable portion of his tax will amount to. If we made an estimate in October we might overassess what the refundable portion of the tax would be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister said, "having regard to the previous year's income".

Mr. GIBSON: That is the basis for working out what he will pay in the first two periods, but we would hardly be justified in accepting that sum for rebate purposes until we knew what his income for the year will be. A great many incomes vary considerably from year to year.

Mr. SENN: I think there is a good deal of merit in the contention raised by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser). I have a suggestion to make that might obviate all the difficulty, although it would mean a delay of three months in making the first payment. I see no reason why the income tax return should not be made out on January 15 for the year previous and then there would be no difficulty about estimating the whole thing. Here we have four payments made before the income tax return is submitted. If you were to delay the first payment for three months you would be able to have the income tax return properly made out, and there would be no difficulty about making adjustments.

Mr. GIBSON: While the income tax return does not need to be in until March 31, probably in a great many cases it will be filed with the January payment. I think a great many taxpayers will know their previous year's income at that time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there a provision that it must be in by March 31?

Mr. ILSLEY: In the case of those making four payments. In the case of those who have deductions made monthly or weekly, the return may be put off until September 30.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It does not say that.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): The final return will be made on March 31, just as it was last year?

Mr. GIBSON: In respect of the cases where 75 per cent of the income comes from salary or wages and deduction is made at the source, the returns are made later in the year. Those who are not getting 75 per cent of their income from salaries or wages will fill out their forms as heretofore, on March 31.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): Is the refundable portion of the tax to be payable only at the end of the year?

Mr. GIBSON: No.

Mr. WRIGHT: I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) with regard to what he has said about the refundable portion. What will happen will be that the taxpayer will not be able to meet his insurance premiums until the government makes the refund, probably at the end of the year. He will have to let his policy lapse until that time and pay interest to the insurance or mortgage company. If you cannot allow full exemption, I think you should allow a percentage of the exemption. I know in some cases there is going to be a real hardship in meeting insurance and mortgage payments and the income tax in the first few months.

Mr. PERLEY: I want to make another appeal to the minister to change the dates to November 15 and February 15. Merchants, lawyers, doctors, in fact the whole business community in western Canada are affected, because they are waiting for the returns from agriculture. They cannot possibly make a return until the farmer has paid for his new machinery and other expenses. This year it is practically all on a cash basis; at least 50 per cent cash has to be paid and then the remainder later in the fall. This affects not only the farmer but the whole business community. The merchants will not has to pay $50 in addition. Then he has to wait until such time as the government refunds that extra $50. In other words, the governments holds up that money until it is ready to return it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let me understand this. Supposing the refundable portion of the tax I must pay the government amounts to $1,000. Do I understand that it may be the case that I shall have to pay that amount to the government in four quarterly instalments of $250 each, along with my other taxes, and wait until September, until I file my final return, for that refund, if I am able to show a bona fide payment of $1,000 in insurance premiums?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it will be either one of the plans I have mentioned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The plan I have suggested would be the hardest, would it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that would be the hardest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I can satisfy the department that I paid life insurance premiums amounting to $1,000 in the calendar year 1942, which will be my taxable period, and can submit official receipts showing payment of $250, say on October 15, $250 the following quarter, $250 for the third quarter and $250 for the fourth quarter, or more, why should the department not accept that indisputable evidence, so that I shall not have to put up any money, instead of forcing me to pay the money to the government? Why should the taxpayer not get a little break in this matter? That would not be attempting to take anything away from the government; it is just what the statute will call for. I would have no difficulty, as many others would have no difficulty, in furnishing insurance premium receipts to cover each quarterly payment of my deductible portion. It seems to me that would be eminently fair. Of course, if the department would not accept that evidence, I would have to bolster it up with proper evidence from the company.

Then there is another point. I believe the minister's reply to me was based on the use of the words "having regard to the previous year's income and applying the current year's rates." I assume that was the basis of his statement, that you would pay these two instalments on the basis of the 1941 tax, applying the current year's rates. But let me point out this anomalous position. If my memory serves me aright, in 1940 members of parliament received $5,100, whereas in 1941 they received only $2,900, less the national defence [Mr. G. K. Fraser.] tax. This year we shall have to pay on an additional $1,100, on $4,000 in addition to our other income. Unless we make some allowance for that $1,100, we shall not be paying 25 per cent in the first instalment of this year's taxes, based on last year's income. I do not know how you are going to work that out. I am just directing the point to the attention of the minister and his officials, though no doubt they are more thoroughly aware of the problem than I am.

Then there is one other thing, and I am not going to labour this any farther. I should like the minister to explain the position in which sole proprietorships will find themselves under this resolution. For example, if the fiscal period of a sole proprietorship ended on the 31st day of January, 1942, under what taxation rates will he be taxable, the 1941 rates or the 1942 rates, or will there be an apportionment of eleven months at the 1941 rates and one month at the 1942 rates? My understanding is that the normal rule is that sole proprietorships are taxable under the rates for the taxable year in which their fiscal period ends. I think that is right. If that is the case, it would mean, under the example I have given, that the sole proprietorship would be taxed in respect of eleven months of 1941 at the very steeply increased 1942 rates. If such is the case, it would appear to me rather an intolerable position for a sole proprietor, and I believe some formula must be worked out under which justice would be done him in the premises. I am going to place that on the record, so if an answer cannot be given immediately the matter can be considered. I have no doubt there are innumerable problems of a like nature which will arise under these resolutions, and which will have to be studied.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I think we should have this matter straight, that we should find out just what is the position. If a man has to pay the tax plus the refundable portion on October 15, and in addition look after his other payments, and then wait until the end of the following year before getting any refund, in the case I mentioned he will pay the government $431, the whole tax, plus the $200 he will have to pay the insurance company, or a total of $631, and he cannot afford to do that. I have sent a note to the minister outlining my suggestion, and I do not see why the government could not follow it, because it would not cost one cent. The government will get part of the tax anyway.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think any administrative decision on the point could be made off the crop. I shall be surprised if many of us are not trying to harvest our crop this fall when the snow is on the ground. When the crop is harvested we shall be able to market only a small percentage. The latest maps issued for the three prairie provinces show a prospect of a very large crop at every marketing centre in the three provinces, which is most unusual. Probably not since 1915 have we had such prospects for a big crop. This is going to create an impossible situation on the prairies. I trust the minister will be able to do something about the first payment at least.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How does the minister think it possible for any taxpayer, and especially a farmer, to reckon his 1942 income as early as October 15? How can I reckon what my income will be for the full year as early in the fall as that? It is not fair.

Mr. GIBSON: The tax is reckoned on the income of the previous year at the new rate. The two payments are made on that basis. Then in January—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is the same formula as last year, with the difference in date?

Mr. GIBSON: It is figured on the same income as last year, with the new rates applied. Then, in the new year the correct income for the previous year is definitely ascertained, and the final two payments made of one-half the remaining tax payable.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Suppose a man has an income of $2,000, and the refundable part of the tax is $200. He is a married man with no children. When the first payment is due he has paid premiums and has receipts for them to the amount of $200. Can he turn them in at that time, or does he have to extend them throughout the year? Can he discharge the whole refundable part of his tax by putting in those receipts at that time? He would, of course, have to pay the rest of the tax, which is $231. Most of the year would be up at that time, and he might have receipts not only for his insurance but perhaps for any payments on mortgages, medical expenses, et cetera. If he could turn them in at that time, it would be a great help, whereas if he could set off only a proportion and had to pay part of the compulsory saving, it would mean a double payment.

Mr. GIBSON: That would mean that the taxpayer would not be paying one-quarter of the tax in the first quarter or one-half in the first half-year. The department would not have the proper proportion of the tax in those first two periods.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Not if the man handed in receipts for $200 and, in addition, paid the proportion of the normal and graduated tax which would be $231?

Mr. GIBSON: It is difficult to follow the case the hon. member puts. I gather his suggestion is that the amount that can be deducted should be deducted from the earlier payments.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes.

Mr. GIBSON: That would mean a much smaller tax payable in the first periods if he took his total deduction in the first periods and left none for the last two periods.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The man would have no payment to make on his compulsory savings in the last periods anyhow, because his insurance receipts would cover it. The government would get nothing but the receipts plus the proportion of the normal and graduated tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me state what I think the hon. member said, and let him correct me if I am wrong. He is thinking of a taxpayer who pays in four quarterly instalments beginning October 15. By that time the taxpayer has in his possession receipts evidencing payment of life insurance premiums or instalments of principal on a mortgage or something of the kind which make up in amount the total instalment. The question is whether the department will accept those receipts instead of the money in payment of that instalment. Is that it?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is what I mean.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a matter for the Department of National Revenue, but I should think their practice would be something like this, that they would refuse to take anything but cash in that year, that October; that when the year ends, in January, they could adopt either one of two courses of action. Either they spread the receipts evenly over the three remaining instalments, because then they would know exactly what offsets the taxpayer was entitled to, or they could take the alternative course of compelling payment in cash until the non-refundable part of the tax was paid in full, and after that take receipts. Which course they would take I do not know, but I should think it would be one or the other.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If the government does not take the receipts on the first payment on October 15, it means that the taxpayer not only has to pay his insurance premium during the present year, but ion of Canada 2 per cent, and that every mutual company shall pay to the minister a tax of 4 per cent? What is the reason for the apparent difference in the rates?

Mr. ILSLEY: Probably the best reason, although there may be others, is that in effect the business of Lloyd's is consolidated for the purpose of determining whether they make profits in Canada or not. There is no other way of doing it. Lloyd's organization is a unique organization.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is just an association.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is an association, and yet there is no joint liability. When one is insured by Lloyd's he is not insured by a group of insurers operating or acting jointly; he has a large number of contracts, each with a large number of individuals.

Mr. JACKMAN: Syndicates.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some of these individuals are operating at a loss and some at a profit. In determining whether the whole of them are operating at a loss or at a profit in the country, naturally the operations of all must be consolidated. That is a great advantage for taxation purposes.

Mr. JACKMAN: The government do not share in losses. Do Lloyd's consolidate all their profits and losses on Canadian business, or is it the total of these syndicates in England who operate also in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: The question is whether they consolidated their business.

Mr. JACKMAN: This is a tax imposed on Lloyd's at a slightly higher rate than on Canadian companies, because their business is considered as a whole, not the individual syndicates which may operate in Canada, some of which may show a profit, some a loss. Is it possible to take a consolidated picture of the business of Lloyd's in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right for income tax purposes, but here we are talking about a tax on premiums. The advantage to the company, to the insurers as a whole, lies in the fact that for income tax purposes you consolidate their business. There is no way to come at them one by one. You have to consolidate their Canadian business and determine income tax in accordance with the net result, which is a great advantage to the company that justifies a disadvantage on the premium tax.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How does the consolidation justify the charging of a higher rate? If these were individual companies, how would the position of the government be improved?

Mr. ILSLEY: The consolidation very materially minimizes their income tax liability. If the premium tax were the same as that of other companies, and their income tax were minimized by this peculiar arrangement of theirs, they would have an advantage over competitors.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In England are they charged a higher tax than others?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does this not look like discrimination against Lloyd's?

Mr. ILSLEY: It may to them. It is open to argument, no doubt.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is all very well from the point of view of the minister, but from the point of view of equality before the law, where is there any justification for picking them out for different treatment?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what I have been explaining.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister admit that it is not a good principle that one organization should receive one treatment and another a different treatment?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what principle the hon. member is trying to get me to subscribe to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is stating the general principle of equality of treatment.

Mr. ILSLEY: Equality of treatment is a right principle, but there would be no equality of treatment between Lloyd's and their competitors in Canada if their competitors cannot consolidate and Lloyd's can, because the consolidation of the business of a hundred insurers so that the losses of one offset the profits of another minimizes very materially the income tax liability of those insurers. Therefore you have the competitors of Lloyd's paying income tax on a less advantageous basis than Lloyd's. We contend that it is fair that Lloyd's should pay premium tax on a less advantageous basis than others.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The attitude taken by the government, then, is that for the advantage of Lloyd's competitors, and in order to secure equality of competition, this tax is being imposed?

Mr. ILSLEY: To secure equality of competition, yes.

Special War Revenue Act

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Surely there is no justification for this government undertaking to assure equality of competition between private organizations by means of a tax—

Mr. ILSLEY: What does the hon. gentleman mean by "equality of competition?" I agreed to that before I understood what he meant.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It was exactly the purport of what the minister said. He said Lloyd's had an unfair advantage over other companies in the matter of competition.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the matter of income tax.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, "competition" was the word used by the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; my whole argument is that income tax is imposed on Lloyd's on a more favourable basis than on their competitors in Canada, and conversely the premium tax is higher on Lloyd's than on their competitors.

Mr. JACKMAN: I might agree with the minister if he can answer in the affirmative the question I am about to put. The effect of this consolidation which Lloyd's are allowed is that some syndicates may lose money and others may make money, but the government shares only in the profits, not the losses? And just as a company pays a 2 per cent higher rate on a consolidated return, so the government is trying to make the same difference here. But if it is a fact that there are few if any losses by insurance companies in Canada, it would seem that the imposition of a higher rate on Lloyd's merely because they consolidate may be very unfair, and not lead to equality of competition. Do any insurance companies in Canada operate at a loss?

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. member asking whether Lloyd's do?

Mr. JACKMAN: No. The minister is assessing Lloyd's a higher tax than other companies by reason of their consolidating their returns. If there are no losing companies in the consolidated picture, then there is no advantage gained by the consolidation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member means the consolidated insurers, not companies?

Mr. JACKMAN: Syndicates.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, syndicates, yes. They are individuals, as I understand. A Lloyd's policy is a document signed by a large number of persons, each of whom obligates himself to assume a certain part of the loss. If there are one hundred insurers there are really one hundred contracts. The hon. member asks, do any of those—

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. JACKMAN: There is no advantage in a consolidated return unless some subsidiaries or individuals in the consolidation lose money—losses, of course, are not taxable —and certain others have profits against which the losses of the others would be an offset. In a consolidated company return the advantage is that there may be a subsidiary which is losing money, and to make a consolidated return they must pay 2 per cent higher corporate income tax. If there are no Canadian companies, or if the number is not substantial, that lose money, I think Lloyd's are discriminated against.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the hon. gentleman's argument is fallacious. I do not think the determining factor is whether the Canadian companies, any of them, lose money or not. I do not know whether they do or not, I suspect they do. I think I know of one that has lost money, but I am not sure. But that is not the determining factor. The determining factor is whether if Lloyd's were taxed on the same basis as the others, that is, each insurer taxed individually, that would mean that Lloyd's as a group were paying considerably more tax than otherwise. By the system we have adopted they are paying less taxes than they otherwise would, or no taxes. We are just treating them differently from the other companies.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the justification for putting a tax of 4 per cent on mutual companies as provided in subsection 3? This looks very much as though the advantage that came to the insured through insuring in mutual companies and Lloyd's is now to be denied, or prevented as much as possible, by the imposition of heavier taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have not gone into it exhaustively, although there has been considerable discussion as to the justice of the pre-existing difference in rates. The factory mutual and reciprocal exchanges have had their premiums taxed at 2 per cent as compared with 1 per cent for the stock companies and mutual companies generally in Canada. This does not apply to mutual companies generally; which is a very limited class of companies, taking in the reciprocal exchanges and the New England factory mutuals. For a long time there has been a difference in the rate imposed on their premiums as compared with the rate imposed on the premiums paid the ordinary Canadian mutuals and stock companies.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What has been the difference up to the present?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has been 2 per cent for the reciprocals and factory mutuals and

Special War Revenue Act

1 per cent for the others. Now we are adding 2 per cent in the one case and 1 per cent in the other.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: You have simply doubled it. Is there justification for penalizing companies who pass on to their insured the advantage of the savings they make, companies such as the mutuals and the Lloyd's syndicate, by placing upon them heavier taxation than is placed upon ordinary joint stock companies? The advantages of the savings generally are passed on to the insured. What justification is there for a government taxing agency penalizing institutions of that kind? -because they are penalized when they are required to pay heavier taxation than is paid by joint stock companies. On the one hand the company that operates purely on a joint stock basis has to pay a certain tax, but as soon as a mutual company is formed for the advantage of its policyholders, then it has to pay a tax which is immeasurably heavier. There must be some justification other than that given by the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not correct. The hon. gentleman is speaking as though mutuals, the sort of mutuals we think of here—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am thinking of the mutual companies which charge a certain premium and then, at the end of the year, when it is ascertained what the losses are, a benefit is given to all insured. That is the type of company covered here, is it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: The ordinary mutuals are not covered.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But what about this company that is taxed 4 per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: Those are limited, I feel sure, to the factory mutuals and the reciprocal exchanges, and that is a very limited class of companies. They have a peculiar set-up. I have heard and participated in arguments by the hour, not with them but about them, as to whether there is a difference and whether the difference does justify this difference in rate. It has been there since early in the thirties, I believe, or at any rate for a number of years.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Were the companies represented in the arguments?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, they were not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Of course not.

Mr. ILSLEY: Whatever I say, my hon. friend is going to have it that the mutuals are taxed at a higher rate than the stock companies. That is what he is going to say, and apparently I cannot stop him from doing so. But that is not so with regard to any but a very small proportion of the mutual company business, the New England factory mutuals and the reciprocal exchanges, who have an entirely different way of operating from the ordinary mutuals in Canada, who are taxed on the same basis as the stock companies.

44561-293

Mr. NICHOLSON: In spite of what the minister says, the hon. member for Lake Centre has made a point which this committee should consider. Regardless of how few companies are operating on this particular premium deposit plan, they are carrying on under the mutual idea, and I think taxation of this sort is discriminatory. I do not see any reason why a government department should take sides as between various types of companies competing for various kinds of insurance. I think the hon, member for Lake Centre has made a case which should be considered by this committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the superintendent of insurance were here to argue the case he would point out that the item subject to the tax is a different item in the balance sheets of the factory mutuals and the reciprocal exchanges from that of the joint stock companies. I have heard the validity of that distinction disputed—certainly it is disputed by the reciprocal exchanges and the factory mutuals—but I have also heard it stoutly upheld. After hearing considerable argument on the matter I decided to leave it exactly as it has been in the past and not to precipitate myself into a dispute of that kind in an effort to correct a situation which has existed for a good many years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had occasion, almost twenty years ago, to look into the case of these New England mutuals. In our part of the country they carry a good deal of the insurance on our factories and mills, or they did; I have not been familiar with the matter during the last few years. I came to the conclusion that they provided the cheapest and most effective form of insurance that any industrial concern could operate under, and I have no doubt that is true. The old line companies will combat that idea, but the advent of these mutuals into the field, in New Brunswick at all events, had the effect of bringing down rates to an astonishing degree. It was simply surprising what the old line companies offered to continue the business for, but even then the factory mutuals could and did underbid them and obtained a good deal of the business. This seems to be just an opportunity to impose a tax upon people who are providing a service at a very low rate. Is this wholly in the interests of revenue, or is this another balancing feat, as was the case in connection with Lloyd's?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is an adherence to the status quo; this is a Conservative act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That sounds very good, an adherence to the status quo; that is very high sounding, but it does not mean much to the ordinary layman who does not know a great deal about the insurance law. I wonder if, because these companies provide very low cost insurance, the minister or some genius in the Department of Finance has not seized the opportunity to say, "Well, here is a place where we can jack them up." And it is suggested to me that possibly this might be inspired by rival interests, in the hope of putting these people out of business in Canada, but of course they cannot do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The inspiration came a good many years ago, then.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be true.

Mr. LOCKHART: Could it not be corrected now?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The inspiration could not have come so very long ago, because Lloyd's have not been operating in Canada for very long.

Mr. ILSLEY: Since 1932 or 1933, I believe. But I am not talking about Lloyd's at all, and neither was the leader of the opposition.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to know whether this is an equalization of tariff in order to equalize competition between these companies, or whether it is for revenue. If it is for revenue, it means that those in this country who are insured in these mutual companies, operating under the system outlined in subsection 4 of section 14, will have to pay more for their insurance than they have paid heretofore. In other words there is a discrimination against people who choose to insure with mutual companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not correct. There is no increase in the tax imposed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, the old rate was 2 per cent and the new rate is—

Mr. ILSLEY: Four per cent.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The old rate applying to companies under subsection 14 was 1 per cent and is now 2 per cent. In other words, in one case you are increasing the tax by 1 per cent and in the other you are increasing it by 2 per cent.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and there is an answer to that. The increase from 1 per cent to 2 per cent is on the stock companies, is it not? That is the argument, that we favoured stock companies being increased one, as against two?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is not the same increase.

Mr. ILSLEY: It just shows how cocksure a person can be who does not know all the facts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister can speak with authority on that, so far as this section is concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to say what happened there. With regard to the stock companies there was a provision before that the premium tax should be subtracted from the income tax. Now it cannot be. So that the 1 per cent is paid in increased income tax for every company that makes a profit. In that way the position is equalized. It is an increase of 2 per cent, only the other 1 per cent comes in increased income tax.

Mr. MacNICOL: How much extra revenue will accrue from the additional 2 per cent?

Mr. GIBSON: The increase in the full year would be $250,000, and for the remainder of the year $190,000.

Sections 6 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10-Returns.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Should the expression "every telegraph operator" be worded in that way?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That means that in an office where there might be half a dozen operators, each one would have to make a return.

Mr. GIBSON: It does not mean every telegrapher. It means the operator of an office.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There are only two operating companies. The minister is going to adhere to this telephone tax, is he?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I shall have to.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is too bad. This tax on telephone extensions is so small it is not worth bothering about. It is one of those things which annoy people, and it falls on people in brackets which are surely caught adequately enough by the ordinary tax. It yields very little revenue, and perhaps does not cost the individual very much. Surely the minister is catching sufficiently that class in the higher personal income tax brackets without making this small imposition. It is so trivial it is not worth bothering about, but it just keeps people from giving their whole hearted support to the budget and doing everything they possibly can to help the minister, rather than find ways and means of getting around certain provisions and perhaps defeating the main purpose the minister has in mind. I do think it would be better if he would not throw out these little barbs which draw blood, which do not amount to anything, but which make people feel inclined not to help the minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A tax like this has a psychological effect which will operate against the government's budget. People who are called upon to pay 25 cents a month on telephone extensions are the people who are not only caught but are soaked in the drag-nets. This is going to have the effect of increasing their wrath, and it will be reflected in their lack of cooperation and their disposition not to buy war bonds and war savings certificates. They will say: The government is taking it out of me right and left, fore and aft; why should I buy any more war savings certificates? I have heard that time and again, and no doubt 1 will hear it again when I go home. The minister will hear it too, and his war savings committee are going to hear about it. If the minister would give in on this one minor point it would show a little flexibility, and it would be appreciated by the people. No doubt they would say, "Well, he is not so hard-hearted after all."

Mr. NICHOLSON: I take exception to the observations of the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Rosedale. It seems to me that the minister should not give way, because those who are going to be taxed are people who can still make a great many adjustments in their way of living, without any serious change in their standard of living.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Record of telephone extension, dispatches or calls.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I would ask the same question about the expression "Such telegraph and telephone operator." Then, section 12 sets a penalty not exceeding $1,000. Going back to section 9 we find reference to "such telegraph operator" and so on. I suggest the section is not very clear, and that the word "company" should be used.

Mr. GIBSON: If the hon. member will read the definitions in the act of "telegraph 44561-2933 operator" and "telephone operator," I believe the point will be clear in his mind.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Tax on railway, vessel, bus and aircraft tickets or right of transportation.

Mr. MacNICOL: I notice the rates have been materially increased on aircraft travel in the northwest. Until recently there were a number of private lines up there, but I understand that now one of the big transportation companies is in control. The placing of a tax on air travel in the northwest, in addition to the increase of rates, will interfere with air traffic from Edmonton to the northwest territories. I have been in that district, and I am going up there again this summer, and I can understand what a difference I shall have to pay this year as compared with last year.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just 5 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: But that is applied to the new and higher rates. Aircraft companies have greatly increased their rates.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I notice that the tax on pullman or parlour car seats is to be 15 cents. Surely this must be regarded as a luxury tax. Pullman or parlour cars operate only on trains which carry air-conditioned cars and equipment of the kind. I believe pullman travel must be considered a luxury.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not a luxury; it is a necessity.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It may be a necessity for those who can afford to pay it, but my submission is that pullman travel is in the luxury class. The tremendous strain on railway facilities in connection with war industries should give all hon. members cause for careful consideration. A pullman or parlour car seat costing \$2 will carry a tax at the rate of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If the pullman seat costs \$5 the 15 cent tax brings it down to a very low rate. Would the minister tell the committee why the pullman or parlour car seat tax was not placed on a percentage basis, the same as the tax on sleepers and tickets?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the answer is that no one ever pays $5 for a chair car seat, to go anywhere.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member is confusing pullman seats and sleeping car accommodation. You cannot pay as much as $5 for a seat; they will not sell it to you. You would have to take a berth.

Mr. NICHOLSON: You can pay $1. It should be on the percentage basis.

Mr. ILSLEY: We would lose a tremendous revenue—perhaps I should not say "tremendous", because the total is not that great—if we did that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This is a discriminatory taxation. The minister is allowing those who are using this luxury form of travel to get away on a percentage less than the people who buy tickets.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is more in practically every case.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It should be on a percentage basis, with a minimum of 15 cents. A chair car ticket from Toronto to Ottawa would give you this percentage. A chair from Melville to Winnipeg costs $1.60, so that this would give you less than 10 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not critical of the hon. member for his suggestion, because his approach to many of these matters is very much like my own. I do not think the revenue or any advantage which would be derived from the change would be worth the inconvenience. Chairs are bought for short distances, and a tax of 15 cents is easy to administer. It will not mean that conductors will have to go round with their pockets full of coppers. Theoretically we would get more money from the tax the hon. gentleman suggests, but this would then be a case where the observation of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) would apply; it would be an inconvenient and irritating tax that would not yield much of anything. People would have to be making odd change for that particular purpose.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is one part of this section which demonstrates that while the minister is not willing very often to listen to arguments from this side of the house, apparently he has been convinced that he was wrong last year on one matter. There is now an overriding proviso which reads:

Provided that the tax imposed by this section shall not apply on the charge for a ticket or right of transportation, if the regular one-way charge for such ticket or right to any place in or outside of Canada is 75 cents or less.

This matter was argued quite strongly last year, but the proviso was kept at 50 cents on the theory that there never was a commuter who had to pay 75 cents. The minister has raised the limit, which is one way of admitting that he was wrong, which he does not often do.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am glad to see this raised from 50 to 75 cents. Both the minister and the Minister of National Revenue replied to my argument last year that no commuter who lived just outside the city and came to work every day paid 75 cents—it was not possible. I gave them examples, and apparently they find that it is possible. If a commuter buys a book of tickets, the 75 cent exemption is determined by the price of the individual fare. This creates a hardship, because you get a substantial discount when you buy a book of tickets. It brings up the general principle which I find in many places in this budget. There is too little acquaintance with the problems of the people of Canada. There is too much thinking in what is sometimes referred to as the ivory tower.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The bureaucratic mind.

Mr. JACKMAN: They do not seem to be acquainted with the real problems of the people. There are several other changes which the minister has made to which I may have a chance to refer, changes which were strenuously argued for last year and refused by the minister. As the minister knows, there is very little of a critical nature in suggestions made in regard to budget proposals. The suggestions we made are for the most part based on experience, and I do wish the minister would give a little kinder reception to those that are advanced.

Section agreed to.

Sections 14 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

On section 18—Cigarettes and manufactured tobacco to be in packages.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is new, is it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much is it expected will be received in revenue under this new tax?

Mr. GIBSON: It is estimated the revenue for the full year will be $17,600,000; for the remainder of the year, $13,200,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This section is all new?

Mr. GIBSON: It is new.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It reads:

All cigarettes or manufactured tobacco, whether imported or manufactured in Canada, shall, before they are offered for sale or are removed from the custody of the proper customs officer for sale or consumption, be put up and prepared in such packages as may be prescribed by regulations made under this act, unless they are imported in such packages.

Do we not have another provision with respect to the putting up of cigarettes in packages?

Mr. GIBSON: Under the Excise Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Subsection 2 imposes an excise tax on cigarettes of the same type as are referred to in subsection 1. Is this a double tax?

Mr. GIBSON: The present tax under the Excise Act is $6 per thousand, and the tax under the Special War Revenue Act amounts to an additional $2 per thousand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are giving them two jolts, so to speak.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why was there a change in the method of taxation? Why did you not raise the excise tax $2?

Mr. ILSLEY: That was dealt with in the resolution.

Mr. JACKMAN: Stock in hand?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it applies only to manufacturer's stock at the time the resolution was passed. The old tax goes into the price for price ceiling purposes, and the new tax does not.

Section agreed to.

On section 19-Proviso.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think this is the section the leader of the opposition referred to a moment ago. I have heard of several cases where people are purchasing articles on the instalment plan which will be taxable under this new provision. In one case a young woman was buying a set of silver for her hope chest, and she had only one more payment to make. When she went to pay it she found she was being assessed 25 per cent more because of this new tax. I presume it is a case of administrative difficulty, but is there no way in which such cases could be dealt with?

Mr. ILSLEY: Could this not be discussed under schedule VI?

Section agreed to.

On section 20—Collection of tax upon sugar content of goods imported.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the change here?

Mr. GIBSON: We are removing the superfluous words which gave the rates of the tax on sugar. The rates are set out in schedule II and need not be repeated in the body of the act because the act itself would then have to be amended every time a change was made in the schedule.

Section agreed to.

Sections 21 to 25 inclusive agreed to.

On section 26-Repeal of sales tax on furs.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Why is the sales tax being repealed?

Mr. ILSLEY: Its place is taken by the new tax.

Section agreed to.

Sections 27 to 30 inclusive agreed to.

On section 31-Certificate of default to be registered as judgment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a type of clause that has crept into legislation in the provinces. Under a workman's compensation act, we will say, an assessment is made and if the man does not pay it, his whole property may be tied up by registering some kind of wickhagen—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Wickhagen?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. It is a homely term in New Brunswick applying to a legal process. This section imposes a lien by statute on property. I notice that in the succession duty act it is called a caution caveat is the word we usually use. Is this a new principle in taxing statutes?

Mr. GIBSON: This is just adding one section to the other sections already subject to the same provisions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is as clear as mud. I asked if this was a new principle in our legislation, or have we been doing it for years?

Mr. GIBSON: There is no change in the principle at all. This is just adding one other section to the other sections already dealt with in the same way.

Section agreed to.

Sections 32 to 34 inclusive agreed to.

On section 35-Control of amusement tax.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the federal government obtain a revenue now from the amusement tax on picture show tickets?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was the defect in the previous control that made this necessary?

Mr. GIBSON: The change of method in regulating this tax was brought about because there were different regulations in the various provinces. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police were checking theatres in some of the provinces by counting the patrons entering, but found that that was not a satisfactory check because some of the patrons were entering free, on passes. This provision is intended purely to assist in checking evasion of the tax in places of amusement.

Special War Revenue Act

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What has been the history? Has there been much evasion? What about abuses? Talk about abuse of the pass system on the railways the abuse of the pass system in motion picture houses is tremendous, I have heard. How much is the country losing by means of this free pass system in connection with picture shows?

Mr. GIBSON: There is no check on that.

Mr. MacNICOL: Subsection 3 provides:

A patron to whom a portion of a ticket is delivered under subsection two of this section upon being admitted to a place of amusement, shall keep the same in his possession until he leaves such place of amusement.

Is not that a common nuisance regulation? When a man goes into a picture show, after sitting down, he usually rolls up the stub and throws it on the floor. Now he will have to throw it outside when he comes out.

Mr. GIBSON: This provision is already in provincial legislation, and we have included it for uniformity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am surprised that a Scotsman would throw on the floor his right to a seat, because if the usher brought somebody else along and the man did not have his stub with him, he would have no right to his seat. I recommend to my hon. friend that he keep his.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Are horse races considered amusements?

Mr. GIBSON: There is a tax on admissions, and taxes on betting.

Section agreed to.

On section 36-New parts XVI and XVII:

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has anybody read these sections? I have tried to. They were never before the committee. These are new provisions relating to the operation of the tax in certain places of entertainment. Does anybody in the committee know just what he is doing? Does the chairman know?

The CHAIRMAN: I do not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Take the penalty clause, for instance. That is a new enactment, is it not?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All these sections from 133 to 143 are new and were never discussed on the resolution stage. Power is given to the minister, for example, to exempt any person from payment of the tax if the entertainment is for a charitable purpose.

[Mr. Gibson.]

I am going to read the penalty clause, 137, so that at least some people will know what we are doing:

Every person who fails to present a bill or invoice or to affix or cancel an excise stamp or stamps as required by section one hundred and thirty-five of this act is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, for the first offence, to a penalty of not less than twenty-five dollars and not exceeding two hundred dollars and in default of payment to imprisonment for a term of not less than three months and not more than twelve months, and for each subsequent offence to a penalty of not less than two hundred dollars and not exceeding five thousand dollars and in default of payment to imprisonment for a term of not less than six months and not exceeding two years.

The object, of course, is to penalize those who systematically or who may as a matter of practice try to defraud the treasury by not affixing these stamps. I agree that some provision has to be made for punishment of those who are out to defraud the public revenues.

Mr. MacNICOL: How are people to be notified?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose the department will see to it that the whole trade affected by this bill is circularized and that they know about these new provisions and these new stamp taxes. These are new stamp taxes and the stamps must be affixed and cancelled. I suggest to the minister that the penalties, at least for minor infractions, are pretty high. On wholesale infractions of the tax he ought to be pretty severe, but is there very much latitude or discretion given to a convicting magistrate? I should like him to think that over. Suppose by inadvertence I put on a stamp and do not cancel it-to take the most minor thing I can think of-I have to pay a fine of $25. It seems to me that that is excessive.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: With reference to the point raised by the leader of the opposition, I am told that this is in keeping with the penalties for infractions of other revenue laws. Whether the offence is of the same magnitude or not is, I suppose, arguable, but it is a very easy thing for anyone to evade this if he wishes, and the penalty must be fairly strict.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister consider putting in "knowingly or wittingly"?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. They will get out by saying that they forgot to put the stamp on.

There is a section here which the leader of the opposition wanted called to his attention when we reached it. It is on page 14, section 140 of the act, being part of section 36 of the bill: Tax on retail sales. The question was about delivery.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Instalment sales.

Mr. JACKMAN: Suppose a person has undertaken to purchase various articles which are taxable under this section and has almost completed the payments, or has been making deposits against a specific article. No delivery has been taken. It may be that a young woman is saving for a hope chest, has specified flatware or something of the sort, and has almost completed her payments; and now she must pay, in order to get delivery, 25 per cent extra. I understand that is the way this section is administrated at the present time. It does not seem equitable.

Mr. ILSLEY: It works both ways, I think. The delivery is the overt provable act and fixes the time when the tax is due, but the moment of sale is sometimes difficult to ascertain. The question then arises whether "sale" means agreement to sell or not. It might be that in many cases an article could be bought and laid away, and if the tax were on the sale, the tax would become due after the conversation took place or after the article was set aside. I assume that if that were the rule, at the time of the beginning of the tax, many transactions might come to light in connection with which it was alleged that the article had been set aside and laid away before the coming into effect of the tax. For these reasons delivery seems to be by all odds the best date to take. I believe that in the administration of the sales tax, experience of years resulted in the adoption of the delivery date as the important date, the determining date.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There might be a case of complete payment with the taking of delivery deferred. The transaction would surely be completed if payment had been completed.

Mr. ILSLEY: Delivery is the date.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Even if payment has been completed?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is unfair and inequitable. I can understand the minister's point of view where payment has not been completed, but in the case of a complete payment where the purchaser says "Hold that, and I will call for it next week," I do not think the tax should apply. Does it apply in such a case?

Mr. ILSLEY: If delivery has not been made the tax does not apply.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would there not be constructive delivery in the case of which I speak?

Mr. ILSLEY: There would be constructive delivery; that is, the article would be held by the vendor as agent for the purchaser, and lawyers might raise an argument as to whether delivery had not actually taken place. But I think that for purposes of administration the officials of the excise division take physical delivery as the one determining factor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, it is the easiest way.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is another example of administrative ease being sought, notwithstanding the hardship on the individual. I do not know how general these instalment cases are, but it does seem to me that the administration might take a more lenient attitude in regard to them, because it is only during the next few months that any evasion or subterfuge could be perpetrated if this section were made more equitable. It seems most unfair that persons who have already undertaken to buy things on a limited income should now be subject to the very steep tax of 25 per cent because they had not actually taken physical delivery. The administrative difficulties would be over in a few months if the minister would relax the method of handling the tax.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): In the case just cited, if the entry has gone through the books of the vendor the transaction would be definitely closed so far as the vendor was concerned, even though the goods had not actually been delivered. Another point is that in auditing the vendor's books the department's auditor would go in accordance with those books, and that would be the alpha and omega so far as transactions of this kind are concerned. Up to a certain point the tax does not apply, and from there on it would apply. It would not be within the province of the departmental auditors to go back and check stocks, I imagine. The simplest and most satisfactory way would be for the departmental auditor to take the audited books of the company as the transaction on which the new demand would be based.

Mr. ILSLEY: Many of them do not keep books, or adequate books.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): But the point taken by the hon. member for Rosedale is well taken, because, as we all know, many young couples getting married to-day, with the husband in the armed forces, are not able to take up residence yet but want to feel some sense of security with regard to certain articles they had taken a fancy to, perhaps feeling that they will not be able to get them later as the shortage of materials extends. In many cases the article is fully paid for and the transaction closed, but it is left in the custody of the company. There is also the consideration of spoilage, wastage, and the necessity of storing elsewhere in case the husband is obliged to move and the bride goes to live somewhere nearby. Perhaps they hope eventually to settle in their home town, but in the meantime they are wandering around and are unable to gather together these goods, which they have not only had charged but have paid for and feel that they own. I cannot see that it is possible for the department to apply this tax on undelivered goods, in the face of the bookkeeping entries of the vending companies on the one hand and the parties moving around on the other.

It obtains not only in regard to such persons as those referred to by the hon. member for Rosedale, but in many other cases. Take a simple example—the Rolls razor. I do not know whether razor blades come under this tax, but scores of people have set aside purchases because these goods cannot be supplied from overseas. They have set aside stocks, and paid for them; the entries have gone through the books of the vending companies. Thinking of the great number where physical delivery is not taken, it seems to me it is going to be a great task for the department to determine the matter on the basis of physical delivery.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot help thinking that the cases discussed are highly exceptional. In the great majority of cases where the sale does not synchronize with the delivery, the delivery comes first. The goods are taken possession of, and the property in the goods passes when the instalments are paid. The hon. member for Rosedale is putting a very exceptional case where money is paid with a view to getting the goods later.

Mr. LOCKHART: There are scores of them.

Mr. ILSLEY: But there would be many more of the other variety.

Mr. JACKMAN: How many dishonest jewellers are there who would try to rob the department? The minister is not treating this matter fairly.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not talking altogether about dishonest jewellers; I was talking about [Mr. J. H. Harris.] the date we should take. We could have a fancy formula that would be against the crown no matter what happened; I suppose we could take the date of the transfer of property or the date of delivery, whichever was earlier, and carve some of the transactions out of the act. But why do it? Where is the great hardship here?

Mr. JACKMAN: The inequity of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Future buyers are to be taxed; why should not the buyers on the borderline?

Mr. JACKMAN: Surely the minister does not say that is sound reasoning. Why not make everything retroactive?

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say anything about making things retroactive. Where is the hardship in putting a tax on goods that pass into the possession of the purchasers in the future, following the passing of the act?

Mr. JACKMAN: If the minister were saving for fifty or a hundred weeks a dollar a week to pay for some article a young woman wanted for her hope chest, he would soon find where the hardship is, if when he came to his last payment he had to start saving for another twenty-five weeks.

Mr. ILSLEY: A hundred weeks would be two years during which she has been saving. That is quite a wait. Then the hon. gentleman puts another twenty-five on that. Surely he is taking a highly exceptional case now, whatever he was doing before.

Mr. McNIVEN: Before lunch the leader of the opposition, in commenting on the speed with which we are going through this bill, asked whether we as members knew what was in the sections. In glancing over the sections I was surprised and shocked to find in section 31 that a judgment could be registered against a delinquent taxpayer after fifteen days from the receipt of a registered notice; that that judgment, no matter whether the man lived in Ottawa or the Yukon, would be registered in the Exchequer Court of Canada and would appear in the records of this country as a judgment against him. Following the issue of the judgment there is the right to issue an execution against his goods and lands, and the appropriate officer may go into possession of his goods and chattels. It may be argued that in the case of the sales tax he has already received the moneys represented by the tax. He has collected it from someone else; therefore there should be no arrears. But there are many cases in which business concerns have absorbed the tax. The tax is payable out of their profits. They find themselves in debt to the department. They receive a registered notice, and fifteen days afterwards a judgment is recorded and the sheriff may step into their place of business. For many of them it means bankruptcy. I really wonder whether we understand that we are placing such drastic powers in the hands of officers of the department.

Mr. GIBSON: There is nothing new in this provision. It now applies the law to two more sections, that is all. It has been the law that has been carried out in the past, I think very fairly.

Mr. LOCKHART: Just to clarify 142 of section 36, subsection 1, where a watch is purchased many months before and almost paid for when it is delivered or ready to send overseas, is the whole tax of 25 per cent added to the cost?

Mr. GIBSON: If the goods are exported the tax would not apply at all. Otherwise it would apply.

Mr. LOCKHART: I know of five men who are now at Debert, and who no doubt will soon be going overseas. The wives of these men are buying watches for them, and have just about finished paying for them.

Mr. GIBSON: Those goods are not being exported; they are being delivered to purchasers residing in Canada.

Mr. LOCKHART: And they will have to pay the full 25 per cent tax on those watches?

Mr. GIBSON: That is right.

Mr. LOCKHART: Could it not be on the unpaid balance? I have in mind a watch costing $32. The tax would amount to only $8, but that means quite a lot to a young wife who is working and saving her money to send a watch to her husband, who expects shortly to go overseas. Could not the tax be applied to any balance still owing, or something of the kind?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

Section agreed to.

On section 37-Schedule I.

Mr. SENN: Paragraph 7 imposes a tax of 25 per cent on electric or gas light fixtures and lamps and shades, globes and reflectors. Why should globes be placed in that list? They are essential; everyone uses them, and for that reason they are not a luxury but a necessity. They might better have been left out.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If I might refer for a moment to section 143, in part XVII, this section refers to the matter 44561-294 about which the hon. member for Regina spoke a short time ago. This deals with penalties. Under it, either the salesman or the purchaser must cancel the stamp, and if that is not done a penalty of from $25 to $2,000 may be imposed. That is about all we see in this act-penalties all the way through. Then the minister does not give the taxpayer very long in which to pay his tax. When we go back to the section imposing the tax on furs, we find that the tax must be paid the first business day following the delivery of the furs, though in many cases the dealer will not get his money for several days. I do not believe the people are getting a fair deal under this measure. The penalties should be reduced, and the dealer should have a reasonable time within which to pay these taxes.

Special War Revenue Act

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Haldimand asked with regard to globes. There is no change in this item; it is not a new provision at all.

Mr. SENN: I wanted to know if that meant electric light bulbs, that was all.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am told that it does not.

Mr. STIRLING: What is a globe?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have seen them, but I do not know how to describe them. They are lighting fixtures.

Mr. STIRLING: But not electric light bulbs?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Under paragraph 8 of section 37 a 25 per cent tax is imposed upon coin, disc or token operated slot machines and vending machines; coin, disc or token operated games or amusement devices of all kinds. Does this mean the government is sanctioning the use of these machines?

Mr. ILSLEY: This provision is not new.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know, but there have been a great many objections to machines of this kind.

Mr. GIBSON: This is not a new section. It refers to such machines, for instance, as those which distribute candy, gum, and cigarettes; coin-operated devices that are used for merchandising goods in that manner.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to ask the minister when a man is a professional photographer and when he is not?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know; I suppose when he earns his living at photography.

REVISED EDITION

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is very important. Is there any definition of a professional photographer?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, but there are different types of equipment.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think there should be some definition. Otherwise all you would have to do would be to go and rent a film for a few dollars, or something of the kind.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman has missed the point. There is an attempt here to distinguish between two types of equipment equipment designed for professional and industrial use, and equipment designed for amateur use. Equipment of the first type is exempt; it is the second type that is taxable. There is no need for an amendment to the interpretation section to define what is industrial or professional use. I am told that this concerns equipment of two types.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The point is that many professional photographers are taking moving pictures with 8 millimetre film, in order to cut down on expense. I think you should have some definition.

Mr. ILSLEY: If they use amateur equipment it is taxable.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): This item reads, in paragraph 5:

Cameras, photographic films and plates, projectors for slides, films or pictures, except those designed exclusively for industrial or professional photographers' use—

What is the design? I should like to understand it. There are hundreds of thousands of amateur photographers in Canada. cameras they buy, the films they buy, the projectors they buy were so expensive even before this extra 25 per cent was imposed, that very few people could afford to use them. By this additional tax you are shutting out the amateur almost entirely. As one hon. member has just said, photographic films and slide projectors used by professionals are also largely used by amateurs; there is very little difference. Take thirty-five millimetre film. Many amateurs use it, but it is used also by professionals, and is shown in theatres on the screen. How can you tell whether that film is designed for use by a professional or by an amateur? It all depends on who buys it. It is not a question of design in the film, because the film used by the amateur and the film used by the professional are of the same design, and the same thing applies in many other cases.

Mr. ILSLEY: That may be so in many instances, but I am quite sure that you would [Mr. Ilsley.]

not find amateurs using to any extent the sort of cameras or equipment used by Karsh. for example, or any photographer of that type. If equipment is designed exclusively for the use of professional photographers, or for industrial use, it is exempt from the tax. Other equipment is taxable, even though some professional or industrial use be made of it. There would have to be a ruling by the Department of National Revenue drawing a line in classifying equipment. On one side of the line the equipment would be regarded as designed exclusively for professional or industrial use, while on the other side of the line that would not be so. Articles of one class would be exempt, while others would be taxable. The goods that are exempted here must come within the words of the exemption. We start with the basis of them all being taxable. But in order not to impose a business tax to any greater extent than can be helped, because of the business taxes that are on now, we try to carve out part of this range of goods, and those are not taxable. The kinds that are carved out are those designed exclusively for industrial or professional use. It may be that some of them will be taxed.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): With all due respect to the minister, his explanation makes it no clearer than it was before. If the tax is imposed for revenue, why exempt the professional photographer? He is the man who makes money out of it. The amateur does not.

Mr. ILSLEY: We get him under the excess profits tax.

Section stands.

HONG KONG COMMISSION

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE-DEBATE SET FOR MONDAY, JULY 27

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): With the consent of the house may I intervene to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) what has been decided with respect to the Hong Kong debate?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend is aware, the intention on the part of the government has been to proceed with the Hong Kong debate immediately after the conclusion of the discussion on these bills standing in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). Do I understand it is the wish of my hon. friend that any other order of procedure should be adopted?

4654

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that we proceed on Monday, and make it a definite fixture for that day at the opening of business.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know it is the desire of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) to proceed as rapidly as possible with the discussion, largely because, among other reasons, the necessity for so proceeding has been impressed upon the government from time to time. However, if my hon. friend and other hon. members wish to have the matter stand as the first order of business on Monday, I will ask my colleague if that would be agreeable to him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not see how it is possible to take it up to-day, when there are two or three more bills to be discussed. Only two have been passed, and the third is now under way. The bill having to do with the Dominion Succession Duty Act is to follow, and then we are to discuss the Excess Profits Tax Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can take up the Excess Profits Tax Act to-day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right, that is satisfactory; then supply.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): While procedure is being discussed could the minister give any information as to when Bill No. 115 will be taken up?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's wish is that we should definitely proceed on Monday?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well.

Mr. ILSLEY: Bill No. 115 will have to come after the Hong Kong debate.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 114, to amend the Special War Revenue Act—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

Section 37 agreed to.

Sections 38 to 41 inclusive agreed to.

On section 42—Coming into force of certain sections.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an amendment to section 42.

Mr. GIBSON: I move:

That section 42 of Bill No. 114 be amended by deleting the words "sections one to twelve 44561-2941 inclusive" in line one thereof and substituting therefor the following: "sections one, nine to twelve inclusive".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What happens to sections two to eight?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are to be provided for in another section to be added. I shall move that later.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 43, 44 and 45 agreed to.

On section 46—Coming into force of certain sections—sugar.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Why is there mention of the sixteenth day of February?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the date I made the announcement about the change in the tax.

Section agreed to.

Sections 47, 48 and 49 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. ILSLEY: As I explained, another section is to be added. My colleague will so move.

Mr. GIBSON: I move:

That the following section be added to Bill No. 114:

"50. Sections two to eight inclusive of this act shall be deemed to have applied to premiums received by insurance companies in Canada during the calendar year 1941, and each calendar year thereafter."

Mr. ILSLEY: These taxes on the insurance companies are to take the place of provincial taxes repealed. When I presented the budget . of 1941 on April 29 of that year I stated that in respect of certain classes of companies it might be necessary to impose the special taxes to take the place of the provincial taxes, and that. they would be retroactive to October, 1941. That was missed when the bill was drafted.

Section 50 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to the effect the taxation imposed under this budget is having in the constituency I have the honour to represent, the Yukon. It is causing an actual exodus of people from that territory. They cannot stay there and earn sufficient to pay their living expenses as well Special War Revenue Act as the new taxes, and there is nothing left for them but to get out. That is a sad state of affairs.

On June 3 I drew the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to the inequality between the wages paid by foreign employers in that territory and those paid by Canadian employers. I should like to read a short extract from a British Columbia paper, as follows:

Writing from White Horse, Yukon territory, a former resident of the lower mainland unfolds an odd angle of the doings in the north country since Americans went in to build the Alaska highway and other defence works.

"There are a lot of American outfits up here doing construction and defence work with American money. They brought lots of help up with them but not enough to go ahead the way they figured on unless they could get some Canadians. They did get some Canadians and paid them at the same rate as Americans, $1.05 an hour for ordinary labour with time and a half for overtime; American dollars.

all for overtime; American dollars. That didn't suit the White Pass and Yukon who have a contract to supply help to build an airport here."

They are referring there to the transportation company.

"They only pay 75 cents an hour for their help. What they get from the Canadian government is another question. So a politician pulls the strings at Ottawa and the next thing is, all Canadians at White Horse working for Americans are brought down to 75 cents an hour straight, and the next move is, all Americans at White Horse are ordered to get rid of all Canadians and hire no more.

Now what kind of a game are they playing at Ottawa? They are supposed to be trying to keep all the money they can in Canada and still they prohibit Americans doing defence work with American money from hiring Canadians which would bring American money into Canada. It looks like a big racket to me.

P.S. Room rent the cheapest at White Horse is $10 a week; meals 75 cents to $1.50; so you will see labour is better off working outside."

That is why labouring men are obliged to leave that part of the country. I may say that the company referred to asked me to apply to the national war labour board for authority to raise by 50 per cent the wages paid to common labour. They were then paying 50 cents an hour, and the board raised the rate to 75 cents an hour, plus cost of living bonus. The employees and the employers were quite satisfied with that rate until the United States contractors came in and paid larger wages in United States money. Naturally the Canadian labourer went where he could make the most. Why not? He should not be prevented from doing that. He could get only 75 cents per hour working for a Canadian employer, whereas he could get what amounted to $1.15 per hour in Canadian money working for a foreign contractor.

On June 3 I brought this matter to the attention of the government, when I said, as reported on page 3017 of Hansard:

The consequence is that employees of Canadian employers are leaving them and going to work for these alien contractors, who are paying no attention to our Canadian law, while Canadian employers are bound to observe it. Certainly Canadian employers of labour would not be allowed to do such a thing, and I submit that it is the duty of the government and of the Minister of Labour to see that these alien contractors obey our Canadian law.

I repeat that. If you are not going to do that, then you should let the Canadian labourer work for the man who will pay him the biggest wages.

There is a further inequality in the ruling of the national war labour board. They have provided one scale of wages that may be paid for the different categories of labour south of the sixtieth parallel, which is British Columbia, and another slightly higher scale which can be paid north of the sixtieth parallel, which is the Yukon territory. They provide:

Because of the emergent nature of this work employees may be required to work ten hours per day but not more than sixty hours per week. In such case all work in excess of the customary hours shall be paid for at the usual overtime rates prevailing in the district for the respective trades or as established by agreement or provincial regulations.

That is the ruling for the district south of the sixtieth parallel, but no provision for overtime is made for the territory lying north of the sixtieth parallel. The usual practice for employers there is to pay time and a half for overtime, but apparently this government board does not recognize that. I have it on good authority that these United States contractors are now employing tractor and truck drivers in western Ontario on the basis of $20 to $25 per day, with transportation provided to the scene of construction on the Alaska highway. I do not understand how Canadian labourers can go up there and accept that money, with the present ruling of the national war labour board. I should like to see them get it. Here is what has happened. The government, through the Department of Finance, is taxing these people at such an excessively high rate that they cannot stay in the country, and on the other hand the government, through the Department of Labour, is preventing them from earning wages which would permit them to stay in the country. This is a cruel imposition on the Canadian labourer, and I am asking that it be removed.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think there is an answer to what my hon. friend has said. If

[Mr. G. Black.]

I remember aright, he was the first one to direct my attention to the situation in the Yukon. We must remember that in the United States they have not travelled as far as we have in the stabilization of their wages policy, but I believe that in the not too distant future they will 'follow our lead. My hon. friend will readily understand that we cannot have our own wages structure destroyed because of the building of the Alaska highway.

Then there is the question of labour supply. We all know that there is a very tight situation, particularly in western Canada and more particularly west of the rockies. Conversations were held through an arrangement made by officials of the Department of External Affairs with representatives of the United States government, and a plan was worked out under which Canadian contractors who assumed contracts for the building of the Alaska highway would engage only Canadians and pay them the rate of wages set by the national war labour board. Labour coming from the United States and engaged by United States contractors would be paid the United States rates of wages. My hon. friend will understand the complexities of the situation. The United States workman gets not only the rate prevailing where he is hired, but an additional 25 per cent for working abroad. He also has the benefit of the rate of exchange, which is about 11 per cent. Most of the men engaged on the building of the Alaska highway will be United States workmen who will be employed by United States contractors. We faced a somewhat similar situation in the building of a pipeline into Alaska from north of Edmonton, but I am glad to say that this has been straightened out, according to the information I have received from the employment service of Canada.

My hon. friend referred to the recruiting of men in western Ontario. I want to say that as far as United States contractors are concerned there will be no recruiting of men in this part of the country. In the operation of an enormous undertaking like that, there are bound to be exceptions to the rule and difficulties in the application of the policy.

We have to take a national view of this question. What the hon. member says about giving it with the one hand and taking it away with the other is true, but when the budget resolutions go into effect they will affect everybody, members of the House of Commons and the general public. When this thing gets into full swing I say frankly that I think the arrangements which have been made between the two governments will work to the eventual benefit of the people of British Columbia. What we tried to avoid was the very difficult situation that exists in Newfoundland. It is not an easy policy we have to administer, but there was no alternative to the one we took, and taking the long range view I think it will work out satisfactorily.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The Minister of Labour says that when the budget resolutions go through everybody will be assessed. I do not think that includes United States labourers working on this project. They will not pay income tax in Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL: They will pay it in their own country.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Canadian labour ought to be free to work for the United States contractors at the United States rate.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister has made an adequate reply to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black). Here we have a situation which is upsetting everything in relation to the labour supply in the Yukon. After all, it is under Canadian sovereignty; the United States government ought to conform to the wage-ceiling structure that we have put into effect in this country. I do not think there would be any violation of the good feeling between the two countries if they were asked to do that.

I do not appreciate the significance of the minister's reference to Newfoundland, but I do know that wage ceilings down there have been sky high, beyond the dreams of avarice of the average man in Newfoundland. They told me when I was there last autumn that men were working for two or three weeks and then going home to visit their wives for two or three weeks, coming back to work when their money was spent. The situation in the Yukon makes it impossible for a Canadian contractor to retain Canadian labour. The situation should be grappled with immediately.

I do not put any stock in the minister's suggestion that when these budget resolutions go through and we have a new normal tax under the income tax schedules applicable to everybody in Canada, we can make these fellows pay the tax. I have grave doubts about that. How will you enforce it when all they have to do is to cross the line to some other part of the work? The fact of the matter is that the minister has not yet got a solution to the problem. He should give an undertaking to the house that the problem will be solved along lines that will protect the Canadian position.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to answer my hon. friend if the house would consent.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT, 1940

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 113, to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1-"Standard Profits."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, on the resolution stage, on July 21, Tuesday last, at page 4461 of Hansard, I asked a question which was not then answered. The question was:

What progress has been made in fixing standard profits for depressed industries?

Then I went on to say:

I have been told that the board of review has not adjudicated upon even one-third of the cases before it. If that be so, should not some additional agency be created to speed up the work? Predicated on that statement the situation is very disturbing to those concerned. If there are several hundred such cases and they do not know what to do until their standard profits are determined, it is unfair to them.

I went on to say:

The question may be based on an entirely erroneous impression, but I should like to have some statement as to the position at a later stage.

Mr. ILSLEY: The board of referees has had referred to it by the income tax division 737 cases to date. The board has handed down the following decisions: (a) under the heading of depressed business, 303; (b) under the heading of new business, 50; a total of 353.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A little less than half the total number?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. In addition, approximately 50 decisions have been made and only await official promulgation. That was the position on June 21, 1942.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it thought that all the cases have been referred, or how many cases are there which have still to be referred to the board in due course?

Mr. ILSLEY: The new companies will be coming continually to the board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I assume so.

Mr. ILSLEY: The commissioner informs me that quite a number of old companies which have not yet made application will be doing so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Am I to understand that the 737 cases of old com-[Mr. Mitchell.] panies which were referred to by the minister covers the total number of old cases in which application has been made to be dealt with under the depressed industry clauses, and that of these some 400 have already been dealt with? That covers a period of about two years does it not? How many more old companies is it anticipated will apply?

Mr. ILSLEY: These are the cases that have been referred to the board, but a large number of applications to the minister have not been referred to the board. I have not the figures here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are they of such a character that they can be dealt with by the administrative officers on 'the basis of principles established by the board? I understand that this board—which I may say in passing I thought, and still think, is a very fine board—spent a substantial amount of time in the early stages of its tenure of office in studying the position and in trying to arrive at statements of general principles applicable to certain classes of cases. The chairman of the board told me that was so, and I thought it was a very good course of procedure.

While I am on my feet may I say that he paid a very high compliment to the type of assistance which the board had received. It seems to be fashionable in some quarters to slam the civil servants. I never have done that. I have not even slammed "brass hats". But it may be some little satisfaction to the civil servants to know that a man of the calibre of Mr. Justice Harrison thinks that the type of civil servant assigned to assist him is of a very high character, and I want to put that on the record. I do not know whether Mr. Justice Harrison would himself say that publicly, but it was not a private or confidential conversation, and I think that I should say that.

What I want to know is this. There must have been many hundreds of depressed industry companies and partnerships and what-not, who were advised, either by their accounting staff or by their auditors, to take advantage of these provisions of the act. Was it the fact that the board established these principles and then the department itself went on to administer the principles thus laid down without referring each case to the board? Or-perhaps this is the better question to ask-was it the practice to refer each case to the board so that the applicants could have the opportunity-and I think it was afforded in every case in which they so asked-of making their representations to the board?

I think the board gave great consideration to representations which were made. What is the practice? Are the old companies pretty well dealt with, or are there several hundred beyond what the minister has intimated. Also, what is the fate of the newsprint companies in this respect?

Mr. GIBSON: The method by which this has been worked out is that the depressed company is now permitted to assess itself, and if the department in going over the company's figures is willing to accept those figures, there is no appeal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no reference?

Mr. GIBSON: There is no reference to the board; but if the department does not accept those figures, the company is referred to the board of referees. This method has very much cut down the number of appeals.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And when it is referred on the application of the applicant to the board, and comes back to the department, what is the procedure? Does the department always reaffirm the board's decision, or does it ever overrule the board?

Mr. GIBSON: After it comes back from the board of referees, the department goes over it. I do not think that in many cases the department would disapprove the recommendation of the board of referees.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want to know what the minister thinks, I want to know what he does. Does he ever reverse himself? Does he ever reverse the board? Because, after all, the minister has the final say.

Mr. GIBSON: There has never been a case in which the recommendation of the board has been upset.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to hear that.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Do I understand the minister aright that in the case of depressed industries they would assess themselves; that is where they have made an application to the board of referees, when the application is pending? The depressed industry in that event could not assess itself and pay its taxes. The urgency of the question is based on a thought running through my mind, namely. that a large number of businesses close their fiscal period on March 31, and the four months period expires next week, on July 31. Meantime there are quite a number of depressed industries who have applications before the board of referees, whose applications have not been dealt with, and who are in this quandary. They are anxious to pay their tax on the due date, namely July 31, but there is no decision from the board of referees. Did I understand the minister to say that in that event they could remit to the Department of National Revenue the amount of tax compiled on their own figures and subsequently have the matter adjusted, without penalty?

Mr. GIBSON: The only cases that go before the board are those in which the taxpayer has not been able to agree with the department as to what is the profit to be allowed.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The board of referees are in arrears with a lot of cases, and the tax becomes payable on July 31.

Mr. GIBSON: The taxpayer has the right at the present time to ascribe to himself what he considers to be the right amount of tax, and to make payment. Later, if there is any dispute with the department, the matter is referred to the board of referees.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The tax would be on the standard profits of the four previous years, but in the case of the depressed industry where they claim to work under paragraph (b), 10 per cent of the invested capital might be the basis on which the standard profits would be calculated. Could the taxpayer in that event pay his tax as of July 31?

Mr. GIBSON: A company might pay on the basis of 10 per cent, but if the department claims that it should be 7 or 8 or 5 per cent it would then be sent to the board for their ruling.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): That matter of adjustment afterwards by the board of referees would be honoured by the taxpayer without penalty from the department?

Mr. GIBSON: There would be no penalty, but there would be interest on the amount of arrears.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): As a constructive suggestion to the department, let me say that there are a great number of industries in Canada who find that their inventories are depleted at the opening of navigation. That is to say, during the summer months, with navigation on right up to the fall of the year, they pile very heavy inventories on their docks and slips and in their warehouses, with the idea of carrying on until the opening of navi-These industries, as the minister gation. knows, invariably close their books on April 30. On August 31 their tax becomes due. The suggestion I have to offer is that the board of referees who are handling cases of the kind which are now before them—and there are many, particularly in the coal industry—might readjust their agenda or their itinerary in such a way as to try to dispose of the cases of those industries whose taxation becomes due and payable on August 31. It is too late now to do it for July 31. I think perhaps that condition might have obtained with regard to March 31. In other words, get some sequence in this matter; because it is a source of worry and concern to those who are conducting their businesses as honourably and as best they know how, to find that they are not clear as to what they ought to pay. They are anxious not to fall afoul of the department.

Mr. GIBSON: I will pass that suggestion on to the board of referees, with the recommendation that it be favourably considered by them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under the statute the allowance for a depressed industry group is a maximum of 10 per cent, or 5 per cent, or anything in between. On what principle are these allowances made? What company is allowed 10 per cent, what company 8 per cent, what company is held down to 5 per cent? What is the basis of final assessment?

Mr. GIBSON: That is what the board of referees spent a great deal of time originally in finding out, as to what classes of industry earn high rates and what classes earn low rates, so that they could deal with any application knowing approximately what rate should be applied to each class of industry.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has not answered my question. I should like to know the result. I know the method. They investigate each class of business and apply some formula to a particular class. But why should one have 10 per cent and another 5 per cent?

Mr. GIBSON: The history of that type of industry shows what the normal profit is. I take it that an industry that has a greater degree of risk would expect to make a higher rate of profit.

Mr. JACKMAN: Take for instance the newsprint industry. There, instead of one company being depressed the whole industry was depressed. Are you going to allow 5 per cent or 10 per cent, or how will you establish the principle as to the amount to be allowed? We should at least know what is in the mind of the department or of the board, in order that the public and the people who administer these companies will have some knowledge of what their position is.

I should like to know also whether or not the newsprint industry has had any ruling, [Mr. J. H. Harris.] after two years or more, on excess profits tax. Has clearance been given as to income tax? I gather none of them knows what its position is, not only for last year but even for the previous year. There must be some body of principles that will enable business to know where it stands.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And there should be some finality about taxation.

Mr. GIBSON: The board of referees made an investigation of the newsprint industry as a whole. They determined that the industry was depressed. Now they are dealing with the individual companies to find out what relief should be granted to each company. They made an examination, not restricted to Canada but of the world, to ascertain what the situation was, what the profits were in various companies all over the world, and what would be a fair return for these industries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has there been any finality with respect to any of these companies? I have information in respect to one company only up to March, but up to March there had been no settlement. The company had a splendid year last year. It had the cash to pay. I suppose it paid what it considered was due, although I do not even know that. The company, however, had to hold a huge sum in reserve in order to take care of the highest eventuality, money which might have been used for other purposes. In the meantime the shareholders are not getting a cent. As my colleague adds, they did not then know whether the amount appropriated, some $2,000,000, was enough. I realize the magnitude of the difficulty.

Mr. GIBSON: There are so many types of businesses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, many types. But these newsprint companies went through a terrible time during the depression. Most of them had to go through the wringer, I say with sorrow. These excess profits taxes are hitting them hard, and this provision was made so that they would not suffer as they have in the past and would not, I hope, be left in such a position that if another depression comes they would have to go through the wringer again. These companies employ great numbers of people. Some of them, at the peak, employ five thousand men. Without doubt it is the largest manufacturing industry in Canada, one that is native to this country and to which we look for a large amount of employment. Therefore notwithstanding the jibes that may be thrust at me from certain quarters in this house, I think these companies have to be kept on their feet by the avoidance of excessive taxation. They cannot go through another period such as that through which they went in the last decade. If they do they are out, and one of the greatest factors in our national life in respect of employment is going to be in serious difficulty. I should like to know a little more about what is being done, and when the situation will reach finality.

Mr. GIBSON: Of course we realize the seriousness of the situation with regard to the newsprint industry. They presented their case as an industry, and it was given serious study. That has now reached finality so far as the industry itself is concerned. Now the claims of the various companies are receiving consideration from the board. I cannot say, as to each individual company, what stage their appeals have reached, whether in any particular case they have been finally adjudicated upon, but I know that the general principle has been laid down for the industry as a whole.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there much difference between the representations of the industry itself as contained in its brief and the decisions that have been reached? How far did the government go? Did they yield to all the requests of the industry, or in what particular did they not? And is the result satisfactory to the industry?

Mr. GIBSON: I cannot make any statement on that, because the brief is filed with the board of referees, and unless there is an appeal from them after their final recommendation is made I would not have occasion to go into the brief at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has not come before the minister?

Mr. GIBSON: No.

Mr. JACKMAN: Has the newsprint industry been definitely classified as a depressed industry, and if so what has been the rate of earnings the board has decided it shall be allowed?

Mr. GIBSON: The industry as a whole does not get the rate. The industry is depressed, and it depends on the financial set-up of each company what its rate should be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister said that the industry as a whole was declared to be a depressed industry?

Mr. GIBSON: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is one thing that has been settled. But the rate that will be applicable to any given company is not a general rate, if I understand his remarks.

Excess Profits Tax Act

Mr. GIBSON: It depends on various factors including the amount of capital employed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a fixed principle, but will it vary in application as between companies? Some companies are much better situated than others, and some mills in the same company are better than others. Take Abitibi. Some of their mills were old and had been almost abandoned; other mills were great money makers. That company, I suppose, would have to be treated on the basis of its whole position, not as individual mills. Will some companies be allowed one rate and other companies allowed another rate of interest?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes, that may be so.

Mr. JACKMAN: All subject to the ordinary taxes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There will be a variation in the allowance made to different companies, depending on their earning power, their efficiency, and all the other factors that go to make up the difference between profit and loss balance.

Mr. GIBSON: Depending upon all the factors.

Mr. JACKMAN: And then they are all to be subject to this tax?

Mr. GIBSON: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: We are still very much in the dark, and I do not suppose much light can be thrown upon the matter by the minister here. But it does strike me that we should be able to learn what rate of earnings a depressed industry will be allowed, and what rate a concern such as a great railway will be allowed. In the one case it may be 10 per cent, which, after payment of a tax of 40 per cent will leave 6 per cent. In the other case it may be 5 per cent, which after pay-ment of the tax will leave only 3 per cent. There is no finality about these matters so far as the public is concerned. As the leader of the opposition suggests, perhaps the min-ister does not want us to know. But after such a lapse as we have had it is time that business knew about where it stood.

I should like to ask a question also with regard to the point I raised last year concerning the plateau of corporation profits, which was the best expression I could find. We take the period from 1936 to 1939 as our standard profit period. As applied to our economy the plateau is very low as compared with that which prevailed in England during their period, because, while it included some of those years, more alternatives were given in that case. In the old country they had a boom in the heavy industries, and the export industries also did very well during the years which made up their plateau. In this country we had a complete depression in the newsprint industry, for example, with the excep-tion of one year, and the heavy industries generally did very poorly. As a matter of fact the aggregate of corporation profits was very low during the years used as a base. Let us take a case nearer home, that of the United States. How does our plateau of profits compare with the plateau which existed in the United States? We are putting on a very heavy tax, and we should know whether we are taxing a decrepit animal or a healthy, live animal. A comparison of our plateau with those of other countries will give us some indication of that. Many people have very little interest in this question, but it is a vital matter to industry; for on it depends to some extent whether or not industry will be able to survive the high rate of taxation now imposed. It is exactly the question with which one becomes familiar in our municipalities. If your assessment is high your tax rate may be low. If your assessment is low your tax rate may be high, and you come out about even. Here, however, you have a base which is very low, which in the circumstances is equivalent to a high rate of assessment; but you also have a high tax, equal to that of Great Britain and higher than that of the United States. I should like to know from the minister whether any work has been done or any publicity is to be given to the relative plateau of profits in this country during the base years as compared with those of Great Britain and the United States? Secondly, what rate of earnings is to be allowed in connection with newsprint, and in connection with the Canadian Pacific railway, both depressed industries? What rates do they get?

Mr. GIBSON: The question of what rate is to be allowed depends upon various factors including the capital structure of the company being dealt with. One company may be operating on borrowed capital while another operates on capital that has been subscribed, and the rates allowed would be determined largely by the capital structure of the company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose that is true in a degree. But take the case of a company with a large proportion of bonded debt as compared with the equity, as against that of the company with a smaller proportion of bonded debt as compared with the equity. Which gets the higher rate of return—the one with the large bonded debt? Perhaps I might illustrate it by the use of figures. Let us say one company has $10,000,000 of bonded debt and $5,000,000 of proprietors' capital. The other company, with the same amount of capital invested, $15,000,000, has $5,000,000 worth of bonds and $10,000,000 worth of shareholders' capital. Is there any difference based on that? That just follows the minister's statement with regard to the capital structure. Would there be any differentiation in those cases or would you treat the shareholders' equity as capital on the same basis? One is in a much more healthy financial condition than the other; the one which owes $2 is much worse off relatively than the one which owes only $1.

Mr. GIBSON: There is of course a limit on the profit that can be allowed under the 10 per cent limit, and the amount has to be varied according to the capital employed and the nature of the business. Those factors have to be considered, and where there is a small equity capital in the business normally it would have to get a higher rate, of course up to the limit of 10 per cent, than a business where there is a higher equity capital.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You treat the company having a smaller shareholders' equity better than you treat the one with a larger shareholders' equity. I took the simple case of a $15,000,000 financial structure, in the one instance $10,000,000 of bonds and $5,000,000 of shares and in the other instance $10,000,000 of shares and $5,000,000 of bonds. The one with the greater bonded debt gets better treatment than the other?

Mr. GIBSON: They would get a higher rate; yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the justification for that? It is the same type of money.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the question?

Mr. JACKMAN: The leader of the opposition asked what was the justification for treating the company with the larger bonded indebtedness more favourably than the company with the larger equity investment. The minister said they were treated differently, and now the leader of the opposition has asked the justification for that treatment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I can give the answer myself, that in the one case the shareholders' investment is in a more hazardous position than in the other.

Mr. GIBSON: He is taking a bigger risk.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury:) That is not the only factor, but is that the main factor?

Mr. GIBSON: That is one of them.

4662

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think I will pursue this any further. I do not think the minister knows anything about it. I do not say that unkindly, but I think it is a fact.

Mr. JACKMAN: And what about the relative plateau of profits?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not had a chance to read this draft as thoroughly as I would like, and that applies also to the succession duty act. I suggest that these be left over.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before we do that I should like to ask a question in respect to this bill. When this proposal was contemplated, was there any consultation with representatives of business in respect to this whole question of excess profits? This follows what I was about to ask with reference to the change in the set-up. So far as I am aware we are proceeding with taxation measures such as this without any consultation with those who are to be affected, without consultation with business, without the aid and support and information that those who are actively and practically engaged in business could give the department. I am assuming that that is a fact; I know nothing to the contrary.

In the United States there is sitting to-day, or will be sitting if it is not now, a committee to consider this question of personal income tax. It invites representatives of business to appear before the committee to give it the benefit of their advice, and more important still, the benefit of their experience with respect to the effect of taxation on individuals and companies, so that the committee may have first-hand information—not only theoretical—as to the effect of such taxation.

I could show the minister an interesting letter I received during the noon hour from an outstanding business man in a Canadian city. He points out that we are proceeding on the wrong basis so far as our income and excess profits taxation are concerned. He shows that we lay down certain principles and then we bend the law to suit those principles, irrespective of the effect they will have on the individual. If I were to mention this man's name the minister would recognize him at once as one of the brightest and most outstanding business men in Canada. He is of the opinion that we go about this matter in the wrong way. We set up a tax structure having for its primary purpose the securing of money. I admit the necessity for that, because we are at war and we have to get money. We are taking it from groups, individuals and companies. But we have to proceed along much more scientific lines than those on which we have been proceeding thus far.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I am a little uncertain about the "hear, hear" from that quarter of the house, because I would be afraid of what it involved.

Mr. GRANT: You know you are wrong now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And if the hon. member for Prince Edward Island would hold his tongue and keep quiet, it would be better for everybody in the house, because his interferences are based on pure ignorance, and nothing else. Perhaps that will hold him for a while.

Mr. GRANT: That is terrible, isn't it, from a leader of the opposition. That is what leaves you where you are.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We cannot proceed with our budget any longer on the basis of corner store economies. We have entered into tremendous big business in this country. We have a budget which is staggering in size, proportion and implications; certainly it is staggering as regards the sacrifice entailed. I am wondering if we budget in the proper way. I am wondering if in our desire to out-Herod Herod we have not proceeded in an improper direction, and under false premises.

The point I make is that in the United States they have adopted a different practice, which I believe has been in effect for a number of years. The treasury recommends a plan or programme. In that country they have a very high type of man filling the position of secretary of the treasury, and he is surrounded by capable officials, as is the minister in this house. I am not going to say our officials are not efficient—not at all. I am trying to make constructive suggestions; I am not trying to destroy. My purpose is to point out that we go about this thing in the wrong way. I believe we should do what they are endeavouring to do, and perhaps with a good deal of justification, in the United States. In that country the treasury recommends certain things. It is understood of course that in the United States the treasury is apart from the legislative body. They have a different set-up, but I do not believe that alters the principle for which I am contending. Certain recommendations are presented to the house of representatives. From there they go to a budgeting committee-I have no doubt the minister is much more familiar with their technique than I In that committee they hold hearings am. and invite representations from men who know how the taxation will affect not only corporations and big business, but small business and little taxpayers.

Mr. ILSLEY: And then they do not follow them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not always, no. But I venture to say that they are very much impressed with what they hear; and out of the whole accumulation of knowledge surely there is a little wisdom.

Mr. MacNICOL: The same thing in England.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the democratic procedure. I suggest that we might very well follow it in Canada. It seems to me that it would have some advantages, although I would not say it is ideal. It is very much better, however, than the hit-or-miss system we have in Canada. I do not care how clever our advisers or experts may be, after all not many of them have had any actual day-to-day contact with business. They have not had as much as a good corporation lawyer-and on that point I would page the Minister of Justice, who would qualify as a corporation lawyer. Those officials have not had as much day-to-day experience as those of us who, in days gone by, were intimately connected with the problems of business, and know how it is affected by tax changes. Those officials have theoretical knowledge, it is true. They have book knowledge far beyond anything I ever hope to attain. But as to the practical application of that knowledge, I would not trade my practical experience for all the theory they have inside their craniums.

That is my suggestion to the minister. I make it in the utmost of good faith. I would ask him to ponder it between now and the next budget. Instead of having the whole country rush to Ottawa after the budget is brought down, let him have some inquiries made before it is brought down. Let people point out to the minister the inequalities of certain taxation, so that he will not have to back away from things. And, by the way, this minister does not do much backing, although he does a little.

In my lifetime I have seen a whole budget revised. I remember one occasion when Mr. Fielding, who has been heralded as a great minister of finance, presented a budget in the early twenties. We were down one night in the old museum building, and word came that Mr. Fielding was delivering a second budget. We all had to pile out, and when we did get up we were presented with a second budget. [Mr. R. B. Hanson.] Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is where this budget should be—in the museum.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not say that, because there are many good features in it. I supported it, and I cannot take the position that the budget is all bad.

As I said in my speech on the budget, every time I have had to deal with a budget, either as a private member or in my present capacity, I have been confronted with the necessity of deciding either to support or to reject. There have been many things in every budget I have ever heard that I could support whole-heartedly, and there have been many things in those same budgets I should and could condemn. But one has to make a decision either to accept or reject as a whole. That is another fault in the system. Of course it is too late now to make any change with respect to the system of bringing in the budget, but I am asking the minister if he could not make some change in days to come. We are going to be at war next year, and we will have another budget. I am not going to repeat what I said about the maximum of taxation having been reached. But I do think we have reached the time when the law of diminishing returns will come into operation. I am sure of that, from the reactions I get from the country. Some of these very taxes which have been imposed are going to defeat the purpose the minister has in mind. However that is a prophecy, and it is a pretty dangerous sphere to enter upon at any time. I may be wrong, but that is what I am suggesting. What I am striving for is the enunciation of the principle we should follow when preparing a budget. Perhaps what I suggest could not be done with respect to tariff changes, but I think it could with respect to direct taxation. We should consult the people who are to pay the bill.

Mr. JACKMAN: The banking and commerce committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My hon. friend suggests the banking and commerce committee. I would have to think over that suggestion before I would be willing to accept it in its entirety. I have no doubt that considerable good would come out of that sort of committee. I should think that some body could be set up to examine the proposals suggested by the treasury officials before they are brought down in the budget.

This would be a radical departure from our practice in this country, but after all we should not live too much in the past. Let us have a little progress. Knowledge is never static. We should go forward in devising our taxation methods. I had not intended to elaborate upon this matter, but I have been thinking about it since noon. I recommend it to the minister. There may be insurmountable difficulties, but at the moment they are not apparent to me. Between now and the next budget I suggest that the minister consider having hearings held in advance, not afterwards; that he consider receiving representations before the event, rather than afterwards, from the people who may be affected.

I can understand how once having brought down a budget and committed the administration, it must be a difficult thing to reverse one's position. If one's mind is as inflexible as I believe the minister's is, it must be a humiliating thing to have to change your position. However, if I am convinced that I am in error, I have never found it humiliating to admit it. The trouble is to convince the minister that he is wrong. I am sure that this would be helpful to the people who have to pay the bills.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no objection to giving this some consideration and studying the methods employed in other countries. I must say that I do not know much about them. I am under the somewhat general impression that in Great Britain, whose methods we follow, the greatest secrecy is preserved in the preparation of a budget. Business is not consulted to any great extent, nor is anyone else. I think the economists probably have the same influence there that they have here and with the treasury of the United States. I think myself that that is all to the good. Economists are likely to approach a matter from the point of view of the general interest rather than any particular interest. It is extremely difficult for a business man to adopt this general attitude, and in saying that I do not want to say anything against them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I appreciate that.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is extremely difficult for a business man to make an unprejudiced and unbiased approach.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Therefore you could not accept their recommendations one hundred per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: The leader of the opposition is suggesting that we go United States in the preparation of our taxation. As he knows, we have been pretty faithfully going British in this connection. I have no reason to think that the United States method is the better method. For example, let us consider some features of this budget. The changes in the excess profits tax adversely affected the prices of certain stocks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They resulted in a cut in dividends, and there will be more cuts.

Mr. ILSLEY: They forced the corporations to cut dividends. The banks are cutting their dividends, and sooner or later other companies will have to do likewise. Let us say that we had a committee considering the changes in the excess profits tax. It might become fairly apparent at a certain stage that certain action was to be taken. I cannot see anything to prevent speculators in shares from gaining a profit because of the advance knowledge they might obtain from the deliberations of the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that happen in the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether it does, but I do not see anything to prevent its happening here. One of the reasons why I delivered the budget in the evening this year instead of the afternoon was that I felt that if it were delivered in the afternoon there were clever, facile individuals who would immediately see the effect it would have upon the prices of certain stocks and profit thereby. Another reason was that there was to be a heavy retail sales tax, and there would be the possibility of a rush to buy goods the day before the tax came into effect. Of course that was not very serious, but there are times when these are serious considerations, especially in dealing with tariff matters.

Year after year we have worried about the effect of advance knowledge, and we do everything we can to discourage newspapers from publishing surmises and conjectures as to the budget, lest the public be affected thereby. This budget was prepared through the efforts of fifteen or twenty very able men, who worked on it with me for months, and who kept their counsel. There was not the slightest hint of a leakage of any kind, even in connection with decisions made weeks before the budget was brought down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nevertheless stocks were tumbling for a month before. Look at Bell Telephone.

Mr. ILSLEY: There were other causes for that. I am saying that there was absolutely no leakage.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): American Telephone was falling in the United States. Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was a long time ago.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It was at the same time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think a case has been made out against our method of preparing a budget. It is the English method and from what I know it is highly preferable to the United States method. Apparently the committee in the United States becomes a battleground of conflicting interests. I presume they employ counsel and send experts to fight to protect their position. Here the greatest care is taken not to introduce provisions that will be ruinous or discriminatory. If a mistake is made, it is corrected after the budget is brought down. The next day after a budget is brought down telegrams begin to pour in from those affected by the new taxes, and protests are made against the imposition of this, that or the other tax. Take the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) for example. He thinks it is a terrible thing for business not to have more to say in writing a budget. He is the exponent of business when he objects to every tax. I think he has objected to practically every tax; I do not remember a thing that he has favoured.

Mr. JACKMAN: I really object to the Minister of Finance saying' that. Every time anyone wants to iron out some inequality he should not be said to be representing the business man. I suppose when I was talking about the poor young lady who is buying a chest of silver that I was speaking for business. But the minister must admit that in his proposals there are some things which are not practical. I know that changes have been made, not because of any influence hon. members may have over the minister but because he listens to someone outside in whom he has confidence. I should like to refer to one section to illustrate my point.

Resolution 5 amending the Dominion Succession Duty Act provided that the proceeds of life insurance policies if the deceased was domiciled outside Canada (1) at the time the contract was entered into and (2) at the time of his death and (3) further that the beneficiary also was resident outside Canada, shall be exempt from duty. The merest tyro in business or insurance would know that that provision would destroy the possibility of any of our great Canadian insurance companies doing any business whatsoever in the United States or in any other country outside Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not agree.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister does think so?

[Mr. J. G. Ross.]

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not think so, after hearing the insurance companies on the point. They did not go nearly as far in their own behalf as the hon. gentleman has gone in their behalf.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why should a person in the United States take out an insurance policy with our Canadian companies when he will have to suffer succession duties in Canada and have his own succession duties in the United States? It would be an intolerable situation. I am not suggesting that I know more about insurance than the insurance companies themselves. They have put forward their point of view, and the minister has withdrawn his proposal.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not for that reason. The main reason for withdrawing it is a legal point, and that is that the effect of it is limited because the situs of documents under seal is the place where the document and the seal are found.

Mr. JACKMAN: If I were an American I would never take out a policy through a Canadian insurance company if I knew I had to pay succession duties in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: You would not have to do it in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred because you would be domiciled in the United States and your beneficiary would be domiciled there, and therefore you would be all right. I wish the hon. gentleman would not use such extreme language as to say that the merest tyro in business would know he was ruining the insurance business in Canada. He goes so very much further on behalf of them than they do themselves that he spoils his case.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not want to overstate my case, and perhaps the minister is right. But it would hurt their business anyway. Last year we had the withholding tax on coupons of provincial bonds, and the minister changed that. Surely that resolution does betray a lack of practical business experience on the part of the minister's advisers.

Mr. ILSLEY: I could make a very effective reply by saying on whose advice I did that, but I won't.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister and I had a heated argument last year—

Mr. GILLIS: What is before us, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is quite in order.

Mr. GILLIS: He is discussing insurance and how the minister puts forward his budget proposals. I want to say something on the excess profits tax before we leave this. Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You will have a chance. We are still on the method of approach in the preparation of a basis qua excess profits, and I think the hon. member is quite in order.

Mr. GILLIS: He was in the United States a moment ago, discussing insurance companies.

The CHAIRMAN: I have allowed a little latitude on section 1 because no one has raised objection, but if objection is taken, I do not think the general policies of the minister in bringing down a budget can be linked up with section 1, the only effect of which is to add the proviso in paragraph (i). That proviso reads:

Provided that standard profits shall not include for the purposes of this act property in any form received by a taxpayer deemed to be the payment of a dividend under section 19 of the Income War Tax Act.

It would take quite a stretch of the imagination to see how the general policy in bringing down a budget could be covered by that amendment.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, as I understand the clause under discussion it deals specifically with the newsprint industry and makes certain provision whereby that industry might meet with a board of referees to determine whether or not they come under the Excess Profits Tax Act, and on this section I think the discussion should be specific.

I was very much struck with the concern of the leader of the opposition for those employed by that industry. The hon, member for Rosedale is always very much concerned over widows when discussing excess profits.

What I had in mind was this, that the act as it is at the present time, rather than guaranteeing the peace-time profits of the newsprint industry is merely for the purpose of seeing that they share in any excess profits that can be made by virtue of the fact that the country is at war. I hope that neither the leader of the opposition nor any others in his group will not later in the session, when matters that are urgent and important to other members of the house come up, rise in their places and show that they are in a hurry to go home, because the discussion that was precipitated here this afternoon has, in my opinion, very little justification. No one in this country is guaranteed his peace-time standard of living like this particular industry is being guaranteed its peace-time profits, as I understand it.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not correct.

Mr. GILLIS: That is what I am trying to find out.

Excess Profits Tax Act

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These are companies that did not have standard profits.

Mr. GILLIS: My understanding of the excess profits tax is that the standard is taken from the average in the last three normal years of operation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Four years.

Mr. GILLIS: The average profit made during those years is considered to be the standard profits.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What if they did not have any profits?

Mr. GILLIS: Then they would not be in business.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes, they would. That is where my hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. GILLIS: The newsprint industry in Canada was not on relief. It went through a boom after the outbreak of the war, although there has been a slump recently because of the power situation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Because of the volume of sales and transportation difficulties.

Mr. GILLIS: What I have in mind is this. We have had reports from a large number of the employees of that industry who have lost their work because of the slump in the industry, and they have not been guaranteed any peace-time standard of living. They have not been guaranteed a job. They have been "considered" on this basis, that your job is to find a job for yourself, and to a large extent they are doing that. Every one of our peace-time industries which is considered non-essential has been drastically affected because of the war. Gasoline retail dealers, for example, were legislated out of business. No regulations were brought down on their behalf; no one pressed the case for compensating them or guaranteeing them the standard over the last four years. They just went out of the picture. They are absorbed in other industries. Many of them closed up their businesses and took carpenter's tools or a pick and shovel. I think it is ill-advised on the part of the leader of the opposition to take up the time of the committee in fighting for a readjustment of what I consider is a more than fair arrangement when regarded in the light of what has happened to others in that industry. The workers must go and find a job for themselves. If the newspaper industry is not essential to the war effort, while power is, and the newspaper industry is closed up, I do not think the taxpayers owe that industry anything unless the whole operation is taken under examination and considered at the same time and on the same basis. In my opinion the arrangement proposed by the minister is more than fair—the arrangement for the board.

Mr. JACKMAN: The hon. member does not understand it.

Mr. GILLIS: I understand it perhaps a little too well for the hon. member. Arrangements are made for the board of referees to take any section of these operations under examination in order to determine whether they have been making profits over the last four years and to arrange that the industry be kept in operation. That has been done for no other section or stratum of society in this country that I know of, except those in the upper crust whose friends on the right go to bat for them when they are threatened in any way, shape or form.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course the speech to which we have just listened is a roorback from yesterday. I am going to ask the minister, on his responsibility as minister, and with the full knowledge he has, to give the hon. member, and those for whom he pretends to speak-not those for whom he speaks, but for whom he pretends to speakthe true situation with respect to depressed industries. May I call the attention of the hon. member for Cape Breton South to a statement I made in this chamber not long ago, that labour in this country is interested in its jobs, and that labour is often misrepresented by these professional politicians, theorists and schoolteachers.

Mr. ILSLEY: We keep drifting away from the section, but I should like to explain the theory and principle of the Excess Profits Tax Act for the benefit of the hon. member for Cape Breton South and one or two of his associates who, I have felt, have not completely understood it.

It has been said, I believe by the hon. member for Yorkton and certainly by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, that in some way or another certain profits are guaranteed industries as a result of the Excess Profits Tax Act. That is not so.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I do not believe I ever said that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have heard the hon. gentleman from time to time ask who gets their profits guaranteed except these companies? I just want to point out that all these companies are in danger of running into a loss all the [Mr. Gillis.] time and that there is no guarantee of the standard profits. 'That is the essential point I want to make. The standard profits are ascertained for entirely another purpose, not for the purpose of giving companies a guarantee that they will make them. They do not get that guarantee at all. They may or may not make profits. They may run into a loss, as I think certain companies will do this year who are selling automobiles.

Mr. GILLIS: They do not come under the Excess Profits Tax Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: They do, provided they make profits of more than $5,000. All except some very small companies come under the act. The whole range of business in Canada, whether the companies are incorporated or not, comes under the act, except small ones making under $5,000 a year. The government does not guarantee anybody any profits; it ascertains those profits for the purpose of determining what the normal excess will be, the excess over the average profits of the four years before the war.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The standard profits.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. But there will be anomalous cases, cases where it would be unfair to take the average of the four years as the standard profits, because it is obvious that they are not the normal profits of the company. With relation to these depressed industries, provision is made for them to apply to the board of referees to get something other than the actual average of the profits of those four years. Once that is determinedand there have been already, as I have told the leader of the opposition this afternoon, three or four hundred determinations of those cases -and we have a competent board sitting to determine them, then the taxing authorities are in a position to know what the excess is over the standard profits, and they are in a position to tax that excess. But there is no guarantee of profits. That is the reason from our point of view-from the non-socialistic point of view, if I may put it in that way -for permitting people profits of more than a bare, fixed amount. It is because of the danger of losses; it is because they are risking their capital, and go into the red certain years and nobody does anything for them. That is just too bad, but it is just their worry. Therefore we think it is fair that there should be some leeway in the good years. One hundred per cent excess profits tax without any return takes the whole excess away, even though they may go away down in the red afterwards. From a non-socialistic point of view we think that is a little too rough, and while we take the whole 100 per cent away, we allow them 20 per cent to shoot at. We think that makes for economical and efficient management, makes them careful about not throwing their money away and demoralizing their business. That is why we do not favour a full 100 per cent excess profits tax.

4668

Mr. GILLIS: Do you declare the newsprint industry a depressed industry? You are prepared, are you not, to assist that industry now as a depressed industry?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it gets no assistance as a depressed industry. This simply means that, instead of first taking the average of the profits of that industry or certain units of the industry for four years—

Mr. JACKMAN: If it had any profits.

Mr. ILSLEY: If it had any profits—and some of the companies may not have had any profits at all, or infinitesimally small profits, I do not know—you take a higher level which is based on certain principles applied by that board. That does not mean that they get any assistance from anybody; they do not get a dollar. It only means that we do not take so big an excess.

Mr. GILLIS: What is the basis? Do you take the last four years' operations, or what four years?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether it is determined or not, but for a depressed industry the most that can be allowed any industry is 10 per cent on its capital.

Mr. JACKMAN: Subject to the 40 per cent tax. The hon. member does not know that.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a 40 per cent tax, no matter how small the profits of the industry. But the most that can be allowed any industry is 10 per cent—it may range down to 5 per cent—on the capital. It is often very hard to determine what the capital is by the way, when I hear these suggestions that we should ascertain the capital of all industry in Canada-that is one of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation proposals; I do not want to open up a big debate on that-and allow all industry 4 per cent and take the rest. It would be just about impossible to do that on any fair basis. The discrimination would be terrible when you came to try to apply the principle and ascertain what the capital actually is. It is not a matter of getting the evidence; it is a matter of applying the principle.

The reason why there is a sliding scale between 5 and 10 per cent on capital in these depressed industries is that in some industries there is little risk and in others there is greater risk. That is the essential difference. There will also be differences in capital structure, as the Minister of National Revenue has shown this afternoon, but the main difference is the nature of the industry. If a person is in one of the feast and famine industries where you have losses for years and profits for years, 10 per cent may be slim. On the other hand for a public utility 5 per cent is plenty. Therefore provision is made for allowing from 5 to 10 per cent on capital in depressed industries.

It may be asked, how determine the capital there? It is a manageable proposition there. The normal thing is to take the experience, to take what they actually did earn over the range of the business. That can be ascertained. But this ascertainment of capital, to be workable, must be kept within manageable proportions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the minister make it clear that no one is guaranteed profits?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Because the hon. member's whole assertion is based on the theory that under this tax structure someone is being guaranteed something.

One other point in connection with the excess profits tax and the budget is its effect on shareholders. Has the minister visualized this, that as a result of the fall in capital values people may sell their shares and invest in government bonds? How is that going to affect his taxation prospects?

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the question?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My suggestion is that the new budget has had an adverse effect on capital values of shares.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Some, yes. None of us know yet what the full effect will be. To see what the effect really is you perhaps have to go to a wider area than Canada. Look at American T. & T. and see how that has shrunk under the effect of new taxation, a huge shrinkage in capital value, I think from 160 to 112 or thereabouts. I have been told that the taxation on that company will be equivalent to $4 or $5 a share. Assuming the public get the idea that there is going to be more and more taxation on dividends and the like, which constitute personal income; is there not a tendency to say, well, I will be safe and protect my capital; I will sell out and put it into government bonds. What is the effect going to be on the revenue?

Mr. ILSLEY: How does it affect the revenue?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It will affect the revenue from that man's holdings.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Did I understand the minister to say that no company is guaranteed a profit?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct—not under the Excess Profits Tax Act. What has the hon. gentleman in mind?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There are industries in Canada that are guaranteed a profit. It might not come under the Excess Profits Tax Act, but the impression might be wrongly taken by some hon. members that no companies are guaranteed a profit. That would not be correct.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the hon. gentleman thinking about?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In the aircraft industry, for instance, some companies are guaranteed a profit.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, they are not. On certain contracts they get cost plus so much. They are not guaranteed a profit on their total operations.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They are guaranteed a profit on that contract.

Mr. GILLIS: Which is their total operation in most instances.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understand the board of referees decide what is a standard profit. Is that their function?

Mr. ILSLEY: In a depressed industry, yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: A war industry at the present time will, I presume, be in its feast stage. Do they spread over some war industry all the profit that company has been making since 1918? How do they determine the basis in that case? These companies which in peace time were engaged in some manufacturing business have changed their whole industry. Does the board of referees take into consideration the capital invested by such a company and the losses they were making in peace time and level that with what they are making now, or do they look forward to what that company might be doing ten years from now? How do they determine the basis of standard profits in that case?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure about the principles they apply, but they would start with the years 1936 to 1939 inclusive. Those are the years which prima facie determine the standard profits of a company. If the [Mr. R. B. Hanson.] company argues that it was depressed for that period, I do not know just how it proves its case. I presume, if it had been losing money, actually in the red for the whole period, there would not be any doubt about the matter, because that would obviously be an abnormal condition for a company incorporated to make a profit. But some assessment of the proper or fair return on capital would be made for that class of company, and they would be allowed that, not less than 5 per cent or more than 10 per cent on the capital. That, I presume, would be the approach the board of referees would make. It must be borne in mind that I am not in touch with what the board of referees is doing. I knew about the act at the time it went through, and the intention in framing the act was as I have stated. When I say they cannot get more than 10 per cent under any condition, that does not apply to new companies. New companies are entitled to the rate of return normal to the business, and the board of referees fix that, although that may be difficult. What I am saying is correct in the main; that is the underlying principle. Provision is made for some exceptional cases in order to meet particular hardship cases.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The board of referees would have to determine the actual capital for these companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: For the depressed companies; that is right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And the minister says that might be difficult.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but the definition is a long, carefully drawn definition, with every clause worked out. Roughly speaking, the definition is based on this, that it is the cost of the assets less depreciation, and less debts owed by the company. That is the general principle for determining capital. Not the par value of the shares; that does not mean much.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That brings in the other point that I want to bring up. In the case of an agreement under the War Measures Act whereby some special allowance is made in consideration for some construction, say the enlarging of their plant to the extent of $34,000,000, as I believe was done with International Nickel, whereby $5,000,000 a year is allowed to that company for depreciation and depletion, will that not reduce the profits of that company to the extent of $5,000,000 a year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, for taxation purposes.

Supply-Agriculture

Mr. CASTLEDEN: For instance, we will say the profits for the year were $12,000,000 and that the standard profits ordinarily would have been $3,000,000. Their excess profits in that case would be $9,000,000. If you make this special allowance for depreciation or depletion, that will reduce their profits for the year from $12,000,000 to $7,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Your standard profit will still be $3,000,000, and therefore the portion taxable for excess profits will be only $4,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but note this, that at the end of the five-year period the profits for taxation purposes shoot right up, because their depreciation is very largely written off. This merely advances depreciation, and it is not always an advantage to a company to take all its depreciation early. They are running a chance when they do that. Sometimes it is an advantage to spread depreciation over quite a period. In the case of International Nickel, however, I should like anyone who studies that agreement to ask any questions about it at any time, because it is a highly advantageous agreement to Canada. Under it, International Nickel brought in about $34,000,000 in United States money and invested it here, and they are taking out their ore very rapidly as a result. Naturally their profits would be swollen out of all relation to normality by that abnormal operation; and it would not be fair to expect them to undertake that highly abnormal operation without a rapid write-off of the investment by depreciation. If it should turn out that they are getting some permanent benefit it might be different, but the faster the depreciation is written off, the greater will be their profits in future years.

Mr. JACKMAN: And the greater will be the tax on future profits.

Mr. ILSLEY: And the greater the tax will be on the profits in future years, unless there is a reduction in the rate of taxation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is not likely that the rate of taxation will be so high in post-war years.

Mr. ILSLEY: It might not be.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And their plant will be increased in value to the extent of $34,000,-000, while the depreciation of $25,000,000 will have been written off. Therefore it will cost the company actually about $9,000,000.

Mr. GILLIS: As I see it, whether or not this act is going to be of any benefit to the country will be determined largely by those who sit as referees. How are these boards of referees selected? The newsprint industry is depressed. You would not call in the heads of that industry to sit in judgment on their own case, as we have done in connection with the dollara-year men here?

Mr. ILSLEY: Under the act I believe the Minister of National Revenue selects the referees.

Mr. GILLIS: Will they be civil servants, responsible to the government?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a board which has been in existence for a year or two, of which Mr. Justice Harrison of Saint John is the chairman. The other members are Mr. Dalglish of Montreal, an eminent and able chartered accountant and former president of the dominion association of chartered acountants, and Mr. Fell of Toronto, who at the time of his appointment was associated with one of the life insurance companies either as director or president. The board is highly regarded for its ability and fairness.

Mr. GILLIS: I am quite satisfied with that line-up. You have a judge at the head of it, and the minister has some jurisdiction over the board. I thought the selection might be made in the way that the government has chosen a number of the people who are really managing the country to-day, the dollar-a-year men, the heads of industries who really have been called in to act as sales agents for their own companies.

Section agreed to.

On section 2-Persons liable to tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an amendment to be moved to this section, but I should prefer to have the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again rather than go ahead with this act, because I want to give some attention to it and a little more thought than I have had time to devote to it so far.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service.

2. Publicity and extension division, $108,715. Mr. GARDINER: For the benefit of those who have not reviewed what took place the last time we were before the committee, we passed item 1 just before the debate concluded, but we discussed quite fully the publicity and extension division and also touched slightly on the advisory committee on agricultural services. The discussion of administration covered pretty well the general questions which might be asked, but I would presume that hon. members would desire to discuss the other items under the head of science service, production service, marketing service and special. Just toward the end of the discussion on the last occasion I noticed that we were inclined to get down to a discussion of acreage payments and things of that kind, which really come under "special", and if we could wait until we reach that item before having any further discussion on those matters it might help us to get through more quickly.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not know that this is the proper item under which to mention it, but the Minister of Finance was asked a question concerning the advisory committee on beef.

Mr. GARDINER: The proper place for that to be discussed, if it is to come up under these estimates at all, would be under "marketing".

Mr. PERLEY: The details of this item are on page 54 of the estimates, and I see there an amount of $5,755 for the cost of living bonus. I think that is new this year. Would the minister explain it?

Mr. GARDINER: The cost of living bonus is added to the salaries all the way through the list, and that is the amount which covers this particular branch of the service.

Mr. PERLEY: Just for this one branch?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Administration service.

4. Contributions to empire bureaux, $36,274.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would the minister explain the item?

Mr. GARDINER: These bureaux were set up some years ago, and are listed at page 54 of the estimates, as follows:

| Farnham house laboratory | $ 6.083 | 33 | |
|-------------------------------|----------|----|--|
| Imperial agricultural bureaux | | | |
| Imperial bureau of entomology | 5,353 | | |
| Imperial bureau of mycology | 2,920 | 00 | |

$36,274 00

These bureaux are established with offices in Great Britain to gather information with regard to experimental and scientific investigations in connection with agriculture in different parts of the empire, so that whatever is discovered in one place can be utilized in another.

Item agreed to. [Mr. Gardiner.] Science service.

6. Animal and poultry pathology, $147,300.

Mr. WINKLER: Has consideration been given to the supply at cost of serum for erysipelas in pigs? Two years ago the service in connection with poliomyelitis was given at cost, thereby cutting the cost to farmers to about one-half. But the cost of servicing for vaccine in connection with young pigs is very high at the present time. Some farmers are spending close to $100, and if the cost were cut, it would make a great difference to them.

Mr. GARDINER: The department does not supply the serum, but it is purchased in the ordinary commercial way by anyone who wishes to have it. The department, however, supervises the importation of it when it comes from outside, and checks on the different serums put out to deal with diseases of this kind. There is no financial assistance in connection with the purchase of the serum. We have, however, investigated costs. There have been complaints as to costs, but so far we have not been able to find that there have been any excessive charges in connection with the supplying of it.

Mr. WINKLER: The charge may not be excessive, but the profit to the druggist is, I believe, 100 per cent. I have no complaint against the druggist making a legitimate profit, but I think that is a little high.

Mr. TRIPP: There never has been and is not now any profit of 100 per cent or anything like that in connection with the supplying of serum to farmers, or anybody else.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There should not be any profit.

Mr. TRIPP: You would not expect anyone to handle it for nothing, would you? The druggist does not charge any more than the government does for such products. Druggists handle them at the same price. They might get a 10 per cent discount for handling, but the price at the drug store is the same as the price from the government department.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Could people not send to the department directly for the serum?

Mr. TRIPP: I think they do sometimes. I know in my own province the serum for poliomyelitis is handled by both the department and the distributors. It is not always done through the druggists; sometimes the municipalities handle it. However, it is all supplied at the same price. If the municipalities distribute it they get the same discount as do the druggists. The retail price is marked on the package, and the price received by the druggist is not increased in any shape or form. I do not wish the committee to think anyone is making 100 per cent profit; that is absolutely wrong.

Mr. SENN: I should like to ask about the serum sometimes used in the treatment of Bang's disease, one of the most scurrilous and damaging diseases in Canada to-day. I understand the agricultural college at Guelph has a serum it is willing to distribute, but there is something in the federal act which prohibits its doing so. Has any advance been made in connection with preparing a serum which will deal effectively with this bad disease which is causing so much trouble in our dairy herds?

Mr. GARDINER: I presume the hon. member has in mind the calf vaccine, which is made in the United States. It is produced in Canada now, although it was not made here originally. During the last year permission has been given to distribute it in Canada.

Mr. SENN: In addition to the vaccine for calves I understand there is a serum used in the treatment of cows in calf, and that there has been a prohibition in connection with its coming into the country. There has also been prohibition in connection with distribution from time to time. I know it has been used by veterinaries with very good results, and I trust that the prohibition will not be continued.

Mr. GARDINER: The department does not recognize the use of any serum for older animals. There is a calf serum or vaccine used as a preventive. Then, the department does test cattle for Bang's disease. In other words, it checks them to find out whether they react, and if there is positive reaction their destruction is advised.

Mr. SENN: I am trying to find out whether the importation of serum used in connection with the more aged cattle is prohibited, and if it is prohibited to use the serum provided by the agricultural college at Guelph. I know that serum has been used with very good effect at times, and I would hope, if there is any ban on the importation or use of serum, that at least in the hands of veterinaries it might be allowed.

Mr. GARDINER: The information I have from the officials is that my hon. friend must have in mind the calf vaccine. The serum containing live cultures is not permitted to be imported.

Mr. SENN: I was asking if that prohibition should be done away with.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no permission for the importation of the serum containing live cultures, and the only vaccine of which we are aware, which is sometimes used, is not used on the older animals.

Mr. WRIGHT: How far have we gone in the development of rust-resistant barley?

Mr. GARDINER: I would suggest that we leave that until we are discussing the estimates for experimental farms. The officials before me are not experimental farm officials.

Mr. HATFIELD: Will the decrease of $2,515 have any effect on the service?

Mr. GARDINER: As a matter of fact we are not cutting out any services or officials; it is simply a matter of general economy.

9. Agricultural chemistry, $102,881.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What work is being done by this branch?

Mr. GARDINER: From the experience which the hon. member has had along certain lines he will know that chemistry is the basis of practically all studies in connection with agriculture. Soil studies are based upon chemistry, as are the constitution of plants and other matters of that kind. The chemical branch provides all information used in connection with studies of this kind.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In the United States they are carrying on extensive research work in connection with plastics and other byproducts of agriculture. Is any provision being made for the greater utilization of agricultural by-products?

Mr. GARDINER: The Department of Agriculture may provide information which would form the basis of certain studies, but these are carried on largely by industrial chemistry. That work would come under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The Department of Agriculture is not carrying on any extensive work?

Mr. GARDINER: Not along those lines. Item agreed to.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Some time ago the department advertised for an artist, but it was specified that he should be male. I have had inquiries from young ladies who have attended art schools and colleges and who want to know why they were not given an opportunity to apply for this position.

Mr. GARDINER: The artists that we employ in the department must go out into the fields, into the forests and among animals in order to make drawings and pictures of the different types. It was thought advisable to have them male.

Experimental farms service. 12. Central experimental farm, $585,130.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Last year I inquired about the farm at Rosthern, and I should like to have a statement from the minister as to what disposition has been made of this farm and the animals and equipment, whether the land has been sold to anyone and, if so, to whom and at what price. Last year the minister stated, as I remember it, that while some effort had been made to effect a sale, or that tenders had been called for, nothing had been done up to the time the estimates were before the committee.

Mr. GARDINER: The farm has not been sold; it has been rented to Mr. Friesian, who made an offer for it. The live stock has been transferred to other farms, and most of this stock is still in the province. I think by far the greater part was transferred to Melfort.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In the lease to Friesian is there any option to purchase?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) asked about rust-resistant barley. Could we have a statement as to what work has been done along these lines?

Mr. GARDINER: Some investigations have been carried on in connection with rustresistant barley, but they are not by any means completed. Certain types have been developed which resist certain types of rust, but we have not yet been able to obtain a variety free from leaf rust. Further work is being carried on in this direction.

Mr. WRIGHT: Are they being distributed commercially?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Why should $18,040 be paid for feed in connection with an experimental farm of 827 acres? Is it impossible to grow this feed on the farm?

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. member were to look over this farm he would see that a [Mr. G. K. Fraser.] considerable part is taken up with experimental work in connection with hedges and horticulture generally, while other parts are utilized for experiments in the production of grain crops. Herds of live stock of different kinds are kept for experimental purposes, and feed is required for these. The object of running an experimental farm is not to produce a certain amount of grain to feed the live stock; it is to consider the different methods of utilizing different crops and other work of like nature.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If feed grain is shipped from a branch experimental station, would it be treated simply as a bookkeeping entry, or is all this feed purchased from outside sources?

Mr. GARDINER: Very little is transferred, but when it is transferred it is treated as a book entry; it becomes a sale at one place and a purchase at the other.

Mr. PERLEY: What is going on with respect to investigations into new rust-resistant wheats? As the minister knows, certain strains of rust-resistant wheat run out after a period of years. Is this work being kept up? Is there anything in prospect? Have any experiments been carried on at the western experimental farms in connection with the production of beets for sugar? I understand that some experimental work was carried on last year in the Qu'Appelle valley and other places.

Mr. GARDINER: From the hon. member's knowledge of the farm which is in his own constituency, I think he knows that this work is being carried on more extensively this year than at any previous time. New strains of rust-resistant wheat are being developed continually. As has been stated, after a period of years some varieties of rust-resistant wheat go back to a position where to a certain extent they are subject to rust. New varieties and new strains are being developed continually to overcome any weaknesses in the varieties that have been in use.

Mr. QUELCH: What is the main objection to using Regent wheat? I notice from the government reports that it is a very heavy yielder and rust resistant, and yet the farmers are discouraged from using it.

Mr. GARDINER: Regent is a nicer looking wheat than Thatcher, and probably gives a better sample, but it is not as good a yielder as Thatcher. Many farmers prefer Thatcher because of the heavier yield and therefore higher return per acre. I think that is the real reason. Mr. HATFIELD: Have any experiments been made with Russian dandelion which has a high rubber content?

Mr. GARDINER: We are working on it this year for the first time. We have secured seed from the United States, and some of it has been sown at the experimental stations.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I notice that the services of the apiarist are being dispensed with, which seems strange in view of the expanding demand for honey.

Mr. PERLEY: What about beets?

Mr. GARDINER: There is selection work being done on sugar beets at the farms. I think what the hon. member has in mind is what we discussed last year with regard to certain checks being made on the growing of sugar beets in the Qu'Appelle valley. The only work being done in that direction is being done by the provincial government.

Mr. MacNICOL: Sometimes I have criticized the minister, but I am always pleased when I can give him a pat on the back. I want to compliment him upon the splendid experimental farm at Beaverlodge, Alberta. I happened to call there last summer and spent a couple of hours looking over what was being done in horticulture for the beautification of farms all through that part of Alberta, and experiments in producing all varieties of grains and vegetables. I was so amazed with what I saw that I made up my mind when I returned to Ottawa I would pat the minister on the back for the good work he is doing there.

Mr. GARDINER: Thank you.

Mr. STIRLING: Some time ago experiments were being carried on, the minister told us, with regard to finding a soya bean variety which would be suitable to the growing period of southern British Columbia and southern Alberta. How far has that experiment progressed?

Mr. GARDINER: As a result of the experiments which are being carried on we have two varieties, Pagoda and Cabot. They are both yellow beans that are produced, and they are being more widely distributed this year than ever before because we are desirous of producing soya beans to get a further supply of vegetable oils. We found that the seed supplied had been so completely taken up last spring, largely by people who were desirous of trying it out for themselves, that when we tried to get soya bean seed for sowing in connection with irrigation districts in western Canada we found it very difficult to obtain, and we could get only small quantities. Mr. STIRLING: Was any distributed in southern British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: There was no request made for distribution in southern British Columbia. They imported their own.

Mr. WRIGHT: These branch farms fill a very great need in the agriculture industry. I would call to the minister's attention the development in northeastern Saskatchewan, in the White Fox area, with regard to alfalfa seed. From five to six million pounds of alfalfa seed were produced, and there is a real need for an experimental station here to conduct experiments with alfalfa. It is a crop about which we have much to learn. One year the seed sets; another year it does not, and we do not know whether the cause is the weather. soil condition, or what. There is a small station at White Fox, but it is not on the real alfalfa type of soil. There was some thought last year of establishing an experimental station further west on the real alfalfa soil. I would urge upon the minister that something be done along that line, because alfalfa in that section represents probably 90 per cent of the farmer's livelihood, and in years in which there has been a total crop failure it has been necessary to distribute a good deal of relief. There is a real necessity for some further study in the production of this seed.

Mr. GARDINER: There are five illustration stations in that area. As my hon. friend knows, there is a certain type of soil, what is called grey soil, which is most suitable to growing alfalfa. Some of the stations are located on that soil, and some are located on the different soils in that area which, so far as we know, are not so well suited to growing alfalfa. We are experimenting with both types of soil, because it would be an advantage to be able to grow alfalfa on a different type of soil from that on which we are succeeding with it now, and it would also be a means of utilizing further land. Therefore we have stations on both types of soil. With the farm located at Melfort, which is not very far away from that district, and another at Brandon, it probably would be considered too costly to establish what might be known as an experimental farm in the White Fox area just to experiment with alfalfa alone. The work is being carried on through illustration stations largely.

Mr. WRIGHT: I realize that. I have been on several of these illustration stations, but they are small stations carried on by individual farmers. No extensive work is being done on them. While I would not advocate the establishment of a complete experimental farm in that area I think a little more technical work could be done on one of these stations, on one of which a full-time man could be employed to carry on this work, which is important to that section of the country.

Mr. GRAYDON: It would seem that in the White Fox area they are having the same difficulty in growing alfalfa that we had in our part of the country. For no special reason that any farmer can ascertain alfalfa will produce good seed for a number of years, then all at once a whole section will go completely out, and no decent seed can be obtained for a number of years. That happened on our own farm at home. Whole districts were affected in the same way. It is a problem which is general, I presume, throughout the east and the west.

Mr. QUELCH: To what extent has there been development of sugar beets, and what are the main obstacles to further development in order to take care of the sugar supply?

Mr. GARDINER: There has been an increase in Alberta and a decrease in Manitoba and Ontario. On balance I understand there has been a decrease for the whole of Canada.

What the hon. member for Peel states about alfalfa is perfectly true, and it is as a result of the experience we have had in the east that certain work is now being done in the White Fox country. We are experimenting with fertilization of the soil to see whether the qualities for producing alfalfa seed will be retained.

Mr. SENN: Are such experiments being carried on in Ontario? In my locality alfalfa is grown quite extensively, and we have had the very same experience which the hon. member for Peel relates. For some years we can get a good crop of alfalfa seed, and perhaps for two or three years it will be a failure. We have never been able to find out what the difficulty is. Have any experiments been carried out in the alfalfa-producing areas of Ontario?

Mr. GARDINER: I should have said in dealing with the west that the work has been carried on in cooperation with the agricultural college, which is a provincial institution. The work in Ontario is being carried on in exactly the same way, in cooperation with Guelph college, and the experimental work in connection with it is done in the same way, through illustration stations here and there in different parts of the province.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With regard to the sugar beet acreage, and the answer given, in view of the fact that Canada is on a sugar ration at this time could the minister explain why there has been a decrease in the sugar beet acreage in Ontario this year? Should we not be encouraging farmers to grow as much as they can?

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. GARDINER: There are two factors which enter into the matter. The labour situation has, of course, a great deal to do with the production of sugar beets, since labour is a very large factor, but there is this in addition. I understand from inquiries I have made that it is not so much a shortage of sugar which causes us to ration it-that is when you take the whole picture into viewas it is the shortage of shipping. There is very strong objection to using shipping for moving sugar from places where it probably is in surplus to places where there may be more or less of a shortage, and it is thought wise to ration sugar rather than to use up as much shipping as would be required to supply it. In our own case here, in the first place it would be difficult, with the labour which is available, to produce enough sugar to supply all our needs.

Mr. HATFIELD: That is all the more reason why there should be an increase in Ontario.

Mr. MacNICOL: You could not get the farmers to do it.

Mr. HATFIELD: Did the wartime prices and trade board have anything to do with this decrease in the production of sugar?

Mr. GARDINER: The main factor in that line is that they are alternative crops. When we guaranteed a price of $1.95 for soya beans, that had something to do with it. It is a crop, I understand, which can be grown with less labour, and probably the producers think they can make more profit. There was a transfer of acreage from sugar beets to soya beans, also a transfer of acreage from ordinary beans to soya beans, and also a transfer to corn, brought about partly by the feeding value of corn in the production of hogs and live stock.

Mr. PERLEY: Is there any increase in the acreage seeded to beets in Manitoba this year?

Mr. GARDINER: I would doubt if there is any increase this year over last year, but it should be remembered that last year a considerable part of the beet crop of Manitoba was not harvested because of the wet weather in the fall.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was asking the minister regarding the estimates for the experimental farm. Apparently the apiarist was not provided for. Have his services been dispensed with this year?

Supply-Agriculture

Mr. GARDINER: The chief assistant's position is vacant. He is transferred to one of the other departments. I should not have said he was transferred; he is doing work in another branch of our own department, the marketing branch.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Before the committee rose at six o'clock there was some discussion of sugar beets. It is true that we have been growing sugar beets in Canada and in Ontario for forty years. We have a capacity in Ontario for processing beets to the extent of about 45,000 acres. Wallaceburg had the first sugar factory in 1902, and that factory operated successfully every year until this year. This is the first year since that time that it is not going to operate. It has developed from a capacity of 600 tons a day to a total tonnage for processing now of around 2,500 tons a day. It has modern equipment. We should grow about 25,000 acres more of sugar beets this year than we are growing. Twenty-five thousand acres at about ten tons an acre, which would be only a very average crop, and about 300 pounds of sugar per ton, would give close to 750,000 hundredweight of sugar. We are rationing sugar, although there is not a definite shortage at the moment. In fact there are quite large supplies, but sugar is being rationed in order to conserve that supply. It is, however, quite possible and even probable that there will be a shortage before another year. The minister gave some of the reasons why the total acreage of beets is not being grown this year. He said they went into growing corn, soya beans and some other lines that did not take so much labour. That is true to a large extent. Nevertheless, if the sugar beet contracts had been offered to the growers a month or six weeks before on the same terms they eventually took, I have no doubt the total acreage of sugar beets would have been grown.

Under normal conditions we import about 80 per cent of the sugar we use in Canada. For years we have been advocating that the sugar beet industry be developed to take care of the situation that has now arisen. Most of our supplies of raw sugar came from countries that have now been cut off, and to-day we have only one source of cane sugar, that is Cuba and the islands round Cuba. That sugar must be carried by rail or truck from points in the United States to maintain our sugar supply this year, so that millions of dollars that would have gone into the hands of workers and producers in Canada will be 44561-295 diverted into long freight hauls, much of which would not have been necessary if this situation had been handled better earlier in the year. Shipping is very hazardous from Cuba to the Atlantic ports; there have been some heavy losses. The present situation should not be permitted to exist for another year. We should at least grow all the sugar beets we can process and handle.

It is true the finance department gives a subsidy or bonus of half a cent a pound which was taken from the excise tax and diverted to the sugar beet grower. But I repeat, if the contracts had been given in time and the matter handled properly we should have had a full acreage and tonnage of sugar beets this year in Canada.

Productive Service.

16. Compensation for animals slaughtered, $375,750.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to know the production of sugar from an acre of sugar beets.

Mr. GARDINER: Are we going back? About ten tons of beets to the acre is an average crop.

Mr. HATFIELD: How much sugar would those ten tons produce?

Mr. GARDINER: About 18 per cent of the tonnage of the beets.

Mr. SENN: Is it the policy of the government this year to carry on with the cleaning up of certain areas in connection with tuberculosis? What is being done in the district round Hamilton? I understand that the county of Brant is nearly finished and that the counties of Norfolk and Welland are under way, but what about the county of Haldimand? What is going on in that vicinity?

Mr. GARDINER: It will be remembered that in the first year of the war we tried to cut down our vote for this purpose. We have found it quite costly to maintain the service we were giving in areas in which a considerable number of the herds are under the accredited plan. Therefore we have attempted to bring in under this plan areas of that kind; we have been introducing municipalities in the west and counties in the east where the accredited herds are pretty well up in the total number of herds for the district. In addition, we have been attempting to keep up the checks that are made on the herds in areas already admitted, and under a supplementary estimate which will come down later on we are asking for an extra amount over and above what has been provided here to take care of some of the services for which we have not sufficient money at present; that is, to provide for some extra part-time service which was reduced to a minimum two years ago. I shall have the record in a moment with regard to the counties.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Before the discussion concludes with regard to sugar I should like to ask the minister if his department has looked into the possibility of using the sugar refining capacity of the maritime provinces in the refining of sugar from sugar beets. Within the last few months the large sugar refinery situated in Halifax, which has been in operation for many years, producing a large tonnage of standard sugar, has been closed down as a result of transportation difficulties. I should like to hear from the minister as to whether or not his department has investigated the possibility of raising sugar beets on the farms of the maritime provinces, so that the two refineries in that district, the one at Halifax and the other at Saint John, might be able to operate to capacity.

Mr. GARDINER: I would call attention to the fact that we are now on item 16; we have gone far beyond the item under which we discussed sugar beets, though we have gone back to it twice. However, with regard to these refineries in Nova Scotia, as my hon. friend knows they have been devoted to the refining of sugar cane, and that is not a matter which comes within the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. We have not been associated with that end of the sugar business in any way. With regard to the question of whether or not we can produce sugar beets in that section of Canada in sufficient quantity to keep those plants operating at full capacity, of course that is a matter to which we should give and are giving consideration; that is, the extent to which sugar beet production can be encouraged there. Up to the moment, however, the sugar beet production in that part of the country has not been sufficient to keep those plants operating at capacity.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Then may I ask the minister if his department has completed its investigation into the possibilities of producing sugar beets and refining the sugar in the two plants in the maritime provinces? Now that sugar is rationed all over Canada, this becomes a matter of importance. We have this refining capacity, and I should like to know whether there is any possibility of a large production of sugar beets in the maritime provinces which would keep this capacity employed. This is a very important development, important in the interests of the consumer, in the interests of the labourers who have lost their employment at the Acadia refinery at Halifax, and very important in that it may give the farmers of the maritime provinces another crop to grow.

Mr. GARDINER: As I said a few moments ago, our interest in the sugar beet industry in the maritime provinces has been purely experimental. We do work in connection with sugar beets at all our experimental farms and plots there, but so far as I know this department has had nothing to do with making any checks on the refining of sugar, and we have no data here giving any information with regard to experiments which may have been carried on in connection with such refining. Therefore I am not in a position to give any helpful information in that regard.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In ordinary times is it possible to grow sugar beets and produce sugar which can compete, as far as price is concerned, with sugar produced from imported cane?

Mr. GARDINER: A great many factors enter into that question. I do not pose as an authority on sugar production in Canada, and of course as far as we are concerned in the Department of Agriculture we are interested only in the product that can be grown on our own farms, namely sugar beets. But the problem which concerns those of us who live in western Canada in connection with the growing of sugar beets in peace time-which, after all, must be taken into consideration, since the present is an abnormal time-is largely that of the market we have for sugar. Our market is practically confined to the prairie section, as a result of the fact that the freight rate on sugar is fairly high. Sugar is a heavy commodity, and shipping costs are high. Therefore we cannot produce sugar to be shipped outside western Canada. There has always been some controversy as to whether we in western Canada should use nothing but beet sugar, in order to make possible the greater development of that industry. There are some who contend that you could not possibly get into the position where you would use beet sugar to the exclusion of any other kind, largely on account of people's tastes and what they think are necessities in connection with certain uses that are made of sugar. In any event a considerable part of the sugar used in western Canada is cane sugar, and probably that will continue to be so.

Mr. MacNICOL: For table use, too?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not competent to discuss all the phases of the matter, but I have had several memoranda prepared by officials who have gone to western Canada to investigate the situation. The general conclusion is that the amount of sugar that can be produced in western Canada is limited by the market which exists between Winnipeg and the mountains. On the other hand, as I remember the discussions that have taken place here-and I have attended many of them when delegations representing the beet sugar district in Ontario and the beet sugar district out around Raymond in Alberta have called upon us-the figures show that it costs a good deal more to produce sugar beets under irrigation in Alberta than to produce sugar beets under the conditions which exist in western Ontario. That is another factor which makes it impossible to ship sugar out of that area in Alberta to other sections of Canada.

Mr. RICKARD: Has the government given any consideration to compensation for Bang's disease, under item 16, and has the county of Durham had its second test for tuberculosis, as provided under section 15?

Mr. GARDINER: Haldimand has been admitted, but the tests have not been started there up to this time.

Mr. SENN: Is it the intention of the administration to begin them this year? I have been trying to find that out, because the question has been asked me a number of times.

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed that Haldimand is one of the counties in which it would be almost impossible, if not indeed impossible, to start inspection, under our present policy, because it requires all the money we have available under this vote to take care of retests in the counties to which I referred a few moments ago. Durham has not been retested.

Mr. SENN: Not the second time.

Mr. GARDINER: No. So far as Bang's disease is concerned, we are not paying compensation in connection with cattle slaughtered as a result of that disease. It is not the intention under present conditions to embark upon a policy of that kind.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has there been any serious outbreak of hog cholera in the past year? Two years ago in connection with this particular item there was considerable discussion as to whether the importation of pork from the United States had caused an outbreak of hog cholera which was occurring at that time. Since that time the importation of pork from the United States has pretty well ceased. I was wondering if there had been any connec-44561-2953 tion between the importations and the outbreak of the disease, or if the department had come to any conclusion in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no conclusive evidence as to whether the importation of hog meat from the United States introduced hog cholera, but the fact is we did have considerable hog cholera about that time. However, that has been cleaned up, and we have had no outbreaks of hog cholera in the last two months. It is presumed that it is fairly well under control at the present time.

Mr. MARSHALL: There is a reduction of $154,250 in the vote. What amounts were expended for the year ended March 31, 1942? The auditor general's report gives the figures only to the end of March, 1941. Could I have a break-down by provinces for 1942?

Mr. GARDINER: They are not yet broken down by provinces for 1942, but the total amount is $270,603.33. The reason for the reduction in amount is largely on account of the fact that we are making retests rather than opening up new districts. When we make retests, of course the number of cattle slaughtered as a result of finding tuberculosis is much smaller than when we are opening up new districts.

Mr. MARSHALL: The amount of the appropriation for last year was $530,000, of which $270,000 was spent. Therefore in reality this year we shall spend $100,000 more than was actually spent last year. Is that correct?

Mr. GARDINER: There was a big compensation last year for hog cholera and for other purposes which we do not expect to have this year. We are going to spend less in any event. We are not taking on as many districts as we did last year.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is this figure of $375,750 not a little exaggerated?

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed that in some of the areas into which we are going this year we anticipate very high slaughterings, and for that reason we expect this amount will be spent. We would hope, of course, that it might not be necessary to do so, but it would not be safe to start in with less than the amount appearing in the vote.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is it the intention before the end of the session to table the minister's report for the year ended March 31, 1942?

Mr. GARDINER: No; the report is not published yet for that year. I believe I did table at the beginning of the session the report for the preceding year. The one to the end of the last fiscal year is not yet published.

Item agreed to.

Supply-Agriculture

Production service.

17. Live stock and poultry, $705,572.

Mr. SENN: The live stock industry as such is undoubtedly one of the most important parts of the agricultural industry in Canada. If one looks at the estimates, particularly that part under which production services are listed, he will find that the three items covering health of animals, compensation for animals, and live stock and poultry total nearly $2,700,000, and the total amount to be expended is only $3,745,947. It is undoubtedly true, therefore, that the department realizes the importance of the live stock industry. However, it is difficult to discuss that industry, and particularly the production end of it, without saying something about marketing. They seem to go together.

Mr. GARDINER: The discussion could come under the vote for marketing. There is a live stock item at that point, and I believe that would be the proper place to discuss marketing.

Mr. SENN: I wish to discuss both ends of it, but if the minister wishes to have it the other way I would not object.

Mr. GARDINER: It would be better if we discussed production in relation to live stock at this point, and then discuss the marketing under the marketing item, thereby avoiding any overlapping.

Mr. SENN: It is difficult to keep them separated. I was going to say that there are certain factors such as the labour market and price which tend to increase production. I do not see how we can separate the two factors, and talk about one without having something to say about the other.

Mr. GARDINER: If it would facilitate matters I would suggest that we might pass these items on the understanding that when we come to live stock marketing we shall not be held absolutely to the item, so that anything in relation to the subject may be discussed.

Mr. SENN: So far as I am concerned I will not hold up the marketing item. If I were allowed to make a few observations now I would have nothing to say about it later. However, I am prepared to follow the wish of the committee.

I was pointing out that labour has a very great effect upon the production of live stock in both the dairy and the beef end of the industry, as well as in connection with pork and other types of live stock produced in Canada to-day. It is undoubtedly true that even yet the farmer is unable to compete in the labour market. The price he is paid for his particular class of goods does not enable him to pay the price he would have to pay if he were to secure the labour in the amount required to produce live stock, because, after all, the live stock industry takes more labour than any other part of agriculture, I believe, with the possible exception of fruit production.

We have not had a parity between farm prices and prices of other commodities for some length of time. In fact that is a condition which goes back for years. Little progress has been made along that line, because the natural laws which relate to the marketing of cattle and marketing of other classes of farm products are not allowed to be brought into operation.

Of late years, especially since the war commenced, a number of boards have been set up which have had to do with setting prices and supervising the production of live stock. I have criticized the membership of these boards because of a lack of producer repre-sentation. To-day I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) about a board which is being set up under the wartime prices and trade board in connection with the beef situation. Again we have the same position. The price will have an effect upon production as time goes on. I have no doubt that if I had been given the names of those who have been appointed to this particular board I would have found that the producers are not represented except through the officials of the department. They are all good men and I know many of them personally, but I cannot see why they would not represent the packers just as well as the producers. Yet on these boards there are packer representatives and representatives of the transportation companies. Where the packers are not interested directly, we find representatives of the buyers and dealers. I have criticized this practice from time to time, and I am sorry the min-ister has not seen fit to place representatives of the producers' organizations on some of these boards. They should not be placed on the advisory boards because those boards have no authority. They can advise, but they cannot make decisions. The decisions are made by the boards themselves.

Price ceilings have been established, and just the other day the minister stated that floors had been placed under certain commodities produced on the farm. That is true up to a certain point. Those floors, however, are not stationary and permanent; they change from time to time. While there may be a floor under an article, we find that from time to time there are fluctuations in the price which the farmer obtains. He does not get the same price every week for his hogs, and the same applies to almost all his products. It seems to me that this is a most unfortunate position, and it is causing a good deal of anxiety and ill feeling among those who are producing cattle.

The action of the wartime prices and trade board has undoubtedly discouraged produc-tion. I think it will be found that the whole cattle trade is in a hopeless muddle. A great deal of confusion has been created in the minds of the producers. These conditions are most unsatisfactory, not only because of their effect upon the cattle producer but because of their effect upon other branches of the industry. The officials of the department know that dissatisfaction and confusion exists, and an attempt has been made to rectify the situation by granting bonuses. Bonuses have been granted on cheese, milk and butter. The wartime prices and trade board has set up a food corporation to alleviate the situation which exists in Ontario and other parts of the dominion. This corporation will purchase cattle which otherwise would go to the United States market, and the cattle will be purchased at United States prices. I understand that the modus operandi is to have a shipment which may be destined for the Buffalo or some other United States market sent into the stockyards at Toronto or some other place. Then the cattle are valued by commission men at United States prices and handed over to the packers at Canadian prices. If I am rightly informed there is a difference of from $20 to $25 in the price.

The difficulty is to know whether the farmer reaps the benefit. It is quite easy for a drover to go into the country and tell the farmer that the Toronto or Canadian price is so much. Cattle are sold to the drover on that basis. He then applies for a permit to export the cattle, and an order comes from the food corporation that they are to remain in the country. He obtains the United States price, but as near as I can learn there is no way by which that extra price received is sent back to the farmer. That is a condition which should be carefully guarded against. In any event the packers are protected from loss.

This action on the part of the board has turned a sellers' market into a buyers' market. Up to the time the board placed a ceiling on beef carcases, producers of cattle were enjoying a sellers' market. They could sell with every assurance that they were getting the top price. But as soon as the order came down that the price was to be reduced one cent a pound on a certain date in June, another cent a pound on a certain day in July, it had the effect of bringing down the price of cattle some two weeks before those particular dates. I do not know whether that could be avoided. Supply-Agriculture

The packers have to slaughter and hang the beef for a certain length of time, and they paid a lower price on purchases made a week or two before the time when the price would be reduced to the butcher or the person cutting up the meat.

This provided a lever for the packers to beat down prices. If you go through the country you will find that there is no equilibrium so far as prices are concerned. One drover is paying a certain price; another drover is paying another price. They are buying cattle as cheaply as they can. They tell the farmers that the price of beef has been reduced by the board one cent or two cents and is going to be reduced still more. The result is that the farmer does not know where he stands.

There is another phase of the situation which is perhaps the worst of all. This spring quite a number of farmers who were short of help and who saw a good crop of hay in the offing went out and bought cattle at high prices before the wartime prices and trade board had issued any regulations. They bought these cattle in order to put them on the grass instead of harvesting the hay. When the cattle are about ready for sale the farmers are faced with this order of the wartime prices and trade board which reduces the price one cent a pound per month. The price has been reduced two cents a pound already. and by next month the reduction will be three cents. These farmers are going to lose money. That is why I say that price will have a detrimental effect upon the production of cattle in Ontario and other parts of the country.

Taken all together, our present set-up for the marketing of live stock, particularly of cattle, is haphazard and unworkable. It is simply a hand-to-mouth policy. The wartime prices and trade board are continually changing their rules and regulations. They do that in order to rectify some mistake that has been made, and almost as soon as that is done they find that things have become unworkable in some other direction. The result is that there is confusion not only among the farmers but among the whole trade. I would suggest to the minister that he take this matter carefully into his consideration to see if something cannot be done to relieve the men in the beef producing areas so that they can carry on.

Here is another situation which the farmer is fearing. I do not know whether his fears will turn out to be justified or not. After the price has got down, which will be in the fall months, to $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents below the level that formerly obtained, it will be allowed to correct itself again, just about the time the farmers in the east are purchasing their feeders for the winter. If prices are allowed to go up high again, the result will be that a great many farmers will not purchase western feeders at all. They have had their experience once. They purchased cattle this spring and are going to lose money on them, and I warn the minister and whoever may be responsible that the farmers will not stand for a repetition of that and that cattle will not be purchased in the quantities in which they should be purchased this fall to go on the feeding lots in the eastern provinces.

Mr. GARDINER: I would very much prefer that we defer the discussion of the subject opened up by the hon. member for Haldimand until we reach the item for marketing. I have a very good reason for asking this, because the particular officials who will check me on any figures I might use are not sitting in front of me at the moment, and I would much prefer to wait until I have Mr. Shaw here.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is being done to encourage the farmer to raise more sheep?

Mr. GARDINER: The plan is to attempt to increase the flocks by one million head through the cooperative arrangement made between the federal government and the provinces. The arrangement involves the federal government paying freight on ewes shipped from one part of the country to another in order to make them available to those who will use them for breeding purposes. The government is also supplying rams.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What is the situation to-day with regard to thoroughbred cattle? Have we many in the country? I know that United States buyers have been buying up herds throughout different districts. They have been in Peterborough county and paid big prices. There is no doubt that the farmer has benefited from that, but the choice cattle have gone over to the United States.

Mr. GARDINER: The registrations of beef and other cattle are increasing year after year. To give a few figures registered breeds of beef and dairy cattle numbered 66,060 in 1937. There was a drop from 1937 to 1939, when the figure was 41,822, but in 1940 the numbers rose again to 86,365, and in 1941, to 92,392. The figures for breeds of sheep were for 1940, 14,360, and for 1941, 15,432; and for swine in 1940, 12,660, and in 1941, 13,221. It will be noted that the number of pure-breds is very small compared with the total number of live stock in any one of these classifications, but the numbers are going up, not down.

[Mr. Senn.]

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Have you put any ban on the slaughter of pure-bred calves?

Mr. GARDINER: No. The figures would indicate that they are on the increase rather than the decrease.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is the policy with respect to selecting the best ewe lambs from the stockyards?

Mr. GARDINER: The methods are not the same in the different provinces. Each province is working out its own method of selection from whatever stock is available.

Mr. CARDIFF: Were any more areas accredited in the past year, or has that been discontinued?

Mr. GARDINER: We discussed the item with regard to that matter before the hon. member came in. I presume he refers to the T.B. free areas. We are taking in additional counties only where the accredited and supervised herds make up the greater part of those that will be inspected.

Mr. CARDIFF: The county of Huron had an application in for an accredited area. Would it be possible to get that through?

Mr. GARDINER: It would not be possible to get a new area opened up unless a very considerable number of herds are already included.

Item agreed to.

Production service.

18. Plant protection, $280,591.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the explanation of the increase in this item?

Mr. GARDINER: The increases are: for the Japanese beetle, $15,000; equipment, $6,000; supplies, $2,000; statutory increases, $1,718; making a total increase of $24,718.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the Japanese beetle?

Mr. GARDINER: The Japanese beetle attacks all kinds of fruit trees. It is a beetle which came in from the United States.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does the minister's department have to pay the extra tax which the Minister of Finance has imposed this year? In this item I notice the sum of $2,000 for telephones and telegrams, and in other items throughout the department are sums of $2,000, $4,000 and $7,000 for the same purpose. Will the extra tax make any difference in the minister's estimates?

Mr. GARDINER: The tax is paid. Of course it is a cross-entry.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know it is.

Mr. GARDINER: It will be small in comparison with the whole amount; it will not affect it materially.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Can the minister make a statement under this item with regard to flax production in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: It will come under No. 19.

Item agreed to.

Production service.

19. Plant products—seeds, feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, including grant of $18,900 to Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $519,582.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the hon. member for Danforth reference to fibre flax or oil flax?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It is oil flax. While the minister is procuring the information I might make a short general statement, and perhaps he might be able to answer the entire problem. A survey was made as to the possibility of taking care of a flax crop which might approach double the ordinary production, and the feeling was abroad that there would not be enough equipment available to handle the flax and press it, to make the oil cake on the one hand and the linseed oil on the other. The survey was made some six or eight weeks ago, and the question I want to ask-apart from the first one, namely what the production is going to be this year-is, whether or not the equipment, a large portion of which has been idle during the last three or four years, has been inventoried, and whether or not those who were processors of the flax are ready to handle the crop and turn the oil into the channels which are in need of that product. A general statement should be made. This is a very important item.

Mr. GARDINER: There is an increase. We have not the exact figures, but there are approximately one and a half million acres as against around a million last year. That is, they are up by about 50 per cent instead of 100 per cent. We did not double the acreage.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Has the minister any information as to the prospect of handling this crop by the processors with the equipment which is here?

Mr. GARDINER: The increase in acreage, it will be recalled from the discussions last year, was intended to provide for shortage of supplies of oil, not only on this side of the line, but possibly on the other side as well. There has not been the increase in plants which would make possible the handling of all the flax which will probably be grown this year in Canada, but it has been understood from the beginning that any of the flax which could not be processed here would be processed on the other side of the line.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I want to take this opportunity of protesting as strongly as I possibly can with regard to the conduct of those charged with the responsibility of issuing priorities on machine parts for the processors not only of flax seed but of other products which are producing oil from fats in Canada. To-day, within the last two or three hours, the priorities division, on being asked to give priorities to bring into this country equipment of a kind that could be used for the pressing of such products as flax for oil, applied for a higher rating than P.D.1A, which is so far down on the list that it will be impossible to get this equipment repaired and put into condition during this calendar year. I ask the minister in his official capacity and through his department to urge the priorities division to give priority on equipment of a kind which is going to handle this crop for the benefit of the agricultural economy of Canada.

The matter is even more important than that, because, as many hon, members in the chamber, including the minister, know, this shortage of oil is very serious. It is not going to get very much better during the next twelve months, and every possible avenue which will permit of more production should be followed through in the interest of the country. I want to register a protest that the priorities division are not giving consideration and the right-of-way to this necessary industry in this time of war. Of course hon. members know why we are short of oil. The whole Pacific production, which I think the minister will agree is about 75 per cent of world production, is out of our hands and under the control of the axis powers. Our short supply will become more serious, and everything possible should be done. I see an hon. member from western Canada rising to his feet. I hope that when he takes his place, following me, he will ask that consideration be given to having some of this processing done west of the great lakes, so that the stock food value of the oil coming from the pressing of flax will find a ready market right in that part of Canada where the production is going on. By this means more of the finishing of our cattle might be done in the west, and the necessity avoided of sending so many cattle to the east, because, as the hon. member for Haldimand says, when they come here they may find a poor market. We should have a rather better balanced economy, and the matter should be attended to now that the need has arisen since Japan has taken over the great oil production areas.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken that priority should be given to machinery for oil processing, and I also agree with him as to the desirability of the work being done in western Canada, where most of the product is grown.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): And where there is plenty of coal, cheap fuel.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes, and where the product can be used to advantage. What I want to draw to the attention of my hon. friend is this. He asked as to the production figures of flax for this year. The figures already mentioned as regards acreage are probably right-three and a half millions this year as against two millions last year. But we must remember that last year throughout western Canada there was not a heavy yield of any crop, and the yield of flax would also be below the average. This year, with the moisture conditions which obtain in western Canada, the average yield will probably be much higher than the long-term average. Instead of having this year one and threequarter times the amount of flax we had last year, there is every probability that we shall have two or three times the amount of last year's yield.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): How many million bushels would be my hon. friend's estimate ?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Well, at three and a half million acres, I would say that there is every possibility of a yield of somewhere in the neighbourhood of twenty-five million bushels of flax.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): That means that we must have the equipment and machinery to handle it.

Mr. SENN: During seeding time this spring there was a great shortage of mangold seeds throughout Ontario. I suppose that is partly on account of the fact that mangold seed came largely from Belgium and other European countries. Has that shortage been taken into account and any provision made for another year?

Mr. TRIPP: If flaxseed cannot be processed in Canada, will permits be given to individuals to export it? Mr. GARDINER: That is not handled through the Department of Agriculture. Export permits will be given through the Department of Trade and Commerce and have been given, I imagine, under the direction or control of the wheat board.

Mr. PERLEY: That was understood, was it not, when the order in council went through fixing the price?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): If such export permits are given, I hope the wheat board will see to it through the wartime prices and trade board that a fair proportion, perhaps two-thirds of the oil produced, is returned to Canada; otherwise it will be necessary for Canada to refuse export permits to a degree and to process her own flax in order to keep an adequate oil supply in this country.

That again emphasizes the importance of some pressure being brought to bear on the priorities division that has to do with machinery used for oil extraction.

I want to put on record how poorly matters are handled in priority department 1A. The requests you make are not attended to. You call, get no reply; the individual in charge is not there. When I pointed out the urgency of the matter and said I would have to take it to a higher place, the stenographer answering the telephone replied, "Well, go ahead and do so". It is not conducive to the national interest to have service of that kind in a situation which is so important at this time.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry that that item also comes under another department. I might say, however, that priorities in connection with steel and other commodities which are necessary for production are of necessity discussed at all times with the United States, and there do arise difficulties in connection with getting the amount required in Canada, as there are difficulties in providing the amounts necessary in the United States.

As far as the arrangement with regard to flax is concerned, and the oil derived from it, we have an understanding with the United States that we do get a certain supply of soya bean oil into this country. In return for that, we allow a certain part of the flaxseed oil to remain in the United States. I am not in a position to give the exact proportion, but it is an understanding which has been worked out on the basis of the facts as they exist.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What is the situation with regard to vegetable seeds? The truck farmers in Peterborough riding and others are afraid they may not have enough for next year.

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

Mr. GARDINER: It will be remembered that at the beginning of the war we set up an organization to try to obtain in Canada the garden and other vegetable seeds required in this country which we previously obtained from Europe. We hope this year to have mangel seed to the extent of 251,250 pounds—

Mr. SENN: Canadian grown?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, as against an amount for 1941 of 212,714 pounds. That is what we believe our requirements to have been in 1941. It is hoped this year to have a production of 251,000, and therefore we are well in advance of the requirements.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What about carrot, onion and truck farming seed generally?

Mr. GARDINER: Last year our requirement for carrot seed was 73,000 pounds. This year we are producing about double that, and therefore there will be no shortage as far as that is concerned.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In connection with fertilizer, I understand an order in council has been passed that the present subsidy is to be continued in the eastern and western provinces. Last year the fertilizer subsidy was for the production of certain farm produce only, as far as the western provinces are concerned. If my memory is correct, it was to produce coarse grains and pasture. We in British Columbia, and particularly in the Fraser valley, are especially interested in the production of corn for ensilage. In the production of corn for canning about 85 per cent of the value goes into ensilage and 15 per cent for canning. Under the last order in council we were held not eligible for the subsidy on fertilizer; the ruling was that our corn was not produced for feed only. We of the Fraser valley are most emphatically of the opinion that our corn for canning is a by-product, the principal value is the ensilage. Since I understand that the subsidy on fertilizer is to be or has been reintroduced for this year, will the ensilage be taken into consideration as if the corn is produced purely for feeding?

Mr. GARDINER: The fertilizer subsidy was given to increase the amount of feed for the production of dairy and meat products, as part of the policy of increasing production. When we examined into the quantities of fertilizer available it was found that we could not go beyond the classification of which I have spoken, including pasture lands for the same purpose, without depleting our supplies of fertilizer and thus reducing them for the objective we have in mind. In other words, there is a shortage of the essential 44561-296 Supply-Agriculture ingredients that go into the making of the fertilizer, and we are using it only in connection with those crops which we consider essential to the production of feed. If we were to go into such things as corn for canning purposes, of course that would lead us into gardening generally, the growing of different kinds of crops for direct food purposes, and we have not considered it advisable to go into that field.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: With all due deference I should like to correct the minister. Last year he did that very thing; he provided the subsidy to encourage the growing of corn for canning purposes, and that very thing is being done under last year's act. What I am suggesting is that the minister should pay the subsidy on fertilizer used to grow corn for ensilage purposes. I am sorry the minister has been misinformed. Last year the subsidy was paid in connection with corn for canning.

Mr. GARDINER: If anyone is getting away with that, we did not intend him to do The provision now covers ensilage corn; SO. the term used is field corn, but it is the intention that it should include corn grown for ensilage purposes or corn grown as food for live stock, that is, fodder corn. This has been done under an order in council passed early last summer, which is now being extended to cover the period to December 31, and I presume it will be extended even beyond that. At the moment, however, the order in council provides for this subsidy to December 31, and our main objective in extending the date was to put fertilizer on pasture lands this year in the period between July 1 and December 31.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If I am correct in my understanding of what the minister said, the subsidy was intended for that very purpose, to increase the production of corn for ensilage?

Mr. GARDINER: To increase the production of food for live stock, and ensilage is food.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then am I correct in understanding that this subsidy will be paid in connection with corn principally used for ensilage? That is exactly what I am asking for. Am I correct in that understanding of the purpose?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not fully acquainted with what they do in the Fraser valley of British Columbia, from which the hon. member comes. If they are growing corn for canning purposes, picking off the corn and using the remainder for ensilage, then I do not believe they would be able to collect the subsidy on the fertilizer. But the subsidy may be paid on fertilizer put on land on which corn is grown which is used for feeding purposes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is not quite clear to me yet, and I should like to have this straightened out, because I took it up with the minister last year. The Fraser valley is the only place in British Columbia, so far as I know, where corn is grown for canning purposes, and the point I want to impress upon the minister is that of the protein value of that corn, 85 per cent is used for ensilage purposes and only 15 per cent for canning purposes.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Is that out of the same field?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Just a moment. They grow a lot of wheat in Moose Jaw, and they get a bonus for everything they can grow. In the Fraser valley, according to the information I get, not only from the farmers but also from the canners, 85 per cent of the value of the corn grown goes into ensilage and only 15 per cent for canning purposes. If we are to be penalized in regard to the subsidy, if I may put it in that way; if it is to be paid only in connection with fertilizer used for corn grown for canning purposes—

Mr. GARDINER: No, for feeding purposes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Just a moment; I am getting a lot of advice here.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member is asking for information, and I am giving it to him.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then I want it to be authentic. I do not think the minister follows me. We will call this domestic corn. To a farmer in the Fraser valley 85 per cent of the value of domestic corn is in ensilage, but if I am not misinformed, in order to get the subsidy it must be domestic corn. Am I correct in that?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know what the hon. member means by domestic corn.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Well, corn grown for canning purposes?

Mr. GARDINER: It is not paid on corn grown for canning purposes; I have said that several times.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Well, that is not according to the statement made under the minister's own signature last year.

Mr. GARDINER: Why not read the letter, and then we shall have the information?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Just a moment. We endeavoured to get the subsidy on the fertilizer we used for the corn produced in the Fraser valley last year. We were not given that subsidy, and we were told over the signature of the minister why we did not get it. We were told that canning corn or domestic corn, as I call it, which I think is the term the department used for it—

Mr. PERLEY: Golden Bantam.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Very well; Golden Bantam. I took up the matter with the minister last year, and I was informed that we could not get it because this corn was not produced principally for ensilage purposes. Chilliwack Canners and Canadian Canners could not get it, so what chance had a private member? The minister's department maintained that this corn was produced primarily for canning purposes. I am stating that in the Fraser valley 85 per cent of the value of the corn produced goes into ensilage and only 15 per cent into the cannery. I hope I have made myself clear now.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and that is exactly what I said three minutes ago.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then can I take it from the minister that corn produced for the canneries—I know some of the Ontario members will realize what I am getting at of which 15 per cent of the value goes for canning purposes and 85 per cent for ensilage purposes, is entitled to the subsidy on the fertilizer?

Mr. GARDINER: I can only say that we have an advisory committee in the province, set up by the provincial people, who agree with the interpretation we have placed upon it, just as other committees in other provinces have agreed, and we are following that out. The interpretation is just as it has been recited, that we do not pay the subsidy on the fertilizer placed upon land used to grow. corn for canning purposes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is not clear to me yet. I am not particularly interested in the interpretation of the provincial government; I am elected not as a provincial member but as a federal member. I am asking the minister if corn produced for canning purposes, which in the Fraser valley is used for ensilage to the extent of 85 per cent of its value, will be entitled to the subsidy.

Mr. GARDINER: I have said "no" three times.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): In view of the fact that the potash which formerly came from Germany is now cut off, what steps has the department taken to supplement our supply of this essential ingredient? Also, is any propaganda going out by way of literature from the department to make sure that agricultural communities do not waste wood ashes, which are perhaps the other source of supply.

Mr. GARDINER: Most of the supply, in fact I think practically all we are able to obtain from anywhere outside Canada, to make up for the shortage of potash which previously came from Germany, is coming from the United States, and I believe to a great extent from New Mexico. But a plan has been worked out whereby the amount of fertilizer which is available will make it possible for us to do what we propose to do under the order in council.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Are we having any success with the million dollars invested in the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company at Trail?

Mr. GARDINER: We have not the information here with regard to that.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Has the department made any investigations as to the possibility of obtaining a potash supply in the salt deposits at Malagash, Nova Scotia? It has been reported from time to time that there is an extensive potash deposit there awaiting development, one of the largest deposits in Canada, comprising millions and millions of tons. They have been operating it for a number of years, and are hopeful that it may be developed as a war industry. Materials such as chlorine and other chemicals could be produced there for war purposes. Potash would be one of the substances which might be obtained if a plant were put in there. Has the minister's department made any inquiries as to the possibility of developing a refinery there for the production of potash, for fertilizer purposes?

Mr. GARDINER: My information is that we are in no serious difficulty with regard to potash supply. The supply now available is sufficient to look after our requirements. But I might add that this information could be obtained to better advantage from the Minister of Mines and Resources. Any development in that connection which takes place would take place under the direction of that department, rather than the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Would the minister not agree it would be far better from the Canadian point of view, as well as the point of view of the industry, and especially from the point of view of the people in 44561-2963 eastern Canada who are entitled to more interest in the development of their industries, if this product were secured within Canada from the deposit there available, rather than have it imported and necessitate the sending out of exchange and the giving of employment to people in another country who do not need it? It would have the further advantage of creating an industry in war time which would have a post-war value of great importance to Canada, and would be of particular importance to that locality.

Mr. CARDIFF: I believe the subject of feed would come under this item. In my constituency we are very much interested in feeds. We grow considerable quantities of coarse grains and feeds, which we consume. During the year we buy large quantities in carload lots from western Canada. We appreciate the fact that in the past year the dominion government has paid the freight on carload lots coming from the west, and we hope that policy will be continued.

We are also interested to know that a ceiling has been placed on coarse grains. Because of that fact it is impossible for us to get what we call cheap grain, other than screenings. We could use great quantities of screenings, if we could get them at the price we think we should pay. If the western farmer were getting anything worth-while for those screenings, one could realize that perhaps there might be some reason for the price being where it is. But in these times, when we are engaged in such a fight for our freedom, I do not believe commission firms' charges and handling charges could bring the price of the screenings to the price we have to pay before we get them. The western farmer pays the freight on the screenings to the head of the lakes, and when it reaches that point it is taken off him as dockage. It does not cost anybody anything that far. When we get it in our part of the country it costs us at least $25 a ton, or thereabouts. Why is it that screenings are as dear as that when we receive them in eastern Ontario?

Mr. GARDINER: Again we are discussing a matter which does not directly come under my department. As I remember the figures the last time I investigated the matter, the value of screenings at Fort William was about $8.50. That was the price for screenings, just as they are taken from the grain. After that, of course, they are cleaned and graded, and then they are finally shipped to Ontario and ground into feed. By the time the screenings reach Ontario the price, which includes freight —or at least did include freight until the federal government began to pay that chargeis increased. Then there is the further fact that a considerable percentage of it has been cleaned out, and does not appear in the product which is purchased at the higher price here, as compared with the $8.50 at Fort William.

The main reason why the feed would not be shipped back to the farmer in western Canada would be that there is not sufficient value in it to warrant the payment of freight for taking it back there. The value is really put into it by cleaning it and having it ground and supplied to the farmer, who can utilize it as a mixture in connection with other feeds. The western farmer would probably have enough of the grain from which the screenings had been originally screened, without having it shipped back.

I would say, however, that during the last war-and I am not sure about this one; the hon. member for Qu'Appelle may know more about present conditions-we were credited with our screenings from the grain, when the grain was at a very high price. At that time we were credited with certain amounts for screenings which were taken out of our grain at Fort William. I imagine wheat has not risen to a price sufficiently high to make it pay at this time. There is the question as to whether the price will be high enough in the future. However, we have had returns, and there are certain returns which can still be secured. For example, a man can get his grain cleaned at the elevator without sending it to Fort William. Many of the local elevators have cleaners in them. If the farmer cares to draw his grain to an elevator which has a cleaner in it, he can have his grain cleaned at that point, and save the freight on the screenings to Fort William. However, because there are so many factors involved, and because I have not before me the prices either at Fort William, in the west or in the east, I would not care to say more than that in the matter.

Mr. DONNELLY: I think when the dockage is over 3 per cent the farmer is paid for it.

Mr. CARDIFF: Would the minister care to say where he gets his figure of $8.50 at the head of the lakes?

Mr. GARDINER: I got it from a farmer from the middle of a meeting in London.

Mr. CARDIFF: Maybe one of the western members would give an answer?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I should hate to disagree with the minister's figure, but I have not yet heard of screenings being worth $8.50 a ton in western Canada. Recleaned screenings would be worth that, perhaps; that is, refuse cleanings, with the valuable parts cleaned out. I can remember during the last war when screenings sold in western Canada for $20 a ton. As the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) says, when we are docked over 3 per cent on our grain we are paid for the screenings. The refuse screenings from the elevators are recleaned and sold, but I question if they would be worth over $8.50 per ton.

Mr. CARDIFF: I do not mind paying that to the western farmer if he has it coming to him; I would rather pay it in that way than by way of bonus, but the fact remains that he does not get anything for it and he pays freight on it to the head of the lakes. As far as I figure out, it does not cost anybody anything.

Mr. DONNELLY: The farmer does not pay for having his grain cleaned. When it is under 3 per cent it goes to the man who cleans it.

Mr. CARDIFF: It does not cost $8.50 a ton to clean it.

Mr. WRIGHT: The farmer in western Canada pays for the cleaning at the head of the lakes.

Mr. PERLEY: I think the matter should be referred to the agriculture committee next session.

Mr. STOKES: A great many dairy farms in eastern Ontario contain large areas of permanent pasture, land which cannot be cultivated and upon which the dairy herds get most of their early summer sustenance. In many areas a small, low-growing weed is practically crowding out the grass, and I should like to know if any study with regard to the eradication of this weed and the improving of these pastures, has been made. The average dairy farm of eastern Ontario contains about 50 per cent of land of this type. The farmer may not always have the lush grass he has this year and may be faced with a serious shortage of pasturage.

20. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $65,000.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): At this time an item of this sort is really not called for, and I should like to ask the minister if consideration should not be given to dropping it. These buildings house race horses and so forth, and I am sure the communities where these places are located will forgive us if we do not go on with these buildings under war conditions. I notice the minister has supervision of race-track betting across Canada. Last year the amounts wagered totalled $21,-355,037; the pari-mutuel commission and gate receipts amounted to $2,189,749, and the prize money, $1,051,824. Surely they could provide their own requirements out of those amounts? In the communities where there is no race-track, this work could be left out. Does the treasury of Canada get any portion of the $2,189,745 gate receipts? Does the dominion put up any of the prize money of $1,051,824?

Mr. GARDINER: This amount of $65,000 is not, strictly speaking, a grant to fairs in the sense in which the hon. member has referred to it. We were making considerable grants to fairs up until two years ago, but the first year of the war we cut out all ordinary grants. These amounts are to take care of commitments made over a period of years which have not yet run out for assistance in connection with buildings. Racing is regulated by the Department of Agriculture, and a charge is made for all the services performed by the department. I am not in position to state what revenue is obtained from the race-tracks because that information can be obtained only from the Minister of Finance or by consulting the records of the Department of Finance.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did I understand the minister to say that no grants are being made to fairs, such as the Canadian National exhibition?

Mr. GARDINER: There are no grants for the operation of fairs, but there are some grants in connection with the operations of agricultural associations.

Mr. MacNICOL: In one way I am sorry that that is so. The Canadian National exhibition will not be in operation this year. and a number of handicapped and crippled men who have acted as gate-keepers and so forth for a number of years will not have employment. They are in the greatest distress. These men looked forward to having two or three weeks work in the fall looking after gates or ticket offices, to obtain a few much needed dollars.

Mr. GARDINER: The larger fairs, particularly Toronto, have been closed as a result of the use of the buildings by the military people. That was the beginning of the difficulty, and it has developed to such proportions that it was thought unwise to continue the fairs.

Mr. PERLEY: According to the particulars on page 65 of the estimates only four fairs will benefit. Are there any fairs in Saskatchewan and Manitoba that will receive grants outside of the grants for building purposes?

Mr. GARDINER: There are no outstanding grants. Any grants that were made in connection with buildings at those fairs have been completely paid out. The only ones left are enumerated here.

Mr. McNEVIN: The buildings at the Toronto exhibition are almost entirely used by the Department of National Defence. I do not think we should take any action to discontinue these grants.

Mr. GARDINER: They are a matter of contract as between the federal government and these boards. We must continue to pay them; that is why they are there.

Mr. PERLEY: The supervision of racetrack betting should be considered. The minister's report, at page 159, contains a table giving certain information in this connection by provinces. The total amount wagered in the dominion was $21,355,037; the parimutuel commission and gate receipts were $2,189,745 and the prize money amounted to only $1,051,824. According to the table Saskatchewan does not go in too much for this kind of sport, because the people of that province wagered only $429,894; the people of Ontario wagered $12,859,315; the people of Quebec, $1,427,549 and the people of British Columbia, $3,387,588. A lot of this should be cut out. It is just a disgrace, a graft, so to speak, when one considers the amount that was paid in and the amount paid out in prize money. There must be something wrong. Do I understand that there is no revenue from this supervision?

Mr. GARDINER: There is sufficient collected to pay the costs of supervision. These races are operated not under legislation of this department but under the criminal code. All we do is to supervise the holding of the races and the betting that goes on there. We supervise the pari-mutuels.

Mr. PERLEY: Do they require a permit from the minister's department before they can hold a race-meet?

Mr. GARDINER: They have to comply with certain conditions which are set out in the legislation. They must be a recognized chartered association before we issue a permit.

22. Marketing service administration, $94,457.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This is the item that provides for the services that were performed by Doctor Allen of Great Britain?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understand that a recent appointment has been made of a successor to Doctor Allen. What is the type of work to be done by the commissioner in Great Britain?

Mr. GARDINER: It will be recalled that this position was created about four years ago, and a year or so before the war Doctor Allen was appointed to the position three years to a day before he lost his life crossing the ocean to become active in his position. The reason for establishing the position was that we desired to have one man in Britain in charge of the different officials we had there to check cargoes and the nature of the food products we were shipping to that important market. Doctor Allen acted in that capacity until the war started, and for some time after. He returned to Canada during the war in order to make known to the people here what the requirements of Britain were and the standard of commodities they required. After performing that service here he was on his way back to Britain to take up his further duties there, those duties having to do largely with the inspection of cargoes in order to see that the commodity arrives in Britain in a proper condition to supply that market satisfactorily with the food products from this side.

Mr. Robertson, who has been appointed to take his place, was the live stock commissioner for Saskatchewan. He is a returned man of the last war and has given long service in connection with the live stock industry of Canada. He is going overseas to take the position which was vacated through the death of Doctor Allen.

Mr. WRIGHT: There was a good deal of complaint last year of the quality of our bacon, that it was shipped too green. Has that been overcome? Are there any complaints this year?

Mr. GARDINER: Some very small quantities of bacon shipped to the old country may not have been quite up to standard, but so far as our records show, almost all, if not all of it, was reported to be excellent.

Mr. WRIGHT: There was a report last year that some six million pounds were not up to standard, and there was a good deal of complaint about it.

Mr. GARDINER: So far as we know, there was no such amount as that which was below standard.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is a reference in the annual report of the department to discussions which the minister had last fall with the British ministry of food. Would the minister care to make a statement with regard to those discussions? Might not the British ministry of food be prepared to accept Canadian wheat at a price more in line with the prices of other commodities that are being bought by Great Britain under the terms of our billion dollar gift? I can think of no good reason why the British ministry of food wants to buy our wheat at such a very low price when it knows the cost of producing commodities here in Canada. Is there any possibility of reconsidering the price which is to be paid for Canadian wheat in view of the fact that Canada is making a billion dollar gift?

Mr. GARDINER: The marketing of wheat comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the minister of that department is sitting here waiting for his turn. The proper time to bring the matter up would be when my colleague's estimates are before the committee.

24. Dairy products, $365,098.

Mr. McNEVIN: I wish to make a few remarks on the marketing of whole milk. I am well aware that under this item there is a dual responsibility and a dual control inasmuch as in Ontario, particularly, we have a provincial milk board which has substantial authority and jurisdiction in this matter. The Department of Agriculture is also interested. Then the wartime prices and trade board control the retail price of milk.

When speaking on June 3, with regard to dairy products, I referred to the fact that there was a satisfactory arrangement with respect to the price of whole milk and cheese, but that a similar situation did not obtain with respect to butter. At that time no public announcement had been made with regard to the discontinuance of the subsidy of 30 cents per 100 pounds for whole milk produced for retail consumption in the cities. If I remember correctly, when this bonus was put on it was expected that during the months in which the bonus would be paid, the distributors in the various areas affected would inaugurate certain economies whereby, on the discontinuance of the bonus. the producer would not be expected to bear the full weight of its withdrawal. The bonus was discontinued as of the first of June, and unfortunately these economies had not been put into effect. Therefore the full weight of the deduction has fallen upon the producer of whole milk.

The base price set in the base period would return to the farmer 1.93 per 100 pounds at the farm for 3.5 milk. That is taking into consideration that 15 per cent of the milk shipped is paid for at a lower price. I think since that time the provincial milk board has authorized an increase in the price of that 15 per cent up to 1.95, which is the price for milk for manufacturing purposes. That, of course, is an advantage, but only a very slight advantage. I am quite sure that, as the matter stands at present, there is widespread dissatisfaction on the part of milk producers throughout the whole of Ontario with regard to the present set-up.

However, I want to point out this fact. I think the price of milk on the farm for manufacturing cheese will net the producer from $1.75 to $1.80 for 3.5 milk, so that at the price of $1.93 the producer of the whole milk for city consumption has an advantage of only probably about 15 cents per 100 pounds over the producer of milk for manufacturing into cheese. I think it is an undisputed fact that, for a number of reasons, the producer of whole milk is entitled to a substantially wider spread. For example, the cheese factory takes the entire production, whereas the producer of milk for retail in the various urban centres can deliver only up to his quota, and then he must do something else with the surplus. I think also it is generally recognized that milk produced for the wholemilk trade requires a great deal of additional care in order that it may reach the consumer in first-class condition. Then, again, the producer of whole milk must maintain a quota throughout the entire year, whereas the producer of milk for other kinds of dairy produce can produce greatly increased quantities at certain seasons of the year and greatly lessened quantities at other times of the year. Therefore, taking the whole situation into consideration, I think that at a not very distant date some definite action should be taken to correct the situation with respect to the production of milk for city consumption, or I am of the opinion that the supply will be inadequate. I know that at a recent meeting of representative milk producers within this category there was a lot of talk about a strike. It is possible that that feeling may grow. Therefore I call attention to these facts in order that full consideration may be given the matter. Doubtless the supply will hold good under present pasture conditions during the month of July, but it is quite likely that in August and September the supply will be short unless some action is taken.

As to economies, we know, for example, that the price of bottles has been passed on to the consumer. He must pay if there is any wastage of bottles. Extra deliveries have been discontinued. As a further item of economy, as far as the distributor is concerned, milk cannot be sold on credit; it must be sold for cash.

In the light of these circumstances I want to say as a milk producer that, while my individual relations with the dairy to which I have shipped for about twenty years have been very satisfactory, producers of whole milk under present conditions are not satisfied collectively. I believe that during the last war the average price paid to the producer for milk was, from 1915 to 1918 inclusive, around $2.80 per 100 pounds, and that milk retailed at about 12 cents a quart. Under present conditions the quart price in many of these markets is 13 cents; yet the producer is getting, including his transportation costs, approximately $2.35 for 3.5 milk.

I may have something further to say on this matter when the estimates of the Department of Finance are under consideration. But I ask now that provision be made at an early date to increase the present price by at least 40 cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. SOPER: Would it not be possible under this item to do something for dairy butter producers? The creamery butter producers are bonused or have a subsidy now, but the dairy butter producers are not getting that. Dairy butter production in Ontario is from 20 to 25 per cent of our production; in western Canada, I understand, it is higher. While I know it is quite a difficult matter to deal with, possibly it could be handled through the creameries. These people are living in most instances a considerable disstance from creameries, and the creameries are not inclined to extend their routes on account of shortage of trucks, curtailment of tires, and other considerations, and those who produce dairy butter are not equipped to deliver cream to the dairies every day. I certainly think they are entitled to some protection in this matter.

Mr. FURNISS: I should like to say a word in support of what has been said by the hon. member for Lanark. The district of Muskoka, which I represent, contains about twenty-two townships, and throughout the district there is not a creamery. It might appear that there is not sufficient milk to warrant the establishment of a creamery, but that is not so. The fact is that the farmers are scattered throughout a wide area and the distances are so great that it does not pay to gather the cream to the creamery. These people are not allowed to participate in the bonus. I was home a couple of weeks ago and was talking to a hard-working man and his wife. They had just completed their having. I asked him if he had a man, and he said "no". His wife, who was standing behind him, said, "I am the only help he has. Besides helping with the hay I churn sixty pounds of butter every week." That woman is not able to participate in the bonus and is deprived of about $3 a week. I understand that about 100,000,000 pounds of dairy butter are made in Canada. A considerable portion is used on the farms, but at least half of it is sold, and the loss to the farmers who are not able to get their cream to the creameries amounts to about $2,500,000. I wish to say on behalf of the farmers and farm women of this country that, apart from the armed forces, no other persons are making a greater contribution to the war effort than are farmers, farm wives and children, and if anything can possibly be done to allow these people to participate in the bonus it should be done. To my mind it would have been an easy matter if the price could have been allowed to rise 5 cents so that everyone could participate.

Mr. CARDIFF: I do not wish to repeat what the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, has said. I think he covered the ground very well. I should like to mention one point in connection with the bonus paid on milk. It was put on at a time when I believe the minister will admit that if something had not been done, there would have been a great falling off in the supply. The result was that many farmers not only maintained the herds they had but bought other cows, with the result that many of them purchased milking machines. These machines are expensive. About the time they thought they were going to get a little cheap feed to help to pay for them, the bonus was cut off and they found themselves without sufficient returns to finish paying for the machines. Others who wished to buy machines to help to solve the labour problem in the summer found the firms selling these machines cut to a certain quota, with the result that such people could not buy the machines. They could not get help or buy milking machines. I realize that the government tried to take care of these people, because it increased the quota 200 per cent from 1940 to 1942, which looked reasonable at the time.

[Mr. Furniss.]

But when one considers that in the last six months there were probably more milking machines sold than in the last ten years, he will realize the serious condition in which some people found themselves. They find themselves now with their herds on their hands and their summer work in progress, and they are unable to get help. Some time ago I placed a question on the order paper with regard to this matter. The question was:

Will the government give consideration to having mechanical milkers removed from the restriction placed upon them by an order in council dated January 19, 1942?

The answer in part was:

The quota on mechanical milkers was set at 200 per cent of any manufacturer's or importer's sales in 1940,---

Which at the time seemed reasonable.

-whereas the average for all units was 84 per cent. In establishing this percentage for milkers consideration was given to the essentiality of these machines as well as the existing labour shortage.

If the minister would consider having that restriction removed to allow these people to buy milkers to help overcome the shortage of labour, it would be a fine thing.

Mr. FAIR: May I add a word in support of giving a bonus on dairy butter. I do not think it necessary to go into details, because the government knows very well the position of the producers of dairy butter.

Mr. GARDINER: The subsidy is paid, of course, under the wartime prices and trade board. The difficulty they find is being able to be sure that any subsidy paid on dairy butter will go to the producer. The butter is purchased at so many places and marketed in so many different ways that it is hard to work out a plan under which payment of the subsidy can be made. The suggestion made by the hon. member for Lanark is one worthy of consideration, but that would not by any means cover all those concerned. It might lessen the number who are more or less discriminated against, if it is desired to use that term, as compared with patrons of creameries, but it would not entirely remove the difficulty.

There are no complete or official figures with regard to the production of dairy butter in Canada, but we have always kept estimated figures and they are something like this: Creamery butter, 286,000,000 pounds. That figure is as authentic as possible for figures of this kind. The estimated production of dairy butter across Canada is 94,000,000 pounds. That is to say, between 20 and 25 per cent of the butter production of Canada is estimated to be dairy butter. Much of that is consumed right on the farm and does not enter the market at all. It has been found difficult by the wartime prices and trade board to work out a plan under which the payment can be made. It was hoped that it would be possible for a considerable percentage of the people who are now making dairy butter to send their milk to the creameries. Of course we know there are certain areas where that is impossible. Generally speaking, however, it is hoped farmers will be able to do that and get the advantage of the six cents a pound butterfat subsidy.

Mr. FAIR: If that is the only hindrance, I would suggest asking the western farmers to work out a plan.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sure the wartime prices and trade board would be pleased to have a plan submitted.

Mr. FAIR: Is it guaranteed that the western farmers will get the bonus if they provide the plan?

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member will have to submit that question to them.

Mr. KINLEY: This matter is of interest to the small farmer. My experience is that if you raise the price of creamery butter you immediately raise the price of dairy butter. Farmers come into town, find out the price at the store, and usually sell their butter just under the creamery butter price. It seems to me that the bonus is reflected in the price which the consumer pays for the creamery butter.

Mr. GARDINER: The subsidy is not in the price paid by the consumer. The price to the consumer is the same as if the subsidy had not been paid. The subsidy is paid through the creamery to the producer of the butterfat.

Mr. KINLEY: That is rather a discrimination, is it not?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, that is the question which is raised.

23. Agricultural economics, $96,935.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I believe we skipped item 23. I understand the department has carried on a good deal of work in connection with land utilization in different parts of Canada. During the past ten years, as a result of the drought and depression, I think at least 20,000 families have been established in northern Saskatchewan. Many of those settlers are on sub-marginal lands. With the prospect of 250,000 additional people being needed in industry within the next year, now would seem to be a good time to take action to move some of these people from the submarginal areas. We are now experiencing the difficulty that many expected in the earlier stages; some of the settlers after spending three or four years on inferior land are moving away, and now we have a very small group responsible for maintaining schools and other social services. With the great shortage of labour, it would seem there would never be a better time than now to take action to see that these people are enabled to move to other parts of Canada.

Would the minister say something about the machinery available to make use of the land utilization services that have been carried on, so that the Department of Labour, for example, might look to the areas in Canada where people are on sub-marginal land and the possibilities of having them moved to other places where they can find employment? Many of them are engaged on very small units, operating ten or fifteen acres of land, and I can think of a great many other ways in which they might use their energies now to assist the war effort. Could the minister make any statement on this question?

Mr. GARDINER: Most of the activities referred to were carried out under a separate vote which is not now in the estimates. When it was in, it came under the special items, where the estimate in regard to prairie farm rehabilitation now appears. Under that vote we are still carrying on certain activities, in that we accept from the provinces the definition of submarginal lands, and then we do form some of those submarginal lands into pastures and assist in moving the people out. But I do not think that is the problem which the hon. member has in mind. There is at present a vote under the Department of Labour, I think starting with $60,000 at the beginning of the war and going up to $100,000 this year, for the purpose in the first instance of taking people who desired to move from just such areas to Ontario, which desires farm labour to be moved here if that is at all possible. That item was put in the estimates for the purpose of assisting such movements from the west or anywhere else to this province, or from one part of the province to another. Very little of the money was spent the first year; I believe a good deal was spent last year, and I think more will be spent this year. My understanding is that either the Minister of Labour has signed an agreement with the province of Ontario or the agreement has been negotiated and is practically ready for signature, and that the plan is to enter into certain arrangements with any other provinces that desire to do so. I have not the terms of that agreement before me at the moment, but no doubt the Minister of Labour will have them when his estimates are under consideration. The intention is to encourage and assist provinces to move labour about within the provinces, and, where necessary, to move it from one province to another, in order that any surplus labour now on small holdings such as have been referred to, where a proper living cannot be made, may be made available to other areas where there is employment. In general terms that is the plan.

25. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, and grants, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $108,350.

Mr. MARSHALL: I think it very unfair to compare an estimate of $127,197.12 for the year 1941-42 with an estimate of $108,350 for 1942-43. In order to obtain a true picture we should have the amount actually expended under this estimate in 1941-42. Is the minister in a position to give the exact figures in that connection.

Mr. GARDINER: It will be recalled by hon. members that we have an act which provides for these expenditures. Under that act we agree to pay 30 per cent of the cost of cold storage. Of that we agree to pay half in the first year, the other half being divided into four payments. The fact of the matter is that we announced as a matter of policy, I think two years ago, that we were not going to undertake any new cold storage obligations. Therefore the amount voted last year was only sufficient to take care of previous commitments, and of course the amount this year would not be exactly the same for the reason I gave a few moments ago, that half the total amount is paid the first year, and the pay-ments are very much reduced in succeeding years. I am told that this was just the amount necessary, and that the whole amount would be paid out.

I should say that this policy has been reconsidered and that there are now under consideration supplementary estimates which will be brought down at a later time by the Minister of Finance and which will have to be discussed when they reach this committee. This is one of the items for which we have decided to provide an estimate in the supplementaries. The vote will not be as large as that of previous years, but we are finding that there is a shortage of cold storage facilities across Canada, on account of the fact that such large quantities of food are being shipped to Britain. At times our cold storage facilities are filled [Mr. Gardiner.] to capacity, and we could make use of more. Therefore we are resurrecting this vote and putting in an amount to take care of a certain limited number of cold storage plants. I am not at liberty at the moment to state exactly what the amount will be, because it has not been finally passed by treasury board and council.

Mr. SOPER: I notice two very large items here, one for $23,000 to the Trenton Cold Storage Limited, and one for $56,000 to the Winnipeg Cold Storage Company Limited.

Mr. GARDINER: Those were two cases where construction is still going on, and the first payments amount to half of the 30 per cent we contribute. That is why they are particularly large this year.

Mr. WEIR: Having regard to the comments of the minister and his reference to a supplementary estimate in connection with assistance to cold storage plants, I should like to refer to another feature of preserving foodstuffs; that is what is called the quick-freeze method. As I understand it, no assistance has so far been given to this process. There is, however, a considerable development going on in connection with it, particularly with regard to fruits. As I understand it, under this process fruit is preserved by quick freezing and kept in that condition without the necessity of using sugar, which, of course, is an important consideration at the present time. If this policy is going to be reconsidered in the light of more recent developments, and having regard to what the minister has already said as to the necessity for added assistance in this regard in relation to the war effort, I wonder if at the same time he would consider making use of this policy to assist in the development of these quickfreezing plants throughout the country. I have in mind more particularly the type of plant that might be developed in communities on a cooperative basis. Of course I recognize the fact that at the present time we are stymied, as it were, because of the rulings of other branches. I presume that, for the present at least, the priorities will pretty well eliminate any possibility of the immediate construction of plants of that type. However, I do think it of sufficient importance to be worthy of consideration, and I should be obliged if the minister would keep it in mind.

26. Fruit, vegetable and maple products and honey, including grant of $5,000 to Canadian Horticultural Council, $523,520.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to invite the minister's assistance to the vegetable growers in certain outlying parts of Canada: first, in northern Ontario north of Haileybury, on up as far as Cochrane, about parallel 50, and west of Cochrane. There are many areas in which large quantities of vegetables could be grown, but most of them would only decay because there is no place to ship them. I have been wondering if the department has ever considered a scheme whereby a small cannery could be erected in that area, and the canned vegetables sold to the large mining companies in that district. The same applies to northern Manitoba, and particularly to the constituency of the Minister of Mines and Resources. I have in mind the area of the Pas, about the 54th parallel. There are some of the finest lands in the world there, a million acres of it, just west of the Pas. T have been over it, and in that area I saw the finest of vegetables, among which were sugar beets.

The farmers upon whom I called, and who showed me their vegetable crops, remarked that if there were some way of getting their produce to the mines at the north it would greatly help their position. Apparently they have great difficulty in getting their produce up to Flin Flon and to Sheridon. There is great opportunity now, because there is quite a development I believe along the Hudson Bay railway.

I have been wordering if the minister would consider, first, doing something to assist the farmers in northern Ontario to market their vegetables, either after canning or in some other way, and if he would do the same in northern Manitoba, in northern British Columbia and in northern Alberta where that splendid experimental farm at Beaverlodge has been established. The experimental station there is doing a great work in all that area, and I would assume that it is because of that experimental farm that vegetable growing there has become such an important industry.

At Dawson Creek, Pouce Coupe and Sweetwater, and all through there one finds very fine areas of splendid land, but no place to dispose of vegetables, with the result that too much goes to loss. I remember stopping at Peace River, about the 56th parallel, in the constituency of Peace River, and I remember that on the day I arrived there they were showing the vegetable products they were growing in their vicinity. It was almost incredible to see cabbage weighing twenty-two pounds, and turnips of such a tremendous size. Not only were there magnificent vegetables, but grapes in abundance. To my great amazement I saw as fine grapes on that market as I have seen grown anywhere. While I was in the town members of the board of trade asked me if I would place their predicament before parliament.

That day I saw a large truck of the very finest of tomatoes, which had been ready a few days before to ship to Edmonton. However, owing to the dreadful state of the roads they could not be taken away, with the result that they had rotted. I was told that the same thing had happened to cucumbers. There had been hundreds of baskets of cucumbers permitted to rot because they could not be taken to the market at Edmonton, which is in fact their only market. I promised myself that when these estimates were before the committee I would ask the minister if some consideration could not be given to northern Manitoba, northern British Columbia and that fine area near and west of the town of Peace River, where the land seemed perfectly adapted to the growing of vegetables. I promised to ask if the minister's department would not consider some action whereby farmers in those districts who raised quantities of vegetables might find some way of disposing of them, either through the erection of a small canning factory-perhaps it may not be an economical proposition-or through some other means. However, those people are pioneers, and it is too bad to see the result of their hard labour rot on the trucks because it cannot be carried to market.

If there were small canneries in those areas, northern British Columbia products could be sold along the Alaska highway to the thousands of men who are on that road; northern Manitoba product could be sold to the mines in that vicinity, and the Peace River product shipped out. I would ask the minister to do something to assist the farmers in those areas and in other areas with which I am not at present familiar, but which I may visit this year.

The farmers in outlying areas are pioneers who perhaps deserve more assistance than the farmers immediately adjacent to cities, such as those in the constituency of the hon. member for Peel. The farmers in that constituency raise vast quantities of vegetables which they have to take only a short distance to the county town, where quantities of vegetables are purchased and to the communities along No. 2 highway. Those which cannot be disposed of in that way go to either Hamilton or Toronto.

Because the farmers in the outlying areas are pioneers I do urge that something should be done for them to enable them to dispose of their vegetables properly, even if it is necessary for the department to erect or to assist in the erecting of small canneries.

Mr. GARDINER: I would say at the outset that there is one difficulty at this time, and that is to obtain tin with which to begin any kind of canning operations. Only yesterday I was waited upon by a very considerable delegation from Ontario who were trying to make sure that they would receive even a percentage of the tin they required in the past, in order to carry on their canning operations this year. We shall probably experience some difficulty in that regard. Therefore that is one practical difficulty which stands in the way at the present time.

There is under consideration at this time the question as to whether food can be supplied out of the Peace River country, part of which is in British Columbia and part in Alberta, to the Alaska highway; and in that connection we are considering the supplying of not only vegetables but meats as well. I do not know just what plans can be or will be worked out, but the matter is under discussion and consideration.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear the minister say that.

Mr. GARDINER: The difficulty, of course, in connection with canning in outlying areas in order to sell the supplies outside those areas is the old difficulty of producing commodities of that kind in quantity and marketing them in quantity. It would obviously be impossible for them to put up surpluses and ship them out of areas of that kind into areas where there are larger populations and where there are canning plants which are producing at a rate cheaper than the plants in the outlying areas can produce, especially when they have to add shipping charges for the longer distances to the greater areas of population.

In certain very limited areas in Canada and in much greater areas in the United States plans have been worked out under which canning is done in the homes or in small community ventures, to supply those communities themselves. In the United States these ventures are promoted by women's organizations. I recall that when the farm women were here last winter quite a number of them who came from the United States spoke of that as one of the most important works being done by their organizations in that country. I do not know whether it is because Canada is newer, but the fact remains that we have not found it possible to develop the idea to as great an extent. There seems to be some reason why it is more difficult in Canada. It has been tried in a number of provinces, but it has not gone as far as we would like to see it go.

The main problem I believe is that, first, of having sufficient quantity in a community [Mr. MacNicol.]

to warrant the establishment of a factory: and then even if there is the quantity and the factory, there is the further problem of competing with others who are producing in areas such as those immediately adjacent to Toronto. Hamilton, Winnipeg or other smaller cities farther west. It will be realized by the hon. member who has just made the suggestion that some difficulty would be experienced if the products had to be shipped out. I quite agree that there are some possibilities in connection with making supplies available to the works along the Alaska highway and to the mines in the immediate vicinity. I really think most of these possibilities could be overcome by local organizations where the amount canned was not so large as to warrant establishing a factory.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): While I do not want to delay the proceedings of this committee unnecessarily, I feel that I should say a word on this item. This item covers one branch of the work of the Department of Agriculture which has suffered considerably in 1939, 1940 and 1941. I refer to the apple-growing industry in the different provinces of Canada. I have had the pleasure of working in close contact and cooperation with the fruit growers of British Columbia, with the fruit growers of Nova Scotia, with the pomological society of Quebec and with the Ontario fruit growers' association. Having had that close association, I should like to offer the sincere appreciation of the apple growers of those provinces to the minister; to the deputy minister; to Colonel Wheeler, the fruit commissioner; to Mr. Conger, and to the various inspectors and departmental associates who have given of their time and thought in order to protect the apple-growing industry which had become a war casualty.

I do not know whether it is fully appreciated, but the apple grower cannot take advantage of a diversion of crops. An apple orchard produces only one crop and is a lifetime investment. It is only because of the foresight and the cooperation of the gentlemen I have mentioned that the apple growers of Canada were able to survive in those years of depression caused by the cutting off of our export markets by the war. It is anticipated that arrangements for 1942 will continue these good results. I want to thank the minister and his departmental heads for the fact that this grant to the Canadian Horticultural Council is being continued. This council, formed in 1916 under the secretaryship of Major Leslie Burrows, has been one of the finest agencies for dealing with the problems of the fruit and vegetable industry. At all times these problems have been directed to the minister and his officials. I hope the committee will forgive me for taking up time in order to place these few words of appreciation and gratitude upon the record.

Mr. WRIGHT: During the base period last year there was a wide variance in the price for which honey was being sold in western Canada. Certain of the cooperative honey producers in western Canada had made agreements with the wholesalers for the sale of their product. Others who waited a little while to make their final agreement got better terms. As a consequence, prices varied considerably during the basic period, and an anomalous position was created as between Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Has the position been cleared up? In northern Saskatchewan we have one of the largest honey cooperatives in the province. I believe they handle about 50 to 75 per cent of the honey, a large part of which has been going to the export markets. An order in council has been passed closing the export market, and I should be obliged if the minister could make a statement on the marketing of honey?

Mr. GARDINER: There have been negotiations with Great Britain for the sale of our honey, but it is a little difficult to make arrangements for the shipment of this product because there is a market for it in Canada at a price higher than the British feel like paying. In other words, this commodity is consumed here in considerable volume at prices higher than we could obtain elsewhere. The hon. member referred to the fact that selling prices were not the same during the basic period last year. That is one of the problems before the wartime prices and trade board. It is somewhat similar to the problem that exists in connection with milk and other commodities. It sometimes happens that a commodity is not sold at the same price in all communities, or even in all parts of a certain community, because of certain undertakings that have been made. The question is being considered by the wartime prices and trade board, and an attempt is being made to arrive at a solution of the problem. This does not come under the Department of Agriculture, although our officials are consulted with regard to it.

I want to say to the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario (Mr. Fraser), that the Department of Agriculture and I as minister greatly appreciate the associations that have existed between the horticultural council and the department. I had thought that if the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) had been here I might have referred to the remarks he made about the marketing of beef and other products, to the effect that there should be producer representation. Since I have had the privilege of being Minister of Agriculture the one group of farm producers who have maintained ideal relationships between the department and their industry are those people who are associated with the horticultural council, and particularly the apple boards. They have not asked the department or the government to be represented in certain places. They set up an organization of their own; they have made known their needs and seen to it that the department at all times knew what their organization thought ought to be done. They have worked consistently at the task of taking care of the interests of their producers. They have not wasted any of their energies in other directions. While the thanks of the growers of fruit, and particularly the apple growers, have been extended to the departmental officials and to myself as minister, I must say that a great part of the credit is due to the fact that the industry has been so well organized under the council. They made their needs known from the first days of the war. I think they found the officials of the different departments ready to sit down with them to work out their problems. The problem could not be dealt with entirely by the Department of Agriculture. The Department of Finance played a considerable part in the negotiations, and also the Department of Trade and Commerce when the problem was associated with trade outside Canada. That organization at all times has been well informed not only with regard to their own industry here but also with regard to the possibilities of marketing their products. They have stayed with the job until they, in cooperation with our officials have worked out plans which would be helpful.

I am sure hon. members will agree with me that we have heard very little complaint from the apple growers across Canada in spite of the fact that the earliest war problem in all of the different branches of agriculture came in the apple industry. The apple growers had been exporting 50 per cent of their crop to Britain and were told in the very early weeks of the war that they could not depend upon exporting any more apples to the British market. While Britain took 50 per cent of her requirements that year, she took none at all the next year, and she took some the following year. The information given to us by the British government was that Britain did not want our apples and did not wish us to expect to be able to market them in the British market during the war, but she has come in from time to time and taken some of them. In view of all these difficulties I think there is a lesson for all of us who are interested in agriculture in the splendid way in which this business has been handled through cooperation between the producers as represented by their boards and the departments, as the hon. member for Northumberland states it has.

Mr. STIRLING: I should like to present my own thanks to the minister for the way in which he has referred to the Canadian Horticultural Council. I feel sure that the recognition which he has given this evening will be greatly appreciated by the many associations which go to make up that council.

This grant which the government is paying annually is but a fraction of the revenues of the council. I cannot state accurately how many associations there are now as members of the council, but I will hazard a guess that it is between thirty and forty, and each of these associations, whether they be apple growers, or small fruit growers, or flower growers, or whatever they are, makes large contributions to the horticultural council. So long as I have been a member of this house, in my endeavours to represent the fruit growers of the part of Canada that I represent, it has been of very great assistance to me to be able to turn to the information always available through the secretary of the horticultural council.

I should like to add this also, that the negotiations which the minister has carried on, particularly with Nova Scotia and with British Columbia, have been greatly facilitated in that he had to deal in both those parts with boards which were set up originally under the Natural Products Marketing Act. Although that act came to a sad end, the boards persisted in the excellent work they had been doing. The functions of the fruit board in British Columbia are now being carried on for this purpose of cooperating with the dominion government, and the functions which they carry out are carried out under an order in council of the War Measures Act. I very much trust that with this information it will be possible at some not very far distant date to resuscitate the marketing act under which such boards will be perpetuated.

Mr. RICKARD: I should like to endorse what the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario (Mr. Fraser) has said. Several times I have given credit to the Minister of Agriculture, the officials of his department and those connected with the horticultural council for the work they have done in connection with the apple grower, but I think we should also give credit to the hon. member for [Mr. Gardiner.] Northumberland, Ontario, because I believe that no man has had a keener interest and spent more time and energy in trying to do his part for the apple growers than he, and I should just like to put that on record.

Mr. GARDINER: I want to endorse what has just been said. The hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, is, I think, as well informed with regard to not only the growing of apples but also the barrelling of them, and the making of the barrels—

Mr. RICKARD: And the selling of them.

Mr. GARDINER: —and the selling of them as anyone in Canada, and he has been of great assistance. I should say, too, that in what I said with regard to apples I had special reference to the boards that have been mentioned.

Mr. WRIGHT: Have any regulations or orders in council been passed with regard to the marketing of honey this fall, and if so, what are they?

Mr. GARDINER: That is entirely under the wartime prices and trade board, and I would prefer it to be discussed under the appropriate item.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have received a number of letters regarding a rumour that large quantities of honey were sold to the liquor interests. Can the minister say whether this valuable food can be purchased by the distilleries to be used instead of sugar?

Mr. GARDINER: The use of honey for industrial purposes is being restricted by the wartime prices and trade board to the same quantity as was used last year. Therefore it would not be possible to have any increased use of honey for liquor purposes this year over last.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would it be possible to buy honey and use it for liquor purposes instead of sugar?

Mr. GARDINER: There could be no increased use of it as a substitute. That is the idea they have in mind, to prevent honey from being used as a substitute, thus making it possible to put more sweet into commodities than the regulations provide for.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Queens): We have heard a great deal about apples and other agricultural products. I represent Queens, a constituency in the smallest province in Canada. I think every hon. member will admit that Prince Edward Island produces the best potatoes and turnips grown anywhere in the world. I should like to say to the Minister of Agriculture and his department that I think we have the most efficient inspection department of anywhere in Canada. The certified inspection department is headed by Mr. S. G. Peppin, who is well known to the department, and he and his staff carry on very efficiently. Mr. C. E. Shaw, head of the table stock inspection, and the staff under him, certainly understand their business.

I have been connected with the potato business for the last twenty-five years, growing, grading and shipping. Without boasting I might mention that I organized the table stock potato inspection service in Prince Edward Island about twenty years ago, and about that time the farmers went into the growing of certified seed and table stock on a fairly large scale. A few years ago our province produced nine or ten million bushels of potatoes in one season, which was very creditable for a small province like Prince Edward Island. It was not an unusual sight in the fall of the year to see eight or ten large steamers, each carrying from 150,000 to 200,000 bushels of potatoes from Prince Edward Island to Cuba and south American markets.

I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture to cooperate with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and see what he can do in helping to provide steamers for the shippers to carry our products to south American markets. I understand from the large shippers that it is almost impossible to get a large steamer to take our seed there.

I am sure our people appreciate everything that is being done by the department to encourage and assist in the growing of potatoes.

Mr. PERLEY: I notice in the minister's report—since a little apple sauce is being passed along right now—there is an item that a new plant has been established for the manufacture of apple sauce. It has been greatly expanded and can produce three thousand cases a day, and the total output was 150,000 cases. The minister might tell us where the market is for this apple sauce, and whether we in western Canada are likely to get any of it. It was apple juice last year; now it is apple sauce.

Mr. GARDINER: The plant is, of course, carrying on in accordance with the agreement which we made with the apple growers, and a considerable amount of apple sauce has been made. It has all been disposed of, most of it to the army, and the product has been found very acceptable.

Mr. SOPER: I understand that a product known as apple coffee is put on the market. Does the minister know anything about that? Supply-Agriculture

Mr. GARDINER: Apple coffee is to be made in a plant which has been established out on the Pacific coast, and which, I believe, is practically complete.

Mr. STIRLING: It is at Vernon, is it not?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think any of the product has been put out, except in an experimental way.

Mr. STIRLING: It is not on the Pacific coast.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not on the coast; it is in the coast province, at Vernon. The plant is not quite completed, but I believe it will be turning out the product in a short time.

Item agreed to.

Mr. GARDINER: I wish item 29 to stand, and to take items 32 and 33 if the committee will permit.

Mr. PERLEY: Before we take up these special items, I wish to ask the minister with respect to an item in the budget items, Votes and Proceedings of June 23. On page 6 of the appendix is an item at the very top, under the heading, "Statement of expenditures by major categories and by departments for the last five fiscal years," and then it gives an estimate for agriculture for this year amounting to $8,437,000. I wonder whether, before we get to the special items, the minister could give us a break-down of that. It was not taken up when the Minister of Finance was dealing with the matter.

Mr. GARDINER: Those are the items that we have just gone through. The break-down would be of that item.

Mr. PERLEY: Does that include the special items?

Mr. GARDINER: No; it includes all but the special items. It is reported here at the bottom of the estimates: Ordinary expenditure, $8,771,000; special $9,725,000.

Special.

33. To provide for assistance for the replacement of maple production equipment, $50,000.

Mr. HAZEN: I made some inquiries about this item when the estimates were up last year or the year before—I have forgotten which year it was—and the facts are not clear in my mind, but if I remember correctly the minister said that this amount was paid under some agreement which had been made with, I believe, the maple producers of the province of Quebec and that it was to extend over a period of years. I am sorry that I have not the details of his statement before me, but what I have in mind is this. If there were an agreement of that kind, why has the amount been reduced this year by $25,000? How can it be reduced if there were such an agreement?

Mr. GARDINER: The committee will remember that some years ago it was found that there was lead poisoning in the maple products produced from the province of Quebec and from the neighbouring states. Much of the product was being shipped to the United States, and they were protesting these shipments, so that an investigation was made and a process developed whereby certain equipment could be provided from which lead poisoning would not find its way into the product. The government of Quebec, this government and the producers entered into a three-way agreement which was intended to extend over a period of some three or four years. Our proportionate amount to be paid was about $300,000 a year. The province was going to pay a similar amount, and the producers were going to be responsible for a small amount in order to replace the old equipment with new. The war came on after we had been working at that for one year; the necessary material with which to make the new equipment is not available, and accordingly the plan has not been gone on with to the full volume of activity which we expected. This amount is what we expect to be able to spend this year under all the conditions existing. If it were not war time we would be asking for considerably more.

Mr. HAZEN: Does this lead poisoning come from the sap itself?

Mr. GARDINER: It comes from the equipment. Those who are familiar with the gathering of sap in the forests of the east will recall that the old buckets used to rust; they were just ordinary tin and became very badly rusted. Some person developed a new product that would not rust, and it appears that this product was covered with a coating of lead which found its way into the sap. The sap was allowed to stand under certain conditions in the buckets, and a very small percentage of lead poisoning got into the maple syrup. The result is that those who are careful of food supplies, to see that they are absolutely pure, have been insisting on eradicating that difficulty. It was to assist in that that we had undertaken this provision.

Item agreed to.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS

CONSTITUENCY OF STANSTEAD—REFUSAL OF LEAVE TO APPEAL ANNULMENT OF ELECTION OF R. G. DAVIDSON

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to make a statement in the matter of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act and the election of a member of the House of Commons for the electoral district of Stanstead, held on March 26, 1940.

On June 30 last I received from the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada certified copy of judgment of said court setting aside the decision of the trial judges of the superior court of Quebec and declaring the petition in the matter of the election for the electoral district of Stanstead should be maintained, and the election of the respondent, R. G. Davidson, for the House of Commons, should be annulled. I tabled the judgment, and it is set forth at length in Votes and Proceedings of that day, pages 441 to 451.

On July 3, 1942, I was served a notice by the agent of the respondent's solicitors that a motion would be presented on behalf of the respondent before the presiding judge in chambers at the Supreme Court building in the city of Ottawa, on Thursday, July 9, 1942, at ten-thirty of the clock in the forenoon, or so soon thereafter as counsel can, for an order staying the execution and all other proceedings herein so as to permit respondent to apply for leave to appeal to His Majesty's Privy Council.

On July 6, 1942, I was served with a copy of a petition for special leave to appeal to His Majesty's Privy Council praying that His Most Gracious Majesty in council will be pleased to exercise his royal prerogative and order that the petitioner shall have special leave to appeal from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada of June 26, 1942, and that His Majesty may be graciously pleased to make such further or other order as to His Majesty in council may appear fit and proper.

In view of these proceedings I did not issue my writ for a new election, awaiting the final disposition of the motion before the Supreme Court of Canada to be heard on July 9 last.

On July 21, 1942, I was served with a certified copy of the judgment of Mr. Justice Hudson refusing the motion made before him on July 9 last. In his judgment Mr. Justice Hudson points out that His Majesty's Privy Council have consistently refused such applications for leave to appeal. There is one feature of these proceedings which does not commend itself to me, which infringes upon the immunities of the House of Commons in its relations with the courts of justice, and that is the practice sought to be established of serving on the Speaker notices of court proceedings.

When a court of justice renders a judgment affecting a member of parliament in cases which parliament has empowered it to try, the registrar or clerk of that court is bound by law to certify that judgment to the Speaker. That practice should not be departed from when the house has to be apprised of a court decision or court proceedings with respect to one of its members. Such notification should be certified to the Speaker by the officers of that court instead of service being made by the solicitors.

I now table the certified copy of the judgment of Mr. Justice Hudson, which will appear in Votes and Proceedings of this date.

I considered carefully and thought it proper to have legal opinion as to the steps which I should take to bring the matter before the house.

Under the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, chapter 50, section 68, the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada certifies to the Honourable Speaker of the House of Commons the judgment of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada reversing the decision of the trial judges, and also certifies as to the matters and things as to which the trial judges would have been required to report to the Honourable Speaker had their decision not been appealed to that court.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada was in the following terms:

Under Section 59 (a)

This court was of the opinion that no corrupt or illegal practice had been proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge and consent of the said Robert Greig Davidson, the candidate declared to have been elected at the said election, or by his official agent, Robert Bouchard.

Under section 59 (b)

The following persons have been found by the supreme court of Canada to have been guilty of the corrupt practices set opposite their names, as appears in the reasons for judgment given in support of the decision of the court:

The names and nature of offence appear in Votes and Proceedings of 30th June last, page 442; I need not read them.

Under section 59 (c)

The supreme court of Canada came to the conclusion that corrupt practices, on the part of the agents of the candidate had prevailed at the election to which the petition relates, to an extent sufficient to warrant the annulment of the election. Under section 59 (d)

The supreme court of Canada did not find that the inquiry into the circumstances of the election had been rendered incomplete by the action of any of the parties to the petition, or that further inquirv as to whether corrupt or illegal practices had extensively prevailed was desirable.

I call attention to paragraph (c) of said section 59 which requires the court to report to the Speaker—

. . . whether corrupt or illegal practices have, or whether there is reason to believe that corrupt or illegal practices have extensively prevailed at the election to which the petition relates.

If the court states that such practices have prevailed, then section 71 of the said Dominion Controverted Elections Act provides that no new writ shall issue for a new election in such case except by order of the House of Commons.

Certified copy of the judgment of the supreme court certifies as follows, as I have already read:

Under section 59 (c)

The Supreme Court of Canada came to the conclusion that corrupt practices on the part of agents of the candidate had prevailed at the election to which the petition relates, to an extent to warrant the annulment of the election.

In my opinion, therefore, section 71 of the said act governs the subsequent proceedings. That section is as follows:

When the trial judges or the Supreme Court of Canada in their report on the trial of an election petition under this act, state that corrupt or illegal practices have, or that there is reason to believe that corrupt or illegal practices have extensively prevailed at the election to which the petition relates, or that they are of opinion that the inquiry into the circumstances of the election has been rendered incomplete by the action of any of the parties to the petition, and that further inquiry as to whether corrupt or illegal practices have extensively prevailed is desirable, no new writ shall issue for a new election in such case except by order of the House of Commons.

I shall therefore await the order of the house before issuing a new writ for a new election for the electoral district of Stanstead.

RADIO BROADCASTING

THIRD AND FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. J. J. McCANN (Renfrew South) presented the third and final report of the special committee on radio broadcasting.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I think perhaps at this stage I should point out that the committee was not unanimous in its report. I should like to make that clear.

Labour Conditions

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES AND CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY REFUNDING OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance first if he anticipates that it will be necessary for him to bring down any supplementary estimates before the house adjourns and second when he proposes to move the resolution standing in his name relating to the Canadian National refunding operations. I suggest to him that we should have that bill as soon as possible.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I have not given much thought to it lately. I shall take into consideration the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about supplementary estimates?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, there will be supplementary estimates.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GENERAL MOTORS OSHAWA PLANT—PARTIAL OPERATION AND SHORT HOURS OF LABOUR

· On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Last night I received a telegram from interested parties in Oshawa representing the United Automobile Workers of America, stating that the General Motors plant there had not been put in full operation by July, as had been previously suggested or indicated would be the case, and alleging that a large part of the plant is not in operation and that men are working short hours. My understanding of the position is that the plant was to be retooled and a change made, but I wonder if the Minister of Munitions and Supply could make a statement with regard to the matter. I may add that I sent him a copy of the telegram just a moment ago.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): As my hon. friend has said, just this moment I received a copy of the wire. With regard to the situation at Oshawa I may say that some six weeks ago the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and I met a delegation from the United Automobile Workers and discussed the situation with them. It was claimed then that the plant was only partly operated and that the men [Mr. Graydon.] were working short hours. We looked into the situation and found, as obviously must be the case when a peace-time operation is shut off, that a period is required for retooling in order to put the production lines to other uses. That retooling has been going on for some time. I told the delegation that I expected the tooling to be completed in July. This is still July. The retooling operation may be a little late; at this time it is difficult to get tools and procurement of tools is becoming increasingly difficult as the tempo steps up in the United States. I presume tooling is still going on, but I may add that the number of employees at Oshawa at that time was, and I think now is, vastly greater than it was at any time during the course of ordinary operations. I think it was then at its peak for all time, and I believe it is still at about the same level.

In the matter of short hours, we questioned the men who composed the delegation. They were all working overtime, not working their eight hours but actually working nine hours, so that I do not think the complaint with regard to short hours is very serious.

PICKERING MUNITION PLANT

INQUIRY FOLLOWING EXPLOSION—ALLEGED DEFECTIVE SHELL CASINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to ask another question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. and I will say very frankly that under ordinary circumstances I would place the question on the order paper as a notice; but because we are so near the end of the session I fear that we could not get an answer quickly enough. If the minister so desires, I shall ask him to treat this as a notice. It arises out of the explosion at the government munition plant at Pickering. According to an article appearing in last evening's Ottawa Journal, the attorney general of Ontario has ordered that the evidence taken at an inquest following the explosion at the Pickering munition plant shall be forwarded to the minister.

I should like to ask the minister if he has received that evidence and if he has had an opportunity of considering it. At the same time I should like to draw his attention to a leading editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail regarding this matter and the series of questions posed in that editorial with respect to the explosion and the operations at the plant. With the permission of the house I should like to read those questions, and the minister I think should at a later stage make a full reply. The questions are:

What the citizenry must know is why 60 per cent of all the shell casings received up to June 8 from the Montreal plant were defective; why 420,000 out of 700,000 received were defective.

Was there any inspection at Montreal before the shell casings were shipped? If not, why not?

Was there any inspection at the Pickering plant before loading? If not, why not?

Is the inspection system effective? If not, why not?

Who pays for the defective shell casings, and who pays for the buffing of defective casings?

Who is responsible for the production of 420,000 defective shell casings in one plant out of a total received of 700,000?

This is an important matter in connection with a government-operated plant. I suggest the house should be informed as to the true situation.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I saw neither the editorial in the Globe and Mail, nor the article mentioned in last night's Ottawa Journal. However, the matter was called to my attention. It was merely explained that there had been an editorial in the Globe and Mail and an article in the Ottawa paper this morning.

I made inquiries, and I find that we have received no copy of the evidence at the inquest. I have heard nothing about difficulty there. I am told that the editorial places the responsibility in my department. I might add that one responsibility which is not in my department is that of final inspection.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then it is some other government department.

Mr. HOWE: However, in view of the question asked I shall give the house a full report as soon as I can possibly get the information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is fair enough.

Mr. HOWE: But I will have to get the evidence itself, I think.

COMPOUND GIN

JOHN DE KUYPER-FOOD AND DRUGS ACT REGULATIONS AS TO ADVERTISING AND LABELLING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I prepare my own questions. I wish to refer to sessional paper 303-D of June 5, 1941, in which it was officially declared that it was not permitted by the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act to label as gin the product called John de Kuyper compound gin. I refer in the second place to the numerous exhibits produced in the house in June 13, 1941, April 30, 1942 and July 10, 1942, in which and by which the said compound was labelled and advertised with impunity in the press for more than a year as "gin". How is it that this could have been done for more than a year, in contravention of such regulations?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I had no notice of this question. I may say, however, that I am informed by the Department of Justice that the Department of Pensions and National Health has conformed with the law as it exists. We are pursuing our research into the important question asked by the hon. member for Témiscouata, which is a very valuable contribution to the war effort.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not want the Canadian people to be poisoned.

WHEAT

ARRANGEMENTS FOR HANDLING OF 1942 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I prepare my own questions. Owing to the fact that the house may adjourn on Tuesday next, and that I cannot go through the form of putting my question on the order paper, I should like to have an answer from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). Has the wheat board made any new agreement with the line elevator companies for the handling of the 1942 crop; also is there any new agreement made with the executive of the Winnipeg grain exchange with respect to the handling of that crop? If so will the minister table the agreements on Monday, or as early as convenient before the house adjourns?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have no knowledge of any new agreement, either contemplated or in course of preparation. The members of the wheat board, however, are expected to be in the city within the next day or two, and I shall make inquiries.

CHEESE

DIFFICULTY IN SECURING CONTAINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. STOKES (Hastings South): Like the hon. members for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), I have prepared this question myself. My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, and is based on a report appearing in this morning's Globe and Mail, which states that there is serious difficulty in the procuring of cheese boxes in that section of eastern Ontario from which I come, because of the fact that the manufacturers of the boxes are demanding a much higher price than ordinarily prevails in western Ontario and in other parts of Canada. The article states further that thousands of cheeses are sitting on the factory floors because of this condition.

Labour Conditions

Is the minister aware of the condition, and what steps are being taken to ensure a regular supply of boxes for this very necessary production?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I am aware that there have been some difficulties in connection with the production of cheese boxes, but I believe the details might better be discussed when my estimates are before the committee later in the day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no difficulty so far as production is concerned; it is a question of the price ceiling.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a difficulty in connection with production too. The proper material to make the kind of cheese boxes we have been using is not available.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a matter of price ceiling.

ACCOUNTANTS AND AUDITORS

QUESTION OF STATUS IN RELATION TO CIVILIAN OCCUPATIONS OR SERVICE IN ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): A few days ago I referred to the Minister of National War Services the question of competition in connection with auditors and accountants. I have a further communication this morning asking if some definite direction could be given. Is there any possibility that these men will be taken out of civil life and away from the important work they have been doing in connection with the preparation of intricate audits for smaller corporations in the vicinity? Would the Minister of National War Services suggest that their services are urgently needed? If so, very many of them would be glad to divert their energies to the assistance of the government, if it is indicated by the minister that there is such a need for this type of man.

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): I indicated to my hon. friend that chartered accountants had been listed under section 15 of the national [Mr. Stokes.] war services regulations. That means that they are regarded as essential to the efficient prosecution of the war. The attention of administrative boards therefore is directed to the desirability of considering any application for postponement which may be made by any individual chartered accountant. Further than that I do not think I can go.

TOURIST TRAFFIC

ASSISTANCE IN RESPECT OF LOSSES SUSTAINED THROUGH DECREASE OF TRAFFIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I should like to make a further inquiry of the government, although I am not sure to which minister it should be directed. I refer to a dispatch dated at Washington, July 22, indicating that negotiations are proceeding and that a bill has been introduced in congress with a view to assistance in financing the great losses sustained by persons who have been affected by lack of tourist business. I shall be pleased to send the clipping to the appropriate minister. Has any general discussion taken place between the two governments on the question of assisting those who have suffered great loss in this way?

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): I am not aware of any such negotiations.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DISMISSAL OF EMPLOYEE UPON HIS ENLISTMENT IN ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. I have received a complaint from a young man who enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force, and was given three weeks ' time in which to report for duty. According to the information I have he was immediately dismissed by his employer. I understand that is an illegal procedure. I should like to learn from the Minister of Justice, whose responsibility it is to check on that type of violation of the law, if it is the responsibility of the young man, or does a government department make a check?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): There is not a sufficiently concrete case stated by the hon. member to enable me to give an answer. If the hon, member will submit the exact facts so that they can be ascertained and verified, I shall be glad to have the law officers of the department examine into the question and give my hon. friend their findings.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Attorney General (Mr. St. Laurent) if it is not a rule of the house that the Minister of Justice shall not give legal opinions in the house? That has been the rule since confederation, and it is what the predecessor of the minister told me last session, when I raised the matter and he said I was right.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall not attempt to give offhand any legal opinions to hon. members of the house. I understood that the hon. member had a case in mind which involved the responsibility of some department of government and I felt it was not sufficiently precise to enable me to express an opinion. I stated that I would be glad to consider such a concrete case as the hon. member might bring up and if the responsibility of any department of government was involved, I would refer it to the law officers for their opinion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I call the attention of the house to the fact that most of the questions asked to-day should really have been placed upon the order paper, but in view of the statement made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), that we were nearing the close of the session, I think the sense of the house would be that some latitude should be allowed in connection with questions asked at this time. For that reason I allowed them to be asked this morning, but I hope that this will not be taken as a precedent.

CANADIAN FORCES

CIVIL EMPLOYMENT REINSTATEMENT ACT-CON-SIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS

The house proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 5, to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of discharged members of his majesty's forces.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house agrees to their first amendment and the amendment in the title of Bill No. 5, an act to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of discharged members of His Majesty's forces or other designated classes of persons; and disagrees with their second amendment for the following reasons:—

"The operation of the said amendment shall detract from the enforcement of the act."

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I think the house ought to give some consideration to this. What I gather from the reasons given by the minister is that if the senate amendment is agreed to it will lessen the power to enforce the act. I think that is the principle of his objection. Section 11 originally provided:

The governor in council may make all such orders and regulations as may be deemed necessary or desirable to carry out the purposes and intentions of this act, which orders and regulations shall have the force of law and shall forthwith be published in the Canada Gazette and be tabled in parliament forthwith if parliament is in session, and if parliament is not in session, within two weeks of the opening of the session next following the making of such order or regulation, and he may prescribe the penalties that may be imposed for the violation of such orders and regulations.

What the senate has done is to delete the words, "for the violation of such orders and regulations," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "upon summary conviction for the violation of any such order or regulation, but no such penalty shall exceed a fine of $100." The effect of that is not to take away from the governor in council the powers conferred by subsection 1 of section 11: that is left in full force, and that is the substance of the section. What the senate has done is to insert a limitation clause covering the method of procedure for violations, namely, limiting it to action upon summary conviction and limiting the penalty to a maximum fine of $100. I suggest that the senate is on sound ground, that the question of gaoling a man should not be left to the governor in council to be enacted by order in council. That is a function of parliament. On the last point the senate amendment is correct. This principle should not be lightly departed from by this house.

I am not sure whether I called attention to this section on a previous occasion, but if I did not I should have. Why in the world should parliament vest in the governor in council the power to gaol a man for the infraction of a civil right? There is a principle involved. If the minister is going to take the responsibility of overriding that principle, that responsibility will be his, but I do not recall that it has ever been done. I think it would be a violation of a fundamental principle of the administration of British justice. The power to gaol a man should never be conferred upon any government to be enacted by order in council.

This amendment limits the method of trial exclusively to summary conviction. I have two opinions on that. If a case were serious enough it might be necessary to proceed by way of indictment, but I imagine that such cases would be quite rare. I should think that summary conviction, which is the speedy method, would be resorted to by the Minister of Labour or whoever is charged with the responsibility of enforcing this act. For the reasons which I have given, and which I think will appeal to the house, I do not think the administration should adhere to the statement of disagreement which the minister has just laid down.

Mr. MITCHELL: There is no intention of imprisoning anyone under these provisions. Section 9 is the penalty section, and it provides for a fine not exceeding $500 and a sum not exceeding an amount equal to twelve weeks' remuneration received by the individual appealing to the courts. That clause gave the committee considerable concern. Some members thought that it should be given stronger. If my hon, friend will read the senate amendment he will see that it conflicts with section 9 which was passed by that body.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not the right to speak again, but I ask the permission of the house to do so. The point to which the minister has directed my attention alters the situation in a degree. By section 9 an offence is created and a penalty imposed by parliament for certain specific contraventions of the act. It is proper that parliament should do that. Any orders and regulations which the governor in council may make under section 11 could not have relation to the matters covered by section 9, with which parliament has dealt already. Therefore, it must refer to other matters, and it seems to me logical to declare that the proposed amendment is dealing only with that limited class. I suggest that the argument I have put forward in that connection is well established. I think there is a straight distinction between the two positions. I do not think I need labour the point further.

Motion agreed to.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE AGREEMENTS WITH PROV-INCES-ADVISORY COUNCIL-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 64, respecting the carrying on and coordination of vocational training.

Mr. NEILL: Explain.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Speaker, the amendments are not of a fundamental character. In paragraph (c) of section 2 the word "forestry" is inserted after "agriculture." Paragraph (d) of section 3 is amended by striking out the word "of" in the seventh line and substituting "vested in," and "Can-ada" is substituted for "the dominion," so that it will read "vested in the crown in the right of Canada." In paragraph (c) of section 4 there is a change in phraseology which does not alter at all the intent of the section. Paragraph (c) of section 4 is struck out and the following substituted:

(c) Any vocational training project for the conservation or development of the natural resources vested in the crown in the right of the province;

Subsection (5) of section 6 is amended by inserting after "provided" the word "that." Section 12 is struck out and the following substituted:

12. Expenditures incurred under this act shall be paid out of moneys appropriated by parlia-ment for carrying out the purposes of this act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think these amendments are all right.

Motion agreed to, and amendments read the second time and concurred in.

WAR RISK INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR COMPENSATION FOR WAR DAMAGE TO PROPERTY-CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 56, to make provision with respect to insurance of property against war risks and the payment of compensation for war damage.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): There is a misprint in one of these amendments, the one referred to as on page 5, lines 4 to 9. That should be page 6. That is quite clear because it refers to clause 11. The amendment will be found at page 612 of Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is sufficient, I think, that the error be brought to the attention of the committee for the correction to be made.

The amendments proposed by the senate are acceptable to the government. The only material amendment is the amendment to section 26, and this is an important and substantial amendment. Section 26 as it passed the house provided:

The minister may, on behalf of His Majesty, and holding a certificate of registry from the minister entiting it to transact the business of fire insurance on Canada.

The senate has added at that point, after the word "Canada", the following words: and such other companies as may satisfy the minister with regard to their financial standing and ability to perform the obligations required of them under such an agreement.

War Risk Insurance

Representations were made before the banking and commerce committee to the effect that provincially registered companies be made eligible for making agreements with the minister under this act. I opposed that position. Several members of this house also wrote me asking that provincially registered companies be included, and I wrote them that I was opposed to their inclusion.

Mr. NEILL: Does the minister mean provincially registered insurance companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Representations were also made by the government of the province of Quebec to the same effect. I pointed out that if provincially registered companies were included among those eligible for agreements with the minister, it must be understood that they would be subject to certain requirements by the minister, that as minister responsible for the important operations of this branch which is to issue insurance policies against war risk I must take the position that I could not authorize any company to carry on such important agency business on behalf of the government of Canada unless this government had a deposit from such company and had the right to audit the books and investigate and inspect such company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have some jurisdiction, in other words?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I pointed out that this government had no right as at present to look at the books of any provincially registered companies, and that we had no deposit from provincially registered companies, and therefore I felt it would be much better to adhere to the position that we would authorize only dominion registered companies to carry on this important agency business. I did, however, offer to move the inclusion of the very words which the senate has included here, provided that it was distinctly understood that provincially registered companies would be subject to selection. By that I mean that it may be necessary to exclude a large class of small provincially registered companies; for instance county mutuals, farm mutual, parish mutuals, and so forth, and that if these were included it must also be distinctly understood that the dominion government would require a deposit from them and that regulations would be made subjecting them to inspection if necessary. Those conditions were not satisfactory to the government of the province of Quebec; therefore I felt that the inclusion of these words would simply lead to dissatisfaction and perhaps friction. Consequently I did not move their inclusion when the bill was before the House of Commons. But now that the senate has inserted these words I am prepared to accept them rather than have any disagreement with the senate over the matter. But at the outset I must make it abundantly clear, so that there will be no misunderstanding in the future, that the conditions which I have mentioned as being indispensable—selection, deposit and inspection—will be the conditions that will obtain.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the minister of the opinion that if the house were to withhold its consent to this amendment it might endanger the whole legislation? Is that the reason why he is acquiescing?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He will agree with me, I think, that the inclusion of the amendment in the bill makes it very much wider than he had originally proposed—

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and that none of the limiting obligations to which he has alluded are in this amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All that has to be done now to include other companies—and they need not necessarily be confined to insurance companies, although I would assume no other company would apply; although perhaps a trust company might—is to satisfy the minister with regard to their financial standing, that is to say, their solvency, their ability to perform the obligations required under such agreements.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is a safeguard. It leaves it in the hands of the minister. I have a feeling, however, without having given the matter much thought to-day, that the minister's first position was a sounder one.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it was.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If he is prepared to forgo that position I do not know that I should criticize it.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): May I suggest to the minister that this is not a sound way to treat this amendment. The banking and commerce committee were definitely of the opinion that there should be no such provision as is made by the senate. The minister himself has said that he does not believe there should be any such provision; therefore I suggest that the House of Commons should insist on the original section. Otherwise, once this amendment has been agreed to it will become law and then we may have another minister of finance-I hope not-who has not such clear-cut and sound opinions on the question; he would find this section in the bill and might exercise his discretion in an entirely different way. That, I suggest, is striking at the soundness of this whole bill. The senate amendment is so worded that it might be construed as covering companies which are not even insurance companies. The wording is not "such other insurance companies", but "such other com-panies". I submit that if the banking and commerce committee and the ministry and the House of Commons were sound in the wording of the section as it stood originally. we should be firm on it and not agree to this amendment, which is apt to lead to trouble in the future.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister was on sound ground in the first place when he insisted that this should apply to insurance companies which come under the supervision of the federal government. Now he has accepted this amendment, and he does more than provide for the original request to include provincially registered insurance companies. He extends it to include such other companies as may satisfy the minister regarding their financial standing and their ability to perform the obligations under the agreement. He has made certain conditions-condition of selection, deposit and inspection-and they are not set out in the amendment. Probably the amendment could be interpreted to cover the question of selection, but I do not think it covers either deposit or inspection. The minister ought either to adhere to his original position, or, if he is going to accept the senate amendment to put into the bill a stipulation with regard to the three things he has just suggested, namely, selection by the minister, provision for deposit, and provision for inspection of companies coming under this legislation. Now he has not only moved from his original position but he has taken in wider territory than was originally asked of him, namely, the inclusion of provincially registered insurance companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am quite ready to be convinced in this matter, because I am uneasy about it. I would ask that the matter stand until Monday.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is wise.

Motion stands. [Mr. Green.]

VETERANS' LAND ACT

PROVISION FOR SETTLEMENT ON THE LAND OF VETERANS OF THE PRESENT WAR-CONCURRENCE

IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 65, to assist war veterans to settle upon the land.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These amendments are numerous, but they are not important?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They are all changes in drafting, a matter of terminology.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was the title changed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No. The amendments are set out at page 614 of Votes and Proceedings. The first amendment is on page 3, lines 14, 15, 16 and 17, leaving out the proviso. Then on page 3, lines 22 and 23, leaving out all the words after "war" in line 22 to the end of the clause; then page 3, lines 24 to 34. For clause 3 (1) (2) and (3) "substitute the following"-purely a matter of alteration in drafting. All the changes are improvements. The next is on page 4, lines 32 and 33, leaving out all the words after "sole" to the end of clause 5 (1) and substituting the following-and so on. Then on page 5, line 16, for "the crown" substitute "His Majesty". On page 5, line 17, leave out "of the dominion". On page 5, lines 18 to 26, for clause 6 substitute the following-purely a matter of redrafting, with the same intent of improvement. On page 5, the substitution of "acquisition" for "acquirement". On page 5, line 27, leave out "execution of any of the". On page 6, lines 6 and 7, for "under the authority of this act" substitute "hereunder". On page 6, line 7, after "veteran" insert "certified by him to be qualified to participate in the benefits of this act". This relates to the elimination of provisos in the previous section. On page 7, line 12, there is a substitution of words for figures. Page 7, line 34, after "veteran" insert "certified by him to be qualified to participate in the benefits of this act". They have transferred that from the previous section. On page 10, lines 6 to 10, for clause 19 (1) there is a substitution. That is exactly of the same purport as the previous section. On page 11, lines 32 to 35, there is a redrafting. On page 12, lines 23 to 27, it is also a matter of redrafting. They are all definite improvements on the original drafting and I move concurrence.

Motion agreed to, and amendments read the second time and concurred in.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPLICATION OF CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT TO CERTAIN DIPLOMATIC OR CONSULAR REPRESENTATIVES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 120, to amend the Department of External Affairs Act.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Unfortunately I was not present when this bill was discussed on the previous occasion. However, I think I understand from the Prime Minister's remarks and a reading of the bill what its purport is. It is to extend the provisions of the present law to certain officials of the government who were previously not under the superannuation or other acts referred to?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; so that those who have been under the Superannuation Act, if appointed to a diplomatic post, may continue to contribute.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words, their position is preserved?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is one consideration to which I desire to allude which would be the reverse of that position, that is, the position of persons who have been appointed to bodies in the government service from without the service and are not allowed to contribute to any superannuation fund and therefore do not get the benefit of the provisions of superannuation acts. This means that at the expiration of their period of office they simply retire with no provision for superannuation. That is true, I think, with respect to certain boards set up by the government. It occurred to me that while we are dealing with this matter, consideration should have been given to that position.

Take the case of the civil service commission or the board of transport commissioners, bodies to which men are appointed for a period of ten years. Those who were in the civil service prior to their appointment remain in that category. They make their contribution, based on the amount of their salaries, and at the conclusion of their period of ten years they are automatically entitled to a retiring allowance. But a man appointed to the transport commission or to the civil service commission, from without the service, that is from the general public, is not permitted under the statutes as they are at present to get into any sort of position comparable to that of his colleague.

External Affairs

It must be recognized I think, that in these days of competition men who take these positions for ten years stand very little chance of reemployment at their time of life. That must mean, unless their situation was such as to make it possible for them to take the risk, that they hesitate to serve the state. Of course I know that some people who do not look far enough ahead would be desirous of taking the positions no matter what the conditions might be. But it would be fair to public servants who perform these duties if we could bring them under the provisions of the superannuation act or give consideration to their position in this regard when drawing up legislation of this kind. It is obviously designed to take care of situations which have arisen-and I think quite properly so. I am not suggesting that the case to which the Prime Minister referred should not be protected. Otherwise men might hesitate to accept positions in which there is no assurance of continued occupancy, and leave the service and the sense of security that goes with superannuation. That is the human point that is involved in this legislation. They might very well refrain from accepting positions which in the national interest it is desirable that they should accept and occupy. Should we not have resurveyed the whole field and taken in these other classes?

There was one question about which I wanted to ascertain the facts. Does this bill affect in any way the position of former Chief Justice Turgeon and his occupancy of the post of minister to the Argentine and Chile? He was on the bench a long time, and he retired from his position on the bench to become minister. He would undoubtedly come under the retirement provisions applicable to the judiciary. What is his position? Will he also be affected by this legislation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not at all. Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He does not come under it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is assured of his retiring allowance as a retired judge. Is that in suspense at the moment, or is he receiving that now in addition to his salary?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say positively at the moment, but I should be surprised if he is receiving anything from that source.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would judge so. There is the anomaly in some of our legislation of a man receiving—perhaps this is applicable only to great war pensioners—a large disability allowance under the

44561-297

Pension Act and at the same time being in receipt of a high salary in the public service. I always thought those two situations were incompatible. I do not say this as against any person, but on principle. A man with a 75 per cent disability allowance under the Pension Act goes into the public service at a salary of $10,000 a year—

Mr. McGEER: If he had no disability he might have been able to make $50,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But not in the public service. It raises a question of principle.

Mr. McGEER: There is no reason for denying a man who has actually suffered a disability in the war the opportunity to work in accordance with his abilities—with what is left.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): An important matter of policy is involved in the second reading of this bill. That is the policy of making ministers plenipotentiary and envoys extraordinary-and some of them are very extraordinary-out of civilians serving the state as civil servants, some of them very able men. We have on the whole the finest civil service of any country in the world. Their duties are fixed. True, there are exceptional men in the service. We have one in the Clerk of this house, and there are several dozen others. But to take these honourable gentlemen out of their civil work and think you can land them in some embassy on the seven seas and that they can learn to be ambassadors or ministers in a day is foreign to the situation. No civil servant is trained for that work.

My second objection to this has to do with the question of status which was raised. As hon. members know, since the war started many of our representatives have been washed out, as in France, Belgium, Holland, and in Japan. That office in Japan was much criticized here during the session of 1937 by my former leader, now in the House of Lords, and myself. The ambassador there was a very fine citizen, a splendid man, but unfortunately was absent from his post on account of illness. Those were the years when we got into all this trouble, not only in that country but throughout the world, by thinking overnight that we were a nation. The finest ambassadors that Britain ever had during the past hundred years were men who were trained in the service. One unfortunate practice before the present war began was the thrusting into Washington and many other places of politicians and newspapermen, amateur novice diplomats, thinking that they could learn to be diplomats and ambassadors in a day.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

The greatest ambassadors Britain ever had were permanent men trained as such in foreign affairs, such as Sir Cecil Spring Rice, Sir Ronald Lindsay and many other great ambassadors. especially those in the days of Palmerston. Salisbury, Vansittart, and George Canning. that great prime minister who kept Britain out of Europe's wars for almost fifty years. Nearly all Britain's representatives abroad for the past hundred years have been trained diplomats who knew their place and knew how to carry on in Berlin, in Washington, in Paris and all over the world, and as a result Britain's name was respected. A few years ago we came along and thought under this wonderful new Dominion of Canada's status we were a separate country and a nation. That was one of the great problems before the war, the drift of some of the dominions away from the mother country. They were led to believe that the state of affairs in the world had reached the point where they could cut loose from the mother country. Therefore we opened up an embassy in Washington and all over the seven seas, thus dividing Britain's representation there, and Canada was the chief drifter. That was bad enough in time of peace; it was even more fatal in time of war. As I said in 1937, we then became a nation all right at ten o'clock dinners and five o'clock teas, and on the front pages of American magazines, and all that sort of thing. Just let us look at the expense of all these proceedings. As I see it, here we are amending two statutes, the civil service act and the act relating to external affairs.

I do not wish to detain the Prime Minister; no doubt he has more arduous and important duties to perform elsewhere. In conclusion. however, I want to object to this whole policy, as I have objected consistently to it from 1923 onward. During the debate on this question in 1937 I predicted the coming war with Japan and told the Prime Minister he should beware, and my other leader told the house that I represented a large body of public opinion on it. I have always been consistent in opposing the appointment of these representatives, because I believe they do a great deal of harm and duplicate other civil services. Look at what we have done in Washington. Why, we have a small standing army there. We have erected a large building, and the staff is so large that when they go to work in the morning it looks like a parade of the Queen's Own Rifles in Toronto or the Governor General's Foot Guards in Ottawa. First there is the army, wearing epaulettes and all that sort of thing, a great many of whom do not want to be there, who would prefer to be fighting this war. Then comes the navy.

External Affairs

I do not see the minister here this morning, but he has a large number of men down there as aides. Then there is the air force and the women's army. Well, it is no wonder that the tax rate has gone up as high as the moon.

While I have the greatest respect for the Prime Minister and the work he is doing I really believe this embassy business is being carried too far. We have several new countries available now, including Libya and some other parts of Africa. No doubt in the years to come we will want to send ambassadors there. We have some very splendid members of parliament on both sides of the house who might qualify; offhand I could nominate almost a dozen for the job. I do not believe we have any admirals in the house now, but I see on the government benches my hon. friend the old mayor over there, who is on the war expenditures committee, and I think he might be a splendid ambassador to help us get some new ships for our navy. I would nominate him. There are also others. There is the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who I think would make an excellent ambassador to Scotland. Then there is the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot); where could you get a better ambassador to France? He is a specialist in many languages and he is a man of humour, as he showed the other day when he wanted to have the food and drugs act amended to allow the passing around of a favourite brand of refreshment and entertainment so popular with diplomats.

I fail to see any value in these appointments. It seems to me that our rules are antiquated. I believe we have had some good men, and I agree that those mentioned by the Prime Minister should receive their pensions and other rewards. I am casting no reflection upon them, but I believe our rules are on about the same level and as venerable as those of Noah when he entered the ark. He is said to have taken two of each in with him; I suppose he took in a Grit and a Tory, but at that time there was no C.C.F., and in any case there was no room for them. But there is an opening now in connection with this new embassy business. I think we could very well let these matters stand until after the war, and then consider the whole question of this dream status of ours. It is all right in peace time; hip, hip, hurrah! and the hallelujah chorus, because we are a nation. But what happens when war comes along? We appeal to the mother country to send over the army and the navy to save us.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am sure the country at large will be very glad that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) is not selecting our ambassadors. I 44561-2973 think when the people of Scotland got Rudolph Hess, they had enough for one generation without adding any further difficulties. I believe this is a commendable piece of legislation. In days gone by there was a tendency to select as ambassadors wealthy people who had been contributors to campaign funds and who wanted to enter into the social whirl. That practice is still being carried on in various parts of the world, but to-day there is a move in the direction of selecting career men for jobs of this kind, and I am sure everyone is convinced that it is a move in the right direction. The tendency is more and more to select men who have been trained in the government service, who have had some practical experience and who are appointed on the basis of merit rather than of influence with the powers that be. The present secretary for war in Great Britain is a man who has spent almost his entire life in the civil service. The British people generally have approved the fact that the British government are turning more and more to their trained men to represent them across the seas. It seems to me that if we are making: it possible now for the government to avail themselves of experienced, trained civil servants to represent them in the various countries of the world, they are going to get a much better type of representation than would be possible on any other basis. This legislation will make it possible to ask such men to accept these responsibilities without making it impossible for them to continue under the civil service superannuation scheme. It will give them a feeling of security; it will let them feel that when their work is finished they can come back to the service and have that security without which no man should be asked to leave the protection of his career and serve his country abroad.

If the government is moving in that direction it is a commendable thing, and it is to be hoped that in future more and more of the ambassadors and consular officials representing Canada abroad will be trained civil servants instead of merely the playboys of international social life.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I should like to know to what extent this superannuation act is self-supporting. In the estimates of the Department of Finance there is an item of $2,350,000 which is to be advanced by the department in order to maintain these superannuation benefits. Is it possible to ascertain the amount that is contributed by the civil service itself to thisfund?

External Affairs

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might point out that we are on the second reading of the bill and many of these questions could be better dealt with in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Very well; I will ask the question in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In regard to what has been said by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and others, may I say first of all that the matter raised by the leader of the opposition with regard to the treatment to be accorded members of boards or commissions who are appointed to perform special services is a very large question. I should think it could be properly considered only on a bill which dealt specifically with the whole question of superannuation. It was suggested at the outset that the aim to be achieved by this particular measure should be achieved by an amendment to the Civil Service Superannuation Act. The Department of Finance, which administers that act, felt that to amend the act on this one specific point would open up the whole question of amendments to that act, including, among other things, the purposes mentioned by the leader of the opposition. It was felt that the present time would not be opportune for a general discussion of the superannuation act. For that reason the present amendment is being proposed to the Department of External Affairs Act rather than to the Civil Service Superannuation Act. I believe it was the opinion of the Department of Justice, to which department the matter was referred for consideration by the Department of Finance, that the present procedure was not only preferable but the right one. I might say that members of the public service who receive appointments as ministers or consuls general have not been given as large allowances or salaries as have been given to those appointed to these positions from outside the service, and who have not been members of the public service. That circumstance arises from the fact that has been understood that those who are permanently in the service will have the benefits to be derived under the Civil Service Superannuation Act. That is the main purpose of the present amendment to the Department of External Affairs Act. This amendment will ensure that those members of the public service who are serving as ministers and consuls will get the benefits to be derived from the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

I have made inquiries about Mr. Justice Turgeon, and I find that the leader of the opposition and I were right in assuming that [Mr. Castleden.] while Mr. Justice Turgeon is minister, he does not receive the pension he would be drawing as a retirement allowance. His pension is suspended for the time being.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has restated his views in regard to embassies. I thought he somewhat contradicted himself, perhaps unwittingly, when he took exception to members of the Department of External Affairs being appointed as ministers, on the ground that they had not had the kind of training ministers should have, and then proceeded to praise the British service, and the method followed in Great Britain of making appointments from the permanent service to these ministerial posts. In my opinion the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) took the right line, one which certainly has been in the mind of the government, namely that so far as possible we should encourage career men. We should seek to have those who enter the public service to look forward to being in a position to fill higher and more responsible posts. I would say to the hon. member for Broadview that I cannot conceive of any training better adapted to qualify a man for the diplomatic service than that which he may receive as a permanent official in the Department of External Affairs. As hon. members are aware, permanent officials in different grades in the service may be transferred from legation to legation, from country to country. They come, in this way, into contact with those who are most interested in the public affairs of different countries. They become more fully acquainted with all matters pertaining to international relations. Their whole training qualifies them as one who has not had that experience could not begin to be qualified for the higher positions in the permanent service.

One difficulty, in respect of giving appointments as ministers to men who have chosen public service as a career is that for the most part they are not men of means. They have entered the service largely because of the opportunities it offers for service. When it comes to being a representative in a foreign country they are immediately confronted with the difficulties which arise in connection with the social and other obligations connected with such a position. It is sometimes very difficult to persuade public bodies to vote moneys necessary for purposes of entertainment, and for upholding in other ways the standards set by other nations. As a result ministers appointed by countries like our own, where the diplomatic service has not been of long standing, are at a very considerable disadvantage. I believe however that public assemblies are beginning to take a truer view of matters of this kind, and as time goes on will be prepared more and more to see that men who devote their entire lives to any branch of public service will not, for any reason other than of efficiency, be handicapped in receiving the highest opportunities which may present themselves in the public service.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Diplomatic or consular representatives to continue as contributors to Civil Service Superannuation fund.

Mr. McCANN: In his remarks the Prime Minister said that the objective in the bill might have been attained by an amendment to the Civil Service Superannuation Act. Has any thought been given by the government to implementing the report concerning that act which was made three years ago? My interest in the matter arises from the fact that I was a member of the committee and took part in drafting the recommendations. It is too bad that so much time has elapsed without consideration being given at least to the recommendations made at that time. I am not sure whether this question is applicable at the moment, but as the matter was mentioned by the Prime Minister I have taken the liberty of asking it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the Minister of Finance has not only made clear verbally that he has considered the recommendations contained in the report to which reference has been made, but that he has also made this clear by some of the measures which have since been introduced by him although offhand I cannot refer to them specifically.

Answering the hon. member's question in the broadest way, I would say that the government has repeatedly considered the recommendations contained in the report to which he referred, but it has felt that because of the larger questions which have come up for consideration and action in this period of war it would be unwise to select this particular time to go at any length into matters pertaining to superannuation, and other questions arising under the superannuation act. My hon. friend will understand that any discussion of the kind at this time would certainly occasion very long debates in this house. There are many considerations of which account would have to be taken. It has thus far been thought by the government that it would be better not to seek to enter upon such discussions at this time, if such could be avoided.

External Affairs

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I was referring to the hon. member for Huron-Perth, not myself. He was a former mayor, and was a member of the war expenditures committee. I should like to see the hon. gentleman nominated. I nominated him once myself. I would not want to be dressed up, going all over the world on such a mission.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: This bill brings certain people under the provisions of the superannuation act, that is, those who have been contributors and shall continue to be contributors under that act. Is the basis of the contribution the amount of salary received?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand so.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: To what extent is this act self-supporting?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This act is the Department of External Affairs Act, and I am not familiar enough with the provisions of the superannuation act to answer offhand any questions in regard to it. I would have to leave it to the Minister of Finance to give to the house the desired information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am afraid that none of these acts is self-supporting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think everyone would like to see the act self-supporting, but whether it is or not I am unable to say.

Mr. JACKMAN: I gathered from the remarks of the Prime Minister that he felt that the allowances paid in certain places were inadequate. Is any provision being made, either in the estimates or the supplementary estimates, to make them adequate in view of present conditions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In preparing the estimates for the Department of External Affairs the question of allowances to which my hon. friend has referred was kept in mind. I do not anticipate additional estimates at this session to cover this matter.

The hon. member for Broadview has referred particularly to the position of the legations, or embassies as he calls them, at a time of war. I should like to say to him that I believe the British government and the government of the United States would be the first to say that the Canadian legation at Washington has at this time of war been of the greatest possible service, not only to the Canadian government but as well to the British and United States governments. I can think of nothing that could possibly have been more fortunate, having regard to the kind of questions that have arisen at this period of war, than that we should have had a legation established at Washington at the time it was. Because of the relations which the Canadian legation enjoys with the departments of government in the United States and because of the fact that its personnel enjoys as well the best of relations with the British embassy and those who are associated with it, as well as the confidence and good will of the British government, it has been of the greatest possible service to the countries concerned at this time of war.

Mr. CHURCH: I see no useful purpose in keeping up all these legations at such great cost. I think the people of Canada do not approve of it. Washington at half cost was enough. It is nothing but separatism. It shows a lack of faith in the ability of the mother country to look after our interests in some of these capitals.

Bill reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Prime Minister prepared to tell the house now, or before it adjourns, the nominations that have been made in connection with certain positions in the diplomatic service?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have been most anxious to be able to make an announcement before the house adjourns, but it may be that I shall not be able to do this until after the house has adjourned. My hon. friend will understand that it is absolutely necessary for anyone accepting an appointment of this kind to consider what it will involve in the matter of finance, in the matter of leaving this country at time of war, and going to a country that is at war. I have approached different persons in the hope and expectation that their services might be secured for some of these posts, but difficulties have arisen that appeared wellnigh insuperable and which I am sure my hon. friend will understand. I am hopeful that after the house adjourns there will be a chance personally to take the matter up at greater length than has been possible thus far, with some of those who are in view.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if something could not be done to make those who speak in this chamber speak loud enough so that we may hear what they are saying? The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked what I assume was an important question of the Prime Minister. We could not hear what he said, neither could we gather from what the Prime Minister said what the leader of the opposition had asked. I believe all that is necessary is to bring this to the attention of the leader of the opposition and remind him that we are all very weary because of the tremendous strain under which we are working, and it certainly does not make things any better when we cannot tell what he is talking about.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS

SAGUENAY TRANSMISSION COMPANY, LTD., SAGUENAY ELECTRIC COMPANY AND ALUMINUM POWER COMPANY, LTD.

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City—for Mr. Dubuc) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 99, respecting certain transmission and distribution lines of Saguenay Transmission Company, Limited, Saguenay Electric Company and Aluminum Power Company, Limited.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Governor in council may approve site and plans of works.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This bill was considered by the private bills committee, was it not?

The CHAIRMAN: It was.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And unanimously reported?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The reason for the bill is stated in the preamble. If the reason is correctly stated, and I assume it is, it seems to me that in order to avoid any questioning of the rights of the company in respect to the Navigable Waters Protection Act this bill should be passed. I understand that no objection has been urged by anyone.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think there should be some explanation of the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The preamble gives the full reasons.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The sponsor of the bill gave a lucid explanation on a previous occasion, but he is not here at the moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The position the company occupies has been doubted in some quarters because they proceeded to do certain things with respect to certain rivers in Quebec, which are named in the preamble, on the theory that those rivers were not navigable. I have had to deal with this statute and I have never thought it necessary to come to the Department of Public Works, which I believe administers the Navigable Waters Protection Act, for approval to cross or to bridge or to build a wharf or dock on any river unless it was a water which was obviously navigable, like the Saint John river. The short tributaries of the Saint John river would not be considered navigable, but apparently someone has attacked the position of this company and they want to protect their position. I think the bill is all right.

On section 1-Marriage dissolved.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, before these divorce bills are all disposed of I want to say a word. Some of these cases have been before the law courts of Ontario where the parties were domiciled; then they moved over to the sister province, where they have no divorce court, and now they have applied to this parliament for a divorce. I would like that matter looked into.

There is another matter. I do not wish to take advantage of the absence of the Minister of Justice, but I should like to say a word with reference to Bill No. 67, standing on the order paper in my name, to amend the Judges Act. In the province of Quebec there has been a decision in the court of appeal that the judges must adhere to the laws of the country because under our constitution the courts are subservient to the legislature. There have been decisions by one or two judges in the province of Quebec that they will not obey the law and follow decisions of the court of appeal of Quebec. My point is that by the decision of the court of appeal of the province of Quebec or other final court, the judges are bound, and they must follow, as is the custom, the decision of the court of last resort.

Bill No. 67, to amend the Judges Act, has been standing on the order paper for a long time. I hope that the government will take it up. Parliament has the appointment of judges, and the province has jurisdiction. The federal government is the appointing power, and the provincial authority has to do with regulations and constitutions of provincial courts. There should be some decision given by the Attorney General of Canada or by some other authority with respect to this matter, and I hope that that will be done in the recess.

I also think that a public bill like Bill No. 67, to amend the Judges Act, should be given precedence over these private bills. Bill No. 67 is a public statute and should take precedence over these divorce bills which occupy the time of parliament with the concerns of private citizens. On grounds of public policy I protest against that practice.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, I assure the hon. member that I shall bring his remarks to the attention of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Production service.

27. Live stock and live stock products, $553,026.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Last evening we passed all the items in the general estimates with the exception of No. 27. It will be recalled that under production, a question having to do with the marketing of live stock was raised by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) and I asked the committee to consider the questions then brought up under this item of live stock and live stock products. Last night, in view of the fact that the member for Haldimand and some others who are interested in the matter were not present, I asked to have that item stand and we went on and passed the last item under "specials". The items left include 27, live stock and live stock products, under which I had hoped to be able to discuss the question of labour as applied to the raising of live stock, and also the question of shortages in beef, which we have discussed on a number of occasions, and four items under specials, namely, farm rehabilitation, farm assistance, wheat acreage reduction and assistance to improve cheese and cheese factories.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I presume that under 27 we can follow up the excellent study made by the hon. member for Haldimand yesterday afternoon. I take it that the marketing of beef would come under the board set up in connection with price control.

Mr. GARDINER: Those are two items which I shall discuss. There were two or three members on their feet last night when I asked the chairman to have the discussion taken under item 27, and I should like to give those members an opportunity to ask whatever questions they have in mind or make whatever statements they wish to make before I deal with these matters.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The member for Haldimand covered the subject very well both as regards the difficulty of feeders of beef and from the standpoint of farm labour. There is another point that is disturbing to many producers and feeders, and one which eventually will affect the nation as a whole with regard to foodstuffs. That is, the question as to what regulations have been made with regard to price control for feeding cattle this winter. We know that there was a price crash in June and early July of 3¹/₄ cents per pound live weight. If a man desires to feed cattle he is now faced with the impossibility almost of procuring efficient farm help. If he makes an outlay for the purchase of feeder cattle this fall and feeds them costly material in the winter-and grain will be in demand. I have no doubt, throughout the north American continent-he will naturally be anxious to know what assurance there will be that he will receive a reasonable remuneration for his labour, the cost of feed and other costs when he comes to market his cattle next spring or towards midsummer. What will be his return for feeding cattle, which is so essential to the food requirements of the nation? I think the minister should make a statement covering that angle.

Mr. WRIGHT: May I call the attention of the minister to the matter of establishing a board of live stock commissioners in Canada to go into the whole marketing of live stock. At an earlier date I drew his attention to this particular question and he said that the producers would have to be willing to bear the cost of grading if this commission were appointed. I cannot quite agree with him on that. Grading is important, but it would not of necessity have to be taken up at once. There are a great many other things in connection with the marketing of live stock which such a commission could adjust. I know that from time to time, in different seasons of the year, there is a considerable variation in the price of live stock. There is a variation as between different markets, and there is also to be considered the fact that packers to-day are buying larger and larger quantities of stock direct from producers rather than through the public markets. The public markets are establishing the price which is paid for that product, and I think there is plenty of scope for such a commission even without the matter of grading. The government has signed an agreement with regard to the wheat problem and the result is that we in the west are going to have to reduce the amount of wheat grown there, so that there is only one thing that we can turn to, and that is live stock. In western Canada we shall have to produce more live stock if we are to maintain the agricultural economy we have there. A live stock commission appointed at this time could take up the whole problem of the marketing of live stock and live stock products, and this would stabilize the market and have a good effect on production, which is so necessary at this time. I bring this matter again to the attention of the minister and ask his opinion on it.

Mr. HATFIELD: As the war has shown, we must change our agricultural policy and use more farm commodities in the manufacturing stage, and I contend that agriculture in Canada is now in that stage. This being so, I would make a few suggestions:

1. That there be no price ceilings on agricultural products without a floor assuring the cost of production to the farmer.

2. That all ceilings or floors on agricultural products be approved by the Minister of Agriculture before going into effect.

3. That two pilot laboratories be erected, one in western Canada and one in eastern Canada, to carry on the research study of the utilization of farm products.

4. In order to ensure a supply of meat products a ban should be put on the slaughter of calves under one year of age.

5. To ensure a wool supply for our own needs, there should be a selection made of the ewe lambs for sale. These should be purchased by the government and resold to the farmers on easy terms.

6. Farmers should be encouraged in localities where sugar beet factories are now located to grow beets to the capacity of these factories. There should also be assistance given to the two cane sugar plants in the maritime provinces to change over from cane to sugar beet and the farmers should be encouraged to produce sugar beets.

7. The farmers of western Ontario and Manitoba should be encouraged by subsidy to grow corn to ensure a supply to keep the two cornstarch factories, located in Ontario, producing to capacity, so that we would have a supply of starch, glucose and oil by-products from these factories.

8. A subsidy should be worked out ensuring the same price for dairy butter as for creamery butter, as the number of dairy butter makers will increase owing to lack of transportation.

9. The price of cheese should be made uniform in every province in Canada. If there is to be a provincial subsidy, it should be in each province with the assistance of the federal department. 10. A subsidy on fertilizer should be used to assist in the transportation of fertilizer chemicals, thereby ensuring a lower price to all buyers of fertilizer.

11. There should be more cooperation between the federal Department of Agriculture and provincial departments of agriculture. All overlapping should be done away with.

12. Grain alcohol plants should be established in western Canada to produce alcohol from wheat and barley for the manufacture of synthetic rubber. I understand that synthetic rubber can be made from wheat at the present prices at a cost of thirty cents a pound, whereas the cost of synthetic rubber from petroleum products would be around forty cents a pound. The processing of synthetic rubber from grain is much quicker, with less expensive plants.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I should like to say a word to the committee with regard to a situation which is very close to me, coming as I do from one of the best beef cattle raising districts in Ontario. We find ourselves in a very uncertain situation. The minister may say this is not a matter that comes under his department, but the people whom I represent, who are principally farmers, feel that the minister and his department should look after their interests, and they always look to him to do so. I can say also that the minister has been very fair with the farmers of Ontario. We have not always agreed with him, but he has done a good job, and we appreciate what he has done.

As I listened to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) last night when he reviewed the cattle situation, and read some of the speeches he made in other years, I thought I might take a few minutes of the time of the committee to deal with the cattle situation as it has varied during the last number of years. I go back to 1910, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was leading the government and the present Prime Minister was a member of his cabinet. That government was endeavouring to negotiate a trade agreement with the United States for the benefit of the rural people of this country. I was only a boy at that time, but I remember quite well the reciprocity election of 1911, when Sir Wilfrid went down to defeat fighting for the farmers of this country, endeavouring to put through a trade agreement in their interest. The present Prime Minister suffered personal defeat at that time also, at the hands of the electors of North Waterloo. The farmers were fooled then, but they have never been fooled since.

Then in 1912, when the Democratic party came into power in the United States, they put into effect the well known Underwood treaty under which our cattle were allowed free entry to the United States. After that treaty was negotiated the farming population of this country enjoyed prosperity. Then we came to the last war, when cattle prices were inflated. None of us wants to see that happen again, but I will say that during the great war the cattle raisers did make a reasonable profit. Later on, in 1920, when prices collapsed, the profits the cattle raisers had made were wiped out, sometimes in a single day. Then we had the Fordney-McCumber tariff of 1922, and things went along from then until 1929, with the cattle raisers enjoying reasonable prosperity. Suddenly the depression came upon us, and we all remember what happened from 1930 to 1935, when our cattle were sold on the farm at from $3\frac{1}{4}$ to $3\frac{3}{4}$ cents per pound. In 1936, however, the Prime Minister negotiated a trade agreement with the government of the United States under President Franklin Roosevelt, allowing us to ship our cattle to the United States under a two-cent tariff. and once more the cattle raisers became prosperous. When that trade agreement was renewed in 1939 that tariff was reduced from 2 cents to $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents. Then an arrangement was made under which we were given a quota of approximately 190,000 cattle to be shipped to the United States on a quarterly basis. The cattle raisers got the benefit of that extra one-half cent.

Then came this war, in 1939, and prices were inflated, but not a great deal. We continued to receive a reasonable profit both on cattle shipped to the United States and cattle sold in the home market. Toward the end of last year and early this year a ceiling price of 19¹/₂ cents was placed upon beef carcasses, which decreased our profits to a certain extent, and later the cry went up that we were short of beef during the winter and spring. The cattle raisers of this country disposed of a large portion of their cattle during March and April, shipping some to the United States and some to the home market. The first quarter, January to March, was filled very quickly; the second quarter, which began April 1, was filled in about five weeks. Then we had a food production board set up under the wartime prices and trade board, headed by Hon. J. G. Taggart, a man whom I hold in the highest regard and who I believe under-[Mr. McCubbin.] stands the problems of the cattle raisers of this country. This board established a seasonal ceiling on the price of beef carcasses, which dropped from $19\frac{1}{2}$ cents to 16 cents during the month of September.

What happened? There was an inflation of price even after the quota was filled during the first week in May; the price to the cattle raisers went to about 134 cents. The packing houses and butchers paid that price for cattle, but after this seasonal drop took place, during July, the cattle price dropped at a rate which was not healthy for the cattle raisers, and that drop is continuing week by week. You may say that I should not criticize or find fault unless I have something better to offer. I should like to explain how this works and how it is detrimental to the Ontario beef producers. After the shortage of beef that we experienced last winter, this food production board was authorized to step in and buy cattle at the export price in the markets of this country, in Calgary, Winnipeg and Toronto. They were authorized to pay for these cattle at the export price and to sell them to the packing houses at a price corresponding to the ceiling. I will say that last week when the price to the exporter was 12 cents a pound it was being sold to the packing houses at 10.65 cents. The government was making up this difference. That may be all true, but the man who was suffering was the farmer back on the back concession who did not understand this set-up. He read in the paper that the cattle were being sold at 10.65 on the Toronto market. The drover would go back into the country, and state that on the market in which he must sell these cattle he would receive 10.65 at the very top, and that he must be able to buy from the farmer for 10 or 10.25; yet in reality he was receiving 12 cents for those cattle.

Some may say that the farmer should understand that, but the fact is that he does not understand it. As all hon. members understand, he is to-day working some sixteen hours a day, striving to save his crops, and to do the work of two men on his farm. All he reads is the newspaper headings, in which he sees the price at 10.65. The drover will tell him that that is the price he is receiving, and that he should be fair and sell his cattle at 10 or 10.25 and sometimes less. That is what he is doing. I have every respect for the drovers; they are a fine group of men but the farmer is being exploited where he does not understand the situation.

This is not a healthy attitude for cattle raisers who are disposing of their cattle. In the district from which I come cattle are going out, carload after carload. All railway stations are shipping them out. The farmer sees the price drop down by half a cent, and then by another half cent, every so often, and he knows the price has dropped and he is disposing of his cattle for what he can get for them. Those cattle should be kept on the farms until August or September, when they would become firm and hard, and produce more beef. This is a seasonal drop, the price of which drops down in the late fall, and then rises again in the winter, and continues to rise until the following June, when it again drops, and the same thing happens all over again. Then for grass-fed cattle, which should be disposed and sold during July and August, he will receive the low price. I feel that this is detrimental to the cattle raisers of my district, and also to those in the west. My idea is that the board should step out of the picture entirely. It could be kept in operation, but there should be permission for a free exchange of cattle with the United States.

My statement may be disputed, but I feel that we have in Canada to-day cattle enough to fill our quota of 190,000, and still keep our home market going. I believe that that is a true statement, and that the board should be kept in abeyance, rather than in operation. If the packers and the butchers do not play fairly with the farmers and the drovers on the open market, then the board could step in, but I have always been a firm believer in low tariffs. I belong to that group of people who believe that there should be an interchange of trade, and I believe, too, that much of the trouble in which we find ourselves to-day can be traced to high tariffs and restricted trade.

I am a firm believer in the flow of cattle to the United States, because I believe we should keep that market over there. We do not wish to sour our American buyers. I say that because I know that our prosperity as cattle raisers on the farms of Ontario is to be found in the days when the United States buyers and commission men representing packing houses of our own country come to our farms. In those times we have competition and opposition, and as a result we receive a fair price for our cattle.

All the cattle raisers are asking is a fair price. It may be said that they are receiving that price. Some may say, "Why, that is a wonderful price; it is all profit." Only those who are closely connected with the raising of cattle realize what it costs to produce a steer or a heifer in shape to sell on the market for beef. I know this government is sympathetically disposed toward the farmer, more so than any other government has been. As I 44561-2983 said before, our Prime Minister suffered defeat some years ago when fighting for the farmers of this country, and he is still sympathetic toward them.

I ask that the food production board step out of this picture, and let the free exchange of cattle take place with the United States, as well as in our home market. We feel we can fill our quota, supply our home market and thereby give a fair return to the cattle raisers of this country.

Mr. EVANS: Following what has been said by the hon. member for Middlesex West I should like to say a few words about the cattle industry in western Canada. Coming from a constituency composed largely of ranches, and one which produces a great many feeder cattle, I should like to go on record as being in favour of the suggestion offered by the hon. member for Middlesex West, namely that the board step out of the picture and leave a free movement of cattle on the market.

Since the United States trade treaty of 1936 came into operation, the feeder exporter has grown up in the cattle market. During the year throughout western Canada the feeders contract with the ranchers and farmers for the purchase of feeder cattle at different periods of the year. The feeding of cattle has become a yearly occupation, and hundreds of tons of Canadian wheat are being fed to those cattle in western Canada.

Recently I had communication from some of those large operators in western Canada with respect to the business of finishing these feeder cattle. When they have had cattle ready to go to the market in July we find the board has stepped in and caused considerable difficulty for the exporter. In fact I know of one large exporter who has two large feeding plants in Alberta, one at Cardston and the other at Picture Butte, who feeds on an average of 25,000 to 35,000 head of cattle a year. These cattle were mostly exported to the United States, but they take up a lot of the slack in the trade in western Canada. While we produce a great many feeder cattle and ship a great many of them to eastern Canada, if we did not have those large dealers operating in western Canada the feeder market would break and the producers in the west would receive a low price for feeder cattle.

I strongly support the argument presented by the hon. member for Middlesex West to the effect that the wartime food corporation should keep off the market, excepting in cases where it is necessary to have more beef for the Canadian people. I agree that we can fill our quota in the United States and supply all the beef needed in Canada. In fact I do not agree with those who say there is a shortage of beef in Canada, because I know that the production of live stock has increased since 1936, particularly in western Canada. I believe we have enough beef going onto the market this year to more than supply our Canadian demands. In fact it would be just too bad if we continued to operate as we have done during July, and prohibited cattle flowing to the United States market.

In a report issued to-day by the Department of Agriculture I notice we have shipped only a few more than 4,000 head of beef cattle to the United States in July, while last year in the same month we allowed about 13,000 to cross the line. This year we have more cattle in Canada than we had last year, and if we fool with the quota, through the operations of the food control board, there is the possibility of our quota with the United States being cut down in another year.

I was talking only recently to one of the large feeding operators, and he tells me that if they cannot feed Canadian cattle and are assured that they will be allowed to export at least up to the quota, it is very likely they will pull out of the feeding business in Canada and get their cattle from Mexico. So that there is always the possibility that we may lose our quota. We hope this war is not going to last forever. It will be just too bad for the cattle raisers of Canada if anything should happen to the quota we now enjoy under the United States trade agreement. I strongly urge upon the minister and his officials that they endeavour to have a free movement of cattle on the Canadian market.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): A great deal of uneasiness exists among the stock raisers of western Canada because of the action of the wartime prices and trade board. Last April a story appeared in the press to the effect that restrictions would be placed upon the ship-ment of cattle to the United States. Under the 1935 trade treaty the United States tariff on Canadian cattle over 700 pounds in weight was cut from 3 cents to $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound. The United States permitted 250,000 head of cattle to be imported each year, Canada's share being 193,950 head. The stock raisers of western Canada were alarmed over the possibility of our not being allowed to fill that quota. The press carried dispatches to the effect that Mexico was endeavouring to have her quota increased at our expense. If that should happen, the cattle industry of all Canada would suffer.

When these announcements were made last April I received several communications from the west, and I should like to read one or two in order to show the feeling that exists. [Mr. Evans.] The Okotoks United Farmers of Alberta, an organization containing some of the most prominent stock raisers in that province, wired as follows:

April 22, 1942.

Geo. H. Ross, M.P., Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir: We members of Okotoks U.F.A. strongly oppose any restrictions on export shipments of cattle to the United States. A move of this kind by Canada would force United States to enlarge quota of Mexican cattle to the detriment of Canadian producers. As you will see this would have the effect of flooding our market. This in turn would reduce the price, lessen competition among packers and enable them to make greater profits at the expense of cattle raisers. Last year when restrictions were placed on exports of heavy bacon, price dropped immediately three dollars per cwt. The same thing will happen to cattle. This in turn would discourage production and be Canada's loss.

Respectfully,

Okotoks United Farmers of Alberta, J. M. Hutchinson, Secretary.

For the past sixty years the Lloyds have been prominent stock raisers in Alberta. I received the following letter from Mr. J. E. R. Lloyd.

April 23, 1942.

Dear Mr. Ross:

I observed in the newspaper that the house will soon consider a recommendation by Mr. Gordon for some restriction on the export marketing of beef. I, as a life long rancher, am looking to you to see that the proper interests of the producers of cattle are reasonably protected.

The ceiling on beef for sale to the retailers by the packers was fixed on the basis of prices in September and October. Those are the months when beef has been cheapest in the many years I have been ranching. The reason for that is that grass fed cattle are sold in those months and grass fed cattle have cost the producer less than the fed cattle.

Now the packers having a maximum price at which they can sell beef to the local retailers have found that they cannot without loss buy the fed cattle at the prices which prevail by reason of the export market and resell to the local retailers at the ceiling price fixed by the prices and trade board.

In my opinion the remedy for this situation is not to put an embargo on the export of cattle which would have the result of lowering the price which the producer may obtain for beef cattle, but rather to adjust the ceiling fixed by the prices and trade board so that the packers could afford to buy the beef from the ranchers for sale to the local retailers in competition with the export market.

From inquiries I have made I believe the beef now on hand and in sight in Canada is well above normal. The trouble is that the price fixed is too low to keep the beef here for use in Canada.

I have heard that the representatives of the western stock growers and producers association and representatives of the government of Canada are meeting in conference in Winnipeg on Saturday, April 25. They may arrive at some satisfactory solution but in the meantime I am urging you to use your best influence against an embargo on the export of beef. If we do not fill our quota to the U.S. we may lose the privilege of that quota and not be able to regain it.

Yours very truly,

J. E. R. Lloyd.

The United States market is of tremendous importance to the stock raisers of Canada. We have never been able to market our cattle satisfactorily in Great Britain. Our logical market is the United States, and if that market should be lost it would be most unfortunate. When I received these communications I thought of bringing this matter to the attention of the house, but Wartime Food Corporation was formed about that time. I expected that this food corporation would go out on the market and buy cattle. If it was thought that cattle were being sent to the United States in too great a quantity they could have gone into the stockyards and paid ten cents a pound more and obtained the cattle needed to supply Canada's market. That action would have created harmony and good will among the ranchers of Canada. Any temporary shortage of beef that existed could have been supplied in that way and the United States quota could have been filled later. The additional cost to the treasury, if any, would have been trifling.

But that procedure was not followed. The United States buyer comes to Canada and buys a herd of cattle. He applies for per-mission to ship those cattle to the United States. Permission is refused; his cattle are seized and he is told he must go home without them. But that is not all. He must wait in Canada until the cattle are sold, and then he is paid for the cattle in Canadian money. He brought into Canada United States currency to buy the cattle, but when they are sold he is paid in Canadian money. But Canadian money is of little use to him here, because he cannot take take it back with him across the line without a permit; and so there is the further aggravation of having to wait a number of days here until he gets a permit. The result is that when he goes back to Seattle or wherever he came from he is going to tell all the stock raisers among his friends and neighbours of the treatment he received in Canada, and in that way we are losing a great many customers that we can ill afford to lose. Not only is the man who comes up here not allowed to take his cattle away, but his neighbours and friends in the city to which he returns are told of the treatment he received, and that is hurtful to our cattle industry. Can the minister give us some assurance that this will be corrected and that it will not occur in the future?

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member for Lambton-Kent and the hon. member for Haldimand last evening raised two questions which have been discussed at some length to-day. The first one had to do with the labour supply for agriculture in different parts of Canada, more particularly in Ontario, and the second had to do with the marketing of beef. I stated last evening that I would attempt to reply to what had been said and give any information I possibly could on those two points when we were discussing this item.

I should like first to deal with the labour situation. I have said on one or two occasions that the time would come in Canadian agriculture when we would be employing perhaps all of the labour in agriculture that we could justify under war conditions. I mean by that that there are three different uses that can be made during the war of any man-power that we have in Canada. First, man-power can be used for the production of food; second, it can be used for the production of war munitions and war equipment; and third, to provide men for the armed forces. It goes without saying that up to a certain point the most important part of the programme in so far as it affects man-power has to do with the first two of these three activities. Being a nation which never is prepared for war until war comes, it follows that we have to provide those things which are necessary for the maintenance of armies at the same time as we are providing the army itself, and in Canada we have been carrying on along that line. I sometimes think we had approached the point I prophesied when we attempted more or lessto freeze labour on the farms last spring.

To indicate our present position to the committee and to others interested in the labour situation in relation to farming, may I place on Hansard a few figures which are based upon the registration made in 1940, and which have been brought up to March 31, 1942. The figures are not official in this sense, that they were made up by officials of our department; that is to say they do not come from the statistics branch and probably could not be proven down to the last man.

The total male population of all ages from 16 up, eligible for work or service, is 3,900,000. Of this number there are 1,511,000 over 45. This leaves approximately 2,400,000 males between the ages of 16 and 45. The number of single men and widowers without children is 1,511,000; single men in the armed forces, 360,000; married men in the armed forces, 104,000; single men farming, 429,000; married men farming, 871,000. In each case I am giving round figures. In other primary industries—mining, lumbering and industries of that kind—there are 62,000 single men and 190,000 married men; construction industries, single men, 63,000; married men, 194,000. In all other employment, which includes clerical work, work in munitions plants and factories of all kinds all across Canada and in transportation, there are 597,000 single men and 1,800,000 married men.

Mr. SENN: Are these figures for April of this year?

Mr. GARDINER: As of March 31, computed on the basis of the registration of 1940. What I wish to point out with regard to these figures is this: There were 429,000 single men on farms, farm labourers and sons of farmers, on March 31 last, about the time we attempted to freeze labour on the farm.

The only other large pool of labour, single men, is the last group, consisting of 597,000 employed in all other activities other than the primary industries. In leaving those figures with the committee I wish to emphasize that there are only two large pools of man-power, single men, from which more men can be drawn for military service if we require large numbers of men in the military service of this country. One is the 429,000 on the farms, and the other is the 597,000 in all other employment. Many of the 125,000 engaged in primary industries and construction would be frozen there if we were following the freezing policy throughout. Those are the two large groups from which the men would be required to be drawn if we desire greatly to increase our armed forces.

The other point I wish to make in connection with these figures is this. We have made remarkable advances in our production upon farms since the war started. I do not know that I would care to place a long list of figures upon the record in that regard, but someone has said, and I think it comes from the economics branch of our own department, that if you make a careful survey of the year 1938 and of the production values of 1938 and then make a careful survey of the last complete year, you will find that there has been a 40 per cent increase in the value of farm production in Canada as between 1938

But that does not give the picture I am desiring to give at the moment. I am trying to show to the committee that there has been an actual increase in the production of our farm commodities, which of course leaves out of consideration the prices obtained for them. In 1938 we marketed 3,700,000 hogs, and this year we are attempting to market, and probably will succeed in marketing, about 7,000,000, almost double the number. We [Mr. Gardiner.]

marketed 1,183,000 cattle in 1939, and 1,400,000 in 1942, or an increase of 220,000 in 1942 as compared with 1939. But I would emphasize the fact that since the war began we have not been pushing, until this year, an increase in the production of beef cattle, the reason being largely that we were producing an increased output of those commodities which we were marketing in Britain and which Britain required in order to have increased food supplies there. We were not and we are not sending beef to Great Britain, and so we were pushing the production of dairy products and hogs.

So far as butter is concerned, we increased marketings last year by over 20,000,000 pounds as compared with the preceding year. In other words, we were maintaining production at about consumption level in butter, and that was what we aimed at. We did not expect anything better.

The cheese marketings in 1939 were 125,000,000 pounds, and the marketings this year will be about 160,000,000 pounds, so that there has been a remarkable increase in the production of this commodity.

So far as grains are concerned, there will be an increase in production in oats, barley and flax. As a matter of fact, there will be an increase in all grain products in which we have been trying to bring about greater production. In all probability there will be a decrease in the number of bushels of wheat produced, but we must remember that there has been a switching from wheat to coarse grains amounting to between seven and eight million acres as between the two periods of time. Much of that acreage has gone from wheat into coarse grains, being responsible for the increase in coarse grains.

The exports of eggs for 1939 were 8,460,000 dozen, and for 1942, 17,540,000 dozen. I think it will be agreed, from this, that there has been a remarkable production in the foods required to assist in winning the war.

There has been a similar increase in poultry. There has been an increase in all milk products during that period of time. I will not attempt to give the complete figures with regard to that increase in milk products, apart from what I have given in connection with dairy products which are required to assist in feeding the British public. I give these two sets of figures side by side to indicate that we have done a very good job in increasing food production, and we are hopeful that, with the fine crop we have all across Canada this year, and with the application to the problem of an amount of labour similar to that which we applied last year when there were less favourable crop conditions, we ought to be able to increase our food production con-siderably this year. The weather has been more friendly to us and will help towards that end. These two sets of figures should bring us to this conclusion, that from now on we shall have to do with no greater volume of labour across Canada than we have at the moment. The probabilities are that the labour which we shall have available for farms will decrease rather than increase, and an attempt will have to be made at reorganizing the labour we have and to move it from place to place, as the Minister of Labour is providing for, in order to assist in the harvesting of crops in one area at one season, and in another place at a different season, or harvesting different crops at different seasons and moving from one place to another as the season requires. That may have to be done in order to increase if possible food production in Canada, at a time when probably there will not be more labour.

Any movement of man-power will probably have to be from both of the pools I have spoken of into the armed forces rather than in any other direction.

The other question having to do with beef is one that I should like to deal with in a few words. The Minister of Finance yesterday agreed to bring down the names of the members of the advisory beef committee, but he was not able to do so at three o'clock and he suggested that I might put them on the record to-day. The prices board, as hon. members have emphasized in the discussions which have taken place, is administered in the Department of Finance, and the advisory committee is naturally appointed through the activities of that department rather than through the Department of Agriculture. I am informed, however, that all these men who are on the advisory committee, with one exception, were nominees of farm organizations, those in most provinces being nominees of the various organizations which I shall name, and some of the others being nominated by the federation of agriculture for Canada. I believe the latter applies particularly to the men named from Ontario.

The following are the beef advisory committee:

British Columbia: Leslie Cameron, Ashcroft; British Columbia Beef Cattle Growers Association.

Alberta: George C. Ross, Lethbridge; Western Stock Growers Association; H. L. Taggart, Olds; Central Alberta Cattle Feeders Association.

Saskatchewan: M. Wylie, Battle Creek; Saskatchewan Stock Growers Associationwho is well known to the hon. member for Supply-Agriculture

Maple Creek (Mr. Evans), and one gentleman, I understand, who was not nominated by a farm organization but by an official of the agricultural society in the city of Saskatoon. I refer to Alex McMillan, of Juanita, Saskatchewan, cattle feeder.

Manitoba: William Bryce, Dougald; Manitoba Federation of Agriculture.

Ontario: Stewart Brown, Shedden; Ontario Feed Cattle Committee; B. Warnicka, Barrie; Ontario Cattle Breeders Association.

Quebec: N. G. Benett, Bury.

Nova Scotia: Walter Oulton, Windsor; Maritime Federation of Agriculture. He represents the federation of the three provinces.

These are the men on the beef advisory committee. I am told they are all farming and doing nothing but farming. It will be agreed therefore that they would be regarded as representative not only of farmers but of farm organizations interested in the beef trade.

Certain statements have been made with regard to the beef situation. I am not going to give many figures but I will agree with what has been said by members who have spoken from different groups in the house, that more cattle have been marketed in the first six months in 1942 than in the first six months of 1941, and from the information we have there would appear to be as many cattle in Canada at the present time as we have had over a very considerable period of years, going back to the year following the last war, if not for a longer period than that.

The figure of weekly marketings of cattle from January 1 to July 16 last for this year were 566,984—practically 567,000. The figure for the same period a year ago was 535,693, an increase of over 30,000 head marketed in that period of time, six months and two weeks, bringing us down almost to the present time as compared with last year. That shows that the statement made that the marketings have been as high is correct. The inspected slaughterings are up just about proportionately to the figures with regard to weekly cattle marketings.

Then with regard to exports, the suggestion was made by the hon. member for Calgary East that the shipments to the United States during the last two weeks have been comparatively low, but that is not true of the first six months of this year. During the first six months of this year we exported to the United States just about twice the number we did in the first six months of 1941. The round figures would be 50,000 in 1941 and 100,000 in 1942. There is this further fact, that although our marketings in Canada have been up, the consumption of beef in Canada is up also, up even more than the marketings. One reason is that we have military camps all across Canada, and anyone who has ever been in a military camp or worked in a lumber or railway camp knows that men enjoy beef more than any other meat when they are working at hard labour out in the open air, particularly in the summer time. They eat it in a manner which does dispose of a considerable quantity. We are having that experience in Canada at the present time. The best of our beef is going to the military camps. A higher price is being paid for what goes to military camps than anywhere else. The men are being fed on the best we have and are consuming it in great quantities. In addition, there is increased purchasing power. The result is that there has been what is called a shortage, in the sense that there is a greater demand for beef in Canada than even the increased deliveries have been providing for.

It was to deal with that problem that the price board started to do something. Last fall the price board established ceiling prices on a large number of commodities, on practically everything that is on sale in Canada. Among other things they provided ceiling prices on beef-but not on cattle-at the highest rate which existed between September 15 and October 11. It so happens that the prices which then prevailed for beef did make possible a higher cattle price than prevailed at that time. The reason is obvious. That is the period at which cattle are coming off the grass in considerable numbers, the period at which in most years the price is down rather than up as compared with say July. But last year we were in a period of rising prices for cattle, brought about by the condition developing of which I spoke a short time ago, with the result that cattle did not go down to the extent that might have been expected in September, but they were down as compared with what they would have been had the cattle not been coming in in the volume they did. In other words the price probably was a half to three-quarters of a cent lower on cattle than the price prevailing for beef made possible at that time.

We started with that price on beef as the ceiling. In other words the board had said: No one may sell beef at a higher price than that; and they allowed the price of cattle to vary in relation to the price of beef. We went along fairly satisfactorily until March. Some foresaw that there would be difficulty in March, and there was some discussion even as early as January, but the first attempts to grapple with the problem in an effective way were made about the end of February and during March.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

There was a condition existing then which has been explained by hon. members this afternoon and which everyone admits. Farmers had purchased cattle last fall and put them into feeding stalls across the country with the intention of selling them on the United States market in the spring or on a Canadian market that would bear a relationship to the United States market. In other words they expected their surplus to go to the United States market. Without going into a discussion of the details of how it was brought about or what happened, all I wish to state is that the market was kept open during the second quarter of the present year, with the result that over 50,000 head of cattle went over in the first five weeks following April 1. That 50,000 was approximately the quota allowed into the United States in a quarter. After that had happened there were discussions with regard to how we might deal with the problem for the coming year. Any farmers who had put cattle in feeding lots or stalls last fall had the full benefit of the United States market in April of this year and the early part of May.

A plan was then laid down under which it was hoped to benefit by the experience we have had since September and during last year and to take care of any difficulty which might otherwise arise. Anything done had of necessity to be more or less experimental; nothing of the kind had been tried before. One of the objectives that everyone has in mind is to attempt to deal with it in such a manner as not to interfere with the quota which has been established in the United States for cattle. Another-and perhaps this has been placed first—is that we sought to retain a sufficient amount of beef in Canada to meet the requirements of our own people. This is in part because we wish to reduce our consumption of pork in Canada in order to be able to supply more bacon to Great Britain than we otherwise would be able to supply. So that in addition to establishing a ceiling price for a commodity that enters greatly into the cost of living, an attempt is being made to retain a position where not too great demands will be made upon pork which the British require, and which we are informed they are even more anxious to have during the coming year than they were during last year.

Having said that I should like to say that there was a certain price level established last year in connection with the marketing of beef, and I will give a few figures to indicate what it was. There was no great change in the price from October to January. For example, the price of good steers on October 2, was $9.06 per hundred at Toronto. That is for good steers-all these prices are for good steers at Toronto. The last week in October the price was $8.71-that is the average for the week. For the last week in November it was $8.64. For the last week in December it was $8.98 and for the first week in January $9.30. For the last week in February it was $9.75, and for the last week in March $9.87. During that period it will be noted that there was a variation of about a cent a pound. There was very little variation until December, and then an increase of about a cent a pound in January and February. The price in the last week of March was $9.87, still not a very considerable increase, though during the month it was up to 10 cents for one week. In April, taking the last week of the month in each case, the price was $10.69, in May, $11.69, and in June, $12.90. During the week of July 16, which is the last week for which I have the figures here, the price was down to $10.66.

The intention of the food corporation is to take advantage of this experience-and I may say their intention is in line with the recommendations made by the federation of agriculture and others across Canada-and try to establish a price level in the fall of the year which will make it possible to take in feeders in the fall, feed them through the winter and deliver them in the spring. I would ask hon. members to keep in mind what I stated in the beginning, that the price level for beef made possible a higher price for cattle than prevailed last fall, but probably I should also say that the price of cattle during certain days in the month of June was higher than the ceiling price of beef would have permitted. There has been a sliding scale provided for beef for the coming year, beginning at the same level in September as last year but running up to a level which would make it possible to pay an amount equivalent to the extra cost of keeping cattle from the fall of the year until the spring as compared with feeding them on the grass. I would emphasize the fact that this is a ceiling price, not an assured price. This year, however, when there was not an assured price, we had the experience during certain weeks in June of obtaining more for the cattle than any assured price could have given. There is always the possibility that for a limited period of time that or even the reverse may develop under conditions now obtaining. This is guarded against by a proviso which has not been emphasized in any publicity I have seen or during this discussion.

As I said a moment ago, one of the objectives of the price board, the Department of Agriculture and others interested has been to maintain the position we have occupied in the

Supply-Agriculture

United States, in relation to our quota. The first part of the arrangement which holds cattle in Canada is the only part that has been in operation so far, and for that reason we have been hearing the criticisms without being in a position to state the advantages which may accrue. I believe the hon. member for Maple Creek said some four thousand cattle had been marketed in the United States during the weeks immediately following July 1, as compared with a considerably larger number last year. But this further fact should be stated, that the food corporation has taken possession of a similar number of cattle, though I have not the exact figures, which they have kept in Canada and for which they have paid what is considered to be the equivalent of the American price. The arrangement is that the cattle exported to the United States and those purchased by this corporation are to be added together, and that until the two make up the total figure of the United States quota, which is 51,720, then the assured price in Canada in relation to cattle being marketed here will be one which will compare favourably with the price for export cattle in the United States. It is considered that under this arrangement farmers who sell during that period-it may not be quite the same farmers, and there may be that criticism-will receive the American price for as great a number of cattle as would have been the case under the conditions which existed previously. That leaves out of consideration the fact that onethird, let us say, of the cattle coming up for the American market are taken by the food corporation, and only two-thirds go to the United States. Leaving that one-third on this market would have a tendency to depress the market during the latter part of the period. The undertaking which has not been emphasized is this, that during that period of time the same corporation is prepared to hold up the price to the ceiling, by providing, either through the purchase or otherwise, that cattle are exported from Canada to the United States until the quota is completely filled. In effect that should have the result, if we have the cattle to market, of placing as many cattle in the United States as would have gone there under a market that was not controlled at all. We have not yet gone far enough or had enough experience to be absolutely sure that it will work out in this way, but that is the intention of those who are attempting to establish the plan at the present time.

The suggestion has been made that there is a falling price, but I think it should be said that it is not the intention of the price board or of the Department of Agriculture that the price should keep on falling, so far as ceilings are an indication of price, after we have reached the basic period and reestablished the basic ceiling as of last year. From there on the ceiling price will be a rising price. With that information not distributed as widely as it might have been, I can understand some farmers being stampeded into rushing their cattle to a falling market; but I believe that when the farmers fully understand the situation-and other than the fact that sufficient publicity has not been given to it there is no reason why they should not understand it-the danger would be of the opposite nature, that there might be a tendency to hold back cattle and thus keep down the supply for the time being. But let me repeat that it is not necessary for cattle to remain at the level of last fall in order to be sold under the beef ceiling of last fall. Cattle prices can go considerably higher than they were last fall and still come under the price ceiling for beef then established.

I wanted to make those facts clear, because soon hon. members will be going home to their constituencies and I should like them to understand the arrangement as it now exists in connection with the cattle market.

Mr. EVANS: There was one matter I intended to bring to the attention of the minister in connection with the feeders. I stated that they contracted their cattle over the year in order to have a steady flow into the yards. The information I get from the west is that these feeders have contracted for cattle for September and October delivery at around 11 and 114 cents, but that now they are going to step out of the contracts and lose their deposits because these feeder cattle are down below that level.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry to have to say that the only prices which are out up to the present are the zone prices which were referred to, and they have been established only down to the period from September 14 to December 30; that is, for beef. At that level beef is approximately 31 cents lower than during the period immediately prior to July 12. In reply to the hon. member for Maple Creek I would say that, apart from the reason that people did not have the facts which were available, there was no real reason for making any agreements to deliver since about the third week in June in the expectation of any prices higher than those which I have indicated, because the statement was given out at that time that the policy I am now outlining was the policy which would be followed. I am certain that it was pretty well understood in western Canada, because I took the trouble myself [Mr. Gardiner.]

to go to the offices of the farm organization in Saskatchewan, in the city of Regina, and explain the matter in detail, as I am explaining it now, in the very week in which the announcement was issued. Therefore any deals which were made on that basis since that time would be made with the facts. Of course those made before would be without the facts.

I must admit, too, that there were deals made last year. Cattle were retained in Alberta by United States citizens, and fed in Canada with Canadian feed, on the assumption that the cattle could be sold at a certain price this year, or at whatever prices might be prevailing this year. When their cattle were taken by the corporation they had a grievance, and that grievance has been pretty well satisfied by the action of the food corporation since that time.

Generally speaking, however, I think the men who are buying cattle for feeder lots can be assured that the prices paid for beef will establish a relationship of prices very similar to those which would have had to prevail during this last year in order to make provision for the necessary rise of about $1\frac{3}{4}$ to 2 cents a pound on cattle, as between the fall of the year and the spring of the year, if one were going to feed them. But the basic price from which we must start under the plan is the price of last fall, with the amount added which I indicated a few moments ago.

I believe that is all that is necessary for me to say. If there are any questions, I shall try to answer them.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The minister has given some figures with respect to man-power or labour on the farm. He gave figures as to the numbers frozen on farms and the numbers available in industry. I do not think he proved his point. One of his colleagues, the Minister of National Defence, speaking recently, stated that every man in this country should be put where he was able to produce the most in the interests of the nation, whether in agriculture or otherwise. Then, speaking recently, the Minister of National War Services said that there was in Canada a voluntary enlistment of some 505,000 people. About the same date a return brought down showed that voluntary enlistments from Quebec were only some 75,000. In other words, this means that one great province with a population amounting to about one-third of the total population in Canada has made a voluntary enlistment contribution of approximately one-seventh of the total enlistments.

One of the prairie provinces which practises mass production along agricultural lines has the record of the greatest per capita enlistment in the dominion. As a result, they have a grave farm help situation. There is a scarcity of efficient farm help. The Minister of Agriculture has suggested that it will be necessary to move labour so that the country may take care of this condition. I wonder if he would suggest that those young men in the prairie provinces should quit farming and go into the armed forces, young men who can operate farm equipment which can do the work a dozen men used to do less than a generation ago in the production of foodstuffs? Does he suggest that those young men, some of whom may have aged parents who cannot carry on alone, should join the armed forces? Does he suggest that young men of this kind should join the armed forces, and that men from this eastern province, men who are totally untrained and inexperienced in farm labour and farm equipment, or methods of mass production, should take their places? Does he suggest that those young men from that eastern province should assist us in the production of foodstuffs at this time? Is that the policy he is advocating?

Mr. GARDINER: I was not thinking in terms of any province or any particular area.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What about the nation?

Mr. GARDINER: I was thinking more particularly of the movement of men within a province. I do not think they would be moved very far under the system of which I have been speaking. The fact is that at the present time the Minister of Labour has an agreement with Ontario, an agreement which is to be made the basis of agreements with other provinces. That agreement provides for the movement of labour within Ontario. What I had in mind was that a man may pick apples at one time; he may harvest hay at another time or harvest grain at some other time. Through certain movements of labour it would be possible to take care of labour shortages.

Then, we have taken one further step. An arrangement has been entered into with our United States friends whereby, when their combine outfits get to the Canadian boundary line they may come across, and proceed with their activities without any difficulty. They will not be charged duty on machinery they are using, provided they take it back when they are through with the job.

A further arrangement I had in mind is one now being carried out in Saskatchewan. I refer to the organization of urban centres. As men who come from the west are aware, in harvest time there are very few farmers who come to the town to do business in the daytime, unless it be to get repairs for implements. The practice was followed in the last war of keeping a skeleton organization in a place of business. That organization was composed chiefly of women. The men go out to work in the harvest fields during the greater part of the week, and on Saturday nights they come to town and carry on their ordinary business. That practice is being worked out again in western Canada. Provincial governments are encouraging it, and I believe Saskatchewan has probably gone farther up to the moment than some of the other provinces, because of the great wheat crop in that province. However, the plan is progressing in all the provinces, and there is the possibility of an agreement being entered into to assist in the financing of that arrangement.

That was the movement I had in mind. I had not the idea that we would attempt anything in agriculture by way of adjusting any other matters which may concern some people in connection with enlistments.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I thought we were discussing this matter from a national point of view. After all, this is a federal government. If the minister thinks we should continue along the line that while our womanfolk in one section take over business organization or work of production, whereas in another section of the country our young men are not going into the armed forces, well, I have not much more to say about the matter.

Mr. McCUBBIN: What other section does the hon. member mean?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I mentioned one of the great provinces, Quebec. Perhaps they operate under a different system from what we do. However, I gave the figures to substantiate what I said. Does that answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. McCUBBIN: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Very well, then. I am pleased that the minister made the statement he did about the matter of equipment coming across the boundary line from the United States, because I believe that to a great extent that will assist in the harvesting of the crop we have in the west. That is a step in the right direction. But that has very little to do with the man-power situation.

The minister's explanation about the cattle situation still leaves an element of chance in future months for stock feeders. I do not believe this price ceiling will encourage many people to go into a very heavy feeding of cattle during this winter.

Mr. O'NEILL: I have been pleased to receive the information placed on Hansard by the minister with respect to the price ceiling. It is well known to all of us who know anything about cattle that the cattle industry, especially that part of it in the west, was for a long time a depressed industry. Now that the farmers do have a chance to get a little better price for their beef, the price ceiling is put on. I am quite in agreement that there must be a price ceiling on beef, just the same as a price ceiling on anything else might be necessary. But it seems to me that if there must be a price ceiling, then there should be a price floor below which a buyer could not offer, when purchasing stock. That price floor does not exist. It is impossible for the producer to understand this multiplicity of regulations, and an opportunity is offered to the packer or the buyer to resort to sharp practices in order to obtain cattle at a lower price.

At the present time a P.O.R .- pay on rail -system is being advocated, but the producers in my section of the country are opposed to this. The fact that it now appears that that system will be introduced does not reassure the producer that he will get the price to which he thinks he is entitled. In substantiation of the statement I made a moment ago that the door would be left open for sharp practices on the part of the buyers, a paper published in my district carried an article in its issue of July 10, to the effect that a rancher had dropped $500 in a cattle deal. According to the article it would appear that a buyer for one of the large packing houses had induced a cattle rancher to accept a lower price for some of his cattle. I do not know whether he referred to them as beef, but he may have. He claimed that there was a price ceiling on beef, and he induced the rancher to sell his stock for less than he should have. I have written to men in the west who I think would be in a position to give me accurate information, but I have not yet received it. The house will adjourn in two or three days, or probably in less than a week, and should I get the information I would not be able to do anything about it until next year.

Mr. GARDINER: That point was raised by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin): I understand that the hon. member's suggestion is that the buyers are saying that the price paid on the market for cattle being purchased from the government under this plan is quoted as the buying price for cattle on the market. This matter has been discussed before. I thought the situation had been corrected, but I am not certain that it has. In any event, an attempt [Mr. J. A. Ross.] is being made to correct it. The price that should be quoted is the price the government pay for the cattle, that is the United States price, not the price which the government get for the cattle when they sell them to the packing house.

Mr. SENN: How does the farmer know that the cattle are destined for the United States market? When they are purchased the drover may say they are for the Canadian market, in which event the lower price would prevail.

Mr. GARDINER: The drover can sell the cattle on the market at the United States price. He has no right to say that he is selling them to the packer at a lower price. If he does not sell them on the United States market, he sells them to the government at the United States price. That is the price the farmer ought to receive until the United States quota has been filled.

Mr. O'NEILL: I am glad the minister has made that explanation, but it seems to me that he should go a little farther. These price ceilings are tied in with our financial structure. Whether we agree with them or not, that is the way in which the government is attempting to finance this war. Penalties should be imposed upon those who induce a producer to sell at a lower price by making misrepresentations that the regulations permit only a certain price being paid. If the article to which I referred is correct, this buyer should be forced to return the $500 to the rancher, and told in no uncertain terms that if a repetition of that practice occurred, he would not be in business any longer. Unless the government takes some drastic action, I do not see how it will be able to continue this price system.

The constituency of Kamloops probably raises more than half the sheep raised in British Columbia. The government is asking us to increase the production of wool. There are two ways in which that can be done. One is to save the ewe lambs that would otherwise go to the market, and the other is to stop the inroads made by predatory animals. If the ewe lambs are to be withdrawn from the market, the farmer will have to be paid for the cost of maintaining these lambs beyond the time they would normally be sent to market.

I know the minister will say that the matter of predatory animals is something for the provincial government. However, we should not overlook the fact that the provinces have given up to the dominion many fields of remunerative taxation. When the dominion is asking the provinces to increase the production of wool or of any other product, it should be prepared to assist the provinces. I do not think the provinces can afford to pay more by way of a bounty on predatory animals than they are paying at the present time. Unless the bounty is increased to a point where it will be profitable to hunt these animals, their numbers will not be cut down. There are three bad ones in British Columbia, the cougar, the wolf and the coyote. I mention these things to the minister in the hope that something may be done.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): In endeavouring to maintain these ceiling prices and be fair both to the consumer and to the raisers of beef, the food corporation has a very difficult task on its hands. At the present time there are two prices for cattle prevailing on the Toronto market. Those who are exporting cattle sell them on the Toronto market. If the corporation requisitions the cattle, it buys them at the export or United States price. But the small farmer who sends cattle into the general market to be sold to the local butchers sells his cattle for the best price he can get. Consequently there are two distinct prices on the Toronto market.

The other question I should like to bring up is in connection with the seasonal drop in the price of cattle which is being maintained by the price ceiling. This takes care of the feeder fairly well, but the grass feeder is under a handicap. This man buys his cattle in the spring, say in May, when the price ceiling is up, puts them on the grass during the summer, and then sells them when the price ceiling is low. I do not see how this man can hold his position against the feeder who markets his cattle at the price-ceiling figure.

As I mentioned last night, intensified farming is largely carried on in southwestern Ontario and the labour problem is acute. We shall have to have a labour organization to handle our sugar beets next year. Perhaps bringing some more of our Japanese friends from the Pacific coast may assist in solving the problem.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Queens): With regard to the two prices on the Toronto market, does the trader, when he brings his cattle in, have to get an export permit before the board takes the cattle over and pays him on the basis of the United States price?

Mr. GARDINER: The men who are dealing in cattle for the United States apply for a permit, and the assumption is that they get it if they apply for it. When a man goes out to buy cattle which he intends to ship to the United States, buys cattle in Winnipeg, for example, to ship to the United States, he purchases them on the Winnipeg market, and the government takes the cattle through the food corporation. They estimate what he would have got for those cattle in Minneapolis, and then pay that price, less the freight. He might have a permit to export them, but it does not necessarily mean that they will be exported. If the cattle were sold for consumption in Winnipeg, the government would have no reason for touching them. I can understand that there may be two prices. There always have been two prices, and there is more than one reason for that. Sometimes cattle are sent in which are not in the pink of condition. Again, there may be difficulty in making up a carload at some particular time. Those cattle may not bring as good a price as a whole carload to go to the United States. Cattle may be brought in to the local market at a time when there are no cattle going to the United States. There are so many reasons that members can guess them for themselves as well as I can.

Mr. WRIGHT: We have a ceiling price but no floor. The only guarantee the producer has that he will receive a price for his live stock is to keep the market scarce, because if he raises a few extra head, prices go down. That should not be the policy of the government—to discourage production. But just as soon as a few extra head of cattle come on the market, the price goes below the ceiling price. That has been the experience in the past and will be in the future, once the United States quota is filled.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member for Melfort comes from an area where they have one of the best cooperative live stock organizations for marketing live stock to be found anywhere in Canada. They can very easily organize to have cattle or any other live stock sold in different markets. Cattle can be sold in the United States market, through the trade, or through farm organizations, when permits could not be obtained for selling cattle in the United States, which would guarantee the United States price as the floor price so long as the quota is not filled. If the quota is filled, the corporation has undertaken-this has not been explained to the public-to maintain a floor up to the ceiling price for beef with the proper relationship between the price of cattle and the selling price for beef.

Mr. WRIGHT: What is that?

Mr. GARDINER: It will depend upon the place and the time. It will be higher in June, for example, than in September, but there is a relationship between the two which my hon. friend can work out just as closely as I can. There are understandings as to what it ought to be which have been pretty well worked out in the department and in the trade; and if at any time the Department of Agriculture considers that a proper relationship is not being maintained, we will certainly represent on behalf of the farmers of this country that the corporation should buy those cattle and send them to the United States until the ceiling price is maintained in Canada. That is not fully understood in Canada. There is only one period when there is not a floor; that is after the United States quota is completely filled, and then there may be a week or two at the end of that period when farmers would be compelled to hold their cattle.

Mr. WRIGHT: I think if publicity were given to the relationship between the ceiling price and the actual price, it would prevent what the hon. member for Kamloops has told us about, namely, buyers going throughout the country and, because the farmers did not know the regulations, deceiving them as to what they should get. I think the government would be well advised to give more publicity to that relationship.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a difficulty about that. There are so many different kinds of cattle going on the market, and they are marketed under so many different conditions. But the officials of the department know what the relationship ought to be at markets like Winnipeg, Toronto and Calgary, where the situation can be watched very closely. We have men there who can watch it. We expect the corporation itself will look after that. The officials of the department are also keeping a check on it, and an attempt will be made by both to guarantee the ceiling price on cattle as long as there is a market anywhere else for them at a higher price or even at that price.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We all appreciate the difficulty which the government is encountering in finding men for the armed forces, for the munitions industries and for agriculture. When the Prime Minister spoke in this house on the 24th of March with reference to the orders in council he brought down he said, as reported at page 1567 of Hansard:

On the other hand, the growing scarcity of labour on the farms and the increasing importance of maintaining, and, indeed, of increasing food production, has been recognized. This has been accomplished by a fundamental alteration of the policy regarding compulsory military training and service where such service touches persons wholly or mainly employed in agriculture.

From what the minister said this afternoon there has been a change in government policy with respect to the calling up of men engaged in agriculture. I have no quarrel with that.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

It is a matter of government policy, and the farmers of Canada will have to adjust themselves to whatever changes must be made, but I think the farmers should be notified as soon as possible as to what consideration they are going to be given. Could the minister give any information as to the number of men who have been called from farms in a province like Saskatchewan since the end of March as compared with the numbers called a year ago for the corresponding months? Did the order in council, P.C. 2252, which the Prime Minister brought down, actually make any change in the policy being followed by the Department of National War Services in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the figures for Saskatchewan or any of the other provinces for the period mentioned. The only figure I have is the total number called from farms, or enlisted from farms, into the army and into war services, including both the army and factories making munitions. The total number from farms is 215,000; that is the decrease in population on the farms across Canada as a result of the fact that men have gone from the farms into one or other of the activities. Our own department put out a publication to which I would refer hon. members, which is called "Farm Labour in War Time". It was put out in July in mimeographed form, and hon. members can get copies of it. I would advise them to get this publication. It can give only an estimate, but the estimate is based on facts gathered across Canada with regard to the whole manpower in connection with agriculture. I would suggest that the hon, member read that publication, because it will give more information than I can.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does it give figures since last March?

Mr. GARDINER: I hardly think so. It is based on a survey of farm labour on 5,218 farms in Canada, in February and March, preceding the time when the decision was made. All I can say with regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie is that, generally speaking, the boards have been attempting to carry out the spirit of the regulations as they were laid down. I must admit that in some cases, if the information I have is correct, they would probably have leaned toward the side of the army, while in others they might have leaned in the opposite direction. But it is very difficult for boards to handle individual cases in a manner that would satisfy everyone. I get as many complaints from one side as from the other.

Mr. BOUCHER: Do these figures give the total enlistments together with the total number of men in the three armed services and factories, separating munitions workers from the men in the forces?

Mr. GARDINER: That figure is the total reduction of people on farms brought about by enlistments and those going into factories in 1941 as compared with 1940, but it does not include 1939. I went through the volume only hurriedly, but anyone reading it carefully will get a better idea.

Mr. PERLEY: Does that refer to volunteers, or does it include trainees?

Mr. GARDINER: It includes all men who have gone from the farms.

Mr. SENN: I have listened with much interest to the minister's statement with regard to the beef situation. His address may be divided into two parts, that dealing with labour and that in regard to the beef situation. I do not intend to say anything further about labour, except that undoubtedly there is a shortage of labour on farms at the present time. That is inevitable. I do not think anyone is to blame for it, but on the other hand I believe and have always believed that had selective service been brought in immediately after registration, a good many men would have been saved to the farms who are more valuable there than in the armed services, while others might have gone who are not so valuable. I will leave it at that.

I was very much interested in what the minister said about beef. His explanation is, after all, rather involved. I tried to follow it as closely as I could, and I am frank enough to say that I was not altogether convinced, partly because I do not understand some of his arguments, and some of the explanations he made. I am afraid that will be true not only of some other members but more than ever true in the country, particularly among the cattle raisers themselves. His explanation only serves to a greater or less extent to show the muddle that exists at present. It is a muddle that exists at least in the minds of the producers, and in my opinion it is the producers whom we should attempt now to reassure so far as this particular position is concerned.

As a matter of fact, in spite of what the minister may say, I am of the opinion that producer prices are not controlled in the way they should be. If there is going to be a ceiling on carcass prices, there should be some assurance to the producer himself that the price he receives will be based on the ceiling price, or, as the minister says, on the United States or export price. No matter what the minister may say-and I am not altogether disputing his words-I am afraid there are two prices in Canada; in fact, I am certain there are. One is based on the export price, and one is based on the domestic price of beef. Try as he may and as the department may, and try as the wartime prices and trade board may and will, so long as drovers are buying cattle and going into the country and offering prices, and until farmers are united in some kind of cooperative organization, there will be two prices, and this whole situation will not be cleared up until some further action is taken. There are no two ways about it, that although the producers' price is not controlled, neither is the consumers' price controlled at the present time.

I saw a statement in the press not long ago that the wartime prices and trade board were trying to set prices for twenty-nine or thirty different cuts of beef. So far as I understand, that has not been done up to the moment. What takes place is this. The retailer can charge almost any price he likes. I go to him and buy a steak, and I say, "That is a higher price than the price set down for the basic period of last fall." All he has to say to me is, "Well, that is a better quality of beef; it is a better steak than the one you bought last fall." There is no way of getting around it. I do not see how it is possible to set prices for twenty-nine or thirty different cuts, and as far as I can learn they have not been published up to the present time. I am not speaking in a critical way at all. I am only pointing out to the minister what exists, and what I believe exists in Ontario in the minds of the producer. I refer to Ontario particularly because that is the part of the country with which I am best acquainted.

The whole marketing system for cattle is haphazard and confusing to the minds of producers, and this situation is largely because of the action of the wartime prices and trade board. It robs the producer of any feeling of security. I have on more than one occasion pointed out that the farmers have to make their plans a considerable time ahead if they are to raise cattle or any other kind of farm product. They must plan ahead, and under the present system what assurance have they of what the price will be? It only adds to the gamble they are taking. It seems to me that something should be done to assure the farmers and producers that they will get a reasonable price.

The minister tried to explain the matter, but I am frank to say I could not understand how under the present system the farmer is going to have any assurance that if he buys cattle as he did this spring and will want to do next fall, he is going to be assured of a fair return when those cattle go on the market. There is need of some assurance further than has been given. Frankly, the minister's explanation was so involved that I do not fully understand it.

Mr. REID: It is my opinion—and I say this meaning no offence to any hon. member that we have been wasting a great deal of time this afternoon to no purpose, because the Minister of Agriculture has nothing to do with the price of beef. I would propose to the government that in order to get out of the impasse as far as agricultural prices are concerned there should be set up a ministry of economic warfare, and the men in charge should be deputy ministers so that the minister would be responsible to this house. You can make all the speeches you like to the Minister of Agriculture, but in the final analysis Mr. Gordon is the man. We are making representations to the wrong minister, good as he is, and he is a good minister.

Mr. PERLEY: I am as anxious to get through as anyone, but I take issue with the hon. member for New Westminster. We have not wasted much time here this afternoon: we have voted already, I think, some thirty items in about three hours. We listened to a very interesting statement from the minister, one that has given us much information. He dealt with the labour question. That was worth while. Much more could be said. The labour situation is becoming so serious that some industries in this country, those not directly concerned with the production of munitions, gold mining for instance, may be closed. I was very much interested in his statement, and I think it was worth while. He dealt with production, giving us much information in that regard, and then dealt with the advisory committee. There have been many worthwhile suggestions made to the minister. I am going to make this further suggestion, that his department is the one that should be in charge of this whole price-fixing set-up as far as agricultural products are concerned, beef and live stock, wheat and dairy products. The price board is not doing the job as I think he would have done it as far as agriculture is concerned. I offer this suggestion, that there should be a reorganization with respect to this price-fixing, and that agricultural products should be under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture.

What has been the reaction of the minister to the recent drop in prices of live stock?

Mr. GARDINER: I assume the hon. member means cattle?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes.

[Mr. Senn.]

Mr. GARDINER: Of course farmers always object to prices going down; anybody does. But no one can tell until some time has passed what effect it will have on the marketing of cattle.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): As to the question raised by the hon. member for New Westminster about wasting time and having the wrong minister, I would remind him that on July 1 when I was speaking on the budget I asked the Minister of Finance, who I think is the proper minister who has control if there is any control of this price-ceiling set-up, to make a statement of the situation, either he or the Minister of Agriculture. They were both in the house at the time. Therefore I think we are justified in trying to get some information here when we could not get it from the Minister of Finance. I agree with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. I have always been—

Mr. REID: And myself.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And the hon, member himself, yes. I have always been unable to discover why we should have the Minister of Agriculture responsible only for production, and one of the greatest agricultural commodities produced, that is wheat, handled by the Department of Trade and Commerce. To me that is not a sensible set-up. The government should make some adjustment, and I would say that the Minister of Agriculture should be responsible for the marketing of our products as well as the production. The present is not a sane, feasible organization at all.

Mr. HATFIELD: I understand that the United States minister of agriculture has complete control over prices of agricultural products in that country. Is that not correct?

Mr. GARDINER: I appreciate very much the confidence hon. members seem to have in the Department of Agriculture and in myself. But I doubt very much if it will get us far to discuss the question here. I had hopes when I started this morning of keeping an appointment to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock, which I am afraid I must give up. But the time has gone by for that, and I am quite prepared to go on with the discussion.

Mr. HATFIELD: Does the United States minister of agriculture have control of agricultural prices in that country?

Mr. GARDINER: He has to a certain degree.

Mr. FAIR: What is the cattle population of Canada at present compared with a year ago?

Mr. GARDINER: The figures are not out for the present year. The figure for all cattle in 1941 was 8,806,000; for the previous year, 8,565,000; for the year before that, 8,474,000; and for the year before that, 8,500,000. That is as of June in each year.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In a return brought down on April 29 I think it gives the figure for June 1, 1941, as 8,797,000. It shows a decrease of 42,500 since 1937.

Mr. GARDINER: There are two sets of figures out in connection with some live stock, depending on how they are taken and where. One is made up by the Department of Agriculture, the other by the Department of Trade and Commerce. These are presumed to be the figures of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This is a return by the government on April 29.

Mr. GARDINER: Here is a statement which has a bearing on this matter. It is estimated that cattle particularly beef cattle, are being sold at thirty pounds heavier weight, and that is figured on by some making the calculation, figuring the numbers from that.

Mr. HATFIELD: May I have an answer to my question?

Mr. GARDINER: The United States minister of agriculture has, I think, to give consent in many cases, but I notice that in dealing with some prices not even he has control; the house seems to have control.

Mr. FAIR: That is the way it should be here.

Mr. BOUCHER: The hon. member for New Westminster has pulled out of the woods a live hornets' nest in his statement that a great deal of time has been lost this afternoon. It was lost only to the extent of the inability of the Department of Agriculture to handle a very sore grievance held by the farmers of Canada. Here we have the Minister of Agriculture for the dominion, charged with responsibility for the production of agricultural commodities, limited by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as far as our export market is concerned, admitting that this export market has a great deal to do with better prices for agriculture, yet completely blocked by the action of the dictator of prices, as I would call him; that is, by Mr. Gordon, a man who is not responsible to this House of Commons. I believe the suggestion of the hon. member for New Westminster with regard to a ministry of economic production or economic warfare is something which should be given every consideration by the government.

Supply-Agriculture

Let us look at the situation in Canada. We had a price ceiling applied late in the fall when, as everyone knows, prices of agricultural commodities are probably at their lowest during the entire year. Now, to bolster up that price ceiling we have a subsidy, again governed by the wartime prices and trade board. We have the export market set at one figure and the domestic market at another. We have a price ceiling which seems to have gone entirely out of control, as far as prices to the consumer are concerned, since the retailer must charge and the consumer must pay prices dictated but not controlled by any proper machinery, if machinery could effect any control. All this is going on at a time when commodities, particularly meat, are scarce, on account of exports of dairy cattle from this part of the country. Take a conglomeration like that-I think that is about the only expression I can use to describe it-and how could one expect the control of prices to be satisfactorily administered by a man who is not directly charged with the responsibility of administering production, a man who is not required to come to this house in order to get the benefit or the disadvantage, according to the point of view, of the views of those who have been elected as the people's representatives? In addition, this man is not charged with the responsibility of cooperating with farmers; probably he has not had much experience with farm problems, and so far as I know he may not be readily reached by the representations of farm organizations. When that is summed up, the situation becomes not only preposterous but grotesque. For that reason I feel that at a time like this, even at this late stage of the session and at the risk of delaying the adjournment of this house, we should try to have the Department of Agriculture given much more power in connection with controlling or regulating the actions of the price controller. If that could be done, I think we would have dealt with an important matter concerning one of the most fundamental industries in Canada to-day. We all know that while agricultural production is most necessary, labour is very scarce and prices have been largely neglected.

Take the situation right here in Ottawa at the present time in regard to milk. I give that just as an illustration. To-day the price of milk in Ottawa to the consumer is exactly the same as it was in the days of the depression. Then look at the retail price of beef and see how it compares with the price in depression days. These things are the cause of great discontent; and in war time the morale of the agriculturist, as well as that of the soldier and all the rest of us, must be built up. Those who produce agricultural commodities in this country must have a thorough understanding of the man who is in charge of their industry, the man to whom they must make their representations. It does not seem sensible that they should have first to consult the Minister of Agriculture, be sent by him to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and then be told that they must go to Mr. Gordon. This situation is not conducive to peace of mind, nor is it conducive to efficiency.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wanted to ask the minister a question with reference to this matter of farm labour, which he mentioned a few moments ago. One of the most pressing problems confronting western agriculture to-day, and for the next few weeks, is that of farm labour. There are prospects of a magnificent crop, but a great many farmers are afraid they will not be able to take it off on account of the shortage of farm labour. That would be a tragedy, when feed is needed for cattle and when people in other countries may have to be fed in the event of an allied victory.

Has any approach been made by the minister's department to the defence ministers, to see if it would not be possible to have men released from the armed services in order to help in harvesting and threshing operations? I realize quite well that the defence ministers are not going to take very kindly to this, because it is a great headache to military officers to have to arrange for leave and all that sort of thing. I know that last spring, when leaves were granted so that men might assist in spring seeding, it meant a great deal of work for the officers. On the other hand, however, I know that thousands of acres of land would not have been seeded if the government had not arranged to permit these young men to go home for two weeks or thirty days. I realize, of course, that many of these men cannot be relieved of their duties. I believe, however, that there are many who could. I noticed last fall that many men in the British army were allowed to go into the fields to aid in harvesting the crops. I noticed also that in Russia, in spite of the fact that they were fighting an invading army, some of their men were released for the harvest, because it is still true that an army fights on its stomach and that a nation can resist only if it is fed. After all, to some extent we are the granary of the united nations, and we need to garner not only grain but other food for ourselves, for the people of Great Britain and for our allies.

In many of these training camps there are thousands of young men who have taken part of their training. The training day is fairly short. Men who are well advanced, who have finished [Mr. Boucher.] their training quickly, might be released for two weeks or thirty days, and I believe they would find it quite easy to catch up when they came back. Part of each day is devoted to physical training and other things which a man could afford to miss, particularly if he were going to do work which would keep him in excellent physical condition so that he would not be likely to become flabby or soft.

It seems to me that this matter should be discussed seriously. I do not know what the problem is going to amount to. A short time ago the minister said there was not going to be any more labour available. I would go farther and say there is going to be less labour available; that the so-called freezing of men on the farms has not worked out as it was hoped, because ever since last March many men have left the farms to go into the army and for one reason or another. While the minister's suggestions are excellent, in connection with using people from stores and so on, I am afraid many of these people would not be of much use on farms. Here we have thousands of physically fit young men, many of whom came from farms, some of whom are trained to handle mechanical equipment such as tractors, combines and binders. It seems to me sheer folly to have them in one part of Canada, while part of our crop goes to waste in another part. Therefore I would ask the minister whether any representations have been made in this connection to the defence departments?

Mr. GARDINER: I believe all farm organizations have made representations to the Department of Agriculture, as well as to the military departments. The answer which has been given was the one given to the house a few days ago to the effect that it would be very difficult for the army to arrange for men to go out, say, to harvest hay in one season for two weeks; then immediately following that to go out to harvest crops for another two weeks, and then following that to go out to save some fruit crops, and so on. One has only to recite that procedure to indicate that if the army tried to meet all those requests, the men would not be in training very much of the year. Of course, having said that much, and having taken that position as a matter of policy, the Minister of National Defence went on to say that there would be exceptions. There are men who have had their training and who have not yet been stationed in a particular place. Those men would be entitled to some leave in any event, and those leaves may be lengthened. There are other cases where hardships can be proven at home because of conditions which have developed since the men involved were taken into the army. In those cases leave is permitted. There are many cases of that kind, all of which are based upon particular circumstances. But I believe it will be agreed that it would be rather difficult to establish a blanket policy under which military men could go out into a country as widespread as this one, and take care of all the different labour problems which arise in connection with the different types of agriculture we have.

The problem in Great Britain is quite different. Five per cent of their population are on the farms, and when they take people from the other 95 per cent into the armed forces, and permit them to go out and help on the farms, it is understandable that they can do a good job. In a country so widespread as this one, however, even if we followed the same policy we would not get the same results.

Then, may I say a word about this other policy in connection with the organization to do harvesting. I believe most hon. members can recall the time when practically the whole of the crop of western Canada was harvested by just such means. We used to run harvesting excursions from eastern Canada. On those excursions were farm boys, and some from urban centres, who came west before the days when our farms were mechanized as much as they are to-day. Those boys did the harvesting job.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They were young men.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and they could do a good deal in a day, if they had the will to do it. Then, there were the men in the country towns and villages who had done a considerable amount of manual labour to keep themselves in fair shape, although their jobs may have been clerking in a store, a bank or somewhere else. At the time of the last war we found those men not only capable but very willing to go out on the farms, and I notice that already in this war some of them have organized themselves and gone out to help with the farming in certain areas. A good many have turned in their money to patriotic funds of different kinds.

These efforts are all to the good, and will go a considerable way toward harvesting the crops. Only a short time ago a delegation waited upon me, and it was clear that they were very much concerned about taking off their hay. About three weeks later a man who had met them, along with me, said to me, "Have you heard any more about the hay?" I said, "No, I have not." "Well", he said, "the hay in that particular district is all in the barns". Sometimes we worry in advance. It will be remembered that we used to harvest our crops in the west by beginning in August and ending in November. Recently we have become accustomed to begin in August, if possible, and to end as early as we can in September. We may have to go back to the old method, and stretch it over a longer period of time, in order to do the job completely.

However, in view of the fact that we realize that the labour we have is all the labour we can get, and the further fact that there are only so many people in Canada, and that they are engaged in different activities, I believe we shall get along all right. People in the different communities will organize themselves to do the job of harvesting the crop, and I think they will harvest it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the minister think the price of beef on the open market now is being deliberately manipulated down during the months of July, August and September? Does the minister believe it is being managed deliberately, so as to bring it down?

Mr. GARDINER: It is being deliberately arranged that the price for beef will not be as high in September as it was in June. That is part of the policy. Then, after September it advances back to where it is considered it should have been in June. The present plan is to have a rising scale of prices from September to about June, and then a falling scale until about September again. That plan conforms pretty well with what has happened in past years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe that perhaps there are good intentions behind the policy, but the difficulty lies at the point mentioned by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent. As the minister knows, there are a great many producers, particularly in western Canada, who do not aim to feed stock during the winter, for beef. They carry the stock through and then turn them on the ranch, preparing their beef for the market in the latter part of August and September. Those men are going to be placed under a serious handicap because of this price arrangement.

There is one further serious aspect of the matter. There is a strong suspicion in the minds of many producers in the west that the packers view with the utmost complacency this fall in price in August and September, so that they may fill their establishments at low prices. This whole procedure militates against the welfare of the farmer or rancher who is producing beef on the ranch. In fairness to the great number of people who produce grass-fed beef, I say that some arrangement should be made for their protection. Has the minister done anything along those lines?

Mr. GARDINER: It is difficult to do all that we are asked to do. When prices were threatening to go down in the spring the argument was used that the cattle could be fed much more cheaply on the grass. It was urged by farm organizations—not particularly by the packers—that cattle have been coming off the grass for twenty years at a lower price than they have been going on the market in the spring, the reason being that cattle must sell in the spring at about one and three-quarters to two cents higher than when they are taken off the grass, and feeding in the form of feeders, in order to make it possible to get people to take those cattle and feed them.

Many of the cattle which come off the grass in the fall are ready for market, while many of them are not. They are simply feeders. It is just a question as to which plan would bring the greatest return to the farmer or rancher who has both types. If a man has only finished cattle in September he will find that that has always been a time of low prices, with the possible exception of an occasional year such as last year. The price was higher then than it had been previously. But generally speaking-and the experience of twenty years proves this-the price of beef, and the price of cattle even to a greater extent than beef, has been down at that period of the year. It has been the rising price toward the spring which has taken care of the fact that cattle would not be produced in stall feeding if it were not for the fact that you could get more for them in the spring, taking one year with another. That feeding we expect will go on under this policy. I am not so certain that the rancher will do any better under this plan than he has done under the practices which have been going on in the last twenty years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the minister think the rancher will do just as well?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I think so. That is the intention, and if it is found by experience that it is not turning out in that way, then of course plans are always subject to change.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister gave us the names of the members of the beef advisory committee and the names of the organizations which had suggested them, a rather impressive list. Has this beef advisory committee any authority, and are its recommendations listened to? Were the regulations put into operation during the last year the result of recommendations of this advisory committee?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. GARDINER: This beef advisory committee was not operating last year. There was no price board until September and no food corporation until June of this year, and this is an advisory committee to the food corporation. As has been said before, the price board does not come under my department, and I would hesitate to discuss matters of policy relating to it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to add my voice to those which have protested against the apparent impotency of the Minister of Agriculture with respect to agricultural prices. The Minister of Agriculture should be responsible for agricultural prices and all matters pertaining to agriculture. He should be responsible to this house as the man functioning in that capacity. The first man the wartime prices and trade board should consult with respect to matters pertaining to agriculture. Is that done?

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Shaw, who is in charge of marketing in the Department of Agriculture, and the assistant deputy minister of the department, a former member of this house, are members of the price board representing the Department of Agriculture. The board is made up entirely of officials from departments of the government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the minister consulted by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) with respect to the policy of leaving boys on the farms to do the farm work? Has the minister or any responsible member of his department had anything to do with the drafting of regulations concerning agricultural postponements?

Mr. GARDINER: I was the minister who set up the Department of National War Services, and I do not know of anything for which I have been criticized more by the members of this house than the fact that I had two departments under my control. While I appreciate the compliments that are being paid me to-day, I would recall that there was considerable criticism of my having control, not only of agriculture but of the calling up of men. I drew up the regulations which form the basis of the present regulations. There have been some changes made since that time. In addition, I am a member of the man-power committee of the cabinet, which is made up of only a part of the cabinet, and I am consulted from time to time with regard to man-power problems.

Mr. BLACKMORE: When hon. members were criticizing the minister for holding two positions they must have failed to realize the significance of having the Minister of Agriculture in charge of the calling up of boys and determining whether they should be left on the land.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to add my voice to those who have protested against the calling up of these boys. When the order in council was passed in March it was assumed that it froze men on the farms; I believe "presumed" was the word the Minister of Agriculture used. I know of men who thought when the order in council came out on March 23 that they were to be frozen on the farm, and they assisted in putting in considerable crops. They have now been called up and taken off the farms, and in many cases older and sometimes crippled people are the only ones left to take off the crops. I do not think the seriousness of the labour situation in the west is realized by people in this part of the country. The farmers in the west are considerably alarmed about the situation. If the minister is on the man-power committee of the cabinet I hope he will see that everything possible is done to get assistance to these people. Naturally the farmer prefers to have a man with some experience. A man out of an office who has never done much work on a farm is not as valuable as a man who knows how to handle machinery, how to run a tractor and is accustomed to the labour. He is as good as ten of the other men. If the minister has any influence in this manpower committee I hope he will use it.

Mr. FAIR: Why should the price of hogs fluctuate on the market when a guaranteed price is paid to the packer?

Mr. GARDINER: The average weekly prices per 100 pounds, paid on the Toronto market, beginning with January 8, were as follows:

| $15 | 33 | | $15 | 18 | |
|------|----|--|------|----|--|
| 15 | 50 | | 15 | 25 | |
| 15 | 27 | | 15 | 25 | |
| 15 | 10 | | 15 | 21 | |
| 15 | 08 | | 15 | 25 | |
| 15 | 18 | | 15 | 33 | |
| 15 | 25 | | 15 | 35 | |
| 15 | 50 | | 15 | 46 | |
| 15 | 35 | | 15 | 56 | |
