Until now the Farm Credit Corporation has been a land mortgage lender requiring real estate security on all loans under the Farm Credit Act regardless of the purpose of a particular loan. This type of security arrangement is suitable for land-based enterprises such as grain farmers. Other types of security work better for businesses such as poultry or dairy farms, where other factors such as the quality of the facilities, the health of the livestock or the amount of quota owned have a greater impact on the farm's success than the amount of land owned.

The new legislation will permit the Farm Credit Corporation to accept all types of security, including real estate, farm equipment, portable buildings, debentures in negotiable securities and whatever suits the combined needs of the corporation and its clientele.

The Farm Credit Corporation will be given the power to enter into agreements with any department or agency of the Government of Canada or of a province, or with any other person or institution. This will permit sharing of expertise and the efficient use of government resources to the benefit of farmers.

The discussions to date have focused on what will be new at FCC after passage of the Farm Credit Corporation Act. I would like to take this opportunity to stress that the Farm Credit Corporation will continue to provide financing for its traditional clientele: the primary producer and family farms.

There is no doubt that the success of processing and value added diversification depend on the continued ability of our excellent Canadian farmers to produce high quality grains, vegetables, fruits and meats. In the years to come we expect that primary producers will still account for more than 80 per cent of the Farm Credit Corporation business.

What this bill does is remove the restrictions which have prevented FCC from serving the increasingly important value added aspect of farming. It allows the corporation to explore new business opportunities while giving it more flexibility to improve service to its existing customer base.

A great amount of careful thought and diligent effort has gone into the creation of Bill C-95. The version I am presenting today represents the consensus of the agricultural industry and those who are interested in its welfare that the Farm Credit Corporation legislation should be modernized and its role clarified.

Over the course of the consultations we have had a strong sense that this bill reflects the will of the industry. In the weeks since this bill was first tabled there have been many calls to our offices and to Farm Credit Corporation offices from farmers who welcome the new legislation. They want to know when it will be passed and when new programs will be available.

The publicity surrounding the work of the task force on farm finance and the tabling of the legislation has raised expectations in the farm community. Discussions that we have had with farmers and others interested in rural development indicate a sense of excitement and anticipation. Farmers have repeatedly told me that they are very happy with the new legislation and hope that it will pass soon.

There is some urgency to the matter as the cropping season approaches and farmers make plans for the coming year. We have to remember that cropping season is at different times across Canada. We know they will be into their fields very shortly on the west coast.

I think we can all agree that this legislation is needed. The staff of the Farm Credit Corporation is waiting for us to put a firm legislative framework in place in which to construct new financing programs to meet its clients' needs. Farmers and rural people are waiting for this bill to pass so they can firm up their business plans.

The time for reflection, consultation and discussion has been fruitfully spent. We now have a piece of legislation that the industry endorses. Farmers across the country are watching us as we speak, waiting for us to pass this bill into law.

I am confident that our decision to pass Bill C-95 quickly will greatly be appreciated by the rural community. I believe this piece of legislation is positive. The agricultural sector is looking for it. I know it is expecting us to be diligent and fulfil what we have been sent here to do in providing legislation that is going help the agricultural sector and our rural communities.

It is more than the farm gate we are helping. Many of our small communities depend on farmers and the farm income sector. The income farmers generate is shared in those communities. It is very important that we have a viable food producing industry.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have a chance to say a few words on the passage of Bill C-95, the Farm Credit Corporation Act.

Clearly this bill will provide a new structure for the Farm Credit Corporation which will be very much appreciated by farmers across the country. It will provide a certain amount of flexibility that is not there in the operation of the FCC itself.

It does not necessarily mean the government's attitude or policy with regard to the over-all arrangements for the funding of agriculture has really changed. The parliamentary secretary has talked about the urgency of putting this in place because of the start of the cropping season.

With the FCC legislation generally we are talking about long-term financing of farm operations and mortgages on property. This bill expands it to cover processing plants whether it is a grain seed cleaning plant, a killing plant, or whatever the further processing may be.

Agricultural producers really want to know what the government is going to do about the farm financial crisis which faces the country this year because of the global trade wars between the European Economic Community and the United States on the price of grain.

If we look at the report which came out a few weeks ago from the WEFA corporation, it talks about a crash in 1993 in net farm income. It indicates that realized net farm income is expected to plummet to $3.2 billion, forcing a renewed round of financial belt tightening in the agricultural community. It also talks about net farm income in this country dropping by $1 billion.

I want to refer to one of the main reasons it is dropping by $1 billion this year, apart from the climatic problems which faced eastern Canada and western Canada. Because of the damp, cold fall season we still have thousands of acres of corn in the fields in Ontario and wheat that has not been threshed in western Canada. The government's support programs all came due to be paid in 1992. The financial support in 1992 was dropping dramatically. It was supposed to be an election year, but it did not really happen. There was only a referendum.

The parliamentary secretary says that this legislation is waiting to be passed. It is waiting to be passed and to be implemented in the agricultural community. It probably is going to have no impact whatsoever on the farm financial crisis. If we look at Saskatchewan, for example, the net farm income was some $640 million in 1992. It is estimated to be $238 million in 1993, which is about a quarter of what it was three or four years ago.

Agricultural producers want to know what the government is going to do about the farm financial crisis. The election was supposed to be in 1992 so the government had all of its support programs geared, whether it was GRIP, NISA or FSAM, the federal smoke and mirrors program. Those pay-outs were supposed to all take place in 1992 and they did, but even at that because of the climatic problems the support or net farm income was not very satisfactory in 1992.

We waited with great anticipation to see the estimates for 1993-94. We thought that when the government's spending estimates came out we would know what the government was going to do about the $1 billion reduction in net farm income.

Sure enough the estimates came out and the budget of the Department of Agriculture was decreased by $638.8 million. At a time when farmers were facing a $1 billion reduction in net farm income, the government chopped its Department of Agriculture spending estimates by $638 million. Some of that was included in the assistance available through the Canadian Dairy Commission. There was a cut of $38 million there; similarly in the Western Grain Transportation Act, another $70 million. That is going to cost every producer shipping grain to the east coast or to the west coast some $2 a tonne.

The Farm Credit Corporation bill is useful. I believe with its flexibilities and the provisions for further processing it will be helpful.

The crisis this year is really with regard to net farm income, to the financial crisis for Canadian farmers.

It is interesting to note that the parliamentary secretary was thanking members on this side of the House, both here and in the standing committee, for their co-operation. We would have been more impressed with that thank you if the government had been willing to adopt some of the recommendations, not only those we made as opposition members whether they were from the NDP or the Liberals, but also those that came from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. It represents the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, SaskPools, the Prairie Pools Inc., UPA, the Atlantic producers and all those types of organizations.

None of those recommendations were accepted which said to make the money available to Canadian citizens and to residents of Canada as long as they are not non-resident farming groups. But no, that was not acceptable to the government.

We were saying that the majority on the board of directors should be farmers. The government only accepted one small amendment. It had been rejected in the standing committee. However, the government accepted it this morning after being hammered at the annual meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture a couple of weeks ago.

The government would not accept the idea that there be an appeal board. I guess there is a lot of partisan politics in this place but it seems to me that the bottom line should be that legislators should not give up their rights easily.

One of the rights we have is to put in appeal procedures to guarantee the rights of the individual agriculture producer from an all-powerful board of directors which to many producers is far away from them. They have no contact. They do not know them. At the present time there are only half a dozen. Under this legislation there will be 12.

Instead of protecting those producers and saying that we are the legislators, we are the people that are sent here by the people of Canada and we want to write legislation to protect those producers by providing an appeal procedure, the government gives it away. It throws it away.

Government members get their directives on voting from the Whip and they vote by rote. We seldom ever put an important amendment in committee because it is always voted down. At least it has a public airing in here. It is on television. People can see that this government loves to talk about parliamentary reform, but it is really a bunch of hogwash.

When those members go into the agriculture committee they vote en bloc against anything that is ever put by members on this side. At least we have the satisfaction when legislation comes before the House it is aired for the public to see, for agriculture producers to see. They see government members vote down practically every amendment that is ever offered by agriculture groups across the country, whether it is the CFA, UPA or whatever group.

We want to have a majority of producers on the board of directors of the Farm Credit Corporation. That is because we think they know more about it. They are more personally involved. They are very considerate.

Some accountant may be brought in from a big accounting firm in Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal or Vancouver who may be very wise about those things. But what does he know about the problems in Lambton—Middlesex, Prince Edward—Hastings, Algoma, Manitoulin or the other farming areas?

We wanted to see a majority but of course, the orders came down. We know where the orders come from. Of course those things are always voted down.

I would have been more impressed by the parliamentary secretary's third reading speech if I had seen that kind of co-operation and consideration in the actual drafting of the legislation.

I am always amazed at how much talk there is on the government side about parliamentary reform. I am not very impressed with the way it operates, at least not in the agriculture committee. That is because it does not operate. Regardless of how good the amendment is, if it is not offered by the government, it is usually voted down by rote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but it being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

MILITARY BASES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, Canada has military bases that are sufficient for a defence establishment of 250,000 men and women. Canada has a defence establishment of no more than 80,000 men and women.

I call on the government to significantly reduce the number of military bases that exist in the country and so eliminate the cost associated with the maintenance of these bases.

I call on the Minister of National Defence to declare the bases surplus and sell them or turn them over to some other worth-while purpose. There is no room in our defence expenditures to continue to maintain redundant military bases.

SHOAL LAKE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I would like to again raise the issue of the proposed KMP mine at Shoal Lake, Ontario.

Shoal Lake is the sole source of Winnipeg's drinking water and the proposed mining operation raises several environmental questions. The best way to answer these questions is for the federal government to conduct a full-blown review of all activities, not just mining, in the Shoal Lake watershed. That is the position of the province of Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg.

With Ontario and Manitoba on opposite sides of the issue, it is important that the federal government step in and provide leadership.

In a letter I received recently the federal transport minister said he has no authority to initiate a federal review under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. That may be so, but if this federal government does not want another Rafferty-Alameda problem on its hands it will find a way to hold a review. It takes political will, starting with Tory MPs from Manitoba who are not doing their jobs on this important issue.

MINING EXPLORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, if it is to contribute to the Canadian economic recovery, the mining industry in Abitibi must first ensure the recovery of exploration, which provides its source of raw materials.

To make the exploration expenses financed by flow-through shares more effective, the Quebec Prospectors' Association is asking the Minister of Finance to allow the exploration work to be spread over a whole year following the year in which the funds were raised. Exploration companies would thus no longer have to rush to complete their work by February 28.

Other measures must be obtained, such as a 125 per cent tax deduction for underground exploration and 175 per cent for surface exploration, the exclusion of flow-through shares from cumulative net investment losses, the creation of a Canada exploration expenses account that would make the adjusted cost base the purchase price for investors no longer eligible for the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption.

FREE TRADE

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it has now been four years since free trade became a reality, long enough for Canadians to judge it a success or a failure.

Last month I included a mail-back ballot in my regular householder. It asked two straightforward questions. The first was: Should Canada use its right to give six months' notice and get out of the Canada-U.S. free trade deal? Eighty-nine per cent said yes. The second question was: Should Canada stay out of any extension of the free trade deal which includes Mexico, and soon other Latin American countries? Ninety per cent said yes.

The verdict is in. These people in Edmonton East, and I suspect elsewhere in Canada as well, want out of free trade. The New Democrats, and only the New Democrats, are listening. We will release Canada from the free trade strait-jacket.

NATIONAL EPILEPSY MONTH

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the month of March is National Epilepsy Month. Epilepsy is the most common neurological disorder in Canada and it is estimated that 1.5 per cent of the population have had or will have some form of epilepsy in their lifetime.

During March, Epilepsy Canada and its member associations across the country will be sponsoring a variety of public education activities to promote the health and social well-being of Canadians. I am really pleased that this government has been supporting the ongoing efforts of this organization. As well, this non-profit volunteer organization has shown excellent leadership in the development of successful partnerships with the corporate sector.

• (1405)

Epilepsy Canada continues to promote ongoing medical research and public understanding in order to achieve a better quality of life for people with epilepsy. This organization is to be strongly applauded for its tireless and invaluable work in this area.

NATIONAL PHYSIOTHERAPY WEEK

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to inform the members of the House that the week of March 14 to 20 is National Physiotherapy Week.

Physiotherapists play a vital role in Canada's health care system. The theme for National Physiotherapy Week, "Physiotherapy: Teaming up for good health", emphasizes this role. It also highlights the increasing emphasis of the profession on illness and injury prevention.

The Canadian Physiotherapy Association, which provides leadership and direction to its nearly 8,000 members across Canada, will be sponsoring this campaign to increase awareness of physiotherapy. To celebrate the week special events will be held in the many places in which physiotherapists can be found.

I am sure the House will join with me in wishing members of the Canadian Physiotherapy Association the best of luck during National Physiotherapy Week.

THE LUBICON

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, after more than 50 years the human rights of the Lubicon people remain at stake and continue to be abused. Negotiations between the Lubicon people and the federal government have not taken place since 1989. This government has clearly reneged on its fiduciary responsibility.

The actions taken by this government on the Lubicon land claim reinforces this government's well-used technique of pitting one group of aboriginal people against another.

In the case of the Lubicon, the federal government funded splinter groups to undermine Lubicon progress and diminish band membership. It is the same story on the issue of extinguishment. This government's policies have split ties of friendship and the relationships of aboriginal families and their communities. There have been enough reports, studies, and bureaucracy, and enough take it or leave it tactics have been put forward by this government.

The Lubicon issue has now become a human rights issue. The United Nations Human Rights Committee has stated that the Canadian government's treatment of the Lubicon threatens their way of life and culture and constitutes a violation of article 27 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, one of the main continuing sources of public cynicism about members of Parliament arises from a lack of public confidence in the over-all compensation programs which pertain to those who serve in this House.

This comes not only from a perception that pension plans are too generous but also from a misunderstanding of salary and expense provisions.

Simply put, the Canadian public has not been well informed or consulted over Parliament's long history about the fundamental compensation structure by which members of this Parliament are rewarded and reimbursed for their work here.

The time is long overdue for a comprehensive review of all aspects of that program. It should be conducted on an independent professional basis by one or more of the most qualified consultants in the country. It should start with the recognition of the qualifications and capabilities that are required to be an effective MP and should include analysis and comparison with respect to equivalent job descriptions in industry and other professions.

Its recommendations should be based on the standards of professionalism that Canadians would always want at work in this Chamber.

With a general election and a new Parliament now clearly in sight, this is an ideal time to commission such a total compensation review.

THE MEMBER FOR HALTON—PEEL

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the member for Halton—Peel was elected chairman of the official languages committee on February 20, 1992. Two meetings were called that year, both at my request and insistence.

Under former chairpersons between May 2, 1990 and May 2, 1991 the committee met 26 times, some 13 times more than under the present standing committee chairmanship of the member for Halton—Peel.

Given his poor record of duty as chairperson it is no wonder that he found time to write in his latest book that half of the current parliamentary committees should be scrapped. His book, Garth! Just what the hell is going on in Ottawa, is his testimony to inefficiency and a complete lack of interest.

Maybe the member for Halton—Peel should take time out from his leadership campaign and do the job he was sent here to do by his constituents in the first place.

In this country official languages are no laughing matter. The Prime Minister should fire this uninterested member and reinstate a working standing committee with government members interested in the subject.

IRANIAN NEW YEAR

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to wish all Iranian Canadians a happy Nowruz.

This occasion, the Iranian new year, is celebrated on the first day of spring and marks the start of the Persian calendar.

I am proud to honour this special day and the 150,000 Iranian Canadians who will join in the celebrations. This day officially recognizes their significant contribution to Canada's unique cultural mosaic.

• (1410)

I know this is an important day for the Iranian community of Canada, and Dr. Sy Kazemi of Markham will be leading the Nowruz celebrations.

POVERTY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, children are our nation's future. Despite repeated highlighting of the pathetic circumstances of over one million Canadian children who are living in poverty in this country we continue to witness government policies which aggravate the problem. We see a growing number of poor children become poor youth, who are not only unemployed and despairing but are highly costly to our Canadian society.

Instead of providing basic necessities to poor children and providing productive employment opportunities to our abandoned youth we have instead an abundance of expensive government programs to study the problems, words rather than action, and cuts, cuts and more cuts. Social and health agencies in Northumberland are being forced to decrease jobs and thus services to our most needy.

When will the government change its priorities and put people first? When will the government recognize that this country and its future belong to our children and youth? Federal government cuts to social program transfers are resulting in long-term, unsustainable social and health costs.

Canadians care. Why does this government not care?

AMEUBLEMENT TANGUAY

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, Ameublement Tanguay opened a $7 million distribution centre in my riding on February 24.

The president of this furniture company, Maurice Tanguay, has risen to the challenge in a very dynamic way and this venture will provide economic benefits which the Quebec City region needs.

For the Conservative government, the growth of small and medium-sized businesses is very important. This distribution centre is another example of the ability of entrepreneurship to develop Quebec and Canada.

I thank the shareholders and employees of Ameublement Tanguay and welcome them to Québec-Est.

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my concern about the glaring lack of competition for the Tory leadership race.

After much deliberation, after consultation with my handlers, after discussion with my family and friends and after considering the odds, I have decided to enter my horse, Slip Chaser. I am convinced that he will make an ideal candidate. He has no political experience and is in no way connected to the Tory government's policies. At age three, he is youthful. He was born and raised in western Canada. He has a winning record when it comes to constitutional matters. Just last year he won the Halton—Peel Conservative Association's own Constitution Pace. Moreover, he recognizes the importance of grass roots.

He can truly put a new face on the Tory party and nobody can deny that he truly represents change. I am confident that my Slip Chaser is the dark horse who can win the triple crown, which the present Prime Minister failed to do.

JACQUES PARIZEAU

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, in an article in the Montreal Gazette, it states that during a trip to Paris last week Parti Quebecois leader Jacques Parizeau told a group of students that a sovereign Quebec would rely upon France even more than it has in the past.

Does this mean that Monsieur Parizeau welcomes the prospect of Quebec becoming a puppet state of France?

THE CANADA COUNCIL

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Canada's cultural talents have been nurtured by the Canada Council, which can be justly proud of the achievements realized by our artists through its support. They are winners of Geminis, Genies, Junos and literary awards, and many have also captured world-wide attention by winning the Booker Prize, Prix Gaumont, Oscars, Emmys and architectural awards.

This government's ongoing starvation and latest bent on deficit reduction means a significant loss of the next generation of new and aspiring artistic greats; less "mentoring" of creative writers, dancers, composers, and builders; and less exposure to Canadian creative talent and support, as support is now decimated for touring by dance, music and theatre companies. This degenerative process cuts growth, appreciation and development outside of major Canadian cities, leaving our country culturally destitute and divided, its needs filled by foreigners.

Canadians need a strong cultural defence. I call upon the culture minister to have a talk with his leadership choice and ask her to give up one of her choppers to save Canada's cultural legacy from the chopping block.

WINDSOR, ONTARIO

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my constituency in the Windsor area has been hit hard by the Tory recession, the Tory FTA, the Tory high dollar and the Tory GST. This, our fifth most important industrial city, has among the highest unemployment rates in the country at 13 per cent.

In contrast to the Tories, for this city in need a friend indeed has been the Rae government. Over 30 provincial government initiatives had already led to hundreds of millions in new infrastructure, industrial expansion and hundreds of new jobs when last week it confirmed the casino project with its 8,000 new jobs.

Today Chrysler Corporation will announce new investment worth $500,000 in Windsor. Not only is that an expression of confidence in Windsor and its workers but as well in a government willing to contribute $40 million to help create jobs.

The federal government contributed just enough, $7 million to buy a ticket to the festivities for its minister of state for science. We know whom Chrysler, its workers and the community will thank the most. The government that cares enough to do its very best, the Government of Ontario.

CONSERVATIVE LEADERSHIP

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, last night deep in the bowels of the Prime Minister's mansion, not the one in Westmount but the one at 24 Sussex in Ottawa, we heard the puppet master was pulling strings once again.

The PM, and that stands for puppet master, was meeting with the Minister of the Environment. Were they talking about improving the economy or cleaning up the environment? No. They were talking about improving the chances of the Minister of National Defence to win the Tory leadership race.

Temporary jobs do not attract very many candidates or much attention. Tory MPs, like other unemployed Canadians, want full-time, permanent jobs. What the PM, and that means puppet master, does not appreciate is that Canadians do not want a change of Tory; they want a change of government.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance.

Last week the government was talking about a non-budget and a leadership convention. This week we heard that there may be a budget and a non-convention.

Will the Minister of Finance introduce soon a budget that will meet the economic needs of Canadians, or is he waiting to have a budget that will meet the needs of the Tory party?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition will get both and he should be worried about both of them as well.

As the Prime Minister indicated last Friday, I was involved in my pre-budget consultation process. That process is well advanced. I have now had a chance to discuss the budget with my cabinet colleagues and I can advise my hon. friend that I will be bringing down a budget shortly after the House returns from the Easter break.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are glad to hear that, because the country needs a budget right now. And incidentally, there are a number of developments that will interest the Minister of Finance.

Of course we are very disappointed that the Minister decided not to run for the leadership of his party. He has always been well-liked, but unfortunately, his neighbour to the left decided otherwise. It is really too bad.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he intends to take the advice of the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore who said this morning that it was very important that the Canadian government not proceed with the helicopter program.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the hon. member is referring to, whether he is referring to the fact that social payments should be cut or payments to provinces. Which part of that statement was he referring to? He may want to clarify that.

The fact of the matter is we will be building on the policies that are starting to demonstrate very clearly they are serving Canadians very well.

Mr. Riis: No, no.

Mr. Mazankowski: If I may, Mr. Speaker, last week Statistics Canada released a review of the leading economic indicators. This is what it said: The unemployment rate, down; help wanted index, up; department store sales, up; Bank of Canada and prime rate, down; housing prices, down; aggregate wages and salaries, up; planned construction activity, up; industrial capacity utilization rate, up.

• (1420)

Those are the kinds of policies we will follow.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is one thing the Canadian people know is going down. It is the government and the Conservative Party. There is no doubt about it.

I just want to know from the Minister of Finance if he has any intention of looking at other propositions that have been accepted by Canadians all across the nation today. One good way to put some of the unemployed back to work is to have in the next budget a program for infrastructure: one-third, one-third and one-third. In travelling across Canada the mayors are asking for that all the time.

When will this minister start listening to the Canadian people by reflecting the needs of the Canadian people right away and putting them back to work as they want?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we will continue to build upon the December economic statement and the budget I brought down last February, both of which are serving Canadians very well.

The hon. member knows we have been going through a very difficult process of coming out of a recession and a difficult process of restructuring, but I can assure my hon. friend that our policies are the right ones.

As a matter of fact if the hon. member would cast his attention to an article in The Financial Post of a couple of weeks ago, the headlines said: "Clintonomics borrows heavily from Mazankowski". That is a pretty clear indication. The hon. member just a few weeks ago was advocating that the Clinton proposals were the right things. Well, here we are. Just like Panasonic, this government is slightly ahead of its time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. He boasts about the Tory record, but I see that he is just another Conservative minister who does not want to carry the can for that record as a Conservative leadership candidate.

The Minister of Finance says that he is building on the policies of the Conservative government which have brought us nothing more than 1.5 million people unemployed.

I want to ask the minister: In his budget is he going to do something to finally bring these unemployed Canadians some real hope and confidence for the future, or is it going to be just another one of those Conservative budgets that did nothing more than create 1.5 million people out of work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when is the hon. member across the way going to talk about some good news that is happening in his own backyard: a $500 million expansion for the Windsor plant? If we were to listen to Bob White he would have suggested that plant would have been built in Mexico.

The Toronto Star this morning says: "Autos help swell Ontario job ranks. The real growth is in automotive products. The big winner is machinery and equipment". That is positive news.

I have more positive news: Employment increased for the sixth consecutive month in Ontario by 6,000, resulting in an accumulative gain of 91,000 since August.

There is some good news occurring. Why does the hon. member not get on the band wagon and join with some optimism?

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the expansion which we welcome came about because the previous Liberal government stepped in—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harvard: Way to go, Herb.

• (1425)

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the previous Liberal government stepped in to support that plant with loan guarantees which the Conservatives opposed. That is the history. That is the record. That is the truth, and the Minister of Finance is shaking his head in agreement.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance whether he will tell us that in his budget, which he now says he is going to bring down after Easter, he will announce the cancellation of the $8 billion helicopter program which Canadians do not want and instead bring forward a national infrastructure program that will create jobs in towns and cities right across this country. Will he make that commitment today?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, I was not nodding my head in agreement. I was nodding my head in amazement. Amazing Gray is suggesting I follow the Liberal policies that gave us 22 per cent interest rates, 13 per cent inflation and 12 per cent unemployment. He wants us to go out and borrow or tax some Canadians to generate a $15 billion slush fund.

Where would he suggest that I get the money from? Whom would he suggest that I tax, or whom would he suggest we borrow it from?

Mr. Peterson: You gave us the great recession of the 1930s.

Mr. Mazankowski: As I have said in this House so often there is only one taxpayer, not a federal taxpayer, not a provincial taxpayer, not a municipal taxpayer, but one Canadian taxpayer. It will all come out of the Canadian taxpayers' pockets.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is correct. He is continuing to follow the Liberal policy of trashing transfer payments to the provinces.

Yesterday the Conservative Government of Manitoba added to its previously announced cuts to school-boards, hospitals, child care and other services by cutting off completely funding for friendship centres, crisis centres, aboriginal groups and representatives of the poor and the disabled.

Other provinces are contemplating crippling cuts to other social programs. What will the Minister of Finance do to restore services for those who are victims of these very hurtful economic policies?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, since this government has been in office our major transfer payments to the provinces have grown at an annual rate of 5.2 per cent per year, or 60 per cent over the period of time we have been in office, from $25.6 billion to $40.5 billion.

In his own home province the transfers to Manitoba will grow at an annual average of 6 per cent between 1984–85 through to 1993–94, expected to exceed $1.9 billion in 1993–94, and it accounts for just under 40 per cent of Manitoba's revenues. That works out to more than $1,700 per person.

The hon. member has got it all wrong. Transfer payments have not been cut; they have been going up. They have gone up by 60 per cent since we have been in office.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that had he and Allan J. MacEachen not changed and changed again the formula, Manitoba would have received $280 million more this year.

Before the April budget will the minister meet with his provincial counterparts and discuss what they will do about the financial crisis and what will they do to preserve and create jobs in this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if we had followed that kind of logic, today we would have had an $82.5 billion deficit rather than a $34 billion deficit. That is what this government has had to do.

I ask the hon. member to consider what is happening in the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Saskatchewan.

They too are faced with the realism of fiscal restraint and they too have to structure their payments with discipline. That is precisely what we are doing because when there is a shortfall of $8 billion or $10 billion in revenue, governments must act, federally and provincially, and indeed municipally. When is the hon. member going to accept that responsibility? It is high time.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the government is fond of saying that there is only one taxpayer. Certainly the Minister of Finance is fond of saying that. This is folly to the students in my riding, particularly those who attend schools in the Transcona Springfield school division, whose quality of education will suffer because of education cutbacks that are directly related to years of unilateral federal cutbacks in the rate of increase in transfer payments to the provinces. These cutbacks began in 1981 under the Liberals, something they do not always admit.

What advice does the minister have for the people in my riding who, because they already have a small tax base, cannot possibly make up the difference in the way that some people in the wealthier parts of Winnipeg might be able to? What advice does he have for them? There may be only one taxpayer, but not all taxpayers are equal and this government's cutbacks and the Manitoba government's cutbacks are hurting people who can least afford it.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could provide the hon. member with a quick, simple and easy solution. Unfortunately there are not any quick, easy or simple solutions. The fact of the matter is that we have had to constrain our federal spending in a manner consistent with the revenues. That is a responsible approach. That is what provincial governments are faced with and that is what the federal government is faced with.

Notwithstanding that, as I indicated, our transfer payments to the provinces have been increased at an annual rate of 5.2 per cent per year since we have been in office or 60 per cent over that period of time.

In terms of transfer payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, those transfer payments have grown at a rate of 8 per cent per year. In the meantime, our over-all federal government expenditures have been sustained at a rate of about 4 per cent.

Clearly we are not fighting the deficit on the backs of the provinces or the municipalities. As a matter of fact, they are getting better treatment than other groups which rely upon federal government revenues. I ask the hon. member to consider that. I think it is very fair.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last week the Minister of National Defence boasted that her policy is the full equality of women in the armed forces. We now know that at least three reports in the last year told the minister that no woman is safe from harassment and that when she complains, she suffers the consequences.

I ask, then, how could the Prime Minister let this go on, knowing that harassers are protected while the victims are punished?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I think we are all aware that harassment of any kind, sexual harassment or personal harassment, is unacceptable, but I would like to reassure my hon. colleague that the women serving in the Canadian Armed Forces do indeed have policies and programs to ensure that they will be able to serve free of harassment.

Indeed, it has been as a result of the work that was done by the advisory board when I was associate minister to bring some of these issues out into the open that has ensured that DND has been able to review its policies, to upgrade them, to ensure that there is mandatory education throughout the commands, that there will be appropriate procedures in place with independent harassment officers.

All of these initiatives are part of achieving the policy that the chief of the defence staff sent out throughout the Armed Forces last fall of zero tolerance of sexual harassment in the Canadian Armed Forces.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is leadership at the highest level that is required if women who have already been the victims of complaints of harassment are going to find any relief and if the situation is going to be stopped.

[Translation]

My supplementary is therefore directed to the Prime Minister. It has been five years since the Supreme Court informed the Department of National Defence that there was a serious problem with sexual harassment in the Canadian Forces. Will the Prime Minister instruct his Minister of National Defence to ensure that a person who is found guilty of sexual harassment is relieved of his duties?

• (1435)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have made considerable progress in this very difficult area, thanks in part to the vigorous approach taken by the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women. Granted, in some departments and in some parts of Canada the problem remains.

The Minister of National Defence has taken vigorous and effective measures to deal with the serious problem mentioned by my hon. friend. So far, there have been a number of improvements but, as Prime Minister of this country, I will not be satisfied until the problem of sexual harassment has been rooted out completely, in this department and in our society. Every citizen has an obligation to ensure that this problem is dealt with once and for all, in the interests of society.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister knows that when a victim chooses to complain she becomes the immediate adversary of a powerful Canadian forces system, a male system which quickly will organize to humiliate and punish her further.

I ask the Prime Minister to immediately order an independent inquiry into all cases of sexual harassment within the Canadian forces, an inquiry that will ensure it is the harasser and not the victim who is being punished.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I have just responded to my hon. friend in French and I can assure my hon. friend that the seriousness of this problem—

An hon. member: She understands French very well. It just was not a good enough answer.

Mr. Mulroney: Oh, I see.

Mr. Harvard: Like David Milford.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, given the seriousness of the question raised by my hon. friend, I would have thought that her colleagues in the Liberal opposition would have wanted to hear the answer without interruption.

The matter raised by my hon. friend has been given the highest priority by the Minister of National Defence. She will pursue this matter as vigorously as she pursued similar matters when she was Minister of Justice. I am sure the report that she will be able to make to my hon. friend in the House is one that she will find satisfying because we are in the process of dealing with this very serious matter.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister not realize that women in the Canadian forces see how other women are treated when they complain? They quickly learn to suffer in silence.

Will the Prime Minister immediately establish a process totally outside the military that will review any and all cases of sexual harassment, a process that will finally give women a fair hearing?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to my hon. friend that I am not au courant of the latest developments in the last number of hours that the minister has been working on. I can say that in general I support what my hon. friend has said. If there is a presumption to exist, the presumption is one of innocence and one of support in favour of the complainant.

There should exist a climate wherein a woman who makes an allegation of sexual harassment should be able to do so with all of the benefits of that presumption and in a climate which gives her the opportunity to bring this forward without reprisal and without the possibility of intimidation of any kind.

That is what we are working for and these are the procedures that the Minister of National Defence and the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women are pursuing. My expectation is that the Minister of National Defence will soon be able to give my hon. friend that assurance formally.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION AGENCY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

When the Minister of Transport tabled the NTA review commission report last week in this House, he sent it to the transport committee for a public review. Yet on Friday the government appointed the author of that report, Mr. Gilles Rivard, to take over the National Transportation Agency, an individual who has clearly made up his mind on the direction of transportation policy in this country.

Given his recommendations, including increased foreign ownership and ripping up more rail lines, how can the minister believe that Mr. Rivard will be the impartial chair of this quasi-judicial agency?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the implication is that nobody should have a clear mind in order to become president of that agency, I think he is completely wrong.

This man is very qualified. He made a review of the NTA with four other colleagues that were as well qualified. I do not see anything in that which would disqualify him from becoming the chairman of the NTA.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of the philosophy of the individual, it is a question of the fact that Mr. Rivard has already passed judgment on matters that are before the NTA.

The application to acquire one-third of the ownership of Canadian Airlines by AMR, CN's application to sell its main line from Truro to Sydney, CP's application to abandon all of Atlantic Canada are all matters dealt with in the Rivard commission report.

How can the minister in good judgment appoint a man who has already made up his mind on the specifics? Why does he not revoke the recommendation and the appointment now?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that this review commission was composed of five people who are well qualified experts in the field of transportation. This is a unanimous decision and I do not see anything in that which would disqualify this able person from becoming the chairman of the NTA.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance.

The minister in response to an earlier question on the problems created in Manitoba by the lack of transfer payments refused to acknowledge that in terms of real growth transfer payments have not kept up with the problems facing Manitobans.

The real problem facing Manitobans is the lack of an economic strategy to create jobs and to create wealth within their province. I ask the minister today: When is this government going to turn its attention to the economic problems of Manitoba and begin to create some money to address these questions of poverty?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will answer that question again, and for further clarity I will be glad to photocopy this and send it across the way.

Major transfers to Manitoba grew at an annual rate of 6 per cent per year between 1984–85 and 1993–94. This year the transfer payments are expected to exceed $1.9 billion. That accounts for about 40 per cent of Manitoba's government revenues and it is expected to exceed $1,700 per person, almost 40 per cent above the national average.

If that is not fair or beyond the scope of being fair, perhaps the hon. member may want to have an explanation sent over to me as to what he considers to be fair.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister deliberately avoided the question. He did avoid the question. The question is this: If all these statistics are so great and if the strategy is so great, why does Manitoba, for the first time in its history, have the highest rate of child poverty? Why are all these groups being denied funding? Why is nobody able to make the economy work?

It is because this government sits there week after week and does nothing.

I again ask the government when it is going to start doing something for the Manitoba economy.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): As I indicated, perhaps that is a question he may want to address to the Government of Manitoba. The fact of the matter is that our transfers to Manitoba are 40 per cent above the national average.

If the hon. member was not so adamantly opposed to some of the initiatives, such as the free trade initiative and the GST initiative which are helping drive this economy out of recession, and if he was out promoting that rather than criticizing it every day, perhaps the attitude might change. I happen to believe, having just returned from Manitoba, that the economic outlook in Manitoba is improving there as it is right across the country. It is relying on exports. It is using the tools that this government has provided. I know that the hon. Minister of Finance from the province of Manitoba, the Hon. Clayton Manness, is a responsible individual. He will bring in a responsible budget that will deal with not only the fiscal problems but also the economic problems to which the hon. member has referred.

TORONTO ECONOMY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. Like everywhere else the number one issue facing metro Toronto is the stagnating economy.

Nothing illustrated this more dramatically than a weekend report by Gerard Kennedy, director of Toronto's Daily Bread Food Bank. He stated that almost 10 per cent of metro's population have had to use a food bank. Of the 162,000 people who are dependent on it today over 2,000 are pregnant women, 70,000 are children, 12,000 are disabled and over 14,000 are in poor health.

Given that this represents a city within a city and a disturbing indictment on the status quo, can the minister assure us that whenever he presents his new budget he will abandon the old and failed Tory economic agenda? Will he seek new solutions that will create new jobs, new opportunities and above all, new hope which Canadians are desperately in search of?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the sincerity with which the hon. member poses the question and I sympathize with the difficulties.

The fact still remains that we are making progress. As I indicated earlier, employment in Ontario has increased for the sixth consecutive month resulting in a cumulative increase of 91,000. Ontario has gained 76,000 new jobs with more than half of those coming from the manufacturing sector. I think he would agree with me that there is progress.

He suggests that we shift gears and change the thrust of fiscal and economic policy in this country. The hon. member and I disagree on that. I think what he is suggesting is that we should borrow more money to spend more, or that we should tax more to spend more. I am sorry. I just do not agree with that kind of approach. I do not agree with his leader when he suggests that we can borrow money at the federal, provincial and municipal levels. You cannot borrow your way to prosperity and I think the hon. member should recognize that.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

In response to the food bank crisis in Toronto the federal department of health and welfare last month spent $75,000 organizing a conference which recommended such solutions as establishing a community-wide soup kitchen and actually another idea suggesting we should begin to grow food in the Toronto public park areas.

Instead of wasting taxpayers' dollars chasing hare-brained ideas, why can the government not finally and very simply recognize that the most effective solution for such hard-pressed Canadians is a good job with decent pay? This means that the government simply must change course and produce a new economic strategy because the old one is not working.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member. The best social safety net is a job. This is what Phil Cross of Statistics Canada had to say in an article published in The Toronto Star on March 16 which stated:

> "The real growth is in automotive products, and the big winner is machinery and equipment. There have been just some spectacular gains," Phil Cross, the federal agency's director of current analysis, said yesterday.
> Cross said the gains were registered over the 12 months since February 1992.

I think that certainly does offer hope. It certainly means jobs are being created. The export demand is there. The economy is being driven by exports and by enhancement in productivity. This is thanks in part to the free trade agreement, thanks in part to the GST and thanks a whole lot to the policies of this government.

MINING EXPLORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. If the mining industry is to contribute to Canada's economic recovery, it will first have to ensure there is a recovery in exploration activities.

• (1450)

Could the minister give us his position today on spreading exploration activities over an entire year, tax deductions for underground and surface exploration, the exclusion of flow-through shares from cumulative net losses on investment and the creation of a Canadian exploration expense account, to help the mining exploration sector in this country after the first federal budget?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I would say that is a question for the Order Paper. However, knowing my colleague's interest in the mining activity in the part of the country he represents, I would like to reply that in the exploration for using flow-through shares, it can be spread throughout a whole 12-month period even going 60 days into the next year.

Also, under the federal Income Tax Act, there is not a differential between the subsurface and surface use of flow-through shares to provide for exploration initiatives. The hon. member should also know that the federal income tax rules require that only 50 per cent of the exploration expenses be financed through flow-through shares in order to allow flow-through shares to be used for exploration.

As to the establishment of a Canada account, I am sure he would catch the interest of the Minister of Finance. I would be pleased to have discussions with the member for Abitibi and my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Is the minister aware that doctors and medical specialists in Prince George and other communities in British Columbia have opted out of medicare and are charging fees to patients? That is extra billing by any other name.

If the minister is aware of this situation, can he tell the House whether his department has been consulting with the B.C. government on this situation to try to determine any future action either government might be able to take on this situation?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is a very good question. We are actually in touch with the Government of British Columbia to ascertain the exact story of extra billing in that province. My hon. friend knows very well that the Canada Health Act does not allow extra billing by the provinces or doctors.

I repeat that we are in touch with the province. If there is any problem, we will act accordingly.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's answer. Examples have been prepared out of Prince George and other communities where some medical practitioners are asking for additional fees up front from patients. I will provide that information to the minister.

I would like to know what specific measures or action the government might have at its disposal in consultation with the minister of health in British Columbia to try to end these practices.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the very short answer is that I will enforce the Canada Health Act, dollar for dollar.

In other words, it is known that we transfer money to the provinces with regard to dollars accepted by the Canada Health Act. If there is any extra billing in the province of British Columbia in collaboration with the province itself, we will make sure it cannot happen any more.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday I got a great answer from the Minister of State for Agriculture about the feed freight assistance program. I hope the same happens today.

The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission has made a presentation to the Department of Transport about a far more equitable and fair formula for the maritime freight rate reduction.

I wonder if the minister could give us some good news on that. Will he consider that plan and accept it?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we have been working with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission to try to arrive at a consensus.

Thanks to his own involvement and that of his colleagues, I am happy to report today that we have come to a consensus of reducing the subsidy on the basic westbound portion of the agreement, eliminating the subsidy on used household goods and scrap materials and reducing the intraregional subsidies by 10 per cent. I think this is good news for everyone concerned.

SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In his economic statement he committed support to small business through the Small Businesses Loans Act. There are approximately 960,000 small businesses now eligible under this act. In the last two weeks several small business people have come to me. They have been to financial institutions. The financial institutions say they either know nothing of the Small Businesses Loans Act or they are not going to co-operate.

When will the minister stop ripping the heart and guts out of small business and start promoting this piece of legislation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the bill was initiated by this government. My understanding is that it is currently before the Senate.

I want to take this opportunity to thank the hon. member for his co-operation. He and I and our colleagues over here are on all fours on this particular piece of legislation.

I have had discussions with a number of financial institutions and banks which are very supportive of it. I have had discussions with chambers of commerce and small business organizations that are looking forward to this legislation. It is a very major advance forward and will help the small business community very much. He and I both agree that the small business sector is the main engine of economic activity and job creation. This will be very helpful.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. I sat in committee. I worked with this government. We co-operated and put the bill through in record time. The banks were there. They committed to support this. Your minister of small business committed. It is not happening.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member knows how to put the question through the Speaker and I am sure he will.

Mr. Mills: In this country, small businesses are our greatest hope for new job creation. My question through you, Mr. Speaker, is when will the Minister of Finance honour his commitment? When will he give us an undertaking to promote this bill throughout Canada and also call in the banks so that they will begin to act on their own commitment?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I generally appreciate the hon. member's enthusiasm. We have already had discussions with the banks.

The legislation has not received Royal Assent. As soon as the legislation receives Royal Assent we will conduct the kind of campaign the hon. member is talking about.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration.

Yesterday the department of immigration announced the closing of eight local offices throughout Canada and the virtual closing of 28 others. This is simply to proceed with the centralization of its services in Vegreville, Alberta.

How can the government so callously leave thousands of Canadians without important immigration services simply to prop up the re-election possibilities of the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The hon. member refers to the member for Vegreville. For his information, for over 25 years now the minister has been re-elected to this House and knowing him, I know he is in for another 25 years.

The hon. member is suggesting that Canadians would be deprived of services. I want to correct the record and correct his statement because it is not correct.

The Canadian public will be better served with this case processing centre. Instead of people having to line up in offices and wait hours for service, they will be able to use a mail-in system. This has been proven to be very successful, so the people will be better served. More important, Canadian taxpayers will save money and I know Liberals do not care.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this proposal to replace face-to-face immigration interviews by a centralized paper review in Vegreville, Alberta will take longer. It will generate more errors. In the long run it will cost more. The pilot projects show that. In addition, this proposal will facilitate fraudulent applications from the criminal element.

Why does the minister not listen to reason and send this pork-barrelling project back to the drawing boards as quickly as possible?

• (1500)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Canadians will find little comfort in the assertion of the hon. member that using new technologies, trying to better serve the public with new technologies, with a more effective and efficient service, is going backward.

I know that the Liberal approach to things is to go back and see in the past a solution for the future, but that is not the way to go.

People will be better served by this new service, will benefit from it and, more important, taxpayers will save money. That is what we have to do.

BILL C-7

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

On June 11, 1992, this House passed Bill C-7, respecting the status of the artist. On June 23, 1992, the bill received Royal Assent. Today, March 16, 1993, the legislation is still not in effect. As a result, associations representing artists are unable to settle a number of important issues, which has very serious implications for many artists.

The Minister of Communications has already told artists that the legislation required a complex process. If the process is so complex, I would like to ask the Minister of Labour when he intends to consult the interested parties and when the legislation will finally come into effect?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that it will not be long.

FORESTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry.

It is my understanding that European governments are about to ban green lumber shipments from Canada because of a high nematode infestation and that this ban is going to take effect on June 1 this year.

Further I understand that because of the increased costs for kiln drying and heating our manufacturers are going to be at a disadvantage for costs they cannot recover.

In light of what is really a trade sanction disguised as a scientific sanction, what action is being taken to alleviate the situation? Is there any prospect that the ban can be postponed? Can our industry be competitive with heat treated lumber on a certified basis?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, my friend is correct. This is a very serious issue in the sense that it puts at risk potentially $300 million worth of trade with the European Community. It is for that reason we are dealing with it at the highest level.

Our efforts in the first instance are to ensure that our European colleagues understand the clear distinction between plant health issues and trade. We have applied for an extension to allow us to do further studies. We have also applied for a species exemption to allow those species that are not affected by the nematode to be shipped freely.

We expect some answers from the Europeans in due course.

Mr. Speaker: I want to advise the House that I have a question of privilege from the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau, but before hearing that I want to respond to a question of privilege brought by the same member on March 11.

PRIVILEGE

LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE ON BILL C-113—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On March 11, 1993 the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau raised a question of privilege concerning an occurrence in the legislative committee on Bill C-113 the previous day. Members of the committee had found remarks made by a witness to be offensive; and after the witness had refused repeated requests from both sides of the committee table and from the chair to withdraw the remark, the committee had agreed to a motion that his evidence be expunged from the committee's record.

The hon. member indicated that the action taken was not within the committee's powers because committee evidence and the testimony of witnesses before the committee are privileged; because the correction of the record, which is within the power of committee, cannot extend to the expunging of whole sections of the verbatim transcript, and finally because a majority of the committee's members had acted to silence the witness. He also suggested that the chairman of the committee might have intervened during the hearing of the testimony to caution the witness or even to eject him.

In support of this position the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce added that the extreme measure taken, of expunging the entire testimony because of one unacceptable statement, was unprecedented in his experience and contrary to democratic parliamentary procedures.

The hon. member for Red Deer, the chairman of the committee, then briefly related the events in question from the committee chair's perspective. He indicated that he had been reluctant to interrupt the testimony at some earlier points on account of questionable remarks and that "one extremely inflammatory—statement" had come at the very end of the testimony. At that time he had asked the witness to withdraw the remark. During the subsequent discussion he and other members had repeated this request; but when the motion to strike out the witness' testimony was proposed he felt he had no choice but to put it before the committee.

The hon. member for Ontario who had proposed in committee the motion which has been brought to the Speaker's attention, argued that the committee's action was in order because a committee like the House has the power to enforce the rules of order and civility on all those within its ambit and also the power to order the exclusion of the public from its meetings. He also pointed out that the House had not yet received the report from the committee relating to this question citing Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 107, which states that the House deals with a question of privilege arising in committee on report from that committee.

[Translation]

I would like to thank the members who contributed to the discussion on this point for the conciseness and restraint they have shown in making their arguments. The events occurring in committee were clearly such as to cause strong feelings, and the Chair appreciates the rationality and objectivity with which all members put their points of view.

[English]

I would particularly like to thank the hon. member for Red Deer for his help. He seemed at one point to be beginning to wonder if the chair of a legislative committee was as great a mark of honour as he had supposed; but I would like to assure him that, in the eyes of the Speaker, selection to the Panels of Chairmen, like election to the Speakership, is a distinct mark of honour if not always good for the nerves.

With regard to the question that has been raised, I need hardly detail to the House the many occasions on which the Chair has clearly stated its reluctance to interfere in the proceedings of a committee. I have already mentioned the quotation by the hon. member for Ontario of citation 107 of Beauchesne.

[Translation]

As the House knows, however, this rule is not entirely inflexible. The Speaker may pronounce on such a question if it is very serious or urgent or if there is a lack of direct or recent Canadian practice available for the guidance of members. Such a departure from regular practice cannot in my opinion be considered a precedent.

[English]

There are in fact some Canadian precedents for the deletion of short passages of the Debates of the House because of their unparliamentary or offensive character. The most recent of these that the Chair has been able to find dates from April 3, 1933, when the Speaker ruled that an unparliamentary word previously used in the House should be expunged from the Debates of that day.

May's 21st edition at page 634 states that committees have expunged evidence which is "improper or inadmissible—which properly speaking [was] not evidence—and even the whole of the evidence given by a witness". This is in accord with the implications of our own Standing Order 113(5) which gives a legislative committee the power "to print from day to day such papers and evidence as may be ordered by it"; and therefore necessarily the power to decide not to print.

The procedural objections raised to the committee's action were, very briefly, because testimony is privileged and because the correction of the record cannot extend to wholesale deletion. It seems to the Chair that the privileged nature of testimony mentioned in Beauchesne's sixth edition at citation 106 refers to the witness' immunity from prosecution rather than to any inviolability of the evidence itself. I agree that what was done in this case is not a correction as envisaged in Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 828, but rather as I have mentioned a decision not to exercise the power which the committee undoubtedly possesses.

Such a decision by a committee would of course be noted in its Minutes of Proceedings and Erskine May suggests, at page 636 of his 21st edition, that "the committee—indicate in the evidence as printed the places in the text where material had been omitted". I understand in the present case these measures have been taken.

In conclusion, the Chair must find that the actions taken by the committee, as outlined by its chairman, were within its powers and that the matter raised by the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau does not under the circumstances constitute a question of privilege.

I have a further question of privilege from the hon. member and I will hear the hon. member.

PROCEEDINGS OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE ON BILL C-113

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am very disappointed in your decision.

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. The hon. member may be disappointed in the decision but the duty of the Chair is to bring decisions down according to the rules and according to the procedural law. It is completely improper and certainly not appropriate for an hon. member to start off on a second question of privilege arising from the same committee, and it just may be that the Chair is being very generous in even hearing it with that kind of a criticism. If the hon. member does not like the decision the hon. member has other places where he can go and express it, but not in this Chamber.

Mr. Samson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You are quite right. I withdraw the comment and I do apologize to the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: I just want to say to the hon. member that I appreciate the comment and the apology is accepted.

Mr. Samson: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of personal privilege concerning the legislative committee studying Bill C-113. On March 11, 1993 I raised the question of privilege in the House concerning the decision by the majority of the committee studying Bill C-113 to expunge the testimony of the witness.

My point is very short. I am at a loss as to how the committee could proceed prior to hearing your decision. Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 693, deals with clause-by-clause study of legislation and states:

> (1) Before beginning its clause-by-clause study, the committee will usually call the sponsor of the bill and such witnesses as it deems necessary, to give evidence upon the merits of the bill.

While the committee called witnesses who testified on the merits of the bill, the question of privilege I raised related to procedural and substantive defects with how the committee dealt with one of those witnesses. Beauchesne's clearly establishes a condition that must be satisfied before a committee can begin clause-by-clause study of a bill.

My earlier question of privilege was one which had to be dealt with by you, Mr. Speaker, since it was argued that the committee exceeded its jurisdiction. The decision of the majority of the committee to proceed with clause by clause, without first hearing the ruling of the Speaker, is I believe a display of contempt for the Speaker of this House. This is especially true, given the fact that the committee was given the option this morning of suspending clause-by-clause hearings and the majority of members of the committee chose not to wait for Your Honour's ruling.

I ask that the proceedings of the committee today be declared a nullity. I also ask that this matter be referred to an appropriate committee of this House for disciplinary action of the chair and the majority members of this committee.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to what the hon. member is saying and I understand. I want the hon. member to know that I understand there is some dispute going on within the committee. It is not for me, at least at this point, to enter into one side or the other of that dispute.

The point the hon. member has raised is an interesting one. I will consider it very carefully and will report back, as of course I am obliged to do and which I would want to do. But I do want to make one thing clear: However I may report back, I do not think I have any power to interfere with the proceedings of the committee at this time.

I will take the hon. member's comments under advisement and I will return to the House to try to give an appropriate response as soon as possible. Again I thank the hon. member for his courtesy.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I listened carefully, along with others, to your ruling and I simply seek clarification on two points.

First, the evidence referred to in your deliberations, Mr. Speaker, was presented again yesterday. It was exactly the same evidence and was accepted yesterday. In other words the evidence that was removed from the record one day was accepted the next, and I seek clarification on how this can be done.

Second, do we understand now that if members feel strongly—I think that was the term you used in your ruling—it means the majority through a motion can then eliminate from the record what has been said? Is it fair, now that we have assumed that is the case, that we might apply the same here in the House of Commons, that is if the majority of members of the House of Commons had strong feelings on an issue they could introduce a motion and again have Hansard stricken in terms of some of the evidence presented here?

Mr. Speaker: First of all I want to say to the House that the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Kamloops, rises on this matter. The hon. member is a very experienced member of this House as we all know, and I am taking very carefully into account what he said.

The answer to the first part of the hon. member's question is this. As I understand it a completely different witness went in front of the committee and said much the same thing that had been said by the witness that had caused the committee to expunge the record at a prior time, and in this case the committee decided to do nothing but to hear it out. That of course is within the prerogative of the committee.

There certainly cannot be any criticism of the committee for having heard a witness and allowed the witness to say whatever it was, no matter how offensive some members of the committee may have thought it was. That is the answer to the first part of the question.

On the second part of the question I would ask the hon. member to perhaps find a moment this afternoon to look carefully at the recent opinion that I gave which basically comes down to this: The committee does not have to report all of its proceedings. I think the hon. member will see that is really what the judgment turns on, but if the hon. member is having further difficulty with it after having had a chance to look at it I would be pleased to discuss it with him.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mayer that Bill C-95, an act to continue the Farm Credit Corporation and to repeal certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned for the lunch hour I was talking about the Farm Credit Corporation Act at third reading of Bill C-95.

The bill makes a number of important improvements in the structure and organization of the Farm Credit Corporation. It gives it more independence and so on. The real acid test of whether it will make any difference in the back concessions of Canada will really depend on whether the government provides additional funding. This will be especially important when we look at the fact that this legislation will provide for funding beyond the farm gate for further processing and so on.

Clearly the facts of the matter are not very encouraging. If we look at the amount of funding and the amount of loans that are being provided by the government, we see they have dropped by some $1.2 billion in the last five years. The government is not increasing the amount of funding available. In fact it has reduced it by almost 20 per cent over the past several years. Although the legislation as passed will be beneficial, the question is how the government will actually operate it.

I spent some time this morning pointing out that the net farm income is projected in this calendar year to drop by almost $1 billion. The government has given no indication that it is going to provide the same level of support in this coming calendar year as it provided even in 1992. We saw the tremendous rallies in Lucknow, Ontario and Saskatoon in the first couple of months of this year, where tens of thousands of farmers rallied to protest the lack of action by the government.

It seems to me that the government's approach over these past several years has been to increase the support to the industry, tied to the prospects or likelihood of a general election. In 1987-88, the support was very high for the grain industry which is facing an extremely difficult time because of the international grain wars that are going on between the European Community and the United States. In 1990-91 the support was reduced. Everything was set for a larger amount of funding in 1992 and that occurred, except it occurred when prices were still at a very low level and inclement weather meant that many thousands of farmers in northern parts of Saskatchewan and Ontario were not able to harvest the crops.

Although this legislation is a good structure, it is really permissive legislation that allows the government to do certain things and the Farm Credit Corporation to do certain things. Whether or not they will ever do it remains to be seen. Clearly the financial crisis facing rural Canada this year is absolutely devastating. In Saskatchewan, the net farm income is dropping from more than $600 million to some $238 million. Three or four years ago it was almost $1 billion in that one province, which is so dependent on a healthy farm economy.

Last fall the government should have realized what an extremely bad situation there was. It was the worst for crops in southwestern Ontario and Ontario generally. The fall months were cold and wet and the corn crop could not be harvested. What did the government do? It fumbled around until about late September or early October trying to decide whether or not there would be an advance payment regime. This program, which the government wiped out three or four years ago was brought back within a matter of months and the interest free cash advances were provided on the first $50,000 under that program. The government did not make up its mind for several months whether or not this program would be reinstated this year. It short-changed the program so there was only some $41 million. The Ontario Corn Producers Association had to go from bank to bank trying to find somebody to fund the program which it operates on behalf of the Government of Canada.

On top of that, for a number of years in western Canada when there were difficulties harvesting wheat or a grain crop, it was possible through an Order in Council and special arrangement to have unthreshed grain paid for or a farm advance provided for it. In the Ontario case, the government spent several months making up its mind whether it would provide this help for the 25,000 corn producers who are facing the worst cropping situation in history. Finally it came through with the $15,000 limit rather than the $50,000 limit which is available for threshed, harvested corn.

If the government is willing to provide a $50,000 interest free cash advance for threshed or harvested corn, why would it lower that limit when farmers are facing the terrible situation of not being able to take off the crop? Yet that is exactly what happened. In the end, the whole thing floundered. I think there were only 20 producers out of 25,000 who were able to even take advantage of that program. It is a case of niggling and nickel and diming and fighting for every dollar that is needed even though the economic situation for many of these commodities was as bad last year and this year as it was in the 1930s.

We are glad the bill is going to be passed. We hope it will not take very long to be passed in the Senate, but the over-all situation is that the farm financial crisis being faced this year should be the priority for the government.

We know farmers are facing a $1 billion reduction in net farm income. We know the government has chopped the estimates for the Department of Agriculture by over $600 million. Producers really want to know why the parliamentary secretary cannot come into the House today and say the government knows the net farm income is going to be down dramatically this year. It knows there is going to be a general election some time this year, whether it is in the fall, summer or spring. The parliamentary secretary, who was so positive on third reading debate, cannot make a clear statement outlining exactly what additional financial support will be made available, not just for this bill but to help farmers face the perilous drop in net farm income which in Saskatchewan is simply a disaster. It is about a quarter of what the net farm income was four or five years ago.

If the government really wants to show its commitment to agriculture this would be the time to make that statement. I think the parliamentary secretary has seen the tremendous devastation in the corn crops and the difficulties of harvesting that crop last fall. Much of it is still in the fields in southwestern Ontario. I really do not know why he would not move in and help.

Right now we not only face the fall-out from the grain trade or subsidy wars that are going on, but we face the tremendous uncertainty of the free trade deal. The NAFTA is even more uncertain now because we do not know whether the United States is going to accept it. There are also the GATT negotiations.

So much of that uncertainty goes back to the FTA itself. There are problems with the countervail duty that the Americans are trying to impose on our hog producers. There are problems we face with regard to durum wheat. Investigations have been carried out by the United States International Trade Commission with regard to beef production. So much goes back to the FTA. The Prime Minister went to New York and said that American trade law cannot apply to Canadian producers. Ask the hog producers who have had to pay a countervail duty off and on since 1985.

There is great uncertainty in all the sectors. I think there is greater uncertainty now in the supply management and marketing areas than there ever has been because the GATT negotiations have proceeded and stopped, proceeded and stopped, and at some stage you start to wonder if there ever will be a GATT agreement. Either way people in the supply managed sector are very uncertain of their future.

If there is a GATT agreement, clearly the Dunkel commission report which we are concerned this government will accept, will bring in tariffication. Ultimately that will open the borders and drive down the price of poultry products and dairy products. If there is no agreement, then we face the ice cream and yoghurt decision under the FTA. Clearly the government promised it was going to provide import controls. John Wise, the minister for agriculture at the time, stood in this House and said the government had no fears that producers would be protected. Commodities like ice cream, yoghurt and so on would simply be taken from the tariff lists and put on the import controls list. Clearly the government misled Canadian producers.

As soon as that was done in the fall of 1989, the United States immediately took Canada to the GATT, had a panel struck and within nine months of its complaint had a decision that the import controls being put on ice cream and yoghurt were not in keeping with our international commitments. That decision is sitting there waiting for the United States to demand that it be implemented.

If the GATT agreement does not go ahead it will clearly demand access for those two dairy products. If it makes that stick, it can demand access to our markets for cheese, butter and milk powder. Then the whole supply management marketing system, which has been so beneficial for some 34,000 of our producers will start to crumble.

Either way there is great uncertainty today for the supply managed commodities. It really goes back to that FTA agreement in 1987.

There is very great uncertainty, whether one is talking about the grains and oilseeds sector or the supply management sector. It is nice to see the Minister of State for Agriculture here in the House when we are debating the Farm Credit Corporation Act. He knows the previous Minister of Agriculture misled the dairy farmers and poultry farmers when he said their supply managed marketing boards were fully protected and they would be protected by putting—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. Minister of State for Agriculture.

Mr. Blais: I note that the experienced member for Algoma knows better than to say that the former Minister of Agriculture misled. It is not true. I think my hon. friend should reflect on that and withdraw his words. I think it is not true when one looks at what the government has done for dairy farmers and particularly how it has defended the system in Canada. It is the best system in the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): A situation like this is always very difficult for the Chair, because in debate, interpretations can vary widely from one side of the House to the other. I prefer to let freedom of speech prevail in such cases. The hon. member for Algoma may proceed.

[English]

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, it is nice to see that the Minister of State for Agriculture is not so preoccupied with the leadership convention of the Tory party that he recognizes that dairy farmers and poultry farmers are very concerned. They are very concerned because the former Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Wise, told farmers: "You have no fears about this government selling you out. There are no fears that the supply management system is going to be protected".

When he announced to the dairy farmers of Canada in January 1988 that he was going to put ice cream, yoghurt, butter, cheese and skim milk powder on the import control list, Mr. Bentsen, who was the chairman of the Senate finance committee in the United States said: "Mr. Wise, if you do that, we will take you to the GATT and we will open those markets for ice cream, yoghurt and similar products, so don't do it". Mr. Wise said there was no problem, he could do that. Mr. Bentsen reminded Mr. Wise that there was no provision in the FTA for import controls on Canadian dairy or poultry products. The United States has it. It has its GATT waiver. It has complete control. However, in the FTA there was no provision in that way.

After the election in 1988, the government went ahead and put these products on the import control list. The United States government immediately challenged Canada and asked for a petition to GATT to set up a panel. That GATT decision was rendered in September 1989. The government tried to cover it up for months. Ultimately even the Minister of State for Agriculture from la belle province agreed, reluctantly I believe, because they had made a promise to accept that GATT panel decision.

Here we sit with a decision by a GATT panel in December 1989 calling on Canada to open its border to ice cream and yoghurt. That precedent could be applied equally to other processed dairy products. Processed dairy products represent 63 per cent of all of our production. One significant thing about it is that a disproportionate amount of it, on a population basis, is located in the province of Quebec. It will really fall to the Minister of State for Agriculture in Quebec if and when the United States demands access for those commodities to explain to those industrial milk producers in Quebec why he ever agreed to that arrangement. Clearly there was no provision made in the FTA to protect those commodities.

That is why producers are very concerned. They know that the FTA exposed them. They know that the government lost all of its bargaining power in the GATT negotiations. Because the Americans had already gained access, why would they negotiate very hard or at all in those GATT negotiations?

That is why our position has been so weakened in those GATT negotiations. It is because the Americans already have access under the ice cream and yoghurt decision for processed dairy products. They could easily go back and get similar decisions for skim milk powder, butter, cheese or other commodities or poultry products.

There is very great concern not only that the government has sold out in the FTA, but that the ice cream and yoghurt decision really weakened Canada's bargaining power with the United States which after all is a big player.

It was not surprising three or four months ago when the chief negotiator for Canada announced that Canada had lost support. Where there were six countries supporting supply management a year ago, by January or by October last year it was down to only one or two. It is just one step after another that has been a relentless move toward tariffication. That is the American proposal which helps them but would destroy our supply management system.

There is very great concern as to whether the government really has any clout or any bargaining power at all. It is strange that the Prime Minister in New York back in 1987 said that the United States trade law could not apply to Canada and he would make sure that happened.

Of course he did not get it in the FTA. The FTA leaves our producers of steel, forest products, hogs, Durum wheat or whatever open to United States countervail duty.

It is interesting that in the North American free trade agreement, the government did not go back and try to get those things. It is amazing that after the experience we have had with the constant harassment of anti-dumping and countervail duties, that it did not go back and correct that and get a subsidy code and an anti-dumping code put in. Every other international free trade agreement in the world has them. Yet for some reason or another apparently the government did not even try.

Why did the government not say to the Mexicans: "Look, we really got taken on the FTA. Let us combine our forces and get an anti-dumping code. Let us combine our forces and get a countervail duty code. If we have support programs then we will know exactly what support program is going to be subject to U.S. countervail duty and how to handle anti-dumping activity by United States corporations". Yet we look at the NAFTA and all that is there.

That is exactly why we argued in the 1988 general election that the government is better off to negotiate in the GATT. There is over-all support from 108, 110 or 120 nations and the United States is not a country with 10 times the economic power that Canada has or maybe 20 times the economic power that the Mexicans have.

Clearly it cannot be argued that somehow or another, the government got mixed up and did not know what it was not getting in the free trade deal in the fall of 1987. Clearly it knew it was not getting anything in that regard.

It is even worse when it comes back with a NAFTA deal in the fall of 1992. Here is another deal where it did not make any arrangements. Fortunately the Clinton administration is concerned about some of the other things we did not get, things like environmental and labour standards. Of course Canada gave up its energy provisions which Mexico got. We did not stick for those same energy arrangements.

One has to ask what kind of negotiators we have. Our whole supply management system is in a turmoil and very concerned about what is going to happen in the future. Our food processing industry, the second largest industry in the country, is very concerned. Over 100 plants have been closed or have moved to the United States. Some 34,000 jobs have been lost in that processing industry, much of that due to the FTA and the move by the United States to take over those sectors.

It is most unfortunate. This Bill C-95, the FCC bill, provides assistance for further processing. However, if an industry has been wiped out by the FTA and has moved its plant to the United States, it is hard to save the horse when the stable doors have already been thrown open.

The bill we are passing today is a good bill but it does not solve all the problems of agriculture in this country. It does not even begin to do that. We want to see it passed. However, we want to see the government show some responsibility with regard to the farm credit crisis which is facing this country. This bill certainly does not cover those crises and what will resolve those problems, many of which are devastating for thousands and thousands of producers in this country.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I wish to participate in the discussion of Bill C-95 considering the changes to the Farm Credit Corporation Act.

First of all, I would like to acknowledge that I do have a bit of a conflict of interest in this. The head office of the Farm Credit Corporation is located in my constituency and I am of course concerned with it. I would like to acknowledge the government's moving the head offices to Regina. It makes a lot of sense, especially considering that the largest land owner in the province of Saskatchewan is the Farm Credit Corporation. In September it held 1,943 leases totalling 877,000 acres of land. It is the largest land holder in my province of Saskatchewan.

There is much in Bill C-95 that we support. We are happy to see that the government dropped the one section, section 5, trying to establish in the bill that it is exempted from the provincial laws. Of course, the government did that in part because of the court decision.

We can pass laws but we should also surely deal with the intent. I still have some concern here. There are some very grave problems facing the farm community. We have heard this eloquently expressed by members from all sides of the House.

Farm families are losing their land. This land has often been in the family for many generations. There is a crisis, mainly due to the dramatic drop in what farmers get for what they produce. While the costs of production have gone up, their return has gone down.

Many farmers have been continuing to exist on the edge of bankruptcy. They are never certain whether it is this year they go under or whether they will be able to survive for one more year in the hope that things will improve. It is no wonder that in Saskatchewan we call our province "next year country". If it is not drought or frost or grasshoppers that threaten farms, it is low commodity prices. But the sense of optimism and hope that exists in my province, particularly among the farming community, makes them keep going. It is in the hope that next year conditions will be better, prices will be better and again they will be able to make an honest return on all their effort and investment.

One of the problems, of course, has been the declining value in farm land. Billions of dollars have been lost in the province of Saskatchewan just on the decrease in the value of the land. Many farmers are staying on the land because they do not feel that the price for farm land is adequate right now. They are hoping that the price will go up, that the farm economy will turn around. Then they will be in a position to sell.

That means the average age on the farm continues to increase. By that I mean the average age of the farmer on the land is quite high. It is because young people are not able to get into farming. They are either being discouraged or they do not have the necessary capital to get in.

To begin to turn all this around requires a new mind-set, a new attitude, particularly on the part of federal and provincial governments. It is a crisis that can only be addressed by co-operation between federal and provincial governments.

The provincial government in Saskatchewan made some honest attempts to deal with the farm debt crisis and the numbers of farmers being forced into bankruptcy and having to give up their land. The province moved to develop a moratorium on farm foreclosure. Since the FCC was the largest land holder in Saskatchewan it was very important that it co-operate.

The federal government took the position that legally they did not have to co-operate and apparently one of the courts have found in their favour. As I mentioned before it is not just a legality. It is more than that. I implore the federal government and the Minister of Agriculture to de-politicize agriculture and to look at the attempts by the Government of Saskatchewan to deal with the crisis, particularly the crisis of farm foreclosure, and to co-operate with it.

What the Government of Saskatchewan is trying to do has been accepted by the banks and most lending agencies. It is fair and makes a lot of sense. It is trying to help farmers stay on the land. Surely the federal government can co-operate. We cannot afford to play political games. We have to de-politicize agriculture. We have to work together to develop a strategy so that farm families can stay on the land.

Agriculture is more than a business. Agriculture for us in Saskatchewan is also a way of life. People want to stay on the farm and raise their children there because they prefer the rural way of life. It is in the national interest that we maintain a strong and viable rural community and farm community. It is more than just a business. We have seen governments invest and help faltering industries and faltering businesses. We feel that type of assistance should also be available to the farm sector of our economy.

Much of Bill C-95 is positive, as I have mentioned before. It allows for a greater flexibility in terms of the type of lease arrangements individual farmers can enter into with FCC. It allows for flexibility of FCC to work with either provincial governments or other lending institutions in developing viable plans. I hope this government through FCC will expand on the opportunities this bill allows them and will enter into co-operative efforts particularly with the provincial government to help slow down the amount of farm foreclosures and to help, with the provincial government and other lending institutions, farm families facing a severe crisis.

There are some things we would have liked to have seen added to it. We would have liked to have seen the advisory panel being maintained and used more actively. We would have liked to have seen an appeals board. As is bound to happen, disagreements occur between people working for FCC and farmers. It would allow the farmer an opportunity to go to an arm's length-type board to hear his complaints. He would have the feeling there is a body out there he could bring his complaints to.

We would also like, and we feel this is essential, long-term lease options and long-term fixed interest. These are essential in agriculture. There are many variables in agriculture, particularly price that goes up and down. As a foundation to the farm we have to introduce some stable elements. Surely a stable long-term lease on fixed interest would allow the farmer to do more planning, to know that his monthly or yearly payments on loans for purchasing his land are going to be fixed. That would create some stability in a network that has a lot of instability.

We also want to see community trusts for farm lands that have gone into a bank. Intergenerational transfer of land, transferred from one generation to the other, from fathers to sons and daughters, is very important. The previous provincial government of Allan Blakeney introduced the land bank to help facilitate the intergenerational transfer of land in a smooth and orderly way. It allowed the young farmer to be able to start farming the land, make his yearly payments and eventually have the option of purchasing the land or continuing to work the land on a lease-type basis as long as he wanted to. On the other hand it allowed the older farmer the opportunity of taking out what he had invested in the land over all the years of working it and retiring.

In other words it allowed the younger generation to enter into farming without requiring a lot of up-front cash for a down payment on the purchase of the land. On the other hand it allowed the older farmer to retire and get his investment back out. This is what we were hoping the land bank would do.

In many ways the land bank did that. Perhaps there was some criticism of it. The only legitimate criticism I would have is that many decisions tended to be made in Regina. Reform that would have allowed more of a community-based board or such organization on a community basis to manage the land in the bank would have been a much wiser course to have taken. It would have given the local people a sense that they owned the land and that they were custodians and guardians of that land upon which the well-being of their community and their districts depended.

These things I speak of are not included in Bill C-95. They are steps I hope we will take in the not too distant future. I think they are necessary steps to address the severe problem of the intergenerational transfer of land, the need for a co-operative strategy among federal, provincial and local municipal governments to make agriculture more viable and to work on value added projects.

I point out that Bill C-95 allows us—and I congratulate the government for this new addition to the act—to begin to co-operate to bring all our resources together. That is the only way we can begin to save agriculture.

• (1600)

We know the province of Saskatchewan has severe debt problems. Its payments on the debt it has incurred are horrendous and create a deficit situation that prevents the province of Saskatchewan from directing the needed resources to agriculture.

The federal government also faces a similar situation. In fact in some ways it is a more severe situation. It is time these dwindling resources available from either the federal or provincial government go to agriculture. It is time they started being used more wisely. Instead of playing political games it is about time these resources were brought together for the maximum benefit of the farming community. I hope new politics will be developed. Certainly there is a need in agriculture for new politics.

We have some objections to Bill C-95. Our agriculture critic has introduced some amendments. Unfortunately the amendments were not acceptable to the government. We also feel the Farm Credit Corporation is only part of the solution. It is not the whole solution. Other steps have to be taken by governments at the provincial and federal levels to adequately address the problems being faced.

Over all we are happy with Bill C-95. We see it as a step in the right direction and on the whole we support the bill.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise again to make more comments on Bill C-95, an act to continue the Farm Credit Corporation and to repeal certain acts in consequence thereof. We have spent a considerable amount of time today on this bill in the House at report stage and now at third reading.

I would like to make a few closing comments on this bill. As was stated so well by some speakers before me, this is a piece of permissive legislation. I talk to people in the riding of Prince Edward—Hastings quite frequently. I remind them of the work we do in the House in Ottawa and that many of the pieces of legislation are permissive legislation. This means that if the direction or the permission given in the legislation is allowed to happen, flows and follows the way we hope it will, some good things can come from its passage.

Perhaps we do not need to remind Canadians it is not always the case. The intention may be very good, but there must be the will of those who write the regulations and put them in place after the legislation is passed here. That is what really makes it tick. That is what really makes it work.

For the most part this is a good piece of legislation as far as the agrifood industry is concerned. The government accepted an amendment to the bill this morning stressing that the FCC was first and foremost to deal with family farms and small and medium sized businesses in rural Canada. That is more prominent in the legislation than it was just a few hours ago. For that I say thank you to the government. That was one step.

There are other good points to this bill. One is that it now makes Farm Credit Corporation money available to those who lease property but do not own farm land. The Farm Credit Corporation management tools or loans have not been available to lease holders in the past. In addition, it gives the Farm Credit Corporation the power to make or guarantee loans to farmers or a group of farmers that have an operating farm or businesses relating to their farming operations and thereby hopefully allow more value added facilities in rural Canada.

• (1605)

In some comments earlier in the House today I said, I hope clearly, that one of the things we need very badly in rural Canada right now is the facility, the opportunity and the support to take the raw product that we have been quite successful in selling in the past in Canada, and many times in exporting, be it wheat, beef, pork or fruits and vegetables, and process it further and develop it further so that Canadians can have the jobs doing that and Canadians can enjoy the benefits. Farm credit changes here will allow the board of directors to make loans to individuals or groups of individuals who want to do that and therefore create jobs in rural Canada, in the smaller or medium-sized towns or wherever it might happen to be, and take that process on.

Unfortunately but in reality the world has changed in the last few years. We have been very successful in the past in selling grain on the world market, but we know that for many producers today world prices do not allow them to survive economically. We have to consider ways in which we can value add that grain. I am only using that as an example of products that are produced by family farms in Canada today.

Another positive change in this bill is the opportunity for the Farm Credit Corporation to take more than just the real property as security. At the present time the Farm Credit Corporation takes a mortgage on the property on which it is loaning money. That is the extent to which it can go for security.

The bill allows the board of directors to make regulations that will allow them to take off-farm property or off-farm security as security on a loan to be used in agriculture. In my view, this is a positive step. This allows someone to have a job somewhere else or to acquire some capital or some equity someplace else and then use that to back their farming operation or their rural on-farm manufacturing or value added business that they might want to put in place in a community.

It also gives the Farm Credit Corporation, and I think this is a plus as well, the power to set interest rates. It does not have to go to the cabinet each time it wants to change interest rates. The board of FCC has the ability and the duty of borrowing money wherever it can borrow at the best interest rate it can get. Now it is able to set its own interest rate on what it has to charge.

I say last, but certainly not least, is that it is made very clear in this bill that it is the intention and the direction of the Farm Credit Corporation to act on a break-even basis. Unfortunately in the past we know too well that the Farm Credit Corporation has not always done that. For the good of all of us and for the good of the taxpayers in Canada I hope and I think it can fill all of these other requirements and duties and obligations that it has and still do it on a break-even basis.

I remind the House as well that this is, as other speakers have said today, not necessarily the be all and end all and the answer to the financial crisis in rural Canada and the farming communities today. There are problems out there. The present government likes to brag about the amount of money it has directed toward rural Canada and to farmers in its term of office. Yes, it has been a considerable sum of money. But I have to remind the government that it has not been successfully and correctly directed.

If we look at the situation we have on farms in Canada today compared to when this government came into power, the total farm debt today is equal to or greater than it was.

The number of farmers that are exiting the industry is at the same rate if not greater than what it was. I could give many other examples to simply tell Canadians that what this government has done has not been successful. There must be some changes.

We have to change our priorities and the manner in which we support the agrifood industry and the primary producer. I outlined some of that. My first suggestion would be to assist that industry to take its products through further stages so that if it cannot obtain from the world price or from the price of the raw product a market price for the raw product it can obtain what is needed, a piece of the action from the development and the value added of that product as we go on up through.

The government talks about parliamentary reform and so do we. We in this party have put forward a number of suggestions on how parliamentary reform can make the legislative process more successful. I have used Bill C-95 in some discussions I have had in my riding as a good example.

Here is an example of a topic and a bill that everybody agreed needed to be discussed, revamped or whatever words you want to use. It has been talked about in the agriculture community and the farm community for a number of years.

In my view the process we went through today would have been far more successful if we had taken this discussion first to the Standing Committee on Agriculture and asked that committee and any witnesses it wished to bring forward to that committee for suggestions on how the Farm Credit Corporation Act could and should be improved.

After having heard those suggestions and witnesses then the work could have been done in drafting the bill. However, as we know very well, that is not the way it happens. That is not the way it happened with this bill.

The minister brought the bill in, the bill was basically cut and dried. Yes, there was one clause at committee that the government agreed to withdraw. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture mentioned it today when he stated that it had been withdrawn. I might say that was done for legal reasons, so the government had very little choice.

Those amendments that we put forward at the legislative committee after the bill received second reading should have been discussed in the way that they could and should have been by the government members, rather than voting down every amendment that the opposition brought forward. They knew from the start that basically we were in favour of the bill.

It is a good piece of legislation but it could be better yet. This is where so often in this House we fall down in our obligation to our constituents and to Canadians.

Of the two amendments that were put forward today, one was passed. Two others were put forward today. I do not think we are asking too much. I do not know whether it was out of stubbornness or what, but the government simply would not pass them. That is all there is to it.

That is asking for an appeal board so that if someone is not happy with the decision or how they are dealt with when they make an application to the Farm Credit Corporation they have one, two or three individuals that they can discuss that with. I do not know what more anybody can ask than that.

As I said earlier today, it was not going to cost much but it would serve a useful purpose. Since this board of directors will be dealing with and making rules and regulations and policy respecting family farms and small and medium sized businesses, primarily in rural Canada, there were amendments before this House today suggesting that the legislation state that a percentage of the board of directors be primary producers.

Whether that be 50 per cent, 40 per cent or 30 per cent I suppose does not matter. There is nothing in this legislation today that says that any of that board of directors has to be primary producers. They in all fairness would have a better understanding of what happens, what is going on and what people down on the farm are faced with today. The instruments and tools of financing would be very valuable and very useful to them.

In closing, there are a couple of other concerns that I have. A number of us have received a copy of a letter from the Canadian Bankers Association which states that it is not happy with this legislation. I may not be using its words but using my words. It says that this may allow the Farm Credit Corporation to intrude on the banks' territory. That does not bother me much. If that is what it takes to keep the banking institutions' feet to the fire, fine and dandy, it will keep their feet to the fire.

Some of the banks have said that if this happens they will consider closing some of the rural banks. I do not think so. The Farm Credit Corporation fills the gap of long-term financing. The banks are needed there for operating loans and for shorter term financing and they will still be there.

Again, if this is what it takes to get the banks' attention then I think that is another good part of the bill. However, with the track record that this government has in privatizing things, I also see where this government could very well be setting up the Farm Credit Corporation to be privatized, sold off, or whatever way we want to say it, to another lending institution. We must be very, very careful and very cautious that that not happen because it does serve, for the reasons I have just stated, a very useful purpose. It has a useful bit of clout in the agrifood industry.

It is a good piece of legislation. I am pleased that it is passing today and I am pleased to support it. In that light I remind Canadians that we in the opposition are often accused of only voting against the government. This is an indication where parties can work together in this House for the good of an industry, for the good of a segment of Canada, but I remind everyone that it could work even better yet.

As I say, this is a good piece of legislation and it deserves passing, but it is too bad it could not have done the whole job and been fixed the best way that it possibly could because it will likely be a long time before it comes back. We should have done a little more work on it while we are here. However, I guess 90 per cent of a loaf is better than none at all. We will take this today and maybe in less than a year or so from now a number or all of us on this side of the House will have the opportunity to complete the job that this government did not wish to do.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am taking part in the third reading debate today on Bill C-95, the act to continue the Farm Credit Corporation. While there are parts of the bill that do have merit, I sincerely suggest that this bill puts the cart before the horse.

I reflect back to my years of running a farming operation. When we wished to make changes, we always had to do a projected cash flow for at least one year or sometimes up to five years. We had to show to our bank that the loan could be repaid and we had to prove on paper that the revised operation would benefit our entire operation.

Here we are today making several changes to the legislation under which FCC operates and there are no programs in place in most sectors of agriculture—I say in most sectors of agriculture, I make exception with the dairy and poultry sectors—to provide the financial stability to repay the loans made to the Canadian farmers with any certainty.

I have spoken in this House before about the huge corporations which my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood referred to this morning, transnational corporation agendas as he called it. These are spelled out in the March 9 issue of Farm and Country tabloid in an article by John Muggeridge called "Agriculture Inc.".

John Muggeridge shows in detail the concentration that is taking place in the United States that I have spoken about a good many times in this House, and how they are taking over the agriculture industry there. He also cites a study that I have used on many occasions by university professors William Hefferman and Douglas Constance of the University of Missouri.

The same names keep cropping up again and again in terms of agricultural production in the United States. These firms are rapidly expanding into Third World countries and becoming a force here in Canada as well.

In the March 10 issue of the Kitchener-Waterloo Record, Jim Romhan in an article headlined: "Buying groups have clout with suppliers", talks about the further concentration of various buying groups in Canada who supply the supermarket outlets and bring more pressure to bear on the processors and naturally then down the line to the producers. That pressure really results in the price discovery system in the marketplace not being allowed to function as it should.

We also relate back to May 1991 to a study done by the Library of Parliament for the agriculture committee of this House. It spells out what happened even in the Chicago Board of Trade in 1989 when the price of oilseeds took a dramatic drop.

I respectfully suggest to this House that until these problems of concentration in production and processing that we have in the U.S. for those firms now branched here in Canada are corrected, Canadian agriculture will continue to suffer. We cannot hide our heads in the sand and think that a few amendments to the Farm Credit Corporation Act are going to resolve the long-term problem.

Before lunch at the report stage of this Bill C-95, I made reference to the fact that our so-called self-styled professionals, many of whom are economists, continue to dream in Technicolor as they swallow the gospel of globalization and refuse to support the need for our marketing boards. They are ignoring the fact that the cost of establishing environmentally sustainable agriculture should be shared by all of society.

I would like to share that thought for just a few minutes because there are no better conservationists in society than the farm people themselves. But it is something they cannot practice if they do not have a return on investment, management, labour and risk.

We criticize countries in South America for cutting down the rain forests but then we look at Canada and see the small percentage of land covered by wood lots. I am speaking here of southwestern Ontario or other areas across Canada. Somewhere along the line there has to be a return on investment if that land is going to be put back into wood lots. I suggest to this House that we should select a species of trees that could be planted on these lands to give a long-term return to the landowner and a return to society in general. We know that trees add to the environment and use large amounts of carbon monoxide.

I would like to continue that line of thought for a moment and make a few further observations. The development of environmentally friendly value added processes must be speeded up to create new domestic markets for Canadian grains, whether for renewable fuels, road de-icers or other biodegradable products.

We now have road de-icers made from grain corn and biodegradable products such as garbage bags made from the same grains.

The use of grains for renewable fuels alone has tremendous spin-off potential. Although the government voted down Bill C-226 last Wednesday evening, it failed to recognize the spin-off benefits of renewable fuels. These fuels would cut the carbon monoxide emissions by 20 to 30 per cent and the carbon dioxide emissions by 6 to 10 per cent. Then the residue or stillage that is left could be used for cattle feed. If wheat was used as the base, the residues could be used for human food. It would be particularly suited to feeding starving children of Third World nations.

The government is not moving fast enough on these issues. How can it expect the farm people to borrow money if they cannot see where there is going to be a return. I suggest it is completely irresponsible. It is ignoring the need for a domestic pricing system for those sectors that do not have price-setting authority. They are ignoring other nations where input costs are much lower than ours and the targeted prices in most cases are substantially higher than in Canada.

I am referring, of course, to the U.S. target pricing systems, where U.S. corn growers will now be receiving one-half of their deficiency payments prior to planting their crops. Yet the Canadian farmers have to make their annual pilgrimage to the bank to ask for a new line of credit for this year or go to some of their suppliers or transnational corporations that make them sign away their farms and assets to give them credit, usually at a high rate of interest. If we are going to compete globally, we have to have prices that compare with those of the U.S. and a return.

We also have to ensure that under article III of the GATT, other countries exporting food to Canada live up to the same stringent environmental and safety food standards we have in Canada.

Recently we were appalled by the outbreak of food poisoning in the western United States directly related to contaminated meat. This was a disaster waiting to happen. Three children died and hundreds were violently ill. Some will have permanent kidney damage. I am appalled that this could be allowed to happen in a country next to us with which we trade and exchange food across the border.

I am deeply concerned, as well, about the growing oligopolies that have developed here in Canada in the food sector and that the problems identified by the previous royal commissions of inquiry in two provinces have never been acted on. This is public information and again, government has hidden its head in the sand and paid out subsidies to keep some of the farmers on the land, while other sectors of the food industry make profits that place them in the top 10 of the 1990 Globe and Mail "Report on Business", report 1000.

There has to be a return on investment, labour management and risk if agriculture is to survive in Canada. Yet just a few years ago, the government removed the two-price wheat system and it has ignored the fact that consumer prices continue to rise after producer prices have fallen. In fact, on a box of crackers the consumer price went up by 235 per cent while the producer price of wheat down by 43 per cent.

It does not take a genius to realize that Canadian agriculture cannot survive under such conditions, especially, as I indicated earlier, when our competitors are operating with target prices and export enhancement subsidies are paid to the exporting companies involved. Not only are they getting subsidies, but a year ago they were also getting Commodity Credit Corporation grain to feed to their livestock operations. Those huge companies are not only exporters of grain, they are producers of beef, pork and poultry meats. They used that export enhancement funding in exchange for grain from the Commodity Credit Corporation until it ran out some time ago.

I call on the members of this House, particularly on the government side, to stop toying with the lives of thousands of Canadians across rural Canada, admit a series of mistakes has been made and place the welfare of the primary resource industry first and foremost on the agenda. Food production and processing in this country must be made a national security item.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY LAW IMPROVEMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)) moved that Bill S-17, an Act to amend the Copyright Act, the Industrial Design Act, the Integrated Circuit Topography Act, the Patent Act, the Trade-marks Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when my colleague in the opposition applauds, that is a good sign; it means that this is a good bill. I want to thank him for that. You will also allow me to thank the senators who studied this bill and passed it.

I believe this is the first time that Parliament has considered a bill amending five laws on intellectual property. This is a first for the Parliament of Canada. I think that several departments should consider such an approach so that, where a vast subject is concerned, the laws dealing with it can be improved together as a package.

Bill S-17 is a result of consultations with the interested community and those concerned are in favour of the various amendments contained in the bill. One may wonder why we would amend five laws on intellectual property all together. For one thing, it is to make the system more efficient and, for another, to make it more accessible for Canadians.

With this package, we are making administrative and technical changes to five existing laws. In the world economy as we know it and as it is coming to be, no country will be able to live or survive if it does not look after developments related to intellectual property. Any country that did not consider intellectual property a priority would be mistaken. In this regard, we in Canada have been working and must continue to work.

The various pieces of legislation we are discussing today are not necessarily up to date and do not necessarily meet the needs of Canadians, which creates higher costs for Canadians in the intellectual property sector who use these five different acts.

I can give some examples of how the situation has changed. Take the Patent Act, for instance. Today, according to the legislation, an inventor must provide a detailed description of his invention in writing, but we know that in 1993 and future years, there will be many new developments in biotechnology. Describing an innovation in biotechnology in writing is probably not the best and cheapest approach for most users. Producing a sample of the biological material would be a more sensible and practical alternative, and that is one of the changes we find in Bill S-17.

Electronic filing and processing of all patent-related documents does not exist at the present time. This is something else that has to be done, both for the government and for Canadians who use the system. Technically, a person can now file a new application but not be able to protect an existing application. Some technical amendments are therefore necessary. One can easily imagine the problems and inequities this can create, so these are the kinds of amendments being proposed in Bill S-17. Of course, filing of patent applications will be simplified.

With regard to the Trade-marks Act, since 1954 there have been no technical or administrative changes in this legislation. We know that today, for instance, it contains no definition of an entity, but it does contain a definition of a group. Once again, these matters are dealt with in the bill.

Bill S-17 also provides for improving the operation and administration of the Copyright Office. Canadians will have better services.

Earlier we referred to the Industrial Design Act. It is important to protect our industrial designers. As you know, Mr. Speaker, although the Industrial Design Act has been in existence for almost a century, there have been no significant amendments to improve the legislation in many years, so this is important. I may add that all the amendments mentioned were suggested and approved by people in this sector.

At this point I would like to congratulate the Intellectual Property Advisory Committee, which was created in 1988, on its excellent work. Committee members represented business, cultural groups, consumers, universities, researchers and experts.

An hon. member: Lawyers.

Mr. Vincent: My honourable friend mentioned lawyers, but I wanted to use the word "experts". In any case, we understand each other. It boils down to the same thing.

These are people who worked very hard to make changes and provide positive and badly needed solutions for the intellectual property sector which was covered by five different acts.

Finally, this legislation, which is intended to improve the administration of five acts, will simplify procedures. It will simplify the technical aspects and introduce advanced technology, while giving Canadians more convenient access to the intellectual property sector.

The Senate has already examined the bill and judged it to be a valid piece of legislation.

• (1640)

I hope my colleagues on the other side of the House will adopt this legislation as soon as possible. If they are prepared to adopt all stages of the bill today, I am available. I would be delighted to be here in the House to support the bill and ensure it is adopted without further delay.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to congratulate the hon. minister on his ascension into glory with his new position in the cabinet. I have had the pleasure of working with him in the House since I was elected and so far he has been a refreshing change from the way that some things work around here. We have already had a few meetings and they have been somewhat productive. I think this is the first bill that the minister has introduced in the House, and so it is a milestone for him. It is generally a good bill to be introducing.

I say that because of the process that resulted in this particular piece of legislation coming before this place. For those who are watching, it happened in kind of a strange way. Bill S-17 was not initiated in this place but in the Senate, or the other place as we call it from time to time. It was introduced in the Senate of Canada. This is the reversible pipeline of legislation which we do not see a lot of in Canada. Indeed, it was debated, there was some committee study, and witnesses were heard.

It comes to us now after having had a fairly significant degree of examination and after some witnesses have come forward. It is sort of a hodgepodge and does a whole lot of things. There are five acts dealing with intellectual property which it proposes to amend. This bill came up through an advisory committee of stakeholders in the industry which had been set up. It went through a lot of the issues of the day dealing with intellectual property in Canada and the things it could agree on it did. It came forward with a series of amendments to five acts.

The five acts are the Copyright Act, the Industrial Design Act, the Integrated Circuit Topography Act, the Patent Act and the Trade-marks Act. Many parts of this bill deal primarily with housekeeping and try to harmonize regulations and correct some deficiencies and problems that the industry stakeholders have had some level of consensus on.

I am not about to say at this point in time that I think that type of approach has led to a flawed bill. That is the way we should be approaching legislation in the House of Commons. If we had more legislation coming forward after that type of non-combative and non-partisan review and consensus we would have better legislation on the floor of the House of Commons.

If we go back to Bill C-22, the Bankruptcy Act, my colleagues on all sides of the House had an unprecedented level of agreement when we pre-studied the bill. Then when we returned to the partisanship, after approval at second reading, things started to come apart again.

There was something that told us way back then that we could do legislation differently. When we consult widely and listen to people's points of views the Canadian people are the ones who benefit because we have better legislation. We are able to strip away a lot of the nonsense that goes on here from time to time and we are able to tap into the intellect, experience and commitment of all members of Parliament, and it does not really matter whether they are Tories, Liberals, Reformers, Bloc Quebecois or New Democrats. Most people who come to this place come here because they want to serve the public of Canada.

I know that the minister was quite anxious to try to get this bill through the House today because of the factors I have just mentioned and because it has already had some debate in the other place. We have not agreed to do that, not because we want to hold the bill up but for two reasons.

First, I am a firm believer that we are paid to oversee the passage of legislation. Although I have a great deal of respect for my colleagues in the other place I was not over there when this bill was debated.

I have read the committee reports and I have perused the Hansards from the Senate. Nevertheless, this is a fairly complex bill. It has over 70 clauses in it. Much of it is highly technical.

• (1645)

For me to say today that I trust what has gone on in the other place, and there do not appear to be many flaws with the bill, so let us just get it through to clear the legislative agenda is not in the service of Parliament. It does not pay the deserved respect to the people who have put this legislation together.

As a purist, I believe that we have to go through the process and I think we will be doing that over the next few days.

The second problem I have is that there are a number of places in the summary where it says that certain clauses in the legislation have the effect of giving Governor in Council more regulatory authority. In short, in these cases it says, and it may be for good reason, that we will give the Governor in Council, which is the executive branch, the right to change certain aspects of the implementation of these pieces of legislation solely by regulation.

When we deal with regulation, then I have some trouble with that. The former minister knows this. When we are dealing with regulation we owe it to the people of Canada to be very sure that we understand the full impact and the depth of the regulatory powers we are giving to bureaucrats, who after all are not accountable, do not have to face the electorate, and are not public figures.

In this bill, and I guess we will find this out in committee, there are a couple of clauses that bother me more than a little. One is clause 8, which amends the Copyright Act. It allows the Governor in Council, which is the executive, to change the fee structure for the application process for copyright by regulation. That bothers me, because I have always felt that any fee that is imposed, be it a user fee, an application fee or a direct piece of tax legislation, is a tax. Any time we are talking about giving unelected people the right to go forward and alter fees without any debate in this place and without going back to a parliamentary committee I get a little nervous. Perhaps when we get to committee we will be able to talk to the officials and find out exactly what regulation-making powers we are giving to them.

There is one other aspect of the bill that bothers me, and it deals with the patent co-operation treaty. I will be quite honest. I am not exactly sure what the heck it is all about. One thing that does bother me is that one clause of the legislation which would change the way we do things quite clearly gives Governor in Council the ability to pass regulations that can override the legislation. That seems really strange to me, and I am not exactly sure how that is done. I would strongly doubt, unless we are just giving very limited powers, that is the type of precedent we would want to be pursuing. We will be asking questions again on that particular aspect of the bill.

There is another aspect of the bill which I have a little difficulty with, and it concerns biological deposits. This is a whole new field for us, in which new pharmaceuticals, new strains of crops and things like that are coming forward, and it is based on biological agents. My concern is only that we should explore this more closely. We have to look at exactly what we are doing.

In the past, from what I can gather from reading the summaries on the legislation, many times a biological sample would be deposited as part of the application process and they would say that this is a sample of what is and it is different from anything before, so they would ask us to give them a patent on it. That has not been accepted in the past and there have been some court cases on that issue.

My concern is that this now makes that biological deposit acceptable as a significant body of evidence to justify the granting of a patent. I am not opposed to it, but I am concerned about its retroactivity. I am not convinced from the information I have read that it is clear. What would happen if a patent had been struck down, or if a patent had been rejected based on the fact that the main supporting documentation for uniqueness was the biological deposit, or the sample, which was not accepted before?

If there is product out there now and this bill has some retroactive impact, what happens to a farmer who has a particular strain of hybrid seed for which he was never able to get a patent in the past? What happens to some of the drugs and pharmaceuticals currently out there? Indeed, there are a number of pharmaceuticals in the field which may now be challenged by some of the generic companies as to the validity of the patents. I want to find out what will happen to those court proceedings or those cases if they do go forward, if this bill is passed.

In conclusion, we are looking forward to some discussion on this bill when it does go to a legislative committee. Our intention certainly is not to hold it up. I applaud the process by which the bill came forward.

The stakeholders in the industry have waited a long time to get these things cleared up and have done an exemplary job so far. I would just ask them to wait a little bit. We have a few questions from our end. Perhaps working together we can come up with a piece of legislation we can all be proud of and that will fix some of the problems dealing with intellectual property in those five various fields.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, when dealing with Bill S–17 we have to also deal with the fact that this bill before us has been presented to us in a very hasty manner from the time it was initially presented in the other place.

We have not really been adequately briefed. We have not been briefed at all by the government which is presenting the bill. Furthermore, this is a bill if ever there was a bill that needed to go to committee for a thorough analysis to look at the consequences in many areas. On religious grounds, people could be very much opposed to the genetic engineering aspect, the biotechnology aspect of this bill. This kind of bill needs that airing out in a committee with expert witnesses.

Very quickly I am going to go over what this bill does and does not do. Generally I think it is safe to say that this is a hardware bill. It is a house cleaning bill which is being put forth by the government in order to bring many of the related laws we already have on intellectual property into line and make them applicable in a most efficient manner.

For the people who are watching and listening to us today I want to mention that on intellectual property we are basically dealing with patents. We are dealing with creators of functional ideas. We are dealing with much more than books. We are dealing with medicines, biotechnology, the creation of completely new organisms. Some very serious questions arise from the impact of this legislation.

As my colleague has said, without opposing the government's Bill S–17 we could still have a better idea on how to actually be in favour of it if we could get a full airing out of its implications and particularly the retroactivity aspect of parts of the bill.

The bill essentially makes amendments to five different statutes all dealing with various aspects of intellectual property. Patents, which protect the embodiment of ideas of a functional nature, are governed by the Patent Act. Copyright, which protects the expression of ideas, is governed by the Copyright Act. Trade marks, which protect symbols and distinguished goods and services in the marketplace, are regulated by the Trademarks Act. Industrial designs, which relate pretty much to ornamentation applied to an article, are governed by the Industrial Design Act.

An interesting new field is called topographies. As a new MP I remember asking: What is this bill on topographies? What are we talking about? I was thinking of territory, topography on a map. That is not what it means at all. My friends, here we are dealing with the computer age. We are dealing with microchips. This is called topographies, or the contents of a microchip. That is actually regulated by—and here is that word again—the Integrated Circuit Topography Act. If that word is seen in the newspaper, they are talking about microchips.

All that is what Bill S-17 is concerned with. It is important to highlight that this bill was not sneaked in. Although it has been very hastily presented to us, it was not sneaked in. This bill was not bull-dozed. The bill has had extensive consultation and hearings with different consumer groups. Actually, the Canadian Bar Association was one of the players as well.

The bill has been involved in a great deal of consultation. All we are asking as members of Parliament is that the consultation continue in committee so that we can understand the full intent of this legislation before we adopt it.

The amendments to the Copyright Act are primarily of an administrative nature. For example, it eliminates the requirement that entries in the copyright register be personally signed by the registrar of copyright or by the commissioner of patents. That sounds to me to be a fair housekeeping measure.

Dealing with the Industrial Design Act the bill allows the applicant to designate somebody else, an assignee to file an application in their own name. You can designate someone to make an application. Once again that seems to be a fairly inoffensive part of the bill.

With respect to the Integrated Circuit Topography Act this would extend protection to us and countries which are reciprocating with Canada. That is just common sense to me.

I have some serious misgivings when it comes to the biotech part of this bill where we are dealing with new organisms. I am not quite sure that it cannot be described in writing. As a writer myself I would like to know why we would be going against the recent ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada which said it had to be in writing in order for it to be valid when application was made for a patent.

I understand the biological sample can be deposited and that would be the example. That would be your so-called application part of the affidavit, but I am not quite sure that in and of itself would suffice. There should be some attempt to write what went into that biological sample, why it is so unique and why there should be a patent on it.

Dealing with this whole question of biogenetic engineering, I am very much concerned that we are actually homogenizing life forms. We are homogenizing plants. We are homogenizing animals. If you read the papers, it appears we are creating a new strain of pig so that we can have parts for transplants.

I am concerned that this is something that is going to receive a great deal of scrutiny by the churches and by people with religious beliefs who do not believe we should be involved in this. He who controls the patents for seeds, animals and livestock, what does that do for the agricultural sector where farmers with the ability wish to buy these animals and seeds without having to deal with a monopoly of a company? It may be a pharmaceutical company or some other company which has a patent on that particular livestock or that particular seed. I am wondering about that. That question has to be answered in committee.

Finally when talking about biogenetics and talking about creating new organisms we are really talking about getting a patent on life. To claim a patent on a life form is a direct and total denial of that person above looking down upon us who is the ultimate individual, I believe, to have that right. We have to look at the whole question of what creation means and whether we can actually seek a patent on creating new life forms.

There are serious questions that we have to deal with in committee. However, I do applaud the minister's approach. I think it is salutary for the House to present a bill in this way. I hope for a speedy passage of it in committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being five o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Crawford that Bill C-301, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act (financial information), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, just by way of background, I compliment my colleague again for having the foresight to bring what I call the accountability and reliability of taxation measures before the House of Commons by way of a private member's bill.

On the last day we spoke on this legislation we were discussing in some detail the effects that legislation like this would have.

Suffice it for me to say that this legislation would make all government programs to be costed out fully and completely before any programs were implemented. Any cost overruns would need the special authorization of Parliament. That really is the critical issue with respect to this legislation.

Even if this House were to approve some project, once that project exceeded the approved limitations of this House, the legislation would have to reappear before the House of Commons. Every member would be apprised of the efficiency of that project. Then there would be a debate on the full extent of the additional costs involved in any program the government implemented.

It would require long-term planning by cabinet ministers. They would have to give the House a very detailed statement on the original cost of the program, the cost in the previous two years and the expected cost over the next five years.

The last time we were debating this particular legislation I made a statement with respect to the goods and services tax. Let me use the goods and services tax as an example of what this legislation is all about. When it was implemented there was some accountability with respect to what it was supposed to do on the taxation system in Canada.

We heard many statements on what was the original start up cost on the goods and services tax. The estimate we heard at the time was that with the addition of 4,000 employees by Revenue Canada in order to monitor and police the goods and services tax, the start-up costs in implementing this tax were going to be $1 billion.

That $1 billion was only an estimate. The tax has been in effect for some two years. We still do not know how much revenue that tax has generated to pay off our debt. We heard at one time that when comparing the goods and services tax with the manufacturers' sales tax which it replaced, that it was going to be revenue neutral. We still have not heard. We have had no accountability from the government with respect to whether the goods and services tax is revenue neutral as it said.

What is the net revenue of the goods and services tax with respect to how it affects the total debt of this country? What are the original set-up costs? To this date we do not have the figures with respect to the actual start-up cost of the goods and services tax. It is information I think all Canadians want to know.

What are the effects and how much money has been reimbursed to all Canadians since the start up of the goods and services tax? I speak of the amount of money that was being sent back to those taxpayers in Canada under the poverty line who could not afford to pay the goods and services tax and were to be reimbursed for the added expense to their cost of living. To this day we have not been apprised of that particular figure. We are interested to know.

The manufacturers' sales tax was reduced. We want to know how much was reimbursed to all the manufacturers and retailers who were compensated for the inventories they had in so far as the manufacturing tax was concerned. How long did that manufacturing tax stay reduced or removed from the products they were selling? What is the experience of those products with respect to increases in prices?

We talk about exports. Canada is a great exporting country, but we have not found out yet how much money is returned to manufacturing industries in Canada that pay export tax on their production methods. When they export those goods to other countries, how much is reimbursed to manufacturers in Canada in businesses entirely involved with export? That is remuneration every member of this House should have knowledge of so we can assess fully the accountability of the government with respect to how much it cost to implement the goods and services tax.

Another example and one that is very prevalent today is that of the helicopters. We talk about accountability of the government. When the helicopters were first introduced in Canada they were supposed to be $2.8 billion. I see the Minister of National Defence who originally gave the contract out is with us today. It was $4.4 billion. We have just heard in the last two months that the contract was no longer $4.4 billion but had risen to $5.8 billion. The legislation my friend is trying to implement and put forward by way of a private member's bill is the means by which this House can control that type of expenditure.

I know my time now has elapsed but I compliment him for having the foresight to bring forth this type of legislation which is so badly needed by this government and by future governments of Canada to control expenditures and save the taxpayers of the country the money they work very hard to pay into the coffers of the Treasury.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-301 attempts to amend the Financial Administration Act in three areas: special Governor General's warrants, long-term planning and the tabling of public accounts. I might say at this point that the comments the member—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the record shows that the hon. member spoke on the matter.

Mr. Kempling: No, absolutely not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is maybe an error. The error is in the member's favour.

Mr. Kempling: It is the first time I saw the bill. As I was saying, the member who just spoke was talking about controlling the prices of helicopters and that this bill would do nothing for that whatever. That is a lot of nonsense.

• (1710)

The bill seeks to amend the Financial Administration Act in three areas: special Governor General's warrants, long-term planning and the tabling of public accounts.

In the case of special Governor General's warrants the amendments would require added information to be tabled in the House by the President of the Treasury Board and would change the timeframe in which these special warrants can be used. I would remind the House that special Governor General's warrants can be issued to provide the government with funds only when three conditions have been met. These conditions are carefully spelled out in the Financial Administration Act.

First, Parliament must not be in session because it is dissolved, prorogued or adjourned. Second, there are payments to be made which are urgently required for the public good. Finally there is no other appropriation to which the payment may be charged.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I just came in and I may be out of order, but I thought the hon. member had spoken on this bill. I have quotes where he said that the bill would fly in the face of parliamentary tradition, that it would threaten the ability of governments to plan strategically, and that it would cloud the services of the Auditor General who should be a commentator on government long-term objectives, et cetera. I was under the impression the hon. member had spoken. Your Honour knows the rules of the House on private members' bills.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I asked the table officers to check and I am waiting for confirmation in the next few minutes as to whether the member for Burlington did indeed speak. However, I take careful note of the point raised by the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park and I thank him for it.

[English]

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I draw to your attention and the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State for Finance that on November 30, 1992 he spoke in this House on Bill C-301.

I know the hon. member is a very busy member. He might not remember speaking on Bill C-301, but Hansard of November 30 does record his remarks.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have here a copy of Hansard for November 30 and the point raised by the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park and the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle is quite correct. I am sorry that I must take the floor from the hon. member for Burlington. Perhaps he would like to add something?

[English]

Does the hon. member want to add some comments about that? He spoke to the bill on November 30, 1992.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the House. November 1992 is a long while ago, at my age. I apologize to the House for taking up its time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I appreciate the comments of the hon. member.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague for Kent for bringing forward this private member's bill. It must be a pretty good bill when some people want to address it twice or more. It requires a bit of persistence on the part of a private member and a bit of luck too to get a private member's bill this far. I want to congratulate my colleague from Kent county.

This bill has a reputation now for being what we call a common sense bill. That in itself is a rather simplistic way of describing something, but it has a lot of common sense and sensibility about it although it is officially called an act to amend the Financial Administration Act.

A few parts of it sort of fascinated me. We can put them in more complicated context if we like, but what would be wrong with having a bill that would very simply state the objectives of any program? That would seem to make sense to me. One of the objectives of my colleague's bill, Bill C-301, would be to state clearly the objectives of the program.

Another would be the estimated total cost of the program over its proposed life and the method by which that cost would be estimated. How do they determine that cost? Unless we know that, they may have forgotten to build in some of the factors which would have a bearing on the final cost of the project. Then there are the estimated sums that will be required for the program over each of the first five years. Sometimes several things we have noticed in this House have come in as what they call cost overruns.

Let us sit down and determine every five years whether a program is still accomplishing what its original objectives were. Is the estimated cost so far out of whack that if we had had all that information initially we would no longer have the program, for example? It would not seem to be anything but common sense to me to anticipate some of those things and evaluate them every five years.

The anticipated effects of the program on the economy, environment, employment and social programs in Canada tend to change periodically. An ongoing evaluation of a program every five years would seem to be in keeping with what we are endeavouring to do.

Finally there is the appropriation out of which the program will be funded. Where is the money going to come from for this program?

I noticed the Minister of Finance made a statement as reported in The Ottawa Sun of February 10. I could table it if anyone is interested. I just want to read a short paragraph which states: "The federal deficit of $34.4 billion is still a big problem". That is what the Minister of Finance said. "He admitted it particularly with the figures released yesterday showing the deficit widened in December to $1.74 billion from $1.54 billion a year earlier".

With my colleague's bill that sort of thing would be less likely to happen. It would not guarantee that it could not happen. However if it started to happen we would have the mechanism in place where we could say: "Let us examine it, let us put it under the microscope, let's see if its original objectives are still valid and do something about it instead of just lumbering on".

The impression in the general public these days is that government spending, not only federal but provincial and I suppose municipal too, is out of control. Reducing the annual deficits in my opinion is the only way to address the long-term debt. If we do not attack the annual deficits how are we ever going to be in a position to attack the long-term debt?

If someone thinks this bill is too risky maybe it is time the federal government and all other levels of government started to take those risks. I do not see it, for example, threatening long-term strategies and long-term plans. Perhaps it would cause us to examine those long-term strategies and those long-term plans, something we have been rather reluctant to want to do.

The public from its point of view sees paying more, paying more and paying more and getting less, getting less and getting less at the same time in which the deficit keeps mounting. That is rather puzzling for the public. It seems this bill would be an attempt to try to get a hold on things so that would not happen, so that would not be allowed to happen.

The idea of cost overruns really means being accountable to the public every once in a while so that there would not be cost overruns and some of the things the Minister of Finance said in The Ottawa Sun on February 10 would be less likely to happen. The other thing the public is continually saying, to me anyway, is: "If we ran our businesses the way that you guys spend our money, we would be out of business very, very quickly.

There is great evidence of that. In this country in 1992, 76,139 people declared bankruptcy. They were not allowed to carry on any further. Somebody put a stop to it. The government does not seem to be in any position, seemingly, to realize that that could happen to the government. More and more regularly you are seeing that there is a great threat. If independent businesses can declare and have to declare bankruptcy, put in a position where they must declare bankruptcy, perhaps it would not be so unusual for the government to visualize the difficulty that the public has in seeing from their perspective why governments are allowed to go on when they have been put to the point where they have had to declare bankruptcy and are out of business.

It is this government's ability, it seems, to disregard all the rules under which private enterprises and private businesses must operate that is aggravating the people. That is why there is so much cynicism today and so much concern about the debt that this country is carrying.

As we all know, it is very easy to get into debt but it is sometimes very, very difficult to get out of it. There are times, of course, where it would make sense to get into debt, but I think what has happened in relation to government is that it does not seem to have a plan for getting out of debt. If you are going to get into debt you should have some plan for getting out of debt.

I think my colleague's bill here is a modest attempt at trying to be realistic about getting into debt. Some kind of an ongoing evaluation must be in place to see that you have a plan for getting out of debt. Only in government are you allowed it seems to get into debt without having any realistic plan for realizing that there will come a day when you must concern yourself with getting out of debt.

Governments do not do things very efficiently. My opinion on that is perhaps it is time they started to do things more efficiently. The reason they do not do things efficiently is because they have never had to. They have got into the habit of thinking that there is a bottomless pit there and all they have to do is tap it and it continues to fill up, something like a spring I guess, once you tap it there is a source there of unending wealth.

We are now in debt in this country to the tune of about $450 billion and it is growing by the minute. I think that is what my colleague's bill is attempting to address, to see if something could be put in place, something in the way of a common sense bill which would allow governments, indeed force governments to have a process for regular examination. Hopefully, that would avoid the cost overruns which get us into the problems that have put us into the $450 billion debt category.

It does not mean that programs would cease by any means. It means that there would be more scrutiny applied whenever a new program was introduced. I congratulate my colleague on bringing this bill forward. I for one will have no hesitation, and I hope those on all sides of the House will see the sense in supporting this bill. I wish him the very best when the vote is taken, if it gets that far.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I rise today also in support of the motion presented to the House by the hon. member for Kent. I think it has been described as the common sense motion. I would suspect that government members if they were not government members but sitting on this side of the House would be voting in favour of it today. It seems to me that what I am hearing from opposition members and as I read some of the speeches from past Hansards and some of the speeches that have been given on this bill, they are things that I have heard members of the Conservative Party speak about when they were in opposition. It is unfortunate that they lost this part of their rhetoric when they made the transition from opposition into government.

They were quite eloquent at times in opposition when they talked about Parliament losing control over spending, that spending was out of control, that we needed a new system and a much tighter system of accountability in order to get spending under control.

I read the remarks from the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State for finance and the excuses he was giving us today. If I would have had the time I would have gone back through the records because I am certain there is a speech somewhere before 1984 where that hon. member would have made remarks in this House criticizing the way expenditures occur and the lack of control over them.

Our country is facing very serious financial problems. We have growing deficits adding up to a horrendous debt that will take generations to pay off. It is time we got our house in order. It is time we stopped allowing expenditures to occur that get out of control.

There is one megaproject after another. Estimates come in, the House approves certain expenditures, a month later we hear that the expenditures have gone up. One, two, three or five years later when the final bill comes in, we begin to realize that it is nowhere near what the original estimate was, what the original approval was for.

It is time for that type of activity to come to an end. We cannot continue to afford that type of expenditure. When the minister or the government make proposals for certain expenditures, those proposals should have a total scrutiny so that Parliament knows if the estimates are accurate, if there is inflation built in and what the final bill will be. Not only Parliament but the people of Canada should know.

As members of Parliament we are ultimately responsible. It is not the government, it is this House of Commons. Ultimately, we the members of this House of Commons are responsible for the type of debt and deficit that we are facing now.

As members of Parliament we are not given the opportunity nor the information to really make wise decisions. In part the government and the bureaucracy want to maintain this control. That is why I believe we now see Conservative members who truly should be supporting this bill speaking against it because they are now captured by the government and not acting on what they really believe in. Surely they really believe in trying to control government expenditures so that we have wise expenditures and members of Parliament can fulfil their proper duty.

The other thing that appeals to me was expressed as I read the remarks of the hon. member for Kent when he moved a motion in the House. If I may quote from his remarks that appeared in Hansard, Monday, November 30, 1992: "As well any cost overruns would need special authorization. It requires long-term planning by cabinet ministers. They would be forced to present to Parliament a detailed report showing any program's cost and its effects on the economy, environment, employment and social programs to the extent that it is possible".

This House has fruitfully debated the whole notion of environmental review so that governments, particularly governments but also private industry, cannot engage in massive undertakings that would alter the physical environment of our country, alter the quality of air or water and affect living species, et cetera.

Now we demand that there should be an environmental review so we know the environmental costs to a program. I maintain we also need a social environmental review. We know when unemployment goes up and poverty goes up, crime, suicides, violence and drug and alcohol dependency go up. There are social costs to this government's Unemployment Insurance Act that it is presenting to Parliament.

Social scientists can show the statistics, the correlation between an act of this government that would restrict the number of people who are eligible to receive unemployment insurance for example and the social effect that will have. They can predict with a relative amount of accuracy the number of suicides, the number of crimes, the amount of family breakdowns, and violence that will occur.

The hon. member suggests in this bill that we should also have some social cost accounting so that when government brings in measures Parliament also knows the effects they will have on our community, on the people and the cost to treat the social ills that a certain particular measure the government might introduce might create.

I think there is a lot of common sense in this bill. I suspect that government members in their hearts would likely want to support this bill. I urge them to let their hearts speak and not their blind ambition of trying to get a cabinet position at some stage.

This bill calls for the government to be more accountable to Parliament in its expenditures. What is the problem with that? Why are Conservative members opposed to that? Is this not really a conservative philosophy that is being introduced here?

As a New Democrat I have no trouble with that. I believe as my colleagues believe, and I am sure hon. members across the way believe, that the government has got to be accountable to Parliament. No greater area for accountability is there than accountability over expenditures and how the government spends the taxpayers' money.

That is what is being called for in this private member's bill. It deserves the unanimous support of this House.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Kent for introducing this private members' bill, one of the very few private member's bills which is votable. I apologize for cutting off the hon. member for Burlington but I did not want people who have not spoken on the bill to lose their time on it.

The media has already dubbed this bill as a common sense bill which I think is the intent of this bill and that is to put curbs on runaway government spending.

CFCO radio in the hon. member's riding said this about the bill. "What Crawford's bill proposes is that government be responsible with our money, that spending is studied before it is done, and overspending be answered for. His bill would give more people in Ottawa a kick at the can known as accountability, members of Parliament, the Auditor General, and the Standing Committee on Public Accounts".

That pretty well sums up the intent of this bill. We have been hearing a lot in Question Period and in debates recently in this House about the cost of the Cadillac helicopters. Initially when the purchase of the helicopters was announced the tab was $4.2 billion. Now all of a sudden it has jumped up to $5.8 billion and the taxpayers are fed up with that kind of throwing taxpayers' money into the wind.

Be honest with taxpayers and tell them exactly what the cost will be three years from now, five years from now, or ten years from now.

We have an experience right in Toronto, a project near my riding of Parkdale—High Park, the SkyDome. In 1985 when the SkyDome project was proposed the cost of the SkyDome was $150 million.

• (1735)

Everyone thought this was a great project that would bring in jobs and revenues. The public was sold on it, but by the time the contract was signed in April 1986 the figure had jumped to $234.7 million. Once all the final touches were put on the Sky Dome, the final cost was $590 million.

Three levels of government were involved as well as taxpayers. I support the Sky Dome. I think it is worth every dollar of the $590 million, but the planners and designers should have been honest with the public and said: "The cost of the Sky Dome will be $590 million". They should not have jumped from $150 million to $590 million.

I am looking more specifically at clause 3 of the bill and part III.I, which deals with the creation of new programs. It says that where a new program is to be established requiring the expenditure of money appropriated from the Consolidated Revenue Fund, the minister who is to be responsible for the administration of the program shall, prior to the commencement of the fiscal year in which the program is to be continued or established, lay before Parliament a statement showing the objectives of the program. It should show the estimated total cost of the program over its proposed life; the method by which the cost has been estimated; the estimated sums that will be required for the program over each of the first five years; the anticipated effects of the program on the economy, environment, employment and social programs in Canada; the appropriation out of which the program will be funded.

Section 42.2 deals with the excess costs. Where the minister is informed that the cost of a program on which he has laid a statement before Parliament pursuant to section 42.1 will exceed the estimated cost shown in the statement for any year, the minister shall lay before Parliament a statement showing the amount of the excess cost for the year, the reasons for the excess and the alternatives that have been considered before concluding that the excess is unavoidable.

Looking at the bill in detail, I think it ensures that the taxpayers' money is wisely spent through good planning. The bill ensures that taxpayers' money is protected because controls will be in place to do proper accounting.

The bill ensures that taxpayers' money is not wasted through over-costing and if more money is needed for the completion of a project, justification must be given for the additional money required.

I am appealing to the members on the government side and I am pleased that the hon. member from Burlington South has spoken on this bill. He did say that this bill flies in the face of parliamentary tradition. It would threaten the ability of governments to plan strategically. It would cloud the services of the Auditor General who should not be a commentator on government long-term objectives.

I think just the opposite. I think this bill would help government plan strategically and help the Auditor General do his job.

The member went on to say he did not think requirements should be invoked which inhibit the government's ability to govern effectively. The government is governing ineffectively now and that is why the hon. member for Kent brought in this bill. This would allow governments, present and future, to plan more effectively.

The member from Burlington South went on to say the government will want to consider whether the proposed amendments are in the best interests of the House. I was never aware that the legislation we pass here is for the best interests of the serving members.

I think the legislation we bring and pass in this House should be measured by whether it is in the best interests of the people who elected us. Is the legislation we pass in the best interests of the taxpayers who are paying for these projects and programs, such as the constituent who called me just before this debate? She is a single parent with a child to raise. She earns $26,000 a year and cannot make ends meet. There is the small business entrepreneur who has to pay the GST and it is killing the business. Whatever legislation we pass should be in their best interests and not work against their best interests as some of the present programs this government has brought in are doing.

I am again appealing to the government members to support this bill. I know some members look at things very objectively and listen to their constituents, as the hon. member for Kent has. I know my constituents support this bill 100 per cent. What the hon. member heard from his constituents I am hearing from my constituents in Parkdale—High Park. They are just fed up with overspending.

I might remind the members that once this bill is voted on it is passed to the committee. Sure it needs a lot of fine tuning, but the committee can do that. Let us not kill a good thing here.

I hear a lot of bellyaching on this Hill, Mr. Speaker, as you do, about members wanting more freedom to vote on legislation that reflects the wishes of their constituents. Here is an excellent example. If we have any guts, and I am speaking to members from all parties and the independent members, let us show that we can do things constructively. We do not have to listen to our leaders on this bill. We do not have to listen to the Whips on this bill. We have to listen to our common sense because this is a common sense bill. If we vote for it we have done the right thing in this House once and for all by listening to our constituents. Therefore I encourage every member in this House to be on his or her feet supporting this bill as soon as we have the vote.

[Translation]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): I believe that I have 10 minutes, Mr. Speaker. Is that the case?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You have up to 10 minutes.

Mr. Kilgour: I will not take much time, Mr. Speaker. I simply want to mention that what my colleague from Toronto just said is true. As usual, he made some good points and I fully agree with him.

[English]

I would like to take perhaps a different tact to what has been taken until now. I would just like to focus the members' attention on a program you may have seen, Mr. Speaker, about a week and a half ago about New Zealand. A number of people have spoken to me about it and I suspect they have spoken to other members here as well.

Let us just look at three themes struck in the CTV W5 program. During 1984, the year foreigners simply stopped buying New Zealand government bonds, all levels of government deficit in New Zealand were at 7 per cent of its GDP. The accumulated government debt in our sister member of the Commonwealth that year was 62.7 per cent of its GDP. Its net public-private foreign debt, according to W5 at least, was 47 per cent of its GDP.

If you fast forward to our country in 1993, the yearly budget deficit for all levels of government for 1992 was 8.5 per cent of our GDP. Our accumulated all-government debt, which is approximately $650 billion I believe, was 90 per cent of our GDP. Our net foreign debt of approximately $300 billion was 44 per cent of our GDP.

I would ask hon. members if anyone in this House thinks that federal-provincial budgets will get better during the current calendar year.

The music stopped for New Zealand's financial party in 1984, the week the newly elected Labour government of David Lange learned its central bank lacked enough foreign currency to meet bond interest payments. A very excruciatingly painful crackdown on government spending followed immediately because, as former Prime Minister Lange put it, his government was "suddenly forced to behave like it was to the right of Genghis Khan". Over the next decade, New Zealanders watched their standard of living drop from third to twenty-second in the industrialized world. A final point on that program is that the New Zealand politicians of all stripes agree that excessive government deficits did them in.

Richard Prebble, Labour associate minister of defence between 1984 and 1989, said: "More debt is like liquor to an alcoholic. Governments must bite the bullet". The current New Zealand health minister, Simon Upton of the National Party, added: "We had hit our credit limits. The only difference between Third World states and countries like New Zealand and Canada is that we are given more rope to hang ourselves with".

Does anyone in this House disagree? Do we really think as members of this House that the IMF is very far now from Canada's financial doors? Does anyone in the House think our country is going to avoid the New Zealand wringer if we continue to spend and borrow, the spend and borrow addiction of the Mulroney years and, in fairness, some earlier Liberal ones?

Our federal-provincial finances are simply grotesque by any objective measurement. How can any MP or MLA for that matter—and I know we prefer to blame the voters for asking for more and more government services—look any young Canadian in the eye today? Do Canadian politicians have no responsibility to avoid putting the standard of living of our children and grandchildren at risk? If they knew what our collective profligacy had done to their futures, I think they would want to run us out of every capital across this land.

Premier Clyde Wells put this point very well the other day. He pointed out that in 1975 each Canadian family's share of the national mortgage so to speak was about $50,000. In 1993 it is about $665,000.

The problem, as some members will appreciate, is that a new government, hopefully a Chrétien government, will be caught between a very fragile economic recovery and escalating federal-provincial debt. Too much cutting too fast would cause our economy to shrink yet again, taking many real family incomes even further downward and increasing UI and other social spending, thereby ultimately adding to federal and provincial deficits.

That said, I am very proud of my leader for saying no to the purchase of 50 submarine-chasing helicopters, the price of which has already jumped from $4.4 billion to $5.8 billion even though the jobs, to put it mildly, would not be created proportionately across the country.

An hon. member: And most of them not even in the country.

Mr. Kilgour: Indeed. I guess I will leave it there. There may be other speakers. I simply want to say that I hope all hon. members in this House will respect the McGrath committee and will vote according to their consciences, not according to what their party Whips tell them to do on this important vote. We can do ourselves proud, I think all of us, by voting for it.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I commend my colleague from Kent on his thoughtful approach to a reasonable bill that would bring a great deal of credibility to this House of Commons, if this bill were passed.

We are talking about credibility. If we stop and think about a small service organization, if we stop and think about every municipal government whether it be the city of Toronto or the small town of Harrow, we know that planning for the future is done through a budget process where all people elected to office are carrying out very diligent views of what is happening within that budget process. This bill is basically asking for that budget process to be dealt with on a reasonable basis.

As a member of the House of Commons one of the things I find very difficult is the fact that I do not have access to the knowledge about how money is being spent in the government. I do not have the information I need to direct my constituents about federal spending. It has been the case ever since being elected. Projects are announced in my riding. I tried to get detailed information about those projects and it was not available to me.

One of the examples that I could give is a project that was announced in Wheatley, in my riding, a $1.5 million marina project. I went to the estimates and searched through them to try to find where that $1.5 million was tucked into the government estimates or accounts so I could make sure that this money had been put aside for that project.

I went through it in as much detail as I could. An expenditure the size of $1.5 million did not appear. It was announced during the election. A large sign was erected in the town of Wheatley, saying "$1.5 million for a marina to be constructed here." However, that money was not placed in the estimates. It was not placed where the general public or a member of this House of Commons could have found it.

Pursuing through the bureaucracy to try to find where those dollars were spent and how those dollars could be brought to Wheatley, I could find no record anywhere. I could not find a department that could say that money had been placed there. This is four years later, and that has not been spent. The sign was placed there saying that this project would go ahead but it is not there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5.50 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 93, the time provided for debate has expired.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on November 27 last year I raised a question with the Minister of the Environment concerning assistance from the federal government to the area of Victoria with regard to the sewage treatment problems it is having.

As it considers this issue the House should first understand that over one thousand communities in Canada dump raw sewage into Canada's lakes, rivers and streams. Unfortunately Victoria is not alone, although we are probably alone in the international abuse we are taking for the problem. In this we feel very much aggrieved.

We have tried hard to deal with the sewage treatment problems in our area. We have a new collector system. We have a modern screening system. We are taking the advice of engineers on how best to dispose of our sewage.

As the House may know, although many members will not have an acute grasp of the sewage problems of Victoria, the system the engineers have recommended would take the sewage well out into the straits of Juan de Fuca where the waters are cold and quickly moving. The engineers tell us, though most of us as lay people find it impossible to understand and believe, that it is quickly absorbed into the water and is of very little serious consequence to the environment.

Be that as it may, we in Victoria are determined to deal with this problem. It has given us international difficulties. The member opposite who will be replying for the government seems to smile at this. It is not a happy problem for the people of Victoria, and I suggest for the people of Canada, because of the consequences. Conventions have been cancelled because of this problem. We think it is an unfair rap because we have tried.

We look to the federal government for support in two areas. The first area is the problem of communicating the facts about the efforts that are happening in Victoria to our friends, particularly in the United States, who are being encouraged not to understand this issue as it should be understood. Instead of laughing at us, I would hope that the government would be sympathetic with us on this issue and would help us with a communications strategy.

Second, I would hope that the government would be prepared to sit down with the provincial government, the capital regional district and the local municipalities to determine if we can actually come up with a more effective method of treating our sewage. In our community on the whole we simply do not accept the engineers' advice. We would like to see better sewage treatment than we are getting.

We have to continue to deal with the other environmental problems in our community including how to get rid of liquid waste and solid waste. We are trying to do that, but it would be helpful if the government would be prepared not just to try to sell us some surplus land, which was the government's most recent offer, but to constructively sit down and help.

The federal government provided $200 million to Halifax to help it with its sewage treatment. So far the government has not put up one dollar to help the people of Victoria. I hope the government will take this problem seriously, as we do, and assist us in dealing with this very difficult environmental problem.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member opposite that the minister stated back on November 27 when the member asked his question that the municipal waste water discharge is an environmental issue that needs to be addressed. British Columbia's ministry of the environment, lands and parks is now taking a very strong stand with respect to municipal waste treatment in British Columbia and is requiring that all municipalities move toward secondary treatment systems.

The hon. member for Victoria made specific reference to the situation in Victoria. Let me assure all members of the House that this government is committed to encouraging the provision of the necessary sewage treatment system in Victoria.

The federal government's goal is to promote a sound approach to management of municipal waste waters. The federal approach is built on its role related to technological development and transfer to promote the optimization of municipal treatment facilities, public education about water use and responsible decision making, the use of economic instruments such as full-cost pricing to provide adequate funding for municipal infrastructure requirements, environmental stewardship to ensure that federal waste waters are dealt with in an environmentally sustainable manner, and the development of a better scientific understanding of the environmental impacts.

I am sure that the member for Victoria is well aware that the federal government is in the midst of intensive discussions and negotiations with the capital regional district of Victoria and the province of British Columbia concerning the treatment of Victoria's sewage, and progress is being made. Given the position being taken by the province, we remain very optimistic that a negotiated agreement can be reached and that the city of Victoria will soon be developing plans, obtaining land, confirming funding, and beginning construction of appropriate sewage treatment facilities.

As part of this government's leadership in promoting sustainable development the polluter-pay principle has been adopted in decision making on environmental issues. As the municipal and provincial governments have the primary responsibility for the management of municipal waste waters and treatment infrastructures, we recommend to the responsible authorities the use of economic instruments such as user fees in addressing this issue.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, on November 26, prior to the finance minister's economic statement, I asked in this House whether his forecast would be accurate and reliable with respect to the deficit. As well, I asked whether he would put forward measures to create jobs now for our unemployed. The finance minister answered that his statement would give encouragement, optimism and hope for the future.

Surprise, surprise. It certainly did not do that. Instead, the finance minister presented a stay-the-course budget with more cutbacks and more attacks on the jobless, recipients of unemployment insurance, and public servants. Besides failing to stimulate the economy, Canadians were faced with higher unemployment into the future.

As if this were not enough, the finance minister had to admit in his economic statement that this government has been unable to deal effectively with its pet economic cause, which is the deficit. The finance minister admitted in his economic statement that the deficit for this year would actually be $7 billion higher than he had predicted the previous year, and that it would be $10 billion higher the following year.

I wonder today whether even those predictions are false because I gather that the deficit will be even higher. It might be as much as $8 billion higher than he had predicted.

It is three months later, and we are asking the same questions. The finance minister in previous years said that this Conservative government was absolutely going to give us a budget every year at the same time in February. Of course, it forgot to say that it would not do it in 1993.

Then we had the scenario of the off again, on again budget. First he was going to give us a budget some time toward the summer, but then we were not sure because he was not sure whether he was going to run for the leadership or not. Now I gather we are going to have a budget after the Easter break.

I am going to ask again if the government is prepared to listen to Canadians. Canadians really need hope. More and more are joining the ranks of discouraged Canadians.

We can quote statistics and can talk about fundamentals, but when I am in my riding office person after person comes to me saying: "What am I going to do? I do not have a job. I want a job. I want to work". Other people are telling me that they are worried whether they will have their jobs next month.

What will the government do to provide some hope? Is it possible or is it absolutely impossible? Has this government totally lost touch with the realities of Canadian life?

It is absolutely essential first, to have the kinds of forecasts we can rely on and, second, to give some hope to Canadians by creating some jobs right away, not sitting there, doing nothing and waiting for something miraculous to happen and then maybe there will be jobs for Canadians.

Once again I ask that the government give Canadians, not just me, the replies and actions they have been awaiting for some time now.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the member for Sudbury asked if the government would present a deficit forecast in the economic statement. As she already knows, the government has presented its new deficit forecasts: $34.4 billion this year and $32.6 billion in 1993-94.

The member will have noticed that the deficit outlook for this year and next has deteriorated essentially because of the drop in revenue due to the slow recovery of the Canadian economy from the 1990-91 recession.

The member says that Canadians want jobs. I wholeheartedly agree with her on that. But what does she recommend? Maybe a magic economic formula? Of course Canadians want jobs. Perhaps the member would like to use a magic wand to create them. The Canadian economy was slowed down by a world-wide economic crisis. Just wishing that it were not so and that everyone had jobs will not make our problems disappear. Much as the member might want it to be so, the Canadian economy cannot be the little engine that will pull the world economy out of its slump.

The government's economic strategy is to invest in growth. Sound budgetary and monetary policies, streamlining the machinery of government, freer trade and broader opportunities for business have created an economic environment favourable to the private sector. This is the sector which holds our potential for future growth.

By investing in Canadians acquiring skills, we have a more productive labour force and more competitive producers. More funds are being given to manpower training programs. Investing in human resources will ensure the basis for lasting improvements to our prosperity.

Small businesses create the most new jobs in this country. The government has helped them with various tax breaks and incentives for research and development. The government is proposing an exemption for unemployment insurance premiums to small businesses that create more jobs next year. It is proposing a 10 per cent investment tax credit and raising the limit for loans to small businesses.

ROUGE VALLEY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, as I said in the House of Commons last November, I was astounded to hear that the NDP's interim waste authority had included site M-6 which borders on the Rouge River Valley on the short list.

I went on to say that if the NDP government were foolish enough to proceed with this site, my government would seriously consider terminating the $10 million financial commitment we made in 1988 to help create a natural heritage park in the Rouge Valley.

In mid-January the NDP government approved a plan to create the natural heritage park which will be 20,000 acres in size or 26 times the size of Toronto's High Park. This news while late in coming is wonderful. What is far from wonderful is that the IWA is still considering M-6 as a possible site for metro Toronto's 40 million tonnes of garbage. When we made the $10 million commitment for the park it was conditional on three critical elements: no dump, no roads and no housing in close proximity.

I have talked to the federal Minister of the Environment and he is very concerned and disappointed that a megadump is still being considered on site M-6. It is simply too close to the proposed park.

Just today I heard that the IWA had drilled seven test holes on the site and it expected this step to be finished by the end of March. Anne Katsoras who chairs the citizens' advisory committee against the dump told me today about that news and said the community was working hard to organize several events to help raise community involvement and awareness of the seriousness of the M-6 site proposal and to help raise money.

The NDP government continues to ignore considering viable options such as incineration or the rail haul option to the Adams mine site near Kirkland Lake.

Provincial Bill 143 forbids consideration of all other options. Landfill is the only option to be considered. It restricts the area for the megadump. It says metro Toronto's garbage must be dumped in York region. It could not, for example, be dumped one-half mile outside York region. This is crazy.

The NPD government continues to close its eyes and ears to the views of the people of this province. We will not forget or forgive it for this arrogance and insensitivity. There will be an election in two or three years. As I have said in my December 1993 mailing to 52,000 residents of Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville: "We will throw Bob Rae and Ruth Grier out of office before we allow a shovel in the ground at M-6".

Bud Wildman was recently appointed minister of energy and environment and Ruth Grier was shifted to the health portfolio. Howard Hampton became minister of natural resources. We would think that these new ministers might have taken a new look at the absolute havoc bill 143 will create in Ontario.

Regrettably they have missed this opportunity. They are still marching blindly to Bob Rae's band which is determined to wreck this once great province with regressive tax measures, harmful labour laws and outlandish spending resulting in horrific deficits, to say nothing about Bill 143, one of the most undemocratic laws I have ever seen.

If the Rae government would simply listen to the people and the facts it would have another good reason to forget about the M-6 site. One reason concerns Transport Canada and its bird hazard guidelines published in 1989. These guidelines stated that a dump site could not be created within an eight-kilometre radius of an airport or a heliport. The M-6 site is only three kilometres from the heliport at Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville hospital. This is a 24-hour emergency service. The M-6 site is also less than eight kilometres from the Markham airport and is only 2.5 kilometres from the edge of a potential international airport on the Pickering lands.

The Minister of State for Transport has also expressed her amazement that the Rae government would ignore the guidelines and therefore put people's lives at risk since air crashes are a distinct possibility when there are thousands of sea-gulls at a megadump.

In closing I want to say again that I will do everything I can to stop Bob Rae and the IWA from creating a megadump at the M-6 site. I cannot believe they would be so stupid to proceed with M-6.

In the end we may have to drag this issue into the courts for two or three years, by which time there will be an election and we can throw the rascals out along with the IWA.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member on his perseverance in the situation in the Rouge Valley.

The IWA or the Interim Waste Authority was established by the Government of Ontario to examine and review all potential landfill sites within the regions of Durham, Peel and York metro. The members of the advisory board are charged with making a single recommendation for a landfill site in each area by mid-1993.

The inventory of the potential sites was based on scientific and technical data rather than on political and social pressures or considerations. That is the over-all game plan of the Ontario government. It functions at arm's length from the Government of Ontario and its recommendations reflect the members' technical assessment and not the government's plans or policies.

The IWA has reduced its long list of 50 sites down to a short list which still includes M-6, an area bordering on the Rouge Valley. Consequently M-6 will be assessed in terms of its technical feasibility. Adjacent land use and other influencing factors will be weighed accordingly when its suitability is being considered.

Subsequent to the IWA final recommendations, public hearings will be held to encourage input and inquiry into the appropriateness of the recommended sites following the consultation stage. The final decision will still rest with the Ontario cabinet.

In all likelihood the next stage of technical assessment will eliminate M-6 from the short list. As IWA operates independent of the government's proposed plans for land use in the Rouge Valley and as the government's current support for a park in the Rouge Valley neither restricts nor encourages the IWA's review process, advising the Ontario government of the federal government's concerns would not prove effective at this time.

The minister of natural resources made the Government of Ontario's position quite clear on January 19 of this year when he announced the creation of an urban park within the Rouge Valley and the preservation of 8,000 acres of adjacent agriculture land. The M-6 site is located within the area identified for preservation as agriculture land.

In evaluating the suitability of M-6, the IWA will now have to take into consideration the Ontario government's expressed intention to establish a park in the Rouge Valley. It is a decision which will likely have considerable influence in the IWA's final assessment of M-6 suitability for landfill purposes.

I remain confident in the Ontario government's commitment to the Rouge Valley park. I am hopeful that the IWA recommendations will not favour the M-6 site, given its current and projected adjacent land use.

When the IWA recommendations—

AIDS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on December 1 last year, I asked a question in the House about federal funding for the fight against the AIDS epidemic. I asked the government to accept the unanimous recommendations made by the four main groups that are fighting against AIDS in Canada: the Canadian AIDS Society, the Canadian HIV Research Foundation, the Canadian Hemophilia Society; and the Canadian Public Health Association.

Last week, these four associations and all Canadians received the government's response. It was negative.

[English]

The response of the Conservative government was a devastating blow to those involved on the front lines in the fight against AIDS.

Instead of the budget of $55.35 million per year which was requested as a minimum by the four groups to which I have just referred as well as by the ad hoc parliamentary committee on AIDS in a strong and unanimous recommendation to the government, the Minister of National Health and Welfare allocated $42 million a year. This falls far short of what is essential in the fight against AIDS. Tragically we will, of course, spend more money later rather than now on prevention and on assisting community groups that are on the front lines of the struggle against this epidemic.

I want to ask the parliamentary secretary to the minister for an explanation as to why this government ignored the recommendations of the four national groups that are on the front lines in the fight against AIDS as well as the ad hoc parliamentary committee. Why did it ignore these recommendations?

Government says it does not have enough money for the fight against AIDS. At the same time it is prepared to spend $5.8 billion on attack helicopters. This government is morally and ethically bankrupt.

On the same day I asked the government when it was finally going to keep the promise to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation.

Over seven years ago, seven long years, the Minister of Justice of the Conservative government promised to accept the unanimous recommendation of the equality rights committee and to amend legislation federally to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation.

The Ontario Court of Appeal said that the federal government's law was unconstitutional, that it violated the charter of rights. How did the minister respond? The then Minister of Justice is now the Minister of National Defence. She wants to be leader of the Conservative Party. She said: "Well, okay. I will bring in an amendment to include sexual orientation". However, in the same breath she brought forward an amendment that denied the reality of gay and lesbian relationships. It restricted the definition of those relationships and restricted the definition of marital status to opposite sex relationships.

That is not only an attack on committed loving relationships, but it also flies in the face of the Leshner decision of the Ontario Human Rights Tribunal. It flies in the face of the very eloquent comments of Madam Justice Claire L'Heureux-Dubé when she spoke in the judgment in Mossop on the reality of Canadian families.

I call upon the government to bring forward the necessary and long overdue amendments to ensure full equality and justice for lesbians and gay men in this country, but not to take away a fundamental element of that equality by defining marital status in the narrow and restrictive way that the Minister of Justice did.

In conclusion, I once again appeal to the government to increase the level of funding for the epidemic against AIDS and to amend Canadian human rights legislation to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation and also to recognize the reality of lesbian and gay relationships in that act and in all other federal legislation.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, on March 11, 1993 my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, announced that the government would renew the national AIDS strategy.

The renewal of this strategy for a period of five years, at a time of severe financial cutbacks, is an indication of the federal government's commitment to meeting the challenge of fighting AIDS and HIV-related diseases. The national AIDS strategy, phase two, will receive annual funding totalling $42.2 million, or $211 million over the next five years. This new funding represents an increase over the annual $37.3 million provided in phase one.

At a time when federal departments are being asked to downsize their programs, this investment in the health of Canadians is tangible proof that the federal government is committed to finding a cure for this disease.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has also asked his deputy minister to provide an annual supplement of $1.5 million from his department to improve support for initiatives in this area.

Furthermore, the Medical Research Council of Canada is committed to spending $2 million annually over the next five years to support AIDS research. Since 1983, the Council has spent more than $13 million on research and education in this field.

That is why I appeal to all Canadians to get involved and support what is being done by the government, community groups, researchers, health professionals and the private sector.

As the minister has said repeatedly in the House and on many other occasions, this government remains firmly committed, now and in the future, to the objectives of the national AIDS strategy.

In concluding I would like to add that I think the national AIDS strategy is an indication of this government's commitment to improving its social policy and making Canada a healthy country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, we saw something quite sensational in the headlines this morning, a stroke of genius on the part of the Leader of the Opposition, who has found another candidate to help with this country's renewal. His name is Elijah Harper, well-known for his unfortunate tactics and formerly a member of another party.

One may well wonder about all this, especially since on the weekend, speaking to party members who were tired, anxious and starting to have their doubts, he had the following comment on the Progressive Conservative Party's leadership campaign: that we still had the same substance but were only changing the labels.

I wonder how seriously we should take the Leader of the Opposition, who wants to change the labels while resurrecting yesterday's men. I am thinking of people like Messrs. Munro, Johnston and Samson, who according to the Leader of the Opposition are some of his best candidates.

I wonder why the Leader of the Opposition is so prompt to criticize the government and the Progressive Conservative Party right in the middle of its leadership campaign, considering that some of his decisions have had a questionable impact on the renewal of this country.

[English]

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the federal government's estimates of a few days ago attacked literacy programs, seniors, aboriginal programs and official languages. This week the Progressive Conservative Government of Manitoba has decided to do away with over 50 organizations, among them the Manitoba Anti-Poverty Organization, organizations that deal with the physically handicapped, child care, native friendship centres, and l'Association canadienne d'éducation de langue française.

All of these organizations, including the Manitoba Anti-Poverty Organization, render services to the poor, to those who have less, to the handicapped and to those who need more in order to be able to fully contribute to society.

It is totally unacceptable, it is insensitive and it is deplorable that governments would try to cut back on the backs of the poor, the defenceless and those who do not have political power. I abhor that practice.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I have received a significant number of complaints from constituents regarding unsolicited facsimile advertising and automatic telephone solicitations. Businesses and consumers are extremely annoyed at the waste of time and the expense and nuisance to which they are subjected. In the case of faxes, expensive paper is wasted and their machines cannot receive or send important business communications. Telephone advertising ties up staff, telephone lines and answering machines which sometimes must be played back long distance at a cost.

I advise all constituents who contact my office to register with the Canadian Direct Marketing Association to have their names removed from lists. However, companies owned by one particular individual are not members of the CDMA and are the worst offenders.

Bill C-62 is currently pending. It will give the CRTC greater authority to deal with this problem. I urge that this bill be expedited and that the CRTC and Bell Canada act promptly to tackle this irritating and expensive problem.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, Canadians finally have a commitment from the Minister of Finance that there will be a budget this year.

What Canadians, particularly seniors, now want is a commitment from the minister that the programs they rely on will not be destroyed in the name of deficit reduction.

Canadian seniors have suffered more than their fair share from this government's economic mismanagement. Cuts to medicare hit hardest among those who need health care the most. Cuts to independence and research programs jeopardize the future health and well-being of older Canadians.

The time has come for the Conservatives to stop blaming others for the mess they have created and start taking steps to help Canada's three million seniors.

HON. JEAN CHAREST

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, speaking before an audience of more than 1,500 supporters last night in Sherbrooke, Jean Charest said, when he announced he would be a candidate for the leadership of the Conservative Party: "It is wrong to say that a leader is being selected without a single idea having been expressed."

He went on to say: "Democracy claims its rights. This race must be a debate on ideas. A debate on organization is no substitute. The grass roots of the party will decide, and no one else. When I say new generation, I am not refering to age. No generation is right or wrong because of its age."

"The Conservatives are looking for a leader who will introduce a different style and new ideas", he pointed out.

He also said: "The Government of Canada must continue to support restructuring of the economy. Once we have changed the structure of our economy, we must review the Canadian social contract to which this economy is linked. It is wrong to say that Canadian society must accept poverty or high unemployment."

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, the member for Mississauga South has sent a questionnaire to his constituents. He wants to know whether the Government of Canada should eliminate or keep the old age pension.

This same member is the one who forewarned us that the GST would be a cash cow for the government, and he was right. He was also the one who told us that the universality of social programs would be ended, and he was right again.

The member for Mississauga South obviously has inside knowledge of government thinking. By asking the question now, is he warning us that the elimination of the old age pension is being considered by this government? Is he testing the water to determine what the public reaction would be if the government were to go ahead and do that?

Canada's seniors are entitled to have this information. Canadians and we in this House want to know, not after the next election but now. We want this government to assure us today that the implications of that member's question are being repudiated by this government.

GROSSE ÎLE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, today is St. Patrick's Day, a day when the whole world is Irish and our thoughts turn to shamrocks, leprechauns and the wearing of the green. But the thoughts of Canadians of Irish origin will also turn to Grosse Île, an island in the St. Lawrence River just east of Quebec City that served as a quarantine station for European immigrants who came to Canada between 1832 and 1860.

More than 15,000 Irish immigrants, the victims of famine and disease, are buried on the island. For Canadians of Irish origin this is indeed a sacred and hallowed ground.

Parks Canada intends to develop Grosse Ile as a national historic park, not to commemorate death and disease but rather as a welcoming place for the celebration of the human spirit. Hopefully, the development will also be sensitive and respectful to the mass graves, to the memories of those who died and to those who cared for the dying, while at the same time recognizing the contributions that Canadians of Irish descent have made to our country.

PHARMACEUTICALS INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, two days ago the government member for Don Valley East ridiculed the opening of a new $200 million facility by Apotex Inc., Canada's leading generic drug manufacturer.

This member not only showed his profound ignorance, but clearly demonstrated the disdain which his government has for Canada's generic drug industry, an industry which is vibrant and indispensable to our national economy and employs over 3,000 Canadians with more than $430 million in sales.

Moreover, last year alone, lower priced generic prescription drugs saved Canadian consumers and provincial governments an estimated $1 billion.

If the Tory legislation extending protection to the more expensive multinational brand-name manufacturers is allowed to remain on the books then Canada's compulsory drug licensing system will be destroyed forever.

• (1410)

Rather than ridiculing Apotex for opening a new facility and creating much needed jobs the government should be congratulating Apotex, Novopharm Ltd. and the others. Regardless of who its leader is going to be it will lose the next election, and one of the reasons is because—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, British Columbia residents are rightfully alarmed over recent reports of a large influx of Asian criminals moving into Canada.

RCMP inspector Doug Ewing is quoted as having said: "Many of the world's most ruthless, vicious criminals have already set up power bases in Canada". Criminal Intelligence Service Canada said that Triad members already in the country are involved in drug trafficking, gambling, extortion, prostitution, money laundering, armed robbery, alien smuggling and counterfeiting of credit cards.

I call on the government to ensure that immigration officials, Revenue Canada, the RCMP, co-ordinated law enforcement units and local police will get full support in their efforts to stop the immigration of criminals into the country and to deal firmly and quickly with any immigrants or visitors who flaunt the justice system of this country to the detriment of all Canadians, especially other honest and law-abiding immigrants and fellow citizens.

CONSERVATIVE LEADERSHIP

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, Boyer in, MacDougall out, Valcourt out, Beatty out, Wilson out, Maz out then in and then out again. Garth, Garth who? Campbell, you bet. Charest in then maybe out, but then enter the puppet master who has pitted his apprentices one against the other.

From his lair at 24 Sussex Drive the PM explains to the environment minister that he must enter the leadership contest to at the very least give the illusion that there is a race for first place.

The poor member for Sherbrooke was first told by Tory strategists, now there is an oxymoron, to wait until the new Tory leadership race to be held after the defeat of the party in the next election but the PM tells him: "Faith and begorra Jean, we can't be having a coronation".

It is a cruel hoax on the Minister of the Environment. Canadians have seen through this charade, this phoney debate. As the poet William Makepeace Thackeray said: "All is vanitas vanitatum". Let him shut up the box of puppets, for his play has been played out.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, last week, when he appeared before the CRTC, the president of the CBC said that the corporation would now give high priority to implementing a French all-news service as a counterpart to Newsworld. "Our French audience is entitled to a good news service," Mr. Veilleux is reported to have said. He compared the lack of a French Newsworld to a regional disparity.

For nearly four years, anglophones have had a news channel in their language. Although the Broadcasting Act states that the corporation should seek to offer equivalent programming in French and English, we francophones have had only poor proposals that were either rejected by the CRTC or abandoned.

Allow me to wish the president of the CBC and his whole team better success this time, before the situation becomes awkward.

DISABLED WOMEN'S NETWORK CANADA

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this government has killed the only national organization that represents and works for women with disabilities across Canada.

DAWN, the Disabled Women's Network Canada, will be forced to close its doors by the end of this month. Since 1985 DAWN Canada has worked hard to put disabled women's issues on the federal agenda, including their special concerns about violence, employment, parenting, self-image and new reproductive technology. Canadian women with disabilities depend on this important organization for information, networking, research and support.

I urge the Secretary of State to provide adequate funding to DAWN Canada so that it may continue its important work on behalf of women with disabilities.

THE GOLD BOND CONVEYOR

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I know all members of Parliament will want to record their sympathy for the families of those who lost their lives in the tragedy that befell the Gold Bond Conveyor.

The 32 crew members who perished in the cruel seas of the North Atlantic, though not Canadians, represent all the men and women of the world who go down in the sea in ships. The oceans are a cruel grave and a constant reminder of the power of the Almighty.

• (1415)

All we can do is extend sympathy to the families of the deceased seafarers and pray there are no further tragedies yet knowing there will be.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, every day women are victimized by circumstances, misconceptions of their place in Canadian society, targets and victims of violence. Each year we set aside a few days to focus on women's issues but as long as women experience injustice, inequality and inferior status in Canadian and international society we must struggle daily, not once a year, to correct wrongs.

Unequal pay for work of equal value, abuse in the work place and responses which further victimize the female victims, media and commercial depictions of women which are demeaning and violent, these and other injustices against women must be corrected.

Today 60 per cent of women are employed in the work force. However, we must compare the opportunities available to women to those of their male counterparts and recognize women are as capable and productive in the work force when given the opportunity.

Child care and training opportunities must be more available to women. Mothers who wish to raise their own children at home should have adequate recognized training to provide care for their own children and others in their home if so desired.

We do not need a few superwomen. We need a society where all women are guaranteed equality and are assured justice and dignity.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the government is heavily chopping back the immigration service for which Canadians pay fat fees in addition to taxes.

For a year the new mail-in application system in Toronto has been failing. Since April 1992 over half of the mailed in application questionnaires have been returned to senders for corrections. This is because applicants can no longer get help from immigration staff.

MPs' inquiries often go unanswered for over a month. Local immigration staff often admit there is no immigration officer to work on the constituent's case.

Now the government has announced that in order to centralize mail-in service for all Canada at Vegreville next year, it will terminate more than 900 permanent and temporary staff. It will close 11 Canada Immigration Centres and replace 13 more with a single officer in the Canada Employment Centre.

This means massive work backlogs and delays so that only Canadians rich enough to hire a lawyer can get good service and the rest of Canadians must suffer third-class service.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the environment minister, I would like to ask the Minister for International Trade a question.

Yesterday, concerning the discussions now underway on the environment commission under the North American free trade agreement, I would like to know from the minister, or even better, from the environment minister, whether the environment minister agrees that the commission has no power to compel both the Americans and the Mexicans to have environmental standards that are as high as Canadians' standards.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Charest: I have nothing else to add, Mr. Speaker.

Seriously, to put this issue of creating a North American environment commission in context, the decision was made with the previous American administration in September to create this North American environment commission. At that time, the three ministers concerned held a trilateral meeting in Washington.

At the time we mandated our respective officials to define for us what its mandate would be or at the very least to provide us with options, which they started to do, except that since then, there was an election in the United States. The new American administration asked us of course to take the time to study this issue and to come back. We are still waiting for the American administration to respond.

Now, as for the specific question raised by the hon. Leader of the Opposition, issues of sovereignty overlap some regulatory issues. We must take all that into consideration. The negotiations in the coming days will show us where the parties want to go on this.

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if it is the intention of this government to have a commission that will have some real power, then it has to be a watch-dog which has some teeth, not a lap-dog that is there to serve the interests of the big industries that want to pollute the environment and use it to make the Canadian situation more difficult. Will the minister talk to his other colleagues?

I also want to congratulate him on showing more guts than all those other people who have run for cover, because it is never over until it is over. My good friend the Irishman, Yogi Berra, said that some years ago.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: Will this government have one clear policy on this matter? We need international standards that are strong, not just a committee that will help the big industries to keep polluting and using it as an advantage against countries which respect the environment.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I heard that Yogi Berra was a Liberal.

What we are seeking through these negotiations is an opportunity to strengthen environmental co-operation among the three countries from a continental point of view. We must keep in mind—and the hon. Leader of the Opposition should know this—that when the Americans have talked about environmental agreements between the countries they have mostly focused on border issues between Mexico and the United States.

I have found in my discussions with our American counterparts that in 90 per cent of the cases those are the types of issues they are focusing on. Canada has insisted that if there are going to be these types of negotiations and we enter into these negotiations then we want a continental perspective given to them.

We have looked for strengthening of environmental co-operation, better enforcement as one of the key elements in so far as Mexico is concerned. We have even co-operated bilaterally with the Mexicans in this regard.

Of course we want the promotion of sustainable development and a trinational body. What we want to do, and I think it will be part of the discussions, is to explore the relationship between the trade commission and this environmental commission. We look forward to hearing what our American counterparts have to say on this.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer, but does he not believe that it would be better now, when we have a golden opportunity to ensure adequate environmental standards in all three countries, if the Minister for International Trade did not proceed immediately with the legislation, so that our partners know that we are very serious about our environmental demands? If we wait, they will know that we are serious, but if we pass the legislation now, they will not take us seriously, of course.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I took an active part in the preparatory discussions for this North American free trade agreement. My colleague, the trade minister, considered the representations made. He even became an environmentalist for this purpose and the end result is a very green trade agreement that contains unprecedented environmental provisions.

The trade agreement itself, I think, deserves the approval of this Parliament, and I am telling you that as Minister of the Environment.

Furthermore, we were able to use the trade negotiations as a lever to create a North American environment commission. We will negotiate with the two other countries to give it a clear mandate which will serve the cause of sustainable development. In the coming days, we look forward to finding out the position of our American counterparts so that we know exactly where they want to go with this.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment has just said he is waiting to see what the U.S. position is. The minister of trade knows very well that the U.S. position is tough. The United States trade representative has said the Americans will walk away from NAFTA unless they get three tough side accords on the environment, on labour and on import surges.

• (1425)

Yet the minister of trade for his part has said that he will not agree to any side accord if it infringes on Canadian sovereignty. The minister must know that any international agreement necessarily involves some derogation and limitation of sovereignty.

Can the minister say how the United States' tough accords, which he presumably rejects, will not in effect limit the sovereignty of all three countries? Or is he saying that Canada will now walk away from NAFTA if the United States demands these tough accords?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend and his leader talk about sovereignty. I have said that we do not accept an invasion of our sovereignty through the ability of the United States to apply sanctions against Canada. I am sure Mexico would take that same position.

I would be interested to know whether that would be the position of the Liberal Party of Canada. Is the Liberal Party of Canada prepared to accept the United States telling us how to run our environmental matters? Is it prepared to accept the United States telling us how to administer our labour laws? I would be very interested in hearing what the position of the Liberal Party is, if in fact it does have such a position.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the position of the Official Opposition has long been that we need stronger environmental and labour standards in the NAFTA.

The minister speaks of sovereignty. The fact is he has said that he is happy with the present agreement. No change, no additions. He will take it exactly as it is. The United States has now said it wants more.

Why is it that Canada does not want more? Why is it that the minister will accept that the United States can say: "Yes, we want more on environment and we want more on labour standards", but Canada says: "We do not even want to raise the central question of subsidies. We do not even want to raise that because that changes the agreement itself".

How can we have parallel accords on the environment and labour and at the same time not seek a parallel accord on subsidies?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to say this but either my hon. friend is showing his lack of understanding of the NAFTA agreement or he is playing a little political game which in view of his intelligence I believe that is precisely his objective.

We have made it clear. The United States and Mexico have made it clear that there will be no reopening of the agreement. My hon. friend is quite aware of the fact that if there are changes to the subsidy code, which he wants and which we would like to have too, it is not possible without a reopening of the agreement.

There are objectives of the side agreements on the environment and labour. On the environment there is the creation of the North American commission, strengthening environmental co-operation, pushing for better enforcement of environmental rules and promoting sustainable development. All of these things we have been seeking for the last year. We are pleased that the Americans have taken it upon themselves to reopen and seek those same things.

We are working on something that has been part of the Canadian agenda for one full year, but it does not need a reopening of the agreement.

What my hon. friend wants is a reopening of the agreement and if he is seeking that, he had better be prepared to put some other things on the table and that I have not heard from the Liberal Party as yet.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, this is a proud day for all of us who have Irish ancestry.

I too have some questions for the Minister for International Trade. My focus is directly on the involvement of the American people and the House of Representatives and the Senate in an ongoing public debate through extended legislative committee hearings in Washington on this issue.

• (1430)

While the United States has dramatically altered what is on the table through the parallel accords and while there is massive input by American citizens in this altered negotiating position, the Canadian government has refused to allow its own standing committee to travel coast to coast, to Mexico and to Washington so that we can show the American and Mexican people exactly what the problems are and vice versa.

Why is the Minister for International Trade curtailing access to these debates by Canadians by not allowing the committee to travel to Mexico and the United States? What has he got to hide? What is he hiding?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have been quite open in seeking public debate, but my hon. friend should speak to his House leader. His House leader will not let us put this matter to a committee.

We had committee hearings in November, December and February and now when we want to send the matter back to committee his House leader will not let it move forward.

My hon. friend talks about sovereignty and here he is going down to the United States, cap in hand, seeking support from the Americans, saying: "Please, please Americans help us out with our problems in Canada". That is the New Democratic Party in their strong Canada-first stance.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, it embarrasses me to inform the minister who has just responded to my question that the request he has outlined has already been denied in writing by the House leader of the government.

The House leader of the government has said no trip to Mexico, no trip to Washington, no extensive televised conferences and no hearings. We may go to Saskatchewan and that is it.

If the minister is concerned about the Canadian people getting access, if the minister is concerned about this information being made public, then I say, why is the minister not giving the same answers that the government House leader is? They are out to hide these hearings and this evidence proves it.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why in the middle of a heavy snowstorm my hon. friend would like to go to Mexico, but Saskatchewan is open for him, New Brunswick is open for him, Newfoundland is open for him. He can travel anywhere in Canada.

I would have thought that with the Canada-first stance of the New Democratic Party the member would be seeking the advice of Canadians, not Mexicans and not Americans.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, indeed I have taken the advice of Canadians. One piece of advice I have taken is from the former negotiator for the Conservative government on the free trade agreement, Mr. Gordon Ritchie. This is his advice, and I quote: "Gordon Ritchie, former deputy chief negotiator for the Canada-U.S. pact said that Canada's position on the side deals is a negotiating blunder".

If the former chief negotiator for the government says it is a blunder, how can the minister possibly accuse Mr. Ritchie of not having Canadian interests? How can he accuse Mr. Ritchie of not consulting with Canadians? Frankly, this government is still keeping the information secret.

I ask this minister whether or not he agrees with Mr. Ritchie's statement. Yes or no? Is Mr. Ritchie right in this statement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I believe my hon. friend was in Mexico when the hearings started in November. If he had been here for all of the hearings he would have a better understanding of the range of positions that people have been taking.

If my hon. friend would like to debate the side issues, let the matter go to committee so that the issues of the environment and labour matters which is a continuation of the agenda that Canada started in February 1992 can be negotiated. If he wants to have input on these issues he should tell his House leader to forget about the boondoggles and going down to Acapulco in the middle of winter and come up to Canada and debate the issue.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, today Max Yalden told us the reports of sexual harassment in the military increased dramatically in 1992. Yesterday the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women told us that there were policies and programs in place that could ensure women are able to serve free of harassment.

My question, therefore, is for the Prime Minister. Why are these famous policies not working?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to read to the House the order of the Canadian forces harassment policy. I am happy to table it. It indicates very clearly that the subject of harassment was recently discussed at Armed Forces Council.

"Members of Council reaffirmed that harassment in any form, personal, sexual or abuse of power is unacceptable conduct and will not be condoned in the Canadian forces in any way at any rank level". I am very happy to table this.

I think it is very important to underline two things. First of all, we have begun a review in the Canadian Armed Forces as to the actual policy of dealing with sexual harassment. We are dealing with the complaints process, systemic problems, problems in reporting and investigating and responding to allegations of harassment. That report will be in my hands in April and I will be very happy to make it available to the House of Commons as soon as I have it.

In addition, we have been doing a survey of 5,600 members of the Canadian Armed Forces because questions have been raised about the ease with which members of the forces feel they can raise questions of sexual harassment. We have been doing this confidential survey of 5,600 members of the forces to see whether we are getting the appropriate level of reporting because the numbers that I have seen, in my view, are low. My guess is that the reality is higher than that.

That report will be available in April and I will be pleased to make it available to the House of Commons. We are doing everything possible to ensure that we know the reality of what is happening and to ensure that the policy of the Canadian forces, which is zero tolerance for sexual harassment, is applied in the forces.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): If only zero tolerance was the case, Mr. Speaker.

Yesterday the Prime Minister said that the minister of defence was working on this plan. Today the minister has told us of this plan. Policies are in place in many departments, including DND. The Minister Responsible for the Status of Women told us so yesterday. Policies are in place in departments of government. What is not in place is enforcement.

Consequently my question is for the Prime Minister who spoke very eloquently on this subject yesterday. I say to him today, will he direct all his ministers to enforce the policies that are in place and deal seriously with sexual harassment now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not have to direct my ministers in that regard because they all feel very strongly and have already acted upon the notion that there should be zero tolerance of sexual harassment at any time and in any circumstances.

My hon. friend quite properly points out that notwithstanding this rule and its vigorous enforcement, it is not always successful. We will be exerting further vigilance and further effectiveness to ensure, not only throughout the Public Service but in Canada, we can arrive at the creation of a climate wherein it is accepted by all citizens that sexual harassment of any kind is profoundly unacceptable and as a society we must rid ourselves of it.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs, a minister who is not devoting very much time to the concerns of veterans.

What I am asking about, what the veterans of Canada are asking about, is the massive increase in costs which have been forced on veterans who receive care in nursing homes and hospitals. Currently they are faced with a 29 per cent increase this April.

• (1440)

Will the minister look at this with the view of providing relief to these people on fixed incomes?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first I want to say to the hon. member that I take my role as Minister of Veterans Affairs very seriously. One of the things I will not do, unlike the hon. member, is raise unwarranted fears among veterans or among the employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs about the level of staffing in the programs we provide.

I have just seen a press release issued by the hon. member suggesting that according to the estimates we are cutting back the Department of Veterans Affairs. He is accusing the department of budgeting $38 million for professional services which he suggests will be handed out to friends of the government. These are, in fact, medical services, to doctors and rehabilitation workers, the professionals being chosen by the veterans themselves.

In other words, the hon. member has quite wantonly sown seeds of disquiet, doubt and insecurity among the employees of this department in a way that I think is quite inexcusable.

With respect to the issue he raised, he knows well those changes were made some time ago in full consultation with veterans organizations. They are well understood and they bring the costs that are charged to veterans in line with the lowest level charged by provinces for similar services.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, regarding the other matters the minister has raised, I believe the truth is now coming home on the issues I raised previously.

My supplementary question for the minister is this: Will she dedicate her department to reducing the self-pay portions that veterans are now forced to pay and will she set a new course that will return fairness and generosity to the veterans of this country?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the veterans of this country I think care as much or more than anyone about our ability to sustain the things we think are important to us as a society, and that includes our social services and other benefits.

Therefore, the veterans themselves and their associations have been very helpful and supportive in setting benchmarks for the kinds of charges that are levied on the services of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the level of support that is provided.

There is no abstract way of determining what is an appropriate level of charge. Therefore we have sought to find some kind of solid benchmark against which to measure the charges that we impose for our services. The benchmark we have chosen is the lowest fee for this service among the provinces in Canada, because the provinces have the main constitutional responsibility for providing services of this sort. Veterans in Canada will pay no more than the lowest fee charged by a provincial government for these services. That, Mr. Speaker, I think is eminently fair.

TRADE

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

In Washington in the past two days the U.S. trade representative's office said it was this government, the Canadian government, that seriously hampered environmental provisions in the NAFTA, such as section 104 regarding the Basel Convention on Hazardous Waste. We also heard over and over in Washington that the Canadian government has now abdicated any sort of position that might improve environmental co-operation with our trading partners.

Why is Canada dragging its heels on the environment? Why is the minister committing such gross negotiating blunders?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member is getting her information. I can assure her that I went so far as calling my new vis-à-vis in the United States, Carol Browner, and inquiring about how her position was evolving at that time. That was not too long ago, just a few weeks ago. They were still defining—which is acceptable, we can understand that—the positions they would be bringing to the table.

The hon. member seems to be making a leap from that situation of fact to an assumption that our government on environmental issues has not been assuming its responsibilities, when it is quite the contrary, Mr. Speaker. If anything, this government of all the modern governments in the world's industrialized countries has been one that has offered leadership through all the major forums, including the G-7.

If the member does not believe that, maybe she would like to re-read the words of President Bill Clinton when he met with the Prime Minister of Canada.

• (1445)

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the U.S. trade representative's office in the person of Brian Samuels quoted that Canada is seriously hampering negotiations on the environmental provisions because Canada wants to protect its waste industry.

What are we doing here, creating jobs for hamburger flippers and waste management experts? Is that the Tory way?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, Canada and our government, I think it was in November, signed and ratified the Basel convention, which is an international convention. Furthermore, we have bilateral agreements with the United States on the issue of transboundary transportation of waste, both hazardous and non-hazardous. We are now looking at a system by which we will have a notification for even non-hazardous waste between both countries.

That is the type of work that has been done in this area over the last few years.

Obviously the hon. member wants to believe that some position or some point of view in the United States administration coming from I do not know where on some environmental issue is not favourable to Canada.

If that is her position, let me read to her specifically what President Clinton said at a press conference in the presence of the Prime Minister. He said: "And I may add that the Prime Minister's administration in Canada has had a strong record on the environment, something we want to try to beef up in a supplemental agreement".

We agree with that, Mr. Speaker.

POVERTY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, while the Conservative government is trying to alter the definition of poverty and the employment minister calls the jobless free-loaders, the number of hungry in Montreal has increased dramatically—300,000 being served food in the month of November.

The number of single parents seeking food is up by 71 per cent, children more than 180 per cent. This is cause for concern and cause for alarm. Hungry children cannot concentrate and hungry children cannot learn to read and write when their tummies are empty.

My question for the Prime Minister is why can the government not afford to help these needy people and avoid another generation moving into the poverty cycle?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think every member in this House will acknowledge that as long as there are children in this country who do not get a square meal, we cannot afford to be complacent.

We cannot but acknowledge that the situation exists and in fact, last year, this government invested $3 billion for the children of Canada and Quebec, which will be used to help needy families. We are also considering various programs with the Government of Quebec to help give children a better quality of life.

There is a fundamental aspect to this question. The present government is trying to develop and has, in fact, developed policies to help these people get decent jobs. At a time when we are going in that direction, I trust I can count on the hon. member's support so that we can tell Canadians that all concerned, including those of the government, must focus on providing decent jobs so that poor Canadians will be given a chance to support themselves. And I am sure they will succeed, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, that response is certainly not going to fill the empty stomachs of the people we have been referring to, hundreds of thousands of people in Montreal.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Montreal is hungry. Mothers and children and young people in Montreal are so hungry that in November alone, more than 800,000 pounds of food, which is 20 tonnes a day, were distributed. This is Montreal, not Somalia. This is so distressing that I want to appeal directly to the Prime Minister and ask him what he is going to do to alleviate the misery at the foot of the very mountain where he will soon be living.

[English]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly avoid giving a political answer to a political question.

• (1450)

I would again ask my colleague to try and understand the policies of all governments in this country, particularly this one which decided last year, even with all the pressures, to make $3 billion available to the children of Canada and to try and develop a good economy where people have work. That was exactly our purpose and the purpose of all governments. Canadians should be told that all efforts should be in that direction.

Oral Questions

CRIME PREVENTION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

Last week the government sponsored a three-day national symposium in Toronto on crime prevention and community safety. Over the course of the symposium I listened carefully to four different senior ministers, all of whom agreed that the root causes of criminal behaviour are poverty, illiteracy, unemployment and the lack of adequate housing.

If four cabinet ministers believe that these are the real causes of many crimes, what is the government doing about it and why is this government paying more attention to leadership conventions rather than crime prevention?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for raising the fact that this symposium was a success. We gathered together everybody that is involved in crime prevention: police officers, provincial, municipal and federal governments. The justice committee, chaired by the hon. member from Mississauga West, which was very active the week before, was helpful.

At the end of the symposium we decided to have a national strategy on crime prevention. I do not know if the hon. member was present or not, but I announced that we would have 20 to 25 people in Toronto help me and my colleague, the Solicitor General, in order to have the major elements of the strategy by May. I think it was a tremendous success and we should follow the route we are taking.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

I would like to believe in what the minister is saying but I refer him to a letter that I sent to the former Attorney General and Minister of Justice, now Minister of National Defence, which appeals for federal resources to fight the rampant drug and sex trade on the streets of my Toronto riding.

This letter, a copy of which went to the Solicitor General, was signed by representatives of four levels of government, including myself. Almost three months later there is still no reply, not even the courtesy of an acknowledgement. When is this government going to cease deluding Canadians and address the crisis on our streets?

An hon. member: The people in his riding are fighting it personally.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned at the symposium, Canadian taxpayers are already spending $8 billion. That money is already in the system. That is a lot of money.

Everybody recognizes that we have a lot of money in the system. The cost of crime involves an additional $6 billion. That means $500 for every Canadian in this country. I think there is a lot of money in the system.

We want to spend this money in a smarter way and the way to do that is to work together. This is the way this government is working and I am sure it will succeed.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The immigration mail-in application system has been failing in Toronto for a year. The majority of mailed in applications are returned to sender for correction. MP's inquiries often go unanswered for more than a month and too often the answer when it comes is there has been no officer working on that file for these months.

Now the minister plans to extend that failed system to all of Canada by centralizing it at Vegreville; mailed in for the whole country.

• (1455)

Does the minister intend to force Canadians to go to expensive lawyers to get good service or to use MPs and underfunded local community organizations for free substitute help, or is he telling Canadians to give up hope of any decent service from the immigration department?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Not at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in the press release that the government provided indicating the closure of offices in places like Kamloops and Whitehorse, the minister's backgrounder says: "As a result of the lack of in-person interviews, fraud and misrepresentation will easily pass undetected". This was a major concern by this move to Vegreville.

My question to the minister is this. If he is already admitting that this move will increase the possibility of fraud in terms of an unfair immigration system and misrepresentation, why would he proceed with this? Why not go back to the drawing-board and say that these centres will remain open?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if he did that obviously we would not do that.

POLICE SAFETY

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

At present the use of personal defence sprays are classified as prohibited weapons. However the use of these sprays can save lives and facilitate the work of the police. Instead of risking injury or loss of life, police should have these personal defence sprays such as pepper spray devices for their use.

The trauma to police officers as a result of using their firearms in the line of duty could be diminished by the use of these devices.

Can the Minister of Justice say if a decision will be made permitting the use of these devices by police forces, a decision that could save lives?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I share the concerns of my hon. friend. He should know that we have pilot projects in different parts of the country where police forces are using that kind of a device.

I think we should be very cautious in the way we look at the use of those devices. My department along with others and at the provincial level as well that are responsible for the application of laws are closely following those pilot projects and will make a decision.

We really do not have to make a decision to amend legislation for that, but it will be looked at very closely. This is what we are doing.

CANADIAN FORCES BASES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

The minister will know that there are more Canadian Armed Forces bases in Canada than are necessary, far more than are necessary. I wonder if the minister could tell this House what she is doing to eliminate some of these bases and cut down the costs of these bases as an economy measure.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the rationalization of defence infrastructure is one of the government's highest priorities, but it is something that has to be carried out with considerable care for two reasons. If we are to divest ourselves of infrastructure, we want to make sure that we are thinking long term in terms of the needs of our Canadian Armed Forces and also because decisions to decommission infrastructure across the country impact on communities.

The Minister of National Defence had commissioned a minister's advisory group on defence infrastructure to create a process for doing this. That process has been reviewed by the standing committee and we hope to put it into place soon to ensure that we will be able to deal with the question that the hon. member raises in a rational and fair way that is in the interest of Canadian communities and the Canadian Armed Forces.

ATLANTIC FISHERY

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of fisheries who I think should throw his hat in the ring too.

For months the minister has promised assistance to Atlantic fishermen and fish plant workers across Atlantic Canada in communities that have been literally shut down by the quotas he announced last December. Yet, with the exception of the northern cod recovery program which is destined to a particular area in Newfoundland, the very programs that are in place to provide this assistance have been slashed in his government's recent spending estimates.

• (1500)

For example, the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program has been cut by 45 per cent and the Plant Workers' Adjustment Program has been cut by 89 per cent. Why is the minister reneging on his commitment to Atlantic fishing communities?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Bonjour monsieur. Monsieur le président—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crosbie: That suggestion had not come to my mind.

I might just deal with the hon. member's question. As a matter of fact, I have just written the hon. member pointing out to him that he had made very bad mistakes in similar statements he had made in Nova Scotia on what was being spent in these programs.

There are no such spending cuts. The Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program will be spending $584 million. The northern cod program will be spending something like $780 million to $800 million.

We are now looking carefully at the situation in the Atlantic provinces outside the northern cod area. This is to see whether anything further needs to be done to assist those fishermen and plant workers who will be affected by the cuts to the TACs this year.

There has been a huge increase in spending in fishery matters in the last two years. That will continue and has to continue.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to ask the minister further questions about that in the committee studying the estimates.

When will the minister announce for the rest of Atlantic Canada a program comparable to his northern cod recovery program to assist those fishing communities elsewhere that are going through the worst resource crisis in their history? This crisis in large measure is due to his government's mismanagement of the fishery.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I hate to see excess of partisanship in the House.

The crisis in the fishery has a lot of causes that go back many years. The main cause is an extremely unusual environmental cause having to do with the temperature of the water.

In ending my answer, I might just quote from an editorial that I just came across. It says: "John Crosbie is a straight-talking, no-nonsense intelligent guy who refuses to buckle under to loud-mouthed pressure groups". So you can forget him right off the bat.

PRIVILEGE

Mr. Speaker: My obligation is to bring a ruling to the House.

Yesterday, March 16, 1993, the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau raised a second question of privilege, following my first ruling concerning the proceedings of the legislative committee on Bill C-113.

The basis of the member's point, as he stated it, is that the committee, or a majority of its members, had shown contempt for the Speaker in proceeding to study Bill C-113 clause by clause before hearing the ruling of the Chair on the hon. member's first point relating to the expunging of testimony.

I thank the hon. member for his defence of the Chair for which he has demonstrated a sincere regard. It is very clear, however, that decisions relating strictly to the proceedings of a committee, such as the choice of witnesses to be called and the scheduling of clause-by-clause study, are the committee's decisions to make.

It does not seem to me that in this case there is any reason the Speaker should intervene in the committee's proceedings.

I must therefore conclude that the hon. member's point is not a question of privilege.

BILL C-113

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint, without amendment.

While I have the floor, I would like to take this opportunity on behalf of the committee to commend the committee staff for the competent and professional manner in which they handled their duties, especially our counsel, Djénane Boulad, and our researchers, Eric Adams and Kevin Kerr, who actually worked in shifts to provide us with timely information. We had outstanding assistance from our clerk, Robert Normand. All of the staff worked long days and provided excellent support. Their efforts were appreciated by all members of the committee.

CANADIAN CHARTER OF RESPONSIBILITIES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-415, an act to establish a Canadian charter of responsibilities.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Redway: Madam Speaker, as you have indicated, the purpose of this bill is to establish a Canadian charter of responsibilities which would be a companion to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The vast majority of Canadians strongly support the principles set out in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. However, there are a great many Canadians at the same time who also believe that we have laid too much stress on our individual rights and not enough on our responsibilities to one another. This bill represents a first attempt at what I hope will become a great national effort to define and to establish a legal and constitutional basis for those responsibilities which bind Canadians together. They make us one nation rather than only a collection of individuals and diverse and regional interests.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Redway moves that the bill be now read the first time and be printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-416, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (tax credit for mental or physical impairment).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, this bill provides that a taxpayer with a physical or mental impairment that prevents the individual from doing household tasks in the home is entitled to a tax credit, under section 118.2 of the Income Tax Act, for part of the amount paid to another person in return for carrying out these household tasks. The new tax credit will apply to the elderly if they can prove, on the basis of a medical certificate, that they are unable to carry out household tasks.

Irrespective of the amounts paid to another person for doing these household tasks, the taxpayer will also be entitled to a tax credit for mental or physical impairment under section 118.3 of the act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Harb moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON BILL C-115

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, there have been some discussions. The government is anxious to provide Canadians the opportunity for a thorough examination of the NAFTA implementation bill. Therefore the government has proposed that a special committee be struck with all powers of a standing committee to pre-study the bill.

Accordingly, there have been discussions among the parties and I would like to seek the consent of the House to put the following motion:

That a special committee of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the subject matter of Bill C-115, an act to implement the North American free trade agreement;

That the Standing Committee on House Management appoint the membership of the special committee and present its report which shall be deemed concurred in upon presentation to the House of Commons no later than five sitting days after the adoption of the motion;

That the special committee be composed of eight members;

That the changes in membership of the said special committee be effective immediately after notification signed by the member acting as the chief Whip of any recognized party has been filed with the clerk of the committee;

That the committee have all the powers of a standing committee of the House of Commons, pursuant to Standing Orders 108(1), 120 and 121;

That the committee have the power to adjourn from place to place in Canada, along with the necessary staff;

That the committee have the power to engage one expert staff person to be attached to each recognized party represented on the committee;

That the order for the second reading of Bill C-115 be amended to refer the said bill to the special committee for the committee stage consideration of Bill C-115;

That the special committee's report on Bill C-115 to the House shall be the committee's final report.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to present the motion?

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, because of the importance of this request, in the proper precedence, I would defer to my hon. colleagues in the Official Opposition to indicate their position on this first.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: Then, Madam Speaker, the Official Opposition having agreed to it, I must say that listening carefully to the words of my hon. friend and recognizing that the document that we have to consider is obviously going to take some time, as a matter of fact it is going to require a good deal of travel and consultation with Canadians. For that reason, I think there has to be more negotiation. This is to ensure that the government is serious that Canadians will have a real opportunity to respond to the size of this document.

Therefore, at the moment, I have to say no. That is because I have no assurance that Canadians will have meaningful input into this process.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Just to further explain, Madam Speaker, the letter we received—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I just asked the House if the hon. parliamentary secretary had unanimous consent to present the motion. Obviously, there is no consent. So we do not have to go on with debate on this subject. Are there other motions?

PETITIONS

VIOLENCE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present pursuant to Standing Order 36, both on the same topic. The petitioners request that the Criminal Code of Canada be amended to prevent the sale and distribution of serial killer board games and killer cards.

CHINESE CANADIANS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I have a long petition which I will try to summarize from many Canadians of Chinese origin. It is concerned with our very racist history, which must be redressed.

In 1885 Canadians who were of Chinese origin had to pay a unique racist head tax. That was followed in 1923 by the Chinese Exclusion Act. This kept families separated for years, and to this day families have suffered from this action.

The many petitioners say that there must be action by this government because it is long overdue. They call for an all-party parliamentary resolution to acknowledge this injustice which is in our history, to recognize the suffering that individual Chinese Canadians and their families have undergone, to have a letter of acknowledgement that would go out to people who have these certificates, many of them are very elderly now, and to provide symbolic financial redress.

They want symbolic financial redress in the form of $10,000 per head tax certificate and community financial redress. They also want plaques of elderly pioneers who built this country to go to organizations.

That is their request of this Parliament.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, this petition is signed by many seniors in my riding of Ottawa Centre. They are calling on this House to urge the government to ensure that the Old Age Security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canadian seniors.

The petitioners indicate that over 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 actually live below the poverty line, and they also point out that last year's budget only allowed them an increase of 37 cents.

These seniors are calling on this House to take the necessary action to urge the government to deal with this question as soon as possible.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, these petitioners believe that the medicare system is threatened. They ask government and all political parties to preserve our system of health. They want reform of health care. They want a commitment on the part of governments and all political parties to a comprehensive health care system and a renewed commitment to the Canada Health Act.

The petitioners would like the withdrawal of Bill C-91, which gives brand-name drugs a 20-year market monopoly, and they want provisions for the production of low-priced generic substitutions of brand-name pharmaceuticals.

Finally, the petitioners want a reaffirmation of the major federal responsibility for health protection and promotion, disease prevention, and medical research, for a national health care system for all Canadians, a universal system.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present this afternoon.

The first petition points out that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who have seen sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazilian prison have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons, and discrimination in sentencing and parole.

The petitioners note that the cumulative effect of these irregularities provides ample ground for the Government of Canada to seek a remedy on their behalf. The only effective remedy is expulsion in accordance with Brazilian law. Therefore they call upon Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have another set of petitions which are signed by hundreds of residents of British Columbia, including residents of my own constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway. In the petitioners' view the embargo against Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) regarding information and humanitarian aid should be lifted. They point out that the United Nations Security Council resolution 757 does not include mail, personal parcels, newspapers, or, in particular, humanitarian aid.

The petitioners suggest that the embargo denies Canadian residents the ability to provide humanitarian aid and financial support to dependents and others in need and they raise concerns about the prohibiting of mail and the denial of access to information through newspapers.

Therefore the petitioners urge Parliament to amend the embargo against Yugoslavia, which discriminates against all residents of Canada of Yugoslavian origin, as soon as possible.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have a petition which has been signed by a number of residents of my constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway. It notes that many studies have shown a link between violence in entertainment and desensitization to violence in our society. Part of this culture of violence is the Serial Killer board game, a game which comes with a bag of 25 babies. The point is to murder as many defenceless children and adults as possible.

The laws of Canada do not deal with materials portraying torture, rape and murder as fun, including the Serial Killer board game. Therefore, the petitioners request Parliament consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violent and degrading material such as the Serial Killer board game can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Finally, Madam Speaker, I have the honour of presenting a petition which is signed by hundreds of residents, not only of British Columbia but other provinces as well and a number of residents of my own constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway, on the subject of the Chinese head tax.

The petitioners note that Chinese immigrants to Canada had to pay a head tax in the late 1800s and early 1900s. This had a profoundly negative impact on Canadians of Chinese ancestry. It is important we acknowledge this injustice and reaffirm the principles of justice and equality.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to take a number of steps, including redress, plaques and pledges to ensure that this will never happen again and that the Constitution be amended to ensure that it never happens again.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present two petitions.

The first is from petitioners of central British Columbia and northern Alberta. They point out their opposition to the plan to divert part of the North Thompson River in order to sell the diverted water to the southern California area. They ask the federal government to take whatever steps necessary to ensure that water is considered exempt from NAFTA.

BILL C-268

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on another matter, the petitioners from a number of Indian reserves in Ontario ask that Parliament enact Bill C-268 which is an act respecting a national solidarity day for the aboriginal people of Canada.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to rise on behalf of a number of constituents in the municipality of Kaleden, including, Madam Speaker, for your interest, the former member of Okanagan—Similkameen, Mr. Fred King.

These people are upset about the increasing amount of violence shown on television and as part of our ordinary lives. They are particularly upset about the violence depicted in the Serial Killer board game.

The petitioners ask that Parliament consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violent and degrading material such as the Serial Killer board game can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, the petition I am presenting is certified as correct.

"We, the undersigned residents of Canada draw to the attention of the House the following: That many studies have shown a link between violence in entertainment and desensitization to violence in our society and that the laws of Canada do not deal with materials pertaining to torture, rape and murder as fun, including serial killer board games."

Therefore my petitioners from Boswell, Creston, Kootenay Bay and Gray Creek in the riding of Kootenay East call on Parliament to consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violence and degrading materials such serial killer board games can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

TAXATION

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from several hundred teachers across the province of British Columbia, including Kamloops, Prince George, Terrace, Nanaimo, Courtenay and many other communities.

The petitioners note that the Income Tax Act allows self-employed professionals and business people deductions for operating expenses and improving their offices and businesses, but unfairly refuses to allow teachers deductions for the expenses which they incur to better their teaching abilities and to provide materials for their students.

Therefore, the petitioners call upon Parliament to request that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue take action to amend the present Income Tax Act to allow teachers in the educational institutions in Canada deductions for professional expenses made in the course of their employment.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present today a petition signed by a number of citizens of Alberta, including people in Boyle, Edmonton, Calgary, Lac La Biche, Onoway, Stony Plain, Waskatenau and elsewhere, all of whom have the following points in common.

The petitioners are of the opinion that the proposed North American free trade agreement has resulted in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada, that it will cause Canadians to lose more good jobs, that it cannot be remedied through renegotiation. As the Constitution requires a general federal election before January 1 of next year, the date on which the North American free trade agreement comes into effect, they call upon the House to reject the proposed NAFTA and to recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement.

I would just note in concluding that this bears directly on the debate we will be having this afternoon.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, I too have the privilege of presenting a petition signed by many people in Toronto, including my own constituency, who state that the proposed North American free trade agreement has resulted in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada and that this agreement will cause Canadians to lose more jobs. Also Canada's Constitution requires a general federal election before January 1, 1994, the date on which the North American free trade agreement is scheduled to come into force.

Therefore, the petitioners call upon this House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and to recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, Question No. 413 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 413—Mr. Caccia:

Is the National Transportation Agency monitoring air quality in cabins of aeroplanes so as to protect the health of the flying public and if so, what are acceptable standards for breathable (a) suspended particles (b) nicotine (c) carbon monoxide (d) carbon dioxide (e) humidity and are they presently being enforced?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): The National Transportation Agency does not have a mandate to monitor air quality in aeroplanes.

Air quality in aircraft cabins is regulated by Transport Canada both through aircraft airworthiness certification under the Aeronautics Act and pursuant to the Aviation Occupational Safety and Health (OSH) Regulations made under the Canada Labour Code, Part II.

Airworthiness standards define maximum cabin concentrations for carbon monoxide (50 ppm) and carbon dioxide (3 per cent by volume, sea volume equivalent). These standards are enforced through the aircraft certification process. No limitations are defined for suspended particles, nicotine or humidity.

Aviation OSH limitations are dependent on the frequency and duration of exposure to particular chemical agents. OSH limitations exist for carbon monoxide (50–400 ppm), carbon dioxide (5,000–30,000 ppm), nicotine (.5 mg per cubic metre), although this involves cutaneous absorption as well as respiratory absorption, and respirable nuisance particulates (5 mg per cubic metre). No limitations are defined for humidity.

Compliance with the cabin air quality standards set out in the Aviation OSH Regulations is achieved primarily through the complaint and resolution procedures prescribed under the Canada Labour Code, Part II, involving company safety and health committees. Transport Canada becomes involved in such issues only when these procedures do not result in resolution of the issue.

CANADIAN PETROLEUM RESOURCES ACT

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-106, an act to amend certain petroleum-related acts in respect of Canadian ownership requirements and to confirm the validity of a certain regulation, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

He said: Madam Speaker, I look forward to entering the debate on second reading of Bill C-106, the Canadian ownership requirements repeal bill.

At the outset, I express my appreciation to the critics from both the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party for limiting our time and proceeding with this bill into legislative committee as quickly as possible. It is very much appreciated.

This bill is very much in the line of the government's agenda for strengthening the Canadian economy and the petroleum industry. Bill C-106 is being introduced at a time when international competition has never been greater, both in the petroleum sector and other sectors of the economy. I would like to take a few moments to review the policy context within which this decision was made.

Canada's economic security and future prosperity depend on the willingness to face up to economic realities. Since 1984 the agenda of this government has been to empower participants in the Canadian economy to employ the skills and initiatives that they have to allow them to build a more competitive Canada. The nations around the globe have been encouraged to adjust and adapt to an increasingly competitive environment.

As we look at this important sector and recognize that the energy policy is just one element of the government's economic policy, it does reflect the confidence of the market. It is consistent with this philosophy. The main thrust of the energy policy since 1984 has been to deregulate, eliminate interventionist programs, privatize Crown corporations in the energy business and to improve access for Canadian energy products world-wide.

At the beginning of our first mandate we made a commitment to Canadians concerning future oil and gas policies. These commitments materialized in a new policy framework based on market forces and not government intervention. Just to recall, in 1985 we signed the western accord. That involved the deregulation of oil prices and the elimination of oil export charges. Federal energy taxes such as the PGRT were removed at that time.

In the same year, the government introduced the deregulation of natural gas markets which has led to a threefold increase in exports of natural gas. Later in 1985, the government announced its frontier energy policy that set out the framework for the industry to operate on frontier lands.

The government also addressed the issue of jurisdiction over offshore oil and gas resources which led to the signing of the joint management accords with Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

As we negotiated free trade agreements with the United States in 1988, the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, and with the United States and Mexico in 1992, we continue to commit to the breakdown of barriers both within Canada and external barriers with our trading partners so that we can have the prosperity and the ability to build upon a global market which we depend upon for our prosperity.

Last year the government announced the changes to the treatment of foreign investment in the petroleum industry which has led to the drafting of Bill C-106. Taken together with the measures announced in March, these constitute a very reasoned and sound response to a changing industry.

Canadians need a strong and resilient oil and gas industry if we are going to develop our domestic energy resources. The industry provides Canadians with the opportunities for high-quality job opportunity employment. It also produces Canada's most advanced and successful technological advances.

In the development of our own frontier resources we will permit those benefits that this industry provides in regions of Canada to be spread more equitably across Canada.

I am very sure that colleagues in the House will agree that we must develop our frontier oil and gas resources. If one looks at the frontier on Hibernia, it does require enormous investments.

We need to attract additional investment dollars and sources of capital so we can foster exploration and development so that we are able to secure our energy future in Canada and to ensure the health of the petroleum industry and the economy of our country to make Canada more competitive and to maintain the prosperity that Canadians enjoy.

The removal of the Canadian ownership requirement is an important step toward achieving these goals.

The National Energy Program was interventionist and it impeded the growth of the industry. We have changed that. Bill C-106 reflects the government's willingness to adjust to changing positions. As we look at international oil markets which have become more competitive, the market for oil and gas investment has also become much more competitive.

We introduced market forces into energy policy for the most effective and efficient development of our resources. As we go forward to repeal the Canadian requirements for ownership we will be removing a self-imposed restriction on the ability of private investors to take risks and uncertainty associated with the development of Canada's most challenging petroleum resource projects.

There is intense international competition for investment financing whether it happens to be in the petroleum industry or other industries that are requiring large injections of capital and that self-imposed restriction that we have in Canada is unacceptable and costs Canada. The members of the Canadian industry who are involved in bringing these projects forward have reinforced this message.

As we look at the change in economic environment and in the way that capital resources now can be moved around anywhere in the world seeking the best return on investment, it means that there is no differential between the ability to invest in oil and gas projects as compared with any other projects. Until the announcement in March 1992, there was that barrier.

If we had continued the Canadian ownership requirement we would have frustrated willing investors who would wish to participate in Canada's frontier petroleum projects. We recognize that one cannot isolate Canada. We cannot isolate ourselves from the operation of open-capital markets and more importantly we recognize that it is not in the interest of Canadians to do so.

When we look at the development of large-scale oil and gas projects, we will look for those people who are prepared to invest and prepared to take the risk and not at the country of origin of those investors. Investors will be able to be attracted to projects in Canada as they are in other areas of the world. They will be able to make their own judgment. They will be able to accept the risk or reject the risk without the government imposing restrictions which disqualify certain investors who would otherwise be willing to participate. We will be able to improve the investment environment in the frontier areas in particular.

Canada cannot afford to have obstacles in the way of ventures which require a large injection of capital. We believe that there is enough difficulty in attracting investors because of the risk that is inherent without having an arbitrary level of Canadian investment in these high-risk projects which would result in the underdevelopment of these resources for Canadians.

I want to point something out before I take my place. From the statements that were made during the presentation of petitions, my colleague the energy critic from the New Democratic Party attempted to suggest that this bill would have something to do with NAFTA.

I call his attention to this. The announcement of the government's policy was made in March 1992. He would know when we made that announcement that if we were negotiating an agreement we could not prejudge what Parliament would do. At the same time, why would anyone want to discourage the development of Canadian resources by putting a requirement that penalizes Canada while allowing the United States and Mexico to proceed with their energy projects?

Who would benefit from that? Surely the people in Mexico and the United States would benefit if Canada was not able to proceed with their energy projects. It would penalize the people of Canada.

We made the announcement in March 1992 that we would be making these changes. They are not inconsistent with this government's policies since 1984. I believe that it is the right policy and it will allow for an important resource to be developed in Canada by those investors who wish to take the risk and wish to invest. It would not be not dependent upon the country of origin which then would penalize Canada. We cannot afford that as a nation.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, on Bill C-106, which deals with Canadian ownership of certain petroleum assets—

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Forgive me, if it was stated then I missed it. Is the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast rising on question and comment or on debate?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is rising on debate. The hon. member for Edmonton East should know that when we start second reading of a bill, unless there is unanimous consent and members do ask for questions or comments, the first two speakers are allowed up to 40 minutes and that period is not followed by a period of questions or comments.

We are resuming debate. The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, since the 1950s and earlier controversy has surrounded the issue of non-Canadian ownership of our economy. While political and economic realities have dramatically changed around the world since, the issue of foreign investment and ownership of Canadian assets still vexes many thoughtful Canadians.

Almost weekly more of Canada's economy is being opened up to foreign investors, mostly but not always from our neighbour to the south. Miller Brewing in the U.S. is buying 20 per cent of Molson Breweries. AT&T is acquiring 20 per cent of Canada's new long distance phone company, Unitel. American Airlines is seeking 33 per cent of Canadian International Airlines. Three American companies, Mobil, Chevron and Murphy, will end up owning two-thirds of the giant Hibernia oil field.

Increasingly the development of the Alberta oil sands, which constitute a veritable Saudi Arabia within Canada in terms of oil reserves potential, is being done by investors from the U.S. and more recently from Japan.

Since the establishment of Investment Canada in 1985 there has not been a single turn-down, not one. It has approved the foreign takeover of 739 Canadian-controlled companies worth an estimated $69.5 billion. Another 2,882 Canadian companies, worth about $7.4 billion, were also sold to foreign investors during the period but were considered too small to require Investment Canada review.

Many economists look favourably on foreign investment because they think it results in increased economic activity and jobs within the host country. They say that foreign investment spurs more competition in the host country, results in the introduction of newer technologies and new trade opportunities in other international markets, because trade and investment are now so closely linked around this increasingly shrunken planet.

Many Canadian owners do not want to sell their enterprises to non-Canadians. However for many, after a fruitless search for capital or bank credit in Canada, and some of our major financial institutions are doing a very poor job in helping small and medium-sized businesses which until 1990 were creating most of the new jobs across Canada, the sale to a foreign corporation often becomes the only or best way to survive. For instance, Connaught BioScience, Canada's leading vaccine company, and Lumonics, our leading laser company, were both sold abroad after spending one year or so looking for Canadian funding.

After Gulf Canada walked away from its 25 per cent stake in the Hibernia project that project became another example of how futile the search for home-grown money often is. It was obvious that Ottawa's finances, with a federal debt-GDP ratio looking over an abyss, could simply not afford the cost. The only option, if the project was to survive, was to look for a foreign partner with clout.

According to a 1992 study, in B.C. foreign-owned companies operating in that province had invested almost $2 billion and employed more than 14,000 British Columbians. One hundred and eleven of the companies with operations in other provinces employed a total of 42,419 people nation-wide. Canada has very high unemployment. Only Spain has a worse unemployment rate than we do among the 13 nations that the Economist magazine tracks weekly in its statistics.

This level of activity is a boon to our economy, because unless an economy first creates wealth there can be no compassionate social problems maintained or enhanced over the longer term. It would appear that foreign ownership has become less of an issue, except for our friends on the far left, the New Democratic Party and the National Party which it has spawned from the city that the critic from the NDP and I come from, Edmonton. Foreign ownership has become less of an issue in era of economic globalization and freer and freer capital flow among most countries.

For example, direct foreign investment by residents of the G-7 nations has increased eightfold since 1967 alone. In contrast to the 1970s, a good deal of the popular opposition to foreign ownership of energy assets appears to have melted away in Canada and in many other nations, from the former Soviet Union to Venezuela. With multinational oil companies being wooed around the world for their capital, technology and management skills, there is a real fear that Canadians might be left behind.

In September 1984 the then new Prime Minister of this country declared: "You have been talking about economic nationalism. I am speaking of 1.5 million unemployed"—by the way it is almost exactly about the same number we have today—"who are not concerned with where investment comes from. They are concerned with attracting investment to Canada so that they can have jobs". It is thus a puzzle why our Department of Energy, Mines and Resources needed more than eight years to figure out what the then Prime Minister was talking about.

When one scans this government's mostly destructive economic policies since 1984 it is clear that politics, and not jobs, was all that mattered. Energy politics, next to the constitutional struggle, has been the most prominent feature of federal-provincial conflict and collaboration since about 1973.

Creating an open market for Canadian energy assets as late as 1992 was a reversal by the former energy minister, a western Canadian, who for years ignored energy industry pleas for looser foreign investment rules, fretting about a nationalist backlash.

Even those who agree with the Tories' now mostly discredited trickle-down economics must question the timing of this policy change. It is a scarcely concealed pitch to voters who have defected to the Reform Party, which scorns nationalists and promises looser oil take-over rules.

Recently some desperate Ottawa Tories attempted to counter Alberta's oil patch flirtation with the Reform Party by moving the National Energy Board headquarters to Calgary; quite properly because it should have been there in the first place. They have also gone forward with a partial privatization of Petro-Canada, which author Peter Foster says has devoured about $10 billion of federal taxpayer money since the 1970s.

The ultimate irony is that few people seem greatly interested in investing in energy firms these days. Why would any intelligent foreigner invest in an energy economy which has seen such an incompetent federal government? Is there a more incompetent economic policy anywhere in the advanced industrialized world?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Yes, back in the early 1980s with the National Energy Board. Remember where you came from if you can.

Mr. Kilgour: We are now living in the 1990s. Perhaps the minister should remember what decade we are now in. This is a government that knows so little about basic economics. Is there a government that knows less about creating jobs and keeping them? Such questions suggest that there is much opportunism in the proposed policy change.

I am glad the former finance minister is here since much of this is his fault. In our country the yearly budget deficit for all levels of government for 1992 was 8.5 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product. The accumulated all-government debt, approximately $650 billion, was 90 per cent of our GDP. Our net foreign debt, approximately $300 billion, was 44 per cent of our GDP. Does anyone in this House disagree? Do we really think as members of Parliament that the IMF is very far from Canada's financial door?

Does anyone think that our country is going to avoid the New Zealand wringer if we continue to spend and borrow, an addiction of the present government and in fairness some early Liberal ones as well?

I ask the Minister of Finance how any MP, or MLA for that matter, can look any young Canadian in the eye today? Canadian politicians have the responsibility to avoid putting the standard of living of our children and grandchildren at risk. If they knew what our collective profligacy had done to their futures then I think they would want to run us out of every capital city across the land.

Premier Wells made this point very well the other day. He pointed out that in 1975 each Canadian family's share of the national mortgage was about $50,000. Today, after nine years of the Tories, it is about $665,000 per family.

I am proud of my leader for saying no to the purchase of 50 submarine-chasing helicopters, the price of which has already jumped from $4.4 billion to $5.8 billion. Why would any company foreign or domestic—

• (1550)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Why did he call it $8 billion yesterday?

Mr. Kilgour: I do not mind, Madam Speaker, if you want to let the minister heckle. It does not bother me. I assure you that I am used to being heckled in court by people with a lot more intelligence than the minister.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When there is that type of exchange in the House, the Speaker normally will intervene only if the conversation seems to be a problem for the person who has the floor.

The hon. member first tells me that it does not bother him and then starts to throw insults across the floor. I think it might be easier to get on with discussing this bill. It is a very serious bill. I will give the floor back to the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

Mr. Kilgour: Why would any company, foreign or domestic, invest now in our energy sector which suffers from a high Canadian dollar, high real interest rates until very recently, high operating costs and high taxes in a period of low profitability? Why would anyone invest in an industry with an average rate of return of 5 per cent when the "rate of return means the same thing in every language to every investor".

Across western Canada, upstream oil and gas industry employment is most regrettably down by about 35,000 jobs since 1985. Even if an optimistic forecast of gradual price recoveries comes true, sector employment is still expected to shrink by about 11,700 jobs, 18 per cent, to leave this key Canadian industry, one based in western Canada, with only 51,900 jobs by 1995.

There was widespread consensus among oil and gas experts that 1993 would be almost as tough for the industry as 1992. Predictions about the near future of the sector do not vary widely now either.

Except for gas, the industry could remain unhealthy through the mid-1990s. More losses and lay-offs will occur, the petroleum reserve will keep depleting and operating costs will continue to escalate unless things change in Ottawa.

There is probably about $55 billion currently invested in Canada's energy sector. Over all, the industry did not make a profit last year. To be sure some younger companies did make a profit.

Quite understandably, oil people have been lobbying governments for a new fiscal regime to increase their cash flow and prevent the departure of activity to other resource-rich countries with less onerous tax and regulatory regimes.

Our companies cannot do much more to rationalize themselves. Most of them have already taken Draconian steps to reduce costs including downsizing and shut-downs. Returning the sector to financial health over all is not happening.

Many companies are still short of up-front cash for drilling and exploration and the important service sector, at least until very recently, remains in severe disarray.

The recent changes to the Alberta royalty structure was music to the ears of a battered industry. Provincial politicians had finally managed to stop squeezing the geese that laid Alberta's golden eggs with a new policy that seemed to satisfy the industry.

Virtually everybody in the industry said that a royalty system designed in the booming 1970s in anticipation of high oil and gas prices was no longer realistic in today's world of higher production costs and lower commodity prices. Yet it took more than five years for the industry to persuade Alberta politicians that a revision of the existing royalty regime was critical to Alberta's economic well-being.

A more profitable energy sector could lead to larger government revenues as the industry already accounts directly for 25 per cent of the Alberta government's revenue. Considering that the Edmonton government's accumulated debt totals $14 billion and is now growing at $13 billion a year, turning a blind eye to the plight of a vital petroleum industry amounts to extreme political myopia.

Suffice it to say that the average annual royalty revenue from 1980 to 1986 was $4.4 billion in Alberta. For the current year it will probably reach only about $2 billion.

Although the new royalty system represents the most profound change the industry has seen in two decades, words of caution are needed. The 1991 royalty holiday for new oil wells intended to revive sluggish drilling activity was a well-recognized failure, unfortunately.

Since the program was announced, drilling activities continue to decline. One industry insider put it aptly: "If you don't have hard cash you can't drill wells, royalty holiday or no royalty holiday".

Only 132 out of an available 432 rigs were working in the winter of 1991. Canada's largest oil and gas company, Esso Resources Canada, drilled only 22 wells in the first nine months of last year.

• (1555)

Since the new provincial royalty measures were announced most industry analysts have applauded predicting that lower royalties will generate more activity and save jobs, royalty relief on new wells will particularly help exploration and the new system will encourage long-term stability in the sector.

According to the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors the new Alberta royalty regime will mean an average of 16 more rigs working than last year, creating 1,200 jobs on rig sites.

Some experts warn that the reformed royalty structure does not guarantee increased oil patch activity. There is no industry assurance that extra revenues will be invested in western Canada. Indeed it might result in the exploration for new reserves in more attractive geological locations.

The new royalty structure will reduce the Alberta government's take by almost $500 million over the next three years while there is no comprehensive data on the corresponding gains from increased activity.

Are the royalty reforms more than slightly attractive to major multinational oil and gas producers? Even if their returns on investment were healthy, many major companies seem reluctant to explore a sedimentary basin where they think mainly small oil pools remain.

Alberta's best known pools of conventional oil are almost two-thirds depleted and not enough people expect major new discoveries. My own province's conventional oil reserves shrank 8 per cent or 264 million barrels during 1991 alone.

The situation is further aggravated by our present wasteful practices. More than half the oil wells in Canada are abandoned before more than a small part, often as little as 10 per cent, of the oil in place is recovered. Without new initiatives, Canada will face the prospect of importing oil at an annual cost of $10 billion by the year 2004.

Oil sands development probably offers Canadians the best hope for a reasonable level of oil sufficiency over the longer term. The oil sands resources in Alberta alone, as I indicated before, are greater than the proven oil reserves in the entire Middle East. The total amount of oil trapped in the sand may be as much as 1.7 trillion barrels. That is a lot of oil. It is enough to supply Canada for 4,000 years or the U.S. and Canada until 2400. By that time of course our energy will probably come from sunlight or hydrogen.

In the meantime the sheer size of oil sands deposits is reason enough to encourage some shifts in our exploration focus to the heavy, non-conventional and frontier oil resources. More technological support is required to assist in developing and extracting the resources at minimum cost with the lowest possible environmental impact. The Athabasca oil sands continue to produce 16 per cent of Canada's oil and could produce far more.

Suncor and Syncrude, the two Canadian pioneers in the field, continue to increase production and to cut costs. We must only salute these companies. Both are in the process of becoming even more efficient and cost competitive thanks to a number of factors including new technologies. Their production costs per barrel are down to a very impressive $15 range.

Syncrude has already produced more than 600 million barrels of oil, which is more than the estimated recoverable oil in the Hibernia field. It has spent more than $4 billion in developing and expanding its two oil sands leases. The company is one of Alberta's biggest employers with 4,000 people on the payroll and about 1,200 contractors. It has already paid $1.3 billion in royalties to the Alberta government and millions of dollars in federal taxes. It has given its owners a positive cash flow for 12 out of its 14 years of existence.

Not surprisingly, the Mitsubishi Oil Company obtained a 5 per cent stake in Syncrude once it was allowed to. Speaking personally, I very much hope that more oil sands investments will be made by Japanese investors in the near future. Why should there not be investors from Taiwan, South Korea and other Pacific rim nations as well?

"If no major oil sands development is announced in the next five years we will have made a tragic error in this country", says Syncrude's current president Eric Newell. However, few oil companies these days have the finances to cover the enormous capital requirements. Suncor and Syncrude can make money because they have paid for their plants. The infrastructure has been there for years but it is still too expensive to get new players. This is a fact that was demonstrated when OSLO shelved its project.

Other projects like the Lloydminster upgrader, the Vancouver pipeline and most recently Hibernia, have been delayed because of the enormous capital burden on consortium partners.

It is my view that if access to foreign capital was made available, more of these frontier projects would be able to proceed creating desperately needed jobs in our north and our other frontier areas.

Some foreigners are interested in our oil sands. Last year a Chinese oil company, the China National Petroleum Corporation, became the first foreign investor in the oil sands research facility at Fort McMurray, Alberta. The Chinese will invest $6.5 million over the next two years in AOSTRA which operates an underground test facility. Another company, a Japanese-based oil firm, has also committed itself to invest several millions of dollars in AOSTRA.

Both initiatives have encouraged optimism that oil sands bitumen may be commercially recoverable with the cost of a barrel reduced to as little as $7.

One reason there is no immediate sign of further oil sands development is that private sector moves money into more tempting conventional foreign fields.

One would be amazed at the opportunities available to Canadian exploration companies in foreign countries. It should be emphasized that most of them have introduced dramatic changes in their foreign investment policy, something this government has been incapable of understanding since 1984.

There are a number of Alberta companies that are going to cash in on oil and gas reserves in Asiatic Russia which might outstrip even that of the Middle East. For the long-term the Russian federation has indicated it is considering the issue of large exploration concessions and possibly privatizing existing fields which would allow for direct foreign ownership of reserves.

Many Alberta companies are looking at southeast Asia, especially Malaysia, with its positive investment climate. Southeast Asian governments have expressed interest in Canadian skills and oil field technology, which are some of the best in the world.

Struggling Alberta oil companies are also being lured, for example, even to Pakistan with promises of big finds, healthy prices, low taxes and consumers ready to buy all they can produce. The rules and regulations regarding foreign investment were overhauled in 1991 in Pakistan which is looking for as much foreign commercial participation as possible.

In South America, Argentina gets everybody's attention as the top country in which to look for oil. It is perhaps the most stable political and economic system on that continent and has an excellent oil and gas infrastructure.

In addition, it is possible for a single company now to acquire exploration rights to vast areas in South America. Canadian Occidental or Canadian Occi as it is called and its parent, Occidental, have 100 per cent of a 197,600 hectare block in Ecuador. Nobody dreams of having access to that sort of acreage in western Canada.

However, all that glitters is not the material we use in rings. Although cheap exploration opportunities outside Canada are proving a bargain for petroleum companies, with dwindling budgets such ventures are very harmful for drilling and service firms left behind.

Our drilling industry in the west of Canada is already at its lowest point in almost 20 years. Therefore, a new government in Canada must move to keep companies in Canada while making investment more attractive to foreign sources of capital.

Gerry Protti, the director of the former association IPAC, said in March 1992: "The foreign ownership restriction is discriminating against the oil and gas industry. Treating the oil and gas industry differently from other industrial sectors is not going to benefit developing resources or creating jobs". In his view the investment restrictions keep small and medium-sized companies from much needed capital from both foreign and domestic investors.

Between 1985 and 1990 Canadian-controlled petroleum firms reinvested at an average of 99 per cent of their annual cash flow and domestic activities. Foreign-controlled firms reinvested an average of 77 per cent. While the reinvestment rate is not as high for foreign firms, the commitment to Canadian projects remains noteworthy because resources developed through foreign financing are almost always under Canadian management.

Foreign reinvestment rates were much higher in the years when our exchange and interest rates were more competitive in real terms. Canadian-owned shares of our petroleum firms grew from 26 per cent in 1981 to 45 per cent in 1990. Relaxation of foreign investment rules will probably reduce that figure but no independent analysis to my knowledge has shown unequivocally why this would be a bad thing. Much of our domestic oil and gas industry, particularly that in my own province of Alberta, has been achieved through foreign investments. Given that our western-based petroleum industry has been forced to accept a bad economic environment since late 1985, the Government of Canada has an obligation to improve access to pools of offshore capital.

Selective tax concessions have proven to be ineffective in creating a profitable climate, not to mention the dangerous patchwork effect they have in the marketplace.

Foreign investment and ownership rules are only one tool that the minister has to make the petroleum sector more profitable.

The measures to be announced by the minister are likely to be short-term solutions which will not likely fully satisfy the demands of an industry in great difficulty.

Some means of stimulating more activity is urgently needed for our entire resource sector.

The mining industry, for example, which now accounts for about 4.4 per cent of Canada's Gross National Product and supports about 330,000 direct and indirect jobs, faces serious difficulties because of the existing federal-provincial tax policies, environmental assessment and regulations, problems of land access and security of tenure, all of which create investment uncertainty, particularly for people like the Japanese. They are not used to dealing with various levels of government in order to have a project go ahead.

Mining exploration, for instance, is at its lowest in a decade. In 1991, it fell to $656 million in spending from $751 million in 1990 and $1.3 billion in 1988. Reserves of many of Canada's metals have dropped significantly since the early eighties. For instance, proven and probable reserves of copper, nickel and zinc were almost two-thirds of those reported in 1981, while lead was down 60 per cent of its 1981 level.

For the first time in recent history, mineral production is exceeding reserve additions and opportunities for mineral exploration and development continue to be squeezed. Mining exploration is of course high risk and a high dollar cost is attached. It is crucial that mineral exploration in Canada be returned to high levels to replace depleting reserves. This is only possible if sufficient incentives are provided to attract investment from around the world to the high risks of mineral exploration.

It should be emphasized that only our domestic mining industry is hurting. There is a wide perception abroad that the legislative and policy changes introduced in a number of mineral-rich countries, particularly in Latin America, have had a significant impact on investment flows in the mining industry. By relaxing previous restrictions on foreign investment and resource development, such countries have unleashed a pent-up demand for unusually high quality mine development opportunities.

In many countries foreign investment laws have been liberalized to reduce or eliminate restrictions on foreign ownership, to place foreign investment on a more equal footing with local investors. Some governments have also introduced legislation aimed at reducing taxes on foreign remittances or on foreigners reinvesting profits in the local economy.

For example, to attract foreign mineral investment, laws have been revised and mining tax rates, import tariffs, freight rates, export duties and price controls have been reduced or simplified to promote mining activity.

Areas of land formerly off limits are being opened for mineral exploration and development by foreign mining companies. About 40 Canadian mining companies are active in Chile, helping to make Canada the fourth largest foreign investor in Chile after the U.S., Japan and Finland.

This trend toward Latin America also raises serious concerns about Canada's ability to maintain its position as the world's largest producer of zinc and fourth largest miner of copper.

In closing, the current levels of Canadian ownership in the oil and gas industry are not so dangerously low as to imperil the domestic control of our resources. Improved access to foreign capital can improve our access to new technology enabling firms to enhance what is already a competitive advantage compared to other oil-producing nations.

Improvements in market conditions in Canada that would occur through greater access to capital would be likely to entice our own oil companies to explore our domestic frontier as well as in other countries.

Most economists would agree that measures which inhibit foreign direct investment tend to reduce aggregate economic growth and income levels.

It should be emphasized, however, that the proposed bill first and foremost will affect our aboriginal peoples who live on the frontier lands north of 60. My colleague from the Western Arctic will speak to that issue soon.

The bill's impact on aboriginal land and whether or not aboriginal nations will support such an initiative will depend to some extent on their ability to profit from new projects in terms of jobs, royalties and the extent to which energy-selected ventures will affect wildlife and environment.

• (1610)

Producing oil and gas from the north's vast energy reserves was part of the national dream just a decade ago. The area was seen as a source of our national energy self-sufficiency. It would be imprudent for the Official Opposition to oppose any reasonable relaxation in foreign ownership in that industry on the grounds of economic nationalism.

What seems to be required though are conditions such as promoting exports or using Canadian suppliers or making shares in the Canadian enterprise available to Canadians, to recover resource sector jobs so desperately needed across Canada particularly across our frontier lands.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, at the outset I would like to place an unusual request before the House. I would like to seek the unanimous consent of the House to be granted the same time allotment as previously was granted to the critic for the Liberal Party and the minister in addressing this bill.

I make this request because the circumstances of the genesis of the bill and its impact require an analysis more thorough than I can manage in 20 minutes. I put myself in the hands of the House. I do however seek that unanimous consent.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to have 40 minutes?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Consent is not given.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, that being the case I will move as far through my remarks as I am able in the time allotted. They will then be resumed on my behalf later in the afternoon, I believe by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

In any event let me begin by saying how sad it is to see the once proudly nationalist Liberal Party reduced to yet another supplicant at the temple of international capital. I must say that those who served the party well in its nationalist heyday must be hanging their heads in shame and spinning in their graves at this point.

This is a free trade bill. The Americans wanted it; the Conservatives complied. This bill meets exactly the negotiating objectives of the United States government adopted even before the 1988 passage in Canada of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

The government is abandoning completely the long-standing Canadian policy of maintaining and increasing Canadian ownership and control in our strategic petroleum industry. This is being done through this bill and the government policy announcement of March 25, 1992 dumping Canadian ownership requirements outside the Canada lands, and through Bill C-89, the bill that extends to U.S. investors the same review thresholds for oil and gas investments as apply in other sectors of the economy. It is through these three agencies the government is doing this.

The alleged purpose of this bill is to spur significant amounts of constructive new investment in Canada's oil patch. But that is nonsense. Instead, this bill will harm Canada by guaranteeing that in the long term as Canadian petroleum assets recover their value, God willing, the number of American takeovers of Canadian oil and gas companies will increase. In the long term this will result in fewer jobs for Canadians and a greater flow of energy dividends and capital out of Canada.

Finally and most dramatically, if the North American free trade agreement is implemented and thereafter for so long as it remains in place, no government will ever again be allowed to reintroduce foreign ownership restrictions in the Canadian energy industry.

Taking this point by point, what does this bill actually do? Under existing law in Canada, oil and gas licences in areas of federal jurisdiction on the so-called Canada lands are granted only to Canadian citizens, permanent residents or companies, the shares of which are at least 50 per cent Canadian owned. If this bill passes, these restrictions will be scrapped. Canadian citizenship or Canadian ownership would cease to be a consideration in the issuance of licences to extract Canadian oil and gas on these lands.

The only remaining requirement for a non-Canadian company would be a mere formality. That company must file a few papers to ensure that it is incorporated in Canada. That is it. Obviously the long-standing Canadian policy of attempting to increase Canadian ownership and control in the Canadian petroleum industry is killed once and for all by this bill.

We must ask ourselves why the government is making this change. The government claims it is giving up this control in our industry to make it easier for petroleum companies operating in Canada to raise investment capital. In what was to be the first of a two-stage change, the then minister of energy announced on March 25, 1992 that the government would "no longer prohibit the sale of Canadian controlled upstream oil and gas companies to foreign investors". He claimed that the long-standing federal policy of 50 per cent Canadian ownership of our upstream oil and gas industry "restricts the free flow of capital into Canada's oil and gas industry" and that the requirements elimination "will enable industry to gain access to additional sources of capital which it sorely needs".

He added: "By lifting restrictions on the sources of investment capital, we expect that it should enhance exploration and development of Canada's oil and gas resources. The ultimate result will be growth in Canadian oil and gas production."

Evidence indicates that the change is unlikely to be much help to the Canadian energy industry. Economist Campbell Watkins, a member of the International Association of Energy Economics, was quoted in the March 25, 1992 Canadian Press article to the effect that allowing increased foreign investment was unlikely to spur investment in the Canadian oil patch. As he put it: "We can free up the rules but don't expect a flood of foreign capital. It's not as if there's a great pent-up supply of foreign capital just waiting to push into Canada".

Even the former minister of energy has admitted publicly that the change was unlikely to have dramatic positive effects for the Canadian industry. On April 1, 1992 he told the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources that he had been very careful when he announced the new policy. As he put it: "I did not say at any time that I expected there would be a great rush of capital into Canada because of the changed policy".

One week later, describing the likely impact on investment in the energy industry he told the same committee: "I never said that it would be an instantaneous cure-all or that it would be a cure-all at any time." In fact, not only was the government unable to point to any significant benefit which it anticipated in consequence of the change, it apparently did not even study the likely effects of the change before announcing it.

During a briefing on the change conducted a year ago last March, energy department officials indicated that no assessment of the effects of this policy change had been undertaken in the department prior to the minister's announcement on March 25, 1992. When I asked the then minister about this in the energy standing committee he said: "I cannot tell you, Mr. Harvey, what assessment there will be on new investment."

There is no solid evidence that eliminating restrictions on foreign ownership and control will result in improvements in the financial outlook of Canada's petroleum industry. In fact, a major report on the profitability of Canada's upstream oil and gas industry, commissioned by the Canadian Petroleum Association, itself dominated by U.S. owned and controlled companies, did not highlight these ownership restrictions. Instead, the Powerwest report indicated that the main reasons for upstream industries' poor financial performance were, and I quote from a September 17, 1991 CPA/IPAC news release: "Low oil and gas prices, the maturity of the Canadian western sedimentary basin, rapidly rising costs of production, a provincial royalty system designed for a different era, high interest rates and high exchange rates". You will search their release in vain for the slightest mention of ownership requirements.

Clearly the Conservative suggestion that foreign ownership restrictions significantly hobble the industry are wrong. Other problems, including profitability in this era of deregulated, artificially low prices are much more important. Recent experience in Canada bears this out.

For example, even though the Conservatives are allowing every penny of the money raised in their shameful sale of our former public energy company, Petro-Canada, to be diverted from the public coffers back into the company, the second tranche of shares was widely seen to be a flop. Even given the Conservative get back the money you paid guarantee to any investors who would buy these shares, the investors just were not buying.

Similarly, even though no foreign ownership restrictions apply to the Hibernia project, and even though the federal Conservatives are subsidizing the project and thus are subsidizing American companies and consumers by over $3 billion, the government had to kick in another $300 million taxpayers' dollars before it could get another private company to invest in the project.

Foreign ownership restrictions are not hobbling the industry any more than they were hobbling Hibernia. In fact, eliminating these restrictions could simply increase the degree to which foreign controlled petroleum companies are able to cash out or sell their assets to other foreign firms—the name Li Ka Shing hovers gently in the background—and move the operations and the jobs that they provide out of Canada.

This change will increase foreign control. I know of no one who disputes the contention that this bill, together with Bill C-89 and the elimination of the oil and gas ownership policy, will increase the degree of foreign control in Canada's oil and gas industry, mainly through corporate takeovers. There is no other long-term impact that it can possibly have. That is its intent. The anticipated increased foreign control may eventually cost Canada billions of dollars.

Data compiled by Canada's petroleum monitoring agency over the last 12 years indicate that the high degree of foreign control in Canada's petroleum industry has made problems in that industry much worse. These data show that Canadian control in our oil and gas industry builds that Canadian industry; whereas foreign control and ownership in the industry bleeds the Canadian energy industry. Do not take my word for it. Just refer to the data compiled by the PMA.

Between 1980 and 1991 foreign-controlled oil and gas companies exported over $26.8 billion net from Canada. That is after all the investments, all of the drilling, all of the infrastructure construction and all of the investments of these companies in Canada, they still exported a net $26.8 billion, more than two times the size of Alberta's Heritage Savings Trust Fund. That money extracted from Canada will never again be available to create jobs in Canada. By comparison, during the same period Canadian-owned and controlled companies generated a significant $2.1 billion net inflow; $2.1 billion to create new jobs, to invest in new exploration and development. That is the signal difference between the two: foreign control and ownership cost the country money; domestic control and ownership bring money into the country.

Canadian control also means greater reinvestment which generally means more jobs for Canadians. From 1981 to 1990 Canadian controlled companies reinvested 94 per cent of their $34.8 billion cash flow. By contrast, foreign controlled companies reinvested only 77 per cent of their $49.1 billion cash flow. Ninety-four per cent by the Canadian controlled companies, 77 per cent by the American controlled—I am sorry, Madam Speaker, they are not all American, just principally American-controlled companies.

You do not need to be a rocket scientist to figure out the divergence here. The logical conclusion is inescapable: Any government that is interested in maintaining and increasing jobs and development in Canada should do everything in its power to increase Canadian control in the petroleum industry. Attempting to treat problems in the industry by encouraging even more foreign ownership and control, as this bill does, amounts to treating the symptoms with an even bigger dose of the disease.

The late and well-respected New Democrat, Tommy Douglas, said it well in the House of Commons on November 15, 1978, and I quote from that year's Hansard, page 1169:

> The choice in this country is whether or not we are going to develop the petroleum resources of Canada for the benefit of the Canadian people, or whether we are going to continue to be the economic colony in which our vital energy resources are owned and controlled by foreign multinational corporations.

Doubtless some members will object. Canadian ownership and control in the Canadian petroleum industry is increasing right now, regardless of the change in the government's policy and regardless of the anticipated effects of the bill. It is true that Canadian control of the upstream industry has risen from its 1988 nadir of 37.6 per cent of upstream revenues to 42.8 per cent in 1991. Over the same period Canadian ownership of upstream revenues has risen from 42.1 per cent to 45.2 per cent. Both are still down from the mid-1980s highs of 49 per cent control in 1986 and 47.9 per cent ownership in 1985, but the trend is upward.

A similar trend can be seen in combined upstream and downstream revenues, control and ownership which now stand at 38 per cent and 45.5 per cent Canadian respectively. So what's the problem? The problem is ruinously low asset value.

The reason Canadian control and ownership are nudging upward at present is that foreign-controlled, principally American transnationals are literally cashing out their holdings, especially in the western sedimentary basin. They are selling what they can, taking the money and running to the sunnier and more profitable climes of Indonesia, Burma and elsewhere as enumerated by the member for Edmonton Southeast.

As Canadian oil patch workers have discovered, it is hard to compete with slave labour and dictatorial governments that have no interest of their own people whatsoever. However, I suggest that advising the Canadian government to adopt similar policies is hardly what is required.

The reason the transnationals are cashing out their holdings in the western sedimentary basin is because the price for the product is too low. Recent happy talk about a possible doubling of the price of natural gas notwithstanding, the facts are that the California public utilities commission remains in place and active, competition with massive cheap pools of Mexican gas is foreseeable and Canada remains locked into the so-called market price strait-jacket of the free trade agreement. Simply put, transnationals can make more money elsewhere, thank you very much.

Canadian juniors and independents are therefore buying up the assets put up for sale by the transnationals. This has two effects. First, it nudges Canadian ownership and control figures upward. Second, it ensures a further drain of capital from the oil patch and thus from Canada. This will remain the case so long as American dominated commodity prices remain low and asset values thus remain depressed.

But just let another oil price shock happen or a significant energy commodity shortage develop in North America and prices will rise once again, drawing asset values up with them. Once again Canada will find itself in the position it held before control and ownership policies were brought in in the first place: wide open to opportunistic foreign corporate penetration of our energy industry.

There you have it. Take your pick of two possible Tory futures for the Canadian petroleum industry. You either get increased Canadian ownership and control of depressed value assets or you get renewal of foreign ownership and control of high value assets.

These are the people who style themselves as shrewd businessmen? It would be hilarious if it were not so pathetic.

I had hoped to turn to the question of why this particular bill at this particular time but I suspect, looking at the clock, that I am shortly to run out of time. Let me just say that in his speech on this bill my colleague, the hon. member for Windsor—Essex, will address the substance of the charge that this is a free trade related bill and that it represents a complete capitulation to the demands of the Americans, demands that were made prior to the 1988 FTA and were put into the 1988 American legislation.

What this bill means simply put, encapsulated, is that free trade claims another victim. The government prepares passage of a bill allegedly intended to address a Canadian problem which does not in fact exist. It seeks adoption of a law which can have no long-term effect that is not harmful to the Canadian economy. It does so in the interests of a group of foreign-based, transnational corporations which feel no more loyalty to Canada and the Canadian people than they do to whatever denizens may reside on the fourth moon of Jupiter.

In the happy but ever less likely event that there will continue to be citizens of an independent Canada in the future, they will marvel, incredulous, at the end of term machinations of this pathetic assembly of tin-pot ideologues, quislings, and incompetents.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the member, because he and I sit on the energy committee together, where does he think there is a good foreign control law around the world that would please him?

For example, does the members like the situation in Mexico where under the proposed NAFTA Pemex, the state oil monopoly, would continue to have a monopoly on all risk activities for oil and gas? Is that what he thinks Canada should do? Does he think that kind of a policy would attract foreign investment to our oil sands which, as he knows as an Albertan, represent the best hope for the next 20, 30, 40 years? Would he like to see that kind of a policy, which our limp-wristed negotiators for Canada negotiated with NAFTA, for this country? Does he think that would help his constituents?

The member gets up and tells us that his is the 14th poorest riding in the entire country. Does he think it would create jobs for young people in his riding, oil geologists or people who work on service rigs, if we were to go to the Pemex model which negotiators for Canada and the United States have somehow, for reasons which escape me, agreed to?

What century, what planet does he think he is living in today when Venezuela and the former Soviet Union, the Russian federation, are all opening their doors as fast as they can to compete for scarce capital?

Does he think that his policy will be a way to get the Japanese or the Taiwanese to come and build a new oil sands plant? Does he think his policy, which is out of some distant ideological age and he is the one that mentioned ideology, would bring jobs and prosperity to Canada and would create wealth in Canada?

I would be grateful to have his comments.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, the distant ideological age, which I take as reference for the purpose of these discussions, was the period from 1975 to 1982. As the hon. member will know, at that time Alberta was booming, employment was growing at rates that were causing severe social dislocation, and it was good times from one end of town to the other.

What were the characteristics of that age? What differentiated it from the circumstances we have now? The answers are fairly easily determined. They include regulated pricing and Canadian ownership requirements.

I would think that having taken the trouble to cross the floor from the government party to the Official Opposition Liberal Party he would know this. The answers include an activist federal government which determined that Canadian energy resources were to be developed in the interest of the Canadian people.

Apparently all of those lessons are to be jettisoned. All of that history is to be ignored in favour of a brave new world of transnational capital that invites us all to the great human foot race to the bottom. It invites every nation there is, every people on the planet and every individual on the planet to line up at the starting line and begin running down into successive basements of wages, regulations, environmental and labour standards, and human degradation that we can find.

I am sorry but I ain't running. My party ain't running. To the degree that we have anything to say about it, the Canadian people ain't running.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I listened to my hon. friend. It is really kind of sad because while there is a lot of ideology spewing out of his mouth there is not a lot of sense. If he would compare the facts to the statements that he has just made he would realize that what he has said is absolute garbage. However, that was not the purpose for which I stood up to speak. I just wanted to make that point because I could not accept the garbage that he just put on the floor of the House right now.

The member called this a free trade bill and said that this bill was designed by the Americans and was subject to the requirements of the Americans that were in the original free trade agreement.

I listened to my hon. friend from the Liberal Party, and while I did not quite hear him say that he is going to support this bill the way he was speaking and addressing my friend from Edmonton from the New Democratic Party indicated to me that he is in favour. I am not sure whether he speaks for his party, but he is in favour of it.

• (1635)

If that is the case, the Liberal Party is against the free trade agreement, it is against the North American free trade agreement and yet it is in favour of this bill. So how can this piece of legislation be a product of the free trade agreement?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I must confess that I am indebted to the hon. Minister for International Trade for putting that question. The answer clearly is obvious. He is correct when he says that it is logically impossible to oppose both this bill and the free trade agreement.

We have not had a vote on the free trade agreement in this House yet, but I assume we are going to have a vote on this bill pretty soon. I suspect that the Liberal Party will vote in favour of this bill. At least that is how I interpret the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

I would suggest that will provide a very fair indication of the Liberal Party's true position with regard to both the North American free trade agreement and the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

As for the spewing of ideological garbage, let me try to spew a wee bit more ideological garbage: $26.8 billion net exported from the country, $2.1 billion net imported to the country. Those are the respective records of the foreign-owned and controlled companies from 1980 to 1991 and the Canadian-owned and controlled companies 1980 to 1991. If that is ideological garbage then I am pleased to be an ideological garbage collector.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, would the member tell us how many people in his constituency work in the oil-servicing industry, the oil industry, or in part of its activities within his constituency? Would he also tell us whether he thinks that if this bill passes it will result in less employment in Edmonton East?

My party has now sold more than 3,000 Liberal memberships in order to nominate a candidate, and I am happy to say that three of the nominees are women, to run against this member.

Does the member think that it will help or hinder his constituency if this measure passes?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, to answer the hon. member's first question, I am sorry but I cannot report with any accuracy how many residents of Edmonton East work in or are associated with the petroleum industry in its production and exploration guises. My guess is, and it is only a guess, that the number is somewhere around 2,000 to 3,000. I can say that there are fewer, by several times, than there were a decade ago. I would suggest that there are fewer, by several times, than there were even seven years ago.

As is the case everywhere else in Alberta, deregulation has slaughtered employment in my riding. For that reason I remain unequivocally opposed to deregulation. The cost in human terms in Alberta has been immense.

As to whether I think this bill will help or harm the people in my riding, I think in the near term it will have no immediate street level effect one way or the other. I see no evidence of there being a pent-up demand by would-be foreign investors in the Canadian oil patch slathering and pounding at the door to get in.

The one major recent example we have had of new foreign investment was Murphy Oil going into Hibernia and it had to be bribed to do it. No, it will have no short-term consequences one way or the other. In the long term, and especially if asset values recover, it will have the effect of causing even greater net capital export from the country. If he thinks that is a good idea then he is by all means welcome to vote with the government in favour of this bill.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I said that I was not sure what the position of the Liberal Party is because my friend from Edmonton did not state whether it was going to support this particular piece of legislation. However, I must say that I listened in absolute amazement to the extraordinary hypocrisy that was spouted by the member from Edmonton. It has not taken him long to change his colours. It took just a short period of time, from when he left this party to the time that he slid in with the Liberal Party, to forget the past totally.

If the member read the piece of work that he just presented to the House he would probably be embarrassed. First of all, he was very critical of the foreign investment policy of this government. He is now supporting a party which introduced the National Energy Program, which he was opposed to when he was on this side of the House. He is now supporting the party that introduced the Foreign Investment Review Agency, which he was opposed to when he was on this side of the House. He is also now supporting a party that voted against the changes to the National Energy Program and the changes which transformed the Foreign Investment Review Agency to Investment Canada, which we made. Unfortunately, he has had to leave the House because he cannot stand the truth in his ears right now.

The member then talked about the high levels of debt. Here again he is supporting the party that eight times in the last four years voted against spending control bills that this government has introduced.

The member is supporting a leader who said in a very proud way in a speech a few days ago, which he called a policy speech and that is an oxymoron in itself, that he was Doctor No of the Liberal Party when he was President of the Treasury Board. We checked back to when he was President of the Treasury Board and we have a quote in which he said how proud he was to be the President of the Treasury Board that held back the increase in government spending to only 26 per cent. He is Doctor No. What would we have had if he was an easy spending guy, if he was Doctor Yes?

The member then talked about the high Canadian dollar and the high interest rate policy that he claims this government has been following. Everything that we have introduced to try to bring interest rates down, whether control of inflation, control of spending, deficit control, or all those things that are designed to bring down the level of interest rates which he is opposed to, that party voted against.

The member stood there and flailed away at this government for the policy that we are changing today and that is the same party that introduced the policy that we are changing today.

This man, who was the Judas of the Conservative Party when he went over to the Liberal Party, today stood up with a holier than thou attitude and said: "I am going to protect my constituents, and this government on the other side of the House did not have the courage to protect the oil and gas industry in Canada". He has just flipped right around and changed—

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I take as a personal affront the comment of the hon. minister with regard to the member from Edmonton and the use of the word Judas. I think we are above that kind of thing, or at least some of us in this House are.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do agree that we should keep the level of debate on a higher—

Ms. Clancy: I agree, Madam Speaker.

Ms. Blondin-Andrew: Keep a civil tongue in your mouth, Michael. It is very unbecoming for a minister.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the level of debate on both sides of the House should be a little higher at this point. The hon. minister has the floor.

• (1645)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I have been on the government side of the House for eight and a half years and not once since I have been on this side of the House have I heard a question asked from members opposite as to when we are going to change the policy that is in the bill that is before us today. Yet we hear this man standing and criticizing us for being so slow when he is a member of the party that did everything it could to pillage the oil and gas industry in western Canada that is extremely important to that part of the country. It is unbelievable to listen to the stuff that he is talking about here.

Bill C-89 proposes three amendments that are designed to address some specific problems in the Investment Canada Act that was passed in 1985 by this House. It was opposed for a lot of broad reasons by the party opposite, none of which had anything to do with the—

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member from Essex—Windsor.

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, if the minister would check, I think that we are presently debating Bill C-106 which is not the bill to which he just referred in talking about the various amendments which are being made to the Investment Canada Act. I think he will note that that is the next piece of legislation slated for debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will allow me to listen to what is said and to rule on the relevancy. The hon. minister.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my understanding is that the legislation that we are debating now is the Investment Canada Act. Am I correct on that?

Mr. Kilgour: No, you are not.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Then I apologize. I will withhold my brilliant remarks and let my facts stand on what I heard the hon. member from Edmonton saying just previously on the hypocritical position he was taking on policies that this government supports and that the member is supporting on the other side of the House.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I have to say first of all that it is a little hard to take the minister's extreme statements with respect to the member from Edmonton seriously when the minister did not even have a sense of what bill it was that we were debating here in the House of Commons.

I did want to ask the minister how he can possibly stand up in this House and say that it makes sense to open up further the foreign ownership restrictions which he himself signed in an exchange of letters with James Baker as part of the free trade arrangement back in 1988. How can it make sense to open up those restrictions further in view of the fact, brought out so forcefully by my colleague the member for Edmonton East, that this country has had a net loss over the past 10 years of something in the order of $26 billion in outflows as a consequence of the foreign ownership that presently exists. At the same time Canadian-controlled corporations are resulting, in the case of oil and gas, in a net inflow of $2.1 billion.

How can a minister who is concerned with our economic position and the access to capital that we have as a country to such capital for jobs for our future and for industrial development for which he is responsible stand up and say that it makes sense to make it easier to have foreign-owned firms when their record is so abysmally worse than the Canadian-controlled companies with respect to keeping capital in this country and creating jobs in this country for the future?

• (1650)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his question and his earlier interjection.

The numbers, as I recall, show a reinvestment of 94 per cent and a reinvestment by Canadian-owned companies of 77 per cent.

Mr. Langdon: Foreign-controlled?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) Yes, by foreign-controlled.

Mr. Langdon Of cash flow?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) Yes, of cash flow.

My hon. friend I think realizes that when foreign capital comes in it brings with it much more than just cash. It brings with it technology. If that foreign capital had not come to Canada that technology would not have developed to nearly the extent of the industry that we have today. That is whether it is on the conventional side of the industry or in the heavy oil side of the industry.

My friend from Edmonton is shaking his head. I do not know whether there are flies running around him but if he could listen carefully he would understand that the discovery just south of his riding in Leduc was made by a foreign-owned company. That was the start of the Canadian industry in Canada. Now he is nodding his head in approval.

The industry then developed considerably from there principally upon the resources of the foreign-owned companies and the technology that they brought with them. As those companies developed the Canadian industry, Canadian-owned companies were spun off from the U.S. companies and resulted in a very strong Canadian industry today whether it is in the exploration and development industry or the oil-servicing sector.

It is in the oil-servicing sector that we have had a real success story because it is there that those companies are able to go and sell their technology and generate jobs for Canadian companies in other markets.

If we did not have the foreign-owned companies to start all this, then we would have been starting way back and would not have had nearly the development that he enjoys in his city of Edmonton right today.

One does not get that capital for nothing. There has to be a return on that capital and it is this disparity that is in effect in part the return on that capital, but one does not get something for nothing. Maybe the NDP always thinks that one can get something and that there is a free lunch, but in fact there is not. I think my hon. friend would believe that if he would be straight with the House.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, it is interesting that the hon. member who just spoke talked about free lunches because earlier on he was chastising another member from Edmonton for his failure to support expenditure control legislation that had been introduced in this House.

What I wanted to raise with the minister was the fact that on so many occasions when he was the minister in charge he—and now his successor—refused to do anything in response to the many questions that I placed in this House about free lunches.

There is such a thing as a free lunch or a freer lunch or a cheap lunch if you happen to be a business person and you can take advantage of the business and entertainment tax deduction in this country that costs the Canadian people and the Canadian taxpayers $1 billion a year.

Over the years we raised this and we have always been met with the argument that we could not do anything about this because we had to remain competitive with the United States. I understand that some move may now be in the offing in the United States to change that particular tax deduction there and that excuse will disappear. It will be interesting to see what response the government has to that.

Again, with respect to the member's own remarks about expenditure restraint, I wonder if the minister would care to comment on the article by Mr. Peter Meyers that maintains that the capital gains tax exemption was the biggest budget goof in Canadian history and that the member who just spoke was responsible for this biggest budget goof in Canadian history. The total price tag, this article argues, for this tax break already exceeds $20 billion and says that at least $14 billion of it was totally wasted and squandered randomly to what has amounted to a taxpayer-financed lottery.

I am talking about the $500,000 lifetime capital gains tax exemption which was supposed to stimulate investment, but which covered such a broad range of things that it amounted to a windfall profit for—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I imagine the hon. minister will choose to answer, but I must tell the hon. member that we are a long way from Bill C-106 and Bill C-89 for that matter. The hon. minister.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I do not think I will comment on the relevancy question. I will leave that to you and your responsibilities.

On the question of the exemption for entertainment, there are some changes that are being proposed in the United States. If in fact there are changes that affect the competitive position of the Canadian industry then that will provide some flexibility for the Minister of Finance and it will be up to him to decide whether or not he wishes to maintain a competitive advantage for Canadian industry relative to their counterparts in the United States or change that. That is something he might address to the Minister of Finance in anticipation of his budget in a month's time.

The other point that the hon. member has raised is a question of the capital gain exemption. I have not read the article that my hon. friend refers to but the purpose of this proposal was simply to encourage Canadians to invest in the country. It was focused essentially on small businesses and farmers where there is a $500,000 exemption. All the rest is $100,000 exemption. My hon. friend knows that was restricted somewhat by the Minister of Finance in his last budget.

The analysis that my hon. friend neglects is that there were benefits brought about by that incentive by people putting their money into the country, creating jobs, creating new technology and creating exports and in that way increasing economic activity. The economic impact of that is not taken into account by any analysis that my hon. friend would quote. Since he is only giving me a one-sided conclusion, clearly I have to reject that conclusion.

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity today to speak on Bill C-106, the legislation that will eliminate restrictions on the foreign ownership of oil and gas production on frontier lands which are lands north of 60 and offshore areas controlled by the federal government.

I have a personal interest in this bill and I am sure that my constituents who are watching would like this bill and other bills related to the territories to be treated with the seriousness and the concern that they feel about it. I do not think it is a laughing matter or necessarily to be so partisanly imbued.

Having said that I would like to deal with some of the direct issues that pertain to this bill. I think it will have a direct consequence and impact on my riding of Western Arctic and on the Northwest Territories generally.

Bill C-106 will bring further frontier lands into line with conventional lands in Canada, which as of March 25, 1992 are no longer subject to the maintenance of the requirement of the goal of 50 per cent Canadian ownership in the oil and gas sector.

I have to say that with bills I have the opportunity to speak to I have some caution and reservation in approaching various bills because I think it is a very complicated process. I think that to just throw oneself at the foot of any bill in approval is rather silly and irresponsible.

I have reservations about this bill. Particularly, I have reservations about wooing foreign investment. This is due to the lack of real investment by the federal government in its own country and in its own industrial base and in particular, in the companies and corporations that represent Canada.

Bill C-106 is guaranteed to affect a number of regions in the north. I am thinking in particular about the areas which have the most oil and gas activity. For example, there is Norman Wells in my area of the Sahtu region of the Northwest Territories. It is an area that will not only be very much impacted by this but it is also currently struggling with land claims. In the final stages of having its claims ratified, there was one area in which it was particularly interested in obtaining a deal with the government. It was perhaps to have some of the revenues flow from those particular wells in Norman Wells through the claims provision to the people. But that was not meant to be. I would say that there might be some redirection of the government's efforts to make those kinds of accommodations in the future.

In Inuvik, the Mackenzie delta, this area is known for its willing participation in the oil and gas industry. In fact the National Energy Board hearings were held in Inuvik. Many people participated and expressed their concerns as well as their support. This area has been very much involved in the oil and gas industry for a number of years. In the Beaufort region, Tuktoyaktuk and some of the other communities have had in years past much activity and much human and financial investment.

Benefits have accrued from those activities to the communities. It has resulted in a number of different activities that the communities have engaged in because of the benefits that have accrued from the oil and gas activities in and around that area.

In the high Arctic we have Panarctic Oils Ltd. which has put a face to its business through the work it has done with the locals as well as with other Canadians who have taken an interest in working under those conditions.

I have a few concerns in relation to these areas and regions which will be highly impacted by Bill C-106.

I would also like to mention in particular that in dealing with any bill in the House, what comes to mind generally is the whole issue of aboriginal land claims. The impact that Bill C-106 will have on aboriginal land claims north of 60 is still not certain at this time.

Any oil and gas project development will require the support and approval of the aboriginal First Nations in the region: the Inuvialuit, the Gwich'in, the Dene-Métis, the Sahtu. Also within the area of the Cameron Hills oil development activities we have the treaty eight looking at a land adhesion treaty.

Support for the development projects will depend upon a number of requirements which would have to be met accordingly, one being the ability for aboriginal peoples to profit to some extent from the venture. That bears in mind a very controversial issue.

I look at the whole issue of Lubicon where there are absolutely no provisions made for those revenues to go back to the people of that area. What in fact has been happening is the multinational corporations are extracting over $1 million each day from Lubicon land. The Daishowa paper company has been clear-cutting on Lubicon land since 1990. This development is destroying the environment and has killed the Lubicon traditional economy of hunting and trapping and has forced these people on to welfare.

Maybe in addition to getting approval for this bill, this government could look at some provisions for putting in trust royalties which would force the government back to the table on these particular issues.

• (1705)

It is highly unfair to have the environment of the aboriginal people more or less pillaged and impacted on severely. We could say that any new development includes prospects for the creation of directly and indirectly related local employment opportunities as well as education initiatives and job training programs for local residents. This is to prevent an influx of highly skilled foreign workers displacing the opportunities there for local people.

Co-management projects to determine socio-economic and environmental impacts in reviews will have to be undertaken. To what extent future oil and gas development will affect wildlife in the environment in the region will have to be considered.

Environmental assessments and mechanisms thereof have to be in place. For example, the U.S. $12 billion pipeline project to ship Arctic gas from the Mackenzie delta to the gulf of Alaska will have to undergo a full co-management review by the Inuvialuit and the Gwich'in, both of whom have already settled their land claims in the Northwest Territories.

As a member of Parliament I have the responsibility to represent all of my constituents in Western Arctic. Therefore, while there are major proponents that are very pro-development the issue of land claimants and the land titles question as well as the issue of security of supply are still major concerns that cannot be dismissed.

Those must not be dismissed. We can look perhaps to amendments in those areas on future debates in relationship to this bill. They are very serious concerns and they must be dealt with. They must not be dealt with in a casual or cavalier manner. Therefore in taking every precaution to ensure that all parties are fairly represented and benefit by Bill C-106, there should be a mechanism put in place that would provide for consultation and assessment of socio-economic and environmental impacts. An amendment to Bill C-106 would address this concern.

I am confident that in supporting this bill the best interests of northerners will be served. However, I must say that due to the lack of internal investment by this government on the oil and gas industry we must revert to reducing the Canadianization restriction. This is in the hope that multinational companies will support new oil and gas initiatives in the north and the high Arctic that the Canadian government and Canadian companies have not been able to.

In relationship to that I would not be surprised to see the government go elsewhere to look at foreign investors to build our infrastructure. I think that is clearly an abdication of its responsibility to Canadian citizens living in the far reaches of this country.

I would hope that the long-term benefits for the north as a result of this bill will be great. I hope they will give the north that much needed boost in its regional economy. The north has suffered like other regions of this country due to the length and intensity of the recession.

I am very proud to say that a revitalized oil and gas industry north of 60 would be good for the Arctic and would also be good for the rest of Canada. The long-term effects of northern development would have a positive impact on the industrial base of Canada. It would increase the demand for industrial goods and services. Most important, it would create jobs and the demand for goods and services in the north.

Regionally this means more northern employment. It means more financial independence for the territorial governments' improvements to northern infrastructure and services and means more opportunities, not all but more, because the government has to do its share for native organizations.

However these benefits will not be assured to northerners until outstanding agreements with the federal government on the northern accord and outstanding land claims are resolved.

The treaty land claims in the Deh Cho as well as the Sahtu and Dogrib land claims and outstanding claims in the Yukon must be resolved. In order to resolve these claims, the financial resources must be made available to fund resource management boards. They cannot be boards in name only. They must have the resources to be able to do the job they have been mandated to do.

The northern accord is critical for the transfer of legislative responsibility for managing and regulating on-shore oil and gas resources to the government of the Northwest Territories and for the sharing of oil and gas revenues.

As a result of the delay in transferring this power northern oil and gas development activities and much needed employment opportunities are being sacrificed and lost.

The provisions of the accord will allow northerners to more effectively control and manage the resources locally rather than by remote agencies in Ottawa.

In conclusion, I believe that Bill C-106 will offer new development opportunities for Canada north of 60. However, for this new development to have encouraging results the government must first carry through on outstanding commitments to aboriginal groups and the Government of the Northwest Territories. In doing so, northern and aboriginal Canadians would be able to reap the full socio-economic benefits resulting from Bill C-106 of the prospect of increased and renewed oil and gas development north of 60 as they are rightly entitled to.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member. I took it from those remarks that it is her intention to support the bill. I very much hope she will correct me if I am wrong in that assumption, but that is at least what I inferred from her remarks.

I must say the two spokespeople thus far who addressed the bill on behalf of the Liberal Party have been wonderfully measured in their remarks, skilfully so I would say.

During the course of the hon. member's remarks she mentioned a number of amendments she would like to see made to the bill, presumably in committee. She mentioned such things as guarantees for benefits, local community development and that sort of thing.

I was wondering if she has taken the step of at least attempting to determine the degree to which the amendments she would like to see to the bill would be deemed to be within the scope of the bill and thus in order. I must admit that given what I understand of the bill, and I have been through it in some detail, virtually everything she mentioned would necessarily be deemed outside the bill's scope. Thus they would not be admissible as amendment either in committee or in the report stage debate on the bill in the House.

I would very much hope she could say that I am wrong on this point. The proposals she makes are very good ones and certainly ones that will enjoy the support of this caucus. However, again I would greatly appreciate her informing the House whether or not she has been able to determine that such amendments would be within the scope of the bill.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for his question. It is a good question and one we are currently seized with. We are working on consulting with the energy critic to examine whether these are components that could be put into amendments. I am not ruling out that possibility. I have not reached the point at which my hon. colleague has information that I have not had, or has an eye for the bill that I do not have.

As far as I am concerned, I will continue to push for amendments which would have this particular impact and would address the issues I have mentioned. I do not see any reason why these would be considered outside the bill. I have not reached that stage. My hon. colleague, the energy critic, and I are currently working and consulting on this.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, as well, during the course of her remarks to the House, the member stated quite rightly that the development of petroleum resources in the north could be of great benefit to the people in the north and to the rest of the country.

I would go further and say that as regards natural gas, for example, if the resource in the north is not developed, we in the south are going to be in very difficult straits two to three decades from now. In fact, it is in the national interest that those resources be developed.

Unfortunately, what I know of the petroleum industry, which some of its proponents would say is next to nothing, it seems that the great barrier to development of petroleum resources in the north is not a matter of who owns or controls a given resource company. In other words, it is not a question of foreign or domestic ownership; rather it is a question of price.

Those players in the field now, the petroleum companies active in Canada, simply are not getting a price for the product they are producing now which is sufficient to support the exploration and development of new resources, especially what we know are very expensive frontier resources. I would suggest that in a free market, the current price will preclude northern development for the foreseeable future.

I am wondering what the hon. member would propose as a remedy to the current price regime which will most certainly prevent any development, favourable or unfavourable.

• (1715)

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Madam Speaker, I think any foreign investors take their cue from the government of a country. I would say that if the government demonstrated a keener interest, as past governments have, in the Beaufort delta in investment in the oil and gas industries on lands north of 60, surely that would be a clear message to foreign investors. It would make it more attractive.

Clearly, if the government made it less costly by investing in infrastructure, which has been a major request of the people who live on lands north of 60, that would also help to pressure and perhaps alleviate some of the cost concerns that investors have and would in fact make it more attractive in terms of investment in these lands.

In addition to what has been mentioned, what would also make it much easier for investors to come aground on this particular issue would be if outstanding land claims were resolved and all of the impediments were removed. It is not just the cost. There is a myriad of concerns that face foreign investors.

I must conclude that having done all of this is no guarantee if there is not the political will on the part of the government.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, one of the key points that the member just mentioned in response to the last question was government assistance in infrastructure. I must confess that I am not at all certain what she means by infrastructure.

Let me ask very particularly, is the member suggesting that the government itself build the necessary pipeline or pumping facilities or the necessary roads into drilling areas or the necessary ships for the purpose of offshore drilling and the drilling platforms? What is meant by infrastructure that would benefit from government investment sufficient to bring the production costs down to the point where such production would be economic at today's prices?

Ms. Blondin-Andrew: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has given me a wonderful window of opportunity to express my views on something that northerners are very much in favour of and that is the completion of the Mackenzie highway. That would be one part of the infrastructure that would help to reduce the cost of doing business in oil and gas in the north.

Also, in relation to that, there are huge opportunities across Canada with ports and terminals. I would very much like to see for instance the Coast Guard facility for the Northwest Territories, which is headquartered in B.C., relocated to Hay River, Northwest Territories. It would open up the Mackenzie valley corridor through the Mackenzie River. It would create jobs. It would cause a whole flurry of business activity. It would be great for the service industry.

As well, I would like to see a major port in the area of Tuktoyaktuk. They certainly have the expertise and the willingness. I think that would certainly help to reduce the cost of carrying out oil and gas activity in the north.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, at the start of my comments in this debate let me just remind members and others that what I will be doing is analysing this piece of legislation in what really amounts to the second half of the over-all analysis which was begun by my colleague from Edmonton East.

My colleague outlined very effectively the tremendous outflows of capital which have occurred in the oil and gas industry as a consequence of the excessive foreign control that exists in that industry in this country. He finished with the question: Why, given this excessive haemorrhaging of the country, would a government bring forward a bill such as this?

One reason is that the Conservatives themselves have never apparently fully appreciated the significant harm that foreign domination causes. As a result, they have often taken both sides of the question on this issue of foreign ownership and control of the oil and gas industry. As an example of this, I want to quote from two speeches given by two prominent Conservative MPs in the House of Commons on the same day, June 20, 1978.

• (1720)

The member who now represents Calgary Centre as House leader of the government said this: "I was a founding member of the Committee for an Independent Canada and I believe that far too much of our economy is owned by foreigners", and, he says: "precisely it is because the oil industry is owned primarily by foreigners".

An hon. member: Who said that?

Mr. Langdon: That was, believe it or not, the House leader of the Conservative Party, who on other occasions has himself taken quite the opposite view.

What was especially remarkable that particular day was that at the very time that he stated that, his seatmate, a few minutes later, the present Minister of Finance, the member for Vegreville, put the case for domestic control. He put it: "We in Canada may not have the luxury of ownership in this very important sector. The important thing in this ongoing debate about our natural resources is not so much a matter of whether we own them, but more important, a matter of whether we have the capability of controlling the manner in which these resources will be developed".

Ownership and control are clearly intimately related and even the Conservatives know it. Yet the Conservatives do not in this bill seem to recognize that when you give up your capacity to control ownership levels, you lose an important ingredient in the recipe to control the industry that is so important to particular parts of this country, such as Alberta, Saskatchewan, the areas north of 60 and in fact parts of British Columbia and actually parts of my own constituency where oil, believe it or not, is produced these days.

We could suggest a second reason why the government would bring forward this bill. That is because the Conservative Party receives significant amounts of money from some of the very foreign-controlled oil and gas companies that stand to benefit from relaxed controls on foreign ownership in Canada.

In 1991 for instance the Conservative Party received over $20,000 from Amoco Canada and over $49,000 from Imperial Oil Ltd. Still it seems unlikely that pressure from energy companies alone, no matter how much money they give the Conservative Party, would account for the potentially dramatic changes fostered by the bill before us.

There is in fact a third reason. That is the reason to which my colleague has already made reference, the fact that the United States government was and continues to be keenly and actively interested in relaxing Canada's foreign investment rules. In fact, what we have here is a piece of legislation which is part of the NAFTA agreement brought before this House before the NAFTA agreement itself is brought before the House and before the United States has even come to its final conclusions with respect to NAFTA.

In fact, the United States has been pushing very hard for relaxation of our foreign investment rules with respect to oil and gas and the United States has received what it sought in this bill. It has received it at Canada's expense. Perhaps most significantly, it has received it without any return in the shape of some sort of concession on the U.S. side which might in some small way at least make up for this remarkable concession which we have made.

In the case of energy, Canada gave up substantial control of our oil and gas resources in the free trade agreement in 1988. For example, under the FTA the Canadian government gave up the right to cut back on exports to the U.S. while maintaining domestic consumption in Canada. The FTA also made it the right of our government to make sure that Americans paid prices at least as high for our energy commodities as we pay ourselves.

Initially, however, what the FTA did not do was to extend these concessions in the energy sector to the question of ownership. It did not extend the elements which are in the free trade agreement and which give increased benefits for foreign ownership from the United States to the energy sector. In fact, this exemption is set out in an exchange of letters between industry minister Wilson who spoke previously and James Baker who was at that time Secretary of the Treasury, I believe, in the United States. This appears at the very end of the free trade agreement. In fact, the Conservative government in Alberta used this exemption set out in the free trade agreement to try to mollify people concerned about maintaining control of our strategic energy industry. It boasted, for instance, in the tabloid which it produced called Straight Talk on Free Trade. Perhaps it should have been entitled Doublespeak on Free Trade.

The guidelines on investment in the energy industries have not been changed. That was true with respect to ownership requirements. But that was because the free trade agreement, as we can now see, was just step one in the attempt to get greater American control in our oil and gas industry. Even before the Conservatives had rammed the FTA through Parliament, the U.S. government was busily attempting to gain further concessions.

Each year the U.S. trade representative in Washington issues a report that identifies those measures in other countries which the United States considers unwarranted barriers to trade. Each year since the FTA came into effect, that is from 1989 through 1992, this report, entitled National Trade Estimate Report of Foreign Trade Barriers has made specific and pointed objections to Canada's energy investment rules.

There is even more direct evidence of U.S. pressure. U.S. President Reagan transmitted to Congress on July 25, 1988 a document entitled Statement of Administrative Action. This document which I quote from describes "significant administrative actions proposed to implement the FTA". Here is what it says about Canada's energy investment rules. In other words, this is what at the very start of the free trade deal the U.S. government was aiming to get from the free trade agreement's aftermath, and I quote: "The administration is committed to further liberalization in the field of investment. Subsection 304(a) of the implementing bill authorizes the President to negotiate an agreement with Canada on the liberalization of investment rules. Subsection 304(b)(2) sets out the objectives of further negotiation on this subject, including 'extension of the principles of the agreement to energy'."

In other words right at the start the American government was seeking as one of its key goals through further negotiations involving the free trade agreement to get rid of those very restrictions within the free trade agreement which maintained the oil and gas ownership restrictions on the energy sector. In fact, a law putting into effect this U.S. commitment to further changes was in place by September 28, 1988. That was nearly two months before the federal election took place in Canada which ended up approving the free trade agreement.

Section 304 of that law passed in 1988 states: "The President is authorized to enter into negotiations with the Government of Canada for the purpose of concluding an agreement to liberalize investment rules". It goes on to indicate that liberalization of investment rules should include "the extension of the principles of the agreement to energy to the extent such industries are not currently covered by the agreement".

There you have it. The U.S. government stated very clearly that one of its ongoing negotiating objectives on investment was the extension of the principles of the free trade agreement into other fields to the energy sector.

Despite the exchange of letters which our Minister of Finance at that time, the Minister for International Trade and the treasury minister in the United States, Mr. Baker, had appended to the free trade agreement, clearly a con game for the Canadian people was taking place, a con game which suggested to those of us in Canada that the energy industry was going to be exempt and this could be carried forward into the free trade election. People in Alberta could be told, people across the country could be told, energy has been safeguarded. Yet at that very same time the American government had already made clear in law that it intended to seek the elimination of those safeguards for our energy industry. The Americans were successful. The Conservative government abandoned our foreign ownership provisions and that is what this bill is about.

It is what is in this bill. It is also in the bill that the Conservatives have before the House, Bill C-89, which we will be debating later, to amend the Investment Canada Act.

This abandonment coincides exactly with the objectives that the United States had. Many Canadians are going to be shocked to learn that not only was this something which was taking place under U.S. law but in fact this was not an isolated example.

There have been all sorts of other areas in which the United States had set out its objectives for what it wanted to get further under the free trade agreement and which this government and Canada has subsequently put into affect.

The con game operated not just with respect to those supposed exemptions for energy appended to the free trade agreement on which Canadians when they voted in 1988 felt were somehow real. They were not real. Various other commitments which Canadians felt were there in the free trade agreement on the part of Canada were not really commitments to which this government had any real respect, any real commitment to honour.

• (1735)

For example, section 304(a)(2) of the United States bill pressed for changes to the eastern Canadian transportation rates, and the Conservatives acquiesced to this through Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act. It received Royal Assent November 26, 1991.

The Conservatives have gone further. They announced they will soon make other changes that the Americans want, this time to the Western Grain Transportation Act.

Similarly, section 304(c)(1) of the U.S. legislation calls for negotiations with Canada to increase the minimum North American content limits on automotive products from 50 per cent to at least 60 per cent. Canada's chief NAFTA negotiator announced in August 1992 that Canada had acquiesced to that demand as well and the new limit is 62.5 per cent.

Section 304(b)(3) of the U.S. law calls for improved protection of so-called intellectual property rights. The Conservatives again have acquiesced by ramming through this Parliament Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, forcing Canadians to pay more for prescription drugs, which are costing them hundreds of millions of dollars each year in higher health costs.

All of these policies, which sometimes we have called the corporate agenda in Canada, represented not just the corporate agenda in Canada but specifically and laid out in detail the United States government's agenda in Canada.

We have had a government which, not just once but in bill after bill has marched these various demands that the United States wanted through our Parliament. It has marched them through, over our strong-felt, hard fought opposition, without any return whatsoever to Canada as a quid pro quo for these giveaways to the United States.

What we have here is a case of total capitulation which stands out as even more dramatic, given the fact that Mexico's energy industry has been permitted to escape from any similar attack in the NAFTA legislation which the three countries have agreed on.

I would make this last comment. This legislation shows how far our government has capitulated to American interests. The NAFTA legislation which will come before this House in the very near future shows even more fully this capitulation to American and corporate interests. That is why we oppose it. That is why we oppose this legislation as strongly as we do.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I must say that the remarks of the member for Essex—Windsor are particularly instructive and describe the genesis of the bill we have before us today particularly aptly. I cannot help but think that, just as occurred to me, the hon. member found his time expired long before his argument was completed.

I was wondering if I might put to him the following question. Had he unlimited time, what further points would he like to make to the House today?

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for what is for me a particularly welcome comment. I will not take it that I have unlimited time, but there were some final points I had hoped to make with respect to what passage of NAFTA would mean. I would like to put those points before the House if I could.

It is very important to recognize that not only is NAFTA a sign of the same kind of capitulation which this bill represents, but if NAFTA were passed as it presently stands, it would mean that new ownership restrictions would never be allowed in the future in the oil and gas industry.

Careful readers of the North American free trade agreement will note in annex I to NAFTA that a part specifically allows the retention of Canada's existing foreign ownership restrictions with respect to energy. One is driven, if one simply looks at that, to the bizarre conclusion that the government protected this particular part of Canada's sovereignty only to abandon it unilaterally with this bill. The truth, however, is somewhat more depressing. This exemption from the otherwise applicable provisions of NAFTA is almost certainly merely a formality.

In fact, during a February 9 briefing, departmental officials indicated that Canada listed this exemption in the NAFTA agreement because existing foreign ownership restrictions, i.e., those that are still in place until this bill is passed, violated NAFTA and would continue to do so until changed through legislation. Since legislation to achieve conformity with NAFTA could not be passed before the agreement was signed last December 17, that small identifying entry was needed. To our point of view, that rather crucial NAFTA exemption, and it is possible some others that are included in the NAFTA annexes, is merely temporary.

Conservatives in our view have already bargained away this important aspect of Canadian sovereignty. This bill is in front of us because it is an integral part of what this country has really agreed to as part of the NAFTA accord.

In any event, passage of the bill now before us will undermine the perceived need for the NAFTA exemption so we expect the exemption will be withdrawn from the legislation when it finally does come in its final form before the House.

What we have is a set of changes which I have traced, all of them tied to the free trade agreement, all of them tied to the Conservative project of making us a mere continental annex to the United States economy. I have to say this as someone who has studied the past and who believes strongly in the future of this country. But for us to so abjectly follow a series of government priorities set out not by ourselves but by the United States in its own free trade legislation is a sorry commentary on the honesty and forthrightness of this government.

To a significant extent this government has been following a course of action set down for it by President Reagan rather than a course of action dictated by the interests of this country.

We are in a pre-election period. There is much discussion about new leadership and a new generation taking power in the Conservative Party. If this new generation when it takes power in the Conservative Party does not jettison the abject sell-outs this government has presented to the United States over the past four and a half years since the free trade agreement came into effect then we will not have seen the regeneration of the Conservative Party. We will simply have seen a mock charade presented to the people of Canada.

I do not think this House should accept this bill. I hope that some of the leadership candidates in the Conservative caucus will get up and say the same thing because if there is to be any change from what this government has represented in the past, which is capitulation to the United States, then surely it will have to be reflected in a change in the approach that is selling out this important provision which has represented a major step forward in getting more Canadian control and ownership of the oil and gas industry in this country.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, one more question for the hon. member if I may. He remarked at some length on the fact that the exemption the Canadian government entered into the NAFTA treaty in annex one, which allows us now to maintain ownership requirements in the energy industry, will in effect be a nullity after the passage of this bill. It is expected that the exemption thereafter will simply be withdrawn and that annex will be cleansed of that particular exemption.

It is my understanding that once that is the case then never again, so long as the NAFTA is in effect, will Canada be able to restore any level of ownership restriction on energy commodities or indeed on any other form of industrial production.

I would like to ask the hon. member if that is his understanding as well?

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, this simply represents, as my colleague has so aptly stressed to the House, one more means by which the NAFTA and the free trade agreement in effect ties the hands of future Canadian governments. That is one of the reasons that we think it is absolutely crucial that the free trade agreement and the NAFTA become things from which we free ourselves.

We think it is very important, for the freedom of Canadian governments to do what is needed in the future to revive our economy and give us a new sense of direction and dynamism, for us to withdraw from the free trade agreement and not proceed with the NAFTA.

Of course if we do proceed with the NAFTA on January 1, 1994 it will then not be possible under the NAFTA to put new restrictions into place with respect to foreign ownership in any industry in which those restrictions do not at the present time exist. What we would have to do in that case would be to withdraw from the NAFTA itself.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I think it is fortuitous that we are having this kind of debate on March 17, as it is St. Patrick's Day which is a wonderful day not just for the Irish but for all those who wish they were. Nevertheless, as a result of certain events in Canadian political life St. Patrick's Day has unfortunately come to be associated with the relationship that developed between a prominent Irish Canadian and a prominent Irish American, namely, the current and now retiring Prime Minister of Canada and the former President of the United States of America, Ronald Reagan.

All those of us with a certain amount of Irish blood, and I count myself among those, are not able to sing When Irish Eyes are Smiling with quite the same gusto and uncritical enthusiasm with which we used to before the days of the shamrock summit and the spectacle of the Prime Minister and Ronald Reagan singing that wonderful song together.

It is the consequences of that unequal, subordinate relationship that we are debating here today. Either through naivety or evil, or however it came to be, one Prime Minister of this country set out to dismantle and Americanize what had developed into an independent country, not fully but nevertheless much more independent than it had ever been. It was developing into an independent country.

The fact that one Prime Minister could set out to dismantle and Americanize this country will go down in Canadian history, if 100 years from now there is anything called Canadian history and it is not just a sub-chapter in American history, as one of the most heinous political and economic crimes of the age from the point of view of those people who value what has been built up in Canada over the last 125 years.

We have a bill before us which was an open objective of President Reagan at one time, which was an open objective of the Americans for a long time. No other government, no matter how much it might have bent, wove or submitted in some way or another to American will and American power, ever dared to just openly say that whatever it is they want we will give it to them and give it openly, we will give it to them without ambiguity, as a free gift.

That is what we have here in terms of one of the final acts in the complete abandonment of any notion that Canada as a country and as a community should maintain any kind of control over who owns its energy resources.

It is amazing just how much can happen in 10 years. Never let it be said that politics is a long, drawn-out process, that it takes decades to do things.

• (1755)

It may take decades to do good things but it has taken less than a decade to do the very bad thing that has been done to the admirable ideal and the partially realized reality of a Canadian-owned energy industry. Ten years ago it was not treated as if it was some sort of romantic notion but as a partially realized reality, and many people hoped that it might even become more so.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): It was an element of government policy.

Mr. Blaikie: It was an element of government policy.

It is hard to believe just how quickly some of the things that seemed plausible in 1983, which we might want to have improved upon because they had only been taken in half measure, now seem to be completely beyond the pale—to use an expression that I am told has its origins in Dublin and therefore is appropriate for today.

Why is this? We all remember the story, and again it is apropos for today, that when the colonel who owned the factory or the plant in Baie Comeau came to Baie Comeau once or twice a year there was the young lad from Baie Comeau, young Brian, who was always willing and able to sit on the colonel's knee, almost like David for Saul, and sing for the colonel.

The fact is that young lad who sang for the colonel over time developed a choir called the federal Conservative caucus, which has been singing for the colonel. Who is the colonel? The colonel is the symbol of that absentee American landlord. He is the symbol of the Canadian future that has been visited on us in the last eight or nine years and is about to be visited on us even more, thanks to the North American free trade agreement.

The Prime Minister has been singing for the colonel all his life and he developed a choir around him called the Conservative caucus, which has been singing for the colonel these last nine years.

I have always thought that there are two very different views of Canada. That is the difference between the Prime Minister's hometown and mine. I also come from a company town. It is called Transcona. The company there is the CNR, which is a publicly-owned company, a Crown corporation.

I have felt ever since the day that the current Prime Minister was elected Prime Minister of this country that my kind of town, my kind of Canada, has been on the endangered species list. In my kind of Canada we were not ashamed to work for a publicly-owned company and we were proud of the work that all of us—uncles, aunts, nephews, cousins, and grandfathers—who worked for the CNR did.

We did not know we were part of what was wrong with Canada. We did not know that we deserved, during nine years of Conservative government, to be hunted down like animals and made extinct. That is what this government has done to that kind of Canada through deregulation, free trade agreements, privatization, contracting out and all the other ways they have said to the hundreds of thousands, indeed millions of Canadians who have worked in the public sector over decades that their way of living was what was wrong with Canada, that that is something that has to be eliminated, that an army of people with masters of business administration have to be hired to eliminate these people who have worked for CN, Air Canada and the public sector in general. Part of what was wrong with Canada was these institutions, which the Tories have so diligently set out to get rid of and destroy.

• (1800)

Two different views of Canada, Mr. Speaker: The view from Baie Comeau where everyone pays homage to the absentee American landlord and the view from Transcona where we worked for the people of Canada through a company that was owned by the people of Canada, and we never had to sing for anybody, and we still do not sing for anybody that we do not choose to.

The Prime Minister may be retiring but the Canada that he leaves behind is a model of that town and that context that he grew up in. I say this with apologies to the people of Baie Comeau, but it is true nevertheless.

We in Transcona and other places like it will not forget the Prime Minister. We will also not forget who was part of his hunting party, who tried to run us down, who tried to find those people who worked in those kinds of places, wherever they might be, and eliminate their jobs and give them to so–called superior people and superior institutions in the private sector or, worse still, to private sector institutions or companies or multinational corporations in the United States of America and now Mexico.

That is what is wrong, as far as I am concerned, with what I have seen over the last nine years of this Conservative government.

This bill, as has been said by my colleagues more ably than I can say it and certainly in greater detail, is part of the whole Canada–U.S. FTA–North American free trade agreement agenda. The shame of it is that it is part of what the government is willing to do in some ways outside the agreement. It is like the changes to the laws affecting the production of generic drugs in Canada. It is part of the agreement but it is not part of the agreement; it is not in the agreement because the government does not want to own up to the fact that it is part of the agreement.

The government give the illusion of sovereignty here. It says no, it has not been forced to do this to itself, it freely does this to itself. It is like someone who does something because, although nobody has a gun to their head, there is a guy in the next room with a gun to their head who has promised them that if they do not do it he will come into their room. It is shameful.

It is misguided. Just take it on the economic logic alone, that foreign investment is needed, foreign investment creates jobs. I listened carefully to the Minister for International Trade earlier, the former Minister of Finance, when he said "yes, foreign-owned companies do not have the same record of keeping capital in the country as Canadian owned companies, but that is the price you have to pay for their investing in Canada in the first place".

The question has to be asked, as it should be with other policies that have been introduced by the same minister: Did the policy work? Do these kinds of policies work? Do they actually have the effect that the government intends, regardless of questions of sovereignty or of Canadian control or ideological and moral concerns?

Do they actually work? Is it even an internally coherent argument economically? Often it is not. Often if you look at the performance of these particular measures, they do not deliver. It does not happen.

The analogy that I would like to use on that is something about which I had an earlier exchange in the House with the Minister for International Trade, a policy that he brought in when he was the Minister of Finance, the capital gains tax exemption. There is an example of a policy that was designed to do a certain thing. It was designed, as the minister said earlier in the House, to stimulate small business, stimulate investment and create jobs, but did it do that?

Some people have had a good look at that policy. One person in particular has written an article called "The Wilson Legacy", a man by the name of Peter Myers. He calls that capital gains tax exemption the biggest budget goof in Canadian history. He says that only $6 billion out of the $20 billion that was forfeited in terms of public revenues ever went for the purpose that the minister had in mind when he created that capital gains tax exemption.

I am not even sure that he should have created it in the first place, even if it would have worked, but let us just take the minister in terms of his own goals. In order to stimulate $6 billion worth of investment, theoretically speaking, he forfeited another $14 billion in the form of tax exemptions to people who were very quick to realize that this was a real giveaway because it did not just apply to new investment in business. It applied to the investments that they already had made. They would be able to sell those shares or whatever capital gain they realized on those shares that they had bought prior to the budget of 1985. They claimed that capital gains tax exemption after the budget of 1985 and made a killing. No new jobs created there, no new investment.

The same with real estate speculation, all kinds of people taking advantage of that lifetime capital gains tax exemption of half a million dollars to roll over properties, to flip properties, to buy properties, for the specific purpose of selling them again after their value had increased to take advantage of speculation, as it is called. It does not create any new jobs, except maybe for the odd real estate agent.

I raise this as an example, albeit not one in the energy sector, of the way in which this government has so badly mismanaged the economy, even in terms of its own goals.

I think that is true with respect to what the government has done in the energy sector. I think it is true with respect to what has happened as a result of the free trade agreements. What you cannot get anybody to do is to admit that they were wrong, to admit that it has not worked out.

They are more content to kind of look at what has happened to the economy of Ontario and say: "Well, it is either a recession or it is the NDP government". It cannot be the free trade agreement. It cannot have anything to do with the most significant economic policy decision we have made in this century. It could not have anything to do with that.

Unfortunately, the conventional wisdom tends to accept that kind of language. We talk about the recession. We talk about the economic downturn. This is not a recession. This is a complete restructuring of the North American economy. Every time anybody uses the word recession, they are using language which does more to conceal than to reveal what is actually going on in the Canadian economy and in the North American economy.

That is one of the things to which I think everyone should give some thought. The minister of trade said to the hon. member for Edmonton East, which I thought was a kind of History 101: "Well, if it had not been for foreign investment in Leduc in 1947 there would be no oil industry". All right, fair enough. It may not be entirely accurate but certainly that is the myth in Alberta. I have heard many Alberta MPs, particularly Gordon Taylor, and if I heard him once I heard him 100 times say: "When we wanted Canadian capital there was no Canadian capital. Nobody would invest in Alberta. The Americans came and invested in Alberta and that is why we have an energy industry today". Fair enough.

However, over time many Canadians in all parties came to see that the degree of foreign ownership of an already established energy industry was something that was of concern. Over time—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I too deeply regret that the hon. member's time has expired. I think it is a terrible shame. Therefore, I would pose to this hon. member the same question I posed earlier to the member for Essex—Windsor which, in a nutshell, is: Had the member unlimited time in this House to speak how would he carry on his remarks at this point?

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, if I had unlimited time I would say the following. I would pick up just where I left off, talking about Leduc and the fact that it is illegitimate to use the historical fact that American investment was needed in order to get our energy industry off the ground in Alberta because of a lack of Canadian capital to justify the wholesale abandonment now of an industry that had the potential not so many years ago of being significantly Canadian owned.

That goal has been systematically abandoned through a variety of measures; through the privatization of Petro-Canada for instance which has to do not only with Canadian ownership per se but the form of Canadian ownership, whether there was to be a significant element of public ownership or not, and also through all the other measures that we have had before us including this bill that we have before us today.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that the hon. member mentioned during the course of his remarks was his contention that this bill was in fact free trade implementing legislation, that this bill was in some senses one of that array of bills that has been already placed, is being placed and will continue to be placed before this House, all of which have as their intent the implementation of various parts of the North American free trade agreement and indeed some residual parts of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

I think, for example, of such things as the act to amend the Railway Act, Bill C-11, which received Royal Assent on November 26, 1991 having previously passed this House. That bill came before this House as a direct consequence of U.S. lobbying that was authorized in its original free trade implementation legislation in the United States in 1988 which in its section 304(a)(2) called upon the American President to press for changes to the eastern Canadian transportation rates.

The President, being a good American, apparently pressed for those changes and son of a gun if he did not get them in Bill C-11, the act to amend the Railway Act. The Conservatives have actually gone further by announcing that they will soon make other changes that the Americans want in these regards, this time to the Western Grain Transportation Act, but that is another story.

Similarly, that same American law of 1988, the American law that implemented their part of the free trade agreement, in its section 304(c)(1) called for negotiating with Canada to increase the minimum North American content limits on automotive products, and I quote that American law: "from 50 per cent to at least 60 per cent". Son of a gun, if Canada's chief NAFTA negotiator, John Weekes, did not announce in August of 1992 that Canada had acquiesced to this demand as well. In fact, Weekes ceded it. The American legislation called for an increase of 50 per cent to 60 per cent. Hell, we are good folks. We will give them 62.5 per cent.

I am not at all certain that it will come as a surprise to Canadians to learn that the bill before us today achieves in legislation precisely what the American Congress directed the American President to achieve in Article 304(b)(2) of that same 1988 American act in which the American President was directed to get the Canadians to get rid of their ownership restrictions on petroleum, oil and gas. He has achieved it. Ronald Reagan lives in the Canadian House of Commons. How about that.

I would just like, if I may, to put to my hon. colleague this question. Is there anything that an American President could request of this government and its array of Mulroney choristers that it would not sing? Is there any tune so base, any melody so disharmonious or any accompaniment so vile that it would be deemed past him?

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for that question.

The fact is that many times I hoped that I had seen the limit of how far this government would go to meet the multinational corporate agenda which so often coincides with the American agenda. It always continues to surprise me in a most unfortunate way.

I must say that I am glad to see that some members of the government have come back into the Chamber. I thought for a minute perhaps that the government had resigned or that it was serving dinner in the lobby. Actually for a significant amount of time there were no government members present.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. Debate. The hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to participate in the debate, though I must say that part of what concerns me about this bill is that it typifies the way in which this Parliament functions or does not function.

As I read through the bill, there appeared to be fairly insignificant changes because the printed bill makes reference to removing a few sections of some acts and altering some definitions which on the first reading do not appear to be of much significance at all. The bill, as it is printed, does not really tell you very much about what it does.

If one was in the Chamber this afternoon anticipating the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to lead a spirited debate on this bill, one would have been disappointed. If one was expecting that same minister to be present during the debate on the bill and to answer questions from members on all sides or that the government would have appointed an official minister for the day to carry the bill, then one would be hard pressed to find out who that is. It kind of typifies the parliamentary process and where we are. Here is a bill printed which in essence does not appear to do very much. One really has to dig into the reasons behind why the government would introduce this bill to get much of a sense of what it is trying to do with it.

I was watching earlier in the afternoon. I take it the Minister for International Trade was here for a little while. He made some reference to what I thought was a rather good speech by the member for Edmonton East who at least gave our perspective on legislation of this nature. He stood up and said these words, I believe: "ideological garbage". There was not a member standing in this place saying: "I disagree with your point of view". There was not a member standing in this place giving his reasons why he might disagree with an opposition member. It was a senior minister of the Crown whose eloquence extended to the use of the term "ideological garbage".

Maybe that is one of the reasons why people across Canada say: "If that is the very best argument that can be mustered by a senior minister of the Crown why do we not toss them out and go to the local beer hall where we can at least get some energy behind that kind of language?"

I was interested to note that a little later on in the debate the same minister of the Crown was interrupted. I could be wrong, but it did appear to me as I watched that little interjection transpire that this same senior minister of the Crown was not really aware of what bill was before the House this afternoon and had to be corrected. That's rather unusual.

I think it says a little bit about the parliamentary process as this Parliament grinds to a halt. As well, it says a whole lot about ideology because as one reads through this bill and one understands where it fits in this whole free-trading process one really has to understand that if one examines the numbers there is no great crying financial reason to do this. There is an ideological reason to do this. There is a belief in free trade, almost a blind belief in free trade, that would drive a government to do this.

There are commitments that are perhaps not written on paper, perhaps done behind closed doors and perhaps done during the course of negotiations on things like free trade agreements with the United States that begin to appear in this type of legislation. On the surface it does not make sense. More money went out in the last decade than came in for investment purposes.

We seem to be levelling off in fact and perhaps changing just a little bit in terms of who owns the petroleum industries in Canada.

I admit to being not very ideological but I would say this as an absolute statement. I believe that the resources of this country do not belong to any private or public corporation. However old-fashioned a notion this might be, those resources in the ground, on top of the ground or in the sea, belong to this nation. It is true. We have always developed them and brought them into use through some myriad of schemes of private development and public development. We have tried almost every kind of joint venture that one could think of.

However, let us get to the basis of all that. The reason why this law is before the Parliament of Canada is that in a legal sense the resources and the extraction of those resources belong to the people of Canada.

Let me introduce an element that has not been talked about very much in this Chamber this afternoon. If one came in through my industrial riding of Oshawa and asked people whether they were getting good value for their dollar in the petroleum sector and whether their government was doing something good for them, then one really could not muster much of an argument about price for the consumer goods that my citizens use. In order to do that, oddly enough, one would have to go to the United States and talk about natural gas in California.

Most of the people who I represent are thoroughly confused about how American companies can come into Canada, extract resources from distant points in our land, transfer them way down into the United States and sell them cheaper there than they can sell them here in Canada. That befuddles a lot of us. I pretend no insider knowledge. I pretend no understanding of it all. I simply say that it confuses the hell out of me too.

I do not understand that. Is there a government in place to protect both our resources in the first instance and to serve the best interests of our Canadian consumers? Second, does it provide good, strong economic growth machinery? If those were the concerns of the Government of Canada, they are surely not represented in this bill.

This bill it seems to me represents an ideology at work that says flatly that only the private sector can do anything and the best thing a government can do is get out of the way. It says that when one engages into large, multinational free trade agreements, such as is now being proposed between Canada, the United States and Mexico, the best law is no law at all. Governments should just get out of the way. In some magical way the private sector will do what no one else in the world can do.

I do not believe that for a moment. I think that is the height of stupidity. All across the section of Canada where I live lie all of the ruins of that kind of political stupidity, all of the closed factories, all of the small businesses bearing that hardship, all of the local economies that suffer because somebody somewhere else in the world has made an economic decision which destroyed their local community. I choose my words carefully here because there are many small towns in southern Ontario whose local economy has been destroyed by ideology, by free trade and by this kind of legislation.

I am sure that before there is another election this current government will be back into those small towns announcing a grant for this and a cheque for that and a subsidy for something else. Would it not have made more sense not to destroy the economy of small towns? However, one does that when one enters into a free trade agreement which in theory does somebody some good but in practice ruins the economy of a local community. In a small town, closing down the one furniture factory, the one auto parts supplier and the plant ruins that local economy.

It is not just the people in that plant who suffer. It is everybody else in that community. Every person who contributes to the support of public education in that community gets hurt. Everybody who contributes to policing in that community gets hurt. Everybody who supports the corner store gets hurt. One has damaged irreparably the local economy.

Each small town from all across Canada has its own little structure. It has its own little economic pattern and growth. When one intrudes on that in a negative way, such as what this government did with its free trade agreement, one intrudes into every single household there. You invade every single pocketbook.

Perhaps it is true that the only damage one can see is a factory that has closed and gone to Georgia, Alabama or, if this government has its way, a little farther south into Mexico. Maybe that is all one can see with a first look, but if one stops to listen and to look around at the faces of the people in those small communities, one soon understands that one has damaged every single one of them.

It is part of this kind of legislation I suppose that somebody somewhere fervently believes that a big sector of our economy like the petroleum industry in western Canada really has to have massive investment from outside our own shores. Setting aside for a moment whether that is a good thing or a bad thing, is this bill going to do that?

In my view, it would be absolutely and totally nonsensical to believe for a single moment that this legislation is going to bring in droves of investment from offshore. That is not going to happen.

A former minister of energy of this same government sat before a parliamentary committee and said so. So what is this bill about then? It is about ideology. It is about somebody's political sense and upbringing over their common sense. It just kind of squashes common sense.

As I heard a couple of other members say, it is not at all unlike the reference that was made to a little place called Schefferville in Quebec where the current Prime Minister rose in his own magnificent way to become the Canadian head of that company. He sought at one point in time to virtually close the entire community because the American company, Iron Ore of Canada that had its Canadian subsidiary, decided that operations should cease there.

In a blink of an eye they ceased without question, without any malice or without anybody being mean or nasty. That is just the way that free enterprise operates. That is just the way that business decisions are made.

Who then picks up all of the ramifications of that? In some small case I suppose the private sector pays its price. The private sector in my community and in many communities now is downsizing. That is the polite word to use. It is not necessarily that those production facilities are not useful any more. It is not necessarily that they are not profit-making any more. It is just that there is no real reason to have them.

If General Motors of Canada has production capacity in New York State or in Michigan and we have the same kind of capacity in my home town of Oshawa, there is no reason to have it stay in Oshawa any more. Move it. If the capacity is somewhere else, take it there. If you have an axle plant in St. Catharines that makes a good product which makes a profit—which General Motors itself says it will continue to buy, source its part from that exact same plant—will shut it down because it is in the process of doing something else.

I know some members will never grasp this notion but sometimes the work of the private sector runs against the better public interest. That is kind of an outlandish statement and I do not really mean to upset anybody, but not all the time does the very best interests of the private sector run smoothly along with the best interests of everybody else. In my view that is where a government is supposed to step in.

It is fine for all of us in all political parties to have some kind of basic ideology and political belief, there is absolutely nothing that anyone here in this Chamber would want to do to alter that. But when that ideology gets in front of all other common sense, surely then the ideology should step aside.

This bill in many ways represents what is wrong with government in Canada for me. I would expect, as somebody who has been in politics for 20 years, that I should be able to read a bill and tell everyone, just by reading the bill, what the bill is about. I do not believe it can be done with this bill. You should not have to run off and research all the background of free trade agreements and of the existing state of the petroleum industry to make any sense out of printed legislation. I do not believe that is a reasonable thing to do.

If the government wants this bill, it should have the minister front and centre every single moment that the legislation is before the House of Commons. That is not true here either. I do not want to get carried away with this for a moment and all of us do understand there are pressures for members of this House to be in 19 different places all day today. All of us share that pressure. I do.

But if a government feels that this type of legislation is important it ought to have its members here. It surely should. It ought to have ministers of the Crown here who at least know what bill is before the House at any given moment. That is my version of how a Parliament is supposed to work; a minister responsible for a piece of legislation carries it in the Chamber.

All of us understand that there are times when the minister cannot possibly be in the Chamber. To me that would say to not proceed with the legislation at that moment. If the minister wants it, it is his or her obligation to be here to carry it through, to explain to all the other members why the government thinks this is an important initiative.

We are going to have some more of these arguments because I believe more of what will happen in the next little while in this Parliament, if it stays in business much longer, is going to be brought out directly to the free trade agreement. I believe that free trade in its many forms—with the United States, with Mexico, with whomever you want—is going to dominate our discussions here for a little while. It ought to. It is the substantive issue that has robbed us of jobs in communities that I visit almost every month as I go around my part of Canada. It has hurt us. This kind of legislation has hurt us.

If there is an argument which says that this bill is going to do something good for Canada, I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, I have watched the entire debate in this Chamber this afternoon and I have not seen a government member stand up and do that. I have seen government ministers get up and insult somebody on this side. I am not too meek and mild about this, he can get up and insult me all he wants, but it has to be understood that when he does that I will give him back in kind whatever he has to say. However, that is not the relevant point; the relevant point should be that if the government believes in this law, get the minister here, marshal the arguments and make them.

I heard the minister of trade ridiculing, I believe it was the Liberal critic, for being on both sides of the issue. The minister of trade obviously does not understand the Liberal Party of Canada. That is their forte. That is what has made them strong. What has kept them going for so many years is the magnificent ability to say: We believe in the left and we believe in the right and if you don't like this policy we have got another policy over here. They change magnificently. Now they await the coronation, not of Kim Campbell as the leader of the Tory party but the return of their rightful place in Canadian history. I guess when the Tories have really loused it up very bad, people should by nature appoint the Liberals as the next government. We may be in for a treat. We may well see that age old process in Canadian politics about to get changed.

I believe that members on all sides have an obligation to do things which perhaps it is not fair to ask the Canadian people to do. When we see a bill like this which on the surface does not appear to do very much, it is our job to find out exactly what does all that fine print mean, exactly how does that translate in my own constituency in the part of Canada that I represent and in fact to the whole of Canada's economy?

I believe this bill does some damage. The free trade agreement which is the instigation of this kind of legislation has done us more damage. The government that has brought us to this stage in our parliamentary process has done us even more damage. A curse on all of them.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by welcoming the minister back to the House. We missed ya Bill, we missed you somethin' fierce.

Mr. McKnight: Unfortunately I was able to watch it all.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I would like to pick up on some remarks that the hon. member for Oshawa made concerning the Liberal Party as he was concluding his address. I must admit there is very little that has surprised me in the debate this afternoon.

I have been following this bill for long enough now that I figured I had pretty much everybody's position pegged, but when the two—and there have only been two—speakers for the Liberal Party spoke this afternoon and both, not without a bit of hemming and hawing, a bit of tacking to the right and tacking to the left, finally came out and said they are going to support this bill, I was surprised. I was shocked.

I have been listening to various members of the Liberal Party for a long time now saying: "Oh no, no, we are opposed to free trade. We are opposed to the NAFTA. We are opposed to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and by God you just give us the chance and we are going to renegotiate it and make it swell".

Today I hear again the only two spokespersons for the Liberal Party saying: "No, no, this bill is okay. This integral element in free trade is fine by us. Hey, just let her whistle through there folks". I must admit I have difficulty squaring this.

I was going to ask the hon. member for Oshawa, who as a parliamentarian is much my senior and whose experience of the Liberal Party which of course is in Ontario to be found in its essence far exceeds any such experience I might enjoy, if perhaps he could speculate on the meaning of the apparent decision of the Liberal Party to support this odious little piece of legislation.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I am going to have to have some words with my hon. colleague when he refers to me as being that much older than him. We will have that outside.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Senior in parliamentary experience.

Mr. Breaugh: Senior in parliamentary experience. He is trying to weasel out of it now.

I want to note that I believe we have flushed the minister in the Chamber, as the saying goes—it is a parliamentary term—and that is not bad. We are going to flush him just a bit further.

Mr. McKnight: If it bothers you I can do without this.

Mr. Breaugh: Okay. The hon. member asked me to try and explain some of the comments that were made by Liberal members somewhat earlier. I guess the little parallel which I could offer him as being the essence of the Liberal Party is that a Liberal is one who feels quite comfortable with the notion, as did David Peterson did when he ran as premier of Ontario, that he would be violently opposed to free trade with the United States. Shortly after the election he became very comfortable with free trade with the United States.

In order to understand how the Liberal Party functions one has to understand raw political desire for power and it really translates to this in very simple terms.

An hon. member: Is that Bob Rae's problem?

• (1840)

Mr. Breaugh: Whatever needs to be done before an election is done. If it is necessary to say they are for free trade, they will say that. Whatever is expeditious after the election is also done. It is their ability to separate those two things. Where you think there is a right and left, they see neither. Where you search for consistency, they are never hampered by that niggling little concept that one should think through a position and stick with it. If there is some cause however fleet, however minute, which bumps them off a position, they are happily bumped.

If the hon. member is somewhat confused, as I noticed the Minister for International Trade was, he has certainly been in this Chamber a lot longer than I have. He could not figure out how the Liberal Party could be in favour of this legislation and against free trade. The problem is that he might just as well have said: "I cannot figure out why the Liberal Party is against free trade and against this or for it and against this".

These words being for something or believing in something are totally alien to the whole cause of Liberalism in Canada. They have one single-minded goal. Whatever is necessary, whatever has to be done to get them in their rightful place, they will do.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I was undecided whether to take part in this debate. Although it is an important one, it is a debate over Bill C-106 by which the government undertakes to abandon completely the goal that the Canadian people, and at one time the Canadian government, have had for some time of maintaining and increasing our control over the petroleum industry and for that matter, over other industries as well.

When I listened to the debate, and I have heard practically all of it, I felt that what was said by my colleagues from Edmonton East, Essex—Windsor, Winnipeg Transcona, and now from Oshawa, was excellently said. Their command of the subject and of the rhetoric was far beyond mine. However I realized there was at least one point that could be added in our opposition to this bill. I wish to deal with that one point now.

This is a point of moral teaching. It was well made about one decade ago by the Roman Catholic bishops of Canada. I will quote very few words from them. It is in their document The Ethical Reflections on the Economic Crisis of 1982 in which they said that economic recovery would have to have three goals. "The needs of the poor must take priority over the wants of the rich. Secondly, the workers' rights must come ahead of the maximization of profits. Thirdly, the participation of marginalized groups must take precedence over the preservation of the system which excludes them". That is a very important point stated three times.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The hon. member for Willowdale, I would like to see the speaker if you do not mind.

Mr. Heap: Thank you for your judgment in the matter. This point which is the same point stated three times over for clarification by the bishops is a point which applies very specially to the indigenous peoples of the western hemisphere, the ones who were conquered by Europeans starting five centuries ago and are still held in subjection in practically every country if not every country of the western hemisphere, except in the Caribbean where they were exterminated to the last man, woman and child. They are not in subjection there. They have been replaced by their killers.

Those people are still here in many parts of North America, including Canada. The Pope visited here in the last decade. When he went to the north, to places like northern Alberta and the Northwest Territories, he made a point of speaking particularly to these people and reminding them and us of their rights as human beings created by God.

It is not the point made only by the Roman Catholic church. At this time of year there is a program mounted by several of the church bodies in Canada called Ten Days for World Development. There is the Anglican church, the Evangelical Lutheran church, the Presbyterian church, the United church and the Canadian Catholic Organization for Development and Peace. For good measure they are also associated with CIDA, the development arm of the Canadian government.

During these 10 days for world development presently and at this time in other years for 20 years now, they have pressed the point that development and economic recovery and economic health must rest on respect for the people at the bottom of the ladder rather than higher respect for the people at the top of the ladder.

This has been developed this year into three restatements of the principle. One is that sustaining people's lives and cultures within their communities, that is small-scale operations, regional self-reliance, local ownership and control, must take priority over supporting the profit objectives of transnational corporations. This speaks directly against Bill C-106.

Yes, there is oil as there are many other valuable resources in our country. Yes, it can be developed. But to say it can only be developed by the most powerful corporations in the world which are mainly centred in the United States is simply not true. We can do things in a more co-operative way. If we do not do things in a more co-operative way then we suffer. It is not just the people at the bottom who suffer such as the native peoples and the poor people of Canada, but the whole of our society suffers. We all suffer if we neglect the people at the bottom of the ladder, if we neglect local control, regional self-reliance and instead in a lazy or a defeated sense hand over control to someone somewhere else in the world.

The second principle concerns conserving renewable resources, that is plants, water and forests, and also non-renewable resources, such as agricultural soils, oil and gas. Conserving them for future generations must take priority over selling them for short-term profits.

One of the remarkable statements that sticks in my mind is that of the former Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Pierre Trudeau. He was in a rush to sign some earlier agreement with the United States about control of oil and said that we had better sell it to them. He thought we had oil for hundreds of years ahead. Somebody had sold him a story that we had so much oil we could not possibly use it up in a century. He said we had better sell it to the Americans while they were still in the market to buy it. As though some day nobody would want to buy our oil. Within a very short couple of years, it was found that we did not by any means have such unlimited supplies of oil.

We are now in the business of using up the easily available supplies and moving to places like Hibernia. There we have to put in billions of dollars to get somebody else to invest money to take the oil out of the ocean and take it to the United States. We will not get the oil. We just subsidize the foreign investor who is going to get it.

I believe that the teaching of the churches based on the teachings of the Christian and Jewish tradition is that we should have some regard for our children and our grandchildren. They are going to need some of that oil. We should not be in such a hurry to sell it all off as fast as it can be extracted.

The third principle is that all citizens should participate in setting their country's social and economic priorities and in deciding how trading agreements can complement these. Economic or social agreements must not limit future decisions for the common good.

It has been pointed out by several of my colleagues that this bill is essentially a part of the same action as the North American free trade agreement. If this bill is passed and if the North American free trade agreement is passed, governments of Canada will be prevented from responding to the citizens of Canada if Canadians ask for greater control to be restored over the oil industry.

The Government of Canada will not belong to the citizens of Canada. It will be an instrument of the oil companies in the United States or somewhere else if the United States should lose control of its multinational corporations.

What I am saying is that the teaching of our major churches in Canada and the 3,000 years of religious tradition behind them warns against giving away control of our oil industry for nothing.

I hear somebody snorting as though he did not think it was for nothing. In fact we have not seen in the history of the past 10 years the benefit of having these oil rights and control sold off to other countries.

What we have seen, certainly in a comparable case in Ontario is the disaster of having foreign companies own so many of our manufacturing industries. Once the tariffs were said to be taken off or in the process of being taken off, we lost hundreds of thousands of jobs in the manufacturing industries because we had not had the good sense to establish our own control over our own jobs.

Canadian citizens should be able now and in the future to make the decisions about our oil industry, about our forestry industry, about our agricultural industry, about our manufacturing industry, about our transportation industry, about our communications industry. We should not sign away our birthright, even if somebody is willing to pay us money for it at the time. The money loses its value much faster than the resources and the infrastructure of our country.

It was about 2,800 years ago in Israel that a person stood up in the marketplace in Samaria, and said: "Do not sell the poor for silver; do not sell the needy, the desperate people, for a pair of shoes". This was the prophet Amos. The rich people of his time did not pay any attention to him. Their country has long since disappeared. Others are replacing it.

Others still have to learn the same lesson: If we desert the poor and if we sell off the birthright and the patrimony of our country, then the whole nation will suffer along with the poor. Therefore, I urge that this bill be defeated.

• (1855)

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I was listening with interest to what the member for Trinity—Spadina said. One of the churches he named is the one I belong to. Many members in this House belong to many of the churches he named. Is he suggesting that the churches of Canada are opposed to this bill?

Is he suggesting that the member for Western Arctic, who stood up and supported this bill, was somehow misrepresenting the views of her constituents? They desperately need jobs in oil and gas exploration, jobs in oil and gas servicing, jobs in mines, all kinds of jobs.

Is he suggesting that the churches of Canada want people to live on welfare or social assistance?

As the hon. member is an ordained minister, I hope he will speak carefully in reply to those questions. I hope he will not suggest that the churches of Canada are somehow lining up outside the Parliament Buildings in opposition to this bill. As a member of one of those churches I think that the churches of Canada believe overwhelmingly in the importance of each individual person, each individual soul if you like. They want to see people work. They want to see people be able to have dignity which comes from honest labour. They want to see all kinds of things.

I am not sure whether I understood the hon. member correctly, but I hope I did not. However, for the member to suggest that anybody belonging to a church, as many of us do here, should somehow be against this bill, I respectfully suggest is not honestly representing the views of any of the churches he was trying to represent in his arguments.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very direct question. He expressed a hope that I was not saying what he thought I was saying. I will do my best to make him happy by explaining again what I did say.

What I said was that the principles published by the authority of the church I belong to, the Anglican church, and the other ones I mentioned, do not mention Bill C-106 and do not specifically mention any oil companies. They do speak against giving the priority and the power to the transnational corporations in preference to the local people, whether it be the local people of Canada, the local people of northern Alberta, the local people of the Northwest Territories or whatever region.

The unwarranted leap is being made by the hon. member when he suggested that the only way the people in the north can have jobs is by selling our birthright to the transnational corporations. The hon. member is making a completely unwarranted leap.

There would be jobs if this government followed a different policy. Instead of funding the transnational corporations with multimillion dollar tax breaks, it should fund small business and not by taking the money from the unemployment insurance or from the unemployed. The money should be redirected from the transnationals to the small business people, not to the land speculators as was done by the former Minister of Finance with his tax exemption for capital gains. It should be done by much more carefully studied and publicly supported programs of aid to small business. If this government followed that policy then those people would have the jobs the transnational corporations have not and will not give them.

I ask the hon. member to consider the basic principles which I quoted from the document published by Ten Days for World Development. I ask him to consider those principles and see how they bear on this bill. The churches have not undertaken to lobby against any particular legislation in this matter, but they have given us some clear, moral guidance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine will be the first one to be recognized when this bill comes up again.

It being seven o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

FISHERIES

GRAND BANKS

The House resumed from Thursday, February 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mifflin:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take immediate action to extend custodial jurisdiction for northern cod over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion of my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. I just want to make sure that everyone is aware that on February 11, 1993 my colleague put a motion before this House that reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take immediate action to extend custodial jurisdiction for northern cod over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

This is a very commendable motion. It shows the guts that the Liberal Party has in pursuing the extension of our functional jurisdiction over the fish that are on what we call the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

One has to remember that in 1977 a Liberal government extended the 200-mile fishing jurisdiction over our coastal waters. This was not done easily, but our government took an initiative and it went after that. At the same time, it did say to the countries: "You can participate in the stocks that are excess to our Canadians needs". One of my big disappointments has been that the provincial government of Nova Scotia and the other provincial governments have not gone out to try and market the fish caught by foreigners within our 200-mile limit and outside.

That fish does not go to the U.S. It goes to places like Cuba, Japan and eastern Europe. We have not made a consistent, hard effort to develop the markets so that our companies process the fish or that our boats catch that excess fish. We have not since 1977 made much more than a nominal attempt.

It is one of the faults of the Government of Nova Scotia that it has not taken this upon itself because it is responsible for marketing. We have empty plants. At the same time that we declared our 200-mile exclusive fishing jurisdiction in 1977, we agreed that the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization would be set up. That was to manage the stocks of the Atlantic beyond our 200 miles.

What has happened in the interim is that as of 1986, which is a sad state of affairs, the European Community and others have overfished the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. We in Canada are in a unique situation. It is our continental shelf. We have control of it as our continental shelf, but we do not have control of the waters above that continental shelf. We cannot exercise that jurisdiction, even though it is the same stocks that we fish on the other side of the 200-mile limit, within our 200-mile limit.

We see countries overfish the quotas set by NAFO, the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization. We see them overfish. Our own fishery is in trouble with the same stocks, in so much trouble that the minister of fisheries declared last July that there would be a moratorium for at least two years, if I am not mistaken, for the spawning biomass of northern cod stock to recover quickly to long term average levels. This has been devastating for our community and particularly in Newfoundland where communities are so dependent on those stocks, whether inshore or offshore. Yet they have sat back and watched members of some of the European communities in defiance of NAFO quotas continue to fish and overfish the stock on which there is a moratorium.

The minister of fisheries whom we have heard in this debate is now making arrangements with the European Community for them to abide by our moratorium or to abide by whatever the governing body, whichever it is, is going to say.

There are no fish. When the fish come back, are the people who are taking the stock going to come back and take to the extent they have taken in the past? We expect the stocks to rejuvenate. We in the Liberal Party want a government that is going to extend our custodial jurisdiction over the fish that come from within our continental shelf so that we can protect that stock for future generations.

Many of my colleagues have gone to Europe many, many times to speak to the Europeans. It did not help. The only thing that has stopped them is that there is no fish. I think that before the fish come back we here in Canada had better take the same effective measure we took in 1977 when we declared our 200-mile fishing zone. We have to go beyond that and extend it to the rest of our continental shelf that is outside our 200-mile fishing zone. That can only be done with a concerted effort by negotiations, by telling people that we are going to exclude them, and taking active measures to exclude them.

That may sound difficult in this day and age but abuse has been going on first in defiance of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, second in defiance of the weak approach this government has taken since 1986 to deal with the nose and tail, and third the idea that we as the country that is closest to the stock should have a management plan for all the stocks within our area. If they do not have the right stuff over there to show that to the world, then I think it is time they allow someone else to get into the discussion and try to achieve what we want on the nose and tail.

I commend my colleagues from Newfoundland. I think they see it closer at hand. They see their stocks being depleted. They see their communities like ours as well not being able to fish. Yet they have continued to see the foreigners come in and take that fish even though there is a moratorium on the northern cod.

It has been a very weak effort by the government to exert control and custodial rights over that fish. My colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception is to be commended for bringing this and for having done it consistently since he has been a member of Parliament, coming into the House and making it a priority that he wants to see the Government of Canada take effective control. It is only an extension. The continental shelf is there. It is just extending our rights to the waters above the continental shelf.

We have not in four years and through three ministers of fisheries seen that effectiveness to do away with that overfishing by the European Community. It has been going on since 1986. It did not just start. The Europeans may not be there today, but that is because there is no fish, and that is the only reason they are not there. If there were to be fish there tomorrow or in two years, are we going to allow them to come right back and do the same thing?

Mr. Speaker, in two years there will be a new government and we will exert our control over that nose and tail.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, I certainly commend the attitude and the thinking of the hon. member from Nova Scotia who has expressed her concerns on what we might like to do as Canadians. But the fact is that what we are talking about doing here in this private member's bill is neither practical nor realistic under international law.

I would like to deal with a few of these points as we talk about extending our jurisdiction. In fact, international law does not allow us to do what we would like to do. For example, I am told that in Newfoundland today there are people who are subsisting on fishing through the ice and there are more cod fillets available as I speak than there were three or four months ago.

The problem is that we have difficulty dealing with an issue that becomes far more transparent from the perspective of what it is we should do as a responsible fishing community, whether it be Koreans, whether it be Japanese, whether it be Canadians and Americans, or whomever. We have a very distinct responsibility as an international community.

As Canadians we have extended our jurisdiction out to 200 miles. Unfortunately, that does not include the nose nor the tail of the bank of Newfoundland which significantly contributes to the welfare of our cod stocks. That is what this government has been attempting to address over the last number of months. The history of that fishery is well known to everybody who is familiar with it.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has risen in this House on more than one occasion to describe what would happen if Canada unilaterally extended custodial jurisdiction for cod or any other species beyond our 200-mile limit. Let us face it, we do not have that jurisdiction in international law. We are not permitted under international law, the Helsinki convention or any other convention, to establish ourselves beyond that. We have got to work with other communities.

It is inherently important that we recognize that South Korea, for example, recently agreed with us that indeed it will withdraw from that particular fishery. We must show an example through responsible fishing practices ourselves which we have undertaken at great political expense, no question about it, great political expense. The minister of fisheries would agree to that. There is no question about it, we have exerted a significant amount of responsibility regarding our fishery in this jurisdiction. We cannot unilaterally extend our borders beyond the 200-mile fishing limit, despite how much we might like to be able to be in a position to do that. I think that my colleagues from Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would agree with that.

I am pleased to be able to inform the members of this House that the latest development in our efforts to obtain international co-operation and support has been officially confirmed by the Government of South Korea. That is important because the South Koreans are big players in the international fishing community all around the world. Whether it be in eels, cod or whatever, they are big fishers in our world-wide oceans. They have confirmed that they will cease all fishing activity in the NAFO area outside Canada's 200-mile limit as of the end of April this year. That is terribly important to us as a fishing nation.

This is of major importance because in 1992 there were seven Korean vessels: four were flagged in Korea and crewed by Koreans and three were crewed by Koreans but flagged in Panama and other countries. These particular people were fishing in our waters, from which they have already confirmed that they have taken substantial numbers of fish in the last few years.

I would simply conclude by saying that Canada is not alone. The 50 states of America are with us in delivering a powerful message against high seas overfishing. It has been a long and bitter fight against foreign overfishing. I have spoken in this House of Commons against it and have taken different opportunities to do so even when I was not on the fisheries committee, but before that, and even though my constituency does not have a big fishing community. But there are people in my constituency who are interested in fishing and who are deeply dependent on it, through fish processing plants and other spin-off effects.

Mr. Speaker, you would understand that, even coming from the constituency that you come from, which I know is interested. I have seen you in the House of Commons and in the parliamentary restaurant. You eat tuna fish sandwiches. You enjoy all of these things that our oceans allow us to enjoy. Why would you not be interested in this sort of thing? Of course you are.

Mr. Speaker, I applaud you for your tolerance in this debate and for your interest in ensuring that we will have an opportunity to present the position of fishermen in our society and what is important to them.

I just want to end with this particular point. Mr. Speaker, I thank you for listening and I implore you to ensure that it is well understood by the public, by the Canadian electorate and by the fishermen of our community that we, as much as we would like to do, are not in the position to extend our borders beyond that 200-mile limit which we have already established. It has served our fishermen well over the years, particularly in the last weeks and months when we have taken definitive decisions in Newfoundland where fishermen are now the beneficiaries of great programs that have led their families to greater prosperity than some of them have ever known. That has been an initiative of a very caring and compassionate government.

I am sure that will continue to be the case in the days and months to come, particularly as we deal with bills of this nature for which I commend the hon. member but it is not a practical solution to our difficulties or problems.

• (1920)

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, today, as has been duly noted in the House, is St. Patrick's Day. It may not be well known across Canada but St. Patrick's Day is a statutory holiday in Newfoundland, as is Orangemen's Day. They may be enjoying themselves today or over the weekend but in the back of their minds I am sure there is a great concern about the whole future of their province.

The sad story is that it is now too late to really save the fish stocks off our youngest province, and Britain's oldest Dominion as we learned in our history not too many years ago.

Action should have been taken 10 years ago but the policy of greed and overexploitation overruled good sense and good fish stock management.

This action of benign negligence and oversight has resulted in a state of near financial insolvency for the seafaring people of the province of Newfoundland. It has also placed the workers on the shore in a state of prolonged welfare assistance. It is a sad story that should never have been told.

A proud and hardworking people are fighting for their very survival. Newfoundland's history is unlike that of any other province in Canada.

It is too late now to do things right or to do them differently. Now we have to face the situation as it exists today. The motion moved by the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception is the first step in the long-term solution to our fish problems.

The member's reasons for proposing this motion are well documented in Hansard of February 11 of this year. The chronology of events and the results of those events and decisions are in Hansard for all of us to read.

The bottom line for his province of Newfoundland is not a pretty one. Blame is properly shared in the hon. member's speech of that day.

The truth is that this government must bear the majority of the blame because it turned a blind eye to the havoc that was being wrought in the gulf and off the Grand Banks. This government turned a blind eye to foreign overfishing. It turned a blind eye to the technology that was cleaning out everything that swam in the water. It turned a blind eye to the evidence that stocks were quickly being depleted because of the overfishing and the technology being used. It turned a blind eye to everything but political expediency.

Now hard decisions have to be made, and this present minister knows he has to make them. That is why he put in place the two-year moratorium on northern cod and the drastic reduction in the gulf stocks for groundfish. However, we still see foreign vessels inside our 200-mile limit and in many cases within sight of our shoreline.

One would think the national good would take precedence over international agreements in this case, but no, this government is more concerned about the restaurants in France than about the dinner tables of Canadians, especially Newfoundlanders.

This government is able to create problems where none existed. The lobster industry in Prince Edward Island is a prime example. Once upon a time there was one size of canner lobsters caught in the waters off Prince Edward Island. Everyone seemed to be happy with that. They had only the fluctuations in price and the variations in fish catches to deal with, which is normal in the fishing occupation.

But peace and happiness is not a state that Tories can long tolerate. They had to change that state and today three different sizes of canner lobsters are caught off the shores of Prince Edward Island.

They now have fishermen fighting fishermen because everyone now wants the other to agree on their particular lobster size. They now have fishermen's associations splintering along the lines of their particular lobster size thereby threatening the united voice of the fishermen in Prince Edward Island. All this has been done in the name of conservation.

The most conservation-minded fishermen in Atlantic Canada are lobster fishermen. First of all they not only have a limited entry fishing but they have a closed entry fishing. There can no longer be new lobster licences granted.

There are two two-month fishing seasons in Prince Edward Island, very short fishing seasons. They also have strictly enforced trap limits during these two-month fishing seasons. This fishery has been stable over the past 20 years. Yet we have this present situation where the government has hired a consultant to recommend what it should do to get itself out of this jam which it created.

This particular consultant report has to be digested and agreed to by fishermen within weeks, something which is almost impossible to do.

To return to the motion at hand, I believe with the proposer of this motion that Canada must once again take unilateral action to protect its resources. It must take custodial jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks, something which members from Newfoundland have been saying in this House since I came here in 1988.

This motion is not extending the Canadian territory over those particular areas. It is merely exerting custodial jurisdiction to manage the breeding grounds which are used by our fish stocks.

Canada must do what was done in 1964. If I may refer to the decision made in 1964, Canada passed fishing zone legislation to attach a nine-mile exclusive fishing zone to the three-mile territorial sea. Canada felt it was time to act on a unilateral basis.

In 1977 Canada decided to take unilateral action to create a 200-mile zone of jurisdiction. The precedents are being set whereby Canada has taken control over its fisheries and the jurisdiction within those fisheries as to who can fish there and in what quantities.

I urge this House to adopt the hon. member's motion.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, as you know, many of us in the House have used our notes extensively tonight because some of the material is very complicated, somewhat scientific and very statistical. I hope you will take that into consideration this evening.

Under the agreement with the European Community on fishing in the northwest Atlantic Ocean outside Canada's 200-mile limit which is awaiting ratification, the EC, the European Community, agrees to work with Canada to end overfishing by fleets from states that are not members of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization.

What I would like to do is outline to the members of the House this evening some of the steps this government has been taking to end this problem and some of the successes that we have achieved in this area.

Since 1986 vessels under the flags of countries that are not members of NAFO, mostly Panamanian and Korean flag vessels, have taken more than 165,000 tonnes of fish contrary to NAFO conservation measures. In 1992 countries that are not members of NAFO are estimated to have caught 32,425 tonnes of fish in the area regulated by NAFO in the northwest Atlantic Ocean outside Canada's 200-mile limit. This total includes 6,025 tonnes of cod including 1,200 tonnes of 2J-3KL cod—just identifying a geographic area there—and 17,225 tonnes of red fish, mostly from NAFO divisions in 3LMN. In division 3L alone, non-NAFO members caught an estimated 1,200 tonnes of northern cod in the NAFO regulatory area outside Canada's 200-mile limit. Korean catches are estimated at 14,825 tonnes of redfish and flatfish. Thirty-two different non-member vessels fished in the NAFO area in 1992 alone.

In April 1992 the minister of fisheries travelled to Panama to seek co-operation in ending fishing in the NAFO regulatory area by vessels registered in Panama which are primarily former Spanish and Portuguese vessels. The Panamanians again agreed to penalize vessels registered in Panama that fish contrary to NAFO conservation decisions and to allow new registrations only on condition that the vessels refrain from fishing in the NAFO area.

Subsequently, based on photographic evidence provided by Canada, Panamanian officials have fined several Panamanian registered vessels for fishing in the NAFO area and several more have been deregistered. Packages of evidentiary material on Panamanian vessels that continue to fish in the NAFO area are being sent to Panamanian authorities at regular intervals.

As a result of Canadian representations, two other non-NAFO members, Honduras and Venezuela, have also said that they will take measures to prevent vessels operating under their flags from fishing in the NAFO regulatory area.

Among the non-NAFO members, South Korea has been the worst offender. South Korea is not a member of NAFO and has no quotas to fish in the NAFO regulatory area. In 1992 Korean-flagged or Korean-crewed vessels numbered 6 of the 32 non-NAFO vessels in the NAFO area. The remainder were mostly Spanish and Portuguese vessels reflagged to Panama. Korean vessels target redfish and flatfish. Over the last five years they have taken 73,000 tonnes of redfish which represents 20 per cent of all the redfish caught, and 10,000 tonnes of yellowtail flounder which represents 23 per cent of all yellowtail founder caught.

Canada has been calling for the complete withdrawal of all Korean vessels since 1992. The Prime Minister raised the issue directly with the Prime Minister of South Korea in June 1992. As a result of this and a meeting held in February between the minister of fisheries and a South Korean delegation, South Korea has recently announced that it will withdraw its vessels in the northwest Atlantic at the end of 1993. South Korea has also indicated that Korean crews will no longer be licensed after March 1993 for use on third country vessels.

These moves, coupled with the comprehensive agreement with the European Community which was reached in December 1992, have the potential to go a long way toward ending the problem of overfishing outside 200 miles.

Our agreement with the European Community, once it is ratified, has the potential to make the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization once more, as it was in the years following the extension of jurisdiction in 1977, an effective means to conserve and manage fisheries for straddling stocks in international waters.

Central to this is that the EC will now, as it did until 1986, accept and comply with NAFO quotas and other conservation and management decisions. This is fundamental. The agreement can stay in place only if the EC complies with NAFO quotas. Canada has always accepted NAFO quotas.

The EC will ensure that catches by its fleets do not exceed NAFO quotas. Canada and the EC will maintain patrol vessels outside 200 miles and Canadian patrol vessels will carry EC as well as Canadian fisheries inspectors. When an EC patrol vessel cannot be present, EC and Canadian officials will co-ordinate inspection activities and regularly review catch data for all fleets to ensure fisheries are closed when quotas are caught.

Beginning in 1994 there will be additional EC control measures as part of the EC's reform of its fisheries. In the interim, the EC will apply the same control measures as in 1992 which were successful in closing fisheries to EC vessels when quotas were caught.

Canada and the EC will work together to end fishing by non-NAFO fleets. Measures to work on include: preventing reflagging of vessels for this purpose, preventing Canadian or EC nationals from crewing non-NAFO vessels and, as necessary, preventing imports of fish caught by non-NAFO fleets. These fleets, largely comprising of Korean and reflagged EC vessels, are becoming an increasingly serious threat for resources outside 200 miles.

Canada will work with the EC to revitalize NAFO through joint proposals and to add a dispute settlement mechanism to avoid abuse of the objection procedure.

Canada will set a total allowable catch or a TAC for northern cod in 2J-3KL, another geographic jurisdiction, once the present moratorium ends, based on advice from Canadian international scientists. Scientific advice indicates that on average 5 per cent of the biomass is outside the 200-mile zone. Five per cent of the TAC will be distributed by NAFO and Canada will retain 95 per cent of the TAC.

The EC has agreed to support NAFO management decisions outside the 200 miles that are consistent with Canadian management decisions outside the 200 miles.

Because the EC will be co-operating with Canada in conservation of fisheries resources outside 200 miles, as soon as both parties have given formal approval, Canada will provide access to ports and surplus allocations and permit commercial arrangements.

If problems arise with the agreement, there will be consultations to seek to resolve them. Either Canada or the EC can terminate the agreement on 60 days' notice. This agreement, once ratified, will reflect the commitment of the EC to rational management conservation and sustainable development of the northwest Atlantic fishery.

It reflects the EC's new approaches to surveillance, control and effort limitation, so the catches do not exceed quotas. It also reflects the EC's commitment to measures against reflagging and fishing by non-NAFO fleets.

Finally, it reflects the political will of the EC to work together with Canada, bilaterally and within NAFO, in a common cause to help renew depleted fish stocks and to conduct fishing in compliance with NAFO decisions.

Many important elements of this agreement call for Canada and the EC to work together to achieve common goals, like effective control of fleets, an end to non-NAFO fishing and reforms to prevent abuse of the objection procedure.

Good faith and a spirit of common purpose are therefore needed by Canada and the EC. If we bring these to the operation and implementation of the agreement, then we will have taken a critically important step toward rebuilding straddling stocks and achieving sustainable high seas fisheries for the future.

We are pleased that the EC is now ready to join Canada and other NAFO contacting parties in seeking to end fishing by non-member vessels in the NAFO area and to prevent reflagging of vessels that are owned or controlled in the NAFO member countries.

Canada alone cannot save and rebuild straddling stocks off her east coast. Co-operation of all maritime and fishing nations is essential. Throughout the period since 1989, Canada has made a tremendous effort to achieve that co-operation and to have the principle of sustainable development given an effect in high seas fisheries in the northwest Atlantic.

We also have reason for optimism about the future. Canada hosted a three-day meeting on high seas fisheries of 48 states from around the world which opened in St. John's on January 22 of this year. The meeting brought together like-minded states in preparation for the United Nations Conference on High Seas fishing that will begin in April. At the St. John's meeting, coastal states shared their experiences, considered common approaches and committed themselves to a common course of action going into the coming conference.

At that St. John's meeting there was wide acceptance of the proposals contained in the discussion documents prepared by Canada regarding management principles, remedies, surveillance, control and enforcement, as well as a discussion document prepared by New Zealand on problems of developing states.

Five key matters were dealt with in that discussion paper. I will touch on those: the special interest of coastal states in straddling stocks and highly migratory species outside the 200 miles; the principle of consistency between conservation and management measures outside 200 miles and those taken by coastal states inside 200 miles; the no adverse effect principle, that is fisheries outside 200 miles should have no adverse impact on resources inside 200 miles; the need for effective enforcement outside 200 miles; and binding dispute settlement to ensure effective conservation and management.

Like-minded states are ready to do what needs to be done to persuade the rest of the world to take those concrete measures that we as coastal states believe are needed to end high seas overfishing.

The United Nations Conference on High Seas Fishing will provide for the first time a forum to develop rules for the management of high seas fisheries in accordance with the conservation and sustainable development principles within the framework for international co-operation established by the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. It will also continue to focus international attention on current overfishing on the high seas, increasing the pressure to stop this practice.

In conclusion, we have more reason than ever before to be optimistic about the future when we consider among other recent developments our agreement with the European Community, the solidarity of like-minded states and the progress we are making in our discussions with the non-NAFO members.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise tonight to participate in this debate on the private member's motion put forward by the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

It is a very important debate, important in order to prevent further ecological disaster through the pillaging of transboundary fish stocks off Canada's east coast. In order to save an essential national industry and a valued way of life for many rural citizens, Canada should take immediate steps to extend its functional jurisdiction to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

I also wish to talk about the sorry state of the Atlantic economy and the continued disregard the current government displays toward the people of that area. There exists many examples, too numerous to mention in the time allotted to me tonight, of the lack of caring and understanding on the part of the Government of Canada toward the every day concerns of Atlantic Canadians in particular and Canadians in general face.

The closing of the Summerside military base, the free trade agreement and the GST are simply three examples which prove that the government implements policies contrary to the wishes of the people. After implementation, it is the people, not the government of the day, which must bear the brunt and the pain of undesirable economic policies.

Increasing unemployment, especially in Atlantic Canada, is proof enough that these policies are not working. However, the government continues pursuing its agenda of destroying the economic and social fabric of this country regardless of what people want and need. The latest and most unfortunate example of the government's disregard for Atlantic Canadians and their unique way of life is the current issue of foreign overfishing. It clearly puts into focus the government's goals of satisfying the needs of foreigners while forgetting the people that count most: Canadians, and in this case Atlantic Canadians.

There is one reason why the vital cod stock and the flatfish supplies are dwindling: foreign overfishing by Portuguese and Spanish trawlers. This fact cannot be contested.

• (1945)

What is the government's response to this attack on Canadian sovereignty and Atlantic Canadians way of life? Diplomatic delegations are sent to Europe and the government publicly states that the issue is complex and there are international dimensions to it.

The result of this response is no concrete promise of employment for fishermen and plant processors and a continual increase in the amount of fish caught by these foreigners.

The facts cannot be disputed. The European Community had a northern cod quota of 9,500 tonnes in 1986 and 1987. It has not been allocated any extra quota since that time. However, the EC's catch of northern cod over the six-year period 1986-1991 approaches 250,000 tonnes. In 1986 the European Community fleets caught 62,000 tonnes of northern cod. This amount was almost 30 per cent of the amount caught by Canadians.

More foreign overfishing of Canadian resources simply leads to one inevitable result: The amount of the resource available for Canadians decreases. While the economic costs of this are easy to measure, the human cost is more difficult to quantify.

Atlantic Canadians have always enjoyed a unique culture, a unique outlook and a unique way of life. This has been shaped over time by geography and the type of employment available in the area. As with previous policies however, the government has ignored the special concerns of Atlantic Canadians during the current crisis in the Atlantic fishery by refusing to stand up to foreigners and protecting and promoting the economic and cultural interests of Canadians.

The government always talks about the best social policy available is having a job. When one has a job, one has dignity. People cannot become dependent on government hand-outs at this time of savage budget cuts.

This is probably the one thing the government has stated that makes sense. However when given the opportunity to act on these grand and noble statements such as right now, these actions fall wide of the mark. The government must understand that saying and doing are two entirely different things.

People want action now. However this government is not acting at all in the best interests of the fishermen. Livelihoods are disappearing daily. Canadian sovereignty has blatantly been violated and the government does nothing concrete to secure for Atlantic Canadians that dignity of having that job.

The problem of current foreign overfishing is not simply a localized problem. It cuts to the core of how Canadians view their country and view themselves. The Atlantic fishery plays a vital role in this self-perception. Indeed, the fishery is a national industry. The government appears to forget this every time it allows foreign trawlers to take away jobs in the region.

We usually think of the auto industry of central Canada to be a national industry and therefore worthy of national attention. For example, the auto industry currently employs, or did employ approximately 117,000 people. That is almost precisely the same number of jobs as in the Atlantic fishery in terms of men and women in boats and in plants in the four Atlantic provinces.

This government ignores this fact, as it has forgotten about the region on numerous other occasions. I fear that the destruction of the Atlantic fishery is consistent with the destruction of other so-called sacred trusts, such as universal family allowance. The two are unfortunately part of the government's secret agenda of ruining what it means to be a Canadian.

Today I call upon the Government of Canada to take the interests and the concerns of Atlantic Canadians seriously and finally do what is right. What is right is to give Atlantic Canadians dignity through employment. The only way this can be done is to take strong concrete actions against this foreign overfishing.

In order to achieve this the government should adopt appropriate conservation policies which give Canadians, not foreigners, the ability to get the most access to the vital fish stocks.

• (1950)

The time has come once again for the government to stand up to the foreigners and to help Canadians. The means are readily available. Unilaterally extending Canadian jurisdiction beyond the 200-mile economic zone is one example which would preserve the spirit of the Law of the Sea and come to the aid of Atlantic Canadians.

The issue, therefore, is political will. While the government has previously not had the political will to do what is right for the country, I hope members on the government side can finally convince the government to do what is right this time. Atlantic Canadians unfortunately are running out of time with this government's indifference to the concerns of the people.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I would imagine you and hon. members of the House are curious as to why someone from the middle of the prairies is entering into this specific debate. There are a number of reasons I have something to give to this debate.

The first is the fact that as early as yesterday afternoon our Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology was hearing evidence from the networks of centres of excellence.

A profound presentation was put forward by what is called the open group. It is working out of Dalhousie University studying the problems with the northern cod stocks. It was very interesting. It was enlightening for someone such as myself who comes from the prairies. We looked at how that group is doing a significant amount of work in tracking the small larvae of cod in an ocean. The larvae apparently are only three centimetres long. It is beyond me to figure out how larvae that small can be dissected and through the research programs tell of things that are being done.

The other reason is that I come from Selkirk, Manitoba. I grew up in a fishing community on Lake Winnipeg, which is a big freshwater fish stock. Lake Winnipeg has also had problems with overfishing, lack of fish and an over-demand on the stocks. We too in Manitoba have had a significant problem in trying to restock Lake Winnipeg in particular. We also had a significant fish processing industry.

The difference between the concerns of the members opposite with their fish processing industry and that of my home community, is that ours was taken away because of political will. It was the political will of the Liberal Party. It decided it was more convenient to have the fish processing industry in the city of Winnipeg in a Liberal constituency than it was to have the fish processing industry close to the source of supply in Selkirk, right along the Red River where the fish freighters could bring their catch to processing. But that is history.

I would like to get more significantly into today's debate. Like other of my colleagues, I have some very significant well-detailed presentations. On the strength of these prepared presentations I will carry on. I would like to thank those who took the time to help me put this presentation together.

We know that the hon. member's motion is well-meaning. He is concerned about the state of the northern cod stocks and so are we. He is concerned with foreign overfishing and so are we. We are also very concerned about those affected by the serious problems with the northern cod stocks. As a matter of fact, this government has moved forward with major initiatives on all of these issues.

Before I describe how this government has responded to the northern cod situation, I will say a few words on the issue of jurisdiction. Whether the hon. member talks about custodial jurisdiction for northern cod only, or whether he talks about the full jurisdiction over everything that moves on the continental shelf, at this point in time what he is proposing would be a unilateral action that would not fly in the international community.

Whether or not the hon. member wishes to acknowledge it, Canada is a full-fledged, respectable and respected charter member of this community. Canadians are peacekeepers and we are peacemakers. We are not price-takers. We are committed members of the United Nations, which is a body that has increased its credibility and effectiveness in recent years and continues to do so. Why is this? It is because the nations of the world have decided, as never before, to act together in their common best interests. Canada is working with many countries in the global community to effect the kind of change that the hon. member and all of us would like to see, but it must be done properly. It must be done in such a way as to have the support and concurrence of other nations. Then it can be effective and respective.

We are taking the initiative. We are spearheading a drive to effect the appropriate changes. I hope we can count on the support of the hon. member and his colleagues in order to show the world that Canada is serious and should be supported. That is all I will say for the moment regarding the international initiative.

If I may, however, I will address another side of this very important issue and that is the measures this government has taken to deal with the northern cod situation. On July 2, 1992, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced a two-year moratorium on the northern cod fishery. This was an unprecedented but necessary decision. It may be unprecedented on the northern cod situation but I know that we have had a very similar moratorium in Manitoba with our freshwater fish. The minister arrived at this conclusion only after careful and lengthy deliberation and consultation. It was based on the scientific advice he had received on the disastrous state of the northern cod stock.

All our hon. colleagues and indeed everyone in the country knows that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is a compassionate man. Everyone knows he is forward thinking, pragmatic and fair and I can say on occasion that I think he is rather humorous. It is with no surprise that on July 17 the minister announced a comprehensive program called the Northern Cod Adjustment and Recovery Program, better known as NCARP. This addresses the needs of the people affected by the moratorium and the need for a sustainable resource and economically viable fishery.

The first measure under NCARP was to provide income support payments of up to $406 per week for eligible fishermen and plant workers who were not in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits. This payment is based on the individual average unemployment insurance benefit for each fisherman and plant worker over the last three years. It does not make work nor is it intended to qualify people for unemployment insurance. It is a direct payment by the government completely outside the UI system to provide replacement income during the whole of the two-year moratorium.

The amount of $225 per week is the minimum income support payment for those eligible. There are now some 16,000 people receiving income support under this program. The remaining 8,000 to 9,000 people who qualify for NCARP are for the most part either working or drawing other unemployment insurance benefits.

It has become clear to all the stakeholders in the northern cod fishery that capacity in harvesting and processing far exceeds the limits of the resource. All stakeholders, whether it is the union, the provincial government, the fishermen or plant workers realize that changes must be made. This is important to provide those who remain in the fishery with the opportunity to make adequate incomes in the future while those who leave are provided for.

Fishermen and plant workers who have qualified for NCARP assistance have had five measures to consider. These measures include early retirement for persons 55 years of age and older, license retirement, training outside the fishery and professionalization within the fishery involving training toward certification.

The deadline for these decisions was March 1, 1993. The vast majority of fishermen and plant workers have mailed their option forms back to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. The preliminary results indicate that some 20 per cent have chosen training outside the fishery or early retirement. If an eligible fisherman or plant worker chose early retirement, benefits will continue until age 65. If an eligible fisherman or plant worker takes training outside the fishery, benefits may continue beyond the moratorium, depending on the length of the training. If an eligible fisherman or plant worker pursues training inside the fishery or for those qualified for fishing experience exemption, then the support payments of up to $406 per week will be maintained for the duration of the moratorium.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

It being eight o'clock p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

I want to make two brief comments about the bill, mostly about the procedures. The witnesses were extremely helpful to us in our deliberations and there was complete co-operation of the members. I especially want to single out the clerk of the committee who helped us through some rather ticklish situations. I want it on the record that I do appreciate that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On debate, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank my hon. friend for introducing the motion which of course we oppose.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is not debatable. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no consent. Therefore it is not debatable. I am sorry.

Mr. Riis: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I simply want to make a very short intervention to say why I did not give unanimous consent. Normally we would be inclined to do so.

The wording of the motion my hon. friend has put forward really limits the amount of debate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have heard the terms. I asked for unanimous consent. There was no unanimous consent. There can be no debate on this.

PETITIONS

BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA AND CROATIA

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, subject to Standing Order 36 it is my pleasure and honour to present a petition signed by several hundred residents of Alberta in Edmonton, Calgary and Red Deer dealing with the utter tragedy going on in Bosnia-Hercegovina.

I will just give the substance of the petition as it is very short. The petition states that innocent men, women and children who are ill-equipped to defend themselves continue to be slaughtered in Bosnia-Hercegovina and Croatia by heavily armed aggressors.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to demand that the UN take immediate military action to stop the fighting. Failing that they request the UN arms embargo be lifted so that the victims in Bosnia-Hercegovina and Croatia can be properly equipped to defend themselves. As in duty bound the petitioners will ever pray.

As I say, several hundred people have signed that petition.

VIETNAM

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): I have a second petition. This one relates to Vietnam. The petitioners are mostly from Ottawa, Nepean, Kanata and Montreal. I will just give the conclusion because this petition is longer. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to request the Government of Canada to use its good office to urge the Hanoi government to meet the following legitimate demands as a precondition for economic aid and trade relations.

• (1015)

Abolish the communist dictatorship and establish a democratic and plural political regime in Vietnam; respect human rights and organize free elections under observation by United Nations; and release all political prisoners including religious leaders and members of the former armed forces and government of the republic of Vietnam who are being detained in various concentration camps in the country.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I too have the honour to table a petition forwarded to me by a group of constituents. They are most upset that one million Canadian children are currently living in poverty.

It was not long ago that Canada ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. My constituents are of the opinion that we all have a moral obligation to alleviate child poverty and suffering in Canada.

It would seem to me in this day and age that we as Canadians should be able to take care of our own children. After all, it has been mouthed in this House many times that they are our future. In that sense they are a great investment for our nation.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition that deals with the situation in Bosnia-Hercegovina and Croatia.

These petitioners are demanding that the United Nations take immediate military action to stop the fighting. Failing that, they request that the United Nations arms embargo be lifted so that the victims in Bosnia-Hercegovina and Croatia can be properly equipped to defend themselves.

VIETNAM

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition which deals with the question of human rights in Vietnam.

These petitioners are calling on this House to urge the government to do whatever it can in order to help abolish the communist dictatorship and establish a democratic and free political regime in Vietnam by means of a free election, as well as to urge the present Government of Vietnam to respect human rights and release all of the political prisoners that are presently held.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Federation of Students represents over 450,000 college and university students in Canada. This petition is from the students of universities in Regina and Saskatoon and of the community college system in Saskatchewan and Manitoba..

They call upon the government to eliminate the 3 per cent tax on student loans, increase the weekly loan limit, keep the six months interest subsidy, respect the current limits for minimum course load and maintain the special forgiveness provisions for students with disabilities and the total borrowing time.

They ask the government to amend the Canada Student Loans Program to enhance accessibility, to guarantee 100 per cent of student loans and improve accessibility for part-time students. They fear the new government program which is going to be handled by the banks. They think it might limit accessibility.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, allow me to present a petition from the people of Barraute, Dubuisson, Malartic, Saint-Mathieu, Amos, Landrienne, Rivière-Héva and Val-d'Or in Abitibi, who say that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they incite more violence.

They say in the petition that all toys which incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made. These citizens express the opinion that freedom of the press in reporting acts of violence should be limited and that information on violent acts which is repeated too often on all television stations and on radio can incite others to commit the same acts of violence.

Therefore the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points in order to eliminate violence in our society, so as to protect our children more and ensure a better quality of life for all our fellow citizens.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present petitions on behalf of a number of residents throughout British Columbia. They are deeply concerned about a plan to divert the North Thompson River into the Columbia River basin and consequently sell that Canadian water to the area of San Diego, California.

Members of the First United Church in Kelowna, British Columbia collected these names. They are simply asking the government to ensure that our water will not be sold to the United States through water diversion and that water be identified as an area of exclusion under the North American free trade agreement.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter that is unrelated, once again the petitioners are by and large from Alberta. They state that Canadians wish to designate a day of recognition of Canada's original inhabitants to honour native cultures and that June 21 is the most appropriate day to recognize our First Nations.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to enact Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the aboriginal people of Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 453 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 453—Mr. Flis:

With respect to the total number of contracts awarded to the private sector for consulting services by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), (a) what are the selection criteria (b) how many were awarded to each province during the past five fiscal years?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Seniors)): With respect to the total number of contracts awarded to the private sector for consulting services by the Canadian International Development Agency, the detailed answer is as follows:

(a) Selection Criteria

A unique set of criteria is established for each selection which reflects the particular requirements of the assignment to be contracted. In broad terms, these criteria normally include:

1. Professional and Technical Expertise: this might include the requirement for a professional designation or accreditation (i.e. chartered accountant, engineer, agronomist) specializing in a particular field (i.e. a chartered accountant specializing in the establishment credit systems for small or medium sized firms; or an electrical engineer specializing in alternative sources of heating such as biomass, or new and renewable energy).

Note: CIDA classifies its professional and technical requirements in some 700 different sectors, subsectors and areas of specialization.

2. Experience: might include the number of years of practical experience in a given field; experience in doing similar work—planning, execution, monitoring, evaluation—under similar conditions; international, regional or country-specific experience.

3. Language Capability: The language preference of the recipient country (usually English or French) is the determining factor. There are sometimes requirements for other special language skills, such as Spanish, Portuguese, Mandarin.

4. Availability: This refers to the availability of the recommended consultant to provide the services within a specific time frame i.e to attend a scheduled international forum; to be a member of organized mission team.

5. Cost: In keeping with government contracting policies and practices, CIDA seeks to obtain the best value for the Crown (best services at a fair market price).

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—CANADIAN YOUTH

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk) moved:

That this House condemns the government for policies regarding jobs and job creation, post-secondary education and job training and retraining that are having the effect of robbing a whole generation of young Canadians of their legitimate aspirations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to speak on our opposition day motion today:

That this House condemns the government for policies regarding jobs and job creation, post-secondary education and job training and retraining that are having the effect of robbing a whole generation of young Canadians of their legitimate aspirations.

Undoubtedly a crisis faces young Canadians today which this country can no longer afford and we as members of Parliament can no longer afford to relegate these youth issues to the bottom of the political agenda. For this reason, I welcome the opportunity that this opposition day motion gives us. It allows us to bring to light many of the problems facing these young Canadians.

I would like to begin by putting a question to my colleagues on the other side. How many times have we heard that young Canadians are this country's greatest asset and our greatest resource, that they represent the future? Unfortunately our future, the youth of this country, have lost hope. They are demoralized. They are marginalized. They are a lost generation. They are generation x.

The problems facing young people in Canada today are overwhelming: acute unemployment of close to 18 per cent; fears over job security and changing labour requirements; drastic cuts to education; inadequate skills to cope with increasingly technological change and a knowledge based economy; over a 30 per cent high school drop-out rate; a dramatic increase in the number of street kids; drugs and sexually transmitted diseases; and finally, a lack of direction or coherent government policies to deal with these problems.

The youth of this country feel lost and alone and they are tired of government inaction. They know what the problems are and they know what the solutions are. The time for action is now.

Chronic youth unemployment and under-employment has demoralized the young people of this country. In fact the biggest problem facing youth today is unemployment. As a country, we need to give back to Canadians purpose and hope. We need to get them back to work.

Unfortunately there is a present void in our government's youth policy in this area. Why? Because the government has never explicitly stated a specific policy geared to putting youth back to work. In other words, they have no game plan to get Canadians working again.

I believe that for young people today, no other policy program is more important than getting them a first job. We know that on-the-job experience is a critical part of developing marketable labour and skills. Of course, the problems facing young Canadians today is that they have not been able to get that first job. Otherwise, they tend to be marginalized until there remains but one big question: How do we get young Canadians working again? How do they get that all-important first job? How do we give them back that hope and confidence and let them know that this country cares about their future?

In the short term, young people can be put to work. They can be put to work to do environmental and community based service. A Canadian environmental youth corps would give young people the opportunity to participate in environmental rehabilitation and education projects. I feel this would be an investment, not only in our youth but in our communities which are today suffering. To give young people career experience, summer employment opportunities must be maintained by the government. In fact, the government must acknowledge that giving youth summer job experience is an investment in our future.

Since 1985 the Challenge program which has provided summer job opportunities has been slashed by more than half. In 1985 it was $205 million, today it is $101.9 million.

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, if we are serious about any future jobs for our young Canadians, we need to give more importance to these summer job experiences and first-time jobs for students.

What about the long term? What are the long-term prospects for our Canadian youth? What are the challenges that this country, especially its young people, face going into the next century? The fact is that this country is undergoing extensive restructuring as world economies become increasingly integrated. We are told that we must face globalization, that we must be ready for change.

Therefore, the greatest challenge facing Canada and Canadians will be to become more competitive and a more innovative country. However, as this country has been slow to respond to this international challenge it represents more of a problem for today's youth, both in the short and the long term.

The biggest problem facing youth today is unemployment, specifically structural unemployment. This means that the demand for labour is changing faster than the supply of labour can adapt. This is problematic for our young people because although there is demand for high-tech, high-skilled jobs, young people do not have the training for these jobs and they cannot compete.

It stands to reason that until we give our young people the tools they need in order to compete, they will be condemned to remain in the marginal aspects. They will remain marginal workers taking temporary, low-skilled and low-paying jobs with little job security. Imagine the feeling of low self-esteem resulting from being chronically unemployed. It is ironic, is it not? The future of this country, our youth, feel that they have no future.

We should not lose sight of the implications of high youth unemployment, both on the victims and on Canada's future competitiveness. How do we become more competitive? How do we change the mind-set of a country that seems slow to adapt to this change? How do we encourage Canadians to embrace the technology of an information economy as opposed to resources and manufacturing?

In my opinion, education and continuing education is the basis of a productive and competitive society. If we want to compete globally we must place a high priority on education. Canada's commitment to education must be unequivocal. It is fair to say that our poor economy and our future prospects are tied to the quality of our education system. Therefore, a revamped education system must be ready to give young people better job-related training to help them beat the vicious cycle of structural unemployment.

First, some fundamental problems must be addressed, and these problems are obvious. Federal government cuts in transfers to the provinces have left provincial treasuries empty with little choice but to make drastic cuts in important areas such as education. Within the school system teaching must be ready to adapt to the many changes that are going to take place over the next decade.

We also have to acknowledge that two-thirds of graduating high school students do not go on to university or to post-secondary education. This represents a large pool of untapped resources that do not see conventional post-secondary education as a viable option. Because our secondary schools are oriented toward academic subjects and because our school system does not encourage vocational programs, there are thousands and thousands of students who feel that they have been given no practical alternatives within this system. This represents a tragic waste of potential.

Only about 10 per cent of students are enrolled in apprenticeship programs. Moreover, the present apprenticeship program system is highly concentrated in manufacturing and construction trades, instead of meeting the growing demands of the technological revolution.

Between 1996 and the year 2000 the percentage of the work force requiring high-skilled jobs is going to increase from 45 per cent to 64 per cent. However, the percentage of Canadians actually acquiring high-skilled training is declining. Think about it. We are simply not prepared for the next century. It is today's young people, the youth of this country who are going to suffer.

Therefore, in order to effectively target educational resources and new and changing demands in government, we must create a national apprenticeship training program. This would enable our young people to acquire the specialized fields they are going to need for the jobs of tomorrow, something that universities today do not seem to be able to provide.

A change in the educational system must also include an extension of co-operative education. A promoted and expanded co-operative education program would bring together government, business and labour to give these young people a career experience that is essential for their futures.

Moreover co-operative education, besides giving valuable work experience, provides students with the ability to finance their education and it is therefore cost effective for governments. It also gives youth opportunity to understand their discipline and to improve their ties within the corporate community. For government, co-op education gives all partners—government, business, labour and our local communities—a chance to work together in the best interests of Canada's young people. As we become more competitive we must learn how to consult and to collaborate with one another.

Obviously there is a correlation between education, the quality of the labour market and the performance of our economy. For this reason government along with all players must act quickly because the education system in this country is simply not ready for the changes and the challenges of tomorrow.

I would like to take a moment to talk about the unique challenges of rural youth. It has become apparent to all Canadians that small rural communities across this country are in a state of decline. It includes fishing communities in Newfoundland, it includes farming communities all over Canada, including my riding of Haldimand-Norfolk and other resource based towns.

Sadly, rural Canada increasingly cannot retain its young people. Rural youth feel that they have no choice but to leave their homes and to leave their communities. In many cases the education system can be blamed for the way that it socializes people off the farm or away from the fishing community. Of course many young Canadians leave their communities with the hope of finding jobs. Unfortunately high unemployment is both an urban and a rural problem and even when they leave these homes they do not seem to find jobs.

As I have already noted, education skills experience is needed for most of today's jobs. Many young people from rural communities end up on the streets. In fact, we were told in our task force hearings across the country that one-third of the homeless youth in urban centres come from small town Canada. They come out of small towns and end up on the streets of these urban centres.

The point is that we on all sides of this House from all parts of Canada must consider very seriously the crisis facing rural Canada and the implications of a decaying rural infrastructure and the effect that has on our rural youth. We have to come together and develop strategies to deal with this.

It is time for all Canadians to realize that rural Canada is a vital and an integral part of a strong and united Canada. We cannot afford to lose our young people.

Government is always key to restoring hope to a country hit hard by tough economic times. It is government that must take a leadership role. The private sector has been slow to respond and to adapt to the changes facing this country. I believe in the short term government can be the engine of economic growth because government sets an example for the rest of the country.

If we want Canadians to start spending again, if we want the private sector to be ready for the challenges of globalization and if we want to show young Canadians that we care about their future, then we have to show them that government is willing to act and take the initiative.

Government should not have to apologize for discriminate spending in this area because fiscal responsibility means more than just slashing and cutting. It means more than just a bottom line because once this country, especially its young people, loses confidence and hope then bottom-line fiscal policy means very little. For young Canadians the prospect of a strong economy restores the sense of confidence in what their country can do for them, both in the long and the short term.

Young people are worried. They are also worried about the deficit and debt reduction. After all, they are the ones who are going to have to deal with them. I do concede that there is a temptation within governments to indiscriminately spend, and this must be tempered by fiscal responsibility and a consideration of our long-term goals and objectives.

However, I maintain that the best way to restore hope in young Canadians is to give them back their lost sense of pride, their confidence and their self-esteem. To get them working again is to empower them and to give them back all they have lost.

All Canadians, not just government, must take more seriously these challenges facing young Canadians. Governments must work co-operatively with, each other, business, labour and local communities to develop these policies and programs geared toward young people.

Working co-operatively means pulling together to find constructive solutions. Instead of arguing about who is to blame we have to concentrate on constructive ways to solve this problem and get young Canadians working again, because young Canadians need solutions now.

If we continue to ignore the problems of generation x we risk losing the unlimited potential of an entire generation of Canadians. We have to be willing to invest in our future. We have to give young Canadians a renewed sense of hope and confidence. After all, this is our future we are talking about.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I understand that Germany produces 400,000 apprenticeships a year. I think Canada produces 24,000. Could the member make some comments as to how we might try to catch up to Germany and start to do more for youth who are not, for one reason or another, able to go to university or pursue post-secondary education?

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for that question. He does bring to light one of the examples that we have seen as we have studied this issue across the country. We went across this country and talked to all Canadians about it. A number of people mentioned the German experience.

The real fact of the matter is that Germany creates more of these jobs for almost half of the money we spend in this country. It not only has more apprenticeship spots, it not only has people who come out of this system trained not only in the construction or manufacturing trades but in those jobs of the future such as the high-tech and biotech areas, but it does so for half the money we spend.

We as a country need to seriously examine this area because it is money well spent. It is an investment in our young people, and it is an investment that does not cost Canadians a lot of money.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, there are approximately 960,000 small businesses in this country right now. They represent the greatest hope for new job creation because most of the larger corporations are downsizing and restructuring. I know that the minister responsible for small businesses supports this position.

• (1040)

I would like to ask the hon. member a question in light of the fact that there are so many of these small businesses right now struggling to make ends meet and stay viable, and many of the entrepreneurs who are operating these small businesses are working 70 to 80 hours a week and sometimes six or seven days a week, while at the same time there are close to 400,000 young people, some of whom have just graduated from school, who are basically sitting at home because there is not a lot of job opportunities out there and so we are disbursing close to $8 billion to $10 billion through unemployment insurance and welfare.

Would it not be a much better approach to try to link the job creation program for youth directly to the small business sector? The person working with the small business person would be learning a skill. That person would be learning a craft, a trade or some sense of business practice and entrepreneurship. Would it not be a much better approach to link those people who are unemployed with the small business sector of this country?

For probably an extra couple of thousand dollars on top of what we are already paying in welfare we would not only be giving people this new skill and opportunity but would also be returning their dignity to them.

I wonder if our party's critic for youth could respond to that.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his input. He is always talking about small business and this is one of the areas in which small business can play a key role.

We do allow small businesses to have students through the SEED program, albeit the money has been cut off in that area. The hon. member knows, because he brought this to my attention, that small businesses are the people who are training Canadians today. We could increase the money going into training because it would help young Canadians by giving them their first job experience and it would help small businesses by giving them trained people and people to help them.

I know the hon. member knows this, but I want to bring to the House's attention that a 1991 report by the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology said that the average Canadian worker currently receives only seven hours of training annually. Compare that to 17 hours in Australia, 170 hours in Sweden, or 200 hours in Japan; and we are wondering why we are lagging behind in this country.

It is not small business that is lagging behind because it is doing its fair share. Both government and big business in this country are going to have to sit down and address not only the needs of Canadian youth being trained but the needs of businesses for the future.

It is they that lack these people with training. There is a complete lack of training in jobs, the government says so itself. It says that there are thousands of jobs that cannot be filled because Canadians are not trained for those jobs.

The time is now. Germany, for instance, has within the last three years increased its funding in this area by some 45 per cent while we in Canada have slashed ours. Germany knows the answer. Japan knows the answer. Sweden knows the answer. It is time this country did what was right and discovered the answer.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe that we have a very serious subject to discuss here today.

I thank the hon. member for raising the issue. Of course I do not agree with the wording of the motion as it was put by the hon. member. I could be tempted to underline that I sense a little partisanship in the wording, but notwithstanding that I believe it is an important subject worth discussion in this House.

Mr. Mills: And you've never been partisan?

Mr. Cadieux: Absolutely not, but I am thinking about it. That being said, it is important to raise these issues and to discuss them.

• (1045)

The wording of the motion gives the impression that this government has done absolutely nothing with respect to the youth situation in Canada. I regret that my hon. friend has taken that slant, which is that nothing has been done and consequently it is a desperate situation. I do not think it is an ideal situation but it is certainly not a desperate one.

The best way for me to respond to such a wrongly worded motion is to review a few of the things we are doing to help young Canadians. I know that my time is limited and I will not be able to touch on all the subjects, but I am sure that my colleagues who will be addressing this important question today will complete the list of programs and initiatives of this government with respect to youth in Canada.

Let me begin by pointing out that despite the tough economic conditions that we have been experiencing the 17.8 per cent youth unemployment rate in 1992, which is totally unacceptable, was below the historical high of 19.8 per cent in 1983 when by coincidence my friend's party formed the government.

The gap between the general unemployment rate and the youth unemployment rate is lower now than it was between 1981 and 1982, also a period of Liberal government.

As well, the youth unemployment rate fell to 16.7 per cent last month at a time when there were 4,000 more young Canadians active in the labour force than in the previous month. This was the result of strong employment growth and a decline in unemployment.

Employment and Immigration Canada knows the employment situation in this country better than anyone and it also knows better than anyone how to help young Canadians find their feet in a rapidly changing labour market.

We know that two-thirds of all jobs created in Canada during this decade will require a level of education beyond Grade 12. We know that 40 per cent of these jobs will require at least five years of post-secondary education. Nevertheless, we know that nevertheless, more than 100,000 young people drop out of high school every year. This represents a national dropout rate of about 30 per cent.

So what are we doing about it? Let us look at some of the ways in which Employment and Immigration Canada tries to help the young people of this country.

[English]

The first step in preparing for employment is a good education. We launched a five-year $296.4 million stay-in-school initiative, which is now concluding its fourth year of operation. Stay-in-school is a national dropout prevention strategy comprising three components: public awareness, mobilization of stakeholders, and programs and services.

Stay in school programs and services aimed at young people at risk of dropping out are delivered under START. Funded under the national stay-in-school initiative, the START option provides funding for a variety of labour market programs and services designed to keep high school students from dropping out.

Business, community organizations, municipal governments, public health or education institutions and band councils all co-operate with Employment and Immigration Canada in START initiatives.

START activities include many innovative approaches aimed at giving young participants life skills training, personal financial management ability and work experience.

[Translation]

Because we must keep working at reducing this 30 per cent dropout rate—even during the summer holidays—about 420 student employment centres are open during the summer. This year we will celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the centres, which were created to help young people find summer jobs.

Canada Employment Centres for Students help students find jobs and they help employers find workers. The staff in these centres are university students themselves. Their job is to offer students the practical guidance they need to find a job, including advice on how to look for work, draft a curriculum vitae and prepare for an interview.

• (1050)

Canada Employment Centres for Students also offer information on various federal and provincial programs. In 1992 the centres made more than 171,500 placements across the country. In addition, more than 106,200 people took advantage of information sessions organized by the centres.

The Canada Employment Centres for Students also help employers. The centres offer direct access to placement and posting services as well as information on remuneration levels, federal and provincial legislation and programs for young people, and information on the number of students available.

We are understandably proud of our efforts and success in this field.

[English]

Take the challenge program which has helped tens of thousands of students locate summer employment since 1985. Challenge helps students gain practical work experience that will assist them to make the transition from school to work. It encourages employers to create jobs and to sponsor on-the-job training for young people.

Challenge '93 will maintain a strong link to the national stay- in-school initiative. It focuses on helping those who have the most problems finding work. Employers are encouraged to hire high school students who traditionally have the most trouble in finding summer jobs.

Challenge offers five options to employers, students and young people. SEED, the Summer Employment Experience Development option, provides wage subsidies to employers to create summer jobs for students. As far as possible, SEED complements provincial and territorial student employment programs, a co-operative process started under this government in 1985.

Last month, I announced that $88 million will be spent on the Summer Employment Experience Development component of Challenge '93. That is an increase of $5.1 million over the amount set aside last year for SEED.

I also decided to extend for one week, until March 19—tomorrow—the deadline for applying under SEED. By extending the deadline and increasing funding, we want to encourage employers in the private sector to create as many summer jobs as possible this year.

We believe employers realize that by creating summer jobs for students, they are helping Canada's labour force of the future. Despite the prevailing economic climate, students should not give up on finding a job.

We also increased funding for the Student Business Loan Program, from $0.9 million to $1.14 million.

The purpose of the Student Business Loan Program is to help young people who would like to start a business to create their own summer jobs. Under the program, students can get loans of up to $3,000 to operate their own small business during the summer.

In 1985, first year of the program 101 loans were approved and 229 summer jobs were created. In 1992, the number of loans approved was 995 and as a result 2,218 students were able to find summer jobs.

This component is offered through the Federal Business Development Bank, in co-operation with the Royal Bank of Canada and the National Bank of Canada.

This year British Columbia will join the group of provinces that offer this component of the Challenge Program: Newfoundland, Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the two territories.

[English]

The business drive for jobs is a collaborative effort by business organizations and companies to challenge their members and the business community to create additional employment for students during the summer without using government wage subsidies.

• (1055)

With its local hiring emphasis the business drive for jobs helps both students and employers. Students gain work experience and learn about career opportunities in local businesses. By the same token, the employers are introduced to potential future employees.

Another challenge option is the Native Internship Program which creates employment opportunities within Employment and Immigration Canada offices for aboriginal students. It is designed to enhance the job search skills of participants and to introduce them to public service as a possible career.

Another of EIC's youth initiatives is the co-operative education program which channels funds to educational institutions to assist them in running provincially approved work-study programs.

Last August I announced almost $25 million in new funding for co-operative education for the period 1992-96. This is an increase of about $4.5 million over the 1991-95 allocation. It will go toward co-operative education programs at 135 secondary and post-secondary institutions across Canada.

As I said at the time, co-operative education plays a significant role in helping young people gain valuable work-related experience. It is an important bridge between the classroom and the labour market.

Altogether, EIC programs specifically for young people, including stay in school, co-operative education and SEED, spent over $211 million nationally in 1992-93 helping young people find temporary employment and preparing them for full-time participation in the labour force. This is on top of our regular employment and training programs that are also widely used by young people.

We are accused of not keeping our commitments to the young people of this country. I disagree. We also have agreements with Newfoundland and New Brunswick concerning the Youth Strategy. These agreements were first signed in 1988 to help young people in these provinces continue their education and get the training and experience they need.

Perhaps the hon. member would care to explain to 17,600 young people in New Brunswick who took advantage of services provided by access centres financed jointly by the federal and provincial governments in what way this government has failed to meet its commitments. These centres offer young people counselling and evaluation services and direct them to training, study and job creation programs offered by the federal and provincial governments. Most of the young people who come to the access centres are between 15 and 24 years old. About 45 per cent dropped out of high school very early on and need basic training.

When we asked young people whether they had a place to go to talk about jobs, training, education or personal problems before the access centres were created, 64 per cent of the young men and 71 per cent of the young women replied they did not. When asked whether they were satisfied with the help they received at the centres, 86 per cent of the young men and 90 per cent of the young women said they were satisfied or very satisfied.

[English]

I suggest the hon. member talk to these Canadians.

Federal and provincial contributions for the Newfoundland agreement total $56.5 million of which $39.5 million represents federal contributions. As of late 1992 there were approximately 2,200 participants actively involved in Youth Strategy projects in Newfoundland. A total of 9,500 youth had participated directly in projects sponsored under the Youth Strategies since 1988-89 and another estimated 50,000 youth have been directly affected by these projects.

These are just a few of the ongoing efforts by this government to help Canada's young people. Rather than "robbing" young Canadians as the motion alleges, this government has moved to do precisely what needs to be done.

• (1100)

Of course we need a competent and highly qualified labour force. Of course the government is concerned about the problems facing young Canadians on the labour market.

What will the future be? There will be stimulating opportunities, but also certain realities that will be more difficult to cope with. Young Canadians can choose from a range of more than 15,000 occupations and a wealth of innovative courses that will help them acquire the knowledge and skills they need.

On the other hand, the labour market is becoming increasingly complex. Because of global competition and new technologies, Canada's labour force of the future will have to meet tougher standards. Today's youth will have to stay in school longer and have more skills than past generations. To be competitive students must have a solid grounding in mathematics, languages and science.

As I just explained, we are doing what has to be done to help the young people of this country prepare for the challenges of a constantly changing world. We are certain that our young people and the entire country will be able to meet these challenges.

[English]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the minister spoke about problems of financing. The government has found $5.8 billion for helicopters which chase submarines. Does he know that if that money were spent on things like youth programs, I am told there would be up to 75 times more jobs created. That is if the money were spent that way rather than on submarine-chasing helicopters.

I must say to the minister that I fully support this program, which is intended to help people continue their education. But can he quote any figures to indicate the level of funding for this program? Does the program have any funds left, and which regions will be able to take advantage of this funding? Apparently there is a lack of funding in some of Canada's regions.

Finally, I also have a question about the school dropout rate. I will quote what was said in Agenda for Youth, a report by the Liberal Senate and House Committee on Youth, published three months ago. It indicates, for instance, the partial illiteracy rate among individuals between the ages of 16 and 34 and born in Canada. Among young people between the ages of 16 and 24, the illiteracy rate is almost 30 per cent, while innumeracy is almost 45 per cent. Among 25-year-olds the illiteracy rate is nearly 20 per cent, while innumeracy is about 30 per cent.

What do the minister and the government opposite intend to do in this rapidly changing world, to deal with this effectively—and I am not talking about what they said they would do, because it is easy to say a lot of nice words that don't mean much—what will they actually do to help young people across Canada?

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Speaker, in concluding the hon. member said that nice words are not enough. That is quite true. We are accustomed to hearing that sort of thing from hon. members opposite, words that fail to offer any solution whatever. For instance, the Official Opposition wants to get rid of the GST but they will not tell us now what alternative they have in mind and how much it will cost Canadian taxpayers.

That being said, I agree with my hon. friend that words are not enough, and if he had listened to all 20 minutes of my speech in which I mentioned some of the practical steps that have been taken by the Government of Canada to help the young people of this country he probably would not have put his question. But he did, which again goes to show that to them what you say is more important than what you do, although they would never admit it.

Again, I regret the fact that my hon. friend, and I assume this is part of their strategy, tried to compare the helicopter program—because that is what he was referring to—to other programs in other envelopes of this government. I may remind him that although these are hard times, the government invested—and I am getting back to his second question—$296 million in the Stay in School Program to deal with a very serious problem. I don't think we should play politics with the high school dropout rate in this country, since these young people are tomorrow's labour force and some of them will take our seats in this House.

We must do something about this fundamental problem. Education will provide the necessary tools to meet the challenges of the future in a rapidly changing world, a global economy, and a world of fierce competition. We must concentrate our efforts on dealing with this problem. The hon. member would have Canadians believe that the Challenge budget was cut in half, but he is wrong, Mr. Speaker, There was some redeployment of funding within the program in order to focus on the fundamental problem: the school dropout rate. However, the other initiatives and options in the program are there to deal with other problems. Yes, funding is still available. This is a five-year program, and we allocate funding by region, as we have done since the beginning of the program.

[English]

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister. He has laid out for us some of the initiatives the government has taken. I am somewhat surprised he did not mention the fact that in the late seventies and early eighties when the Liberals formed the government they began the process of cutting back on transfers to the provinces. They began the process of capping the transfers.

Research we have done into this seems to indicate that the major provinces, those that are seen to be healthy, had the biggest change in funding. In the province of Ontario that amounts to something like $4.4 billion in different types of funding that has been removed from the province's budget.

I am surprised that the minister did not at least acknowledge that the Liberal government began this process. It is true that his government has embellished it, but when one makes a major structural financial change such as that in how schools are funded, how can one possibly be surprised and shocked that the drop-out rates have escalated, that illiteracy continues to flourish and that children still live in poverty? When one initiates a major fiscal change such as the Liberals did the end result of that surely is obvious. All of the resultant problems are right there in our educational system today.

I am somewhat surprised that the minister did not even give credit where the credit is due, to the Liberal Party of Canada.

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated a little earlier, I do not fall easily into partisanship and I am taken somewhat by surprise at having to arbitrate debate. From what I can understand, that would be better addressed between my friends on the other side.

I am sure that during the day, acknowledging that we have done everything that had to be done, they could pursue the discussion among themselves to find out what went wrong in the seventies and the eighties, or perhaps what is going wrong in Ontario today. However, I absolutely do not want to deal with that specific issue. I will leave that to hon. members to debate among themselves.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will make my question short.

The problem we have is that the minister gets up and talks about all the programs the government has been responsible for initiating, all the statistics and all the numbers. The problem is that there is a difference between what is happening in the programs and what is going on in reality.

• (1110)

I am convinced that the lack of action on these programs is something that many members of Parliament are not focusing on. There are a lot of good programs in the Government of Canada and some of them go back many years. They are not just Conservative programs, a lot of good programs are Liberal programs. But we are having a problem today actioning these programs.

We have these kids out on the street who hear about the Challenge program or the retraining programs but when they go to either fill out the forms or try to get involved in one of them they come back empty. What they are asking is: "What good are all these programs"?

It is not unlike the Small Businesses Loans Act. I have been made to look almost like a fool in the last two weeks by the government promoting the Small Businesses Loans Act. It sends the small businessmen to the local banks and they come back not knowing anything about it because the government has not actioned its own policy.

I wonder if the minister would care to react to that and maybe in the spirit of non-partisanship admit that even though there are some good programs in the hopper, they are not being implemented fully.

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend raises a few interesting points. Some of them I am prepared to acknowledge. It is true that some of the programs in place right now were in place before this government came to office. Because those few we kept were good, we have enhanced them and maintained them. I am prepared to admit that.

We have also brought in the other programs that go hand in hand with those in order to give the greatest number of opportunities to our young people.

When my friend suggests that there are some programs that are either misunderstood or perhaps even not applied, that is probably true. In some cases it is because programs have been changed or are in the process of being changed. Perhaps some people, rightly or wrongly, did not get the appropriate information at the right time to respond to the people to whom my friend is referring. That of course has to be corrected.

There is absolutely no question that if the programs need to be enhanced or corrected this minister is prepared to look at that very seriously. In fact, the prosperity initiative is going to permit us to do more in order to make sure that all of our initiatives address the entire picture, not just piece by piece. Sometimes the puzzle does not fit.

I think we all agree that we need the appropriate education, the appropriate training programs, the appropriate initiatives and also the connection between all this, particularly to address the step between school, college, university and the labour force. This has to be ironed out and the prosperity initiatives address that. The means and needs are going to be put in place in order to make sure that the system works and works properly.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have this opportunity once more to participate in a debate on policies which are designed to provide young people with some answers to some of the serious problems of employment and social and economic dislocation that they face these days.

I suppose the point at which to begin this debate is to refer to the year 1985. That year was declared by the United Nations to be International Youth Year. I led a New Democratic task force on youth that went across the country talking to young people that year. They were given an opportunity to express their views on what their concerns were at the time and what the solutions might be.

It should be understood that one of the concerns within the United Nations was that in the industrial nations of the world there were accumulating large numbers of unemployed youth, youth who not only did not have jobs but who had very little prospect of jobs. There was concern that not having jobs would ultimately lead to a group within society that would constitute a serious social problem.

At that time, the government also sponsored a number of youth fora across the country within the context of International Youth Year. A number of us in this House attempted to get the government to introduce a coherent youth policy. We just heard the minister say that the prosperity initiative was somehow going to address the issue of a coherent youth policy. That just demonstrates one thing: that the government at the time, having made the promise it would adopt a youth policy that would address the issue of youth unemployment, failed to meet its promise. Now in 1993 we have yet another promise that will address the issue. There could be no clearer, more dramatic demonstration of the failure of this government's policies with respect to youth.

The report provided by Stats Canada in January entitled "Labour Market Trends for Youth 1989 to 1992" is interesting because it corresponds to the introduction of the free trade agreement as well as the beginning of the recession, really a depression, that exist now.

No matter what the minister may have said about the immediate short-term gains in youth employment, the fact is that between 1989 and 1992 youth unemployment rose from 11 per cent to 19.3 per cent. Unemployment among youth grew from 303,000 in 1989 to 431,000 in 1992, beginning to mimic the situation in the years 1984 and 1985.

What I think is significant in all of this is not only that youth unemployment has increased, but the number of youth who are looking for jobs, that is the number of youth in the labour force, has dropped. This is an expression of the hopelessness that plagues youth these days, that same kind of hopelessness which was identified back in 1984 and 1985.

We can refer to another bit of information which has been given broad public debate and discussion in recent months and that is the appearance of generation x. It is the product, the predicted product, of the failure of the governments of the eighties, including this government, in 1984, 1985 and continuing to this day. Unless something dramatic is done we may face yet another kind of generation, perhaps generation omega, those who are completely through and those who are completely disillusioned, disenfranchised and disempowered and consider themselves outside the pale.

The fact is that we have a serious unemployment rate. We have a serious problem with respect to the ability of young people to adapt to the new knowledge-based economy we now face.

We identified dramatic changes in 1985 in our task force report which have to be addressed. Youth must be prepared, but those initiatives simply have not taken place.

It is interesting to recall that just a few days ago the House justice committee published a report in which it indicated that if one really wants to address the issue of crime prevention in Canada, one has to focus increasingly on young people at risk and the underlying social economic factors associated with crime and criminality.

Certainly, if we are going to address crime then we have to address its roots. Crime is one of the expressions of the disillusionment and disenfranchisement of young people. Since 1984, the year before International Youth Year, there has been a 405 per cent increase in violent crime committed by youth. In general it would be too simple to describe it in these terms, but at least in part it is an expression of the frustration that inevitably will come to young people who are looking for jobs in the absence of any coherent policy to provide them with jobs and the training for those jobs in a population that has a 30 per cent innumeracy and illiteracy rate, which is an issue that has not been adequately addressed.

It has to be admitted that the illiteracy rate among youth is no higher than the general population, but in this day and age one would expect the educational system to provide better preparation than that. There is a 35 per cent drop-out rate in our school system. That reflects some of the concerns we heard when we had our task force. Youth thought their schools served them poorly. For example, we found, insofar as vocational counselling was concerned, that the average high school student in this country faces a situation in which there is one counsellor for each 1,000 or 2,000 students. They need more help in that regard. They also said they wanted more co-operative programs and more work experience programs associated with schooling at the high school level.

There were a number of things that we suggested should be done at the time. Among those was to increase the funding available for co-operative and work experience programs. More important, we suggested a number of approaches to improve the situation with respect to training and education for youth. I will come to these in a moment.

We heard the minister bragging about the tremendous initiatives this government has undertaken. I have already indicated that this government's youth policies have been a failure. One might wonder why, in view of the large number and diversity of programs cited by the ministers, they are nevertheless inadequate. Well, they seem to have multiplied in a very peculiar way; they have increased in number but decreased in size.

We heard the minister, and it bothered me immensely, brag about the youth employment centres. The youth employment centres on college campuses right across this country have been closed down. We heard him talk about the Canadian Jobs Strategy and what contributions it was making to youth training and retraining. The fact is that while the Canadian Jobs Strategy, to an extent of 40 per cent, serves youth the government has cut $200 million from that program. It multiplied the programs and decreased the resources.

We heard the minister talk about the SEED program and the Challenge program. This is one area where we must concede to the Liberals. When this government came into office it cut the amount of money available for student summer employment from $240 million ultimately to $180 million right now.

We heard him talk about the SEED program. We heard him talk about co-operative programs. In order to fund work experience or co-operative programs for high school students the government took money from the SEED program and shifted it over to the high school level, resulting in $140 million being cut to $80 million for the SEED program. We heard the minister say that the SEED program has been increased from $80 million to $88 million over the last four years. While all that was going on the unemployment rate has almost doubled for young people, particularly in the summer.

That is hardly a record to stand before this House and brag about. We have heard my colleague mention what the government has done with respect to its obligations for post-secondary education. The accumulated cuts to the university and college system as a result of this government's actions, as well as those of the Liberal government before it, will amount to about $10 billion in a decade.

What is the result of that? The result is that universities find themselves severely cash-strapped. Libraries are in a state of deterioration. Laboratories are using archaic microscopes. I dare say that if the present trend continues the microscope of Antoni van Leeuwenhoek will be used in some of the laboratories of this country.

Not only are students gaining access to a university and a college system that cannot do a good job of preparing students for a new technological future, but to get there it costs more. Tuition fees have increased right across this country. I will give some examples. Between 1985-86 and 1991-1992 tuition for engineering undergraduates increased 145 per cent at McGill, 82 per cent at the University of Saskatchewan, and 92 per cent at Simon Fraser.

Meanwhile, because of these increased tuition costs 70,000 students were turned away from the universities and colleges of this nation last year.

This government's policies, which are intended to encourage university graduation and encourage students to gain an education, have resulted in a situation as a result of the real actions of this government in which on many campuses there are food banks. There are food banks at the University of Toronto, Simon Fraser University, the University of Manitoba, the University of Alberta and Dalhousie University.

Where do students from ordinary families get the funding to go to university or college? They get it from the Canada Student Loans Program. What is happening to that? This government is in the process of making it worse and worse. Just recently Bill C-76 passed through this House. Let me just mention something about Bill C-76 and the promises the government made back in 1985 about consultation and concern about youth. That bill went to a legislative committee which refused to hear from students, refused to hear what students would say about the fact that this government had imposed a 3 per cent tax on student loans and then turned around and eliminated the six-month interest-free period.

The government tried to make it sound good by promising those same students that the 3 per cent tax on student loans, which means that a student goes in and borrows a couple of thousand dollars and before he can get it home must pay $60 out of his pocket right then and there, would be eliminated when it eliminated the interest-free period. It did not do that.

Students have had the government stick its hands in their pockets for a total of about $70 million in additional costs to students across this country for a program which is supposed to encourage accessibility to universities.

Now it intends to make it a single bank program in which student loans would be made available on the same basis as any other private loan, a single bank perhaps will do it. It is going to insist that a student carry at least 80 per cent of a full load thus making it more and more difficult for part-time students to gain access to university. This government has a lot of nerve coming into this House and bragging about what it has done for young people, who are hurting right across this country.

We urgently need a coherent, broadly-based program to eliminate illiteracy among youth, to ensure that every child in this country, as our party suggests, will have access in this new socio-economic environment to the necessary preparation for school through a broadly-based increase in the availability of day care, not day care for just care but day care for education.

We need a program that will provide broader access to work experience such as the national community youth service that we suggested. We need a program that will provide funding, as we suggested in our task force report, for youth between the ages of 18 and 24 for two years to make it possible for them to go to college or university, to engage in entrepreneurship, to be retrained or to take apprenticeship for two years. That would ensure that more and more of our youth would have access to a reasonable choice about what kind of training or educational alternatives, and therefore vocations, are suitable to them and it would not be dictated by their ability to pay. These are the kinds of programs we need.

Mr. Speaker, if you want to see a government that is interested in youth then contrast the cutbacks by this federal government to the 70 per cent increase in youth training funds in Ontario, to the JOY program of last summer which appealed to so many young people.

I want to congratulate the Liberals for having introduced this motion. I want to congratulate them for having had a report on the needs of youth. That report was an excellent report in reporting the needs but it was very short on describing the solutions. They are calling the kettle black when they accuse this government of not having policies. They came late to the scene.

I hope in identifying the problems as the Liberals have in that report and in condemning the government for what it has done that they will do in this area what they have not done in very many areas, and that is come up with policies that will address the issues they have raised in more specific terms than they seem inclined to do.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I listened very closely to what my hon. colleague was saying. I would like to ask him about his colleague at Queen's Park, the premier of Ontario. They both are members of the same political party. I would like him to comment on some of the actions taken by Mr. Rae with regard to students.

The member knows that education is primarily a provincial responsibility. As I understand it, his friend and colleague, Mr. Rae, the premier of Ontario, has cut back on funding for students wishing to attend post-secondary institutions. That is the first part of my question.

Second, I would like to have the member comment on what it would cost to implement some of the very worth-while programs he was suggesting a few moments ago. I do not think there is much disagreement in this House with regard to some of these programs. However, the NDP are quick to suggest new programs but very rarely does it attach a price tag to any of these specific programs. Is it any wonder that the NDP is so lacking in credibility when it comes to these matters?

Can the member comment on Mr. Rae at Queen's Park, and can he provide this House with some specific costings for each of the programs he is suggesting? Once he has done that, can he explain how he would pay for these new programs. Would it be through increased taxes or by way of other programs being cut? Can the hon. member please comment?

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has perhaps been in this House when I have expressed deep concern about the action by the Ontario government in eliminating grants to students. However, it should be understood that the grants to students were coming out of provincial coffers. When we really look at it, that was one way of shifting the cost to the Canada Student Loans Program and therefore increasing the available provincial funding to universities.

This is a direct result of the cuts in EPF initiated by the Liberal governments beginning in 1975. Yet I would say the new super-minister of education and training, my colleague Dave Cooke in Windsor, agrees with me. I have no doubt a re-examination will take place with respect to that.

In respect to some of the programs I have suggested, I suppose there would be some curiosity among the Liberals about the ideas that the New Democrats have brought forward. The Liberals will inevitably see what they can borrow. That is why their youth report contains so little substance. We will be specific about those programs I have suggested.

In fact the child care program we have suggested will cost $100 million in the first year and ultimately $1.7 million in the last year. This is within the context of a broadly-based program of worker empowerment training and education and investment. After five years it will ultimately lead to a $10 billion cut in the deficit.

With respect to the program I have advocated concerning youth prospects which would provide two years of training to young people between the ages of 18 and 24, this was costed. In the first year it would cost about $400 million and ultimately about $1 billion. That of course does not take into account the expenditures already being made with respect to the administration of other student aid programs which would incur a savings if this kind of program were introduced.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, my friend raced through those numbers so quickly he hardly had time to breathe. He talked about a $10 billion return. Is he really serious about that with regard to the first program he was mentioning? Where does he propose to get the money from? In the second program he talked about $400 million. He said it so quickly it almost sounded more like four cents or 40 cents. That is a lot of cabbage. I am sure that my friend will agree.

Where does he propose that money will come from? He knows as we speak that his friend Roy Romanow is about to cut the civil service in the province of Saskatchewan. He is about to cut loose all his friends in the labour movement. Bob Rae as we speak is talking about cutting back tens of thousands of civil servants in the province of Ontario.

While they are talking about cutting back at the provincial level, they have their youth critic here in Ottawa talking about spending, spending, spending, in a very irresponsible fashion I would submit. I would hope that the hon. member and his party, before they start talking about all these new programs, would be kind enough to inform us in detail where this money is to come from.

Rather than simply saying that we give it time and as the economy improves we will end up paying for it, someone has to pay the bill every month. It seems that members of the NDP are always inclined not to worry about the fact that there is a mortgage payment or a rental payment coming up at the end of the month; they are just prepared to put this country and this province further into debt.

Is it any wonder they have so very little credibility?

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how this hon. member has the gall to stand up here and talk about credibility. He has already demonstrated to the whole nation watching this debate on television that he is an extremely slow thinker, even for a member of the right wing of the Liberal Party.

I know I might have gone too fast for the hon. member. I think it is important for him to understand that we are talking about a federal issue here and the role of the federal government.

We are not going to talk about the cutbacks. We are not going to talk about the cutbacks in the civil service by a Liberal government in Newfoundland or a Liberal government in New Brunswick or a Liberal government in Quebec. We are not going to talk about the fact that those Liberal governments have higher proportional and faster growing deficits than Ontario.

We are not going to talk about that, but I will continue to go as slowly as I can so that this right wing deficit preoccupied member of the Liberal Party who seems to be so slow in grasping things will understand.

I did not say, for example, that day care all by itself would lead to a $10 billion cut in the deficit. What I said was that an over-all program designed to produce jobs of the sort that the Liberals have been challenged by almost every newspaper in this country to produce and will not, will lead to in context over all a $10 billion cut in the deficit over five years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. I am sure he will be able to read it in Hansard.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to address the House on this motion as proposed by my good friend the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk. It is a fact that young Canadians are confronted by numerous challenges. Steps we take to help them will have a direct impact on all our lives.

Last year I had the privilege of serving as co-chair of the Liberal Senate and House of Commons committee on youth. My colleagues and I travelled across Canada. We went to every province and the Arctic and met with hundreds of Canadians, both young people and those interested in helping them.

We met with teachers, students, fishermen, farmers, police officers, people who run drop-in centres as well as aboriginal groups and multicultural groups. Through those meetings we learned a great deal about the state of youth in Canada. I can say that for many of them the situation is bleak.

Young people today are faced by rising unemployment, fears about job security and feelings of alienation. They are frustrated by an education system that cannot help the 100,000 high school students who lose hope and drop out of high school every year. That is 100,000 a year, one million in a decade. It is a system that fails to address the high illiteracy and high innumeracy rates that afflict our youth.

Young people worry about not having the skills needed to find jobs in tomorrow's knowledge-based economy. They cannot understand why the federal government will not provide them with opportunities.

Everywhere our youth committee went, whether it was in Moncton, Quebec City or in Edmonton, the message was always the same: Young Canadians feel that they have no future. Many are deeply troubled by the present situation. They are desperate for a new vision of Canada, a vision that will restore their hope and show them a future.

Young people, their parents, their teachers, people in youth-serving organizations all look to the government for guidance and leadership. Sadly, this government has turned a deaf ear to their concerns.

For the past two years our youth have struggled alongside other Canadians through the worst recession in recent memory while the government turns its back on the human misery created by the recession. Is there misery in this country? Ask the two million Canadians lining up at food banks. Forty per cent of that number are under the age of 18.

That neglectful attitude is also evident in other areas. Look at the unemployment rate. While the general population now has a rate of 10.8 per cent, youth unemployment stands at 16.7 per cent which means that almost 400,000 young people are listed as unemployed. That is a trend which has maintained itself throughout the recession.

The youth unemployment rate has always stood at approximately six percentage points higher than the general unemployment rate. The number of unemployed youth has risen steadily since 1988, going from 303,000 to 431,000 in 1992.

• (1145)

How did this Progressive Conservative government respond? Well, it responded by diminishing opportunities for young people. Because of government cuts the jobs created by SEED, the summer job creation program, went from 94,115 in 1985 to 53,800 in 1991.

The government has also cut deeply into funding for post-secondary education and in training programs for youth. In 1991 the Conservative government cut transfers for education by almost a half billion dollars and in the 1992 budget another $800 million was cut.

This assault on youth has to stop. A new generation of political leadership in this country will achieve that.

I was born in 1960. My generation grew up believing that if we worked hard and received a good education we could expect to do better than our parents did. But as we see, times have changed and that is no longer the case.

As a member of Parliament I have spent the past four years listening to the voices of young people throughout Canada. I can say that an entire generation of young Canadians is learning that the rules for inclusion in our society have changed. Instead of an unlimited future, today's youth are confronted by diminishing opportunities.

The Liberal Party of Canada is determined to restore hope and offer a future to Canada's youth. We are determined to get our economy moving again, rebuild Canada's economic leadership, create highly skilled, highly paid jobs and reclaim the future for our children. We want to create a society that will be able to compete globally, protect the environment and provide opportunities for its members.

Young people are an important part of our vision. That is why we are committed to giving them the tools they need to build their future in the new economy, an economy where young people will be full partners.

We call on all our economic partners—business, labour, all levels of government—to join us in a program to eradicate illiteracy and innumeracy among our youth. We call on them to help us promote co-operative education, to encourage work place training and to help us develop national education strategy goals.

The Liberal Party of Canada is committed to establishing a national apprenticeship training program, to creating a Canadian youth service dedicated to environmental protection and responding to the social needs of our communities.

The Chrétien plan outlined earlier this year offers the promise of developing an educated work force with world-class skills. It offers the promise of a globally competitive economy and a learning culture that can easily adapt to change.

This is the direction in which we want to go. This is the Liberal vision of the future. We are determined to make that vision a reality.

The message we have received from young people is clear: They do not want political leaders to sit idly by; they want them to act. Government has a moral responsibility to provide opportunities for its young people. In turn, young people have a moral responsibility to make the most out of those opportunities.

Young people understand they have an important role to play and they are ready to take up that challenge. They also understand that the future is not a gift, it is an accomplishment.

We know on this side of the House that by building an effective partnership with the key stakeholders and young Canadians we can achieve the vision that we have outlined today.

The future of this country depends largely on the political will to act and to effect positive change for young generations. For far too long, this government has been silent on developing an effective agenda for young people.

I think that we, as an opposition party in Parliament, have outlined to the government what we as a party in government would do. It is a serious program that I am sure will make a difference. Together with young people we will make it happen.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I just want to compliment the member for York North on an excellent address that outlines a direction and a policy. I think that all members should be cognizant that this particular member has done a lot of work with respect to youth and the agenda for youth.

I know that in the process of preparing for the new direction that the Liberal Party is going to offer with respect to youth the member for York North travelled around the country and consulted. Therefore the recommendations and the views that are expressed have come from the bottom up rather than from the dictatorial methods employed by the government.

I wondered whether the member could tell us of his visit to Atlantic Canada. I know he was in my own riding of Moncton. What feedback was the member getting from youth and what directions did they indicate that we as a government should take?

Mr. Bevilacqua: I would first like to stress the point made by the hon. member that I think is of extreme importance. We as Liberals realized a long time ago that there must be a new style of politics in the 1990s and that people must be partners in the development of policy with our party and indeed within our country.

I may tell you that 3 of these 10 recommendations that are part of the agenda for youth are now a part of our electoral platform. Unlike what the members opposite often say about opposition parties that do not make their agendas available early on, I can sincerely say that we have been telling the Conservative government since January what our agenda for youth will be.

On the point raised about Atlantic Canada, there is a generation of young Canadians in Atlantic Canada who reflect the national concerns. They have fears about job security. They are concerned about the unemployment rate. They are concerned about how the federal government has not been able to equip them with the vehicles of opportunity to deal with global changes, the global economy and global competitiveness.

What is of major concern to Atlantic youth is also that their economy is being restructured but nothing is being done—not only for them but for their parents—during this adjustment period. They feel shut out and alienated from the entire process of government.

The Liberal Party, as the modern party that it is today, has decided to open the doors wide to ask Canadians at the grass roots level to tell us what they think and what their concerns are. I am proud to say that the agenda for youth is not only the work of parliamentarians but it is the work of young people from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from coast to coast to coast. That is the way this party will proceed for many years to come.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to commend my colleague from Haldimand—Norfolk for this opposition motion because I believe that the subject is extremely important. I would also like to commend the member for York North for co-chairing the committee which studied the problems of youth throughout Canada. I believe that these two events will hopefully make a tremendous contribution to this great challenge facing the country today. For me, the fundamental question today is this: What should we do, what do our young people need today?

[English]

Let us look at that. It seems to me that what Canadians want—young people in particular—is hope, empowerment, dignity and an education that will lead to jobs. Clearly that has to be the focus of government because our future, yours and mine, Mr. Speaker, depends upon our young people being well educated and well trained and having the kinds of jobs that can not only sustain that which we have in our country today but also that which can be used to build upon for future generations.

The recession is supposedly over and yet we are talking about unemployment rates of 16 per cent and 17 per cent. In some parts of the country for our young people it is in excess of 20 per cent. If we were to go to certain groups in our society, for example our aboriginal people, it would be very, very close to total unemployment. This is a far cry from full employment.

That depresses me. I take it that that concern is shared by all my fellow parliamentarians.

I remember travelling across Canada a couple of years ago to talk to the young people in our colleges and universities and other young people who were in the work force to ask them about how they saw the country and their future. There was uncertainty. There was not the enthusiasm that one normally sees among our young people. I noted and they reminded me that both education and jobs are rapidly escaping the grasp of many of our young people today.

Between 1985–86 and 1992–93, tuition fees have skyrocketed out of sight. Let me give some examples. The fees have grown by 69 per cent at Memorial University and 185.7 per cent at Northwest Community College in British Columbia. I could give more examples that are even more striking.

Those are tuition fees. We often forget to talk about incidental fees, which are those other fees that students need to pay. They have grown in certain sectors by even greater percentages.

For the first time in our history the young people of Canada are paying the goods and services tax on books and reading materials so they are being hit again. They are unable to find suitable employment. The summer of 1992 was one of the worst ever for young people. They either had no jobs or if they did have jobs they were poorly remunerated short-term jobs so they were unable to save and contribute as fully as they could have to their education this year. It was a real disaster. I am really hoping, as I know my colleagues are, that things will really change.

What has been the government's record with respect to post-secondary education and making it more accessible? Without being partisan whatsoever I assure you that it has not at all been laudable. I will let the people be the judge.

Let me share this with you. The criteria for the allocation of student loans was set in 1984, almost a decade ago. What has changed? Absolutely nothing. This is totally inadequate. Obviously the costs have gone up dramatically. I will give an example of someone who is going into the faculty of dentistry in my province. The loan money that he or she can get will not even cover the fees for that particular student. Surely that is inadequate. Surely we are reaching the level where education becomes available to those who are the richest in society.

Quite apart from not changing the student aid program in a positive kind of way, the government did some very regressive things. It imposed a 3 per cent tax on student loans Mr. Speaker, if you, and I had to borrow as students it was because we did not have enough money. Obviously that is why we borrow. Yet at the same time it has imposed a 3 per cent tax on that. Those who do not have to borrow do not have to pay the tax. However, those who do not have the resources have to pay the tax.

What else did it do? There used to be a six-month interest-free period so that I, as a student, could graduate, get a job and then start repaying my loan. What has happened? Now it is in the process of changing that. There is going to be six months' interest more to pay. It is interesting that the 3 per cent tax is going to yield to the government coffers, according to government estimates, $22.5 million. This additional six months' interest would yield to the government coffers, once it is fully instituted, $35 million. That is an additional almost $60 million out of the pockets of our young people.

That is what the government has done.

What has happened as a result of that? Obviously student debt has gone up at an exponential rate. It is really going out of sight.

I want to share the following example with you, Mr. Speaker, because I know how interested you are in young people. There has been a 500 per cent increase in the number of students who graduate with a total debt burden in excess of $10,000 during the last four years.

Now the government is talking about the first step toward privatizing the student aid program. It sends out submissions to banks to ask them if they could handle it. The students are very clever. They say: "Just a minute, there".

What criteria will guide the decisions in making student loans? Then they asked who will set these criteria and what the role of the bank or banks will be in this whole process.

Mr. Speaker, I assure you that students are very nervous. Why? Of course if they have money there is not so much of a problem. However, if they have few resources what will happen? Will colleges and universities be less accessible? Will these young men and women who want to pursue their education be able to do so with a loan that they will have to repay later?

[English]

I want to recap and point out that the government has cut transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education. I have said it time and time again in this House. In roughly a decade of government control it will have reduced and cut back the grants and the transfer payments for health and education by $30 billion. It is not $30 million but $30 billion. It is about $20 billion for health and about $10 billion for education.

As a result, as I indicated, the universities have increased their tuitions and incidental fees. Student loan criteria have not changed since 1984. There have been some regressive measures such as the 3 per cent tax and the addition of six months' interest. All of that, quite apart from the goods and services tax, is penalizing students. They have taken hit after hit after hit with no relief.

These students are graduating with huge debt loads and the prospects of a job are not particularly good; they are either over the short term, poorly remunerated or they do not exist.

Let me share some examples as to how the student aid program, quite apart from the 3 per cent tax and the additional six months' interest, has really caused difficulty.

There is a young woman in my riding—and I could give a dozen such examples of this—she is the mother of three. She defaulted on her student loan because she was unable to find a suitable job. She was unable to find any job. Now she is being threatened with the possible seizure of her child tax credit on her income tax return. She really is. This is the absolute truth. Besides that, she is being harassed by a collection agency.

I understand that one has to try to collect the money but one cannot draw blood from a stone. Surely a mother of three who has done her best to get a job should not be harassed by anyone for money that she cannot repay.

In another instance, I have a constituent who took out a student loan and decided to take a three-year program at university. He studied for two years, ran out of money and went back to work in a responsible kind of way. He then wanted to go back and complete the third year. Lo and behold, that was not possible because he had supposedly defaulted on his loan.

Now he has to wait. Will he be able to borrow money again? After he has gone through a number of hoops and hurdles, I suspect that it will be possible.

Can one agree with me that this is not the kind of program that we need? This is not the kind of program that you and I and other parliamentarians want. We need a program that is going to be truly sensitive to the needs of young people and will encourage them to finish their education.

• (1205)

I know I am running out of time. I do wish I had another hour. I am sure that I could share some insights that would be useful not only to my parliamentary colleagues but as well to Canadians. I am sure some members of government will disagree with me, but let me say that even our training efforts are not particularly appropriate.

Many jobs are available today and yet training is unavailable to respond to those jobs. I am delighted that the leader of the Liberal Party has started to make very important statements about where the party stands with respect to education, on the job training, a Canada youth service, and our commitment to education. He issued a statement saying we want the best education training and retraining programs in the whole world so we can be competitive.

We need to make education accessible. We need to improve training and retraining to make apprenticeship and vocational training as well as a whole gamut of educational programs available if we want this nation to be a leader among nations and our young people to be leaders rather than followers.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for his comments on education.

As he knows from travelling across the country, as he did from university to university talking to post-secondary education students, there really is a feeling out there of despair. We have a whole group of students coming out of university with no hope of a job.

As was seen in the The Globe and Mail this morning, the article headed, "Escaping the Student Debt Trap", we have hundreds and hundreds of examples of how students are going through university piling up debt upon debt. A student piled up $20,000 in government loans.

He then got out of university and had no chance of paying those debts back because he could not get a job.

I know the hon. member has talked to thousands of students across the country. He brought out a great report on ways he feels universities and governments can better adapt to these changing times in order to help students not only to get jobs but to get the education they need to find these jobs in order for Canada to compete internationally.

I want to ask my hon. friend where does he feel the government should be putting its priorities today in terms of education? Given that we have limited resources and that when the books finally come out in the next budget it is going to show that our national finances are in extremely rough shape, where should we be putting the priorities in terms of education?

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question.

He indicated was there were three reports that were a result of travelling across the country and consulting with young Canadians over the last three years. They are available and I would be delighted to share them. They are non-partisan documents. They simply identify the issues, concerns and challenges.

With respect to where priorities ought to be placed, I think we should listen very carefully to young people, for example the Canadian Federation of Students. I presented a petition today on behalf of students from Saskatchewan. They represent over 450,000 students. They and the community colleges are telling us the following:

We understand we are in very difficult financial times. We are willing to do our part, but we also have to ensure we do not save money today and sacrifice tomorrow. We have to ensure not only that there is adequate money for education, training, retraining, literacy programs, research and development, but that the money is spent in the best way possible to respond to Canada's challenges.

What are those challenges? We all agree that economic development, the creation of jobs for young people, those who need jobs has to be the first priority. We also recognize, and I have said this through petitions and oral questions, that one of the greatest challenges this country faces—quite apart from economic development, the creation of good, long-term, well-remunerated jobs—are our social challenges. Look at the poor today. There are five million Canadians living at or below the level of poverty, most of whom are women, over one million who are children. Over two million Canadians will be fed at food banks. Over two million Canadians will receive social assistance.

These groups are often powerless. They do not have the necessary skills and education to integrate fully into society. We have to target moneys to those particular groups to make sure that they can, by themselves, have that which they need in order to get jobs and contribute fully to society.

We have to recognize that when they are not doing that they need to collect assistance from the public purse, and when they do that they do not feel very good about it. They want to be contributing to the public purse. That is what I would do, absolutely.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will comment on the dynamic leading role which the Department of the Secretary of State plays in helping our young people grow, develop and become competitive in Canada and in the world.

To contribute to the full development of youth, the Department of the Secretary of State as well is doing its full share in five major fields of activity: funding post-secondary education, the youth participation program, the Canada Student Loans Program, official languages in education and special activities like Voyageurs Canada '92.

The government has a big role to play in education. Although education is under provincial jurisdiction, the federal government's expertise and funding means equal opportunity for all young people in Canada.

[English]

The action plan for Canada's prosperity released in 1992 called for a major effort on behalf of colleges and universities across Canada to become more responsive to the educational needs of Canada.

Canada spends approximately 2.2 per cent of our gross domestic product on post-secondary education. This may at first appear to be a modest amount, however in dollar terms in 1991-92 that amounted to almost $14.9 billion. The majority of that investment comes from the federal government. It reflects our commitment to developing highly qualified human resources which are critical to our future.

We support post-secondary education directly and indirectly. Through Established Programs Financing arrangements and other forms of support the federal government will channel about $8 billion into post-secondary education in 1992-93.

Contrary to what my friends opposite may suggest, this government has not cut funding for post-secondary education. We have been forced to impose restraints on spending to control our national debt and we are proud of our government's record in this area. Even in this time of restraint we are well aware of the need for investing in our future. To that end the total funding available for post-secondary education has continued to increase.

Established Programs Financing support for post-secondary education has steadily increased by nearly $100 million in 1990-91, by another $182 million in 1991-92 and by more than $72 million this year. The total Established Programs Financing support for post-secondary education now exceeds $6 billion. This is just basic support for post-secondary education.

The federal government has in 1992-93 forgone some $3.6 billion in tax revenue and contributed about $1.4 billion in cash. The federal government also provides direct support to post-secondary education through other programs. The Department of the Secretary of State is the lead department for co-ordination between departments and agencies for education matters. Without the involvement of the federal government, post-secondary institutions and their students will lose almost $2 billion worth of direct support including $123 million for post-secondary schools directly funded by the government. To put this contribution into perspective there are roughly the equivalent of one million post-secondary students in programs across our country.

Our support for each person registered in a post-secondary education program amounts to $8,000 a year, or about $30,000 for a four-year program. We are investing $8 billion in our future this year. That is certainly not robbing a generation of young Canadians of their legitimate aspirations. That is how we must build a strong and prosperous country.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to talk to you about the Canada Student Loans Program. By helping needy students pursue their post-secondary education through the Canada Student Loans Program we are promoting the full development of the nation's youth. Basically, a Canada student loan is an investment in someone's future.

[English]

About a quarter of a million students are now in post-secondary studies with the help of the Canada Student Loans Program. More than half of the recipients are women and more than a quarter of the total are over 27 years of age. In every region of our country the Canada Student Loans Program assists needy students with a helping hand. This represents $740 million in Canada student loans for 1991-92, $100 million more than the previous year.

This sustained commitment to investing in the individual has resulted in Canada's enviable rate of participation in post-secondary education, about 62 per cent in the 20 to 24 year old group, second only to the United States at 68 per cent.

The program also contributes to the development of a well educated, skilled and adaptable labour force which is critical to increasing Canadian activity, competitiveness and our quality of life.

We have through the Canada Student Loans Program provided support for students to pursue their educational goals. This is an ongoing commitment to the potential offered by our young people.

This government has also committed itself to modernizing the way we fund and operate the Canada Student Loans Program in order to enhance assistance for needy students and to strengthen the program even further. There is more to post-secondary education than just the hard dollars invested in our future and our young people.

[Translation]

Activities to promote our two official languages are also part of our educational objectives. The Department of the Secretary of State is committed to co-operating fully with the provincial and territorial governments so that minority anglophones and francophones can receive education in their own language in their communities and help other people become familiar with the other official language.

Two major advantages flow from such a commitment. For one thing, it helps fight illiteracy and school drop-out by encouraging French and English speaking youth to acquire the skills needed to be competitive. For another, it is clearly advantageous on the world market for Canadians to know both official languages.

About 2.9 million young Canadians have benefited from the Official Languages Program of the Department of the Secretary of State and thus acquired essential skills for our common future. In 1990-91, our provincial and territorial partners invested $3 for every dollar allocated by the federal government to official languages in education. That clearly proves this program's success in motivating not only students but also those directly responsible for the administration of education in the provinces and territories.

According to a study of the Official Languages in Education Program conducted in 1992, the provinces and target groups believed that federal aid was absolutely necessary at all levels of the education system. Furthermore, 74 per cent of the parents questioned in that study want their children to learn both official languages in school. The promotion of official languages is a key to encouraging young Canadians to pursue higher objectives by calling on skills in which the federal government has invested.

• (1220)

Several components of the Official Languages in Education Program have yielded amazing results. For example, about 7,000 students take part in French or English immersion courses every summer, thanks to a special program.

Every year about 1,200 students have part-time employment as teachers' aides in courses in French as a first language, under the Official Languages Monitors Program. In addition, the program helps some full-time monitors in rural or remote regions.

The Official Languages Promotion Program funds some 20 organizations of young francophones throughout the country that are committed to fighting assimilation and promoting the feeling of belonging to Canada.

In Quebec the program helps young anglophones continue to play an active role in their own language in Canada.

In co-operation with all provinces and territories, various programs promote the growth of post-secondary institutions in all parts of the country that teach the official languages. Right here in Ottawa, the Department of the Secretary of State and the ministry of education of Ontario are helping to finance the Cité collégiale. This is not just a small grant; it involves creating a whole new French college in Ottawa.

The Cité collégiale is one of many projects in which the department is taking part all across the country. The government is interested in the issues that concern all Canadians. It is not satisfied with mere rhetoric; it does not hesitate to participate financially and to act on the strength of its many years of experience, competence, planning and deep commitment.

[English]

Speaking of actions, the government is also involved in outreach youth through our other programs. Many of our programs target the youth of this country as a principal audience or as a specific subset of the main audience. Programs like Stay In School encourage high school-age young Canadians to graduate from high school. Funding for 10 official language minority community radio stations speak often to the youth in their own language. Also, our involvement directly creates 200 jobs.

The Education Support Branch of the Department of Secretary of State is also responsible for funding Canadian studies learning materials. The department co-operates with the Department of External Affairs to ensure the effectiveness of our participation in international education forums and activities. As well, the Education Support Branch is involved with non-governmental organizations that are active in education. The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, the Canadian Association of University Teachers, the Canadian Federation of Students, the Canadian Federation for the Humanities, the Conference Board of Canada and the Canadian Education Association are just a few of the organizations with which the department deals on a regular basis.

We must also mention our work with the Commonwealth Youth Program, the International Council for Canadian Studies and Canadian Information Centre for International Credentials as part of our UNESCO commitment.

The Department of the Secretary of State produces hundreds of publications for educators, teachers, administrators and resource centre staff. As an example, they produce the Guide to a Good Exchange which shows voluntary organizations how to maximize the over-all success of a reciprocal student exchange with tips on fund raising, organization and planning.

The department works with people who have disabilities through National Access Awareness Week and the Disabled Persons Participation Program. Both include youth involvement.

The Native Citizens Directorate programs feature community-based programs that target the youth of this country.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we come to our special programs. My friend opposite should be familiar with Voyageurs Canada 92. Indeed, his own riding of Haldimand—Norfolk was paired with Dartmouth, Nova Scotia as part of the Voyageurs Canada 92 program. One hundred young Canadians between the ages of 16 and 21 left Dartmouth and travelled to his riding last summer to experience life in another part of Canada first hand.

• (1225)

Another 95 young members of his riding travelled in turn to Dartmouth to see life through Nova Scotia eyes.

On behalf of the Secretary of State, I would like to thank the hon. member for joining us to create such exciting educational experiences for our leaders of tomorrow.

In all, nearly 28,000 Canadians took part in Voyageurs Canada 92 as part of the Canada 125 celebrations. Thousands more people, not just young Canadians, but Canadians of all ages, felt the effects of Voyageurs Canada 92 through the joyous exchange of stories and memories and even the learning that comes from spending time with someone from a different part of the country.

Since 1986 some 100,000 young people participated in exchanges funded under the OHC. An example is the Encounters with Canada program at the Terry Fox Centre here in Ottawa, which brings approximately 3,000 students between the ages of 15 to 17 to enhance their knowledge of Canada and, again, a greater awareness of our country by participating in one-week workshops.

One participant in the exchange organized by the YMCA, another organization funded under the OHC program, had this to say: "Many more of these programs are needed to help bring Canadians together. We have so much in common yet all we ever hear is what divides us. These exchanges are vital".

The hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk moved a motion which says that this government has robbed a generation of young Canadians of their legitimate aspirations.

Perhaps he did not know the extent of this government's commitment to advancing our youth. Perhaps he did not know that we have invested $8 billion in post-secondary education. Perhaps he did not know that the government has forgone $3.6 billion in tax revenue from post-secondary institutions, thus helping these institutions make better use of their resources. Perhaps he did not know that a quarter of a million students in our colleges and universities are counting on help from the Canada Student Loans Program to obtain their certificate or diploma in order to build their career, to build our country.

Perhaps he did not know that 2.9 million young Canadians are gladly learning our two official languages. Our country will benefit from that long after my colleague has left his seat in this House.

Perhaps he did not know that 1,200 university students have part-time work as teachers' aides in first language French courses, not only in cities and towns but in rural communities and remote regions.

Perhaps he did not know how committed the Department of the Secretary of State is to helping official language minorities in colleges and universities, not only through financial assistance but by providing expertise in specific projects, together with the provinces and territories.

Perhaps he did not know that we participate in thousands of projects, large and small, with teachers, administrators, researchers and students to find solutions together, through dialogue and information sharing, to common problems in post-secondary education.

Perhaps he did not know that the Secretary of State has relations with very many organizations, volunteer groups, associations, government departments, companies and countries in order to provide the best possible quality of post-secondary education in Canada.

Perhaps he has even forgotten that about a hundred students from Dartmouth visited his riding to get a glimpse of another part of the country.

Hopefully, he now understands this government's deep commitment to education much better. It is not only a commitment to post-secondary institutions, primary schools, rural schools or schools for the French or English minority, but also a deep commitment to the whole process of acquiring skills to succeed in life.

Our Canadian youth have not been robbed of their legitimate aspirations.

[English]

We have provided as many tools as we can to train the scientists, teachers, technicians, politicians, lawyers and decision-makers of tomorrow.

We give the youth of Canada the encouragement, the head start and even our trust and silent hope for a better future. We have tried to describe for all who come later a path that will see our country grow and prosper. By investing in the individual, we ensure that every young Canadian has a fair chance of success along the path.

We are giving our young people the education, the courage, the skill and the common sense to make their own way along their own road to success, whatever that might be and in whatever direction that might be. That is the record of the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I want to sincerely thank the hon. member for his speech. It was a non-partisan speech that outlined a number of the programs the government is bringing forward. Frankly, we do not have any problems with a number of those programs because they do address a number of needs out there now, not only in terms of education, but keeping young people in school.

What we question is the real commitment of this government to actually recognizing the problems with generation x. There is a whole generation out there that has no hope for a job. They have no hope for a proper education and they have no hope that this government even recognizes the seriousness of the problem.

Preventive medicine is always a good direction to go. I do congratulate the government for putting money into keeping kids in school. As we know, that is a very important area. I congratulate the government for the Voyageur program which the hon. member talked about.

All the people from Haldimand—Norfolk had a fabulous time in Nova Scotia. They got to learn some of the problems and the unique differences within this country by going on that program. I hope the hon. member by saying that is suggesting the program is going to come back for another year. I did not quite hear the hon. member say that but I would hope that maybe one of his colleagues could clear that up for us. I know there are people in our area who would be more than willing to again volunteer their time and services to make sure the program continues because it was very worth while.

My question to the hon. member is this. The hon. member knows that the federal government, having all the physical, fiscal and all the trade responsibilities, really has the responsibility to control the economic direction of this country. The federal government has the ability to set a labour force, to set the training, to set the education for a whole country and for a whole group of young people who just do not have that opportunity.

Does the hon. member agree that the whole problem with generation x, and I know the hon. member understands what I mean when I say that, is that whole lost group which is hundreds and hundreds of thousands of young people who are unemployed, many of whom have never had a first-time job, and if you look at the statistics many have never had a first-time job, has increased dramatically over the years?

Does the hon. member think the government could do more, that there are more programs the government should be bringing forward for these people? Does he not think that what the government has now brought forward is just a light brush over all these problems?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to thank the hon. member for his introductory remarks. I must say I have a lot of empathy for our Canadian youth. I have three children myself, two of whom are teenagers, and I must say it is a full-time job to bring them up and ensure they can look forward to a promising future.

I also want to take this opportunity to mention my personal involvement in the Voyageurs Canada 92 Program. We were twinned with not one but two ridings: Nipissing in Ontario and Brandon—Souris in Manitoba. Every time, I personally picked up our visitors at the airport and went to say goodbye to the young people representing my own riding before their departure.

I also took part in many of the activities that were organized in my riding, together with the families that opened their homes to our visitors. We are now completing our review of this experiment and as far as I am concerned I have nothing but praise for this initiative, and I am sure there are people who will want to repeat the experience.

Regarding further programs or incentives to help tomorrow's youth, I reviewed the measures we introduced since 1984, including the Stay in School Program. I was involved in a number of seminars attended by teachers, parents, people from the various LCSCs and students themselves. These programs are constantly being adjusted to make them right for our young people. The department is also constantly seeking new initiatives to ensure that we have young people we can be proud of tomorrow. We must also bear in mind that we inherited a deficit that weighs heavily on this country and puts a number of restrictions on what we want to do. However, we intend to spend and do what we can to ensure that our youth can look forward to a promising future.

[English]

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I just want to comment on what I have been hearing this morning and put a question to the member for Québec-Est.

This morning I have heard a lot of doom and gloom from members of the opposition with regard to youth and their future. I think it is somewhat too negative, to be blunt about it. I say that in the context there are great opportunities out there for all Canadians and in particular young Canadians.

We all know that the western world is going through some difficult times but I want to remind the opposition and I want the member for Québec-Est to reflect on this. In terms of a global society, if you wish, Canada is doing pretty well. In fact this year our economy is expected to outgrow or outperform the economies of every country in the civilized world by something in the order of 3.5 per cent. That figure is very significant because jobs and opportunities for all Canadians, young and old alike, grow or are created from that. It is something I want the member to reflect on.

There is another point I want to make. I want to take the opposition to task on this in terms of our commitment to training and our commitment particularly to the university sector and post-secondary education. I want to pass this statistic along to the member for Québec-Est to comment on. Every year we transfer to the provinces $6 billion for post-secondary education. Even in times of restraint—we are going through times of restraint now—we have increased that funding and not diminished it. In fact we have increased funding to the post-secondary sector through the provinces by 43 per cent from 1984-85. We are also providing $1.9 billion in training and research to the provinces.

I want the member to reflect on that and comment on what we are doing as a government given our fiscal resources.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member mentioned that Canadian policies and programs are often quoted as an example in other countries, and that is quite true.

• (1240)

I purposely did not mention transfer payments to the provinces earlier on, and more specifically the amounts allocated for occupational training because my speaking time was limited, but I am glad the hon. member raised this very important point. With these payments, the provinces and the territories can spend the money directly on training for our young people.

Mr. Speaker, in recent years there was a trend toward one-shot programs for our young people, which were not that successful. During the 1984 election campaign, I often said that the only permanent thing about these programs was the signs. In fact, the signs stayed up well after the programs ceased to exist and all the money had been spent.

Subsequently we made a number of radical changes by redeploying this money in ongoing programs, where program development and investment impact can be evaluated.

[English]

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am very proud that the Liberal Party has chosen to spend a full day in the House of Commons to acknowledge the plight of our youth. What better way to spend taxpayers' money than on our youth, their future and Canada's future.

[Translation]

I repeat, the best investment we have is our young people, who represent the future of this country. We must create programs aimed at reducing and eventually eliminating the dropout problem by providing these young people with the training they need to find permanent and satisfying employment.

[English]

Last week Statistics Canada reported that since the last election from 1989 to 1992 there were 409,000 fewer young people who had jobs. The UI rate for young men between 15 and 24 years of age is 19.6 per cent in Canada. The UI rate for young women between 15 and 24 is 14 per cent.

What does that mean for our society as we try to come out of this devastating recession? The very people who should be full of energy, full of hope and willing to take risks to reach the positive goals they have dreamed about—the young people of Canada—are disillusioned. They feel undervalued. They are a generation of lost hope.

That is why I am particularly pleased that the Liberal member for Haldimand—Norfolk has put forward the motion that this House condemn the government for policies—maybe he should have said lack of policies—regarding jobs, job creation, post-secondary education and job training and retraining that are having the effect of robbing a whole generation of young Canadians of their legitimate aspirations.

If this Conservative government had spent more time in the past eight years considering long-range goals for our country, our youth would not be in the terrible situation in which it finds itself today.

It is not just the young people. What about their parents who have sacrificed to allow their children to stay in school? These are parents who want the best for their children. These parents want to see some prospects of a healthy, profitable and productive future for their children.

When the UI rate for our youth is twice that of the rest of society, what does that say about this Conservative government? The Conservative ministers and members have jobs but they do not have vision. For eight years they have not had the vision to see that the youth are our future.

The Prime Minister and the finance minister keep saying that 9,000 new jobs were created last month in Canada but the truth is that we lost 5,000 full-time jobs. The figure 9,000 comes from the creation of 14,000 part-time jobs minus the 5,000 full-time jobs lost.

The government has let the youth of this country down. It is saying that it will give them part-time jobs flipping hamburgers but it is doing nothing to find them full-time jobs.

The hon. member for York North and the Liberal Senator Philippe Gigantès travelled across Canada and then prepared a comprehensive report Agenda For Youth. This task force has made many great suggestions. One of them is that the federal government in concert with provincial governments, the private sector and voluntary associations commit to eradicating illiteracy and innumeracy among Canadian youth. How can we expect our youth to attain the highly skilled jobs needed in the world today if they cannot read or write or if they lack the necessary mathematical skills?

Another suggestion is for the federal government to adopt a tax base system to encourage workplace training. Instead of always blocking the way with disincentives, the Liberals suggest using incentives to encourage private enterprise to participate in training our youth.

With the Liberal Party ideas do not stop with the report. The Liberal Party under our leader has already committed to some definite measures for the future of our youth to make these recommendations a reality. In his January 27 speech the Liberal leader stated in part that a Liberal government will work to create a national apprenticeship program to help keep young people in school and to help the transition to work. He also stated that a Liberal government will establish a Canadian youth service designed to allow young Canadians to gain skills and work habits.

Has the government thought of the future? Has it thought of our young people, who are about to begin their adult life without hope, without jobs, without adequate training and without interest? Why not set aside some money for youth development and training?

[English]

The youth of Canada know the devastating record of this government. We certainly heard from the Liberal youth task force travelling across Canada. In my riding of Hamilton Mountain students from Mohawk College and from McMaster University spoke of their lack of hope for the future. Students in the high schools in my riding—Barton Secondary, Caledon, Crestwood, Hillfield Strathallan College, Hillpark, Sir Allan MacNab, St. Jean de Brébeuf and St. Thomas More schools—all know the precarious future they face.

That is a good enough reason for young people of this country to defeat this government in the next election and to vote for the Liberals who have a vision for Canada and who want to participate with the youth of Canada in realizing the potential of our great country and every Canadian in it.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest—but concern—to some of what the member for Hamilton Mountain had to say about this government in particular.

She mentioned long-range planning in her speech. I tell her most sincerely that we have engaged in long-term planning for the youth of this country and for the economy. I take her to task on that. When I say that, I go back to the task force report that she obviously has with her this morning. It was set up by the Liberal Party regarding youth, the economy and employment opportunities, et cetera, to which she has alluded.

I am wondering if that document has been tabled in the House or made public. Perhaps it has and I hope that it has. I hope they do not use that internal Liberal Party document on tax reform which the Liberal Party refuses to make public because in that they talk about the business transfer tax and some of the other things that they will have to do—distasteful things—if they do form a government.

I suggest they probably will not form the government. The Canadian people will determine whether that happens or not.

In that tax reform package they really do discuss within that document what they are going to replace the GST with. Unfortunately, they will not make that document public. As I have mentioned, I hope this document is made public and I hope it is tabled here in the House so we can examine it.

I will caution the member that much of what the member had to say has been stolen from our pages and our government. There is no question about it, we do have a plan for the youth of this country and it is working very well. If given the time later on I will mention some of the statistics. However, we have a number of projects on the go and they are long range.

• (1250)

One we can talk about today is the Labour Force Development Strategy. The member has not mentioned that one. Another one is the moneys we commit through the UI funds to training and retraining. She has not mentioned that one which accounts for about $2.2 billion per year. She does not talk about the 530,000 UI claimants that will benefit from that package. She does not talk about the billions of dollars transferred to the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired and questions and comments has expired. If he could give the hon. member at least one minute for an answer, I would appreciate it.

Ms. Phinney: Mr. Speaker, it will not take me a minute to answer.

This has been tabled for several weeks. It is too bad the member does not have it. Tens of thousands of them have been mailed out across Canada.

The hon. member is right. The Canadian people will decide. It was the youth of Canada we listened to. The youth of Canada told us they are not satisfied with what the present government is doing.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. The motion deals with education, job training and retraining.

Over the past four years there have been many discussions on all sides of the House on the whole question of education, training and retraining. Members of the House of Commons had and still have concerns about the state of the economy and about what is happening in the community in terms of the lack of opportunities and so on. I do not think anybody would disagree with that. However, I think where there is disagreement is that actions speak louder than words sometimes.

So far we have not seen any kind of tangible action taking place, whether we talk about the government in terms of dealing with the question of job creation for youth, training, or transfer payments when it comes to education.

In terms of the NDP, what we have seen day after day in the province of Ontario unfortunately is an attack on the youth of Ontario when it comes to post-secondary education when it comes to grants and when it comes to tuition fees.

Rather than spend my time talking about the lack of action from both the federal perspective as well as the provincial NDP perspective, I want to share with this House some of the things my colleagues and I have done in the past.

In terms of our caucus position on this whole question, a youth report was tabled a number of weeks ago. For those who would like to obtain a copy they can call any Liberal member of Parliament.

The report contains many interesting points. We call for the establishment of national apprenticeship programs. We call for the establishment of some sort of an organization that helps out youth in terms of those who want to participate in the work force. We have tax incentives being proposed in order to help business create jobs. Those are the kinds of things that are needed.

What we need more than anything is a cohesive and co-operative approach that would deal with the whole question of education. There is one segment of this whole debate I would like to focus on specifically. That is the question of literacy.

I know my colleagues have spoken very nicely on education and post-secondary education. I want to share with the government some of the proposals I am working on as someone involved in the area of literacy. I want to divide my proposal into four sections and specifically tell the federal government what its role should be in this whole area.

Over 38 per cent of Canadians are considered to be functionally illiterate. As a result of that these people have difficulty finding jobs and the jobs that are available may not be available to them. The cost of illiteracy is in excess of $10 billion, which is almost 25 per cent of the national deficit.

What is lacking now? We lack a national literacy strategy on the part of the federal government. We do have the National Literacy Secretariat. It was set up five years ago and is in its last year now. The minister made a statement sometime around December saying he wanted to continue with it. However, we have not seen one single penny being allocated in terms of funding. We have not seen any kind of additional commitment with respect to the secretariat for the next five years and beyond.

The government has to look at this whole area of literacy with a little more seriousness than it has done in the past. We can no longer just give lip-service to the communities out there. We need to set out a strategy.

This is what the minister could do. He could establish a strategy at the national level. It would include the policy of national minimum standards on literacy and an awareness campaign. These standards on literacy should be set and met at all levels from elementary school and through to employment training. As well, it has to address the question of adult training programs. Only then can we ensure good quality literacy training across Canada.

We cannot just set up an agency and hope that everybody will run to the agency asking for help. We have to have a pro-active secretariat. We have to give the secretariat the needed funds. We have to give it the tools it needs in order to move out further.

We have to set up a strategy whereby we could bring the relevant groups together. We could bring in the provinces, the private sector, the school boards, the special interest groups, the families, the illiterates and organizations working on behalf of illiterates. We could get them together and move forward.

An ad hoc approach is not going to help us. It is not going to get us out of the ghetto we have found ourselves in for the past few years. We need to have action. That is something my colleague from Hamilton spoke about so eloquently. There is a definite lack of action.

We have a literacy secretariat that is in place for five years, but what about the next five years? Why do we not provide the secretariat with a long-term funding formula so it does not have to come begging to the minister every five years? Why do we not have an act of the House of Commons that will make the secretariat a permanent body of this government? Why do we not have an act? As it is now, there is only a government memorandum concerning the setting up of the secretariat. There is no action plan other than a statement in terms of what will be done in the next 10 years and what we are going to do beyond the next 10 years.

I know the government has stated that it wants to increase the level of literacy. It wants to increase the number of people who graduate from school. What are we doing to achieve that? What is the mechanism the government would set in place in order to do that? It spent over $20 million on consultation which is wonderful. I have to commend it on that because I think it is imperative to have the consultation. What is next? Where are we moving from here?

My colleagues and I are alarmed at the high unemployment rate our youth are faced with. An unemployment rate of 15 per cent to 25 per cent is incredible. It is a national crisis when our youth find themselves on the streets without jobs and without opportunities.

Those are the kinds of issues we are concerned with. Those are the kinds of issues we would like to see the government take action on.

We are also concerned that when the government is in the process of introducing any kind of act the people affected by that act are not asked for their views on it. I refer here to the loans act when it was introduced and put in place a few weeks ago. The student body was not allowed to appear before the committee to give its reaction to the proposals.

It will be recalled that the government made a commitment last year. The minister promised in this House on February 25, 1992 that the government would eliminate the 3 per cent tax on student fees. Have you heard anything on that? It has been one year and there has been no action on this issue.

I know my time is up and we are approaching one o'clock. All I wanted to say is for the country's sake let us sit down and come up with some sort of cohesive plan to deal with the question of unemployment, with the question of youth, with the question of education.

Let us stop this harassment we are embarking on when it comes to our student population. I believe that what we are doing is harassing our youth rather than approaching them with a proper plan.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 24(2). The hon. member will have five minutes questions and comments if he comes back at three o'clock.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

BILL S-8

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, this morning at the transport committee amendments were made to Bill S-8, relating to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act, which will provide Canadian consumers with a consistent Motor Vehicle Safety Act and related safety regulations while providing the Canadian automotive industry with a level playing field when competing with the U.S. industry.

I want to commend the three ministers of transport who addressed these concerns with me over the past three years, the officials from the department who have shown great patience, and the members of the committee from all parties who worked together to give Canadians a high standard of motor vehicle safety.

Under the amendment all vehicles whether imported or non-imported will be required to meet the same safety standard, thereby eliminating the double standard which has existed since the implementation of free trade.

If vehicles do not meet this standard at the time of importation they will be required to be upgraded prior to licensing. This will assure Canadians that they will continue to have the highest standards of safety in the world.

BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the situation in Bosnia-Hercegovina continues to degenerate. The insidious practice of expulsion and the senseless and brutal genocide of people based on their race and religion must be stopped.

Last July the immigration minister promised relaxed criteria to allow 10,000 refugees in to Canada. Yet so far only slightly more than 1,000 have arrived. Improved terms and conditions are needed. As well, let us consider the example of Israel which is settling refugee families on an interim basis until peace is restored.

As international citizenry we should have learned from past massacres that it is our responsibility and our duty to avert this kind of devastation, but when it occurs we must act expeditiously and with human compassion.

Canada and the international community have been slow to move in the face of this genocide, this abominable, this deliberate ethnic cleansing.

In 1993 how can civilized nations afford to allow this practice to continue and not act? Remember, silence can be deafening and the women are being tortured.

MERFIN HYGIENIC PRODUCTS INC.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate Merfin Hygienic Products Inc. of Delta for the astounding contribution this firm has made to B.C.'s exports.

This company's German parent established in B.C. in 1986 and now operates a 151,000 square foot plant employing some 65 people. The company introduced a unique European paper-making technology to North America and has plans to spend up to $18 million in the next two years on increasing plant capacity.

In 1992 company sales were up 60 per cent over 1991, and the company has established itself as a major exporter. Nearly 80 per cent of its 1992 revenues were generated by sales in the U.S., Europe and the Pacific Rim.

Congratulations to Merfin Hygienic Products Inc.

AIR CANADA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise to protest the loss of Air Canada jobs in Winnipeg.

Diners Club/enRoute, an operating division of Citibank Canada, thanks to the sale of enRoute last year, announced last week that it will be creating 100 new jobs in the Montreal area.

What it did not announce was that approximately 80 current enRoute jobs in Winnipeg will be lost as a result of this same decision. Winnipeg's history of losing out to Montreal continues unabated and no voice on the government's side is raised on its behalf.

I am told that another 48 Air Canada jobs in Winnipeg are at risk because of a scheme by Air Canada to farm out its revenue accounting systems program to an American company, using a system developed by Air Canada employees which they thought they were designing for their own use.

Remember when we used to have a publicly owned national airline? Contracting Winnipeg work out to a U.S. firm would have been unthinkable then. Now the whole city seems to be dispensable.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, it is with total disbelief that I read today in the Montreal Gazette that the Minister of National Revenue will not even attempt to collect over half a million dollars in GST payments that were supposedly mistakenly refunded to the yes committee in last October's referendum.

As an excuse he said that the yes committee is officially disbanded so the government simply cannot collect.

Now Canadians finally realize where the GST is going. It is going to line the pockets of the big three: the Conservatives, the Liberals and the New Democratic Party. It is absolutely unconscionable that the taxpayers of Canada, a majority of whom voted against these three parties in the referendum, are actually subsidizing these parties through the loss of this revenue.

• (1405)

The minister should resign for funnelling GST tax dollars to his friends involved in the yes committee's activities. At the very least, the Tories, the Grits and the socialists should pay back the money they owe to the Canadian taxpayers.

My constituents say no once again to the yes committee. They say: "No you may not get off GST-free. Pay your debts".

QUEBEC

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week I gave Parliament evidence that Jacques Parizeau expects that a sovereign Quebec will be reliant upon France.

As well, in an article in the June 1992 issue of The Financial Post the member for Lac-Saint-Jean said that as a sovereignist he, and I quote: "expects a lot from France". Perhaps Quebecers should be asking the member for Lac-Saint-Jean what the sovereignists expect from France and what Quebecers will have to give up for this.

The Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois are insisting that Quebec can make it on its own, yet the evidence suggests otherwise.

CRIME PREVENTION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I questioned the Minister of Justice on what preventive measures were being undertaken by his government to address the root causes behind criminal behaviour.

I also drew the minister's attention to a letter sent over four months ago that was signed by myself, MPP Tony Ruprecht, metro Toronto councillor Derwyn Shea and city councillor Chris Korwin-Kuczynski. It pleaded with the minister to apply federal resources to fight the rampant drug and sex trade in Parkdale—High Park. To date we have not received a response to our request.

For the minister's benefit, I invite him to attend a public forum that I am co-hosting along with the hon. member for Scarborough West next April 3 at Metro Hall in Toronto.

In the meantime, I will leave the minister with the comments I received from one of the senior citizens in my riding. I quote: "Seniors cannot go out at night. We deserve to go out and enjoy music and the arts but we are victims in our own homes and feel that we are in jail permanently".

CANADA–UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, the Canada–U.S. free trade agreement has thrown open the doors to opportunity for industry and workers in my riding of London—Middlesex.

I point to the Kaiser aluminum extrusion plant recently built in London, Ontario. Kaiser's Canadian sales manager says the Canada–U.S. free trade agreement made it all possible. The elimination of a duty on aluminum products crossing the border has eliminated a major obstacle.

Sixty per cent to seventy per cent of this plant's production will be sold in the U.S. A further example of the free trade agreement's benefits is the $675 million U.S. deal between General Motors' diesel division in London, Ontario and the leading U.S. railroad company, Burlington Northern. General Motors will build 350 locomotives by 1997.

Free trade is paying off. Just ask my constituents. Mexico can also be good for Canada. Let us get on with the deal.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the New England Journal of Medicine has pointed out that it costs 40 per cent more per patient hospitalized in American hospitals than it does in Canada. It also points out that not only are our costs lower but that we have lower costs in administration, that we use high technology much better, and that we target children much better than the Americans do.

I am delighted with my leader's comments about his commitment to the Canada Health Act and its five principles, as well as his unfailing commitment to medicare in Canada and its universality.

I am really quite disturbed, as are many other Canadians, by the comments of two leadership candidates of the Conservative Party suggesting that perhaps user fees or universality of medicare would be compromised. As well, there was another leadership candidate who agrees. This is very disturbing to Canadians.

I might also add that the Filmon government in Manitoba has decided to cut and slash hospital programs. I think it has not seen this particular study.

CANADA POST

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, we have some good news for small, weekly community newspapers and paid circulation magazines. These businesses would have faced a drastic increase in postal rates on March 1, 1993. Rate increases will be limited to 10 per cent a year for the next three years as opposed to a 50 per cent increase.

This agreement between Canada Post and Communications Canada also guarantees that Canadian paid circulation magazines will benefit from a gradual transition to full commercial rates. Additional rate increases will be limited to 3 per cent, 5 per cent and 5 per cent over the next three years.

• (1410)

Also, the replacement program for paid circulation magazines which was to be implemented in 1994 has been postponed until 1996. This government recognizes the important role small weekly newspapers play in advancing community participation, and this is just one more positive program we have put in place to continue to foster pride in small communities.

MEMBER FOR HALTON—PEEL

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it has now been established that there is really no difference between provincial Tories and federal Tories.

Shortly after the current election campaign in P.E.I. began the provincial Tories ran ads that were so revolting and insulting to the people of P.E.I. that the Tories had to withdraw the ads.

Now the member for Halton—Peel, who could be the next Conservative Prime Minister of Canada, wants as part of his economic policy to eliminate the province of Prince Edward Island from Confederation.

This is the same MP who with two of his pals slithered into Summerside in July 1989 when the Tories closed CFB Summerside. Now he wants to close the province.

Does this potential Tory prime minister reflect current Conservative economic thinking? What province will follow? Newfoundland? Saskatchewan? Manitoba?

Barbara Yaffe, Vancouver Sun suburban editor, quotes future Prime Minister Garth as saying:

> One of the ways he would lead us out of the shadows of debt would be to cut government bureaucracy in ways that would curl hair from St. John's to Victoria. Does a tiny province like P.E.I. really need its own government?

I call upon the Prime Minister to apologize to the people of Prince Edward Island on behalf of this government and to repudiate the remarks of the member for Halton—Peel.

THE PARLIAMENT, BUSINESS, AND LABOUR TRUST

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the efforts of the Parliament, business and labour trust. The efforts of this group to educate parliamentarians in labour and business management have no doubt been a success.

Its plans to reverse the process and enable labour and business management to become versed in the workings of Parliament and government will no doubt also be a success.

I would like to thank my hosts while participating in the exchange, Dr. Mike Sopko and Dr. Tom Barnett of Inco. My study of their company was a valuable experience.

In closing, I would like to thank the various companies involved in the trust and I would also like to thank parliamentarians past and present for their efforts.

To you, Mr. Speaker, I say a special thank you for your hospitality on Monday past.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it has been remarkable to read and hear from all those people who hate trade unions, like The Financial Post, how wonderful it has been to see CAW members getting a chance to exercise democracy.

It has been even more amusing to see Liberals hailing this exercise in democracy and never asking themselves if shareholders have a vote on the millions their party receives from the corporate world.

For all these new-found friends of the labour movement I have some important news: Last night the largest CAW local in Windsor representing Chrysler workers held a membership meeting to reconsider its ties to our party. Its members voted 300 to 4 in favour of keeping its affiliation with the New Democrats.

I just hope that the media which made so much of the Oshawa membership meeting vote will give as much attention to this overwhelming support for New Democrats from this Windsor CAW membership meeting.

CONSERVATIVE LEADERSHIP

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, let us examine another exciting day in the life of the PM,—that stands for puppet master of course.

First the PM, the puppet master, from his throne in the mansion, not the one in Westmount but the one on Sussex Drive, pulled the strings to orchestrate his own dynasty.

He appointed the Avril Arrow as minister of defence. Then he asked the bagmen in the other place to bring bags full of loonies for the Avril's campaign. So hard did the PM—did I say that this stands for puppet master—? Pull on the strings that the other puppets were knocked off the stage completely.

No matter. From the mansion, the one on Sussex Drive not the one in Westmount, the PM finally convinced Fuzzy to enter the race to give the performance some legitimacy.

Now the Garth decided to run to prove the theory that anybody, and I mean anybody, can be Tory leader.

But all Canadians are really wondering and sitting on the edge of their chairs waiting to see if Otto the Hun will enter the race. Will he take the skate guards off? No one knows except perhaps the PM. By the way, did I say that stands for puppet master?

THE GAZETTE

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all Canadians, especially those whom I have the honour to represent in this House, I want to express how indignant and angry we feel about the cartoon published this morning in the Montreal Gazette.

This drawing incites violence.

It is a disgrace to Canadian journalism. Its author, Terry Mosher, is trampling underfoot what we Canadians hold sacred: respect for the individual, the family, democracy and plain common sense. Nothing can excuse this cruel and disgusting attack on the Prime Minister and his family.

I call on all my colleagues to protest energetically to the man responsible for this indignity and those who allowed it to be published. Freedom of the press exists here as elsewhere to defend values, to express what is noble and beautiful in the human being.

Those who use it to foster hate, to encourage violence, must be denounced; such people are a poison that threatens democracy. The real butt of the cartoon we saw this morning in the Gazette is the mean, small-minded, sick man who drew it, Terry Mosher. The Gazette and its editors have made a mockery of what a newspaper is supposed to be.

Mr. Speaker, sometimes we get our hands dirty reading a newspaper, but those who read the Gazette this morning felt that their very dignity as human beings was sullied.

TRADE

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, free trade was responsible for Bill C-91, one of the worst pieces of legislation to ever pass through this House.

Extending drug patent protection to the fabulously wealthy pharmaceutical companies at the expense of all Canadians, present and future, is a typical Tory fiddle. But is this government content? No. Now it has proposed a ban on 64 herbs and plants because of an obligation in the free trade agreement with the U.S.

Canadians have been using these healing medicinal alternatives for decades. Aboriginal peoples have been using them for centuries. Yet when the multinational pharmaceutical companies are involved Tories know what is best for us all: Level the playing field by clearing any competition even if it is a backyard botanist.

It is time for a change. Let us abrogate the disastrous U.S. trade deal, squash the proposed Mexican deal and chuck this money-grabbing Tory government out on its ear.

MONTREAL GAZETTE

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, I refer today to the scandalous and odious incitement to violence and assassination being proudly printed in this morning's Montreal Gazette.

This is a disgrace. It is a black eye for Canadian journalism and a crime against the fundamental Canadian values of decency and mutual respect.

Given Mr. Mosher's well-known proclivities, I would have thought he would have been the last person in Canada to deal with the question of violence so lightly.

I call on the owners, the publisher and the editorial staff of the Montreal Gazette to apologize to all Montrealers and to all Canadians for this vile and hostile message carried in today's caricature by Terry Mosher.

Given the enormous tragedies that have befallen Montreal at l'École Polytechnique and Concordia University, only a truly sick mind could find anything humorous in a suggestion that such insane violence be repeated against the Prime Minister of Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

HEALTH CARE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the Prime Minister that I share the views expressed by his colleague concerning this morning's cartoon. It was not called for. But we have to ask a question of the Prime Minister anyway.

Yesterday a report published in the New England Journal of Medicine said that Canadian medicare is 40 per cent less costly than the American system. Whereas in Canada everyone is covered freely, in the United States 30 million people are not covered. It is reported that the Canadian system is as good and even more effective than the American system.

I ask the Prime Minister was the Minister of National Revenue expressing a government policy when he said yesterday that the medicare system of Canada, which is free for everybody, should be abolished?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the statement to which my hon. friend refers. I will be happy to take a look at it.

The general sentiment my hon. friend has expressed in regard to the Canadian health system, with its imperfections, is that it remains one of the finest in the world. I have had the occasion recently to indicate that to President Clinton and to others. I think that is a view that would be widely held by Canadians.

I suppose if anyone wanted to campaign for any job if there were a vacancy, this might not be the best platform one might want to adopt. However, I am not aware that anybody has considered adopting that.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. I am sure the leadership race will provide some insights into the Conservative soul and that there will be similar suggestions.

Now that we know the Prime Minister is not inclined to share the opinion of the Minister of National Revenue that free health services for Canadians should be abolished, I would like to know what he thinks of statements made by two candidates who said that the government would be well advised to cancel the helicopter program which his favourite candidate, the Minister of National Defence, is proposing to Canadians and which will cost $5.8 billion, money that could be used to maintain free and universal health services and thus preserve the individual dignity of all Canadians.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I read the comments made by two members of my caucus and I found their opinions interesting as I do similar opinions put forward by the opposition.

The government's position is well known and ably defended, not only by the Minister of National Defence but by other members of the government as well. There is no reason to get upset when a member who is seeking the leadership of his party wonders about certain items of government policy. I can assure the hon. member that it is not the kind of thing that keeps me awake nights. And it shouldn't bother him either. It is entirely legitimate for a member to have questions about the policies of the government or of the opposition. My point is that this is all very interesting, but I don't think the hon. member should make too much of it.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think there have been two members so far who have suggested that the helicopter program be abolished. On this side we consider it is one idea we can share with the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore, not every one of his policies but this one is kind of acceptable.

I would like the Prime Minister to comment on this: It is one week before the election in P.E.I. One of the leadership candidates has suggested that we should abolish the province of Prince Edward Island. Is that a new idea that will become part of the Tory program very soon?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thought the last thing I heard my hon. friend say was that he was going to eliminate the GST. That would close down the GST centre in Summerside, Prince Edward Island, thereby throwing 1,000 Islanders out of work.

I can assure my hon. friend that no one would even seriously consider abolishing such a magnificent and supportive province like Prince Edward Island. The question is: Would my hon. friend give us the same assurance that he will keep the GST in place so as to preserve those 1,000 jobs in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister who may have forgotten that the present Leader of the Opposition was responsible for putting the Department of Veterans Affairs in Prince Edward Island.

Provincial governments are saying that they have to impose very tough budgets on their populations because of this government's policy of off-loading its own debt and deficit problems onto the provinces.

Will the Prime Minister start a new approach based on working with the provinces to deal with these kinds of concerns? This would be instead of simply dumping or off-loading the government's own problems on the shoulders of the provinces through capping and cutting vital transfer payments for key programs like post-secondary education and health care.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the problem of course is not one of off-loading. The problem is that certain provinces waited too long to cut back on their own rate of increase in expenditures.

When we came to office program expenditures in Ottawa had been increasing at a rate of 15 per cent a year for 14 years. We cut that down to below the rate of inflation to 4.1 per cent over nine years.

Provinces—for example, when the new NDP government came in in Ontario—increased expenditures in the neighbourhood of 13 per cent a year. They finally realized that you cannot spend your way out of this kind of problem so they are now beginning to do what they should have been doing some years ago. I congratulate them for that.

I want to point out to my hon. friend that the suggestion that there has been off-loading is misleading. Major transfers to Ontario will grow at an average annual rate of 6 per cent.

The major transfers to Newfoundland exceed $1.4 billion and have been growing at a rate above the rate of inflation, namely 5.1 per cent for nine years.

Transfers to Saskatchewan have been growing at an average annual rate of 7.4 per cent when the Government of Canada has kept its own expenditures down below 4 per cent. We are transferring to Saskatchewan infinitely more on a percentage basis than we are expending here in Ottawa. I congratulate the premier of Saskatchewan. He has finally come to the view that the policies we have been seeking to implement here are the right ones both for Canada and Saskatchewan.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, what the Prime Minister is talking about is really an ad hoc approach to crises created by previous budgets of his government.

Will the Prime Minister convene a high level federal-provincial conference to develop a new approach to federal-provincial fiscal and financial relations? This approach would be one that gets away from making the provincial taxpayer bear the burden of what in fact amounts to mismanagement and resulting off-loading, no matter how the Prime Minister describes the situation.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to get into an argument with my hon. friend. The figures are there and they are either right or wrong. He can examine them and stand up in the House and say that the information I have just given to the House is wrong.

The fact of the matter is that our present difficulties were generated by program expenditures at the federal government level which increased at this—

Mr. Peterson: It is our fault.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says: "It is our fault". For once he is right. It was abusive spending which now has to be brought under control at all levels, the federal level, the provincial level and the municipal level. That is all we are saying.

There is enough blame to go around for everybody. I do not think anybody gets any advantage in saying: "It is not my fault, it is yours", or vice versa.

Clearly, the country has to come to the view that we have been living beyond our means for too long and it must stop. I commend those provinces and those premiers who have come to the realization that program expenditures cannot increase at a rate of 14 per cent a year when productivity is increasing at 1.8 per cent and revenues are increasing at 4 per cent. It does not work. It leads to the kind of deficit and crippling of our growth that we have seen. Only these kinds of economic and fiscal policies can ensure we get out of that on behalf of our children.

TRADE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, when we were in Washington, D.C., we learned that the proposed labour side deal has three options. The first option protects no one. The second option calls for basic labour standards and a toothless commission to monitor it. The third option incorporates all labour standards, the commission and the possibility of trade sanctions and border measures.

• (1430)

My question is for the Prime Minister. Will the government tell the Canadian people that it will support strong labour standards and a real enforcement mechanism to protect Canadian workers and, if not, why not?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing more dangerous than a socialist who is taking a trip.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: Heureux qui comme Ulysse a fait un beau voyage!

[English]

My hon. friend knows full well that Canada's labour standards are among the highest in the world. These have always been enforced and will continue to be enforced by the Government of Canada and have continued to be through the free trade agreement and will be through NAFTA. My hon. friend should not worry about matters that have been resolved and will continue to be defended very vigorously and I think well.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, possibly the only thing more dangerous is a Prime Minister who has taken a trip to the United States and is telling us that these side deals have very little, if anything, to do with Canada.

We know there is no enforcement of labour standards in Mexico. We also know the track record of the government when it comes to protecting Canadian workers. It is bad, bad, bad. I would ask the Prime Minister again to protect Canadian workers. Is he going to do that or is he going to abandon them in his rush to sign and ratify the NAFTA agreement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what we are submitting to the House for consideration is a treaty among Canada, Mexico and the United States. It is a trade treaty designed to increase commerce between the three countries. The entire international experience being that as you lower barriers and tariffs you tend to create more wealth.

I truly do not understand the preoccupation of the socialists with Mexico in the following sense. Socialists demand that we give more and more foreign aid to developing countries. Mexico is saying that they are a developing country but they would rather not have handouts. What they would like is an occasion to trade into a developed market. NAFTA gives us that opportunity to trade, thereby raising the collective wealth and living standards of Mexicans so that they can better fulfil their responsibilities toward their own citizens.

What we are trying to do is allow Mexicans to share in the wealth of our continent as we create new jobs for Canadian citizens.

I would have thought that the socialists would get behind the idea that we can become more prosperous in Canada while helping our neighbours share in that prosperity.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): What is scary is a Conservative demonstrating altruism. What did the Mexican bishop say about the North American free trade agreement? I think what we have seen here is a demonstration of paternalism.

The Prime Minister says he has some doubts about the wisdom of the side deals. The Minister for International Trade says we are willing to consult. The Minister of the Environment says that yes, of course, it is incorporated in the deal.

We want to know who is speaking for Canada and why Canadians should have any confidence in the negotiating stance of the government?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to offend ecclesiastically anyone but my hon. friend can assume that Mexican bishops are not speaking for Canada. The people speaking for Canada are the authorized ambassadors who are there negotiating skilfully on behalf of the people and the Parliament of Canada.

We have some remarkable public servants, very talented and able, who are there today representing the interests of the government and the Parliament of Canada. When they have concluded their work they will report back to the government and the government will report to the House of Commons. At this point my hon. friend can raise whatever fears she may or may not have. It may be that she will be satisfied with the work of these public servants on behalf of Canada and will rise in her place to thank me and others for NAFTA.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the government must know that the removal of interprovincial trade barriers is a major requirement if Canada is going to benefit from freer trade whether hemispherically or globally.

It must know that the Macdonald royal commission, the Grandpré commission and the government's own prosperity initiative have all urged that an essential domestic measure if free trade is going to be effective necessitates the removal of the barriers to the free movement of people, goods and services in our country.

Today in Montreal there is a meeting on this subject. Can the Prime Minister or the minister speaking for the minister of trade tell us and the Canadian people what new approaches this government is taking to promote the removal of interprovincial trade barriers? Most important, what timetable has it in mind for the removal of such barriers?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for an important question. It is true that the removal of trade barriers leads to jobs and to new wealth. I am very pleased to announce today that we have record exports world-wide. We now have a $9.5 billion export surplus with the rest of the world in trade.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hockin: We have also heard today that the surplus with the United States is $17.7 billion, all of this because trade barriers have been reduced world-wide. The hon. member is quite right to ask about removal of trade barriers.

In the meeting today in Montreal two very specific things are going to be accomplished. They are going to put in place a very tight timeline in deadlines. July 1995 will be the deadline for a progressive removal of barriers to trade within Canada. It is in the hundreds. Hundreds of different trade barriers will be dealt with with the timeline expiring in July 1995.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I welcome, as I am sure all of us in the House do, a timetable being put in place for the removal of interprovincial trade barriers.

As an assurance that such a timetable is going to be met, the need for an interprovincial and federal commission to monitor the effectiveness of the measures must be obvious. It was in the minds of the governments at the time of the Charlottetown accord and we would now look to this government to implement it.

Will that proposal be on the table in Montreal? Will it be a federal government position? If not, will the government move to test its commerce powers in the courts if there is any doubt about the federal government's commerce powers?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I do not think proliferating commissions necessarily brings progress.

What we want to do, and in fact a commission may be set up, but proliferating commissions is not really what the country wants. What it wants is action and it wants action through ministers. That is what is going on today.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

In light of the response yesterday of the Minister for International Trade, will the government assure the House and Canadians that the proposed North American commission on the environment will have powers to enforce environmental laws and standards? In other words, can the government give an unqualified commitment that Canada will not accept anything less than that?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, we must be clear what the hon. member is asking for. He is asking for complete, 100 per cent violation of our sovereignty. If we set up a commission where other countries unilaterally can decide what we do, then it is a violation of our sovereignty.

A commission can be set up that respects sovereignty. That seems to be the view of most of the parties to the NAFTA negotiations. Of course, this whole commission idea is kind of a sidecar to the main architecture which is the NAFTA agreement itself which is in place. We are just discussing a small side issue. For us to violate sovereignty for a commission is a question I think the hon. member would like to look at again.

• (1440)

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately for the minister air pollution does not respect sovereignty. Water pollution does not respect sovereignty. The environment does not respect political boundaries. That is what the minister has to understand first.

My supplementary question therefore is this: In the NAFTA agreement, there is a need for standards on production and processes. Will the government include the use of trade measures in order to make industrial activities and production methods environmentally sound regardless of sovereignty?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am glad my hon. friend has shifted his ground. He has moved off this violation of sovereignty to a much more sensible set of arguments. We would be delighted to take a look at those.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. He will know that the Saskatchewan debt, the largest per capita debt in Canada, was created by the financial mismanagement of his Tory friends in the Devine government and by unilateral federal changes to transfer payments which cost the province last year alone $538.1 million.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance admitted the serious mistakes in his government's economic policies by making an emergency payment of $30 million to Saskatchewan as well as $300 million to Ontario and $4 million to Prince Edward Island.

When will the Prime Minister admit that forcing the provinces toward bankruptcy is no solution to Canada's economic problems?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we of course regret the difficulties that the province of Saskatchewan finds itself in. We commend the Premier of Saskatchewan for some of the initiatives he appears to be prepared to take. There are others.

As he knows, the federal government has increased payments to grain and oilseeds producers in Saskatchewan by 655 per cent since the time that we entered government in 1984. We have increased transfers to the province of Saskatchewan substantially above the rate of inflation each year for almost nine years.

The Government of Canada pays some 83 per cent of all agricultural payments that go into the province of Saskatchewan in rough terms. The contribution from the Government of Canada to Saskatchewan is enormous financially on a per capita basis. There has been overspending in the province and the premier is beginning to deal with it.

One way where he could save a lot of money and in fact make money, some hundreds of millions of dollars, and help Saskatchewan modernize its economy, would be to integrate the Saskatchewan sales tax with the GST. He would receive some hundreds of millions of dollars and he would help Saskatchewan producers immediately create jobs in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, there are many things that the premier of Saskatchewan can do to assist the economy of Saskatchewan. The one thing he will not do is harmonize the GST with the provincial sales tax.

The Prime Minister talks about agriculture. He should know that 85 per cent is indeed a very rough figure because the federal government's support to agriculture in Saskatchewan used to be 100 per cent. Now it is only 59 per cent, a cost of $250 million over-all to Saskatchewan.

I suggest to the Prime Minister what this country needs is a federal government that will work with the provinces. I ask him why will he not call a first ministers conference to chart an economic course for Canada which works with the provinces instead of fighting against them?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is not a bad idea. What about a Canada where the provinces would work with the federal government?

We transfer taxpayers' money to them at a rate higher than we spend and that Parliament authorizes for federal programs. Every single transfer to people and provinces from CAP to tax transfers has increased at a rate significantly over and above the rate of inflation, while expenditures in Ottawa have been kept to 4.1 per cent over a period of nine years, having brought it down from 14 per cent on an average basis for 15 years.

Yet we still wrestle with the deficit. We have to bring it down to decrease interest rates even further and to keep inflation down. Because all of these help attract jobs to the province of Saskatchewan. Saskatchewan would not be helped today at all if for example we had, as we did coming out of the earlier recession, interest rates at 22.75 per cent and inflation running at 12.9 per cent that would be an absolute catastrophe. We have a lot of fundamentals in place that will benefit Saskatchewan.

• (1445)

One way where Saskatchewan could help itself and help Canada would be harmonizing its tax policies with the GST, thereby creating new wealth and new jobs in Saskatchewan.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister.

In the past few days both the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence have responded to questions in this House on sexual harassment within the military.

This morning the commissioner of human rights released his annual report. I would like to quote from a statement he made at the press conference: "The defence department policies on sexual harassment are too general and there are clear signs no one in the department takes them seriously".

Would the Prime Minister please respond.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the verdict by the commissioner that there are clear signs in the department that no one takes them seriously. That is an unacceptable statement because it is not consistent with the tremendous efforts of the minister, the CDS and all of the leaders in the department to make sure that there is a policy of zero tolerance for sexual harassment.

The Liberal member for Halifax is laughing.

Ms. Clancy: I'm laughing at you.

Mr. Mulroney: This is not a laughing matter. It deals with sexual harassment and the policy of every government, including this one, and all of its public servants has to be one of zero tolerance for sexual harassment at any time under any circumstances.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, the board of the defence department had recommended that a contact outside the chain of command would make it easier for women to report on sexual harassment.

The harasser has the protection of working in a system where resistance to accepting women is commonplace. The harasser has the protection of hiding behind the Privacy Act. Yet a victim can lose her job, she suffers physical and mental stress and is unable to find out what punishment if any has been given to the harasser.

I ask again: Will the government take immediate steps to protect the victim instead of the harasser?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thought that I had indicated very clearly to my hon. friend a few days ago the response and the policy of the government in regard to this very legitimate question that she raises.

The Minister of National Defence and the CDS have indicated very clearly that there are two important elements. There is a policy of zero tolerance for sexual harassment within the department and, second, the Minister of National Defence and Admiral Anderson are working very actively to create a climate wherein the victim is given the benefit of the presumption of innocence and where this matter can be resolved with all of the possible precautions being provided to the person who allegedly has been offended, both by the incident and/or by the process.

It is not perfect. We are not there yet, but every effort of the Minister of National Defence and every effort of the CDS and his colleagues is designed to achieve that objective. I hope my hon. friend will agree with me that it is a laudable objective that we are now pursuing.

LUBICON CREE

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The Lubicon Cree of northern Alberta have struggled for more than 40 years to secure a permanent land base. Their outstanding land claims have become an international human rights issue and no negotiations have been held in the last four years.

When will this government find the political will to return to the negotiating table?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I think we should put this into context. So far, the Minister of Indian Affairs has had five meetings with the chief. Proposals were put on the table, and the minister has always said he was prepared to continue negotiations.

• (1450)

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The Lubicon Settlement Commission of Review has recommended that beginning immediately all royalties be held in trust and that no additional permits or leases be granted on traditional Lubicon lands without Lubicon approval. Multinational corporations are extracting over $1 million each day from Lubicon land.

Will the minister make a commitment today to end third-party pillaging of Lubicon resources, which has gone on for 40 years without their consent?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, Canada and the Province of Alberta have offered the Lubicon Lake Band $73 million. I think that is a valid and generous offer and to my knowledge both governments are still prepared to review the case.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications.

Last week, the president of the CBC announced that one of his first priorities was plans for an all-news service in French, like Newsworld. Although anglophones have had their service for four years all we got was some proposals that were either rejected by the CRTC or dropped by the CBC.

I want to ask the minister whether he intends to intervene and ensure that this time the CBC's proposal is maintained so that francophones in this country will finally have an all-news service in French.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, generally speaking I agree with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member. However, the decision is up to the CBC and is subject to the granting of a broadcasting license under the Broadcasting Act.

It is up to the CRTC to decide whether this kind of service for Canada's francophone population can be viable. I understand that details of the plan will be announced in a matter of weeks.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister.

Today Human Rights Commissioner Yalden in his annual report said that ethnic purism and racial superiority are spreading and complacency is a grave danger in Canada. Unfortunately the Prime Minister's reluctance to fulfil his past promises regarding racism is feeding this kind of complacency.

I ask the Prime Minister if he will denounce racism by fulfilling the commitment he made back in 1988 to establish a Canadian race relations foundation and will he proclaim Bill C-63 which we passed in this House in 1991 before he leaves? Will he at least establish start-up funds? I know it is difficult to get the full capital commitment, but why not establish a small amount of start-up funds for the foundation to get going, as requested by the Japanese Canadian Association?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend astonishes me with the preface to her question about the fact that we have somehow been delinquent in regard to racism.

We have fought against racism as a profound evil. All of our actions and all of our statements have been devoted to ridding this country of racism both here and in our foreign policy; for example, in South Africa by tying foreign aid more and more to human rights.

In Canada how can my hon. friend say this when after 25 years of refusing to do it this government finally appointed a royal commission to ferret out those guilty of Nazi war crimes in Canada and begin the prosecutions for the evils of Naziism which was alive here in Canada. How can the member say that when after 40 years of refusal this government brought forward a policy to provide legitimate redress to Japanese Canadians? How can my hon. friend suggest that when we created the first Ministry of Multiculturalism and Citizenship?

There are legitimate reasons to criticize anything I suppose, but that is certainly one that is unworthy of my hon. friend.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister why he has not fulfilled his commitment to Japanese Canadians and to others across this country to establish the race relations foundation. That was part of his agreement and it is still not established. The legislation is not even proclaimed.

• (1455)

My supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. Our country's history as he knows is tainted by legislative racism that was involved in the Chinese head tax and the Exclusion Act which affects Chinese families to this day, and also the unjust internment of Ukrainian, German and Italian Canadians during wartime.

In view of the Prime Minister's earlier statements, I would ask if before leaving office he would act to remove the hurt and the shame on all of us as Canadians of these historic injustices with an official apology and appropriate address. Will he do that for Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated half a dozen major instances where we have already acted. These are situations where previous governments refused for decades to act. I refer to the Japanese Canadians by way of illustration.

Ms. Mitchell: You have not finished it.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says we have not finished it.

Ms. Mitchell: Where is the foundation?

Mr. Mulroney: Perhaps it was not perfectly done. We have provided an apology in this House. We provided $350 million to Japanese Canadians and we provided this to the satisfaction of all of the Japanese Canadian communities.

Mr. Speaker: I might point out the right hon. Prime Minister has been asked a question and the right hon. Prime Minister is answering the question. The right hon. Prime Minister has the floor.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend refers to the Italian community. She did so en passant.

I was the first Prime Minister to act for the national leadership of the Italian community which had sought for four decades an apology for the abuses by the Government of Canada in the early 1940s where Italian Canadians were stripped of their citizenship and illegally imprisoned by the Government of Canada. Governments for 45 years refused to acknowledge this and apologize to the Italian community in Canada.

On behalf of all parliamentarians, on behalf of this government, I went to Toronto, met with the leadership of the Italian community and did precisely that. So, systematically, from the enormous damage inflicted on the Jewish community to the pain inflicted on Japanese Canadians, to the problems encountered by the Ukrainians to the travesties inflicted on the Italian Canadian community, item by item, community by community, to the Chinese Canadians, we have been trying to redress some of the extraordinary pain and mistakes of the past.

My hon. friend is right, we cannot do it perfectly, but by God we have tried.

LIVESTOCK FEED FREIGHT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

Recent announced reductions to the Livestock Feed Freight Assistance Program seemed to be in contradiction to the act which says: "The object of the act is to ensure fair equalization feed grain prices in eastern Canada, British Columbia, Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories".

The present proposal does not maintain that principle. I wonder if the department will bring in a new proposal that does comply with the act and is fairer to Atlantic Canadian farmers.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, Agriculture Canada as the member knows met with officials and their provincial counterparts about February 25 in Moncton to discuss this feed freight assistance issue. The main agenda, of course, was the 10 per cent reduction.

As a follow-up to this meeting a proposed compromise solution was developed by the Livestock Feed Bureau and sent to their provincial counterparts on March 12 for their perusal.

If a consensus can be reached among the affected provinces based on this proposal or a slightly modified proposal, the federal government is prepared to take a look at it.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. The North American pornography industry has exploded from a $5 million industry in the early seventies to a $10 billion industry today.

The Los Angeles Times estimates that there are 1.5 million children under the age of 16 involved in the commercial sex trade in North America.

Most of this is happening in the United States. I think the Prime Minister would agree we would be naive to say that this plague is not happening also in Canada. The Prime Minister knows this is a problem.

• (1500)

When is he and his government going to bring forward legislation banning the possession of child pornography in this country?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend raises a very important issue. He knows that the Minister of Justice is away on government business today.

I will certainly take notice of this very important point and confer with the Minister of Justice who will get back to the hon. member as quickly as possible.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the former Minister of Justice, the present minister of defence, promised to bring forward legislation. The present Minister of Justice is just parroting this position.

The Supreme Court of Canada has made a link between pornography and abuse against women and children. Thirty per cent of all the magazines sold on news stands today would have been illegal 20 years ago.

When is this government going to put a stop to the suffering of those involved in this industry and do something?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think I agreed with my hon. friend that it is an important problem. He does not have to yell to try to make it more important. I understood it correctly.

I am sure my colleague the Minister of Justice is also very aware of this. I will raise it with him and upon his return I am convinced that he will speak to the hon. member. Just bringing a bill before the House will not resolve the issue because the bill has to be passed. If we have co-operation on other bills maybe legislation would go quickly.

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, The Montreal Gazette reported that Revenue Canada will not try to collect $539,000 in GST payments it claims was mistakenly refunded to the Yes Committee after the October constitutional referendum.

It quotes the Minister of National Revenue, a candidate for the PC leadership, as saying that the debt is unfortunately not collectable.

Could the Minister of National Revenue inform the House whether this type of policy would apply as well to ordinary citizens, to small businesses and to the Vote No referendum committee in the same way?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, the Minister of National Revenue is out of the House on business.

I would be pleased to take this question as notice for him. The position taken consistently by the Minister of National Revenue is to stand up for ordinary taxpayers and to do everything he can to defend their rights. This is a Minister of National Revenue who has fiercely defended the rights of Canadians. He has spoken out strongly to ensure the laws of Canada are enforced.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government House leader could inform the House of the business that he proposes to bring before the House tomorrow, Friday and for the early part of next week.

I know he will not agree with the comments of his colleague, the assistant House leader, when he says there has not been co-operation in the House. I think he knows there has been extensive co-operation. He would agree with me that bills have been sailing through this House at a record rate.

Perhaps he would give us the business for next week.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, this afternoon we will continue with the sixth of the seven allotted days for the supply period.

Tomorrow I understand there is agreement to complete second reading in the morning of Bill C-97, the Marine Insurance Act, and Bill C-83, the Transport of Goods by Waters Act. Tomorrow afternoon we consider report stage of Bill C-113, the Expenditure Restraint Act.

Monday will be the last allotted day for this supply period.

Tuesday we will continue with Bill C-113 at report stage, if it has not been completed, or with third reading of Bill C-113.

As well, we are hoping to come to an agreement to do second reading of Bill C-116, the Conflict of Interest Act, in the evening one day next week. However there seems to be some reluctance on the part of the New Democratic Party to quickly pass this important piece of legislation which improves and strengthens the rules governing conflict of interest for parliamentarians.

I hope we can also have similar agreement concerning the elections act as well.

While I would certainly not want to suggest that there has been no co-operation, I wanted to echo that my parliamentary secretary was absolutely correct in saying that with more co-operation we would have time to participate in debates that the public were interested in and in pursuing important bills like ones dealing with child pornography.

Quite frankly, as the House leader, because of the inability to get through those bills which have significant financial impact on the taxpayers of Canada I have had to tell my cabinet colleagues that there is no use bringing forward more legislation, even good legislation, because I simply cannot get it through the House.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, we all know the unreasonable demands that are placed on the House leader by his cabinet colleagues. They seem to expect him to perform miracles because they bring their legislation forward late instead of early in the mandate. But that is a problem that the opposition is unable to assist him with.

I wonder if he would consider moving the final opposition day from Monday, March 22 until later in the week. He knows that the supply period ends March 26 and calling the last supply day on March 22 allows less than two weeks for the committees of the House to consider Supplementary Estimates C, which were tabled only on Tuesday, March 9.

I know he must agree with me when I say that the study of the estimates is one of the primary responsibilities of this institution and he would want to allow maximum time. Would he not agree that less than two weeks is an unreasonable amount of time to study those important supplementary estimates and that perhaps he should delay the supply day until later in the week?

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I would certainly be prepared to do that if we could show this new spirit of co-operation and get some agreement under Standing Order 78(1) or 78(2) for Bill C-113.

If the hon. member is suggesting that he is willing to co-operate in support of what he just said was a co-operative mood, and we can get agreement under Standing Order 78(1) or 78(2) to proceed with Bill C-113, then of course we can move the supply day to later on in the week. That would certainly be satisfactory to me. We can always make those kinds of arrangements.

Now he has held up four fingers, suggesting four days. The British Parliament was able to discuss Maastricht in six hours yet he thinks we need four days for Bill C-113.

This is what I mean. They talk co-operation, Madam Speaker, but in fact when it comes down to the crunch they want debate, discussion ad nauseam to an empty Parliament because no one is interested in what they have to say.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I suggest to my hon. friend, the government House leader, that he would find much more co-operation if the government introduced legislation that the public was actually interested in, as opposed to the legislation that he is introducing.

He said he was going to hold this as a tantalizing encouragement, that he would one day bring in legislation that the public was actually interested in. The sooner the better.

He referred to the New Democrats having some concern regarding Bill C-116, the conflict of interest legislation. I want to say very clearly that we have supported this legislation for as long as I have been in this House. We have been asking the government to come forward with legislation as long as I have been in this House. The fact that we have waited for eight and a half years for legislation seems to me to be odd, at this eight and a half year period, to be wanting to rush it through in one evening's debate.

We are anxious to support this legislation. We have some concerns with it but we want to approach this in a rational, logical and business-like way to ensure that it receives the appropriate study and examination. To rush it through late one night seems to be an unusual way to deal with such important legislation.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member knows that in fact the legislation exactly reflects the unanimous report of a committee of this House, which produced these recommendations, upon which there was New Democratic Party members. He knows that every member has the bill in his possession right now and is capable of reading it and reaching any conclusions. In fact, if they want to go back and amend that previous report there is even the capacity to do that.

What I cannot do and act responsibly to the taxpayers of Canada is put on hold or delay a series of bills, the collective result of which is about a billion dollars—that is one and nine zeros—impact on the taxpayers of Canada in order to bring forward what the House leader of the New Democratic Party describes as legislation of interest to the public. These other pieces of legislation may not be sexy but they collectively save the taxpayers $1 billion.

If you can show me a cost benefit which shows it is somehow more valuable to the Canadian taxpayers to put aside these savings of $1 billion in order to "use House time on such important things as conflict of interest or other things of interest to the public," then I would be willing to discuss them. But I humbly suggest that until you can prove that the taxpayers are better off pursuing the strategy he is talking about then I am afraid I have to proceed in the manner I have outlined.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I do not understand clearly my hon. friend's point. It was he who suggested that eventually we will get to legislation that the public is interested in. I am just quoting back his own remark.

The point is that there is a way to do business in the House that is well and historically developed. It is an appropriate process that we have all agreed to. That is why we have Standing Orders. The House is unanimously in agreement as to the ways and means of conducting business here. It is not late at night, sneaking some very important legislation through.

I want to suggest to my hon. friend the following. He has obviously not read the report and the legislation. If he had read the committee report and had studied the legislation he would know that there are great differences in the two documents. That is why we want to proceed with thoughtful, logical, sensible, positive study and examination in the right place at the right time. It does not mean some late night sitting for the government to slip something through on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, there is nothing to sneak through. The lights will be on. Hansard will be here. Television will be here. We will sneak nothing through. We cannot do it. It will all be done under the glare of the television lights so do not worry about sneaking things through.

I think what the hon. member has to recognize, and I hope the House will recognize, is that the first priority this government has is to protect the taxpayers of this country. We think this legislation, arriving as it has out of consultations involving all the parties in the House and unanimously agreed to in its substance, should be passed.

If the hon. member is suggesting that we should put aside the bills dealing with significant savings to taxpayers and devote time to conflict of interest, then I am sorry I cannot perceive that.

However, let there be no mistake, if in fact prior to the next election there is not conflict of interest law in place, the blame will rest squarely on the opposition for failing to co-operate.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I cannot let that go without some response. We have waited eight and a half years for this legislation. Now the government is prepared to act in the dying moments of its mandate.

I want to put this on the record very clearly. The government wants to rush legislation through now, some of it very important legislation that we will support and facilitate. The reason the government wants to rush this legislation through is because it wants to sneak, not conflict of interest through but NAFTA through, the free trade legislation that will profoundly influence the future of this country.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Of course I will let the minister answer, but I think we are now getting into discussions about each side's intentions. I also have the feeling that the usual Thursday question is turning into a debate and that somewhere other than the House of Commons may be the place to carry on negotiations that normally go on all the time in that place.

I will let the minister respond very briefly, but I think that we should then continue with what is on the Orders of the Day. The hon. minister has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Andre: I agree, Madam Speaker. I want to say that we have been asking for two days in a row now to refer the NAFTA legislation to committee so it can be properly studied and not to sneak it through and that has been denied by the NDP.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are really getting into debate.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, this is a question for the House leader. The parliamentary secretary perhaps would take note of it.

I would like to know when the government will proclaim Bill C-63 which was the act to establish a Canadian race relations foundation, in view of the fact that this bill received Royal Assent way back in February 1991, and in view of the Prime Minister's obvious support today and concern for the Japanese Canadian redress?

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I took note of the question raised by the member for Vancouver East and we will be provided with an answer as soon as possible.

While I have the floor, Madam Speaker, I have a point of order, if you would hear it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, I believe that you would obtain the unanimous consent of the House to allow the Minister for External Relations to make a statement, followed by statements from a member of each party.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, we give our consent for this statement.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, it goes without saying that we would agree to giving this unanimous consent so that the minister can speak on this Francophonie Day. Of course, I hope that when the parliamentary secretary said that each party could speak, we will have two or three minutes to do so as well. In any case, we ask the House for that at the same time as its unanimous consent.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, I would like to give my consent, but as the independent members do not have the opportunity to express their opinion on it, I would like the House to allow us to have our say as well.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Minister for External Relations and responsible for the international francophone community has the floor.

WORLD FRANCOPHONIE DAY

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of External Relations and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to draw the attention of the House to the events that will take place on World Francophonie Day on March 20 and to the importance of this anniversary for Canada and the international community.

Canada is privileged to be a member of our two major international families, the Francophonie and the Commonwealth.

In both families, one traditionally headed by France and the other by Great Britain, Canada's status is such that it is able to create support for the fundamental values it is intent on sharing with all its fellow members.

Canadians should realize the importance of Canada's membership and its unique status within the Francophonie.

Canada has every reason to be proud of belonging to this great francophone family whose membership today includes 47 countries and governments, spread over five continents and representing more than 400 million people.

This forum, initially dedicated to cultural and linguistic issues, has since 1986, thanks to the summits of heads of state and heads of government, expanded to include political, economic and development co-operation. Much of the credit goes to our Prime Minister who was involved since the very beginning.

This year there will be many events to mark this anniversary. Activities will mostly emphasize youth, starting with a conference of youth ministers next June in Senegal, to provide for a lasting follow-up to the New York summit which the Prime Minister of Canada had the honour to co-chair with the President of Mali.

In July, the second Francophonie games will take place in Marseilles and Aix-en-Provence, where more than 400 young Canadians will represent Canada's sports and cultural elite. Finally, the fifth summit of heads of state and heads of government from countries where the French language is commonly used will be held in October in Mauritius.

Madam Speaker, like the events organized by Quebec and New Brunswick, those that will take place today in Ottawa are intended to make more and more Canadians aware of the Francophonie and its influence throughout the world.

Today, I had the pleasure of receiving the francophone diplomatic corps, representatives of non-governmental and international organizations and many parliamentarians who will celebrate World Francophonie Day.

These gatherings provide an opportunity to salute the achievements of the international Francophonie. Events include the presentation of the Prix de la Francophonie nationale and the official inauguration of a Salon de la Francophonie on Parliament Hill. I may add that this was possible thanks to the co-operation of the Canadian section of the International Assembly of French-speaking Parliamentarians and the Association canadienne d'éducation de langue française.

• (1520)

With my counterparts from Quebec and New Brunswick, Mr. Guy Rivard and Mr. Edmond Blanchard, I will also have the pleasure of attending the Symposium du Québec sur le Monde associatif francophone d'Amérique, which will be attended by all representatives of America's Francophone community.

Madam Speaker, I wish the international French-speaking community a memorable World Francophonie Day.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I proudly wear this crest which says in French, "in French, of course". With this in mind, I join the hon. minister today in celebrating International Francophonie Day, which is March 20, as it has been proclaimed. We want to mark that date today.

The French-speaking world is alive and well and Canada is one of its essential pillars. It is with great pride that I as a French Canadian speak on it today.

Canada is a unique country where two realities, two worlds, two cultures meet. This makes Canada what it is today; it is what makes Canada the envy of the world.

We have proof of that when we walk around Ottawa and anywhere in the country. I am surprised that parliamentarians—not just ordinary people but also parliamentarians—occasionally forget to take a walk on Parliament Hill. I always ask hon. members to just walk around Parliament Hill to see symbols of what Canada is. We have the statue of Baldwin and Lafontaine supporting each other. They built this spirit of acceptance and tolerance—not tolerance in the sense of arrogance but in the sense of mutual acceptance. Seeing Cartier and Macdonald, Diefenbaker, Pearson and St. Laurent, on the Hill or anywhere else, makes one realize that there is something unique in this country.

I take this opportunity because this morning, together with the hon. minister responsible for the Francophonie who has just addressed us, and with the Prime Minister, and through the kindness of Senator Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, we inaugurated a special Salon de la Francophonie to match the Commonwealth Room right here in our Canadian Parliament.

Madam Speaker, you yourself preside over the International Association of French-speaking Parliamentarians and do a very good job of it. We also have the Canada-France Parliamentary Association. These important associations really symbolize what this country can represent.

This morning two prizes were awarded: the Prix de la Francophonie canadienne and the Prix de la Francophonie internationale. The recipient of the Prix de la Francophonie canadienne for students is with us today. He won $2,000. Despite his youth—and I want to mention that, because I think his is the spirit of hope in our country—he gave his $2,000 to the association he leads, the Jeunes du pays in Bois-de-Boulogne College. By the way, I must say that I was absolutely delighted to note just this morning that these young people are from a college in my riding, although that is just by chance.

I want to name them so that their names will be recorded and they can go around with pride and show that they can build something in this country. The young man is Carl-François Christophe and with him is the young woman who will take over the club from him in a few months, its future president, Sylvie Perron. I think that when we want to say something new about the Francophonie, we should involve young people and seek them out.

I know that I have already spoken for about a minute more than the minister, which is not customary, but I would just like to add one thing. I do not understand—and I am saying this in French but I almost feel like saying it in English, even though this is Francophonie Day—but we have understood it for a long time.

• (1525)

[English]

I cannot understand how people do not see a richness in the fact that we could belong to both the Commonwealth of Nations, in which English is predominant, and La Francophonie, in which French is predominant.

[Translation]

The two working languages of the United Nations, the two working languages of the International Parliamentary Union, the two working languages of many international organizations, we have that in our country. So I say to French Canadians, to Canadians, to French Canadians in Quebec—and I am one, a French Canadian from Quebec—to simply look at this richness and just to understand, first, that we must improve the quality of our French and understand that French can connect us to international affairs. In a way, that is what we want to celebrate today.

This morning the Prime Minister said—and I will certainly quote him because you, Madam Speaker, and he and I attended the first Francophone Summit in Paris—I want to quote what he said, and I hope that I get it right because the press is here. He said that Canada is a child born of France and Great Britain. That is beautifully put.

I conclude by saying to you that France is very important. France gave me my cultural oxygen, so to speak, the taste for the French language, the desire to read, understand and write this extraordinary language, this language of culture. But we also have Great Britain which gave us this parliamentary institution and the British parliamentary system. I like the British parliamentary system.

[English]

I like the British parliamentary system given to me because I belong to the Commonwealth and I like—

I love my language, French. It is important for us. We must protect it and spread it in Canada. We must protect it and especially work to ensure that heads of state understand through the French Commonwealth, so to speak, that they are committed to respecting democracy and fighting torture in their countries. That is why it is important for Canadians to be present in this very important organization that we will celebrate very soon, the day after tomorrow.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, I am filled with pride as I rise today in support of World Francophonie Day to be celebrated on March 20. Seeing that I am the only native speaker of the language in the NDP, I am even prouder, because in my work wherever I am in the country or in my riding I never hesitate to say how proud I am to be a francophone. Our country is only richer for the fact that we have two languages, that we are bilingual, that we are part of both the Commonwealth and the French-speaking community of the Francophonie.

Madam Speaker, I shall be brief in view of the fact that other hon. members wish to speak. On behalf of the New Democratic Party, I want to wish a great day to the Francophonie, the international French-speaking community. Let us keep going with luck and courage!

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unanimous consent having been given earlier to recognize two other members, I gladly do so. The hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I too welcome this opportunity to take part in this brief debate on the Francophonie and the international day to be held on March 20.

With some 100 million native speakers, the French language is one of the most commonly spoken in the world. Like the English language, it is an official language used as language of instruction and even of business in some thirty countries around the wold, hence spoken by 200 million men and women.

It is used internationally to gain access to culture and the latest intellectual developments. It is a working language on an equal footing with English in several international organizations such as those operating under the United Nations.

• (1530)

La Francophonie is also a state of mind, a feeling of belonging. It is a meeting place for men, women and cultures with a commonality of language, according to Senghor.

Madam Speaker, Quebec belongs to this great international Francophonie. It belongs as a member and soon it will belong as a country. That is what the future holds.

What better way to preserve this precious heritage of Francophonie than to build a country around it! If we look at the survival of Francophones outside Quebec, it is clear that a federation is not the answer for the survival of the Francophonie in North America. The Canadian Federation has been more inclined to destroy than to promote French culture in North America. Quebec must create the framework it needs to protect its Francophonie. With 3 per cent Francophones in North America, a country is the best way to ensure the survival of our Francophonie.

Today, we now have a "Salon" on Parliament Hill. We say: three cheers! But is this not too little, too late? As francophone Quebecers, don't we really want a whole house where we will be "maîtres chez nous"? Keeping that in mind, I want to say how proud we are as Quebecers to belong to this Francophonie and that we are looking forward to one day sitting with our fellow members as the 48th francophone country on this planet.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I am proud to have this opportunity to extend my congratulations to the international Francophonie, on behalf of Western Canada and Alberta. As you know, Madam Speaker, in Edmonton we have the collège Saint-Jean which is an outpost of the Francophonie, and I am proud to come from a province that fully accepts French.

I also would like to stress the fact that Quebec, as the cradle of North American Francophonie, is the most important place in North America. My best wishes to my fellow members from Quebec in Parliament.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—CANADIAN YOUTH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Speller (p. 17177).

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize, I had been told that the floor was free. I am told there are five minutes left in questions and comments.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I want to first of all thank my hon. colleague for his speech this morning on this very important subject. He mentioned the whole question of illiteracy and his concerns are very valid concerns which this government should take seriously.

I know the hon. member spoke about this but I want to bring it to your attention again, Madam Speaker. The Economic Council of Canada has forecast that there will be a further one million illiterate people joining the work force by the year 2000 at an estimated cost to Canada, to every Canadian, of about $10 billion annually. That means every single Canadian has to pick up this cost. I am wondering if the hon. member would elaborate some of his views on this issue because to me it seems like a very serious problem.

• (1535)

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, my colleague's point is an excellent one. That is one of the reasons I and my colleagues over the past two years have been urging the government to take some tangible action when it comes to the question of literacy in Canada. That is also why I have on a number of occasions been calling for the establishment of a national literacy standard by which literacy becomes a right rather than a privilege, and that goes hand in hand with education.

Unless we get to a point where we recognize literacy as a right there is no way we are going to be able to fight for it, there is no way we are going to be able to move forward. That is why I am in the process of making a proposal to this House calling for the establishment of a mechanism whereby we would have national education standards.

As a result of this question I want to direct a question to the minister responsible for literacy in Canada, and I am delighted to see him here in the House. Will the commitment of the government to literacy be an ongoing commitment? In other words, will that commitment be independent of election year, independent of the politics of the government of the day? Is there any intention to bring forward to the House of Commons some sort of legislation whereby the secretariat of literacy will become a permanent fixture, a part and parcel of our government? Will it come up with some sort of a formula whereby our administrators do not have to appear before the government every year to ask for funding?

I want to share the rest of my time with the minister, if you do not mind, Madam Speaker. Maybe he can share with us some of his wisdom.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I guess you have just given me a promotion.

My question is for the member for Ottawa Centre and concerns transfers to the provinces. Federally we transfer $6 billion a year to the provinces for post-secondary education. That is a significant transfer of dollars. It represents a 43 per cent increase since 1984–85 and is not an insignificant figure at all.

I would like him to touch on the conditions that should possibly be attached to those transfers. One of the arguments we hear in this House is that although we transfer the $6 billion the spending is entirely discretionary on the part of the provinces.

Constitutionally we understand that the provinces are responsible for education, but should we consider attaching conditions to the spending of those dollars? I believe, as most of us in this House do, that those dollars do not always go to education.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, this is a very valid concern because unfortunately we get stuck with provinces such as the province of Ontario which take the transfer payments from the federal government and rather than spending them on education they spend them on other issues that have absolutely no relevance to education whatsoever. This is a very valid point.

That is why in my speech a little earlier I took the stance that what the government of Ontario is doing is wrong. The money that has been given by the federal government to the provinces to be spent on education should be spent on education.

That is no different than the money the federal government is giving to the provinces to spend on second language training. This is a shame. It is a national disgrace that the federal government has given money to the provinces, such as the province of Ontario, to spend on second language training and the school boards are screaming loudly on a daily basis because they cannot afford and do not have the resources to provide the second language training that is required for children who come to our society as a result of our immigration policy.

That is why it is imperative, particularly now for the federal government to call on the carpet the provincial governments of Ontario and other provinces to ensure that money being given to the provinces to be spent on education is in fact spent on education, even if that means amending the health care act and the transfer payment act that govern the transfer payments from the federal government to the provincial government.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I read in the Projected Order of Business, under the heading Government Orders, the opposition motion which "condemns the government for policies regarding jobs and job creation". This reminded me of the results of the job creation policy of the government of the time, in 1982, at the end of the recession.

In 1984 when we came to power the unemployment rate stood at 11.8 per cent. At the end of the 1982 recession these people with their economic policies, forced Canadians who owned property and who had a mortgage to renew this mortgage at a rate of 22 per cent while inflation was surging ahead at 12.9 per cent, if I am not mistaken. Today these people would have us and all Canadians believe that the way to protect ourselves and to create jobs is to have an economic climate such as the one they created in this country around 1982.

Every measure we have proposed since 1984—and I am again referring to the last budget—was intended to give Canadians the low interest rates which they have today and the lowest mortgage rates in 35 years. Workers in northern Saskatchewan, British Columbia, New Brunswick or the Gaspé peninsula can now renew their mortgage at the lowest rate in 35 years. Surely this is conducive to job creation.

[English]

What we are here to discuss today is what the federal government is doing to help people acquire the skills that they need to bring their talents and abilities to the work force. That is the issue.

We live in a changing world in which new technologies are being developed and new economies are emerging. This means that the nature of work is in transition and increasingly we must compete on a global basis.

If we are to compete individual Canadians and Canadian businesses must be in a position to take advantage of the opportunities that lie ahead. Our policies will ensure that. Our policies will ensure that our work force will have the necessary skills to operate our factories and businesses.

Make-work programs, which are called for every day by the New Democratic Party and at times by our friends from the Liberal opposition, do not address these issues. They were the favourite approach of the 1970s. I understand that a party led by people from prior generations would stick to those solutions of the past. The solutions of the 1970s, make-work projects, lulled Canadians into believing that we can buy the illusion of prosperity. That is the Liberal way. They have tried it. They still rise in this House and call on us to borrow more and mortgage the future of all Canadians even more, and even those who are not born yet.

They say mortgage their future more, borrow more, pass more, create again the impression that we can buy prosperity and that we can buy the standard of living Canadians enjoy.

The Liberal way and the socialist way do not work. Proof of that—

[Translation]

Mr. Kilgour: Has your method worked?

Mr. Valcourt: Let me talk; your turn will come. Madam Speaker—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would ask the hon. minister to address his comments to the Chair. If both sides avoid making comments directly to one another we will avoid unseemly language which should not be heard in the House of Commons.

Mr. Valcourt: Certainly, Madam Speaker. In fact, I am anxious to check the "blues" to see if I said anything unseemly. If I did, I withdraw it.

• (1545)

[English]

I want to make the point that make-work programs do not address these issues. They were the favoured measures of the 1970s and they did help remedy downturns in cyclical industries. I am ready to acknowledge this. However the problems we face today are more complex and require different and innovative solutions.

Now we do not wish to offer Canadians band-aid solutions that do not solve the problem. Instead we have instituted working at creative solutions and I tell my colleagues in the House that indeed they are making a difference.

[Translation]

We are providing more training to Canadian workers. We are helping Canadian industry meet its human resources needs. We are doing more with less, abandoning passive income support programs for more productive measures. As the saying goes: "When I look in the mirror I get upset, but compared to others I am doing just fine".

If you compare Canada to other industrialized countries, OECD members for instance, you can see that 75 per cent of income support funds are active rather that passive. In Canada, with the Unemployment Insurance amendment bill we passed a few years ago, we have now managed to activate 15 per cent of those funds to help people meet the challenge of acquiring new and greater skills. We are redirecting that inactive money—because we are paying people to do nothing—by providing them with help and enabling them to get the training required to re-enter the labour force, which discriminates much more today than it used to in terms of necessary skills. We must find new approaches.

[English]

Rather than offer Canadians more handouts, we want to give them the ability to find and keep stable employment. Our financial commitment in that regard has grown significantly to keep pace with this important priority.

In the 1993–94 fiscal year some $3.8 billion has been allocated for employment programs and services. That is considerably higher than the $2.1 billion spent in 1989–90. Now when talking about $3.8 billion it has to be looked at from the perspective of the government policy of reducing expenditure.

If we look at the cuts that my colleague the Minister of Finance announced in December, people will realize that not one penny was cut from the training funds, the money that can really help Canadians reintegrate into the labour market. That is a clear message that this government affords the highest priority to human resource development.

My colleagues were talking earlier about the education moneys that are being transferred over to provinces. The funding of $3.55 billion in 1992–93 enabled close to 700,000 Canadians to participate in Employment and Immigration Canada's labour market programming. In 1993 $2.21 billion will be directed toward training and adjustment measures for UI claimants. As I said earlier, the training this funding will provide is essential to help the unemployed find new jobs.

We introduced Bill C–113 which is before this House as we speak. It is hoped that later this week it will be considered at report stage. Bill C–113 will introduce measures which will no longer allow those who voluntarily quit their jobs without just cause and those individuals fired for misconduct to claim UI benefits.

I understand that these changes are opposed by the Liberals and the New Democrats. They say that Canadian taxpayers should pay unemployment insurance benefits to people who voluntarily without just cause choose to become unemployed. That is the position of the Liberal Party.

Hard–working Canadians are being asked by the Liberals and the socialists to please continue paying benefits to people who choose to become unemployed. Not those who have to quit a job for just cause, and many do. Those people will be fully protected. But no, for those who have no reason whatsoever, no provocation, no just cause, they say: "Please Canadian taxpayers, pay these people benefits".

These are policy positions of the opposition that result from—

—how could I say it so as not to offend you, Madam Speaker—their connection with or their commitment to such special interest groups concerned with the higher interests of the nation. I think this is a sad and alarming position to take, but ultimately the Canadian people will decide between the solutions they have put forward, those reactionary solutions, and the ones put forward by a progressive government and a progressive party such as ours.

These measures allow us to do more in terms of training as they make money available. Instead of paying benefits to people who, by the way, are free to quit their jobs without just cause—I am not stopping them. The point I am making is that we should not be asking money from our neighbours to pay for these benefits because we need that money to provide yet more training to those who truly need it, that is the workers who did not choose to become unemployed but were laid off all over the country because of the economic restructuring and technological changes we are facing. Some would like us to ignore these changes.

[English]

They wish away problems. But you cannot wish away problems or reality; these things are happening. We have to have the tools in place which help our people to be able to meet those challenges. Those policies are expressly tailored to do just that.

[Translation]

Government is aware of the specific problems facing especially long–standing employees, those men and women who suddenly find themselves with no job after having been employed by a company or having worked for their employers for a long time.

In the near future, we will be implementing a special program for people who get laid off after having had stable employment. In many cases these people lost their jobs because of the world–wide industrial restructuring that is taking place. More often than not plants close suddenly. There is no way of warning the workers well in advance. So they do not have time to prepare, to retrain or to look for another job.

In this new program we at Employment and Immigration Canada will be spending $300 million to provide assistance to these men and women to help them re–enter the labour force as quickly as possible. This assistance will include teaching job–search techniques, administering skill tests and providing information on the labour market, and it will enable some of these people to get the training required to get a job.

• (1555)

Under the new program Employment and Immigration Canada will establish partnerships with certain communities and businesses to set up local adjustment assistance committee. Through these committees we will be able to promptly provide laid–off workers with the services they need. As you know, Madam Speaker, some groups are specifically targeted for assistance under Employment and Immigration programs, but we have never paid particular attention to permanently laid–off workers who have had ongoing employment for long periods of time. That is what this program is intended to do.

[English]

The previous member talked about the school drop–out situation. I want to say that our stay in school program has been an outstanding success. If colleagues remember, the current Minister of the Environment was the minister responsible for youth when he introduced this stay in school program for all of Canada. It has been an outstanding success.

An increasing number of young people in this country are choosing to stay in school and upgrade their education. Between 1989 and 1992 the proportion of youths 20 to 24 years old who were full–time students rose from 48.4 per cent to 53.5 per cent. This is a tangible sign that young people are recognizing the importance of a good education.

My colleague has already informed the House about this program and our other programs for youth employment, but we are doing more. Canada's young people have access to all employment and immigration programs. Our figures show that in the 1991–92 fiscal year a little over 196,000 young Canadians took advantage of our other programs. Regular program spending for the youth segment of our clientele amounted to almost $740 million.

Now this is serious money. This is taxpayers' money. It is devoted to that segment of the population which probably has the heaviest burden on its shoulders, that of assuring the future social, cultural and economic success of this country.

Education is not just for the young. The government places a great deal of importance and urgency on building a private sector learning culture in Canada.

We all know that in the past in order to be successful in the regions of Canada all that was needed were strong arms, a strong back and strong legs and a hard–working spirit. In that way we were able to create this country and create wealth. We have been able to develop a standard of living almost unequalled in the world. Canadians have a high standard of living and we did that mostly with our muscles and partly with our brains.

Nowadays that is over. Future wealth will only be created by that grey matter called a brain. That is the reality. That is why human resource development, training and education must be at the forefront of the government's concern in this country. This government has shown its true colours in terms of education and training by the amount of taxpayers' dollars it is directing to this crucial issue.

I said that education is not just for the young and it was important that we create this learning culture in Canada as a result of the reality we face. We have a dedication to the renewal of this great nation's human resource infrastructure, that is, our people and their skills. The quality of the work force in Canada will be and is a direct determinant of our future prosperity.

• (1600)

The Canadian people know that manpower retraining is essential if our country is to compete on the international market but they are concerned that we may be out-done by our major competitors. In Canada the private sector has to invest more and realize that only through manpower training can their competitiveness, their productivity and their success on the global market be ensured.

Madam Speaker, you are signalling that my time is almost up.

[English]

I would love to have been able to speak about the central initiative which I predict will revolutionize the way in which the private sector considers training and education in this country. This is a $352 million initiative that is already in place and will be expended in a major way in the next few months for the benefit of Canada.

For all these reasons this House should never condemn the policies of this government because they are exactly what Canadians need.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I will tell you that I have a lot to say about the minister's last sentence.

I want to ask him two questions. In his speech the minister referred to the POWA program and said that he cares a lot about those who after a number of years lose their jobs because the company for which they were working shuts down. Therefore, his government according to him wants to implement programs to help these people and ensure that such a thing does not occur. I will get back to this issue.

As for POWA, is the minister aware that right now workers are laid off and will not be able to get the benefits or the help provided for older workers because of a rule in this program? For two or three years we have been presenting petitions to have this rule changed. For example, on the island of Montreal if a company closes down and has fewer than one hundred employees these people do no qualify. It is not their fault. They are not responsible for the plight of the company. They are old enough to qualify for this program. The number of years during which they worked in the industry makes them eligible but because the company must have a minimum of 100 employees they are penalized. In cities such as Montreal, Toronto and all the metropolitan centers which have been experiencing very hard times in the last few years because of the recession workers who are 55 years old are unemployed, cannot get jobs and find themselves in a difficult situation precisely because of this POWA program set up by this government.

Madam Speaker, I have a second question for the minister. He says that the policies put forward by his government and by him as Minister of Employment are bringing good results. I would like to tell him about some of those results, especially in Quebec. In our province, 29 per cent of the population is under 30 years old. They account for 50 per cent of part-time workers and 72 per cent of workers earning the minimum wage. Thirty-three per cent of Quebecers on welfare and 42 per cent of Quebecers on unemployment insurance are less than 30 years old. The drop-out rate in Quebec is 36 per cent, the highest in the country. Is that the result of the minister's policies?

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, I did not realize that I would have the opportunity to give my learned colleague a course on constitutional law this afternoon. If the member wants to criticize the Quebec government in this House for the drop-out rate, so be it.

We all know that education is under provincial jurisdiction. Unless the member wants to be so partisan as to blame this government for the school drop-out rate in Quebec or elsewhere in the country, we should recognize the concerted efforts made by the government of Quebec and the Government of Canada to fight this drop-out problem.

I fully agree with my colleague that a drop-out rate of 36 per cent is unacceptable. However, it must be recognized, and I am sure he will agree, that more and more Quebecers and Canadians from all the other provinces are aware of how important it is for young people to stay in school. In our government's prosperity initiative I had the privilege to meet groups of parents and educators throughout the country who are trying to address the issue of drop-outs. There is a consensus in this country on the need to restructure our education systems and adapt them to the needs of our young people; this is in addition to other social measures which must be taken to help our young stay in school.

The hon. member referred to the Program for Older Worker Adjustment which is the responsibility of my colleague the Minister of Labour. Personally I can say to the Liberal member from Montreal that the best way to impoverish a nation is to idle its human resources. It is true that people who, unfortunately, are laid off, sometimes after many years at their job, have real difficulties retraining or finding a new job. It is with this in mind that we have introduced this Program for Older Worker Adjustment. We want to help those workers.

It is true that there are eligibility rules and that not everybody can retire. Personally, I think that we should try to benefit from this older workforce. In this country we treat our older people as if they had nothing more to offer society. We want to put them away somewhere and tell them to stay there. I say that our collective challenge as a society is to find out how we can benefit from the experience of those people. These older workers are an immense pool of talent, experience and wisdom, and we should see how we can make them re-enter the workforce so that the whole country can benefit from their experience.

I do not think that the solution is to find how we can make everybody retire at the age of 55. These people are loaded with talent; they can do a lot for their country. The programs which we need should rather seek to bring them back into the workforce and thus help the younger people who need their experience.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, I would like to agree with the minister in one of the comments that he made a little earlier that one cannot wish away problems. He is absolutely right but one does not deal with problems that exist today by creating more problems.

He mentioned Bill C-113 and that voluntary quitters should not be entitled to benefits. The magnitude of that statement goes far beyond just the cutting off of their benefits. It also deprives them of the opportunity to get training.

The penalty the minister is imposing on these workers in this bill is overkill. The punishment must fit the crime. One cannot send someone to jail for stealing a chocolate bar, for goodness' sake, and the status quo certainly serves the needs of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in terms of people not having the ability to quit their jobs.

The minister talks very eloquently about education and about our older workers. He says that we should establish ways of utilizing that education. He is absolutely right, we should. But putting them in the ranks of the unemployed through the loss of their jobs is not the way to do it.

• (1610)

We have an educated work force. The problem is that there are no jobs to go to. I think that this minister rather than attack the unemployed should be looking at ways of attacking unemployment and creating jobs whereby we could use the talent of those older workers who are now out of work as a result of his government's economic policies.

We have university students who are graduating every year with no jobs to go to. Yet we are saying that we have to train people for jobs. The whole point that the minister is missing is that there are no jobs for these people to go to.

I would like to ask the minister this: Why does he not look at ways of encouraging industry to hire people?

The mining sector is hurting. There are ways of creating employment in the mining sector. We have miners who are out of work. There are thousands and thousands of years of work experience going to waste. Why not do something for the mining industry in order to put these workers back to work so that they can train people to keep the mining industry thriving and prosperous?

Why not look at those kinds of solutions to the problems instead of creating more problems by introducing bills like Bill C-113?

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, very briefly, I have two quick points. First, when the hon. member refers to the need for industry to create jobs, he asks what one does to create jobs. We entered into a free trade agreement. We entered into a North American free trade agreement because this is about trade.

We cannot sell our goods to this great population of Canada of 27 million people. We have to trade with the world. By trading and by opening the trading doors of Canada to the world we are creating jobs.

On the other point he made, we talk about the level of unemployment. In this country, in 1991, an interpretation of our help wanted index reveals that 300,000 jobs went unfulfilled in Canada because people did not have the skills.

My point is this and I will close on this: The modification to the Unemployment Insurance Act that takes people out who quit their jobs voluntarily without just cause leaves more money to train those unemployed Canadians who will get the skills to create and fill those 300,000 jobs that went unfulfilled.

I am sure that if the New Democrat member thinks this thing over he will want to applaud the measures of Bill C-113.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in the House to discuss government policies regarding jobs, jobs creation, post-secondary education and job training and retraining, because of the severe implications that government policies are having on Canada's youth.

Those of us who have recently been to our ridings will know from recent experience the pain and suffering being caused to so many youths across this country. As the motion indicates whole generations of young Canadians are being robbed of their legitimate aspirations to have a job, to build a life and to work in Canada.

The only amendment that I would think would be appropriate to a motion like this is that this House should condemn the government for continuing Liberal policies regarding jobs, jobs creation, post-secondary education and training and retraining because that is really what has taken place.

Over the last 18 years we have seen cutbacks from the federal government to the provincial governments under both Liberal and Conservative federal governments that have had these extremely negative implications on the provinces. It would be appropriate just to indicate what those cutbacks have been because they have had a major impact on the provinces. I will indicate the impact that they have had on my province of Saskatchewan.

In 1975 the then finance minister, the member for Vancouver Quadra, placed a ceiling on federal contributions to help with post-secondary education. In 1977 the then Liberal government backed away from equal cost-sharing for health and post-secondary education with the provinces with the introduction of block funding. The federal share of spending has continued to decline.

In 1982 the Liberal government then removed the revenue guarantee program for health and post-secondary education transfers to the provinces. As a result of that, $6 billion has been cut from post-secondary education. In 1983 the six and five guidelines placed restraints on post-secondary funding. That has also taken millions of dollars out of moneys available for the province to fund such a critical aspect of any program which will provide opportunities for youth, that of post-secondary education.

In the last eight years of Liberal federal governments there were four initiatives which cut funding to the provinces for post-secondary education.

The Conservative government continued these cuts. In 1986 Bill C-96 changed the formula which escalated federal spending on health and post-secondary education. Instead of spending increasing at the rate of GNP, i.e. at the rate at which our wealth could permit it, the legislation reduced the rate of increase to gross national product growth minus 2 per cent.

This to the end of the 1980s had been costing the provinces $2 billion annually. In 1989 the finance minister proposed a further change to that formula and funding was reduced to GNP minus 3 per cent. In 1990 the budget imposed a two-year freeze on per capita transfers to the provinces for both health care and post-secondary education. In 1991 this 1990 freeze on health care and post-secondary education funding was extended for another three years and we are here debating that issue today.

We have clear joint responsibility on the part of Liberal and Conservative governments to attack the opportunities for Canadian youth to obtain post-secondary education. We could also talk about the cuts to other programs, to the cap on CAP and so on. These programs also have taken money away that the provinces needed to carry on the very important programs which will enable our youth to have a future and play a part in Canada's future.

In case anybody has any doubt about the magnitude of these cuts to established programs financing for health care and post-secondary education, in 1992-1993 because of this dozen or so measures by Liberal and Conservative governments, $247.9 million was taken out of the province of Saskatchewan.

Agricultural program cuts, primarily in the last three or four years, took $215 million out of Saskatchewan, and other programs such as unemployment insurance offloading, manpower agreements, young offenders, legal aid, RCMP, criminal injuries compensation and so on—the list is quite long—added another $75.2 million which was taken out of the province of Saskatchewan in 1992-1993 alone. The total is some $538 million, which is around the deficit of the province of Saskatchewan for that year.

Had the federal governments, Liberal and Conservative, not made offloading a priority, not transferred the debt load from the federal government to the provinces, the province of Saskatchewan last year would have had a balanced budget.

This year in spite of those offloading dollars the province of Saskatchewan will have reduced its deficit by almost half. The cost of these offloading measures, of the province having to take over more and more of education, is that other programs have to be cut.

This can only be described as short-sighted. The government's rhetoric is of course quite right. We do have to become a better trained, better educated work force. We do have to create jobs so that that training can be put into effect. We do have to compete in a global market and it is not getting any easier to do so. That is all the more reason why we should commit ourselves again to funding policies which assist job creation and job opportunities for our youth as well as for other Canadians.

The reason we should recommit ourselves to adequate funding for post-secondary education is that it is not appropriate and not good for Canada. It is not good for Canadians that our post-secondary education system is becoming ever more elitist, ever more difficult for those of lower incomes to have the opportunity for post-secondary education. The whole support mechanism is making it more and more difficult for ordinary Canadians to go to universities, colleges and technical institutions.

Summer job programs have been cut back so it is more difficult for a student to obtain a summer job. Student loan opportunities are cut back so there is not enough money available to borrow in order to go to university. It is almost a vicious circle: Student fees go up because of federal government offloading; one after another it becomes more and more difficult for Canadians to obtain post-secondary education.

We need initiatives to encourage job training and retraining, to ensure that businesses in Canada carry out their fair share of training, which they have notoriously not done in the past by comparison to other countries, and in particular by comparison to those countries with successful economies. All these things need to be re-thought and developed so that Canada's youth have the opportunity both to obtain the skills they need in order to participate in the work force and have job opportunities available to them so that they can use those skills to best advantage.

Over the last 15 years or so we have seen a gradual erosion, as I have pointed out, by both federal Liberal and Conservative governments in moneys and support available for those skill training programs and for education programs. We have also seen a move away from a commitment to job creation. We have seen an obsession with deficit control, both under the Liberal government—that is what the six and five guideline was about—and an obsession with inflation rather than an obsession with job creation.

Indeed, what that obsession with inflation has meant is that people have been deliberately put out of work in order to reduce inflation. That is not the way to get Canada's economy moving again. We all know that little will be achieved in terms of development unless we take seriously the need to educate our youth, to provide opportunities for their education and to provide job opportunities for them afterward.

I would like to take one step back because we all know that one of the problems we face, and the minister made mention of it just recently, is that we have an extremely high dropout rate within our school system. In fact we do not have a particularly enviable participation rate of college age students in our universities in comparison to, for example, the United States, which is embarking on a major campaign to increase the participation rate, while we are increasing student fees and making it more difficult for students to go to university.

One of the reasons why Canadian school children drop out of school at the rates they do is because of poverty. We all know we have one million Canadian children living in poverty. We have 1.6 million Canadians unemployed and 2.6 million Canadians living on social assistance. Not only is this a huge social problem but a waste of economic resources. Until we address the major problem that our economy, our society, is not geared to providing opportunities for all Canadians but is geared to ensuring that 4.2 million Canadians have no opportunities at all, we will never change that system. We need to take a different route.

The minister talks about the benefits flowing from the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and NAFTA. What we should be doing rather than giving up control of our economy to our large multinational corporations who do not give one whit about Canada or one whit about creating jobs, is taking control of our economy ourselves for the benefit of Canadians. It is not only for the benefit of Canada but for the benefit of those Canadian youth who need jobs and opportunities for the future.

We know from all the records that large multinational corporations operating in Canada have reduced their work forces over the last 10 to 12 years and continue to reduce their work forces. We know that large corporations in Canada generally have reduced their work forces. Those large multinational corporations, of which the government is so fond and has been prepared to ease their sphere of activity through the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and now through NAFTA, are the ones that are driving down employment and cutting back on jobs.

That is why we need to take control of our economy. There are ways of doing it. There are ways of taking charge of our economy. We do not have to give up control on the way as we have done. We all know that free trade began, not with the Conservative government, but with the Macdonald commission of the Liberal government. The whole plan for free trade was set out by Mr. Macdonald and his colleagues. It was then eagerly adopted by the Conservative government. It is not accidental that these things have worked in that way.

Only the New Democratic Party has been consistent in demanding that Canada's economy be controlled by Canada for Canadians. There are things we can do. I will not go into them in detail now but one of them clearly involves us taking charge of our education system, turning it into a system and making it work.

We must ensure that we invest more money in research and development rather than less. We should ensure that government works with business and labour in an effective way to plan the direction that Canada can take rather than just let these things be decided willy-nilly by the business community. It had led us into a situation of 11 per cent and 12 per cent unemployment, a million children living in poverty, 2.6 million people on social assistance and 1.6 million unemployed. That is where these policies have taken us.

What we need to do is take back control of Canada's economy by doing more in the training field, doing more for post-secondary education and doing more in research and development. This money will not be wasted. It is money invested in the future. No sensible government, no sensible corporation would not invest in its primary resource, its people. Yet we have seen continual cutbacks by this government and by the Liberal governments before it to those very things which constitute the investment in our future and in our youth.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, I know the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing has always displayed a concern for those individuals who have to depend on the social system in order to have any kind of standard of living.

I wonder if the hon. member is aware that an organization named the Coalition of Provincial Organizations of the Handicapped made a pre-budget presentation to the Minister of Finance on March 11, I believe it was. Its members expressed some concern not only about being trapped within the social welfare system and unable to get out of it because of the lack of employment opportunities, but they tried to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance two things that were of great concern to them.

First of all the shifting of revenues under the Consolidated Revenue Fund of employment and immigration which they have relied on to a great extent for employment opportunities has been cut back in recent years. Also, the policy of employment and immigration now of increasingly applying training opportunities to those individuals only who are recipients of unemployment insurance benefits has effectively presented a barrier to someone who is not on unemployment insurance benefits from entering into those programs.

They were also very concerned about the transfer payments to the provinces which had to a large extent created a position where they cannot even get assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan because of the cutbacks from the federal level of government to provincial levels of government.

I want to ask the hon. member whether or not he has any information about the amounts of money that are involved in those transfer cutbacks. COPOH, the organization I just referred to, did not have those figures at hand the time they made the presentation. I think they would find that very useful information to have.

• (1630)

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, I thank the member for his question.

While I do not have specific numbers of dollars, the minister is in the House and he might very well have some specifics which he could help us with. However, I want to support what the member is saying and recognize, as I think all members of the House should and most do, that the plight of the disabled in Canada in terms of access to job training and access to jobs is indeed of the most severe nature.

One of the problems that the member just highlighted is an absolutely critical one; that so many of the training programs are available only to those who receive unemployment insurance. Of course the vast majority of those persons who have been disabled and who have not been able to work in the recent past are not eligible for that training. Therefore it becomes ever more difficult for them to take their place in the work force.

The minister might want to comment on that. It seems odd that we would not want to break down barriers to job training rather than put barriers up and why there would not be more effective co-ordination with the provinces to ensure that this training is available.

It might also be that we should hear from the government on why it is taking so long to incorporate into the Canadian Human Rights Act the duty to accommodate that which would make jobs so much more accessible to the disabled and enable them to have the opportunity to work as of course they all want to do.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member. How can the hon. member stand up in this House and purport to speak with some knowledge about the crucial question facing Canadians in training and not answer to his colleague that over and above the $2.2 billion that is being spent by the workers and employers of Canada to train the unemployed there is also $1.6 billion that is specifically targeted to disabled Canadians, to women, to natives and to minority groups across Canada—$1.6 billion that is being spent.

My other question to the hon. member is the following: Why is the New Democratic Party opposed to activating the passive income security money of UI for active measures to train Canadians? A sure way to help an unemployed person in this country is to help that person acquire more new skills to integrate a labour market that changes by the day.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, on the first question the minister raised, the issue is not so much how much money is being spent at the present time but how much money is needed in order to address the problem.

Clearly, with the huge unemployment rate among disabled Canadians, the money the minister is speaking of is clearly inadequate to address those concerns. If we are really serious as a country about making sure that disabled Canadians participate in the work force then we owe it to them to put some resources into that. Of course those resources are not just dollars spent, they are dollars that are invested in people which will return to the government in terms of taxation revenue and so on.

Therefore, the question is not how much we are spending. The question is how much money should we be spending and how can we find those resources to invest in Canadians.

The second question was with regard to the use of unemployment insurance funds for training. The minister and I do not disagree on the need for training. The minister and I do not disagree on the need to provide opportunities for those who are unemployed to be trained and to enter the work force. We seem to disagree on the need to have an active, creative and aggressive policy to create jobs in this country, because certainly his government has not done that.

• (1635)

Let us ask whose responsibility it is that those unemployed are unemployed. Is it their responsibility? Is it their responsibility they do not have any jobs, that they do not work? They all want to work. Most of them did work. They cannot find jobs now because of the economic climate, because of government economic policies and, of course, because we live in a difficult world economic environment.

If it is not those employees' responsibilities that they are unemployed, why should it be their responsibility to pay to be trained? Why should the training not be paid for those people who are responsible for their unemployment, for it is the government whose economic policies have turned those people out of work?

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. After Question Period, when I asked the House for unanimous consent to allow the Minister for External Relations to make a statement, I should have mentioned that normally such a statement should have been made at the opening of the sitting, during Routine Proceedings. Because the minister was not present at the time we were unable to proceed.

I would like to ask now for unanimous consent in order to extend the present debate by 15 minutes to compensate for the time taken by that statement and to give members the time they would have had otherwise.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary to the government leader in the House for his co-operation and, of course, we agree with his suggestion.

[English]

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): That would be satisfactory to the New Democratic Party also.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, on another point of order.

[English]

I think that you would find consent for the following motion:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, when Government Orders are called in the morning on Friday, March 19, 1993 the order for the second reading of Bill C-97, an act respecting marine insurance, and the other for second reading of Bill C-83, an act respecting the transport of goods by water, shall be called jointly for a debate on the subject matter covered in both bills; and

That the order for second reading of Bill C-97 and C-83 be amended by having the bills referred to the Standing Committee on Transport rather than a legislative committee in the Economics envelope; and

That, after one representative from each recognized party has spoken in debate, but no later than 10:55 a.m. on that day, all questions necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the said bills shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment, provided that any recorded division requested shall stand deferred pursuant to Standing Order 45(6).

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, we agree with that. I just want to point out to the House that once again we are assisting the government in pursuing the agenda.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, in that same spirit of co-operation and in order to help the government meet its legislative schedule, we give our consent.

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, I shall be brief. I note that the meeting between House leaders after Question Period was fruitful and I thank wholeheartedly the opposition parties for their co-operation.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair is very pleased to be proven almost right for suggesting that negotiations be carried on outside the House, since a decision was reached which seems to suit everybody.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—CANADIAN YOUTH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Speller (p. 17177).

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, I am looking forward to entering the debate this afternoon. I am glad to be following the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing because during his comments in the House this afternoon he raised some issues which I believe he will find I will respond to quite well in my prepared remarks. I am going to veer from my prepared remarks and talk about some of the successes I have had the opportunity to participate in over the last few years as a member of Parliament in working with the various programs within my riding of Selkirk—Red River.

I have had the opportunity to work with the very successful stay-in-school program. I would like to compliment a young gentlemen by the name of Trevor Kennerd, a sports figure within the city of Winnipeg area who worked well with the stay-in-school program. He has been a very prominent and significant spokesperson on behalf of it. I would like to talk about the START program later on but right now I would like to commend the people from the North Selkirk school division, the one that I have worked with on a regular basis, because of their participation in the START program. I have been to a number of graduation exercises in the last while. They have always been rather stirring because of the fact that the young people who have participated in these START programs have such an attitude change and seem to be focused on what we would consider the right direction.

• (1640)

The Minister of Employment and Immigration a while back released a paper called Learning Well and Living Well. The Triple-S Community Futures Organization in the Selkirk—St. Clements—St. Andrews area has been participating on a regular basis through a group they call Focus 2000 working toward showing not only the government but the local division and other school divisions the necessity of changing the educational system. There is a nice young lady by the name of Mary Yardveson who is new to our community who has picked up the ball in this specific issue and has run with it quite well.

At the end of the day when this group comes together, it will have a chance to prove that the work of the Community Futures in the Triple-S area not only provides some very significant direction to the local school area but makes significant recommendations and provides direction to education throughout Canada.

I am very pleased and proud to respond to the motion by assuring the House that this government does indeed have the legitimate aspirations of young Canadians fully in mind. One need only look to the National Stay In School initiative for clear evidence of this government's commitment to supporting today's generation of young people in fulfilling their aspirations.

This five-year initiative was announced in the 1989-90 fiscal year by the hon. member for St. Paul's with a $296.4 million budget and was designed around three main components: a program component, a mobilizing component and a public awareness component.

My hon. colleague, the Minister of the Environment, was instrumental in capitalizing the initiative and in recognizing the critical role all Canadians would have to play in ensuring full economic and social participation for our young people.

I am pleased to note that the author of this supply motion appreciates the importance that training and learning have in job creation and ensuring that the jobs stay in this country.

As we all realize, the job market out there is a highly competitive one. That is why this government has repeatedly conveyed the message to members of the opposition that the solutions lie in fostering a life-long learning culture. The pathway to solution does not lie in continuing to live in the world of 10 and 15 years ago where you could just mortgage the future of emerging generations by increasing the national debt and ignoring the commitment that we as a country must make to learning.

It was our government which realized the importance and the crucial need for having a highly trained and educated work force in place if we as a country are to compete effectively in global markets and have our youth take their place in that work force.

Put that in context. Our government placed a stay-in-school initiative as the cornerstone of our approach to social and economic policy. It was and remains abundantly clear that you must build a solid foundation of work skills as part of the infrastructure for a sound human resource policy. But with three out of ten young people not even completing high school, you can rest assured that youth has a very high priority on this government's agenda if we are to ensure that they will be able to assume their role in society and fulfil their dreams, ambitions and aspirations. Such dreams will be nightmares if the current dropout rate is not reversed.

Throughout the stay-in-school initiative's public awareness component we have been very successful in communicating the state of this issue and its consequences to Canadians at large and to young people in particular. It simply does not serve the future of our young people to enter today's labour market without the benefit of a secondary education and by extension without the employable skills employers are calling for.

• (1645)

There can be no disagreement then that three out of ten young people dropping out of high school is an unacceptable ratio, not simply because of the mid to long-term consequences but because of the personal foreclosure that dropping out spells for each and every young person.

The stay-in-school initiative issued a clarion call when it was launched four years ago. I am proud to say that it is one that has been heard clearly and responded to fully by communities, parents, educators, the general public and young people themselves. This has been done through an array of mobilizing activities carried out under this initiative.

Youth, youth-serving agencies, business, industry, education and labour are working together in a concerted effort and with great innovation to resolve the problems faced by youth at risk of dropping out of school.

No one, least of all this government, is underestimating the magnitude of the problem nor the degree of effort that it will take by all of us working together to ensure successful transition for our youth to the work force of tomorrow.

On the issue of high school drop-outs, I would venture that even the hon. members of the opposition would condone and acknowledge the extent to which this government has enacted an effective catalytic role in bringing the community partners together to redress and resolve this issue.

Members can share the pride that we all have in not only reaching out to youth with our message but also in obtaining the support of business, industry and the general public.

It is worth noting that communities throughout Canada have embarked on programs to encourage school retention. The call to action has been heeded by youth-serving agencies like the YMCA, the Boys and Girls Club, Big Brothers and Big Sisters, and business person's groups like the Rotarians that know how to put service to others before themselves, and there are groups like the Lions and the Lionettes, and my favourite, the Kinsmen and Kinettes.

They all recognize the need to positively support the work that is being undertaken in their communities, rather than just standing up and criticizing what is being done. They know how to assume their civic responsibilities. They have put positive action high on their priority list.

Canada's youth deserve the best and that is why our government has supported the action plan of communities through the stay in school initiative's program component. The START program, as it is called, lies at the heart of this initiative.

Through START programs more than 100,000 young people will have received direct services that encourage them to complete their schooling and build their self-esteem and confidence, which must develop so they can serve the community as best they can.

The kind of services forthcoming for young people under START programs are in the form of innovative interventions. Such interventions have not been developed in a state of limbo. Rather they have been dynamically developed by our community partners in a way that transcends any partisan road-blocks.

We count among those partners provincial and municipal governments throughout the land and corporate partners from all sectors. Practically each day news reports are carried in community newspapers reflecting the concerted efforts being undertaken to support our young people in completing their secondary education.

For example, in Education Manitoba, from February 1993, I read that a new resource kit for teachers and guidance counsellors has been developed under the stay-in-school initiative. It provides lesson plans designed to explore meaningful reasons for students to stay in school.

The first three lessons explore students' career goals and ways to achieve them. A fourth lesson prepares students for a visit from community speakers sharing their experience in the world of work. A fifth lesson focuses on helping students to actively explore their career choices. This is but one example of the resource material developed as a result of the stay-in-school initiative.

• (1650)

If I might once again digress from my prepared presentation, I remember quite vividly a picture in the local community newspaper very recently of the mayor of my home community of Selkirk, Mr. Bud Oliver. He had slipped away from his job as a businessman and was out in one of the elementary schools taking time out of his busy day to talk to young people about what it was like to be mayor and the importance of education.

The Focus 2000 group has built quite an initiative around getting local business people and people of different employment to go to community schools, whether they be elementary schools, junior high or senior high schools, to teach them about their experiences in the work place. I commend those people for those special activities.

This initiative clearly places the needs of this generation and their aspirations as a major priority of this government. The initiative's message that dropping out is no way out has projected far and wide.

Barely a day passes without a newspaper or a magazine, besides highlighting the importance of completing high school, conveying news and commentary about the increasing demands being made by the technology that is changing the work place for all workers and the implications it has for our ability to compete.

The challenge that it presents to our youth is unlike that facing any other previous generation. When we live in the here and now it is difficult to project what skills and abilities the entry level worker will require 10 or 15 years down the road. That is why Canadian youth are showing good judgment and not looking for the quick fix, but rather are placing a high priority on completing their high school education and continuing their studies at the post-secondary level, whether it be through the apprenticeship program, co-operative education pursuits or by attending college or university.

On the subject of quick fixes, I must point out that this government inherited a tremendous debt that nearly crippled Canadians, not only now but in the long term. Yes, we all have to make our sacrifices. We cannot continue to look at short-term band-aid solutions. That narrow vision does not really change the way we do things.

There is nothing I would like more than to be able to guarantee a good job today to every young Canadian. To do so we have to be prepared to stand in the fuller perspective of human resource development as a way of ensuring that Canadians work not only on a short-term basis or on make-work projects, but for the long term. We all have to deal with the needs of tomorrow.

It is for that reason that the stay-in-school initiative encourages youth, parents, communities, business, industry and labour to support locally driven activities. These are being created to mobilize our communities to support and encourage youth in making a successful school-to-work transition. All of us want our young people to be able to assume adult roles beginning with their legitimate aspirations.

It is of interest that with responsibility for the stay-in-school initiative residing with my hon. colleague, the Minister of State for Youth, that his ministerial portfolio with fitness and amateur sport offers a model of coaching which, in the context of the stay-in-school initiative, can and does make a singular difference in encouraging young people to complete their high school education.

It is no accident that the stay-in-school speakers' bureaus which exist in each region draw on the role models offered by young Olympic athletes and aspiring Olympians to convey the importance of training and the relevance of schooling to the world of work. The players of the St. John's Maple Leaf hockey team or Regina from the Western Hockey League are among our stay-in-school ambassadors. Coaching and mentoring form part of the 1,300 interventions presently supported by the stay-in-school initiative.

Just as we cannot expect an athlete to excel without the benefit of training, we cannot expect our young people to enter the realm of work without the skills or attitudes required by employers.

• (1655)

Allow me to reiterate. It is not a quick fix that will make it possible for young people to live their dreams. It takes diligence, dedicated action and action plans. I can assure the House that the action plans undertaken by our partners are starting to point to success under the stay-in-school initiative.

For example, in British Columbia alone when the stay-in-school initiative was launched 10 school districts experiencing the highest drop-out rates were targeted. Data gathered to date indicates that there have been significant improvements in student retention rates, with some school districts reporting there may be as much as a 50 per cent reduction in drop-out rates among the at-risk students.

In closing, let me again assure the House most vigorously that the stay-in-school initiative provides tangible, working evidence of the commitment that this government has made to help this generation of young Canadians fulfil their aspirations.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I welcome the views of the previous speaker. I believe it would be wrong for any member of this House to disagree with the aims of the stay-in-school initiative.

I am by profession an educator. For four years between 1984 and 1988 when I was not in the House of Commons I returned to my profession. I found great changes in the attitudes of students, teachers and parents.

I had been in the House for some 10 years and it seemed to me that the emphasis when I returned was more on how to get along in society, which is a good idea of course, than it was on the accumulation of knowledge.

My hon. friend mentioned that we who are teachers and who have been teachers should have as our goal preparing our young people for the future. With all respect to the hon. member, that indeed should be the goal of education. We should be preparing them for change and for adaptability.

I can cite many studies indicating that the youth of today will have at least five different careers before their working life is over, by that I mean ordinary retirement.

If that is the case, and if our schools are to prepare them for their future, must we prepare them for any one thing or must we prepare them for a variety of things? I pose that as a rhetorical question in this sense: It is my view and it is my contention that the best we can do is prepare them for change because in this technological age, and that was the precise term that my colleague used, of technological change there will be positions in existence not 40 years from now but 10 years from now that we cannot even dream about.

How do we measure the success of a student? Is it by the marks we give them at the end of the day? Is it by the fact that when they go out to get jobs this one will earn $40,000 a year and this one will only earn $20,000? I pose the question to the hon. member who has just spoken.

In years gone by we did have standardized tests in Ontario. Let me explain. At the end of grade 13 there were exams that were written right across the province. In order to graduate from grade 13 everyone had to write these exams. From the results we said that this school is better than this school because it turned out more people who had higher grades. I ask the hon. member: Is it his view that we should have standardized tests in all of our schools across Canada?

I refer specifically to the end of grade 8 which is the end of elementary school and then again at the end of grade 12, if that is how many years we have in a particular province. I would like to hear his views on that.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, I think the questions that have been posed are quite legitimate ones. I do agree that there is a significant technological change going on in the world at this time. In fact I would say there is a technological revolution taking place today that probably is the equivalent or greater than the Industrial Revolution at the end of the 19th century and we have to be prepared to adapt.

I was questioned about how I felt education should take place. There was a lot of commentary about whether getting back to the basics was the right way to go but I think it is a simple term that probably is understandable if one has the basic skills and can then change and adapt.

I agree that there has been a significant change within the school system in the last few years. I think it is not only up to the government and the school system but the parents in general to take responsibility for that. I sometimes think that the parents ask the school division and the school teachers to do more things than they should. I think that a lot of things that take place within the school system should actually take place at home.

We have to give students these skills and we have to give them the ability to go out and perform. If we do not give them these basic skills how are they going to compete or how are they going to further their education?

There is a significant problem within one of my own school divisions. We have a very competent and internationally recognized elementary school called Birds Hill School that has a very progressive program in science and math education.

The problem is that they are looked upon as the black sheep of the family. They are left on their own, which is very discouraging to me and very discouraging to an awful lot of people. When one criticizes the education system then I will say very publicly by way of this commentary in the House that I have never seen anybody circle the wagons more quickly than the education system when somebody comes forward to criticize.

There was talk about standard testing or national testing. I am a proponent of that. I am a proponent of that because it is useful. Sooner or later somebody is going to have five different jobs in their lifetime. Sooner or later those five different jobs might be in five different regions of Canada. If I have to take my daughter who is now in high school from Manitoba and move to Alberta because of a career change, then I want to know that she has the same basics going into that education system in Alberta as she had in Manitoba. One should know that there is a similarity and that the goals to be achieved are very similar.

I sometimes question the attitude of educators who say that because different regions have different requirements that the educational system has to adjust to that. Maybe there is a certain amount of truth to that, but the basic skills of reading, writing and arithmetic are ones that can be carried around.

I have personally written the Prime Minister that I think the education system should be putting a lot more emphasis on delivering those basic skills to all Canadian students. I have no idea how the government puts this upon either the provincial government or the municipal governments, but those are the basic building blocks that you need to move forward in education.

I'll go back to the national standards. I believe that how one uses these national standards is open. My recommendation to the government has always been that if we create these national standards, whether it is industry or various education systems or universities, they may draw upon them. They may not be forced to draw upon them but there is the knowledge that if Dalhousie University wants to accept students from Selkirk, Manitoba, they know that they have achieved a certain level of education by way of a national test. I appreciate the questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, let me first congratulate my colleague, the member for Haldimand—Norfolk, for this Official Opposition motion and I quote:

> That this House condemn the government for policies regarding jobs and job creation, post-secondary education and job training and retraining that are having the effect of robbing a whole generation of young Canadians of their legitimate aspirations.

Last February, the unemployment rate reached 10.8 per cent in Canada. In Quebec, it was 13 per cent; in Montreal, 13.7 per cent. Youth unemployment was at 16.7 per cent. That is higher than the Canadian average and higher than the average for the province of Quebec and for Montreal. Earlier, I mentioned some figures for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

You come from Quebec just as I do, Madam Speaker, and you will understand that I am trying to give an indication of the situation in our province. People 30 years old or less represent 29 per cent of the total population, 50 per cent of part-time workers and 72 per cent of workers earning minimum wage. They also represent 33 per cent of all welfare recipients in Quebec and 42 per cent of unemployment insurance recipients. In the province of Quebec, the school dropout rate is 36 per cent, the highest in Canada.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration was saying that education is in provincial jurisdiction and I agree with him on that point. However, Madam Speaker, we must ask ourselves why there is such a high dropout rate in our education system. Is it because it is not working properly or because our social and economic system is not? Does the minister responsible for employment ask himself that question? If the dropout rate is so high, it is probably because people have lost all hope.

When young students see that their brothers and sisters, their friends and neighbours who have studied and gone to university or college are unable to find jobs after graduation, they get discouraged and wonder if it is still worthwhile to stay in school. It is easy to see that the problem lies not only in the education system and that we cannot put the blame on the provinces; it is due to the unbearable socioeconomic situation we have created in Canada. We are losing a complete generation.

I hope the Tory government, which is now embarking on a leadership campaign, will hold a debate on that subject and propose policies which will restore confidence and hope to young Canadians, that will give them an incentive to stay in school and bear with our education system. That way our young people will receive proper training and will be ready to face the challenges of the 21st century.

On this side of the House the Official Opposition and its leader Jean Chrétien commissioned a joint committee of Liberal members of the House and Liberal senators which travelled throughout the country. As the member for Saint-Léonard I had the pleasure of welcoming the committee to my riding and the young people of Saint-Léonard took part in the hearings. They had the opportunity to air their grievances, describe their experiences and explain why the present education system is not working.

After touring the country and listening to many groups and individuals, mostly youngsters, that committee made several recommendations and I would like to mention a few.

• (1710)

For instance, there is the creation of a national apprenticeship program by federal and provincial governments, in collaboration with labour and the private sector. This is very important, Madam Speaker.

Earlier the opposition and the government discussed the possibility that workers might have to change occupations at least five times in their career, as studies show. It is therefore important that we have national standards. We know that today the federal minister for trade and commerce and his provincial counterparts are meeting in a effort to bring trade barriers down. The time has come.

Much has been said in this House about free trade between Canada and the United States and free trade between Canada, the United States and Mexico but we still do not have free trade within our own country, Canada. It is therefore high time and I think that we will soon see some results. It is important that we do not encroach on provincial jurisdiction. We do not want to take anything away from the provinces but it is important to have national standards for our young people to develop in their own country and to have hope.

Another recommendation concerns the creation of partnerships between the federal, provincial and territorial authorities, the private sector and labour in order to promote co-op programs which allow young people to acquire job experience while studying. We are faced with a new crisis these days. Young people graduate and start looking for a job but invariably they are asked if they have any experience. How can they if they are not given the opportunity to work and gain valuable experience? It would be good to introduce such co-op programs at the provincial and federal levels, between management and the unions and between the work place and the school so that graduating students have not only an academic background but also job experience that would allow them to fully participate in society.

Personally, before I started in politics I had the opportunity to visit Europe and to look at their school system.

In Switzerland, a small company would not have hired a student if he had not studied in a particular technical college with which it had entered into an agreement allowing the student to return to the firm to practise what he learned in school. That is what a co-op system is all about. Not only did that student get a diploma at the end of his schooling but he was also given a certificate of apprenticeship by this particular institution showing that he was ready for the job market, instead of living the tragedy we are witnessing today. Young people sacrifice so much to get their college or university degrees but once they have graduated they are told that they need experience in order to get a job and it is a serious problem for them.

Another recommendation, Madam Speaker, is the use of tax incentives to promote on-the-job training. It is very important that we do our utmost to encourage businesses to provide training and give a chance to our young people so that they can get a job and benefit from such training in order to remain competitive. This is the 1990s and soon it will be the 21st century; we have to be competitive. We can see big international markets developing, blocks being formed in Europe, Asia and here on the North American continent. If we want to be successful and competitive we must have a highly specialized and well trained labour force. Given the fact that 70 per cent to 75 per cent of Canadian companies are small-sized businesses, which create at least 80 per cent of our jobs, and that those businesses for the most part hire five employees or less, we cannot expect them to have in-house training programs. We have to develop such programs.

• (1715)

So, we hope the federal, provincial and territorial governments, the private sector and volunteer organizations will join us in promoting literacy. It is important. Another tragedy in today's society is all those people who still have trouble reading and writing.

We have to convince our young people that they belong in our society, that they will have a well-deserved place in our society once their training or studies are over. But once they realize that we have to make sure there is a place for them, or they will quit school out of frustration.

I want to touch upon an issue not directly related to youth but which the Minister of Employment and Immigration raised. It is about POWA, a program for older workers. Think about how 55-year-old people, even those who are working, must feel today. With our economy in a state of crisis and our young people having trouble finding jobs, can you imagine how a 55-year-old worker who has just lost his or her job might feel? When a business closes its long-time employees are in a precarious situation. Their job prospects are practically non-existent.

The Minister of Employment has said that the government can no longer afford to pay people to stay home; we need working people in Canada.

I agree with the minister. However, where are the jobs for these people? Where are the training programs to help them retrain and find jobs? If we cannot give them jobs or afford to retrain them, we should at least have the decency to give them enough to live on and raise their families. Many people at 55 still have children in school or at university. They still have a mortgage to pay. In my riding a lot of constituents—I have tabled petitions with 5,000 names on them and I could have a bundle more—a lot of people are asking the government to amend these regulations. There has to be a provision allowing a business with less than 100 employees to take part in POWA.

After several years I still have not figured out the spirit of these regulations. The only reason I can think of is that they want to reduce the benefits the federal and provincial governments give to older workers. But then, if 70 per cent to 75 per cent of Canadian companies are small businesses with less than 100 employees, how can you have regulations that apply only to businesses with 100 employees or more? What happens? In most cases, in urban areas such as Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Calgary, any city with over 500,000 people, this special provision applies and when a business with 100 employes or more closes workers can receive POWA benefits.

It is all right for the government to say it does not want to pay people to stay at home, that it wants productive citizens. I agree, but do we have jobs for these people? Do we have training programs for them? The answer is no to both questions. Once their UI benefits run out, not to mention that the number of weeks of benefits has been reduced, the unemployed are destitute. In most cases—and that is the tragedy—those people do not even quality for social assistance benefits because all their life they saved money, they worked long hours to manage to buy a house and put their children through school. Now they are penalized because after they lose their job, once their benefit entitlement period is over, they have to sell their house and lose everything they acquired from 20 to 30 years of work and sacrifice because they are not entitled to any benefit, not even UI benifits. That is the tragedy we are in with this government's policies.

• (1720)

I hope the Minister of Employment and Immigration and his officials are listening and will amend POWA so that older workers can continue to raise their children and keep them in school, by giving some allowance to those victims of this government's economic policies.

[English]

Massive unemployment, low-paying jobs, drugs, youth gangs, violence and a high drop-out rate are the problems faced by youth today. Youth are facing an unfortunate and vicious circle. They cannot find a job without experience and they cannot get experience if they do not have a job. That is the tragedy.

For the record I want to quote an article from The Globe and Mail of January 14, 1993: "The under-25 casualty: Young Canadians are graduating from university and entering the job market only to encounter dead ends and detours. Rough road ahead for unemployed youth".

That is the situation we have today. When we talk about education it is easy to say that because it is a provincial jurisdiction we have nothing to say. In the meantime, we see what is happening.

If the drop-out rate is very high it is because our educational system is not working. It is because young people see their brothers, sisters, cousins and neighbours finishing school, they work very hard to get through college or university, however once they are out there looking for a job they cannot find anything. They are so discouraged by that so they say: "Why should we do the same thing? Why should we continue to stay in school when after so many years of sacrifice they do not want us out there, there is nothing for us?"

That is the tragedy. We have to address that because we are losing a generation. We will lose a total generation. It is very nice to debate about free trade with the United States, and free trade with the United States, Canada and Mexico, but what are we offering those young people? What is the future for them?

The government says: "Oh yes, with free trade we are going to have jobs". So far we have only lost jobs and more and more people are discouraged.

I remember during the constitution debate a young girl came to my office. She said: "Mr. Gagliano, you are a wonderful member. You talk about Canada, my Canada and I love Canada. But how do you want me to continue to believe in this Canada when I cannot find a job?"

If we want our young people to be proud of this country like we are, we ought to give them hope. They have to have hope for the future. The only way to have hope for the future is to make sure that when they finish school there is a job for them.

Make sure that in getting an education they also receive the necessary training and experience. Then once they finish not only will they get a diploma for their academic studies, but they will also be ready to face the working market, to face the competition. Make sure they are the best trained. Once our young generation is well trained, then and only then can we face the world. Then and only then can we have free trade with any other country. If we have the best generation, the best educated young people in the world, we can face anybody and be competitive.

• (1725)

However, if we continue with the same policies that have been followed for the past nine years there is no hope for our young people. No matter if a free trade agreement is signed, our young people will not find jobs. We will have to reverse this course, otherwise it will be tragic.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): May I say, Mr. Speaker, how nice it is to have you presiding in the Chair this afternoon.

It is a pleasure for me to speak on this motion of my esteemed colleague from Haldimand—Norfolk. This resolution is one that is very close to my heart because in my riding of Halifax there are five universities and a number of other post-secondary institutions. Of course because Halifax is a large city, at least a large city by Atlantic standards, there is a large population of young people.

Today those young people do not have the kind of hopes and the kind of dreams that I suggest young people had 25 years ago, the kind of hopes and dreams that I was able to have when I was their age. That is because life is so difficult, because the economy is so depressed and because sadly their government—and in Nova Scotia that is both provincial and federal—appears not to have a plan in mind for them.

This resolution states:

> That this House condemn the government for policies regarding jobs and job creation, post-secondary education and job training and retraining that are having the effect of robbing a whole generation of young Canadians of their legitimate aspirations.

Those are very harsh words. Normally we try to avoid apportioning blame in the general debates in this House. However, every one of us in this House has a very special responsibility to young people, to the youth of this country. Almost anything that comes to mind to talk about that special responsibility could be regarded as a cliché. Except when things are essentially true they transcend the realm of cliché and bear repeating because of their essential veracity.

One of those truisms is that the youth of our country are our future. They are our hope and they are also our salvation. The mistakes of each generation are not necessarily visited upon the next. The things one generation has done wrong can frequently be corrected by the next generation.

However, if we do not provide the atmosphere for that next generation to thrive, for that next generation to plan and for that next generation to dream, then we are not going to improve. We are not going to have a better society. We are not going to see the kind of progress that we have all dreamed of for this country, for our children and for future generations.

Canada's youth are caught in a set of all-pervasive problems. I refer now to the report of the Liberal Party's joint Senate and Commons committee on youth. Our youth are disadvantaged today in two ways: They are buffeted by high unemployment flowing from the current economic recession and they are severely hampered by the continued failure of the federal government to create a better social and economic climate for them.

The committee found that youth unemployment is linked to several factors. The first is technical innovation. The second is that low-paying jobs, which are normally entry level positions, are being phased out in many sectors, meaning that market demands can be met by fewer workers but at the same time nothing is put in place to take the place of those entry level jobs. Third are the pressures of international competition.

What these three factors say is that we are heading into an increasingly globalized economy utterly unprepared. We are unprepared as a country and we are particularly unprepared as a work force. We are most dangerously unprepared vis-a-vis our youth work force.

What do we do? Effectively, and it is an expression my mother used to use and it is called "cutting off your nose to spite your face".

Mr. Kilgour: Mine too.

Ms. Clancy: East or west, mothers have the same wisdom.

Young people today want nothing more when they finish their education than to get out into the work force and contribute. All of us here, think of it, just think back and remember what it was like when you knew you had your first job, whether it was a summer job when you were in school or whether it was your first job when you finished your education. Remember what that excitement was like. Remember the anticipation. Remember how you felt, that finally you were entering into that very special world of the adult even if you were, as I was, 16 years old and going to work as an errand girl at the local hospital where I think I was paid $32.50 a week.

There was the dignity of employment and the joy of knowing that you were earning money and making a contribution. You were paying taxes; 16 years old and I was going to get to file an income tax return. I very quickly got over the joy of that particular part of the equation.

I can see by the smiles on all sides of the House that we all remember that. I know equally that we all, every one of us on all sides of the House, want to see that joy reflected on the faces of young people from coast to coast to coast. That is the tragedy.

Here we are in this magnificent, incredible country, with all the things it has to offer, and we are looking at a youth unemployment rate unprecedented in the annals of this country. It is just not good enough. It is not good enough from each and every one of us. It means that each and every one of us has failed. We have failed because we are not handing on to our young people the kind of society, the kind of marketplace, and the kind of opportunity that they deserve. We are not handing on to them the Canadian legacy that was handed on to us. It is not fair and it is not right.

Shortcomings in government action to deal with these problems have translated into more than 1.1 million Canadians under the age of 18 living in poverty. Imagine that that can be said of Canada in 1993. What a tragedy. What a horror. What a disgrace.

Poverty is not simply an economic problem nor does it simply affect the poor. Employment provides people with a sense of belonging in a community. The fact that people are employed and can make the contribution I referred to earlier has a ripple effect, a spin-off effect in communities across this country that is almost beyond computing. When you are employed, when you are enjoying the fruits of your labours, then you want to make a further contribution to your community. That has been the tradition in Canada.

The employed person, the person who feels that at the very least he or she is making that kind of contribution and supporting himself or herself also wants to make a contribution to the community in other ways, thus making the over-all community a better place for us all.

• (1735)

Statistics Canada reports that between 1986 and the year 2000 the proportion of the work force requiring high skill levels, which means more than 12 years of education and training, will increase from 45 per cent to 64 per cent. But the proportion of young Canadians acquiring such high skills is declining. Our high school dropout rate is a national disgrace. One in three young people drop out of school before gaining the training and skills increasingly required in a knowledge-based society. Here we are, coming into what is known as the age of communication and the age of information, and one in three of our young people drop out of school before they gain the skills necessary.

Children from single parent families and families of low occupational status are streaming into the basic rather than the advanced high school programs. That is the antithesis of the Canadian tradition.

I look at my own family. I look back at my grandfather who, I believe, went to grade 6. I cannot remember exactly but it certainly was not more than junior high school. He eventually became the president of the Mining Institute of America and one of the foremost mining engineers in Canada. His children all went to university, and God knows his grandchild ended up in the House of Commons.

That is a tradition in Nova Scotia. The children of fishermen, the children of coal miners and steel workers, the children of CN workers and dock workers, went to university because in the Celtic tradition, the Scottish tradition, whatever, education was the most desired goal. The idea that because your father worked in a manual labour job would somehow preclude you from going on to university was nonsensical. It was just not something that was believed in. That is the Canadian tradition.

As I say, I know it from the Atlantic provinces' aspect, but it is the same in Alberta and Ontario and Quebec. It is the same for all of us, we know that. You look at the statistics here in Canada today and the children of dock workers and coal miners and manual labourers are not going into advanced level because they are not being streamed that way.

I do not think that those children are any less gifted. In the long run they are probably more gifted because of the exposure they have had to other educational areas in our society. But they are not going into the streams that will lead them to higher education and higher skills training. This must be changed. We have to focus our goals and targets as a country on education.

Another thing, and supposing the brickbats come from everywhere, we have to get over our constitutional preoccupation with education being a provincial matter. We have to look at education in the broader sense and see that only by co-operation among federal, provincial and municipal governments are we going to solve this kind of problem.

In a speech entitled "Governing in the 1990s" my leader, the member for Beauséjour, stated that he would start a national apprenticeship training program to keep young people in school, and help their transition into the work force. That, Mr. Speaker, is one of the areas in which we need to see action as soon as possible.

The transition from school to the work force is probably the hardest transition that young people are going to have to make. There is a young man working in my office here in Ottawa. He is a volunteer, he is a university student, he comes from Halifax, and he goes under the wonderful Irish name of John-Paul Coady. He spent his March break last week back home in my riding looking for a summer job, working every day to ensure that he would have employment this summer to help him go back to school in the fall.

It is not true that the bulk of our young people are out skiing or basking in the sunshine. They are actively looking for jobs but they are looking for jobs that are not there. That is the tragedy.

• (1740)

In my province of Nova Scotia, youth unemployment between the ages of 15 and 24 is at 21.7 per cent. Among the males age 15 to 24 it is at 24.2 per cent. Among the females in the same age group it is at 19.2 per cent. Those figures are tragic. They are tragic and they are unacceptable. We cannot continue to say that we are successful as a society and as a nation while figures like that are allowed to exist.

Other things that we can do? The Canada Student Loans Program must be reviewed to explore other options for financing access to education.

Currently before the House of Commons we have Bill C-76, an act that would remove the six-month interest free grace period after graduation for students to pay back student loans. For students who cannot even find a job, the thought that they are going to be in difficulty over the pay back of their loans, without that grace period which most of us who had the benefit of student loans had, is hitting people when they are already down.

Our young people deserve better than that from their federal government. It is deplorable behaviour in these economic times. It adds insult to injury, especially when the government has also seen fit to continue with this 3 per cent administrative tax on student loans. We are not exactly being very kind to our young people.

Research and development leading to new products in advanced materials, telecommunications and environmental technologies will radically transform the foundations upon which our national economy and those of other nations exist.

Our ability to maintain a high standard of living depends in great part on our ability to compete and export. Young people must become better trained. They have to learn more about computers. They have to learn more about science and technology if they are going to secure good jobs in the future. There must be a partnership between the federal government and the provincial governments with all Canadians to develop a concerted plan for young people in Canada.

As the joint committee of the House and Senate and the Liberal Party confirmed, young people want to be informed, involved and empowered in all dialogues affecting the future of the country. As I said before, it is a truism: they are our future. They must be given a greater voice. It is only fair.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I have been looking forward to speaking on this motion introduced by the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk.

What we have been talking about today in the field of education is not only what goes on in a classroom. We are really talking about partnerships in a knowledged society if you will. It encompasses more than just a classroom. It spreads out its arms to encompass our industry, our technology, our science. In a word, it touches on every aspect of our society.

Education in my view is the key to social justice and economic progress. Only a society which values knowledge, innovation and skills can expect to compete in international trade with those nations that have placed highest priority on educating their young people.

Research and development leading to new products and advanced materials, telecommunications and environmental technologies will radically transform the foundations upon which national economies exist today. It is now commonplace that almost all factors of production can be mobilized anywhere in the world; Third World countries, north, south, east or west. Today and in the future the most important of these factors will be the quality of human resources. Education and skills are imperative for success in both a competitive domestic economy and in a global environment.

The challenge to Canadians will be to translate understanding of this fundamental principle into concerted and sustained action. There is much to be done.

Close to one-third of Canadian students do not finish secondary school. That is appalling. A shocking number of young Canadians are illiterate and this is unacceptable. Too few young people are competent in science and technology. Only one-third of students finish post-secondary education. Many of the remaining two-thirds of young people do not receive the skills training necessary to compete in a rapidly changing economy, indeed, in a rapidly changing world.

Even though many youth do not plan on post-secondary schooling, the Canadian system of vocational and apprenticeship training is haphazard at best and in my view has achieved very poor results. University funding has been slipping at a time when many other nations have redoubled their efforts to provide high quality education for their young people. Why have we not been doing the same thing?

Action is urgently needed. That students traverse the educational system and emerge illiterate shocks Canadians. It shocks me and it should shock those here in this House today. In fact, for over a decade the Science Council and the Economic Council have warned that students were failing to reach minimum levels of literacy in reading, writing and the sciences.

How can this be? How can this be acceptable in this age of 1993? What is the price of illiteracy? The price of illiteracy is potential unemployment. In future labour markets it may be impossible for illiterate or marginally literate youth to make the transition to high skills levels demanded by technological advances in the most competitive firms.

There have been many warnings over the potential fate of any industrialized nation which does not adequately address the problem of illiteracy. As they say, the chickens are going to come home to roost unless we do something about it now.

It is troubling to me that the federal government has responded to public concern over illiteracy by decreasing support for those programs designed to address this problem. The argument that Canada may already be spending too much on education does not bear close scrutiny.

Based on a percentage of gross domestic product, the GDP alone, Canada spends the most on education of all the OECD countries. However, Canada's expenditures on education as a proportion of the GDP per capita are only somewhat higher than average among OECD members. Clearly, Canada needs to achieve better results with the money it does spend, as the hon. member from the other side has just said.

Without the literacy skills necessary to adequately prepare them for changing technologies, students will be locked out of those jobs which promise the greatest security for them and for their future families.

This is directly related to transformations in the new economy. As demands for productivity increase, not only executives and managers but workers on assembly lines will need to understand and work with shop floor technologies. The accelerating pace of innovation will require that workers read manuals, communicate through word processors and computers and demonstrate initiative within their changing milieu. The cheapest work force cannot be a substitute for the best educated or best trained work force. The best trained work force begins with the highest level of literacy.

The Liberal youth committee has recommended that the federal government, in concert with provincial governments, the private sector and voluntary associations commit now to eradicating illiteracy and innumeracy among Canadian youth.

[Translation]

In my opinion, science and technology are the key to the future. Our capacity to maintain a good standard of living is partly dependent on our ability to compete and export. Jobs requiring high skills and education will only be secure if Canadian companies can match or exceed the productivity of their competitors on a sustainable basis.

Canadians must understand that innovation, science and technology really are the keys to our future economic growth. First, young people must become familiar with science, technology and computers. Canada is near the bottom of the list of nations in terms of our students' performance in scientific subjects, and this is regrettable.

For Canada to prosper our young people must be able to adapt to change and must be able to upgrade their skills throughout their lives. A larger number of individuals must have a well-balanced education and must be able and willing to take risks and to practise entrepreneurship. Increasingly, our technologists, scientists, engineers and health professionals will require not only specialized skills but also expertise in human relations. This merging of management and economics with science and technology will require our teaching institutions to come up with more balanced programs.

Canada will then be able to draw on its most precious resource, its people, to succeed in a knowledge-based economy. It will be able to rely on a number of innovative projects being implemented to improve teaching institutions and increase our efforts to promote interest in science and technology among our young people.

If we want our teachers and students to achieve better results internationally we must set ourselves the following national objectives: increase public awareness of the value of education, especially in mathematics and science, for the future of our children and the preservation of our standard of living; ease the transition from school to employment and encourage schools and their graduates to constantly upgrade their skills; encourage Canadian business to invest more in employee training.

Canada has not progressed as fast as its competitors. We are not as computer literate as many other countries. Consequently, we must teach our young people how important computers are for science and technology.

It is clear in the context of a global economy where the future is bleak for countries which export mostly bulk raw materials that science and technology are the keys to economic renewal.

[English]

I want to address technology and gender equality. Wherever we go today we are told time and time again that there must be equality among our citizens in Canada. It is of little importance whether they be male or female. They are the citizens, they are the future of our country. Canada must capitalize on the skill and potential of all its citizens. All of them.

• (1755)

However, women are still not broadly represented in most scientific, engineering and technical fields. Why? Are they dumber than the rest of us? Are we so smart that the women cannot compete?

Madam Speaker, you sit here now as the Deputy Speaker of this House of Commons. You sit here because you have the qualities needed to do the job. Female members of Parliament are here because they have earned their place in this House of Commons and their place in society as equals throughout our land.

Now I believe the federal government should take a leadership role in enhancing opportunities for women from early childhood through formal training in science and engineering technology and apprenticeship training.

I have four daughters. When they were born my wife and I decided that if they were capable they were going to go to university. Even if they had not gone to university we told them they were equal to anyone else in this nation that they had to grow according to their own abilities and that they and they alone were going to be the authors of their success.

It was important for them to know that it was not necessary to be a male to be a boss. It is not necessary to be male in order to get a good paying job. It is not necessary to be a male so that you can take your rightful place in society as an equal among equals.

In a report entitled "More Than Just Numbers" the Canadian Committee on Women in Engineering called for assistance for women pursuing careers in the sciences and developed initiatives to help increase the momentum. I am going to name a few.

First was to advocate an enhanced role for women in science, engineering and technology so that young women will be encouraged to pursue careers in these disciplines.

Second was to integrate the study of equality issues and gender stereotyping and gender differences into teacher training programs. Why is it that before all members of the police were male? We never had any firewomen. We had few female lawyers and few female doctors. Why? They had the same mental capabilities as their male counterparts, but we always said they had to stay in the home. Well that is not acceptable to me and it should not be acceptable to the people of Canada.

Third was to introduce young women to the female role models in science, engineering and technical occupations. We have a couple of astronauts in this country. I am very happy to say that the last one that went into space was a women.

Fourth was to develop programs to attract and retain women in engineering science and technology. Hire more women to teach science. Provide an environment that ensures the physical, the emotional and the psychological security of all students.

Finally, another initiative was to implement and enforce corporate policies that demonstrate a commitment to the hiring, promotion and career development of women professionals.

I see that my time is running a little bit short and there is so much that I wanted to say. I want to speak finally on a national education strategy.

• (1800)

While education is undoubtedly a provincial jurisdiction, there is no quarrel with that. It is a fact. It is in the British North America Act.

It also is a national problem in search of good ideas as to how it can be solved. Ideas do not have to have jurisdictional frontiers. It is when the ideas become solutions to be applied that the question of jurisdiction arises.

I believe that provincial governments and public services are perfectly capable of evolving and applying solutions to a national problem within their jurisdictions. So does this committee believe that interjurisdictional co-operation will happen and that it will help.

Canadians must immediately establish flexible, practical ways to improve educational outcomes at all levels from early childhood learning through elementary, secondary and post-secondary education.

I believe that standards and strategies to strengthen education can be worked out by consensus among provinces and the federal government. Bob Kennedy once said: "Some people look at things as they are and they say, why? I look at things as they could be and I say, why not?"

Why can we as Canadians not work together to make this a better place for our children? Why is it we have to have all this jurisdictional bickering? As if it matters where the ideas come from, as long as they are our ideas and as long as we can implement them for the betterment of our nation.

Canadians must establish this co-operation. There must be standards and strategies to strengthen education and they must be worked out, but they are going to require something. They are going to require facilitating linkages between all levels of the educational system. Business and labour and governments and social services and non-governmental organizations must be promoting improved media coverage of education issues and we must celebrate excellence.

We cannot isolate our best students and put them on one side as if they are the untouchables. We must put them there and say: "This is what you can be. Be the best that you can. There is room in Canada for excellence and there is room for you to help us do that".

We should be celebrating excellence in education and teaching by supporting existing award programs and by championing new awards where necessary. There must be an evaluation of research studies prepared by other organizations, building on valid work by undertaking the means through which we can accomplish these objectives.

I and my party recommend that the federal government form working partnerships with provincial and local governments, educational institutions, business and labour, to establish a national education strategy and goals for that calculated to strengthen educational outcomes for Canadian youth.

What is at stake here is no more and no less than the well-being of our nation. We cannot wait any longer. It is time for us to act and the time is now.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I would like to agree with everything that my colleague from Welland has just said and would like to support strongly the motion by the youth critic of my party, the member for Haldimand—Norfolk.

If I may, I would like to speak a little bit in the time that is available about the agenda for youth, the report of the Liberal, Senate and House of Commons committee on youth of which I was very proud to be a participating member, as was the member for Welland I am quite certain. If anybody watching this would like a copy, they should contact any member of my caucus and we will do our best to provide them with one. It is an excellent document, one which I am proud to note does not require any net new spending on behalf of the Government of Canada.

If these recommendations which I might start with were to be implemented it would not add to the dreadful financial position which our young people now see ahead of them.

It cannot be said too often and I think Premier Wells put it well the other day when he said that in the mid-1970s each Canadian family's share of the national debt, the national mortgage was his phrase, was about $50,000. Today in 1993 the portion of the national debt is about $665,000 per Canadian family. How could any of us look a young person in the eye as members of Parliament, or MLAs, after what we have done to their financial futures over the last many years in this country in terms of impairing their futures in the sense of things that my friend was just speaking about?

I am extremely proud of the fact that my leader has said no to the purchase of 50 submarine-chasing helicopters, the price for which has already jumped from $4.4 billion to $5.8 billion. That money which of course we would have to borrow could be used for other things. One estimate I saw indicated there would be 75 times as many jobs created by spending that money on things other than on helicopters.

Let me summarize briefly what our youth report says. First, the federal government in concert with the provincial governments and the private sector voluntary associations commit to eradicating illiteracy and innumeracy among Canadian youth.

I think you have heard virtually all day today, Madam Speaker, percentages and comments about the state of innumeracy and illiteracy among Canadian youth at present.

Second, the federal government in concert with the provinces review innovative options for financing access to higher education for students in Canada, alternatives to be examined under a national grants program and altering the Canada Student Loans Program.

How tragic when there is a bright young woman or a young man who cannot afford to go to university today or go on to post-secondary education, who cannot afford to become a pastry chef or anything else they aspire to. I am told by a person who goes to the same church I do in Ottawa that there are 300 people registered in a cooking course he is helping to teach at Algonquin College. We have to get away from the notion that everybody has to become a teacher or a doctor or a lawyer. The vast majority of Canadians will not become one of those. For once we have to start doing something about all those other occupations which in fact one could argue form the cornerstone of the Canadian economy. A hard-rock miner for example has to get training. A carpenter has to get training.

I spoke to a man just last week who had come from Germany about 30 years ago as a carpenter. He built buildings and now I guess he owns a lot of buildings. That is the Canadian success story. We have to get away from the notion that it is only the teacher, the doctor, the lawyer who should get attention. All young people should get attention. I am glad to see that my friend from Welland agrees with that.

Third, the federal government should establish working partnerships with the provinces, business and labour to promote co-operative education programs. The federal government should embark on a public awareness campaign to educate the general public about the potential advantages of co-operative education.

I think this figure is correct. Germany now has about 400,000 apprenticeships each year. This entire great country of ours I am told has about 24,000. Who is going to do better over the long term, young people in Germany or young people in Canada? We have to start to do something very serious about apprenticeship programs. I am glad that my party is supportive of that and co-operative education as part of it.

• (1810)

Four, the federal government, together with provincial governments, business and labour create a national apprenticeship training program.

I think my comments would of course relate to this recommendation too.

Five, the federal government establish a Canadian environmental youth force in which young people could participate in environmental rehabilitation and educational projects across Canada.

I know a number of people who have gone out to plant trees in the summer where there are clear-cut forests. I am sure they do not do it in your province, Madam Speaker, but it is done in B.C. and Alberta. What better thing for a young person to do than to go out and plant trees.

At the same time I am told by a friend that the forestry department of the University of British Columbia is having enormous difficulty attracting students. Everybody wants to go into environmental programs. Somehow the word has got out that you should not study forestry, you have to go into something else. Better forestry practices are of course essential to the well-being of thousands and thousands of people who work in the forestry industry. I believe it is our biggest industry, as I am sure you know, Madam Speaker.

Six, the federal government should adopt a tax-based system to encourage work place training.

I think my colleague from Haldimand—Norfolk pointed out that the average firm in Canada trains seven hours a year per employee whereas other countries do—

Mr. Parent: Hundreds of hours.

Mr. Kilgour: My colleague from Welland says it is hundreds of hours.

Mr. Parent: At least two weeks of extra training.

Mr. Kilgour: Right.

Seven, the federal government develop a much more sophisticated system of tracking the technological needs of employers and matching them with the available work force in the community. Attention will be focused specifically on young people in this process.

We have heard in this House today from the minister, who should know, the figure of 300,000 jobs available in Canada for which we have no qualified applicants. Someone else mentioned 600,000. The point is that there are all kinds of jobs available even in this depression ravaged economy, or recession ravaged economy, but we cannot fill them because we do not have trained people to do them.

I might mention a speech I read recently. It pointed out that the largest employer now in the United States is McDonald's. I think it has about 500,000 employees, but I suppose they are mostly part-time. The problem though is that the future of the McJobs, as they are called, basically minimum wage jobs that so many young people and so many high school students feel they have to take and do take, is anything but certain. I am told that a few years from now when we go into a McDonald's, if you eat at McDonald's, there will not be a bright-faced young person there to get you a Big Mac with ketchup. You will push Big Mac, ketchup and whatever else you want and that object will come out automatically through an automatic system. How many young people's jobs will disappear if that happens?

One of the fastest growing companies in North America I am told is a company in Florida that is automating banks. Where are thousands and thousands of Canadian men and women who work in banks going to be if this continues apace and these jobs are basically eliminated as well?

I am told you can literally type a letter in Toronto or Ottawa and have the letter actually physically typed out in places like China. The implications of that kind of a global economy for people who are not trained are simply too awful to contemplate.

I am told that if you have teaching qualifications in Japan you can teach anywhere in those islands. You do not have to get provincial accreditation. You can go anywhere in the islands of Japan and teach and you will pull in the same salary for experience and so on.

I think I am running out of time so I will move on.

Eight, the status of the Science Council of Canada should be restored. One of the chief mandates of the Science Council should be to educate Canada's young people to the expanding role of science and technology in society and the work place.

In particular of course, as we heard, young women should be encouraged to take more science of the sciences. I read not long ago that 10 years after they start in basic science in post-secondary education that 90 per cent of the people working in science in Canada, at least as of a few years ago, are men. That is an awful statistic.

Mr. Parent: Condemnation.

Mr. Kilgour: Condemnation. Thank you.

Nine, to assist young people in rural communities the federal government examined programs such as the U.S. agricultural extension system to enable residents of rural communities to mobilize physical and human resources and create networks of self-help and economic development.

I think that is self-explanatory and self-justifying.

Ten, that the federal government form working partnerships with provincial and local governments, educational institutions, business and labour to establish national education strategy goals calculated to strengthen education outcomes for Canadian youth.

My friend spoke about that too. I think a week and a half ago there was an article pointing out—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, I must interrupt the hon. member. It being 6.15 o'clock p.m. it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 30(7), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CITIZENSHIP ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-285, an act to amend the Citizenship Act (oath of allegiance) be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise in debate on this private member's bill, Bill C-285. I think it is a good bill. It makes a lot of sense. It is timely. It is relevant and it fits the times. It would change the Citizenship Act of this country. It reads:

> I swear (or affirm) that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Canada and the Constitution of Canada, and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen.

New citizens can relate to that. They have come to a new country and a new home. They are pledging allegiance to their new land. It is a public and solemn commitment to Canada. It is something that new Canadians want to do. It is part of a contact, so to speak. In acquiring a new home, the new citizen is swearing allegiance to it. It is part of a bonding process.

One might ask what is wrong with the old oath. It reads: "I swear or affirm that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth II, Queen of Canada, Her heirs and successors, and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen".

What is wrong? With all due respect to the British parliamentary system, which is one of the best in the world, the Queen, Her family and the monarchy are not that relevant to most new Canadians. In fact, they are not that relevant to most Canadians who have lived here all their lives.

That may sound odd coming from someone like me who would preserve the monarchy, certainly its infrastructure, if not every tiny aspect of it. The fact is that the monarchy is a distant institution. Sure, it is an important part of our Constitution. It serves a distinct governmental role that I support but there is almost no emotional attachment.

Yes, our Queen is our head of state but she does not live here. She is British. She is from far away. She comes to Canada for visits only. It is hardly the stuff on which to build emotional attachments.

I really wish that this were not true because, to repeat, I support the monarchy. If we did not have one, we would have to invent one. If only the Queen were here, if only she were a Canadian living in Canada the year round, that would make a big difference. That is not going to happen yet I have no stomach for severing our connection to the monarchy.

Therefore, I think we ought to amend some of our laws and one of them should be the Citizenship Act as proposed by this private member's bill.

Think about it. Having a new Canadian swear an oath of allegiance to Canada is exactly what the new citizen wants. It is direct, meaningful and it expresses the solemn commitment the citizen wants to make to Canada. It will not be damaging to the monarchy. It can easily survive this change because its basic structure would remain well intact.

None of this is far fetched. The Department of the Secretary of State back in 1987 kicked around some ideas for a new wording of the oath. One suggestion was: "I swear or affirm that I will be a loyal citizen of Canada, obey its laws, abide by its Constitution and faithfully fulfil my other citizenship duties".

To be frank, the current requirement is confusing to many new citizens, especially those who do not have a British Commonwealth background. They come to Canada and want to pledge allegiance to the country of their choice but they are left confused by having to swear an oath to the Queen. They cannot really understand why they are required to swear an oath to the Queen who is a person who resides in another country. It must be a bit disorienting.

The member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce told a story about a man who balked at taking the current oath. He felt that he had not chosen Britain but Canada. One man even took the government to court and argued, among other things, that the current act is unconstitutional. He lost. That aside, we can still do better.

It could be argued that the new citizens should learn our system of government and that would clear away the confusion and that is a valid point. Nevertheless, the new citizen wants to make his or her pledge directly to Canada. What better way is there than the one proposed by this private member's bill? I will repeat it:

> I swear (or affirm) that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Canada and the Constitution of Canada, and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen.

This proposed change to the act is just one more step in the growing up of Canada. Since our colonial status we have come a long way. We have a bit of a way to go and this change to the Citizenship Act should help. Along the way we acquired a new flag, an anthem, we stopped appointing non–Canadians as governors general about 40 years ago and we abolished legal appeals to the British Privy Council about the same time. It seems strange but until then our Supreme Court of Canada was really not the supreme court. Canadian citizenship did not come along until the 1940s and we were not able to amend our Constitution without British approval until the early 1980s. We all remember the big fight over our patriation of the Constitution.

We have come a long way as a country. Changing the Citizenship Act helps fill in the new face of Canada.

The bill bears a similarity to one I introduced in Parliament a couple of years ago. That bill, aimed at changing the Parliament of Canada Act, would require parliamentarians to take an oath of allegiance to Canada and its Constitution. I do not think it is good enough for us to swear an oath to the Queen as the Constitution currently requires. It suits the constitutional niceties but there is a new pride in Canada and the people want their representatives to swear allegiance to Canada. The name Canada is important. They also want the oath to Canada because they know that from time to time people are elected to this House whose commitment to Canada is questionable. Voters want it on the record that every MP has taken an oath to Canada. Allegiance to the Queen is okay but adding an oath to our country firms up the commitment.

We have to take into account that there is a new spirit out there. It is a deep love for Canada and people want it reflected it in our laws, in our symbols and in our institutions. That is why I support this private member's bill and I hope that everyone in this House can do the same.

I believe that the bill should go to committee where possible improvements can be considered. Maybe room can be made in the bill for Canada, the Constitution and the Queen. In other words, it will have all three major elements. That may be seen as a compromise, but whatever the case this bill takes us in the right direction and it deserves our support.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, very briefly, the bill that we are debating is Bill C–285, a private member's bill to change the Citizenship Act which affects the oath of allegiance.

With all the respect that I have for the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, I cannot support this bill.

• (1825)

I listened with interest though to the previous speaker. I think it will show the differences that we have in this country. It is one of the beautiful things about Canada that we do have the right to disagree on so many basic issues. Maybe it is my grey hair showing, but I have a terrible fondness for the history that the monarchy of this country represents. It goes beyond just symbolism. This is a country where our country and all of our traditions are based on the history of a monarchy.

By affirming the oath of citizenship, new Canadians participate in a formal ceremony that is rooted in tradition. They have explicit vows and implicit commitments. There are official witnesses in attendance. In most cases families and friends attend. They share in the pride of the occasion. There are pictures taken and afterwards there is usually a social ceremony. It is a solemn occasion that befits a ceremony uniting a new citizen with the country of Canada.

The oath underlines that Canadian citizenship is not to be entered into lightly. In a different context, the oath that the new citizens take is exactly the same oath that is taken by any public servant. Anybody who serves in our Armed Forces takes exactly the same oath. Anybody who is in the RCMP has to take exactly the same oath. It is the oath that I took when I took on the responsibility of being a member of Parliament in this country. It is the same oath that the senators who reside in the other place take before taking their seat. In fact, it is the identical oath, Madam Speaker, that you took as you became a member of Parliament for Canada.

There was a Commitment to Canada project. This project occurred last year on Canada's 125th anniversary. It was a project with Canadians who had never taken the oath, because most Canadians never take the oath, of allegiance. They were born here and they are not required to. Last year more than 1 million voluntarily, on their own, re-established their love and respect for the country by going through the oath-taking ceremony. It was taken symbolically, yes, but for most of them it was a very real and meaningful occasion.

New Canadians, after going through the swearing-in ceremony, describe it as being suitably impressive. During the official procedure they swear or affirm the oath of citizenship before a judge and in the presence of a uniformed member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Of course they sing O Canada at the same time. They receive both a certificate and a commemorative document attesting to their new status as a Canadian citizen. An American, who became a Canadian citizen recently, called the ceremony:

> a lovely affair with just the right amount of pomp. There were 105 of us there, from 28 countries. And when, at the end, the judge read out the list of countries, I knew why I was there and why I was a Canadian. The catalogue of countries was a poem of people coming home to a new place. The old countries were still there, on the globe and in our lives, for most of us had not escaped from something; we had simply come to another place that let us be ourselves without having to melt like cheese in a rusty pot.

Canadians understand that swearing allegiance to the Queen of Canada is not the same as swearing or affirming allegiance to a foreign power.

There was a paper "Proud to be Canadian" which was circulated in the previous term, 1987-88 and a great many people responded to it. Interestingly enough, the subject of the Queen and the oath generated the largest public reaction, mostly through letters. On the consultations carried out afterwards based on this discussion paper, "Proud to be Canadian", the majority of the people spoken to indicated support for retaining the Queen in the oath of citizenship. In contrast, only a few people wanted the Queen excluded from the oath.

At that time, a major point was made that the Queen is what distinguishes us in many cases from becoming an American. Deletion would be denying the reality of our country's membership in the Commonwealth. The Queen is viewed as a symbol of unity and is part of our historical tie.

I received a copy of a letter which was addressed to the hon. member who is proposing this amendment. It is from the Canadian Citizenship Federation. In that letter an appeal is made to the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce that he desist from continuing his motion. I will quote: "We wish to take this opportunity to record in the strongest possible terms our unanimous objection to the proposal contained in Bill C-285, to amend the oath of allegiance as described in the current Citizenship Act".

The argument the people put forward in opposition to this amendment centre around the fact that the Queen is still a fundamental part of our system of government. Canada is a constitutional monarchy. The presence of the Queen in the person of the Governor General provides a balance in the organization of our government that is vital to its democratic operation. To remove reference to the Queen in the oath of allegiance would be to deny this fundamental truth.

If you are going to change the oath of loyalty to the Queen then in effect you really are going to be required to change the whole system. The people in the Canadian Citizenship Federation are very much opposed to that. They close their correspondence to the hon. member by again saying: "We implore you to withdraw your support of Bill C-285, an act to amend the Citizenship Act".

I would like to close by reading the oath all new Canadians make.

> I swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth II, Queen of Canada, Her heirs and successors, and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen.

Millions of Canadians have taken that oath, Madam Speaker. I have taken that oath, you have taken that oath. I will not support the amendment proposed by the hon. member.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I believe that we need to move with caution in making a change to the oath of citizenship and not move with the haste that the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce suggests.

We are talking about making a change that in isolation may appear on the surface to be minor. Yet in reality, the change would have a far-reaching impact, an impact not only on the oath of citizenship but on oaths administered to members of the House, the other place, members of the Armed Forces and of course the Public Service.

An oath of allegiance to the monarch has been a staple of the Canadian naturalization or citizenship process since the year 1868. In the first years after Confederation anyone who wished to become naturalized as a British subject in Canada was required to take both an oath of residence and an oath of allegiance before the naturalization could become effective.

• (1835)

A person naturalized under this act was a British subject while in Canada but was not recognized as such outside Canada. When a husband acquired the status of a British subject, his wife became a British subject as well.

The Imperial Naturalization Act became effective January 1, 1915. Naturalization of aliens under this act was recognized throughout the world, bringing uniformity to the various naturalization acts in effect in the United Kingdom and in the Commonwealth. Again, an oath of allegiance to the monarch was sworn before naturalization could become effective.

As we are all aware, any person naturalized in Canada before January 1, 1947 became a British subject only and not a Canadian citizen.

The adoption of a distinctive Canadian Citizenship Act, the first of its kind in the British Commonwealth, came about as the result of increasing agitation during the 1930s and particularly during and immediately after World War II. After the adoption of the Statute of Westminster in 1931 there was a feeling that the people of Canada should have the official status of Canadian citizens and that there should be legislation covering it.

In 1946 the then Secretary of State, the Hon. Paul Martin, introduced a bill in the House which became the Canadian Citizenship Act effective January 1, 1947. After that date Canadian citizenship could be acquired by birth, prior naturalization or marriage and by British subjects who lived in Canada.

It is worth noting that this evolution did not affect the oath of allegiance. The oath was still required before Canadian citizenship could become effective.

After February 15, 1977 every qualified person applying for citizenship whether British, Irish or a member of a Commonwealth country, or indeed an alien, has had to take the oath of citizenship before acquiring Canadian citizenship and that is as it should be. The law applies equally with none of the previous preferential treatment for those legally domiciled in Canada from Britain, Ireland and Commonwealth countries.

Thus we have had oaths swearing allegiance to the Crown in Canada for more than 125 years. It is absolutely clear that the allegiance being sworn is to the Queen of Canada. Canada is a constitutional monarchy, as my colleague said who just spoke before me.

It will remain so until a constitutional amendment agreed to by the federal government and all the provincial governments provide otherwise. Our Constitution spells out very clearly that the Queen embodies a democratic system of Canadian government encompassing the House of Commons, the Senate and the Governor General.

Thus when people swear the oath of citizenship it is to a concept of Canada that we all share. The oath of citizenship is a part of that system. The wording reflects our constitutional monarchy and acknowledges our national heritage. To be a Canadian citizen is to accept and to recognize that legacy. This amendment would jettison that legacy.

As one hon. member commented when this bill was before the House previously, this country has a long tradition of continuous association with the institution of the monarchy, beginning as far back as 1535 when Jacques Cartier claimed this area on behalf of the French crown.

As Canadians we have adapted the symbols from other parliamentary systems to make a strong Canadian parliamentary system and a strong democracy. The oath of citizenship is part of that system.

I also believe that changes to the oath at this time would prove most divisive. All amendments to the Citizenship Act, including possible changes to the oath of allegiance, should be considered in a comprehensive manner when the government introduces a series of amendments to make the act more contemporary.

The change proposed by this bill could hardly come at a more inappropriate time. Thousands of Canadians, especially young Canadians, are about to take the oath as their reaffirmation of Canadian citizenship during National Citizenship Week, which is April 11 to 17. I will be attending one of those ceremonies in my riding and I am sure other hon. members will be doing the same.

During National Citizenship Week many members will participate in these citizenship ceremonies right across our country. These events will occur from coast to coast and in the far north as well. They will be in such varied locales as primary and secondary schools, citizenship courts, community halls and other gathering places.

In the schools, children will reaffirm their citizenship. In some instances, some of the teachers will take the oath of citizenship as well.

As many of us can attest, these ceremonies are joyous and touching occasions. For new Canadians, it is affirmation that they are accepted as equals and with the full responsibilities that come with citizenship in this great country of ours.

For those reaffirming their citizenship, it is confirmation that they are citizens, citizens of a nation that cherishes its heritage and yet builds for its future through the process of accepting people from around the world as Canadians and members of our wonderful society.

The board of the Canadian Citizenship Federation, which promotes the respect for and the recognition of Canadian symbols and traditions, believes the current oath of citizenship should remain unchanged.

In addition, the board members are of the unanimous position that not only the formality, but the dignity of the existing citizenship court ceremonies must be maintained and supported. It is their view that: "Without question, the solemnity and demeanour of the court proceedings creates a lasting feeling of respect and pride among new Canadian citizens."

In conclusion, let me restate my position. I oppose the amendment to change the current oath of citizenship because, first, the change is being made in isolation and not as part of a review of the entire Citizenship Act.

Second, I do not believe that something that is part of the heritage of every person who has become a Canadian citizen should be dismissed without serious public debate.

Third, as long as Canada remains a constitutional monarchy, I have severe and serious reservations about changing the oath of citizenship.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this important debate concerning the heritage of Canada and in particular the change that is proposed.

I had the privilege of being an immigrant to Canada many years ago. I came to a country that I was not familiar with. I heard suggested earlier in the debate by another member that new citizens swear allegiance to the Queen, yet think that as new Canadians the Queen is really irrelevant to their coming to Canada.

That may be true. I am sure they did not come to Canada because Canada was headed by a Queen. They came to Canada because of the many things that Canada had to offer. But to suggest that they did not come here because the Queen was here, therefore we should remove the Queen from the oath, I must admit I have some great difficulty with that.

It goes a little further because many of the traditions that we as Canadians have known are subject to change. We understand that and some of those changes are very appropriate. I might suggest that all of us as Canadians at one point or another have had to swear an oath, and in the past it was necessary to swear an oath on a Bible. A Bible is not the appropriate book for all Canadians because there are Canadians who have other holy books that they would prefer to use. We understand that and we changed to accommodate particular needs.

Whether we swear allegiance to the Queen or not is really not an affront to any person's individual beliefs or persuasions in a religious sense. Those who wanted to come to Canada and investigated coming here did so knowing full well that we had a parliamentary system with a tremendous heritage relating back to the British parliamentary system, which is headed by the Queen.

We all know we are members of the British Commonwealth throughout the world, and again that Commonwealth is headed by the Queen.

For those new Canadians who come to Canada and take exception to it, if that is the only exception they ever take to Canada then they have truly come to a very great place. I do not think that is a reason for those of us who believe in this oath to change.

Very clearly the amendment that is before the House today pays attention only to one small portion of the Citizenship Act, which is a very broad piece of legislation that serves all Canadians. Merely changing the oath, which has far-reaching implications for Canadians, is really to tinker with a piece of legislation that should be dealt with in its entirety. Everything should be looked at if we are going to adjust things, and unfortunately this piece of legislation before us does not do so. It takes a very piecemeal approach.

I do not believe the issue of the Citizenship Act is dormant. The government is examining the current act and the most visible aspect of the scrutiny has been the consultations the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship held with citizens and groups across Canada. This will lead to a reassessment of the act. That is probably good, and hopefully will lead to a new citizenship act. It would be far better to deal with the issue of the actual oath when we address the broader and bigger concerns associated with Canadian citizenship and the Citizenship Act.

Canadian citizenship implies certain responsibilities. We often hear about the rights of citizens but for citizens there are responsibilities to; it is much more than the oath new Canadians or Canadians in general who are reaffirming their citizenship proclaim when swearing allegiance. The citizenship ceremony is symbolic. It is the final step new Canadians take in accepting their new home and accepting and acknowledging the rights and responsibilities of their citizenship.

All members in this House have participated in citizenship courts as members of Parliament. We have been invited to bring greetings and welcome new Canadians in our ridings. Those new Canadians who have sworn that oath of allegiance do so with all the pride and vigour that they can muster, at least that is true in the ones I participated in and I suspect the same is true in the ones you have been in, Madam Speaker.

They are not concerned in that context of the oath. Their pride is in becoming Canadian citizens.

I must place my reservations on record about the amendment to the oath of allegiance within the Citizenship Act as proposed by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. This amendment addresses the symbolic aspect of the Citizenship Act rather than the broader issues of the act itself and as such should be seen as truly a half measure.

I might give some examples of why I think it is simply addressing a symbolic issue and is a half measure.

Canada has parliamentary traditions, no doubt about that. We believe that at the head of the Government of Canada there is the Queen and representing the Queen in Canada is the Governor General. If, as one of the members had suggested, the Queen is not important in the swearing of allegiance, then because many Canadians do not relate to the Governor General are we suggesting that we should remove the Governor General from our governmental process? I do not think so. I certainly hope not.

• (1850)

Every time the Government of Canada or the provincial governments are in the courts they are acting on behalf of the Crown. Are we proposing that we eliminate the Crown from any discussions, and that we get away from those traditions? I certainly hope not.

I mentioned before that like all new Canadians I had the privilege of taking that oath of allegiance and swearing my allegiance to the Queen. I also swore it when I was elected to the municipal council many years ago in Ajax and similarly here as a member of Parliament. This oath permeates many things that we do in Canada. There was a great uproar recently in Ontario when the police removed the oath of allegiance. It was very clear that according to the tradition of the police department it wanted to retain its oath, its promise, and its swearing of allegiance to the Queen.

I should point out that when I was a little smaller than I am today, in my early years as a boy scout, I made a promise to do my duty first to God and then to the Queen. Are we proposing that boy scouts should no longer promise to do their duty to the Queen because we do not like the mention of the Queen in an oath? I certainly hope not.

What I am trying to say in those comments is that the aspect of the Queen permeates Canadian society. To simply remove her at the first step, which is our oath of allegiance, may ripple all the way down through the system. I, for one, am certainly not interested in doing that.

I say "I for one" because I am pleased that earlier the member for Cariboo—Chilcotin talked about a group of citizens, the Canadian Citizenship Federation, and he quoted from a letter that had been addressed to a member of Parliament. From that letter it was very clear that there are a lot of Canadians who are opposed to this bill before the House. I am pleased to see that some of the members of that association are watching this debate. I welcome them and hope they are finding it interesting and very educational to hear the different views on the subject matter.

The basic rights and fundamental freedoms of our citizens are clearly laid out in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I reiterate for hon. members that this government of which we are all members continues to pursue the fundamental values of Canadian citizenship that have a direct impact on our daily lives. Those values are equality and participation.

Within the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship there are several areas. There is the race relations and cross-cultural understanding branch to try to address concerns that are out there. Heritage cultures and language programs are being addressed. There are community support and participation programs, a multiculturalism secretariat, a human rights directorate, a voluntary action program, literacy and citizenship.

I did not leave citizenship to the last because it was least important but because all those previous items lead up to the most important aspect, and that is citizenship.

Madam Speaker, you are indicating that my time is running to an end. I do have several more comments but maybe I will have to return at some other point on this matter to discuss them. Very clearly, I believe we have enough activity in Canada to encourage citizenship. I believe the bill before us would not be conducive to strengthening citizenship in this country.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, to begin I want to clearly lay on the record the fact that I will not support Bill C-285.

To explain why is simple: The intent of this bill is to remove all references to the Queen or the monarchy. I simply cannot accept that.

I want to be very specific about what the bill calls upon us to do in regard to the changing of the oath of allegiance. I will read into the record what this bill proposes to do. It says:

> Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:
> 1. The Schedule to the Citizenship Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
>
> Oath or Affirmation of Citizenship
> I swear (or affirm) that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Canada and the Constitution of Canada, and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen.

• (1855)

That is what Bill C-285 proposes to do in taking away reference to the Queen and the monarchy. To put it into perspective I want to read into the record what the present citizenship oath states:

I swear (affirm) that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, Queen of Canada, Her heirs and successors and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen.

I do not know what is to be gained by taking away reference to the Queen and the monarchy. We are a constitutional monarchy. We do affirm our allegiance to the Queen, as has been mentioned by just about every member in this House when taking our oath of office as members of Parliament. What is to be gained by this? I suggest absolutely nothing. But a whole lot can be lost, a lot of our history and a lot of our pride as Canadians.

One of the most touching things that happened to me as a member of Parliament was last fall when all members of this House and in fact all Canadian citizens were involved in the referendum debate. That was a gut-wrenching exercise to say the least, regardless of what side of that issue one was on. It was a very emotional debate. It was one in which every Canadian citizen had a chance to take part and many of them did. In fact, we had a huge voter turn out and Canadians had a chance to speak.

One of the things that touched me during that debate was something that happened in my own family. Until October 1992 my wife was an American citizen. She could not vote in the 1988 election. She could not help get me elected as a member of Parliament. In fact, I was a little bit concerned as to whether or not she would actually vote for me in 1988, so I was not too concerned at the time whether or not she had her Canadian citizenship.

All joking aside, it was a very proud moment for me when my wife wanted to become a Canadian citizen so that she could take part in that very worth-while debate in the fall of 1992. When she decided that she wanted to become a Canadian citizen she had absolutely no problem in taking the oath of citizenship because it is something that has been expected of all Canadians. Twenty-seven million Canadians appear to have no problem with that oath as it now exists.

One of the things that strikes me as a former teacher, as an educator in one of my previous lives, and I have had a few previous lives, is that as Canadians we do not have a real sense of the history of our country as citizens of other countries do. We have no sense of pride and nationhood as some countries have. In fact, that is one of our identity problems as a country.

There are only 27 million Canadians on the North American continent of over 300 million people. We are small in comparison to our American neighbours next door and the Mexicans. One of the things I have witnessed for many years is that the Americans have this intense sense of who they are and what they are. That has been missing in Canada.

• (1900)

Going back to my teaching days I always went to great lengths to try to instil in the minds of young Canadians what Canada was all about so that we would know ourselves. That is because we are infiltrated in Canada every single day, 365 days a year by, media messages, much of them spilling over from other countries, namely the United States of America.

I have often stated that in some ways Canadians are more familiar with the American anthem than they are with their own. We have a better understanding of their system of government than we do of our own system of government. We all have to take responsibility for not having promoted our side of the story over the years. We could have done more in that regard. I attempted to do that in my teaching days.

There is nothing wrong with a little nationalism. There is nothing wrong with a love of country and an understanding of how we evolved as a country. There is nothing wrong in understanding how the monarchy as it pertains to Britain and transplanted to Canada has evolved over the years, right from the days of the Magna Carta on up through. It is a very rich history. It is one that we can be very proud of as Canadians. I do not think it is one from which we want to dissociate ourselves.

Therefore I think Bill C-285 should not be considered by this House. However, let us put some of the numbers in perspective. I mentioned my own family situation and what my wife did last year in becoming a new Canadian. She is not alone in that. In fact last year more than one million Canadians affirmed their citizenship as part of the 125th anniversary of Canadian Confederation.

Canada is the most sought after country in the world. What I mean by that is simply that it is the most desirable country to enter. Of course we have an ongoing debate as to how many people we should allow into Canada and how many the economy can sustain and how the country will grow, but that is a debate for another time.

The fact is that Canada is one of the most desirable countries in the world. Of those hundreds of thousands of people on this very day who wish to come to Canada, not a single person in my mind would have a problem in taking this oath of allegiance as it now stands.

Canada has been identified by the rest of the world as the number one best country in the world. There is none better. How did the rest of the world arrive at that conclusion? The world itself, the 162 countries that do belong to the United Nations, actually measured the well-being of their citizens. In doing that they measured and examined everything. They examined health care, they examined educational levels, access to universities and access to health care and support programs for seniors and disabled citizens. They even examined our charter of rights and the rights and freedoms we enjoy as Canadians. At the end of the day they concluded that Canada is indeed the best country in the entire world.

Well if we are good enough for the rest of the world, why can we not be good enough for ourselves? Why can we not just simply stand up and say: "Listen, what we have here is pretty good. Let us sustain it. Let us keep it". Why do we have to enter this debate to change something most of us readily accept?

The argument to change it is very shallow and does not deserve the merit and support of this House. Let us for once maintain the status quo. Let us maintain that which we consider to be truly Canadian. Therefore, I will not support Bill C-285. Madam Speaker, thank you very much for your understanding.

• (1905)

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this particular private member's bill, but not because I am in favour of it.

I find that this bill lacks any kind of understanding of the true value of the Queen in our society. The Queen is our head of state and is personified in Canada through the Governor General's office and the Lieutenant Governors in each individual province. Through these people and through this institution a tremendous amount of value is given to this particular country. It is something that people when they become new citizens learn to recognize by taking that oath of citizenship.

I come from a riding in metropolitan Toronto that is about 60 per cent immigrant and in which the number of people of British descent is very much a minority. Only about 18,000 people in Don Valley North list British as their heritage.

The people in my riding strongly value the Queen. I have attended many different events in the Vietnamese community, in the Hungarian community and in other communities at which a lieutenant governor has been present. I have seen people such as Pauline McGibbon, Lincoln Alexander and Henry Jackman using their particular office to help new citizens. They help citizens of Canada from all backgrounds to recognize the importance of that particular office and of its value in our country. It has nothing to do with a particular person, the Queen, although I think that Queen Elizabeth has been a tremendous queen. It is head of state and it is a non-political head of state.

One can go to something like the Hungarian ball and hear Lieutenant Governor Hal Jackman talking about Canada and about the values that we share as Canadian citizens. Lincoln Alexander at a high school in a suburban area of Toronto used that office to explain in a non-political way the value of our country. I think what a tremendous asset it is that we have this institution. It makes a tremendous amount of sense to have new citizens recognize that.

Many of these new citizens are fleeing countries because of the the lack of solid institutions such as the monarchy which we have and value in Canada. Looking at Canada, one of our main assets is these strong institutions. We have a civil service in which the value of a high-quality civil service and lack of corruption are held in extremely high regard.

Similarly in our Parliament, members of Parliament who act in a fraudulent way or break laws are held in tremendous disregard. In this country we have values that are very strongly held. In other countries it is frequently found that there is a level of understanding of the importance of institutions such as the police, such as an impartial justice system a non-political system in which people can come before their various institutions no matter what their particular political persuasion is and find they are treated as individuals.

That is something that is a tremendous asset in Canada and is undervalued by many Canadian citizens. They do not recognize this to the same degree others do. It is an institution that has changed as Canada has changed.

We see the various representatives of the Queen and the Queen herself as being very much in touch with many of the issues we experience in Canada. They are very much aware of things such as racism and the problems of new citizens coming into our society. These are not people who are out of touch.

• (1910)

It is not a stuffy monarchy, an institution that has not kept pace with the changes in Canada. This has been reviewed before the courts. I have with me today one of the decisions with respect to the oath of citizenship.

There was a case involving Charles C. Roach who claimed that he was entitled to be granted citizenship without having to take the oath of citizenship in its present form.

He too was confusing the institution of the Queen and of the monarchy with a person. I will just read part of what Mr. Justice Joyal ruled: "It is in my view quite proper for Parliament to require persons wishing to become Canadian citizens that they swear and affirm their loyalty to the head of state. That the head of state should be found in the person of Her Majesty the Queen might be a matter of debate but it is nevertheless as much a part of our constitutional framework as are provisions of our chapter.

Furthermore, the personified symbol of Her Majesty as head of state is not in terms of our long constitutional heritage a latter day invention of some imaginative or manipulative spinner of tales, but the the result of constantly evolving constitutional principles which are cloaked in constitutional conventions in the United Kingdom and partly codified in Canada in the Constitution Act, 1982.

The head of state as Her Majesty is so defined is the very embodiment of the freedoms and liberties which the appellant has inherited and which he now enjoys.

In a legal sense, the head of state legitimizes the laws of Canada which in concrete terms provide for the peace, the order and the good government of its citizens.

The argument raised by the appellant that Canada's head of state is the Queen, that she is Anglican is evidence to me of a dialectic which is bereft of any legal or constitutional content".

This particular individual who challenged this oath of citizenship was making the same mistake as the member who sponsored this bill has made. He is confusing the particular person with the institution. The judge has affirmed the whole constitutional value of this in his statements. The office is in fact symbolic of our institutions and I think that is very, very important.

He also says: "Similarly, if the appellant feels that it is against his conscience to make oaths to all but the Supreme Being or to the principles of truth, freedom, equality, justice and the rule of law, the statute does not impose an oath of allegiance. Indeed out of respect for individual conscience an affirmation of allegiance will do as well".

There is flexibility within the oath of citizenship. I for one and the vast majority of my constituents and as I say a very multicultural constituency, strongly believe that an oath of citizenship with the enunciation of the Queen as the head of state is very important and something that we all value as Canadians.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, I, like a number of my colleagues who have spoken before, do not feel that it is appropriate that I should be supporting this legislation.

Before I go into my prepared remarks which talk about the history of the oath, I would like to preface my comments with some off the cuff words on how, in listening to previous speakers, this debate has caught me a little bit off guard. I did not really think that I would have the emotional impact of what I have heard earlier. I say that with a lot of sincerity.

At a time in our country and even internationally when change keeps coming at us from various directions, and it is coming on us on a regular basis, we keep looking for what our roots are and where we could stabilize ourselves. We can do that within our own family unit. We can do that within our church and our beliefs. We can do that within our institutions.

By every stretch of the imagination this is a very significant institution we have in the House of Commons, the Government of Canada in general and our country. How we feel about ourselves and the oath brings with it a significant amount of history which I will get to later in my comments. It is very very relevant.

I would like to make a small comment and I think it is relevant in the fact that—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do apologize. I will have to interrupt the hon. member. The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to order made on Thursday, March 18, 1993, for the second reading of Bill C-97, an act respecting marine insurance, and the order for the second reading of Bill C-83, an act respecting the transportation of goods by water, are called jointly for a debate on the subject matter covered in both bills.

[English]

Mr. Danis: Madam Speaker, I would like to formally designate Monday, March 22 as the last allotted day for the supply period.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MARINE INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY WATER ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-97, an act respecting marine insurance, and Bill C-83, an act respecting the transportation of goods by water, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Debate is on the subject matter covered in both bills.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to be here this morning on behalf of the Minister of Transport.

I do not know why I in particular was asked to speak on behalf of the Minister of Transport. Possibly it is because he and I have certain physical features in common. I do not know but it is a great pleasure for me.

In beginning this debate on behalf of the government I would like to extend the minister's thanks to our colleagues on all sides of the House for the co-operation they have provided in making it possible for this somewhat unusual debate in which two bills are on the floor at the same time, Bill C-83 and Bill C-97. I know that the minister wished me to extend his appreciation to the opposition. I will be very careful to ensure that the water remains here today and does not fly around the room as it did the last time I rose in this Chamber.

• (1010)

We are here today to debate two bills at second reading. The two bills are somewhat interconnected, in that they deal with the establishment of clear rules for conduct of business for certain aspects of marine commerce dealing with liability and insurance. I would like to make a few comments on both bills, but I will take them one at a time.

First, I will deal with the Carriage of Goods by Water Act, Bill C-83. The purpose of Bill C-83, an act respecting the transportation of goods by water, is to modernize Canadian legislation concerned with the rules of liability and compensation for damage or loss of goods during carriage by water.

The primary goal of the Hague rules is to establish uniform conditions under which shipowners or carriers are liable for loss or damage to cargo in their care. The rules set specific provisions on this liability and establish an upper limit on any claim made by cargo owners or shippers.

The new act has been the subject of much dialogue. It will adopt amendments to the original basis of the bill, the Hague rules, by increasing the shipowners' limit of liability and replacing the gold standard with the International Monetary Fund's modern currency unit, the special drawing right.

These amendments, known as the Hague/Visby rules, increase the limit of liability from $500 to about $1,000 per package and introduce an alternative limit of about $3 per kilo, whichever is higher. Another important amendment establishes specific provisions on liability for containerized cargo.

The development of international law in this area did not stop with the 1968 Hague/Visby rules. In 1978 a new United Nations Convention on Carriage of Goods by Sea, known as the Hamburg rules, introduced further changes to the limits of liability, burden of proof and procedures for claims.

The modifications introduced in the Hamburg rules would increase the limits of liability by about 25 per cent and would abolish the formal list of defence in support of a provision that holds the carrier liable for any loss or damage unless it is proven the carrier followed all reasonable steps to avert the loss or damage.

Generally the Hamburg rules are seen as being more favourable to shippers than the preceding international regimes. I have to mention that our industry was not unanimously in favour of adopting the Hamburg rules. Shipowners and their insurers, as well as cargo insurers and the legal community support the implementation of the Hague/Visby rules. The shippers, on the other hand, much prefer the adoption of the Hamburg rules.

Canada is not alone in not yet having adopted the newest regime. To date, the Hamburg rules have been actually adopted by only some of our trading partners, representing only about 2 per cent of our present water-borne trade.

In the absence of a consensus by our industry, a compromise approach is proposed in Bill C-83 by incorporating the Hamburg rules in schedule II. The bill requires the Minister of Transport to conduct a review and report to Parliament within six years of the adoption of the Hague/Visby rules as to whether or not they should be replaced by the Hamburg rules.

This approach will allow Canada to implement new liability rules on a gradual basis, in step with acceptance and adoption of international conventions by our trading partners. It will also demonstrate Canada's intention to accept the Hamburg rules when it is proven that they will provide a viable basis for new cargo liability conditions for international trade.

In the intervening period Canada will pursue with our trading partners the possibility of a co-ordinated action that we hope will lead to wider acceptance of the Hamburg rules in international water-borne trade.

We are in a position today to replace a badly outdated liability regime with legislation that not only brings us up to date but also positions us well for the future.

I would like to turn briefly to the second piece of legislation before us, namely Bill C-97, an act respecting marine insurance.

At the present time there is actually no federal legislation that governs the contract of marine insurance. The 1992 federal Insurance Act is confined to laws governing the operations of insurance companies while the provinces have enacted laws governing the contract of insurance, including laws over marine insurance contracts.

In 1983 the Supreme Court of Canada had to review the issue of provincial and federal jurisdiction in marine insurance. In its judgment in the Triglav case, the Supreme Court recognized that marine insurance is an integral part of maritime law and that the contract of marine insurance was a maritime contract clearly within the jurisdiction of Parliament as part of navigation and shipping.

• (1015)

We have been advised by our legal experts that the provincial marine insurance act may, at least in part, be inoperative as a result of this judgment by the Supreme Court.

This case brought into question the applicable law to contracts of marine insurance. It has led all interested industry groups to a unanimous position urging the government to enact a federal marine insurance act and thereby resolve the uncertainty which now exists as to the scope and application of the provincial marine insurance acts.

Bill C-97 provides a positive response to the concerns of the marine insurance industry. The proposed legislation, like the existing provincial legislation, is based on the British Marine Insurance Act of 1906 at the urging of our industry. Despite what may seem to be its extreme age, the British act is actually the most developed and widely recognized law on marine insurance. It has served as a model for national legislation in many countries.

The proposed act establishes a statutory framework for the contractual relationship of the principal parties to a contract of marine insurance, namely the insurer and the insured and their respective rights and obligations arising under the contract and the principles of indemnity for losses covered by the contract.

Not proceeding with the proposed legislation would perpetuate the current situation marked by anomalies and uncertainty that may make the conduct of marine insurance in Canada unpredictable.

I have been advised that all sectors of our marine insurance industry have strongly expressed their desire that we spare no effort in adopting the proposed legislation to correct the present situation.

Finally, in concluding my remarks on these two pieces of legislation, I would like to once again extend the thanks of the government, and in particular the Minister of Transport, to hon. colleagues on the opposite side of this Chamber for their courtesy and co-operation. The Canadian industry will be the beneficiary of the expeditious treatment of these two important bills.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, we will certainly take thanks whenever we can get it from the minister.

I suggest in response to my colleague from South Shore that the reason he was asked to speak on these bills has nothing to do with his shape at all. Rather it is not only the fact of his proclivity for spreading water around the Chamber when he speaks, but also the fact that as a maritimer, he is clearly learned in the intricacies of these two bills. That was a very concise and erudite explanation of a complex area of law. He is to be congratulated for it.

Really, there is not a great deal to add on these topics except to say I find the areas interesting as legal matters. We rarely deal with matters that might be described as private law in this Chamber. Most of the legislation we enact here is of a more broad public policy nature and the areas of private law normally fall to provincial jurisdiction.

This is an exception as a result of the fact that in C-83 we have the implementation of an international convention and in C-97, as a result of a Supreme Court of Canada decision, we are dealing with insurance law which would normally be in the provincial jurisdiction. However, because in this case it relates to matters of international maritime commerce, the court has found that federal jurisdiction is touched upon as well. Therefore C-97 in that case attempts to create an interlocking relationship of federal and provincial law that ensures that maritime insurance is covered by a statutory framework.

There have been a number of submissions made to the minister as well as to the opposition parties concerning these bills. An example that I brought with me this morning from The Canadian Board of Marine Underwriters, referring to both bills, says:

> Both bills are very important to the Canadian maritime industry, and will help to ensure the efficiency and competitiveness of Canadian importers, exporters and marine insurers alike. For that reason, all sectors of the maritime industry have supported the legislation.
> It is of some concern to us that since an election must be held in 1993, either or both bills might not receive passage in time to be enacted. We would therefore urge you to do your utmost to see that both bills receive priority attention in order that they may become law.

• (1020)

I know we all eagerly hope there will be an election in 1993 and so we share the concern of the industry that these bills be dealt with in an expeditious manner. I did hear this morning that perhaps the Minister of National Defence will be looking for a way to suspend the Constitution in order to avoid having an election this year. However, we will put that in the category of rumour and carry on with the assumption that we will be going to the polls this year.

In that case, the reference of these bills to the Standing Committee on Transport creates quite an extensive work-load for the transport committee. The minister just last week referred the report of the National Transportation Act Review Commission to that committee as well and asked us to report on that by the end of June.

I would suggest, particularly in light of the disagreement among sectors of the industry on Bill C-83 as to what set of rules ought to apply, that the committee will need to review many of the implications of Bill C-83 and hear witnesses from the industry on that matter.

For our part, I would like to say we will do everything we can to try to expedite those hearings so that the bill can be properly considered and brought back to the House as the first priority. Perhaps this will be prior to entering into the detailed consideration of the review commission report, which as I say is also before the committee.

In juggling these priorities I would like to say that from our point of view, and I will be interested to hear what the NDP has to say about it, these bills should come first. They do require hearings. They do require witnesses, particularly on Bill C-83. We will attempt to have them back to the House as quickly as possible.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak to the two bills, Bill C-83, an act respecting the transportation of goods by water, and Bill C-97, an act respecting marine insurance.

I indicate right at the outset that we support these two measures, which basically are bringing marine law and marine insurance law into the 1990s. We will do whatever we can to quickly proceed through committee.

In fact, one of the reasons we want the bills to go to transport committee is that there are people on that committee who have a sense of the maritime industry already. They are well positioned to know what is in these bills and to determine what aspects of them need to be looked at and then move them back to the House. I honestly do not expect much of a delay there.

In terms of the transportation of goods by water the government speaker took us on a European tour with respect to The Hague Visby rules and the Hamburg rules. The bill is designed to allow the Minister of Transport to bring those rules forward when the marine industry of Canada decides it is time.

If we look at the breakdown in terms of the value of Canadian water-borne trade, we will see that almost 60 per cent of our commerce moves under The Hague Visby rules, $11 billion or 19 per cent under The Hague rules and only 2 per cent under the Hamburg rules. So we have a long way to go in terms of matching what the industry is doing.

I have one suggestion which I intend to have raised in committee. Under Bill C-83 there is a provision which says that: "The Minister of Transport shall within six years after the coming into force of Part I"—which is The Hague Visby rules— "(a) consider whether The Hague Visby rules should be replaced by the Hamburg rules; and (b) cause a report setting out the results of that consideration to lay before the House of Parliament".

There are two points. The minister can do that at any time during those six years. I think it needs to be clear in the act that the six years run out on December 31, 1999.

In addition, we have just gone through one process mandated by law that required a formal review of the National Transportation Act. There were hundreds of thousands, if not millions of dollars spent to review that act and the report was tabled last week.

• (1025)

The Transportation Safety Board had the same kind of mechanism built into it but only after three years of the act being in place. Now we are embarked on the same kind of course. In effect they have set up a commission which will spend taxpayers' money to review an act that is only three years old. By the very testimony of the chairman of the board the act is working quite well, thank you very much.

What I am suggesting is that in addition to what is in this bill the matter should automatically be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport at that time. Whenever the minister decides it is time to evaluate whether or not we move from the Hague Visby rules to the Hamburg rules, he would table it in Parliament and it would then be automatically referred to the Standing Committee on Transport. It will review it and send back a recommendation to the House as to whether or not we should move forward with whatever the minister's recommendation may be.

He or she may decide it is still not time to move forward to the Hamburg rules. We could call witnesses from the industry and get a sense from them and then we could report back to Parliament with our own recommendation that may or may not be consistent with the minister's. What it does is save taxpayers money, quite frankly. It saves having to go outside for a commission. It allows some protection for Parliament from a minister just going ahead and changing the rules, so to speak.

I think the committee should look at that as a possible change in approach as to how we deal with this legislation. In any event, that is Bill C-83, the transportation of goods by water.

In terms of the marine insurance, clearly we are updating Canadian law because of a court case that brought into question whether or not Canadian law applied as opposed to provincial law. I am sure that once the officials come before us at committee we will get some sense of the nuts and bolts of that. I will be honest I am not familiar with the intricacies of insurance, let alone marine insurance.

There are some interesting clauses in this bill. I just want to read them into the record because I think they will pique some people's interest in terms of the weirdness in some ways of legalese.

For example, clause 18 states: "Every contract by way of gaming or wagering is void". Does this mean that people sort of gamble away their ships? Is that what this means and therefore there is some protection there? That might be a question worth raising with the officials. Schedule III, construction of marine policies, has some interesting wording too.

We have had some experiences in this House with marine legislation where we were trying to bring it into the modern era, the modern language, eliminating flogging for example on board vessels which was in the Canada Shipping Act until about 1986 or 1987. We finally got rid of that antiquated method of keeping the seafarers in line.

An hon. member: Things do move slowly.

Mr. Angus: Things do move slowly, yes. Actually a lot of these bills that we are dealing with today are based on a 1924 law passed by Great Britain. We are just sort of fine-tuning it. It takes time in the House of Commons and the bowels of the bureaucracy to have these things worked through.

In fact, on Bill C-83 there was a white paper, a discussion paper in 1984 that led to the bill today. It took eight years, from 1984 to 1992, not for a philosophical bill, but for a nuts and bolts bill to work its way through the consultation which has to happen, the justice department in terms of legalese and what have you.

Back to some of the more interesting clauses in this schedule:

> "pirates" includes passengers on the insured ship who mutiny and persons who attack the ship from land;

That is interesting but what happens if it is a pirate from another ship? Is that covered elsewhere in the bill? It is an interesting matter to raise.

Another clause in the schedule states:

> "thieves" does not include persons who commit a clandestine theft or passengers, officers or members of the crew of the injured ship who commit a theft.

I am not quite sure I understand that kind of wording.

Here is an interesting one: In a marine policy a reference (b) to arrests, "and of kings, princes and people includes political or executive acts, but does not include riot or ordinary judicial process". Kings, princes and people, that is interesting.

• (1030)

Indeed, perils of the seas means fortuitous accidents or casualties of the seas but does not include ordinary action of the wind and waves.

Over the last while, we have seen the reality of the normal action of wind and waves with two major casualties, one on our coast and one on the coast of Great Britain. In a serious way, we need to take a look at the ramifications of that particular clause.

For those people who really find that legalese drives them crazy, here is the classic. This is under number (2) in a marine policy, reference (c): "To average unless general means a partial loss of the subject matter insured other than a general average loss but does not include particularly charges". Perhaps the government speaker might want to explain to the House what that particular clause means.

As I said at the outset, we support the two pieces of legislation. We agreed that they should be combined for the purpose of debate. We want the bills to go the transport committee because it will be in a position to give them speedier consideration.

I do not think we should wait another 10 years for these bills to come back. We should pass them at second reading now, get them into committee, back out of committee, given third reading and then on to the other place as quickly as we can. It helps the maritime industry do its job in an efficient and in a less expensive way.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Since one representative from each recognized party has spoken in debate, pursuant to order made Thursday, March 18, 1993, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the two bills now before the House.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The first question is on Bill C-97. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the next question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The second question is on Bill C-83. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

Mr. Danis: Madam Speaker, on behalf of the government House leader, I would like to thank my two colleagues from the opposition who have co-operated in the passing of this bill.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Madam Speaker, I have a message here from the Greek community of my riding.

The Skopje regime insists on seeking international recognition of its multi-ethnic former Yugoslav republic under the name of Macedonia, while leaders of the various ethnic groups accuse this regime of ignoring the wishes of the majority of the population on the issue of the republic's name and of violations of their basic human rights.

I would like our government to inform our Parliament whether these accusations are being taken into account, considering that ethnic Albanians alone constitute more than one-third of the total population.

APPRENTICESHIP PROGRAMS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, no nation in today's highly competitive world market will be able to bring about economic renewal without first having a well-trained and adaptable work force.

Such a work force comes about only when labour and management work together. Our ability to generate wealth and be successful in the global economy will depend on that.

The best way to build a highly skilled and highly relative work force is through a revised national apprenticeship program.

Canada's apprenticeship program has fallen into great disrepute. No longer is it seen as an integral part of our education system, but rather it is looked upon as a dead end by prospective students.

When is the government going to show some understanding and appreciation of the nation's lack of skilled tradesmen? When is the government going to announce a renewed, revitalized national apprenticeship program that will address the pressing current need in Canada for a well-trained work force? Canada can no longer afford a hit and miss approach to apprenticeship programs.

OLDMAN RIVER DAM

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, on January 23, 1992 the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that Alberta requires a licence under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for the Oldman River dam. The Supreme Court upheld the March 13, 1990 Federal Court of Appeal ruling which quashed the required licence and ordered an environmental assessment and review of the dam.

The number one recommendation of the EARP report was to decommission the dam. The federal Ministers of Environment and Transport proved to be too wimpy to accept the fact that the dam is both environmentally and economically unsound. They rejected the number one recommendation but promised to implement the other 22.

On May 2, 1992 the Minister of Transport said of the 22 recommendations: "We will ensure that they are implemented". By November 19, 1992 not one recommendation had been implemented and the minister lamely promised: "We are going to see that these 22 recommendations are implemented".

Spring run-off is about to begin and the negative impacts will take effect.

Canadians should take note that the Conservatives refuse to obey the Supreme Court of Canada or stand up for their own promises. These ministers are the fat, wingless ducks of the Oldman River.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, one way that my community is trying to regain economic activity and diversify its economy is by helping local people prepare to start their own businesses.

The Brock University Centre for Entrepreneurship, Niagara College and the innovative New Enterprise Store are teaching potential entrepreneurs the techniques necessary to establish their own businesses. The Niagara Enterprise Agency is also being established to help identify potential entrepreneurs in the plants that are closing and provide them with the training necessary to commence their own businesses.

Training programs are also in place to help train people for the opportunities that will be created by these new businesses.

However, local entrepreneurs are all too often running into the same problem. This is an inability to obtain the necessary capital to put their ideas into effect. Many of these new businesses do not have the assets which they can mortgage in order to obtain the needed financing. Government programs like the Small Businesses Loans Act, the Small Business Financing Program and the Federal Business Development Bank make financing available, but we must do more.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, November 21 is the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination.

Racism, anti-Semitism and racial discrimination are among the most destructive forces within any society. Our Charter of Rights and Freedoms prohibits discrimination based on religion, colour or place of origin. However, the charter cannot solve all of our societal problems.

To solve the social problem of racial and anti-Semitic discrimination and crime is to address the education system. School curricula at all levels must ensure that a component is taught in the classroom on the issue of race relations. From the very earliest stages through post-secondary education our school system must reflect our cultural mosaic.

I call on the government to establish a national depository of racial and anti-Semitic crimes in our society. Through such a depository, proper planning can be done to establish programs to respond to the challenges of racial harmony. We must act now to ensure that Canadians of all backgrounds continue to live and work in the finest nation on earth.

THIRD HOLLAND LANDING GUIDE TROOP

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity today to congratulate the Third Holland Landing Guide Troop for taking a interest in the future of this country as it relates to the problems of pollution in Lake Simcoe.

These young ladies have learned that fishing and tourism are very important to the people of Georgina. They also understand that Lake Simcoe is in big trouble and these guides think pollution is "very wrong", to quote them directly.

They are concerned that if the province of Ontario puts a giant mega-dump within one mile of Lake Simcoe it will affect the spawning ground, which is very near the proposed dump site. This has the potential of making the pollution in Lake Simcoe that much worse.

These young guides do not want to get anywhere near or go swimming anywhere near a dump. They feel Lake Simcoe has enough problems already because of fertilizers, sewage and other pollution. The quality of the water is already at risk in Lake Simcoe. They recognize that most of the fish which are caught in Lake Simcoe have been put there as a result of being raised in a fish hatchery because the algae and the pollutants that are now in the lake have ruined many of the spawning areas—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the member's time has expired.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, the provincial budget tabled in Saskatchewan yesterday is tough because of a decade of PC government mismanagement and cuts to federal transfers. It demonstrates that a New Democrat government can commit to and achieve deficit reduction without doing it on the backs of those who are most in need.

Painful cuts were necessary and they were made, but they were tempered with compassion. This was not the situation in the provinces of Manitoba or Newfoundland, which also made budget announcements this week.

The slash and burn policies implemented by the Conservatives in Manitoba called for devastating cuts to 56 social service industries which are the front-line advocates for the poor and disenfranchised, those most affected by failed PC economic policies.

The Liberals in Newfoundland also decided that hiring investigators to crack down on social assistance abuse, cutting grants to volunteer organizations and cutting Public Service jobs without notice is their solution. That will not alleviate the serious social problems and chronic unemployment that are plaguing that province.

The budget tabled yesterday in Saskatchewan proves that New Democrats are serious about getting people back to work, containing as it does many job creation initiatives. It shows that fiscal responsibility and social responsibility—

FLEXI-COIL LTD.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, Saskatchewan has some world-class companies underpinned by world-class technology.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate one of those companies, Flexi-Coil Ltd. of Saskatoon. People from Regina do not often congratulate people in Saskatoon, but this is one of those strange times.

Flexi-Coil manufactures farm machinery and its order books are overflowing. In fact, employment at the company has just doubled in seven months from 430 to more than 800 right now.

What is driving the company's success? The answer is research and development and leading-edge technology that allows seeding operations in high moisture conditions with minimal soil disturbance.

Flexi-Coil has not bought the argument that Saskatchewan is too far from major markets. Instead, it is developing international markets and putting people to work.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, the Minister for Science and the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, in responding yesterday to a question, said that we have a surplus of trade with foreign countries of $9.5 billion.

I would like to remind the minister that trade includes goods, services and financial flows, and those numbers are disastrous. The current account deficit with foreign countries amounts to $30 billion for 1992. I wonder when the minister is going to come clean with the Canadian public and portray the real economic situation of the country. For example, we have a national debt of $650 billion, which amounts to 95 per cent of the gross domestic product, equivalent to Brazil and Venezuela.

OIL AND GAS INDUSTRY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, oil and gas has faced a bad economic environment almost continuously since late 1985. Among western Canadians alone employment is down by about 35,000 jobs over the past eight years, partly because of our high dollar.

Even with gradual price recovery the number of jobs is still expected to decline by about 18 per cent by 1995. To put that in more human terms, another 11,700 families in western Canada will face the prospect of job losses.

We need to restore profitability and competitiveness to our domestic energy industry if it is to be rejuvenated.

The federal government has a role to play in the revitalization of the sector, which provides close to 100,000 direct jobs in Alberta alone. According to one estimate, 30,000 new jobs would be created in the west and throughout the Canadian economy for every billion dollars in new investment in our oil and gas industry.

With no change in the fiscal regime, industry investment this year might drop to $4.1 billion, or 85 per cent of forecast cash flow. The federal government has shown a commitment, thank goodness, to oil and gas in the Atlantic provinces. It could also stimulate the oil patch in the west.

ST. AUGUSTIN, QUEBEC

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, Sunday, March 7, 1993 is a memorable and historic date for the residents of the village of St. Augustin on the lower north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence in the riding of Manicouagan, in Quebec.

On that date they elected their first municipal council. St. Augustin, the largest community of the lower north shore, is now a legal municipal entity with the powers and responsibilities administered by elected local residents.

I wish to pay tribute to all those who ran in the municipal election. Their involvement shows their interest in the development of their community.

I would also like to offer congratulations and best wishes for success to Mr. Harrisson Lavallée, the first elected mayor, and to Léo McKinnon, Andrew Fequet, Gerry Driscoll, Alfred Maurice, Jeoffrey Lessard and Eldon Gallant, all elected municipal councillors.

I want to assure them of my continued support and co-operation.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Madam Speaker, the concept of the elimination of Prince Edward Island, and possibly other Atlantic provinces, from the Canadian federation is finding more support from Tory members of Parliament and from candidates for the Tory leadership.

S. O. 31

This morning I received a letter from a resident of Delta, British Columbia, expressing concern that this may be Tory policy. According to the letter the member for Delta, who just happens to be B.C. Tory caucus chair, on his March 12, 1993 cable TV program "On the line with MP Stan Wilbee" was asked by host Frank Buckles if P.E.I. was too small to be a province. The hon. member, who supports the leadership candidacy of the minister of defence, agreed and further advocated that the Atlantic provinces amalgamate to form one or maybe two provinces thereby saving the taxpayers in the rest of Canada a lot of money and helping to reduce the deficit.

The letter concludes with a request to ask the member for Delta and the defence minister if this is Tory policy.

I ask all Tory MPs, including the Prime Minister, if this is Tory policy or merely regional pandering passed off as deep economic thought as reborn Summerside friend, Garth Turner—

YOUTH DAY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, each year on March 21, as we welcome the arrival of spring, New Brunswick celebrates provincial Youth Day.

Youth Day in New Brunswick marks the province's recognition of youth and their contribution to society. It is a special day that represents hopes and new beginnings.

Youth Day is celebrated with activities provincially, including an environmental clean-up and awards for youth initiative recognition.

These awards are an initiative of the Youth Council of New Brunswick. Each year two awards are presented to individuals or organizations that have demonstrated leadership, initiative and dedication in working with youth.

A recipient of this year's award is Fredericton's own Characters Incorporated, nominated for its sense of what Canada is all about. There can be nothing more moving than the intense feelings of youth expressed in dance and song, and Characters Incorporated represents the best of what young New Brunswickers have to offer to Canada.

I would encourage the members of this House to join me in expressing appreciation for the inspiration and the contribution to leadership which our youth provide—

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, passengers using Vancouver International Airport will soon be paying a special tax of $5 to $15. This tax will be imposed on travellers by the Vancouver International Airport Authority in order to fund its capital construction plans.

This is a tax that could not come at a worse time for Canada's airline industry, but the villain here is not the local airport authority. Instead, New Democrats hold the Minister of Transport responsible.

We in this party warned Canadians that there would be hidden costs to the transfer of control of airports to local authorities. Sadly, we have once again been proven correct.

• (1115)

Successive Conservative transport ministers have imposed deregulation, reducing the government's role and responsibility in transport matters.

Canada is now reaping the bitter fruits of Tory free market philosophy with catastrophe in all transport modes. Now there is one more burden for the Canadian consumer: another tax on travel thanks to Tory transport policy. Regretfully it is one more reason for traffic to divert from Vancouver to Seattle in Bellingham, Washington.

CANADIAN MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Canadian municipalities are still trying to obtain a reversal of the 1992 freeze imposed by the government on the portion of municipal taxes applied to federal property.

During Question Period last Friday, I reminded the Minister of Public Works that the government was responsible for paying its fair share of municipal taxes on its property, the same as any ratepayer.

I also reminded the minister that the Ottawa–Carleton Regional Municipality had recently reassessed all property categories and that the federal government stood to gain as a result. He promised he would consider these matters and try to find an equitable solution.

I may remind the minister that the municipalities are still waiting to be consulted. Meanwhile, other ratepayers feel it is unfair they should have to make up the shortfall.

BRITISH COLUMBIA LEGISLATURE

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, last night on television I viewed a scene from Victoria far uglier than any clear cut I have ever seen.

Hundreds of environmental rowdies violently stormed the British Columbia legislature with the sole purpose of imposing their radical and intolerant views on the people of B.C. These people are prepared to use and abuse the freedoms of democracy but are also prepared to abandon the democratic process when it no longer suits their narrow purpose.

These people are akin to terrorists. They started with spiking trees and sabotaging vehicles. Now they have resorted to the violent intimidation of elected representatives.

Yes, it was an ugly scene and as a British Columbian I was ashamed. It is a shame I am sure that is shared by all responsible environmentalists.

LEADER OF THE LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, the boss of a political party might from time to time think that some of his caucus are less than confident with their position and their party's future in Canada. They may be disenchanted. They may be called radical, fanatic, militant, rebellious. They may be seen to be upset, overturned, distressed, grieved, troubled, disconcerted, disturbed, worried, up–ended, capsized, set back, collapsed, conquered, confounded or defeated.

This week we saw a national leader detect troubles within his caucus, troubles that caused him alarm. Without much thought to their legitimate concern about the crumbling of their support base, standing on a platform that was a mile wide and an inch deep, the Leader of the Liberal Party labelled his flock of sheep as being nervous nellies and cry babies.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

Yesterday, speaking in Kitchener, a Mexican diplomat confirmed the worst fears of Canadian workers. The diplomat said that although Mexico does have environmental laws it does not have the means to enforce them and that they would not be enforced until the year 2000. Meanwhile in Washington, Canadian NAFTA negotiators said they do not want a parallel accord on the environment to have any teeth.

How can Canada be calling for a toothless side deal on the environment when Mexico has said it does not intend to enforce its own environmental standards until the year 2000? How does that help our Canadian workers?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, yesterday and the day before the negotiators of the North American free trade agreement met in Washington to lay out the parameters for some parallel agreements to go with the NAFTA agreement.

It was reconfirmed yesterday that first, the NAFTA agreement will stand as is. It will not be amended. Second, all three countries agree that it will be implemented. The goal is to implement it on January 1, 1994.

Third, they discussed various positions regarding the environment, labour standards and what is sometimes referred to in Canada as snap-back provisions on commodities.

• (1120)

I can tell the hon. member that they had good meetings. The meetings were very fruitful. Many ideas were exchanged among the three countries.

They are now going back to their political masters in each country discuss the options and establish negotiating positions. That will take place over the next period of time.

The hon. member should not at this particular moment jump to the conclusions that he is jumping to. He always does. He takes the first thing that is said in negotiations when there is not even—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Windsor West.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister.

I am quoting a Mexican diplomat who just spoke in Kitchener. He let the cat out of the bag and said that Mexico cannot and does not intend to enforce its environmental standards at least until the year 2000.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I quote what this Mexican diplomat said: "We already have standards, but we do not have the means to enforce them". He even added that some environmental measures would not come into effect before the year 2000.

I wonder why the government does not take this into account. Does the minister intend to ask our Canadian negotiators to demand that the environmental side agreement include a mechanism to ensure compliance with standards, to protect our Canadian workers?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, since the question was the same in French and English, the answer is the same.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the minister has just said that his government does not care about the effect of non-enforcement by Mexico of its environmental standards on Canadian workers. Why is the government ready to see companies and jobs siphoned off to Mexico because of lax enforcement of its environmental standards?

Will the minister commit today that the government will not proceed with NAFTA legislation without a firm commitment from Mexico to a strong parallel accord on environmental standards, an accord which contains the means to enforce them? Will he make that commitment today?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, first of all, the hon. member stands up here and says that all these jobs and businesses are going to be siphoned off to Mexico.

At the same time in his own riding, Chrysler announced a half billion dollar upgrading of a facility there. If in fact all these businesses were going to flee to Mexico, then why would they be spending this tremendous amount of money reorganizing here in Canada to assure the jobs of Canadians? The hon. member is saying that.

Second, as far as protecting the environment is concerned, Canada takes a back seat to no one in protecting the environment. We have one of the finest environmental records in the world today, It is one we are extremely proud of. Our Minister of the Environment has done an extremely good job bringing in the green plan and leading our Canadian delegation to Brazil, where Canadians were praised by everyone for the positions taken on the environment in Canada.

The hon. member knows full well that Mexicans are not like Canadians, and Americans are not like Canadians. We are all different. The hon. member wants Mexicans to become Canadians. He cannot have it that way because it does not work that way.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Acting Prime Minister.

Yesterday, two provinces had no choice but to introduce extremely severe budgets, again cutting provincial programs as a result of the down-loading of the debt by the Government of Canada. The Newfoundland minister of finance and the premier of Saskatchewan have both added their voices to a call for a national conference to resolve the debt crisis in this country.

Why does the government refuse to call such a conference? Why does it continue to allow the debt to fall on the shoulders of those Canadians who have the least capacity to pay?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization): I am glad this question was raised. The provinces had a meeting with the Minister of Finance. The finance ministers met a year ago January in Quebec City, as a matter of fact. I had the privilege of being at that meeting. I can tell the hon. member that the Minister of Finance at that time urged all the provincial finance ministers to come to grips with their deficits, to come to grips with co-ordinating in a more reasonable fashion the budgets of the federal and provincial governments so that we would be going after the same things. He repeated that in January of this year with the finance ministers at a meeting in Ottawa.

• (1125)

All finance ministers, no matter what their political stripe, including Newfoundland's minister of finance to give him full credit, agreed that deficit reduction was the number one priority in this country. All finance ministers at that time agreed to tackle this major problem. I have nothing but praise for the ministers of finance in Saskatchewan and Newfoundland.

Now, as far as the off-loading argument is concerned, I want the hon. member to know that the average rate of growth to Newfoundland over the last nine years has been 7.4 per cent. It is the highest of any province in Canada. It is expected to approach $1.4 billion to Newfoundland in 1993-94. That is over 40 per cent of its budget.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, the fact is that the transfer payments were reduced from what was expected. They may be increasing but they were reduced from what was expected, forcing the provinces to find moneys out of their own budgets.

If what the minister says is true, that the Minister of Finance is meeting all the finance ministers and agreeing that the debt crisis is the most important thing in the country, why does the government refuse to call a national conference as the finance ministers and premiers have called for? Why does it refuse to do that?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): The Minister of Finance, as I have said, met as recently as January with the finance ministers to discuss the budgets of this year. That has taken place.

Now the budgets are coming out. There will be another meeting following the provincial budgets and the federal budget to see where we go from there. That takes place all the time and will continue to take place.

The hon. member makes it sound like these finance ministers do not get together. Having formerly sat on the treasury benches, he knows full well that—

Mr. Rompkey: I am just quoting them.

Mr. McDermid: I can say that the finance minister from Saskatchewan who called for that meeting was not at the January meeting. She was not the finance minister at the time so I understand why she is doing that. There will be another meeting called after the budgets have been delivered by the ministers of finance of this country. They are co-operating and the hon. member should be happy about that.

TRADE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): My question is on the subject of NAFTA negotiations. Yesterday, John Weekes, Canada's NAFTA negotiator, claimed that the United States does not properly understand how NAFTA in fact works. Import surges of low-priced Mexican products, he said, are covered under the existing deal and no side deal was needed.

My question for the Acting Prime Minister is this: Does the government not understand how weak the present NAFTA deal is on import surges since it requires full consultation with the other country and can only be used once against a given product?

Why does the government not understand what the United States government has come to see, that much tougher and faster moves must be taken against import surges to protect Canadian jobs?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, in the NAFTA as in the free trade agreement there are provisions to prevent the sudden surges or to cover the sudden surges of import products, especially in the fruit and vegetable area. That is the area where they are primarily used. They are the snap-back provisions. They have worked in the past and will work in the future. That is what our negotiator has stated to the United States and Mexico.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I represent a constituency that produces many of those agricultural products which are supposed to benefit from the snap-back provisions. They have come into effect in every case where they have been used under the FTA at least six to seven weeks too late to do any good for Canadian farmers. I want to put a supplementary question to the government dealing with environmental enforcement since this area is one in which it has also failed.

• (1130)

Yesterday, as my colleague has indicated, a senior Mexican diplomatic official told a Kitchener audience that while Mexico had strong environmental standards, the country "has not yet the means to enforce them". This is the clearest admission yet by Mexico of what we have claimed all along, that environmental laws simply are not enforced in that country.

I ask why the government does not see that this lack of environmental enforcement dangerously threatens the Canadian record on environmental concerns.Why does—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the question has been put and we are getting into speeches.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I can say to the hon. member that Mexico is a developing country. Mexico does not have the wherewithal that we have in Canada and the United States, but we know it is getting better. It is working at it and it is trying.

We have a great opportunity, through an environmental commission that has been set up, to help Mexico with that very problem it has of policing environmental regulations. We are there to help. That is where Canada can add greatly to Mexico in environmental matters.

It is not a matter of bringing the big hammer on it, which the hon. member and the NDP want to do. That is not what we should be doing. We should be helping it with guidance and support in policing its environmental laws and that is what we will do.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the minister talks about policing and yet this commission which is being set up has absolutely no authority with respect to environmental enforcement. It is a cipher. It has no meaning.

[Translation]

And now for my supplementary. This week, Premier Bob Rae of Ontario attacked the Mexican government's record on human rights and democracy. He said that Amnesty International had reported instances of torture and the disappearance of 55 journalists.

Why does the government continue to support an agreement with Mexico?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): First of all to the preamble of the hon. member, I might say that if Mexico stopped trading with Canada because of one of our environmental laws, the NDP members would be the first on their feet saying that Mexicans are treading on the sovereignty of Canada. They would be the very first.

We do not believe that we need strict enforcement laws dealing with trade to deal with environmental matters. We believe that they can be accomplished in other ways, like we did with the United States on the acid rain treaty that we signed with them and many other examples. There are many other ways of doing it without using the big stick that the NDP would use, and it does not work.

Let me say this about a developing country. Certainly there are problems within developing countries. We see that around the world. We do not stop trading with them. We try to help them with their problems. As their economies grow and improve, so does the style within those countries. That will happen in Mexico.

We happen to think that Mexicans can produce and trade their way to a better way of life. The NDP wants to give Mexico hand-outs but keep it suppressed. That is not the way we do things.

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

For many years, women working in the Canadian forces who had the courage to stand up and complain about sexual harassment were discharged without just cause.

Will the government have the integrity to set up an independent inquiry today that will make a thorough investigation of these reprisals?

• (1135)

[English]

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, there are 30,000 women involved in the Department of National Defence. The department has taken the initiative, as indicated by the minister yesterday, of doing a questionnaire of 5,600 people to make sure that there is zero tolerance for sexual harassment in the Armed Forces.

Yesterday the minister indicated the report will be made available in April, as soon as it is finished. The Department of National Defence is taking every step possible to make sure that zero tolerance for sexual harassment remains in the Armed Forces of Canada.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also addressed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Today women are being forced out of the Armed Forces because they have complained of harassment. Nothing is being done to stop it. These women have come forward with great courage to stand up against a system that closes ranks to ostracize, punish and force them out.

Is there anybody on the government benches who will promise these women that not one more woman will be discharged from the Canadian Armed Forces while those who protect the harassers continue to rise in the ranks?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member meant to say that no woman will be discharged from the Canadian Armed Forces because of her complaints regarding sexual harassment during this period of time until something is done to correct it.

I think that is a fair statement to make. I can say that the Armed Forces in Canada are trying to make sure that no sexual harassment goes on in the Armed Forces. If the member has indications of people who feel that they are being pushed out today, then please, make sure these cases are brought forward and they will be investigated thoroughly.

I happen to agree. There should be—

Mrs. Catterall: They have been brought forward for four years.

Mr. Dick: Oh, be quiet for a moment, Catterall. All you do is yap.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. We will check the "blues" see whether anything unparliamentary was said. I know that there was but I could not hear. If the hon. minister feels that he did say something unparliamentary, he should rise and withdraw right away.

Mr. Dick: Madam Speaker, I do not believe I said anything unparliamentary. If I did, I would certainly withdraw it.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, it is a delight to be in this House where chivalry lives.

I believe that there are people on the government benches who have zero tolerance for sexual harassment. I believe that.

Treasury Board policy for example calls for sanctions against sexual harassers. In the case of the Halifax public servants, which I have raised over seven times in this House, the report is done. Sexual harassment was found. Conciliation has been ordered for victims but no action has been taken by the Public Service management against the harassers.

Will the Acting Prime Minister or any minister on the other side of the House guarantee zero tolerance and see that appropriate action is taken against these men?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the President of the Treasury Board, I would like to answer the question by my hon. friend.

She knows, and the Prime Minister has stated it on a number of occasions, what the policy of this government is concerning sexual harassment. It is one of zero tolerance.

I support that. In a certain time in my prior life, I was responsible for implementing sexual harassment guidelines at the University of Montreal. I know what it is and I support the policy. If my hon. friend has any particular case where she feels something has been done which is not fair, she should bring it to our attention.

I can tell my hon. friend because she speaks in generalities that if she has questions or cases, she can bring them to our attention and I will transmit them to the minister responsible for Treasury Board.

An hon. member: And it will be dealt with appropriately.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I am delighted. The names are Ghislaine Jalbert and Heather Buchanan, those are the two people. There is a report. It is there, it is out. It is on the Treasury Board president's desk.

• (1140)

[Translation]

The two victims, who are public servants in Halifax, have been retaliated against for two years now. For two years, the three aggressors have boasted that they have not been punished. If the government is so devoted to fighting sexual harassment, what does the minister intend to do to ensure that these men are justly punished?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I think that the two ministers who spoke before honestly answered the questions raised by the member for Halifax and the member for Ottawa West and clearly stated that no form of sexual harassment would be tolerated.

My colleague mentions some very specific cases that have been referred to the President of the Treasury Board. When he is here, he can answer very clearly and precisely the questions on the cases referred to. But this week, I heard the Prime Minister and the defence minister repeat many times that the government, just like the opposition, does not want to tolerate any form of sexual harassment. However, it is the President of the Treasury Board who will answer questions on specific cases.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, my question is for whomever is answering for the Minister of Finance today.

Yesterday we saw two tough budgets in Newfoundland and Saskatchewan and yet the federal government continues, and did so yesterday, to trivialize the impact of federal off-loading on the provinces.

The Newfoundland minister of finance said: "The decline in transfer payments has placed a heavy burden on the province's finances and added pressure on our credit rating". The minister of finance in Saskatchewan said: "By far the most serious threat to our budget plan is the federal government".

I ask the minister responding, who is telling the truth here, the federal government or the 10 provinces and the two territories?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the member from Saskatchewan and I this morning heard municipalities in Saskatchewan accusing the Government of Saskatchewan of off-loading the problem on to the municipalities.

I believe there is one taxpayer in Saskatchewan as there is in any other province. I think we should consider that the province of Saskatchewan followed exactly the example of this government when it decided that it had to deal with the deficit and debt of the province.

Everybody knows that Canadians agree with the way this government is working with the deficit and debt. They agree so much that the government in Saskatchewan, which is an NDP government, decided to do exactly the same thing.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, this is quite remarkable. If the minister had only looked at the budget yesterday he would have seen that in fact the budget is creating jobs in Saskatchewan and is arguing for full employment. It is a budget that is compassionate and is not hitting the hardest hit in this society as this government has traditionally done. It is a government which has controlled government spending and it is the only government in Canada which has actually reduced current expenditures.

Therefore this government does not need to lecture the Government of Saskatchewan on how to deal with its budget, thank you very much.

The minister of finance yesterday indicated that no one government can tackle it alone. "We need national solutions", she said. "We need co-operation, co-ordination and a new national agenda".

When will this government begin to work with the provinces instead of fighting against them? When will the government work with Canadians?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I do not know if I understand the meaning of the word "lecturing" in English. But in my view, I praised the Government of Saskatchewan for following the example of trying to control the deficit. However, the same Government of Saskatchewan did what we have not done so far. It has reduced by 2.8 per cent the transfers to the hospitals and school systems.

The Saskatchewan government considers that it has to manage the budget of Saskatchewan in a way that will control the deficit and debt.

Once again I praise the Government of Saskatchewan for doing exactly what this government has preached for eight years: control the deficit and the debt and you will control the economy of this country.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The minister will know that the unemployment situation on Cape Breton Island is truly devastating. There are thousands of fishermen who, because of the lack of fish stocks, will join the thousands already unemployed.

• (1145)

This situation is very serious. These fishermen have no income. They have no alternate employment. They have no means to feed their families in the months to come or pay what they owe on their boats. If the fishing industry is to recover there has to be fishermen to fish. What is the government going to do for these fishermen?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member points to a very serious situation in Cape Breton and other parts of the maritime provinces.

As the hon. member may know most of the fishermen and plant workers who will be affected by the reduced quotas announced by the minister of fisheries are currently receiving unemployment insurance, a good part of them.

The minister of fisheries and myself are working right now on a solution to the plight of those unemployed people. I expect within the next few weeks we should be able to apprise those communities of the initiatives we are going to put in place to try to help them out during these really tough times.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I appreciate that perhaps the minister is well meaning but I do not think he truly realizes the seriousness of the situation.

These people are in a difficult position. They really do not know what they are going to do. They do not know how they are going to look after their families. They do not know how they are going to look after the payments on their vessels.

The unemployment rate in Cape Breton right now, according to Statistics Canada's own figures, is 28.5 per cent. That is a national disgrace. Surely the minister will admit that.

Will he please speed up the process? Will he please do something for the people who really need the government's help?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the record is an example of the attention we give to these people. I think the hon. member will acknowledge that when, for example, we introduced the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program it was oriented toward trying to help these people.

We understand the plight and situation of these fishermen and plant workers who have no income at all because of the reduced quota.

As I indicated we are going to do our share at the federal level. We are speaking with the provincial government, because it is the responsibility of both levels of government. I expect in the next few weeks, as I said, to be able to apprise those people of the measures we are proposing to help them help themselves during these tough times.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, in the minds of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance the recession is over. Yet for the approximately 40,000 unemployed in Hamilton the pain of the recession continues. There are 5,000 more people unemployed in Hamilton today than a year ago.

Could the Acting Prime Minister tell Canadians what the finance minister is going to bring forth in the upcoming budget to alleviate this situation?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I know the hon. member would appreciate my giving the finance minister's budget today. I am not in a position to do that. I would suggest she wait until the minister delivers the budget in his place here in the House within the next few weeks.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, the Conservative Party is trying to portray a youthful image for itself in the current leadership race using old faces with old ideas.

We have 392,000 unemployed young people in Canada today. That is 17 per cent of our employable youth. Will the Acting Prime Minister tell us what the government is going to do for these young people, who are the future of our country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, as a matter of fact in the last month an encouraging statistic showed that 14,000 of these young people found employment.

Ms. Phinney: Part time.

Mr. McDermid: Excuse me. It is still unacceptably high. We are bringing forward many programs. The Minister of Finance announced a number of them in his December budget. We are seeing employment growth, especially in Ontario and in the manufacturing areas, which is a positive sign due to the record exports that are going to the United States and to our trading partners, with the exception of Britain.

• (1150)

That is very encouraging news for Canadians and for young people coming into the work force. We will continue to strive toward that end. I am sure the budget of the Minister of Finance, although it will be a tough budget and has to be out of necessity as the provinces are doing as well, will also pay very careful attention to helping those who need it most.

JOB START PROGRAM

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I see the Minister of Employment and Immigration has left the House. In any event I would like to put my question to someone who is answering for him.

There is a very successful training program in Oromocto, New Brunswick, for young adults called the Job Start Program. It is not just a classroom experience. It is a real employment scenario where they teach skills and the work ethic. It is a special and continuing approach with a track record of 70 per cent in continuing employment of those who have left the Job Start Program. Unfortunately the job start concept has no longer been included as part of the general national curriculum of the CEC program structure.

Is the minister's department considering the Job Start Program for a future curriculum nationally? Will it recognize the Oromocto project for its unique characteristics in its programming for 1993-94?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): That is a very good question, finally, Madam Speaker.

The Department of Employment and Immigration has put forward in two provinces, particularly New Brunswick and British Columbia, a few experiences in terms of new retraining of social recipients in collaboration with the department of health and welfare.

The Department of Employment and Immigration is reviewing the cases and the possibility or opportunity to expand that program. The minister will certainly consider what the hon. member from Fredericton asks of the government.

FISHERIES

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, this government has abandoned collective bargaining with its employees. It has instituted a wage freeze. It has continued to demonstrate its contempt for federal workers.

Now the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the minister say they agree fisheries officers should be reclassified. The Department of Transport and the minister say marine surveyors should be reclassified. Everyone claims Treasury Board is the obstacle.

Can the government justify allowing mass reclassification of senior bureaucrats and refusing legitimate reclassification for fisheries officers and marine surveyors?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board, I will take notice of the question of my hon. friend. I can assure her that as soon as the minister comes back he will get back to her on that.

She will have a supplementary question, no doubt.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Yes, Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I appreciate the minister has undertaken to get that information from the President of the Treasury Board.

I have a letter from a fisheries officer that says: "Unfortunately I am beginning to doubt that fisheries officers are ever going to be recognized for the duties they perform or the services they provide to the people of Canada".

I am also told with regard to marine surveyors that Transport Canada recognizes the legitimacy of their claim after a review of the ship safety branch.

Will the government respect the important service of these workers and reclassify them as they deserve? I hope the minister will say yes and take that to Treasury Board.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question.

Like I said in my prior answer, I will bring it to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board. Also I will talk to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of Transport.

INTERIM WASTE AUTHORITY

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, there is a very delicate balance presently in the state of Lake Simcoe as it concerns the water quality and its importance to the Trent–Severn waterway system.

My question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Presently the Interim Waste Authority is looking at the mitigation measures and the net effects that a proposed dump site in this area would cause. He is talking about off-site impact studies, biology, geology, hydrology, surface water, all things that are very important to Canadians and to the minister of fisheries.

Is the minister going to report to the Interim Waste Authority prior to the final selection? Will he make a public and formal declaration to the authority? It has asked for submissions. Is the minister going to do this before the site selection process is completed?

• (1155)

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his question. The minister is away on government business today but I will be sure to bring the comments of the hon. member to his attention. Knowing the minister, I am sure he will reply very shortly to the hon. member.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment. This government and this minister often speak about their training strategy but there are some concerns about its efficiency.

The London Industrial Training Advisory Board has over $1 million slated for training but cannot spend it because the money is allocated to train UI recipients only and it cannot find eligible UI recipients.

Why will the minister not relax his government's rigid training guidelines and allow the board to train people who need training whether they are on UI or are UI exhaustees?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has recognized that the Government of Canada is doing a tremendous amount of training and retraining and is spending funds in that regard. I thank him for that compliment.

I can tell the hon. member that moneys being spent for training and retraining of UI recipients is something new. It is very important to ensure that people have the necessary skills when jobs become available to accept them.

I will ask the minister to look into the particular suggestion the hon. member has made. If moneys are not being spent in one area for training then I think they should be spent somewhere else. I will make that suggestion to the minister, and I am sure he will look into it for the hon. member.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, let the record show that I am not at all pleased with what the government is doing on the issue of training. As a matter of fact it has failed desperately in this particular area.

When the training board I mentioned met with officials from EIC to ask them to allow non-UI recipients into the training courses those officials said: "We would rather leave the classroom seats empty than put non-UI recipients in them".

That is absolutely ridiculous, and I ask the minister once again when he will adopt a comprehensive, flexible approach to training and abandon his government's present unfair position.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I caution the hon. member in bringing forward quotes like that because I am going to challenge him right now to name the person who said that and to bring to the minister's attention the name of the person the direct quote was attributed to.

I know members of my party and I would be very concerned with that kind of talk, because it really does not fit what we are trying to do with training in this country.

If the hon. member would be so kind as to tell me who made that statement, we can question them to find out why they said that. I think it would be most helpful. It might be helpful to go outside the House and name that person as well.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Christine Lamont and David Spencer are now in their fourth year in Brazilian prisons. Christine has recently been tested positive for tuberculosis.

Will the Acting Prime Minister tell the House why the Prime Minister has not yet replied to letters written to him on January 7 and March 2 from leaders of the Anglican, Catholic, Presbyterian, and United churches asking to meet with him on this very important issue?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows about this government's communications with the Government of Brazil.

A new development has occurred in Brazil in that the Brazilian Supreme Court yesterday agreed to consider the appeal on the length of the sentences. The Government of Brazil is aware of Canadian concerns regarding the length of the 28-year sentence. The Brazilian government is also aware of the importance that Canada attaches to an early decision on the appeals currently standing, but I think it is positive that the Brazilian Supreme Court is currently looking at the situation.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, in fact the minister will know that two days ago the Superior Court of Brazil agreed that the 28-year sentences for Christine and David were unconstitutional. No one knows exactly when the court will set new sentences, whether it will be in six months or a year or whenever.

• (1200)

The Department of External Affairs throughout this has taken the view that nothing improper happened in the Brazilian judicial system. Now we find two days ago that it clearly did.

In the circumstances, why will the Prime Minister simply not ask that these two Canadians be expelled from Brazil as is allowed by Brazilian law, and as so many Canadians, church leaders, members of Parliament from all parties have asked the government to do?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know better.

I am sure if this government or any other government was attempting to interfere in the procedures of the courts in Canada he would be the first one on his hind legs screaming and yelling like a wounded hyena. The same is true with the—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will end with two single questions from the hon. member for Oshawa and the hon. member for Cambridge.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue.

One of my constituents, Mr. Harold Booth, purchased a 1991 Cadillac. He was rather incensed at the amount of goods and services tax he paid on the vehicle, $2,640.75.

He was infuriated when he found out through something called a national input credit formula for car dealers that the split on the goods and services tax resulted in the car dealer receiving $1,727.59 for processing the tax collection and the Government of Canada receiving $913.16.

How does the government justify a situation where a car dealer makes more money collecting taxes for the Government of Canada than it does selling the vehicle?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is incorrect, of course, as he usually is.

If he would look at the cost of vehicles prior to the elimination of the federal manufacturers' sales tax he would know that the cost of the vehicles was higher than it is with the new GST.

For the sake of a healthier and more competitive industry, not only in the automotive area but across Canada as a whole, the government had the guts to eliminate that hidden, unfair tax and replace it with an open, visible GST which has lowered the cost of automobiles for consumers in Canada.

INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister for International Trade.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association estimates provincial barriers to interprovincial trade cost Canadians $6.5 billion a year. The C.D. Howe Institute in a March 16 statement on internal trade within Canada said that provincial and territorial internal trade ministers should seize the opportunity to agree to remove internal trade barriers.

These discussions have been going around since 1986 and in my opinion there has been a tremendous lack of political will.

Could the minister or the parliamentary secretary update this House about any progress made in meetings held yesterday in Montreal concerning the dismantling of provincial trade barriers?

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to respond to my hon. friend's question.

As all members of the House will know, nobody has been more vigorously working in the direction of breaking down interprovincial barriers, as he did in bringing forward in a major way the free trade agreement and the NAFTA, than the current Minister of Industry, Science Technology and Minister for International Trade.

I am pleased to advise the House that yesterday the minister and his provincial counterparts agreed to a basis, a timetable and a negotiating process by which they will eliminate interprovincial trade barriers.

I might mention that this timetable calls for the commencement of formal negotiations no later than July 1 of this year, the completion of negotiations by June 30, 1994 and the ratification of a comprehensive agreement by June 30, 1995. This is a tremendous announcement and is greatly to the credit of the minister who has done such an excellent job in preparing the Canadian economy for growth, development, jobs and other opportunities.

• (1205)

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue has just left the House for a moment I am sure.

From this side of the House I heard him using the term "a wounded hyena" and I thought it was in reference to another member of the House. I think perhaps you might check the "blues" and if this term was used, perhaps the hon. minister would consider withdrawing it.

It is bad enough that in the heat of battle we do use terms that are sometimes uncivil, at least from my perspective. I would feel that a term, if he did use it, like "wounded hyena" describing any member of Parliament should be withdrawn.

I would ask the Chair to please look into it and if she deems it necessary, make a ruling on it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will definitely do as the hon. member asks. If the expression was used describing someone in a derogatory manner, of course, a withdrawal would be in order.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 58 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceeding.]

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

PRESENTATION OF 74TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the 74th report of the Standing Committee on House Management concerning the list of members who are to sit on the legislative committee on Bill C–102.

Pursuant to Standing Order 113(1), this report is deemed adopted once it is laid upon the table.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

PRESENTATION OF 75TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I also have the honour to present the 75th report of the Standing Committee on House Management concerning the list of members of the standing committee.

If the House agrees, I intend to move concurrence in this report later today.

ELECTORAL REFORM

FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to report from the Special Committee on Electoral Reform its fourth report. In accordance with its order of reference of Monday, March 8, 1993 your committee has considered Bill C–114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act and has agreed to report it with amendments.

The House would also like to know that the committee has ordered a reprint of Bill C–114, as amended, as a working copy for the use of the House of Commons at report stage.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–417, an act to amend the Criminal Code (gun control).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, this would be a fairly brief amendment to the Criminal code. There has been a recent interpretation which currently requires registrars of firearms to take firearms away from people who bring them in for registration and keep them for up to six months until a permanent registration certificate is issued.

This is happening in situations where most of the firearms are brought in by people who already have registered firearms. They have safe storage in their homes. These firearms would be better kept in those safe storage areas.

This would permit them to bring their guns in for examination and then take them home immediately to the safe storage situation, thus relieving some of the pressure on the Crown. Not all police stations have safe storage situations. It will be safer for society and better for the owners of guns. That is the thrust of the amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Hawkes moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

CONCURRENCE IN 75TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, if the House agrees, I move concurrence in the 75th report of the Standing Committee on House Management, which was presented to the House today.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, unfortunately I cannot give consent at this time. I would be more than happy to allow it to come forward later but there has been a breakdown in communications. I am not certain what is in it, and therefore I think it would be inappropriate for me to give consent at this time.

PETITIONS

HOUSING CO–OPERATIVES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, as you know, housing co–operatives are an affordable alternative to regular rental housing and help meet the huge demand for social housing in Canada. Unfortunately the federal budget cut 34 per cent from the projected spending on social housing in 1992 and led to the cancellation of the Co–operative Housing Program.

For these reasons, voters in the Ottawa Centre region have signed a petition urging the House of Commons to ask the government to restore the Co–operative Housing Program.

[English]

VIOLENT CRIMES

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, the petition is certified correct as to form and content.

This petition has been signed by over 2,500 constituents in Cambridge and Kitchener and relates to the fact that these people feel the majority of Canadians consistently support more severe criminal sentences for violent crimes. It asks Parliament to pass legislation establishing mandatory minimum sentences for all violent crimes which would apply uniformly across all regions of Canada.

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions on the same subject, the subject being free trade.

The first petition is from the Council of Senior Citizens organizations of British Columbia. It is opposed to the present free trade agreement with the United States and petition the House and the government not to enter into a further agreement with Mexico.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have another petition signed by a number of people, many of whom are from my riding of Port Moody and Coquitlam, British Columbia.

They ask the House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to get out of the present Canada–U.S. free trade agreement.

BILL C–113

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure today to table several petitions signed by over 1,000 people from several communities in my riding concerning Bill C–113, particularly the changes to unemployment insurance.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

CONCURRENCE IN 75TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent to move the motion that I previously moved. I would ask you to seek that consent.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Langlois: I move:

That the 75th report of the Standing Committee on House Management be concurred in.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 463 and 474.

[Text]

Question No. 463—Mr. Dingwall:

With respect to Canadian National (CN), (a) how many hectares of undeveloped land does it presently own (b) how many hectares of developed land does it presently own (c) what is the total market value of the land?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): The management of the Canadian National Railway Company advises as follows:

(a) and (b) CN as a whole has approximately 150,000 hectares of land. Most of this inventory is in rail operating use.

At CN Real Estate, the real estate business arm of Canadian National, there are approximately 14,000 hectares of undeveloped land in the inventory at the present time, of which 8,700 hectares are abandoned rights–of–way, 5,000 hectares are other rural and miscellaneous lands, and 308 hectares are development sites.

Assuming that developed land includes buildings, these buildings would be generally measured in square feet, not acres or hectares. At the present time, CN Real Estate wholly owns approximately 726,000 square feet of office buildings, multi–use properties, retail and parking structures in major markets, and has an ownership interest in an additional 3,400,000 square feet of income–producing properties.

(c) The total market value of all of CN Real Estate's land holdings and income properties is approximately $900 million.

Question No. 474—Mr. Whittaker:

With respect to the publication "Canada Moves", dated February, 1993 distributed in the Globe and Mail of February 11, 1993, (a) what is the total cost of this publication to the government, departments, agencies and Crown corporations (b) how much was paid by each department, agency and Crown corporation (c) what is the cost of advertising by each organization which appears in the publication (d) which agencies received the contracts for those ads?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): "Canada Moves" is a Toronto Globe and Mail publication (Supplement). The following corporations were invited to advertise.

The Canada Ports Corporation advises as follows:
(a) Not applicable.
(b) See (c) below.

(c) Canada Ports Corporation (including the ports of Trois-Rivières, Saguenay and Sept-Îles and the Advantage Canada Initiative) $51,7000
Montreal Port Corporation $10,200
Prince Rupert Port Corporation $5,610
Vancouver Port Corporation $10,000
Halifax Port Corporation $5,610

(d) Nil.

The management of the Canadian National Railway Company advises as follows:

(a) Not applicable. (b) $12,000. (c) Same as in (b) above. (d) CN's ad was placed through its agency, BBD Needham Worldwide.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

ERROR IN TABLE OF CONTENTS OF HANSARD

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, yesterday, my party Whip asked me to do him the favour of responding to the statement made by the Minister responsible for La Francophonie. You were there yourself and since you presided over the proceedings, you know what I am going to say.

I am sorry, but this is the third time. Under "Routine Proceedings" in the table of contents in French, La Table des Matières and Affaires courantes, my name is conspicuously absent. The Whip told me this morning that I did not do my duty yesterday, because the Official Opposition was not represented under "Routine Proceedings".

You know very well I took part in the debate, and I brought this up because it is the third time this has happened. The first time I let it pass. The second time I decided to be patient, but now, the third time, enough is enough.

I was given assurances this morning that everything would be done to prevent a recurrence, but to the many people who read Hansard and look at the table of contents first to see what might interest them, it looks like the Official Opposition was not interested in World Francophonie Day.

I am raising this point of order so that corrections will appear on Monday. I don't know how the House will do this, but I know it is possible, so that Canadians know the Official Opposition, which I represented yesterday, is indeed interested in this very important subject. Under Routine Proceedings, under the heading "World Francophonie Day", we read the names of Mrs. Vézina, Mr. Samson, Mr. Plamondon and Mr. Kindy. There was a mistake, because the list should read as follows: Mrs. Vézina, Mr. Prud'homme, Mr. Samson, Mr. Plamondon and Mr. Kindy.

Being a seasoned parliamentarian, I will not pursue the matter. I realize people make mistakes, but you will admit it is very annoying. On my twenty-ninth anniversary as a member, the proceedings were interrupted to mark that occasion, which subsequently appeared under the heading "Agriculture". If anyone wants to know exactly what was said in that debate at that time, they will have to look under "Agriculture", in which case they will never be able to read again what was said on an occasion which I must say I enjoyed very much.

I hope this will not happen again and that the machines will be supervised more carefully, since today everything is electronic.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As the hon. member just said, I presided over the proceedings when the hon. member made his speech, and a very interesting one, in connection with World Francophonie Day. At least I can give the Liberal Whip the assurance that the hon. member did make a very interesting statement yesterday in the course of this debate.

This oversight in the table of contents is annoying. I certainly realize that. And I may say I don't blame the hon. member for being not only annoyed but even angry—

Mr. Prud'homme: Not angry, just sad.

Madam Deputy Speaker: —or sad, and we will make sure the necessary corrections are made in the other editions of Hansard.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT, 1993 NO. 2

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint, as reported (without amendment) from the legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are 19 motions in amendment standing on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint.

Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for South Shore, infringes upon the financial initiative of the Crown contrary to citation 698(7) of Beauchesne's sixth edition. Therefore it is out of order and consequently will not be selected.

• (1220)

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5, standing in the name of the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, will be grouped for debate with a vote on Motion No. 2 applying to Motions Nos. 4 and 5.

[English]

Motion No. 3, standing in the name of the hon. member for South Shore, seeks to amend a statute which is not even part of the bill before the House. This is contrary to citation 698(8)(a) of Beauchesne. Therefore it is out of order and accordingly will not be selected.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 6 and 12, standing in the name of the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau, also infringe on the financial prerogative of the Crown. Therefore they are out of order and consequently will not be selected.

Motions Nos. 16, 17, 19, standing in the name of the hon. member for South Shore, will be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13 and 14, standing in the name of the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau, will be grouped for debate and voted on as follows: (a) a vote on Motion No. 7 will apply to Motions Nos. 8, 9 and 10; (b) Motion No. 11 will be voted on separately; and (c) an affirmative vote on Motion No. 13 will obviate the necessity of the question being put on Motion No. 14. A negative vote on Motion No. 13 requires the question to be put on Motion No. 14.

Motion No. 15, standing in the name of the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau, attempts to introduce a new concept into the bill and therefore is beyond its scope contrary to citation 698(1) of Beauchesne. It is out of order and accordingly will not be selected.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 16, 17, 19, standing in the name of the hon. member for South Shore, will be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 19, standing in the name of the hon. member for South Shore, is consequential to Motion No. 3 and therefore will not be selected.

I shall now propose Motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5 to the House.

Mr. Danis: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. There have been discussions among the parties and I would ask for consent to table the royal recommendation for Motion No. 1 and to allow the three Motions Nos. 1, 3 and 19 to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Following the unanimous consent which was given a second ago, I would like to give this ruling to the House and I think it is the way we should proceed.

Motions Nos. 1, 3 and 19, standing in the name of the hon. member for South Shore, together with Motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5, standing in the name of the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, will be grouped for debate and voted upon as follows:

A vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 3 and 19. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 1 will obviate the necessity of putting the question on Motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5. A negative vote on Motion No. 1 will necessitate the question being put on Motion No. 2. The vote on Motion No. 2 will apply to Motions Nos. 4 and 5.

• (1225)

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the indulgence of the Chair. The ruling you have offered to us will allow very clearly for a vote on matters relating to transportation in Atlantic Canada. That is the vote on Motions Nos. 1, 3 and 19.

By obviating the need for a vote on Motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5, you prevent this House from having a separate vote on a matter directly related to western Canada, i.e., the Western Grain Transportation Act.

I am wondering if the House will agree to have a separate vote. We accept the grouping for debate, but ask for a separate vote on the clauses dealing with the Western Grain Transportation Act which are clauses 15 and 16. That would be Motions Nos. 4 and 5.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will put to the House a different possibility of applying the votes. I hope this will be agreeable to all parties.

The motions are still grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 3 and 19. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 1 will obviate the necessity of putting the question on Motion No. 2. A negative vote on Motion No. 1 will necessitate the question being put on Motion No. 2. The vote on Motion No. 4 will apply to Motion No. 5.

Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-113 be amended in Clause 14

(a) by striking out line 23 at page 6 and substituting the following:

"be twenty-eight and one-half per cent for preferred move-"; and

(b) by striking out line 31 at page 6 and substituting the following:

"twenty-eight and one-half per cent rate."

• (1230)

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-113 be amended by deleting Clause 14.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade) moved:

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-113 be amended

(a) by adding immediately after line 31 at page 6 the following new clause:

"Maritime Freight Rates Act

15. Section 5 of the Maritime Freight Rates Act is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (c) thereof, by adding the word "and" at the end of paragraph (d) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph:

(e) movements of used household goods and movements of scrap and waste material"; and

(b) by renumbering the subsequent clauses and any cross-references thereto accordingly.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-113 be amended by deleting Clause 15.

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-113 be amended by deleting Clause 16.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade) moved:

Motion No. 19.

That Bill C-113 be amended in Clause 28 by striking out line 8 at page 13 and substituting the following:

"(4) Sections 14 and 15 shall come into".

He said: Madam Speaker, I would like to speak to the amendments I have put forward and begin by thanking my hon. friends opposite for their co-operation, particularly those in the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party who participated in the legislative committee on Bill C-113, in allowing these amendments to come before the House. I would like to apologize and thank Your Honour and the Table for the difficult procedural challenge I presented with these amendments as they have come forward.

These amendments are extremely important to the manufacturing sector in Atlantic Canada and members of the Atlantic Transportation Commission who first brought forward their necessity to the legislative committee on Bill C-113 and indeed the government.

The reduction in subsidies introduced in the December economic statement of the Minister of Finance would have cut the subsidies provided under the Maritime Freight Rates Act and the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act by 10 per cent.

Shortly thereafter the Atlantic Transportation Commission on behalf of manufacturers in Atlantic Canada approached the government. As business people they respected and appreciated the government's deficit control efforts and wished to support the government in its deficit control efforts. Their request was that instead of an across the board reduction in the subsidies they would prefer a selective application of the subsidies that would be more in tune with the concept for which these statutes were initiated in the first place.

I might remind the House briefly that these programs came about going back to the Duncan commission on maritime claims in 1926, after which the Maritime Freight Rates Act was brought in. Those statutes respond to the National Transportation Act in its intention and recognition of transportation as a key to regional economic development and commercial viability.

In Atlantic Canada manufacturers and producers are in effect price takers rather than price setters in the marketplace. As such they must generally absorb all or a major part of outbound transportation, particularly when selling into central and western Canada.

The Maritime Freight Rates Act and the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act provide a reduction in freight rates for the movement of commodities that have been manufactured or produced in Atlantic Canada. That in effect makes it more possible for Atlantic Canadian manufacturers to be competitive in the larger markets of central Canada.

What has been brought forward in the proposals encapsulated in this set of amendments would see, rather than 10 per cent across the board, no change in the basic subsidy for the selective westbound; in the basic westbound, a 5 per cent reduction and in the inter-regional, a 10 per cent reduction. Household goods would be eliminated from the basic westbound. Scrap and waste materials would be eliminated from the basic westbound. At the same time during the first year of the program there would be data collected with a view to making further modifications next year.

It is important to say that members of the House, in having amendments before them for discussion, are hearing what has been said to government, indeed to all parties, by Atlantic businessmen and manufacturers. It is going to be beneficial. It brings those two statutes back to their original purposes in terms of supporting manufacturing enterprises. I am sure it will be very well greeted by the business community in Atlantic Canada and the people whose jobs depend on those manufacturing enterprises.

I thank the House and strongly recommend the support of these amendments by all members.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I suspect some members were caught by surprise by the brevity of the hon. member's speech.

I rise today to oppose the contents of this bill, having put forward motions that specifically would delete the clauses to reduce subsidies under the Western Grain Transportation Act and subsidies under the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act.

The government has brought in a modification of the bill based on its consultation with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission. We on this side of the House facilitated the government getting unanimous consent in order to undo some of the damage being wrought with this bill.

I want to make very clear that we will vote against the government amendment. Although it makes a very bad bill slightly better, we are against the elimination of across the board subsidies to Atlantic Canada just as we are against the 10 per cent reduction of federal funding going to the Western Grain Transportation Act which is designed to ensure that our farmers on the prairies can afford to ship their grains to export markets.

Let us not fool ourselves. This is not just an exercise in deficit reduction. This is not just an exercise of down loading to the provinces or the municipalities. When it comes to the section of the Western Grain Transportation Act we are down loading into the pockets of the farmers. This is not a reduction in the rates charged by the railways. This is a reduction in the amount of money used to offset the cost to the producer.

Whether it is $1, $2, or $3 a tonne, that money has to come out of the pockets of farmers who have already been bled dry because of the price of grain around the world, thanks to the Americans and the Europeans in terms of the subsidy war. It costs a lot of farmers more to produce grain than what they get when they sell it. The government has decided to put more onus on those farmers to pick up the cost.

I am wondering what all this is about. It has to do with a law that was passed on September 28, 1988. It is called Public Law 100–449, entitled U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement. I want to quote from an interesting section of it. It is section 304 that deals with negotiations regarding certain sectors' biannual reports. Referring to the President of the United States it says: "(a) in general and (2) as an exercise of the foreign relations powers of the President under the Constitution, the President will enter into immediate consultations with the Government of Canada to obtain the exclusion from the transportation rates established under Canada's Western Grain Transportation Act of agricultural goods that originate in Canada and are shipped by east coast ports for consumption in the United States".

How much of the free trade agreement agenda is found in Bill C–113? Certainly my colleagues will argue that the whole question of the cuts to UI does nothing more than parallel what is available in a number of our competitor States today.

Obviously the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission has been successful in convincing the government that there is a better way to make these cuts. I give it credit for coming forward and taking a look at some of the elements in the current legislation that perhaps skew things in Atlantic Canada.

For example, the provision that scrap metal can be subsidized means that it is cheaper to send scrap metal to Hamilton or Sault Ste. Marie than it is for the metal to go to Sysco in Cape Breton. That does not make sense.

The subsidy for household goods is used primarily by federal employees who are being reimbursed by the government in any case to move their household goods from Atlantic Canada when they are transferred back across the country, whether it is DND, the RCMP or whatever.

Those things make sense. I understand why the APTC put them forward to get a reduction and more power to the commission, but I want to ask the government where the same consideration was for federal public servants who were told that they were having their wages restricted as a means of helping the government's deficit plan. Did the government sit down with them and work out a way in which perhaps money could be saved? There was not one discussion.

What about the unemployed who are being hammered by this bill? The unemployed who for whatever reason have to quit a job without having another one to go to are to be denied UI benefits entirely. Did this government sit down with those people and say: "Is there a better way?" Did it even ask: "If we put you back to work, will that help the deficit?" Of course it will. Those are areas my colleagues will pursue as they participate in this debate.

I want to return to the Western Grain Transportation Act. If the government was legitimately concerned about the act and the manner in which the funding is offered, it would recognize, as the Standing Committee on Transport did, that there are some imbalances in the act. It does not treat both directions in the same way. It does not provide assistance to the marine sector to take the grain that comes to the port of Thunder Bay and move it to an export position in the St. Lawrence River.

The transport committee has recommended that on an interim basis the marine component be covered. That will stimulate the economy in eastern Canada because right now we are in danger of not having enough ships to move the crops from western Canada. The reality is that the west coast is plugged. One more bushel of grain cannot be moved through Prince Rupert or Vancouver. None of us want grain being moved through Seattle because we want the jobs to stay in Canada. If we do not act and provide for a better balance we are not going to have enough ships on the Great Lakes. We are not going to have enough people left in Thunder Bay to handle the grain, clean it, weigh it and trans-ship it. As a nation we are in danger of losing our ability to be flexible. The same arguments can be made for Churchill as well.

What the government is doing now by cutting the Western Grain Transportation Act is saying to the seaway: "No, we are not going to give you any more money. We are not going to help you out. We are going to let you go down the tubes". At the same time it is saying to the farmers: "We lied to you years ago when we passed this act".

• (1245)

The Liberals passed the Western Grain Transportation Act, and the Tories have not bothered to deal with its inequities. They were saying at the time: "Trust us. Do not worry, it is in the law. It cannot be changed. The formula is firm". We have just proven that it is not firm. The government arbitrarily cuts 10 per cent and attacks the farmers at the same time, both in terms of the next two or three years by making them pay more for their transportation and also by sending them a signal that the Western Grain Transportation Act is up for grabs.

Certainly the United States would like us to get rid of it. My sense is that this government would like us to get rid of it, because of this warped sense that we have to get rid of the deficit.

We do not necessarily disagree with getting rid of the deficit and bringing it down to a manageable level, but we do disagree with doing it by attacking people. That is not the way. We need to put more money in the hands of people so they can get out there and buy consumer goods, create jobs and therefore create new taxpayers.

This is true for the bill itself in its entirety, but these three clauses in particular are going to undermine the fabric of this country. We on this side, my caucus, have no choice but to propose the kind of amendments that I have put forward to eliminate the clause that reduces the Western Grain Transportation Act by 10 per cent and to eliminate the clause that reduces in any way the freight subsidy in Atlantic Canada. We need to protect those areas of subsidy because in doing so we are protecting the regions and we are protecting the people.

For the government to bring forward this kind of legislation shows quite frankly that it does not care any more. It does not care about Atlantic Canada. It does not care about the unemployed. It does not care about western Canada. It does not care about any part of this country.

Therefore I am going to continue to oppose this bill, as will my colleagues. I am pleased that the member for Regina—Lumsden was able to second my motion, because of anybody in this House he is not only the most knowledgeable member on transportation but the strongest defender of the prairie farmers and the most vociferous opponent of the kind of cuts that we are seeing here today.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I am happy that the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission was able to talk a little sense into the government as this bill was passing through the committee and achieve the modest relief that is represented in the amendment.

The commission is fighting a losing battle and it has been, along with other transportation groups in Atlantic Canada, for the last several years this government has been in power. In Atlantic Canada we are seeing, through other legislation, the erosion of subsidies to grain producers and grain consumers in Atlantic Canada, as well as an erosion of the transportation infrastructure generally in Atlantic Canada.

This has been the legacy of this Conservative government. It is one that has been very much on the minds of industries that use transportation services, be it to bring grain or other products in from central Canada or to send our own products such as food products, pulp and paper and our basic resources across Atlantic Canada and through the rail system and the road network out to market elsewhere in Canada and the United States.

This may be a small victory, and I would certainly respect the ability of the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission to speak on behalf of transporters in Atlantic Canada. It has proven itself in other instances to be a responsible advocate of the transportation industry in Atlantic Canada. It is certainly willing to work within the confines of legislation that is put before it.

Certainly this legislation does very little to enhance the ability of our industry, producers and consumers in Atlantic Canada to receive a level playing field when it comes to east-west transportation. The amendment before us does not exonerate the bill itself, which we continue to oppose.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I have a feeling of déjà vu. I have a feeling we have been here before, between 1980 and 1984 when the Liberals abolished the Crows Nest Pass freight rate agreement of 1897 and implemented the Western Grain Transportation Act over my objections and the objections of my colleagues and major farm organizations.

It got to the point where the prairie wheat pools reluctantly accepted the abolishing of that rate and the increased freight rates for grain producers. It reluctantly accepted those changes because of the guarantee of a basic rail network, the guarantee of a sufficient supply of grain cars and the guarantee that the Government of Canada would continue to pay its share of the freight rates under the Western Grain Transportation Act.

This bill proposes to reduce the government's share of the cost of moving that grain by 10 per cent, which means that the difference will have to be picked up by farmers.

Ever since 1984 the grain producers of western Canada have been paying an ever-increasing amount of the cost of moving grain. In 1986-87 their share was $5.97 a tonne. For 1991-92 it had almost doubled to $11.07 a tonne. For the current year it will be $14.12 a tonne. That is an almost threefold increase in the farmers' share of the cost of moving grain, while grain prices have been steadily dropping since the 1980-81 crop year. They have gone down almost every single year.

The prairie wheat pools, representing 100,000 grain producers in the three prairie provinces, made it clear that it does not like, does not accept and does not agree with this provision in the bill. It says that its concern about the expenditure cuts legislation lies in the section that deals with a 10 per cent cut to the assistance paid by the federal government under the Western Grain Transportation Act.

The WGTA was implemented in 1984 under the Liberal government and with reluctant support by the Tories, or at least they said they were reluctant. Prairie farmers reluctantly gave up fixed freight rates and accepted increasing freight costs in exchange for a guarantee of service from the railways and a commitment of a constant amount of assistance from the federal government. This assistance, the Crow benefit, was set up in perpetuity in the Western Grain Transportation Act.

• (1255)

The Tories have done it again. They have even brought an end to perpetuity. It was only on the condition that the prairie grain producers had this guarantee in perpetuity that they reluctantly went along with the abolishing of the Crows Nest Pass freight rates.

If this is not a betrayal, if this is not going back on the word of the Government of Canada, of the Parliament of Canada, then I do not know what is.

I want to say to the Minister of Supply and Services that he can inform his four colleagues from Saskatchewan that not a damned one of them is going to be back here. There will be no Tories from Saskatchewan, just as there are no Liberals from Saskatchewan. Both parties are going to be wiped out because of what they did from 1980 to 1984 and what they are doing again now.

An hon. member: We have no money to spend on it.

Mr. Benjamin: If the hon. member knew what a bushel of wheat looked like if it hit him in the face I would be prepared to listen to him. He can get up and make his own speech later.

The United States Congress is proposing to authorize the President of the United States to disallow grain moving from Canada to the United States under the Western Grain Transportation Act for United States consumption. If that is not a direct interference in the internal affairs, sovereignty and independence of Canada then I do not know what is.

The government has taken action, to its credit, to intervene and prevent the American government from making American subsidiaries obey United States' law in Canada. The government put a stop to that kind of interference. It damn well has to put a stop to this kind of interference as well.

The equalized grain rates, the subsidized grain rates, are meant to put Canadian grain producers in an even position, a level playing field—the Tories want to call everything a level playing field. What the hell is the use of having a level playing field if the other guy has the ball on our 10-yard line all the time?

The average haul for Canadian grain producers is over 900 miles, for American producers it is about 700 miles, and for producers in Australia and Argentina it is under 200 miles. In order to have equal competition with grain-exporting countries we devised a freight rate system that put our grain producers in the Canadian Wheat Board in a position in which they could compete. Now the government wants the farmers to pick up some more of the tab.

It is kicking them when they are down. I guess that is the way the Tories fight, that is the way they govern. They kick them when they are down.

We warned about this in the period from 1980 to 1984 when the Liberals were in power. We told them what would happen. They pooh-poohed us, would not believe us. Railway companies would not believe us and declared they would not be doing the things we said they would. They have done it. The railways are now applying to abandon even some of those rail lines that are guaranteed in the basic network until the year 2000. So much for their guarantees. So much for the government's guarantees. So much for the government's law that says that these are guaranteed in perpetuity.

Any benefit we were getting out of the Western Grain Transportation Act, supposedly in perpetuity, supposedly with guarantees, is being wiped out with a stroke of a pen by this government.

• (1300)

I do not understand why it has to do this. The impact it will have on the deficit is negligible. But the impact it will have on grain producers to the tune of about an additional $2 per tonne will be $2 per tonne less that they will spend in their communities. It will be be $2 a tonne less that they will spend on buying farm machinery which is manufactured in eastern Canada; $2 a tonne less to survive.

While thousands and thousands of our grain producers over the last several years have gone bankrupt and lost land that had been in their hands for three and four generations, the Tories, the Liberals, the press and free enterprise call it a recession.

In some respect what they are going through in western Canada right now is a depression and in some respect it is worse than what the grain farmers experienced in the dirty thirties. Tory times are tough times. Tory times and Liberal times are dirty times like the dirty thirties. It is time to put a stop to this.

We must not allow this to happen to our grain producers again. Enough is enough. I hope that hon. members will see that this has to be stopped. I hope that the Liberals will be willing to admit the errors of their ways and that they were wrong between 1980 and 1984.

Now they are opposing this kind of measure. They did not then. I hope that they will admit the errors of their ways and confess their sins of omission and commission. Vote for this amendment. I hope government members, particularly those of the three prairie provinces, will think twice before they vote for this kind of legislation.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden, who is a very senior and very distinguished member of this House, has made some rather silly statements in his speech. Frankly I was very very surprised.

I know that he is something of an elder statesman in this House and will not mind me referring to him as such. He has indicated he is not going to run in the next election. No doubt the House will miss him.

What I was surprised at was his outrageous suggestion that somehow because there were no Liberals in Saskatchewan at the moment, there would not be any after the next election. I suspect that he knows as well as I do that the people of Saskatchewan have woken to the reality that things have not worked properly for them, either under a Conservative government, which we all acknowledge and he will agree with me has been a disaster for this country, and of course for his province with an NDP government. The Devine government was anything but divine for the people of Saskatchewan.

He had a further difficulty in that he suggested that somehow the NDP provincial government in that province had changed things around. It had a budget yesterday that changed things around all right. It is a change from the Tories, I agree, but it behaved just like the federal Tories.

A little while ago in Question Period, the minister was making some comment.

An hon. member: Point of order.

Mr. Milliken: If the hon. member has a point she can get on her feet and raise it.

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I think it would be nice if the hon. member would address the amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is a smart idea.

Mr. Milliken: It is a brilliant idea, Madam Speaker. I am doing that. I am simply responding to the hon. member's speech. He was making these comments during his speech. I am replying to the comment because I want to set the record straight. I did not want Canadians to feel that perhaps things were not accurately stated in this House.

Aside from his statement that this New Democratic government was doing the right thing, we had a budget that one of the ministers in Question Period was praising today because he said it was exactly the same kind of budget that the government had been introducing in this House all these years. I point it out to the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam who just raised this issue on a point of order that NDP governments behave just like Tory governments. They say one thing in opposition but they act just the opposite when they get in office.

• (1305)

For the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden to sit here and suggest that somehow our actions are the same as the government's is frankly outrageous. Our party is supporting this amendment. We have indicated our support for the amendment. We are voting for it as he has indicated he is going to vote for it and we do support the amendment.

In case he was not clear on that, he seemed to have some inability to grasp, but we do support it and speakers on this side of the House have previously said that.

I urge him to bear in mind that we are. I urge him to speak to his colleagues in the NDP and suggest that perhaps they join the Liberal tide in Saskatchewan so they can get elected because I fear as he must that come the election there will not be any NDPers left in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, British Columbia or anywhere else in this country.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I am rising on the amendment. I want to say that the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden has not lost any of his fire over the years he has served in this House. It is always a treat to hear him.

I want to speak to the amendment and to the reasons this government is bringing forward the changes to the Crow rate. These reasons affect not just the prairies but also the west coast. They affect the grain workers in British Columbia. They also affect railway workers.

Last year the railway bypassed British Columbia, bypassed the Vancouver grain terminals and shipped Canadian grain to Seattle. They shipped that grain to Seattle for trans-shipment overseas on a trial basis. The trial failed. Seattle grain terminals were not clean. They were full of pesticides. They were full of rodents. The terminals were filthy.

At a port of destination, Canadian grain, which has always had a reputation for being of the highest standard in the world was found to be unacceptable and certainly not up to its normal standards. This bypassing of the grain terminals in British Columbia was abandoned. The trial did not work.

It is passing strange that this proposal to cut the Crow rate comes on the heels of this experiment. One would not want to presuppose that this government would be at all mischievous nor would one want to presuppose that this government was even so together as to be able to come at an issue from a number of fronts at the same time.

Here we have a trial run to bypass grain terminals in British Columbia with the railway, affecting grain and railway workers. Then we have a proposal, a piece of legislation introduced in the House to cut the Crow rate. Now the grain and railway workers in British Columbia have been advised that there are discussions going on to develop a north-south transportation route for grain. Guess where the terminals are going to be. The terminals are going to be in Mexico.

Is it not funny that this government is racing to ram through a North American free trade agreement? It is not just all the other jobs we have been talking about fleeing Canada and going to Mexico, now we are talking about Canadian grain going through Mexican terminals to other ports of entry.

This is the rumour and believe me the workers are worried. They have not been able to verify all of it but they certainly have a lot of bits of information that lead both the grain and railway workers to believe that is the intent of this government.

If this is the plan of the government not only are we facing cuts in Crow rates and other impacts on the other industries in British Columbia, we are now facing Canadian railway workers being bypassed for American railway workers and Canadian grain workers being bypassed for Mexican grain workers.

Here we will have a situation.

• (1310)

We have no control over the cleanliness of the terminals. We just heard today during Question Period that it is a proven fact and the Mexicans are admitting that they have no control over the environment, no control at all over how many or what kind of pesticides would be used in those terminals in Mexico.

Put all these little pieces together and you start to see a picture of deceit and collusion and funny-headed thinking about what is good for Canada.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan said: "If the Government of Canada could negotiate with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission for a better way to cut freight subsidies why, I would ask you, could it not negotiate with the Canadian public sector workers for a better way to cut costs than to freeze their wages arbitrarily as it is doing in this bill?"

Here we have a government which took the time to negotiate with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Committee for a better way to cut freight subsidies and then arbitrarily introduced legislation to freeze public sector workers' wages. The government has a legislative responsibility to negotiate with them.

It brings in a piece of legislation and says: "Here it is, no wage increase for you folks for two years. We are off negotiating with other people; we do not have time to negotiate with you".

I would suggest that again we see in this bill on three counts this government abrogating its responsibility to Canadians: a responsibility to Canadian workers to negotiate their wages; the responsibility to the west and the jobs in the west, to negotiate Crow rate changes, not arbitrarily implement then, but negotiate them as they did with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission.

The third is to arbitrarily kick the heck out of unemployed workers in this country who have no control over what the government has done to this economy.

I very much appreciate the opportunity to put these issues before the people of Canada and I hope the government will rethink this bill, particularly as it comes to the Crow rate prior to this bill being put to a vote.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to take part in this debate. It is possible that we should actually consider debate on this amendment today to be the Les Benjamin memorial debate because for those of us who were not part of the House of Commons before 1984, there is a legend which exists.

That is the legend of the great Crow debate, the legend which led to New Democrat members from every conceivable constituency across Canada standing up to speak out in favour of the Crow benefit for western farmers.

I will tell you that the legend lives in our caucus. There are people who have never seen a field of wheat, who have never been to Saskatchewan, who made passionate speeches during that debate. They made passionate speeches because of the leadership which the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden gave to our caucus at that stage.

This is the last term which that member will be here as part of our caucus, unfortunately.

I want, as I start my comments on this, to pay tribute to his contribution over the years to the New Democratic Party. I also want to tell people across this country that debate and that fight took place at a time when the New Democratic Party was down in the polls. In fact, it took place at at time when we were much lower in the polls than we presently are. It was one of the key ingredients that demonstrated yet again to the people of Canada that there is one party that will stand up for average Canadians. There is one party which will fight on behalf of people who are not privileged, who are not rich, people who have been picked on and betrayed throughout their history. That has been the New Democratic Party. That will continue to be the New Democratic Party.

• (1315)

The fight that the member for Regina—Lumsden led back in 1984 and which has passed into the history and traditions of our caucus will be something which will continually be a source of inspiration to all of us who are part of this caucus.

Some members in the Liberal Party say this is an example of the New Democratic Party defending the status quo. Let me suggest it is an example of the New Democratic Party defending solemn promises made to the people of this country. I know that is something that neither the Conservatives nor the Liberals understand, the notion of a solemn promise made by a government to the people.

The Liberal Party made a solemn promise to the people in western Canada that the Crow rate would exist forever. It is not surprising because it was a return for tremendous benefits, tremendous handouts given to the Canadian Pacific Railway. This was a tremendous giveaway in terms of tax, in terms of land, in terms of privileges of every sort. In return for that the Crow benefit was to be maintained in place forever, a sacred promise which the Liberals broke.

It was a sacred promise which they broke when they brought in the Western Grain Transportation Act, the WGTA. That too, though it broke a sacred promise, offered a new sacred promise, that there would be benefits paid to the railways to keep the rates for grain transportation down in the future for all western grain transported in perpetuity. It was a sacred promise.

The Liberals broke one sacred promise but offered another. The Conservatives raged against that broken promise of the Liberals in 1984. I hope I am not mistaken. I suspect they stood up beside the member for Regina—Lumsden and said: "It is terrible that the Conservatives have to stand up for these promises that the Liberal Party is so abjectly breaking". Today we have this same Conservative Party breaking that further sacred promise and making things even worse for the people who produce and sell grain from western Canada.

How much of this damage is going to be inflicted on western farmers? The estimated reduction in transportation subsidies is estimated at $73 million for 1993–94; $104 million in 1994–95.

• (1320)

The retiring president of the National Farmers' Union has estimated that for western farmers it means an increase in transportation costs and therefore a reduction in the amount of money which they will receive for their grain of from $2 to $2.50 per tonne. That is a major bite at a time when all of us in the House of Commons know that western farmers are being hammered. They are being hit as never before, with the possible exception of the 1930s.

In the 1930s it could be put down to problems with weather, at least in part. What is hitting farmers in western Canada now is damage which is inflicted by the policies of the United States with respect to the massive subsidies for grain exports which it has put into place.

Once again in the House of Commons there is just one party standing up and saying that the broken promises of the Liberals in 1984 deserve to be remembered and the broken promises of the Conservatives in 1993 deserve to be remembered.

We are talking about a betrayal of faith, which is being carried out at a time when the farming population is on its knees and the economic conditions for farmers in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta are as devastating and desperate as they have ever been.

I cannot understand the heartlessness with which these promises have been broken. I cannot understand the lack of compassion and economic sense which is involved in breaking these promises because everybody who analyses the history economically knows that when our farm communities in western Canada have done well, this country has done well.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the chance to put these comments on the record. I hope the government will accept some of our amendments to eliminate some of the broken promises that it intends to put in place with respect to the WGTA.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I want to add a point in the debate regarding western transportation, the original Crow rate and the subsequent western grain rate that replaced it.

I want to explain why, as a person with no direct contact with grain farming in the west or even in Ontario, I feel very strongly on this point, along with the rest of the NDP.

I grew up thinking that I was growing up in an agricultural country, a country that produced food to feed its people and even food to sell to the rest of the world. In the last few years I have begun to wonder when I found that farmers are being forced off the land. It happened when I was a kid during the depression. It happened partly because of a massive drought in the west and also because, as one old farmer said to me bitterly, they were selling their beef at one cent a pound in the depression.

But it is happening again without massive drought, without a world-wide depression of the same sort, but with something like a depression, with deliberate restructuring of the economy of North America and other places by a few very powerful companies such as Cargill. These companies have great power to influence the decisions of government in their favour.

• (1325)

It is no longer certain that the land of Canada will feed the people of Canada. That might sound fantastic and ridiculous but for 15 years I have grown concerned about that when I learned Canada was exporting more and more beef cattle and hogs, and importing more and more sides of meat from as far away as Australia.

I began to wonder if we would lose the ability for Canadians to feed Canadians. Then I thought of what I had read about Cuba. In the 1950s in Cuba children starved. They died very young from lack of food because the good agricultural land produced one crop, sugar. Sugar was sold abroad to make rich the few people who controlled the sugar industry and to pay starvation wages to the Cuban people who worked to produce it.

That situation has changed. For the last 30 years Cuba has moved toward producing its own food. It should always have done that but it took a revolution by the Cuban people to bring in a government which would make it possible for Cuban people to use Cuban land to feed the people.

Mexico is a closer example. In the last 10 or 12 years the Mexican people have been eating less food. The consumption of food in Mexico has decreased by one-third. They eat only two-thirds as much food as they used to eat around 1980. This is not because the population has shrunk, if anything it has grown. But they eat less food.

One-third of the food they do eat is imported. What went before that was the gradual year by year destruction of the family farm, the campesino. The ejido, the communal lands protected by the Constitution, enabled a large number of Mexican campesino or farmers to produce the corn, rice, and beans they needed, plus a little over to sell to the people in the cities.

Those people are being forced off their land by changes in the Constitution brought about by Salinas at the direction of international capital so that the farmers will be pushed off their land. The Government of Mexico has reduced the subsidies to the farmers for irrigation, herbicides, pesticides and farm equipment. They can no longer compete with imported corn.

Corn grown in Iowa in the United States sells in Mexico for less than the price that the campecinos must charge in order to live because the United States subsidizes Iowa corn at $12 billion per year. This is more than the whole budget of the department of agriculture in Mexico.

• (1330)

Those farmers are being forced off their land in Mexico. Farmers are being forced off their land in Canada. It is not by drought or world-wide depression, but by the decisions of large corporations and by the decision of this government. This government is forcing farmers off their land by reducing the possibility of farmers being paid what it costs to produce and sell wheat. It is forcing them to leave the land.

The beneficiary will be the great American-based corporations such as Cargill that will take over the land as corporation farms. Then they will be able to raise the price of wheat, flour and bread to anything they please in Canada. They will control the supplies in Canada. They will control the supplies that we can import from the United States or anywhere else. They will be able to push the price of basic food in Canada sky-high.

This government through legislation like this is giving them the opportunity to do this. This government is giving away the birthright of Canadians. It is giving away the control of our best farm land by raising the transportation costs the farmers must pay.

This government signed an unequal treaty with the United States which says that the United States can subsidize the Mississippi transportation system to 100 per cent and take Canadian grain down to New Orleans. But Canada cannot subsidize the transportation of grain through Canada to the west coast or the east coast.

One simple little gimmick does it. It is because the United States treats the Mississippi as a military installation, maintained by the U.S. Army Engineering Corps and therefore a subsidy is not a subsidy. However, Canada is prevented from doing anything similar.

It is clearly the United States which has directed the Government of Canada to introduce this disastrous law. It will have the effect of destroying a great many more family farms in Canada. Eventually Canadians will pay intolerable prices for the flour and bread produced. The price will be controlled from outside Canada by companies that have no interest in whether Canadian farmers can farm or whether Canadians can eat.

Shame on this government.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to debate this very important topic. The member from Trinity—Spadina eloquently pinned it down in his speech. What we are talking about is the cost of food and the supply of food.

What could be more important? What could be more important to a country with a traditional agricultural past like Canada has? What could be more important for a country than to be independent?

I know the independence of this country is slipping away. People sense that. That is the problem the Conservatives are going to have in their leadership campaign. It will come up in their attempt to hang onto office. They are not going to make it because they have basically been giving away this country piece by piece and people sense that. People want new policies to protect Canada.

An hon. member: Liberal policies.

Mr. Waddell: My friend says Liberal policies. No, not Liberal policies because in this very issue talking about the Crow rate and transportation rates, I was in the House when the Liberals brought in the changes. They started it. I remember that debate well.

The member for Essex—Windsor paid tribute to one of our great colleagues here in the House, the member for Regina—Lumsden. I recall his leading us; he was leading the pack. We started as a dishevelled pack but ended up being pretty effective at the end of that debate. I vividly recall the debate and I recall the contribution of the member for Regina—Lumsden. He led the debate and taught me at the time a little bit about farm economics. For someone who represents a suburban riding in British Columbia that was important. There were a lot of details about the Crow rate. We went through all the details, up and down the details.

• (1335)

The thing that sticks in my mind is basically what the member for Trinity—Spadina was getting at. The member for Trinity—Spadina represents an urban riding, right downtown. What he was getting at is that we people from urban and suburban ridings have to understand that it is important to protect the family farm and farmers in Canada. If we do not it will mean in the long run that people from outside this country will control our farms and the price of our food. We cannot really have an independent country if we have that.

Before I leave the dastardly deeds of the previous Liberal government which started this problem, I did want to pay tribute, as the member from Windsor did, to my retiring colleague, the member for Regina—Lumsden, for his leadership in this issue and in other issues in this House, especially transportation issues. We used to call him "Boxcar Benjamin". That was a term of endearment because he would raise the railway issues all the time. They were important issues.

People will say to us: "New Democrats, the world is changing. It is a global economy. You cannot protect the status quo. You cannot do these things". At first it sounds good that it is a new global economy and we have to make changes in the old way Canada was operating. However, there is a limit to what those changes could be.

If we get rid of the family farm for big, corporate, foreign-controlled farms, we are not going to have control over future farming in Canada. People will say to someone on the west coast and this is happening now in the Port of Vancouver: "Well, we are just going to let some of that grain go down to Seattle or we will let some goods that are being shipped be picked up by trucks south of Alberta or south of British Columbia and connect it through that way. We will make it cheaper to go that way". Many of my constituents depend on the Port of Vancouver. Gradually what will happen is that those of us who depend on that port will see it decline. The lesson is this talk of: "Well, it is all in the global economy".

As the member for Trinity—Spadina pointed out, the Americans are subsidizing the Mississippi route, giving $12 billion to their farmers, more than the entire budget of the poor Mexican department of agriculture. Let us get into the real world and forget the propaganda.

In the real world one has to fight for survival and that is why Canada has been a great country. The Conservatives under Sir John A. Macdonald, a man for whom I might have even voted, he being a Scotsman, a lawyer, a good speaker and besides, the New Democratic Party was not around in 1867, had a national vision of Canada. He had a national policy. The policy was to link the east and the west. This government is de-linking it, making it north and south. Eventually it is going to join Canada with the United States. That is the agenda. That is the corporate agenda, to sell the country out so we will no longer have a country.

People wonder why NDP members get up and fight these battles. It is because we love Canada. We are getting into these fights in this battle over changes in the transportation subsidies and in the way we deal with our farmers in Canada.

• (1340)

People ask: "Why are you standing up to support the Canadian farmer? You are from the west coast". My answer is that the fate of my constituents on the west coast is tied to the fate of the Canadian farmers. Their survival is tied to the survival of my constituents and their jobs.

The New Democratic Party is the only party so far in this coming election to have put forward a job creation strategy. It is out there for everybody to see.

People are now focusing on a Conservative leadership on personalities or on the Liberals and personalities. I have been through one of those leadership campaigns. I challenge the members in the leadership to put out some policy so all Canadians can see it. Bill Clinton did that when he ran for President of the United States. He actually put out some policy. He said to people—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to know what that has to do with this bill.

Mr. Waddell: I was getting to that. I am glad you asked that question, Mr. Speaker.

What it has to do with this bill is our attack on the provisions of this bill in withdrawing the transportation subsidies. I suggest that people look at these notes from the National Farmers' Union. The changes in this bill would be phased in commencing August 1, 1994 over a four-year period by increasing the farmers' share of grain freight rates by $5 a tonne annually for three years and bringing farmers to payment of full compensatory rates in the fourth year.

In fact, what the government intends to do is break the promise and trust of the farmers. It is going to break the family farm. It is going to attack those on the west coast in the Port of Vancouver and the transportation system there.

We in the New Democratic Party say no. There is an alternative. We have an alternative economic policy and we have an alternate transportation policy. We hope that this House and Canadians will look at these policies as a real alternative to this government which is selling out Canada and will destroy this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 4. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will be please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I wonder if you would have the name of the member for Mission—Coquitlam as a seconder of those motions of the member for Timmins—Chapleau.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Those motions of the member for Timmins—Chapleau will be seconded by the member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau) moved:

Motion No. 9.

That Bill C–113 be amended in Clause 18 by adding immediately after line 32 at page 8 the following:

"(5) A claimant is not disqualified from receiving benefits under this Part unless the Commission establishes, beyond any reasonable doubt, that the claimant had no just cause under subsection (4) for leaving the claimant's employment."

Motion No. 10.

That Bill C–113 be amended in Clause 18 by adding immediately after line 32 at page 8 the following:

Motion No. 11.

That Bill C–113 be amended in Clause 19

"ing of a disqualification under section 27 or 28".

Motion No. 13.

That Bill C–113 be amended in Clause 20 by striking out lines 32 to 46 at page 9 and lines 1 to 17 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor:

"disqualification is for such weeks for which benefit would otherwise be payable following the claimant's waiting period as are determined pursuant to subsection (2).

(2) The number of weeks of a disqualification under section 28 shall be:

(a) for a first disqualification, not less than seven nor more than twelve, as determined by the Commission;

(b) for a second disqualification, twelve; and

(c) for any subsequent disqualification, fifty–two."

Motion No. 14.

That Bill C–113 be amended in Clause 20 by striking out lines 3 to 16 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor:

"tial claim for benefit, the weeks of insurable employment before the week in which the event giving rise to the disqualification occurs, and the weeks of insurable employment in any employment that the claimant loses, after the event, shall be used for the purposes of subsection 6(2) or (3).

(5) The weeks of insurable employment mentioned in subsection (4) shall be used for the purposes of sub–".

He said: Mr. Speaker, the intention of this bill is that as a result of the Minister of Finance's economic statement, the Minister of Employment and Immigration will bring the expenditures of the bill under control. This is something that I very strenuously differ with. The expenditures of the Unemployment Insurance Commission are out of control, not as a result of the unemployed but as a result of the economic policies of this government.

The purpose of my amendments is to attempt to bring some sensitivity and some sense to the changes within the UI portion of Bill C–113.

There has been an awful lot of emphasis put on voluntarily leaving one's employment and relating that to just cause. For the record, I would like to read into the record the definition of the word voluntary. I got this definition from the dictionary. It says that voluntary is: "done, acting, able to act of one's own free will, not constrained or compulsory, intentional". That is the definition.

Given that definition, I do not think that there is anyone in Canada today who leaves his or her job voluntarily. Everyone has a reason for leaving his or her job.

The problem is that it is a good reason, but according to the commission and the act it may not be a just cause reason. The onus and burden of proving that just cause is on the backs of the unemployed.

We have at our disposal a document that I have called a "but book". It describes a situation in which a person has just cause to leave his or her employment, but there are many conditions that must be met. This "but book" now has been transposed and it has been put into this grey bible that we received from the commission.

I would just like to refer to it for a moment as it pertains to the case of sexual or other harassment. It states, among other things on the page, and rightfully so, that harassment of any kind is unacceptable, whether of a sexual nature or otherwise, intimidation, threats, blackmail, abuse of authority or poisoned work environment, whether by superiors or co-workers. I agree with that whole-heartedly, but the part that follows is what causes me some concern.

• (1350)

This grey bible lists reasonable alternatives for an employee who is sexually or otherwise harassed to follow. That is where the problem lies. As an alternative, a person who is sexually harassed must speak to the employer. If that employer happens to be the person who is doing the harassing then how can this employee be expected to face that employer? If the employer is despicable enough to be sexually harassing an employee how can that employee in all good faith go to that employer and say that the employer has to stop it? That will only cause more harassment.

People must explore the possibility of a transfer to another unit. If the employer is the person who is causing the harassment does anyone think for one minute that the employer is going to be willing to transfer people, to say that they are right, he has been harassing them so he will transfer them to another unit. Does anyone really think that is going to happen? I do not think so.

They must seek assistance of the union or association. They must follow the grievance procedure. They must use the provisions of the collective agreement. They must go through all of this process prior to proving just cause.

On the same page, under the title of Just Cause, it says: "No other reasonable alternative to quitting. Existing reasonable alternatives cannot resolve the situation. The harassment is intolerable for any period of time. Not necessary to undertake or to await the result of a tribunal hearing in respect to the employment or human rights". That last part causes some problems not only for me but for the agents who are hearing the evidence put to them as it relates to just cause for sexual harassment. It is not necessary to undertake or await the result of a tribunal hearing.

When we look through this grey bible we can see that every section relates to what the claimant must do. I would like to relate some of the cases for applying just cause. There is a case of an employee who is 18 years old and is being harassed by her employer to do more work. She must tolerate shift changes on very short or no notice at all. The claimant worked from 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. in a gas station. She worked from 3 p.m. to 11 p.m. in the kitchen and she worked from 6 a.m. to 2 p.m., also in the kitchen.

The case is too long to read all its parts, but the point is, and it is not the only part that involves this case, it is a matter of this employee not having the ability to even correspond with her employer. She tried to speak to the employer but he was not there. She tried to speak to the kitchen manager but that person was not there on numerous occasions, so she finally had to tell her co-worker that she was leaving.

The adjudicator or the agent who saw this case said that this employee did not have just cause for leaving her employment and as a result disqualified her for nine weeks and reduced her benefits to 50 per cent.

When we look at numerous cases and talk about people leaving their employment for various reasons one wonders, when we talk about the jurisprudence and we talk about the 40 just cause reasons, as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Employment and Immigration referred to them, we can cite time after time various cases in which people have been harassed.

• (1355)

Here is another one. It concerns a 45-year old woman. The agent says: "According to the information presented with your claim for benefit you voluntarily left your job without just cause. You are therefore disqualified from receiving UI benefits for seven weeks and you will get a reduction in your benefits to 50 per cent".

If we look at the evidence there are three and one-half pages of written testimony from this 45-year old woman who was sworn at and told that she was despicable and did not know how to dress properly. She was put under such stress that her blood pressure soared to 220 over 150. She was told if she did not quit she was headed for a stroke or maybe a heart attack.

There is half a page from the employer that says: "In closing, I feel the remarks made about myself go beyond the sour grapes of a disgruntled employee and I will be forwarding a copy to my lawyer for an opinion on my legal rights".

This is clearly a case in which an employee made a claim to an agent and said: "I had to quit, I have no other recourse". The information was made available to the employer, and now the employer is going to seek legal action.

To add insult to injury, this woman lost benefits for seven weeks and her benefits were reduced to 50 per cent. Is that just cause? What determines just cause?

When we talk about the problems that exist today and when I look at legislation, I look for legislation that will make things better for people, that will do what it is supposed to do.

Allow me to quote a letter from the Attorney General addressed to myself dated March 5, 1993 in keeping with what I have been saying, which is that the decisions by adjudicators, by agents are inconsistent and that the 40 reasons of which we have heard are not being applied. Mr. Speaker, please allow me two quick remarks on that point to emphasize what I am saying.

The Attorney General says: "In paragraph 3.188 of the 1991 annual report we further reported that penalties were still applied inconsistently". He goes on to say: "As you can appreciate the application of penalties requires close monitoring and as such is an ongoing concern of the commission".

I also have a copy of a letter that was addressed to the chairman of the legislative committee that heard our arguments in regard to this legislation. It is from an employee representative on a hearing commission. In the letter this officer states: "I have heard reference to 40 reasons that will be allowed. I do not know what they are and if 40 reasons are contemplated then the public has a right to know what you are considering and I request a copy".

Mr. Speaker, I know you are being very generous and I appreciate that. My point is that my amendments would include those 40 reasons in the legislation, and would include a common law spouse. I am told the policy is that they are accepted, but it is not in the legislation.

My amendments are friendly amendments. In the strongest terms I urge everyone to support these amendments and I do thank you for your indulgence, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to comment on the motions presented by the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau.

I would like to consider these motions one by one and comment accordingly. Motions Nos. 7 and 8 standing in the name of the hon. member are actually an attempt to expand the definition of just cause. This definition is found in clause 18 of the bill. Although there is no objection to the motion as such, the motion is unnecessary because the 13 reasons listed under clause 18 of the bill already cover the vast majority of the additional reasons proposed by the hon. member. I will remind hon. members that paragraph 28(4)(n) of clause 18 allows for prescribing regulations, which could easily serve the same purpose as the changes proposed by the hon. member.

• (1400)

Finally, all the reasons proposed by the hon. member are already part of the jurisprudence and, as such, are binding on the commission's officers, who must take these into account when making their decision. Unemployment Insurance officers cannot ignore the forty or fifty reasons recognized in the jurisprudence when they make a decision on the eligibility of a claimant.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to comment briefly on motion No. 9. It would require from the commission a standard of proof applicable to criminal cases "beyond any reasonable doubt". I may remind the hon. member that the Unemployment Insurance Act is social legislation, not criminal legislation providing for punishment, as does the Criminal Code. That is why I cannot support this motion.

Motion No. 10 proposes to include in the Unemployment Insurance Act a definition of the term spouse that adds the concept of common law spouse. I admit that the principle which inspired the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau is sound, but I cannot support this motion because it is not entirely necessary. Practically speaking, people who have lived together for at least one year are already treated as spouses according to UIC policy. In this respect, I may refer the hon. member to page G-45, chapter 6 of the guide. I would be delighted to send him a copy if he is interested.

I will now consider motions Nos. 11 and 13. There are two objectives here: first, to reinstate the system that existed prior to Bill C-113, and second, to introduce a three-stage disqualification system which would be based on the claimant's record of disqualification.

Even if these motions did not exceed the scope of this bill, I would object in any case, since the government has made it clear that individuals who leave a job voluntarily and without just cause should not have access to unemployment insurance benefits. These two motions would destroy the principle of the bill, and this of course means they are entirely unacceptable.

Finally, Motion No. 14 would provide that individuals leaving a job without just cause would be able to use the weeks of insurable employment preceding their voluntary departure to qualify again for benefits. This motion would lead to situations where individuals would leave a job without any penalty whatsoever. You will understand why the government cannot accept this motion.

As for the matter raised by the hon. member concerning sexual harassment, there are a few things I would like to say. The only reasonable alternative does not mean that the employee must speak to the employer if she is harassed. That would only be the case if the harassment came from someone else. It means the employee must at least make an effort to correct the situation, if at all possible. In some cases, the individual will not have to speak to the employer.

When there is just cause, there is nevertheless a procedure that says the employee must make a reasonable attempt to correct the situation. This applies to all cases of just cause. An attempt must be made at one's place of work to correct the situation. If that is impossible, then there is just cause because the situation cannot be changed. This also applies to sexual harassment.

In concluding, I would like to go back briefly to the motion which deals with the definition of common law spouse. I repeat, the principle which inspired the hon. member has great merit, but in practice, unemployment insurance officers have specific guidelines that provide that a common law spouse is to be treated as a spouse in the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Therefore it is unnecessary to have a debate on an amendment that is redundant and unnecessary, since in practice, the treatment of these cases is already fair and equitable.

[English]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I thank you and I thank the member for Timmins—Chapleau for his amendment.

We have heard debate on both sides of this amendment. I want to put this amendment in the context of the bill and give a few ideas I have dealing specifically with the amendment but also with the bill in general.

What we are talking about here are changes to the UI program which are included in Bill C-113. These were first proposed by the Minister of Finance on December 2 here in the House of Commons. The changes involved the following: That the new UI benefit rate for new beneficiaries would be reduced from 60 per cent to 57 per cent of insurable earnings as of April 1, 1993, which is just a few days away; second, and this is the contentious issue, that people who voluntarily leave their jobs without just cause, as defined by section 28 of the UI Act, or lose their jobs through personal misconduct will no longer receive UI benefits.

Let us put that into the context of the state of the UI fund. You will see what effect it is going to have. There are a few people in this House and in Canada who know that the unemployment insurance program is the federal government's single largest expenditure for 1993 of almost $22 billion.

What does that mean? It means that more money is spent on the UI program than on national defence, Old Age Security or the total administration of the federal government. That is what we are dealing with here today.

Before 1990 the federal government's contribution to the UI fund was about 20 per cent. In 1990 the government decided that general revenues would no longer contribute to the UI fund. How was it going to do it then? The fund was going to be financed by UI premiums paid by employees and employers.

How did it raise all this money? These premiums have been raised since 1990, first by a 24 per cent increase in July 1991 and then by another 7.1 per cent increase in January 1992. Revenues collected from these premiums totalled almost $18 billion for 1992-93. Despite such revenues the cost of the program has climbed $7 billion since 1990.

Why? It is due in large part to an unemployment rate which has gone from 8.1 per cent in 1990 to 10.3 per cent in 1991 to 11.3 in 1992. I think in fairness that we have to say that this could be directly attributable to the policies of the present government. Because of the steadily rising UI costs the UI fund is in a deficit position. The cumulative deficit is $4.9 billion.

• (1410)

With that as a background, just what effect will the changes in Bill C-113 have on the UI fund? Surely if we are going to make changes they will tend to clear up the deficit. Let us have a look at some of the figures.

The government expects that cutting the benefit rate from 60 per cent to 57 per cent and eliminating UI benefits for voluntary leavers and those who are fired from their jobs will save a total of $2.5 billion over two years. Nonetheless, even with these cuts the deficit in the UI fund is expected to rise to $7.6 billion by the end of 1993. That is up from $4.9 billion now, as we speak.

It is clear therefore that the effect of the changes in Bill C-113 will be negligible. If the purpose of the government in introducing these changes was to control spending as was stated by the minister in December 1992, it can be said in fairness that the government has failed.

We have to ask another question. What effect will these changes have on Canadian society? It has been shown that the measures proposed in this bill will not reduce or even contain a deficit of the UI fund. It is also clear that the changes do not target cheaters and by going after quitters the restrictions are aimed at a relatively small section of the UI recipients.

It is safe to say therefore that the government in this instance is simply cutting for the sake of cutting without any all-encompassing vision of what the UI program should be doing and without any idea of how the program could be made to work better.

The stated purpose of hunting down and punishing quitters is nothing more than a convenient fiction used to distract people from the real issue. The government does not know what to do about Canada's unemployment crisis and that is the real problem. Unfortunately the price to be paid by society in general for these relatively inconsequential and ineffective cuts could be quite high.

In 1990 the government enacted the latest UI restrictions and thousands of families were thrown into poverty. The percentage of unemployed workers covered by the program dropped from 70 per cent to 58 per cent. Where did these people go? They had to eat. They had to live some place. They had to keep their families going.

If the proposed changes in this bill become law those people no longer eligible for unemployment insurance will have to turn to the already overtaxed welfare system that is for the most part covered by the cities.

The Conservatives, this government, have clearly decided to attack the unemployed rather than attack the scourge of unemployment. Under this proposal Canadians will bear the burden of proof in establishing their just cause for leaving their jobs.

In 1986 I recall the Conservatives established the Forget commission which presented recommendations which would have gutted the UI system as we know it. However, even Claude Forget, the head of the study questions the Tory measures calling them "a political miscalculation and economically just an empty gesture, a waste of time and of political credibility".

Not even their ideological soul mates are with the Conservatives on these measures. The measure dealing with just cause will discourage legitimate complaints about sexual harassment and substandard working conditions.

Immigrant women and non-unionized workers will be even more vulnerable at the work place as a result of these changes. The government should not support measures which chain a worker to a particular job regardless of the treatment received from an employer. This is Canada. This is 1993. We are not at the stage where we used to have people come over in servitude. Surely in this day and age we can be a little more compassionate with our Canadian confreres.

• (1415)

The UI program is designed to provide income replacement and to promote labour flexibility and mobility. Many people will be discouraged from seeking better employment opportunities for themselves given this punitive and Draconian measure. Many workers will be forced to stay at low paying and dead end jobs. Is that what we want for our Canadian workers? I suggest it is not.

If this legislation passes the UI system could find itself buried under an avalanche of appeals, literally hundreds of thousands of appeals. In 1991, 191,000 UI applicants were held to have quit their jobs without just cause and were penalized. About 19,000 of these rulings were reversed. Why if everything was so fair and above board?

Resources of the department are stretched in dealing with this level of appeals. It is ludicrous to believe that a department could cope with 190,000 appeals. Should it attempt to do so? It is entirely likely the standards of just cause will be applied in an inconsistent and arbitrary fashion.

I remember the police, the squealer police or whatever they are called. If we thought our neighbours were doing wrong we would call the police: send in the cops and make sure they were punished and penalized for losing their jobs or leaving a job they could not stand.

We have come a long way since 1984. A 1991 Economic Council of Canada report found that people who quit their jobs were not a drain on the UI fund. In an analysis of 1986 the unemployed figures show that half of all job quitters went to another job immediately. Another 43 per cent found new jobs within 10 weeks. By contrast, one in five persons who lost their jobs found work immediately and another 50 per cent had found work within 10 weeks.

I know that time is running short. I want to leave this thought with the House. The people of Canada want to work. They want good paying jobs to support themselves and their families. I suggest to the House that if this bill is passed it will call into question the honest, hard working people of Canada who in a time of need had the Government turn its back on them and literally throw them on to the welfare rolls.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, shame on the government. It is sad to say we are debating a bill that does not have one redeeming factor.

As I said earlier when I spoke on the bill, not only does it attack unemployed workers when they are down, when they are hurting the most, when they are faced with double digit unemployment, it attacks Public Service workers who work for the unemployed in unemployment centres. We have workers who for economic reasons, because of failed economic policies of this government, are unemployed and on unemployment insurance. They are now being penalized, harassed and threatened. They are guilty until they can prove their innocence. We also have public sector workers whose wages have been frozen, who have to work in understaffed UI centres and somehow have to accommodate and work with angry unemployed workers whose benefits are being yanked back by the government. We have two sets of workers this government is managing to mesh into one piece of legislation.

• (1420)

I want to address most of my remarks to the additional clauses introduced by the UI critic for my party, the member for Timmins—Chapleau, concerning legitimate just cause. The hon. member pointed out that the government had touted 40 reasons why one could quit a job but in fact spelled out less than half of them in the bill. Why would that be? Are 27 of the reasons secret? Do we have secret reasons and public reasons? Why would the government not have included all 40 reasons in the bill rather than only 13 of them?

An hon. member: A lucky number.

Ms. Langan: Lucky number 13 is not so lucky for the workers of Canada, but maybe the government figures it is a lucky number.

I want to address some of the reasons the hon. member has added in his amendment, such as a formal promise of increase in wages or salary that was not fulfilled. Formal promise is equal to a contract. If somebody breaks a contract is that not just cause for leaving the work place? Or, are we setting up a situation wherein the government is providing a scenario so that the employer can now renege on agreements and know that the worker cannot make a move because the worker will not be able to collect unemployment insurance if the employer does not live up to his end of the agreement?

The second reason that the hon. member has in his amendment is unjustified reduction in wages or salary. That is not just cause for leaving a work place, a wage cut. A worker goes to work with a commitment that he or she will receive certain compensation for doing that work. Now the scenario is that an employer can say arbitrarily: "You will take a wage cut. You have nowhere to go because unemployment insurance is cut off for you". Shame.

Loss in wages or salary due to the employer's financial difficulty is another reason. What can the employer do if he or she has financial difficulty? There are several remedies the employer could seek. The employer could seek funding from financial institutions. The employer could seek bankruptcy. It is not pleasant but it is available to an employer. An employer could in fact cut workers' wages. What does the worker have to do? The worker has no options because he or she is caught again by this bill which leaves him or her guilty of something if he or she withdraws his or her labour.

Intolerable working conditions, unreasonable work requirements, wages or salaries that are less than provided for by legislation, or an employer who does not pay minimum wage are other reasons. A worker has to stay there and work because the government says that worker has no right to unemployment insurance. It is shameful.

Moral objections to the employer's illegal activities or employer's activities that violate freedom of conscience are not cause under the Unemployment Insurance Act for quitting a job. Place of work distant from family and serious sickness in the family are not causes under the Unemployment Insurance Act to quit a job.

Exertion by employer of excessive pressures to retire is not cause to collect unemployment insurance any more. In this economic climate many employers are putting pressure on older workers to retire.

Working conditions that in the opinion of a medical practitioner adversely affect the person's health are not cause under this bill to quit a job. Shame. A doctor says this job is going to kill you but this government says you have to stay in it because it will not give you unemployment insurance while you seek another job. It is shameful.

Working conditions considered on credible and convincing explanations by the claimant as adversely affecting the claimant's health are not just cause. Again, too bad about the employee's health. The government says the employee has to keep working and cannot collect unemployment insurance.

• (1425)

Long periods of separation from family due to distance of place of work from family residence is not just cause. This is a country where we have all kinds of industry with camp living: fly in and fly out. Marriages can hardly survive. They have very tough times surviving because the workers have to leave home for long periods of time. We could even say that for members of Parliament. We know about fly in and fly out work conditions and how tough it is to keep the family together. But it is too bad for workers. It is not just cause to leave a job to try to save a marriage, to save a family, and be at home with kids who are having problems. Those are not just causes under this government legislation.

If the government really thought about the conditions being created for Canadian workers and what it was really saying to Canadian workers, after sober reflection it would probably withdraw this bill with a whole bunch of shame. The government's attitude is: if you quit your job in this country you are a cheat; if you quit your job in this country you want to go skiing; if you quit your job in this country you are lazy or if you quit your job in this country you are guilty until you are proven innocent.

If that is what a Tory Canada is all about, I would suggest the government had better hasten its way to the electoral ballot box. I do not believe most Canadians think this is what our Canada is about. I suspect there may be a change of heart when the election comes and the government finds itself with a bunch of amendments as it sits in opposition. Then we will amend this bill so the workers of Canada are treated with dignity and respect and are innocent until proven guilty.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to talk about men and women who have left their jobs voluntarily and about the fact that this bill proposes they should not receive any unemployment insurance benefits if they left without a good reason.

[English]

What I have discovered in discussing this bill and the new penalty provision with many of my constituents is that the presentation of the issue, I suppose particularly by the minister, has resulted in a great deal of misunderstanding among the general public about what the existing rules are for unemployment insurance in the event people leave their jobs voluntarily without just cause.

The minister through his rhetoric has managed to convey to many Canadians the notion that lots and lots of people are quitting their jobs, that this fact is causing a large expenditure of public money, and that unless this bill is brought in these people will simply get UI without problem and very easily.

Many constituents to whom I have spoken have the notion that people who quit their jobs voluntarily are not at the moment subject to any penalty for doing so. That impression in itself is not correct. The existing law provides for a penalty of a minimum of seven and a maximum of twelve weeks without benefits in the event of somebody quitting a job without just cause.

Surely the starting point is that Canadians need to understand this is a phenomenon subject to penalty already and it is not necessary to have this particular bill passed to penalize people who quit their jobs without just cause.

The second notion is that these quitters are causing a major drain on the fund. It is important to understand that the number of people who actually quit their jobs is relatively limited and has been declining over past years. In fact the number who quit their jobs at the peak of the economic cycle in 1988 was much higher than now. This reflects the fact that people do not quit their jobs readily when they know times are tough. They may be more inclined to do so when they are better able to find another job. According to a 1991 Economic Council of Canada report, about half the people who quit their jobs voluntarily do so to go to other jobs. About 43 per cent of the remainder find new jobs within 10 weeks.

We also know, according to the Economic Council of Canada, may it rest in peace, only 1.5 per cent to 1.7 per cent of the unemployment rate consists of people who left their jobs voluntarily. The notion that this is the remedy for the UI deficit is ridiculous. That is just not the point.

The next thing I want to raise so people understand is that the existing system of a penalty of seven to twelve weeks where people quit their jobs without just cause provides, for the adjudicator of unemployment insurance claims, the ability to weigh the merits of the reasons for quitting their jobs, consider their credibility in making the statements made for giving reasons, and judge what the appropriate penalty should be.

When people come in and say they are applying for UI benefits because they quit their jobs, the first stage is to determine whether or not they had just cause. The second stage is if they did not have just cause, what degree of penalty is appropriate in that case. That is the existing law. When the UI law was initially reformed in a major way in 1971, the penalty for quitting a job was one to three weeks. It was later increased to a maximum of six weeks. It was then increased to a minimum of seven and a maximum of twelve.

Although it changed throughout that period of time, there was always a discretion involved in determining what the appropriate period of disqualification was.

This bill has made a major change in that, not just by increasing the extent of the penalty but by narrowing the discretion to one which must be exercised either in favour of the claimant by saying yes this person quit with just cause, in which case no penalty is applicable, or at the other extreme this person did not have just cause and the penalty is no benefits whatsoever. It is sort of the capital punishment of unemployment insurance penalties.

The essence of mitigation, of figuring out whether somebody took appropriate steps in the circumstances, or tried to but gave to the insurance officer an ability to use some discretion, is lost. To my mind it entirely undermines a system on which years of jurisprudence have accumulated in determining what is just cause and what is the appropriate degree of penalty that should be meted out to somebody who quits his or her job.

I did not bother to bring in the decisions of the unemployment insurance umpire and the Federal Court on this issue. It is sufficient to say there is a large range of cases that have dealt with issues of voluntary quitting or dismissal for misconduct and determinations made as to what the appropriate penalty was.

What we do know is that under the existing system in which the penalty period is a range of weeks of disqualification from seven to twelve, the average penalty given to people who are found to have quit voluntarily without just cause is just over eight weeks. In other words, the average penalty is close to the minimum one.

• (1435)

It reflects the fact that adjudicators under the Unemployment Insurance Act, in considering whether people have just cause to quit, usually come to the conclusion that although they did not have sufficient cause to quit, they did have good enough reasons to lessen the degree of penalty being prescribed. Even with that there are a lot of appeals.

Consider this point. Put yourself in the position of the adjudicator of an unemployment insurance claim for leaving a job voluntarily. Your choice as adjudicator is this. Does this claimant get benefits or no benefits, full benefits or no benefits? Under this bill that remains to be the choice.

I suggest that most adjudicators, if they can find a shred of justification for people quitting, are probably going to give them benefits. I know this may even differ from what some of my colleagues have said.

Even looking at it from the point of view of the government's attempt to justify this on fiscal grounds, it just does not make sense. If they lean the other way and refuse benefits, because the penalty is that severe they virtually ensure that there will be an appeal.

I tell you, Mr. Speaker, in the unemployment insurance administration the processing of appeals is a very expensive one because a panel must be brought together. The panel members are not regular employees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. They are paid a fee for the day. They have to be given briefs of what the law is. They have to be given all the facts of the case. By creating this mechanism, the government has stood fiscal responsibility on its head.

Why has the government done that? Other than out of sheer stupidity, I suggest it is because in fact we are right. It is trying to go out and appeal to a right wing constituency in Canada by misleading them into thinking that there are thousands and thousands of people quitting their jobs without just cause and it has to put a stop to that. It is not true.

What the government is doing is fiscally irresponsible. It is unfair, it is unjust, it is against the traditions of our system of justice, it is wrong and it should be stopped.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I rise with hesitation to ask a question and seek guidance on this. Is it appropriate for a member of the legislative committee on this bill to be sitting in the chair during debate on this bill? I am seeking guidance of yourself or the Clerk on this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Soetens): I guess I can only respond by saying I was asked by the Speaker to fill in for a few moments while he left the chair. He advises me that he will be back shortly. All I can suggest to you is I will reserve an answer on that. The Speaker has returned and I will suggest to him that somebody has raised this point of order and I will leave it up to him to respond.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Really there was nobody else to come and occupy the chair but the hon. member. I thought it would be appropriate for him to sit here a couple of minutes.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am of two minds rising to speak on this bill this afternoon. On the one hand I am as always delighted to partake in debate here. On the other hand, I really am sick at heart at what has been done to the working people once again by their government.

• (1440)

I have some notes on this bill and in black print above the second list of notes are the words "guilty until proven innocent". Those words are the complete antithesis of our belief in law in this country.

We refer to the problem of a person before our courts who is considered guilty until proven innocent as the reverse onus. That reverse onus has in a number of cases before the Supreme Court of Canada relating to the criminal law been thrown out, so far, I might add, that it has bounced into obscurity. In Bill C-113 we are right back to a reverse onus against the people who are least able to defend themselves.

It is a reverse onus against workers who will be thrown out of jobs, who have no money and no back-up, who cannot afford recourse to lawyers. Because of other cuts by the government, the legal aid offices in this country from coast to coast to coast no longer take the kinds of civil cases these amendments would engender. It is a disgrace and a scandal.

I cannot believe people good and true on the government side of the House can support this. I cannot believe first and foremost the scam that is being perpetrated on the people of Canada with regard to the whole question of sexual harassment under this bill.

This week we have had a number of questions in this House put to the members of the government on the question of sexual harassment. I have heard time and again from the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the President of the Treasury Board and again and again from the Prime Minister, and what have I heard? I have heard the words that this government has zero tolerance for sexual harassment. Well, talk is cheap. Words are pretty. Actions are what we need here, action that proves that sentence.

Now, my learned and dear friend from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso just said, and I am going to quote him: "What this government has," and I agree with him, "is zero tolerance for Canadians". Very soon Canadians are going to have zero tolerance of their own.

The whole question of this bill vis-a-vis the question of sexual harassment has snowballed to the point where women and men of goodwill are asking: "What is the government doing?"

Time and again the situation has been explained by members on this side of the House to the minister of employment, the Prime Minister and the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women. It is as if ears are filled with wet cement. They are not hearing what we are saying and if they are hearing, they certainly are not understanding.

Mr. Samson: The cement goes deeper than that.

Ms. Clancy: True. The hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau says the cement goes deeper than that and he is right. This is a very serious matter, this question of sexual harassment and how it is affects women in this country.

Years ago, between 1980 and 1984, I chaired the Unemployment Insurance Appeal Board in Halifax. I sat several days every month and listened to cases brought by working people who had been disqualified and penalized for a period in those days of from four to six weeks from receiving their UI benefits.

I discovered we had a very stringent bill and if people left their employment voluntarily, you were disqualified for a severe period of time. Eventually, as a result of the insurance nature of the scheme, the disqualification ended and they did receive benefits for a certain period of time.

• (1445)

The hardest thing to prove at that quasi-judicial committee was just cause in a voluntary quit. Now it is even more crucial that just cause be given the widest possible interpretation because women who claim they have been sexually harassed will have to prove it on the balance of probabilities or they will lose all their benefits. They will be disqualified and disentitled.

The same goes for other people, men and women both, who quit for other reasons. The onus will be on them to prove it.

The second problem is that the employer, who can be the best witness of a voluntary quit and just cause, is not compellable to these hearings. He does not have to come and testify. There is no power of subpoena. How are we going to get him there? Sorry about the pronoun but in most cases it is going to be a him.

What are we going to do? We cannot bring this person by compulsion to these hearings. We have a woman, in most cases, who probably makes $20,000 a year so she cannot afford legal representation. Legal aid offices are not taking cases like this anymore because of cutbacks from this government and other governments across the country.

The whole question of sexual harassment is very embarrassing and painful to a woman in the first place. She goes in and says she quit her job because her boss poisoned the work place or said that if she did not sleep with him, she would not get this promotion or would be fired, any one of two dozen possible scenarios that come under the realm of sexual harassment.

She gets to someone in Employment and Immigration Canada who says she has to prove it, and the civil burden of proof is on the balance of probabilities. It is not as strong as beyond a reasonable doubt, which is the criminal burden, but it is still a heavy burden that must be discharged and there is no help for her.

Over and over again I listened to the minister of employment say that sexual harassment is grounds for just cause. It may be just cause on paper but what about in practice? Practice is what we are dealing with.

I would be delighted to hear from any member of the government, from the minister of health on down, a scenario in which someone in that situation proved a just cause in a voluntary quit.

I would be happy and delighted. I promise I would eat crow from one end of this nation to the other. I would be happy to do that if anyone could show me a case in which a woman was able to prove just cause given the situation I set up: with a boss who is not compellable, with an Employment and Immigration Commission that says the burden of proof is on her, and with no recourse to legal counsel which is where most of them—

An hon. member: Oh, Oh.

Ms. Clancy: If the minister would like to answer my question I would be delighted to hear him say it. Ah, shrug. Nice to see you.

I would be delighted to backtrack on this. I say here I will backtrack if anyone can show me a case in which a woman was able to prove that in those circumstances, because sadly I know that is not possible. Sadly, if it is not possible now how much worse does the whole thing become when Bill C-113 becomes law and women are disentitled right off the top?

• (1450)

In a nutshell the problem is this with regard to sexual harassment. There is not a woman in the world who does not know what we are talking about. I have never had a problem explaining sexual harassment to a woman. I met with all sorts of groups yesterday and every time I talked about it the nods started. Women of good faith who were being honest, and in most cases they are.

There are two kinds of men. There are the men who indulge in this kind of activity. They do not want any more publicity about it so they deny it. Then there are the other men who are the majority of those who sit in this Chamber. They are good men who want to do the right thing, regardless of political affiliation. I believe that of the 295 of us, of the 255 men, the vast majority want to do the right thing. I believe that. I do not think I could stay here if I did not believe it.

The difficulty is that the whole question of sexual harassment is so foreign for most men that they cannot believe anybody does it. Gentlemen, we are here to say that it happens all the time. It happens everywhere.

I see my time is up. Let me just end with a plea. This bill is going to make it worse.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I would like to seek unanimous consent to move:

That Bill C-113 be amended by deleting Part I, the Public Sector Compensation Act portion of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to move the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret, there is no unanimous agreement to put the motion.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am glad of the chance to support the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau on his motion in this matter because it is a very serious attack that is being made on a large number of working people in this country, hundreds of thousands by the government's statistics and many more than that potentially or by threat.

Working people are to be denied the unemployment insurance they have paid for if they quit under circumstances they consider justifiable, perhaps even under circumstances listed in the law but which they cannot prove because the rules by which they have to prove it are loaded in favour of the employer who may have forced them into quitting.

Some years ago I heard it said by a lawyer, who in fact was minister of justice in a provincial government, that union members are second class citizens in this country because they are the only ones who can be sent to jail for not working. If a doctor does not work or if a banker does not work they do not go to jail. A union member can.

At first I was surprised. Then of course I saw it happen. I remember what Jean-Claude Parrot said about his experience. He said: "There seems to be two kinds of laws in this country. When the RCMP illegally opened the mail the government passed a law to make it legal. When workers legally go on strike it passes a law to make it illegal".

This law does not apply only to union members. It applies to all employees and potentially threatens every employee with being starved for lack of unemployment insurance if he or she takes the risk of quitting for what he or she believes is just cause.

• (1455)

The basic reason for that, which others have mentioned but which deserves to be emphasized again, is that the burden of proof is on the worker. It is not on the employer nor on the unemployment insurance system. He or she must prove by rules that have not been clearly stated what it was that gave grounds for quitting. In fact that person is guilty until proven innocent. Unless it can be proven that the person is innocent of the offence of quitting without just cause, then that person is treated as guilty.

This is in reverse of the general way the law is applied in our country, but there is a precedent. It is not applied to Canadian citizens or Canadian residents. It is applied to someone who has come to Canada and applied for refugee status. That person is treated from that moment as though he or she were a criminal or at least a violator of the Immigration Act. This would be until months or years later as the law drags its course and that person can prove that he or she really was a refugee and therefore was not to be held guilty for entering the country without a valid visa.

In other words, the government tried it out first on people who were in Canada without the protection of either citizenship or Canadian residency. Having made it work there in the sense that it got away with it, the government is now trying it on every Canadian who is employed. If you quit you are guilty, unless you can prove you are innocent.

There are no clearly stated rules adopted by Parliament by which that is to be decided as there is in the case of criminal law. There are rules which can be changed at will by the cabinet. They may or may not be fully published. They may be left vague. There is nothing that the public, nothing that Parliament can do about those vague rules.

The person is deprived of income from the word go without anything to live on. This is until the person is able to prove he or she is innocent of quitting without due cause. This may be after months without legal aid.

There is no time limit for the UI system to give a decision. The UI system is not losing money. It is the worker who has to live without money. The unemployment insurance system does not care whether it takes two weeks, two months or two years to give a final decision on an appeal to an umpire.

I have a letter concerning a constituent in Trinity—Spadina. It is a very concise statement of her problem written by a person on her behalf. It reads:

"This person quit her job in November 1992. Her boss was an alcoholic and was verbally abusing her. She had 18 former employees as witnesses. Her claim was accepted at the unemployment insurance office; she was not penalized at all.

In January 1993, her former boss appealed the decision to the board of referees. This worker went to that hearing with three witnesses and five letters and the 18 names and phone numbers of former workers who were her friends and were willing to testify on her behalf. The referees did not question her witnesses at all. She was accused of stealing those 18 names and phone numbers from her boss's work place.

On February 11 a decision came down that she had good reason to quit but not just cause."

What gobbledegook. I know this government spends millions of dollars of taxpayers' money studying what words will con the public into thinking the government means what it does not mean by the words it uses. So having good reason to quit is not the same as having just cause. That is the kind of gobbledegook that a worker cannot be expected to foresee.

She is now penalized seven weeks and gets 50 per cent of her pay. She was lucky under the old system. She is appealing to the umpire. The lawyer believes she has a strong case. Her former boss also had former employees go to the Canadian Human Rights Commission and there has been no decision yet and to the Ontario Labour Relations Board which has ruled in his favour.

If she had the misfortune of having this happen to her after this present law she would not be losing just seven weeks. She would lose all her weeks and not know when she would ever get a decision on her appeal to the umpire.

This is a monstrously unjust law which victimizes workers for being workers, for being employees and not for being bosses.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being three o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business, as listed on today's Order Paper.

CHILD DAY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre) moved that Bill C-371, an act respecting a national child day, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations among the parties and independent members. I believe you will find there is agreement to adopt my private member's Bill C-371, an act respecting a national child day, at all stages including second reading, committee of the whole, report stage and third reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to proceed through all stages of the bill today?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, considered in committee, reported and concurred in.

• (1505)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Harb moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say a very few words and allow my colleagues on both sides of the House to also say a few words on this bill. I would first indicate that the purpose of this bill is to designate November 20 of each year as national child day in order to promote in Canada an awareness of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child which was adopted in the United Nations General Assembly on November 20.

On behalf of Canada, as you know, Mr. Speaker, our Prime Minister chaired the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and this bill continues this momentum. Before proceeding I would like to take this opportunity to thank many people who have made this bill a reality.

In particular I owe a deep thanks to Our Kids, Results Canada and the Coalition for the Rights of the Child, all of whom played an integral role in bringing the issue of child poverty to light.

Also I owe a special acknowledgement to Janis Machin. Without her initiative, help and support this bill would never have got as far as it did.

Finally, I would like to recognize the support I have received from the House leaders of all parties on both sides of the House. In particular, I would like to thank the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his department, my leader for his unwavering support and encouragement, and the many members of this House who have contacted my office to offer their support for Bill C-371.

The interest this bill has created certainly shows the importance that members from all parties in this House place on recognizing the importance of children.

Canada is recognized as being the number one country in the world in terms of social, economic and political stability and prosperity. Yet, unfortunately, we have over one million children who live in poverty. In fact, according to Statistics Canada, children now make up the single largest group of poor people in our country.

Children who live in poverty are at twice the risk of dying before reaching the age of 20. They have increased rates of chronic illness; they often suffer increased physical and mental disabilities and increased psychiatric disorders; and a greater percentage of poor children and youth struggle in school and face higher drop-out and illiteracy rates.

At a time when our children should experience the joy of growing up, learning and experiencing new things, many children unfortunately are left out.

This bill I believe takes a giant step forward in recognizing the many challenges the children and youth of our nation face today. By designating every November 20 as a national child day we are sending a signal to all Canadians that the issues affecting our youth are important to us all.

This bill ensures that once a year communities from coast to coast will stop and recognize children and the issues affecting them. We can ensure that every year we will pay tribute to the future of our great country Canada.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to affirm my support and the support of the Minister of National Health and Welfare for this bill and to compliment my hon. colleague, the member for Ottawa Centre, for his initiative in bringing this bill forward.

Canadians will remember that our Prime Minister was an early supporter of the World Summit for Children and that when asked by UNICEF and member states of the United Nations to co-chair the summit, he accepted and that summit was an unqualified success.

Canadians will also remember that one of the subjects of the World Summit for Children was the Convention on the Rights of the Child and in the final communique and the subsequent action plan endorsed by the 71 participating leaders, the ratification of the Convention on the Rights of the Child became the first commitment expected of governments around the world.

History will record that the Prime Minister returned to Canada from the world summit to fulfil his promise that the conditions of children must become a major issue on the political agenda in all countries. The Prime Minister created the Children's Bureau in October 1991, ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child in December 1991 and oversaw his government's introduction of Brighter Futures in May 1992. Let me take each of these accomplishments in turn.

• (1510)

A dedicated bureau within the Government of Canada to co-ordinate and reflect the interests of children in policy and program development was the recommendation of the International Year of the Child Committee in 1979. Today it exists in the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Canada has ratified the convention on the rights of the child. In a ceremony held here in the Parliament Buildings in the presence of children from all regions of Canada and members of the Canadian Coalition For the Rights of Children, the convention was signed by the Prime Minister. The convention on the rights of the child is very important to Canadians and I would like to take this opportunity to elaborate upon this point.

Children are exceptionally vulnerable. They require special rights to protect them and meet their unique needs. The convention, as an international legal agreement, provides us with a set of standards that confirms the respect our society gives its youngest members. The convention asserts the underlying principle that the best interest of the child should always be the primary consideration. It outlines the responsibility we have as legislators and parents. The convention asks us to look at children in a new way as people and citizens with the same inherent rights as all other members of the union family.

In the hustle of our daily lives, among the constant demands upon our time and energy, this is not easy nor is it simple. In creating this national day to draw attention to the convention, we are responding to article 42 of the convention. This article, one of the shortest of the 54 articles that make up the body of the convention, is one of the most powerful for the future well-being of children. It says: "States parties undertake to make the principles and provisions of the convention widely known by appropriate and active means to adults and children alike". This bill will help us accomplish this objective.

Under the Brighter Futures program, which I will speak about in a moment, the Government of Canada has embarked upon these important tasks of public awareness and involvement in the convention on the rights of the child. In partnership with Professional Publishing Associates, the publisher of several parenting magazines, including Today's Parent, a delightful booklet has been developed that parents can read with their young children. This colourful booklet outlines, in appropriate language, the intent of the convention for children and parents. Over the coming months, over one million households with young children will be receiving this booklet.

The Department of Multiculturalism has produced a beautiful poster that voluntary organizations and professional publishing associates are distributing to children's hospitals, child care centres, parent resource centres and schools and parents. Over 40,000 copies will be provided. These two programs are part of a thoughtful effort to familiarize Canadians with the convention in a user-friendly way that involves children and their parents together. We must never forget that the convention speaks eloquently to the central importance of parents in the healthy upbringing of children. The convention safeguards this parental role by stressing that the state must respect the responsibilities, rights and duties of parents in providing appropriate direction and guidance. There will be many partners as we recognize the national day to recognize the convention and the children of Canada.

The Canadian Coalition For the Rights of Children, a coalition of over 45 national organizations, has written the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare expressing its support for a national day. The city of Ottawa anticipating this national day by a year, held a celebration of children last November 20 at a local school. The Government of Canada will welcome the date of November 20 as an annual day for children. By selecting November 20, this government will affirm a common national day around which Canadians, their organizations and governments will mobilize their efforts to recognize the rights of children.

This bill is also consistent with the government's comprehensive program for children, called Brighter Futures. In fact, the convention on the rights of the child is the first of four components of Brighter Futures. The other three are the new child tax credit recently passed by this House, Canadian action plan for children and the Child Development Initiative. Taken together, these four components form a major commitment toward children by this government that totals approximately $2.6 billion over five years, and ongoing funding for many programs beyond the five years.

Brighter Futures is more than a program or list of activities. It is an idea and a way of thinking about children. The convention is the cornerstone, a set of standards that must be the ever-present guide to all we undertake on behalf of children. The child tax benefit supplement for low and middle income working parents is a new policy instrument that recognizes the serious economic pressures on many Canadian families as they raise their children. The action plan is an outline of the longer-term issues that must be addressed by Canadian society in order to constantly improve the conditions in which our children live and grow. The child development initiative is our confirmation that early involvement with children, particularly those growing up under conditions of risk, can change the outcomes of children for the better as they grow to adulthood.

Brighter Futures recognizes that in recent years a body of research on child development is shifting the focus of social policy for children from attempting to solve problems once they have disrupted the child's life, to anticipating and preventing them through timely intervention.

Increasingly we can see the pathways that lead to problems in later life and the influences that protect or buffer children. Positive influences include healthy pregnancies and birth weight, loving parents who are knowledgeable about child development, caring families and supportive communities. Relatively simple and early interventions are targeted that can help a child move from a dangerous pathway to a healthy pathway.

The programs that illustrate the idea of Brighter Futures are coming on line. A guide to Brighter Futures will be available in several weeks. It will describe over 20 separate initiatives within the child development initiative, all based on early investment in children and the prevention of conditions of risk.

I am proud of the progress begun by this government on behalf of children, beginning with the world summit just over two and a half years ago. I am conscious that this progress reflects the Prime Minister's interest in children.

I am delighted to express my support for the bill currently before the House. Children are important to all of us. Contributions to their well-being must be made by all of us. This bill adds to our society's recognition of the important place we must establish for children and is welcome.

I would like to add that as chair of the subcommittee on poverty we are preparing a system so that perhaps next November 20 we will be able to have some measures to help us assess our progress in combating child poverty.

I know the member for Ottawa Centre has been tabling petitions, as have many other members of this House and I. Indeed I was at the ceremony beginning the spreading of that petition. Members of this House have also passed a resolution to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000.

Our subcommittee is hard at work developing standards so we can assess the state that children are living in across the country and perhaps work to have national standards in welfare or a guaranteed annual income. That is also being discussed at the current moment, and a paper by the minister will be presented on it.

All Canadians want to see that children in this country have a standard of living that is acceptable and reasonable and that they all have the opportunity to thrive.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill because of children, not because of the hypocrisy that has come to this House with the presentation of the bill.

It is hypocritical to have a national child day without accompanying policy that sees an end to hungry children in this country. We have just heard the litany of things the government has done and will do for children, a government that has reneged twice on a national child care program to make sure children are safe and secure while their parents works.

Forty per cent of those using food banks in this country are children under 16 years. We just debated today a policy that will create more families having to resort to food banks because they cannot get unemployment insurance and we have double-digit unemployment.

One million children live in poverty and yet the government member who just spoke from Don Valley North, the chair of the subcommittee for poverty, has recently said the poverty line should be lowered. Will this help children?

Seventy-four per cent of women in their child-bearing years are in the work force. Yet, as I said, there is a dramatic shortage of child care spaces.

Are our children not worth government attention when it comes to their safety and care while their parents are working? The government withdrew funding for the Kids Help Line, a national line designed to help children in crisis.

Now we have a proposed national child day. As I said we support anything that will improve the conditions of children but will a day, November 20, improve the conditions of children without policy?

Where is the Liberal policy on child care? It is the NDP government in Ontario and the federal NDP policy that has taken real positive steps to address the crisis in child care in Canada.

Marion Dewar, the national director of the Canadian Council on Children and Youth is a former member of this House. We hope with the support of the people from Ottawa Centre she will be a member of this House again. She has advocated for an end to child poverty for years. She said: "Spending money on child poverty is not an addition to deficit but an investment in the future".

It may interest those in this House and Canadians who are watching that the sponsor of this bill joined with the then mayor of Ottawa, Jim Durrell, in abolishing the Youth Advisory Council. That council provided a way for the needs of young people to be recognized in those programs delivered by the city of Ottawa.

There is considerable irony in the fact that here today the Liberal member is calling for a national child day. However, when pushed to put into action those policies that truly benefit children, we find the Liberals lacking and in fact, doing just the opposite to what this bill is all about.

I listened to a member from the Liberal benches on an open-line show in British Columbia. He talked about economic policies that would create even worse situations for children currently living in poverty.

On Monday, September 25, 1989, I introduced a private member's motion concerning a suggested child protection commission. It read: "That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of negotiating with the provinces to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children which would standardize laws throughout the country and that this bill of rights include a child protection commission and an emergency hotline which children could contact in times of crisis".

People might be interested in knowing that the hon. member who sponsors this bill not only did not speak for or against that private member's motion but in fact he could not make his way from the city of Ottawa to this Chamber to vote for it.

In addition, we have been told over and over that private members' business is non-partisan and should be non-partisan, that there should be a free vote. However, when we came into this House to vote on that private member's motion, the government Whip turned to his members. The government voted against a child protection commission and a children's bill of rights.

Again, I speak in favour of this bill. I am sure the hon. member and the member from Don Valley North both feel that what they are doing is going to help children. I hope they are right. But to have a child day without child policy and policy that will protect children is not going to solve the problems of children in this country.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The House resumed from Friday, February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Waddell (p. 16093):

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

This matter is votable today if five members rise. There has been an agreement that the vote, if it is to come, will be deferred to six o'clock to make it more convenient for members. I wanted to say that before the debate begins.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent to defer the vote until six o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and participate in the debate on the motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of euthanasia and, in particular, of ensuring that those assisting terminally ill patients who wish to die not be subject to criminal liability.

This matter has been raised and discussed in this House a number of times over the last year. In fact this is the fourth time it has been raised. The debate on each occasion has been an interesting one. It has been carried on with great seriousness, compassion and caring for the issue at hand and for those people who face a long and agonizing death from a terminal illness.

Canadians have spoken out consistently in favour of some changes to the legislation, to the Criminal Code. These changes would permit Canadians who are nearing the end of their lives, who are faced with a prognosis that is discouraging and does not suggest any opportunity for improvement in their condition causing either physical and emotional pain and suffering or both, and who have a firm commitment and desire to do so, to end their lives, seek assistance in ending their lives if it is not possible for them to do so themselves.

In response to a Gallup poll question, which Gallup has been asking for the last 20 years, dealing with the legalization of physician assistance in dying, consistently over the last decade 75 per cent of respondents to the Gallup poll have argued in favour of some changes to the legislation.

• (1110)

In many phone-in radio shows and television shows that I have done on this subject, that 75 per cent figure is approximately the ratio in which the respondents on the radio and television shows presented their arguments. About 70 to 75 per cent of people phoning in to radio and TV shows that I have done supported liberalizing the law with regard to physician assistance in dying.

It is time that this Parliament acted on this issue. It is rare that such a large proportion of Canadians are of a common mind about anything, especially an issue of this importance. It is time that this House responded to that very large majority view.

Over the last little while we have seen some tragic cases in which Canadians have had to plead to courts to have the permission to end their lives when they are living in intolerable pain and suffering.

There was the Nancy B. case in which it was felt necessary to have court-sanctioned permission for the physician to remove Nancy B. from her life support systems. Surely that sort of trial and turmoil for a patient, for a person living in great pain and great suffering toward the end of their life is undignified and should not be required in Canada.

Most recently, we have seen the case of Sue Rodriguez. I do not think anybody in this Chamber or many Canadians would want to have to go through the same torture she is going through in trying to get permission to ask a physician to assist her in ending her life when she concludes that her quality of life is such that she can no longer continue. She wants to have the opportunity to have the assistance of a physician to end her life, and we know what she is having to go through in order to obtain that.

Surely that is undignified in Canada. Surely it is uncaring and uncompassionate. Surely it is something that we have to do something about.

We have been called upon to act in this matter by the Chief Justice of British Columbia, Chief Justice McEachern, who in a decision which considered the issues carefully and with great compassion, argued that while in individual cases a court could respond appropriately the issue should be dealt with at the level of national public interest because, after all, that is where it needs to be addressed.

We are really asking for people to have the right to choose to end their lives under very restrictive circumstances. We are also asking for physicians who assist in that act in that compassionate and caring situation to be protected from criminal sanction.

The Chief Justice of British Columbia has urged this House to act, and this House has the opportunity to respond positively to the motion of my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam.

At the moment we have a situation in which the only restraints on physician assistance in dying are contained in physicians' codes of ethics. We know that across this country patients are assisted in the dying process by physicians every day. We also know that physicians are concerned about the repercussions of potential criminal sanction as a result of responding to their patient's wishes. It is time that we allowed those physicians who act on their patient's wishes out of compassion and caring to do so without fear of criminal sanction.

It would be a progressive response for this House to respond positively to the member's motion. I congratulate the member on bringing this issue to the House of Commons. It is not every day that controversial issues are raised by members of Parliament.

• (1115)

It is appropriate that the House of Commons is faced with these difficult issues because it is surely a question for society as a whole to respond to, and this House through its legislative powers and responsibilities lays down what is appropriate for society in many respects.

Is it not the time for us to say that people who are nearing the end of their lives and whose quality of life is unacceptable to them because of the physical or emotional pain and suffering they face, because the prognosis is so negative and because they want to speed the dying process, should have the right to do so? Is it any longer critical for Canada to say that they cannot do that, that they cannot ask someone to assist them in doing it, and that if they do then the person who assists them will be liable for a criminal offence?

I believe our society has progressed to the level at which we can say that it is not a reprehensible act that should be punished by a criminal penalty and that we should respond in a caring and compassionate way to people like Sue Rodriguez, Nancy B. and the many other Canadians faced with the same tragedy who merely want the opportunity to end their pain and suffering.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am rising in opposition to this motion. I do not think it is a progressive measure to enshrine into the law of this land a motion that supports euthanasia.

I want to begin by saying that I have deep respect for the member who sponsored this motion and for the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing whom I just finished listening to. My opposition to this motion not only results from a personal experience but also from views that I have heard from many of my constituents.

I would like to begin by talking about a personal experience that has caused me to believe that this is not the right way to go. It was the spring of 1988 and I was returning from a holiday in Cuba. I came off the plane and my wife said to me: "Your father has been in the hospital for the last three days and you should go down and see him". I said: "Well, when you say it like that there must be something serious going on here". She said: "He is not well".

From the tone of her voice I knew that something was up and so I rushed right away to St. Michael's Hospital in Toronto and I walked into the room. My father was a very young man, more like a brother than a father to me for most of our relationship. I said: "Well, Dad, what's up?" He said: "I have three months to live". He had lung cancer. After I asked him, in moments of frustration, if he had examined all the options—there are great doctors and great research in this country and in the United States—he said: "Listen, while you have been away I have gone through all of this. The prognosis is that I have 90 days, maximum 120".

After a couple of hours of real bitterness and frustration on my part I then went through an experience in which over the next 90 days I watched my father die. He moved from his home in the country, from the farm, into our home, into my own bedroom, for about 60 days before we moved him into the palliative care unit at St. Mike's. I believe that those days, not only for him but for me and many others around him, were very special moments even though we knew his life was coming to an end.

• (1120)

The first reaction by those of us who are not suffering is obviously one of care and compassion for the person. We do not want them to continue suffering, and naturally we do not want to be someone who is promoting that. That is not where I am coming from.

I believe that life, even in its most painful form and at its loneliest moment, is something precious and meaningful and not for us to make a judgment on as to when it should end, especially when the judgment is to be made by someone who in his or her natural state is low and in pain.

The last hours in the personal experience I had were very meaningful to my father who was in pain. Today we have lots of medication and support systems, but even those last hours were precious and meaningful. Had we co-operated in perhaps a moment of weakness on his part when he might have said he wanted his life to end today or next week, we would have denied him a joy that he experienced right to the end. I certainly know we all experienced that joy.

I hear this from many other people who have had similar experiences. It is not that we do not have compassion for a person who is suffering. It is not that we do not care about a person who is suffering. Viktor Frankl is probably one of the best psychiatrists in the world. He developed a therapy called logotherapy where one can develop a meaning and a satisfaction at that most desperate moment in one's life. Somehow we should be putting more support, more time and more energies into that type of support system for a person who is facing the prognosis of death, of eternity.

For that reason, the reason being that life for me is precious and should be supported with all the forces and energies we have, we should not be the ones who support an interruption of it. For that reason I cannot support this bill.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to stand for a few minutes to offer some comments on this issue. I commend the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam for bringing it before the House.

It is an issue about which Canadians will have to give an awful lot of thought over the next few months and indeed few years. I am sure my hon. friend in bringing the issue forward has done so because he has a great interest in justice issues as well as moral issues. This issue has been brought before the public recently by the Rodriguez case in British Columbia. That may or may not have stimulated my hon. friend to bring forward his motion, but I notice he spoke to that case in his remarks. We are also mindful of the case in Quebec a year ago.

The issue in my judgment is a very complicated one. There are a lot of issues, moral and otherwise, connected to it. Members will no doubt speak to that.

• (1125)

I am not sure in my own mind that there has been a lot of public discussion about this issue. When there is an emotional news story it captures public attention for a period of time and then goes away. Sometimes it leads to the kind of serious debate now before Parliament on this very controversial subject. Sometimes the story comes, goes, passes and is forgotten.

I would hope the Rodriguez case would stimulate the kind of serious discussion I feel we need on this issue in Canada. In a way it is a right to life issue, not dissimilar in the moral context to the issue of abortion and the issue of capital punishment. By contrast those issues have received perhaps too much discussion in this country. I know all members of Parliament have received representations on those subjects for many years.

I have to say honestly that I have not received calls from any of my constituents on this issue. It is not because my constituents do not feel strongly on the issue. It is because I think the issue has become the subject of very extensive and serious dialogue among Canadians.

This has to happen because it is an issue concerning changes in medical technology and our ability to keep people alive. Sometimes I think we have developed it almost to an industry of keeping people alive no matter how miserable they may be. As a nation we will have to face that issue just as it is being faced in other countries.

We are all mindful of what is going on at the present time in Holland and the legislative changes taking place there. With all due respect, Holland is not Canada. This is a moral issue about which Canadians will have to speak. I fully expect as on all moral issues that Canadians will be as divided on this one as they are on the issues of abortion and capital punishment.

However what is important is that we start to focus serious public attention on the issue, and that is where the motion by my hon. friend does a very important public service to Canada. Whether this motion is voted up or voted down, what is significant is that the issue has been brought before Parliament. For that I thank him and I commend him.

I do not know what my own position on it is. A lot of people will be motivated perhaps by their religious beliefs. The Bible is fairly explicit: Thou shall not kill. Of course the implication of this motion is to kill. Perhaps it is a mercy killing. Perhaps it is relieving somebody of misery from which there really is no end except through death. Indeed arguments can be made in that context.

As for myself I am not motivated totally by that concept so much as by the mere issue in my mind of whether it is appropriate for government in a democratic country to authorize citizens to kill each other. I know that is not put in the context meant by my hon. friend's motion, but that certainly is one interpretation.

What is the role of physicians in society? If we go back to the Hippocratic oath or whatever, is it to save life or is it to relieve pain? I am not a physician. I am not going to tell physicians what their perception of their role should be. I guess what I am saying is that it is premature for Parliament to speak on this issue. I honestly do not feel that there has been adequate debate in Canadian society on this issue. After that debate has taken place, perhaps a Canadian view will emerge that favours a move in the direction they are going in Holland. Perhaps Canadians will say no, that it does not reflect the value important to us as Canadians.

Each member of this House will have to decide ultimately where he or she stands. Most I assume would want to know what their constituents' feelings are with respect to the issue. Because somebody is for or against capital punishment or abortion would not automatically determine whether he or she is for or against establishing some legislative basis by which euthanasia should occur.

In summary I want to say it is important Parliament and government examine the issue and what the views of Canadians may or may not be on the subject. It would be premature for Parliament to vote in an overt direction of saying it is ready to commit Canada to a legislative basis for euthanasia. I do not think Canadians are ready for that decision to be taken.

• (1130)

I think it would be premature for Parliament to make that decision. Therefore I will be voting against the resolution though I do so with some reservation. Again, when I make that point I know my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam and my colleague from Fraser Valley East spoke very eloquently on this. A private member's bill has been brought before this House on the same subject. However, I think at this point it is premature. We need to give this issue more focus. The day will come when Parliament will in a serious legislative way have to face this issue and make a decision.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us of my colleague, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, is an important one. It is an issue which I am sure causes a great deal of anguish and personal difficulty to many members of the House.

Any subject that deals with personal, spiritual, religious and moral values is always a difficult issue to deal with in a public place and in a permanent way and Parliament is within the limits of any human act. It is one institution that is called upon to render those kinds of judgments.

It is important to recognize first of all the subject of this motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of euthanasia and, in particular, of ensuring that those assisting terminally ill patients who wish to die not be subject to criminal liability.

It is important to recall that there are at least four members of Parliament from both sides of this House, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, the member for Fraser Valley West, and the member for Burnaby—Kingsway, who have motions along these lines before this House. There may be other members.

It suggests to me and I would suspect to most other members that there is a feeling in our communities that Parliament should be asked to render a careful judgment on this issue in the not too distant future.

There is the case in British Columbia of Sue Rodriguez who suffers from ALS, Lou Gehrig's disease, and her struggle before the courts and on the cameras. It has brought to the attention of the Canadian people, from one end of the country to the other, the very agonizing choices people feel compelled to make.

In the speech of my colleague whose motion this is he pointed out: "People used to die at home mainly of communicable diseases. They received good palliative care from concerned family and friends. Now people die in hospitals surrounded by batteries of life-saving equipment. Seventy-five per cent of deaths are caused by chronic degenerative diseases such as cancer, heart disease, AIDS, strokes and Alzheimer's disease".

The change in circumstances that paragraph outlines has taken place in the issue of life or death. People choose to continue to exercise their option and their choice for life has changed dramatically over the last number of years, even in the last very few years.

I know people in my area, and others from whom I have heard by letter and by phone, generally have indicated they feel that technology has changed to such an extent that some of the religious values that at one time were imposed and generally accepted now have to be called into question. The nature of life itself has changed because of our technology.

I suggest that people are asking us to act with care and flexibility. The courts are asking us to act and render a decision. Surely in light of the knowledge we have, our consciences must demand that we act. How we act is a different question. But if we move ahead with this motion and if it were to receive the support of this House, all that it asks us to do is to consider the advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of euthanasia. In particular this would be to ensure that those assisting terminally ill patients who wish to die would not be subject to criminal liability.

Surely, unless we feel a very strong religious compulsion to deny people the choice in any circumstances, we ought to be able to give our support to such a motion. It simply asks the government and, through the government, Parliament and all Canadians to seriously consider the many issues and come up with the most carefully designed legislation and guidelines that we can.

We are not an ecclesiastical court. If we were, we might be justified in saying no, but we are not. Therefore we must ask ourselves whether we have the right to deny a human being who, being of sound mind, determines that at a given point of artificially induced continuation of life they wish to terminate it rather than continue in a state of existence they find unbearable. I suggest the answer is no. We do not have the right to deny them that choice, a choice that only they should make.

If they have requested technical or medical assistance in exercising that free choice and that choice has been witnessed after a period of extensive personal and family counselling which we have a right to insist upon, then they ought to have that choice.

I am concerned, as I am sure many members are with the possible consequences of precipitate decisions taken by individuals but we can deal with that. I am also concerned by the potential misuse by third parties if we should begin on this road but we can deal with that. Speaking for myself, however, I have no right to impose my religious or spiritual values upon others of sound mind in the exercise of their judgment on what is surely the most important and most personal decision a person may feel compelled to make: the question of life or death.

In concluding my remarks I simply say again that it is an agonizing and moral choice, such as are the issues of capital punishment and abortion. However, we must remember that we are not an ecclesiastical court. We are the freely elected spokespersons of the Canadian body politic. They are concerned with this decision. They are concerned with its implications.

All that my colleague has asked in this motion is that the government address it without deadlines. Government should address it clearly and carefully, with the maximum of public input and consideration for all of those values we hold to be important.

I most sincerely urge all of my colleagues to give their support to this most important motion before us.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I will probably find this somewhat difficult to express, but I must speak on this issue. It is a moral issue as far as I am concerned. It is not just an ordinary situation.

I suspect that most of us in this House have at one time or another had a loved one who suffered seriously in his or her dying weeks or months. That is very difficult to accept and it is very difficult to forget.

However, we were given no guarantees when we were born, when we were conceived. We were not told that we were going to be happy all our lives or that we would suffer no pain. It seems to me that if we deviate from what I have studied and what I have learned with regard to life and its sanctity, then I cannot vote for a motion that would take a human life. To do so, to me, would be murder. To do so, to me, would be a betrayal of all of the things I have tried to stand for in my personal and public lives. Therefore, if this motion comes before the House for a vote, I will naturally be voting against it.

• (1140)

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was not intending to rise today but I think it is important that we acknowledge the assistance the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has given us by bringing forward this motion. I have difficulty with the motion and I believe that most members in the House will have difficulty with the motion.

The whole question of euthanasia is something we are always faced with. It really is a question of whether, as a House, we are going to change the rules with respect to suicide and assisted suicide and where we would draw the lines. I suggest it is not a matter I am prepared to come out and be affirmative on at this stage. I believe my constituents would want to have a fair amount of opinion on the matter. One of the advantages of this debate is at least it brings it to the attention of the public.

I want to make a couple of comments. First, it has always been our law that a person is not entitled to take their own life. If that is the case, then they should not be entitled to have someone else take it for them. After all, life itself is sacred and the taking of life is itself a crime. The issue is whether the taking of life should be made not a crime under certain circumstances.

Surely it is as much a crime to take the life of someone who may be terminally ill as to take the life of someone who says: "I no longer wish to live in this world, will you assist me in killing myself?" Where do we draw the line between terminally ill because of disease or terminally in trouble because of a state of mind?

Where do we draw the line as to what is the real state of mind of someone who is terminally ill physically? Do they really want to end their life or do they only temporarily want to end their life as they go from one state of mind to another? Are they really suffering or are they in communion with God and with the hereafter, as we may want to put it? I do not know. We do not know. However, we have for a long time in our society provided that a person is not entitled to terminate their life and not entitled to have someone else terminate it for them.

We have all had members in our families who have been exceptionally ill. They have not known where they were and have clearly been in pain. It is so easy to pull the plug and kill them.

• (1145)

I do not think we have the right. We would certainly have to think very long and hard if we were to change the way our society has developed with respect to the right to life and the belief in life. Belief in life is a sacred and continuing thing.

I will be voting no on this motion today. I think it is important we discuss the matter but I do not think it is the time today for us to ask the government to legislate on euthanasia.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I intend to use only a few minutes of my speaking time and leave the rest for my colleague, the mover of the motion.

I welcome this opportunity to support my colleague's motion, and I think there are three questions we should ask ourselves. First, do we need this kind of legislation? I think it is clear that we do. Just consider Sue Rodriguez and Nancy B. in Quebec, and so many other cases we have seen. At the very least we should consider the advisability of legislation on euthanasia for people who ask for assistance in bringing about their own death when their condition is such that they would rather die than go on living.

The second question: Is this proposal premature? I do not think so. We may not talk about this problem all the time, but it is nevertheless a very real problem in society today. It is the kind of problem that requires legislation or at least a discussion on its advisability. Gallup and other polls have shown that nearly 70 per cent of respondents agree there should be legislation on euthanasia. I do not think it is premature.

The third question, to which I think we must answer yes, is: Will there be a positive impact as a result of this legislation? The answer is a resounding yes, because if we look at the Netherlands which passed its own legislation, there has been no abuse whatsoever. What we want above all is to be able to get a medical decision and ensure that the last wishes of a patient who would rather die than go on living are respected.

Do we need this kind of legislation? The answer is yes. Is it premature? No. Will it have positive consequences? The answer is yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I just wanted to point out that when the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam is recognized, he will be exercising his right to reply and will be the last speaker on the motion. The hon. member has four minutes, until 11.52 a.m., when the proceedings on this motion are to expire.

The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I want to say first of all that I am very proud of this House of Commons. This is the third hour of debate and the level has been superb. It has been thoughtful, passionate and relevant from all sides, no matter which of the two positions people have come down on. It has been a marvellous debate.

I just mention the hon. member for Don Valley West and my colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap, who made passionate speeches about their own personal life. We have heard very moving speeches, today from the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, and the other day from the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

• (1150)

This issue belongs in Parliament. Two judges in the Supreme Court of British Columbia said that we should deal with it. We are dealing with it and this House has to have the courage to deal with it.

I think the vote this evening is only the beginning. No matter which way the vote goes, and I hope it will be a free vote and members will vote different ways, it is the beginning of Parliament facing this issue.

I crafted the motion delicately so that it would be open to the government to bring in legislation. There is a direction and it is a direction in the way that it was referenced to the Rodriguez case.

Parliament is dealing with it and I predict a future government will have to deal with it. If this government does not deal with it, eventually the people will expect Parliament to deal with it.

We cannot expect sick and dying people to be dragging themselves through the courts. Parliament has to deal with this issue. It belongs in Parliament. That is what we are here for. We have to deal with these tough issues. We have got to do it.

I have had comments from my riding. I want to read a letter: "I am writing to you to thank you for the support you are giving Mrs. Rodriguez in her request to die. I have a prostate tumour which could put me in a position where I am not much use to anyone and suffer a great deal of pain. This is what happened to an older brother of mine. His was not an easy cross to bear".

These are real issues. These are family issues. Our families and our friends have had to deal with these issues. Medical technology allows people to hang on and on and they die in hospital surrounded by tubes and new equipment. People want to die with dignity. That is what the issue really is.

I want to quote Tom Harpur, writing in this weekend's The Toronto Star:

> The truth is, Sue Rodriguez's fight to have doctor-assisted suicide made legal under certain specific, clear and out-in-the-open conditions is not just for her own sake but for the lives of all who may well one day find themselves in a similar situation. In any other field, those who endure loneliness, suffering and abuse for the sake of others are called heroes, heroines or saints. It's time we rallied behind her and recognized what this woman is really all about.

It is an issue for all of us. It is an issue we are going to have to deal with. It is an issue we are dealing with. It is a family issue. It is a life issue. It is the quality of life and the quality of death.

I will end the debate with a quote from Sue Rodriguez to this Parliament. She said:

> Despite my losses, I do not want pity. All I ask of my fellow Canadians is understanding and compassion. Understanding that they too may some day be in a position similar to mine.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 11.52 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 93, the time provided for debate has expired.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): By unanimous consent, the recorded division is deferred until six o'clock p.m. later today.

[Translation]

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North) moved:

> That this House condemns the government for its policies that have stifled economic growth, destroyed Canadian jobs and exacerbated the recession.

He said: Mr. Speaker, today I want to talk about my hope for the future, my faith in the Canadian people and my desire to bring about change in this country. I want to speak about those Canadians who work hard, pay their bills, raise their families, help their communities, hope for a better future and are committed to Canada.

In the past four years I have travelled extensively throughout the country listening to the voices of the people. What I have heard is of great concern to me. Canadians are losing hope. Four years ago almost to the day I stood in this place to deliver my first speech as a member of Parliament. I spoke then about an agenda for change, an agenda that challenged this generation as previous dilemmas challenged our forefathers.

Four years ago I saw that agenda in the face of the single mother who with her children was compelled to stand outside the local food bank for their daily meal. I saw it in the apprehension felt by the factory worker who understood the personal threat imposed by Mulroney's insensitive free trade deal. I saw it in the inequity of Conservative budgets which have unfairly overburdened our working middle class families while rewarding the chosen few. I saw it in the attitude of our young graduates who despite their academic achievements still encountered a cold and indifferent world. I saw it in a country as rich as ours in people with no shelter, no food.

In 1993, four years later, there are more food banks than ever before. Workers are still waiting for adjustment programs and the promised job opportunities. The middle class is paying more taxes than ever before. Young people are faced with rising unemployment and there are more homeless people. We are living in very difficult times.

I could for the next while talk about the government's inability to reduce the public debt which now stands at $422 billion. It was $168 billion when the Conservative government took over. I could also speak at length about the inability of this government to address the deficit challenge, the human tragedy of over two million people on welfare, and 1.6 million people on the unemployment rolls.

• (1205)

I could speak about the declining after-tax income of the average Canadian family, the 38 tax increases imposed since 1984. I could perhaps speak about the 325,000 manufacturing jobs we lost since 1989, the 206,000 bankruptcies we witnessed since 1990 and the one million Canadian children who live in poverty.

These are all very depressing statistics. However do not forget that this situation did not happen by accident. The Conservative government made some very basic and fundamental economic policy mistakes, among them fighting inflation at all costs, high real interest rates, a high Canadian dollar and a free trade agreement without adjustment programs.

Today I want to talk to you about something different. I want to talk about how we can turn this country around.

As a Canadian born in the 1960s, a husband and father of two young children, I am much more concerned about the future than the past. It is for this reason I will concentrate my remarks on the future of this country and the Liberal Party's approach to deal with the future. There is no question a new approach is required.

A Liberal government understands that in the emerging global economy everything is mobile: capital, factories, even entire industries. The only resource that is really rooted in a nation and the ultimate source of wealth is its people. The only way Canada can compete is to have the best educated, best trained work force in the world, linked by the most advanced communication and technological infrastructure.

As a nation we cannot afford to have 30 per cent of our high school students drop out before completing high school, at a rate of 100,000 a year. That is one million in a decade. We have over 400,000 young people unemployed at a time when over 300,000 jobs go unfilled because we do not have people who possess the required skills.

In order to develop these skills we will work with the provinces, business and labour to establish a national apprenticeship program, provide tax incentives for on-the-job training and create a Canada youth service.

Our priority will be to focus on our country's resource, our people. That means investing in people and providing Canadians with a comprehensive adjustment strategy. Canadian workers who have been displaced by the forces of globalization are prepared to adjust and desperately want to. We are committed to helping them because we feel that government has a role to play where market forces fail. Our responsibility is to provide workers with opportunity, and in turn their responsibility is to make the most out of those opportunities.

Developing an effective adjustment program strategy is absolutely necessary as we attempt to develop a life-long learning culture that can easily adapt to change.

We must restore Canada's industrial capacity. Three hundred thousand jobs have been lost in recent months and those jobs are not coming back. We must create an environment to inspire confidence so that new jobs are created. Government must reward the people who work hard at creating new jobs, starting new businesses and investing in our people and plants. We must shift the focus from shrinking the economy to expanding the economy. That means jobs with futures in industries with futures.

• (1210)

The small and medium sized business sector, which creates most new jobs, is an integral part of our strategy. We will help small businesses with initiatives to assist them in bringing new products to markets, to speed up technology acquisition and to export to markets they have never before considered. In conjunction with the provincial governments, we will work toward reducing the regulatory burden which creates unnecessary problems for our small and medium sized enterprises.

We will also challenge Canada's major banks to give small business a break and to develop concrete measures to help small and medium sized businesses get the financing they need.

We would further reform the Small Businesses Loans Act and make it easier for small business to get equity financing. This will help small business and the economy to grow.

I fundamentally reject the solutions of yesterday. I favour policies which speak to the future. I believe in government activism, which means I reject the laissez-faire policies of the Conservative government. While I accept that government cannot do everything alone, it does have a role in fostering stable economic growth.

While we actively participate in the economy, we will commit ourselves to a strict and accountable set of fiscal guidelines. We need fiscally responsible government. If the debt escalates much further it will paralyse future governments.

We are committed to fiscal responsibility. We are committed to unwavering discipline in controlling federal expenditures. We are committed to holding off on new programs that do not contribute directly to the promotion of economic growth and jobs. We are committed to a reduction in the deficit both in absolute terms and as a percentage of the gross domestic product. We are committed to reducing the national debt as a percentage of gross domestic product.

These commitments will move us in the right direction and will help us restore the confidence required in the international community. We must address the debt and deficit problem. It is a national priority.

As a party that has been a leader in the area of global trade we are committed to open and fair trade. The major focus of our trade policy is to secure and increase access to world markets while at the same time securing a better life for our people. Consequently our approach to the negotiation of future trade agreements must be one that deals effectively with human concerns like environmental standards, health and safety standards and working conditions.

The Tories have proven in two trade agreements that they cannot negotiate in Canada's interest. The NDP on the other hand refuses to accept the global reality.

We understand full well that one in five Canadian jobs is directly dependent on exports and we certainly want to be leaders in global trade. Our approach is distinctively different. We are deeply concerned about the development of regional trading blocs. If a North American trading bloc is emerging we recognize that Canada must play an active and independent role in defining that bloc.

We took the position that NAFTA negotiations be utilized to improve the terms of the FTA. Instead the NAFTA in the form agreed to by the government would completely scrap the working group on subsidies and dumping. In addition the government did not correct the energy giveaway in the FTA. The Conservatives have allowed Mexico protection for its energy resources that Canada itself does not have.

A Liberal government will seek changes to both the free trade agreement and the North American free trade agreement. We need a subsidy code, an anti-dumping code, a more effective dispute resolution mechanism, agreed upon labour standards, agreed upon environmental standards and the same energy protection as Mexico.

• (1215)

In addition, the Mulroney government has yet to introduce any adjustment assistance program to help Canadian workers and firms adapt to greater trade liberalization.

As well as improving the terms of NAFTA, Canada should be working with other countries in the western hemisphere to minimize dominance by larger and stronger trading partners. We would work to build common western hemisphere institutions to provide political, demographic and economic counterweights to the United States.

While we must seize opportunities to trade in the Americas, we would not turn our backs on the rest of the world. A Liberal government would work to expand trade in the Pacific basin and with the European Community. We support the Canada-Japan 2000 forum co-chaired by Peter Lougheed which has recently chartered a course for expanding trade with the Pacific basin.

Throughout its two terms in office, the Conservative government's economic agenda has been dominated by free trade. We recognize that trade policy is no substitute for sound domestic policy. Monetary, fiscal investment, training, education and research policies go hand in hand with trade policies. The Conservatives have failed to recognize this reality.

We need a fair tax system. No one can promise across the board tax cuts. That would be irresponsible. We can commit ourselves to tax fairness for every Canadian, especially to middle-class families who have borne the brunt of the tax increases since 1984.

The Conservatives have attacked us for our position on the GST. Here are the facts. The Conservatives have raised or imposed new taxes on individuals 38 times since 1984. The GST, the most hated tax in Canadian history, was imposed on Canadians without proper consultation. It was imposed on small business despite its opposition. It was imposed on the provinces over their objections.

The GST destroyed public confidence in the fairness of tax systems. It has expanded the underground economy. It has undermined consumer confidence, lengthening and deepening the recession. It is complex and costly for small business to administer and takes an army of bureaucrats to collect. It has made federal-provincial fiscal relations much more difficult.

We are left to clean up their mess. Unlike the Conservatives, who railroaded the GST through Parliament, we will implement a replacement in full consultation with individual Canadians, the business community and the provinces.

Unlike the New Democratic Party which thinks it can cancel the GST and have $15 billion fall from the sky, we acknowledge that the only responsible course is to replace the revenue brought in by the goods and services tax.

In the first session of a new Parliament, we will mandate the all-party Commons finance committee to consult Canadians and provincial governments on all the options to the current GST and report to Parliament within 12 months. Our objective is clear. We must find ways to generate equivalent revenues that are fair to consumers, easier to administer for small business and promote federal-provincial co-operation.

I think it is fitting that I started my remarks by talking about the future. I would like in my concluding remarks to speak about young people.

In the past four years, I have travelled throughout Canada listening to the voices of our young people. Instead of the unlimited future that my generation was fortunate to have, today's youth are confronted by diminishing opportunities. They are frustrated by an education system that cannot help the 100,000 high school students who lose hope and drop out every year. This is a system that fails to address the high illiteracy and innumeracy rates that afflict our youth. Young people worry about not having the skills needed to find jobs in tomorrow's knowledge-based economy and they cannot understand why the federal government will not provide them with opportunities.

• (1220)

Young Canadians are deeply troubled by this state of affairs. They are desperate for a new vision for Canada, a vision that will restore their hope and show them a future.

The Leader of the Opposition and the Liberal team are determined to restore hope and offer a future to Canada's youth. We are determined to get our economy moving again, rebuild Canada's economic leadership, create highly skilled, highly paid jobs and reclaim our future for our children.

The Liberal team will create a society that will be able to compete globally, protect the environment and provide opportunities for its members. Young people are an important part of our vision. That is why the Leader of the Opposition and the Liberal team are committed to giving them the tools they need to build the future and the new economy, an economy where young people will be full partners.

We call on all our economic partners, business, labour, all levels of government, communities and individuals to join us in a program to eradicate illiteracy and innumeracy among our youth. We call on them to help us promote co-operative education, to encourage work place training, and to help us develop national educational strategy goals.

The Liberal Party is committed to establishing a national apprenticeship training program and to creating a Canadian youth service dedicated to environmental protection and responding to the social needs of our community.

Like all Canadians, young people understand that the future is not a gift, it is an accomplishment. Together we know we can make a difference. Together we will make it happen. It is clear that we are ready to govern and bring about the type of positive change that Canadians are requesting.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the enormous program of the Liberal Party. It sounded to me like a rehash of some of the things we determined to do back in 1983 and 1984 and have accomplished.

I was wondering if the member could tell us so we could get it on the record for once whether or not his party is in favour of carrying on with the free trade agreement currently in place with the United States.

After he answers that, could he also tell us whether or not he will be voting in favour of a North American free trade agreement that may include Mexico and eventually Chile, Argentina and Brazil? Does he want to have, in other words, a party addressed to world trade even if that trade is just North American trade? To what extent is his party a free trade party, or is his party a protectionist party?

Will he please tell us where he stands and where his party stands?

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Mississauga South for his question.

I can simply tell the hon. member that we stand on the side of Canadians, on the same side as all those workers who lost their jobs in the manufacturing sector and are still waiting for this government to do the honourable thing, to introduce adjustment programs for those workers who have been displaced.

In a very short time this government has clearly indicated to Canadians that it does not stand on their side. We have been waiting for years for those programs to be implemented.

As for the question of—

Mr. Blenkarn: Answer yes or no.

Mr. Bevilacqua: I see that the hon. member for Mississauga is getting quite excited about the speech which I delivered which clearly outlined the direction we are going.

Unlike the past, they were waiting for an opposition speech that was just going to oppose their policies. I tell them, and I do not think they are ready for this, that there is a new Liberal Party out there that is going to promote modern policies as I have done today.

• (1225)

On the issue of global trade, let us not kid ourselves. Something that is fundamental to Liberal economic policy is the fact that we are great believers in global trade. We will take all measures necessary to bring about the type of export trade and relationship between Canada and other western hemisphere countries whereby Canadians will have jobs for the 21st century.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had heard everything here in this House, but I must say a renaissance of the Liberal Party with the help of Camil Samson or Don Johnston stretches the imagination somewhat.

I had a meeting not long ago with the Quebec Food Retailers Association, and I would like to ask the hon. member a question about the tax on cigarettes in Canada.

Food retailers in Quebec are complaining that the excise tax on cigarettes in Canada is so high that it encourages smuggling. According to Quebec retailers, both levels of government—federal and provincial—should reduce taxes to make smuggling less profitable. They believe this would reduce crime in an area where the situation is comparable to what happened under prohibition in the United States.

Like my colleagues, I would appreciate a clear answer from the hon. member. If he wants a healthy economy and a low crime rate, would he approve of reducing taxes on cigarettes in order to fight crime linked to smuggling?

[English]

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, we as a party are reviewing the tax act simply because we have to look at modern day reform so that we can have a fair and more just tax system, unlike the one that the Conservative government has implemented.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important debate today because it gives us an opportunity to put the facts before the House as to just what is going on in this country.

The Conservative government and the members opposite seem to have this illusion that the country is doing really well. I want to put a couple of facts before the House today and then ask my colleague to respond as to what the Liberal Party's position is on this particular issue.

For example, business bankruptcies in Canada in 1990 were 11,642 and in Ontario they were 2,907. In 1991, business bankruptcies in Canada were 13,496 and in Ontario 3,629. In 1992, business bankruptcies in Canada increased to 14,317, and in Ontario they increased to 4,240. I would suggest with the way things are going that in 1993 either there will be no businesses left to go bankrupt or there will be an increase to a record number in 1993 as well.

I would like to ask my colleague the following. One of the issues that the Tories like to talk about is that they are the party that represents the business community and in fact represents small business. I would like to know why it is that the Tory party and the government have not seen fit to help the small business community in this country, where we know jobs are created, to deal with these record numbers of bankruptcies and these record numbers of job losses. I would like to know if there is another way of approaching this which will be much more appropriate so that we can get the record number of people who are unemployed in this country under this particular regime back to work.

• (1230)

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his question. Fundamentally, there is a need for doing new things in this country and we must engage the small business community.

There is a whole new world out there in relation to technology, for example. We as a government will attempt and will succeed is speeding up technology acquisitions by small businesses so that they can modernize the various industries. We will help them achieve new exports in markets they have never considered before.

The relationship between small business and the Liberal Party has been an excellent one over the years. That is because we have always been not on the back of small business but on its side.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity. I would like to ask my Liberal friend from York North a question.

He made a couple of comments relating to the team of the Leader of the Opposition. I think he called its commitment "the J.C. team's commitment to operate within certain guidelines or parameters". I hope his memory goes back to the early 1980s, about 1983. I am just wondering whether those economic parameters the Liberal Party is committed to are somewhere between zero and the 12 per cent inflation that we had then, between zero and the 24 per cent interest rates we had then, and between zero and the 13 per cent unemployment rate we had then. Are those the parameters the new Liberal Party commits itself to?

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, one thing I am going to do is tell the hon. member that we will in no way, shape or form imitate the provincial government in Ontario. It has created an unbelievable mess in the Ontario economy.

We are committed to bringing a new economy to Canada. That is our commitment. We will do it with fiscal responsibility, with progressive programs and with the type of economic changes in institutions and in government that will bring prosperity back to Canadians.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood is welcoming me this morning. I always enjoy seeing him sitting in the House heckling. I am sure he will do a fine job today as he usually does, along with his friend from Kenora—Rainy River. I am looking forward to participating in this debate.

I looked at this motion and could not believe it, even now after hearing that speech by my hon. friend from York North, who is a neighbour of mine in the political scene in Canada. He was talking about the new party. This fresh new Liberal Party is going to come here to Canada and save us from ourselves.

This fresh new party is led by an individual who was in the House of Commons when John Kennedy was president, when Harold Macmillan was prime minister of Great Britain and when de Gaulle was president of France. Instead of aftershave there is that faint smell of embalming fluid coming across from that side of the House. There is nothing new about that party, nothing at all.

My hon. friend talked about the tax system and how they are going to look at the tax system. I have news for him. This is his first term so he is probably not aware of what went on before or he has not studied it.

The last time the Liberals did that they appointed a royal commission on the economy. It was led by a very distinguished Canadian, a former parliamentarian, a Liberal cabinet minister by the name of the Hon. Donald Macdonald. He along with many fellow Canadians from all walks of life spent a number of years looking at the economy of this country and what had to be done. The report came out in late 1984. What did it recommend?

Mr. Mills: An adjustment program.

Mr. McDermid: It recommended a free trade agreement with the United States. It recommended a consumption tax. It recommended that we do away with the manufacturers' sales tax and have a consumption tax. It made other recommendations, including reducing the number of categories in income tax. All these have been accomplished by the present government. They have all been accomplished.

• (1235)

The hon. member said there was no consultation on the goods and services tax. That was the blatant statement he made today. Again, he was not here during that period from 1984 to 1988. Immediately after the recommendations came out from the royal commission many hearings were held by the finance committee, by the government across this country.

In 1986 three options were presented to the Canadian government. Consultation took place until 1988 when the government made the decision before the election that there would be a goods and services tax. Believe it or not, we campaigned on it in 1988. We laid it out to the Canadian people and we campaigned on it. As I remember, we had a very good majority government in 1988 and so we implemented the goods and services tax.

I understand the hon. member's enthusiasm being new here and I applaud him. In his comments he said he was going to accomplish all those wonderful things: deficit reduction and at the same time we are going to increase foreign aid; we are going to increase help to small business; we are going to increase adjustment programs; we are going to increase this, we are going to increase that; and, by the way, on the GST we are going to have a parliamentary committee look at it for a year and then maybe we will come up with an answer as to what we are going to do. If the parliamentary committee's recommendation were to keep it as it is, would they keep it as it is?

Would they keep it as it is if that was the recommendation? No answers. Let the record show there are no answers coming from over there, none whatsoever. Read that speech this morning. It is just wonderful platitudes.

I understand the depression coming from over there. There is a reek of fear from the benches across the floor because they are watching their political prospects fade as Canada's economy gets stronger which is to the real benefit of Canadians. That is why they are worried over there. They are also worried when the Conservatives come in with a new leader that they are going to be wiped clean. That is another thing to worry about, but we are not going to talk about that today because that is not included in the motion.

I heard the hon. member talk about a flawed free trade agreement and how terrible it is. They have seen Canadian exports reach a new record in January of $14.6 billion. We achieved the largest monthly merchandise trade surplus since March 1985. Last week Statistics Canada reported that employment rose in February, the ninth gain in the last 10 months. There are 156,000 more Canadians with jobs today than there were last August.

They do not like this kind of news. They sit over there yelling and screaming. They do not like good news. They want to keep everybody depressed in this country. They want to keep them down for their political advantage. They want everybody really feeling badly about themselves.

This morning I thought we were at a funeral listening to his speech. This did not sound like a brave new political party. It sounded like somebody moaning and groaning because he knows full well that his seat is in bad shape right now. It is in jeopardy and he knows it.

We are holding inflation at the lowest sustained level in decades. That is an achievement Canadians are taking to the bank.

Mr. Mills: You will not win a single seat in metro.

Mr. McDermid: The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood must have got up late this morning and did not read the latest Angus Reid poll. I am sorry. He must have missed that quite conveniently somehow on the weekend. He must have been up at his farm riding his horses or something all weekend and missed it.

An hon. member: That is why they are so edgy.

Mr. McDermid: The interest rate on a one-year conventional mortgage is back down to 7.25 per cent. That is half of what it was a couple of years ago. On a standard $100,000 mortgage that translates into a monthly saving of $480 or $5,700 a year. That is good news for Canadians. It is more disposable income in their pockets.

• (1240)

The other thing I am finding that Canadians are doing about that is they are making the same payments and paying down their mortgages much quicker. One family told me that with the change in the interest rates it is knocking five years off the length of time to pay their mortgage.

This is a distorted motion. It implies that the opposition members could advance policy alternatives that could have stopped a global recession that affected Canada. However they rarely specify these alternatives.

This morning there were no alternatives. They were all platitudes. It was all wishy-washy stuff. Anybody could stand up and say that. The hon. member did not say how he was going to do all these things. "We are going to help small business. We are going to help small business obtain technology". How? Through grants? Through loans? How are we going to do that? Tell us how we are going to do that. He does not know.

The policy agenda the Liberals have to offer is a matter of record. We just have to remember the seventies and early eighties.

I just picked up the red tide, The Toronto Star. The Liberal power in the city of Toronto is this great paper, The Toronto Star. Beland Honderich, when I spoke to him, did not shy away from that. He said: "I am Liberal and proud to be and I will keep pushing the Liberals as long as I can". Here is a great article: "Seeds of Disaster Planted in 1975". We know the fiscal record of the Liberals. The people know it too and they do not want them back.

Here is what the Liberals do. We heard it today.

An hon. member: Polls are for dogs.

Mr. McDermid: Oh thank you, John Diefenbaker, that was very good. Now the Liberals are quoting John Diefenbaker. I just heard the hon. member quote John Diefenbaker. That is great.

There are the Liberals and we heard it today. They believe that when the country has a problem they borrow more money. Their philosophy is: Do not worry about higher taxes tomorrow; just spend your way through the problems today and the hell with tomorrow. We had to pick up tomorrow and we know that tomorrow has to be thought of all the time. The leopard has not changed its spots. The Liberal leader and his mouthpiece today talked about deficit and debt control but did not dare identify a target.

The most he would say is that he would cut the deficit as a share of the gross domestic product. We have done that by half. Since we came in we have cut the deficit as a percentage of the gross domestic product by a half. How much will they cut it? Will it be a dollar, will it be 0.0001 per cent of the GDP? They are just not saying.

At least that other party over there, the New Democratic Party, as part of its pie in the sky program claims that it can cut the deficit by billions in five years. Nobody believes it, but that is what it says it can do.

Nobody in Canada nor in this government created the underlying problems that made Canada so vulnerable to a recession. What we have done is put in place solutions based on years of tough decisions and consistent effort to position Canada for growth in the 1990s and into the 21st century. If we want to see this growth continue and accelerate we must stick to the policies that are clearly proving their worth. These are policies that are reflected in the forecast by the OECD, representing 24 of the world's major industrial nations, that Canada will see the best growth of any G–7 country this year and next.

That is better than the U.S.

An hon. member: Wow.

Mr. McDermid: The hon. member sits there and says: "Wow". It is better than Japan, Germany, France, the United States, Italy and the United Kingdom. That is pretty damned good with the economic situation we have now. But oh, no. My hon. friend goes around moaning and groaning, with his face hanging down, about how terrible things are in this country.

The hon. member says that things are so bad and if we just elect the leader of the Liberal Party we will get out of it. That is all we have to do. I am going to say that his record as finance minister, his record on the Treasury benches, is one of the worst this country has ever seen. I am not sure he has the credentials to even lead a party, let alone be the Prime Minister of this country. That is for sure.

Let me remind the House of some of the economic realities we faced and the steps we had to take to repair the economic damage done by the previous government to set Canada on the path to sustainable economic growth and job creation.

• (1245)

The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood would like to see me resign. He would like to see me resign because I am such a threat to them.

There was a TV show once about the opposition called Fantasy Island. The rest of Canada lives in a world economy marked by two overriding economic realities: constantly increasing competition and growing national interdependence. No company or country can count on safe markets or secure customers.

The big breeze from Kingston just blew in. By golly the roads must be clear between Kingston and Ottawa. Look who has just arrived. The hon. member from Kingston just got here from—

Mr. Milliken: From committee.

Mr. McDermid: —committee. It is nice to see him up and around at this time of the day.

As well, no country is immune from global currents. We are all linked in a world-wide web of financial markets, shared economies and trade partnerships. This is particularly true for Canada because trade is our bread and butter. It supports one in four Canadian jobs. Yet both opposition parties have opposed the free trade agreement. They are talking about opposing NAFTA. Maybe they will not, maybe they will vote for NAFTA. Maybe they will support NAFTA yet. I should not jump to conclusions too fast.

Few of the major industrial economies are doing well. We are currently performing better than most, given that we saw fourth quarter growth of 3.5 per cent on an annual basis at a time when the German and British economies were shrinking and those of France and Italy were flat. Japan is expected to only grow by somewhere between 1.5 per cent and 3 per cent this year. The fact is that there is no way Canada can isolate itself from the consequences of global economic weakness. There is no way that our workers and companies can succeed and grow unless we become more competitive and more productive.

There was an interesting article in The Globe and Mail. In the "Money Matters and Amazing Facts" section the headline read: "Factories making more with fewer people". The article continued: "Companies that survived the recession did so mainly because they invested heavily in new machinery and equipment that would let them produce more with fewer people. As a result, factory output has increased by about 7 per cent in the past year even though the number of jobs is up by less than 1 per cent. And although the pace of job creation in manufacturing has picked up steam in recent months the trend to higher productivity is likely to continue for some time yet and always does".

Mr. Bevilacqua: A jobless recovery.

Mr. McDermid: My hon. friend says it is a jobless recovery. What he should be saying is that we have become more productive and therefore we can sell more in the world today. In selling more we are going to increase business and that will create employment. He must understand that is what follows. It has to follow. He does not understand that but it has to follow.

The hon. member must also understand that in every industrialized country in the world manufacturing jobs have decreased. Does the member deny that? Does the member deny that in the major industrialized countries in the world manufacturing jobs are disappearing? Does the member agree with that or not? He does not know. He does not know. He does not have a clue.

We remember when the Liberals were in power and spending $1.33 on programs for every dollar of tax revenue they brought in. We had to turn that around. We now have a surplus on our operating budget. It was tough to do and it is going to continue to be tough.

The Liberals are living in a dream world if they think they can carry on and not worry about deficits and debts.

Mr. Mills: He said it in his speech. We talked about it.

Mr. McDermid: He did. At the same time he talked about how many programs he was going to increase spending for but would not say where the money was coming from. He was going to cut taxes for the middle class. He was going to give more to small business. He was going to give more to foreign aid. He was going to do all these things and reduce the deficit. That is wonderful. We will be very interested in seeing this great smoke and mirrors achievement.

They can say all these things now very easily because they are in opposition and they are not going to be over here to implement them. All I can say is: Thank God for that.

• (1250)

He was talking about the GST today. He was saying that he was going to change the GST. They are not sure how they are going to change it, when they are going to change it and what it might be. They talk about maybe a hidden tax that will cover everything. That will be the GST two, the Grit's sneaky tax. That is what that stands for.

We took a lot of flak over implementing the GST. However, it was the right decision, our growing exports proved that point. The GST has reduced—

Mr. Milliken: Rubbish.

Mr. McDermid: Here is the expert from Kingston. A great businessman, he understands all this very well. The GST has reduced the cost of capital investment for firms by about 4 per cent. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association has estimated that by eliminating the federal sales tax manufacturers improved their competitive position by $3.5 billion in one year. These are not the government's figures, my figures, the finance minister's figures or the Prime Minister's figures but the Canadian Manufacturers' Association's figures.

Mr. Milliken: All at the expense of the consumer.

Mr. McDermid: Nonsense, absolute nonsense. In the 1992 budget we reduced personal and corporate income taxes and improved the capital cost allowance for manufacturing and processing firms.

Mr. Milliken: Tory times are tough times.

Mr. McDermid: Here we go. Here is the old cry. The opposition is in bad shape today. It is in terrible shape, not only in terms of ideas but politically. The Liberals know it. This week we heard their own leader talk about cry-babies and nervous nellies. He said: "Come on guys, buckle up. Come on, get behind me because I am a little nervous now too and I need all the propping up I can get".

We have taken some very tough decisions over the last nine years. They have not all been politically popular but they were revolutionary. It is beginning to be proven that we made the right decisions. Canada is going to come out of the recession that we have experienced over the last couple of years with flying colours. The Canadian people understand the fiscal situation and will be prepared to reward the Progressive Conservatives with another majority government this year. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to be constructive in my remarks to the member.

In mid-December the Minister of Finance made an economic statement. He put forward an idea called amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act. In his remarks the Minister of Finance made mention of the fact that the greatest hope for new job creation in this country lies with small business. We on this side of the House support that position.

When the piece of legislation, Bill C-99, came to this House we co-operated in committee and we co-operated in the House to put this bill through the House because we feel that the 960,000 small businesses eligible under this piece of legislation should be supported and should be encouraged.

With the previous initiative, the prosperity initiative, after second reading the government spent millions and millions of dollars promoting it, promoting the "we can do it" campaign.

• (1255)

This piece of legislation will go through all readings in the House of Commons. It is receiving royal assent today or tomorrow from the Senate. The government knows the bill is going through; it controls the Senate. If it is so committed to small business then why will it not communicate it to the people of Canada, to the small business people of Canada, the people who are thinking of going into business, the people who will create the jobs, who will end up moving from welfare rolls to job creation and paying taxes? Why will it not get behind its own legislation? In the last two weeks I have heard about no less than 20-odd small businesses that have gone to the Bank of Montreal, the Royal Bank, the CIBC and the list goes on. To this day everybody is saying: "We do not know about it".

I promoted this bill and I have been constructive on this bill. However the government is not communicating it and it is thereby frustrating its own efforts to put people back to work.

I ask the minister in a constructive way: Why will his government not communicate to the people of Canada that this piece of legislation exists?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, we will. There is no question about it, but comparing it with the "yes we can" campaign is kind of like comparing apples and oranges. There is no legislation dealing with the "yes we can" campaign. I am glad the hon. member supports that piece of work because I thought it was very good to highlight two Canadian companies that have done well. The hon. member knows full well, and I think he will agree with me, that every time we pick up the paper it says: "We have not been able to compete" or mentions that another company had closed or whatever.

We were trying to say to Canadians: "Don't get down. We have great companies in this country and, yes, we can," and instil some pride. A lot of those "yes we can" companies were small businesses.

Mr. Mills: Small Businesses Loans Act.

Mr. McDermid: The member had his little five-minute say. Let me answer the question in my own way, if I might. I did not interrupt him. Maybe he would give me the same courtesy.

Mr. Mills: He interrupted incessantly during my speech.

Mr. McDermid: He did with me too, so let us call it even. The "yes we can" program was a very successful program that was well received by the public, there is no question. However there was no legislation involved in it. We will promote it once this legislation is through and the minister of small businesses has met with the banks and has their assurance that they will work with the program. I think the banks want to see the legislation through before they start promoting it. It receives royal assent today or tomorrow, as the hon. member has pointed out, and we will be doing what is necessary to promote it because it is a very important piece of legislation.

We do not bring legislation to this House and then put it on the shelf and forget about it. The hon. member knows that. He is trying to make an issue out of something that really is not fair at all. Once the bill is passed, our government will do what is necessary. If we brought out brochures and information packages, et cetera, before this bill was passed the hon. member, his leader and the rest of them would be up on their feet moaning and groaning about being out ahead of a bill. How can we promote this stuff before the bill is passed?

It is a weak argument.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I have the feeling I am in a love-in between the other two parties. If I may perhaps have your attention.

I would just like to ask a question of my colleague. I followed what he said with a great deal of interest and many of the things he said were pretty factual.

What I would like to ask him concerns a problem I am having with this whole question of free trade. Small businesses that have contacted me are very much concerned about the new free trade agreement that we may have with Mexico and the United States. Some of the small business people have told me that they have already had their business negatively affected by free trade with the United States. I see the Conservative tradition being established by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence saying he is against the helicopters while the Minister of National Defence says she is in favour of the purchase of the helicopters. Perhaps the minister could respond in a very objective manner, even if it does not go along with the party's policy and the general response given on free trade. It is the following question.

• (1300)

Inasmuch as certain businesses are going to be affected, negatively I am sure, and the American government has asked that there be certain ironclad, parallel agreements before going further, does the minister not think it would be prudent for Canada, before we go any further with NAFTA, to seek similar types of guarantees—I am talking about environment, working conditions and so forth—and do that at this stage as the United States is doing?

There are two reasons. First, in a substantive sense it would help us be more protective of our own jobs. Second, in a symbolic sense it might show that we are demanding certain concessions from Mexico that the U.S. is demanding from Mexico. We are doing this in a united way. I am not talking about government policy or government response. In free trade, would it not be more prudent to wait for those parallel agreements to come about before we go further?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the short answer is no. I will expand on that if I might.

We requested accords much like those being debated now a year ago February. That is on record. There is no question about that. At that time the administration of the United States turned it down.

In a speech some time in October the then candidate for the Democratic Party, Bill Clinton, stated that he would like some side agreements on the environment, on labour and on what we call snap-back or provisions that would protect sudden surges from countries into their marketplace of certain products. We had no problem with that and we are at the table with them as an equal partner. The three countries are negotiating these things.

At the same time, the NAFTA is not going to be changed. That was reinforced again by the President and by the negotiator just in the last week. They are not going to change the NAFTA. These are separate agreements that are being negotiated. As a matter of fact, the one on the environment and so on is one that we had promoted for over a year. We feel very comfortable in sitting down and negotiating these with our two partners in the NAFTA.

Each legislative body in Mexico, the United States and Canada has started to examine the NAFTA. It has not been put on hold in any one of the jurisdictions, including the United States. That procedure is going on. We are saying that while these side agreements are going on, which will not affect the NAFTA one iota—it is not going to be amended—the procedure will take place because all three countries are committed to implementing it on January 1, 1994. Again that was reiterated by the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. Resuming debate.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, the member for Chambly and I are splitting the time.

I am pleased to be involved in the debate today on the opposition day's motion which says:

> That this House condemns the government for its policies that have stifled economic growth, destroyed Canadian jobs and exacerbated the recession.

• (1305)

It probably should have read depression, but it is a good start. It certainly is descriptive of the problem we find ourselves facing.

I would like to address some of the things brought in by this government which my party and I consider to have been so devastating: the free trade agreement, the proposed North American free trade agreement, deregulation, privatization and changes to unemployment insurance, not one devastating change but at least two of them. I should mention the off-loading on to the provinces. I will not go into all the ramifications of that, as well as the GST.

Certainly there have been clawbacks. I do not suppose there will be time to go into those in any great depth but there were the clawbacks of the seniors' pensions and the changes to family allowances for children just in case I do not get back to that topic. It certainly has crossed my mind to wonder why the government has to try to correct Canada's economic problems—and we will get to the source of those as well in a moment—on the backs of children and seniors.

I think I heard the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization say that for the most part what the government did was implement many of the proposals in the Macdonald royal commission which was set up originally by the Liberals. He was berating the Liberals for not having taken cognizance of what the commission that they themselves set up proposed for the country.

I would like to point out that in the context of the Macdonald royal commission, the then national director of the United Steel Workers of America was the co-chair and the director of the union to which I still belong and with which I was involved for quite some time, issued a minority report on that commission. I think that is important.

I also believe that I heard the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization quote an article from what he referred to as the "red paper". I think that is The Toronto Star. Being from the hinterland of Saskatchewan I am not too familiar with the eastern newspapers. The Toronto Star said that the seeds of disaster which confront Canada originated in 1975. I certainly would concur with that because of course the problems facing this country started under the Liberals and as the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization has admitted, continued under the Liberal-sponsored royal commission into their administration.

They do seem to have a certain affinity for each other. I noticed just a while ago we had a Question Period which I think could be described as a truce. Certainly the amount of heckling that went back and forth between those two parties subsided considerably. I think that was out of respect for each other's potential embarrassment if they got into too deep a discussion of any of the issues.

In the province of Saskatchewan since the free trade agreement came in—I will not go into all of these—in the goods producing industries there has been a decrease of 17 per cent in the jobs available; in the mining, quarrying and oil industry a decrease of 17 per cent; in manufacturing it has been 16.5 per cent; in durable goods there has been a decrease of 27 per cent; in the production of beverages—this goes into the aspect of how interprovincially the free trade agreement has affected trade within Canada—the decrease has been 36 per cent and in building, development and general contracting there has been a reduction of almost 40 per cent. The list goes on and on.

I would like to point out that the government spent millions of dollars in media advertising trying to convince Canadians that the free trade agreement was so good. It spent almost $2 million on radio commercials and almost $1.5 million on a brochure which it sent to every household in the country. The tabloid told us that free trade had boosted exports, created jobs and helped cushion the recession. What it did not tell us was that an additional 600,000 Canadians had joined the official unemployment rolls since January 1989 and that the unemployment rate had risen from 7.6 per cent to 11 per cent or 1.6 million in total. In Saskatchewan the unemployment rate since free trade came in has gone from 7.4 per cent to 9.1 per cent. The tabloid did not tell us that bankruptcies had increased as much as they had.

The tabloid asked us to consider the growth statistics from 1981 to 1991. Furniture was up by 28 per cent, textiles were up by 89 per cent and plastics were up by 16 per cent. What it did not tell us was that in the textile sector almost 22 per cent of the jobs had been lost; an increase in unemployment in that sector of almost 13,000 jobs. The plastic sector had a loss of 22,000 jobs. What it did not tell us also was that there had been a drop of 11 per cent in production in the auto parts industry. In addition to the 30,000 jobs lost in the machinery producing industry, there had been a drop of 20 per cent in production.

The pamphlet also pointed out, and it was well worth remembering, that every billion dollars worth of exports creates 15,000 jobs. In the period between 1989 to 1991 it said Canadian exports grew by almost 11 per cent. It is talking dollars, but what it did not tell us is that if we take into account inflation and a change in the value of the Canadian dollar, our exports increased not by 11 per cent, but increased only two-thirds of 1 per cent. At the same time and under the same criteria the imports into the United States from Canada increased by 2.9 per cent.

It is important that one defines the terms in which one is speaking. Inflation and the value of the Canadian dollar made all the difference and the amount of increase was simply insignificant.

There is not going to be time to talk about the devastation the government has caused through changes to UI. It is obvious that whether we are talking in terms of the Liberals or the Conservatives, the devastation to the nation has been the same and both have contributed to it, perhaps not equally, but they certainly share the responsibility for having taken Canada into the depths it is in.

I was interested the other day when the member for South Shore was berating the critics of the North American free trade agreement. He said that we had to stop hiding behind this high wage wall. I do not think we have to stop criticizing the free trade agreement. We have to criticize it as strongly as we can for the simple reason that it is not a matter of Canada hiding behind a high wage wall. If we look at our competitors, those who I think can be genuinely called our competitors, or most of the European countries, they have significantly higher wage rates than we do, even with the United States dollar being the standard against which we measure them.

Many of our competitors have higher wage rates than we do. It is unconscionable for someone in the government to say that we have to stop hiding behind high wage rates, implying that what we are supposedly as Canadians willing to do is take lower wages. I cannot imagine for what reason.

I see my time has expired, Mr. Speaker. I assumed there was going to be enough time to address all the issues. I thank the House for the time that I have had.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond briefly and ask a question of my hon. friend.

I am flabbergasted. In the last two years we have had more snow in the maritimes than we have had for 20 years. I cannot believe my hon. friend did not blame that on the free trade agreement too because it seems he has blamed everything else on it.

• (1315)

It is interesting. He says that increases in unemployment have occurred since the free trade agreement came in. Timing-wise he is right. We, along with the rest of the world, have been through a major recession. If there are no barriers around Canada then my hon. friend is not seeing through the invisible whatever is there.

Interesting. Let me just read him a quote or two. I know he will not take my word for it because for some reason he is a bit suspicious of what I might say. Listen to this one. "Far from creating the recession the FTA has softened its effect. The recession has been global and coincided with a fundamental restructuring of the world's economy. Critics too often attribute the effects of both recession and restructuring to the demon FTA, when without the FTA and those increased exports Canada's recession would have only been far worse and restructuring more difficult".

What lofty source do we have here? Would you believe it is The Toronto Star? That is what The Toronto Star said.

Then this one: "Free trade critics are confusing the facts. They are blaming the FTA for job losses that are attributable to a variety of other economic circumstances, such as the recession. There is also evidence that the FTA rather than hurting the economy may have actually offset some of the damage that the recession has done to the Canadian economy today". That is from the Conference Board of Canada.

Here is another one: "The perception in some quarters that the FTA has had a negative impact on the economy is not supported by the evidence. Canada's access to the U.S. market has improved since the agreement with 15 of 22 Canadian industry sectors gaining market shares. Canada's exports to the United States have reached record highs and net foreign direct investment inflows turned positive in 1990 and 1991 after nearly two decades of net outflows. Canada has already benefited from the FTA in a number of ways".

That one is from the Royal Bank of Canada. I could go on, but I will simply conclude by asking my hon. friend, if he is correct and the FTA is the source of all these problems, to explain to me why they have had a recession in Germany, Japan, France, the United States and every other industrialized country in the world?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the hon. member's question. I am still completely puzzled by his statement the other day in the House directed toward critics of the free trade agreement that we had to stop hiding behind a high wage wall.

I have the figures here somewhere. If we look at the European economies they range from a high for total compensation, wages and benefits, I believe Norway is on the top with Germany and the Scandinavian countries coming just slightly below, of somewhere around $24. Canada, out of 13 countries, comes in eleventh.

I do not hear the member from South Shore and I do not hear anyone from the government suggesting that the European countries which certainly are competitors ought to be lowering their compensation rates for wages and fringes to their employees. I have the impression that they are doing very, very well, thank you, as far as their economy is concerned. The German mark has almost supplanted the American dollar as being the standard by which progress is made.

Mr. McDermid: Boy, are you behind.

Mr. Fisher: Well, perhaps, but if you want to use the American as the standard, the world's greatest debtor nation, I suspect that there really is not much efficacy in doing that. The United States is hardly something to look upon.

I am rather curious about the member quoting the Conference Board of Canada. I could be wrong, but was the Conference Board of Canada not one of the boards that the government dismantled in the mini budget in December?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Fisher: No? Well, it is slated. The only reason the government has not got rid of it then is that it is a private body. Any other bearer of bad news, it certainly does a good job of eliminating. I find it appalling that the member would stand up and try to defend the government's abysmal record.

• (1320)

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I came here and I listened to what I know is the opposition motion today which essentially says that the government, the Conservatives, are responsible for the economic mess that we find ourselves in. I do not buy that. I do not think it is true. I do not think it is right what the Liberals say in their motion today, that all of our problems economically, the recession and everything else can be laid at the door of the Conservatives.

A lot of things can be laid at the door of the Conservatives. I do not particularly like the idea to purchase helicopters for $5.8 billion. I think it is wrong. I think it is a wrong idea. The parliamentary secretary to the minister of defence thinks it is a wrong idea. I think it is time for us to look at a little bit of sharing the blame because we have to admit that when the Conservatives came to power, they were saddled with a pretty heavy deficit.

We have to admit that when Bob Rae came to power in Ontario the Liberals did it to him. They left him with the cupboard bare. You have to admit that when Mr. Romanow—and I cannot blame this on the Liberals—came into power for the NDP in Saskatchewan the Conservatives did to him what the Liberals had done to Bob Rae.

Let us discuss things, if we are going to discuss things in this House of Commons, along factual lines. We are all to blame for spending getting out of control. It is out of control still when we look at the helicopter purchase. It is out of control still when we look at the federal deficit, which is almost $500 billion.

When we talk about free trade it is almost like the weather because it is there, it has been voted and we have it. If it is raining or if it is shining, one side or the other always tries to blame the other for that particular meteorological phenomenon.

If it is raining, if we are losing money, it is free trade. If it is shining you can be sure that if the economy has a little blip where it goes up, the Conservatives are going to say: "You see how good a deal our free trade arrangement was".

I do not think Canadians are buying this argument. I do not think Canadians watching the motion being debated today are particularly happy to see the bantering back and forth where the Liberals are saying you guys are incompetent and the Conservatives are saying you Liberals are incompetent. The message it sends to the people who elected us is that both political parties are incompetent. They are the ones who have managed the public purse for the past some 30 years where most people remember the economy just going into the pits.

Think of the message that we are sending to the people who have elected us. The Liberals are calling the Conservatives no good, the Conservatives are calling the Liberals even worse. What is the solution?

An hon. member: Vote NDP.

Mr. Edmonston: No, I am not necessarily saying vote NDP. I think you have to look at the facts. There is something which must come out and it is this. There are three provincial NDP governments, that is true. Those governments have been hit by the cupboard being bare, by what I would call disingenuous rhetoric from the other parties saying: "Oh well, the cupboard is bare, we did not say it during the election but that is what happened. You are the new government. Do something with it".

I am going to ask the Canadian people to do this. Look at how well our governments are going to do provincially. I think they are going to do very well even though they have been asked to run a marathon with what I would call lead Reeboks because the recession and the overspending of the governments provincially have given a good opportunity for the NDP to show what it can do as a good government.

I think things will work out in Saskatchewan. They will work out in Ontario and I think they will work out in British Colombia.

• (1325)

It shows that contrary to what most people believe when they think of the Conservatives as excellent money managers or the Liberals as almost as good money managers, they are the chief architects of the terrible situation of unemployment we find, of the number of people on welfare and of the bankruptcies. They are the chief architects of this situation that we find ourselves in right now.

I do not think any one particular party has a monopoly on the culpability for what has happened. We are all responsible, but our party, the NDP, has a unique chance to prove what it can do when the going gets rough. I think we are going to do that. As we go on, probably in the next year or so, particularly with what is going on in the United States, the economic climate is going to improve somewhat. We are going to be able to have a chance to do the best with what we get, and I think we are going to be getting a better economy.

When we are talking about the situation as it is right now, and what we can do to improve it, the obvious thing is to cut spending. That means thinking the unthinkable. It means looking at universality closely. It means shifting and refocusing money perhaps from one sector, senior citizens, to another sector, youth. Those are hard decisions. We are going to have to look at bilingualism and how much we are paying for it. We are going to have to think the unthinkable, not along party lines but along common sense lines.

While we are talking about the Triple E Senate; equal, elected and—I am trying to think of the other E.

An hon. member: Efficient.

Mr. Edmonston: I am sorry. Efficient, yes. Efficiency was forgotten a long time ago. However we should look more closely at a Triple E government in which we concentrate on education, the environment and, above all, the economy. That is the Triple E that we have to concentrate upon. So stop blaming each other and let us get down to work, because if we want the people behind us, if we want them to elect us or support us, we had better speak their language. This morning we did not speak their language.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I just have a brief question.

I was very interested in the hon. member's comments and I agree with him. That is what our government has been trying to do. We have been trying to take a look at the economy to see where we can streamline and cut back on our spending and so on.

Do the hon. member's colleagues within his party agree whole-heartedly with what he suggested we do today, such as looking at universality and some of the other issues? Do they support that?

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, not only members of my party but also those in the provincial governments support that position. If we look at their actions right now we will see them coming to grips with the reality of not having the money to spend that we have had in the past. It means that we have to take a hard look at universality. It means we will have to take a hard look at what is theory and what is reality, what are resolutions, and what has been past policy and try to put that in terms of today's reality.

There is a revolution going on. It is a revolution in thought. It is a revolution not along party lines on ideological lines but a revolution in which people are now asking not what is good for them but how much it will cost. That is an essential key to getting the public's confidence. How much will it cost? Can it be done efficiently? Is it practical? If we start thinking along those lines, no matter if we are Liberal, NDP or Conservative, we will have no trouble getting the public's vote.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science Technology and Minister for International Trade: Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to ask my hon. friend, as he talked about controlling expenditures, if he would explain why the NDP government in Ontario increased its spending by 13 per cent last year.

The member raised the subject of EH-101s and says that the helicopter contract should be cancelled. I have been a little bit confused by statements coming from his party about this because on the one hand his leader says the NDP wants to create jobs and yet the EH-101 contract will create 45,000 person-years of employment, and these are high-tech, good and valuable jobs that will position us well for future contracts.

The member's leader says that we need to have air-sea rescue helicopters. What on earth does she think the EH-101s are? When the minister of defence increased that order a year or so back from 25 to 50 it was so that the best helicopters in the world would be available to provide search and rescue for our fishermen and other seamen, so that we would have that equipment for fisheries patrol and also so we would have it for drug surveillance.

• (1330)

I suppose what they want to do is get rid of the Armed Forces. I do not know. What is the point of having state of the art equipment like our general purpose frigates and then not putting the equipment on them that is necessary to enable them to be efficient.

I have three questions. How would he equip the Armed Forces? What would he do with the general purpose frigates, of which nine are floating now, if we are not going to have the helicopters for them? How would he provide for the necessary fisheries patrol and air-sea rescue without the EH-101s?

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I would like to preface my response by saying that having served in the military for three years and having been honourably discharged I am very supportive of our military. It is important that we have a strong military. However when we have—

Mr. McDermid: The American military.

Mr. Edmonston: The American military.

Mr. McCreath: We don't hate the Americans in here, we think they're all right.

An hon. member: They are our NATO allies.

Mr. Edmonston: We have to be careful when we are dealing with the purchase of these helicopters. I believe that these military helicopters are not suited for the job per se because of reports I received. We already have read in the newspapers that these are essentially sub-hunting helicopters. They have been called Cadillac helicopters.

On the other hand when we try to reason that it will create jobs we have to create smart jobs that will be maintained other than by federal government grants. That is one of the reasons why the former minister of defence, who was always pleading for Quebec, was saying: "We need this business in Quebec. We need our booty". I was always against that because all of Canada needs jobs. We need sustained jobs and not jobs that depend upon the government handing out gifts to different contractors, even if they do come from Quebec. I do not accept these kinds of make work programs for equipment that we do not need to do that particular job.

In terms of the rescue aspects of these helicopters, I have seen reports that the prop–wash from these helicopters when rescuing someone in an ocean environment would actually drown them. Do not tell me that these are needed, either for rescues or for jobs.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate today. I want to compliment my colleague, the hon. member for York North, on his very fine opening speech in this debate. I understand I will be sharing my time with my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa South.

Next month Canadians will cross a dubious milestone. In April Canada will have spent three years mired in the grip of recession. Even if we accept the brave pronouncement of Mr. Philip Cross of Statistics Canada earlier this year that the Canadian recession is over there is not much to cheer about; not for the 1.5 million individuals who according to Statistics Canada's labour force survey last month were unemployed; not for the 76,139 businesses and individuals who last year slid into bankruptcy, a figure which is 50 per cent higher than in the worst year of the 1981–82 recession.

It has been said that Canadians emerged from the 1981–82 recession lean and mean. If Canadians emerged from that recession lean and mean, then they are coming out of the present one plain scared. The recession has not been like the others. The world has changed and we are in a new game.

Canadians feel the ground shifting under their feet. Our resource industries, the fishery, agriculture, forestry, and mining no longer generate the kind of secure export jobs they did in the past. The manufacturing sector has been battered. According to the investment firm Wood Gundy, some 363,000 manufacturing jobs were lost between April 1989 and February 1992. In industries from steel to forest products to the fishery to the auto industry, across the whole range of the economy, Canadians have seen their jobs disappear.

These job losses have not been temporary. They have been permanent. Jobs that seemed secure are now in jeopardy. What people used to need to know to make it no longer applies. Canadians who have not already lost their jobs are fearful that they will be next. Businesses that have survived for decades have bitten the dust of bankruptcy or are in trouble.

The federal government and the provincial governments are paralyzed by debt, a disturbing amount of which is owed to foreign bankers. The tough medicine of the budgets of Newfoundland and Saskatchewan last week played more to the bond analysts at Moodys and at Standard and Poor in New York than they did to their own electorate. The budgets of the other provinces will likely follow suit.

Canadians are hoarding, waiting for the next blow to strike. Businesses are not investing. Consumers are not spending. The Canadian economy is not growing. This government, transfixed by its three–year ill timed obsession to wring the last bit of inflation out of the Canadian economy has shown itself incapable of acting in an imaginative and creative way to get the Canadian economy moving again and reposition our economy to take advantage of the new opportunities. There are new opportunities that our changed world presents.

During the last election campaign the Prime Minister boasted to Canadians that the Conservative government was best able to "manage change". We will undoubtedly hear that phrase repeated again and again in the next few months in the mating dance that has been contrived by his party apparatchiks, and that word, as the leading contender knows, is Russian for "hacks", to coronate the Prime Minister's successor.

This party, which has led Canadians into the morass in which our economy now finds itself, will try to portray the pretenders to the Prime Minister's throne as the leaders best able once again to manage change.

Canadians have already had enough of these managers managing change. What Canadians want is an election to change the managers.

This government has had nearly five years since the last election to show Canadians how well it can manage change. It has had plenty of change to manage, much of it change which it provoked itself.

Hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are now on the unemployment rolls or the welfare lines have experienced the change that this government has produced.

It is worth going back more than eight long years to the economic statement of the former Minister of Finance on November 8, 1984. That document, entitled Agenda for Economic Renewal, was a brave statement of the new government's priorities.

I remember that statement because at the time I was a policy analyst fresh out of university working in the Department of Employment and Immigration. I was keen to apply my new knowledge to the exciting task of renewing the Canadian economy. The themes that ran through that document and to which the government, at least the finance minister, seemed committed were the need to get government finances, meaning the deficit, under control, removing the obstacles to economic growth, and achieving these aims equitably and with a concern for the most needy of Canadians. These were objectives I could get behind, and for four years I worked hard in my own small way to try to help the government achieve them.

It slowly began to dawn on me, as it has been dawning on the vast majority of Canadians, that this government is either uncommitted or incapable of dealing with the fiscal problems facing our country and of preparing Canadians for the economic challenges of the future.

The government began with very favourable circumstances. The federal deficit, though high in the aftermath of the 1982 recession, was declining. When the Tories took office the Canadian economy was surging forward. The new government had a sweeping mandate from the Canadian people for the kind of changes it was proposing in its economic statement. Instead the mandate was squandered. Rather than use the opportunity of strong economic growth to make sizeable reductions in the deficit, the average deficit from 1984–85 to 1989–90 was some $24 billion per year. The federal debt during that period nearly doubled.

Indeed, in the run up to the election in 1988, the government so over-inflated the economy that the Minister of Finance launched a crisis call within months of that election on the state of the federal finances. Instead of acting decisively to remove obstacles to economic growth during that period, the government shuffled.

At the UI policy analysis directorate where I worked, we waited for the government to follow up in a serious way on its undertaking to correct some of the disincentive problems in the unemployment insurance program. When in 1989, after I left, the government finally screwed up its courage to make changes to the UI program, the changes it made merely weakened the underpinning of that program. It withdrew government financial participation without altering the underlying problems with the UI program itself. The changes in Bill C-113 are more of the same.

This government has known and the Canadian policy-making community has known since well before the last election that the single most important policy challenge facing our country is devising policies and programs and providing the necessary leadership to enable the Canadian economy and the Canadian work force to adjust to what is now being described by some as the new economy.

That is the emphasis on high value-added, knowledge-based, service-oriented industries. It has been widely known that the key ingredient in preparing Canadians for this new reality is a greater commitment on education, specifically in the development as quickly as possible of a highly trained, computer literate work force. The diffusion of that knowledge through the private sector will have a higher emphasis on research and development and on spreading that research and development throughout Canadian industry, be it fish processing or fibre optics.

It has been widely known since well before the recession that the underlying framework of policies in Canada in many ways supported a resistance to change. This resistance to change has been documented by study after study, beginning with the Economic Council of Canada, which before the last election issued a statement on precisely this subject, called "Managing Adjustment". This government has ignored that statement.

I am hurrying because I realize I have to share my time, so let me just rapidly conclude.

My point in conclusion is that this government has not managed change. This government has resisted, has shuffled and has studied the problem to death over the last four years. It has squandered four valuable years of opportunity to re-position Canada to be ready for the new economy which we now face. That is the tragedy which this government has perpetuated and that is its legacy for Canadians.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to listen to those debates on the economy because what we hear mostly is rhetoric and really no solutions.

If we look at Canada's present economic state, the national debt, provincial, federal and Crown corporations, it is now about $660 billion. That amounts to 95 per cent of the gross domestic product. To put it in perspective, it is the same level of debt that Brazil and Venezuela have. When New Zealand reached 75 per cent of the gross domestic product as its debt, it was declared bankrupt. Recently, we have seen what is happening to Newfoundland in its budget, to Saskatchewan and to Ontario as well.

• (1345)

As we all know, only Ontario Hydro has a debt of $34 billion. It is a bankrupt company.

What do we hear? What do we hear from the government side? We are told for instance, that our exports are up, that we have a surplus in exports, in goods, of $9 billion for this year. What the government forgets to tell us is that in the current account which includes goods, services and financial transactions, there is a deficit of $30 billion for this year.

This means that Canadians have to borrow $30 billion outside of Canada. It cannot be borrowed from Canadians. It has to be borrowed from outside so our foreign debt now reaches the amount of $300 billion. We owe that to foreigners.

What are the solutions? This is what I am trying to find out. The opposition parties and the government side, what do they propose to deal with this crisis? They talk about having more—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In fairness, I have to give the floor to the previous speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): I share the hon. member's deep concern with the state of the government deficits, provincial and federal. It is a very serious problem. It is a problem that is not going to go away. It is a problem that we are going to have to deal with and to manage as prudently as we can when we form the government.

I want to make one quick point. The best way to deal with the deficit is to create a growing economy, a growing productive, competitive economy. That is my point about adjustment. That is where the government has failed. It has failed. It has wasted four years. The economy has changed and this government has not enabled Canadians to change with that economy. That is what we need to do to have a strong economy to meet the debt obligations which have been incurred by this government. That is my point.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate on the economy and economic policies.

In the ten minutes I am allowed, I think I should go straight to the core of this debate. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, it isn't easy to deal with the serious problems of debt and deficit.

At this point, however, we must realize the problem is not exclusive to federal and provincial governments, Crown corporations and Ontario Hydro, which has a very large debt, as the hon. member for Calgary pointed out. It is a problem that concerns us all in this country. We must find ways to deal with debt-related problems and with a deficit that is increasing annually at all levels of government.

[English]

We have, I believe, reached the point in Canada where we can say without fear of overstatement that our finances are approaching crisis proportions. The level of our debt and deficit is reaching those of countries where the International Monetary Fund has taken action.

• (1350)

Recently in Canada there have been a number of news reports both in print and on television comparing Canada's situation today with that of New Zealand in 1984. That is when a new government, a socialist government as it happened, was elected and within days of election discovered that it could no longer finance its government operations through international borrowing. It had reached the limit.

I believe very sincerely it has reached the point in Canada that it does us no service, as members of Parliament or members of legislatures to try to affix blame for the situation we are in. It is not simply a problem brought on by one level of government. It is not only a problem of lack of will on the part of legislators, but it has been a lack of commitment on the part of all Canadians to deal with the fact that our consumption of our wealth in Canada exceeds our ability to create it and has for many years.

If we fail to deal with this issue at the national level and at the provincial level in a co-operative way, then others from outside our borders will deal with it for us.

In the final analysis, right now as Canadians we are not saving enough to finance our own consumption and our own investment. Therefore we are having to borrow from foreigners. Sooner or later they will either demand exorbitant interest rates because of the risk they perceive they are taking, or they will simply refuse to lend to us. That time is coming. It does not matter which party forms the government. One of the key items on the agenda is going to be to deal with that issue.

The second key economic problem which we are facing, and I think all of us would agree with this, is that of unemployment. Today as we have the first signs of a recovery beginning, we continue to have 1.5 million Canadians out of work. Large numbers of them are people who in previous recessions were able to keep their jobs. They are people with skills and training. In many cases they have been displaced by the economic circumstances in which they find themselves. They are unable to find new work, certainly not at the level of income to which they have become accustomed.

In community after community, industry after industry, we are finding that the work force is not going through a period of temporary lay-off. In fact it is going through a period of permanent downsizing.

In the face of these two problems, the debt on the one hand and unemployment on the other, we find policy makers in a kind of gridlock saying that to address the debt problem we really are going to create more unemployment, that to create jobs we are going to have to increase the debt.

This is the situation in which we find ourselves. What we need first and foremost is an approach to dealing with these problems in a Canadian context based on honesty. I do not think we can afford the luxury any more of misleading the public and it does not really matter which party that comes from. We have to deal with the Canadian public in honest and direct terms about the nature of the problems that confront us.

Also, it is vital that we have a vision of where we want to take our country. With respect, I would like to suggest a few things that I think can be part of that.

First of all, we have to renew our commitment as Canadians to being the best. This is not simply rhetorical. We have to build in our people a confidence that we as Canadians can be as good or better than the rest of the world. We can be more productive. We can be more capable. We can be better educated.

Second, our commitment to education and to training must be unequivocal. It is simply not satisfactory that Canada labours along with a 30 per cent high school drop-out rate and with something approaching one-fifth to one-quarter of our population incapable of maintaining adequate skills of literacy and numeracy.

This is not going to be adequate in the world we are entering in the 21st century in which we are competing with others and not just among ourselves, not just with the Americans or the Mexicans, as we often talk about around here. We are also competing with the emerging east European economies of Poland, Hungary and the Czech and Slovak republics where there is a good skill base, a good education base, low wage expectations and gradually re-emerging technological and manufacturing economy. We are also competing with the new emerging economies of Asia, Singapore, Taiwan, Korea and even China.

Third, we have to invest in infrastructure. Our transportation and communications networks have got to meet the test and the challenges of the 21st century. It is simply not adequate for us to put off spending in those areas.

Fourth, we have to make the tough decisions to focus our resources strategically. We simply do not have excess resources available to squander on projects that are wasteful and which do not accomplish the goals we set for ourselves as a nation. That will not be easy but it is something we have to be prepared to do in an open, fair and sometimes difficult way.

I think none of this can happen if Canadians are not confident they can buy into a program of renewal, that they cannot accept that sacrifices may have to be made. Yet if they do not believe they will succeed in overcoming the obstacles that confront them, they will not support it.

We need commitments in addition to an economic program that stresses growth and creation of jobs. We need two other commitments.

We need a commitment to maintain and preserve on a sustainable basis the environment which is after all at the root of the creation of the wealth that this great country enjoys. We also we need to restate and to emphasize the commitment that we have to the social contract in this country. Canadians need to believe that when times get bad that we will care for one another. We will ensure that we are committed as a nation, not just to the creation of wealth but to the sustainability of our health and education systems, to the alleviation of poverty and to the building of a clean and healthy environment. These commitments have to exist at the same time and with the same intensity as a commitment to the creation of wealth, to the stimulation of jobs, to the reduction of the debt.

If we as leaders in this country can work together toward those objectives, I believe there may be no limit to the commitment that Canadians will show to achieving those objectives.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague not only for the fact that he has recognized so insightfully some of the difficulties we are having in this nation today but the fact that he is putting on the table some constructive and very specific ideas. That is what people are looking for today.

It is not just that we would stand up and point out the fact that this government has really lost its sense of compassion and caring. There is the mere fact that the government continues to sit around for almost three months now from its economic statement and does nothing in relation to small business. Yet, government members stand up and say that this particular bill is not through the House of Commons and that is why they are not going to promote the Small Businesses Loans Act.

My question through you, Mr. Speaker, to my colleague is related to small business. We on this side of the House have been saying for years now that the greatest hope for new job creation in this country lies with small business. The entrepreneurial spirit is in the men and women of the 1.1 million operating businesses in this country. That is where we believe the great hope lies for job creation.

I wonder if my colleague, who is also one of our former finance critics, could talk for a minute or so to this House and the people of Canada about some of his ideas on how we could help small business.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

HON. JEAN J. CHAREST

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, "Jean Charest, a man of reason and a reasonable politician" is the title of an editorial by André Pratte, published last Saturday in La Presse, which included the following: "Jean Charest is a politician of reason. . . Delegates will be won by his intelligence, his grasp of the issues, his moderation and his persuasive arguments".

"In his four years as Minister of State For Youth, he had a chance to examine one of today's pressing problems, the school drop-out rate, and he talks about it today in very concrete terms. Young people do not necessarily drop out of school because of the school system. They drop out for all kinds of reasons. They may be attracted by the large number of jobs available in Southern Ontario as a result of an overheated economy, or, as is the case in Eastern Canada, they don't see the point of staying in school because there are no jobs or because their parents don't encourage them to go to school".

"At a time when everyone wants to be consulted, when many people realize that the national debt is problem number one in this country and when spending cuts raise howls of protest from interest groups, Mr. Charest's proposal that the next federal government be given a clear mandate to fight the deficit may be very attractive to voters."

UNIVERSITY SPORTS

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, while we may differ in our political views those of us in this House who are graduates of St. Francis Xavier University share a great pride in our Alma Mater.

We were all thrilled by the exciting performance of the St. F. X. University varsity basketball team yesterday, under the leadership of coach Steve Konchalski, in winning the CIAU championship in basketball with an exciting 72–64 victory over McMaster University in Halifax.

For Nova Scotians yesterday was a double triumph with Acadia University winning the CIAU championship in hockey in Toronto.

The St. F. X. X-men thrilled their fans, as they have all year, with superlative basketball, with Richard Bella, Brian Lee and Blair White in particular turning in outstanding performances yesterday.

Winning the CIAU championship, the first ever for St. F. X., was a particularly fitting tribute to Father George Kehoe, St. F. X.'s much loved former athletic director who died tragically last year and to whom Coach Konchalski dedicated the team's win.

I know all members of this House, including my colleagues from Hamilton, will join me in congratulating the St. F. X. basketball team on its thrilling performance yesterday.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

WORLD HEALTH DAY

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, on April 7 we celebrate World Health Day to honour the adoption of the World Health Organization's constitution of 1948.

This year's slogan is "Handle Life with Care—prevent violence and negligence". Three and one-half million people die every year as a result of injury caused by violence, accidental or intentional. Injuries cost Canadians over $11 billion each year, and although this rate is falling injuries are the leading cause of death and the second leading cause of hospitalization of our youth.

Health and Welfare Canada is starting a program to target injury prevention and its evaluation. Safety is everyone's responsibility and must be included in all our policies.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS PROGRAM

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I received numerous copies of a letter addressed to the Prime Minister from the students of the University of Saskatchewan concerning the proposed changes to the Canada Student Loans Program.

I would like to read part of the letter:

> Today, a post-secondary education costs a great deal of money. Not all students have the ability to pay these costs. The Canada Student Loans Program, therefore, has allowed hundreds of thousands of Canadians to further their education regardless of their income status.
> Your government has publicly recognized the importance of creating an educated work force. Yet the legislation put forward in Bill C-76 will discourage, rather than encourage students from continuing.

The letter goes on to ask whether the government is so obsessed with deficit reduction that creating an educated and skilled, and therefore competitive, work force is no longer one of its priorities.

I suggest that the government's top priority should be to get Canadians back to work, and that means providing post-secondary education that is accessible to more than just the wealthy.

MORDEN, MANITOBA

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, on the assumption that good news rarely gets the publicity it deserves I would like to inform the House of an important announcement in Manitoba which occurred on February 9. On that date Monsanto Canada Inc. announced the construction of a $5.1 million, 12,000 square foot manufacturing plant in Morden. At this new plant there will be the production of a new herbicide in a very environmentally safe facility. This plant will mean the employment of some 17 people now, with the possibility of an increase in employment if production increases as is anticipated.

Morden was selected from among some 50 Canadian locations. One of the advantages for Morden was the fact that its proximity to the United States was very important as it is anticipated that there will be sales of some $50 million to the United States in the first year of its operation, which demonstrates the growing importance of the United States as an export market for Canada.

NORTH KOREA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the world should be greatly concerned by North Korea's current reckless behaviour. It began last week with diplomats claiming that North Korea was "ready for war" with South Korea because of joint military exercises with U.S. allies. Then North Korea became the first country to withdraw from the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty, a giant step backward in the movement to limit the world's doomsday arsenal.

Today we hear from U.S. News and World Report that North Korea and Iran allegedly struck a $630 million deal to develop nuclear ballistic missiles capable of hitting targets in Japan.

Are we doomed to repeat the mistakes of the past? Is North Korea destined to become the next Iraq, a nuclear renegade on a path to its own destruction?

It seems to me that this new world order is beginning to resemble the old. Hundreds of Canadian soldiers gave up their lives in the last Korean war. Their sacrifice must not be in vain.

UNIVERSITY SPORTS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, today there is no Mudville in Wolfville but joy in the town as Nova Scotia and Atlantic Canada happily extend hearty congratulations to Coach Coolen and his Acadia crew for bringing home the bacon with a resounding 12-1 victory over the University of Toronto in yesterday's national finals of the CIAU hockey championship.

Acadia's motto Nin Pulvere Vinces was played out in spades for Acadia's first ever national hockey victory, which literally means: From the dust of many defeats comes victory through the collective hard work and effort of all.

In this case it was truly a national victory for the Axemen. Eight provinces were represented on the team and I am sure that in the justified honour to Coach Coolen as Coach of the Year he would be the first to admit that active community support helped along the way.

The national championship for Acadia's 3,500 student body is a delicious delight for the town of Wolfville, which is celebrating its centennial this year, a beautiful blend of town and gown.

Students and Alma Mater of Acadia from coast to coast can stand up and cheer for their boys in garnet and blue who have brought new honour to the hallowed history of Acadia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

RED CROSS MONTH

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to remind members of this House that March is Red Cross Month. Every year two and a half million Canadians volunteer time or donate blood to the Red Cross.

The Red Cross Society is also active in many other areas. It provides support to people in their homes, in the form of such services as homemakers, sick room equipment loans and support for veterans and seniors. Last year 13,000 Canadians who suffered minor emergencies and major disasters were helped by the Red Cross.

Whenever we hear media reports about a natural disaster or a war we will also hear that the Red Cross is there providing assistance. Last year the Red Cross channelled some $34 million worth of aid to people in 80 countries around the world.

I would ask all members of the House to join me in wishing the Red Cross Society and its volunteers a very successful Red Cross Month.

FRENCH LANGUAGE COLLEGES IN ONTARIO

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, many Ontario residents and especially students who wish to continue their education have a vested interest in seeing new community colleges established in Ontario.

According to the province, the federal government is not co-operating.

I will read verbatim a press release issued by Ontario Minister of Education David Cooke, in which he said, and I quote:

> There are rumours that the federal government is reneging on its agreement with the province on financing for a French language college in the north and another one in the southwest. It has been almost a year since the province said it was ready to sign the agreement with the federal government. How much longer will francophones in northern and southern Ontario have to wait for the federal government to make up its mind?

• (1410)

There is one community college in Ottawa. There are 2,900 students, and they have the right to be educated in French in Ontario. They have that right under the Constitution.

I want to ask the government to stop dragging its feet and conclude an agreement with the Province of Ontario on the acquisition of the land and building concerned.

[English]

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I understand that a special committee of cabinet is now working on an adjustment package to assist individuals and communities impacted by the severe reductions in groundfish quotas in the Scotia Fundy and Gulf regions.

I wish to impress upon the government the urgency of this situation. There are significant numbers of people in coastal communities such as Lockeport, Lunenburg and Louisburg who have either exhausted their UI claims or who have been unable to get sufficient work to qualify in the first place. These numbers will drastically increase during the next two to three weeks.

I urge the government, and in particular the ministers of fisheries and employment, to make an announcement this week that will clearly indicate to people in the affected communities that the Government of Canada is there to assist them during this time of particular difficulty.

Today the government must give clear indication that help is on its way and it will be adequate.

POVERTY

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, last night Radio-Canada broadcast a very moving television program on poverty in Montreal. My congratulations to narrator Ms. Dussault and producer Ms. Payette, who managed to show us the poverty in which, unfortunately, too many Canadians live, while respecting the dignity of these poor mothers and their children.

Under nine years of Conservative rule the gap between rich and poor has widened increasingly. We need an election to replace a government dedicated to the interests of the rich with a Liberal team that has heart and compassion and shows a firm resolve to help the neediest in our society.

[English]

SASKATCHEWAN BUDGET

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I applaud the direction of the Government of Saskatchewan in its recent budget which attacks the deficit through expenditure cuts and tax increases in order to "guarantee that all we enjoy today is passed on to our children and our grandchildren".

This is surely sensible advice for all levels of government and just happens to be exactly what the federal government has been doing for the past eight years in order to deal with the Trudeau legacy of debt. Ironically, every single federal taxation measure and program reduction has been opposed by the NDP and Liberal opposition.

I want to congratulate the Saskatchewan provincial NDP for having finally seen the light. Hopefully, the federal NDP members from Saskatchewan will learn from their provincial brethren the importance of and the need for deficit reduction programs, provincial and federal.

FRIENDSHIP CENTRES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the reason the Government of Saskatchewan has to reduce the deficit is because of the position in which the Devine government left that province.

Across Manitoba, Friendship Centres are being hammered by cold-hearted politicians who simply do not understand their value to society.

Three months ago the federal government announced 10 per cent cuts to selected native programs such as Friendship Centres. Last week, Gary Filmon's Conservative government in Manitoba staggered aboriginal groups by announcing 100 per cent cuts to Indian and Métis Friendship Centres province-wide.

Friendship Centres are worth their weight in gold. In many cases they are the only social safety net available to Canada's urban aboriginal population. Friendship Centres provide counselling and referral services, hostel accommodation, youth, recreation and education programming, interpreters, fine option services, food banks, emergency support, and interpreters for medical care.

If this government understood the need for Friendship Centres it would not be cutting funding it would be increasing it. Our Friendship Centres should not be forced to close.

PEACEKEEPERS

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I ask all members of the House of Commons to take notice of the return from Croatia of the 1st Combat Engineer Regiment.

The 120 personnel from 1st Combat Engineer Regiment stationed at Canadian Forces Base Chilliwack spent six months with the United Nations protection force in the former Yugoslavian republic of Croatia.

In the very difficult environment of post-breakup Yugoslavia the troops distinguished themselves and carried out their duties of maintaining roadways and constructing facilities for use by UN forces. My congratulations to their commanding officer, Major Carmen Bradley.

• (1415)

I was honoured to meet the families of these troops during a welcome home ceremony this past Saturday evening at the base. I doubt whether people who have not been involved with the Canadian forces or had loved ones in the force realize the stress that the children and spouses go through during extended absences like this. These people on the home front have also done an excellent job of supporting the troops.

My congratulations and appreciation goes out to the forces coming home and to their families. We are proud of you.

Some hon. members: Bravo.

FOREIGN AID

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has not only made extreme budget cuts to official development assistance, but has changed its development assistance policy without any public discussion which denies bilateral assistance to the poorest countries and their poorest peoples.

Today, the Liberal caucus is holding a round table discussion on the implications of these cutbacks on the peoples of the African countries, the region most impacted by eight cutbacks and policy changes. We were not pleased when this government unilaterally decided to make our assistance conditional to debt-burdened countries accepting punitive structural adjustment programs. We cannot accept that major objectives of the government, as quoted from its leaked document, are: "to support and promote market-based reforms and trade and investment links between Canada and aid recipients".

I have in hand petitions I received at a Queen's University rally last week. Hundreds of students and thousands of Canadians across this land demand public consultation before policy changes are initiated and that this country continue to priorize the poorest of the poor in our aid program.

SCIENCE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, even as the federal government cut funding from crucial Canadian science programs it was happily doling out more money to send into orbit, $10 million more into orbit this year than last. What does it do with most of this money? Over $1.5 billion will go to help build the U.S. space station.

With a new President in the White House there might not even be a space station. The Americans are realizing that you get far better economic spin-offs from science on the ground than from megaprojects high up in outer space. We have already wasted $300 million that could have better laid the groundwork for the kind of value-added, knowledge-based economy that creates the stable, high-paying jobs that people desperately need.

For the thousands of Canadian unemployed the final frontier is not space. It is that last unemployment insurance cheque before the oblivion of absolute poverty. That is a frontier we should be making sure no one explores.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

As we speak, there are 400,000 young Canadians who cannot find work. On the other hand, we have 300,000 jobs that cannot be filled because we do not have people who possess the required skills.

As the Prime Minister orchestrates his departure, is he proud of a legacy that leaves one in five young Canadians without a job?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I think it goes without saying that members on all sides of this House find the unemployment of our youth today unacceptably high. That is why the government has been concentrating on training and retraining programs to try and encourage those who have dropped out of school early—some 30 per cent drop out of school and that is an unacceptably high rate as well—to get back into the work force to get some training they need that will bring them into today's reality in the economic picture that we find ourselves in.

There is some $3.5 billion being spent on training and retraining and that, I believe, is a very positive sign that this government is doing something to encourage the young people to get back to work.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the truth is that as we near the end of the Mulroney era 400,000 young people are out of work. One young person out of five is looking for work. However 300,000 jobs cannot be filled because no one has the right training.

I want to ask the Prime Minister just this: What happened to his promise that training programs would be provided following the signing of the Free Trade Agreement? Why did he betray Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): As usual, the hon. member's statement is wrong. Today $3.8 billion is being spent on manpower retraining programs, especially for young people in Canada. This is unprecedented. An interesting point is that we managed to do this despite fierce opposition from the hon. member's party.

• (1420)

Every time we introduced a bill in the House to create jobs for young people or increase amounts allocated to the retraining program the hon. member for Hamilton East voted against it.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I voted against his unemployment insurance bill and I am proud of that.

[English]

In the last four years of Prime Minister Mulroney's mandate 325,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost. Anyone who represents an industrial riding will see the devastation day by day, week by week that is causing.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this. In the dying days of his government, will he make good on his personal promise to have specific retraining programs for those workers who lost their jobs as a result of his free trade agreement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard specifically to the free trade agreement, perhaps my hon. friend would like eventually to discuss some facts. On an annual basis Canada exported $19.6 billion more to the United States in 1992 than in 1988. In January 1993 our exports to the United States were 23 per cent ahead of the level in January 1992.

My hon. friend refers to the Mulroney accomplishments. My hon. friend refers to the Mulroney record. I am thereby forced, despite my modesty, to mention some facts to my hon. friend. As of the end of December 1992 employment in Canada was up by 1.3 million jobs from the September 1984 level; from 1984 to 1991 employment grew at an average annual rate of 1.7 per cent, the fastest of G–7 countries; inflation was at its lowest level in 30 years; and interest rates were at their lowest level in 21 years.

This compares with a record by the Liberals of unemployment of 11.8 per cent, interest rates at 22.75 per cent and inflation at 12.9 per cent, the worst record since statistics were compiled in the history of Canada. That was the Liberal record and this is the Mulroney record and we are proud of it.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade.

Speaking Friday at McGill, Bob Dunn, an economist at George Washington University, said that the Governments of Canada and the United States are using misleading data on the job losses that will result from the NAFTA deal. Professor Dunn said that both the Canadian and American governments are choosing not to speak about the true jobless figures from NAFTA.

I ask the minister: Why is he hiding the true job loss figures? When will he let Canadians know the whole story on NAFTA job losses?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend wrote that question before he heard the answer from the Prime Minister two questions ago.

I will give the answer again. Thank you very much for the subsequent question. The answer is that in the month of January we had a remarkable increase in exports and that follows on a period in 1992 where exports from Canada to the United States under the free trade agreement were up by 16 per cent. This is a huge increase which demonstrates that Canadian companies are finding business opportunities in the United States and turning those opportunities into jobs back here in Canada.

It is a curious thing. That article that my friend is reading was from the same day that these statistics came out, but there was not one mention of those statistics in that article. It is a curious thing that the media would not bring the two into the same article to get some balance in the reporting.

• (1425)

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the minister who neglects to say that 80 per cent of our exports to the United States were duty free before the trade deal. He does not seem to make a connection with the ongoing nature of those exports. He also overlooks the 1.5 million people who are still out of work in this country.

If the minister is so sure the professor does not know what he is talking about, why does he not put his money where his mouth is? Will he make public the government's own economic impact statements on the proposed NAFTA deal? Will he tell us how many more Canadian workers are going to lose their jobs because of this proposed three-way NAFTA deal? Do not talk about the past. Tell us about your impact studies and what they say about the NAFTA.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is quite amazing that this member should talk about putting his money where his mouth is.

I sat five feet away from him in 1980 when he was asked whether he would resign if interest rates went up again. He said: "Yes, I will resign". What happened when interest rates went up to 22 per cent? He sat right there twiddling his thumbs, never a thought of resignation, never a thought of the principle that he is talking about now. I will put my money where my mouth is anytime this hon. member wants to do the same thing.

An hon. member: Any more questions, Herb?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I want to refer to a study not done by the government but through the C. D. Howe Institute. It says: "Free trade with the United States has helped the development of the higher value-added industries that are crucial to Canada's future economic growth, a result that is consistent with the predictions of supporters of the agreement". That is an impact study done by an independent observer that says that the free trade agreement has been good for Canada and good for Canadians.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. It concerns the P.E.I. fixed-link.

On February 24, in response to a question from my colleague, the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands, the Minister of the Environment said "there has been an environmental assessment done on the project".

On Friday the Federal Court ruled that this government has violated its own environmental guidelines and that a generic study of a generic bridge design is unacceptable. Judge Reed even called the process so far downright silly.

Given this court's decision and the extent of public interest in this review, will the minister take this process out of the back rooms and proceed immediately with a full proper environmental assessment of the specific bridge proposal complete with public hearings?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we appreciated Madam Justice Reed's prompt decision on this matter. It is a comprehensive decision. This government has always, as he will recall, undertaken to abide by the process right from the beginning.

He will not be surprised, however, to know that I have not had an opportunity to discuss this matter with cabinet colleagues or with other levels of government, although I did have a quick call from Premier McKenna who offered his support. I have not had a chance yet to speak to the Prince Edward Island government for obvious reasons. I will have to wait in order to discuss it with the new premier, perhaps.

In any event, the member and the House can be sure that we will be looking at this extensively. I will be able to report to him and to the House within a few days.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that it is going to be a difficult one for the minister. While the minister decides the fate of the project, he must not allow a repeat of the Rafferty-Alameda and Oldman River dam situations where work went ahead on the projects while the environmental reviews were going on.

Will the minister ensure that a similar fiasco is not repeated and ensure that the project is not continued even one day more while the environmental assessments are incomplete?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated to my colleague, we will look at the implications of this very carefully. We have always respected the process. Certainly we will not do anything that would be inimical to the judicial process.

I will have a fuller answer for him in a few days.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary question. We are not going to give up.

The court ruling also stated that the plan to end ferry service between the island and the mainland is unconstitutional. Yet Bill C-110, the enabling legislation which does just that, is currently being rushed through the legislative process. This is not only inappropriate but unconstitutional. Will the minister withdraw Bill C-110 immediately?

• (1430)

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this again is part of the process we will have to look at. My colleague knows that in the agreement signed between the federal government, by myself, and the Government of Prince Edward Island certain assurances were given by that government that whatever steps deemed to be necessary would be taken in order to cure any constitutional problems.

Bill C-110 is something that has been considered in committee. It may well be that it is not project specific legislation but legislation that might be useful in the future for any project.

However, he can be sure we are not going to do anything rash or precipitous.

RUSSIA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Prime Minister, along with other heads of government, reaffirmed his commitment to the process of democracy and market reform taking place in Russia. Given the very serious and deteriorating situation in that country, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he could tell us if any new specific plan of action or of assistance is being developed by Canada along with the other western countries prior to the meetings of President Yeltsin and President Clinton in Vancouver, so that the west and Canada can show their good faith to the Russian people, that we very much care about their anxious desire for reform.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for a very important question.

Late last week I was in touch with Chancellor Kohl in a lengthy telephone conversation in regard to what we might do together with President Clinton and other leaders around the world. I share my hon. friend's concern about the absolute necessity to maintain the democratic institutions that are growing in Russia and the market reforms, without which there can be no successful future for these institutions of democracy itself in Russia.

We have strongly supported President Yeltsin's initiatives. We have conveyed our support for him, his initiatives, and the process at this important juncture in Russian history.

It is my expectation, although one does not know, that the Vancouver summit will proceed as scheduled. Canada will be ready to proceed with new and we think constructive and creative approaches which will help the Russian people and the Russian President in his endeavours and his important initiatives to build a democratic, market-driven society in Russia.

I thank my hon. friend for the support I know he will give to the Government of Canada as we work with our colleagues in the G-7 and elsewhere to help bring this about.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, last spring when President Yeltsin visited this city the Prime Minister and the government made a number of commitments to provide encouragement and support for grain shipments, nuclear safety projects, humanitarian assistance and a special scholarship fund.

As things stand now, grain shipments to Russia have been suspended for the last six or seven months. The announced $30 million nuclear safety program and the $10 million Yeltsin democracy fellowship have not yet been implemented. Our humanitarian assistance is on the decline.

I ask a very serious question of the Prime Minister. How can we expect to believe the Prime Minister when the commitments made almost a year ago have not yet been fulfilled. If the Prime Minister is serious about his support, as he just stated, will he authorize the restoration of grain shipments to Russia and release the funds already committed to implement the initiatives announced last June.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Canada among the leaders of the countries of the G–7 has the second highest per capita assistance to countries of the former Soviet Union, including Russia, second only to Germany.

Germany's large numbers come from the fact that there was a special capitalization program in the federal republic to pay for the removal of 350,000 Russian soldiers who were on their territory. On a per capita basis, Canada's assistance to the former Soviet Union, including Russia, exceeds that of all other G–7 countries, with the exception of Germany as I have indicated. So my friend's question is somewhat surprising.

• (1435)

In fact many of the G–7 leaders are suggesting to their legislatures and their Parliaments that they raise their contributions and the nature of their programs to match those of Canada, which on a per capita basis, put together as a package, would represent a very significant infusion of technical assistance, agricultural assistance and market reform possibilities.

My friend refers to President Yeltsin's visit in June. We have lived up to every one of the commitments that we have made. My friend mentions the Yeltsin Democracy Fellowships as not having been honoured. I met in my office two weeks ago with participants in the Yeltsin Democracy Fellowships and they were very grateful. They came from Russia.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): What about the grain shipments?

Mr. Mulroney: No, my hon. friend mentioned the Yeltsin democracy fellowships. Unless I made a mistake and these were not young Russians standing in my office. They were there under the aegis of the Yeltsin Democracy Fellowships and very grateful to Parliament and the Government of Canada. In fact one of them specifically asked that I convey his affection and best wishes to the member from Winnipeg.

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, on Friday I raised a question regarding two cases of sexual harassment in the Public Service in Halifax and was told to refer them to the President of the Treasury Board. I am doing so to the Acting President of the Treasury Board.

The final report on this case has been out for over a month. It found sexual harassment and so I ask: What will this minister do to ensure that these men are justly punished?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board is well aware of the case. He has indicated to the House that sexual harassment is absolutely unacceptable in any aspect of the Public Service and actions are now being looked at. It is an active file on the minister's desk and the appropriate action will be taken.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would be more reassured if I had not been told today by the investigations conciliation officer of the Public Service that the conciliation process which is, as the minister says, under way will not, and I reiterate will not, deal with sanctions.

Again I ask the minister what sanctions will be applied so that the message of zero tolerance, which I do not necessarily dispute, is at least credible to the people who perpetrate these actions?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board has said on several occasions, and he meant it sincerely and it is reflective of the government's policies, that the appropriate action will be taken.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Public Service Alliance of Canada, representing front line workers in unemployment insurance offices, today released a booklet outlining what working people should know about changes to the UI act.

The booklet outlines the hassles workers claiming benefits are going to have to deal with. Could the minister or whoever is responding tell the members of this House how he will be providing Canadians with this type of factual information so that those who must apply for UI will clearly know the rules?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, there will be brochures printed and available to all those wish to have them, including the unemployment offices throughout this country.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like it better if I knew they were going to every household.

The regulations concerning child care under the new UI amendments create a situation where if you cannot find child care, if you cannot get leave and you quit your job because you cannot get that child care, you will not get UI. The government is forcing parents to settle for untrained, unskilled and unknown child care.

I would like to ask the government what would the family caucus and child care advocates have to say about this? How can quitting to ensure the protection of your children be called voluntary quitting and have the parent not eligible for UI?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the preamble to that question is erroneous and I think the hon. member knows that. The officials of the Canada Employment Centres will review each case and if there is just cause, the people will receive unemployment insurance benefits. That is the assurance of the minister and the government.

• (1440)

For the hon. member to be spreading these fears around is totally irresponsible.

MONTREAL ECONOMY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Finance.

Montreal's economy is in a terrible slump, with an unemployment rate of 14 per cent, 27 per cent of the labour force out of work and 21 per cent of families living below the poverty line.

Why did the government not agree, as requested by the city and the province, to participate in a municipal infrastructure reconstruction program that would stimulate the economy and create jobs?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member and his party are talking about handing money to municipal infrastructure programs.

I would like to remind the hon. member, because he was a member of the government in 1982, that it had a municipal government infrastructure program and cancelled it. It was cancelled because it said it was not the responsibility of the federal government. I remember that very clearly. I am sure he does also because we were in the House together at that time.

There is a modest infrastructure program, due to the fiscal situation that we find ourselves in, that was announced by the Minister of Finance in December. I can tell the hon. member that those discussions are ongoing with the provinces and announcements will be made in due course.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the program we had during the last recession was kept through that recession period.

If the government really wanted to create jobs, stimulate economic growth and reduce the deficit it would initiate such an infrastructure program. Poverty in Montreal and elsewhere in Canada will not be reduced by part-time, minimum wage jobs with no security and no future.

Why is the government not taking steps to promote quality jobs with decent salaries so that young couples can start families and properly take care of them?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend surprises me with his solicitude for Montreal. When we had a bill on pharmaceutical legislation before the House that would create thousands of new jobs in Montreal and provoke over $1 billion in new investment, my hon. friend voted against it.

My hon. friend says quite—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister has the floor.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I say this in full friendship. My hon. friends, the caucus of the Liberal Party, were warned by their leader last week not to be nervous Nellies, to appear to be confident and relaxed. I know how tough that will be for them, but convey an air of confidence.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister could try again.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, they asked me for months, they stood in the House, including my old friend from NDG and said to me: "Prime Minister, you have to quit". So I did and now they want me back. I do not know, is it too late?

It would be with great difficulty but I would forgive him his vote against the pharmaceutical bill even though it created thousands of jobs in Montreal. But because of what he said in regard to the fact that it alone—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1445)

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, if the Liberals want to know why they are sinking like a stone, just turn to the member for Hamilton East.

To answer my friend's question, the pharmaceutical bill does not solve all the problems, obviously not at all, but this attitude brings about some important matters, for example just in the month of February.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Employment and Immigration.

There are almost 50,000 men and women who are unemployed in Manitoba today. Roughly one-quarter of those unemployed people are young men and women between the ages of 15 and 24. Manitoba has the country's highest and fastest growing rate of poverty. It is the poorest of the poor among youth. Manitobans are tired of this despair. They want action.

What specific measures is the government prepared to take to get these people back to work, to eradicate poverty, to remove the despair Manitobans are feeling at this very minute?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, time would not allow me to list the number of endeavours this government has undertaken, but we could start with the $3.8 billion we are spending in training and retraining.

Let me be specific because I think it is very important. Some 326,000 Canadians will receive skills training. Of these 164,000 will receive the training through the Unemployment Insurance Commission at a cost of some $430 million and another 160,000 will be trained on a feepayer's basis. There is self-employment assistance of some $110 million.

There is a list—I could go on and on—of the assistance we are providing for young people to get into the work force, especially through training and retraining to upgrade their skills or to give them skills if they have dropped out of school at an early age and want to come back to take training and retraining.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Those programs are doing nothing today for the 12,000 young people without work.

[Translation]

The minister tells us these policies and programs will deal with the situation. That is just not true and he knows it. Why is there so much unemployment in Manitoba? Fifty-five per cent of the unemployed are young people. Why is there so much poverty in Manitoba which has the highest youth poverty rate in Canada? Why do so many people go to food banks in Manitoba? I am told this year there will be over 100,000. What is the government going to do now, to put these people back to work?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised the hon. member minimizes the training and retraining. Just a few moments ago his colleague from Hamilton East said that what young people needed was training and retraining.

Mr. Duhamel: Yes, and I wish you would do it.

Mr. McDermid: They cannot have it both ways over there on the Liberal benches although they try to.

We feel training and retraining are the most important elements to get young people trained and back into the work force in meaningful high-tech jobs. We are doing it and it is paying benefits. We have seen employment rise every month over the last 11 months and we expect it to continue that way.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. The North American Free Trade Agreement provides for environmental protection measures unequalled in any other trade agreement in force today. NAFTA protects our right to establish and enforce our own strict environmental standards.

Could the minister explain his position on this side agreement on the environment with Mexico and the Americans and tell us why he is not proceeding with amendments to the Free Trade Agreement between Canada, Mexico and the United States?

• (1450)

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Department of the Environment, which I have the privilege of heading, was directly involved in the discussions on the North American Free Trade Agreement. In fact, the agreement that came out of the negotiations is probably the greenest free trade agreement in existence today. It contains a commitment by the countries to sustainable development which constitutes a precedent, especially after the Earth Summit in Rio, and it also contains a commitment by each country to set standards they deem appropriate, as well as a commitment not to relax standards, legislation or regulations for the purpose of attracting investment.

Even more significant is a committment in the agreement or, should I say, parallel to it, to create a North American commission on the environment. The parties are now discussing the mandate of such a commission, and I hope we will be able to finalize the Free Trade Agreement as such so that we can have a continental approach to the environment.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of the Environment.

The minister will know that there was an environmental assessment review on the expansion of the Lester B. Pearson airport in Toronto. The minister will also know that the Minister of Transport has totally disregarded this environmental assessment review in the expansion of that airport.

Will the minister direct that the environmental review process be followed and that the environmental review process mean something in the expansion of government work?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the hon. member's conclusions on whether or not the recommendations have been followed.

I understand the hon. member has a great deal of concern for this issue and I share his concern, but in regard to the environmental assessment itself the government has followed a certain number of recommendations. It has made some evaluations in regard, for example, to the runways and the recommendations made in the report. It also found that its own experts did not agree with some of the recommendations made in the report, more specifically on the north-south runway and for that reason chose to follow the course it has followed.

I may add by way of information for the hon. member, whether on this issue or another one mentioned earlier today, that individual departments direct the environmental assessments according to the environmental assessment review guidelines we are now living under.

That is a critical element in the implementation of the environmental concern. It is critically important that each department assume its environmental responsibilities and that it takes the recommendations in regard to the over-all concerns they have to deal with, and that is what the Department of Transport has done.

CRIME PREVENTION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. However, before I ask it I want to tell my good friend, the Prime Minister, that I hope he does not change his mind. I am looking forward to seeing him where old prime ministers go: Madam Tussaud's or whatever.

Mr. Mulroney: Heaven.

Mr. Waddell: There is another direction too.

At the recent conference on crime prevention in Toronto the minister and his officials heard the same kind of evidence that our justice committee heard, namely that we prevent crime by tackling the social and economic conditions that cause crime. When the justice committee heard the same evidence we arrived at a number of recommendations.

What is the minister doing about those recommendations? It seems to me that for him and his colleague, the Solicitor General, it is all talk and no action. What is he doing about the recommendations?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend should recognize the results of the symposium in Toronto were very good because we got everybody together, from all parties as well, and I think we are going in the same direction.

We got the report from the standing committee about three weeks ago. I announced in Toronto that we were going to have a comité du suivi which would bring all elements of the symposium together. I will go to cabinet very soon to get some initiatives before the House, I would say, this spring.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about a comité du suivi or an advisory committee to follow this up. I ask the minister to be specific, because we were in our recommendations. We need a national crime prevention policy with a national council.

• (1455)

I ask the minister to tell the House who is going to be appointed to this committee that he talked about. What is the selection process? Who will the committee report to? What are its responsibilities and what is the timetable? I ask him to be specific, for some action and less talk.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I should remind my hon. friend that the symposium was last week. We are just about 10 days past that symposium.

I made a commitment at the symposium that we will get all those good ideas and good initiatives on the table. Before announcing what we are going to do I thought it was better to get what the people wanted us to do.

With this consultation process done now, with the standing committee report all together, I think going to cabinet to get the government's position on those different issues is the way to do things.

I mentioned in my previous answer that we were going to bring it to the House this spring. It is a good time frame.

[Translation]

I think it is entirely reasonable to assume that this spring we will be able to introduce initiatives in response to the recommendations made by the symposium and the standing committee.

CANADA SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of small businesses, science and technology.

All hon. members should agree that the Canada Scholarship Program has been an important incentive for many of our young people to enter university and to study science and engineering. The students of today will be crucial to Canada's competitiveness tomorrow.

Could the government comment on its plans for the future of this program and what it plans to do to assist young people in learning technological trades?

Ms. Copps: How is your householder, Edna?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend opposite asks the member asking the question whether this is for her householder. I hope it is because she has been behind technological training for youth ever since she was elected to Parliament.

The program she is speaking of, the Canada Scholarship Program, is sponsored not only by the government but also by educators and by industry. We now have 2,500 scholarships annually under this program.

I would like to remind the House that we have announced a new scholarship program beginning this year for first-year diploma program students entering technology. There are going to be 800 scholarships for these technology students and it will grow to 1,600 scholarships by the year 1995. My hon. friend will be interested to know that a minimum of 50 per cent of the scholarships are awarded to women.

FISHERIES

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The minister will know that Nova Scotia fishermen feel somewhat abandoned by the minister of fisheries and the government for their failure to put in place an adequate compensation package.

In view of the seriousness of the situation on the east coast, what specific plan of action and time frame do the minister have in mind to assist these fishermen, plant workers and communities in their time of crisis?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman realizes of course that we do not have a moratorium in the fishery in the areas he is referring to so it is not, strictly speaking, comparable to the situation in the northern cod area.

Nevertheless, the reduction in the total allowable catch is very severe this year. There will be some thousands of people affected as to whether they become eligible for UI or not. With respect to what we can do for the fishery and processing plant workers, we are reviewing that situation. It is quite complicated because there are fisheries going ahead that will be quite profitable in other than groundfish species. The government is reviewing the situation.

We have to remember that most people are on UI at the moment and the fishermen will not be coming off UI until the middle of May. We still have some time to see whether any extraordinary steps are needed.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the minister of fisheries is not only the minister responsible for that department. He is also responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. He knows full well the frightening high unemployment in some of the communities in Atlantic Canada. In fact in industrial Cape Breton it is 28.5 per cent, an alarming rate for any community in this country. Now thousands of fishermen and their families are having to turn to welfare and other means in order to provide for themselves.

I ask the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who is seized with this particular problem and has been reviewing it for an extended period of time what specific plan of action, and the time frame for that plan of action, he is prepared to implement to assist those fishermen, those communities and those plant workers. Those Canadians deserve an answer.

• (1500)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, our Atlantic groundfish management plan was announced the middle of December 1992. As I have said regular programs are in place, including the regular unemployment insurance program, and most people are covered, if not all, under those programs now.

There may well be as we approach May some people who come off the unemployment insurance program who will be affected so there is still time to review the situation.

There are many programs available: the Community Futures program, the Atlantic Adjustment Program and FAP, the Fisheries Alternatives Program. These are all being examined to see if we need more flexibility and what additional steps are needed. An announcement will be made in due course.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister of fisheries to whom I direct my question will know that today in Sydney and tomorrow in Halifax fishermen are expressing their outrage at the way the government is handling the fisheries crisis.

To sit here and listen to his responses to my colleague a moment ago one would think there is no problem. One would think that one program or another is taking care of all those people. That just is not the case.

How does he explain the outrage being expressed in Sydney today and in Halifax tomorrow? Is he all right and those fishermen all wrong, or is there maybe some truth to the charge that the government has failed those people in terms of the compensation package he ought to be making available to them?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, we are all familiar with the nature of campaigns that are launched and under way from time to time in connection with people who want the government to take action in one direction or another.

It is a common feature of all those campaigns. Outrage is a very considerable part of a campaign so I am quite familiar with the fact that outrage is being expressed. I am also familiar with the fact that we have many programs under way that are assisting fishermen and plant workers throughout Atlantic Canada. We are going to be spending $780 million to $800 million under the northern cod program. We are spending an additional $584 million under the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program. We are reviewing the situation to see what additional assistance might be needed or what additional flexibility might be needed to assist the people who may require assistance because of the lower TACs this year.

Present programs at the moment are looking after them, but these present programs may well not be adequate after May. Naturally it is a feature of demonstrations and the like that people express their dissatisfaction and their disgruntlement. That is the nature of demonstrations.

POINTS OF ORDER

TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, when the minister responded to my question on unemployment insurance today he suggested that I was using erroneous information.

I would like to take this opportunity to table the government document from which my question arose and in which it is said that a person voluntarily leaving employment by personal choice to take care of her child and then applying for regular benefits would have difficulty in showing just cause as required by the act.

Mr. Speaker: Would the House give the member permission to table the document? Is there permission?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the Chair would give some consideration to a term which seems to be used fairly often in this Chamber by members opposite, the word erroneous.

I am sure the Chair would note that when a question is put sometimes the response is that it is erroneous in terms of its factual content. That gives a certain perception to the viewing audience which I believe to be inaccurate and unfair. At the same time those of us on this side could in supplementary questions accuse the government of being erroneous in its facts. I am wondering where this will lead us to.

• (1505)

Would the Chair take it under advisement to take a look at the implications and the fact that I believe motive is being impugned here. I do not think that is part of our Standing Orders and I do not think it is part of the traditions in the House to impugn the motives of hon. members who rise in their places to ask specific questions of ministers or of ministers who make responses to hon. members opposite.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked if the Speaker would comment on the use of the word erroneous. I might but I think I would prefer to wait until I have the full context of how the word was used and the circumstances under which the complaint was brought, because words in themselves without the context are not always the best guide to members.

I appreciate the comment of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–418, an act to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to make a few brief remarks on the introduction of this bill.

The pensions of members of Parliament have been the subject of much discussion and a certain amount of mischief in recent years. Notwithstanding the mischief makers the Canadian public must realize that a readily accessible pension plan is a quid pro quo to the attraction of high calibre mid–career Canadians other than independently wealthy Canadians to leave their careers to serve as members of Parliament.

What is legitimately objectionable to the public is the notion that a person can come here early in adult life, serve a few years, and then leave to pursue another career while drawing a parliamentary pension potentially for several decades.

It is this problem that is addressed by the proposed legislation. It would simply indicate that parliamentary pensions cannot be drawn until the recipient reaches the age of 55. Its application would be to all persons including current incumbents elected to the next and subsequent Parliaments.

• (1510)

I recognize that a private member's bill is largely a symbolic act. However, if we as members are to be responsive to the public, we must be prepared to openly address these issues. As for myself, I believe we need a total review of pensions in Canadian society. All too often people are locked into careers by their pension arrangements that they would sooner leave. Others have no pensions at all.

I believe it is time for a mandatory, universally portable, individual pension scheme for Canadians that would apply equally for all Canadians including members of Parliament.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. McCreath moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the petitioners call upon the government to ensure that on French and English radio and television, steps are taken to minimize the use of inappropriate language in programs and thus reduce the occurence of violence.

[English]

They really believe that much of the language and acts of violence on radio and television is in fact counterproductive to what people are trying to do in terms of the models they have set up for their families. They ask the government, indeed all parliamentarians, to reduce it and to remove it if at all possible.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): I have a second petition today from residents of Saskatchewan.

[English]

They reflect the sentiments of Canadians throughout the country when they ask the government to review its policies on education. They condemn the government for having applied the 3 per cent tax on student loans and particularly the latest measure where it added another six months' interest to student loans.

They really believe that the loans program is inadequate and that it has to be revised. They are really quite afraid of the new proposal coming from the government where the banks will become involved. They are wondering who will set the eligibility criteria, what the role of the banks will be and whether or not that will diminish access to post-secondary education.

[Translation]

I support them because I think this is an excellent petition.

MENINGOCOCCAL DISEASE TEST KIT

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, about a year ago Mrs. Wanda Quigley of Wabush, Labrador, circulated a petition across Canada which attracted over 25,000 signatures with regard to the production of a test kit for meningococcal disease. She lost a child to that dreaded disease.

This petition is presented on behalf of a large number of people in the province of Nova Scotia who call upon Parliament to urge the government to obtain ownership of the test kit and to have the situation with Health and Welfare Canada resolved so that the test kit can be on the market and available to Canadians.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, I have the privilege to present a petition to this House dealing with violence on television.

Many studies have shown a link between violence in entertainment and desensitization to violence in our society. Hundreds of children, women and men are killed and are subject to inhumanities as a result. In particular, part of the culture of violence is the serial killer board game that comes with a bag of 25 babies. The point of it is to murder as many defenceless children and adults as possible.

The laws do not deal with this at the moment. The petition signed by over 80 people from Saskatoon asks Parliament to consider amending the Criminal Code so that violent and degrading materials such as the serial killer board game can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

MENINGOCOCCAL DISEASE TEST KIT

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleague, the hon. member for Labrador, in presenting a petition concerning meningococcal disease which has taken the lives of many children in Canada.

I am reminded of the death of young Islanders to this dreaded disease that gives almost no warning and no time really for treatment. The government should do whatever it can at the Department of National Health and Welfare to make this kit available that tests all types of meningitis at its early stages.

The names on this petition are from Summerside, basically Prince and King's counties, Prince Edward Island. I encourage the government to respond very quickly to this petition.

• (1515)

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, the petition I have is signed by a number of people on Vancouver Island. It draws attention to the fact that the proposed North American free trade agreement has resulted in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada.

This agreement would cause Canada to lose more good jobs. If implemented, this trade agreement will result in further restrictions being placed on the ability of Canada's federal, provincial and territorial governments now and in the future from assisting Canadian industries, conserving Canadian natural resources for Canadian benefit and advancing needed social progress.

The petitioners call upon the House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and to recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to table a petition from young people in the riding of Hull—Aylmer.

They call upon Parliament to consider an amendment to the Criminal Code to prevent the distribution in Canada of violent and degrading material like the serial killer board game.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bevilacqua.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in the debate today, although I must say that when I read the motion put forward by my hon. friend I cannot help but wonder what world he is living in.

It ignores the facts at home and it ignores the facts abroad. It takes what I guess Canadians are coming to see as a typical Liberal approach to policy. There is no substance. They chase the polls, pretend to be in favour of whatever seems to be popular, are against absolutely everything and criticize every initiative taken by anyone else.

Consider this business of pretending that we are still mired in a recession when clearly we are starting to come out of it. There is no question that we have been through a tough recession. The whole world has been through it but things are turning around and Canada is well postured to come out of it.

Furthermore, I might say that it is interesting to note our recovery is export driven by the trade policies put in place by this government, every single one of which the Liberal Party opposed. Is that not interesting?

We hear them talk about all the terrible things going on. Let us check the record. Let us look at what is going on in the country today. The unemployment rate dropped in February from January. The help wanted index rose by four points in February. The composite leading indicator was up 0.7 per cent. That is a huge jump and a good sign of robust growth over the next few months. They scoff on the other side but these are the facts. We have to deal with the facts as they are, not as they wish were.

Housing starts in February jumped 6 per cent over that in January. Exports in January 1993 set another record. We sold $14.6 billion of goods and services to the world, which is more than we sold previously in the history of this country.

In 1992 exports set an all-time high and were up 11.2 per cent from 1991. The inflation rate in February 1993 was only 2.3 per cent. That is not bad when we compare it with a 12.9 per cent inflation rate that the Liberals left us when they left power.

Our workers are more productive. Statistics Canada reports said that labour productivity has had its best rate in almost 10 years. In 1992 output per person was us 2.3 per cent. We are coming out of this recession. We are well postured and we are well positioned to deal with the changes going on in the world.

• (1520)

Why? It is simply because the government has had the foresight and the courage to put things in place. The world is changing whether my hon. friends opposite want to know it or not. In fact one of our colleagues here, the hon. member for Halton—Peel, has recently published a very excellent book. I want to give him a plug. He looks ahead and talks about some of the things that are going to happen in the future. I would recommend this book to all my colleagues for their reading.

Here are a few of the principles that he sees as he looks ahead: a lot more globalization, success to those who are competitive, competitive pressures to reduce taxes and lessen regulations, more efficient government, pressure to control government spending, more economic restructuring, changing demographies, and it goes on.

Whether my hon. friends opposite want to acknowledge it or not, the world is changing and Canada must change to align itself with the changes in the world so that Canadians will be able to benefit and have a level of prosperity such as they never experienced before as we head into the 21st century.

That is precisely what underwrites the economic plan of this government set forth in November 1984 when it first came into office.

It is interesting to reflect on that performance over the last eight and a half years. There has been a five-part program. These are not ad hoc random happenings that have gone on. There is a clear structure and a plan to prepare Canada to be competitive in the 21st century. It has included a program of deficit control. Interestingly enough, every deficit control measure that has been brought in since I have been here has been opposed by our friends on the other side who have now become the apostles of deficit control. Is that not interesting?

Tax restructuring has made our Canadian manufacturers more competitive, difficult though it was to go through. I notice my hon. friends scoff. I notice they opposed the restructuring but they have absolutely no idea what they would put in its place.

New trade agreements have provided market access for our exports. Twenty-five per cent of the jobs in this country are dependent upon exports, and one needs somewhere to export to. Our friends across the way would get rid of our various trade agreements. I do not know where they propose to trade without them.

There are privatization and reduction in the size of government. Each of these measures has been opposed by the other side, yet those are the things that have taken 60,000 to 70,000 people off the payroll of the Canadian taxpayers.

There are industrial adjustment programs. Obviously structural changes in the economy impact directly on people. That is why the government has brought in the labour force development strategy the elements of which, once again, were opposed by the other side. It has taken a passive approach to handing out money to people and turned it into an active approach in terms of unemployment insurance. It not only provided interim support for people but provided opportunities for them to train themselves so they will be prepared to take advantage of the opportunities that exist as we head into the 21st century.

These programs have been targeted at improving productivity. I just quoted a figure a moment ago on how Canadian productivity has gone up. Improving productivity, quite simply, means enhancing our competitiveness and enabling us to take advantage of those opportunities.

The strategy is clearly working when we look at the growth in jobs. There are 118,000 more people employed in Canada today when compared with a year ago. Clearly it is working. One of the manifestations is when we look at the growth in trade surpluses. Clearly I am sure that if my hon. friends opposite reflect soberly they will realize that actually these initiatives have done a great deal.

I know my time is limited, but I would like to focus on the trade area, some of the initiatives that the government has taken, the impact of those initiatives, and where we are going from here.

Trade agreements provide opportunities. Results come when firms, businesses and workers take advantage of those opportunities. If we are going to take a look at the free trade agreement and assess its results, and if we are going to look at the potential that NAFTA offers us, we have to look at them for what they are and not for what they are not. We cannot throw up a bunch of smoke-screens and simply go out and try to terrorize or scare Canadians.

I remember in 1988 when the Liberals and the NDP went around and told everybody they were going to lose medicare; they were going to lose this and they were going to lose that. Well, guess what? Four and a half years later what do we have to show for the free trade agreement? Our exports have gone up dramatically in Canada. We still have medicare and we still have our social programs.

The free trade agreement should not be confused with the recession in terms of its impact on the economy. The recession has devastated our economy in many respects. Let us face it, but let us try not to play the game, as I heard from some speakers earlier in this debate, by saying: "Ah well, every job that has been lost has nothing to do with the recession, it has everything to do with the free trade agreement".

• (1525)

I quoted a number of eminent authorities earlier today in responding to one of my hon. friends, but just for their benefit since I see a number of Liberal members in the House let me quote from one of the most reputable Liberal sources in the country, The Toronto Star. What did The Toronto Star have to say about the free trade agreement? Let me quote from The Toronto Star of February 7, 1993: "Far from creating the recession the FTA has softened its effect. The recession has been global and coincided with the fundamental restructuring of the world's economy. Critics too often attribute the effects of both the recession and restructuring to the demon FTA when without the FTA and those increased exports Canada's recession would only have been worse and restructuring more difficult".

If my hon. friends in the Liberal Party are not going to accept the gospel according to The Toronto Star then the universe is really not unfolding as it normally does.

Let us take a look at the evidence and the facts on what the impact of free trade agreement has been. A recent study by the C.D. Howe Institute shows that since the FTA Canada's trade balance with the United States has improved more than its trade balance with other regions. The C.D. Howe study also shows it is in those sectors liberalized by the FTA that exports have increased the most, in particular those in non–resource based manufacturing.

Total merchandise exports to the U.S. have increased to record levels since the FTA. From $102.6 billion in 1988 exports reached $122 billion in 1992. This is a 19.2 per cent increase in four years. Exports in 1992 increased 13.6 per cent over 1991. Canada's merchandise trade surplus with the United States was $17.7 billion, a 27.3 per cent increase over 1991. In December alone Canada's trade surplus with the United States increased by $411 million to a record $1.96 billion.

Those are pretty extraordinary figures and it is hard to say: "What does that mean for me as an individual?" What it means quite simply is that exports mean jobs. If our Canadian companies are to continue to grow and prosper they have to be able to compete where the markets are. If we are to try to shelter our Canadian workers from the rest of the world then quite simply there is not going to be an opportunity to sell in those markets. We have to be competitive.

Clearly the FTA has contributed to our competitiveness. I noticed in January 1993 our exports to the United States were 23 per cent higher than in the same month only a year earlier.

Another impact of the FTA has been the sharp increase in foreign direct investment into Canada since it was implemented, clearly showing confidence in the Canadian economy and in the government's structural reforms. Investors from all over the world know, and indeed Canadian investors know it, they can invest in factories and the expansion of businesses in Canada and that they have access to the largest market in the world in the United States.

Investments quite simply means jobs. The growth of investment that has been the direct result of the FTA clearly has been beneficial. Our exports to the U.S. are setting record levels. Our merchandise trade surplus with the U.S. is at record levels. All this has had a positive effect on job creation with a net increase, as I said earlier, of 118,000 new jobs more than in the previous year.

That is performance. That is the outcome of the FTA. What does the Conference Board of Canada say about the FTA? "Free trade critics are confusing the facts. They are blaming the FTA for job losses that are attributable to a variety of other economic circumstances such as the recession. There is also evidence that the FTA, rather than hurting the economy, may have actually offset some of the damage that the recession has done to the Canadian economy today".

I could go on and on. I have a lot of quotes here that I would be pleased to read into the record for the benefit of my hon. friends, but I think the point is clearly and unequivocally made. The fact is that the free trade agreement is doing for Canada exactly what it was supposed to do, creating economic opportunities and creating jobs.

• (1530)

When this recession is fully behind us there is absolutely no question that the Canadian economy is going to be booming as never before.

Now we are moving into the next step, the North American free trade agreement, which has been signed and which adds another 85 million people, creating the largest market area in the world with Mexico, Canada and the United States.

It builds on the FTA. It is interesting to note a number of features of the NAFTA. Already I hear my colleagues opposite, particularly my friends in the New Democratic Party who seem to be out to convince the entire world that NAFTA is going to put them out of business and make them all unemployed.

It is interesting to note with respect to the NAFTA the auto pact remains the same. Agriculture will see some barriers removed to the export of Canadian goods into Mexico. Yet our supply management system for poultry and dairy remains untouched, exactly the same, protecting the food supply of Canadians and protecting Canadian farmers.

It preserves the FTA exception for cultural industries. I remember all the talk in 1988 about culture and about how the door was being opened when culture was not in there. Culture is not in the NAFTA either.

Health and social services remain fully protected. Canadian government policy prohibiting large scale export of water is unaffected as well. We have heard talk about that. If it is bottled and manufactured then it can be exported. That is the limit on it and has been the case up to now.

Of course it provides market opportunities for Canadians in the area of natural gas exports. What is the impact on the environment? We are hearing a fair bit of talk about that because of the bilateral discussions that are going on. It is interesting to note that the NAFTA itself contains more provisions relating to the environment than any other trade agreement ever signed in the history of the world. There is a strong commitment to sustainable development and to environmental protection.

Countries may maintain their own environmental standards. There is absolutely nothing in the NAFTA that will bring down the environmental standards that Canadians insist upon as the basis for government in our society. It prohibits the reduction of standards in health and safety as well as in the environment that attract investments. There is going to be a procedure to observe that.

As we know there are parallel discussions going on. People seem to be suggesting that because parallel discussions have been started on the environment and labour as cases in point, there is nothing happening with respect to the environment.

I want to point out, to use a word raised by the House leader of the Liberal Party earlier today, nothing could be more erroneous than that suggestion. Canada put the suggestion on the table one year ago that we should look at further enhancing environmental predictions through trilateral discussions. With the change of government in the United States the Americans are being more responsive. Some people would suggest we are taking the cues from the Americans with respect to the environment.

There is no country in the world that has the enviable reputation of this country in terms of its record with the environment. We saw that at the onset at the United Nations conference on environment and development last June in Rio when Canada was looked to as the delegation that was providing leadership in the world in the area of sustainable development and in the area of the environment. Our green plan was looked upon as a model to be followed by all nations.

We as a government welcome the new increased interest that the new American government has in terms of environmental protection. We are absolutely delighted to have an opportunity to sit down to discuss further enhancing protection of the environment.

As well, I might say there should be no misconceptions about what the impact of collateral discussions on the NAFTA itself. President Clinton has made it very clear it is the intention of his government that NAFTA will go ahead on schedule, unchanged. It will not be reopened. It will go ahead on schedule on January 1, 1994. Hopefully by that time we will have these side agreements as well.

As with NAFTA there will be full consultations with all affected groups, with provincial governments, with business and labour groups and so on, so that the opportunities presented to Canadians through those discussion to have their input will be there, as it has been before. What is important about NAFTA is what the Government of Canada wanted to get out of these negotiations and what in fact we achieved through these negotiations. We hear a lot of talk in the House about Mexicans but as far as this government is concerned its primary concern is what is best for Canada.

We headed into those NAFTA discussions with the interests of Canada in mind. Essentially there were three objectives set forth by the Government of Canada. The first was access to the Mexican market, to gain access for Canadian goods, services and capital to Mexico, one of the fastest growing and most promising economies in the world, on an equal footing with the United States.

Clearly these discussions between the U.S. and Mexico were going to happen. If there was a bilateral agreement between the U.S.A and Mexico on the one hand and a bilateral agreement between the U.S. and Canada on the other, one does not have to be a genius to figure out where the investment is going to go. The investment is going to go to the United States.

By being part of a trilateral agreement we have the opportunity to enhance investment in this country. That was an objective we sought. That was an objective we have achieved.

Second was to improve and protect the FTA, to resolve trade problems with the United States that had occurred during the past few years while ensuring no reduction in the benefits and obligations of the FTA.

The FTA was a complex document negotiated over many months and brought into place on January 1, 1989. Naturally as with any document of that magnitude there would be some chinks in the armour and some little problems that had to be worked out. The NAFTA negotiations provided us with an opportunity to put on the table the concerns of Canada as a government with the way the FTA was working, for example things like the establishment of Canadian content in automobiles. Things like that were sorted out in the NAFTA. The second objective was achieved.

Third and finally was our aspiration to see that Canada remained an attractive location for investment. Obviously investment is the key to growth. By being part of this large North American market of 350 million people Canada now has a marvellous basis for the attraction of investment from abroad, the result of which is going to be more jobs for Canadians and the opportunity to maintain the high standard of living we have.

In conclusion I must say when I reflect on the motion put forward by the hon. member opposite I really think it is time for him to go back to the drawing-board. I hope he will listen to the speech delivered earlier today by my hon. friend, the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization, who dealt with a number of fiscal matters. I hope he will listen to what I said on trade. I look forward to the rest of the debate. I trust my hon. friend on reflection will realize that perhaps this government is doing an outstanding job and should be sustained as it will be at the next general election.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a couple of comments and then pose a question to the hon. member.

He indicated that he was disputing the essence of the motion, that there is stifled economic growth. How would the hon. member respond to the concern of the youth around the country who say they have lost hope in this government? When they graduated with skills they could not find jobs. They also fear the skills they have today may not be relevant tomorrow.

Would the hon. member respond to the specific question of whether he would favour the establishment of a national apprenticeship program and the creation of a Canadian youth service to address the very emergent concerns of youth about unemployment and their future?

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to my hon. friend's question.

We can dress these programs up in any kind of fabric we want but the bottom line is that what is best for the youth of Canada is a strong economy. A strong economy where there is economic growth, an economy in which there are incentives for investors, will mean the establishment of manufacturing enterprises and that is going to mean job opportunities.

Job opportunities and the economic growth that would spring from them are exactly what young people are looking for today.

We have benefited for many years from a high quality of education in this country. Right now our education systems are challenged as never before, challenged in part because they are looked upon to accept responsibility for all the social evils of society and the difficult problems that kids bring to school, challenged also by the level of resources available to them. Government restraint is popular in principle but when it means not providing the growth in expenditures that may be expected, whether in youth programs, education, transfer programs to the provinces or whatever, they are difficult to cope with.

• (1540)

In the long run the best thing we can do for young people is not burden them with the debt of our past but ensure we have a strong economy that will provide them with the jobs and the opportunities they are looking for in the future.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I must agree with the concluding statements of the member opposite, although I would put a slightly different interpretation on them. He said the government could not be accused of not working as hard as it could. It certainly is working as hard as it can to distort the effects of what has happened as a result of the free trade agreement.

I was referring this morning to the very expensive tabloid the government sent to every household in the country. It said that since the free trade agreement no country has been able to take a larger share of the U.S. market for manufactured goods than Canada. As a matter of fact the U.S. commerce department's figures, obviously different figures from what the government is using, point out it is from simply not the case.

Japan had the largest share increase in manufactured imports both before and after the FTA was implemented. As a matter of fact Australia, Mexico and South Africa had a larger percentage of growth in imports into the United States than Canada, and they do not have a free trade agreement with the United States either. There certainly is a lot of distortion there. I am at a loss to understand why the government would try to convince us otherwise.

I would like to come back to a statement that the member made the other day in relation to the free trade agreement. He said that as Canadians we must take down this wall of high wage protection we have put around ourselves and get ourselves reintroduced to the real world.

There seems to be a tremendous amount of concern on the government side for the workers in Mexico and great praise for the free trade agreement and how much it is going to do for them. The Maquiladora sections of Mexico have had free trade for 20 years. The Mexican workers who work in that area of Mexico are suffering from lower wages than the workers in the rest of Mexico.

I ask the hon. member how on earth he can extrapolate from the evidence that either the Canadians or the Mexican workers will be better off under the North American free trade agreement.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend from Saskatoon—Dundurn really thinks that South Africa represents serious competition for trade with the United States then I suggest he has a very creative way of looking at the growth of trade in the world.

Let us deal with the point that he makes about wages. I know he takes everything I say as gospel, but just on the off chance that he might be a little bit suspicious let me read from another source, an expert in this area, the Business Council on National Issues, which I know he will recognize as a very reputable source. The council states: "Low wages are just not a main source of competitive advantage for the knowledge intensive industries that play an ever larger role in modern economies. If low wages were the key to investment decisions the poorer regions of Canada and the United States would account for disproportionate shares of domestic business investment. In fact relatively low wage regions of both Canada and the United States generally receive disproportionately smaller shares of business investment including manufacturing investment".

My friend talks about the Maquiladora, which represents about 2 per cent of the manufacturing economy of Mexico. We are dealing with a very unique circumstance in terms of those free trade zones to which he refers. He and his colleague from Nanaimo—Cowichan would have the entire country think that all future manufacturing in North America is to be done in the Maquiladora of Mexico.

The reality of the situation is that our international competitors are not low wage countries. They are Europe, the United States, and Japan. The same thing applies. What is significant is the cost of production and productivity, not just the price of labour.

• (1545)

Mexican cost of labour is less, on average seven and a half times less than the price of labour in Canada. On the other hand productivity of Canadian workers is six and a half times higher. Access to capital in this country is also considerably higher. The productivity of capital technology is higher in this country. That is why Canadians can compete. My friends in the labour movement and the NDP should not be afraid of Canadians they should take pride in what Canadians can do. It will be a success story just as the FTA has been.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for South Shore with great interest. He seemed to be saying that the NAFTA was a great step forward in helping the supply management sector, helping trade and so on.

I wonder if the hon. member could explain exactly why the government failed to get a subsidy code and an anti-dumping code the free trade deal when it was renegotiating under NAFTA. Taking into account all the problems we have had with the steel industry, with the hog and pork industry, all the trade dispute problems that the Prime Minister said would be solved by the FTA, it did not make arrangements to have a subsidy code so there would not be any future countervail duties against Canadian products being sold to the United States? Why did we not make arrangements for a countervail duty code so that everybody would know? Since every other free trade deal in the world, whether it is the European Economic Community group or the Australasian group or the New Zealand-Australia free trade deal, has these arrangements why did this government not—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. There is one minute remaining in the comments or questions period.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I could hardly do justice to such a complex question in one minute but I will try the best I can.

The important thing is that we do have a dispute settlement mechanism, in fact we have two of them in a general way in chapter eighteen and more specifically in chapter nineteen, which is definitive and inclusive.

As for the subsidy definition issue obviously it would be desirable to sort it out but the two parties have not been able to come to an agreement. What is important about the FTA and about NAFTA is what we have come to an agreement on.

My hon. friend talks about agriculture. I remind him again that the supply managed sector in Canada is fully protected under the FTA and again under NAFTA. If he thinks it is such a bad deal for farmers then he should talk to the pork producers. He should hear what they think about the FTA and the mechanism for resolving disputes which have served Canadians so well and so effectively and which we would not have without the FTA.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I am happy to have an opportunity to participate in this debate. The motion put forward by my colleague from York North was:

> That this House condemn the government for its policies that have stifled economic growth, destroyed Canadian jobs and exacerbated the recession.

My colleague left out one very important point in his motion when he talked about destroying Canadian jobs. There is one sector of the economy of this country that has grown, and that is the lobbyist sector. Under this government the lobbyists have managed successfully to influence and assist in this government's policy in a most destructive way for the past seven or eight years. I do not think Canadians today realize just what a force the lobbyist industry has been on this government.

Another area that has grown under this government is the area of the underground cash economy. There are experts today who would suggest that the underground economy in this country is worth over $100 billion.

• (1550)

There is a professor at the University of British Columbia, W.E. Diewert, who said that before the GST the underground economy was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $80 billion and since the GST it has been exacerbated and is now in excess of $100 billion.

When this government stands up today to defend its record I wonder what planet it will be on. When we go home to our ridings on the weekends or during breaks we run into people day in and day out who are without jobs, young people who are just graduating and cannot even get interviews because there is not even an opportunity. We talk about small businesses that are hanging on by their fingernails, and the government stands today and quotes its record and its statistics.

During the next election the central issue in the campaign is going to be one of trust. government members are going to be one of trust. Governement members are going to be saying "Trust us to stay the course". I cannot believe that the people of Canada will accept that, and it will not matter who the new leader is. It will not matter if it is the minister for small businesses, the Minister of National Defence or the member for Cambridge. The bottom line is they are going to run on their record of the last nine years.

This is a government that took office in 1984, talked about tax reform and then proceeded to install 32 tax increases, including this poorly designed GST, at the worst time in our economic history in terms of a downturn. The government crushed the confidence of the community at the retail level. It taxed books. It put a tax on cold pizza but not on warm pizza. It will not matter who the Conservative leader is because that GST is going to be on every doorstep morning, noon and night.

It was the same when we talked about the free trade agreement during the last debate. To this day I believe that the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra won the free trade debate but Canadians were fooled by the foreign multinational advertising led by the Business Council on National Issues, another example of where the lobbyists came in and bought full-page ads and radio ads and fooled Canadians with third party advertising. I pray this time Canadians will not be duped again.

Today there is this big media hype about the Minister of National Defence, a person who has rarely given a speech in the House of Commons. We do not know really what she stands for, but at the same time there is this media hype around the country saying that she is the answer to all that ails us. Yet at the same time she has been part and parcel of every decision that has taken place in this House for the last five years. She was there for the GST. She is there for the helicopters.

I do not believe for a minute that Canadians are going to stand by and just say that they want another four years of Conservative rule and that they want another four years in which, according to the latest numbers from Statistics Canada, there are 2.2 million people receiving welfare and 1.5 million people on unemployment insurance. Last year we spent close to $35 billion on welfare and unemployment insurance and the interest on those costs.

Speaking constructively about an idea that the government came up with just before Christmas, the Small Businesses Loans Act, we all know the greatest hope for new job creation lies with small business. The Small Businesses Loans Act was a good idea that the government had, but once again it has managed to screw even that up. It is unbelievable what it can do to a good idea. It thinks that Canadians are stupid. It was an idea that was announced in December to put some cash, some capital back into the hands of small business because that is where the job creation potential is and that is where our greatest hope is.

• (1555)

Here we are pushing April and we still do not have the message out to small businesses. I have said it in this House for the last three months. I keep begging the government to communicate this idea, advertise this idea. What does it do?

It has no sense of urgency. It does not realize that the bank manager will come knocking on the door saying: "Hey, your mortgage payments are behind" or "Mr. Small Businessman, your overdraft is unacceptable. We are not going to help you any more".

The government does not understand the sense of urgency. It does not understand when people are out of work or are about to lose their homes or their jobs or their businesses, the slap in terms of personal dignity that takes place. It seems to coast along takes its time. I believe Canadians during the next election are going to remember the deep pain the government has inflicted on them.

I am not suggesting for a second that any party, any person has the magic answer or has the magic wand to correct a global recession. That is not where I am coming from. I am coming from a point that when people are in deep pain and are looking to their leaders to give them some hope, this government sort of throws up an idea but then takes its time in implementing it.

I know of small businessmen dealing with this government who have been waiting in some cases for a year and a half, up to two years, to get action on files that they requested of this government. This lack of urgency, this seeming indifference to people when they are in deep pain, is going to be this government's legacy when we go to the people over the next few months.

As I said, I do not think for a minute we have a flash answer to correct all that ails us. Throughout history even with the flaws in the Liberal Party, and I know from time to time we have incurred larger deficits and therefore caused more debt in this country's Treasury, the Liberals, if one goes back 50 years, have the greatest record for putting people back to work.

When I go door to door or store to store in my riding in the next election and they ask me what the Liberal Party stands for, I will tell them to look at our record over the last 50 years and they will see that Liberals put Canadians to work. Liberals create more jobs than any other party and, quite frankly, I would rather have a little bit of debt on the nation's Treasury but let Canadians have their dignity and have them working.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I see my hon. colleague wanted to speak. I will be brief. Maybe there will be time for him too.

My hon. friend says that Liberal governments put people to work. During the tremendous boom of 1985 to 1990 the Liberal Government of Ontario put people to work this way. It hired over 18,000 public servants. That is how it put people to work. In the middle of a boom it added to public servants.

We read last week that the NDP government in Ontario is to lay off 18,000 people.

Does he believe that the way to create jobs is to hire public servants? Is that the Liberal approach, because if it is, it is not the NDP approach it seems any more, or the Conservative approach.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe the minister put that question to me. He knows full well that it is not the approach of the Liberal Party of Canada. The Liberal Party of Canada, and he knows this full well as I have said it in the House 150 times in the last three years, believes in entrepreneurship. The Liberal Party believes in small business.

• (1600)

There are over 960,000 small businesses in this country. Perhaps we could get the bill of the minister advertised and get the banks of Canada, instead of getting the CDIC to guarantee Edper, Campeau, Central Guaranty and the Royal Trustco, to help small business. He can find $10 billion for those people but he cannot find money to advertise to small business.

That is what is wrong with this government. We are not asking it to create a bureaucracy. We oppose red tape as much as anyone but we hate it ripping the heart and guts out of small business. The government is doing it by creating expectations with the Small Businesses Loans Act and not communicating the reality to the banks and the people that it is available.

When the minister talks about David Peterson and his Liberal Party hiring 18,000 public servants, I am not sure his facts are absolutely right. I will give him the benefit of the doubt that he did hire them. During that period he also balanced the budget.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. The hon. member raises a valid point about the underground economy. It seems to me back in 1981 when we had our last recession we had electricians and others unemployed. It was quite common when we went into the Legion to have a beer to hear people talking about whether so-and-so could do a job for cash under the table.

What he suggests in 1991 was just as true in 1980. When he expresses concern about going in and talking about the Small Businesses Loans Act, does he not feel better knowing that businesses have a better chance? If we went back to 1981 the prime bank rate was 22 per cent. Today he has to say because of these Tories and Tory policies the bank rate is 6.75 per cent. That must make businessmen feel a little more assured.

What about the consumer he bumps into who 10 years ago, back in 1981, had a five-year mortgage rate at 21.75 per cent? How does he explain to them today the difficulty and that the rate is under 9 per cent? How does he match the two?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I can respond to that quite easily. First of all, when we talk about the global recession that took place in 1980-81, the interest rates in the United States were close to 16.5 per cent and 17 per cent. Let us compare apples and apples.

The difference between 1981 and 1991 is that we had in our budget at that time a special recovery program. We did incur a little bit of debt to the Treasury but we built things. We built airports, things that we needed, non-optional use facilities. We built infrastructure because we would much rather pay people. We would much rather pay people to be out working with their hands and their minds than to give them a welfare cheque and have them sitting at home watching videos.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to enter into this debate. I want to follow up on what my colleague has talked about in his opening remarks to the people of Canada.

One of the things that has concerned me the most as a member is the facade which the Conservative government is now putting up, that everything is good in the land. It says we had a recession. It was a world recession. It was not our fault. We could not do anything about it. We have a debt so therefore we do not have the capability of helping Canadians to find work and to get the economy working again.

The facade that is being portrayed in this House today has been portrayed out on the hustings for a number of months because an election is coming. It has to be put to rest. We have to get back to the debate that we are in today, concerning legitimate ideas from members of Parliament as to how we get 1.5 million Canadians back to work.

Before I give my suggestions, and allow the government to analyse them, I hope it will do something instead of spending its time trying to suggest to Canadians that things are great out there. Let me mention to the government opposite what has happened in the last few years.

In 1990 Canada's business community had 11,642 bankruptcies, 2,907 in Ontario alone. In 1991 Canada had 13,496 bankruptcies, Ontario had 3,629. In 1992 Canada had 14,317 bankruptcies, Ontario had 4,240. These are business bankruptcies. They are not personal bankruptcies, and the difficulties incurred with that issue. They are simply business bankruptcies.

I want to spend my time today talking about what the government should be doing to get people back to work. It should be dealing with ways of helping small business, getting governments off the backs of small business. In that way small businesses can start spending their time figuring out, imagining in their own minds and being creative, ways to create employment and of course to make a profit for themselves in creating that employment that we are talking about.

I want to mention something that I got from a friend who is the new president of the Ontario Hotel–Motel Association. He gave me a list of regulatory hoops that a small business has to go through in order to start up a small business in Ontario. They call it the wall. In front of me I have a list of 42 regulatory agencies which a small business has to talk to before it can even open its doors. There are 42 different agencies in Ontario that an entrepreneur has to go and see before he can even attempt to make his first dollar.

Let me list them as quickly as I can. It is important for people to realize and not to be surprised that nobody in this country would even dare to start their own business given these kinds of situations.

Entrepreneurs have to see the municipal authority and check the by–laws. They have to look at the planning act, check the official plan and the zoning by–laws. They have to have a site plan control and deal with regional authorities, public works, policy statements, proposed wetlands policy, the Municipal Act, Building Code Act, Public Parks Act, Public Lands Act, Surveyor's Act and Surveys Act, Provincial Parks Act, Woodlands Improvement Act, Forestry Act, Crown Timbers Act, Trees Act, LLBO, Hotel Fire Marshall, Boards of Navigational Waters Act, Lakes and Rivers Improvement Act, Conservation Authorities Act, Wilderness Areas Act, Aggregate Resource Act, Fisheries Act, Endangered Species Act, Environmental Protection Act, Ontario Water Resources Act, Environmental Assessment Act, Public Health Act, Ontario Heritage Act, Foodland Guidelines, Farm Practices Protection Act, Off–Road Vehicles Act, Public Transportation Act, Highway Improvement Act, Public Service Works Act, Industrial Safety Act, Occupational Health and Safety Act.

Mr. Speaker, when you take a look at these regulatory agencies, can you imagine why no one in their right mind would want to start a business in Ontario or in Canada?

Mr. Mills: You have not even included the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Nault: That is right. My colleague says we have not even included the GST and the nightmares the government has created for small business by having it be the government's private tax collector.

I have done what the minister opposite who intervened in my colleague's speech asked us to do. I sent a letter to the business community in Kenora—Rainy River. I am sure all members here have their business community on their computer. I sent businesses a little memo telling them about the Small Businesses Loans Act and how they should go to their local bank and ask them if they can take a look at this. I told them if they are having difficulties because of the very difficult recession we are in and they want to try and keep themselves going and get the kind of capital and investment they need to create employment and stay in business the federal government is prepared to help them by guaranteeing up to 90 per cent of a loan to small businesses.

I did that in good faith because the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism said the government was really going to sell the Small Businesses Loans Act, it is a great thing. He is right. I want to help out and get our small businesses back to work so I sent this out to the businesses in my riding.

• (1610)

The phone started to ring minutes after people got this in the mail. They said: "This is great. We have got a program. I did not know this". They went to their bank and the banks did not know about it. The local bank managers in northern Ontario kept telling the small business community: "Oh, that is interesting. Small Businesses Loans Act. I do not know anything about that.

An hon. member: It's a true story.

Mr. Nault: No wonder small businesses are going bankrupt in this country with the kind of banking establishment they have to do deals with.

I am now presently researching how to create a northern Ontario regional bank because we really are in desperate trouble in northern Ontario.

The member opposite grins and shakes his head and laughs. However, if one tries to get a loan in northern Ontario one will see what it is like. Even in the best of times in northern Ontario some individual from Toronto calls them up and says there is a depressed area in northern Ontario. It is about the size of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick but it is a depressed area. One does not loan money up there.

That is so even if there are people such as those on my list who have been in business for 10 and 11 years and have been very successful and who are looking for some help during a very difficult time. One individual here owns her own business and all the property that is involved with it. She does not have a loan whatsoever. She asked for a line of credit and she was turned down. They would not take her property because the bank in Toronto the big guys in Toronto, said that Rainy River was a depressed area. One cannot lend money there.

That is my point. My point is that we either have to change the system or tell the banking community that it had better get its act together or we will have no choice but to do something about it.

I tried to find out what the banking community was up to. I have a very good friend in the riding who is a fairly wealthy businessman. He got a letter the other day from his bank, which is the Royal Bank. I cannot say who the gentleman is or what his financial situation is but I know personally that he is quite wealthy and owns a lot of property.

The bank sent him a letter the other day suggesting that he had a problem. He was a bad risk. He was simply amazed. They told him that they were going to change his monthly service charge and his current interest rates, which were prime plus one and a half per cent, to prime plus four per cent. He could not figure out why.

Then he checked with some people in the banks who are little higher up and learned they have changed their policies now. We have been told that businesses have now been put into three categories: class A, class B and class C.

I do not have too much time, but class C includes pretty well 90 per cent of the businesses that give the banks less than $300,000 in service charges, interest carrying charges, fees and other extras. If those businesses give the banks less than $300,000 a year and they are in class C they have to pay prime plus four per cent.

I can understand now what has happened. We would never get anybody to admit this in the banking establishment but these are the changes they have made. We have no choice in this House but to either enact legislation to make these banks allow businesses to create wealth in this country or else we will all be looking for a place to hang our hat next election because this country cannot survive under that kind of situation.

In my short time I hope I have outlined to the minister what is really going on in northern Ontario. We had better do something about it.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. The hon. gentleman talked about some 14,000 business bankruptcies in Canada. I think he would also be interested to know that just in Los Angeles county in the United States last year there were some 14,000 business bankruptcies.

While the hon. member suggests that only in Canada are we experiencing business bankruptcies, it is also true south of the border.

It is a very simple question. I listened very carefully to the hon. member's comments. It seems to me now that the Liberal policy is the nationalization of the Canadian banking system.

• (1615)

I just want to ask the hon. member if he could please clarify if it is the policy of the Liberal Party to nationalize the Canadian banking system?

Mr. Nault: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot help but laugh at the member opposite because he has basically trivialized people's lives.

An hon. member: He is probably another Kim Campbell puppy dog.

Mr. Nault: I cannot understand this. We have record bankruptcies in this country and tremendous problems. This is a very serious debate in the highest institution of the land and the member stands up and asks me a silly question as to whether I would be as dumb as the NDP and nationalize the banks.

I am not talking about that at all. What I am talking about is the fact that the banking establishments in this country can loan the Reichmanns billions of dollars without checking their credit rating. Look at the O&Y fiasco before our eyes. However, these institutions will not even give somebody in my riding a $10,000 loan even if he has the best credit rating, owns his own home and is prepared to put that up as collateral and owns the property that the business is being run on. Now he asks me a silly question about whether I want to have the banks controlled by the government.

I will tell him what I want. I have checked this out. There is absolutely no regulation that prevents a particular region in this country from setting up a regional bank. It is perfectly within the regulations and the act as it applies today. What I have been trying to find out is whether I could be proactive enough to convince the Ontario government to change the act as it relates to the credit unions because the Ontario government controls that particular act. If I cannot do I want to find out if there would be another mechanism in order for small businesses to get some loans.

Does the member opposite not think that a regional bank can be created under schedule A? He should take a look at the banking act to see that under schedule A one has to have so many people involved in creating this bank who are investors. This is a private enterprise system. It would have its own board from northern Ontario so I do not have to have somebody from Toronto tell me that Kenora—Rainy River is a depressed area. I want to put it back into our hands as northerners. We know best how to run northern Ontario and we will create the wealth for which we have been waiting a long time.

I want to tell the member for Cambridge how long northern Ontario has waited for the rest of Ontario to take it seriously. We have waited a long time. The Minister of State for Small Businesses of course gives us this regional development program called FEDNOR.

Mr. Sobeski: Are you going to do away with FEDNOR?

Mr. Nault: Well, Pat, just relax. I will tell the member exactly what I think of FEDNOR if he does not get his shorts in a knot. Just relax. The fact remains that FEDNOR has not created the diversification of the north that it was intended to do.

The real problem in northern Ontario is that the banking establishment has left us completely out in the cold. FEDNOR can fool around on the fringes all it likes. We appreciate the hand-out. It is a very nice thing to get a little hand-out, but Canadians and northerners are very tired of being the poor cousins of southern Ontario. We want some control over our own destiny and if the banking establishment in Toronto does not want to give it to us then we will create it ourselves by creating our own banking institutions in northern Ontario.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member who has just spoken to stay for a minute so I can respond to a couple of his comments and also to those of his colleague. I respect both of them very much and they are interested in these subjects so I am going to try to respond to what they have said in the last 10 or 15 minutes because they are asking serious questions.

I will address northern Ontario first because as the minister responsible for FEDNOR and as a minister for small business I think one of the real pleasures of that job was to be in charge of FEDNOR and to see that $60 million program in the last five years go into northern Ontario and create thousands of jobs in over 105 different communities.

• (1620)

The beauty of this program is that it supplements bank lending and private financing. I am surprised to hear the hon. member speak disparagingly of it. It usually levers the banks to do things they would not do.

I think he makes a good point. Northern Ontario has always had difficulty with getting chartered banks to pay attention and to give small businesses access to credit. That has been an historic problem for about 100 years. It is less of a problem now because of FEDNOR. In 400 different cases, it has levered bank lending that would never be there if FEDNOR was not there.

I ask the member to not say he does not want FEDNOR because that would have shut down those 400 things from happening and 105 different communities have benefited from the program.

An hon. member: He did not say that.

Mr. Hockin: I want to speak to my friend's more telling point which is that banks generally are not lending to small and medium sized enterprises. I want to thank his party and I want to thank the NDP which helped too. There was tremendous work by caucus members on our side who helped us get the Small Businesses Loans Act through the House of Commons two weeks ago. On Thursday it will have third reading in the Senate and will receive royal assent. The hon. member wants us to advertise this program before it is passed.

An hon. member: You have done that for nine years.

Mr. Hockin: The hon. member says that we have done it for nine years. He wants us to advertise the program with all the details, all the regulations and all the amendments even before it has passed the Senate. We cannot do that.

I want to tell my hon. friends, the members for Kenora—Rainy River and Broadview—Greenwood, that I respect their impatience about publicizing this. I want their ideas on how to do it.

Here is what we are going to do as soon as the bill passes on Thursday because I think everyone is interested in what we are going to do. We are going to put together a massive advertising campaign with the banks, and independent of the banks, right across Canada.

The second thing we are going to do is to make sure within the next month that all the lending officers in every bank branch—and we want the caisses de dépôt and the credit unions as well—are given a course on what the new SBLA is and what it amounts to so that they can be au courant.

I quite agree with the member for Kenora—Rainy River when he says that if one goes into a bank today in Kenora and ask about the SBLA then they are thinking of the old SBLA and not the new one.

An hon. member: They do not know about it at all.

Mr. Hockin: That is probably true too because they did not like the old one. It did not give them what they wanted and it was a program that the Liberals had put in place from 1980 to 1984 and that we changed in certain ways. Both what we did and what they did was not enough to lever more than $400 million worth of lending last year.

We are now told by the banks that with these changes that we have made to the SBLA—my hon. friend supports these changes—we are going to have over $1 billion worth of business in the next year alone.

How are they going to do that if they do not promote it? How are they going to do it if they do not advertise it? How are they going to do it without training? This is what the program will be. I look forward to having help from members of Parliament to help us advertise this.

I think everybody in the House is interested in this subject. They can do a lot for their constituents. It might help them all get re-elected if they tell all the small businesses on Main Street in their riding about the SBLA.

What is new about the SBLA, this innocuous sounding little bill, the Small Businesses Loans Act? Everybody goes to sleep when we say the words. Let me say, that it is the most exciting piece of legislation to pass this House in this session of Parliament. I think we provisioned $40 million for loan losses under this program and we are going to lever $1 billion worth of activity.

By the way, in contrast to the NDP government in Ontario we are spending $1 billion directly to create jobs. It is creating 8,000 jobs in one case and 800 in another. This is much smarter spending. By using a loan guarantee scheme of $40 million one can get the banks to put $1 billion up instead of us. That is what SBLA is.

Why are the banks interested this time around? I want my friend from Kenora—Rainy River to listen carefully to why it is different. The guarantee has been raised from 85 per cent to 90 per cent. If there is a loss under this loan the banks pick up 10 per cent of the loss and the federal government picks up 90 per cent of the loss. This is a very big enticement.

Second, we have increased their commission. They had a 1 per cent commission under the old bill. This is a problem. They had to do a lot of paper work. We have increased the commission to one and three-quarters per cent on the understanding that they market the devil out of this thing, promote it and train for it. This was a very good point by my hon. friend, the member for Broadview—Greenwood. That is where the commission is.

We have done those two things for financial institutions. That means they are going to put this Small Businesses Loans Act in the window and promote it. If they do not we should make sure they hear from us. That is what we did for the banks, but what did we do for the small business people?

• (1625)

First, we got interest rates down to the lowest level they have been in 35 years. The other thing we have done for them under this act is we have said: "Look, no more". If they get a Small Businesses Loans Act where the federal government is guaranteeing most of it the banks would still ask people for their house, car and cottage and all that personal security and collateral to cover their 10 per cent exposure or 15 per cent exposure. We are saying in this bill that is unacceptable and the financial institutions cannot do it.

All they can ask to cover their 10 per cent exposure is for their signatures giving their personal security for 25 per cent of the loan. That is all they can ask for that. They cannot register any assets against it or anything like that. It is simply their personal security with their signatures based on their cash flow or salary. They cannot register any title against it.

What does this mean? It is very significant. This means that if they do not ask for their house, car and all their other belongings on top of the loan guarantee their collateral can be used to finance working capital. It could be used to finance accounts receivable, inventory and work in progress. This has always been the problem. They say they can never get a loan for working capital because their collateral was all tied up when they bought their truck or factory.

This particular act will be very effective in levering all sorts of economic activity that would never happen before. I cannot be too enthusiastic about it. I cannot agree more with my hon. friends that we should really market it, really promote it. I want to stand in the House and be criticized any day after next Thursday if this is not happening, but please do not ask us to advertise it and market it before it is passed because the regulations might change, the amendments might change it. On Thursday we will know and then off we go to the races. Maybe we should pass a bill through the House giving us $5 million to sell this because it is something we really should do.

We are talking to the opposition motion about the economy. The reason small business is important is that 80 per cent of all new jobs created in Canada in the last 10 years have been created by companies with 50 employees or less.

Nobody knows this. People think jobs are created by great big auto companies or great big hospitals or great big something else. In fact that is not where jobs are being created any more. I was in Windsor last Monday when there was a $900 million announcement by Chrysler and not one new job was created. It is to maintain the work force of 4,200 on this van plant with that investment, but even Chrysler with a huge investment of $900 million is not creating any new jobs. It is just holding its own.

Where are the new jobs being created? They are being created by small and medium sized enterprises. Canada is a much more entrepreneurial country in 1993 than it was in 1973. I remember the first week I was elected in 1984. There was a great line-up of people who wanted things from their MP: they wanted passports, they wanted to get a relative in or whatever. I had 13 businessmen lined up waiting for some grant or subsidy from the government. I was appalled. Even our entrepreneurs were not entrepreneurial in 1984. This country was becoming sick with its dependence on the state. Even entrepreneurs would not do something if the federal government did not give them a hand.

We still have regional programs for northern Ontario so there are still some small handouts, but generally we have downsized those programs and we are moving more smartly with this loan guarantee scheme through the Small Businesses Loans Act to make sure economic activity takes place.

There is something else about who these small business people are. Who are they anyway? I want to change the image of who they are. Fifty-two per cent of all new small businesses created since 1986 were created by females. I think 26 per cent in the last 10 years were created by new Canadians, first generation Canadians who started small businesses. The participation rate of women was very low in the sixties. Now it is 80 per cent and they are owning and operate businesses. It is a new phenomenon and new Canadians is a new phenomenon. The Vietnamese boat people all have jobs. They have small businesses. They are going gangbusters. It is the same with Koreans. It is the same with all sorts of new Canadians. This is a new reality that is giving power to our economy.

People say that this is fine, that we will have a whole lot of mini businesses but nobody can export or compete internationally if we just have small businesses. That is wrong. Washington Week said that is wrong. I opened 19 different companies this fall in southern Ontario that were expanding. They all had 100 employees or less and they all had three things in common.

• (1630)

Mr. Nault: How many did you close, Tom?

Mr. Hockin: The member wants to hear that these things are happening. We do have net growth in the economy.

They had three things in common. First, they were exporting 80 per cent of what they were producing. Second, they had some new technology, a new piece of machinery that caught them up with everybody else or put them a little ahead. The third characteristic, which is kind of sad, was that they did not want anybody to know that they were doing well. They did not want any publicity.

I heard the other day that 80 per cent of all new jobs in Canada are never advertised. People do not want to advertise they are expanding. I asked to bring the television cameras and the media with me to cut the ribbon and I was told they just wanted me and no publicity. They say this because there is nothing in it for them to get a lot of publicity.

The point is good things are happening. It is hard to get that message out. It is small and medium sized enterprise that is growing and doing well.

There is something more to this motion than simply small business. It is the over-all climate that has been put in place for economic growth in Canada. I do not think the next election—I have some advice to give my opposition friends—will be about framework policies, trade agreements and tax reform. They were for the elections of 1984 and 1988. The next election is going to be community by community, town by town, main street by main street and about how job creation is being stimulated. That is really what the election is going to be about. We are not going to be talking about these great big issues any more.

Those frameworks are in place so it is going to be what will happen in the detailed way. In the detailed way community by community, street by street, company by company, it is our view in the federal government, the Conservative Party, we should not do it through excess subsidies. We should try to stimulate growth in more intelligent ways. Probably the best example is the Small Businesses Loans Act which will lever tremendous activity with very little federal government resources, just a lot of intelligence and good marketing.

Let me conclude with this point. In one quarter of 1992 the real GDP in Canada grew 1.4 per cent. It was the sixth consecutive quarter of growth and the strongest since the second quarter of 1991. At 2.1 per cent inflation remains subdued. In fact our inflation performance was the best among the G-7. Exports have grown by 14 per cent since June 1991. Corporate pre-tax profits are rebounding from their deepest slump in 60 years and are up 30 per cent from their 1991 levels. Business bankruptcies are down, not up, 3 per cent from the levels a year ago. Cross-border shopping is down. All these changes augur well for a much stronger economy in the new term.

What this country needs, what this Parliament needs for the next six months is a celebration of this good news, these positive new forces. The economy is improving. It is the exact opposite of what the motion suggests.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by saying to the minister that we in the Liberal Party of Canada supported his efforts in amending the Small Businesses Loans Act so that the 960,000 people who really drive this economy could get that support. We are happy to see him stand in the House today to commit that after Thursday the bank managers, the 7,500-odd loan officers, credit unions and small businesses of this country from coast to coast to coast will know the act is in place.

It has been a tradition in the House and in government for the last 15 years that after second reading things are promoted in newspapers and on television and radio. To use the Senate as the reason for not communicating the Small Businesses Loans Act is not a good argument. At any rate I want to go on to something else.

• (1635)

The minister talked about entrepreneurial spirit in this country. I think the entrepreneurial spirit is fantastic. I support him in that regard. He also talked about the fact that we are not giving out as many grants today as we did a few years ago. I think he forgot an area where we are giving out billions of dollars in grants.

Because the government has not addressed the tax preferences that have built up in the tax act, not just in the minister's regime but in previous Liberal regimes, it has not really addressed the issue of tax grants to major corporations. The minister knows as well as I do that there are close to $40 billion or $50 billion worth of tax expenditures or tax grants. Many of them have not had accountability as to whether or not they are meeting their public policy objective, namely job creation or keeping certain sectors vibrant.

I would like to hear the minister say in the House today that it might be a good time to review tax grants that have been given through the tax act mostly to foreign multinationals.

Mr. Hockin: This is always a murky area where allegations fly around. There is always a bit of truth to them and there is a lot of untruth to them.

On the hon. member's question, no government has spent more time or effort pruning the tax system of loopholes and boondoggles for business than this government. They have just about all been removed.

When we took over we had the scientific and research tax credit which was a terrible leakage. It was brought in by either the Turner government or the Trudeau government before it. Billions of dollars was going down the drain. We closed that. We have worked at closing a whole host of other loopholes. We continue to do so. As a matter of fact we have to because we need the revenues.

What we have not done is introduce a minimum corporate tax as has been suggested by a lot of people because frankly it would just hurt small business. People say they want to make sure that every corporation pays tax. It turns out that small businesses with loan loss carry-forwards from before that finally make a profit can apply their loan losses of previous years against the year's profit. We believe in that. We do not believe in taxing it back.

If they want to take big business and make an exception for it, that is an argument I would like to hear the House debate. We have to remember that small business is allowed two, three or four tax expenditures I believe in. The first one is loan loss carry-forwards. The second is that if a business is part of a grouping of companies it does not tax twice; it taxes once. If it is sending profits or dividends to another member of the corporate family then it is taxed by that other member rather than taxing it and the other member. That is the second source of tax expenditure. I do not think any country in the world would want to double tax, to have a double corporate tax, for small and medium sized enterprises.

What would be the other big exemption? Financial institutions, the banks, insurance companies and trust companies somehow have been escaping tax because they can make loan loss provisions that are too generous or have various schemes. We have changed that. We are the first government that has actually made sure financial institutions pay their fair share of tax.

I was told the other day by a chairman of one of the biggest life insurance companies in Canada that he pays eight different types of taxes. There are three or four different types of federal taxes that he pays. That is what this government did. We now have a corporate tax structure that has been pruned of most of the loopholes that were not fair. We have left a system that will stimulate enterprise by especially exempting small business from a whole host of taxes.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated listening to the minister's comments a short while ago, particularly as they related to FEDNOR in northern Ontario. By and large the FEDNOR board has proven itself very knowledgeable about the particular industry from a regional perspective. Although we have some dispute in some of the areas of loans, by and large it is a very good program.

I was interested in what the minister was talking about in the small business venture. The minister has been here for eight or nine years, I have been here for only four years and a few months. If there is one thing in the thrust that this House is showing with respect to how we are going to get this economy going, it is going to come down on the back of the small business person within this country, not only in northern Ontario but throughout Canada. On that area we are ad idem with respect to how this Parliament should really operate on an ongoing basis.

I was particularly interested in his comments on Windsor and the announcement made this past week. I know the minister is from London. Windsor is about 100 kilometres up the road. Having gone to school in Windsor at Assumption College, the university and the law school and so on one becomes very close to the city of Windsor and has many friends there.

I would like the minister to comment on the $900 million that was announced by Chrysler with respect to versatility on the van production. The van has proven to be a magnificent vehicle for all of Canada and the United States in production.

Chrysler will be more versatile in its production methods to compete with some of the competition presently on the road. Even though it has not created any new jobs I would be interested in the minister's comments. If we do not have them I would be prepared in the future to listen to him through his department as to how it secures and builds a confidence within Windsor and other communities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. Time is running out and I must give the floor to the hon. minister.

Mr. Comuzzi: I will put my question and then I will sit down. I would like to hear about the confidence it builds and the security that it builds in those people who are employed and what effect that will have on the small business community in Windsor.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for asking that question.

It is important we recognize that the investment is very important and positive and will create confidence. I was making the point that so many big business investments just maintain jobs but they also maintain confidence and I think that is very important.

I have been told this investment will entice suppliers to make long-term commitments. These are suppliers next door, suppliers in Canada, suppliers in southern Ontario, Essex county, Kent county, Middlesex county, Elgin county and maybe stretching all the way up to Toronto. They will be enticed to make investments and to deepen their intentions to produce in Canada rather than Mexico or the United States.

There were lots of indications of suppliers being around who are going to make reinvestments and grow as a result of this investment. Therefore they can bid for work in the United States because their whole operations will have risen up to the kind of performance level where they can export at lower prices.

I think the hon. member has suggested an important point. A large investment such as Chrysler does give confidence to small and medium sized suppliers. It makes them more competitive. This means jobs are created because they can export and so on. That is one of the good results from that announcement.

I also have to tell the hon. member that Windsor is a hard-working town. Ever since I was a kid, people of this town have worked hard. Windsor has always been an up and down kind of economy. It is a boom and bust economy that rotates around the automotive part of the economy. This will help give them confidence.

I actually salute the Chrysler people who won the Canada awards of business excellence in 1991 for quality. This great big banner is hanging outside the front door. They are very proud of it. They are just as proud of it as a small little company that wins that award. They are an example to the rest of Canada.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT, 1993 NO. 2

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-113

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. An agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2), with respect to report stage and third reading of Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stages.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bevilacqua.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the minister for his speech. I think he was very sincere in what he said and I encourage him to make an important announcement tomorrow. Certainly he has my support.

Having said that though, he talked about the celebration the country should embark upon. I was just wondering what exactly the details of that celebration would be when I look at the state of the economy as of March 1993. I see the unemployment rate is still above 11 per cent. I see the welfare rolls are at 3.8 million. I see the number of people living in poverty is at 4.2 million. Not to worry, because I understand one of the government members has suggested we just move the poverty line higher to make it harder to qualify as that would make fewer people below the poverty level. Bankruptcies were at 5,401 in January. The good news is they are starting to drop. They were 18 per cent below the level of a year ago but last year, with 76,139, was still the highest in Canadian history.

Economic growth was 0.9 per cent in 1992, a bit of good news: inflation was 2.0 per cent in January. But we have suggested all along that the government wrestled inflation to the ground and wrestled the entire economy to the ground as well.

Before we get into fits of euphoria, as the minister has suggested perhaps we should do, I would ask him to take a look at the real statistics. Take a look at the real world in Canada. I do not think the euphoria will have spread to ordinary Canadians.

Coming from Ontario, these are indeed difficult times. The Ontario New Democrats are also taking the brunt of criticism from just about everybody. I want to say that some of the statistics are never brought forward. I want to take the opportunity of putting them on the record. The federal government in some sense of misguided co-operation has continually short-changed the province of Ontario. The numbers and statistics bear out this fact.

The province of Ontario contributes 43 per cent of national taxes but gets 30 per cent in return. Ottawa pays 50 per cent of social assistance in other provinces but only 29 per cent in Ontario, even though the province has more than one million people on welfare. The federal contribution to health and post-secondary education is down to 31 per cent, compared to 52 per cent three years ago. Ontario has also been hit hardest by the economic policies of the federal government. It has lost 80 per cent of the manufacturing jobs. They have disappeared in this recession.

The motion before us suggests that we should condemn the government. However, I suspect that Canadians are tired of politicians and political parties on a continual bent to condemn one another for their actions or for their lack of activity. I suggest it certainly behoves us rather than condemning and severely criticizing one another to get together and attempt to work together to get this country out of this severe recession, if not depression, we are presently in.

I appreciate that this may be perceived as a scatter-gun approach, but I wanted to hit upon just a few government policies that have not been highlighted for quite a while.

• (1650)

I want to talk about the Hibernia project. We supported it but we believe it has been misguided in many of its guidelines that the federal government forged for the Canadian people. In this $5.2 billion megaproject for Canada, Canadian content has not been guaranteed. It is probably one of the few countries in the world that could forge such a megaproject and not have Canadian content assured.

About one and a half years ago Algoma Steel in my riding said: "We are shut out of the steel contract in Hibernia. A Korean firm is going to get it. There is no doubt in our minds that they dumped the product on the Canadian scene".

Algoma Steel is in difficulty. I went out to St. John's and I received a good audience and a good explanation. I was told at that time: "We are still on target. We are going to have 65 per cent to 70 per cent Canadian content". The then minister told me not to worry, Canadian content was going to be on stream.

As it turns out, they took a review of Canadian content in the Hibernia project. However six months later various Canadian manufacturers and specifically MIL Davie shipbuilding of Quebec said that not only could they not get involved but they could not even bid on the contracts. They were being shut out completely from the market.

The Algoma Steel situation was never resolved to our liking. We could have brought charges of dumping, but that is costly and we do not have the time nor the moneys to proceed.

As we proceeded, we found the target for Canadian content was just that. It was not written in the contract. As time progressed, the amount of Canadian content decreased from that 65 per cent to 75 per cent down to 55 per cent to 60 per cent.

We found out just a couple of weeks ago that the minister admitted to being foiled over Hibernia contracts. He admitted that he could not get the major oil consortiums to allow Canadian bidding on the Hibernia project. Here is a Canadian megaproject and we could not negotiate appropriate Canadian content. There is one misguided policy.

The minister who spoke just prior talked about the next election. He said that it will not be about major frameworks. He said that it is not going to be about free trade agreements. It is not going to be about NAFTA because the frameworks are in place. The election is going to be fought community by community, neighbourhood by neighbourhood, household by household. I happen to agree with that latter comment.

However, to suggest that the frameworks will be insignificant is not acceptable. If the framework above is faulty, one must accept the fact that the structure below that framework is also faulty and will not survive.

Some of the members I have listened to this afternoon from the government side made much ado about trade agreements, the successes of free trade and the prospective success of NAFTA.

I suspect these people have not left the city of Ottawa. If they have been to Mexico, they have spent too much time in the resorts. They have not seen the reality of the Maquiladora in Mexico. They have not seen the exploitation of Mexican labourers.

• (1655)

The member for South Shore talked about the productivity of Canadians. We do not dispute that, but let us not underestimate the productivity of Mexicans. Their productivity is increasing and they are becoming more and more competitive with Canadians.

To say that they are malcontents and less than ambitious is not true. They are quite productive and quite efficient and it is at our peril to attempt to compete with them on that playing field when their hourly wages in the Maquiladora could be 80 cents per hour. It is out and out worker exploitation.

For those who suggest that this will open up the Mexican market of 80 million people I ask them what they anticipate the Mexican people will buy from Canada at those wages. I would encourage members on the government side to go down there and deal with the reality of the Mexican Maquiladora area.

I would also tell them to not accept the fact that the framework of NAFTA is going forward with as much haste and as much acceptance in Washington as it is in Ottawa, by the government side. The politicians, labour groups, and environmental groups in Washington are not at all sold on the fact that this NAFTA agreement will go forward. If the vote were held today NAFTA would be deafeated.

Unfortunately this government says that really does not matter and we have to go forward with as much haste as we possibly can. It has changed its attitude toward the parallel accords. At first they were of no concern to us, they were between Mexico and the United States. Then we had to go to the table, we still did not have a strategy in place but we said we had best get to that table.

The Clinton administration has made it abundantly clear. If the parallel accords have no teeth it will not sign the accord and will not support the NAFTA agreement that is in place. The members of the administration are going group by group down to Mexico to see what they are dealing with. That is all I am asking.

I would ask the government members to get down there and see the reality. We met with some of the promoters on the American side in Washington last week. One of the pro-NAFTA people, a patriarch of the American Congress, talked derisively of labour standards. He said: "Parallel accords, whatever they mean; labour standards, whatever that is; environmental protection, whatever that means. You just cannot negotiate these kinds of things". That is pretty scary talk and a pretty scary attitude.

He also went on to say, and I agree with him on this statement: "If the parallel accords have any substantiveness to them then they will unravel the original agreement and that is impossible. We are not going to open that agreement". The Americans are in a conundrum right now. I am happy for that. I hope the conundrum continues.

I wish that this government would open its eyes to some of the perils of this agreement. It continually trots out very powerful statistics indicating that our exports into the American market have increased. We accept that. They increased before 1988 as well. The government does not trot out statistics which show that our exports to many other countries have declined. Those are the kinds of statistics that we suggest it is not bringing forward and which it definitely should bring forward.

• (1700)

Another issue, perhaps in isolation but once again it is one of those issues that is presently in committee and I hope it will see the light of day in the House very soon, is that of family trusts. It is part of the taxation system in this country that the fabulously wealthy have been able to protect their fortunes for a long period of time. It would appear, after 21 years of protection of the wealthiest people in this country, that new legislation will allow these people to set aside their hundreds of millions of dollars in these family trusts for another 20, 30 or 40 years.

These trusts have gone untaxed for 21 years. We do not know how many of them there are. There were 22,000 family trusts in 1972, the value of which we do not know. We do know that one of them was worth $70 million, and that amount went untaxed year after year.

The suggestion is that 21 years is not enough time for these people to get their income tax house in order, so give them more time. I asked average taxpayers how much time they have to get their tax house in order? They get 12 months to get it in order or else. The government says that it has to extend the rule to protect the family trusts a little bit longer, another 20, 30 or 40 years, because some of these people are going to have to see a lawyer and lawyers are costly. Shame.

The second reason is: What if they have to sell something? What if they have to sell one of their small companies? Would that not be a shame. The third reason, and the most cynical of all, is: What if they have a disabled child? They must have a future. We must protect them for the future because if they are disabled then they may not be able to provide for themselves.

I say that is cynical because if they are setting $70 million aside, as one example, surely they could do a little bit of planning with their finances to ensure that the child does okay when he or she becomes an adult. I think the government threw that disabled child example out there to make us feel bad. It is difficult to even mention this here in the House, but nevertheless that is how cynical one gets when presented with this kind of information. It is not acceptable, not in any way.

We have no idea, because of the lack of information available on these family trusts, how many are out there and how much money is involved in them, but we do know that the scandalous tax system continues. If the government has its way it will continue for another 20, 30 or 40 years. That is how cynical one can become.

Yet the government will talk about a UI cheat. He might be bilking the system for a couple of thousand dollars, but here is somebody with literally millions and multimillions of dollars and the government is saying: "That is okay, 21 years was not enough. We will give you a little more time to get your house in order".

It has been a bit of a shotgun approach but I wanted to touch on a few policies that irked me about the government. I do not think it is appropriate that we always condemn one another, but certainly I think the policies are misguided.

• (1705)

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a very specific question about the NAFTA and one of the reasons that the NAFTA is so important.

Canadian exports of auto parts to Mexico total about $100 million each year. Currently to get into Mexico they must incur a 10 per cent tariff, so a $100 part plus a 10 per cent tariff is sold in Mexico for $110. Parts producers in the United States also face the same 10 per cent tariff.

If the Government of Canada followed the member's policy and tore up the North American free trade agreement but the United States and Mexico, who originally wanted the agreement, did work out an agreement then after the phase-out period the Canadian auto part producer would be selling his part in Mexico for $110 but the American auto part producer could sell his part down there for $100. Who does the member think the Mexicans are going to buy from? Where does he think investment will go? It will go to the United States. What will happen to the auto parts industry in Canada because the NDP does not want Canadian auto part producers to be on the same level playing field as American part producers? I want to tell the member that when the committee was holding hearings labour unions and everyone else had difficulty in answering that question.

Can the member tell me how by tearing up the NAFTA, by excluding Canada, that will protect those people in his riding, my riding, and Windsor who depend on exports of the auto parts industry.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, the member has lost the big picture. The problem is that he has isolated something that is a little more complex than he lets on.

What he has not pointed out is that presently General Motors has more employees in Mexico than it does in Canada. This whole concept is the global trading block that will extend beyond Mexico to Argentina and El Salvador. I have seen ads that say: "Come on down to El Salvador and have Rosie sew your garments for you. She makes 33 cents an hour, and not only that but she has a nice personality too. We also have good roads down here". The ads extol the virtues of El Salvador.

He is missing the picture. The only thing these multinationals have an interest in is relocating. They will relocate in the United States in the right-to-work states or further south in Mexico, and the big three have made no bones about it. They can hardly wait until they relocate. They have said that the only people stopping them from relocating are those bloody unions that cause too much controversy and bad press.

If I cannot answer the member's question I apologize. I have no great expertise, but please do not lose sight of the much bigger picture. I think the member is putting the blinders on and allowing that to happen.

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the last response with a great deal of interest because of the position I have in my community. We have a lot of automobile parts producers. They are most interested in the NAFTA and are in full support of what it does. As my friend from Cambridge pointed out, tariff barriers coming down on automobile parts going into Mexico will be a great benefit to my part of the country.

In addition, in the NAFTA North American content for automobiles is raised to 62.5 per cent. For someone from an area such as mine in which there are the big three auto producers, specifically General Motors, this is important. They have been asking for that increased content and now that is going to be done in the NAFTA.

• (1710)

The current FTA only provides for 50 per cent content. This is an advantage to our area and something that we look forward to. The labour unions were mentioned. This is something that they had lobbied for. They are now not saying anything about because it because they have this part of the renegotiation and they have this increased North American content that is going to help the automobile parts producers in my area. In that way, for my particular area, NAFTA will be a benefit.

I listened to my friend and his response to the question that was asked by the member for Cambridge and I say that it is something quite important to our part of the country which has been hard hit.

I would be interested in my friend's response as to whether we going to build the tariff barriers back up around our country. We know that nearly 30 per cent of our country's gross domestic product comes from selling products to other countries.

What are we going to do if we tear up the FTA and NAFTA? Are we going to build up tariff barriers around this country of 27 million people whose wealth and standard of living depends on trading with the rest of the world. They are not going to say: "Oh, that is great. We are just going to be happy about that."

Another thing perhaps my friend could comment on is the fact that the auto pact is now part of the FTA. Ripping up the FTA could endanger the Auto Pact. Under the Auto Pact we are a net beneficiary. We consume 9 per cent of the cars in North America and we produce 17 per cent of the cars that are consumed in North America. The Auto Pact is very important to us and anything that would endanger that would cause us and this entire country a great deal of difficulty.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to get into a debate with a member who represents his constituency. Who knows better than he about his constituency? I will accept some of his, I hope, very valid arguments. I am surprised. I want to check some of the statements he has made that suddenly all of the opposition in the area has gone silent. I find it hard to believe that they have now gone into the woodwork. I am not going to venture into a specific debate as I suspect he would not debate me on steel, but I do not know that for sure.

Sectoral agreements in trade are good and we are saying yes to the auto pact. The Canadian steel producers of this country are saying that sectoral trade agreements are what this should be all about. Probably, on balance, we know that there are going to be some net gainers and some net losers. We will proffer the appropriate sectors and the numbers of losers under free trade and NAFTA.

I wanted to ask this question again. Who does the member think will be buying these parts from Canadian producers? Will they be shipped from his area to Mexico to be purchased by the Mexicans? I somehow doubt it.

We talked about barriers. Are we going to build the barriers up again and become protectionist? Free trade is fine. I think anybody who argues against true free trade is misguided. However, what is the problem with striking a social contract among the three countries? Is there a problem with that? They have done it with some success in the European Common Market. However, in the North American trade agreements there is no mention of it. In fact, heaven forbid if one talks about environmental or labour standards. What is that? What a nebulous, airy-fairy obscure thought.

We say: "No, not at all. Let us raise some of the standards of these Mexicans. What is the problem?" Do we have to lower our standards? Absolutely not. I agree with the member and that is probably the only thing we agree on.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend's motion is the kind of blanket statement that opposition members find so easy to make.

• (1715)

With all due respect, I would suggest that hon. members of the opposition take the time to learn about the very real efforts this government is making with regard to the Canadian economy.

The hon. member's motion gives the completely false impression that this government has been sitting idly by. Canadians know that is not the case. We have been making a genuine, concerted effort to deal with the economy and to give business an incentive to invest in this great nation.

This government has many programs that are beginning to show good results. It does not happen overnight. There is no instant solution but we are making progress.

Because of the Free Trade Agreement, along with other trade initiatives, Canada's exports are up 11 per cent. That does not represent stifled economic growth to me. This government understands economic reality, and we have clearly demonstrated fiscal and economic leadership.

During the last two decades inflation has been the most intractable problem for many nations. However, in Canada our government has conquered this killer of jobs and economic growth. Under our government inflation is now around an acceptable two per cent. The approach we have taken is a no-nonsense approach. It is an approach that avoided quick fixes, and instituted real change so this magnificent country can enjoy long-term gain.

Tax reform has enabled Canadian business to compete around the world without being saddled by a manufacturers' sales tax. The result is that other nations see Canada with a disciplined government that puts good fiscal management ahead of soft policies designed to win popularity contests. We have the respect of those other nations and the confidence of foreign investors.

Over the past few years this government has been building a solid framework that will enable business and labour to successfully compete in the new, technology-driven, global economy. For example, let us just consider some recent initiatives the government has undertaken to help small businesses. I trust that my hon. friend realizes that small business is the real driving force behind our economy.

In the economic statement delivered by the Minister of Finance in December the small business loan limit was increased to $250,000. Additional forms of working capital are also becoming available. Rules for investing in retirement savings plans were made more flexible so Canadians will have more incentive to invest in Canadian companies.

We did not increase income tax or UI premiums. We did not increase the small business tax rate and there is no payroll tax for training. We made changes in the unemployment insurance program, changes that were requested by both business and labour. Besides freezing UI premiums, we are providing employers with a UI premium holiday for new companies and new employees in existing companies.

Opposition motions condemning this government imply that we should pretend there is no massive debt and just spend, spend, spend, that we should live beyond our means and place a totally irresponsible financial burden on our children and grandchildren. This government will never take that path. The people of Canada have entrusted us with a solemn responsibility to do what is best for our economic health, and we have every intention of living up to that responsibility.

This government has addressed issues that previous governments shied away from and placed them at the top of our agenda. Not because we enjoyed doing so but because we knew it was the right thing to do. This government has had the courage to acknowledge that we do not have all the answers. We have entered into partnerships with interested parties in some sectors to ensure that we are on the right path for a full and healthy economic recovery.

We know that partnership with all stakeholders in the economy is the way to go. Last year the steering Group on Prosperity stated in its reports that, and I quote: "Our future prosperity depends on our ability and willingness to draw upon the creative talents of all Canadians. This means becoming an inclusive society, where everyone has a fair opportunity to participate fully and to contribute to the best of his or her ability".

This is much more than a visionary statement. It is a well thought out recognition that if Canadians pull together and believe in one another, we will continue to top United Nations' polls as the greatest country in the world.

The hon. member's motion reflects his concern about Canadian jobs. Perhaps he does not remember the dead-end, make-work projects of the 1970s which did not create jobs but instead increased our debt and ultimately cost us jobs. This government has not continued down that path when it comes to getting workers back to work. We want workers to be able to enjoy a comfortable life and contribute to the growing prosperity of Canada. To that end we have taken a long-term, constructive approach that will produce lasting results.

The Canadian Jobs Strategy created in 1985 emphasized the growing importance of developing workers' skills so they can actually use them in the work place. In the current fiscal year, the Canadian Jobs Strategy budget is a hefty $1.6 billion.

When the hon. member was writing his motion, did he remember the labour force development strategy that we introduced in 1989? It is a comprehensive strategy that forever abolished useless, dead-end, make-work projects and instead emphasized the importance of investing in the best resource this country has; its people.

That investment must train and upgrade workers' skills and, perhaps most important, it must develop a training culture so that Canadians realize school is not out just because they have left the classroom. Lifelong learning and acquiring higher level skills will be necessary throughout one's entire working life.

Did my hon. friend remember that this government fulfilled its promise to consult with Canadian stakeholders? To ensure that our labour force development strategy is kept on the right track, we brought together representatives of business and labour, educators, trainers, women, aboriginals, persons with disabilities and visible minorities. They are the creative and knowledgeable individuals who make up the Canadian Labour Force Development Board, a body formed in 1991 that has helped us enormously to understand the needs of the private sector and to create programs that will fulfil those needs.

Does the hon. member know that one of the first recommendations made by the Canadian Labour Force Development Board was to substantially increase the use of unemployment insurance for active programming. This idea came from people who work in the community and who fully understand that we must make the unemployed productive members of society again. The unemployed want jobs, not hand-outs.

Did we take that advice? We most certainly did. In 1992 we dedicated $1.95 billion to unemployment insurance developmental uses. That is, three times more than the 1990 funding for active programs and training for UI claimants. All told this year we are spending around $21 billion to help unemployed workers.

I trust that my hon. friend knows that Canada's unemployment insurance program is one of the most generous anywhere in the world. It is a significant burden for both workers and employers, and so, this investment must be made wisely and fairly to ensure our future prosperity.

The Canadian Labour Force Development Board has proven to be a positive force in bringing together the diverse economic interests of Canadians. Discussions are now taking place involving the Department of Employment and Immigration, provincial and territorial governments and private sector representatives to increase the number of provincial, territorial and local labour force development boards.

• (1725)

The people who live in a community are the best qualified to know the needs of that community. These local boards will have significant influence over a substantial amount of our expenditures on training and adjustments in their communities.

This government understands fully that community involvement is the key to a healthy, local economy. We showed that understanding when we brought in the Community Futures Program to help rural and remote cummunities facing severe labour market adjustments. Community Futures committees reflect the diversity of local interests. They create initiatives from the input of their community, initiatives that the government can then put into action.

Besides local committees', business development centres are another key component of Community Futures. The staff at business development centres have the expertise to counsel and give technical assistance to small business people and entrepreneurs.

Speaking of entrepreneurs, this government also has a Self-Employment Assistance Program that provides income support to UI claimants and persons eligible for social assistance. Rather than pay people to be unproductive, we are helping those with the skills and desire to become self-employed to get their businesses off the ground.

Our government is committed to saving jobs. Is the hon. member aware of other innovative programs like work sharing, which enables employers to avoid lay-offs during temporary slowdowns?

Our local human resource planning program helps employers develop a productive work force. As well, this government recongnizes that some Canadians are willing to move to find employment. With that in mind, we have a mobility assistance program to help individuals seek employment somewhere other than where they are currently living.

There is also the problem of long-term workers who suddenly find themselves unemployed due to industrial restructuring. The Department of Employment and Immigration will spend $300 million to help displaced workers once again become productive citizens.

In this current fiscal year, our $3.55 billion budget has enabled 850,000 Canadian workers to participate in the government's labour market programming administered efficiently and effectively by the Department of Employment and Immigration.

In the coming fiscal year, we are allocating approximately $3.8 billion for labour market programming. I think even the hon. member will agree that figure represents a significant increase over the $2.1 billion spent in the 1985-86 fiscal year. Of that $3.8 billion, $2.21 billion will provide active training and adjustment measures for UI claimants.

I trust that I have made it clear to my hon. friend that this government is taking all reasonable steps to ensure economic growth and to help workers train for jobs that will give them and Canada long-term prosperity.

Our programs are working. The unemployment rate fell to 10.8 per cent in February, the lowest it has been in the last year. Since August approximately 156,000 higher paying, full-time jobs have been created.

I say to the hon. member, and to all hon. members, this government welcomes constructive suggestions to keep the economy moving upwards at a steady, healthy growth. Let us pull together to help all Canadians fulfil their potential and ensure that Canada has a prosperous future.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened very closely to my colleague from Québec-Est, the parliamentary secretary, who described in detail the importance of the $3.5 billion in funds for training. I will also remind the House of the training measures which the opposition opposed in Bill C-21 and wants to oppose again in Bill C-113.

• (1730)

My colleague touched on a variety of subjects. One of those which has the greatest impact on our economy is the debt load. We remember very well that when the Leader of the Opposition was in power his government increased spending by 15 per cent a year on average. Our government has brought this rate of increase down to an average of 4 per cent. The Liberals let the deficit rise as a percentage of the gross domestic product from 0 to 8 per cent. We have managed to cut it almost in half, to 5.2 per cent.

I have a question for my colleague. We have seen the waffling of the Liberal Party, which for four and a half years has voted against every spending reduction measure here in this House, just as it opposed the GST. The Leader of the Liberal Party is now trying to take a position on the goods and services tax, saying that he will remove it and replace it with another tax that will apply to food as well. That is really shameful! Then he changes his mind and says that he will not remove it but will hold consultations. He is really asking for a blank cheque. Finally, we will recall this great statement from the Leader of the Opposition, "You know, we must not be obsessed with the deficit; the Conservatives are becoming obsessed with deficit reduction".

So the question I have for my colleague from Québec–Est is this: How do his constituents see the importance of reducing the deficit and how do they react to those who claim that the deficit is not important and that we must not be obsessed with it? I know the people of Québec–Est very well since I was born in Quebec City and a large part of my family lives in Quebec City and in your riding, Mr. Speaker. I am convinced that these people are intelligent and very concerned about the future and economic prosperity. How do the people of Québec–Est react to careless statements about the importance of controlling public spending and lowering the deficit?

Mr. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, like me, you have noticed that it is easy to recognize a Quebecer, especially one from Quebec City. His constant smile clearly shows that my hon. colleague from Terrebonne is originally from our lovely region.

Remember the evening of September 4, 1984 when it was announced that the Conservative Party would form the next government with a majority. An eminent member of the opposition said: "Anyway, the coffers are empty". Despite that, I think that we have done things which are worth listening to and repeating again and again and we have been trying to do that for several years. My hon. colleague touched on the important point of labour force training.

When a company or a country is in difficulty, just saying "eliminate the deficit" will not make it go away overnight. It is a long battle and I can say we have been through it on the issue of training. Let me talk briefly about the Challenge Program.

This program was initiated by our government in 1985. Today it gives high school, college and university students an opportunity to have a summer job in keeping with their aspirations. It gives them practical experience to show a future employer when they graduate. When we visit some companies, we realize that these students are often hired outside the summer period, to replace someone on maternity leave or someone who has suddenly fallen ill or to work certain hours over the Christmas or Easter holidays. Today young graduates already have some practical experience.

This is what we are setting up for people who were not students when we took power. My hon. colleague from Terrebonne knows very well that we spare no effort to use all available funds for programs that will give Canada the highly skilled labour force needed for global and world trade.

• (1735)

Many countries now look up to us as an example and envy us. They are implementing initiatives that we began in 1984, but unfortunately they are doing it ten years later. If we follow these programs, we will have benefits and concrete results ten years before other countries. At this rate, Canada will long remain in the much desired position of being the No. 1 country in the world.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the comments of my friend from Quebec.

After nine years of Tory rule and after looking at the devastation on the economic development side, the unemployment situation, the youth unemployment, people who are going to food banks in places like Montreal and Quebec City, it just amazes me that a member can stand up and say it is the Liberals' fault.

They say they are sorry, they are doing their best but they have only been in power for nine years and are still trying to get it right. They are still trying to figure which programs are going to work as far as the federal government is concerned in Quebec. They are still trying to figure out which programs they are going to use to get people back to work in Ontario.

However, it is still the Liberals' fault. It has to be the Liberals' fault. They say people cannot trust the Liberals because it was all their fault for the last 10 years, 20 years and 30 years. I want to suggest to the last speaker and to the government that, Canadians are not buying that. What they want are concrete solutions.

I would like to ask my colleague from Québec-Est if he could tell me what the government has done to help the 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed to get back to work.

I may be mistaken but in my mind one of the highest unemployment rates in the country is in Quebec. I would like the hon. member to tell me, besides his continual spin that it is the Liberals' fault, what he proposes to do about the situation in Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I just want to repeat what I said earlier, that when we took office, the coffers were empty. I was from an international accounting firm where I acted as a bankruptcy trustee for many companies. I would never have thought that we would have as big a job as we were left with in 1984, which involved turning around a whole country.

The initiatives that we have put forward, without any help from the opposition unfortunately, were difficult to implement. Today, after all these years of effort, we see some very concrete results. We have inflation and interest rates under control. We just learned, as I said in my speech, that unemployment has gone down nearly 1 per cent recently and is the lowest it has been in a year. I know full well that much remains to be done, but let us be optimistic. The hard work we have done and the unpopular measures we have taken during the past nine years are bearing fruit and this will be even more evident in the coming months.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us condemns the government for its policies that have stifled economic growth, destroyed Canadian jobs and exacerbated the recession.

Each time we raise this question with the ministers of the government, as we did today when I asked the Prime Minister and the Acting Minister of Finance what they were going to do about the large numbers of unemployed in this country. I referred to Montreal where the official rate of unemployment is 14 per cent. However, if one looks at those who have dropped out of the labour force the actual figure is 27 per cent with 21 per cent of Montreal families living under the poverty line.

• (1740)

Each time that we ask the government to do something about this the answer we get is a comparison with the recession of 1981-82. What comfort does that give the 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed? What comfort does that give Canadians whose children are unemployed? What comfort does that give Canadians whose husbands and wives are unemployed?

Would it have been appropriate for us in 1981-82 when we were asked about the recession at that time to simply compare it with the Great Depression of 1932-37? No. That would be completely ridiculous. As a matter of fact we tried to deal with the recession in 1981-82. We believed the government had a role. As a matter of fact the things we did finally brought us out of that recession in 1983-84.

However, we did not use the cheap put-down of simply comparing the recession of 1981-82 to the Great Depression of 1932-37 which was under Conservative government, which happened under the R.B. Bennett government. We did not do that.

It is equally ridiculous and gives no comfort to the 1.5 million Canadians, who are unemployed, that are officially unemployed, to get that kind of ridiculous answer from the government.

When we ask these kinds of questions the government says: "We have put forward solutions to the unemployment problem, but you voted against them in the House of Commons". Of course we voted against the free trade agreement. We tried to convince Canadians that it was wrong. The government was re-elected nevertheless and it rammed through the free trade agreement. Yes, we voted against it and time has shown that now this has cost Canadians jobs. It was not the solution to the problem of Canadian unemployment.

Yes, we voted against the goods and services tax. Expert after expert, even those who were in favour of the goods and services tax, said that even if it was the right thing to do in the long run, the government was introducing it at a time of recession and that would exacerbate the recession. However, the government went ahead anyway and yes, we voted against it.

We are going to vote against the $6 billion helicopter proposals. We will vote against the unemployment insurance changes which are reducing unemployment insurance during a time of recession when people need those moneys.

What do we see with respect to the different organizations, the different think-tanks and economic organizations that are studying this matter? The report of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development warns there will be no break for the jobless in 1993. It says that even though there will be a pick-up in economic growth in this country it will not mean a pick-up in jobs.

Then we have Peter Hadekel, the financial columnist in the Montreal Gazette, who says: "Very soon the working world will be divided into two types of people. Before the end of the decade less than half the work force in the industrialized world will have full-time jobs. The rest will be part-timers, temporary workers or the unemployed".

What a sad picture for the future. How can young people start a family? How can they plan to have children and build a home when all they can look forward to are part-time minimum wage jobs, non-unionized jobs with no benefits, no pension, and very often no unemployment insurance? I know that many companies try to keep these part-time jobs under 15 hours a week so the workers will not even get unemployment insurance when they are laid off. Is that the future we can give Canadians? We are seriously asking the government to do something about it.

This government is still following the discredited policies of the Reagan and Thatcher regimes in the United States and Britain. Thank God, there has been a change in the United States. The people down there recognize the nonsense of that approach where everything was left to the free market system. Now there is a government down there that is bringing back a mixed economy approach. It is a government that believes that government has a role with the private sector in stimulating the economy and creating jobs and we believe in that same approach.

The government does have a role. We put forward a proposal whereby the federal government would participate with the municipalities and the provinces in a massive redevelopment of municipal infrastructure, roads, bridges and sewers, ports, airports, things that will stimulate the economy and provide a proper atmosphere for the private sector.

The government turns it down. It does not believe that it has a role to play. That is why it is at about 17 per cent, 18 per cent in the polls. This sort of shim-sham that is going on now, the leadership campaign, may redeem it for one month or for a couple of weeks, but the Canadian public will see that it is the same group of people with the same do nothing policies that are dooming this country and dooming our economy. It is not good enough.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 81(15), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply.

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR ROSEMONT

Mr. Speaker: Last week, we heard the hon. member for Beauce comment on a newspaper article about the Acting Speaker. After a number of discussions, I think it may be appropriate to hear what the hon. member for Rosemont has to say.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Beauce quoted a sentence that was reported in a newspaper obviously out of context.

What people should realize is that we had a big meeting of militant members of the Bloc Quebecois in the riding of Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, attended by nearly 1,500 people. These people know their member very well, especially since they were largely responsible for electing him in 1984 and 1988. They remember his doubts when he was about to join the Bloc Quebecois when he was in his riding in 1990 and 1991, and then went back to the Conservatives in Ottawa.

• (1010)

What I said in addition to what was reported in the press is that by accepting his appointment as one of the Deputy Chairmen of the House, the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans had put himself in a position where he had to apply rules that did not recognize the Bloc Quebecois, with the approval of the traditional political parties here in this House. Of course I realize, and that is why I used the word instrument, that the Speaker cannot overrule a decision by members and party leaders who applied the letter rather than the intent of the Standing Orders, because everyone knows perfectly well there are precedents that would amply justify recognizing the Bloc Quebecois as a political party.

It is quite simple. The hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans had a choice. He made his choice and, as a result of that decision, he is now in a position to apply rules set by all or by almost all political parties in this House, by what we call the traditional parties.

I used the word collusion. Perhaps I should have said coalition, since collusion connotes an element of secrecy. I may add that the committee's meetings were secret and that we were never able to explain our position. We were never able to discuss it. The Standing Orders were applied. In fact they were used as an excuse and there was never an open debate. I think it would be more accurate to refer to a coalition of the traditional parties in the House instead of collusion.

The crux of the matter remains the same, and the people of Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans realize that. The fact is that for the past two years we have had a situation where many members told their constituents they were very close to the Bloc Quebecois, and now when conventions are being held to elect candidates for the next election people should know where they stand. I think the residents of Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans will know exactly where they stand in the next election.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may comment briefly on this point of order. Personally, and I am sure I also speak for most if not all parliamentarians in this House, I think that when presiding over the proceedings of this House the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans is absolutely fair and impartial. If people say the hon. member takes political sides in his own riding, well I certainly hope so. After all, he was elected as a member of a political party. But to say that his role in the Chair makes him party to some kind of collusion or coalition is unfair because it reflects on the Speakership as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, you have said many times that the Speaker is the servant of the House, not its leader. You yourself, Mr. Speaker, are a servant of the House and your colleagues as well, including the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans. I think he is strictly impartial in the performance of his duties and, as I see it, this criticism is entirely unfair. He is no one's instrument. He is, as you are, Mr. Speaker, a servant of this House, and that is as it should be.

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member for Rosemont going on at length about how he was misinterpreted or quoted out of context I still believe the journalists at the Beauport-Express in Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans accurately reported what was said that evening.

• (1015)

There was talk of collusion. It was said that the rights of Bloc Quebecois members were violated in this House. I think the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans is doing a magnificent job in this House as one of its Deputy Chairmen. With unruffled calm and an abiding concern for fairness and justice he has always given everyone his due here in the House.

Since the hon. member for Rosemont is apparently unwilling to admit that he went too far—although it would have been so easy for him do so this morning—I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Terrebonne:

> That the matter of the comments made by Mr. Tremblay, member for Rosemont, with regard to Mr. DeBlois, member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans and Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole, as reported in the March 14, 1993 edition of the newspaper Beauport-Express, be referred to the Standing Committee on House Management.

I move this motion, Mr. Speaker, subject to the Chair's ruling.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: This is, of course, a rather difficult situation, not only for the Speaker and the hon. member, but also for the House.

I listened carefully to what was said by the hon. member for Rosemont. He may have given some explanation of the circumstances in which he made the comments that were quoted in the newspaper in question.

However, I have some difficulty with the facts, because clearly if we consider only what was quoted in the newspaper those words are in my opinion unacceptable to this House. If we consider the words that were reported we clearly have a prima facie case that affects the dignity of this House and our colleague, because our colleague is an officer of this House. As the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said earlier, like the Speaker he is an officer of this House and an attack against the integrity of a person in that position is an attack against this House.

As I said before, I listened to the comments of the hon. member for Rosemont, and I assume the crux of the problem is the position of the Bloc in this House. I realize that there have been ongoing complaints by some members of the Bloc Quebecois about its status as a party in this House.

• (1020)

However, all members, and the public as well, must realize the decision on the status of members of the Bloc Quebecois was not made by the Speaker or by our colleague.

If the hon. member for Rosemont would accept this distinction and perhaps be willing to withdraw this morning the comments he made with reference to the Speaker—and as the Speaker of this House I am his Speaker as well—we would accept that.

However, in the circumstances, I think that for the sake of relations between Bloc Quebecois members and the other members of this House it would be entirely appropriate to withdraw altogether the comments reported in the newspaper.

If there is a withdrawal, it would be preferable to make it here. I therefore suggest that the hon. member for Rosemont consider the Chair's comments and perhaps, on reflection, he might wish to withdraw entirely the comments that were quoted in the newspaper.

M. Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether we have a language problem, but I think I made it quite clear that I understood the Speaker did not, and cannot, for that matter, make the rules that denied the Bloc Quebecois recognition as a political party. I made that quite clear.

I also said that by accepting the appointment the hon. member was bound to apply rules made by others. If that is interpreted as inferring that decisions made by the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans were not impartial, that certainly is not what I meant. I meant that by accepting this appointment, he put himself in a position where he had to apply rules against the recognition of the Bloc Quebecois, which are not his to change.

As the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said earlier, he has become a servant of the members of this House. Instead of using the word servant, I used the words un instrument. I do not want that to be interpreted as being partial. When he makes decisions in the House, he cannot do otherwise but apply the non-recognition rule.

My point was that he had the choice to either accept or refuse this position. It is quite clear that he is a servant of the House. I referred to un instrument and I am quite prepared to withdraw the word collusion, if you prefer, and to talk about a coalition, which is common knowledge.

It seems to me my interpretation is quite clear, and people know, as the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott-Russell said earlier, that the Speaker is a servant of the House.

• (1025)

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I want to thank the hon. member for his comments and his explanation, but there still is a problem. Although the hon. member for Rosemont has put forward certain arguments which are not altogether impossible to understand, especially in politics, I still think we are faced with a difficult situation for the House.

[English]

Consequently, having found there is a prima facie case I am going to put the motion of the hon. member for Beauce to the House. Then it will be for the committee and the House to decide. The hon. member for Rosemont will of course have a chance to discuss the matter with his colleagues in the House and in the committee.

It may well be that out of that discussion may come something useful in terms of the general amity of members among themselves. I do think it is a matter for the House to decide.

The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, you said that you had some difficulty. I am trying to understand what that difficulty is because I think I clearly explained that what I said was not a reflection on the decisions of the Speaker. I explained that I would substitute the word coalition, a decision by all the members of this House, for the word collusion. I am trying to understand your reasons for this decision, Mr. Speaker, and I must say, quite honestly, that I am somewhat at a loss.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rosemont will understand it is not appropriate for the Chair to give an explanation after making its decision. However, I suggested he withdraw his remarks as reported in the newspaper. The hon. member may not agree with the Chair's suggestion, but lacking a specific statement by the hon. member in which he withdraws his words I believe it is appropriate to give the House and the committee an opportunity to consider this matter. The hon. member has every right to state his case, and he will have ample opportunity to do so in committee. After this brief explanation I think the case is closed. Once the committee has tabled its report the House may have a chance to consider the matter again. However, for the time being the case is closed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

[English]

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, March 19, consideration of Bill C-113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13 and 14.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague, the member for Timmins—Chapleau, for the amendments he has introduced to the unemployment insurance section of Bill C-113.

The legislation is so terrible that nothing can really make it palatable, but if we can in some small way lessen some of the effects of the bill, that at least is a worth-while exercise.

I understand that government members are being inflexible in their approach to the amendments, but I hope they will take a serious look at them and will actually choose to support some of the improvements to the impacts the bill will have.

There are a number of amendments dealing with clause 18 of the bill. This clause increases the grounds for just cause. The first paragraph of the bill suggests that just cause exists where the claimant has no reasonable alternative to leaving employment. Motion No. 7 would replace that phrase so the just cause for leaving employment exists where any of the following circumstances applied to the claimant.

The reasonable alternative is out, that the government provides for itself. In the "but book", the book of draft directives issued by the director of benefit entitlements, every legitimate reason for quitting a job also has a number of buts applied to it. You can quit your job to look after a child, but only if you first ask a trusted relative or if you have asked for a change of hours, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera.

Even the new briefing book listing reasonable alternatives to go with every just cause provided the commission with a means of rejecting claimants, even though they have given just cause reasons for quitting.

Motion No. 8 adds reasons for just cause, bringing the total to 40. The Conservatives like to tell us that jurisprudence actually gives us 40 reasons that provide just cause. They speak of these 40 reasons in tones of reassurance. Why should we worry about people being unfairly penalized when there are all these reasons they can use to get benefits.

We have basically included all 40 to call their bluff. We notice the parliamentary secretary for finance said on Friday that he recognizes this as an attempt to expand the definition of just cause, but he calls the motion unnecessary because the 13 reasons listed already cover the vast majority of additional reasons proposed by the member. That is what he says.

In other words, the 40 reasons with which the government has attempted to reassure Canadians do not really have any weight at all. Most are variations of the original five already in the UI act.

• (1125)

It is true there is some minimal advantage in increasing the list to 40, just as there is some minimal advantage in increasing the list to 14. They may be a little stronger for being there but they should not be looked at in a simplistic manner. It cannot be said that because the reason is on the list one gets the benefits.

We have case after case which demonstrates how people listed these reasons and still lost the benefits. There are inconsistencies now in the application of the just cause penalties at the level of the agent, the appeal board or the umpire. It is the umpire level which establishes the new jurisprudence. In the future people will lose all their benefits because of some factor buried in the existing law which basically says a good reason is not good enough.

The last reason in our amendment does not include "as prescribed" which appeared in the bill. As prescribed pertains to jurisprudence and commission regulations. If these two words go into the new legislation, a truly just cause will not be considered if it is not contained in the jurisprudence and commission regulations. It limits any future additions to jurisprudence.

Motion No. 9 places the onus of proof with the commission and establishes that benefit of doubt beyond any reasonable doubt shall go to the claimant. In spite of the commission's continual assurance that the benefit of doubt will be given to the claimant, there is nothing in the act that says this. There is also nothing to reverse the onus of proof to the commission. Under the present practice the claimants must prove they had just cause rather than the commission proving they did not.

Motion No. 10 clarifies that a common law spouse is a spouse under the act. That should not be necessary as one would think that common law relationships are now fully recognized. However, we can show an umpire's decision which states that if Parliament in its wisdom had wanted to include—and I believe it should be included that it would be just cause to quit one's job to follow a common law spouse—Parliament would have stated so in the statute.

The parliamentary secretary smugly suggested this amendment was not necessary because UIC guidelines now include common law spouses. I remind him in the presence of legislation it is jurisprudence that establishes the rules. Because of this umpire's decision the policy should become stricter. Here is our opportunity to include it if members of the other side of the House will only support this motion.

Clause 20 of the bill amends section 30.1 of the UI act so that claimants disqualified on the basis of section 28 will lose all their benefits. Section 28 claimants are those who are fired for misconduct or who quit without just cause. These same claimants lose seven to twelve weeks of benefits and their benefits after that are reduced to 50 per cent.

Our position is that this penalty is severe enough. With that kind of penalty very few people would quit a job just for the fun of it, particularly in an economy where they risk getting no job again.

The minister likes to ask if anyone who quits a job without good reason should get UI. I would like to ask the minister: Does he believe workers who had good reasons for quitting their jobs should still lose all their benefits? Under this law that is exactly what is going to happen. No one really deserves to lose all benefits. The worst part of this legislation is that many of these people will be innocent victims; people who will not be able to prove their case. We all know that under this system you are guilty until you prove yourself innocent.

We are calling Motion No. 13 the Quebec amendment. As suggested by some Conservative members from Quebec, the bill as it stands now is too inhumane. We therefore suggest a three-step process. The first time a person is fired is the first event. The claimant remains under the current legislation of seven to twelve week exclusions. If there is a second event a person gets the maximum 12 week exclusion. Only if there is a third event will the claimant suffer a total loss of benefits. Motion No. 11 is included as cross-referencing for the purpose of the Quebec amendment. These corrections would have to be made to make Motion No. 13 apply.

• (1130)

This is the essence of the amendment the Quebec Tories who protested Bill C-105 wanted to see. We are putting it in for them. Allowing workers three chances obviously is more humane. While we in no way agree that it would make the bill acceptable, as with any of the amendments it is obviously better that total loss of benefits should not be the penalty until someone has quit or been fired on three successive occasions.

Under clause 20(4), once a person is disqualified none of the insurable weeks of employment prior to the event can be used to requalify for a later claim. I am running out of time but I would like to point out that with respect to time which has been earned previously and has not been used up in no way under any circumstances should the person be disqualified from using it. This is simply overkill. It is using a shotgun to kill flies and there are many other analogies one could make.

I hope that the minister and the government members will consider their opposition to these amendments as I believe they make vital corrections. The impact of this bill will be incredibly severe. Surely the government cannot object to some amendments which will soften it.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take part in this debate at report stage. I have one or two points I want to make. I know a lot has been said on both sides of the House and I know that members on this side have for the past several weeks condemned Bill C-113, particularly as it relates to unemployment insurance.

I have been involved in UI debates for many years and if there is one area of law making that increases the intensity of debate around here, it is amendments from time to time in relation to the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Every government we have had in the 22 years I have been a member of this House has in its so-called reform approach to UI come in with measures that are ever more Draconian. For example, the Liberals a number of years ago reduced benefits from 66 per cent of income down to 60 per cent of income. Now they are screaming because the Conservative government is about to reduce the benefits from 60 per cent to 57 per cent.

There is no doubt in my mind that the Conservative government is using the Unemployment Insurance Act as a weapon in its arsenal for deficit reduction but it is doing it on the backs of the unemployed. That is simply not fair.

I am a member not of the labour committee but of the justice committee of this House. I cannot help but draw certain parallels between the Unemployment Insurance Commission and how it operates and the criminal justice system in this country and how it operates.

In the criminal justice system the onus of proof of guilt is on the system. In other words the Crown has to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused is guilty. The accused does not have to prove his or her innocence.

In the unemployment insurance system it is just the opposite. The onus of proof is on the claimant. When the claimant is adjudicated and there is any doubt whether or not his or her claim should be acceptable, and the Unemployment Insurance Commission says it is not acceptable, then the onus of proof is on the claimant. The onus of proof is on the person applying for the unemployment insurance.

Incidentally this is not a welfare system. This is an insurance system. It is a compulsory insurance system into which the claimant has been forced by statute to pay. It is an insurance against loss of income due to being unemployed. But at the same time the government insists that the claimant must prove that the claim is correct. It is not the other way around. It is philosophically unfair. It is basically unfair at the outset.

• (1135)

Second, in the criminal justice system, a person is innocent until proven guilty, as I mentioned a few moments ago. It is often an assumption in the unemployment insurance system if there is a very deeply disputed aspect that the claimant is guilty until proven innocent. This is very often involved in disputes arising from being dismissed for just cause or quitting for just cause.

Third, the criminal justice system is guided by laws that must be changed by statute. This is a very rigorous process. The unemployment insurance system is guided by directives that can be changed by the commission at any time, that can be interpreted loosely or severely, depending very often on the individuals who are involved in the actual hearing itself. Consequently in the UI system, many of the decisions are based upon individual officers in the commission itself, not according to law, not even according to regulations sometimes, but according to a whim, or according to a very narrow interpretation.

Fourth, in the criminal justice system all witnesses are treated equally before the law. That is a basic precept. The odd time this does not occur, it usually gets front page coverage, particularly in the criminal justice system if it involves a person who has been charged with a serious offence. In the unemployment insurance system, employers have more power than the claimants through the separation slip and through the approach recommended by the UI directives. I do not think there is any question about this. In a dispute between an employer and an employee the decision goes in favour of the employer most of the time.

Fifth, under the criminal justice system decisions are made first by police that investigate a crime and gather information and evidence. They present the evidence to a Crown prosecutor. It is a decision of the Crown prosecutor whether to proceed with the charges or not. Then the trial itself involves prosecution, defence, the judge—that is the bench—as well as a jury very often. However, in the unemployment insurance regime the UI agent is the police officer, the lawyer and the judge, usually with the responsibility for making a decision alone. We are speaking here of the decision of first instance.

In the criminal justice system, except in extreme crimes, jail sentences or fines are not imposed until after the appeal system has been exhausted. The fine or the jail sentence may be arrived at in court and prescribed, but the fine is not paid or the jail term is not served until all the appeal processes have been exhausted.

In the unemployment insurance system the claimant suffers total loss of income immediately. What does the claimant live on while pursuing the appeal? This is particularly true in cases of alleged sexual harassment. It is easy for the government to say all the person has to do is launch an appeal if there is any doubt whether or not sexual harassment was a factor in a person leaving her job. That is fair enough. The point here is it may take months, in fact I have heard of some cases taking over a couple of years to resolve. In the meantime, that person is not receiving any benefits from the Unemployment Insurance Commission into which that person has had to contribute by statute. To me that is not fair.

Again, under the criminal justice system, sentences to fit the crime may increase or decrease minimally within a prescribed range. Under Bill C-113 the penalty goes from a maximum of 12 weeks' loss of income to full loss of income. I argue that is not fair.

In the criminal justice system though inconsistency exists in the system it is controlled by the appeal process. If mistakes have been made at the lower level, at the court of first instance, the appeal system is there to correct the inconsistencies or the mistakes that were made.

• (1140)

In the unemployment insurance system decisions from one employment centre to another can differ greatly. Appeals are also localized and potentially inconsistent. There is very little one can do about it, if anything.

Again under the criminal justice system if an appeal process is too lengthy the court may drop charges against the defendant. That happened in the province of Ontario a couple of years ago. Many charges, some of them fairly serious, were stayed simply because the courts were technically unable to receive and do their job. They were backlogged to the point where the Supreme Court of Canada said that it was not fair to keep the charges outstanding and therefore they were stayed.

Under the unemployment insurance system there are no regulations which proclaim a minimum appeal time in favour of the claimant.

Again I go back to the sexual harassment aspect of an unemployment insurance appeal. Why should a woman who says that she was sexually harassed and therefore was forced to quit her job have to wait for months, even up to two years to get justice in the unemployment insurance system and at the same time receive no benefits if in the criminal justice system there are prescribed limits of time after which the charges must be stayed? Justice delayed is justice denied. Surely the same principle should apply in the unemployment insurance system.

Finally, in the criminal justice system the defendant cannot be excluded from his or her trial except in cases of extreme misbehaviour in the actual court proceedings. Under the unemployment insurance system, Bill C-113 allows the chair of an appeal board to exclude the claimant while hearing evidence from the employer.

For some or all of those reasons, I am voting against Bill C-113.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure in some respects to at least stand and discuss this particular bill and point out some of the errors the government has made with respect to UI legislation.

I think all of us when we first heard that a bill was coming down—I think it was Bill C-105—looked at the general intent and said it was a good idea to look at unemployment insurance. We could see if there were ways to improve the system to make it work better and to make sure that it was not being defrauded or abused.

When we finally had a chance to analyse the bill it became very clear the bill was lacking. In fact the government knew it was lacking as well because it withdrew the bill and made many amendments and changes to try to make it look better.

The optics of correcting abuse in the UI system is always great. Anybody who works hates to think that their tax dollars are going to somebody who is freeloading or abusing the system or who is actually taking from the system unjustifiably.

It is great optics from the government's point of view to proceed on that basis and introduce this legislation, but it knew it was wrong. The government made changes. It has now brought back another bills which is what we are debating today, and the same problems are still there.

I think the government now is a little worried that the optics have gone a little sour. In fact, when we really analyse what has happened here the government is saying that it has a major political problem. There are 1.6 million Canadians out of work and of those about 400,000 are youth. The government is saying: "We cannot deal with it. We do not have any answers. We are stuck. We are finished. We do not understand. We cannot do anything. What do we do? Rather than trying to deal with the situation let us take a look at the optics again and see if we can come up with something that is just a little neater and divert people's attention".

I am sure everyone is familiar with the old shell game where you hide the pea and try to divert people's attention away from what is going on so that they cannot figure out where the pea is.

The simple fact of the matter is that is what is going on here with Bill C-113. The government is trying to divert Canadians' attention away from the problem of unemployment and put it on the backs of unemployment insurance and the small number of people who may be abusing the system.

• (1145)

The government keys in on some interesting things such as quitters. It has good optics with quitters. Anybody who quits is not thought of too highly so it wants to focus on quitters or cheaters.

That is the way in which the government has tried to divert people's attention away from the fundamental question of why the government has not been able to put Canadians back to work. Why has it not developed policies, procedures and directions that would see Canadians working so that they did not have to use the unemployment insurance system as it presently exists or as the government intends it to exist?

Instead, the government wants to play the shell game and divert people's attention. We have to deal with the bill. Looking at the bill, one can see that in order to make the optics look good, it has to be negative. It cannot be positive.

We have to say that all cheaters are guilty until they prove themselves not to be. The whole onus shifts. It is seen in the area of sexual harassment. One has to prove the harassment. Anybody who quits because they have been harassed for whatever reason must prove it. Again it shifts the onus.

It all sounds very good. The optics look excellent, but the fact of the matter is it is manifestly unfair. As the previous speaker pointed out, when we look at our fundamental system of justice the opposite is the case. You are innocent until proven guilty. If government feels that people are cheaters, quitters or harassers, then the onus should be on the government to prove that rather than shifting it in the other direction.

I look at unemployment insurance and from the people whom I talk to in my office I know that no one wants to be on UI. Nobody goes out of the way to say: "Put me on UI. I want to be on UI". They want to have a job. They want to have dignity and pride. That is not acquired by being on UI. Maybe what we should be doing is rather than looking at the optics of unemployment insurance, why not get right to the root and find out how we can get people employed and off of UI. We have built-in systems within the UI system that in effect preclude people from getting back to work.

There was an interesting case of a fellow who lost his job. He tried to start up a business. It was a corner store operation. It took him two or three months to actually get that business up so that it would pay him some money. UI found out about it. They said: "No, no. Because you were working in this business for the last three months, we are going to penalize you. Not only are we going to take away the UI that you got for the three months, we are also going to penalize you". They made it so that he almost went out of business with the loss of money and the penalty UI put on.

He would have been better off to stay home and not try to better himself, not try to become gainfully employed and not try to find employment for others. In this particular business he was employing three other people.

What we have to do is change the optics of this to helping people. We have to put in a UI system that is for the people and not against the people. This government and its bill are doing just the opposite.

I look at what is going to happen to the provinces. We have seen statistics over the last little while with respect to bond rates and all of those types of things. The provinces are in trouble, very serious trouble. What does this government say? This government says: "We are going to take people off UI and put them on the welfare rolls because they are not going to be able to survive either way". If it puts them on the welfare rolls then it is the provinces' problem and not the federal government's problem.

The governments least able to handle the situation are the provinces and the municipalities. The government says: "Let us shift the burden. Let us put the burden on those two levels". Then the welfare rolls grow, either in provincial governments that look after welfare, or municipal budgets which are strained to the limit to look after welfare situations.

We have an opportunity in this country now to come up with a system that works, not one that penalizes. Put in those incentives to try to create jobs rather than try to punish people.

Quite frankly, if the government looked hard, there are lots of real abusers it could find and really change the system. All one has to do is look at what is going on in some of the areas in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island to see where there are abuses in the system, not going to individuals, but just as to how the whole system functions. Those are the things that government should be looking at to see if some changes can be made.

• (1150)

I have to say when I first heard about the bill I thought it made some sense. We should try to make sure that those who abuse the system are dealt with. One hears all sorts of stories and no one knows if they are true or not. One hears of people getting paid a higher wage and then having to pay something back under the table. Or there is the creation of jobs for a prescribed period of time and then allowing people to quit and other people to come along. I think that is an abuse which has to be dealt with. We have to look at those situations.

However, we have to also look at the root cause. In certain industries we do have seasonal employment and this is the only way that seasonally employed people can function for the rest of the year. So why do we not build in a system that does not force them to be cheaters and in effect, crooks? Why do we not allow them to work at their profession but at the same time maintain some dignity? Instead, we have to drive them under the table.

I see my time is running out. I think that this bill is fundamentally flawed. It is done only for optics. It is only done for the leadership campaign that is unfolding and the anticipated election shortly thereafter.

Canadians deserve a better deal than that. It is time to put politics aside. It is time to deal with the root problem and that is the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians. Of that statistic we know that hundreds of thousands of Canadians have already given up and are not even looking for work any more. That is where the problem is. Let us get past the optics and to the problem. Let us create jobs for Canadians.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): I am pleased to stand and speak to Bill C-113, which is the new UI bill. My colleague from Moncton kept referring to it as optics. I call it a public relations exercise which fails to change the substance of Bill C-105.

This new bill which is presented by the government will still deprive many deserving Canadians of UI benefits until they have been through a very lengthy appeal process. This issue is being used, as far as I am concerned, as nothing more than a smoke-screen. It hides the fact that the government has no idea of how to deal with the unemployment crisis we have in this country today.

The government says it is doing this to fight the deficit in the UI fund. If that is true, why does it not put Canadians back to work? Every time unemployment is reduced by a percentage point, $2 billion is cut from the deficit in the UI fund.

The UI fund is being used more and more for purposes other than replacement income. The government should not be deciding, in my opinion, how the fund should be used. It should be the employer and the employee as the government no longer even puts a cotton-picking penny into it.

Three billion dollars is now going from this fund into the retraining program. If the government used the money from other sources for the retraining program to put Canadians back to work it would not see such a huge deficit in the unemployment insurance fund.

The head of the Human Rights Commission, Max Yalden, when appearing before the legislative committee reviewing this bill said that the federal government should develop safeguards to protect claimants' rights while it reduces eligibility for unemployment insurance. He went on to say that in cases of alleged sexual harassment claimants should be given the benefit of any doubt. They should not have to prove harassment within legal definitions just that there was a valid perception of harassment.

As an example, the committee recently expelled a labour union delegation and expunged its testimony from the record. In other words, the government does not like to have anything uncomplimentary said about it. Fortunately, Judy Rebick read it back into the record last week so now it is known what many people in this country think of the government. When she appeared before the committee Judy Rebick also said that 53 per cent of those who voluntarily quit their jobs are women. As we all know, women are fighting for jobs in the first place and are fighting to keep those jobs.

• (1155)

The unemployment insurance program is the federal government's single largest expenditure, forecast to be $22.5 billion for 1993. Before 1990 the federal government's contribution to the UI fund was approximately 20 per cent, and since that time it is now totally financed by employees and employers. As a result of rising UI costs the UI fund has a deficit of $4.7 billion. I have already read into the record how the government could have reduced that.

The government expects that cutting the benefit rate from 60 to 57 per cent will save a total of $2.45 billion over two years. Maybe so, but at what cost?

How does the government justify these cuts? It says that these cuts are necessary to stop all those shiftless, irresponsible people who quit their jobs and then expect to be supported by hard-working responsible Canadians. But how many people are actually abusing the system? I would like to suggest there are not too many. There are two kinds of abuse. There are those who defraud the system with false claims and other scams and there are people who receive benefits after quitting their jobs for no apparent reason or after being fired.

The government calls the first group the cheaters. According to its own statistics the amount of money that is lost annually to these cheaters is something like $200 million, or less than 1 per cent of the total program. It is not a great amount of money.

The government estimates that 6 per cent of UI recipients are people who either left their jobs without just cause or were fired for misconduct. It has been shown by a great number of people that the measures proposed in Bill C-113 will not reduce or even contain the deficit of the UI fund. The government is simply cutting for the sake of cutting without any all-encompassing vision of what the UI program should be doing or any idea of how the program could be made to work better.

The government does not know what to do about Canada's unemployment crisis, and that is the major problem. If the proposed changes in Bill C-113 become law then those people no longer eligible for UI will have to turn to the already over-taxed welfare system.

Let me relate this to the Ottawa-Carleton region, of which Nepean is part. At the start of this month there were 30,300 unemployed persons in the RMOC. Changes to unemployment insurance are being felt in all sectors of this community.

The message from Canadians, as well as the people in this region, is that the changes to UI must not be taken as a simple budgetary measure but must be viewed in the context of a broader change affecting elements of our social safety net. They also go on to say that between 1990 and 1992 the number of unemployed persons in the RMOC increased by 10,800, or 64 per cent.

During the same period the number of social assistance case-loads had increased by an average of 540 per month, including a 345 per month increase in case-loads of employable persons. Changes in UI will mean that employable persons will remain on welfare longer. Approximately 6 per cent of all the UI claimants in the region quit their jobs. This means that as many as 1,350 individuals of the RMOC who are eligible for UI benefits in the present system will not be eligible for UI in April 1993.

Provincial and regional governments will experience increased financial burden as a result of changes to the UI law. The decrease in the number of people eligible for UI could mean a loss of $16.452 million per year in gross UI benefits to this region of Ottawa-Carleton. That is an incredible amount of money.

In addition, the reduction of the benefit rate from 60 to 57 per cent will mean a further annual loss of $24.684 million to the region in UI benefits. At the same time, contributions to the provinces and municipalities for social programs have not kept pace with the increased financial burdens they have experienced.

• (1200)

I mentioned this because it is having a very grave impact upon all of the municipalities across the country. It is clearly a case of shifting the burden from one level of government to the other and yet it is the same taxpayer who is footing the bill for them all.

The major criticisms that people have levelled at these changes are that people will be much less likely to quit their jobs, regardless of the working conditions, because they will no longer be eligible for UI; and employers will be able to use the threat of dismissal to force employees to accept a situation that might otherwise have met with resistance. Anyone who quits a job or is fired is required to prove that he or she was justified in doing so before receiving benefits, and people are considered guilty until proven innocent.

I heard of an example this morning in a meeting with people in the real estate area. They brought to my attention the UI program's treatment of commission salespersons. Realtors must give up their real estate sales licences to collect benefits for loss of employment, requiring extra expense to reapply for the licence when they regain employment. Their fluctuating income makes it impossible for some commission salespersons to meet the requirements. People who pay into the system for years are forced to accept much lower benefits than they would receive if the benefits were based on earnings averaged over the previous fiscal year. So real estate people are very concerned about this bill.

In summary, and I could go on at length, under Bill C-113 workers are in effect deemed to be guilty and must prove their innocence when they voluntarily have to quit or are fired by their employers. Under the current system a penalty for disqualification is already set at seven to twelve weeks. With Bill C-113 the penalty is total disqualification of benefits with loss of credits.

The bill does not come close to understanding the job reality for all workers, and this is especially true for construction workers.

I would hope that all members of this House would examine their conscience and vote against this bill.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I join the member who just spoke in hoping that everyone will vote against this bill, but I am not very confident that will happen.

Some four years ago the government embarked upon a program to slow down what it called the overheated economy in southern Ontario. The method it used was to very gradually increase interest rates, so gradually that it had little effect on the economy in southern Ontario or anywhere else because what kept the economy going was the increasing amount of credit that was available. As long as the lenders were prepared to give that credit businesses kept borrowing. As long as the money was being spent and businesses were expanding workers were getting money, spending that money and buying the goods that were being produced, and the economy kept growing at a great rate.

It was only when the lenders started to worry about collecting the money they had loaned out that the economy started to slow down. However it did not slow down as gradually as the interest rates had gone up. It slowed down precipitously, so that we entered the period that the Conference Board of Canada described as the first ever recession in Canada created by government policy. The government did it not by increasing interest rates but by increasing them to the point where the lenders started to worry about collecting their money back. The money was no longer in circulation and people no longer had the funds to buy the goods that were being produced in Canada, and we now have what some call a recession and what some know is a depression.

The government has learned nothing from that experience because we are now at the point where it wants to get the economy moving again. What does it do? It lowers interest rates. But again, it is doing it so gradually that it has little effect on the economy. It will not have any effect until it gets to the point where the lenders are confident about getting back the money that they lend out. They are not going to do that until Canadians start purchasing again.

• (1205)

It is hoped that this legislation before us now in part will save the UI fund some $500 million to $600 million this year. It may save the UI fund but, as others have pointed out by downloading these costs onto the provincial governments and reducing the amount of money that will be available, when people change from UI to welfare they will be getting less.

It is not just that people are getting less but that people are losing whatever confidence they might have had in any kind of a recovery.

When we see headlines from time to time saying that there are signs that the economy is turning around, fewer and fewer people believe that it really is turning around because they do not see it and they do not feel it. They know that the number of unemployed is increasing. They know that the number of jobs is decreasing, that is, the well-paying jobs, the ones that really count.

From time to time we see stories of plants shutting down or plants, businesses and industry moving away from Canada to the sunnier climes of Mexico.

The government may well save the UI fund $500 million—I do not know, I understand that figure is questionable—but it is taking it from the people who can least afford to fight the recession and the depression. Those are the people who are already not earning very much, if they are earning at all. Those are the people who would be spending every cent that they received in their own communities throughout Canada, and by spending it would give some encouragement to people who are in business and give some encouragement to the people who are working, so that they can spend their savings in some security of the job which they hope will continue.

Now they have little of that because more and more people are worried that if others are losing their jobs, when will it be their turn?

Until the recovery does become a reality people are not going to have the confidence they need to spend their savings to get the economy moving, or to even spend their earnings.

We are taking it from the poorest. The people who have lost their jobs are now going to have something like a 10 per cent reduction in the amount of UI they can claim. If they do claim UI they will not know whether they are going to get it because there will be tests. They will have to undergo examinations to see whether or not they qualify for UI.

I do not mind that kind of checking up, but the purpose of it, which is to take more money out of the economy at a time when the economy needs it most, is the crazy part of this measure. It is the same as when the government seemed to have little idea as to how to slow down what it considered to be an overheated economy. It only happened by accident. It did not happen because of the gradual increase in interest rates; it only happened at the point where the lenders were afraid to lend any more.

Once again, it is reducing interest rates gradually, but it is having no effect. When there is some conscious effort on the part of government itself or if industry and business by some miracle get back some of the confidence they have lost in the Canadian economy, only then will it turn around.

In the meantime the government should be doing its share. The government should be taking the lead in providing job opportunities, just like the New Democratic Party which has presented a policy to create employment and put that money into circulation. People who are working are paying income tax. They are paying into the UI fund, not drawing out of it. They are not cutting back, they are expanding.

Putting people to work is the way to reduce the deficit, and eventually to reduce the debt. That is the only answer to the economic problems we have today and the only way we can do that is to bring back confidence. The only way we can bring back confidence is for the government to take the lead quickly, not gradually, not slowly, not in the way it slowed down the economy, not in the way it is trying to improve it right now. It must take dramatic steps to show that the government itself has faith in the future of Canada.

We have talked about an infrastructure program. We have talked about it in the last two federal campaigns in particular. The Liberals picked up part of the idea in the last federal campaign and we will be talking about it again in the coming campaign.

There is a tremendous amount of work that needs doing in this country. We should be hiring contractors in this country, not contractors in other countries who might produce $5.75 billion worth of helicopters. Contractors in this country could be building roads, sidewalks, sewer systems, water systems, things that are needed, upgrading what needs to be done in Canada, projects that would create employment from one end of the country to the other. Yet the government's attitude is that we have to draw in, we have to rein in, we have to control the spending.

By controlling the spending it is doing exactly the wrong thing if it wants to get the economy going again. It should know that. It has had a couple years of experience of gradually going downhill, with the occasional headline saying that things are turning around, things are getting better, knowing full well they are not. The real statistics show the number of people employed in good jobs that enable them to pay substantial income taxes and to pay into UI funds so that the money will be there to draw out for the emergencies some people experience. There is a way to improve our economy. As I stated, more than anything else it depends upon confidence.

To get business moving depends upon the confidence of the lenders to put money into the communities. It depends upon useful work being done, not paying people to stay home on welfare, not paying people to stay on UI, but providing them with useful jobs, especially for the lower income people. They are going to spend that money in their own communities in our country, consuming goods that are produced here in Canada, keeping the money circulating in Canada, and above all else creating some confidence that the government at last has some idea as to what it should do to get the Canadian economy moving again.

It can be done, but the government has to be willing and determined. The government has to show that at last it knows what needs to be done, that it knows the cure for the illness of the Canadian economy and is determined to make that cure available to the Canadian people and the Canadian economy.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, usually I begin by saying what a pleasure it is for me to participate in a debate on a certain bill. Unfortunately, because of the guillotine motion that we voted on just prior to this debate I am not entering this debate with such pleasure. This government has brought in closure and time allocation more in this 34th Parliament in a four and a half year period than in all 33 Parliaments prior to this Parliament.

I remember when we were in government between 1980 and 1984 how the Deputy Prime Minister used to get up and criticize us because we brought in one or two time allocations in a session. He ranted and raved how we were hijacking Parliament, how we were stifling debate, how we were killing free speech. Now, who is hijacking Parliament? On an important topic such as this he puts a motion to limit debate to one sitting day.

It is high time that this government was thrown out so that it can no longer guillotine this House and prevent free speech.

In fairness I must say I have been receiving criticisms on both sides of this bill from constituents such as Henry Raston who is in real estate and talks to a lot of people. He came into my office and shared with me what he has been picking up. Yes, the Canadian public is fed up with people who are collecting UI and living six months in Florida which makes them unavailable for work.

If you are collecting UI you are supposed to be available for work. The public does not want to pay for someone who is not available, who is sunning him or herself while the hard-working person pays for that.

The other category is the quitters, the ones who work part time, build up their UI premiums and then go off again. There are the cheaters and there are the quitters, but that is not what we are objecting to on this side of the House. We want to eliminate those people also and the present legislation can do that. There is no need to change the present legislation. Instead of sending the UI cheques out, have the people report and pick up the cheques as they used to do. You would soon find out which workers are available, which ones are cheaters and which ones are quitters.

Most of the representations I receive are on the other side, representations against this bill, and very strong representations. Some of them are reflected in the letters I receive. Here is one from Desmond McComish. He does not write to me. He is writing to the right hon. Prime Minister. He writes:

> Dear Mr. Mulroney,
> I am writing to you to express my dismay and disgust at the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance regulations, whereby you propose to deny UI benefits to people who quit their job or get fired for cause.
> I was fired as the comptroller of a company last year and the boss took the position that I had been fired for cause—to protect himself from a lawsuit and because he was the type who believes a good offence is the best defence. Had the proposed UIC—

That is Bill C-113, that we are debating today.

> —rules been in effect, I would have been denied UIC in addition to receiving no severance. That is appalling.

This is someone from a Conservative riding. He goes on to say:

> If you persist, and that loose cannon, Bernard Valcourt, continues to attack the unemployed, I can assure you that I personally will bend my efforts in the election to ensure your defeat. The proposals are idiotic and political suicide. What fool would propose such changes this side of an election anyhow? Obviously not a friend. Unless you are letting Mr. Valcourt skewer himself as punishment. I helped vote you in before. Rest assured, I won't do it again. The middle class are scared enough and you have badly miscalculated the negative political fallout from these proposals—among the employed middle class, i.e.—the working scared.

Signed, Desmond McComish, a close Conservative friend of the Prime Minister who is going to do everything he can to defeat the Tories over this bill.

Another constituent who does not want to be identified says this in writing:

> It is unconscionable that the government is attacking the one group of people that is most affected by the current recession, the unemployed. This type of action is both insulting and disgusting. Although I am not on UI, it is an important safety net for people who may lose their jobs. Cutting back benefits and making it harder for people to collect will result in a tremendous backlog of appeals, trap people in dead-end jobs and especially hurt those that are wrongfully dismissed. More than likely the unemployed will be forced onto an overburdened welfare system. Contrary to what Mr. Valcourt thinks, most unemployed people will not be "proud" to help reduce the federal deficit.

Toronto and other major cities are complaining that the people who should be getting UI are not getting UI and are going on welfare assistance. The welfare tab is getting too large for the municipalities and the provinces to bear.

You may say: "Well that is fine, Mr. Flis, but what is your proposal?" My suggestion to the government is do not come up with smoke-screens. Call a spade a spade. The problem is not those who are receiving UI. The problem is that there are no jobs for these people. Create the jobs. Create the training. If they cannot find jobs because they are just not available right now let us put these people on training programs.

In the 1980s we had a tough recession also. Let me give an example of what the Liberal government did in my riding. We put people to work restoring the Sunnyside pavilion to its historical site. We got funds for Palais Royal, a cultural recreation centre, to get it functioning again. We created jobs at the Canadian National Exhibition, at Ontario Place and at the Sports Hall of Fame. We built a bridge over Dundas and Sorauren through make-work programs, through infrastructure programs where the city pitched in, the province pitched in and the federal government pitched in. Our leader has been recommending this for two years, but somehow this government has no ears. If it has ears it has no middle ear or inner ear. If it has that, somehow it is not getting to the brain.

• (1220)

If the government had taken our suggestion of sharing the infrastructure programs three ways people would be working. Just in the few examples that I gave we put tradespeople to work: carpenters, electricians, plumbers, and decorative iron workers. All of these people who were unemployed got jobs, thanks to three levels of government getting together.

I know the government says there are 40 reasons under which people can leave work and claim it as a just cause. Let me give an example. I cannot identify this constituent who left his job after three months because the company he was working for was doing something illegal in telecommunications.

Yes, the government says those would be moral objections: "Employer practices contrary to professional ethics, law, regulations or illegal activities contrary to fundamental ethical values". These would be just causes.

What does this constituent have to do now? First he has to write to Keith Spicer of the CRTC so that the CRTC can identify whether the actions are illegal or not. That will take at least six months.

An hon. member: Or longer.

Mr. Flis: Then it will go to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. That will take another three months. That is nine months this person is not working and not collecting UI. What do you think will happen to him, Mr. Speaker? He will be forced onto the welfare rolls. A professional person will be forced onto the welfare rolls. That is what this bill is doing.

I appreciate some of the amendments and motions that have been presented here. My colleague from Saskatoon—Dundurn went through all the motions so I do not have to repeat those. He put them on record, exactly what it is that we are debating.

Thank you for allowing me to put my concerns on the table. I would like to end up with putting my concern and tell this government to stop guillotining the debates in this House.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, for nearly eight years, the Conservative government has been telling us that it is trying to lead this country to prosperity. Unfortunately it seems to keep leading it to bankruptcy and, for many, straight to hell.

Unemployment is still rising and nothing seems to indicate that the trend will change soon. Of course, the government has an explanation, and as I said before, it always has an one. It is always other people's fault or it is worse elsewhere. That is some consolation for the thousands of jobless Canadians who see no sign of hope.

What about the level of poverty? The people whom the Conservatives are punishing with this bill are those who lost their jobs because of the recession which this government created, sustained and deepened. This government is cutting 3 per cent from the benefits of those who are in real need. The government's economic mismanagement has already cost the unemployed their jobs; now, they are being bled white a second time.

This government which is taking unemployment insurance benefits from those who lose their jobs as a result of misconduct is only giving bosses a most dangerous weapon. An employee can be dismissed for something insignificant, without recourse and especially, to the delight of some employers, without income. The door is open to all kinds of abuse and blackmail.

An employee could no longer risk complaining about questionable conduct, for fear of dismissal. Maybe there will only be one such case of abuse, but that would be one too many. Canadians deserve more respect.

[English]

Instead of helping the unemployed with a social safety net this government is shoving them through the cracks.

The Conservatives are making it difficult for people who have been discriminated against in the work place. Victims of racism or sexual harassment might be reluctant to issue complaints for fear of being denied access to UI benefits. The government has made it very difficult to cite these serious problems.

The measure dealing with just cause will discourage legitimate complaints about sexual and racial harassment as well as complaints about substandard working conditions. Immigrant women, who most often end up working in the worst conditions with the worst wages, will be far more vulnerable than they are now because of these changes.

Instead of proposing a system that actually combats the real problem the government is going ahead with a cynical political move that will hurt the very people who need protection.

If this legislation passes I can guarantee that the results will be an administrative nightmare. Thousands of people will appeal the automatic denial of benefits.

In 1991, almost 200,000 UI applicants were held to have quit their jobs without just cause and were already penalized by the existing system. Almost 20,000 of these rulings were overturned by either the internal review or the board of referees. The possibility now exists that 10 times that many will appeal. I cannot imagine the system being able to cope with that volume and still deliver fair and equitable decisions.

I know that the government has disbanded this organization, but in 1991 the Economic Council of Canada said that people who quit their jobs are not a drain on the UI fund. When we look at the 1986 figures, we see that half of all job quitters went to another job immediately and another 43 per cent found new jobs within 10 weeks.

These proposals will hurt the people of my riding and the people of the province of Quebec. At a rally in Montreal last month thousands of citizens demonstrated against these changes to the UI fund. Because this government no longer contributes to the UI fund it should not act without consulting Canadian businesses and Canadian workers who actually pay into the fund.

Statistics suggest the actual number of people quitting their jobs has declined as this government intentionally brought Canada into a recession.

In September 1988 at the height of the economic cycle more than 31,000 Canadians quit their jobs. In September 1990 the number fell to 26,000. Last fall the number stood at 16,700. It is plain to see that Canadians are not likely to quit their jobs for frivolous reasons, especially in these tough economic times. All the Conservatives have been able to do is remove a great deal of flexibility from the labour force.

The actions of this government simply do not make any sense. You do not pull the safety net out from under people and impoverish them as they seek to make the change from one job to another. The government is just shirking its responsibilities and forcing other levels of government to take over the problems.

In some jurisdictions those denied UI benefits under the just cause proposal would not automatically qualify to collect social assistance. Municipalities in some of our provinces have the discretionary power to adjust or delay receipt of social assistance benefits for people who quit their jobs. It is unlikely that individuals would be eligible for social assistance immediately or while they plead their cases through the appeal process, as they have to deplete their savings or be almost penniless to qualify for these benefits.

Canada used to have a compassionate unemployment insurance system. Most G-7 countries pay UI benefits to voluntary leavers. Japan, Italy, Germany and the U.K. all have penalties for voluntary quitters but they do not deny all benefits. Only this heartless government would do that.

[Translation]

How will these proposals help 130,000 young Quebecers find the work they need for their future and the future of their province and our country?

• (1230)

All this law does is punish the unemployed for this government's inefficiency. We need programs to help the people of Saint-Laurent—Cartierville find permanent employment. We in the Liberal Party are proposing a new direction for the Canadian economy that would put Canadians back to work. If the Conservatives can no longer lead, we are ready to meet the challenge.

[English]

Just before closing, I would like to quote our critic when he said: "If the government is serious about controlling its spending why does it not scale down or cancel its plan to spend $4.4 billion on a submarine-hunting helicopter? If the government is serious about wanting to put its financial house in order, why does it not go after the $16.1 billion that Canadian companies have hidden in tax havens such as Barbados, Cyprus, Liberia and elsewhere?

The fact is that this government has no clear plan for controlling its spending and now the most vulnerable Canadians are being forced to pay for its economic mismanagement. The government has a moral responsibility to show Canadians how it intends to prepare our nation for the future. With this bill it has abdicated that responsibility".

That is a quote from our critic, the hon. member for York North.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of my party, the NDP, to speak on this bill.

You will notice that the government is not defending the bill today. It is not even listening to a number of very serious amendments that have been put forward by the member for Timmins—Chapleau who is trying to take a bad bill and make it a little less so. He has a number of amendments which I am going to speak to in a moment.

Where is the government? It is not doing anything on this bill. The member from Nanaimo spoke for the NDP a few minutes ago and went into the general causes of the economic recession. He accused the government of taking out its inability to put the economy back on a sure footing in this country by tackling the poor and the working stiffs. That is what this government is doing and what this bill does.

We heard the NDP member for Brant speak earlier. He is the critic for the Solicitor General and he said criminals have more rights now than the poor claimants under unemployment insurance. He pointed out that in criminal law a person is innocent until proven guilty but in this system which, as he pointed out, is an insurance system the onus of proof is reversed. We are now making it harder and harder for the ordinary working stiffs to get unemployment insurance after they lose their jobs.

My constituents are in Port Moody—Coquitlam, a suburb of Vancouver, British Columbia. Many of them are working, but many are concerned about losing their jobs. When they lose their jobs and go on unemployment insurance—which they have paid into and are paying a heck of a lot more money into thanks to this government—they want to be able to collect. They want the system to operate in a hassle-free way. I will return to that in a moment.

It was interesting to hear members of the Liberal Party speak to advance some policy. Today is Tuesday so the policy is a little different than it was on Monday, but on Wednesday it will be different again. Canadians are beginning to see that the party is self-destructing inside. They are also beginning to see the Liberal Party members on every side of every issue. It is amazing. Now they are wetting their pants, if I might say so, because the Conservatives are changing their leader. It is pretty pathetic. When I heard the member for Parkdale—High Park speak I thought how pathetic that party really is.

The member for Timmins—Chapleau has suggested a number of amendments. I draw this to the attention of the House and the government.

• (1235)

Motion No. 7 would replace the phrase "reasonable alternative". The claimant had no reasonable alternative to leaving employment. Motion No. 7 would replace that phrase so just cause for leaving employment exists "for any of the following circumstances applied to the claimant". It goes on to deal with that. I challenge the government to look at this amendment seriously and agree to it if it wants to help the ordinary working person in this country.

Motion No. 8 adds reasons for just cause bringing the total to 40, which the government claimed and talked about. There it is. Yet the government does not seem to be prepared to accept it.

Motion No. 9 places the onus of proof on the commission and establishes that the benefit of doubt that is beyond reasonable doubt goes to the claimant. As the member for Brant said, why should it be easier for a criminal than a claimant? When in this country are we going to stick up for the ordinary working person?

Motion No. 10 clarifies that a common-law spouse is a spouse under the act. Just on that particular motion, it is not clear now what a common-law spouse is. Here is the decision by an umpire dated in Ottawa on October 2, 1992 concerning the case of Ms. Frances Barzan. The umpire says:

> If Parliament, in its wisdom, wanted to include, and I believe it should be so included, that it would be "just cause" to quit one's job to follow a "common-law spouse" Parliament would have so stated in the statute. Parliament has failed to do so and it is not for the umpire to do so. It is not for an umpire to expand the meaning of the word—

But he says he thinks Parliament should. Well here is the amendment. Here is the chance. What is the government waiting for? It should jump at the chance. That is what one of our amendments here deals with.

Here is another decision. I will not cite the name of the applicant, I will just use the initials, E.H. It is a decision by the Federal Court of Canada, Mr. Justice Muldoon, arising from an appeal from Hamilton, Ontario on January 11, 1991. He says this is, and I use the judge's words, "a pathetic case". The poor guy has had to live on the job site to work seven days a week. His back is gone. He leaves his job and Mr. Justice Muldoon makes sure he is allowed an appeal. He deals with it and says he only has to wait one week. Now with this new legislation that is gone. The poor guy would not get UI.

This bill is a tragedy. This is in fact taking it out on ordinary people.

I want to take a little different tack. I have gone through the number of motions. This is an insurance scheme. People pay into this and they pay a lot into it. We MPs, and I think I speak for a lot of members in the House, are getting more and more phone calls in our ridings. My riding office in Coquitlam today, as I speak, is getting phone calls about people whose cheques are delayed, who are not getting it or have to appeal and so on.

We treat these issues as priorities. Just think of the people trying to support their families. They go on UI and have no money even though they have paid into it. They do not want to go to welfare. They want to get their UI quickly and get back to work. They have paid for their UI, so we treat this as a priority in my riding and in other ridings.

We are lucky because we have a phone line to UI. We phone and try to get the case brought forward and so on. It occurs to me that politicians and this government are so unpopular, in spite of the little blip in the polls right at the moment, because they are not working for people any more.

You do not have to be a rocket scientist to analyse this. It is a simple thing like not getting your UI cheque on time, not being treated right and being faced with an impossible bureaucratic appeal process. In immigration it means not having a chance to bring your relative over for the wedding because the visa is delayed. It means the post office. You cannot believe the number of complaints I get every day about the way the post office is working.

This is not complicated. It is just simply making government work for people. That is what people want. They pay for it and they want government to deliver on it.

• (1240)

I want to say this to the employees of the unemployment insurance and immigration offices. I appreciate that they are under stress and they are under strain. They have been cut back by the government and we have 11 per cent unemployment. They have more and more people coming to them. It is tough to provide good service. I know they try very hard.

I also know that they have one of the worst ministers that I have ever seen in the job in my 13 years in Parliament. He is a little blow-hard who thinks he is a mini-Mulroney. He is an ineffective minister. I would not want to work in his department. It must be very tough. I think he is pretty ineffective. I am speaking of the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The other reason it is hard for the Public Service employees in these offices is that there is a continued attack by the Conservative government on the notion of government. It wants to leave it all to the private sector. It says that government itself is bad. It pulls the wool over the eyes of people.

I say to Canadians and to this House, let us wake up and realize that what people want is government to work for people. Here we are making a UI system that is going to be even harder on people. We have a recession. We have problems with the government deficit. Instead of dealing with the deficit, instead of dealing properly with government spending and waste, instead of dealing with putting people back to work and dealing with the problems of interest rates, a proper trade policy and a proper taxation system so that the middle class does not get burned and burned, what does this government do? It ends up attacking the worker and the poor stiff who loses his or her job and makes it hard to collect UI.

I suggest the government look at these amendments seriously.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words on this bill and the amendment before the House.

It is a very serious matter to try to figure out what would be a good reason for quitting employment, what would be just cause. You might think, Mr. Speaker, that something would be a good reason or a just cause and I may not think that would be a good reason or a just cause. It is a very serious and complex matter.

We have had a system in effect in Canada that has scales of penalty. I would argue in my 10 minutes that that is necessary under our system. What we have is a board to hear your appeal. We have a judge to hear your appeal if you are not content with the board. You have the law and you have members of Parliament here in this House.

I will just take the board for a moment. I was looking at some of the most recent cases under just cause. I looked at a case where a fellow had quit his job in Brandon, Manitoba and had gone to British Columbia because he was not getting very much work during the week and was being paid the minimum wage. The Unemployment Insurance Commission said: "No, you cannot collect your unemployment insurance". He appealed it to the board.

Look at what happened at the board level. At the board level he produced further evidence. What was the further evidence? He advised the commission that he faced imprisonment for 90 days because he did not pay his traffic tickets. He had so many driving offences in Manitoba that he decided to move to British Columbia.

What did the board say to that? It is incredible. The board of referees took the new evidence into consideration and found that for a young man to face a jail sentence was a very frightening prospect and felt he had no alternative but to quit his job, leave his family and friends to avoid prosecution, so therefore he qualified for unemployment insurance. That is the board that the government talks about as such an expert. What it was doing was trying to figure out whether this fellow had a good reason for leaving Manitoba.

Can you rely on the judge? Look at the recent case of a judge who in 1992 sat in judgment of a lady who had quit because of religious convictions. She was working. Her shift had been changed so she had to work all during the day. It was against her religious convictions to work on that day.

• (1245)

A judge can only deal with the law, can he not? The judge made a ruling. He said: "Look, the fact that I might have been persuaded to have come to a different conclusion, had I been trying the matter in the first instance"—but he was not, the board was. What was his conclusion? "While I have the utmost sympathy for the claimant and respect for the undoubted sincerity of her religious convictions, I am nonetheless obliged to dismiss her appeal". The judge knew that it was wrong. You cannot depend on the judge, can you, in certain cases.

Can you depend on the law? When you walk in, you have got just cause. The law says: "You can appeal this to the board of referees if it based its decision on a misinterpretation of the facts". That is not what is in the law. That is what you were given when you got to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. What is in the law?

The law says: "If the board made an erroneous finding of fact in a perverse or capricious manner", a perverse or capricious manner. That is the law. It is not this that is given to an unemployment insurance claimant. A perverse or capricious manner, go and argue that. Tell that to somebody who cannot get their unemployment insurance. They are trying to figure out: "Do I have just cause? Did the board make a decision in a perverse—". What does perverse mean? Perverse, wicked. A capricious manner, was it a whim?

Can you depend on the law? No, you cannot depend on the law. Can you depend on members of Parliament? Looking at this most recent case here under just cause, it deals with misconduct. This guy was fired for reporting his boss, his supervisor, who he claims was stealing things from the company. The appeal was dismissed. He was fired. The board said: "It appears this type of personal work in the company premises has been condoned in the past" and held that the action of the claimant amounted to misconduct because there is no definition of misconduct in the act. You cannot appeal all those cases on misconduct.

Let us get to the heart of the matter now. Can we really depend on members of Parliament on voluntary leaving with just cause? Here is a ruling of a fellow who had serious nosebleeds, health reasons. Silica dust in a plant was causing him nosebleeds. The judge ruled this and the board and the commission: "The jurisprudence is clear that an employee does not have just cause for leaving unless he has other employment to go to or conditions of work are intolerable with no possibility of them being remedied".

Certainly not turning up for work without even advising the employer is unacceptable. Because he left, because he was having nosebleeds and did not follow through on the remedial action, he has no case to anybody, to the board, to the judge, to anybody.

Finally, where are we in this Chamber? Look at perhaps the most recent case of just cause in which a chap was dismissed for accumulating demerit points. It was deemed that he was dismissed properly. The case went to the courts. The court ruled that he was innocent. Meanwhile, he had lost his unemployment insurance. Now, he is out in the cold.

The law says that the employer had just cause because of this, this and this which was not proven. When a court of law says: "No, that is wrong; there was no just cause", there is nothing in the act to then go back and say: "Give that poor man his unemployment insurance".

• (1250)

In conclusion, let me say that we are dealing with human beings who are applying for unemployment insurance, human beings at the board level, human beings in the person of judges of the Federal Court. What can we expect a judge to do? A judge can only follow the law as it is written and interpret it under jurisprudence that has been determined over a period of time. Finally, we are dealing with human beings who make the law. That is where we fall down in this bill. We have to realize we are dealing with human beings at all levels who can make mistakes.

The law must be flexible enough so that people do not get an unfair deal or an unfair hearing. Certainly let us recognize that the boards are not perfect by any means. Neither are the judges and neither are members of Parliament.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Newfoundland who put all of these excellent cases before the House. I hope the government has listened to his arguments and will use them as a basis for returning this bill to its own tables or scrapping it altogether. If it is determined to proceed with the bill, it should look at those points and try to amend the bill in a way so that its impact on people will be negligible.

For those who are interested, we are debating the UI bill which deals with the question of reduction of unemployment insurance payments from 60 per cent to 57 per cent effective April 1, 1993.

There is a second segment to the government proposal that deals with people who might quit their job without just cause. Those people will no longer qualify for UI benefits.

As my colleague from Newfoundland has indicated, it is extremely difficult at times to justify what is just cause. We are really going against the basic principles of our justice system that the accused is innocent until proven guilty. The government is reversing this principle when it comes to the unemployed. In other words you have to prove you are not guilty. You go before the board with the assumption that you are guilty and have to prove your innocence.

Perhaps we should look at the question of the board that will be looking at what is just cause and what is not just cause. In 1991 more than 191,000 cases came before the board. The board was able to deal with about 19,000 cases and was able to reverse those cases.

If the government is to proceed with Bill C-113, all we are going to see is a tremendous increase in the number of people who will be appealing their cases before the board trying to justify leaving their place of employment.

The government has been saying over and over again that it is taxpayers' money involved when it comes to the payment of premiums. That is not quite so. The government used to make contributions to the UI account until the year 1990. After that it became the responsibility of both the employee and the employer.

What will be the impact of this bill if it passes? The unemployed will not disappear from the face of the earth. However those hoping to collect unemployment insurance will have to go to another source for income. That is the social welfare system. By passing the UI bill the government is unloading or passing on the responsibility to another level of government, the municipal government.

• (1255)

The people we are talking about are supposedly the quitters. I am going to take one example from here in our city. We have an unemployment rate of approximately 30,000 people. Of those 30,000 people, approximately 6 per cent or 1,800 people have quit their jobs.

If this bill is passed does it mean that these people will not be eligible to collect UI benefits? The cost would be in excess of about $30 million annually. That money would be taken away from our region. The result of this would be that more people will have to rely on the social assistance benefit. As well, when you add to that the reduction of the benefit from 60 per cent to 57 per cent then you will have an addition to the $30 million of quite a few millions. All of that money has been taken away from the local tax base.

It has been the position of the Liberal Party and members of the opposition that the government has to address the heart of the problem which is the question of unemployment. Rather than attacking the unemployed, why do we not focus on employment and on measures to stimulate the economy so we will have more jobs?

The whole idea behind proper employment initiative programs is to promote labour flexibility and mobility. After all, it is unemployment insurance. It is an interim measure that has been put in place in order to help employees move from one job to another. It is only fair that such a measure is mobile and flexible. It has been put in place in order to meet the objectives.

I see we are getting close to one o'clock. I want to leave the House with one thought. Every time we deal with a situation in this House it always seems to be a question of reacting rather than a question of preventing something from happening.

Most of the bills that I have seen over the past four years have been reactive bills. One would suggest that they should have been preventive bills that would stimulate the economy and help reduce the unemployment rate or create jobs. This bill obviously is no different.

For the sake of 1 per cent of the work force that is quitting their jobs or abusing the system the government has put everybody in the same basket. We will not be supporting this bill. It is my hope that the government will review its decision in light of all the comments and recommendations that were made by our caucus and by the community as a whole.

Mr. Samson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Given the hour, I wonder if we could have consent from the House to call it one o'clock. We do have other members who want to speak.

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the government, we would be prepared to give unanimous consent, if our colleagues in the Liberal Party agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

At 12.59 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

RACISM

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, during the three years she served in the Department of Justice the member for Vancouver Centre did nothing to fight groups which promote hatred or hate propaganda.

[English]

It takes political will to fight racism. We cannot afford the luxury of doing nothing, like the former Minister of Justice who now hopes to be Prime Minister.

The government's own estimates show that the March 21 anti-racism initiative is ineffective. At the same time, the government has cancelled the Race Relations Foundation, slashed anti-racism funding, and has completely ignored the issue of hate or bias crime.

It is time to take these threats seriously. The former justice minister ignored the problem. I hope this one will not.

BARRIE WELCOME CENTRE

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to applaud the efforts of the Barrie Welcome Centre. As a community service of the Barrie YMCA the Barrie Welcome Centre assists the settlement of immigrants into the Barrie area. In four years the centre has smoothed the cultural transition of over 1,300 immigrants who have come into Simcoe Centre.

The centre provides services such as translation, help with government and legal documents, information on local social services, health care, housing, employment and recreation areas.

The priority of most newcomers is to obtain a working knowledge of English. Currently it provides English grammar lessons to over 60 enthusiastic new Canadians.

Small things like these services provided by the Barrie Welcome Centre help everyone understand our cultural differences. These first steps of understanding will go a long way toward eliminating racism and helping to create a united country.

PAKISTAN

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the minister of minority rights in Pakistan, His Excellency Peter John Sahotra, is now visiting Canada for a few days.

Canadians urge him to ensure maximum protection in Pakistan for Christian and other religious minorities. We hope good relations between our countries will not be marred by an increase in human rights violations in either country.

The Christians, who are less than 1 per cent of the population in Pakistan, were there before the state of Pakistan was founded and have their roots there. Nevertheless, recent violent mobs have attacked Christian clerics and churches, prompting cancellation of some Christmas services.

S. O. 31

News reports indicate that Christians in some cases have been killed or sentenced to death on false charges of blasphemy against Islam.

We congratulate the Government of Pakistan for abandoning plans to show religious affiliation on citizens' identity cards, which would have opened the way for more discrimination against Christians in lodging and employment.

We call on the Government of Pakistan to fulfil its commitment to provide compensation to the churches that were damaged in riots last year and to provide adequate security in the future, rather than curtailing the rights and freedoms of Christians and other religious minorities.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, the government has a strategy which will foster economic recovery, and pave the way for the future and will control the deficit. It depends on private sector support, because the private sector will guarantee our future growth.

We know that just stimulating public spending in the hope of stimulating growth does not work. We have many examples of countries that tried to escape the realities of the world economy. Many times we saw them try to throw money into ill–conceived public investments and poorly designed job creation programs. Many times they have had to retreat, cut spending and get their finances back in order. This has happened in France, in Great Britain and more recently in Ontario. Why would the opposition recommend policies that have always failed?

Look around the world and see the countries which are prosperous. They are not the ones which tolerate inflation, close their markets to trade or accumulate deficits by spending on make–work projects. This government would prefer to learn from those success stories. Why is the opposition always ready to repeat failures?

TAXATION

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, municipalities across Canada are being hit hard by the decision of the Minister of Finance to freeze their grants in lieu of taxes at the 1992 level this year.

This drastic action will cost municipalities $40 million this year as they try to cope with rising costs for welfare and other municipal services. Other municipal taxpayers have to pay the increase in their municipal rates this year. Many of these municipal taxpayers in the Algoma riding are unemployed. Yet if they do not pay their taxes the municipality will seize their home and their property.

Why should the federal government be any different from other taxpayers? That is why this very high–handed move by the federal government places an unfair additional burden on municipalities.

I call on the Minister of Finance to reverse this decision immediately, remove the freeze on municipal grants in lieu of taxes and pay taxes just like any other taxpayer.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, a complete environmental review process was put in place with respect to the Lester B. Pearson International Airport and its expansion. The committee held extensive hearings and completed an interim report in November 1992.

The government has totally disregarded that report and has decided to build a major 8,000–foot runway 4,500 feet west of the existing north–south runway. This new runway will create a new air traffic corridor over homes, schools and the Queensway Hospital, facilities that until now have had no air noise.

The environmental review report said the buildings and homes that are seriously affected should be compensated and retrofitted with anti–noise baffling. The minister has refused to do this and refused to do anything to protect homeowners threatened by the new air corridor and is moving in total disregard of the environmental review process.

I call on the minister and the government to change their course of action.

SUDBURY, ONTARIO

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, on March 20 in an article by Jane Taber in The Ottawa Citizen on the upcoming events scheduled for the Minister of National Defence it was noted that she would spend the evening at the Juno awards. Then it said: "It beats spending Sunday night in Sudbury or the North Bay legion hall wooing potential delegates".

Legion halls can be a source of much inspiration and education. Legionnaires are wonderful Canadians who care for their country. Those of us who have not participated in past conflicts can learn a lot from their experience.

As for Sudbury, it is a wonderful place in which real people have got together to overcome adversity. Chatelaine magazine included Sudbury as one of the 10 best Canadian cities to live in. Sudbury has achieved recognition for its environmental programs. The people of Sudbury have worked to diversify the economy of the area and have been and continue to be successful at it.

Unlike other levels of government Sudbury is debt free. Many would benefit from the Sudbury experience. It is a great place to visit and it is an even greater place in which to live.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member from another great place, Delta.

HELP FIGHT LIVER DISEASE MONTH

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to remind the House that March is being proclaimed Help Fight Liver Disease Month by the Canadian Liver Foundation. I might add that I was going to get the member for Mississauga South to read this.

The foundation, the first organization in the world exclusively devoted to providing support for research and education on the causes of liver disease, aims to reduce the incidence and impact of all liver-related illnesses. Among its many other services it develops support groups for the sufferers of liver disease and their families.

During the month of March the Canadian Liver Foundation's volunteer chapters will sell daisies and daisy items from booths across the country. I am sure the House will join me in congratulating the foundation on its work and in wishing it every success during Help Fight Liver Disease Month.

YUGOSLAVIA

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are horrified by the atrocities that have been committed in the former Yugoslavia. Rape, torture and death have been inflicted on tens of thousands of women in that war-torn region.

• (1410)

I have in hand petitions signed by over 1,000 people in my riding calling on this government to pressure the United Nations into action. The latest reports indicate that the UN has yet to make a credible response.

Delegates to a war crimes tribunal conference have questioned the international political will to bring the perpetrators of these heinous crimes to justice.

Canadians think with honour and pride of our vaunted international peacekeeping tradition. We provide peacekeeping troops to prevent the very atrocities we know war will inevitably bring. We must now use our peacekeeping traditions to strengthen international resolve on war crimes.

I call upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs to use every effort to convince the UN to provide adequate funding for the investigation and trial of war criminals.

CORRECTIONS AND CONDITIONAL RELEASE ACT

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, recent changes to the Corrections and Conditional Release Act were intended to tighten up parole eligibility for those convicted of violent crimes. However, loopholes in the parole system are thwarting our attempts to protect the public from violent repeat offenders.

Last week Albertans learned that because of the practice of sentence merging a convict on parole who reoffends has his new sentence added to his old sentence for parole purposes. Time served on the first offence counts as time served toward parole on the second.

A convicted rapist in Edmonton sentenced to 15 years will be eligible for parole in only 18 months. If he had reoffended after his parole was completed the earliest he would have been eligible for parole would have been the year 2000.

We must ensure that the justice system works the way it is intended to, and the way Canadians expect it to. In the case of violent offenders, sentence merging for parole purposes must be stopped.

IRANIAN NEW YEAR

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, March 21, the first day of spring for Canadians, is celebrated by Iranians throughout the world as the first day of their new year, or Nowruz, meaning new day. This secular observance of the start of the Persian calendar, the arrival of spring and the renewal of life on earth has continuously taken place over the past 2,500 years.

Iran, formerly called Persia, is one of the world's most ancient civilizations. Recent political events in that country have caused many Iranians to leave their homeland and resettle around the world, including in Canada where we have benefited much from the rich heritage of their traditions, values and ideals.

Members of this House wish a happy Nowruz to all Canadians of Iranian descent. We welcome not only their celebration of this time of renewal but also their contribution to Canada's national cultural mosaic and to our way of life.

CANADA–UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, some of my hon. friends in opposition from the Windsor area have had nothing but ill to say of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement since it came into effect. Perhaps I could point to some major projects in their area that the companies involved say can be attributed in large part to an increasing flow of Canada–U.S. trade since the FTA and forecasts of even greater growth under NAFTA.

There have been $25 million in improvements to the Canadian side of the Ambassador bridge, and another $75 million on the U.S. side; $28 million will be spent upgrading the inside of the Detroit–Windsor tunnel, and another $25 million will be spent refurbishing the plaza on the Canadian side; $38 million is being spent to enlarge the CN–CP railway tunnel; a $100 million expansion of Sarnia's Blue Water bridge will be started in 1995; and there are also CN's plans for a new railway tunnel between Sarnia and Port Huron.

That is more than $290 million in investments in Canada's trade infrastructure in the Windsor–Sarnia area. Perhaps my hon. colleagues would like to comment on the jobs that investment is creating and will create in Canada.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's recent patronage appointments to the National Parole Board have further reduced the level of corrections experience held by National Parole Board members. In fact, the percentage of board members with such experience has declined from 85 per cent in 1977 to 40 per cent today.

National Parole Board members make life and death decisions every day and as such require experience in the criminal justice field. Without such experience, their decisions may unnecessarily place Canadians at risk.

The 1988 Daubney report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General said:

> The board can only be as good as its decision makers. If those who are appointed as decision makers do not have the requisite qualifications or experience, their decision making is unlikely to be as effective as it should be.

• (1415)

I call upon the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General to re-examine the process of making these appointments and to put the safety of Canadians first instead of delivering million dollar farewell gifts to Tory supporters.

SPORTS

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, Olympic gold medalists Kerrin Lee-Gartner and Mark Tewksbury were chosen outstanding Canadian athletes by the Sports Federation of Canada last night. Lee-Gartner of Calgary won the Velma Springstead award as Canada's female athlete of the year. Tewksbury, also of Calgary, took home the Norman H. Crowe Award as the top male athlete.

Several other Canadian athletes were also honoured at the federation's annual awards banquet. The gold medal winning women's eight rowing team from Barcelona was team of the year. Nicolas Gill of Montreal won the Viscount Alexander award as top junior male athlete. Nancy Drolet of Drummondville won the Elaine Tanner award as the top junior female athlete.

A friend and colleague, Alwin Morris, was also awarded the Johnny F. Bassett award for exemplary community service, a recognition for all his work in developing indigenous sports programs helping youth across Canada.

I ask the House to join me in congratulating all these outstanding Canadians, athletes who in their own special way have always made us proud to be Canadian, and the Sports Federation of Canada for its work and recognition.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the provincial government in Manitoba is planning to continue with its proposed Assiniboine River water diversion.

According to the Supreme Court ruling on the Oldman Dam case in January 1992, the federal government may do an environmental review when there is an affirmative regulatory power involved. The Minister of the Environment confirmed his acceptance of this view when I asked him about this in May 1992.

The fact that federal funding for this water diversion comes from the western diversification fund and the prairie farm rehabilitation administration, that the Assiniboine is a navigable river, that aboriginal land will be affected, and that irrigation in one region is being favoured over potable use in another, gives the federal government plenty of jurisdiction and responsibility for a proper assessment.

A basin-wide review is necessary to study the cumulative effect of this development. There will be a reduction in the amount of water and an increase in the concentration of chemical pollutants already in the river from agricultural run-off and industry, namely from the American based pharmaceutical company, Ayerst.

I call on the Minister of the Environment to live up to the image he is fond of projecting in his leadership campaign and order the assessment.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

RUSSIA

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

We know that President Yeltsin has not yet asked for a change of venue for the meeting in Vancouver in 10 days, but today the Deputy Prime Minister of Russia said: "We will prepare this meeting to take place in Moscow. This will be a symbol of support for our country".

In light of the statement of the Deputy Prime Minister of Russia, will the Canadian government indicate that Canada will not be offended at all if the United States and Russia were to move the venue to Moscow?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday that we would not in any way be offended at all if the venue were moved anywhere that would benefit the bilateral arrangements and the support for President Yeltsin and his democratic reform.

We are happy to make all the arrangements to accommodate both parties in Vancouver. Should either or both decide that it could best be held and more advantageously be held for President Yeltsin elsewhere, we would be happy to accommodate that.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday in Chicago the U.S. Secretary of State argued in favour of an aid package that would be better targeted and better co-ordinated by western countries. Mr. Christopher also said that to achieve this a meeting of Group of Seven finance ministers and foreign affairs ministers should be held as soon as possible.

Would the Prime Minister agree that this meeting should preferably be held before the meeting between President Yeltsin and President Clinton, and that it would be advisable to try and organize a meeting early next week to pave the way for the meeting scheduled between the two presidents in Vancouver or Moscow?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of what was said by Mr. Christopher yesterday in Chicago.

• (1420)

Perhaps I may point out to the Leader of the Opposition that on May 21 last year I said the following at John Hopkins University in Baltimore, and I quote: "I believe that so far the west's collective response has been hesitant and timid and certainly not commensurate with the needs and opportunities that are out there". I was referring to a collective response by the west to the problems of President Yeltsin and to opportunities in the former Soviet Union. That was my government's position a year and a half or two years ago, and it still is today.

In fact, earlier today I received a call from President François Mitterand of France who shared this opinion and who believes, as I do, that the problem is a complex one and that if there is a change of plan with respect to a bilateral meeting, it may be useful for G-7 members to consider a meeting of heads of government or heads of State. The problem is so important and so complex that it requires political leadership by heads of government. That is President Mitterand's position and it is also the position of the Canadian government.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

I would like to know from the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the Canadian government to make sure that there will be a linkage between the aid packages and the maintenance of a democratically elected government in Russia.

We would like to know if the aid will be linked to democracy or separated. It is very important to know so that there will be pressure on the people in Russia to make sure that they maintain a democratically elected government in that country.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the link must be direct, evident and ongoing. In the same speech at Johns Hopkins University at the commencement exercises on May 21, 1992 I indicated that it was time to unite the people of the former Soviet Union with democrats everywhere.

The first step is to complete the integration of the countries of the former Soviet Union into the global economic system. This refers to IMF, World Bank membership, the creation of stabilization funds, individual technical assistance programs, and the coming together of the G-7 with a view to dealing with this fundamental problem.

My friend and I have discussed in the past how much Canada, the United States and other G-7 countries would have paid had the leader of the Soviet Union said 15 years ago: "I am ready to get out to disband the Warsaw pact. We are going to facilitate the unification of Germany. We are going to bring about a democratic system in Russia and the Soviet Union and end the cold war".

What would the G-7 countries have been ready to say at the time? They would have said: "How much can we provide, when and where?"

The absence of this kind of response is why I said at Johns Hopkins that the western collective approach thus far had been timid and lacking in daring and responsibility. I think the time has come, even at this late hour, for us to respond in the manner suggested by my hon. friend with a profound linkage to democratic institutions and democracy itself in Russia as best exemplified by the maintenance of President Yeltsin in office as the only elected head of government in Russia in a thousand years.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

It was reported in The Winnipeg Free Press today that the Minister of Agriculture indicated that the government is considering spending an extra $80 million to make up the shortfall of 500,000 tonnes of grain promised or committed to Russia last June.

Is the government simply going to unfreeze the credit system that was arrived at last June? Are we planning to spend an extra $80 million to fulfil the previous commitment? Or, are there going to be new commitments made for new grain assistance to Russia?

If I might ask as well, is the government considering altering the charter or the legislation of the Wheat Board to allow it to engage in direct barter arrangements with Russia in order to facilitate the grain trade between the two countries?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in regard to the question raised by my hon. friend, 523,000 tonnes out of 1 million tonnes of the grain shipment agreed to in June have already been shipped. Shipments were temporarily suspended simply because Russia was paying some creditors in hard cash and not honouring some commitments to Canada.

• (1425)

Had all of us been placed on the same footing there would have been no difficulty. But I have had discussions with President Yeltsin about this. The matter is satisfactorily resolved and our expectation is we will be able to proceed.

I mention as well the question properly raised by my friend yesterday about the nuclear safety initiative, which was a $30 million commitment by Canada over three years. Approximately $8 million will be disbursed in this fiscal year honouring that commitment.

Technical assistance in general, which is a very vast and I think constructive program between Canada and Russia with a wide range of projects, is well under way in some pretty impressive people-to-people ways. I give my hon. friend one illustration: 700 Russian oilfield workers and managers are being trained as a result of Canadian assistance in safety and petroleum production. With the assistance of Canadian community colleges funded by Canada the training programs at three Russian oil and gas institutes are being significantly upgraded with 20,000 Russian students benefiting from Canadian expertise delivered at the ground floor level.

If we multiply this kind of technical assistance program perhaps dozens of times we get an indication of what Canada has been seeking to do.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was quoted yesterday as saying that they are now looking at another aid package that might be part of a larger commitment, and I think he indicated there have been some initial discussions.

Given that Canadians share this deep concern about the seriousness of the situation in Russia, but also knowing that we live very much in a time of constraint, I think it is clear that any new initiative should have the support of the public as expressed in this Parliament.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if the government would commit to full parliamentary consultations on any new aid or assistance package so there can be a consensus on what Canada can do to assist the people of Russia, so we can determine where the money will come from and what purposes will be served.

The Prime Minister would agree it is important at this time to have full agreement and consent of the people of this country as expressed through all their parliamentary representatives.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with the suggestion of my hon. friend that a parliamentary debate on this matter would be very appropriate. Obviously the government would be happy to lay its plan in this regard on the floor of the House of Commons. My hon. friend can comment on it, approve it, criticize it and do all the things we ought to do in a parliament.

When one looks back at the Marshall plan and the extraordinary success it had in rebuilding Europe and in maintaining vibrant democracies throughout European countries that had once been devastated, when one considers the extremely modest contributions, relatively speaking, being sought for the former Soviet Union and the timidity and the hesitation encountered in some G-7 and other industrialized countries, it is astonishing to see that this is actually taking place.

It is time for the leaders of the world in respect of this great challenge to stop thinking like bookkeepers and to think like statesmen and visionaries because that is what is required in regard to the former Soviet Union and democracy in Russia.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada today put forward his sixth annual report wherein he said, not surprisingly, that debt reduction should be an important priority.

I want to say to the Minister of Finance that this is the same Governor of the Bank of Canada who raised the interest rates in order to control inflation. For every point those interest rates were raised $1.5 billion was added to the debt and that high interest rate policy created record bankruptcies among farms, individuals and businesses. It is the same Governor of the Bank of Canada who deliberately created unemployment in Canada.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he is not shocked that the Governor of the Bank of Canada does not see the failure of these policies after six years and bring out a new directive. If not, will he bring in the Governor of the Bank of Canada and tell him it will be impossible to address the debt in this country as long as that governor supports 1.5 million unemployed in this country?

• (1430)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am shocked at the rationale that the hon. leader of the NDP is using.

I think she is a supporter of lower interest rates in this country. In order to have low interest rates you have to have low inflation. That is why we have today the lowest bank rate in 21 years and the lowest mortgages in 35 years. Why is the hon. member opposed to that?

I think the hon. member also recognizes that we have to get the fundamentals right. Today's Ottawa Citizen says: "Economic recovery ready to roll". Another headline says: "Recovery posts steady gain, analysts say".

Mr. Milliken: You have been trying for eight years.

An hon. member: It is 10 points down today.

Mr. Mazankowski: There we go again. No one likes good news over on that side of the House. Well, the news is improving, employment is improving, growth of the economy is improving, exports are improving, utilization is improving, housing sales are up and manufacturing sales are up. Why is the hon. member arguing with those results?

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

It is clear that if this government and the Governor of the Bank of Canada had not had the kind of fiscal and monetary policy that has been in place in the last six years and had this government not doubled the debt in the last eight and a half years, we would not need these measures for the recovery that he is talking about. We would not need to have a bigger recovery because we would not have had as big a problem.

It is clear that this government and the Governor of the Bank of Canada had implemented for a number of years a monetary policy which led to a made-in-Canada recession. Two economic analysts both respected in Canada, Informetrica and WEFA, have indicated that we would have higher employment and a greater gross domestic product if interest rates had been kept lower at that time.

I say to the minister that it is his government's policies, supported by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, that created the problems. Will he bring in a budget to address the problem because the problem is the unemployment created by this government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party should get together with the premiers of the provinces of Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia who recognize that deficits and debts are a serious problem in this country.

If she wants to talk about records in accumulating debts, I remind the hon. member that under the Liberal government the debt multiplied 11 times.

Quite frankly, as The Toronto Star pointed out: "The seeds of disaster were planted in 1975". That just so happens to follow that marriage of convenience that took place between the Liberals and the NDP between 1972 and 1974.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, no province ever signed a free trade agreement that cost the country more than 100,000 jobs, and no province created the excessively high interest rates that led to a record number of bankruptcies in this country.

I have a question for the minister. This country does not want any advice about the debt. What this country needs is specific steps to create jobs. How can the minister expect us to consider the debt problem when we have about 1.5 million unemployed in this country? How can we, with an unemployment rate of nearly 11 per cent?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is rather amusing. I find it strange that the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party would criticize policies like the free trade agreement and policies like the GST which are really the instruments that are driving the economy out of recession.

It is exports that are driving the economy. I know the hon. member does not believe in liberalized free trade. She believes we can build a wall around Canada and trade our way to prosperity. That is not the way we feel about it. The fact of the matter is the trading initiatives, thanks in large part to the free trade agreement, and in large part the contribution of the GST in improving the competitiveness and productivity are the two most important features which are driving this economy out of recession.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, a number of trade experts from the C.D. Howe Institute to the government's own recent prosperity initiative have identified as the central weakness of the North American free trade agreement the continuing absence of a common set of trading rules. Yet the minister has said that Canada cannot propose a parallel accord on such common trade rules in the current negotiations with Canada and Mexico because, and I quote: "Any change in the subsidies code would entail reopening the agreement".

Why does Canada not propose a parallel accord on subsidies? Can the minister explain why a parallel accord on subsidies proposed by Canada would entail reopening the North American free trade agreement while parallel accords on the environment and labour proposed by the United States do not reopen the agreement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, trade rules are at the heart and core of a free trade agreement. Rules related to the environment or labour matters are not at the core of a free trade agreement. If you want to have changes in the rules on the subsidies or countervail or anti-dumping, you have to reopen the agreement. That is logical.

If my hon. friend says he wants to reopen the agreement, what is he prepared to give up? What is he prepared to change? The Americans are seeking changes in the cultural exemption. They are seeking changes in the supply management system. The members of Congress are seeking changes in the dispute settlement mechanism. Those are the three priorities that the Americans want. Which one of those would my hon. friend give up in return for changes in the subsidies code?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister says that parallel accords on the environment and on labour standards are virtually meaningless. Let us be clear on this. He says that they are not central to the agreement, but that a subsidies code, which we do not have and he has never negotiated, is central to the agreement but he cannot get it.

If Canada cannot propose a parallel accord on subsidies, on common trading rules, the least the minister can do in the negotiations which resume next month is to propose a trinational panel to work out a common set of trade rules. How can Mexico and the United States refuse to participate in such a panel? Why does he not take that initiative to represent Canadian interests?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first of all, let us just make sure that my hon. friend and I are on the same wavelength here.

We both agree that the subsidies code is in the agreement. There is a subsidies code in the agreement. My hon. friend is nodding. He would like to see some improvements in that. I also would like to see improvements in that but we have to get agreement.

Where we do have agreement is in the GATT. The proposals that have been made by Director General Dunkel on the subsidies code are very acceptable to Canada. We have participated fully in the negotiations there and that, I think, would answer the questions that my hon. friend has. I would encourage him to be somewhat patient. He will get a Uruguay round and he will get the subsidies code.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Minister for International Trade.

Today in Washington, over 600 representatives of the American lumber and home-building industry are asking President Clinton and Congress to repeal the 6.5 per cent tax on softwood lumber.

• (1440)

This tax not only increases the cost of a home in the United States by over 4 per cent but it hurts every Canadian softwood producer and hurts every Canadian worker.

Will the minister ask the President directly to repeal this tax at the April 2 timber summit that is being held in Portland, Oregon?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, on April 1 I will be meeting with the U.S. trade representative Mr. Mickey Kantor. I will be raising the matter of the softwood lumber issue at that time.

I know my hon. friend realizes there is a process that must be gone through. We must respect that process on both sides. I know that he has heard me say many times in the House that there was no basis on which the softwood lumber issue should have been brought to a countervailing duty position.

The government has taken a very strong position on that. In fact what we have been doing since that time is engaging in an advocacy exercise in the United States where we have gone to the home builders in the United States. I believe that our efforts have been instrumental in part in the positions that these home builders have taken and that he just referred to.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the same minister and on the same issue.

We both realize that the softwood lumber industry can be the one bright spot on the Canadian resource horizon if this government ensures that sufficient assistance is given to all of these areas.

I know that in my area alone we could create 1,000 new jobs almost immediately. Will this government make loan guarantees and other resources available to all of the sawmill operators throughout Canada so they can modernize and better compete in this vital industry that is absolutely hot? This government should be taking advantage of it today.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend thinks he has put all the facts, but I believe that it is not possible in Question Period. Let me draw a couple of others.

There has been almost a doubling in the price of lumber in the last year or so. There has also been a drop in the value of the Canadian dollar so that the returns to the lumber producers in Canada, including in his constituency, have increased significantly in recent months. They now have the cash flow and can do some of the expansions that he is looking for.

That together with the changes in the Small Businesses Loans Act that my friend the Minister of Finance has brought in, plus the drop in interest rates that has resulted from the drop in inflation, all combine to put in place an environment which is very very positive for investment in that industry.

PARLIAMENTARY EMPLOYMENT AND STAFF RELATIONS ACT

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council. In his absence, perhaps the government House leader can deal with it.

Six and three-quarter years ago in June 1986, the 33rd Parliament, with all-party support, passed the government's Bill C-45 and enacted the Parliamentary Employment and Staff Relations Act, which very simply extended to workers on Parliament Hill the same basic rights to decent working conditions and health and safety laws enjoyed by all other federal employees.

Almost seven years and one election has passed since Royal Assent was given. Still the cabinet has not proclaimed the operative sections of the act, parts II and III, into law. My question is: Will the government proclaim this important basic legislation before the end of this Parliament? Just when will it act to end this obvious and continuing injustice to those who serve us in this place?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the government, we say that it is not really the government that is holding up this issue. This issue deals exclusively with the House of Commons, with employees of the House of Commons and with employees of individual members.

There are certain aspects of the law which would impose on individual members some requirements that there has been some reluctance to take on. The proper forum to discuss this is the Board of Internal Economy. I will certainly relay the hon. member's concerns to the board.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, after seven years, I and I am sure the workers of Parliament find that answer absolutely up on cloud nine.

The workers we are talking about not only work directly for members of Parliament but they are all of those employees, some unionized some not, who are employed here for the House of Commons, whether they are security workers, whether they carry out the garbage, whether they cook in the kitchens or whatever else. Surely if there was to be a consultation process, they and any Canadians—who I must admit expect the wheels of government to grind slowly, especially this government's—have a right to expect that it will be less than seven years before consultations are held and something gets done. It is an obvious injustice.

• (1445)

Why has the government not acted at this time? What is the reason? Did it not know what it was doing or does it not know what it is doing now?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member was rehearsing his supplementary question and did not hear my first answer.

This is not a government question. It is a House of Commons question. There is a distinction. The Board of Internal Economy has the responsibility for this and the hon. member's party has a representative on the Board of Internal Economy. If there was such indignation in the NDP caucus all these years, how come it was never raised by the hon. member's representative?

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, last December, the Minister of Transport promised in the House that he would present a plan in early February to stabilize the airline industry. Today is March 23, and since Canadian International and Air Canada had huge losses in 1992 and Nationair now needs protection from its creditors, is the minister finally prepared to announce measures to stabilize an airline industry that is on the brink?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite will surely recall that I informed the House in November that if the airlines did not impose the self-discipline required to return to profitability, we would intervene by proposing corrective measures in this House.

Since then, the two airlines have announced reductions in their capacity that are likely to improve their situation. We are continuing to examine various options available to correct the situation if the airlines do not continue in the same direction.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the airline industry has a lot of high quality, high paying jobs that are clearly in jeopardy. It now seems clear that the basis of the minister's policy is that airline companies will fail.

Will the minister disclose to the House what he expects will be the total loss of employment in the airline industry when his policies have had their full effect?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr Speaker, I do not believe the member is suggesting that the Government of Canada should manage the two national airlines. The representatives of these two airlines have said repeatedly over the past few weeks that overcapacity is their main problem.

As far as I am concerned, they control the capacity and can address the problem themselves if they want their industry to survive.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. He will know that Canadians are massively opposed to the purchase of the EH-101 helicopter for the sum of some $5.8 billion at a time when one million children live in poverty and 700,000 children use food banks.

I want to know from the Minister of Finance if he personally supported the purchase of the helicopters. Yes or no?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the government made a decision in 1987 to purchase the EH-101. It confirmed and signed a contract in October 1992. The government stands behind that decision.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I think it is interesting to note that the Minister of Finance did not defend the helicopter purchase.

I want to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

The helicopters cost $5.8 billion. Some manufacturers are bankrupt and Canadians have had enough of this whole affair.

• (1450)

So I come back to the Minister of Finance. Is he prepared to tell us today whether or not he still supports buying these helicopters at a cost of $5.8 billion? This is a simple question.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a simple answer for a simple question.

The Canadian government has made a decision in the national interest and in the interest of our Armed Forces and our UN peacekeeping forces. We need this equipment and we will acquire these helicopters with a 13-year program, instead of having 30, 40 or 50-year old helicopters that could endanger the lives and safety of our soldiers and those who have the heavy responsibility of defending Canada's interests.

[English]

My friend asks whether one minister is supporting this. Well, of course, all the ministers are supporting it. Only in the Liberal Party does the leader go one way and the party the other.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration. First I would like to congratulate him for adopting new guidelines for women refugees facing gender discrimination.

Based on these guidelines I would ask the minister if he will review the case of my constituent, Amina Mohamed, who along with her four sons is to be deported tomorrow to the U.S. and then to Somalia. As a divorced Muslim woman, she has no status and will be shunned. Her parents are dead and she faces grave danger.

Will the minister delay the departure of this woman and her sons and personally review her case based on the new gender discrimination guidelines?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, because of the Privacy Act I cannot discuss any particular case in the House of Commons. But I can undertake to review the case the hon. member mentions.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): I want to thank the minister. I want to mention also that we have an affidavit from American lawyers which proves that if she is deported to the United States she will be ineligible for refugee status and will be deported from there.

I would ask the minister also to look at this case from a compassionate point of view, to allow this family to remain in Canada where the woman has support from her family and friends—

Mr. Speaker: The question is becoming a brief on behalf of the lady. I understand that but it is going too far. Does the minister wish to respond?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, all I can assure the hon. member is that I shall be reviewing the particular case she has mentioned and will get back to her for further details or information she may have.

EL SALVADOR

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The report of the UN truth commission on El Salvador both names and condemns those on both sides who committed heinous atrocities during the war years and attempts to contribute to reconciliation by recommending inter alia that all of the persons named be barred from public office. Yet last Saturday, almost before the ink on the report was dry, President Cristiani moved to grant amnesty to all those named, including apparently those already convicted and in jail for the infamous murder of the Jesuit priests.

Will the minister undertake to convey to President Cristiani that many Canadians who care about the peace process and who have seen him exercise constructive leadership in the past feel betrayed by this action? Will Canada urge him to implement the recommendations of the report in full?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yes we will do that directly with the president. Through my colleague, the Minister for External Relations, we have conveyed that directly to El Salvador's minister for economic and social development.

We will take every avenue in which to do this. We think it is a cynical use of the amnesty procedure, given the need of El Salvador to continue down the track of economic and democratic reform which we have strongly supported. We have strongly supported the President when he has made those moves. We will be equally strong in condemning him as a result of this very cynical action.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my friend, the minister of fisheries.

He will know that today in Halifax fishermen in large numbers are there to send a strong message to him and the government for the way they have handled the fisheries crisis, as did hundreds of fishermen in Sydney yesterday. They are there for very good reason. It is because the government has failed to provide a compensation package for those people who have been victimized by the severe quota cuts and the downturn in catches.

The government is putting the blocks to fishermen on the licence issue and it has the industry in a spin over its cock-eyed reform proposals.

Why is it that the minister insists on putting the boots to these people whom he should be helping?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I think that all members can recognize the partisan and silly nature of that question because the record speaks for itself.

Whenever fishermen have needed to be assisted by this government they have been assisted. That goes from ice compensation, when there was an unusual ice condition several years ago; to a gear up program, to help them when they needed assistance in gearing up after having a bad year; to the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program, $584 million; to the northern cod program, $780 million.

With respect to licensing and the new Atlantic groundfish management plan and reform of the department of fisheries, there is widespread support across the country except in Newfoundland. You can never expect any support from that government for anything constructive. So we have no support from that particular government which does nothing but criticize and condemn—

Mr. Dingwall: I thought you liked Clyde Wells.

Mr. Speaker: Let us try to move on.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Okay, okay, I will tell Clyde you still love him.

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. I want to ask the minister again, if things are as hunky-dory and as perfect as he suggested in his answer a moment ago, what is it about all those hundreds and thousands of people in Halifax yesterday and Sydney today? Is it that in his army everybody is out of step except him? Is that the problem, that he is the perfect guy and these people are all wet? Or maybe they have a cause.

Would the minister recognize that and agree now to do something about their concerns instead of ballyhooing as he is doing here today?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Well certainly the hon. member's party is not out of step, Mr. Speaker. Clyde Wells and Elijah Harper are going arm in arm to assist the hon. gentleman opposite in his next election campaign, the same two people who wrecked the Meech Lake accord. They are not out of step.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crosbie: With respect to the demonstrators in Halifax harbour, when the Atlantic groundfish management plan was announced—

An hon. member: Cheap partisan bull.

Mr. Crosbie: You hate to have your sins of commission and omission—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moncton.

JUSTICE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and concerns the issue of stalking.

The stories we have read in the paper about women who are killed or violently assaulted by men who stalk them represents only the tip of the iceberg. For every week that goes by more and more women are living in terror.

Why is the minister delaying in tabling legislation to deal with stalking?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I already said in this House that this issue, which concerns many Canadians, also concerns me. We will come back to this House very shortly with something that will answer these questions.

Nevertheless, I must say that five sections in the Criminal Code now deal with this issue. Obviously, further to the consultations we had with police groups across Canada, especially at the symposium with my colleague, the Solicitor General, it appears that these sections do not work. We may therefore have to amend the Criminal Code for that purpose. We are now working on it and I should be able to report back to the House soon.

• (1500)

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, the previous Minister of Justice as well as this minister have indicated they have been studying this issue.

Provincial ministers of justice and attorneys general are still concerned. Women are being stalked to death. How many more women must be terrorized before this government acts?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat in English what I said in French. We will be back in the House very soon with legislation on that issue.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The announcement of new runways at Pearson International Airport will inevitably bring additional noise problems to my residents.

Can the minister tell us when RAMPS, the noise abatement system promised for Pearson International Airport to detect flight path violators at a cost of $20 million and which sits idle, will be operational? Can he give us a specific date?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will be pleased to learn that this system will be operative in the fall of 1993.

Mr. Speaker: There will be a single question from the hon. member for Mississauga South and a single question from the hon. member for Calgary Northeast.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport.

The minister has received the environmental review panel report on Pearson airport. The minister has rejected virtually all major recommendations and is proposing to create a new north–south runway 8,000 feet in length and create a new air corridor. The minister has received a copy of an objection from the panel chairman, David Kirkwood, who has indicated that he cannot proceed with any further environmental work under the circumstances.

What is the minister's response to Mr. Kirkwood?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will be pleased to know that the chairman has requested that we clarify the mandate of the panel for the next step of this evaluation which is the rest of the north–south airline needs for Ontario and we are in the process of redefining the mandate.

RUSSIA

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The secretary of state in her address in February 1993 to the Diplomatic Academy of the Russian Foreign Ministry entitled "Canada and Russia—Managing Change" expressed the opinion: "The recent Minsk summit showed once again that Russia, as the accepted nuclear weapon state, has a major responsibility in ensuring the secure command and control of those weapons within the former Soviet Union, including Ukraine, Byelorussia and Kazakhstan".

My question to the minister: In view of the political and constitutional crisis and the possibility of a takeover in Russia by the military, is she still holding the same point of view?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yes, our position today is totally consistent with the position as reflected by the Prime Minister in his earlier answers and with the remarks I made in Moscow at that time.

We do recognize the significance of Russia as well as Ukraine and some others as nuclear powers. This is one of the reasons it is very much in Canadian interests that we be among the leaders in the G–7 and in the western world for providing aid and demonstrating support for democracy and economic reform in those countries not just Russia although Russia obviously is the most significant player at the moment.

One of the reasons we want to continue to do that is because they are nuclear powers and they do have a responsibility. This is well recognized by President Yeltsin.

Also in the hon. member's preamble he was somewhat more dramatic than I would have been in describing the situation there. While we are very concerned about the exchanges between the hard–liners and President Yeltsin at the moment I would not want to over–dramatize it in the terms that he used.

POINT OF ORDER

PARLIAMENTARY EMPLOYMENT AND STAFF RELATIONS ACT

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my point of order arises out of the response to my earlier question regarding the status of the Parliamentary Employment and Staff Relations Act.

• (1505)

The government House leader clearly suggested it was the Board of Internal Economy and not the cabinet that had the responsibility for proclaiming legislation passed by this House. I am in a quandary. If this is his intended answer, I want to know how to proceed as we appear to have a new Constitution. Who has jurisdiction over proclaiming legislation passed by this House: the cabinet, or who?

Mr. Speaker: I listened very carefully to the exchange between the hon. member and the minister. The hon. member is rising now and seeks some information with respect to jurisdiction in this matter.

First of all, it is not for the Chair to enter into that debate. I say this with respect, but nonetheless I remind the hon. member that in a very real sense he is extending the debate which arose with the questions and answers.

The hon. member, of course, has the right to ask questions of the appropriate nominated member of the Board of Internal Economy if he wishes to do so. If that is the route he wishes to follow, then I am sure with consultation he could find an appropriate time to put a question of that sort.

It is certainly not for the Chair to get into an argument about where the jurisdiction is in this particular case.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT, 1993 NO. 2

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–113, an act to provide for government expenditure restraint, as reported (without amendment) by a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13 and 14.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise to debate the issue this afternoon on Bill C–113 at the report stage. This is the bill, as you know, for government expenditures.

The bill is a fairly complex one, comprised of four parts. I am going to address that part concerned with unemployment insurance because it is the most controversial part of the bill and has received most of the attention in both the media and the public eye. Perhaps more specifically and more important, it has received the most scrutiny and concern from those many unemployed Canadians who are now desperate and in the ranks of over 1.5 million Canadians, on the issues that are being debated.

It bothers me and a lot of my constituents that in its mini budget of December 3 last the government did not come up with measures and macro–measures to put some of the unemployed back to work and save money on the deficit.

Instead it is trying to save $2.35 billion by attacking those people who need to be attacked least. It is reducing the benefits for the unemployed from 60 to 57 per cent and imposing what I believe are unfair penalties on those people who quite often, through no fault of their own, have to quit their jobs and go to work elsewhere.

There is nobody in this House who needs to be told what the unemployment insurance program is all about, but there are some changes that have been made since this group of politicians was elected in 1988. Considerable changes were made to the program that I suppose in part are responsible for this shameful measure that is being debated in the House today.

The unemployment insurance program is the federal government's largest single expenditure and exceeds national defence costs, Old Age Security costs and the total administration costs of the federal government. Its forecasted cost for 1993 is $22.5 billion.

I think the key issue here, and it has not been missed by some speakers, is the fact that until 1990 when Bill C–21 was passed, the government paid up to 26 per cent of the unemployment insurance fund. That does not happen any more. The unemployment insurance fund is now totally paid for by employers and employees. Essentially it is a private insurance fund.

I do not believe the money that will be lost by those people who are involved in pursuing their claims from 60 per cent to 57 per cent is going to be equivalent to the difficulties people will have who quit their jobs through no fault of their own. Irrespective of the changes that were made since Bill C–105, which was so unpopular it had to be changed, those people are being asked now to go to appeal. I believe it is tantamount to telling them they are guilty and have to prove themselves innocent. It is all very well to say they can appeal, but what does that mean?

In 1991, 191,000 UI applicants were held to have quit their jobs and were penalized. About 10 per cent or 19,000 of these decisions were reversed by various boards. As you know, we have 99 boards of appeal that include roughly 1,000 people. Canada has 450 CEC centres, but about 250 of them actually process claims. If we look at the volume of information that is involved, last year in the 29 telecentres, 8.65 million telephone calls were made on the subject of these appeals to sort out clarifications in the unemployment insurance decisions made by follow-on appeals, boards and eventually judges.

If that was worked out on the back of a cigarette package, 8.65 million telephone calls in a year at 29 centres with an average number of working days in the year, it works out to 1,300 to 1,500 calls a day. This bill tells people: "Do not worry, you are going to be guilty". In other words, it is assumed you have quit for reasons that would penalize you. If you think you have a case, come back and see us with the 1,900 other appellants, the 1,500 phone calls a day and the 250 centres across Canada.

My confidence in that is not very strong and I will tell you why. I just recently learned of a case. Reference was made to it today by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, but not in the context I am going to report to the House. It will give some indication of the confusion and difficulty one has in actually appealing a case. This case does not even relate to an appeal. I am not going to use names because I think there will be less of a bias.

I am reporting information that was given to me on March 18. It involved a lady in one part of Canada. She was planning to quit a job she had for almost 15 years to join her fiancé who was posted to another part of Canada. She had to resign because she was obviously moving to another place. Before she made this decision she contacted the UI office in her area and asked if she could collect benefits if she were to quit her job and follow her fiancé. After looking at the circumstances involved, the answer from the office was yes.

She made the move and later expected to receive her benefits. After some inquiries she received two letters on the same day at her new address from the Unemployment Insurance Commission. One said she was entitled to the claim she had filed. The other letter from the same office said she had been disqualified from receiving benefits for seven weeks because she had quit her job voluntarily without just cause. This letter said her benefit rate would also be reduced. The point I am making here is that one letter recognized the relationship she was having with her fiancé as a common-law relationship. The other did not because it was reckoned they had not been living together full time for a year. The letters were from the same office, dated the same day and more remarkably were from the same person.

• (1515)

How in the name of Heaven can we expect a member of Parliament, who has been invited to participate in this process by the latest circulars being passed out to employees and the public, to get a handle on a system of flexibility and judgment that allows one person to give two completely opposite answers to the same person in one day? It is bad enough to give one answer with identical circumstances to two different people. It does not excuse the poor judgment made there. But to actually send it to the same person and presumably not know it was going to the same person indicates the kind of system we are being asked to cope with if we pass this legislation.

There is a great belief that those people who quit their jobs go away and never look for work and are a total drain on the work force of Canada. The facts do not support that.

An analysis of the unemployment figures done in 1986 showed that half of all job quitters went to another job immediately. I believe the premise that is inherent in this bill has been the basis of all the vindictive discussion that is going on. The reason the government is having a lot of trouble with this bill, even in its own party, is because it has not really done its homework. Also, it is trying to save money and cut the deficit by nickel and diming and hitting those people who can least afford it.

I believe that is probably one of the most despicable things this government has done in the eight and a half years it has been in power. I for one, and I believe I am speaking for my party, will not be voting to support these measures.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a few comments before I launch into my main burden about the comments made by my predecessor. Although I agree essentially with his remarks, I think he has been misled into believing this is an attempt to save money. When he says nickels and dimes, that is part of the trap the government is trying to create.

This bill really has more to do with the harmonization required under the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the North American free trade agreement with Mexico. I will take my friend through this step by step so he will recognize how insidious this bill is. Not only is it an attack on the unemployed, it is a capitulation to the loss of sovereignty of the nation of Canada to determine its own policies because of the signing of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

I know when I am through there will be one Liberal in this House who will stand with me when we fight the NAFTA deal and demand the abrogation of the free trade agreement. It is regrettable that the Liberal Party has abandoned its position on this issue and its trade critic has accepted NAFTA with some fancy petticoats, but it is essentially the same agreement, an extension of loss of sovereignty. When I am through speaking I know that good member will support me as the lone Liberal in this House against this particular bill.

Mr. Speaker, I know it comes to your edification that this is the second step in destroying the unemployment insurance program as we have known it in this country since we signed the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

The United States signatories to the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement have insisted all along that our unemployment insurance benefits are far too beneficial to the recipients compared to the Americans.

• (1520)

The first assault on the Canadian unemployment insurance program, in terms of harmonization and a level playing field, was the de Grandpré report, which was tabled in this House as promised by this government to make sure that workers would allegedly be protected from the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement fall-out.

Almost every major recommendation of the government's own de Grandpré report was ignored. It went in the opposite direction. The first thing it did three years ago was to slash the amount of weeks that a beneficiary could receive the insurance that he or she bought.

It was the first step on the road to harmonization. This unemployment insurance bill that we are dealing with now is the second chapter delivered from Washington, D.C., through the Tory government.

This is harmonization number two, and if the government keeps it up it will sell it as a video tape. It could call it "Terminator One of UIC" and now "Terminator Two of UIC". It is all written in the United States of America in Washington, D.C.

Does anyone think this government is standing up and fighting for Canadian working men and women? Mr. Speaker, I know that you cannot say because you are in the chair, but if you could speak I know you would agree with what I am saying and say that this government is heading on a sinful path.

I would further say that this government had lied to the Canadian people, but accusing the government of lying is out of order and the last thing I would do is break the rules of this House by accusing the government of lying.

Maybe some of its candidates did, and that is what bothers me. The impression was left with the Canadian people that the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement would be a harmonization that would bring American standards up to Canadian, and then NAFTA would be a harmonization bringing Mexican standards up to Canadian. Nothing could be further from truth. Every single step is a cutback and a cut down to the American standards and ultimately to Mexican standards.

Some wag suggested that the Minister of Finance would end up, as a result of the NAFTA agreement and this kind of legislation, no longer selling used cars but used tacos. That is the kind of harmonization we are moving toward. Everything that is the lowest common denominator in these agreements between Canada, the United States and Mexico is the direction in which we are going.

Who is standing up and fighting for the unemployed in this country? Not the government, not the Liberal opposition. It is regrettable that both the government and the Liberal opposition have been captivated by this same course of cutting the services in this country to meet the new global economy as defined by the United States.

This bill written in Washington, D.C. and sent up, I hope with adequate postage, to this government is an example of the kind of harmonization that is destroying the social fabric of the Canadian work place.

Why would a government move in this direction at this time unless harmonization was the goal? What the government does not talk about is the growing banking system for the poor. One of the fastest growing banking systems for the poor are the food banks. We now have more food banks in this country than we have McDonald's restaurants. Two million people a week are lining up at food banks in this country. That is a record of the Tory government, the free trade agreement and harmonization.

There are 1.5 million people unemployed and the number is rising. Instead of giving people an option to have more time to find ways of finding a job the government is cutting back on access to unemployment insurance and on the payments themselves.

• (1525)

It seems obvious that this government has abandoned its responsibility to Canadians, except for Canadian industries that are a pale reflection of the corporate agenda dictated by the United States and the international capital community.

It does not like to hear these words any more. It believes that the new global economy demands that we cut the guts out of everything we have fought for in this country on behalf of working men and working women. It is urging workers to be more productive with less wages. It is urging men and women to not dare to give up their jobs, even if they are harassed or the working conditions are subhuman, because they will be punished under this bill if they do so.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, two minutes. I thought for a moment that you were giving me a salutary greeting but I understand it was just the two-minute signal. Nonetheless, I appreciate your friendliness.

It is unbelievable that this House is not jam-packed for every second of this debate because this debate is at the crux of the social fabric of which this nation is built and which is being abandoned by the Conservative government at the behest of its erstwhile partners in the American business community who are dictating the policy for the Canadian nation.

This bill is an example, quietly and relentlessly pushing its way through this House, of how the Tories have capitulated to outside capital interests to destroy a competitive edge we had in terms of Canadian working men and women.

What is furthermore regrettable is that while image is being pursued by the mass media around the Tory leadership candidates, not one of them has been asked whether or not he or she will vote against this bill to show that they are different than the present Prime Minister of this country.

They can change a man's suit or a woman's hair-do but that does not change that person's policy. It does not matter a fig who is leading that party over there because they support this kind of legislation which hurts Canadian working men and women.

My dear friend across is mumbling but I do not interpret those mumbles other than as a subdued confession that he, too, will abandon the possibility of running for office simply out of shame at what this bill is doing.

I know that my time is up in this debate, but I want to warn the government that I will be relentless in my pursuit of the fact that none of the leadership candidates of the Conservative Party has taken any position other than to support this destruction of unemployment insurance as we know it. Let every woman and man in this country know exactly what the government is doing.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not always agree with the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, but after listening to the latter part of his remarks I do support what he has to say. I find it amazing, and I said this yesterday in the House, that we are almost one month into the Conservative leadership campaign and with the exception of the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore there has not been another member in the Conservative Party who has been advancing debate or promoting ideas in terms of what he or she stands for.

I agree with the New Democratic Party member. I guess we are going to get the real test in about three or four months but when we are knocking on doors in mid-July or late August, whenever the government decides to call the election, we can be sure that the people of Canada are not going to forget about the GST, the devolution of powers that this Conservative government has orchestrated over the last 10 years, or the dismantling of national institutions.

When this piece of legislation came forward I was trying to figure out where it was coming from.

• (1530)

When I returned to my constituency office, about one week or so after the first session that we had on this bill and after parts of it were introduced during the economic statement, the people that supported this bill in my community were the people who seemed to be doing okay in terms of their own jobs. For starters, I must say there were very few. They would say: "The government is really doing a good job of cleaning up the abuse".

I reflected for a while and I said that now we know the genesis of where this bill is coming from. This bill was designed to try to send a signal to Canadians that in the name of efficiency the government was going to clean up the Unemployment Insurance Act.

It is a cruel piece of legislation when we have an economy in which 1.6 million people are on the unemployment insurance rolls. The latest Statistics Canada numbers show us that 2.2 million people are on the welfare rolls in this country. This piece of legislation does nothing for the people who are out of work.

It does absolutely nothing for the dignity of people who are in tenuous situations in companies. We have already discussed at length the situations that can exist in companies in terms of harassment being a cause for someone to want to leave, and we have discussed how they are not protected under this bill as clearly as they should be.

This bill was packaged, created and put here to appeal to the right wing in this country. Everything now is done in the name of deficit and debt reduction. Those who are most disadvantaged in our community seem to be on the short end of the stick.

The government has missed the whole point of why it is here. Governments are not here for the advantaged. It is not here just to develop policy for the advantaged. Governments exist to design and develop policy for those in our community who are disadvantaged. When a bill like this comes through the House it violates the whole first premise of why we are in government. It does not meet the test of looking after those who are disadvantaged.

I stand here today in total opposition to this bill. We in the Liberal Party are not against cleaning up any abuse in the system. We do not tolerate people who are trying to take advantage of the system.

There are ways of ferreting out those who take advantage of the system. Instead of spending all of this time trying to focus on the abuse factor, which the government has said costs somewhere in the neighbourhood of $200 million out of the close to $35 billion that was paid out last year in unemployment insurance and welfare, and taking all this time to restructure the Unemployment Insurance Act so dramatically in the name of that $200 million, this government should be creating hope and designing policies that will spark or ignite small business people in this country so that they can put people back to work.

With the exception of the Small Businesses Loans Act, this government has done very little to stimulate the entrepreneurial spirit in this country, and that is where our greatest hope for new job creation lies.

• (1535)

When I go door to door in my riding people tell me the number one priority of any government in this country right now is to put people back to work. This particular bill in no way, shape or form does anything to meet that objective.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House this afternoon to speak to Bill C–113, because according to me and according to my colleague, although this bill is apparently supposed to improve the present situation, if we consider the polls in Quebec and elsewhere, it is clear most people are against this kind of reform, because they do not perceive it as such. Now there are polls and polls. The Tories opposite say that the political polls confirm their popularity, but I am talking about the popularity of this particular bill.

Let me explain. What strikes me most about this bill is that it is a denial of the basic rights of the consumer, or the policyholder if you prefer. It has often been said that Bill C-113 is basically an insurance contract between employer and employee.

However, I remember that when I was president of the Automobile Protection Association I had to intervene in litigation between insurance companies and policyholders. I can tell you that if this was an insurance contract and I had to advise a consumer, I would tell him never to sign a contract that contains so many denials of basic rights.

I will give you a few examples to show that the so-called improvements in Bill C-113 are likely to make the situation worse and take away basic rights we already have and which are unique.

For instance, in criminal law we can compare this with the rights of a policyholder. It is up to the system to prove the guilt of the accused. This means that the accused is innocent until proven guilty. But as you and I understand Bill C-113, that is not what happens. Under the present unemployment insurance system it is up to the claimant to prove the validity of his claim, and he will receive no money until he has done so.

In criminal law, when there is a doubt the accused is always innocent until proven guilty. In the case of unemployment insurance, the claimant is guilty until he can prove otherwise.

Imagine the case of someone in need of money and acting in good faith when he or she asks the government for help. Now we have a problem, because the government wants to investigate. The investigation may take a week, a month, two months, three months, and during that time, you do not have a cent and your insurance contract—let us call it that—is not paid up. You will get no compensation until the investigators—who are paid for what they do, so they are in no hurry—have finished their work.

This is a pretty serious problem, because the government theoretically—, and I say theoretically, because I can hardly believe the government is all bad and it must have wanted to do the right thing but the difference between theory and practice is staggering.

• (1540)

I remember when people filed claims with their car insurance companies, for example, and that is not as critical as unemployment insurance, but car insurance claims were usually paid in two or three weeks. Most insurance companies pay as soon as they receive the claim. When the government says that payment is made very quickly, in a week or two, I do not agree. We have figures showing that it takes months and months and in that time people are stressed. Most people who have to wait are in a real fix.

I would like to give you another example from the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CSN) in Quebec. The CSN has a striking example: someone works all his life for the same employer, quits his job and then works somewhere else for 15 weeks. That person would be refused benefits if the requirement to work 16 weeks applies. With Bill C-113, the bill before us today, all insurable weeks from the first job would no longer count for anything, even if premiums were collected during those weeks.

Mr. Speaker, if you were a steelworker and had worked for 20 years and decided to change jobs, but had only worked 13 weeks at the new job, you would not be eligible for unemployment insurance. That is not right, even if the Conservatives opposite find it funny. It is not funny. Knowingly putting people in a tight situation is not at all funny. It is shameful.

Instead of criticizing the government all the time, today I would like to give some help to people who want their claims to be processed with some speed and efficiency. I would like to give those who need unemployment insurance some examples or suggestions to have their claims processed better. This comes from a publication by employees of various unemployment insurance centres.

First, they say you must arrive early. If you want good service arrive around 8.45 a.m. and you will probably have better service.

Second, if you want to begin a job retraining course, because you want to change your line of work and do something else, it is best not to apply in January or September because they are really loaded with claims from people in those months. In months other than January and September you have a better chance of obtaining a retraining course. Also, something very important, if you are already receiving UI benefits, you have a better chance of getting one of these courses.

Third, apply very promptly. As soon as you know you will be let go or no longer work for the same company, you should apply right away because your two-week waiting period starts from the time of your application, not the time you lose your job. So apply right away and you will wait at most two weeks.

If you need a cheque because you are really in a bind and do not know what to do you can still ask the government to issue you a cheque right away. They have a 24-hour service and if your claim takes too long and you have bills to pay, ask for a cheque right away.

Finally, and this is very important, if you have problems with unemployment insurance, contact your member of Parliament. Conservative, Liberal or New Democrat, we are able to help you because things do go a little faster and more efficiently when a member of Parliament is involved. Also, you can always appeal. Apparently, about 25 per cent of people win their appeals against the government, so you have one chance in four of winning your claim if you are not satisfied with the decision of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

• (1545)

Finally, keep a record of everyone you spoke to, because not only politicians forget. UI officials can often forget who you are and what you asked for.

With these suggestions, even if Bill C-113 as now proposed puts you in a bad spot, perhaps in your case you can improve your situation. But one thing is sure. With this Bill C-113 there is no chance of improving your situation.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on Bill C-113, I would like to follow up on what the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood was saying about the government's role.

The government's role in a society that considers itself civilized is to counteract the often cruel forces of a completely free market system, to recognize that from time to time people suffer from changes in the economy, people are hurt by the decisions of others, and to assure them that society and the community are ready to support and help them make the necessary adjustments with a view to resuming a normal life as soon as possible, so they can earn a salary and have enough money to feed their family and pay their mortgage.

[English]

When a government forgets that its role is to find a balance in society to assure that forces beyond their control do not destroy individuals or families, when it forgets its obligation to support through a period of difficulty those who have been hurt by its decisions and the decisions of others, then we truly start to have a society that is less civilized. That is really what this bill is all about.

This bill is about a government forgetting that economic forces are at work in the world hurting people badly and forcing them out of employment. I have to repeat the figures. We now have over five million Canadians, one-fifth of our population, without jobs and subsisting on either unemployment insurance or welfare. That really is a national disgrace.

This legislation tells us the system that many of these people have contributed to for all their working lives, the unemployment insurance system, will no longer be there to help them.

I will go back to the case that to me is the most indicative of what this bill is all about. It is based on the assumption that people who are not working do not want to work. It is not because there are not enough jobs or their skills may no longer be needed by their employers. It is not because the conditions of work may have become so harsh that they have become intolerable or so unsafe that they have become unhealthy or so cruel that they have become personally unbearable, which are some of the reasons people leave their jobs. I do want to talk a bit about what has become the beacon for what is wrong with this bill. That is the case of a person, usually a woman, who leaves her job because of harassment.

• (1550)

We have a very bureaucratic system and it says to this woman that she still qualifies for unemployment insurance, but only if she made sure that before she left her job that she told the harasser that she did not like what he was doing and only if she made sure that if she had a supervisor she reported it to her supervisor, and only if she did all of those bureaucratic things.

Let me tell the House about some of the women I know who find and have found themselves in that kind of a situation. They are not going to be helped at all by the assurances of the minister and the voices on the government side of this House saying that it does not really include them, because it does.

I will explain what happens. There are many women who have gone through a period of supporting their families, often on their own, often living on welfare after the break-up of a marriage. They start working themselves out of that situation, go through a period of re-education and retraining and get back into the work force. What they are mostly lacking is confidence. It takes them a while to get back into the work force and build up their confidence.

They are often working in small places where there is not a union, there is not a system that tells them that they do not have to put up with harassment. They are being harassed.

Now, if people have just started a new job and have not been in the work force for ten years they have lost a lot of their confidence. They are not going to turn around to the person who is harassing them, to their boss, and confront them on it. They are simply not going to do that. They are just going to feel humiliated, belittled, and demeaned, and they are going to walk off the job. Then they are not going to qualify for unemployment insurance.

Most women who find themselves in that position will not have read the Canadian Human Rights Act. They will not know the rules they have to follow until afterwards, when it is too late. Other people who find themselves working in unhealthy and unsafe conditions, who are required sometimes to handle dangerous chemicals or work in an environment in which their health is threatened, are not necessarily going to know what bureaucratic steps they have to take to satisfy some person in the Department of Employment and Immigration that they really had no choice but to quit that job.

They are going to leave, and so they should because no worker in this country should have to put up with working in unsafe conditions.

That is what is wrong with this bill. It does not recognize unemployment insurance as a system that people have contributed to throughout their working lives and from which they are entitled to draw when they need it.

It is an attitude that says: Punish people if they are not prepared to work under any conditions, for any wage, for any employer.

My colleague mentioned that a booklet has been prepared by the people who work for Employment and Immigration Canada. These are the people on the front lines who deal with desperate men who have lost their job and do not have the money to feed their children or pay the rent, who suddenly run into a morass of rules and regulations that says that they are not going to have any money for weeks and weeks and weeks and how they get along is none of the bureaucracy's concern.

The people who work day to day and hear the stories of the women who are out of a job, cannot get training, and even in our own government are told that they must have a grade 12 education or they cannot have the minimum unskilled job in the Government of Canada, have now been told they cannot distribute these helpful hints to their clients.

This is typical of the other section of the bill, which has been less debated. It says to all Public Service employees, whether they are earning $18,000 or $160,000, that there is no increase for them next year.

We are not going to solve the problems of this country by confronting, blaming, or victimizing other Canadians. We are going to solve the problems of this country by working together, and that includes working with our employees, sitting down and asking them to give us their ideas on how the Government of Canada can operate more efficiently and how we can better serve their clients.

• (1555)

What does this government do? It says that they are to blame. The entire federal Public Service costs us 5.6 per cent of the national budget, but on their backs we are going to solve all the economic woes of the country. We are not going to let them be helpful to their clients. This kind of measure, looking after those who are doing well and punishing those who are having a hard time, is not the way to solve the problems of the country. This bill is typical of that approach and that is why I am against it and that is why we are against it on this side of the House.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, one of the main issues in this matter before us is the question of whether somebody who is forced out of unemployment insurance will have a fair hearing.

The question has to be judged by a number of activities before these quasi-judicial appeal procedures that go on within the federal government. The issue has been largely addressing one aspect of this bill, and it is far broader than the single issue of fairness. The previous speaker talked about the individual who is harassed on the job, quits, and does not qualify for unemployment insurance and then goes through an appeal process. Will that person who quits justifiably and goes before that appeal board be reinstated or provided with unemployment insurance?

The issue is whether people can obtain a fair hearing. The opposition says that on the balance of probabilities they will not because it is rigged. The government on the other side, and it is the same thing with the minister, day after day stands up and says that they will and the process is fair so let it continue.

I would just like to read into the record the report of the standing committee for regulatory scrutiny. The ninth report of that committee on May 5, 1988 discussed the process of fair procedure before the committee. It talked about these appeal boards, including the unemployment insurance appeal board. The report said: "For the reasons which follow, your committee has concluded that these regulations lack the necessary procedural safeguards to ensure that the appeal process is consistent with basic requirements for fairness and equity".

Further along in the report it said: "The committee has, on numerous occasions, requested the Public Service Commission to remedy this situation by adopting additional regulations so as to better define the rights and duties of parties taken to appeal under legislation and under government appeal boards". The committee was co-chaired by two people, one from the other place and one from here.

The question is whether people could obtain a fair hearing before a committee. I would like to just read another item into the record. It involves a case heard before the Supreme Court of Canada, court file No. 20882 in which Leila LeCorps-Tremblay was trying to deal with the appeal board of the Public Service Commission. It uses examples in this document, in the reasons for the leave to appeal. It states that:

> The Federal Court of Appeal erred in failing to find that the applicant had denied to her a right to a fair trial in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice before an impartial tribunal as a result of the Public Service Commission Appeal Board's decisions to:
> (i) proceed in the unavoidable absence of the applicant from the hearing and overrule unjustifiably the expert advice on which her absence was based;
>
> (ii) interfere with or permit the interference with the applicant's ability to communicate with and instruct her counsel and advisors;
>
> (iii) decline motions to grant an adjournment so that the applicant could adequately examine her personnel file in the department and could receive, study and confer about copies of documents necessary for reasonable disclosure of the accusations against her and disclosure of the evidence on which such accusation was based;
>
> (iv) instruct the applicant not to make any written record of the appeal board proceedings.

• (1600)

The notice of leave to appeal goes on to criticize the appeal board for:

> (i) expunging from the record documentary evidence submitted by the applicant and refusing to accept documents properly introduced into the record and to assign exhibit numbers to them;
>
> (ii) failing to conduct the proceedings in an official language comprehensible to counsel for the applicant after receiving prior written notice from the applicant of her choice of language, without reasonable cause or justification;
>
> (iii) unreasonably denying the applicant recesses and adjournments without apparent cause or justification;
>
> (iv) repeatedly interrupting the applicant in her testimony and submissions;
>
> (v) refusing the applicant permission to tape record the proceedings;
>
> (vi) permitting the respondent department access to an electronic recording of the proceedings while denying the applicant such rights;
>
> (vii) refusing to exclude witnesses in order to ensure the independence of testimony;
>
> (viii) refusing to grant the applicant's requests for scheduling of witnesses while granting similar scheduling requests to the respondent department.

It goes on and on.

The interesting thing about this is the response by the Department of Justice to this listing of reasons for leave to appeal. It never addressed any of these procedural abnormalities or denials of fair treatment. Unfortunately we have a situation in which these appeal boards do not have a fair and due process.

The argument in this House, which has gone on and on and on, about Bill C-113 is that by the time these people go to appeal where errors have been made or problems have happened, such as the case of harassment or quitting with just cause, they are in a situation in which the government has argued there will be a fair process in front of the appeal boards.

This is an argument that with government appointees on that appeal board it will wind up not giving due process. It is a serious example in which natural justice is compromised in the allegations here, and it is never answered.

At this stage of the game all that can happen is the hope that in the other place there will be substantial hearings on this bill and that closure today will be rectified. It is unfortunate that the elected representatives of Canadians again face closure in this House, that they are unable to examine in careful detail this odious piece of legislation, particularly when even a committee of this House has recommended improvements in the regulations for due process before these committees, which have been continuously denied.

Our only hope lies with the place next door. It is ironic that we as members of the House of Commons wind up appealing to the other place, as odious as it is, to hold decent and fair hearings on this matter.

Hopefully, when it calls those hearings and looks in detail at the committee report, rather than just rubber stamping it, the committee will call witnesses before it such as Leila LeCorps-Tremblay, Nancy Jennings, Rachel LaBelle, Michael Cassidy, Jack Miller, and Val Bourgeois. The last person is an individual who went before a House of Commons committee. At the end of his testimony the Tories decided at that committee that freedom of speech does not apply and expunged his entire testimony from the record and then let another individual put virtually the same testimony on the record.

Hopefully, in the other place when its committee's hearings are held freedom of speech will be available and Val Bourgeois will be able to speak freely. Lauren Hopkins is another witness it may want to hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to remind the hon. member and this House, regarding the testimony of Mr. Val Bourgeois, that the issue was raised in this House and brought to the attention of the Chair. The Chair did recognize that the committee had every right to make the decision it made.

[English]

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, a majority government is justified in doing virtually anything, including suppressing freedom of speech. My concern is that we can no longer assure that there is freedom of speech. The hope is that in the other place when it decides to hold committee hearings on this matter it will look at a broad range of witnesses who have had some experience with these government appeal boards and the lack of due process.

I hope that it will take the example of the ninth report of the standing committee on regulations and examine its recommendations for implementing due process, so that when people go before these boards, in particular the unemployment insurance board, they will be guaranteed a fair hearing with due process.

• (1605)

Those are the remarks I would like to make. I hope that they will have the opportunity to be considered since the government, with closure, has imposed its kind of free speech.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure how many times I have risen to speak under government closure. The government is applying a time limit on debate in order to limit the remarks of various members of this House who are speaking on behalf of the constituents they represent.

Bill C-113 was brought in by the government on February 17, 1993. It will reduce the unemployment insurance benefits from 60 per cent to 57 per cent of insurable earnings as of April 4, 1993. People who voluntarily leave their jobs without just cause, or lose their jobs through personal misconduct, will no longer receive unemployment benefits.

A board of referees is to be given clear powers to protect the privacy of victims of sexual or other harassment, if they come forward and make an issue of it. But I believe this is going too far for women in the work place who simply cannot condone the harassment they sometimes go through and choose to quit their jobs in order to escape.

Workers who leave their jobs through voluntary severance and downsizing will be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

Across Canada we have 1.5 million people unemployed, according to the unemployment insurance statistics. We have an unemployment rate of 10.8 per cent. In Ontario the unemployment rate is 10 per cent or 532,000 people. In my own constituency, on the Lambton county side, there are 921 persons on unemployment insurance. However there are 2,428 people listed as being employable whose benefits have run out, for a total number of people who are unemployed of 3,349. On the Middlesex side of the constituency the total is 910 people.

We have five million Canadians now looking for work, 1.5 million listed in unemployment insurance figures. In addition we have 3.5 million employable people looking for work whose unemployment insurance benefits have run out.

In one town pf 10,000 people in my constituency, three major lay-offs, due to the free trade agreement, have resulted in the loss of 465 jobs. The government's response was to reduce the staff at the unemployment insurance office in that town from two persons to one person and the office is open five hours a day. That is clearly unacceptable.

As I meet with the people, with those workers who lost their jobs through these plant closings due to the free trade agreement, I am becoming very angry with the way these workers are being treated. These people have paid into unemployment insurance for years. In fact, one man who was in my office last week had been at one of these plants for 27 years and contributing to unemployment insurance and now must be available for work if the opportunity opens up.

He has never once been unemployed in those 27 years, never once collected unemployment insurance, and now he is taking counselling and would like to be retained but it appears as if he has fallen through the cracks in the system. He is becoming very frustrated and upset, to say the very least. Like others in this town who have lost their jobs through plant closings as a result of the free trade agreement and whose insurance benefits have run out they have had to resort to social assistance. That is placing an increasing burden on the municipalities, the counties and the province. These people deserve better.

I suggest this latest move by the government is to try to bring the Canadian system into line with that of the U.S., as in other cases to harmonize our system with theirs.

The officials from the Canada Employment and Immigration Centres have been instructed to give the claimants the benefit of the doubt in establishing just cause when they walk away from their jobs whether it is through sexual harassment or other reasons. Perhaps for health reasons they have to walk away or perhaps it is because of allergies they may have to chemicals or other products they are working with.

It goes on to say that the Canada Employment and Immigration Centres will receive special training including legislative knowledge training, adjudication principles and practices, technical and automation input training, and awareness training dealing with sexual harassment, discrimination, child care problems and unsafe working conditions.

This is of little consequence when only one person is staffing the office and it is open only five hours a day.

The unemployment insurance program is the federal government's single largest expenditure at $22.5 billion forecast for 1993. Much of this, as I indicated earlier, is through the job losses and plant closings in this country since 1989.

More money is spent in the unemployment insurance program than on national defence, old age security, or the total administration of the federal government.

Before 1990 the federal government's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund was approximately 20 per cent. But in 1990 the government decided that general revenues could no longer contribute to the unemployment insurance fund.

We warned at that time what was going to happen. Since that time the fund which had been financed by unemployment insurance premiums, which are paid for by the employees and employers, has run up a deficit of $4.7 billion. It is estimated it is going to increase to much higher than that by the end of the year.

The government expects that cutting the benefit rate from 60 per cent to 57 per cent and eliminating UI benefits for voluntary leavers and those who were fired from jobs will save a total of $2.45 billion over two years. Nonetheless, even with these cuts the deficit in the UI fund is expected to rise to $7.6 billion by the end of 1993.

It is clear therefore that the effect of the changes in Bill C-113 will be negligible. If the government's purpose in introducing these changes was to control spending, as stated in the December 2 economic statement, it can be said that the government has failed.

How many people are abusing the unemployment insurance system? It is estimated that the figure is less than 1 per cent of people who are taking advantage of the system. We know that in the past quite often construction workers would work over the summer months, the spring months the fall months and be laid off in the winter because of the harsh climate which makes construction impossible. They are referred to by the government as cheaters. I take exception to that description because it is impossible for people who work in construction to pour concrete and that sort of thing in the winter months to find work all year round. These are not cheaters. These are people whose profession dictates that they have to work during the seasonal months of the year.

This is a very harsh bill. It is another chip out of the social programs we have built up over the years. Less than 1 per cent of these people are taking advantage of the system but here we have a government cutting the benefits at a time when we have factory closings creating unemployment at rates we have never seen for years and years in this country.

The Canadian people and the workers deserve better. The Government of Canada has to accept the responsibility and ensure we make jobs even more secure than they are at the present time by taking a hard look at what the unemployment rate is going to be from the fall-out of the North American free trade agreement.

• (1615)

We know what the wage rates are down there. Make them come up to our standards. Make them bring up their social programs to our programs then we will compete, but do not take away the social benefits in this country that have been built up over so many years. They are among the best in the world.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my first remark is to correct some questionable things which may have been inadvertently said by the opposition.

The previous speaker mentioned harmonizing the system. For example, I have heard it said we are harmonizing the system with that of the United States because of the free trade agreement. That is just not fact. It is just not fact at all because in the United States it is necessary to have 20 weeks of employment so that a claimant can draw 50 per cent of the wages for a duration of six months.

We are quite different. We have 10 to 20 weeks, 60 per cent of the wages and the unemployed will be able to draw it over a period of 12 months.

Let us look at some of the other countries in the OECD. We do not have any agreement with Germany, for example, but it requires 52 weeks employment over a three-year period to draw 63 per cent over 12 months.

Mr. Fisher: What is the unemployment rate in Germany?

Mr. Shields: In Italy 26 weeks over two years to be able to draw 15 per cent—

I find it very difficult. I sat and listened to the speeches from the other side. I am sorry that the member from across the way does not understand. He does not like to hear anything that would disagree with what he thinks.

For example, in Italy an employee must work 26 weeks over two years, to be able to draw 15 per cent of the wage for six months. That is 15 per cent of his salary.

Then we go to Japan. In one year they have to work 26 weeks and can draw 48 per cent of their salary. We do not have an agreement with these people.

In Great Britain, they have to have worked for one year and they can get 16 per cent of their salary for 12 months. That is 16 per cent of their salary for 12 months.

Let us look at some of the facts and some of the problems that we have. A total of $19.3 billion was paid out in UI benefits in 1992, including $15.4 billion in regular benefits, $1.77 billion in special benefits, that is for sickness, maternity, parental and adoption, $1.84 billion in developmental uses and I am speaking about training, work sharing, job creation, self-employment assistance and that sort of thing and $296 million went to the fishermen's and fisherwomen's benefits.

Let us look at some other figures. Unemployment payments have been rising. In 1990 there was a surplus of $2.2 billion in the UI account. Now the account has a deficit of $4.7 billion. Even with changes the total UI account deficit is expected to rise sharply and to reach $7.6 billion by the end of 1993.

We have to slow the rate of growth in the expenditures. We have to curb the UI abuse and there is abuse, contrary to what my friends across the way say. We have to try to get the Canadians who want to work back to work as quickly as possible.

The UI program is an insurance program originally designed to provide temporary income support for men and women who through no fault of their own lose their jobs.

• (1620)

Only those who choose to be unemployed will lose benefits. People who voluntarily seek unemployment will lose their benefits and, in an effort to curb the abuse, only those who agree or feel that they want to get out of the work force will lose their benefits.

We have all sorts of scenarios painted by my friends on the opposite benches. What if a woman is sexually harassed? If she is sexually harassed and quits her job, she has a reason for quitting her job. It has been arranged so that she can make her claim on sexual harassment behind closed doors, in camera, away from the employer who may be or may not be sexually harassing the individual. The government has gone miles to cover those kinds of things.

Then the government says well, if somebody has to quit because he has an allergy and cannot work in the work place, that is a valid reason for quitting. He then would be eligible for unemployment insurance.

The fallacious arguments we are hearing from the opposition benches just do not hold water when people sit down and examine the legislation.

We hear that this is a crime and that we are bringing in closure. We are not putting closure on this legislation. We have put time allocation on this legislation. We on the government benches sat and listened to the tirades from the opposition benches without putting up a speaker. We have not put up a speaker for the last couple of hours. I got up only in an attempt to clarify and to put something on the record that should be placed there.

Fairness in this whole legislation is the key. It is not fair to pay people who choose unemployment. If they choose unemployment, they should not be paid unemployment insurance.

If I have my house insured and I deliberately set it on fire and then turn around and ask the insurance company to pay for my loss, surely it would not be fair. The same applies in every insurance situation that we can think of.

It is not fair for someone to choose to be unemployed. There are people who choose to be unemployed who earn just enough points or weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance. They then choose to quit so that they can draw unemployment insurance after a certain penalty period. It is not fair to those who are paying into the system year after year.

I heard my friend from the other side say that he had a client who came into his office who had worked for 27 years. He had been paying unemployment insurance for his whole working life. He worked for this one company for 27 years and he felt really hard done by because he was not able to collect unemployment insurance after paying into it for his whole working life. I have those people come to my office also who say: Gee, I have paid into this for 30 years. I have now taken early retirement and I should be able to draw unemployment insurance.

Insurance is insurance. When you get out of the work force, whether it is through voluntary retirement, retirement or you decide to choose unemployment, surely to goodness you do not expect the unemployment insurance fund to pay.

They say what about those guys who are fired for misconduct? If someone was working for me and was paying into the unemployment insurance fund, and all of those employees who are working for me were religiously paying into it, and then through misconduct for theft or for a number of other reasons is fired, surely he should not be receiving unemployment insurance. He did something in a deliberate fashion and he got fired. He chose to be unemployed by his misconduct.

• (1625)

The fallacious arguments from the opposition just do not hold water. I hope that people will look at this and read the legislation. This is not closure, it is time allocation. If we did not have time allocation these people on the opposite benches would be standing up day after day going through the same fallacious arguments that they are going through now. We have heard them ever since the legislation was introduced into the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite has just said this was not closure.

[English]

That is about the same as telling us they did not use the meat axe, they just used the broad axe. That is much better and Canadians should be relieved at that. Well, they are not.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if someone was drowning, what would you throw him or her, a lifebuoy or an anchor? What this government is doing is just that, weighing down the neediest Canadians. Canadians who need a lifebuoy are being dragged down toward the bottom by the very government that caused the massive unemployment that we are faced with now in this country. The government intends to take away about $2.4 billion from unemployed Canadians.

[English]

If that was not enough, the government was planning—get a load of this—to set up a toll-free line to denounce suspected cheaters of the program. I guess the toll-free line would have gone this way: 1-800-RAT-FINK. I suppose that was the number that the government was planning.

Yes, it was true. The minister said it. The minister confessed and two days later in the House of Commons he recanted.

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Boudria: Of course he recanted. He had to recant on many things, but such is life. However, Canadians will remember this minister.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I am sure that my hon. friend would not want to deliberately mislead the House, but the facts are that this was something that was created in the bureaucracy as a suggestion to the minister that the minister never accepted and that was the 1-800 number or the RAT-FINK line as my hon. friend has indicated.

It was never the intention of this government to install a line and that member over there knows that. He knows that if we look at the record it did not come from the minister and it did not come as a policy. It came up from the civil servants through the bureaucracy.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, this is not a point of order, nor a matter of privilege. It is not even a valid point that the hon. member opposite is raising. He knows full well that it took the minister two or three days before backing down. By not saying anything at the time, the minister in fact agreed to this RAT-FINK telephone line. Meanwhile, Canadians are not getting the help—

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, as you know, loads of suggestions are regularly made to our ministers. I think it is only normal that they should take the time to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair is willing to show some tolerance, but this is a matter of opinion and, strictly speaking, it does not qualify as a point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, meanwhile, there are groups of workers in my riding who care for those who are unemployed. I am referring in particular to the Hawkesbury unemployment action center run by Mr. Guy Bélisle. My hon. colleagues know how fond I am of Hawkesbury. I mention it often in my speeches in this House.

This group was set up in January 1992 with the Fibreworld plant committee. Seventy-five workers had been laid off when the plant closed.

• (1630)

These people have assessed the workers' needs. Some have gone back to school to complete grade 12. Fifteen took a course in heating and cooling systems at the Cité collégiale, in Hawkesbury. These people have managed to find new jobs. That is the kind of thing we should be doing as a government: training people.

Mr. Hudon: That is what we are doing.

Mr. Boudria: I heard opposite, my hon. colleague from Beauharnois—Salaberry, say: "That is what we are doing".

[English]

I want to bring a case to your attention, Mr. Speaker. I have in my constituency, like all others here, small business development centres. They administer the self-employment assistance program of the government. That is a program by which unemployed workers can convert their unemployment benefits to start up a form of small business and in that way gain meaningful employment.

Let me describe what goes on. The Cornwall office of Employment Canada administers this program for Stormont, Dundas, Glengarry and Prescott counties plus the city of Cornwall. This year it got $200,000 to administer this program.

That might sound like a lot of money. Two hundred thousand dollars is a lot more than I have and a lot more than many of my constituents have, but the $200,000 does not even cover those contracts which are already signed for this year. In other words, we cannot put any new people on the program and those who are already approved might not even get the funds that were approved for them. That is how bad it is.

A constituent phoned me today. She wants to start a marketing and distribution system for goat milk in the riding. It has been approved. A complete business plan has been approved and everything. This is going to work. Everyone has agreed it is going to work. Everyone agrees this person qualifies, but the government, after having approved her for the program, said: "Well, you know the money that we said we would give you when we approved this, well, we are not going to give it to you because we do not have the money that we said we would give you". That is not a very honest way for the government to proceed. That is just one example.

A lady in Apple Hill in my riding, a constituent, phoned me this morning in desperation, trying to get this government to advance the funding under that program. Why is it not there? Why is that not what the government is talking about today in the House of Commons, all these people who are trying to find ways to get back to work using government programs that have already been announced and approved and they still cannot get them? Why?

Are we talking about putting more funds in the self-employment assistance program? I am right now, but not the government across the way. What it is concentrating on is stopping these alleged cheaters.

Government members say that those who leave their job with so-called just cause will continue to receive benefits. Any member who has ever defended an unemployment insurance case knows better and knows that by the time you can win one of these cases, and that is just winning it at the local level of Employment Canada, the case is often four or five months old. Anyone who has ever appealed one of those to the courts, to the umpire, who is a really a judge of the Federal Court, will know that it sometimes takes a year.

What point is it to tell someone a year later, possibly when they are bankrupt or have been on welfare for a long time, that the adjudication of their case a year ago was wrong. Big deal.

What about the ones involving sexual harassment and so on? They go before the Canadian Human Rights Commission. We know how much of a hurry it is in. These people take forever to even return a phone call from an MP, let alone adjudicate on one of the cases. They just do not give answers. I am sorry to speak disrespectfully of employees of a quasi-judicial body, but maybe if they were even so kind as to return phone calls every now and then I would have a bit more respect for them. In any case, when they do adjudicate, two years or two and a half years later, the discussion and the adjudication is academic.

• (1635)

I am against this bill. I urge all my colleagues to vote against this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—National defence; the hon. member for Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington—Indian affairs; the hon. member for Calgary Northeast—Revenue Canada; the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier—Language minorities.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on the report stage of Bill C-113.

I want to congratulate my colleague, the member for Timmins—Chapleau for the excellent amendments he has introduced. I want to particularly address my remarks to Motions Nos. 16, 17 and 18.

The first thing that strikes me, and it has struck a lot of people who are familiar with the way unemployment insurance works, is that a person who applies for UI has a two-week waiting period. Often it takes longer than the two-week waiting period for the agents at UI to collect all the relevant information so the decision can be made on the application. Often it will run to three or four weeks. The client does not get cards and certainly does not get any cheque from UI. The client may get a response from UI eventually as to the disposition of his or her application.

My colleague has introduced a very logical amendment to ensure that time limits are adhered to so the decision is rendered to the claimant within the two-week waiting period.

By law the employer must provide the claimant with the separation certificate. If the employer does not, it has to be reported to the commission. This can cause a considerable amount of delay because the claim cannot be set up until the separation certificate is received.

The way it works now, the client informs the commission that he or she has been unable to get the separation certificate and the commission then goes after the employer. If the employer does not provide the separation certificate, the employee is asked to bring in the pay stubs and a claim is set up based on those pay stubs. That all takes time.

With the advent of new technologies in the processing of applications and the computerization which has taken place, surely it is possible to adhere to a two-week waiting period as my colleague has suggested. If the employer does not come up with a separation certificate in two weeks, then a claim would be set up for the client based on the stubs if the claimant has them, or some verification by the client of what his or her pay was. The claim is set in motion for the claimant, and the employer is dealt with according to the law if he has not provided the separation certificate or other information that is required. I think this is a very appropriate amendment and I do not think it will create any problems on the part of the UI agents or those who process the claims. I think it is quite possible to have a two-week period within which a decision is made and rendered and the claim is processed.

It seems to me that my colleague's Motion No. 17 requires the commission to maintain statistical data. I understand that when the committee held hearings my colleague asked witnesses for statistical information about those who were disentitled without good reason. He asked what those reasons were.

He discovered that 190,000 clients were disentitled without good reason in 1991. When he asked for the statistical information with respect to the reasons Mr. Gordon McFee, who is the director of policy and legislation development, Department of Employment and Immigration, told my colleague that the precise reason for the disentitlement of these 190,000 is not coded but the fact that the claim was adjudicated negatively is. The way one comes up with the 190,000 figure might have been a simulation.

Decisions are being made on amending the Unemployment Insurance Act in Bill C-113 which are not based on information. The government is not able to determine whether the information on which it has based its proposed amendments is really appropriate because it does not have the statistical information. My colleague asked if one could assume theoretically that some of the reasons given for leaving employment may have been valid even though a negative decision was reached. He was told that was possible and there may have been negative decisions given for reasons that were totally appropriate. They may have been just, but we do not know that because we do not have the statistical information.

Mr. Max Yalden, who is the commissioner of human rights, appeared as a witness before the committee and on this question of accumulating statistical information said:

> I would suggest finally that whatever system is put in place to deal with the situations I've been describing should include some means of recording and categorizing the number and nature of voluntary quit claims, especially where harassment has been in question and how they have been disposed of, and second, the provision of some form of overseeing body, which will periodically verify those data and report on how successfully the regime is dealing with so-called just cause claimants.

Here you have two witnesses. First, the Unemployment Insurance Commission admitted it has just guestimated and it really does not keep the statistical information on the reasons for the 190,000 not just cause disentitlements. The commissioner of human rights suggested statistical information should be kept. What did the Unemployment Insurance Commission representatives say? They said it was a good idea and as of April 5, they were going to incorporate the system. It seems to me it is putting the cart before the horse. These changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act should be held in abeyance and we should develop the experience with the reasons why people quit their jobs.

• (1645)

We have to look at the reasons, not fly blind and come in with amendments. The government wants to pander and cater to what it senses is a right wing agenda out there and wants to punish these people because, after all, we are in a deep recession and unemployment is high. Two million people are unemployed in the country. The government asks: "What do we have? We have people quitting their jobs. Oh, good heavens, we have to nail them. We have to show how tough we are with them". I do not think that is the way to legislate. A sensitive government does not legislate in that fashion.

My colleague's Motion No. 18. is an amendment that would make sure that the claimant cannot be excluded from a board of referees hearing. Can we imagine anything so ludicrous as excluding a claimant from a hearing?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being 4.45 p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day and in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of report stage of the bill now before the House.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. I therefore declare Motion No. 5 lost.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you will find unanimous consent to apply the result of the vote we just took on Motion No. 4 to Motions Nos.

7, 11, 14, 16 and 17; then to apply in reverse the result of the vote on Motion No. 1 to Motions Nos. 13 and 18; and finally apply in reverse the result of the vote on Motion No. 4 to the concurrence motion.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe you will now find unanimous consent to apply the vote we just took on Motion No. 11 to Motions Nos. 14, 16 and 17; then to apply in reverse the result of the vote on Motion No. 1 to Motions Nos. 13 and 18; and to apply in reverse the result of the vote of Motion No. 4 to the concurrence motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I would like my vote to be recorded as yea on Motions Nos. 13, 14, 16 and 17, but nay on Motion No. 18.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? At the next sitting of the House, pursuant to order made earlier this day?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn thinks he was missed in the count for the last round and would like to have his vote included with the NDP caucus in the applied votes.

• (1755)

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I just want everyone in the House to realize that in Calgary today it is 20 degrees Celsius.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Mr. Boudria: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Given that it is 5.55 p.m., our colleague who has the private member's motion that we will be discussing now will only be entitled to have his motion discussed for five minutes. I would like to ask the consent of the House to call it six o'clock and permit this Private Members' Hour to be an hour, which after all was the intent behind the rules.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion by the hon. member. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak on a follow-up to a question I asked the Minister of National Defence some time ago. The question was essentially on the report of the Auditor General who looked at the difficulty he saw in the defence program management system.

This was a very serious allegation because we are looking at expenditures of really fantastic and mind-boggling proportions and major programs in the hundreds of millions of dollars. It is not every program that is $6 billion or $10 billion. It is only the major capital projects, but it is not very difficult for a project to assume the dimension of $100 million.

The point I want to make at the outset, which I believe was missed by the minister, was that I did not make these allegations. They were made by no less an authority than the Auditor General. I know some of my previous colleagues in the Department of National Defence are uncomfortable about this observation.

I simply asked the present minister and her predecessor to make a comment on this, discuss it in defence committee or make a ministerial statement to say it was not accurate and the defence department was looking at it, or it was accurate and corrections were being made. I happen to think it is not totally accurate, but the point is, the observation has been made.

We are looking at tremendous expenditures in the controversial EH-101 program. Notwithstanding its merits, this expenditure in the magnitude of $5.8 billion is being managed by a program which the Auditor General calls into question. This controversial program is under discussion practically every day in the media and in this House. The more specific observation was made that the defence program management system does not totally address the system. Using the words of the Auditor General, it is also ineffective. He went on to say that all the problems that were observed occurred in the initial stages of these major programs. If that observation is overlaid on the situation as it exists with the EH-101 program, the result is a recipe for considerable concern and consternation with respect to those people who are following the progress of these important programs.

• (1800)

I would simply like the minister to address this observed deficiency. I would invite her to make a statement in the House of Commons. It is very simple and would take less than a couple of minutes. Alternatively, she could make use of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs and appear in front of the committee to address this very disturbing and very significant observation that was made by the Auditor General who has the authority and credibility to do so.

I believe the minister should have a closer look at the question I asked, advance the answer she gave me and simply address the observation of the Auditor General. Is the defence program management system ineffective or not? If it is not, tell us why. If it is, what immediate measures are being taken to correct these deficiencies?

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer a question that the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception asked the Minister of National Defence in this House on February 2.

Since the Auditor General took a representative sample of projects in February 1991, the Department of National Defence has made important changes which directly affect this management problem. For greater efficiency, the Canadian Forces have adopted capital programs which reflect the defence policy announced in September 1991 regarding present and future military roles.

The restructuring at national defence headquarters to support this initiative led to the setting up of a team responsible for co-ordinating and monitoring the defence program management system. The streamlining of the project approval process and some needed changes should lead to greater efficiency and savings in the project management cycle.

Since the hon. member raised the issue of the EH-101 project, I would like to make the following comments. Several recommendations made by the Auditor General have already been implemented in that project. For example, no contractor was given responsibility for the whole project. Instead, this responsibility is shared by two main contractors who will work in their respective fields of competence.

One of the main contractors is from another country, while the other is Canadian. Also, procurements were made in the most sensible way by buying what we could in Canada, in the best interests of our economy.

I also want to point out that these two main contractors have the contractual obligation to provide for regional economic benefits in Canada, which will be monitored and assessed by IST Canada. If these two contractors do not meet their obligations, they will incur appropriate penalties.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, further to my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs on February 24 I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak about native hunting and fishing rights in Ontario.

The Williams treaty was signed in 1923 and is the most recent Ontario treaty with the native peoples. This treaty involves seven Indian bands in south-central Ontario and included a very substantial financial compensation to the Indian bands in the amount of $500,000 in return for their giving up any right to fish and hunt during closed seasons.

In 1993 dollars this compensation is equivalent to $20 million. The courts have ruled that due to the treaty, members of the seven bands must obey the seasons and regulations.

• (1805)

In one particular case, Mr. George Howard was charged and convicted for fishing in the closed season. He has appealed through the courts up to and including the Ontario Court of Appeal. Each time his conviction and therefore the Williams treaty has been upheld.

The Ontario government is now seeking to ignore these facts and give licences in the form of interim agreements to the seven Williams treaty bands.

The legality of the Williams treaty has been upheld by the courts yet the provincial government pushes on. The area which will be affected includes approximately 1.5 million Ontario residents and cuts a huge swath through the heart of Ontario's tourism and recreational industry.

To arbitrarily tear up this treaty would not only do serious harm to these industries, but also damage the lasting good relations between Ontario's native peoples and non-natives, perhaps to the point where public safety could be threatened. Conservation in Ontario would also be put into peril by such actions.

Ontario Ministry of Natural Resources biologists have recently urged for a shorter wall-eye season, not an open season and that is taking into account the fact that the current closed season and sanctuaries apply today to both natives and non-natives. To totally open up the season which is closed year-round to fishing for natives simply does not make sense.

A recent report has indicated that the majority of Canadians favour native self-government. However, achieving this by tearing up existing treaties without consultation with all interested stakeholders will only create discord and bitterness where bridges and understanding are needed.

I am not questioning the ideal of native self-government. Surely the $5 billion to $6 billion spent by the federal Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development can be more efficiently directed by native Canadians themselves in a similar manner as municipal government does under the provincial division of powers in the Constitution, only under federal jurisdiction.

The process however is presenting problems. Whether it be a question of native hunting and fishing rights, a question of land claims, as is the case with the Algonquins of Golden Lake claiming a large portion of eastern Ontario, or the efforts of the Canadian Parks and Wilderness Society to designate the Madawaska highlands region in my riding as an endangered spaces area, special privileges for any one group are not acceptable to my constituents in Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington. Native self-government should be clearly defined and must not ignore existing treaties and laws.

Only by way of thorough consultation and understanding can an acceptable solution be found and the rights of all concerned be respected.

I caution the Government of Ontario and the federal government of the dangerous emergence of nationalism. In the former Yugoslavia, in the former Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia, as well as in Canada, there is an increasing tendency for historic tribal or nationalistic groupings to want special status.

We all know Canada is a very difficult country to govern due to its size and the diversity of its people. Over the past decade, the constitutional debate has highlighted the difficulties which exist in a bilingual nation and with the status of First Nations within Canadian boundaries, to say nothing about racial and ethnic groups increasingly promoting their nationalism.

The last thing we want in—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry. The rules are tough, but rules are rules.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member I would like to explain first how the jurisdiction of our fisheries is shared between the federal government and the province of Ontario.

Section 91(12) of the Constitution Act of 1867 gives the federal government the responsibility for the sea coast and inland fisheries.

In non-tidal waters, the provinces have partial jurisdiction over fisheries that arises from provincial ownership of the water-bed or where the water-bed is privately owned, from their jurisdiction, as a result of section 92(13) of the Constitution Act of 1867 over property and civil rights.

As part of their jurisdiction the provinces allocate the fishery in non-tidal waters after conservation needs have been met. Moreover, nearly 100 years ago the federal government delegated administrative management responsibility to the Government of Ontario. I want to emphasize this point very clearly. The province of Ontario like other inland provinces is the manager of those fisheries within its boundaries.

The province wants to amend the Ontario fishery regulations so Ontario could issue aboriginal community fishing licences under the Ontario Game and Fish Act to the Williams treaty bands to fish for food and social and ceremonial purposes. Proposed changes to the Ontario fishery regulations, which are passed pursuant to the Fisheries Act, must be processed by the federal government.

Provinces proposing regulations should consult with parties likely to be affected by the regulation so that their concerns can be considered. I do not think it wise or appropriate for the federal government to re-enter the field of regulating Ontario's fisheries either in part or in whole. I do not think Ontario anglers need a second level of bureaucracy imposed on them.

• (1810)

It is the minister's intention to honour the long-standing agreements authorizing Ontario to exercise management responsibilities in this area. Consequently should Ontario submit a final version of the proposed regulation the federal government will process it in the usual manner.

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, on March 18 I raised a question with the Minister of National Revenue regarding his reported decision to not even attempt to collect over half a million dollars in GST payments that were refunded by mistake to the yes side of the referendum committee in last October's referendum.

The minister's excuse that the yes committee comprising party officials from the Liberals, the Conservatives and NDP has officially disbanded therefore the government cannot collect is outrageous.

There is great confusion over the minister's statement. On the one hand the minister has ruled that the GST refund is owed to Revenue Canada by the yes side of the referendum committee. Then the minister says it was an ineligible refund and therefore cannot be applied against the expenditures in the committee's referendum finance return.

On the other hand he has said that he cannot collect the money because the yes committee is disbanded. I say the committee has not disbanded because Elections Canada is waiting for the minister's ruling but he is sending mixed messages to Elections Canada.

Perhaps the minister is not aware that the referendum finance return of the yes side referendum committee is being held in limbo by Elections Canada waiting for the claim dispute to be resolved. Therefore it does not see the yes committee as being disbanded.

I would like to point out that if the Elections Canada ruling is in favour of the yes referendum committee and it is allowed to apply the GST credits to its expenditures it could be sufficient to reduce its expenditures to fall within limits as defined by the Referendum Act.

If, however, the Elections Canada ruling is not in favour of the yes committee there is a possibility it has broken the law in the Referendum Act because it has exceeded the expenditures limit and would be subject to penalties.

Canadians see the potential for improprieties by the minister and his department. I might add that this decision also raises many unanswered questions such as how it was given a GST registration number in the first place. Some of us believe it does not qualify for that. What implication does this have for candidates in party elections financing in the upcoming election? This incredible policy, favouritism for the yes referendum committee, is not only immoral but is of an extremely important precedent setting level.

Maybe the parliamentary secretary could explain to the House why Revenue Canada officials are prepared to go so far in pursuing ordinary Canadians when in the case of the yes committee they are not even going to try to collect.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I rise in order to respond to the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary Northeast with regard to the Department of National Revenue's policy concerning uncollectable GST and more specifically with respect to its application to the yes referendum committee.

It has always been the department's policy to administer the Excise Tax Act in a fair, impartial, predictable and consistent way, using the rules, sanctions and processes securely founded in law. The majority of Canadians meet their tax obligations with good grace.

Sometimes, however, there are situations when the government is not always able to collect the amount of tax due. In the case in point the Canadian Referendum Committee, which ceased to exist as of February 26, 1993 under the terms of the Referendum Act, has no remaining assets and is unable to conduct any further activities.

It is unfortunate that the inaccuracy of the information provided to the department and the department's misconceptions regarding funding and viability of the committee has led to this amount being uncollectable.

I want to assure the House that the action taken by the Department of National Revenue with the yes referendum committee in this situation is the same that the department would take with any other registrant in similar circumstances.

• (1815)

I assure the House that the Department of National Revenue administers the Excise Tax Act in such a manner that all taxpayers are treated equitably and fairly.

LANGUAGE MINORITIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on March 8, 1993, I asked the Secretary of State whether she had embarked on serious negotiations with the provinces to set up school management in those provinces that continue to show some reluctance, namely Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and Newfoundland. I will get to the other provinces later.

The minister answered that she was discussing with her colleagues "a series of measures to help the provinces"—those are her very words—and that she expected to be able to start discussions with the provinces in the coming weeks.

Let me give some historical background. In the Mahé case, in Manitoba, three years ago, and more recently—just a couple of weeks ago as a matter of fact—in the case of the Manitoba Parents' Committee Federation, the Supreme Court of Canada recognized that minorities have the constitutional right to manage their own educational institutions. In fact, it has ruled that Section 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms grants parents from the linguistic minority of that province the right to manage and control the educational facilities where their children receive education.

How much further ahead are we now, 11 years after adopting this Charter? There are of course quite appalling disparities. I admit that there have been negotiations between the federal and provincial levels of government. The fact remains that Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and Newfoundland are holding out. On the other hand, the Atlantic provinces of Canada, which are not the richest, agreed and have implemented a series of measures to put management in the hands of their minorities. In Quebec, the anglophone minority has been managing its own schools, from elementary to postsecondary, for quite a while.

The provinces that put up the most resistance or reluctance are not the poorest. Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia certainly cannot be labelled as poor. But the federal government said: "It is going to provide them with financial assistance." They have been negotiating for years now. Last year, I had hope because the then Secretary of State, the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm, had suggested to me in this House that an agreement would be signed very shortly. The federal government promised some help. Negotiations have been going on for quite a few years now. I was very hopeful last year. The then Secretary of State had indicated to me in the House that an agreement was about to be signed. But nothing happened. Now we have a new Secretary of State who tells me that negotiations are still ongoing.

Where is the political will of this government to negotiate a comprehensive agreement with all the provinces in order to give members of our linguistic minorities the right to manage their own institutions, a right which is entrenched in the Constitution?

My question is simply this: What progress have we made in these negotiations? I understand that the new minister is attempting to meet with the province of Ontario, for instance, and come to some agreement on certain issues. It is not easy, I know. The NDP government in Ontario turns a deaf ear and claims that it has not heard from the minister in quite some time now. But I know full well that it is not so and that she has been trying to meet with it time and time again and to speak with the minister of education and skills development.

Now the said minister claims that the federal government is spiteful and acts in bad faith. I am sorry but I have to ask the parliamentary secretary to set the record straight. We must know what is going on. Is the federal government negotiating with the province of Ontario or not? Is there a general agreement regarding school management between the federal government, the western provinces and Ontario?

I would like to know if this government has any political will to deal with this issue which has been dragging on for several years now. I know that I have the support of members in this respect and that they are fed up with excuses and explanations which do not hold any water. I am told that we have the Official Languages Act. What good is a legislation that is not enforced? What good are all our laws if nobody has the guts, the will to enforce them?

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer the question asked by the hon. member, on March 8, about the right of the francophone minorities to manage their own educational institutions.

The federal government has always supported, in a very concrete way, official language minorities, especially in the area of school management.

The government provided funding, in several provinces, to working groups made up of people involved in education, including representatives from minorities. These working groups have studied school management by minorities. French-speaking communities have welcomed the reports tabled by these working groups.

Moreover, the memorandum of understanding signed by the government in 1988 and the bilateral agreements with the provinces and territories have given official language minority groups easier access to education in their own language.

Supplementary agreements with several provinces, including Saskatchewan, have filled specific or appropriate needs.

As she already mentioned several times, the Secretary of State of Canada has discussed with her Cabinet colleagues a package of measures to help provinces set up school management by minority groups. Talks are continuing, and we expect to start, in the next few weeks, actual negotiation with the provinces.

The Secretary of State submitted to her cabinet colleagues a proposal to renew the Official Languages in Education Program. Pretty soon, we will be starting discussions with the provinces, which should lead to a new Protocol and new agreements.

Let me remind the House that education is a provincial jurisdiction. The federal government has always clearly shown the provinces its willingness to help them fulfil their constitutional obligations. But the provinces have to provide appropriate structures for official languages minorities to manage their own educational institutions.

In that sense we welcome the decision handed down by the Supreme Court of Canada last week, on March 4, three years after the Mahé decision.

While reinforcing the previous decision, the Supreme Court decision adds more elements which provincial governments will have to consider when they prepare school legislation. The federal government will have to be convinced that provinces abide by these principles before supporting any school management program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), a motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.22 p.m.
