I see nothing but specious nonsense in this suggestion by the House leader of the Official Opposition. This is absolute craziness. I suggest that this point of privilege be dismissed outright as an affront to the House and as a waste of time.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, this motion before us is not only an affront to this House but to private members' hour, which is almost half gone now. I will not belabour that but will simply respond to his points.

• (1130)

The hon. Deputy Speaker is of course a member of a political party. That is how virtually all of us arrive in this place. She ran as a Progressive Conservative in two elections and if she offers again she will in all likelihood run as a Progressive Conservative once more, just as my hon. friend runs as a Liberal.

I would submit that if there were anything to be criticized in the potential conduct of a Deputy Speaker it would be if that individual were managing or prominently involved in the leadership campaign of a candidate for the leadership of our party, or any other party as the case may be.

The point is that the Deputy Speaker has proposed to accept a position presiding as a parliamentary officer over a political party convention. There is no getting away from the fact that we are all involved with political parties. Being involved in a Conservative convention is somehow shameful for my friends opposite, but we do not pretend that kind of outrage and virtue. We do not suggest that being involved in a Liberal convention is offensive to this House, because there are Liberals. That is a fact of life, lamentable as it may be.

As a House officer I submit that the Deputy Speaker in accepting to preside over a leadership convention, a joyful event which will require some poise and some equilibrium, is simply being recognized for the virtues which she has displayed time and time again and the impartiality which she has displayed in presiding over this Chamber.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to make one brief point on the matter that we are discussing.

I heard the hon. member for Mississauga South say that the Deputy Speaker was entitled to vote in this House and therefore it would not be inappropriate for her to preside as co–chair of the Conservative convention. If I am not mistaken there are circumstances, although they are limited, under which the Speaker of this House can vote. Does that mean that it would be appropriate for the Speaker of the House to preside over a party convention?

The point is that we are dealing with appearances. We are not talking about the personal integrity or qualities of the Deputy Speaker. We are dealing with appearances and how these appearances apply when we are talking about somebody who holds the position of Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons. Therefore, I am very happy to support my House leader in arguing that it would not be appropriate for someone holding the position of Deputy Speaker to preside over a party convention. Mr. Speaker, I hope you will take my comments into account in your ruling on this important matter.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened with great care to what has been said. I am going to reserve on this matter. It may well be that the House ought to hear from the Deputy Speaker. If that is appropriate then arrangements can be made to that effect.

I do want to emphasize, because this is a matter of great interest to all members, that it has been clearly expressed in the House that the point being raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond is not a personal attack on the Deputy Speaker. As far as I can see there is no suggestion that there is any criticism of any kind at all of the manner in which she is fulfilling her duties in this House. I accept that.

I am going to have to consider the matter and I will return to the House as soon as I can.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PUBLIC SECTOR BONUSES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved that Bill C–339, an act to eliminate the payments of bonuses in the public sector of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this particular private member's bill is really quite simple in intent. It wants the government to look at the current approach to the payment of bonuses to a very small group of individuals and to see whether or not it is in fact fair.

I contend it is not and I shall advance arguments to that effect. I contend that we need to look at it with the intent of eliminating it unless we can come forward with an approach that is fair to every single man and woman who works for the Public Service.

I recognize subsequent to hearing concerns expressed by Canadians, people such as myself, that the government has decided to freeze the payment of bonuses to public servants for now and into the future. I hope that is in fact going to happen. I point out if that is in fact so and they can live without that payment why can this policy not be continued in the future?

It was frozen not only because of the concerns that were voiced, but as well because there was the recognition that the Public Service has been limited to zero, zero and three per cent. It has also been frozen because of the economic situation in which we find ourselves today.

We are not without knowing that we are talking about 1.6 million unemployed Canadians. We are not without knowing there are roughly five million Canadians living at or below the poverty level, most of whom are women and over one million of whom are children. We are not without knowing that 2.2 million Canadians are receiving social assistance. We are not without knowing that over two million Canadians are fed at food banks, 40 per cent of whom are young people and children. The situation is very serious indeed.

I have not even spoken about that huge deficit which is over $30 billion and the debt which has climbed from $170 billion in 1984 to over $450 billion today. Clearly this area can be looked at in terms of reducing costs. Clearly this area needs to be looked at in terms of fairness and that is the first priority.

Let us look at the arguments being advanced on why there is a need for bonuses. Some people suggest there is a relationship between compensation and productivity. To some degree that is no doubt true under certain circumstances. I have no doubt about that. However, let us look at it in this particular situation. Is it true that perhaps 1 per cent of people who receive a bonus affect productivity in a significant kind of way?

People point out to me that bonuses are not permanent. They are not permanent in the sense that everyone gets them on a regular basis. We will look at that phenomenon as well.

Finally, people tell me that it is to retain the very best. As a former senior civil servant, a deputy minister, I can say I knew of no one who had and kept a job because he or she might get a bonus. They kept it because they were excellent, because they had a commitment to the work they were doing and because they were the kind of people that they are: first-rate, competent professionals. Therefore, that argument does not hold a lot of water.

Let us look at the other side of the coin. Why might or should we eliminate bonuses? The link between productivity and bonuses is very difficult to show clearly in government. A lot of people would argue that it cannot be done. How does one accurately measure productivity in a government environment? Are people really satisfied that what is being done today is in fact correct, fair and just? I do not think so.

It is also contrary to the concept of team-work. We recognize increasingly that if we are going to be more productive then we have to establish a culture of co-operation. I cannot be immensely productive by myself, but with the people who assist me, I can become increasingly productive. If I am rewarded, what about the people who have made me increasingly productive? Should they not get some consideration? I would contend it goes counter to this concept of team-work which I think is absolutely necessary not only today but in the future.

Finally, I would like to ask a question. What is the appropriate size of a bonus? Should it be $800? Should it be $3,000? Should it be $100? Should it be $10,000? How do you determine that fairly? How do you put a price-tag on that, particularly in terms of the approaches being used here?

Let us look at how many people get these bonuses. I am told there are about 4,500 managers in the Public Service who are eligible. We are talking about managers in the SM and EX-1 to EX-5 categories as well as the GX category. I am informed that the average payment is 4.5 per cent of the departmental payroll and it cannot go over 10 per cent of an individual's salary.

I received this information in response to a question on the Order Paper. When the last bonuses were paid it was an average of $3,198.35 at the SM level and $7,192 to the EX-5 level. I emphasize that these are averages.

When one looks at the situation today in Canada, my own province of Manitoba has one of the highest rates of poverty. Some of those bonuses are in excess of what a family has to feed itself and to respond to the needs of the family. Therefore, I cannot be persuaded that what we are doing is fair and in the best interests of all Canadians.

Unless my colleagues opposite suggest this is an idea that I have come up with myself, let me quote certain studies that I have requested. Treasury Board guidelines suggest a range of 7 per cent to 10 per cent for those without standing evaluations, 5 per cent to 7 per cent for those with superior evaluations and 3 per cent to 5 per cent for those with fully satisfactory evaluations.

It is important to note as well that only 30 per cent of evaluations may fall in the top two categories but almost 95 per cent of managers receive an evaluation of at least fully satisfactory. In other words almost every one of the 4,500 managers in the Public Service is eligible for the bonus.

For the 1990–91 fiscal year bonuses of about $17.8 million were paid to the eligible managers in the Public Service. The study says that this performance pay has long been an annoyance to other groups in the Public Service. They see it as a way around the wage and salary limits that hold for the majority of the Public Service. Even those within the management category have expressed dissatisfaction with the performance pay system.

Let me quote from the 1989 report of the Auditor General. The Auditor General cited several sources of grievance with respect to the system. These are: deciding on performance ratings without documenting or formally reviewing performance; documenting performance and deciding on a performance rating without input or discussion with the employer being evaluated; rotating "superior" performance ratings among employees for reasons other than performance; granting two ratings, one used in determining pay, generally lower, and the other for performance assessment purposes; allocating a greater proportion of "superior" ratings to senior levels, thus limiting the possibility of recognizing or financially rewarding equivalent or better performance at the lower levels of the management category; as a departmental policy, refusing to consider or acknowledge superior performance, whatever the performance, for people seconded to other organizations, participating in task forces, et cetera, to give more to those who were in the department during the same period; failure or inability to recognize special or exemplary contributions of employees not rated superior or outstanding; and granting merit increases or bonuses without input from or consultation with the immediate superior of the employee being rewarded.

These are serious concerns that have been expressed by the Auditor General.

The question of fairness and performance pay in the Public Service therefore has at least two aspects. The first is the perception of unfairness voiced by these groups that are not eligible. The second is the perception of unfairness voiced by some in the management category, especially those in the lower rungs of the category.

That the bonus is not being paid for the 1991–92 fiscal year adds a new element of perceived unfairness and also highlights one of the flaws. In some instances people have been used to receiving this on a regular basis. Because they have been receiving it and since they no longer will be receiving it until the freeze is lifted, they believe they are being doubly penalized.

In addition to the managers in the Public Service, heads of Crown corporations and Order in Council appointees have in the past received performance pay. At the time that the pay freeze for the general Public Service was announced, there were rumours that about 800 would receive such bonuses.

In fact, and I want to correct the record or the rumour if you wish, there were only about 250 Order in Council appointees who were eligible for these bonuses. The bonuses for that year were roughly $800,000. That is still a lot of people and it is still a lot of money.

Let me emphasize another point. The performance bonuses for managers are concentrated on a small group of Public Service employees. Those in the management category make up just over 1 per cent of all of the employees.

Almost every manager receives a bonus. The typical bonus is about 5 per cent of the manager's annual salary. Being widely spread even over a relatively small proportion of Public Service employees, the performance pay of managers may be too little, to quote this study, to provide an incentive to increase productivity.

We have also been looking at the Public Service in the future. Public Service 2000 is an initiative to renew the Public Service of Canada. It was announced some will recall in 1989. Its objective was to improve the Public Service in light of the probable demands of the 21st century, a very laudable objective.

As a first step, several task forces were set up and they reported in 1990. Not surprisingly, compensation and benefits including performance pay were areas examined by the task forces. Public Service 2000 recognized the deficiencies. It was not just Ron Duhamel, member of Parliament for St. Boniface. It was not just the Auditor General for Canada or Parliament.

Public Service 2000 recognized the deficiencies in the current structure of wages and salaries. As the report of the task force on compensation and benefits put it, and I quote:

> The current Public Service approach to compensation and benefits is highly uniform, centralized and rigidly controlled. Such an approach tends to treat all employees, exceptional and mediocre, alike. Therefore, it cannot be utilized in any strategic manner as a management tool to influence the effectiveness of the Public Service.
> It makes little attempt to recognize and reward exceptional efforts, initiatives or accomplishments nor does it provide disincentives for poor performance.

That is taken from the executive summary, pages 1 and 2.

The future, according to this task force, would have to be different. The task force believes that the modern Public Service should have a flexible and comprehensive approach to basic compensation benefits and performance based rewards. This approach should be managed strategically.

This comes very close to recognizing that the bonuses should try to match their ideal attributes. Therein lies the flaw. In as huge an organization as this government, can it really be said with any degree of certainty that 1 per cent of the people who are getting these bonuses are the only people who are entitled to them?

Can it be said that those people who are receiving those increases are receiving fair increases? Can it be said that those people who are receiving those bonuses are in fact influencing the productivity of the civil service?

[Translation]

I would contend that any improvement in performance would be due to the efforts of all those men and women who work in the Public Service. The number of employees receiving this additional compensation is relatively small at 4,500. That very fact, I am sure this is true, has a negative impact on the Public Service culture. Those who do not belong to the groups I mentioned earlier cannot earn the bonus and that, I think, is deplorable.

• (1150)

I suggest two alternatives. First, let us have a system that would cover the entire Public Service. Let receptionists, secretaries, assistants and all those people who contribute to the efficiency of the Public Service receive the same consideration, fairly and squarely. I do not want to exclude a particular group, if that group or that individual helps improve performance.

But how do we do that? And if it cannot be done, is it worth it? Do not forget what I said, and I will say it again for the benefit of my colleagues. The argument in favour of these bonuses is that there is a very close link between improved performance and additional compensation. The additional compensation is needed to keep our best employees in the senior ranks. As I said earlier, I do not think that is true. I think these very competent men and women are there because of their interest and commitment. Public Service bonuses have been frozen without causing an exodus of employees who prefer to go elsewhere. I maintain that if the bonuses remained frozen and this particular compensation package were dropped, it would not have a negative impact on this group of managers. I think they would stay in the Public Service because of their commitment.

In concluding, I just want to stress that the purpose of this bill is to get rid of the bonuses. As I said in my press release, this bill proposes to treat all public servants the same by abolishing performance pay for senior management.

I suggest we get rid of these bonuses and give some consideration to performance across the board. If we cannot do that in a manner that is fair and equitable, I think we should get rid of bonuses all together.

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate to be only able to have one speaker because of the business of the House preceding the introduction of Bill C-339.

Bill C-339, which proposes to eliminate the payment of bonuses in the public sector of Canada, demonstrates a lack of understanding of the performance bonus system in place for senior public servants.

I mention again that in 1981 when the management category was created, it was then decided to allocate a portion of the senior level compensation package to annual re-earnable performance awards or lump sum payments rather than having these sums permanently built into the base salary. The Advisory Group on Executive Compensation in the Public Service, a private sector group made up of senior executives from the Canadian business community which has been providing advice and recommendations to successive governments for the past 24 years, first recommended and still supports the performance bonus approach to pay.

The principle that a certain portion of the compensation package for executives should be put at risk, that is individual rewards determined on the basis of their contribution to the organization, is also widespread in the private sector.

Performance lump sum awards were introduced for public servants by reducing—and I say that again—by reducing by 15 per cent the salary range maxima to compensate for lump sum performance payments. Therefore, the replacement of the base salary adjustments with bonuses represents a cost saving because the lump sums are not compounded from one year to the next. Performance lump sums do not represent an extra payment but rather an alternative and a more cost-effective and efficient method of distributing the same compensation envelope.

I would like to point out that the elimination of the performance bonuses would mean moving to a system which provides permanent base salary adjustments equal for all, regardless of their level of performance or contribution to the organization. I can only say that it would not only be counterproductive but also unfair and most of all more costly.

I would like to add that the passage of this bill would be going against the current trend in the private sector as reported by the Conference Board of Canada and other consulting firms on the increasing portion of the compensation package that is variable or performance related.

Finally, the proposed act would have the effect of reducing the flexibility of the compensation system in favour of a rigid and more costly method of compensation simply in reaction to a lack of understanding of the objectives of the performance bonuses in the manner in which they are administered in the Public Service.

The government has a responsibility to ensure that the public servants' compensation is fair and equitable compared to the compensation paid in other sectors of the Canadian economy. While being attentive to the interests of the Canadian taxpayers, to date the advice of bodies such as the Advisory Group on Executive Compensation in the Public Service has been a determinant in establishing the current compensation system for executives which is recognized as one of the best systems by many other countries. I think we should continue to rely on those with the necessary expertise to make the compensation recommendations.

I conclude, therefore, by saying that I do not see any immediate or prospective gain that would be achieved by passing Bill C-339.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, while this bill seeks to correct the oversight found in Bill C-29 which dictated the wage freeze for most workers in the federal public sector and did not include bonuses which are paid to senior public servants and heads of Crown corporations, if one recalls, people on this side of the House opposed Bill C-29 and opposed the wage freeze of public sector workers, indicating that the proper place for this to take place is at the bargaining table.

On that same principle, the proper place for wages and compensation for senior Public Service workers is at the bargaining table. It may not be at the bargaining table with the union, but it is certainly at the bargaining table where salaries are established as is the proper place for salaries for heads of Crown corporations, if indeed Crown corporations are included in this bill, in a negotiation process, not in a bonus built in roll-on chunks of money.

The fact is that the average public sector worker who is under the Public Service Staff Relations Act earns around $30,000 with a wage freeze for the next two years. Then there is the fact that in 1991 over 4,750 managers whose salaries are way in excess of that, many of them in fact up in the six-figure salary range, were eligible for this performance pay bonus. That is the world's biggest boondoggle.

If in fact workers in the public sector, in this House, and others in Canada are receiving zero salary increases for, on the government's argument, good reasons in its view then why is this group of people, this strata of privileged people getting performance bonuses? We certainly are supporting that if no one gets a salary increase, these people do not get performance bonuses as well.

I think it is important for us to consider who is getting performance bonuses. If we are talking about the Crown corporations, which I hope are included in this bill, there is some question about whether we are going to have to amend when we go to committee stage to ensure they are included.

Let us look at this. The senior executives of CN, PetroCanada, and Canada Post, the top guys all earn $300,000 a year and they still get a performance bonus? That alone speaks volumes about where this government is going. Those who are privileged and special get a bonus; those who are the workers and the people who in fact produce the productivity in our public sector are the ones whose wages are frozen.

• (1200)

The place for salary increases is at the bargaining table, in the area where the union and free collective bargaining process should be taking over. Those who are the managers and the corporate elite should be doing it at their own bargaining table when they establish their salaries, not getting this backhanded bonus at the end of every year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

The House resumed from Friday, February 5, consideration of Bill C–73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and on Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and pleasure to speak on Bill C–73 today. I really wish there were more positive things I could say about the bill and about Canada Post, because I know a lot of the employees of Canada Post. I meet them in my constituency and in Ottawa. They are fine people who are trying to provide an excellent service, but I regret that the environment and circumstances under which they are struggling to do their best are very difficult.

They are made difficult by the government and have been so since 1984, particularly 1986 when a corporate plan was announced essentially affecting rural Canada. More specifically 5,221 rural post offices were to be closed, privatized, amalgamated or whatever, laying off 10,000 people and affecting hundreds of thousands of Canadians in rural Canada.

It should be apparent to the government and to members who sit across the way who have to support this government initiative that in rural Canada it probably ranks with the goods and services tax and with the 38 tax measures in the last eight and one–half years of this government as being a very unpopular measure.

I know that running a country is not easy. They have to take some lumps for the unpopular decisions they have to make to achieve the leadership they have to show irrespective of party. The public outcry is so great that tens of thousands of petitions have been presented, crying out to be heard, crying out to reconsider the decision to close rural post offices. It is incumbent on the government to pay attention or to heed the cry of those who see it as another blow essentially hurting or trying to dismantle those elements that hold rural Canada together.

This would be bad enough without the present circumstances of a recession and the difficulty that rural Canada is experiencing but there are other aspects that bother me. I am not going to dwell on the social aspect of a post office being the only real federal presence in small communities or on the aspect of Canada Post providing a service above and beyond Canada Post where seniors and people with various difficulties would inevitably get assistance from the affable postmaster or postmistress who always seemed to be present in post offices.

The policy of Canada Post in amalgamating post offices and closing down over 5,000 rural post offices is very much against two other policies. One is autonomous living for seniors, a policy of this government, and the other is affirmative action for women. There are some inconsistent policies.

The idea of autonomous living for seniors was that they would be able to live alone with minimum help. Normally seniors would go to post offices. The warmth and cheer of the post service would be topped up by seniors being able to get their mail from post offices. That does not happen now. Seniors quite often—and I have seen it happen—have to go to postal boxes. Particularly in the wintertime, this time of the year, it is almost impossible for them to get to their postal boxes either to get their cheques or mail from their loved ones, mail that is so important to them.

With respect to affirmative action for women the closing of the 5,221 post offices, with an average of two to three people and in some cases one person losing their jobs, would mean just over 10,000 jobs disappearing with this policy. It is significant that 83 per cent of the 10,000 jobs are held by women. I do not have to refer to the difficulty of women getting jobs. It is the subject of continuous debate and continuous media discussion, both printed and on the airwaves. For the government to pursue a policy and to insist on a policy that goes against the employment of women, particularly in rural Canada, really bears another look.

I cannot help but say it is a source of personal sadness to me as I drive around the 250 rural communities I serve as a member of Parliament to notice the inevitable disappearance of post office buildings, in some cases very small, that used to have the Canadian flag flying over them.

When it comes to profit margins I may be told it is not a big concern, that they are in it to make money. Making money is one thing but the purpose of Canada Post as espoused by the Prime Minister in 1984 was to give service to Canadians. Closing post offices and replacing them with impersonal post boxes or retail post offices is not giving the best service possible to Canadians. It is denigrating the over-all effort of community living. After all, one of the purposes of a government is to provide leadership and encouragement for living in smaller communities at a time when jobs are scarce, almost non-existent, when the economy of the country is so bad and when the debt situation is nothing less than depressing.

This is a bill to privatize Canada Post. It does not address the service to Canadians about which I spoke in the last five minutes. It does not provide specifics of the share offering to employees. It does not place any value on the assets or on the shares. It does not, above anything else, protect the employees about whom I spoke in glowing terms at the outset of my presentation.

The bill is indicative of the things happening in Canada Post upper management. The president of Canada Post makes in excess of $280,000 to $300,000 a year and supports this kind of a policy.

What do I see in the media? I see things like, for example, what went wrong with Canada Post that it is not going to make the profit it said it would make? I see a really gruelling example that has been the subject of discussion in the House, a private company getting $700,000 to send mail abroad. Even government agencies are saying that it is cheaper and more efficient to use private companies than to use Canada Post. The signals from the government are not very good in support of all the things Canada Post is doing.

Two and a half weeks ago I had a meeting in Spaniard's Bay, a community just short of 3,000 people. They are very worked up and concerned that their post office is going to close because, they have been told, the natural opportunity has come to replace the postmaster and postmistress. As I have said in the House, this happened in the Prime Minister's riding and on five occasions the post office was not closed.

As if to add insult to injury, it does not give the public much confidence. I do not like zeroing in on individual members, but one government member was so frustrated that he had to rise in the House of Commons and basically castigate his own government. I am talking about the member for South Shore who on February 19 made a statement about the latest business of having to pay 43 cents to relocate mail.

There are 400,000 Canadians who move every year. This means that service will not provided. It is incredible. In fact it is so frustrating that the member for South Shore said on February 19 that there were no limits to the ways Canada Post would go to infuriate the Canadian public, and the public is infuriated. He went on to say:

> It is nonsense. It is an outrage with which Canadians will simply not put up, nor should they. This measure will not result in Canada Post getting its revenues in order. It will simply result in a lot of mail being thrown out that should be delivered.

This is a member of the government castigating his own government and the efforts of Canada Post.

In wrapping up I can only say that in viewing the mandate of Canada Post, in the words of the Prime Minister to provide a better and improved service to the public, it has not been met. It would appear that the government is taking every step it can to make sure this aim is not achieved.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I stand today to speak on report stage of Bill C–73, in essence a bill that would be a first step toward the privatization of Canada Post.

The people of Canada, especially the people of the regions of Canada, are very well aware of the effects of privatization when it comes to service whenever this government has privatized in any way, shape or form. I remind them of what happened to prices in the airline industry and to the fiasco we are in now after Air Canada was privatized. Do the people of my riding pay less for their fares? No, they do not. They pay a very high price for transportation because the private companies are busy trying to promote flights outside the country. As a result it is cheaper to fly to Florida from Sudbury or to fly to Europe from Toronto than it is to fly from Sudbury to Toronto. I venture to say that privatization of Canada Post would lead in the very same direction.

The services of Canada Post have certainly deteriorated in past years. There is no doubt in my mind that the latest blow has been the advent of the twin boxes which are supposed to be more efficient. The people of Canada will know what twin boxes mean. If they have a piece of local mail they put it in one box and if they have a piece of mail to go anywhere outside the area they put it in another box.

All the mail for northeastern Ontario used to be sorted in Sudbury. Of course that is not done any more. Apparently it is far more efficient to take all mail and ship it to Ottawa so that it can be shipped back to all outlying areas and municipalities.

With the advent of these twin boxes we thought the local mail would be distributed in a more timely fashion. Let me recount some of the things that have happened since the advent of these twin boxes. It appears that any local mail deposited in the box on Friday afternoon, Friday evening or Saturday in essence is also shipped to Ottawa. If you think a letter posted in Sudbury on a Friday night or Saturday will get to its destination on Monday, that is local mail, think again. It is not likely to get there much before Wednesday or Thursday. I am told it is somewhat more efficient to ship all of that mail to Ottawa and have it sorted here because they have these brand spanking new machines that can sort mail very quickly. What they have forgotten is that you have to get it there and back. So the mail is just not getting where it is supposed to go the way it used to.

What has happened to service? We sure pay for it, but are we getting it? In another attempt to save money, a large number of postal boxes were eliminated because it was too costly to collect mail from all these boxes. In some instances, I am sure that it was. We have areas in our country where a high level of seniors live. They have very few ways of mailing and paying their bills. They now have far more difficulty getting to the postal boxes.

I have one instance where there are a number of high rise apartment buildings in a fairly small area together. The postal outlet has been moved. I have had petitions complaining of this, that now they have to walk down quite a steep incline and back up again to mail their letters.

When you are young and healthy, it is easy to say you will just run down and throw the letter in the mailbox. Even though it is a hill you are in good shape and can do it easily. Let me say that when you are a senior living in northern Ontario in the wintertime and you have to walk down a steep incline, you are going to be very worried about falling. It is going to be far more difficult to post that letter.

The services have been changed. They are not accommodating and we wonder why they are having the problems they are having. I always thought that if you offered the best possible service, people would use what is there.

This government goes on about business. It says everything has to be run like a business. I say right now that businesses that do not provide customer satisfaction do not do well. They inevitably go out of business. If it is the idea of offering the best possible service to the consumers out there, Canada Post certainly is not in that kind of business.

I do not know who Canada Post has been trying to serve, but I can say we are not getting our mail like we used to. Away back when, we put a letter in the mailbox and it was a rule rather than an exception that we would get our mail delivered within 24 hours. Nowadays the only way we can have any form of guarantee is if we pay extra and get priority post.

That is one reason why people are relying less and less on the post office. It is less and less likely that their mail will get to its destination on time. Now Canada Post is going to have to compete with faxes, telephones and with a lot of private services which do a very good job, by the way, in making sure that mail gets there on time.

I want to remind Canada Post that it is there to serve the public. Yes, it is fine to try to break even. It is a good idea. However, if it discourages people from using its services, whatever services remain have to be more and more costly because it is the only possible way of recouping the dollars that it is spending.

I would suggest that Canada Post try to instil in its upper management the idea that it is really there to serve the people of Canada. It is there to guarantee that those people who live in the regions that are very far away have access to the materials in a similar fashion to those who live in densely populated areas. That has been the essence of our country, to ensure that no matter where one lives, there will be at least a semblance of a similar service.

Canada Post somehow is forgetting that. It is forgetting that at the expense of the Canadian people and it is forgetting that at the expense of its own employees. The employees are being asked to do more and more with less and less and are having a hard time providing the kind of service they would like to provide.

Door to door mail delivery is not being expanded in any area of Canada, certainly not in my riding. You see these postal boxes more and more. People are being charged for postal boxes because Canada Post does not want to be in the business of postal boxes any more. Every time you turn around it is shedding another part of its responsibility.

It is absolutely essential that we stop worshipping money only because money does not know people. It is good to have a healthy bottom line. The only way to have a healthy bottom line is to serve the people that you are supposed to be serving. I suggest that Canada Post go back to the drawing-board. Yes, it can offer shares to its employees but make it that the shares which are being offered will give the employees a voice.

This proposal gives the employees no voice whatsoever in the ongoing workings of Canada Post. It is only when the employees have a say in what is happening in the services they are delivering that they can really improve. They have some real insight into what should be done and which way we should be going. They see what is happening every day in Canada Post. They see the number of problems. They live with them.

Do you not believe that if you are going to be a shareholder, you should have a voice or a vote in the matters which you are going to share in? This particular bill, although it will sell off perhaps 10 per cent of its shares, will not give the employees any say in the direction of Canada Post. That is a great shame.

I ask that we not pass this bill, that we send it back and ask Canada Post to consult with its employees, to come up with the best possible package to serve the people of Canada because that is what it is in the business of doing.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome joining in the debate on this important bill which is changing Canada Post once again.

One of the most frustrating things I have experienced as a member since I have been elected is dealing with Canada Post. Coming from Saskatchewan and having a riding that is largely rural, there have been a number of rural post office closings in my riding as there have been right across the country.

What is most frustrating is that Canada Post will come into a community and advise the people that they are losing their post office. It holds a public meeting and tells people it is there to improve the services of Canada Post. It is going to give better service. People respond that they already have good service and like the present service. However Canada Post says it has to make some changes because it is costing too much money.

If Canada Post would be honest and open with rural Canadians I could understand it. If it would come into a community and tell people it was costing x thousands of dollars to run the post office and it is only bringing in x thousands of dollars in revenue, they could try and work something out so that they could keep their service and the post office could have a better bottom line.

I do not have a problem with that. What I have a problem with is the fact that Canada Post comes in and dictates what is going to happen. It simply closes post offices with no real consultation. For a long time I wondered what Canada Post was doing. It is clear that what it wants to do is privatize this corporation.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is right.

Mr. Laporte: The hon. member across the way says that is right. The problem is this. Canadian Post should come into a community and tell them it wants to provide good service and that the community should work with it. For example, there is a community in my riding that offered to buy the building for Canada Post. They wanted to give Canada Post a free building and save it money.

In places like Briercrest, where people like Bub Hill were working for the community they said: "Give us shorter hours. Give us fewer days. We would be happy with that".

• (1225)

Another community offered to let one of the town employees work part-time at the post office. Canada Post refused all those offers. It would not work with the community. It simply said that the community would be getting better service and it was closing the post office.

That only makes sense from the point of view of shutting rural post offices down. If this government had the interests of rural Canadians in mind, it would have a different approach to the rural post offices.

Some of these rural communities are struggling to survive. When the post office goes, it is their last contact with the federal government. Every post office in this country cannot remain. Things change. If there was only a more reasoned approach to how Canada Post buildings and rural Canada Post offices were operated, then we could deal with that.

This bill is simply an extension of the unwritten government policy. I note that last May the minister for Canada Post stated that immediate privatization was not in the cards. He made a comment: "If I had to bet, I would bet that in the next couple of decades you will see post offices being privatized all over the world. I would not mind seeing Canada first". Pure and simple, this is one more move down that slippery slope to privatization.

If the government would work with the union instead of ignoring it, we would have better labour-management relations. This idea of trying to placate the union by offering it 10 per cent of the shares without any real consultation with it is ridiculous. It should start dealing with some of the over 100,000 grievances that exist with Canada Post. That is almost two grievances per person. These things have been backlogged for years. There is some frustration that the Canada Post employees are feeling. This is an area where the government could start dealing with problems at Canada Post. It should not unilaterally come in with a bill saying: "Eureka, we have the answer," telling the union, Canada Post and Canadians what is good for them. That is the same attitude it had in closing rural post offices.

I have had people contact me when they were trying to save their post offices. Canada Post told them they could call their MP but it would not do any good because it was going to do what it wanted anyway. That is a really nice arrogant attitude to have. It reflects the arrogant attitude of this government.

When there have been two majority governments for eight or nine years, there is a tendency to become pretty cold, pretty callous and pretty arrogant. Canada Post is reflecting that. That type of attitude is certainly not going to endear Canada Post or the government to rural Canadians.

We are saying on this side of the House that Canada Post should be reasonable. Let us work together to provide Canadians with a good postal service. Let us be honest with Canadians. If the government wants to privatize Canada Post, why does it not have the guts to come out and say what it is doing instead of hiding behind these veils of deceit?

It is the same as the Prime Minister in 1985 making the comment that some people wanted to buy the CBC but it was not for sale. Neither was Air Canada for sale. These are famous last words. Since this government has been in power, it has been saying one thing and turning around and doing exactly the opposite. It has a privatization mentality without any regard for the consequences of its actions.

If Canada Post took the objective that what we want to do in this country is provide Canadians with good postal service, then we have some place from which to work. Instead what it is saying is: "We want to privatize Canada Post. We have to do this one step at a time so that we can hoodwink Canadians into believing that it is not going to be privatized".

Mark this member's words: If this government, this party ever forms the next government Canada Post will be privatized before the end of that term. I just thank the heaven above that we have an election coming up in the next few months and that the government is not going to have enough time to privatize this corporation. Rural Canadians certainly are remembering the callous attitude this government has had toward them.

I would like to comment on and underline the frustration that I have felt. I have never been so frustrated in dealing with any aspect of the government or Crown corporations as I have been with Canada Post. Employees of Canada Post, people in management, have told me and others: "You can do what you want and you can say what you want, but we are going ahead with our agenda regardless". I find that disgusting. I find it underhanded. I find it deceitful. If this government wanted to endear itself to the people it should take a little different attitude. It should try to understand what rural Canadians want and what Canadians want in a postal service.

In the city of Moose Jaw we were told by people like Dave Byas, who is one of the PR boys for Canada Post, that Moose Jaw would not be touched. He said there were no plans for Moose Jaw. The fact is that the wicket service at Canada Post in Moose Jaw is going to be closed. It will be re-establishing all the post offices in Moose Jaw and will have four retail postal outlets.

We found that out through someone in Canada Post speaking out of turn. Then we phoned people in Regina, the people who are supposed to know, the public relations people, and they said there were no plans to close Canada Post, there were no plans to change Moose Jaw. That is a lie by those Canada Post employees. That indicates that Canada Post employees are deceitful. That is the kind of attitude that is hurting Canada Post and hurting the reputation of this government.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I also welcome this opportunity to speak at the report stage of Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act. Perhaps it would be useful to provide some background on the Canada Post Corporation, with emphasis on the 10 years since 1982, when it was created to replace the post office department.

The purpose of creating this Crown corporation was to avoid the problems there had been in the past under the post office department. At the time, the objective was to provide better service, improve labour relations and balance the books. I must say that before the Conservatives came to power, Canada Post Corporation had been well on its way to reaching the objectives set by Parliament in 1982. However, that was not to be. I see I have just roused a few Tories. Maybe they should sit up and listen. They might understand a little of what has been going on in an area I happen to know very well.

So what did happen in 1985? First of all, in 1982 the Department of Finance had set a timeframe for balancing the books which would extend over a number of years. As I said before, the corporation was well on its way to reaching that objective. However, when the Minister of Finance brought down his budget in February 1985, he decided that appropriations would be cut and they would have to balance the books starting that year. A few months later, the government introduced Canada Post's corporate plan, which, as you know, caused a regular revolt across the country, with the so-called supermailboxes people could not open because they were frozen shut, and they are still a big problem today. We remember the indignation of rural Canada, still very much alive today, because the government decided to close thousands of post offices in small towns and villages. These offices were the only federal presence, the only place one could see the Canadian flag.

I will not go into all the details because it would take hours, but as far as this bill is concerned—and that is why I have trouble supporting the bill and in fact, I am against it—what is the government doing about the situation? It is doing a little PR. The corporate plan was imposed by the government on Canada Post, and members of the board of directors who did not agree were obliged to resign.

We know what happened. We had two strikes during the last two terms of this government. Every time contracts had to be renegotiated, there was a strike that cost the country millions of dollars, with violence and the rest. Then in 1992 the minister responsible for Canada Post introduced a bill to say it would try and do some PR. Canada Post would offer 10 per cent of its shares to its employees. The catch is, they would buy those 10 per cent, but nobody knows how much it would cost or what they were worth.

The funny thing is, this government claims it is going to run the show and know how to run a business. As I see it, when you are in business and you decide to sell shares and put them on the market, you need a plan, and you have to know how much it costs. In this case, we have nothing. But the worst thing is that they are practically insulting employees by saying: "You can buy 10 per cent, but you will not have a say in how things are done. You will not have any voting rights".

A shareholder buys shares in a company, whether or not it is a Crown corporation, and has no say in how the company is run. I do not think we can tolerate that today, in 1993. Whenever we ask the government about this, it keeps saying there is a corporation and we should let the corporation decide how Canada Post should be run.

However, in 1985 the government imposed a corporate plan. And all the problems we have seen since then were caused by this plan, which changed the original mandate given by the legislator, by this House, in 1982 when Canada Post Corporation was created. As I said before, at the time this was done to improve services and labour relations and to balance the books. But in 1985, it said: "Forget labour relations, forget services to the consumer and balance your books starting now, because we are not going to give you one more cent". In the process it destroyed something that represented and united us across this country.

Sure, according to the hon. member from Mississauga, the real reason is that it wants to privatize. Sure, sure, but listen. Are we going to privatize the House of Commons? There are some things that cannot be privatized. And our postal service is one of those things, especially in a country like Canada.

[English]

I am not joking. Imagine if we privatized Canada Post. In Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver a private enterprise can run the post office and make a profit. But what happens in the small towns and what happens in the north? It is the philosophy of this government that the country is just Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, and these days even Montreal is being shut out.

We have to stop this mentality and put people first, put service first. That is what we are here for. We have to provide the service and make sure that we can afford it. However we cannot just say that is the priority, because that is what this government did in 1985. The Minister of Finance presented the budget and said from now on, with the next fiscal year starting April 1, the government would not continue with a deficit and the books would be balanced.

In 1982 the postal corporation was given a very clear mandate to give better service, have better labour relations and balance the books in a due and gradual period so that the corporation could organize and reach its objective. Instead, what have we had as a result of that business plan of 1985? We have had two violent strikes that cost the taxpayers millions of dollars. We had to pay through postal stamp increases.

There is no more because of that business plan. Any members of the board of directors of Canada Post Corporation who refused to go along with the government were forced to resign. Therefore the government did what it wanted to do and forgot the original mandate of that corporation. Today, with this bill it is a joke because it wants to recreate the good labour relations that it had in 1982 and which stopped in 1985. Now it wants to give the employees the chance to own part of the corporation. They do not know what they are buying and they have no vote, so this is a joke and an insult.

So far, I was discussing the problems at Canada Post and relations between the corporation and the government, but I want to take this last minute to give another example from my riding.

In Saint-Léonard, there is only one post office, which may soon be closed and just look at the way these things are done. Canada Post did not ask the neighbourhoods around the post office what the town of Saint-Léonard thought about it. So what is it doing? It is looking around for a corner store that can buy the equipment needed to operate a post office. This means there will be no more counter service on Jean Talon Street. Of course there will be fewer problems with the union, because a number of employees will no longer be there.

Did it consider the service aspect? Will people get better service? There you have the whole philosophy of the Canada Post Corporation, reflected in the corporate plan imposed by this government in 1985: Listen, we have to make a profit and the rest does not matter.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, you have no doubt heard people say, "There is nothing there". Well, that is a good way to describe Bill C-73: There is nothing there. There is nothing in it for workers and nothing in it for the people.

[English]

This is, no doubt, the first step toward privatization. I think we all acknowledge that. We recognize that the workers can buy up to 10 per cent of the shares, but there are no prices, there is no precision, and there are no voting or decision-making powers incorporated within that 10 per cent. That is, if they decide to proceed. That is really very unfortunate. This is a first step.

[Translation]

I am convinced that it is the first step to privatization. My colleagues in all parties indicate that they agree with me. I believe that is unfortunate, because the government has a wonderful opportunity to address a basic issue, namely the services which Canada Post provides to Canadians.

[English]

This was a wonderful opportunity. It could have looked at what Canadians are saying and it could have addressed those concerns. Then perhaps it would have been a laudable, appropriate and meaningful bill. I see it as a first step toward privatization. One could read into that perhaps some potential positive elements, but the way it is now written it is vague, imprecise and does not give any sense of what is going to be accomplished and what a golden and wonderful opportunity lost. It could have addressed the whole question of service.

I want to dwell a moment or so upon the question of service. This is a terribly arrogant corporation. As a member of Parliament, I asked a very simple question: Tell me which facilities in my constituency have been affected by your decision. First it resisted. Second, when I persisted, it gave me a list of all those that were still in operation with the services being offered. I guess the official languages are not understood very well. I asked very clearly about which facilities had been affected. I would like to know so I can in fact study this with my constituents, but the choice was not to tell me.

I am hoping, as I know you probably are deep down, Mr. Speaker, that there is a Liberal government, because the first call I will be making will be to the Canada Post Corporation to get a complete list of all facilities that were affected.

Let me just share with the House some of the facilities that in fact have no service or fewer services than they did in the past: Marion Pharmacy, Metro Drugs on Autumnwood Drive in my constituency, McCullough Drugs, Taché Pharmacy, and one that has taken on some significant interest of late, the community of St. Germain.

Recently I sent out a survey in which I asked people: Would you list for me the concerns that you have and tell me what is bothering you. They had lost their post office. It had been changed to an alternative service. They said that there was an inconsistency in service. Sometimes it is good service. Sometimes it is lamentable. They could not count on it.

There are people, for example, who will go to St. Vital, just a short distance away, because if they send a letter from St. Germain they tell me it could take a week. If they send it from St. Vital it will perhaps go at the speed it should and will arrive on time. They point out they are designated as a rural area. That decision is an arbitrary one because they are in fact a small community. By virtue of their being labelled as such they do not get the same kind of consideration as do adjoining urban communities.

The fact that they are called rural as opposed to urban works in their disfavour. They also point out that with the current facilities available there are flyers lying all over the place. It is polluting the environment. It is making their community not at all as attractive as it might have been. They point out that they are receiving flyers late. They get a flyer for a sale, look at the date and realize that the sale is over. That is really quite inefficient. I am sure that you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker.

They also point out that their supermailboxes are close to a highway where the traffic is very rapid and where it is a real safety concern, particularly when there are children involved. They are complaining and their complaints are legitimate. We need to address these concerns, the pollution of the environment, the safety factors, and the fact that it is not nearly as efficient as it was.

What is Canada Post doing about situations such as the ones I have mentioned?

And those are not the only concerns which my constituents shared with me. They often mentioned services in French. As you know, Mr. Speaker, that issue is very dear to me. Because of these cuts and reductions and decisions by Canada Post, there is less service in French for the French-speaking people in my riding, and I find that deplorable.

I have here a letter dated February 14 from a constituent in which he says how much difficulty this causes him. Before, he could go to a post office located nearby and receive services in French. Now, he must go a very long way to receive the same services or else accept services in the other official language. I find that completely unfair. The government had an excellent opportunity to remedy all those problems. But what did it do instead?

[English]

The government came forward with a bill that attempts to suggest that employees are going to be better off. If we look at the press releases from the unions and the workers, we find they do not think they are going to be better off. They think this is a smoke-screen for what the government eventually intends to do, that is to privatize the post office. They see no benefits whatsoever for the workers.

I have to agree with them. Perhaps the intent was noble. I do not know that, but the precisions are not there. What is the worth of the shares? Where are the details? If you and I, Mr. Speaker, were to buy shares, we would like to have a few details and so would they. Here is another opportunity for the government that has been blown again.

At the same time as it introduced this scheme it could have asked: Why do we not look at some of the concerns of Canadian citizens with respect to mail service? Why do we not look at the whole notion of supermailboxes? Why do we not look at the concerns they have for reductions in services, sometimes in both official languages? Why do we not look at the concerns of inefficiency and efficiency? Why do we not look at the concerns of costs? Why do we not address the concerns of Canadians with respect to postal services? It had that opportunity and unfortunately probably suggested that it should not be followed up.

I am coming close to the end of my remarks. I want to finish by simply indicating that it is quite unfortunate the government did not attempt to address the question of service as opposed to the question of potential profit. It is important to have profits when they can be achieved, but at what price? Surely people must come first. Surely receiving communications in the kind of country we are in and in the kind of world we are in has to be a first priority.

I close by saying again to emphasize it that it is unfortunate, because the government could have used this bill not only to do what it decided to do but also to address the question of services, to ensure that all the problems which are regularly reported to all hon. members across Canada about Canada Post's services would be addressed. But it preferred to do something that will not change that at all. As I said at the beginning, there is nothing there for the employees and the government has in no way addressed the issue of services. That is too bad.

The government has again lost a chance to restore some credibility and to try to address Canadians' real problems. Unfortunately, the government has failed to do so.

[English]

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I too have a few things to say about Bill C–73 which proposes certain amendments to the Canada Post Corporation Act.

It is well known to the House and maybe to those who are watching today that the bill would make a few cosmetic changes. There is nothing to get terribly excited about, except to the degree that it sends a larger signal. The signal we have been getting from the government for some time is that it is the government's full intention to privatize Canada Post.

In that context these amendments are another nail in the coffin of service to people, particularly those in rural Canada, people who live in small communities, have grown up with the post office outlet and have come to see it as a part of the service and as a meeting place.

There are few meeting places left in rural communities. Very often the school is gone because the students are being bused down the highway to a larger community. Very often the church has been consolidated with a congregation in another community. It is the same with the parish and community halls; they do not exist in every community to the degree they did years ago. Very often the only meeting place left is the post office. Indeed in many of those communities the local shop does not exist any more. With the change in shopping and buying patterns we find that many smaller communities no longer have anything more than a corner store or a candy store if that.

The role of the post office as a meeting place should not be underestimated. As a place of service, as a place to buy stamps, to receive mail, to send mail, to pay bills, to pay mortgages on houses and to make payments on boats and cars, it plays a disproportionately crucial role in small communities. I would have thought, whatever the over-all objective of government in terms of having Canada Post pay its way and so on, there would have been a particular strategy for the small community. That has not been the case.

As with just about everything of a policy nature in this government we see the same credo. If it works in Toronto it must be marvellous for Tompkins in my riding. If it works in a large urban centre the government rushes out to make it apply, to make it work, in the less populated parts of the country.

That effort, that stubborn strategy of applying urban solutions to rural situations, is causing a lot of pain. Whether it is the issue we speak about today, the post office, whether it is in decreased health care opportunities for people in rural areas, whether it is less convenient transportation availability, or whether it is the increased difficulty to access student loans to further education after secondary school, in all those areas the government's hand is seen making life more difficult for people in rural Canada.

Yes, we in this party are opposed to the privatization of Canada Post. We have said that many times. We are also opposed to this particular bill. As I said, as I implied a moment ago, this bill is the latest step in aiding and abetting the process, the over-all agenda of this government with respect to Canada Post.

What is in the bill? There is talk about some shares to be offered to employees, but we have heard from the employees on that and they are not terribly excited because they would be non-voting shares. The employees would still have no real say, no input in the operations of Canada Post. There has been no effective communication with employees of Canada Post to get their support for this proposal. That is why we have the statement to which my colleague from St. Boniface made reference a moment ago, the statement in which the head of the Canada Post union does not have very kind things to say about this bill or about the government's effort.

In my own riding of Burin—St. George's with 158 communities, the largest of those communities is about 8,000 in population. Many are much smaller. For example, there had been a post office in the community of Cartyville for many years. With the resignation of the postmaster the government moved to a rural franchise and postal boxes.

In the community of Cape Ray in my district, with the death of the postmistress who was a relative of mine, a cousin of my family, with the passing of that dear lady the government moved in again. Canada Post moved in and replaced a long existing post office with a rural franchise and postal boxes.

The same was done in St. Fintan's on the death of the postmaster. When the postmaster retired in Cape St. George the same thing was done. When the postmaster retired in Creston Canada Post moved in with a rural franchise and postal boxes. The list goes on. With a resignation in Burin Bay Arm the same thing happened. When the postmaster in Burnt Islands was promoted the same thing happened. In North Harbour with a retirement the same thing happened: a rural franchise and postal boxes.

In fairness, there have been two or three exceptions. I want to be candid and fair on that point. In Garnish when there was a retirement the position was staffed, as was the case in Rushoon and a couple of other places.

I see my time has nearly run out so I will not dwell on the details. Suffice it to say that in a couple of dozen communities in my riding in the last three or four years post offices which had been playing very vital and worth-while roles in those communities have been wiped off the map. Instead, in some cases we now have the government providing just rural mailboxes.

At this time of year, in the dead of winter, with the kind of weather we get in Ottawa—it is not quite so bad in Newfoundland but we see some snow there too—or in Newfoundland, if people are going to approach one of those mailboxes they had better have their key in one hand and a blowtorch in the other, because the chances of getting their mail out of the mailbox on many days is very slim.

This bill is just the latest sleight of hand by a government that is very practised at sleight of hand. I wish it would leave rural people alone for a change and give them a break instead of socking it to them one more time, as it is doing in this bill.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to support the motions of my colleague, the member for Churchill, who basically wants to gut this bill.

The opposition to this bill is well thought out. It is based on an examination of the history of this government and its relationship to Canada Post. It is a history of saying one thing and doing the other, whether it is in Canada Post, Air Canada or the CBC. On one day the government says that it will not privatize Air Canada, it will not sell Air Canada. Then, lo and behold, it goes right ahead and sells it lock, stock and barrel. The people of Canada no longer have a single share in Air Canada today. It started out by a partial sale, albeit 50 per cent as opposed to the 10 per cent proposed in this bill. This is a first step toward full privatization.

I want to examine the rationale as to why the government is suggesting that giving the employees the opportunity to buy 10 per cent of the Crown corporation they work for will lead to better labour-management relations.

One way not to lead to that is by asking employees to give up part of their earnings and give them back to the company so at some point down the road they may or may not get some kind of return on their investment.

If Canada Post was serious about better labour-management relations it could start by dealing in a fair way with the 100,000 grievances that are already in process. There are 100,000 workers who have felt that the corporation violated the collective bargaining rules, the rules of the contract, which were agreed to by both sides.

We know that just because somebody files a grievance does not necessarily mean that they are correct in suggesting that the company has violated a particular clause. However in that same contract is a process for dealing with those grievances. When there are 100,000 grievances outstanding there is a really big problem.

If we look at some of the patterns within Canada Post from coast to coast to coast in terms of the areas where there may be more militancy or higher absenteeism we really must look beyond the specific grievances and find out what the management attitude is, whether it is an attitude handed down from head office or the attitude of the supervisory staff at a particular location, to find out where the problems really are. That is what we have to do if we really want to be serious about addressing the whole question of labour-management peace.

We also have to ask ourselves whether Canada Post's drive to do much better on its bottom line, to show a profit, has not in part been designed to bring about a forced reduction in the level of service even more than we have already seen.

In suburban Canada people who moved across a line, across the street, went from having door-to-door service to group mailboxes. In the rural area there is now a preponderance of green mailboxes as opposed to driveway-to-driveway delivery, which not too many years ago we could count on as rural residents.

Take a look at our urban post offices. If we go there between 4 p.m. and 5.30 p.m. what do we see? We see long lines, primarily business people, but also people who have just left work and want to do their postal business before the close of the post office that day. What has Canada Post done? It has minimized the number of staff who are there to serve the customers. One or two counter clerks are available at a time when there are 20, 30 or 40 people standing in line trying to do business.

That is done on purpose. That is part of Canada Post's way of forcing a downsizing of the existing corporation, of making it more palatable for post office services to be handled at Safeway, the corner store, or wherever because people are fed up with the line-ups and the long wait. If people are in business, whether they are the gofer whose job it is to take the mail out and process it at the post office or the owner of that business, they do not have time to waste standing in line at the post office. It has a major negative impact on commerce in this country.

Canada Post is now operating under a really neat logic. Instead of having the mail sorted in the community it is destined for—if I dropped a piece of mail in the mail box outside my office in Thunder Bay it would not be processed locally. It would be shipped off to Winnipeg to be sorted and brought back to Thunder Bay. Does that make sense? Is that a good use of human resources? Is it a good use of transportation resources? I think not. What it does is add to the length of time it takes a letter to go across the street.

There was a time when we used to have mail sorting cars on our passenger rail trains. A letter mailed in Thunder Bay on Monday afternoon that was addressed to Ottawa was delivered there the next morning by train. We have gone backward in a lot of things we have done at Canada Post.

In addition to giving the employees this golden opportunity to divert their hard-earned money back into the company they have been fighting with for decades, this bill does not do anything for service. It does not improve service at the post office, does not improve rural service, does not restore Saturday service or Saturday delivery, and does not restore sorting in the communities in which the mail is collected. It does nothing to improve Canada Post services.

The government always talks about wasting House time. It rails at us because we want to debate items and we want to debate them for more than four or five hours. The government could have saved a lot of time for a lot of people, and a lot of aggravation, by not having brought this bill forward.

Which employees are going to buy these shares? Is it going to be the single mom who is a counter clerk and is earning just enough to get by on? I admit that Canada Post because of the collective agreement pays a decent income to its workers. But in today's society even a decent income as we used to define it is not enough. Is that single mom going to divert part of her hard-earned income back to the company? I think not.

Maybe the president of Canada Post might get a few shares. When Air Canada was privatized it was a real boondoggle in terms of the chief executive officers of that company getting access at a really low rate to great amounts of shares. Maybe that is what is going to happen here.

Mr. Manley: They lost their shirts.

Mr. Angus: As my colleague the Liberal transport critic says, they lost their shirts. We will not get into that today, but I agree with him.

It will be those people in the management at Canada Post who will get their piece of the pie. They are positioned so they can squeeze that much more out of the workers and reduce the amount of staff at the counters even more. It will look good on the bottom line but does not do anything for services to people or to Canada.

I have a final point. Canada Post, which provides the ability to move a piece of paper across the street or across the nation, is as important for keeping this country together as the passenger rail service is, as the airline service is, as the highway system is and as the Constitution is. As Canada Post goes, so goes this country.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my friend across the way from Mississauga South seems to be surprised that I would speak on this bill.

He is probably thinking, knowing me as he does, that I might favour employee participation in an enterprise as a means of encouraging productivity and encouraging employees to identify with their organization and feel they have a part ownership in it.

If that were the result of this legislation I might share that opinion. However, when I look at what Canada Post is creating here the best that I can say about it is that it is very disappointing.

Employee participation in ownership in business enterprises is becoming an important factor in the capitalization of many Canadian businesses. Very recently, there was the involvement of the employees council at Canadian Airlines. It was an attempt to save the employees' own company through their participation by forgoing salary and acquiring shares in their company.

They did it as a part of a co-operative effort that included the participation of government and outside investors. It can make sense. It does increase the identification that employees have with their employer when they are also shareholders. However, there are some requirements for that to work. I do not think that those requirements are met in this case.

The bill does not give us very much information about what the government is ultimately going to propose when it actually comes to the point of issuing shares. All we know for sure is that the government does not propose to allow employees to own voting shares. We know they will be entitled to acquire up to 10 per cent of the shares. The other 90 per cent will be held by the government. We know they will not have voting rights.

We do not know what other rights they will have. We do not know whether they will be receiving dividends on a formula basis or whether they will be participating equally with the government as the major shareholder.

I would like to suggest that for this plan to have any validity whatsoever there are a number of criteria that should be satisfied.

First of all, I believe the shares which are issued to employees should be full participating shares. Employees should participate with the majority shareholders equally when dividends are paid out. We know that in recent years there have been years in which Canada Post has paid a large dividend to the Government of Canada. If you want the employees to own shares they ought to participate pro rata on the receipt of those dividends.

Second, employees should be entitled to vote. They should have full voting rights. This brings with it certain other characteristics that are important. If they have voting rights, then management will be required to account to the shareholders for their management of the corporation, which is as it should be. These people are being asked to put money at risk. The accountability function should be there. They are going to be a very small minority in a company dominated by the 90 per cent shareholder. They should have, as a right, minority representation on the board of directors of Canada Post Corporation. They should be entitled to elect, as a class, a director or directors to represent their interests on the board of directors.

They should have a market for their shares. We have no idea what the government may have in mind with respect to this. Since the bill does specify that the shares can only be held by employees of the corporation, the government needs to create in that context a market so that people can dispose of their shares if they need the money. They should be able to know how much they can get for their shares or at least how that price is going to be calculated.

These minority shareholders should have the right possibly to have their director approve certain types of decisions. Finally, if this kind of system is going to work, as a minimum it absolutely requires the support and the participation of the union representatives of the employees.

I will go back to the example of Canadian Airlines where the employee share purchase arrangement is contributing a great deal to the equity of that corporation. Each of the unions at Canadian Airlines has agreed and is participating fully in a co-operative way with that initiative by the employees' council.

It seems to me that to start this share scheme without the co-operation of the unions at Canada Post dooms it to failure. Instead of creating a situation of greater co-operation, of greater mutual understanding, it creates the potential for different kinds of divisions. If this is the path that the government chooses to go, then the warning from my colleague from Thunder Bay—Atikokan a moment ago may be correct, that in fact this is a kind of executive compensation scheme. It is not any kind of employee participation plan whatsoever.

For that reason, there should also be a limit on the number of and percentage of these shares which can be taken up by senior executive officers of Canada Post Corporation. If they are not there for the rank and file employee and if those people are not taking up the shares voluntarily in a situation in which they feel that their rights are protected, this scheme is not likely to work.

Even if you take the position that these shares should be made available to employees of Canada Post, the scheme the government has put forward is filled with points that are uncertain and not clear. I cannot see where they intend to end up. I suggest that this is not going to improve employee relations at Canada Post Corporation.

While I am on my feet, I have to say that in many ways, dealing with issues related to Canada Post have been among the most difficult I have confronted over the last four years. Canada Post Corporation has pursued the mandate that it operate profitably without sufficient regard for its mandate of public service. If in fact some others have said that this plan is really a plan to move Canada Post Corporation toward the day when it is privately owned, then I fear for the ideals of service to the public which seem to me to be fundamental and of primary importance to the mandate of Canada Post Corporation.

All of us have experienced the closing of retail postal outlets in our constituencies. Very frequently well-mannered and well-meaning people from Canada Post Corporation come to try and relay the news to members of Parliament and other people in the community. However, the decision makers hide behind walls, never coming into the community to understand the impact of what they are doing firsthand. I suspect there is a group of MBAs somewhere in the Canada Post Corporation who never go out into the communities. They look at maps and draw circles on them based on where population centres are and say: "Let us put a postal outlet here and let us close that one".

There is a seniors building in my constituency where the postal outlet beside the building was closed. They were forced to go to a new one over two miles away and across two bridges. That is an example of that failure to give consideration to the make-up of the local community.

There is the recent closing of public access to Station T in Ottawa. Members may know it has long been the main postal terminal in Ottawa. It has been a focal point for individual service as well as commercial service for many years. Access to transportation, parking and everything that has been there is suddenly closed and restricted to commercial users only without consultation with the community. I admit there was an effort to communicate to the community the fact that the decision had been made but the decision makers were never taken out from behind the thick walls and put out in the community to discuss with the people, the customers, how they would be affected by the decisions that were being taken.

It is this kind of attitude that causes so much frustration on the part of Canadians. After all, and I think quite rightly so, when they buy a postage stamp they feel that they are paying a tax and that they are entitled to a level of service that reflects the fact that the post office exists not for the good of the management, not for the good of the executives, but for the good of Canadians for whom that it is intended to serve.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues in the opposition, I am pleased to speak on Bill C-73. At the outset, let us put things in their proper place. The purpose of Bill C-73 is not to privatize Canada Post. This bill does not privatize Canada Post. It seeks to encourage employees to share in the profits of that corporation. Nevertheless, it is surprising to hear the opposition again trying to make the Canadian public believe, through disinformation, that we are privatizing Canada Post. If we were going to privatize Canada Post and if it could be privatized at this time, that would mean Canada Post is profitable in a way that shares could be sold and give a favourable rate of return.

What can the opposition have against this bill? What can the opposition have against the government presenting a bill that finally makes it possible for employees to buy shares in the company and share in its profits? What can the opposition have against something that the labour movement has been promoting for 20 or 30 years? For 20 or 30 years unions have been demanding that employees be considered an integral part of the company and share in its profits. We have been hearing that for 20 or 30 years and now that we are doing it, the opposition, in its traditional role of opposing everything, says that it is against this bill and accuses the government of wanting to use it as a way to privatize Canada Post. That is disinformation.

However, we must clearly understand the philosophy of our friends opposite and of our union leaders. Let me quote you a clause, B-6, from the national by-laws and policies adopted at the national convention in 1990. Clause B-6 says: "In line with opposition to industrial democracy, the union condemns any and all attempts by labour bodies to establish a partnership between labour and government or between labour, government and employers. Within the trade union movement, the union wants to promote and strengthen a militant and combative front with which to oppose any form of collaboration with management and government serving management's interests".

A little further, in Clause B-7 of the same document, we read: "—update a militant program of action for the labour movement geared to building the fighting strengths of the labour movement against the employer and government".

When such clauses exist in the national by-laws of unions representing the employees of Canada Post, we should really not be surprised that union leaders systematically oppose a bill whose sole purpose, I repeat, is to enable Canada Post employees to buy shares and share in the profits of the corporation.

The fundamental role of union leaders is to serve their members well. When we ask union leaders whether they will recommend that their members use this new plan, which is good for them because with it they can share in the company's profits and thus make more money, they answer that they will not recommend it because they would be co-operating with the employer and the government. The national by-laws of these unions forbid doing so. They have even set up a program showing union members never to co-operate with the employer. Then people tell us about the state of labour relations between the management of Canada Post and the union.

There are several examples of industrial democracy in Quebec, with Cascades Paper and other companies that have set up plans whereby employees share in their profits. Of course if you work for a company and are convinced that by working very hard with the other employees and helping the company make more money you will add to your income, in addition to your hourly or weekly wages, that is very motivating for the employees. I am very sorry that the opposition, again, and the unions through their leaders oppose a measure that leaves it completely up to Canada Post employees whether they join this plan or not.

We know what Canada Post represents for the Liberal Party. For years when the Liberals were in power, Canada Post was one of the things which helped build up the national debt and deficit that they left us.

Canada Post, this great symbol of Canadian unity. The opposition uses Canadian symbols and national unity to justify almost anything, especially spending or managing with no consideration for those who pay, namely Canadian taxpayers. For years under the Liberals, we saw Canada Post management run up huge deficits which contributed to our national debt.

We must remember how the opposition, the Liberal Party, ran Canada Post. For them, it was a wonderful opportunity for patronage. At that time, Liberal members of Parliament could give people jobs in Canada Post. We know how the Liberals really see Canada Post. What is Canada Post? It is a mail delivery service for all Canadians. The basic purpose of such a service is to be able to deliver Canadian mail safely, efficiently and at a reasonable cost throughout the country.

In the latest opinion surveys conducted a few months ago on Canadians' satisfaction with Canada Post's service, more than 90 per cent of the users of Canada Post said that they were satisfied with the management and the service provided. It was not the members opposite, who systematically oppose all bills, who spoke in that survey or study but rather the Canadian people. Canadians are not asking for a post office in every municipality in Canada. They are just asking us to set up a system to deliver the mail safely and efficiently, at the lowest possible cost. This is what the management of Canada Post is trying to do. To reach this goal, it is quite essential to have in place measures for a better partnership between the management of Canada Post and its employees.

Since Canada Post was given the mandate to be profitable and well run, it has even found a way to turn a profit in recent years. I think that we must be for this bill because, despite what the opposition still says, it will not privatize Canada Post. I repeat, it will only give Canada Post employees an opportunity to increase their income by sharing more in the corporation's profits. I think that the opposition cannot help but be for the good of Canada Post employees and Canadian workers.

This is a good bill and I sincerely recommend that all members of this House support it for the good of the workers at Canada Post, as well as for all Canadians. Let us not forget that good labour relations and good service can only benefit all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-73. I do not think this bill is being presented in the proper light. I think what we really have here is privatization of Canada Post. I do not see how it can possibly be looked at any other way. It is a privatization, with the government owning 90 per cent of the shares and the employees owning 10 per cent of the shares.

It is really just the first step by a government that does not have the courage to say what it is doing. It says it is a restructuring of Canada Post and it is merely giving the employees some equity in the corporation. That is not the case. It is a Crown corporation now. It will not be essentially a Crown corporation in the normal sense after this bill goes through, if it does go through.

I want to draw the attention of the House to section 27(2)(1). It says: "The corporation is authorized to issue to the minister and the minister is authorized to acquire shares of the corporation in substitution for the equity of the corporation held by and on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada".

The government is giving up its equity in the traditional sense of a Crown corporation and is being issued shares the same way anyone would be issued shares. The only difference is that the government is being assured it will get 90 per cent of the shares.

This is only a first step. There is really nothing that is going to lock the government into maintaining 90 per cent of the shares. Those shares will invariably, over a period of time in the not too distant future, go to the private sector. I cannot stress that too much.

The government is trying to put something over on the Canadian people once again. It is not fair. It should be called what it is, the first step in the privatization of Canada Post.

The government is going to get 90 per cent of the shares. The employees are going to get 10 per cent of the shares. Be assured there is really not a great deal of rejoicing among the employees of Canada Post about this. While they are given the shares, the employees are not allowed to vote. The shares are not fully participating and do not have the benefits they should.

The government is giving itself 90 per cent of the shares through Canada Post and giving the employees 10 per cent of the shares, but it is not letting them vote or have any say in the running and operation of this company.

That is absolutely unacceptable. The government and Canada Post have not learned one thing in the last eight years about the operation of this company. Not only are the employees not participating or voting, but there is no step being taken toward integrating the employees into the mainstream of the corporation. Canada Post still has the worst employee-employer relations in the country. I do not believe there is a company in Canada that has a worse employee-employer relationship than Canada Post.

It is quite prepared to give shares to the employees if they do not have any say in what they feel should be happening other than by perhaps dropping something into a suggestion box. This is totally unacceptable.

It is bad enough that there are no employee representatives on the board of directors of Canada Post. That has been put forward over a considerable period of time. One would think that a group with 10 per cent of the shares would at least have some say on the board of directors, but no. I understand there was a representative on a trial basis a few years ago but that was dropped. This is absolutely incredible.

What is the government hoping to achieve? I think it is hoping to disguise what is really the first step in the privatization of Canada Post. It will not be long before the government shares are sold to other parties.

Then of course the fears of Canadians will be even greater. Right now people from coast to coast to coast in this country are absolutely apoplectic about the record of Canada Post with respect to service in their communities.

Canada Post is still trying to reduce the number of post offices, staff and service. If the service were heightened to the rural areas that would be one thing, but it is not. Canada Post. The Government of Canada cannot go on continually thinking that rural Canada does not count for anything in this country.

The postal service is one of the precepts on which this country was built. It was one of the reasons for coming together in Confederation in 1867. Yet this glue which we initially had at Confederation has been melted down. It has been done away with gradually over a period of time and the process is still continuing.

There has to be an acknowledgement, a dialogue between Canada Post and the government on the one hand and the employees and the people of Canada on the other. There is an ivory tower approach that is not working. This bill is not going to help matters at all. It is not disguising what the government is trying to do. It hopes to show it is giving a significant benefit to the employees, has turned over a new leaf and is moving in a new direction. Well, it is continuing along in the old direction, contrary to the interests of the employees and certainly contrary to the people of Canada.

If this government and Canada Post feel that because most of the post office closures took place a while ago the people of Canada have forgotten, they are going to be very surprised indeed. The people of Canada have not forgotten. In fact the people of Canada are marshalled and awaiting the next arbitrary move of Canada Post. Certainly in my riding people do not want any further closures or reductions.

We need the post offices in our communities. Thanks to the depersonalization this government has brought forward in the country, we do not have enough of a focal point to keep the sense of community alive to the degree which we want in this country today. Post offices are vital in maintaining that, and probably more vital right now than ever before in the history of this country.

We need these post offices. They provide service and are the focal points of our communities. They provide what people want. People know what service they want. They are paying for service and they want the service that is in their interests. They want Canada Post to keep the post offices alive and operating in rural Canada. They want Canada Post and the government to come clean and acknowledge the importance of these post offices instead of putting forward legislation like this that is designed to disguise another intention completely.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to speak to Bill C-73, a bill to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act.

Most of my colleagues have already touched on the obvious concerns we have with respect to this legislation, but let us be really truthful with Canadians and tell them what this bill does and does not do.

The government is not really serious about dealing with the real issues of Canada Post and there are many. We all know them because we hear from our constituents who are sometimes not very pleased with the service. We hear from employees who tell us things are not as they should be in the Crown corporation. Yet the government proposes four measly pages of amendments to Canada Post which deal with only one aspect of the Crown corporation, to allow employees the opportunity to buy into the Crown corporation that Canadians already own.

I am not sure that is the real issue Canadians have with Canada Post, at least the ones I have spoken to. Canada Post is owned by Canadians. It is a Crown corporation 100 per cent owned by the government and therefore owned by Canadians.

If Canadians had an opportunity to sit on the board of directors of Canada Post, I think they would try to tell the government and management who initiate the directions of Canada Post that service is the key concern of Canadians, whether they live in urban centres, small towns or rural Canada. Even the parliamentary committees of this House have tried to deal with this issue.

The small business community needs to be reassured that the Crown corporation is dedicated to moving the mail so it can deal with its businesses. We know what has happened in the past number of years. There has not been a great vote of confidence by Canadians in Canada Post. Businesses and people have looked elsewhere to other corporations and businesses for exactly the kind of service Canada Post is meant to give.

Unfortunately, I am not sure the government is dealing with the real issues of the day in its relations with Canada Post. It is a sham that it put four pages forth. I guess there is nothing wrong with an employee purchase plan. It is a new way to bring employees into the corporation. But employees must be more involved than just having the opportunity to purchase shares in the corporation without the benefits of ownership of those shares. When one buys shares in a company, one should have a say at the table in how the corporation is run.

They are not voting shares that the employees would buy. The bill does not talk about the purchase or the value of the shares, the assets of the corporation. How will it distribute dividends and profits? This is something most investors and shareholders would want to know before they invested.

I am not sure this bill even defines what an employee is. It may not be an opportunity to buy shares but a bonus plan for management and executives.

I think Canada Post ought to deal with the real issues of postal delivery in this country. As my colleagues on this side have indicated, it should not prepare another Crown corporation for privatization. We have seen it. We saw the closures of postal offices across the country in rural Canada and small towns. We saw the decimation of services in urban centres. Most new homes now receive their mail at community mailboxes.

We have set up different classes of citizenship in this country as they relate to postal service. If you were lucky enough two or three years ago to own an older home, mail delivery is at the door. If you recently bought a new home, you now have to go to a community mailbox to get your mail. I am not sure that is equal service. The act calls for equal service to all Canadians.

Winter conditions in the months of December, January and February make it very difficult for those with community mailboxes to turn their keys in those small locks. They are supposed to be foolproof. There are not supposed to be any problems getting into the boxes, but that is a lot of bunk. We all know that. If you do not, come to London, Ontario, and try to get into mine. See if you can open those doors. You have to carry a little can of de-icer with you to get into your mailbox.

I want to get back to the real issue about Canada Post. Canadians want equality of service, quality service, affordability and reliability. That is what Canadians expect of their Crown corporation. We have not received that. In fact the prices of stamps and other services that are charged by Canada Post do not equate the services we now get.

There is another serious issue that I think needs to be addressed. If the government and the executives and management of Canada Post are really serious about improving service to Canadians and making it more reliable and affordable, they ought to learn how to work with their employees and not against them. While they may say they are going to offer employees the opportunity to purchase shares because they are really committed to working with their employees, we all know the problems with Canada Post and its labour relations.

There are 100,000 grievances now under way within the system. That does not indicate that things are nice and cosy there. The problems with productivity and providing and delivering a good service to Canadians mean there needs to be mutual respect between management and labour, to work together toward the common goal. That common goal is to serve Canadians and give them the postal service they have bought and paid for through their taxes, user fees and cost of stamps. The management of Canada Post should devote its true attention to working with the employees toward the same goals. I am not sure it has done that. In fact, I think it has done the reverse.

Great productivity can be achieved in this corporation if it is prepared to work with its employees. They should be given the opportunity to give their good ideas on how to improve the service and deliver the service equally across the country. I am sure the employees are prepared to work with Canada Post if they are given the relationship.

Unfortunately in my area of London, Ontario, in the past four years since I have been the member for London East, I have had a number of complaints about labour-management difficulties that have been very hard to handle. There was a suicide directly related to how management deals with employees who have been injured on the job and how they are treated in terms of wanting to come back to work at Canada Post.

I had hoped the government would have taken the issue of Canada Post a little more seriously than to produce a four-page scam on how to involve the employees of Canada Post in the running of the Crown corporation named Canada Post. The truth of the matter is that this is not what this bill talks about at all. We should be getting back to the real issue of Canada Post, which is to deliver reliable, quality, affordable and equal service across this country. The government is playing with smoke and mirrors with the employees as well as Canadians by saying this is the answer to all our problems and ills with Canada Post.

I think it is a lost opportunity by the government to deal with the real issues and listen to the parliamentary committee that dealt with Canada Post and heard from Canadians across the country, including small businesses, which want improvements to a Crown corporation they do not want privatized. They want Canada Post to remain Canada Post, a Crown corporation. I am sure people will really see this bill for what it is. It is really preparing Canada Post for eventual privatization. It will be put into the hands of so-called business people who will not care about what kind of service rural Canada, urban Canada and small town Canada gets.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find consent for the following motion:

> That the House continue to sit today beyond the hour of daily adjournment but no later than 9 a.m. on Tuesday, March 9, for the consideration of Bill C-114, until all questions necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the said bill are disposed of, provided that no dilatory motion or quorum calls shall be deemed receivable during the extended sitting and that any requested division shall be deferred until 6 p.m. on Tuesday, March 9, that at the end of debate on second reading of Bill C-114, the House shall stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 9, at 10 a.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in that case, I believe there is unanimous consent for moving the following motion:

That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of adjournment today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization): Mr. Speaker, I realize the clock is moving and time is limited but I would like to say a few words in this debate.

I have been listening to the debate with great interest. I am delighted to say some of the speakers have even spoken to the bill that is before the House, which I think is very encouraging to see for this place.

I just listened to my hon. friend from London East as he went on about postal services and described this bill as a scam.

I have to say that having read the legislation, I think it is a wonderful opportunity for the employees of Canada Post to have a stake in their company. I do not know why my hon. friend would think that is such a heinous, villainous thing. He talks about voting shares on the board. In fact the procedure by which this program was established is very similar to that which exists in most employee stock plans, so there is nothing unusual there.

I was equally amazed earlier in the debate to hear my hon. friend from Thunder Bay speaking against this legislation. I know from time to time it is hard to fathom exactly what the policies of the Liberal Party are but usually, whether we agree or not, we at least know what the policies of the NDP are. The member's good friends in the Government of Ontario have recently brought in Bill 150 to make this kind of employee stock savings plan available to employees of corporations in Ontario. I also noticed that the Government of British Columbia is doing a similar thing, therefore I thought the New Democratic Party would have roundly endorsed this legislation. I must say I am a little bit bewildered trying to figure out exactly what it is doing.

Much of the discussion here is centred around issues of postal service and so on, but everybody who is a member of Parliament has to deal with the fact that some people are not happy with the quality of service they receive from Canada Post. I mailed a letter last Monday and was disappointed to find out that as of last night it had not arrived yet in Toronto. However, these things happen from time to time and surely to goodness we have to take a look at the over-all quality of service as well.

Rural and urban issues also come up from time to time. All rural members in this Chamber have had to deal with the issue of the closure of rural post offices. It is very difficult. It is not hard to discover as a rural member that there is a real urban focus in this government and not just in Canada Post. The people who develop the legislation and programs are urban based for the most part. That is reflected in many of the issues that come before this House and in the legislation that frequently reflects an urban rather than rural bias.

As members of this House, it is also our responsibility to assist our constituents from time to time in understanding the changes that are taking place. The fact of the matter is that the role, function and purpose of Canada Post is to deliver the mail. If that does not happen expeditiously and on a for value basis, we have a right to complain and criticize.

I think nothing has been more destructive to the quality of mail service in this country than the labour-management relations that exist within Canada Post and the perception on the part of many Canada Post employees that the company is the enemy. They do not feel they have a stake in the company. I think that has been a large part of the problem in Canada Post. That is being addressed in this piece of legislation. It is an effort to bring Canada Post employees closer to the company so they feel they have a stake in it and are a part of it.

There has been some suggestion that this legislation is not adequately specific with respect to how this plan would actually work. Obviously it is up to the employees of Canada Post to meet with the company to work out the details of it. This is a piece of enabling legislation that makes it possible for that to take place.

This legislation is going to make Canada Post do what it is supposed to do, that is improve services to Canadians. I heartily commend the concept that Canada Post employees be allowed to have a share in their company and commend the legislation to all members.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5) the House will now proceed to statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

TELEFILM CANADA

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to draw attention to media reports which indicate Telefilm Canada and the National Film Board are considering funding a film about the 1970 October crisis.

The proposed film, entitled Octobre, is based on a book written by Francis Simard, one of the four people convicted of participating in the abduction and murder of Quebec cabinet minister Pierre Laporte.

I and my constituents profoundly disagree with the actions Telefilm Canada has taken in support of this project. In 1984 this federally funded agency paid $9,000 to Mr. Simard for the film rights to his book. As well, $24,000 has been paid to director Pierre Falardeau to assist in script production.

A positive decision to provide a reported $1.2 million in production funding for a sympathetic portrayal of criminals, terrorists and assassins would be repugnant to the overwhelming majority of Canadians.

I want to add my voice in support of others who have already spoken out against federal funds going to this project.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, despite a modest increase in February housing starts, which are still below normal levels, a government survey recently indicated a full-scale recovery in the home building industry will remain elusive due to a lack of consumer confidence and tens of thousands of construction workers are still out of work.

In Quebec, home builders have resorted to creating their own social programs to rectify this chronic economic insecurity. Their industry association is offering new home buyers an insurance policy against job losses. These Quebec builders are fighting the real enemy, which is an economy that shows no hope of providing long-term employment stability or improved opportunity.

Federal incentives and lower interest rates are responsible for the slight improvement in housing starts and these initiatives have been welcome, but the statistics also reveal that without socially assisted housing the housing construction sector would have continued in recession.

Despite this government's insistence that Canada is enjoying a healthy recovery the statistics tell the real and true story. The government should act now to introduce policies that promote a stable economy with long-term employment opportunities for all.

COMMONWEALTH DAY

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, today is Commonwealth Day. I would like to read part of the message from Her Majesty the Queen, the head of the Commonwealth. She says:

> This year on Commonwealth Day, I am asking you all to think about human values. I know from the many letters I receive from young people that their generation cares deeply about the rights of the individual, about the sufferings of others and about making a better world for us all to live in. I believe the youth of the Commonwealth is well placed to give a lead in showing how human values can be improved.

She goes on to say:

> None of this is easy to bring about because the establishment of human values implies duties as well as rights. If we want to exercise and enlarge our rights and opportunities, we have to safeguard the rights and opportunities of others. We should look for chances to give service just as eagerly as we look for benefits for ourselves.

The young people of the Commonwealth have their future in their hands. May they keep their vision of human values alive and their determination to achieve them undiminished. And may our fifty nations, sharing our experience and working together to enhance the quality of life, send an example to the rest of the world.

FOREIGN AID

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, in addition to Commonwealth Day today is International Women's Day, a time for everyone to recognize a woman's contribution to society and her struggle for social justice around the globe.

I find it painfully ironic, if not hypocritical, of this government to tout the status of women internationally, and yet at the same time slash ODA funding to the tune of $220 million this year.

Canadian aid is primarily aimed at the poorest of the poor, and typically women need our help the most.

• (1405)

In fact, the head of the UN Development Program has advised this government that poverty is the greatest threat to international peace and security. Even the member for Rosedale, a former ambassador to Ethiopia, is speaking against his own government to preserve Canada's aid budget.

Why does the minister herself, someone with a strong reputation for promoting development programs for women, not show equal courage and stop the cuts now? Why is she allowing this government to discriminate against women?

HIS HONOUR YVON DUMONT

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity this Friday past to attend the swearing-in ceremony of His Honour Mr. Yvon Dumont as 21st Lieutenant Governor of the province of Manitoba.

It was a very emotional ceremony, with the Manitoba legislature packed with distinguished guests and well-wishers for the first Métis Lieutenant Governor. Her Majesty chose well in her selection of a dignified individual and a representative of a community which is a very special part of Manitoba's heritage.

In closing, I would like to acknowledge to the House the special efforts of the Hon. George Johnson, who has just retired as the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba. His Honour carried out his duties in an unselfish and dignified manner. All Manitobans and Canadians owe him a debt of gratitude.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, on March 8, 1908, over 15,000 working women marched in New York City to end child labour and brutal and dangerous work places and to fight for equal pay.

On this International Women's Day, 85 years later, over 70,000 women public service employees in Canada are still waiting for pay equity. Canadian women, aboriginal people, visible minorities and people with disabilities have made strides on employment equity, but there is a long way to go.

The Employment Equity Act does not fine employers for discriminatory hiring or promotion practices; it merely fines employers for failing to file reports. Yet this government has not responded to the recommendations of the Special Committee on the Employment Equity Act, even though it was due four months ago.

Eight years after the Tories promised pay equity to their own employees they still have not delivered. When will this government understand that Canadian women deserve far better than broken promises?

SELF-EMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the Colchester Regional Development Agency in Truro, Nova Scotia, has applied to Canada Employment and Immigration for the Self-Employment Assistance program. The Colchester area is surrounded by others that have qualified for the SEA program and it is clear it is very successful.

Under this program people on social assistance or unemployment insurance can qualify for assistance to allow them to start up their own business. Although Colchester has not been able to qualify for the Community Futures Program, as has its neighbours, it is urgently requesting that it qualify for the SEA program.

It is predicted that Colchester will benefit just as much as the surrounding counties have and this is an essential part of the community-based economic development plan for the future as outlined by the Colchester Regional Development Authority.

I strongly urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration to find ways to rectify this inequity and provide the SEA program to Colchester county.

LABOUR UNIONS

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday the largest local in this country's most politically active union voted to sever its ties with the New Democratic Party and deprive it of $40,000 a year.

Why should 100 per cent of union members be forced to contribute to the NDP when support for the NDP is less than 20 per cent? The range of political beliefs is as broad within the union movement as it is across the country.

Why should unionized workers in the rest of the country continue to donate funds solely to the NDP any more than the workers of Oshawa, which is the heartland of the NDP in Ontario?

Workers take notice. They have the right to fund or not to fund whatever political party or candidate they wish, and not necessarily the party of the union bosses. We live in a democracy and this is an undemocratic way of funding one political agenda. They should donate funds only if they wish and to those they support. There should be no political check-off and it is time to implement these changes.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, today is International Women's Day.

Today's theme of women's rights are human rights, urges us to reflect on the status of women throughout the world and women's most basic rights. Canada has long played a leading role in this field. On the international scene, we have exercised strong pressures to ensure that women's rights and participation by women in development are put on the UN agenda.

We have made women's involvement in development one of the main priorities of our development program, especially in traditional areas such as agriculture, safe water supply, credit and small business.

In many countries, progress is being made in providing women with an education and jobs and also in advancing the cause of civil and political rights for women.

International Women's Day gives us a chance to consider these achievements, as well as what remains to be done. It also gives each and every one of us an opportunity to consider what we can do to further this important cause.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, today on International Women's Day, the New Democratic Party is proud to announce that its affirmative action policy has been very successful.

Our policy provides for measures to help women, native people, members of visible minorities and disabled persons obtain the party's nomination.

The outcome of nomination meetings is not predetermined. The democratic process is respected. So far, out of 103 candidates selected, more than 51 per cent of new candidates are women. The Liberal Party, with its undemocratic nominating system, is struggling to get to the 25 per cent mark.

SEXUAL OFFENDERS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are concerned that they are being unfairly put at risk when dangerous sexual offenders are released into the community.

As a result police forces across the country are deciding whether to release the names of such dangerous offenders. However, groups such as the Elizabeth Fry and John Howard Societies warn that such policies could be ineffective, could prove dangerous to released offenders and could violate civil rights.

In Ontario the provincial government has asked police forces to wait for a directive on this issue before deciding whether to release names.

Police forces across the country need guidance on this matter in order to make decisions which are legal, which are ethical and which protect the community.

I urge the Solicitor General to work with his provincial counterparts and community police forces to develop a policy to assist police forces in this matter.

THE DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, guess who is making news down under? Our own Deputy Prime Minister, the member for Vegreville.

Why is he in the news? Well, poor little Mazzy is offended by a statement made by the Australian Prime Minister who told the truth when he said that our Prime Minister's resignation was evidence that consumption taxes, the GST for short, are unpopular and do not work.

In protest our valiant Deputy Prime Minister wrote a letter to the Australian PM in which he stated: "The GST had encouraged strong growth prospects and had fuelled recovery in Canada".

Can you believe it, Mr. Speaker? What planet does he live on?

To further impress the Aussies our deluded crocodile Maz added: "Any misrepresentation of the reasons for the Prime Minister's decision to step down would be unfortunate".

In the Tory fairyland Canadians just love the Prime Minister and his GST. Earth to Maz, it is a little different down here.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, today is International Women's Day, an appropriate time to reflect on the role of women in today's society.

We have indeed come a long way from the world that existed when we were first enfranchised in 1916. We are now super beings who juggle housework, children, husbands and demanding careers in a world that expects us to look good, act good and be good. Yet we are still measured by male standards that have little to do with our reality.

To manage, women have to be more direct, more energetic and more goal-oriented. Men who have created an elaborate set of rules applicable to their own needs often misread women's high-speed activity as inappropriate aggression. They then label us as viciously ambitious and erect defences to keep us out of the competition.

Relax, fellows. We are not out to get your jobs. We just want to be your partners and apply our broader perspective and our intuitive thinking to the day's complex work. We still need you but fellows, you still need us and together we can make a formidable team.

NOVA SCOTIA ECONOMY

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I realize today is International Women's Day and certainly from experience, I know how hard women have tried to integrate.

I bring to the attention of the House today the annual report of the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act. It is not the first time people from Nova Scotia have questioned this little fund that helps one politician and maybe a couple of provincial politicians as well.

Canadians want government to spend money wisely. It is their taxes. But what did this government allow? The Wood Island ferry related infrastructure, Pictou Industries wharf facilities, Trenton multi-use user wharf facility, a highway connector for Trenton's connector highways, a park, other things.

That is not spending Canadian taxes wisely in one little area under the auspices of the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act which would have, had it been properly administered, created the jobs that were needed in Nova Scotia. It has not gone to that.

As a woman I look at those jobs and I do not see them being created by this government. It is time for a change.

MARY PITAWANAKWAT

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, a Canadian human rights tribunal ruled in favour of Mary Pitawanakwat in her racial and sexual harassment case against the Secretary of State. However, the tribunal blamed her for part of the abuse and did not award her much compensation.

It has been established that her superiors at the Secretary of State office dealing with aboriginal programs made comments such as "Indians are savages," and made jokes about being scalped.

Ms. Pitawanakwat, an aboriginal woman, was fired seven years ago. Since then her superiors whom the tribunal found grossly negligent have been promoted. There is something very wrong in this case.

I urge the government to ensure that the Public Service does not reward racism and punish the victims and that an independent system of choosing tribunal members who are fully reflective of the Canadian population is implemented immediately.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CHILD CARE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The government's printing presses today have been busy rolling out releases extolling the progress made by women which shows only that the public relations office of the Tory dynasty is much more effective than its actual policies.

The real important document is a Statistics Canada report which shows that while women are increasingly making more of a contribution to the economy, programs supporting families are falling substantially behind. According to the Vanier Institute this is causing increased stress, pressure and exhaustion for women in this country.

How can this government easily find close to $6 billion for unnecessary, unwanted helicopters and yet renege on its commitment for a proper child care strategy to help the families of Canada?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, today indeed is International Women's Day and a day when we celebrate the advancements women have made in this country and the work we are doing all around the world to help women reach equality.

In fact some very positive and good signs women have to look at are their increasing numbers in the work force, their increasing role in management and their increasing presence in every area of public life.

Some of the issues women are concerned about today relate both to education and increasing their enrolment in many of the areas of science and technology and the balance of work and family. In that area the federal government plays a role. The provincial governments play a primary role, but employers also play a role in ensuring that their policies are compatible and enable women to participate effectively and equally in the work force throughout this country.

• (1420)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that was an answer to my question so I will ask a supplementary.

The hon. member for Rosedale, a distinguished member of this House and the Conservative government, said that recent cutbacks in aid to Africa were stupid. These programs provide assistance that is directed mainly to women and children.

The Prime Minister promised more aid in Rio, but six months later, he is cutting back assistance to the poorest countries.

Why is the government spending money on helicopters and not on women and children in the Third World? Does the Prime Minister think he can maintain the Tory dynasty by forgetting Canadian women and women throughout the world?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows the government is spending money both for defence purposes and for helicopters so we can have improved search and rescue services to rescue people on the seas and elsewhere. The government is spending money for women and children on improved child tax benefits and a whole host of other programs.

I notice the hon. member's leader has expressed grave concern about the deficit situation in the country and is promising to reduce the deficit if and when he gets into power, as unlikely an event of course as that is. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us where he is going to cut if and when he ever gets into power with his leader who says this is one of his objectives.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, among many positive suggestions made by the leader of the Liberal Party one is to cut the helicopters and save $6 billion for Canadians.

In a Gallup poll published today, more Canadians than ever before believe that women are getting a raw deal in our society and that there is less equality today than there was six years ago. They know that the economic programs of this government have worked against the interests of women by cancelling UI rights, by cancelling women's programs, by putting a million children into poverty.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister or whichever minister is going to answer, when speaking of a Tory dynasty does it mean there will be a continuation of poverty for close to 20 per cent of women? Does it mean there will be a continuation of poverty for a million children? Will there be continued cuts in social assistance, women's programs and foreign aid? If this is a Tory dynasty, thank God it is about to end.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is showing somewhat more erratic tendencies than he normally does today. He is probably upset by the fact that our party is going through a metamorphosis and will probably be unrecognizable within the next several months.

The hon. gentleman suggests if we did not enter into a contract to purchase helicopters that there could be a $6 billion saving over the next 30 years. Will the hon. gentleman tell the House how he is going to achieve the $17 billion a year saving that his leader tells us he is going to achieve if and when he comes to power and he abolishes the GST? How will that $17 billion a year saving be accomplished, or what other taxes will be increased to make it up?

Could the hon. gentleman enlighten the people of Canada so they will know exactly what might happen to them if the hon. member's party ever gets into power?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, we now have the dinosaur speaking for the dynasty. My question is for the Minister of National Defence.

When women employees of National Defence asked to put up an information booth on pay equity for International Women's Day, the commandant of the National Defence Medical Centre said no. What is worse, the commandant showed a shocking contempt for the law when he said in writing that he was not fully in support of equal pay for work of equal value and that women should get into high paying trades if they wanted more money.

What has the minister herself done to tell this senior officer and others that such attitudes will not be tolerated?

• (1425)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not been made aware of that particular set of circumstances. I thank the hon. member for raising the point. I will be very happy to look into that. The women involved have not made me aware of it and I am open to their communications.

It is important to point out that Canada ranks second in comparison to all NATO countries in the number of women in our Armed Forces. It has been a challenge to change attitudes and to ensure that women serve with equality in the Armed Forces.

I give an enormous amount of credit to my colleague, the former Associate Minister of National Defence, now the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women, in the work that she did in charge of personnel in the Armed Forces when she was the Associate Minister of National Defence.

Our policy is obviously the full equality of women in the Armed Forces. That continues to be our policy and we will work toward that.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. If she is too busy applying for a new job to look after employees in her own department, let me table a letter she received nearly a month ago. This has been followed up by repeated phone calls to her office.

I would like to ask a supplementary question. This letter mentions very serious payroll discrimination against women in her department, the kind of discrimination that costs many women as much as $15,000 annually.

I wonder why the minister has not taken any action to stop this discrimination.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, it is Canadian forces policy to ensure that women are equal in the Armed Forces. I have a keen interest in the situation to which the hon. member referred, and I can assure her that I will take appropriate action.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, every day thousands of Canadian women are battered, beaten and raped. One out of every two women who arrives at a shelter with her children is turned away because of lack of space.

This government is spending over $11 million for a panel on violence against women, almost $2 million for a telephone survey and more money on research. At the same time it is cutting back on shelters for battered women with its multibillion dollar cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

Why is this government paying people to tell it what we already know, that violence against women is a problem? Why is this government at the same time cutting and chopping away at the necessary services for battered women and their children?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised at my hon. colleague's question on this account. Surely she recognizes, as I and women across this country do, the importance of developing a national action plan to deal with violence against women. It is a plan which will bring together governments, non-government organizations, communities and women to eliminate violence against women in all its respects throughout this country.

In order to do that it is necessary to provide the appropriate information and develop that plan. I am sure the panel will bring forward that plan over the next few months. However, in doing its work the panel has gone to over 100 communities in this country. It has already initiated the kinds of changes required to deal with the issue of violence against women in their homes and on the streets. The development of the community action program is an important part of it.

Let me remind my hon. colleague as well that part of the $136 million federal family violence program is indeed going to support additional spaces and shelters and second stage housing programs for women who are victims of violence.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the reality is absolutely indifferent to that. There have been cuts to the Secretary of State women's program. There is the elimination of the family allowance program. There is the reneging on the child care in this country and the breaking of pay equity promises. There have been cuts to training for women, cuts to unemployment insurance for women, the elimination of social housing, cuts to the existing child care services and yes, cuts to services and shelters for battered women.

When this is contrasted with this government's commitment of—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member perhaps to put the question.

• (1430)

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, when you contrast this to the commitment to 50 sub-hunting helicopters, it is incredible. A strong economy cannot be built—

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may have a question but I have not yet heard it.

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with a very serious issue which should be dealt with on the basis of facts and reality.

If we look at the situation of Canadian women today, we should give them credit for the work they have done and for the advancement they have made. The wage gap is closing. More and more women are going into science and technology. The situation of women in Canada is almost without comparison around the world.

This has been as a result of the work of governments and women on the front line so that we can achieve real equality. Let us work together. Let us not be shouting at each other over these issues. This requires the concerted efforts of all of us to achieve the common goals of equality for men and women.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, specifically, women's groups have documented 14 cases of women in Canada facing deportation. Some are facing domestic violence in Canada and some state and domestic violence from abroad.

I want to ask the minister responsible for immigration this. When fully 80 per cent of the world's refugees are women and children and two-thirds of the refugees accepted in Canada are men, will the minister take this opportunity on International Women's Day to announce a moratorium on the deportation of women who are battered? Will he take the opportunity today to announce a Canadian policy to provide safe haven for women and children in Canada?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises an important issue. It is one that a great many Canadians are concerned with.

As the hon. member knows, in January of this year I instructed my officials in the department to conduct discussions with interested individuals and groups across Canada with the objective of developing a consensus on how we as a country could deal with women who claim to be victims of persecution or violence.

We are the first government ever to introduce into the Immigration Act, which that party opposed by the way, a protection and authority to require for every refugee claimant who faces harsh or unusual circumstances in her country of origin that the decision of the IRB be reviewed.

I think this is a positive step in addressing the concerns of the hon. member.

HELICOPTERS

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

On February 25 in response to a question I had asked the minister about the EH-101 cold war helicopters, the minister stated that a cancellation of the project would mean "a loss to Canada's search and rescue capability".

Is it not true that the EH-101's tremendous down draft can literally blow away any person the crew is intending to rescue? Will the minister not admit it is true what a defence analyst by the name of Dale Grant wrote last week, that the EH-101 will "blow away anything floating in the water below it"?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is not true.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the minister should be aware that in her own dossier she will find reports indicating clearly and unequivocally that there is not a country in the world that uses this type of helicopter for search and rescue purposes. The minister should know that.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. On February 3 in this House the minister was not able to inform the House what the extent of the penalty clause would be with regard to the cancellation of this particular project. I now take this opportunity to ask the minister if she would indicate to the House the extent of the penalty clause.

How much of that money will go to the vendor? How much money will go to the various lobbyist groups that are working on behalf of that particular vendor?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member talks about lobbyists that are working for that, he should remember that the key lobbyist for the EH-101 is a member of the transition team of the Leader of the Opposition.

• (1435)

Mr. Dick: When the hon. member mentioned that no other country in the world uses that helicopter for search and rescue, he is absolutely right because the helicopter has not been built yet.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, once again the minister who just spoke has earned his well-deserved reputation for never letting the facts stand in the way of the truth of a good accusation.

The helicopter has been built. It is shameful that the minister does not know it. There are five of them flying. One month ago, one of them crashed. This minister is an embarrassment to the notion of responsible government for not knowing that about a $6 billion acquisition.

I want to ask a question of the minister who is responsible, the Minister of National Defence. On February 25 the Leader of the Opposition urged the minister of defence to look at the cancellation of this procurement project. The minister said it is not "an unnecessary expense. It is very important for our Canadian forces".

I want to ask the minister of defence whether she is aware that the Italians, who make up one-half of the British-Italian consortium, have reduced their own helicopter order of the EH-101 from 36 aircraft to 16. They have sliced their own order by more than half.

In short, why is Canada the biggest single recipient of a helicopter which one-half of the consortium has now reduced its order for by over 50 per cent? Why are we funding technology and industry in Britain and Italy and refusing to create jobs here at home?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the purchase of the EH-101 helicopters will create 45,000 person-years of employment in Canada, particularly in industries which are 21st century industries that employ women as much as they employ men.

In other words, the industrial benefits of this contract are very important for Canada. I cannot speculate on why the Italian government does or does not make the purchases that it makes.

The EH-101 has been ordered as a shipborne helicopter for our frigates. If the hon. member is suggesting that we should cut back on the purchase of the EH-101 shipborne helicopters, then the natural corollary of that recommendation would be a reduction in the number of frigates that we buy for the Canadian navy.

I think this is something that we should review. I am very happy to hear the views of the hon. member. If he is of the view that this helicopter should not be bought for search and rescue, I would like to know which of the specifications of the EH-101 search and rescue capabilities the hon. member thinks are expendable in order to save money.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not answering the question. Let me give her another opportunity.

This project was announced in 1986 at a cost then of $2 billion. By 1988 the cost was $2.3 billion. By 1991 the cost was $4.4 billion. Two weeks ago we were told, and the government acknowledged, that the cost had gone up to nearly $6 billion.

I want to ask the minister again. I want her to think seriously about this because Canadians are thinking seriously about it. Why is Canada purchasing more of these helicopters than all the other nations of the world combined? Why in particular are we saying that we can afford this Cadillac extravagance in terms of a helicopter when there are cheaper alternatives and when the Government of Italy, one-half of the consortium, has reduced its order from 36 to 16?

Madam minister, it is a serious question. Give us a serious answer.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Government of Italy will be very flattered by the suggestion of the hon. member that we should allow it to make our defence policy.

The fact of the matter is we buy this helicopter because it has specifications that are required for Canada. The last time I looked, Italy did not have the longest coastline in the world as we do. It does not have to conduct search and rescue operations in icing conditions and high wind conditions.

• (1440)

An hon. member: What about Hibernia?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious question. I would like to give one example of why the specifications of this helicopter are important. Icing conditions often restrict the search and rescue helicopter response in this country. On December 16, 1990, when the fishing vessel Nadine sank in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, CH-113 Labrador crews were delayed nine hours by weather and icing conditions. Seven people died in this tragic accident. The EH-101 could have flown in this weather.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the government makes choices and its choice is helicopters. Our choice is day care centres.

I would like to point out that Statistics Canada reported last week that two-thirds of women with a child at home under the age of six were also in the paid labour force, a growth of 20 per cent in 10 years. There has been no subsequent growth in child care spaces. The child care program is a critical addition to Canada's social infrastructure.

How can the government continue to ignore over one million children in need of a safe child care environment? Will the government do something about the desperate need for child care in this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question about day care centres several times before. First of all, I think it is false to claim that the government does not invest in day care centres, because over $1 billion annually is spent on all kinds of programs, especially in the form of tax credits allowed for day care. We also have a number of joint projects with the provinces.

We have also said this question remains a priority, in terms of the decision we made last year to provide substantial assistance for children at risk, to deal with their particular situation. The $3 billion we invested in 1992 in this sector, to be spent over a period of five years, reflects our concern for the children of this country.

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the choices were between helicopters and child care spaces. I bring you back to that.

Our studies have shown that a comprehensive, non-profit, affordable and accessible child care program that will double the number of spaces would create 40,000 new jobs, improve the salaries of those who are already working in the program, put the system on a sound financial footing and put 600,000 Canadian kids in safe, affordable child care.

Why does this government continue to turn its back on Canadian kids who need child care?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, once again I repeat what I said before. Last year we put $3 billion into child care. Of course, to do all that the member would like to do, I would need the kind of money that NDP governments normally have. But even B.C., Ontario and Saskatchewan do not have that money any more.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, recently the Minister for International Trade stated that the North American free trade legislation should be put through Parliament as soon as possible "to avoid uncertainty for business people".

Now a government spokesman has said that the legislation may be delayed at least until June or perhaps beyond when the U.S. position may have become clearer.

What has changed? Who is speaking for the government? Is the government finally conceding, as the opposition has recognized all along, that the parallel accords proposed by the new U.S. administration are tantamount to a renegotiation of the North American free trade agreement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me quote from someone who I think speaks for the government.

The Prime Minister when asked a question about NAFTA said it will pass. The questioner went on to say: "There are serious doubts that it will be ratified". The Prime Minister said: "Oh, no. NAFTA will pass. NAFTA will be passed probably by June". In a CNN interview he said: "Oh, it will be ratified here by June. We are going to get it through the House of Commons". I am sure my hon. friend will support us in getting it through the House of Commons because it is very consistent with the trade policy that he advocates for members of the Liberal Party of Canada.

The matter is very clear. The policy of the government will pass. The side agreements on the environment and on labour will be negotiated among the three countries but the President of Mexico, the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada have all said that the NAFTA signed in December will not be re-opened.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows the opposition has for some time urged that Canada should seek strengthening of the labour and environmental clauses in the North American free trade agreement.

Now that the United States has taken that initiative, when is the minister going to state what the Canadian position is? Has he any position on the renegotiation which will begin next week of the two essential areas of environment and labour and quite possibly import surges? When is the minister going to share with the Canadian people what the position of the government is?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend is not in the House all the time, but I have said quite consistently, starting from a year ago February, that the Government of Canada has been in support of side agreements to the NAFTA covering labour and the environment.

These were turned down by the Government of the United States and the Government of Mexico, but now there is the new administration and President Clinton has said he wants to review the matter, and we are supportive of that.

Some of the aspects of the environmental matters were raised by Canada back in September. That contributed in part to the establishment of the North American Commission on the Environment, which is precisely what we proposed a year ago February.

CN RAIL

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and concerns the decision by CN Rail to dismiss nearly 11,000 Canadian workers.

Since the Government of Canada is CN Rail's only shareholder, does the minister support this decision to dismiss workers in Montreal, Moncton, Winnipeg and other places?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa South surely knows that the government is not pleased about any job loss. Nevertheless, the hon. member must know that Parliament has given Canadian National the mandate to operate on a business–like basis and to give its customers the best service.

Canadian National is the sixth largest railway in North America in terms of its operations, with revenues of $3 billion, and has the second largest number of employees. It has as many employees as companies that do almost twice as much business. CN must become competitive if it wants to stay healthy and the decisions it has made were made within the terms of its mandate.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the minister clearly supports firing employees. Let me ask him this question. Mr. Tellier said in his announcement that federal and provincial taxes were a large part of the problem for Canada's railways. I quote: "Canadian railways pay some $225 million more in taxes per year than U.S. railroads".

Does the minister agree with this statement? Why does he think Canadian workers should bear the brunt of the solution when Canadian governments are causing a large part of the problem?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy the member in the latter part of his question rectified what he had said in the first part. The CEO of CN has not blamed the federal government. He has blamed the fact that the railways in general are paying too much money in taxes.

He should know that the federal government collects $75 million a year from the railways and that is 18 per cent of their total taxes. They pay $203 million to provincial governments, which is 48.6 per cent, and $139 million to municipalities, which is 33.4 per cent.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Canadians are disturbed and concerned over the terrible crimes perpetrated on our society. I would like to know what the minister intends to do about the Young Offenders Act. Will he introduce amendments which will permit the naming of young offenders who commit violent crimes?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, this is a very controversial issue, as my hon. friend knows.

I know there is public concern about the situation. The courts are open to the public and there is access to the records of young offenders for a broad range of purposes.

The question on the other side concerns the rehabilitation process. We have to make sure the rehabilitation process works. The way we can achieve that is by bringing everybody together to work on getting it done.

As my hon. friend from Mississauga West and all other members of the House will know, there was a unanimous report of the standing committee on justice which made a lot of recommendations concerning crime prevention in this country. I hope the symposium we are having on crime prevention in Toronto this week will address those issues and some others, with the help of all stakeholders including members of this House.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government. Two weeks ago, the government announced that the women's program would be funded permanently. The same day, it took $1 million from that program. This morning, the National Federation of French Canadian Women and the Quebec Women's Federation asked the government to double the amount for enhancing the status of women.

Does the government intend to follow through this request from women's groups?

Hon. Monique Landry (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, indeed, my colleague mentioned that the women's program had been renewed and the good news he forgot to mention is that it has been renewed permanently.

I can tell him that women's groups applauded this decision of the government, which shows our government's commitment to support women's groups that have already done a great deal for women's equality and all the concerns that women have in their communities.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, surely the minister could have at least dealt with the heart of the question, the cuts received by women's groups after the announcement was made.

Health and welfare estimates list family planning and reproductive health as past initiatives. There is no commitment to fund these areas in 1993–94.

Considering the long-term social and economic impact of unwanted pregnancies on the individuals involved and on society, will the minister commit here and now to continuing to fund family planning education and research in the coming year?

Hon. Monique Landry (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I must tell the hon. member that in the short time I have held my new position, I had an opportunity to meet representatives of women's groups from across Canada and of course we discussed their priorities. I encouraged them to continue in the direction they had taken and I renewed the commitment to the women's program, which has been cut 10 per cent, like all other government programs.

I also discussed with them a new approach along the lines that my colleague mentioned earlier of developing new partnerships. The government gives them very substantial support. Indeed, we support 500 groups a year. But I think that we must go beyond that and try now to discover partnerships with the private sector and the public sector. Many experiences have already been very positive. This is really the kind of message that I discussed with them and I will continue as well.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

As the House knows the green plan is the operative strategy of the Ministry of the Environment. In the green plan the Red River and Assiniboine River are identified as areas that require an awful lot of attention.

Could the minister tell the House what his plans are to resolve these issues?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am more than happy to tell the hon. member what my plans are—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Charest: —on the Red and the Assiniboine, of course. As he has referred, there is an interest in our government to undertake an initiative around the ecosystem of the Red and the Assiniboine.

I understand the Government of Manitoba has also undertaken some work in this area. We look forward to working together as we examine the different alternatives there are for us in dealing with that ecosystem which is very important for Manitoba and Canada.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

In late January officials of CIC in Halifax rejected outright a request by Lasmo PLC to use foreign instead of Canadian crews in its operations within Canadian waters. The reason for this was simple. It was because there were hundreds of qualified, ready, willing and able Canadian seafarers to do those jobs.

Now that the file is on the minister's desk does he support the decision of the Halifax office or has he overruled it to allow Lasmo PLC, a foreign company, to displace Canadian workers with foreign crews?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the issue the hon. member raises implicates the Canada first employment policy. It has been applied in this case just like in every other case. The decision has been taken according to the act, to the law and to the principles involved.

I do not think he is serving Halifax or Nova Scotia well by claiming this is about taking jobs away from Canadians. The policy is clear. It is a Canadian first policy. In this specific instance the hon. member should know the principles of the law will be applied.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, less than 40 minutes ago senior officials in the minister's own department confirmed that a decision had been made to allow Lasmo PLC to displace Canadian workers with foreign crews.

What form of twisted logic does the minister suffer from that would allow him to make a decision to favour a multinational British oil company over the interests of Canadian workers?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the interests of Canadian workers are being protected. The principles of the act, as I referred to earlier, are in place and are fully respected.

The decision to allow for a certain part of the crew to be foreign workers stems from the fact that the transportation of the crude from Sable Island to where it has to go is an international trip and as such qualifies as an exception under the act.

LANGUAGE MINORITIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Three years ago, the Mahé case gave minorities the right to manage their own educational institutions. The Supreme Court of Canada confirmed this right in a decision handed down last week, a decision that concerned language minorities and, more specifically, the Franco-Manitoban minority.

In view of the disturbing comments made by Premier Filmon, to the effect that francophones in Manitoba must accept his proposal and ignore the law, can the Secretary of State inform the House whether she has started serious negotiations with the provinces, and more specifically with Manitoba, to make an offer of federal assistance to that province, once and for all, to help the Government of Manitoba give its minority the right to manage its own educational institutions?

Hon. Monique Landry (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member I welcomed the decision handed down last week, which came almost exactly three years after the Mahé decision, reinforcing and refining the principles contained in that decision.

I can inform the hon. member that I am now discussing with my colleagues a series of measures to help the provinces implement a school management program. As soon as the general plan has been finalized, I intend to meet the provinces with a view to helping them implement a program that is so important to the survival of minority communities.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, may I just express some frustration with that answer because Conservatives are known for foot dragging. On the dossier of financing of francophone rights to education it is not only foot dragging federally but also provincially.

I want to quote Saskatchewan Premier Romanow in The Globe and Mail of February 7: "The issue for us here is another example of stalled and frustrating federal-provincial matters".

When will cabinet decide and when will Canadians know what position this government has taken in regard to rights of minority language groups to manage their own schools?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do not think my Liberal colleague can find anything to criticize here. Since we came to power, we have very substantially demonstrated our commitment to supporting minority communities, as he well knows.

We passed the Official Languages Act, and we recognize the importance of supporting the provinces in the area of minority education and school management. I repeat that discussions are at a very advanced stage, and I hope that in the coming weeks we will be able to start discussions with the provinces.

I may remind the hon. member that the provinces have to do their share as well. Perhaps he could urge the provinces to put in place the appropriate legislation, so that when we have the money, the provinces are ready to proceed.

WEST COAST SALMON FISHERY

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of fisheries. It flows out of the Fifth Estate program on high seas drift-net fishing.

I want to know what this government is going to do with its surveillance and enforcement to prevent the theft of B.C. salmon on the high seas.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I assume the hon. member will be supporting the EH-101 helicopter initiative because she is concerned and worried about surveillance on the high seas. We are glad to have her support.

With reference to what is being done, we should put the problem in perspective. The north Pacific salmon come mostly from Russia and countries other than Canada. About .05 per cent of Canada's 80,000 tonnes of Pacific salmon that are caught every year are at jeopardy in this situation.

We participate in the various treaty arrangements, aerial surveillance and the like in that area. In co-operation with other police forces we have apprehended people who have taken these salmon illegally and attempted to sell them. We will continue to do that. However, we have no patrol vessels in the area. We are participating in other ways in the surveillance and enforcement activities in this huge area.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is for the Minister of Justice. It arises out of today's Question Period and his reply to the question of the hon. member for Erie about the Young Offenders Act.

I was pleased that the minister invited all members from this House to attend the national symposium on crime prevention in Toronto. I have been trying through his office and through the department to attend that national symposium for a month now. I was told that it was limited to the members on the parliamentary standing committee on justice.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may well have a matter which he wishes to discuss with the minister or others, but I have to say it is going too far to say that it is a question of privilege.

• (1505)

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I believe the minister owes it to this House. Can he accommodate the members he invited today? If he can, fine. If he cannot, then he should not invite us.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister may want to deal with that.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, there are 250 or 260 seats. There are people representing all Canadian organizations, and I welcome the opportunity to mention this. People from the municipalities, the provinces, the federal government, from several departments, from the private sector, members of Parliament, members of the standing committee on justice have been invited. I think it would probably be easy for his party's Whip to make arrangements for access to the seats available to party members. I have no objection. There are seats for the members of the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Clearly, there may be a problem, but I think it could be solved in a conversation between hon. members and the minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SITUATION IN YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear to all of us that the tragic war in the former Yugoslavia is unparalleled in terms of its complexity and of the political, economic and ethnic forces involved. It continues to severely challenge the international community and we continue to search for effective ways of responding to this enormous humanitarian crisis.

We must find ways to cut to the very heart and root of this tragedy. We must find ways to bring this war to an end. We must find a way to stop further bloodshed. We must convince all parties involved that the use of force will gain them nothing. They must realize that after this is over they will have to live side by side no matter what the outcome. They must realize that no peace can be brought about by the imposition of military might.

Intense negotiations have taken place in New York over the past several days. These are expected to resume toward the end of this week. They show signs that at least some of the parties are seriously interested in a negotiated settlement. Lord Owen and Cyrus Vance have produced over the months, and with much dedication, a comprehensive package. This should form the basis of new political, security and territorial arrangements for Bosnians. This is the only proposal available to the parties and they must all negotiate seriously on this basis.

We have been active with the parties urging them to find a meaningful and fair compromise. This is precisely the message that our ambassador to the UN delivered to Dr. Karadzic, on my instructions, last Friday. Any party that stands in the way of a political compromise will face further international condemnation and isolation. We are ready to do whatever we can to help in the difficult search for peace.

[English]

That includes of course and must include the provision of humanitarian assistance until this horrifying and tragic war is brought to an end.

Canadians continue to demonstrate their solidarity and their compassion for those who have been forced into these terrible situations and who are suffering all forms of human degradation. Our government will continue to provide support for these unfortunate people in reflection of what Canadians have expressed they want us to do.

To channel this humanitarian assistance we have chosen to utilize international relief organizations. We have disbursed over $25 million through the United Nations and other organizations. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees, UNICEF, the World Health Organization, the World Food Program, the UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, the United Nations volunteers, the International Committee of the Red Cross and the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies have been our agents. We have found in them close co-operation.

We have intentionally chosen to let those with expertise and objectivity assess the requirements. We have consistently told these organizations that our intention is to help those most in need with what they most urgently require.

We know it is not enough. We know that governments and public institutions in the region are barely capable of coping with hundreds of thousands of refugees and displaced persons. The economies of these countries have been decimated.

We have addressed what we believe to be the number one priority: to help those who have been expelled by warfare and to counter the ignominious practice of ethnic cleansing.

First and foremost, we must ensure that people receive food, medicine and shelter, but we must also deal with the social and emotional legacies of war. In December 1992 and again last Friday, I announced a specific grant to assist the victims of sexual violence. Canadians have been outraged by the rape and sexual assault of women and children in this war. The victims of these repugnant crimes require our urgent assistance.

Both the Minister responsible for the Status of Women and myself indicated on Friday that Canada will provide a further $1.5 million to address these needs. Our contribution will help UNHCR and UNICEF provide women and children with medical supplies, rape-trauma counselling services, food, clothing and shelter.

[English]

Today, I am pleased to announce a further contribution of $9.5 million in response to the ongoing international appeals. We will help the World Food Program, the International Committee of the Red Cross, the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies and UNICEF to continue their activities.

This new contribution outlines Canada's continuing concern for those who are suffering. By channelling our assistance through these established agencies we know that we are addressing identified shortages. We know that our contribution will be directed to and received by those most in need.

As this House knows, the Canadian forces are present on the ground in Bosnia as part of the UN Protection Force. Our troops, a battalion of the Royal Canadian Regiment, have already begun the task of ensuring safe delivery of humanitarian assistance in eastern Bosnia, an area of great need. Our forces have also brought large quantities of food and medical supplies by air to Sarajevo during more than 354 missions. Our men and women operate under the most hazardous of conditions with great commitment and bravery. They are a credit to all Canadians.

The Americans have made a different choice. They have chosen to drop supplies from the air to reach villages isolated for months from any relief. This is a commendable initiative. It will supplement what is being done by land by countries like ours and we fully support them in their efforts.

We know that humanitarian assistance by itself will never be enough. Canada will continue to explore all means for bringing a quick and lasting end to this tragedy, despite many discouraging starts up until now.

We cannot allow the world to disintegrate once again into the basest forms of inhumanity. We must take the lessons of the century and put an end once and for all to the festering hatreds that continue to fuel the fires of war in the former Yugoslavia.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the minister's appearance in the House to make these announcements. I am sure we can look forward to many more in the months ahead under the circumstances and we will certainly welcome this interest in putting forward and tabling in the House important declarations.

Let me also say that in terms of the recommendations or proposals being made by the minister for increased assistance for humanitarian purposes, we fully applaud this initiative and support this kind of effort. This is one of the areas in which Canada can continue to make an important contribution.

In saying that, I hope the minister would take into account some questions that arise out of the first part of her statement. The first issue is whether the government is in any way considering proposals made by a number of the Canadian cultural organizations that have friends and relatives in the former Yugoslavia and are very anxious to supply forms of assistance. In particular, I can think of the willingness of groups to offer medicine and foodstuffs but have so far not been able to develop any co-operative relationship with the government to actually send to these areas.

One group I met with last week indicated it had accumulated a large amount of medicine to send and is utilizing United States aircraft, the U.S. government, to send these provisions and support. So far it has not been able to do it through Canadian auspices.

One of the clear questions I would raise, and in fact I would put it in the form of a request, is that the government seriously consider offering to use our transport aircraft to move into that area and to help in the delivery of those kinds of initiatives. I do not believe they should go necessarily in the areas of direct conflict. Certainly the suffering going on in the refugee camps in Croatia and other areas such as Hungary and the borders are very crucial. I think we can be of great help.

Another matter I would like to raise and it is one the minister did not address is the issue of whether the government is going to finally change its policy and begin accepting as bona fide refugees women who have been suffering from severe persecution.

The minister properly announced and we support the idea of offering international assistance for those who have suffered abuse, sexual crime or violations in the area. However in a form of contradiction while we are offering to help internationally, we are refusing to take a more genuine, open look at that problem here in Canada. As we have seen in recent weeks, there are hundreds of women who have escaped from the most incredible conditions and have applied for refugee status and now are in threat of being sent back.

It hardly makes sense to me that on the one hand we would be saying we must assist them through international organizations but on the other hand we are not prepared to take a more open look at our domestic policy as it relates to the acceptance and provision of this as a refugee claim. I understand that it would be broadening the definition but surely to goodness in this day and age with all the changes going on in the world, Canada could take a lead in helping to broaden that definition and show other countries it is possible by setting the kind of criteria that is required.

A third issue I would like to ask the minister about, and I am really surprised she did not mention it because frankly she has taken an initiative in the past on this matter, is the issue of war crimes.

We have heard about the Security Council authorizing a proposal or a plan for a war crimes tribunal. We have had question marks in this House about whether the questionnaires our own government is using to elicit responses is really one that could lead to very serious human rights abuses of our own Canadian citizens.

It would seem to me that this would have been the opportune time for the minister to have clearly addressed what it is that Canada is doing with its war crimes procedure. If it is going to be effective, it seems to me it could be one of the most significant deterrents to actions taking place, such as the massacres in Bosnia which are totally contradictory to all the conventions of war.

I wonder by its omission whether the government has let go of this issue, whether it is no longer interested in the issue. Is it no longer prepared to put in place the steps that are required to make this a real, effective and fair procedure both protecting the rights of anybody who is going to be named and at the same time ensuring that the war crimes proposal does get the kind of attention and support it deserves?

In saying that, I am not in any way taking away from the announcement of more direct assistance to international organizations but I do think it could stand a somewhat broader examination here in Canada.

It does take me to a more fundamental question which is addressed in the last portion of the minister's remarks that frankly leave us all hanging, waiting for an answer. The fundamental question is as to what Canada's position is in relation to the problem of Bosnia and that conflict.

We talk about how we want them to solve the problem. We hope the Vance–Owen plan will be introduced. What are we doing specifically as a country to ensure that the full weight of our reputation and background experience is brought to bear? After all, we have close to 2,500 troops and are growing in that area. That surely gives us a substantial amount of leverage. I think it is even closer to 5,000 troops. That should give us the right to take significant actions to develop plans and proposals. It gives us a voice.

The minister mentions in the statement I received that she had sent a letter to our ambassador to pass on to the Bosnian–Serbian leaders. What was in it? What did we say? What did we ask for? Are we threatening? Are we cajoling? Are we persuading? Are we expressing fond hopes? Are we prepared to take any action? Do we have a plan? Are we taking any new diplomatic initiatives? Are we working with the Americans? Are we trying to get our European allies to have a little stiffer backbone when it comes to these matters?

After all, part of the problem has been the total failure of European countries to address this issue in its early findings. Even the Vance–Owen plan is going to require significant contributions.

I must say at the same time that in listening to the reports today from the United Nations, we have the Secretary–General saying it may be that we will have to use force in that area to get a solution.

I was listening with some interest to the minister's statement, assuming that the very important policy statement of the Secretary–General would be addressed. I would like to know what it is that Canada intends to do. Are we supportive of the Secretary–General? Do we think the Security Council will have to authorize a new resolution in order to ensure that the parties to the dispute understand that the UN is serious about this? Are we, in fact, once again leaving a dangling participle? Maybe we do not have a position.

The Vance–Owen plan, if it is accepted, will require some 50,000 troops to implement and enforce any cease–fire. Is Canada going to play a role? Are we going to be part of the truce? If so, are we prepared to substantially shift the priorities of the government in defence spending so that we can get the proper number of troops with the right equipment and the right training at the right place to make a full contribution? These are all serious and significant questions that still go without answers.

Mr. Speaker, I see you beginning to make a slight move toward the edge of your seat which suggests to me that my time may be at an end. I am very sorry because there are many other questions I would like to pose. It may simply be that this is the first taste.

I would hope that the minister, now that she has made this initial step in the House of Commons to share with us her ideas and plans, might be prepared in the very near future to broaden them. I hope that she might bring into this Chamber a full, comprehensive statement on what are our future peacekeeping requirements and commitments and where we should be going with them. That would then be the cause of a very serious debate.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to welcome the key elements of the statement made by the minister this afternoon.

We fully support the additional humanitarian relief dollars that she announced on Friday for victims of rape and sexual assault. Earlier this year we pressed the government to do just that. We are pleased that she has responded.

We are also pleased in the government's general support for the Vance–Owen process. I am sure all members of the House join her in hoping that this will produce peace in the region. Finally we support, of course, her strong statement of support for our women and men in the area who serve Canada, the United Nations and humanity there. It is a very risky and dangerous project in which they are engaged. It is a very important one. They have the support of the people of Canada in that. Canada has the third largest contingent in the Bosnia area after France and the U.K. and we are glad to have their support.

I might take the opportunity however to raise some concerns. First, we are all concerned at the persistent violation of rights by the Serbian forces that have generally been supported by the government of Serbia, the crackdown on moderate political forces in Serbia, the failure to act against forces which have been involved in rape, sexual assault and other crimes against humanity, and the persistent interference with humanitarian relief.

The most graphic example of the latter has been the now confirmed reports of 20,000 Bosnian Muslim victims of sexual assault, rape and other violence at the hands of Serbian forces. These actions on the part of the Serbians must not only be condemned and stopped but must be the subject of the war crimes tribunal.

On that we also have a concern and I would ask the minister to try to specifically address this if she has not already done so. The panel appointed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations of course consists all of men and I say that seems to be too often the tradition of the United Nations.

In this case, where one of the serious allegations is of rape and sexual assault, it is entirely inappropriate that the panel consists entirely of men. This is reinforced, I may say, by statements attributed to the chairman of the commission, Mr. Frits Kalshoven of Holland, who is quoted as saying that the rape allegations are going to be a very difficult aspect of the investigation. He said: "It is very difficult for a woman to admit that she has been raped. At the same time it is also very easy for a woman to tell the story that she has been raped when it is untrue". That is a totally unacceptable statement coming from anyone, but most importantly from the chair of the panel that is looking into these allegations.

I may add that the Canadian military lawyer who has been assigned to the panel, Commodore William Fenrick, has also noted the difficulties they are going to face in reviewing these particular charges. I would hope the government would intervene to see there are changes in this.

Two other quick points. We call on the government again to expand the Canadian definition of convention refugee and to get the United Nations to expand the Geneva Convention on Refugees to include those who are refugees from sexual assault. We say that sexual abuse, rape and sexual assault should be added to the definition of war crimes.

I join with the member for Winnipeg South Centre in saying to the government that it should come forward with proposals for a Canadian role in the future, assuming the Vance–Owen discussions are successful.

Let me mention two other points. We call on the government to move quickly to recognize the government of Croatia. The government has delayed and delayed this most important step. There is no legal impediment as to why the government of Croatia should not now be recognized. It has been recognized by other governments. I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if she can find a way to give a commitment to this House to recognize the government of Croatia so that it can take its place in the international world.

Finally, I cannot help but use the opportunity to draw attention to the fact that the government is coming forward with $9.5 million for humanitarian relief and is taking the time to bring it before the House, while at the same time it is blotting Canada's reputation around the world and betraying a commitment to the people of the world by cutting back on official development assistance. We see in Somalia and even in Bosnia that the heart of these problems is the failure of the world to come to grips with the issue of justice and to distribute this world's goods fairly and properly. That is really what is at the heart of so many of the problems the world is facing today.

For the government to cut back on hundreds of millions of dollars to the poorest people of the world while it takes the time of this House to make much about its generosity on behalf of the Canadian people is the height of hypocrisy.

This minister is responsible for Official Development Assistance. It is time the government was called to account for its failures on this point.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I just wanted to say, once again, it is unfortunate that the Standing Orders do not allow us to put questions to the minister or to pursue the debate on this very important issue. I have always said this is one of the weak points of the Standing Orders. I do, however, want people to realize that we are determined to go ahead and change the Standing Orders.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member for Saint-Denis knows perfectly well that if he wants to improve the Standing Orders, he can submit suggestions to the appropriate committee of the House.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. You may have realized that the reason I raised this point of order was to give notice that I intend to continue, as you suggested, my submissions to the committee that is considering these matters.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on the occasion of International Women's Day to draw to the attention of the House one of the key elements of women's equality. In fact this year the theme of International Women's Day that we have adopted at the federal level is "Women's Rights are Human Rights".

In 1993 the world is more clearly aware of the abuses of human rights than ever before. We have heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs talk about it in the context of Bosnia, but there is hope because in June of this year even more attention will be focused on this issue when the United Nations hosts the world conference on human rights for the first time in 25 years. That conference will be taking place in Vienna, Austria.

Events around the world present opportunities for a more rigorous examination of the unequal treatment of women in our society and the chance to create a new ethic of justice for both genders.

The acknowledgement that women's rights are human rights also has important consequences for the way in which we view fundamental issues in our societies. The right to food, to shelter, to property, to social security, to health care, to employment, to religious and political freedom and to live without fear of violence should all apply equally to women and men. In many cases in many parts of the world they do not.

The facts underline this scenario. Women constitute half the world's population but they put in two-thirds of the working hours. They grow half the food but they receive one-tenth the wages and they own a mere 1 per cent of the world's property. They are the main educators of the world's children yet they make up most of the world's illiterate people. They are guardians of family health yet 15 million of their babies die annually from entirely preventable diseases.

We should take pride today on International Women's Day that indeed Canada has been on the forefront of international efforts to accelerate the recognition of women's rights as human rights. We have constantly stressed the concept of women's rights as an integral component of human rights at the United Nations. We strongly put forward initiatives recognizing, for example, that violence against women is an abuse of human rights.

We have also played an instrumental role in the development of the United Nations declaration on the elimination of violence against women. This declaration is going to be considered at the UN Commission on the Status of Women later this month. It is our hope that it will receive support from nations around the world and will go forward to the UN Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly of the UN for ratification later this year.

• (1535)

Similarly, Canada is an energetic and constant defender of women's rights in other international forums, including the Commonwealth, la Francophonie, the Organization of American States and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development.

[English]

Women's rights also continue to be a major element of Canada's international aid policy. In 1984 CIDA adopted a women in development policy with the objective of integrating women of the Third World into the development programs, both as agents and beneficiaries. I certainly have had the opportunity to visit many projects around the world in those past eight years and have seen the very positive impact that this policy has had and how we have been a role model for many other countries around the world.

On the occasion of International Women's Day it is important to recall that in times of crisis Canada will provide humanitarian assistance and specifically for women. Indeed there is the statement that my colleague made earlier today reiterating our commitment to provide $1.5 million to the women and children who are victims of rape, violence and sexual abuse in Bosnia-Hercegovina. I hope that our funds, along with funds from around the world, can help those women to be able to at least recover their lives in some meaningful way after having suffered such horrible atrocities.

The work with respect to International Women's Day is not just abroad. It also applies right here at home. Over the past nine years there have been many changes that have taken place in terms of ensuring and promoting equal opportunities for women. In the work place there have been initiatives such as employment equity and the federal contractors program. I have heard from many persons who feel that the federal contractors program has had an immensely positive impact in enabling women to become involved through various institutions and recipients of government contracts across the country.

Women have also been targeted as a specific group in our training and skills development programs. Education is so vital. Earlier today I had the opportunity to share with some of our Canada scholars the report which the Prime Minister released today on the role of women in trades, technology, science and engineering, a report entitled "Winning With Women". It is a theme which we all take heart in, whether it is in science and technology or in the many other aspects of life where women have so much to offer.

This report identifies the very specific initiatives which we must take to ensure that women will be successful in entering into careers in science, trades and technology. Our Canada scholars program, which requires that 50 per cent of the recipients be women, has played a very important part in bringing about that change.

Whether they are amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to enhance parental benefits or amendments to the Labour Code that are currently before this House to improve maternity and parental leave and protect pregnant employees, there has been a whole range of initiatives relating to changes in law which have helped to advance and fundamentally ensure women's equality in this country.

Again, perhaps one of the most important ones is the change to the Indian Act to ensure that Indian women would no longer be stripped of their status because they married non-aboriginal persons. That has been enhanced through our work on the Canadian aboriginal economic development strategy to ensure that aboriginal women are also accessing entrepreneurship and economic self-reliance.

We see women increasingly going into leadership roles. We are reminded again of the almost trebling of the numbers of women who now hold important positions throughout federal boards, agencies, commissions, and the federal judiciary. We now have a cabinet in which women comprise 20 per cent of the members.

One of the issues that is very close to my heart, and for so many women is a fundamentally important issue in achieving equality, is the issue of violence against women. Our government has applied a policy of zero tolerance toward violence against women both in principle and in action.

In the work of the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women we will have the opportunity to set forward a national action plan. This is in addition to the over 1,300 projects which we have supported through the family violence initiative, which is helping to change and improve the lives of women and children in this country. Amendments to the gun control act, parole laws and Criminal Code provisions relating to sexual assault are all helping to provide better protection for women.

International Women's Day in 1993 is dedicated to ensuring that women's continuing efforts to achieve equality are taken account of both in the concept and practice of human rights. I applaud all those who are working to achieve that objective: women in this Chamber and women across the country operating within governments, in the private sector, in community organizations and women's groups at the grassroots level. They have all been part of this growing energy and this growing commitment. I applaud them for they are working to achieve that objective of ensuring equality for women both in Canada and around the world.

I know I share with all colleagues in this House the belief that this will come. It is our time and each of us will make a difference to ensure that it happens.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am also very pleased to speak on behalf of the opposition party in the House of Commons today on the occasion of International Women's Day 1993.

I listened very intently to the minister's remarks. I was pleased to learn that the theme chosen by the federal government for International Women's Day this year is "Women's Rights are Human Rights". As the official opposition critic for human rights and associate critic for the status of women I have long maintained that these two portfolios are intricately related. I would like to take the opportunity to address the issue of human rights and women and look at how women are faring both domestically and internationally.

The rights to food, shelter, property, social security, health care, employment and religious and political freedom are women's basic human rights. The fact that women are the gender most likely to be denied these rights is indicative of the battle women throughout the world face.

Nowhere is the sad truth more apparent today than in the ongoing war in the former Yugoslavia. Every day more stories emerge detailing the atrocities being committed. Of grave concern is the systematic detention and gang rape of Muslim women in Bosnia. There is now proof that at least 20,000 Muslim Bosnian women have been terrorized, brutalized, forced to bear their attackers' children and often murdered. This constitutes a human rights violation of the highest magnitude.

Unfortunately the tragedy of Bosnia–Hercegovina is not an isolated case. In March 1991 Amnesty International released its report Women in the Front Line, Human Rights Violations Against Women. The report records the experiences of female survivors and casualties of human rights atrocities world–wide. Grave violations of human rights were found to have been committed by governments with widely varying ideologies in Africa, the Americas, Asia and Pacific, Europe and the Middle East. The report documents cruel, degrading and inhuman treatment, specifically directed at women. These abuses may affect their physical, mental and emotional well–being, their role in the family or their cultural environment. Women's rights must be a major element of Canada's international aid policy.

The minister outlined some of the ways her government has tried to enhance this policy, yet all too often we see countries with atrocious human rights records receiving huge amounts of Canadian aid. The minister mentioned some of the terrible statistics regarding women in the world the poverty and poor health, lack of education and child mortality rates. However, she forgot to mention that her own government is proposing a new direction to official development assistance which will cause further difficulties for many women.

• (1545)

Even the minister's own Conservative colleague on that side of the House, a former cabinet minister who has also served as ambassador to Ethiopia, calls the government's actions stupid. Those are his comments.

Closer to home, I have become increasingly amazed at how much energy Canadian women must expend just to fight the system in order to achieve equality of opportunity due to poor government policy. Women are still fighting the advance rather than advancing the fight.

In 1970 women earned 60 cents to every dollar earned by our male counterparts. In 1990 that figure had risen by only seven cents. In 23 years it rose by 7 cents to 67 cents for every dollar.

Women are over-represented in low-paying, part-time jobs and are often denied promotions, job security and standard employee benefits.

The minister talked about what her government has done for women in Canada. I would like to know why her government issued directives to Treasury Board and Justice Canada officials to use stalling tactics before the human rights tribunal established to hear federal Public Service pay equity complaints. I would like to have the minister's response as to why her government, as an example, will not respect the equal pay retroactivity entitlements provided under the Canadian Human Rights Act. Why will the minister's government not abide by the tribunal's decision? Those are three simple questions.

Finally, I would like to know why the minister's government will not support amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act to provide for proactive implementation of pay equity within specified time frames for the 500,000 working women in the banking, transportation and communication industries in the federal Public Service.

Of even deeper concern is the issue of violence against women. One in four women will be sexually assaulted in her lifetime, half of them before they reach the age of 17. Every five days a woman is shot to death in Canada and usually by her male partner. The trends will not reverse on their own. The approach to resolutions must lie in an interrelation of government policies at all levels.

Violence against women does not exist in isolation. The main contributing factor is that social attitudes condone it and poverty confirms it. Women are often forced to remain in violent situations because in all too many instances they must rely on a male partner for their economic well-being. The cycle perpetuates itself. Children who grow up in this environment will live it.

By taking a stand against such offences and working toward policies to strengthen a woman's position in society it would be clear that tolerance of acts against women is unacceptable. Today would be a good day to take the first step.

This International Women's Week of 1993 is a time and an opportunity for all of us, not only all of us in this House but all of us as Canadians, both male and female, to try to right the wrongs and ensure that women move forward to their rightful place in our Canadian society.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, International Women's Day is a time to celebrate our achievements and re-examine our vision for the world.

Too often, both in the House of Commons and outside, we deal with the details and not with the overview. A volunteer who takes crisis calls at a shelter for battered women or a sexual assault centre or a volunteer at a women's centre helping a family find child care, all of these acts that we do each and every day are a part of a larger movement toward full social, economic and political equality and empowerment.

My vision, which I share with many, is of a world in which men and women live in harmony, peace and equality and where no one is beaten or tortured. It is a world in which no one's work goes unpaid or underpaid and unrecognized. It is a world in which we are not divided into rich and poor. It is a world in which no one is persecuted because of their gender, sexual orientation, religious or political beliefs. It is a world in which our children can breathe fresh air and play and live without fear, secure in the knowledge that whether they are male or female, aboriginal, black, white or any other race or colour, they will be respected and valued for who they are. It is a world without war.

Sometimes this sounds like an impossible dream. However, with this vision to guide us, we can bring about positive changes within our own lifetimes, changes that the generations which come after us may build upon and benefit from. That is the vision and there are concrete steps we can take toward that vision.

We can stop deporting women back to situations where they face abuse and death at the hands of their husbands or at the hands of the state. We can establish a national child care program and provide support for parents at home. We can make training and education more accessible by lowering financial barriers. We can implement pay equity. We can channel our resources away from the military, away from military helicopters, away from security intelligence and government waste toward services which invest in the skills and health of our population.

In her statement the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women said that the right to food, shelter, property, social security, health care, employment and the right to live without violence should apply equally to women and men. But they do not.

Yet her government's actions, the cutbacks to social assistance, cutbacks to housing programs, cutbacks to health care, cutbacks to child care and training programs, cutbacks to shelters for battered women and the Secretary of State women's program, these regressive actions speak far louder than her words.

The minister said that Canada has been a leader internationally on the human rights of women. However, her government is deporting refugee women who are fleeing domestic or state violence and gender-based persecution. Over the weekend The Globe and Mail documented the personal situations of 14 refugee women who were here in Canada, some of them in hiding. This government is determined to deport them back to those unsafe conditions in their homeland, back into the hands of abusive men who control their lives. Eighty per cent of the world's refugees are women and children, yet two-thirds of the refugees that Canada accepts are male.

The minister's words will be weighed against the lives of all of these women and children. She cited the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women as her government's effort to deal with violence. Again she is confusing words with action. Battered women cannot receive shelter or safety at the offices of the panel when they are turned away from an overflowing, underfunded shelter for battered women. Actions, not words will lead us closer to our vision of equality.

On this International Women's Day, March 8, 1993, if I have one wish, it is a wish that working together we could acknowledge the fundamental inequality in our society. We could move forward in a systematic way that addresses those underlying reasons why women are at the bottom of the social and economic scale, both in Canada and internationally and make a commitment among all of us in this House of Commons to work together to change that.

INTERNATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF FRENCH-SPEAKING PARLIAMENTARIANS

REPORT OF CANADIAN SECTION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report of the Canadian section of the International Assembly of French-speaking Parliamentarians on the meeting of the board of the parliamentary affairs committee held in Paris on February 3, 1993.

PETITIONS

DRUG PRICES

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to present two petitions, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first one is from a large number of residents across Canada. The petitioners point out to the government that drug costs are going up dramatically because of the abolition of licensing procedures for generic drugs. They request that the government repeal Bill C-22 and not proceed with Bill C-91. Of course as it has now passed, the government should repeal Bill C-91.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by a large number of residents in Surrey and points out that people applying for sponsorship of immigrants pay a $250 fee. It also points out that the Surrey and New Westminster immigration offices are going to be closed which will make it very difficult for people to receive this service. The Vancouver office which is being opened is going to add additional costs of over a quarter of a million dollars because of building occupancy.

The petitioners call upon this House to ensure that the immigration services in Surrey and New Westminster remain open for the public.

CIVILIAN VICTIMS OF WAR

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present two petitions.

The first refers to the protection of civilian victims of war. Their rights should be made known and respected. This petition calls upon Parliament to help the Canadian Red Cross to mobilize governments and the public to be aware of the right of victims of war to receive food, medicine and shelter regardless of race, colour, creed or political, religious or ideological nature.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is from a great number of individuals from St. Catharines, Niagara Falls and other areas of the Niagara peninsula in memory of Rosalynn Dupuis.

The petitioners ask that the Young Offenders Act be amended to provide greater protection to the public. The petition goes through many concrete suggestions. These include that the judicial powers should recognize the consequences to the victim and the victim's family as being paramount and give as much recognition to the victim as is afforded to the young offender. In addition, the parole system should be expanded to be responsible and have the authority to develop and conduct effective rehabilitation programs for dangerous young offenders when they are released from custody.

The petition also calls for life sentences for murder to be incorporated into the Young Offenders Act with the parole provisions at 10, 15 and 20 years. Obviously, the most important one is the provision of a parole system which is not currently in effect with the Young Offenders Act.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, which has been certified correct as to form and content.

This petition recalls the importance of a program known as the Court Challenges Program, which basically helped language minorities defend their rights before the courts. Considering the recent Supreme Court decision on education, I think it is appropriate to lay this petition on the table.

Wherefore the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider the possibility of reinstating the Court Challenges Program, which gives all Canadians equal access to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 325 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 325 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Question No. 325—Mr. Caccia:

Since April 1991, have any cabinet policies been subjected to environmental impact assessments and, if so, (a) who conducted each assessment (b) have any public statements been released and, if so, when were they released?

Return tabled.

Mr. Langlois: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier today when you were in the chair the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader rose in his place and sought unanimous consent to move a motion dealing with a matter to come before the House later today. You indicated that there was no unanimous consent. I was in the Chamber at the time and I did not hear a dissenting voice.

I draw your attention to the Précis of Procedure, pages 63 and 64 which states that the vote on the motion, whether it has been debated or not, is put by the Speaker asking: "Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?" If there is no dissenting voice, the motion carries.

It is the tradition, or at least it has been the tradition in this House that if a member objects to a request for unanimous consent an audible no is heard. It ensures that all members regardless of where they are seated in the Chamber are aware of that no and do not rely solely on the hearing or visual ability of the Speaker.

I am not looking for a ruling at the moment. I am not challenging any decision that has been made. I would ask you to examine this issue, Mr. Speaker, to see whether or not it is appropriate for the Speaker to see the shaking of a head and take that as direction of consent or non-consent when a matter is put before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in notifying me that he intended to raise this point of order. I want to reassure him, after making inquiries and referring to the tradition of our rules, that it is left to the discretion of the Chair to determine whether or not there is unanimity, since it is not a yes or no vote. Presumably, a deaf mute member could refuse unanimous consent in some non-verbal way, if you allow me that example.

That being said, I want to reassure the hon. member that I am certain the House was not unanimous on the motion that had been presented. I take note of the member's request and may investigate further, but I wish to reassure him right away that there was no unanimity. Eeven if it was not expressed verbally, I was able to see that with my own eyes.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, as reported (with amendments) by a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak briefly on this bill and raise a number of issues.

Our concern on this side of the House is that this is simply another move in the privatization of Canada Post. In our view it is a serious enough situation already that we have seen the closing down of rural post offices, the destruction of rural community life and the removal of the visible sign of the presence of the nation in many of the communities of our country.

The minister has said in this House on a number of occasions that this is not part of a privatization move. However, it is extremely difficult to believe that when we have seen various steps toward privatization. We have seen the government increasingly removing itself from any responsibility for the actions, the service or lack of service of Canada Post.

I give one example. Junk mail is of significant concern to a large number of Canadians. They are concerned about the environment and concerned about having to deal with extra pounds of paper that are put into their mailboxes every week unsolicited. They have no way of legally refusing that even when it is delivered by Canada Post. I wrote to the minister some time ago and asked why Canadians cannot have the right to refuse what they describe as junk mail. We all know what we mean, advertising flyers and so on, something that has nothing to do with mail, directed to that person but whose sole purpose is to sell.

The minister wrote back and said Canada Post has to deliver every piece of mail delivered to it. Of course it does because the law says so. That is why I wrote to the minister. The minister of the Crown is responsible for pursuing changes to legislation and instead chose to rely on Canada Post to say it has to deliver this stuff.

This is one of the indications that the government is increasingly absolving itself of any responsibility for postal service when in fact legally it is still responsible.

I wanted to speak about the privatization of postal outlets. This has created ridiculous situations in my riding. Some members will know that Ottawa West happens to be the riding in Canada with the second highest proportion of seniors. One-third of the adults in Ottawa West are over 65. How and where services are delivered means whether or not seniors can live comfortably and conveniently in their communities as they age.

When post offices are moved from very close to a seniors' residence where 200 or 300 people may be housed to a good 20-minute walk away for a population that by large measure does not have cars is the kind of thing that happened under the privatization moves already made by Canada Post. The only concern was accommodating the private sector and providing services through the private sector. The emphasis on service disappears.

The other area in which privatization has seriously affected services in my riding is with respect to French language services. Canada Post is not ensuring that private postal outlets provide services in Canada's two official languages. It means that in Ottawa West, which has a population of close to 10,000 people who identify French as their first language, those people are not able to get the services they are legally guaranteed in their first language.

I am really not quite sure what this bill means and I do not think the government is really quite sure what it means. Let the employees buy shares in the company but do not give them a vote, do not give them any say about it, and do not consult with them ahead of time as to whether this is something they have any interest in whatsoever. It is also set up so shares can be given away. This is a standard part of any privatization package I have ever seen, whether it is in Canada or elsewhere in the world. It is the ability for the senior managers of a corporation, a Crown corporation, becoming privatized to be able to set up their own future and that often involves the issuing of shares and stocks to themselves.

I have to question whether this bill is really about allowing employees to be co-owners of Canada Post. How employees can be the co-owners of something that is not privatized, which the minister denies he is trying to do, is not quite clear. However they are going to be co-owners. In that case the government has an obligation to lay out what this corporation is going to be worth of which the employees are theoretically going to be able to be co-owners.

I serve notice as has already been done by the union representing many of these employees, that this government has an $80 million pay equity debt to women employees of the post office and that it had better not talk about privatizing or valuing the corporation without including that debt in the evaluation.

I am going to speak briefly about something else that has been of great concern to me. A number of complaints and inquiries have come to my office about the treatment of people working for the post office. Those have not diminished with the privatization efforts that have gone on. They have increased. Women who have worked for the post office for many years have suddenly been put on late night shift work. Women who have child care well in place have suddenly been told they have to work on a shift and they cannot get child care. People who have been with the post office for many years have suddenly found it is becoming impossible for them to stay because of the way employees are treated.

We do not have a good situation at the post office now. We have a decline in service to the public, not an increase, notwithstanding what the post office says. We have an increasingly market driven approach to delivering a public service that is crucial to the unity of Canada.

It is not much wonder when we on this side of the House and Canadians in general receive any kind of bill like this there is great cynicism and great scepticism about the minister's comments and great mistrust of those comments about what the real intention is. That is because consistently over close to nine years we have seen this government not being honest and open about what its intentions are. We suspect that in this bill it is another case of one small step to another hidden agenda.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, most members of this House have of course spoken against this bill, but some have come out in favour of it. Since 1965 the general public has lived through 18 major disputes at Canada Post. We have had some very difficult years and as yet a way has not been found to ensure peace in a postal system which at one time was the envy of the world. Canadians do not know that there is a very long history behind Canada Post.

Even before the country was formed in 1867, in the colonies of New France in the 16th century, to go way back, the French saw that the Indians, the native people, the Iroquois and so on, had a system to take messages by river with canoes made of bark. They found their methods very effective, considering the difficulties at that time when all the land was covered with forests. The French at the time of New France adopted this method using canoes of bark to send documents between Quebec City and Montreal mainly, or to Trois-Rivières, depending on the colonies.

In 1735 they decided that official documents could be sent not only by water but also by land through the forests and roads were laid out over time. Strangely for the time, 1735, the first person hired to take messages, if you want, was a Portuguese fellow by the name of Pedro da Silva, as history records. So we can see that everyone was an immigrant even then, because countries other than France and England were also represented in this country. Over the years, the system improved. In 1868, just a few months after Confederation in 1867 when Canada became a country, one of the first departments created was the post office. Post houses were created which over time became post offices headed by postmasters.

With the advent of airplanes, a system developed in the country. We must not forget that Canada's population was not large but we then had a service considered very advanced and rapid, given the small population and the large territory to be crossed to deliver mail throughout the country. I even noticed that in the 1920s mail was free in some rural areas. That is far from the case today. At the time, although people were poor, they could communicate by mail with relatives outside their region.

The first stamps came in the 1800s. It is not surprising that the beaver appeared on the first stamp, which cost three cents. For the time, perhaps it was a lot of money compared to what it costs today.

On the whole, Canadians had a very good system, but unfortunately it was not possible to solve the conflicts in Canada Post. Since 1965, there have been 18 conflicts. I believe they have destroyed morale at Canada Post. Later, we had great difficulty establishing a system with which Canada Post employees were satisfied. Many attempts were made with various government plans to find a solution.

Finally, we have Bill C-73, which is rather vague in that it would privatize the postal system. We suspected it for some time, but the government denied it. What I find hard to understand is that it recognizes that the employees, the postal workers, are the most important part of the system. In spite of that, the government plans to sell them 10 per cent of our system, only 10 per cent—of course, the government would keep 90 per cent—but with no voting rights. Usually, shareholders have voting rights, but not in this case.

The government thinks that privatizing the postal system could solve the strikes and conflicts at Canada Post, but I think it misunderstands the problem. For many years Canada Post has needed a kind of leadership that would not necessarily come from the government and its appointees. It should have invested in that and found the leadership needed to rebuild the necessary morale, but that is not what it did. A conflict situation has been created and has gone on without interruption for the past 25 years.

This bill does not really solve the problems. Instead, they should have found what was creating a situation in Canada Post that always led to conflict. We can honestly say that Canada Post pays well. They are not the highest paid workers, but they are certainly not the lowest paid. Paying well is not always a way to buy peace. In spite of that, they complained that the corporate leadership was uncaring and they felt that they were treated cavalierly.

So this privatization will not solve the problem there. Just giving it to the private sector will certainly not solve the problem, since we have seen that the private sector is not always the answer. We have inherited a system that was built over the years. At one time it was envied by many. Now the government comes up with what it hopes is a solution to all these conflicts. Basically privatization puts the problem out of our control. That is not the way to go. We should always have control over Canada Post because it is extremely important to have a service that meets the objectives of providing the fastest, most reliable service possible. We had such a service and that is still our goal but I think that we would still have the same problems with privatization and then we would conclude that privatization was not the solution.

In closing, I hope that in the next few years, we will really take the time to deal with the postal question and settle it once and for all. We should ask those who have been out there for many years and call upon their knowledge to find a way that will benefit all Canadians and give them fast, reliable service.

[English]

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to enter into the debate on Bill C–73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act. This is nothing more than the privatization of Canada Post.

I listened with interest to the member for Ottawa West. I was the New Democratic Party postal critic during 1980, 1981 and 1982 when Canada Post was made a Crown corporation. During that time the Liberals were in power.

In the small community of Trout Lake just south of my then riding of Kootenay East—Revelstoke, which has now been changed to Kootenay East, a very strong Liberal who had worked for the Liberal Party for many years was delivering the mail. The people were being told that their rural post office in Trout Lake was to be shut down and that they would have to travel approximately 20 miles to a green box at Galena Bay. That was the concern of the Liberals in those days. As a member of Parliament I hired a lawyer to try to fight that, and the minute I did so they changed their decision and let that post office carry on. I do not need to be told anything about what the Liberals were doing with regard to the post office even in those days.

As I said I represent the riding of Kootenay East with nine municipalities and 50 rural post offices. When I see the Liberal member of Parliament for Ottawa West standing in the House expressing concerns with regard to the possibility that she might not be able to receive her mail in French or English or the possibility of some of these changes taking place, I think such members of Parliament have no idea what a member of Parliament in a rural riding must do in order to try to accommodate and work for his or her residents.

Of 50 rural post offices many are being shut down. People are being told to drive as many as 30 kilometres and 40 kilometres to a green box where there are no other services available. Right across the street from the post office we have in place with all its services the government in power is opening up another private enterprise and making those services available. Yet, as I said, people in a rural area will have to drive 30 kilometres or 40 kilometres to get to a green box in snow up to their hips.

This is not the kind of service that we in the New Democratic Party envisioned for our people. Our post office is one of the most essential services people expect to have. It must be equal for everyone across all provinces, across our whole country and especially into our rural areas. Private enterprise will not go into remote areas and give the kinds of services people expect. If we are talking about services we have to retain our Crown corporation. We have to retain equal service to people right across the country and we are not going to do that with this kind of legislation.

I resent being a member of Parliament when I hear what people representing a riding like Ottawa West have to say. I have five airports in my riding and I am trying to get some electric lighting for them. I have five native bands in my riding and I am trying to get some help for them. I have three border crossings and we have the kind of legislation this government brought in to try to protect small businesses in those areas. I have 1,400 kilometres to drive across my riding to represent these people.

The government is taking away our immigration offices. It is cutting back on our unemployment insurances offices. I cannot even have a 1–800 number for those people to phone when they have problems with their unemployment insurance. Yet I hear the Liberal member for Ottawa West complaining whether they can get their mail in French or in English. I am complaining so that we can get a service to represent the people in my riding who have to drive distances in very heavy snow conditions.

When I was on that committee I insisted—and it is in that piece of legislation today—on an amendment put forward by the New Democratic Party for our Crown corporation to give equal service to communities of equal size. I will give credit to the then minister in charge of Canada Post, the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, who agreed to that important amendment. It indicated that anywhere in the country where service was to be made available communities of equal size would be given equal opportunity. That is not happening today under this government.

I hear about the shutdowns of postal offices in small areas. I go there and hear the outcry of seniors who have lived in those areas for many years when they find out their post offices are being closed down. They are told they will be able to go to the nearest area, possibly 15 kilometres or 20 kilometres away, where there will be a post office. After shutting the first one down notification takes place that the other is being shut down.

There is no consideration for these residents whatsoever. It is strictly an economic decision being made by Canada Post. Canada Post is starting to let new private outlets across the street, right across the road from post offices, for the day when it will shut down its post offices in these areas.

We in the New Democratic Party know what that means for our isolated areas and other areas that are not profitable. It means they will be left out. Again we will see members of Parliament from large urban areas having their services, in fact even delivery to the door, when our people have to drive distances to pick up their mail. It is wrong. This legislation is wrong and should be defeated.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate and to ask this House a simple question.

We are beginning to privatize what I consider to be an essential service in Canada, an essential service in the sense that every country has a post office. If we look to the south it has a national post office that seems to work very effectively, and we have a post office that we are trying to privatize. This government has privatized. I will just mention two areas I have seen privatized that have affected the way of life of the people I represent.

One is the railway. We do not have a railway. Even if we had wanted the railway the Tories could take it away. They could just say they wanted to abandon the line and in a hurried fashion the railway picked up the iron rails and cross-ties and sold them. Within a year we would not even think there had been a railway from Halifax to Yarmouth.

What about the airlines? I cannot imagine in the 18 years or 19 years I have been involved in politics an airline industry in Canada that is more mixed up or confused than our airline as it exists internationally. The airline routes we hold dear should belong to Canada and should not be allowed to go south of the border in any way, shape or form. Canada should control its international airline routes.

Perhaps domestically we have a healthy airline industry but internationally I as an elected politician cannot see our international routes being held or controlled, our rights as Canadians being held or controlled by other countries. This government seems to have a laissez-faire attitude in that regard.

Then we come to the post offices. They were just closed and before we knew it some real estate business in the area got to sell them. Although the people have held meetings, protested and said they did not want their post offices closed, they were closed. Like many of my colleagues I have seen many post offices closed in my riding. I have never seen people more offended by post offices being closed. Yet this government has never once gone to the Canadian public and said what it was going to do to post offices.

The Tories have a majority. They can ram it through, and like everything else they do not even consider what the people in Canada are telling them on a day-to-day basis. I do not know how members of Parliament opposite can go home on weekends and face their constituents, unless their post offices are not being closed or it is only in ridings represented on this side of the House that we are losing post offices and railways.

Speaking of railways, Canadian Pacific is abandoning part of the line from Saint John to Montreal. It is abandoning from Saint John to Sherbrooke. It is a very valuable line, now that we have the free trade agreement with the U.S. Why would we give up a line that goes to the U.S., could probably be hooked up with U.S. lines and get right to the midwest, into the big centres like New York and others? Why are we pressuring Atlantic Canadians? Why is ACOA not going out to see if we cannot handle that line, keep it going, keep it active and keep the railway going?

We do not have that. It is the same when we think about the post office and privatization. This government has to provide some services for Canadians. We have a large country. To be able to send a letter to the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, Yarmouth, Nova Scotia or Calgary we need to have a system for the approximately 26 million Canadians that benefits them and that they have a say in. I have not seen that.

People across Canada are questioning this government's spending of the taxes it collects. I think that is why people are so dissatisfied with politicians and people in this House. Right across Canada we hear them ask what we are doing here in Ottawa with the taxes that are collected.

In the 1960s ordinary Canadians could buy a home and send their kids to college on one salary. Today you can have a mother, a father, the children at an early age, the university students and the technical students all working to try to maintain a home and send the kids to school for further education.

We hear this government claim that we have to educate our youth. For the first time I am seeing youth who are trying to be educated without much help as a priority and yet we are told they do so much for Canada.

I think Canadians are sick and tired of hearing what this government has done. It has decreased services in practically every area. It has increased taxes to such an extent that people are hurting and hurting badly. They cannot understand how we can just sit around in this House as politicians, go home on weekends, listen to the people and come back here and not have an effective role to play. We are not effective when we cannot even see that it is a priority in Canada not to privatize but to have an efficient postal service for all Canadians.

I think it is a priority. I would like to know if Canadians feel that way. Perhaps they can improve the service at the post office. Perhaps they can start providing a more down to earth combination of urban and rural services. This is a big country. This is a great country and those are national institutions that this government has systematically done away with. That is why it is so important for this bill to be defeated. Without the Canadian approval I cannot believe we are just undoing another national institution, another service to Canadians who see their taxes going somewhere but not affecting them.

I realize my time is over very shortly but I do want to say it is time the government started listening to Canadians. It is going to have a leadership convention but that is not going to change the attitude we have put up with, or I have put up with for four and a half years. The government has been insensitive and has not paid any attention to the proposals we put forward and this is just one of them. Canadians do not want to see the government privatize Canada Post like Air Canada and our railway system. They do not want to see some of our national institutions go out the door without even being able to vote on it.

Let us hope the election comes soon. I think Canadians want to vote this government out because of its lack of caring about the spending of Canadian taxes and the hard-earned dollars of Canadians which it has controlled.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to participate in this debate with regard to Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act. As previous speakers have indicated, the substance we are dealing with really provides very little in the way of an incentive or solution to some of the problems we are being confronted with at the present time at Canada Post.

One could intellectually argue that making shares available to the employees of Canada Post Corporation is a positive feature of the evolution of governing and particularly of the way Crown corporations operate.

When one looks at it from a very substantive and practical perspective, one readily sees what a sham this really is.

As my colleagues before me have pointed out, this will allow employees the right to acquire only non-voting shares. That is a sham. Will they be able to have their members and representatives sit on the board of directors which determines the policy and direction the corporation will inevitably go? The answer is no. That in itself is a substantive and fundamental omission of the whole proposal being put forward by the government.

As my colleague from South West Nova has indicated, this is really a step in the direction of privatization. One could compare the ideologues of the Conservative Party opposite with Margaret Thatcher in Great Britain, but she did not stoop to such idiotic procedures as privatizing the post office in that country. This government is bent on following a direction whereby it would inevitably, not today but soon thereafter, privatize Canada Post Corporation.

It fails to take into consideration that Canadians do not want to have their post offices privatized. I do not think Canadians agree with the direction in which the government is proceeding. I think Canadians in rural Canada and indeed in urban Canada see this institution of Canada Post as yet another great institution of the Canadian mosaic. I believe that and my colleague from South West Nova has also alluded to that.

Unfortunately, members opposite do not give a damn about the institutions which have added strength to the way of life in Canada. I want to remind members opposite we have had examples. This is the government that said it would never privatize Air Canada. What did it do? It privatized Air Canada. This government kicked up a storm in 1983-84, as my colleague will recall, with regard to the abandonment of certain railway lines across this country. Now we are going to have a report within 48 hours that it will abandon many railroads across this country. VIA Rail has cut off its passenger service to many parts of this country when in fact the government argued many years ago it would never do that.

Canadians have grown accustomed to these institutions. They felt they were important because they added to our culture as a nation and to the Canadian mosaic. They are slowly but effectively being eroded by members opposite. Of course the hon. member opposite speaks from his seat, as he normally does, not wishing to participate in the substance of the debate. He is only name calling from his chair, reluctant to stand in his place and defend something which is indefensible. I understand that. I understand that.

What I find hypocritical about members opposite, and particularly the one who is speaking from his seat at the moment, is the way they stand in their places and clap like wet seals when the Minister of National Defence stands in her place and tries to defend the idiotic program of a $6 billion expenditure of public moneys on Cadillac helicopters. She does this when we have so many issues affecting Canadians today such as the student loans program which affects our students and the student summer employment program which affects young people in this country and day care or lack of day care.

Again, I say to the hon. member opposite, in 1984 the right hon. gentleman who sits opposite to me said with his hand in the air: "I am committed to a national child care program" only to be reaffirmed in 1986, 1988 and 1989. We have not seen one red cent for a national child care program by this government, yet it has moneys in excess of $5.8 billion to spend on Cadillac helicopters.

This Canada Post bill fails to address the issue of services to Canadians. It fails to provide specifics with regard to share offerings. It does not say anything with regard to placing values on assets or the value of shares, nor does it protect any of its employees who are gainfully employed with Canada Post Corporation.

I have an example of a post office in my district in the town of Dominion. It is only because of the good work of the mayor of that town, Mayor Art MacDonald and the town council, whom I have worked with over the years, that we have been able to keep that post office open. This government is bent on closing post offices, services and thereby towns throughout our country.

I recall that members opposite have individuals in their midst who are experts at closing down towns. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, the impartial person who sits in the chair, that you will have to agree Schefferville was one example of shutting down a town. Now the government has found new ways to shut down towns and get rid of post offices.

It does not stop there. In the several minutes I have remaining—I am sure I would get unanimous consent to continue—let me give another example. It is Tory creed. It is its biblical following. Not only has the right hon. Prime Minister closed down towns, we have a living example in the province of Nova Scotia. In the darkness of night the first minister of that province, the Hon. Don Cameron, ordered the machines to be sent in to tear down the toll gates at the Canso causeway. That affected the towns in the surrounding areas and threw men and women out of work, when that particular operation was creating a profit and did not cost the taxpayers a cent.

Then again, Mr. Speaker, what do you expect from the Tory credo? It is to shut things down. It is to take away services from the people of Canada.

It is a sad day for Parliament and it ought to be a sad day for parliamentarians to see the government opposite, in its total arrogance of what is taking place in this country, stoop to such shams as to try to offer employees non-voting shares and somehow think those employees and the Canadians whom they serve will appreciate and thank the government for doing this kind of disservice to them.

Canadians are not that dumb. Canadians are not like members opposite, acting in a vacuum. I say through you, Mr. Speaker, they will have their opportunity to defend their dismal record over the last number of years no matter who they elect to succeed the right hon. Prime Minister.

• (1650)

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my main comments I would compliment my colleague on those last remarks. He has obviously injured the feelings of the people across the aisle with his pertinent remarks respecting what is happening with Canada Post and the direction it is taking today.

I am pleased to add my comments on Bill C-73. Simply put, the bill is window dressing. It is absolutely, positively non-operative. It is not going to work, ladies and gentlemen. It fails in its purpose and it has absolutely no meaning for those people it is trying to help, the employees of Canada Post.

In business we would call this a diversion. Subversion might be an appropriate word too. What it is really doing is diverting the attention of the Canadian public from the fundamental issue before all Canadians with respect to the operation of Canada Post. In my estimation Canada Post has simply lost its way, it has lost its purpose for being and it has lost its very reason for existence.

As a Crown corporation Canada Post is not alone in what it is doing with respect to other Crown corporations we have, not only federally but in the provinces. We need not look any further than what is happening at other Crown corporations. We all know that in any corporation, whether it is a Crown corporation or whether it is a corporation that is privately owned, the corporation takes its direction, its attitudes and its reason for being from its chief executive officers, those in charge on the executive committees and obviously from the board of directors.

Let me give an example of what we see happening in another Crown corporation, Canadian National Railways, with its huge annual losses. I wonder what those losses would be if we knew what the charges are that CNR makes to VIA Rail on an invoice basis on an annual basis. I do not know what they are, but it is going to be interesting when CNR and VIA Rail come before the transport committee of this House.

I wonder what those losses would increase to if CNR did not have the wherewithal and the money that is paid to both railways in this country as a result of the Western Grain Transportation Act and some $700 million to $800 million a year that is used to subsidize the flow of grain in this country. If it was not for the revenue CNR receives from VIA Rail and western grain transportation, its losses would far exceed what we are seeing on its balance sheets today.

We are told that since 1988 this Crown corporation has lost 22 per cent of its business, that it cannot compete with other modes of transportation in this country and as a result it will have to lay off over 10,000 people over the next period of time. That is one-third of the labour force of this particular corporation.

One would have to ask what is wrong with the senior management of this corporation. What is wrong with its chief executive officers? What is wrong with its board of directors? Certainly those CEOs and board of directors have been adequately compensated, both by way of remuneration and the frills that those positions receive. What is wrong with the operation of this corporation that it finds itself in such dire straits today?

We need look no further than Ontario Hydro and the problems it is facing. This is a provincial Crown corporation, grossly negligent in assessing the needs for power in Ontario, miscalculating what the cost of nuclear energy would be in this province, assessing incorrectly what the people in the province of Ontario would endure with respect to higher hydro costs, increasing hydro costs in the neighbourhood of 18 per cent in the last three years.

You ask yourself what kind of management, chief executive officers, board of directors, do these companies have that allow this type of thing to happen? As we heard today it results in not only 3,100 or 3,200 employees having to be laid off last year but an additional 5,000 employees having to be laid off in an economy in Ontario that can ill afford further lay-offs of this type. I think it comes down to the management that these Crown corporations are experiencing.

This brings me to the issue at hand. It is with respect to what is happening at Canada Post. Canada Post, as we know from the annual statement, has lost this past year in excess of $100 million.

There is tremendous employee unrest within the corporation. There have been fundamental changes in the thrust and direction of its mandate. It is directly involved against private enterprise, causing private enterprise sometimes to cease its operations because it cannot compete against a Crown corporation that only has to go to the government and the taxpayer of this country in order to secure and pay for its losses. Private enterprise cannot do this and this is what we are experiencing with this corporation called Canada Post.

I happen to know that some of the executives at Canada Post come from valid and substantial business backgrounds and very competitive business enterprises within this country. I wonder what has happened to those fundamental basic business principles they learned in their prior work experience. Why were they not brought to Canada Post in order to ensure the viability of this very important Crown corporation?

There is only one thing Canada Post has to do. Its only mandate is to provide service for Canadians. That is all it has to do. It provides the service of delivery of mail in the most economical and speedy way it can do it. That is its only mandate. When you read the legislation, it must deliver the mail. That is not difficult.

Where have these fundamental principles gone? Is it the business of Canada Post to promote certain enterprises within the country? Is it the business of Canada Post to be involved, as one of my colleagues stated earlier in the day, in delivering flyers? As I understand it today, the delivery of mail, which is the main mandate of Canada Post, accounts for something around 20 per cent of its annual business.

In my last two minutes I want to say that Canada Post and its executive officers along with its board of directors have very sound business backgrounds. I ask them for the future of Canada Post to apply those business principles. One cannot manufacture automobiles in this country if there are 100,000 grievances from employees who are unhappy with the corporation. You know full well that if there was that kind of grievance and employee unrest, the product that was delivered was not a good product and it would not be delivered on time. This is a problem that has existed at Canada Post for a number of years. It just does not want to come to grips with the issue and get rid of it.

I wonder what the chief executives in this country would do if their field representatives came and made reports on a semi-annual or on an annual basis and said: "I was successful this week, Mr. Boss. I managed to close 12, 14 or 24 outlets where we were providing a service to Canadian people". This is in rural post offices where it is so important in those areas that are out and beyond the main areas of Canada like Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton and so on.

I come from an area that relies on the good service and the ability of Canada Post to deliver a service. I wonder what would happen if these same executives were in a business enterprise that fostered the closing of outlets not only to sell their product but to service the product for Canadians.

I would impress upon and ask the officials in the executive and on the board of directors of Canada Post to return to the good business principles for which they were hired and return Canada Post to delivering a service of which all Canadians should be proud.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill. It is important to defeat Bill C-73 because it is another one of these government bills portraying one thing to the public when it means something just the opposite. This has been the technique of the present Prime Minister. This has been the technique of the present government.

Let me give an example. It says that the changes in this bill, as amended in the legislative committee, are indicated by the underlined and vertical lines. Let us turn to section 27.3(1) which reads:

> The Minister, the Corporation and any subsidiary of the Corporation are authorized to issue or transfer to, and to purchase from, directly or indirectly, employees of the Corporation non-voting shares of the Corporation in accordance with such plan as the Board may, with the approval of the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board, establish by by-law.

That section gives it all away. It gives the Tory hidden agenda away. They want to look good in the eyes of the workers. "Here are some shares. You own the corporation." Does that not sound great? However, does one have any say in that corporation? No, not one word. Does one have any say in the future plans of the corporation, whether the working conditions should be safe in this corporation? No. Again it is in the hands of the Order in Council, in the hands of a group of ministers who think they know it all and they know what is best for all Canadians.

I am very angry as I am speaking here because in Parkdale—High Park we do not have one traditional post office left. All we have left in my riding are retail outlets. There is one good retail outlet remaining that has been in existence for 35 years in the High Park Pharmacy. It serves thousands and thousands of people, seniors and handicapped people who live on the subway corridor right behind this pharmacy.

A year ago someone in this big corporation decided to close this outlet, the only one between the other outlets crossways at Windermere and Bloor which these people have no way of getting to. These people send parcels to Lithuania, to Ukraine, to Poland. Here are people in their seventies and eighties bringing their parcels to this corner post office so they can get them mailed. What a convenience. The pharmacy owner is happy and the clients are happy. They could never be happier.

What does the government and the corporation do? This outlet is too convenient so they close it. I intervened a year ago in the House, in writing to the minister, so the minister and the corporation agreed that they would postpone their decision for one year. That was last May. This May of 1993 we were going to get a decision about the future of this post office.

This corporation, where the clients have no say, where the people providing the service have no say, have harassed this post office and a month ago threatened to close it again. It is not giving them a franchise and it is not allowing them to carry on the excellent service that this High Park Pharmacy postal station 166 is providing to the community.

I intervened. What is the reason behind closing it? Well, Mr. Vaughan from the corporation said that the business was not at the preferred site identified for development. Who wants development? We have High Park right opposite the pharmacy. We have thousands of people living behind the pharmacy. Why do we want development? We have enough clients there now. Because there is no future development, they feel they have to close this postal outlet.

Mr. Dzulynsky keeps asking, and I quote from his letter: "We ask on what basis this study has been made because we are one of the busiest outlets in the area and our volume could sustain a franchise". Again the bureaucrats or some consultant has discovered that their business is going down.

Just last week Mr. Dzulynsky delivered the receipts for February 1992 and this February to me. Business increased, it did not go down. The higher-ups in the corporation are getting this false information and based on this false information they want to close this outlet.

As Mr. Dzulynsky says: "The irony is that our sales increased since the franchises in the area were set up. It seems to us that the people find our location convenient. Does a study of expected traffic patterns count for more than actual proven traffic?"

The consultant discovered that the traffic patterns are wrong and that there cannot be a franchise there. With the traffic patterns along Bloor Street there is no stopping light at that corner. We do not want stopping lights at that corner. Why would the traffic going from Etobicoke to Toronto stop there to use that postal outlet? That postal outlet was put there 35 years ago to serve the people living in the community within walking distance of this post office. This great management of this government, this great corporation, based on false criteria, is closing another outlet in my riding of Parkdale—High Park.

It can be seen why I am so angry. Mr. Dzulynsky, providing the service, feels he has been unfairly treated. I have letters upon letters from constituents who feel they have been unfairly treated.

I have 1,000 names of people who came to use the post office within one week. Within one week, 1,000 people came to use that post office and they are closing it when in the Prime Minister's riding they could not even find 400 people to use the post office. They went out of their way to try to save all the post offices in the Prime Minister's riding, but in my riding of Parkdale—High Park when thousands of people are using the outlets, no. Maybe they are closing it because I am a Liberal.

We just cannot run the country this way any more. It is time to stand up and call a spade a spade. My fear again is the hidden agenda in this innocent little bill, Bill C-73. I do not think we can support this bill when the government comes in with hidden agendas.

I appeal to the minister to get out of his fancy offices here in Ottawa and come to Parkdale—High Park. Come to 100 High Park. Walk with the people to this post office. If that one is closed, he can walk and carry the parcels to Crossways, as has been recommended, and see how far he gets.

Thank you for allowing me to put my concerns and anger on record. This government just has no heart and the corporation has no soul.

Government Orders

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act. We noticed that section 27 of the Canada Post Corporation Act is repealed in this bill and that it is amended by adding thereto immediately before section 28 the following sections:

• (1710)

27.1 The Corporation has an authorized capital consisting of an unlimited number of shares of such classes as the Board may, with the approval of the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board, prescribe by by-law.

Section 27.1 points out:

(4) No shares of the Corporation may be held or beneficially owned by any person, other than

(a) Her Majesty in right of Canada or a trustee for Her Majesty in right of Canada; or

(b) an employee of the Corporation or a trustee for an employee of the Corporation.

(5) Not more than 10 per cent of the issued and outstanding shares of the Corporation may be held or beneficially owned by the employees of the Corporation.

I have one question right off the bat. Are these the rank and file employees working on the sorting floors doing the actual work or are they the executives or the supervisory people who over the last several years have so badly misled the Canadian people?

Scores of post offices were closed not only in my own riding but right across Canada. Since the adoption of this corporate plan in 1986 over 1,200 post offices have been shut down under the so-called natural opportunity policy. Under this policy all 5,221 post offices are scheduled to close over a 10-year period. Individual post offices are shut down when the natural opportunity of retirement, resignation or death of a postmaster occurs.

It is interesting that in six cases of post offices around the Prime Minister's riding when the postmaster retired instead of using the natural opportunity, new postmasters were hired. The post offices remained open in five out of six cases. In the sixth case they could not get anybody to apply.

Having closed these post offices and then by the same token offering to sell shares to employees seems to be redundant and sounds very suspicious.

I want to point out that I go back a long way in my association with the mail couriers in the rural ridings. In fact, before I started public school I remember riding around the mail route with my grandfather in the horse and sleigh delivering rural mail in the winter months. Let me tell you the mail always did go through.

I can say that in many instances we would post a letter and three days later we would have a reply back from London or Toronto because that mail was taken to the post offices. It was sorted en route to Toronto on the mail cars in the trains. You could not get anything much more efficient than that and there would be a reply back in three days. It is a far cry from that today.

I am alarmed even more at what has been happening as the post office routes are amalgamated and one contractor maybe has five or six routes. Most of the former postmasters of those small towns and villages were veterans who were deserving of the position and had the respect of their communities, having previously served our country. Of course they and their rural carriers were bonded but that is no longer a requirement for the contractor today.

If, for example, a contractor in making the rounds decided to stop at a bingo hall to play bingo for an hour and a half and left the mail sitting unattended in his vehicle, who would be be responsible and who would reprimand him? As far as Canada Post is concerned, as long as the mail is delivered that day that is all that seems to matter.

Most of these little post offices did show a profit and provided excellent services. Now Canada Post is going to sell shares to the employees to try to get them to co-operate after we slash thousands of jobs and close down thousands upon thousands of post offices.

As we look at the numbers that are closed already and the impact that this has had, it is really in effect closing down the focal point of the communities across rural Canada. Looking at the lists I have from the various provinces on February 3, 1993, there are still 376 more to close in Ontario alone. Having come through this process let me say that it is very humiliating. I do not blame the people in the communities for being incensed whatsoever.

In the village of Watford, Ontario, Royal Canadian Legion Branch 172 was concerned about the future of the cenotaph in the village. I was very embarrassed last fall at the Remembrance Day services in front of the cenotaph. The post office beside the cenotaph was closed but there was a tattered Canadian flag flying. Nobody through Canada Post had seen fit to replace it until a letter of complaint went to the minister.

We still do not know what is going to happen to that cenotaph if that post office is sold. We have been getting the run-around now for two years. It has been two years since I spoke in the House on this. I was incensed at that time and I still am. I listened to the so-called explanations being given by officials at Canada Post when they came into the community to try to sell them on privatization or retail outlets.

I think back to the time the reeve of the town of Newbury stood up to them and refused to budge. The village itself took over the operation of that post office. The village is doing an excellent job and the post office is still the focal point of that community. It is not a faceless community. It is a booming little community that still has a post office run by the village itself.

In the process of those negotiations Canada Post officials pointed out that it was not acceptable and it was not done. Municipalities were not allowed to run their own post offices. They started digging into it and found that indeed municipalities do run their own post offices in other parts of Canada. Diane Brewer, the reeve of the municipality, showed they were wrong and was able to force them to deal with the municipality. Everything is going extremely well as far as the municipality is concerned, but of course it has put a crimp in the style of Canada Post.

I sat in on several of these meetings or had a representative there. We saw the harsh, insensitive tactics used during these closing procedures when the villagers were assured they would have the type of service they were used to over the years.

The post office cannot be replaced in any community regardless of where it is because of the sense of being Canadian, the sense of pride in being Canadian that we have rekindled. It is one more step toward the death-knell of rural Canada to proceed in the direction such as we see today.

I oppose this bill. I oppose it because of the proud traditions we have had in Canada, the sense of pride that I spoke about, the tremendous service the post offices have given us over the years.

Now they are losing money, not through any fault of local employees, but because they are trying to modernize what has already been very efficient, by laying off the workers at the low end of the scale and hiring more administrators at the top. It is not much wonder we have had labour problems over the last several years.

I think for the good of Canada we have to maintain post offices in Canada and replace them wherever possible and not let them be phased out. They are an integral part of the structure of this nation we are all so proud of.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

• (1720)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the chief government Whip has requested that the division be deferred.

[English]

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until 5.45 p.m. later this day, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for no more than 15 minutes.

CRIMINAL CODE

The House resumed from Friday, February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C–109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and speak to Bill C–109, a bill tabled by the Minister of Justice which includes some very important and necessary Criminal Code amendments, as well as changes to the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act.

These changes, particularly in the Criminal Code with respect to the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, are absolutely necessary. I know that our party, with the very enlightened and interesting speeches given by the member from Cape Breton and the Islands and the member from Scarborough touched on those aspects of the bill.

I intend to particularly focus on those aspects of the bill that concern the telecommunications changes, the Radiocommunication Act in particular. The wiretapping provisions and those provisions that concern the Minister of Justice per se were adequately dealt with. I would like to look at cellular communications and the question of privacy which has become more and more important and serious as we start looking at the kind of legislation that is being brought before this House.

The Liberal Party supports the goal of achieving greater privacy in communications. We have long pursued that goal. There have been a number of concerns that we felt needed to be addressed in this area. We have talked about addressing the so–called nuisance junk phone calls that have been a bother to our senior citizens and families at home and have often interrupted their privacy. We have talked about seeking the opportunity to block the caller identification services that the telephone companies put in, that little thing on our telephones that identifies who is calling and in a sense is an invasion of our privacy.

When we raised these issues in the House the phone companies were at first very hesitant about finding ways of restricting the flow of information that companies might electronically gather on people from their telemarketing operations. After a number of questions and some anger from the population out there something has been done about that.

I could go on and list a number of other things. Suffice it to say that the age of technology and telecommunications has already made privacy of personal communications and personal information a key public policy challenge for the nineties and beyond.

Personal privacy is really under threat. I would particularly like to deal with the question of cellular telephones. I would like the audience and the members of this House to realize that there are over one million cellular telephones out there. They are not really telephones; they are really radios. There are 900,000 scanners tuning in every day, all day and during the evenings to phone calls when people believe they are speaking in confidence and privacy.

I think it is important to look at what Mr. Bruce Phillips, the Privacy Commissioner, has been saying recently over and over again as he talks about the number of times he has had to appear before this House and address the questions of privacy in the different forms of legislation that have been brought to our attention. It is important to note that in every one of these appearances he has underscored the seriousness of this problem. He said that it needs more than tinkering. That is the reason this bill requires much more careful examination and that at committee stage it is an issue that needs to be addressed very carefully.

I would like to quote from the very enlightened presentation that Mr. Phillips made on June 1, 1992 before the Senate to address the issues to be found in Bill C–62, the bill on telecommunication changes which still has not seen the light of day in this House. This is what he said:

> I do not think there has ever been a time when ordinary people have been required to give up to other persons and organizations so much of their personal information merely to function in a complex society. Once given up, this information has itself been transformed into an item of commerce, bought and sold in a huge traffic in personal data which in the United States now surpasses $3 billion a year.
> Thus people sense—and with good reason—that they are losing control of their ability to manage the degree to which society at large penetrates and exposes their personal lives. And as you will appreciate, the very essence of personal privacy is the ability to control what others are able to know about you.
> This situation has come about through an entirely benign process. No one apart from the total recluse has ever been able to claim total privacy, or particularly want it, for that matter. The simple business of human and commercial relations has always demanded some loss of privacy, merely for the purpose of existence. But until fairly recent times, and most notably the advent of the computer age, people could defend important areas of privacy, and especially the right to be left alone, with relative ease. The computer has demolished that defence. It can pull together scraps of personal information gathered from a wide variety of sources, assemble it into virtually complete personal profiles and make it all available to whomsoever is willing to pay for it—frequently without the knowledge or consent of the individuals named in those files. So new defences for personal privacy need to be erected, and this process cannot begin without increased awareness of the problem.

This issue is being addressed here in Bill C–62, if it ever comes to be alive in this House, and in general conversation out in society. I think that climate of awareness is starting to make us realize that this is a very serious matter of personal concern to each and every one of us.

We come across some very serious privacy issues that have arisen out of the rapid advances in telecommunications technology. I suggested that caller identification and cellular telephones were among the most important. We cannot deny that there is a double-edged nature to this scientific advancement.

As Mr. Phillips points out:

> In each case, important benefits and conveniences were made possible by new technology, but absent some special arrangements of prevention, they both carried with them significant potential loss of personal privacy.

I think that alert came under Bill C–62, which went to the other place to be studied. The two issues occupied and preoccupied, and continues to preoccupy, the Office of the Privacy Commissioner. He was particularly addressing his attention to telecommunications and he started to examine the extent of the technical problems that were involved.

We in this House are not technical experts, neither is the privacy office, and there is a lot that takes place in research and development that is so fast and so dynamic in its change that if we were to put our minds to it we could find the answers to the technical problems. We know that technical answers are not going to close the gap in this tremendous invasion of our personal lives, and it is not the right approach. As well, technical fixes would be strictly band-aid solutions, only to be overtaken by new developments and new undertakings.

As far as this bill is concerned, we should say once and for all that its recognition of privacy protection as one of its objectives is most welcome and is a welcome beginning. There is a clause in Bill C-62 that would be very important for the CRTC and it needs to be included in here because it would give us some power and would allow us to have a little bit more control.

The question in my mind is whether the provisions in this bill go as far as they should or as far as they could. Or do they go too far in the sense beyond technology, but the kind of punishment that fits the crime? We all know that having an objective is one thing, but reaching it and finding the method to block it is another. That is why I have qualified my support for this bill.

I might go so far as to say one day that it might be a constitutional problem that we would want to look at. Whatever emerges from this process, I do not think that without a set of guidelines or standards we would be facing the issue squarely, honestly and with the kind of real intent that is required.

I believe that the information that is supplied to customers when they purchase these goods is not adequate. They should be made aware of what they are really buying and the purpose for which the telecommunications equipment that they purchase is to be used. Not only should there be this informed consent on the part of the purchaser, but cost neutrality is in question here. Customers should not have to pay to preserve privacy they already enjoy. Mr. Phillips says caller identification is a very good example of this issue. Until ordered otherwise by the CRTC, telephone companies proposed to charge extra for subscribers who wanted to preserve the anonymity of their telephone numbers. We talked about that in this House and we challenged the minister on that particular issue.

What about the cost of encryption? Is that not an obligation if we want to maintain the privacy of the airwaves. The only way we can do that is through encryption of those airwaves so that our phone can be protected and have a privacy aspect. It is a very costly undertaking. The estimate is in the billions. Should we have the obligation to provide complete privacy? Can we protect it without it being so extraordinarily expensive?

Perhaps we need to look at this obligation very closely when we go into committee and see what the options and concerns are. Do not forget that cellular telephone is really a radio. Mr. Speaker, if you encrypt it from your chair and want to speak to whomever you want to speak to with your encrypted cellular telephone then that does not necessarily mean that the receiver of your phone call, who may not have an encrypted phone, is protected in the sense of privacy. Therefore your communication, which you thought was protected, is not necessarily protected. This is a very important matter. I am going to come to the issue in Quebec in a moment, but a lot of us remember with a great deal of sadness how our lack of understanding of the technology has not been met.

The third concept that I want to talk about is about openness or transparency. Customers have the right to be told what it is they are purchasing. They are not told when they buy that cellular telephone that they are buying a radio. I suggest that such equipment must be so labelled. Customers have to be told what it is all about. They have to be advised that there are scramblers out there and that whatever they say can be listened to and overheard and can cause great harm in the course of their lives, depending on what issue they are discussing. This is a watch-dog call that I am putting in here.

It means we must have, through this minister and this bill, some kind of watch-dog process. The minister announced a supposed watch-dog process and called it the Telecommunications Privacy Protection Agency. It became a sleeping tiger. The mean-sounding watch-dog that the minister announced was really a great big failure.

What was supposed to bring Canadians everything they wished for in terms of peace of mind at the end of their telephones was a sham. The minister did not say this so-called agency had no relationship to government except as a sort of ear to the minister. I would not call that a very effective way to protect people's privacy.

This so-called agency has never been heard of since. It is supposed to be a voluntary agency run by the same industry that is generating many of the complaints about nuisance telemarketing. The worst part is that until the minister took the podium to announce its creation, the industry apparently knew nothing about it. That is like putting the fox in with the hens and the eggs. It is ridiculous.

There was no consultation. There is certainly going to be duplication if the minister ever puts this into action. It was a total waste of time. The minister's action in this case seems more of an attempted display at leadership than the substantive response that true leadership really requires.

The problem we are here to discuss is one that recent events in our country have focused public attention on. We had the case in Quebec during the referendum campaign, for example, of cellular privacy. I remind you what The Gazette had to say in an editorial on December 12. It said:

> Had those conversations (of Diane Wilhelmy and Bud Smith) taken place over conventional phone lines, any unauthorized person who divulged the contents by tape, transcript or even orally would have been liable to charges. Users of cellular or cordless phones have no such legal protection of privacy, and that is what the federal legislation aims to fix. Clearly, strong measures are needed to discourage scanners from divulging information, blackmail, industrial espionage, credit card fraud or any number of illicit acts.

That is not totally accurate because it is still not going to be fully protected.

A January essay in The New York Times described the legislation changes proposed by this bill. It concluded:

> That libertarian attitude up north is what we should adopt here. Never has personal privacy been so vital a component of human liberty. We have been losing to the computer, the recorder and the eavesdropper by default; (it's) time to fight back.

I would suggest it is time to fight back. There is a serious personal privacy evasion going on and we need to do something about it.

Let us look at the problem which is new because Canadians have traditionally been able to use the telephone system in the comfort of knowing that calls over the normal wired system were really quite private.

Cellular phones have changed that. They have changed all the rules and for some very specific reasons. The main reason is that cellular telephones, instead of using a wired system, use a series of cells that are directed by dishes on roof-tops around and between cities, which pass calls in the open air. The call goes from cell to cell.

You can intercept whatever goes over the open air. It is public. Millions of Canadians who use cellular phones must realize they are not, strictly speaking, making telephone calls but radio calls. People have to remember that their cellular calls are transmitted on our public airwaves.

This introduces some serious difficulties in applying the normal expectation of privacy on cell calls. To combat this action people need to do two things. They must use caution and other steps will have to be explored.

Mr. Speaker, you tell me that I only have a couple of minutes left. That brings us to Bill C-109 which is an attempt albeit too late to strengthen the privacy of cellular communications. I say to you that using the Criminal Code with its amendment with indictable offences to the extent of imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years is a very strong measure. It really has to be examined. If we cannot stop the cellular phone call then I think we have to understand whether or not we can stop the right to freedom of speech. This is a very serious question. Should it also be a summary offence rather than an indictable offence?

The question has been raised by journalists whether or not this bill is fair, whether or not it can be perceived to be acceptable in the eyes of the public and whether or not someone can be charged for saying he or she heard something from someone. It is just not well-founded. I think it needs very careful analysis. With the intercepted radio-based telecommunication or the cellular phone call, have you given the right or implied consent when you say you have received a phone call?

There are many serious issues that need to be examined in the course of this bill when it goes to a legislative committee. I hope this House and the legislative committee will take the calls we are getting very seriously. A lot of people see this as an Orwellian bill. We expect that when the bill is being heard, the Canadian Association of Journalists will be called and we can find some kind of balanced solution.

Mr. Speaker, I do not expect you will find that this bill is the final word. An amendment must be brought forward in respect to this bill.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by complimenting my colleague for the excellent speech she just presented to this House. I am sure all members would agree that it was very thoughtful and well prepared.

I want to ask my colleague if she shares some of the concerns that some people have about section 113 of the bill. I know she has touched on it briefly. It is the proposal in the bill which would make it an offence not only to disclose the content of a conversation on a cellular phone, but the existence of a conversation.

That means that if I were an amateur listening to a conversation on a radio—and by the way that is not illegal and it will not be illegal under the bill—and I said to my wife: "Mary-Anne, come over here and listen to this", I have technically committed a criminal act by telling my wife to come and listen to what I had just heard. Even worse, to tell my wife I have just listened to a telephone conversation of John Smith without divulging what he said would be a criminal act under this bill.

I am wondering whether my colleague would agree that those are the kinds of important issues the committee should be dealing with when it reviews this bill clause by clause.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for raising that issue. He has heightened the ridiculous quality of some aspects of this bill and stressed the fact that it is not applicable. A law that cannot be applied is a ridiculous law. You know the old saying: "The law is an ass". Well that is exactly what it is in this case.

Let me suggest this to the House. Let us say you overhear, through the 900,000 scanners out there, two people planning to set off a bomb and indicating where that bomb will be placed. Perhaps you hear two people planning a robbery but you are not allowed to call the police and tell them you overheard that conversation. Is the interest of the public and the protection of society not more important than protecting the fact that you made a phone call and are liable to an indictable fine? This does not make an iota of sense.

I think addressing the question of privacy is fundamental. The way the wording is addressed in this bill needs very careful attention and some serious amendment. If this is the way one is going to look at how to deal with information that can be critical to the well-being of society, then I am sure this government did not intend it to be this way. It would be very poorly founded and certainly not acceptable in the public eye.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In order for my colleague to be able to participate in the discourse and given that there is only one minute before the proceedings are to be interrupted for the taking of the deferred vote, I wonder if I could ask the Chair to call it 5.45 p.m. If I keep going for another 30 seconds the Chair will not have even to do that because it will be 5.45 p.m. by then.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5.45 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion at report stage of Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on Motion No. 1, which was negatived on the following division:

The House resumed from Friday, February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunications Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak to second reading debate of Bill C-109, a bill to amend the Criminal Code, and to deal with a number of areas that are not necessarily all related. The bill purports to deal with a balance between the need for privacy and the need for effective policing. It also purports to deal with the need for privacy in telephone conversations.

The bill has been a long time coming. Some years ago, at least since the 1988 election, the Supreme Court of Canada in a number of decisions, notably the Duarte decision, the Wong decision and the Garifoli decision, pointed out certain inadequacies in our current Criminal Code legislation dealing with police investigation, police surveillance, and the rules used in our courts of law, our criminal courts, to deal with exclusion of evidence and admission of evidence used in convicting criminals.

One of the first things noted was that when certain types of evidence was found by the court to be excluded and certain investigative techniques used by police—these techniques are not just used in Canada but are used all over the world—it in fact made investigations and individual policemen sometimes vulnerable.

I recall in metropolitan Toronto the reaction of the police community when it was found that the use of body packs, that is recorders and transmitters, by policemen working under cover was found to be illegal. In many cases those body packs were not used just to gather evidence but were used to protect policemen. They were used as electronic lifelines, so to speak, from the undercover officer through to those monitoring the investigation. Those undercover techniques, those body packs, those electronic lifelines, sometimes were indispensable in providing protection to policemen and informers who were working under cover.

I may be understating it a bit but I can say they were concerned. They were disturbed that our country's highest court had made so many of them potentially vulnerable to a criminal class that really did not give a damn about the protection of the police and in many cases would stop at little to achieve its ends.

In response to that there have been many requests in this House and from police departments, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, and bodies representing policemen to rectify the situation to protect the police, all the while the courts operating to apparently provide protection to the criminals who were being convicted. This bill goes a long way to rebalancing and restructuring the playing field so that our policemen can operate in our best interests.

The first area the bill touches on deals with surveillance by the state as opposed to surveillance by individuals. It occurs from time to time that police will want to monitor by telephone or by camera with sound or other devices, movements and criminal acts of the criminal element. The common situation that we often see is the drug deal; we have seen enough of them reconstructed on television. There is the purchase and sale of stolen goods, the trafficking in prohibited weapons, trafficking in human bodies and procuring for purposes of prostitution. All of these types of things make it is very useful to have a recorded record of sounds, of video.

The Supreme Court found over the last two or three years that it could not permit the state, which acts for all of us, to engage in these monitoring activities unrestricted. It found that it was unacceptable and, therefore, if the state was going to use any evidence of the sound or video recording, or whatever, it simply was not going to permit it as admissible evidence unless the state got some kind of a warrant. Up to this point, the state really only had to obtain warrants for wiretapping. This was the first field where our laws required police to obtain warrants for that type of surveillance. That had come quite a distance from the old days when about all you ever needed a warrant for was to go into a private dwelling and/or do a search.

In any event, the court was really inviting Parliament to regulate the field. It was saying to Parliament that these types of activities by the state in pursuance of criminal investigations were not acceptable unless they had a judicial sanction.

What this law will do then, and I am stating it very briefly, is provide the mechanism for the state, for the police, to obtain a warrant to do any kind of surveillance using the usual techniques of videotaping, with or without sound, and wiretapping. The procedure is available and it has been streamlined so that police can go to a provincial court judge as opposed to a district or county court judge. That means that there are more judges available and the procedure is stated clearly in the amendments. The police know what they have to provide to the judge; the judge knows what the criteria are and what has to be done before the warrant can be used and the surveillance undertaken.

The provision for obtaining warrants for all types of state surveillance is something that I think most Canadians will see as a good thing. I hope they do. It manifests and reflects the protection of our privacy that the charter envisaged when it was put in place, and it will require the state to be more organized when it embarks on these surveillance exercises. The law does not require the average citizen who is out with a video camera or recorder to obtain a warrant. These laws pertain only to actions by the state.

The procedures involved have been streamlined. One of the areas that had been a problem was after the police had obtained a warrant. The person who was charged or convicted would often question whether or not the warrant that had been obtained was obtained properly. Often the warrant was obtained on information from informers and innocent third parties, people operating undercover.

We had the situation where the criminal wanted to see the information and who provided the information for the warrant. This information is usually kept in what is called a packet. The packet is a sealed envelope which contains the affidavit evidence and other materials that permitted the judge to make the decision to issue the warrant.

This statute also provides some direction as to how a court would review what was in the packet. The accused who under our law has the right of full disclosure, has to know the basis on which he or she has been charged or how a warrant was obtained. There are procedures now inserted in the code which will permit the accused to know what is in the packet but not to know who provided the information. Innocent third parties, informers and ongoing police intelligence operations will be protected.

A section of the bill deals with admissibility of evidence. There was a section in the code which said that evidence which was obtained not necessarily legally or illegally but arose out of a situation where there was not a warrant was questionable in terms of admissibility.

There was a section in the code that dealt with the criteria for admitting it. There is also a section in the charter which deals with admissibility of this indirect evidence. The government has decided to drop a number of the sections in the code in deference to the test in section 24(2) of the charter. I am very interested for discussion at committee on the implications of that decision. I am sure there will be some reasonable explanations because whatever we do here you can be sure will be argued in criminal courts for many years to come.

A mistake made at this stage, using 20-20 hindsight, one error in judgment on our part could result—and I am guessing—in millions and millions of dollars of litigation in the criminal courts. It is extremely important at this second reading stage and the exercise at committee that we do it properly.

Another item I wanted to mention is a far-sighted proposal. The government recognizes, as do parliamentarians, that investigative techniques may evolve. We are thinking about new technology and it may well be that it would be inappropriate for the state to use those new techniques. This section provides that where the state proposes to embark on a surveillance or monitoring exercise using any of these undefined new techniques, a warrant is available for that. Usually it will be the police who will present their proposal for monitoring to a judge and a judge will then approve. This proposal will then regulate a field which perhaps has not even evolved yet. We are certainly dealing with the image of Big Brother here. I think that inserting a provision in the code now to deal with these types of things in the future is probably very useful.

There are sections dealing with tracking and monitoring devices. There are also sections dealing with, as I mentioned earlier, the body pack situation where the undercover policeman needs to know that his colleagues are monitoring him or her as he or she proceeds with the undercover work. I note for the record the section requiring the evidence to come from these body packs, this type of surveillance, is meant to protect the policeman or the undercover person. This evidence cannot be used in court for the charge for which the investigation has been undertaken.

However the proposed provisions do permit that evidence to be used where charges relating to bodily harm with respect to the undercover person are laid. I have noted, as have others, that the evidence is not usable for perjury in the event that the accused perjures himself or herself. I would for the record note that the legislative committee should be considering the use of that body pack derived evidence for perjury charges under the Criminal Code should that eventuality arise.

The next area has already been addressed by colleagues in the House. It pertains to protection of privacy for cellular telephone calls. I had introduced a bill concerning this two or three months ago. The purpose of the bill was to provide the same privacy protection to cellular telephone calls as already exists for regular line based magnetic acoustic telephone transmission.

The government has taken a different route and I am interested in its rationale. Rather than making all telephone conversations carried by a telephone carrier private and undisclosed, non-tappable and non-interceptable, the government has provided that any interception that is done maliciously or for gain will be an offence. That has to do with the interception.

If you happen to be scanning and intercept a cellular call—some say it is just a radio transmission—then the fact that you do it innocently and not for malice or gain would not be an offence. However a second section states that where you disclose what you have intercepted, that disclosure would be an offence. That is the approach of the government.

It raises a couple of more questions. One of them is the charging section where it says it is an offence to disclose the contents of a cellular call. It says that it is an offence to disclose the mere existence of the telephone call. This is a potential problem because we are not talking about the contents of the call, we are talking about its existence.

Someone who is overhearing one of these calls intentionally or not, may simply say to a friend: "Hey, I am just picking up this phone call". In fact, under the terms of this section as now drafted that appears to be an offence. I am not sure that is what we intend. I want to have a closer look at that to make sure that we are not creating criminal offences which we did not intend.

I am very pleased to see that all of these different changes which are overdue have been placed in this bill. At least there is legislation to try to rectify omissions and gaps in current legislation.

My sense of it is that the legislation attempts to balance the privacy rights of all Canadians. That means me and everyone out there who uses telephones, who are out on the streets unknowingly with criminals. The police have all of the technology in the world at their disposal. It is an attempt to balance our privacy against the needs for an effective police investigation and surveillance when the law has been broken.

The law continues the regime of placing a judge's decision between the issuance and the request for the warrant. Under all of the conditions that exist in our modern democracies, that is the best system I think we have come up with.

The bill also goes a long measure to protecting the needs of individual police as they carry out their work on our behalf.

I am pleased to see the bill. I have raised two or three questions that I want to see taken up at committee. Until they are dealt with it is difficult to indicate the support for all elements of the bill, but I do see the bill being dealt with as quickly as possible.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C–109 tonight. In part it is because I am one of those one million cellular phone users. It is also because I have an understanding of the issues involved in terms of the question of privacy, the question of public need and the protection and support of our police forces as they use modern technology in order to obtain the appropriate evidence to put those in violation of the Criminal Code in their rightful place.

Let me start my remarks by repeating the words that are on labels on the telephones probably in most Department of National Defence installations throughout Canada, if not the world and I would suspect in external affairs offices as well. The sticker states: "This line is not secure". That is a warning for the user of a land line that someone may be listening out there.

This bill talks about cellular phones. I think many people forget that a lot of the calls which are either sent to or received by a cellular phone are land lines. Those are the phones in our offices, homes or cottages. It is not just cellular phone conversations that have been listened to by those people who have scanners or those people whose passion in life, shall we say, is listening in on other people's conversations or who for purposes of making a living, through the print or electronic media, are looking for ways to get information for stories.

I have always worked on the assumption that whether I am on my cellular phone or a land line someone somewhere is listening to me. I am not suggesting that someone is tapping my line, but we know the technology is there for governments to be able to scan the other, to scan microwaves, to pick up the symbiotic emissions from land lines from copper and to detect what is being said as people talk to one another.

Let me take it back a little bit. What we are talking about is how to deal with a conversation between two individuals. We have laws in place that protect an individual's privacy in his or her own home speaking to somebody else within the same dwelling. Only through certain procedures can a government agency, that is, a police department or a security service, intercept and record that communication and then use the words that were said and duly recorded in a court of law.

We also established the ability of those same agencies to intercept a communication made over a telephone wire. The courts have recently ruled that those communications, as I understand it, in their entirety must require a court order before they can be used in a court of law.

Up until a couple of years ago one party to a conversation had the right to give permission to the police department to have those conversations monitored and used in a court of law to prove that a violation of the Criminal Code had occurred. Regretfully the court struck down that law.

In my own community we had a case where an individual, according to all the evidence obtained through this wire intercept, was as guilty as one could be. However, because permission had been given by one participant in that phone conversation and because a court order had not been obtained that evidence was no longer admissible and the severe charges were thrown out of court.

This bill returns the ability of our police departments when an individual consents to their conversation, whether it is one that they originate or one that they receive, to use it in a court of law. That is an important and very positive step.

Again, I believe strongly that the police departments must have the ability to wire their police officers so that they can be in constant voice communication when they are sent into extremely dangerous situations. That could be anything from a hostage taking to any kind of street battle. There has to be the ability for the conversations that are recorded as a result of that transmission to be used in a court of law for the furtherance of justice. At the same time I recognize the importance of ensuring that due process is considered so that it cannot be done at random. There has to be a just cause for the use of this procedure.

Let me turn to cellular phones. As I mentioned earlier I have always been of the belief that somebody is listening to every conversation I have no matter what phone I use. Whether it is a phone that fits into my pocket, one that is attached to my car or one that I plug into the wall at home, whether it is a direct line or one of those hands-free phones, somewhere out there someone is listening.

We are talking about degrees of accessibility. There are those phones that have a range of 100 or 200 feet. You can take it in the backyard when you are having a beer in the summertime. Within a certain radius of your home, if someone has the right kind of scanner, the right kind of receiver or in fact a similar hand-held unit they can listen to your conversation. In some cases they only get half of it but in other cases they get the whole thing.

The cellular phone is a broader distribution because of the very nature of the cellular system. If anybody can tune in to your frequency, and again it might just be half of the conversation anywhere within that cell, not only can they listen but they can also record it if that is their wish.

This legislation makes it illegal to use the information that may be overheard, to even acknowledge or to report that you have heard so and so talking to so and so about whatever. It is imperfect legislation, but then the existing laws for land lines, for overhearing people having conversations in their own homes is also imperfect. We need to recognize that.

I would love to see this House pass a law that required all cellular phones to be encrypted so that once the signal left the cell transmitter it would be in a scrambled form and would not be descrambled until it got into the set in my hands. Perhaps over time we can work toward that in a way that is inexpensive to the user.

In the meantime, this bill goes a long way to providing protection so that people who maybe are forgetting that the line is not secure or that maybe do not care but do not realize the ramifications will not find their names and their conversations in the headlines.

Obviously we are not all of the Royal Family calibre. We are not necessarily cabinet ministers. We have not been at the constitutional table. However, there may be business and personal matters that are of no business to anybody else. Because we are public figures or because it is a neat or sexy story, someone will decide to publish it. Or someone will decide to take the tape of that conversation and share it among their friends to a point where the retelling of the story becomes so distorted that reputations are damaged.

That is why I support this particular piece of legislation. I know there are some concerns about civil liberties. I recognize in committee that these matters will be dealt with in a very serious and appropriate way. We do have to be careful that in trying to protect certain rights of certain people that we do not override the rights of society as a whole. That is what democracy is all about: Finding that balance of not giving up one for the other but finding the even keel.

It is an important piece of legislation. I look forward to its passage at second reading and then on to committee where I know it will get excellent study by members of this House and then back to this House for third reading.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak briefly on this piece of legislation. It is a progressive bill and addresses to a great extent many of the concerns in the community with respect to those who try to enforce the law and to the public at large.

I would like to speak on the aspects of the bill which deal with the cellular telephone. Specifically, this bill will try to give radiocommunication similar protection as is now given to other private communications as required by recent technology advancement.

In other words, someone who uses a cellular telephone is entitled to the same privacy as someone who uses a regular telephone. As it is and as my colleague from the NDP has mentioned, it is definitely possible for someone to listen to a conversation between two people. There are technologies that can be used to allow that particular individual to overhear a conversation between two people.

If you are making a long-distance call to another city and using the regular wire line to the central office, at one point or another that particular conversation will go up in the air whether we use a microwave or other type of transmission system. Once it is up in the air it is up for grabs and anybody can listen to it.

The previous legislation protects those people who use regular telephones, but does not protect those who use cellular phones. The government is adding the cellular telephone to the list of equipment protected by the existing legislation. It will also be protected by the proposed legislation.

I am interested in this legislation on cellular telephones because I think the cellular telephone is like any other piece of telecommunications equipment in our society. It makes us proud, as Canadians, that our industry is doing extremely well in the field of telecommunications. I would say Canada is the number one country in the world in terms of the telecommunications industry and the industry's capabilities in high technology fields. When it comes to economic renewal and economic development, it is doing extremely well. That is something we should be very proud of as policy makers and legislators. Every time there is an opportunity for us to have a new breakthrough, we should grab that opportunity and try to help the industry prosper and move forward.

You will be happy to learn that the cellular telephone industry has grown at an incredible rate here in Canada, perhaps more than any other country in the world. This industry presently employs more than 3,000 people and its annual revenue is about $500 million per year. The transmission system is the largest anywhere in the world.

In fact, Cellnet Canada has the longest corridors of cellular service anywhere in the world. The first corridor stretches from Windsor, Ontario to Halifax, Nova Scotia, which is over 2,500 kilometres or in excess of 232,000 square kilometres of continuous cellular service. That is a lot of space. A second corridor stretches from the Rocky Mountains to Ontario and covers in excess of 1,600 kilometres or 120,000 square kilometres of cellular coverage. That is the largest coverage that exists anywhere in the world.

There are close to one million subscribers to the cellular systems in Canada today. Considering that the industry came into the market only about eight years ago, that is a tremendous number of people who have moved to this technology. Cellular telephones are no longer like the ham radio or CB radio that people might use for fun or entertainment. It is an instrument that many people use today for business. Everybody in this House agrees that small businesses generate over 80 per cent of jobs anywhere in Canada, and over 54 per cent of people who use cellular telephones actually work for companies that employ less than 15 people. Most of these people are professionals, whose average age is about 40 years and average household income about $63,000 a year. We are talking about people who use cellular telephones for business and not fun.

Most of these people work in construction, manufacturing, real estate and the business service area. When two business people are discussing business over the telephone, making a transaction or trying to inquire or exchange information, one of the last things they want is for Joe or Sue on the other end of the line to listen to their conversation and try to butt in on the deal or get wonderful bits of information.

I can understand the frustration that exists now in the community and the concern about lack of privacy. Of course, some people are going to say the purpose of this piece of legislation is to help out the industry and the cellular telephone companies. Well, of course it is. We should be proud of the fact that as legislators we are doing everything we can to help our industry prosper. The community is also demanding the same kind of protection for cellular telephones as exists for normal telephones.

There is nothing to be ashamed of here. Some may say it is their right to find out what is happening, but this is almost like somebody coming to your doorstep and putting his or her ear to your door trying to listen to a conversation between you and a member of your family. That person can eventually come to us and say it is their right to know and find out what is happening between you and a member of your family.

It is important for us as a society to balance the two fundamental rights: the individual right to freedom of expression and privacy, and the collective right of society as a whole. In my view this piece of legislation does just that. It provides, to a large extent, a balance between what is considered to be the individual's right and what is considered to be a collective right, my right to privacy and the right of society to protection.

That is why one segment of the bill gives members of our police force the right to use electronic surveillance where they believe there is a dangerous situation and a need for intervention by the authorities.

We have the right of the community to protection and safety, and a provision whereby this bill will allow people in authority to have access to information that takes place between two individuals in our society.

This bill goes a long way toward providing the industry with the necessary infrastructure to launch it further, rather than creating a set-back and scaring off the consumers as well as the professionals who are using cellular telephones on a daily basis.

A lot of people who are watching now are probably thinking they should really think twice about buying or renting a cellular telephone. Of course it is the individual's decision. It is not a decision you or I can make for them.

I would like to bring to the attention of the House that by the year 1996-97 cellular telephone use will increase by about 25 per cent. In other words, by the year 1996-97 in excess of 1.5 million Canadian men and women may be using cellular telephones. Of course, many of those users will want to see some sort of protection.

You can compare that to the United States. The United States has had a tremendous increase in the use of cellular telephones. As a matter of fact the industry in the U.S. generates in excess of $6.7 billion a year. When we talk about that large industry and that large and wide market it is another opportunity for our industry to eventually launch into the United States and elsewhere around the world.

The United States has in excess of about nine million subscribers. When you look at the proportion between Canada with about 26 million people and the United States with about 10 times that and the penetration of its industry and compare it to ours, there is a very good balance between what the Americans have been able to do there and what we are doing here. The rate of increase in the United States is about 9 per cent on an annual basis. We are ahead of that and we are doing just fine.

Moving a little beyond this particular bill, which in fact does address the issue to a point, I would like to see work being done on the question of faxes and access to information.

My colleagues and I receive a whole pile of faxes on a daily basis. One would question the necessity of sending some of the correspondence by fax. Perhaps it would be better to use the mail. I hope that some time the government or future government will look at the possibility of trying to do something to control the flow of information via fax.

This legislation also protects information coming over the fax machines. That information is treated as being similar to voice or computer information being sent. Fax users are in fact protected.

My advice to Canadians and those who might be watching or listening is that whenever you are using your cellular telephone assume at least half the city is listening. This legislation is not going to solve your problem. If you are dealing with a business matter it is preferable not to discuss it on the cellular telephone.

I know there is a tendency to go on and on when you are on the line. Eventually you divulge a lot of information about a business contract or a discussion as it relates to information you might not want to disclose over the line.

There are a few points that can be addressed at the committee level and I hope the bill will go to committee. For those who might have some concerns in the industry or the the community, I would suggest that the committee level is the best place for those concerns to be addressed.

Of course this bill is a first step. It is a bold step and one that I look at with great enthusiasm. I think it is timely.

I do not know what else can be said. When one runs out of ammunition it is better to just move on, fold your tent and sit down. On that note I will do just that. I am delighted to see the bill come forward and I am delighted to see the government moving ahead with this bill. I want to congratulate the cellular industry in Canada which has done an outstanding amount of work. I am very proud of them.

It is probably the first time all of the major cellular telephone companies in Canada have come together to set up a strategy to help users get the maximum benefit from the system. There is some fine tuning that needs to be done but they are doing just fine and I am proud of them.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Hon. Gerry Weiner (for the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved that Bill C–114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Pursuant to Standing Order 73(3), I move:

> That the motion for second reading of Bill C–114 be amended by having the bill referred to the Special Committee on Electoral Reform rather than a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, now that I am no longer Whip perhaps I will speak on debate a little more often. It is something for the House to contemplate.

It is a particular pleasure this evening to be in the position of making the lead speech on Bill C–114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act. I say that for two reasons. There is probably nothing that we do in this Chamber that is more fundamental to the continuation of our form of government, our democratic system of dealing with people, than to consider the issue of the Elections Act and how the people are chosen to sit in this Chamber to act on behalf of the Canadian people.

If we do it wisely and well, then democracy is enhanced. If we do it badly, then democracy is bruised and hurt. Hopefully history will say that the package of amendments before us for consideration in Bill C–114 plus other work to be forwarded to this House by our committee will turn out to be measures that have helped our sense of democracy and their importance in our system of government.

I would like to begin by paying tribute to the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform. Its members worked very hard for approximately 28 months, from November 1989 to February 1992. There were five commissioners in all and they produced perhaps one of the largest royal commission reports in Canadian history.

The basic summary information of the commission's findings is contained in four volumes. These are augmented by over 20 research volumes, not all of which have yet been published. The work they did was substantial. The research work that they commissioned and had performed on their behalf will constitute research material in universities for decades to come. The report really was an extensive body of work.

Because there were 275 recommendations and because there was such a large volume of reporting, the House in its wisdom determined in February 1992 that it was wise to set up a House of Commons special committee to examine the royal commission report and to make recommendations to the House as to what actions it should contemplate and take.

The committee was set up one year and one month ago. I had the honour to chair that committee, and it has indeed been an honour. It has also been a pleasure because of the degree of co–operation we have had beginning with the members of the committee themselves.

Mr. Prud'homme: Name them all.

Mr. Hawkes: Name them all. The members of the committee represent competing political interests in the country and those in the House. They also share a common feeling about the importance of electoral law in Canada, the importance of our democratic traditions and the importance of the continuation of those democratic traditions. That shines through in the degree of willingness to sit long hours, to consider carefully the alternating and different points of view from all committee members and some of those who substitute from time to time, to listen carefully to the staff and to consider recommendations and points of view that are advanced by them.

They deserve a lot more credit than they are likely to get in their home constituencies because the consideration of a report is the primary activity. It is certainly not as public an activity as many other things that could engage our time and attention but it is fundamentally important and I want to recognize that reality in these Chambers.

I would also like to say thank you to those who were witnesses before us. There have been more than people might realize. Even as we drafted the reports we issued an invitation to Elections Canada to be present for the bulk of the time we spent together. At some cost to them in terms of their personal lives and certainly in terms of the resources of that institution, they have complied with our request and have been very helpful to us in providing their experience and their expertise as we consider alternate ways of making recommendations to the House and in particular to the wording to come forward to the House.

It is not often that a committee has an adequate chance to measure its success but I think in this particular instance committee members can feel justly satisfied that their work has been paid attention to. Bill C-114 is remarkably similar to the committee's third report which was our first substantive report laid before the House on December 11, 1992. There are a few deviations, most of them of a technical nature, with some advice from the Department of Justice. Most of those changes I think are things that committee members could agree with.

There are one or two elements which have been introduced from cabinet discussions on which committee members are not solidly in agreement, but I am sure others will discuss those at a later point in this debate.

The result of the committee's report and the subsequent legislation is a document of 114 pages in length which simply amends part of the Canada Elections Act. For those who are listening tonight who have never examined 114 pages of legislation let alone 114 pages of amendments, they might be surprised at the level of detail and complexity which is involved. It really is quite remarkable.

What is also remarkable is the Canadian way of reporting news. If you examine the proposition before the House, 112 of the 114 pages deal with how people should vote and who should vote. The changes are rather substantial and we think very positive. I will come to some of those details in a minute.

There are a few clauses that deal with some other issues that in a timing sense needed to be dealt with now. The committee preferred to have them dealt with now rather than in phase two and the press attention has centred on that. Those things are rather minor in the total scheme of things compared to what the bill is all about.

I know from my own experience I have had difficulty convincing television, radio and print media to do an article or a think piece or a news piece on what the bill is all about. It is almost as if it did not exist, not because it is not important, but simply because it is not as interesting perhaps as some other things which are less important but perhaps more exciting for their audience.

This bill in its main focus answers the question of who can vote and how they will vote. They are major changes. Let me just list some so people can consider them.

First, in all of Canada's urban areas if you do not get your name on a voter's list by 17 days before voting day there is no way for you to vote. All of us who have run for public office have been in contact with hundreds and hundreds of Canadians who simply were out of the country or out of their riding when the enumerators went by their homes and they did not get on the list. They did not know they were not on the list. They show up at the polling place to find out that they have been disenfranchised and cannot vote. It was a big problem during the recent referendum, a lot of complaints.

This bill solves that problem in two ways. You will be able to get your name on the voters' list up to five days before voting and then you will be able to walk into the poll in rural or urban areas, the proper place, and sign up to be on the list on voting day. It may be a little inconvenient for some people perhaps. They will have to travel a little further to get on the list on voting day. It is much better for them to get on the list early but no Canadians will be disenfranchised in the next federal election simply because they did not get their names on the list in time if the House passes this bill in time and makes it the law of the land. It is a major change which will be welcomed from coast to coast.

The second change will allow people who are absent from home during critical voting periods, such as voting day, to be able to vote. That may not sound like a whole lot but let me start with the smallest part of it.

There are people who cannot make it to the polls. They have physical handicaps of one kind or another. They may be just a block or two away. Up to now they had to vote by proxy. They had to give somebody else the right to go to the polling station and vote in their place. Therefore, somebody else knew their voter intention but they had no way of knowing whether that person voted the way they wanted them to or not. It was a proxy voting situation. We are putting in place a system that will allow Canadians in that situation to cast their own ballots in their own homes. The sealed ballot will be returned for counting to an appropriate place.

That same system will apply to Canadians who are away from their ridings during the voting period. They may be looking after a sick relative in another part of the country. Their employer may put them on a course or on a temporary assignment to another part of the country. They may be seismograph crews working in isolated areas on boats and ships and things of that nature. They will be able to vote wherever they are. Let us say it is somebody from Calgary who is working in Fredericton, New Brunswick. He or she will be able to go into a returning office in Fredericton, make arrangements to be put on the voters' list in Calgary, and he or she will be able to vote in Fredericton for the candidates in Calgary. It is unprecedented in Canadian history.

Third, but not last and not least, is that Canadians who are living abroad but planning to return to Canada and who have been living abroad for less than five years will be able to register on a permanent voters' list. So Canadians who are listening tonight, when the law is changed if you happen to be leaving the country, you would be able to register. If an election occurs in your absence you will receive a ballot and have the opportunity to cast that ballot, return it to this country and have it counted. It is a system similar to ones in most western nations that allow their citizens living abroad temporarily to vote.

This may or may not work with practice. It may require some modification in the future, but it is a bold new step recommended first of all by the commission, endorsed by the committee and presented to the House, picked up by cabinet and is now before us in the form of legislation.

The five-year limit will not apply to Canadian military personnel and dependants serving abroad. It will not apply to our diplomatic corps, those who serve Canada abroad at a civilian level and their dependants. It will not apply to provincial civil servants who serve their province abroad and to their dependants as well. This is the first time provincial civil servants have had this opportunity. There has been a system for military personnel and diplomatic personnel in the past. The system has changed somewhat but we think it will be every bit as efficient.

If you read the election law that sits on bookshelves today, Mr. Speaker, you will find a lot of exclusions of people who cannot vote for one reason or another. One that comes immediately to mind is judges. Under Canadian election law it has been struck down so judges are really allowed to vote but the law says they cannot.

When this new law is in place it will be restricted to two categories of people who will not be able to vote. All Canadians 18 years of age and over will be able to vote with the exception of two categories of persons. The first category will be those sentenced to a prison term of two years or longer, in other words those who have committed a crime serious enough to warrant that length of sentence and who are still in prison at the time of voting. The second category will be those Canadians who are living abroad, have lived abroad continuously for five years or longer, or have no intention of returning. Those are the only two excluded categories.

That is a grand simplification. It opens the door to an unknown number of new voters. There have been estimates of between one million and two million more votes being cast in the next federal general election because of the sum total of these changes. They go back to enumeration, getting one's name on the list, being able to swear in on election day, living abroad, being in another part of Canada, and proxy voting being replaced by voting in one's own home for those who are physically handicapped. All those measures taken together produce some unknown quantity of voters. Our predictions would be that the next federal election would produce more voters than at any previous time in Canadian history and that the difference would be substantial. Our democracy will work a bit better because of that.

I want to deal with the future work of the committee and to implore the House on a couple of issues. Bill C-114 needs quick passage. We intend to move it quickly to committee to commence clause-by-clause consideration, to go through it and to be able to make amendments members propose to make the law better. It must be in place as quickly as possible or the Chief Electoral Officer will not have the administrative time necessary to put the new systems in place.

I ask the House to bring forward whatever solid ideas it has for positive change, but let us not unduly delay the passage of Bill C-114 because the nation will benefit from it and the nation needs it.

Some people are worried about a lot of items that are not in Bill C-114. Committee members have absolutely no difficulty in understanding those worries which belong for the most part in what we refer to as phase two or phase three. The committee began over two weeks ago considering a draft report on phase two. Phase two will deal with all the communication issues, all the expenditure issues, and all the enforcement issues.

If we can report to the House on those issues by the end of March, if we can see legislation by the first part of May and pass it into law by the end of May, all those phase two issues can be in place in law and implemented well before the next federal general election.

Mr. Milliken: It should be this May.

Mr. Hawkes: It should be this May.

Mr. Milliken: The election should be this May.

Mr. Hawkes: "The election should be this May". It is unlikely. I would predict the election will probably commence some time this summer with voting in late summer or early fall.

For those members and people in the community worried about the communication issues, worried about the expenditure limits, rebates and definition of election expenses, and worried about enforcement issues, the committee's work is well advanced. I see no difficulty in the committee reporting before the end of March. That leaves sufficient time for the House to act and for us to have changes in place in plenty of time before the next federal general election.

The third part of our work, phase three, will deal with a number of issues such as redistribution, nomination meetings, registration of local associations, aboriginal constituencies, leadership contests and a number of other items in the Lortie commission report, none of which can come into force before the next election because we are too close to an election for them to be put in place and for them to be acted upon.

In terms of our timetable in phase three, if the committee can report by the end of April, if we have the month of May for the presentation of a piece of cabinet legislation and pass it in June, the entire remaniement, the entire change to the Canada Elections Act, the entire overhaul, can be accomplished by this Parliament in a truly positive fashion.

After one year of hard work by the committee we have eight members of Parliament whose expertise in these matters grows almost daily and whose efficiency and relationship to these matters get a bit better.

There are a few other changes in this legislation I would like to touch on briefly, to spend perhaps two minutes on. There are some items in here which will save Canadian taxpayers money. One of those which is key is the clause that allows elections to be conducted without a full enumeration when they are close enough to a previous electoral event such as the recent referendum.

There is another provision which will allow, where circumstances warrant, the creation of a voters' list by a single individual rather than a pair. These things will save the system some money.

There is another set of clauses which puts the responsibility on political parties to be more involved with local returning officers and to provide them with sufficient people skilled in electoral matters to conduct a good election.

There is a provision which makes sure that at every ballot box and at every step of the process we are represented by competing political interests. It is the principle of competing political interests which is our best protection against fraud. Those are expressed in these amendments more clearly than they have ever been expressed in Canadian election law before. I think it is a very positive step forward.

To keep people from being frivolous about their candidacy, or to aid in that regard while still encouraging people to run for public office, is a bit of a moving target. It is difficult sometimes to decide and the committee has recommended basically the process which the Lortie commission brought to our attention. Part of that process will involve a few more signatures on nomination papers, 100 in the cities and less in more rural areas.

We have also taken the idea of the deposit in a couple of directions. There has been for 20 years now a $200 deposit. That is basically raised to $500. An additional $500 deposit is required which is refundable solely on completion of the necessary paperwork for Elections Canada.

Elections Canada told us that a lot of candidates never did the paper work and it cost taxpayers many thousands of dollars to chase them down to get the necessary forms completed so the election was brought to a close. We are putting out a little bit of a carrot: Put up $500. You forfeit it if you do not do the paper work; you get it back if you do the paper work. It is just a deposit on paper work.

There is another section which proposes some limits on direct spending. Canadian election law today puts limits on direct spending for the purpose of opposing and promoting a candidate or a party, puts limits on candidates and puts limits on parties. The law itself says that no one else can spend any money.

The courts have struck that down and the Chief Electoral Officer has struck it down in one province. The Chief Electoral Officer has informed us that it is not his intention to enforce that provision. The committee has acted to put forward a few paragraphs, half a page, which would put a $1,000 limit on people other than parties and candidates who choose to be involved in the election by promoting or opposing directly a candidate or a party.

The reason for that at this time is simply to square the deck, to make sure that the principle which applies to candidates of parties applies to other than candidates or parties. The committee is seized of the over-all expenditure limit issue in phase two of its work and there will be a more extensive report on those matters at the conclusion of our second report.

I hope that will provide people with at least a brief summary of what is involved. I commend the bill to the House. It has the endorsation, in almost every instance, of every member of the committee. There is a slight variation on a few matters but over all we are enthusiastic about the thrust of the bill. It indicates clearly that the work done by the Lortie commission has been helpful in our achieving consensus about some very fundamental changes.

It is a user friendly system that at the same time protects Canadians against fraud. That is why it took so many words; that is why it took so many clauses. I commend it to the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to my hon. colleague, the chairman of the special committee of this House on electoral reform. He said very interesting things, as usual, but he did not really explain what the problems are with this bill. In addition, it is obvious—so it seems anyway—that his speech was intended at least in part for the leader of the government in the House of Commons who is not here today to discuss this bill. That is too bad, because I would also like to know what the hon. minister thinks about it. I regret that he cannot be with us, considering he is always very partisan in his remarks and this would have been an opportunity for me to reply. At any rate, my point is that this bill has finally been introduced in this House, after a four-year wait.

[English]

The Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing was established in 1989 or 1990—a very long time ago, as my colleague from Saint-Denis says—as an excuse for the government to do nothing in respect of electoral reform.

We regret very much the government was unable to act more expeditiously on this particular dossier. Instead, as my colleagues on the other side know, the government dragged its heels and shilly-shallied and dilly-dallied until now when we must scramble to try to get through some changes to Canada's electoral law.

It is fair to say that members on all sides have been pressing for changes to bring the law up to date at least. Instead we have had inaction. The government sat and did nothing. We have made offers before to expedite the matter to get election law on the floor of the House, discussed and referred to committee, but the government said no, that we had to wait for the report of the royal commission.

We in this party participated actively in the affairs of the royal commission from the very beginning. The royal commission had public hearings. The parties were invited to attend and make presentations, and we did so. We recommended to the royal commission that an interim report be presented to the House dealing with routine changes to the act that would update the Canada Elections Act so that it could be in place and workable in time for a general election.

Unfortunately the royal commission ignored that advice. The royal commission went on and on, as the hon. member for Saint-Denis says, and presented its final report a year ago now. Once that report came to the House it was referred to the special committee on electoral reform. That is what we have been working on since that time.

As everyone knows the referendum intervened and the Chief Electoral Officer indicated in no uncertain terms and quite understandably that as long as he had a referendum campaign to conduct he would be unable to deal with any changes to Canada's electoral system. We had to sit back and wait until the Chief Electoral Officer had completed the referendum campaign and its immediate aftermath. There was a very lengthy delay in our committee's work. Although we had started off ambitiously things got held up.

Here we are finally, over four years after the last election. One is due. If the government was not so contemptuous of democracy in this country it would have called an election. We are now debating changes to the electoral law to try to bring it up to date and make it something that will work in the forthcoming election.

Hopefully the law will survive court challenges that the current law is subject to under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The government has elected to allow the committee to do its study on this bill. Indeed, it has given the committee a great deal of freedom.

The committee has seen fit to work through the royal commission's report, adopting provisions that it can accept to propose in its own report to the House. I may say that the report of the royal commission took the form of four volumes. There has been some criticism that our committee did not adopt volume three, which was a draft bill prepared by the royal commission as the basis for proceeding in this House.

As members of Parliament who are charged with making the law of the country we looked at the new draft bill that the royal commission submitted. Large pieces of the royal commission's report could not be in place for an election since it was so late. It was not late according to its own schedule. It was just that the government should have introduced something like this back in 1989 instead of waiting. I do not intend to criticize the commission in that respect.

Given that we could not implement the bill, it hardly seemed reasonable for us to embark on a study of a whole new act where we would have to pull chunks out, put in pieces of the old legislation and redraft them in form that fitted with the bill that the royal commission had prepared.

Rather than do that, we decided that the best policy was to seek to amend the existing Elections Act in order to make changes that would adopt those parts of the royal commission report that we could proceed with and make other necessary changes in order to make the act one that complied, at least for the most part, with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as far as we reasonably could.

We could also make any small and necessary changes in wording to correct past errors and past problems in the act, many of which had been pin-pointed by the Chief Electoral Officer in his reports to Parliament following the general elections in 1984 and 1988.

We had our work cut out for us. The committee embarked on this detailed study of the act. The chairman has indicated how many hours we have spent in this committee toiling through draft bills. It is very tedious work. I hope this debate is a little more lively than some of the committee proceedings have been, although there have been moments of interest and excitement there.

What are the problems with the bill? I want to state, and it will become clear in the course of my remarks, that while the committee made a series of recommendations in the form of a draft bill to the House the government took the draft bill away and doctored it up a bit.

As a member of the opposition and as a member who believed we were working on full consensus I naturally have some concerns about the doctoring that has gone on. Our party supports this bill in principle. We are attempting to assist in its passage at the second reading stage. We will seek amendments in the course of the committee work on the bill and at report stage.

We hope that the government will see fit to agree to some of the amendments that we are going to propose. I want to talk about the problems that I have with the bill first, and then I will mention a few of the more positive aspects later. The principle of this bill is reasonably sound but we have problems with specifics.

The royal commission cost the Canadian taxpayers $20 million. That money has been paid out, but the advice of the royal commission is being ignored by the government in many cases.

I want to start with the issue of the representation of women in the House of Commons, which is one that the royal commission considered very directly. It occurred early in the first volume of its report. In the course of its many detailed studies on this issue the commission determined that there were systemic and structural barriers to the entry of women to this House.

I quote from page 107 of the report: "Among the structural barriers identified, however, two are paramount. The first is the cost of the nomination process. The second is the lack of concerted efforts by political parties to support women seeking nominations".

Those were the two principal problem areas that the royal commission identified as barriers to women entering this House. So that everyone is aware, out of the 295 members of this House 13 per cent are women.

On page 110 the royal commission said: "Another troubling question is why so many fewer women than men seek nomination. Several factors appear to be at work here. Based on the socio-economic analysis presented earlier, it is clear that family responsibilities, still shouldered largely and as a prime responsibility by women, deter many competent and interested women from seeking office at least until their children are older.

A second factor is that women tend to have less employment security and thus face a greater potential impact if they lose their bid for public office at the nomination stage, as a candidate, or following one term in office. As the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women noted, one of the most obvious financial costs associated with running for elected office is the risk to employment. Many women cannot afford to gamble their jobs on the chance of winning an election.

Finally, it is clear that some women are deterred by the differential media treatment they receive as political contenders. Our research showed that although the coverage of women in politics has improved over the last two decades it remains stereotyped, focusing much more often on women's appearance, personal life and opinions about specific issues such as abortion".

Clearly the commission did not feel it could do much to affect the media's coverage of women candidates but it did feel it could do something to make the nomination process more accessible and open for women candidates. It made a series of recommendations in its report. First, it recommended that spending limits be put in place for persons seeking nominations. Understandably we are not proceeding with that recommendation at this stage because some nominations have already taken place and had taken place before we received the report.

In order to avoid controversy on that one during this particular election it was deferred to what we are calling phase three of our committee work. We hope to have it in place in time for the election after the 1993 election.

Second, it recommended that child care expenses be deductible by the primary caregiver when that person is seeking nomination for elected office as a candidate for a party and also during the period of the election itself.

Both these recommendations found favour with the committee and were included in the committee's report to this House, which was tabled in December of last year, but both have been ignored by the government. They were taken out of the draft bill and ignored by the government.

Unfortunately it will be difficult for us as members to try to get those amendments back in because both being changes in the taxation law, subject to advice we will get in due course from parliamentary counsel they may require royal recommendation. If that is so we may have difficulty, although it is taking tax off and we may be able to move them. We will do our utmost to see that those changes are put back in place. Apparently, the government has expressed an unwillingness to deal with them and we are surprised at that unwillingness.

In addition, there was a major recommendation to provide an incentive to political parties to actively recruit women candidates. That recommendation was that if after the next election fewer than 20 per cent of the members of this House were women then in the following election any registered political party that managed to elect women as 20 per cent of its caucus would receive an additional reimbursement from Elections Canada. All the political parties are entitled to reimbursement of their expenses from Elections Canada to a certain degree after the electoral event is concluded.

The proposal the royal commission made was that a party could get up to 50 per cent additional money back depending on the percentage of women in its caucus.

For example, if the caucus was 25 per cent women the reimbursement would be 125 per cent of what it would otherwise be. It was a financial incentive of some significance that was offered to political parties.

We in this party have favoured and consistently pressed for this change in the law. We could not get agreement in the committee to bring forward this recommendation to this House. Again, we believe it is one that should be in this bill and we will continue to press for its inclusion in this bill. It could be included in phase two but so far we have not got agreement in the committee to put it in there.

We are concerned that the important and far-reaching recommendations of the royal commission, which will admittedly not solve the problem entirely but will at least assist in solving the problem of under-representation of women in this House, are being ignored.

We feel that the recommendations are not ones that are overly demanding or onerous, but they will make it easier for women to access the electoral system. We feel it is important for the system and for the obligation members of this House have to represent the country. We believe the House should be more representative and we support these limited recommendations that the royal commission has put forward. We are surprised that the members of the Conservative Party are not supporting these recommendations.

On the last one, the major recommendation about extra payment to the parties, even the women's group in the Conservative Party showed a complete lack of support for it. It indicated that it did not feel that such a change was necessary. I am frankly shocked. I would have at least expected support from that quarter but even those women, at least those who are running that organization, did not feel it was necessary in spite of the very poor showing of their party in having women as members of the caucus. I realize the Prime Minister talks a different tune, but the fact is there are not very many in that caucus and in percentage terms it is quite low.

The second aspect concerns third party advertising. There has been a lot of criticism in the press of the provisions dealing with third party advertising that were contained in the committee report in December. This criticism has particularly come from the National Citizens' Coalition. It has run advertisements, which I would call scare tactic advertisements, designed to make people think that somehow their rights are being trampled on as a result of the third party advertising provisions in this bill. I am pleased that the government has at least agreed with the very limited restrictions that have been proposed in the law that is before this House. I suspect that the reason we have not seen any National Citizens' Coalition ads since is because it realizes what a weak law the government has proposed in this case.

Let us look in detail at the restriction that is proposed. The law says no person or organization may engage in advertising during an election campaign where that organization or person spends more than $1,000, and where the ad is either in favour of or opposed to a candidate or a political party. It must be a direct ad in support of or in opposition to. In other words, indirect advertisements that deal with issues other than candidates and parties, that deal with policy questions, for example, are still able to be advertised by anybody and in unlimited amounts. In other words, all the advertising that went on in the last campaign on free trade, which was such an abuse of our electoral system, would be allowed as long as no reference was made to a party or candidate.

This is not what the royal commission on electoral reform and party financing recommended. The $20 million study that the government established, which is the basis of the work that we are doing, recommended a very severe restriction on third party advertising. It recommended a ban on third party advertising and a ban on expenditures by a third party of any campaign expense during an election campaign, except for $1,000. The ban would apply to everything, not just advertising. It would apply to polling and every other kind of expense because it clearly intended that there be restrictions in place on electoral expenses.

The parties are subject to limits, both nationally and on a constituency basis. Those limits are in place and they are designed to ensure that the electoral process in Canada is fair. I think they are reasonable restrictions. I attended a seminar hosted by the royal commission at which some American congressmen and an American senator were in attendance. They were extremely jealous of the Canadian system of expenditure control in election campaigns. They do not have these controls in place in the United States. They told stories of how they had to spend their time, easily half their time, between elections raising money for the next campaign. It is a completely different system and it is not one that serves the public well.

Our system serves the public well. Politicians are restricted in what they can spend and the parties are restricted in what they can spend. As a result of that our campaigns are not easily bought by one party because no one can spend that much more than anyone else. That is a big help. Also, the level of expenditure ensures that you do not have to be a multimillionaire in order to be a candidate for political office in Canada. It is becoming increasingly difficult for someone who is not very well to do to seek elected office in the House of Representatives or in the Senate of the United States. That is not the difficulty in Canada.

The amazing thing is when reading these advertisements from the National Citizens' Coalition you never see mention of the fact that there are restrictions on Canada's political parties. You do not see any criticism of the fact that there are restrictions on the expenditures of Canadian political parties and there have been for many years in this country. It has not run full-page ads denouncing that part of the law. It is only when it sees the possibility of restrictions on its own advertising campaign that the National Citizens' Coalition chooses to take issue and run its national ads.

I want to say that the National Citizens' Coalition uses these ads and these scare tactics as a fund-raising gesture. It runs these ads and there is always a little blurb down at the bottom—some of my constituents send this material to me—saying if you would like to support the National Citizens' Coalition in its work, cut out the coupon and send in money. You have probably seen them, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to pose some questions to the National Citizens' Coalition to find out where the money goes. It makes a great issue of members of Parliament and the benefits that members of Parliament receive and so on. All of us have seen advertisements on that issue.

The chairman or whatever his position is with the National Citizens' Coalition was asked by one of my colleagues how much he was paid. Of course salaries of members of Parliament are a public matter. Well he said that was private, that it was not the business of the member of Parliament. The member of Parliament asked who decided how much he got paid. That too was private. It was not the business of the member of Parliament. Then the member asked who was on the board of directors. That was private too. It was not the business of the member of Parliament.

One has to wonder what goes on with the National Citizens' Coalition. Its argument is that its rules of public disclosure, its rules of freedom to advertise during campaigns apply only to it. The rest of us, the political parties, the people in public life who have to debate the issues, who are standing for public office and who have to stand again and seek re-election and so on, are all subject to rules. But according to the National Citizens' Coalition we should be and it should not. It wants everything on the politician but it does not want anything on itself.

I suggest that the advertising campaign that has been conducted by that coalition has not served the Canadian public well and has distorted this issue. The proposed restriction is very slight and will hardly affect the issue in terms of the ability of Canadians to advertise at all.

The third area I want to deal with is the question of homeless electors. The royal commission recommended that Canadians who do not have a fixed place of abode are being left off the voters' list and ought to be included on the list so that they, like everyone else, get to exercise their franchise.

The committee considered the proposals put forward by the royal commission and accepted them. We recommended that there be a specific requirement in the law that the Chief Electoral Officer ensure that homeless electors were enumerated where that could possibly be done.

Specifically we provided that a homeless elector could register as an address the place where that person obtained food on a regular basis. However, the government saw fit in its bill to delete those provisions. It took all of those out and said the existing law was satisfactory. The excuse given by the government House leader was that if we changed the law it might allow for fraud.

I suggest that really what this government is doing is saying that the homeless are not likely to vote Conservative so you might as well leave them out. I can understand why when the former Minister of State for Housing said that the homeless enjoyed being homeless. I think my colleague from Churchill will remember his statement some years ago. He is a member from Toronto and he made the statement that the homeless enjoyed being homeless. Therefore there was indifference and a clear lack of care on the part of the government for the plight of the homeless in this country shown by the minister. I suspect that statement cost him a lot of votes in that group.

The government is leaving a provision in the law that requires the homeless to show residence for at least 10 days in a place in order to have that place shown as his residence and therefore get on the electors' list. Most homeless people do not stay in the same place for 10 days. It is an unreasonable provision. The purpose of the royal commission's report and the purpose of the committee's report was to change that law and make it easier for the homeless to get on the list and the government has not seen fit to do that. We believe that provision in this bill should be changed.

Another issue is the length of an election campaign.

[Translation]

The recommendation the committee had made to this House was that the maximum length of an election campaign be 56 days. We also recommended a minimum length of 47 days. The government approved this latter recommendation, by the way, but not the one regarding the maximum length. We regret that the government chose to ignore that recommendation. We also regret, as a party, that the government and the Chief Electoral Officer decided not to approve the recommendation of the royal commission which was for the minimum length of an election campaign to be 40 days.

[English]

Forty-seven days is still too long. Canadians are tired of very lengthy election campaigns. Provincial campaigns are much shorter. I noticed that just last week there was a dissolution of the legislature in Prince Edward Island. That election is to be on March 29. I know my former colleague, the hon. member for Malpeque, who is running to be premier of that province, will do extremely well in the election campaign. I wish her very well as I am sure all members of the House do. That is a short campaign. It is going to be in one month. There is no earthly reason why the Canadian election campaign cannot be shortened to that length of time.

We are told by the Chief Electoral Officer that 47 days is the minimum he can do. The government did not press the issue and accepted it. However it has refused to put a maximum on it. The government House leader mumbled something about constitutional rights of the Prime Minister, that it would require a constitutional change to somehow alter that. What rubbish. There is no evidence of that at all. I would have liked to have questioned him on it but unfortunately I did not get the chance when he was before our committee.

We support a further change to this act that would restrict the length of campaigns to 40 days which even then is long but it is a lot shorter than what we are now dealing with. Canadians deserve a shorter election. It would reduce costs. It would ensure that the Canadian taxpayer gets a little better bang for the buck. The parties would not have to raise so much money in order to operate the campaign. Limits could be reduced.

Those are the points in the bill that I think are negative.

I should mention in a brief passing the issue of prisoners' voting rights. People say: "Well in Kingston of course you are interested in prisoners' voting rights". I am interested in prisoners' voting rights. There are a lot of prisons in Kingston. There are a lot of inmates in prisons in Kingston that is for sure. In fairness also the issue was dealt with by the royal commission which made certain recommendations concerning inmate voting rights.

The committee considered the matter and made another recommendation more restrictive than that proposed by the royal commission. We know that prisoners won the right to vote in court decisions in this country and exercised that right in the referendum campaign. I want to make it very clear that the voting rights exercised by inmates during the referendum were exercised in the riding from which the inmate came, not in Kingston nor in the riding in which the prison was located.

I think my friend from Churchill may remember the figures better than I do, but my recollection is that only 119 inmates voted in Kingston and the Islands during the referendum campaign. That was a relatively high number but it is not very many out of about 12,000 federal inmates who are in prison across this country.

Given that, my own preference would be for a longer period than this two-year restriction that the government has proposed. What the government has suggested to the House in this bill is that any person incarcerated in a federal institution would be deprived of his or her right to vote. I think that is unduly restrictive. I do not believe it is in accordance with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which guarantees to every citizen the right to vote.

Inmates in penitentiaries do not lose their citizenship because they have been convicted of a crime. We do not take citizenship away for that. If we want to make that one of the punishments, let us change the Criminal Code. The charter provides that every citizen has a right to vote. It is on that basis that the courts ruled that the law taking away an inmate's right to vote was unfair and contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The new law will have to be tested in the courts, but I think the government's approach has been: "We do not want to take any criticism on this, so we will propose a Draconian law and let the courts strike it down and then we will have another free for all".

That is not the view of the Liberal Party. We suggest that the matter be taken on and dealt with in a forthright and open way in this House. I hope to move an amendment to that provision of the bill at a later stage.

I want to turn to the special ballots. As the member for Calgary West said in his speech, the provisions relating to special ballots really are fundamental changes in the law. They are going to allow all kinds of Canadians who for a host of reasons were previously unable to vote to exercise their franchise.

I particularly think it will help those who are unable to get to the polls on election day for one reason or another, who are shut in and who know that they will be unable to go. They may apply for and obtain a special ballot and mark it by some arrangement from their house and mail it in. I believe people will be able to take special ballots to people under this arrangement. The details have not been worked out. If that happens, again it will make voting easier.

Canadians who know they will be away from their constituency on the day of the election will be able to do this. Indeed, people who have been left off the list may be able to get on the list and vote by way of special ballot.

There are a series of changes that this law will make which will make it easier for Canadians to vote no matter where they are.

We have already heard from the member for Calgary West about the additional voting rights granted to non-resident Canadians. There is a restriction there of no more than five years absence from Canada and if the voter stays out longer than that, the right to vote is lost. We will survive that. I think that will work.

Certain members of this House have expressed concern about the issue. The hon. member for Saint-Denis certainly did. One of the concerns is the enforcement of the provisions of this act outside the country. It will be difficult to charge an elector outside of Canada with fraud for example. It will be difficult to enforce the provisions respecting expenditure by political parties and candidates outside the country.

Aside from that certainly if the parties or candidates are spending and are caught spending money outside the country, that can be used as grounds for a prosecution here if in so doing they exceed the limits imposed by the act. All in all I believe the new provisions respecting special ballots will help Canadians and will improve the way the act is applied throughout the country.

Generally, the changes that are proposed to this act are reasonable ones. Many are very technical, as the hon. member for Calgary West stated in his remarks and I do not propose to go through them in detail. As I have indicated, we support the bill in principle and will continue to try to make the changes in the areas that I have mentioned in committee and at the report stage.

As the hon. member said, the committee is continuing its work in reviewing the royal commission's report. We are working on the rules relating to enforcement of the act, the financial limits and the reimbursement procedures for candidates and for the political parties and finally the rules in respect of broadcasting dealing with the number of minutes, for example, allocated to each of the political parties.

We believe those changes are important. We believe they need to be in place in time for the election. We in this party will continue to work with the members of the committee from the government and from the New Democratic Party to see that those changes to the law are brought to this House in a timely manner so that they can be incorporated in a bill and adopted before the election.

Third is phase three. I recognize the government feels that somehow phase three is likely to take place before the next election. That could happen but frankly, I have doubts. There are many relatively controversial items in phase three. It is so close to an election. It is hard to start talking about redistribution of seats for example in the weeks or months immediately preceding an election when we know we are going to have to make changes after it.

My guess is phase three is not going to happen until after the next election. One suspects the composition of the House which could be quite different after that election might make a difference in the approach that is taken to phase three.

Phase three might even become something bigger and might result in some changes to phases one and two. After an electoral experience we may be better able to point out the shortcomings that we have suggested are present in phase one and which are not dealt with at the amendment stage in this House. We may find that some of the ideas we have put forward do not work and we may have to make changes in them as a result of that experience.

We think on the whole the measures contained in Bill C-114 represent a significant advance in improving the electoral law of Canada. We are glad to be able to assist this evening in expediting adoption of this bill by the House so that it can be considered in the committee.

As always we will continue to work with the member for Calgary West and the member for Churchill. The member for Saint-Denis and I who are on this committee will continue to work with the other members to make all the improvements we can in this law. We recognize that time is pressing and the complexity and enormity of the task. We have been working on this for many months now and are pleased this has finally come to the House. We will continue to work in future with a view to getting this bill adopted at the earliest opportunity.

I do have an amendment I would like to move. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill:

That the question be now put.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for the opportunity to speak this evening.

This bill, as previous members have indicated, is the result of a year's long work. The special committee on electoral reform spent part of that year dealing with the regulations that resulted from the referendum legislation but most of the work we had done in this one-year period has been a review of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing. The legislation we have in front of us tonight is basically the first of three different phases which we will have on changes to the Canada Elections Act.

Let me start out by saying that this legislation standing by itself would not be sufficient reform. We have called for a number of other changes that must be made to the Canada Elections Act in order to make elections not only be fair but seem to be fair.

Among the changes the New Democratic Party have demanded are clear and comprehensive definitions of election expenses, affirmative action measures that would enable women and other unrepresented Canadians to have a better opportunity at being nominated. Considering that today is International Women's Day I think it is appropriate that be part of the debate taking place this evening. We have also called for clear requirements on both leadership and nomination contests, including limits on expenses for nomination meetings and public reporting of donations to leadership campaigns.

I can say that we made that particular recommendation before we knew about the Prime Minister's resignation. We have been consistent in calling for public disclosure and limits of funds that go out to various leadership campaigns. As the person responsible for drafting most of the rules that we used when our present leader was elected, when I chaired that committee we insisted on very clear limits and on complete disclosure of all donations. We went even further. We put a limit on the amount that any one source could give to a leadership candidate.

I would suggest that those people on the other side of the aisle who have been scurrying around today talking to other members of the Conservative caucus that perhaps they should follow our example when they start their own leadership campaigns, whenever those officially get going.

I could spend a lot of time talking about what should be in this legislation. I hope that the things we believe should be in this legislation will be in phase two. We do not want to see changes to the election act which, although they are important, are basically restricted to the area of allowing more Canadians to vote.

We recognize it is important to people who are at university, who are away from their homes for short vacations or whose work takes them away from their regular residences, to be given the opportunity to vote. We also agree that those people who serve Canada indirectly by working offshore for various charities, human rights groups, environmental concerns, and what have you, should be able to vote. Canadians who might be offshore for a period of two or three years, maybe taking a holiday or what have you, anything less than five years, and who have an intention to return to this country, should be able to vote. Hopefully the changes we have made in the legislation before us today will allow that to happen.

As the previous speaker indicated, there is some danger of fraud. If you allow people, even though they may be Canadian subjects but not living in this country to vote, it is very hard for political parties or the normal monitoring process to ensure that there is no fraud or there is not undue harassment of those voters. Those are concerns that the committee shared and it will be of special concern for us in the future.

Recognizing that concern related to potential fraud, harassment, undue influence, et cetera, we said that we should basically put that opinion aside and say that the greater good is served if more Canadians who are away for short periods of time are able to vote. That was the basic criteria we used.

Unfortunately when the bill came back from the Privy Council, from the government, other clauses that would enable other Canadians to vote had been changed. As a result of the royal commission's recommendations and the committee study, we had recommended that Elections Canada and returning officers proactively go out and help the homeless register to vote. It is not a new concept, but it does require more than the normal method of enumeration in order for that to happen.

The government has denied that request to date, even though it was the recommendation of the royal commission, a recommendation of an all-party committee. Of course, as you would expect, the majority on that committee were Conservative members. An all-party royal commission, again with the majority Conservatives, an all-party committee of the House of Commons, all recommended that Elections Canada take a proactive approach and help the homeless to register to vote. That has not been accepted.

We have just talked about the arguments that this could create fraud. There is more danger, more risk, of letting what may be in excess of a million people, maybe in excess of two million people, who do not happen to have residences at the present time in Canada to vote. If we are going to let that happen, certainly we should let those people who are living in this country and are Canadian citizens, but unfortunately without regular homes or accommodations, vote and we should make those changes in the elections act that would help to ensure that.

In the same vein I do not believe that the government should have restricted the right of prisoners to vote to the extent that it has. Again, previous court decisions, charter challenges basically, the royal commission and the committee that was set up to look into this recommended that more prisoners be allowed to vote. We did not say that mass murderers be allowed to vote; we did not say that people who are accused of terrible crimes be allowed to vote; we put some restrictions on it. The restriction that the government allowed of only people who are serving less than two years means that only people who are in provincial institutions will be allowed to vote. It is too restrictive. Certainly in court cases that have been held in the past, the courts have ruled that other prisoners be allowed to vote.

That does not prevent Parliament from passing whatever restrictions it may wish. I believe that having prisoners vote in the referendum or in a number of elections until now without any hardship to society, it will be very hard for the courts to interpret a restriction of the magnitude that the federal government has suggested and say that it is acceptable under our charter.

There is another element to this which I think we should consider. A large number of the people who will be prevented from voting under the government's proposal will be native Canadians. Their crimes do not tend to be white collar crimes. Their crimes do not tend to be the ones for which you can use a hot-shot lawyer to get you off or to have your sentence restricted to less than two years.

Native Canadians tend to be the poor in our society. Many of their crimes unfortunately tend to be violence related against members of their own society, their own race. Many of those people are interested in voting. Many of those people are capable of voting. I would like to suggest that the government should go back to the recommendation of the royal commission or of the special committee on electoral reform.

A number of other changes were made to Bill C-114 that were not in the royal commission's report or in the report of the electoral reform committee. One of the changes I find offensive is that the federal government has recommended that only people who are covered by the Canada Labour Code be granted leave in order to seek election.

The royal commission and the all-party committee recommended that all employees be allowed that right. It does not matter whether you come under the Canada Labour Code or under provincial legislation, that right should be guaranteed to you.

When the minister responsible was before the committee about three weeks ago and tried to explain this, he said: "A lot of the businesses covered under provincial legislation are small businesses". If the government is in power long enough, that would be true. The businesses get smaller and smaller and smaller.

The reality is that a large number of employees work for Inco, Hudson's Bay Mining and Smelting—pardon me, take back Hudson's Bay Mining and Smelting. It does fall under federal legislation. Many large industries fall under provincial legislation.

If we are going to guarantee people who work under the Canada Labour Code the right to run for election, then surely we should say that all employees across this land must be given the same right. That is only equitable.

How do you explain the situation where you have two people working in the same hallway? Perhaps one works for a corporation that comes under federal regulation. That person is allowed to run. Somebody else working for a larger corporation but one that comes under provincial legislation does not have that same right.

The royal commission spent $16 million to $20 million of Canadian taxpayers' money. One of its recommendations was that all Canadians be granted leave for the purpose of seeking election.

In a similar matter, for the federal government's own employees we believe it is not only important that they have the right to run for election and be granted leave to run but the present rules are restrictive. It means that once they are nominated they must immediately take a leave of absence, even if that election is not held for another year or a year and a half. That is completely ludicrous.

Right now someone who is the janitor in a federal government building and received a nomination now would immediately have to go on a leave of absence. That person is not in a policy-making position. That person is not representing the federal government in such a way that his position is incompatible with that of being a candidate for a political party. We should certainly change our own laws to make sure that candidates can maintain their present positions until the election is finally called.

There are a number of other changes that we would like to see made. When we go into committee on this over the next couple of days the New Democratic Party caucus will be making a number of amendments and hopefully the government and the government backbenchers will support us on them.

The important thing is that this is just the first stage. We know that the most controversial issues are still yet to come from committee. We saw the reaction when we put a very small limit on third party advertising and restricted groups and individuals to spending $1,000 if they are promoting or opposing a particular party or a candidate.

I recognize my time is running out. I will try to get through all these items quickly but they are very important items.

We saw the reaction. We saw the reaction from the newspapers, the broadcasters, and the National Citizens' Coalition. We had people in front of the House of Commons committee saying this is a restriction on their freedom of expression.

It was quite ironic that the spokesperson from the daily newspapers and the spokesperson from the weeklies were both from the province of Quebec. They were ranting and raving and said that even this limit is too much and we are really restricting freedom of expression.

They had to be reminded that in the province in which they live, in which they have lived for many years, there is a complete prohibition on third parties, special interests or others advertising in any way, shape or form. This great threat to freedom of expression is something they have lived with for 20 years, something they had not complained about and had forgotten about.

They were asked a subsequent question. I asked them: Was there a great public outcry in Quebec? Were they saying that their rights, their freedoms, and their right to express themselves were being completely hampered by Quebec law? They both had to admit that does not seem to be the problem in Quebec. There is not a great outcry. The publishers had forgotten the rules they were living under and obviously the public itself did not feel that it was unduly restricted.

Some people will say that people cannot buy an election. That might be true to a degree. However if we take a look, as the royal commission did and others have done, at the various referendums that have been held in the various states in the United States by and large the groups that spent the most money won the day.

As well, in the American tradition incumbents tend to spend the most money and they also tend to win. Incumbents in the U.S. tend to stay on for a very long time even though at the congressional level they only serve two-year terms. Money does make a difference.

We have accepted in this country since the 1973 legislation that there be severe limits on candidates and severe limits on parties. That is part of the Canadian way.

We also say that we must have disclosure of our sources of income. Those are the things that we have accepted for 20 years in this country. For the most part it has helped to balance out and make Canadians feel that they have a fair and honest balance in terms of what the parties can spend and do during election campaigns.

For anybody to suggest that non-party groups can spend whatever they want, in some cases more than candidates and in some cases more than parties, on what might be only one issue means that we have created a complete imbalance in the whole political spending process.

Canadians by and large would reject a system of no limits whatsoever. They believe in a balanced approach. However part of that balance has to mean that there are restrictions on what others can spend during an election campaign. If I am limited to $50,000 for all the things I have to do in an election campaign then it would be completely unreasonable if one, two, three or four businesses in my riding could spend more than that on a single issue. The same thing would apply on the federal level.

We cannot have a situation in which the Conservatives, Liberals and New Democrats as political parties may each spend on the order of $9 million on a national campaign—and that is for the leader's tour, polling, advertising, organizational work, literature and all the things that we do in a campaign—and then find out that some group that supports NAFTA, the North American free trade agreement, decides it is going to spend not the $4.5 million it spent last time but two, three or four times that amount. In other words, it could spend more than the political parties on only one issue and would not have the same responsibilities of political parties.

As others in the House who have spoken before me have said, it is ironic that some of the very groups that speak out against politicians and against restrictions on third party advertising are the same groups, the National Citizens' Coalition being the most obvious, that will not provide any public disclosure whatsoever as to how they are spending their money, who is raising their money and who is profiting from their campaigns.

Canadians want a fair, honest and up-to-date election act. We have moved a long way in that direction with C-114. Let us move the rest of the way. Let us make sure that we do more to bring in women, natives, people of colour and handicapped Canadians. Let us make sure that we bring in and cover a lot of the other issues that are not covered by our present election act. Leadership campaigns are one of the most obvious areas that we have to work on. Let us also make those other reforms on election expenses and financing that are really necessary to improve our democratic system.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I saw my colleague on the other side rising and I thank you for recognizing me first.

I would just like to make a couple of comments and start with the closing comments of my colleague opposite. I am in complete agreement that the examination of expenditures, rebates, limits and in particular the inclusion of the notion of indirect is a phase two activity. I would hope that within the next week or two the committee can reach its conclusions and present them to the House. The sooner we get them into the public domain so others can have a look at them and question or applaud our wisdom, whichever way it turns out, the better. I think we are both looking forward to that public examination. I am in complete agreement with him on that.

I would say to my colleague from the Liberal Party, in passing, that the issue of reimbursement for women or men or candidates of any persuasion is also part of the phase two package. We have not dealt in phase one with any of the reimbursement issues and we intend to deal with them all in phase two. I may have misheard him in terms of thinking that it would be a phase one issue. I think it is a phase two.

The information available to me may not be available to my colleague on the opposite side, but it is my understanding that for the last few elections the homeless have been enumerated by Elections Canada. It is a matter of policy and there is nothing in current law to argue against it.

With the other changes it does become easier to do; with swearing in at the poll and with the list being open until five days before voting day. That whole process would include a longer period to appeal original decisions, that would also be there. That may be a piece of different information. Maybe when we go to clause by clause and we have Elections Canada before us it would certainly be a question well worth asking and getting on the public record. Does it or does it not, can it or can it not enumerate the homeless at this time? I think it can and has.

Mr. Murphy: Just a short response, Mr. Speaker.

When this issue was brought before committee a couple of weeks ago after the government brought down its legislation we asked Elections Canada those very same questions. Certainly my interpretation of the response that we received is that yes, it does make some attempt if someone is already at a shelter or something of that nature. Even then it is basically ignoring the present law which requires that those people must have been at that shelter for the previous 10 days. That is a situation in which Elections Canada is probably ignoring the present law. What happens if someone was to challenge that in the future?

Also, there are a number of other homeless Canadians who would not even fit that category who under the recommendations of the royal commission and with a proactive approach—and it is very important that we look at that proactive approach—we know that within certain ridings in Toronto, Winnipeg and elsewhere across this country—

An hon. member: Thunder Bay.

Mr. Murphy: —Thunder Bay, as my colleague says—there are certain areas where the homeless tend to congregate. Maybe it is a kitchen. It is not a residence but it is a place that they come for a meal, once, twice, three times a week or maybe every day. We can pick them up if we go down there. It is that type of approach which the royal commission was recommending. I noticed in their last census the Americans had to use the same approach in order to get an accurate census of their population.

We should take a look at those positive approaches to make sure that any Canadians, regardless of their present economic situation and hardships, be able to vote.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a brief comment at the outset to pay tribute to all of the members of the special committee for the work they have done. It is not easy, given the number of hours they must put in not just at the table but in terms of consideration of the royal commission's report, other interventions they may get during the formal process of the hearings or the correspondence they get.

No matter which side of the House the members are on they have done an excellent job in terms of reviewing the issues, reviewing the documents, reviewing the concepts and in phase one coming up with a bill that has been translated reasonably well by cabinet. I am not suggesting that we are totally in agreement with the final wording but they all deserve our thanks and the thanks of the public of Canada for the work they have done.

I also want to, while I have the opportunity, pay tribute to my former colleague, the former Whip of the government whom I have worked with for a number of years. He did an excellent job as chief government Whip and we miss him. We also wish him well in his new role as "speechifier" in the House of Commons.

I do have a question for my colleague and it comes out of some of the remarks he made earlier. He was talking about the need for controls on leadership campaigns of political parties. As I understand it, I may be inaccurate and I stand to be corrected, the Prime Minister this past weekend announced there would be a ceiling of about $900,000 per candidate on the Progressive Conservative leadership candidates. Such a ceiling did not include staff costs or transportation costs.

I am wondering if my colleague from Churchill would like to reflect on what that really means in terms of expenditure controls, given his role in my party in preparing the groundwork for our controls for the leadership convention which actually I guess was kicked off four years ago yesterday when Ed Broadbent indicated his intention to step down as leader and when, as we know, the member for Yukon succeeded him. I wonder if he would like to respond to that quickly.

Mr. Murphy: I am not sure how much time I have left, Mr. Speaker, but if my colleague wants me to give a lesson to Conservative colleagues in the House I am certainly willing to do so. If I do not have enough time in this intervention I am willing to hold a little seminar in any of the rooms on the Hill. I will not charge leadership candidates any more than I will charge other members.

It is true that we set up a very restrictive program for the selection of our leader. We did not allow some of the exemptions the Prime Minister talks about. I have not had a chance to check on the actual wording of the clause that passed the Conservative Party executive just last weekend, but I recognize that travel and staff costs can be two of the major components of any campaign, whether it is a leadership campaign or an election campaign.

To exclude travel, especially in a country as wide as ours with as many groups that exist in society, can be a real problem. Obviously someone with a much larger war chest or someone with friends in the airline industry, because that does make a difference, can travel to a lot more places and meet a lot more potential delegates. There are some built-in biases if we exclude travel.

Similarly we were very careful to make sure our candidates did not use House of Commons staff or House of Commons facilities during working hours. I must admit that it got to the point where people became very nervous. I was the Whip of the party at that particular time. They did not know why I was coming to their offices but they were always nervous when I came by. It was ensuring that there was enforcement of those rules for our staff and our members.

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in the debate on Bill C-114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, but first, I would like to make a comment for the benefit of my NDP colleague. It is good that our party wants to set a spending ceiling. It is a turning point in Canadian political history and politics, because a few years ago we would have discussed this issue and it would have been almost unthinkable, because we could spend as much as we wanted to elect a party leader, regardless of the party. I believe it is a step in the right direction and I urge all the other parties to do the same.

I listened carefully to my Liberal colleague from Kingston and the Islands when he discussed this issue earlier. He said that our government took a very long time to come up with this bill. Despite what my Liberal colleague said, I think that the minister responsible for this legislation did a remarkable job in the period between the tabling of the committee report and the first reading of this bill. When the minister was asked to come before the committee, he did so very diligently. When we discussed some problems in this bill with the House leader, who was the minister responsible, he listened to us very attentively on every occasion, I think. The general impression we have with this bill is that it reflects quite accurately the work done by the committee. And this is interesting, considering that sometimes with other bills the committee would work for months, almost years, only to see its report shelved.

I believe the government had the political will to amend the Canada Elections Act. That has been the case since 1988, since the second time this government was elected, when in the Speech from the Throne in April 1989 the Prime Minister indicated the government's intention to appoint a royal commission that would be responsible for making recommendations for changes in the Canada Elections Act.

On April 3, 1989 the government appointed the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing, chaired by Mr. Pierre Lortie. The commission was established on November 15, 1989 to inquire into and report on the appropriate principles and procedure that should govern the election of members of the House of Commons and the financing of political parties and of candidates' campaigns.

To show how diligently the government pursued this matter, after the commission, which started its work on November 15, 1989, had tabled its report in February 1992 the government immediately established a special committee on electoral reform, which included members of all three main political parties in this House. Committee members worked with tremendous dedication and their patience, in some cases, was exemplary.

Hon. members will also recall that the committee's proceedings were somewhat disrupted by the tabling of the referendum bill. Most members switched committees to be able to examine that legislation. And subsequently, we had our Canada-wide referendum. Finally, after lengthy discussion, the special committee was able to table a report in the House of Commons in December 1992, while the bill on electoral reform was tabled, if I am not mistaken, on February 22, 1993.

So it cannot be said that the government has dragged its feet on this legislation, considering that the last major electoral reform took place in 1974. We therefore felt, and I think rightly so—a position that is shared by the other parties represented on this committee—that we had to do something to make the Canada Elections Act even more efficient and more accessible for all Canadians who wish to exercise their right to vote at least once every four or five years, depending on the dispositions of the government in power.

I think it is important to point out that this bill introduces many improvements. Some people will say the government did not go far enough. Others may complain about the government's approach to the issues. They would have preferred to see this, that and the other. Finally, I think what is important about Bill C-114 is that the government is meeting a commitment it made and that the bill improves the electoral process for the benefit of Canadians whom this process is intended to serve.

We must also remember that the bill is largely based on the first report of the special committee, which intends to produce more reports on electoral reform. To us this is extremely important, and of course I say this as a member of the committee. As I mentioned earlier, the Lortie commission spent almost two years—my hon. friend said it cost about $20 million—conducting hearings across the country and listening to people expound on the positive and negative aspects of the present legislation, to consider the amendments that would be necessary to deal with party financing, broadcasting, public opinion polls and candidates, to name a few.

Had we decided to put everything in one single bill—the fact of the matter is we would still be working as a committee on a proposal to table before this House—chances are that the bill before us today could unfortunately not be read the first time, let alone adopted. I think it was extremely wise to divide up our huge task in three stages—phases one, two and three, as we did to provide some very important answers, at least for the short term.

As a second stage, the special committee intends to deal with broadcasting, financing and enforcement issues as I said earlier. In phase three, as mentioned in the report tabled before this House, we will deal with and tackle such issues as the assignment of seats to provinces, drawing constituency boundaries and establishing native constituencies. As far as the drawing of constituency boundaries is concerned, we know that some ridings cover a very small area but are very densely populated, while others cover huge areas, but are very sparsely populated. It is a real nightmare for our officials in Elections Canada and it requires nearly exemplary dedication on their part. When you see how well and how fast—in the case of the last referendum for instance—they completed the enumeration, I think we cannot ask much more from these people. They are already doing their very best and they are doing so not out of self-interest but in the interest of all Canadians, to enable them to exercise their right to vote.

It is easy to register when you live in downtown Quebec City or Montreal, but it is not so easy for those who live in remote areas, when the office of the Chief Electoral Officer is 50, 60 or 100 kilometres away. We have to take that into account and make sure that the proposed legislation as well as the proposed amendments will take into account such factors as distance, remoteness, population density and all those things that could be improved to facilitate the conduct of the vote.

I also wish to thank the committee members for their first comprehensive report which, I assume in good faith, is supported by all of them. It certainly is a good example, as my colleague from Saint-Denis, whose comments are always judicious, said of the parties' ability to work together in reaching a common goal, that is a more accessible and equitable electoral system. The committee's first report is the result of a lot of work in a complex area, of many consultations and of close co-operation with Elections Canada.

In this bill, the government follows up on many of the committee's recommendations. It is important to say it again because these last few years, and I would even say that it is almost a tradition with this government, it has had committees table reports which have never been acted upon. In the case of the special committee on electoral reform, diligence was in order. I believe all Canadians will benefit from that.

The main thrust of this bill is to guarantee that the Canadian electoral system is more equitable and accessible. To this effect, the bill provides for a voting process by special ballot, an improved enumeration and revision process and the possibility for voters of urban polling divisions to register and vote on election day.

The bill also contains fairness provisions. For example, it limits spending by third parties. Speaking just for myself, I believe it was extremely important to set such a limit. I always believed that we must have relatively strict rules to make sure that the electoral process is fair for everyone.

We cannot afford to have a double standard, one for candidates and parties and another for third parties.

I have always thought that as a responsible Canadian, a responsible candidate, a responsible party, if we force ourselves to respect a law which stipulates we must not spend more than a certain amount or conduct polls or advertising outside certain periods, the same restrictions should apply to all taxpayers and all those who are interested in the electoral process.

It would be too easy at this stage to use as an excuse freedom of speech and some court decisions and to say that this could violate the freedom of speech. I think that in a system like ours in which Elections Canada, our electoral system has proved its effectiveness not only here but abroad, it is important to adopt stricter regulations, at least as far as advertising by third parties is concerned. I know what the committee has undertaken, with a direct limit of $1,000 for third parties by the way. We know very well, since the chairman told us, that in a second stage, we will come back with the whole indirect issue, the whole matter of advertising and expenses.

It is true, as the chairman pointed out, that some deficiencies were detected following court decisions. But that does not mean that in its work the committee will find magical solutions. However, we will try in the next few weeks to put in place a proposal which will allow the government to improve the current legislation and once again to make it fairer.

Other examples of improvements to the electoral system that will make it more accessible and fairer is the possibility for Canadians who have been living outside Canada for less than five years, but who intend to come back home, to vote by mail in the federal election. Canadians who live in Canada but who, for one reason or another, will not be in their riding on election day, will now be able to vote by mail.

My colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, was talking about the duration of an election, that is 47 days. It is true that 47 days is still long. In committee, we mentioned the possibility of 40 days. We also talked about a maximum of 56 days or an open-ended period. I would like to remind our viewers and our colleagues who did not have the opportunity to sit on that committee that when the Chief Electoral Officer appeared before us and explained to us how it works, he told us that, ultimately, in order to work well, the electoral process must allow each and every Canadian to be able to vote, but there were a few things that we, as voters or candidates, did not know.

I think, among other things, of having a returning officer for every riding, of providing different polling stations on election day and advance polling stations. There are also the training of the election personnel, and the finding of enumerators, poll clerks and electoral officers. There is the list of electors to prepare and to forward to candidates. There is the enumeration to do.

We asked the Chief Electoral Officer what the minimum amount of time required to do all those things was under the present system, and he said at least 47 days. This is precisely what the committee decided to recommend to the government and this is the reason why Bill C-114 proposed a period of 47 days.

Clearly, I would like the election period to be even shorter, but for that we would have to find other means, other ways to accelerate the various administrative aspects without compromising the right of every Canadian to his or her vote on election day, and guaranteeing that this vote could be cast on election day.

Another element of these changes to the act provides for the continuation of the possibility for members of the Armed Forces or the federal Public Service posted abroad to vote by mail, but these provisions are now extended to provincial public servants. Electors in urban polling divisions will now be able to register on election day and then vote. This option is already available to rural voters. This addition is a clear example of the greater accessibility of the electoral system.

Under the present rules, electors in urban polling divisions cannot register on election day and then vote. The registration system in urban polling divisions is such that it will be done at a revision office. Registered voters must go to their polling station. This system was devised to reduce undue delays at the polling station and to prevent possible frauds.

The provisions prohibiting judges and handicapped people from voting have been struck down by the courts and are repealed by this bill. The bill also deals with the voting rights of inmates. Anyone serving a sentence of two years or more cannot vote.

The bill on electoral reform will also improve the administration of the election process. For example, enumeration of electors will be modified so that as many voters as possible can be registered. Furthermore, the revision period will be extended up to the fifth day before polling. All those measures will improve access to the electoral system.

Thanks to those amendments, our electoral procedure will be one of the most sophisticated in the world. For example, requirements concerning candidate nomination and filing of papers have been re-examined and will now take into account the increase in population and the value of the dollar. These new requirements should not hamper any serious candidate. The already existing embargo period imposed on parties and candidates during the first three weeks of the campaign, on election day and on the day before will also apply to third parties, in fairness to all participants in the electoral process.

And finally I would not want to take up too much House time, but I think the main purpose of our committee was first and foremost to allow the government to initiate this new elections act. I believe the work done by the committee, and by all the members of this House without exception, was such that all the ideas submitted to the government were the result of a consensus. We hope that the government will be as prompt in proposing a bill at the second and third stages as it was at the first. In doing so, it will allow our committee to complete the great task it was entrusted with, that is to amend the Canada Elections Act, to make it more efficient and, most of all, more in tune with the expectations of all Canadians.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the hon. member for Champlain. As he no doubt has noted, the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing proposed to limit the expenses of a candidate in a leadership race. We have heard these last few days that the Prime Minister had proposed such a limit for his own party. If his party had had a real limit during the leadership campaigns of 1976 and 1983, the Prime Minister himself would have been disqualified since he had not informed his party of his expenses and gifts he had received and so on. Canadians would undoubtedly have been spared the problems this government has created under this Prime Minister.

My question to the hon. member for Champlain is this: Would he want us now to adopt the royal commission's recommendations on the expenses of leadership candidates or is he satisfied with the system that has allowed the Prime Minister to become his party leader and that has led to the destruction of the Canadian government?

Mr. Champagne: Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised by my colleague's question; he is not usually partisan, at least in committee. Apparently, you are never too old to learn. I would like to remind him of this: If we had imposed on his own leader the limits we are about to impose on the next, he himself would have been disqualified. That is why one really has to be extremely careful with what one says. I think I know that my colleague is just as eager as I and the other committee members to deal with the issue. I would ask my colleague, who does it very honourably anyhow, to speed up the process in phase two so that we can get to phase three and deal with the financing of political parties.

In closing, I will remind my friend that since 1988 the Prime Minister has always been in favour of cleaning up the way political parties are financed, and he has proven it many times. I think that imposing for the first time a spending limit on candidates for the leadership of the Conservative Party of Canada below $1 million per candidate, shows the commitment of this government and of the Prime Minister to clean up political parties' financing as we will see with our chairman and the committees during the third phase of the report.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate—I have given the hon. member extra time. I have been watching the clock.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): So you turned him down, Mr. Speaker. I would have liked to have listened to his speech.

If there is an issue I have always been interested in, since my teen-age years as a matter of fact, it is the reform of electoral mores. I remember that when I was president of the young Liberals in the Laurier riding, when I was about to enter the provincial race after having been chosen as a candidate in the provincial election during the Jean Lesage era, we were already discussing the issue of electoral reform and of party financing. Throughout my career—as is known I did not run provincially for all kinds of reasons I have already explained in this House; at the request of Jean Lesage, I gave up my seat in favour of René Lévesque—I was elected in 1964 and I have always had a keen interest in the issues of electoral spending and election reform.

So, to put the debate in context and for the benefit of our listeners, let me say that what we are doing right now is revamping the Canada Elections Act so that it becomes a better instrument than it was yesterday, but certainly not as good as what we would like to have tomorrow.

[English]

I wish to thank very publicly our chairman—I like to call people by their name, but the rules say that I should call them by their district—the member for Calgary West.

I would also like to thank our vice-chairmen, the hon. member for Champlain and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the committee members. We have been working together for a year, and I want to thank them because in Parliament often those who make the greatest fuss are not the ones who work the hardest. It is now 9 p.m., Monday but as early as 9 a.m. today, we were already getting ready to debate this legislation all day long and to continue discussing it, as we will keep on doing tomorrow and the rest of the week. That we do in parliamentary committee, or commission parlementaire. as they say in Quebec. It is tedious work. This committee managed to find a modus vivendi, if the Chair who rather likes those expressions allows me to say so, to come up with draft reform legislation which I generally support. But I wanted more, as our chairman would tell you. I will say again that I am very conservative about change. That is what I always say. Being a member of the Liberal Party, that remark makes my colleagues smile. I want to thank the pages who are working late tonight to allow us to dispose of this bill, and I also want to thank the university students who are listening carefully, because they are, in fact, more directly concerned by this debate than we are, since we are older.

We have been waiting a long time for this bill. People must know that it took a lot of time to come up with this 114 pages bill before the House tonight. One can get discouraged just by trying to read it, but it is a beginning. As my colleagues said earlier, it results from the famous report submitted by the Lortie commission which sat for more than two years and probably sounded out opinion and picked the brains of all academics in Canada, to such an extent that it has not finished publishing its findings yet. We, on the other hand, must act. We must modernize the legislation.

Some time ago, another piece of legislation, Bill C-79, was introduced. As an opposition member, I had the honour to be chosen as chairman of the legislative committee. It did not work. We never even sat. We are trying again, and this time, we are determined to see it through. I see that our chairman is still here. Even if it is 9.05 p.m. and we were scheduled to sit only until 7 p.m., we will be back here tomorrow morning. Our chairman is still here and he knows we are determined to see it through.

Phase one is the modernization of the electoral system, that is who does what, who can vote, how to exercise the right to vote. As I said before, when it comes to election matters, as well as legislative and parliamentary issues, I am very conservative. You have to prove that what we have has to be updated. You have to prove it to me. So, I always play the devil's advocate in committee. I know it can be tiresome for my colleagues and I apologize. I always take a completely opposite stand and say, "Try to convince me that we need this change". Once I am convinced, I am better prepared, mentally and intellectually, to explain my new position, because some people always want to change things for the sake of change. That is all right, because we do need change sometimes. But I said: "No, wait a minute. Let us not get excited". Canadians can be unhappy with the unemployment level. They can be unhappy with all the scandals. They may be unhappy about the bankruptcies. They may be unhappy about the failure of family life, of religious life, of intercultural relations. They may be unhappy about all that. They often look for a scapegoat, and that scapegoat is Parliament and the legislation it makes. Then all the good we try to do seems is made to look bad.

I would like to use the few moments you are granting me, Mr. Speaker, to try and demonstrate that what we are doing is good. It could be better. I would like to see more done, because I am very careful. Who has the right to vote? We have extended the right to vote to people who never had it until now, that is Canadians abroad. We have come a long way. Some of my colleagues are furious because we do not even know whether there are 500,000 or two million of these people, Canadians who still claim to be Canadians, who probably do not pay any taxes in Canada but who, under the Charter, might be entitled to vote.

Some people advocated an absolute right to vote for all Canadians wherever they live. We said: "Not so fast", but others said "Never". We went for a middle-of-the-road solution and settled on five years. Perhaps the next Parliament will make reforms on voting rights. My colleagues often go door to door. There are people who travel to the United States on holidays during the winter. Someone from British Columbia could be in Montreal. Someone from Montreal could easily be in B.C. and would lose the right to vote. We have accommodated that.

Canada has a charter of human rights. We could be attacked right in the middle of an election because prisoners have no right to vote. Therefore we had to do it. Some said all prisoners should vote; some said no prisoners should vote. We came to a middle ground that would be highly satisfactory if the elections act was to be attacked. It was not what I wanted. It was not what others wanted and some people refused to accept it.

However there is something in it and that is why I am ready to fight to the very end. My committee colleagues, the hon. member for Champlain, the chairman of the committee, the hon. members for Gaspé and Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia know how strongly I feel for it. I clearly said what I do not want even toward the end of my political life. After all, after 30 years young members will come after us, but I will keep fighting inside this House or any other place until the end of my days to impede the Americanization of the Canadian way of doing elections. It is unique. It is the envy of the world. A lot of people around Canada attack us. Maybe they do not realize it but if we listen to them we will end up in what I call the Americanization of our electoral system. I am talking about election expenses.

It is very strange that it works extremely well. I say it in both English and French. It is the same message: I wish that what was going on in Quebec was going on in Ontario so that in this way people would not say: "Ah, Quebec again". It works very well in Quebec. There is an element of fairness and control where people can be different from the citizens of the United States of America who would like to be involved in the political process. This is capital to me, if we really believe in the kind of country that we are building together. That is because Canada is not yet like the old countries in Europe. It is a country in the making. If we do not want this country to be sabotaged we have to have rules for the electoral system, rules that are willingly accepted across Canada and are well understood.

It is not a question of depriving Canadians of their right to speak. It is a fundamental question of being different from our colleagues in the United States of America are. Do you know what they are doing there? After being here for 30 years I have friends in the Congress and Senate in the United States of America. Some are perpetually raising money in order to get re-elected. They are elected for only two years. There is a time limit for members of the lower house. For senators it is six years and for congressmen two years. Imagine, some have just been elected with President Clinton. Already I have proof.

I can prove that I have new colleagues who were elected and are constantly looking for that darn money that seems so necessary to get elected. Those of us who tried this system in Quebec know that it is not perfect yet, but when we always ask for more and more money, we end up with our hands tied, and I do not like it. That is what I would like people to understand.

Those who want to keep their independence should be able to belong to the party of their choice and still say: "I do not have any money, but I can raise a bit".

When I meet people on the street or at Dunkin' Donuts and they complain about anything and everything, I take the time to explain the facts to them. I explain the system to the people I meet in flea markets or churches. If only people could believe in our system.

The pages who are with us tonight can become members of any political party, contribute to that party and have a say. They give $10 to the political party of their choice and get back $7.50 when they file their income tax return. In that way, for a real expense of $2.50, they earn the right to speak, to be active and present in political parties. We are talking about women today. My God, political parties are open in Canada. It is unique! You could not get involved in the political process in Europe as fast as you can in Canada, Mr. Speaker, and you know it. That is what is nice about Canada and Quebec. If someone wants to take part in it, all he or she has to do is to join a political party whose philosophy he or she likes best and where he or she feels more at ease, and say: "I am doing it and not only that, I am going to contribute".

What is a $25 contribution for someone who pays taxes and will get back $19.75? The spirit of the elections act is a bit about all that. And it costs this person $6.75 to say: "I am not only speaking or criticizing, I am taking part in it". Canadians by the thousands, by the millions, should set out to join political parties. But if it is not millions, it should be hundreds of thousands.

Well, this bill is very simple. It is the beginning of the reform. After listening to Lortie, after reading his report, after analyzing it, after digesting it, we produced a first update. We will continue very actively this week, I am going to tell those who have been very involved with the Lortie commission and those who have followed it closely that we have not put aside the Lortie report. We will carry on. It is called phase two. I have committed myself.

[English]

And I say that in English. My chairman is here. He knows that we would have never given our consent to phase number one. I know that the hon. member for Champlain and all colleagues feel the same, if we did not have the good conscience of knowing that we are going to come back with another report before the election which will be made on time. I see my chairman acknowledging. He is the hon. member for Calgary West who has been attacked unfairly by some people. I know that he is as determined as I am.

It is a public commitment. I am not going to fool around. I do not make a public commitment that I cannot hold. My public commitments are like my private commitments. When I say I do something, I do it. I would never have given my consent to this if I was not sure that we will proceed immediately and try to convince our colleagues to go further and further until the end of this parliament in order to modernize the institution.

What I want to say to our fellow Canadian citizens is that it is an honest effort to modernize our election act. But there is a point which I would like to emphasize. I know that if the Lord is willing to keep me in good health and if voters are willing to re-elect me or to appoint me somewhere else, I would still want to participate very actively in the election process, since I have been talking about it for 30 years or 35 years. At university, in college, I was very active in those issues. The next thing I would like to see is a permanent voters' list. A big project. I will try to describe it in some detail before I close.

What is a permanent electoral list in Canada? It means that instead of taking 55, 50, 47 days for an election—that costs a lot of money. The more money we need, the higher the risk of seeing what is happening right now all over the world: scandals in Japan, in Italy, everywhere, in France, in England, but less in England. If we shorten the election period to 30 days, I cannot conceive such a modern country as Canada—

[English]

Canada is such a modern country, the envy of the rest of world. We do not repeat that enough.

Canada is the envy of the rest of the world. People come here to see how we hold elections.

• (2120)

Our electoral officers are in demand abroad as trainers. Only Canadians seem unable to see that we have a good electoral system, an excellent system, one that we are constantly improving. We should not be afraid to say that it is not perfect, but at least we are improving it and it is so good that others come and imitate our system.

I am now coming to the permanent list of electors. Why? Because thanks to all this modern technology that I do not understand much—but be warned, I started to learn how computers work—it could be possible, one day, to have only one registration, which could be made available free of charge to school-boards for their elections.

If you would allow me a few moments—I know you can show great patience—I would like to finish my speech. So, to conclude logically, imagine that in my area, at a given time, there are three registrations: school-board, municipal and provincial. You can imagine that it would be possible to reduce costs. If we had good co-operation at all levels, national, provincial, municipal and school boards, the same list of electors could be used by all, as it seems that with computers we can feed data to the computer and it produces the lists we ask for. This way we could save huge amounts of money and at the same time shorten the electoral period.

This is about all there is now to talk about. Many amendments are being considered, and my colleagues mentioned some of them. But, I am abusing your goodwill and I would like to conclude by stating my admiration, shared by my colleagues I am sure, for our system.

[English]

I am sure all my colleagues will join with me in thanking the Elections Canada people. The retired returning officer, Mr. Hamel, did a marvellous job. The new Chief Electoral Officer is an officer of the House of Commons, Mr. Jean-Pierre Kingsley.

I know all my colleagues would like to thank the many people who work with them anonymously who are making Canada a country that many people are envious of. Elections Canada has been invited to teach other countries of the world how to manage an election.

I think it is to their credit and to the credit of people who are involved in the election process. I have no hesitation to commend my colleagues. It is not perfection, but we are on our way to making it better and better. There is no doubt in my mind we will come back soon with this law so we can proceed with the other phases.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for his contribution this evening and all members who have contributed. I think it has been the right kind of debate and the right kind of atmosphere.

The member indicated I was nodding my head. I want to repeat on the public record it is my view that phase two can probably be reported to the House in the next couple of weeks, three weeks at the outside. We will deal with communications expenses, rebates and enforcement. The committee is well advanced in its work on those three major issues. We look forward to the passage by the House before adjournment so they can come into play.

All the phase one and phase two issues will be in place by the next federal general election. The committee had that as a goal and I think it is entrained to be able to meet that.

Almost every member has spent some time on the issue of election expenses. I would like to comment on the one aspect that has not been put on the record. Gallup polls and polls of that kind show that Canadians' confidence in their institutions and leadership, not just political leadership but leadership in general, is going down, not up. People are losing confidence in those kinds of institutions.

When it comes to electoral financing, there is some suspicion about how parties are funded and whether or not they end up owing debts to people. That is part of the concern out there. What is open, in a sense, but less well understood and noticed is the number of groups in Canadian society that make a living for their shareholders and employees by saying negative things about the Parliament of Canada or the politicians. The common characteristic is they ask people for donations. They send them dunning letters and raise money. We and the general public do not know how much they have raised. We do not know who they raised it from. We do not know how they spent it, therefore we do not know whose pocket it ended up in.

We know they are not institutions that are not for profit. We know we have no laws that force disclosure. I began to think about this more seriously since the committee started to meet. I will give two examples.

The first group that phoned me about election expenses is a group called Canadian Taxpayers Federation and it sent me a tabloid newspaper. Most of its newspaper was comprised of wire stories, some of it was created for the newspaper, but it indicated it had a membership of 41,000 people. To be a member one had to give the owner of the newspaper $80. When we multiply $80 times 41,000 it comes to $3.28 million a year to produce six tabloid newspapers. Who gets the profit from that?

Then it moves on to conferences and so on. Who gets the profit? Whose pocket?

The National Citizens' Coalition was on the air the other day. The representative admitted to raising over $2 million last year. However, there is information in my possession which indicates it raised a lot more than that in 1988 and in years before that. It could declare a profit, never a loss. I ask myself whose pocket does the profit go into? What is the size of the pension of the people who work for these organizations? What is the salary they are paid? What does their expense account look like?

The common characteristic is: "Send me a donation and I will complain". This one organization says: "I will defend your freedom of speech", and it went to court and struck down a part of the election law as it now stands.

Did it strike down the part that puts limits on candidates and parties? Not on your life. If it was really an advocate of free speech it would have struck down the limits on everyone. That would have been its argument: candidates, parties and others. No, Mr. Speaker.

These organizations are in a better fund-raising position if there are limits on candidates and parties and not on them. Then they can complain about politicians. They can raise money. They have no obligation to tell people how much they raised, how they spent it and whose pocket it ended up in.

Those days are coming to an end. This Parliament must do all it can to make funding during election periods transparent so we know how much it is, where it comes from and how it is spent. If we can put that in with some kind of reasonable limitation, we will have made Canadian election law a lot better than it has been historically.

I thank all the colleagues on the committee for raising the issue. It has a level of complexity that had not been dealt with at great length. I just wanted to make sure it was dealt with on the record this evening. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to make comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Prudhomme: I thank my colleague for raising this last point. Often, when we make a speech, we get away from the points that we wanted to discuss. I thank him for his comments because I fully agree with him and with several other parliamentarians. Indeed, I would hope that when we table an amendment, a free vote will take place.

[English]

I hope we will have a free vote on this issue when we introduce amendments. We believe we should limit indirect expenses as well as direct expenses.

I know my colleague from the New Democratic Party who is still here, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, has been very devoted to this question as have many Conservatives. It is not a question of partisanship.

I would not like people to say they cannot vote for the amendment because the government could be defeated. It is easy to say on this particular item, vote as you see fit, not according to your conscience because some feel this way or some feel that way. You must not say everything is a question of conscience. If you talk too much about that you end up having none, but I passionately believe.

When I said I did not want the Americanization of our Canadian political system, that is exactly what I had in mind. I do not only agree that we should limit, as Lortie said, the direct expenses to $1,000 so nobody would dare attack us in court according to the charter, but what is not allowed directly should not be allowed indirectly.

I am sure many colleagues and many friends will fight until the very last minute. If we do not get it this time we will have it some day because the Canadian people will understand their political system. They will understand what the member said. They will understand what the NDP and some Conservatives said.

I would say: Free us, free us from these occult forces that want to control politicians.

If you really want to democratize Canadian life, free us from those who, behind the scenes imagine that with big contributions they might eventually get indirectly and secretly what they cannot get directly, openly and publicly. That is the spirit behind this bill, and that spirit will shine through when it is understood, because it is in the best interests of Canadians to support it. Therefore, a maximum of $1,000 should be allowed for direct advertising since we had to recognize that the Supreme Court would probably decide one day that people have a right to something. We suggest it should be $1,000. Personally, I would have said zero, but if we settle for $1,000 worth of direct advertising, I submit that anything that cannot be done directly should not end up being done indirectly.

I know of a proverb, but I seem unable to recall it tonight and I would like our learned Speaker, who is a great linguist and a great Latin scholar, to tell us what it is exactly. I refer to the inscriptions on the wall in the Senate that are all in Latin and all from great Romans. That is why they are so long. There is a proverb by Seneca that says that nothing is well ordered that is hasty and precipitated.

These are good living guidelines, these are the very words of Orestes. And Cicero, to close with him, said—and that was probably what motivated Mr.Trudeau—that one had to be guided by reason, not by public opinion. We did an honest job or rather, we tried to do an honest job and we will keep on improving on it. I thank my colleague for his comments.

PRIVILEGE

CO-CHAIR OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE CONVENTION—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday the hon. House leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition rose on a question of privilege claiming that the Deputy Speaker, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot was guilty of a contempt of the House for accepting to co-chair the Progressive Conservative leadership convention in June 1993.

Normally the Chair would not allow comment on the conduct of a Chair occupant to come before the House in such a manner. There is a formal and well-established procedure whereby Chair occupants can be censored. I allowed the discussion because the hon. member insisted on proceeding forthwith and pointed out, as subsequently also did the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam, that the Deputy Speaker's performance in the House was above any reproach and was not in question.

I have had an opportunity to review the comments hon. members have made and I wish to thank all those who sought to assist the Chair in this most delicate issue.

I have reviewed the procedural authorities and have found much comment on the role and impartiality of the Speaker but regretfully very little on the Deputy Speaker. Practice and conventions vary greatly throughout the Commonwealth. In Canada, Deputy Speakers invariably, during majority governments, are chosen from the ruling party on motion made by the Prime Minister. They remain members of their political party, may attend caucus if they choose and may even participate in debate. They can, and often have, voted on controversial government proposals. Some Deputy Speakers have chosen not to attend caucus and/or have refrained from voting in the House. The current incumbent has done just that, voting only twice since assuming the role of Deputy Speaker, on the abortion legislation, which I point out was a free vote, and on the question for the 1992 referendum. It is no doubt such exemplary conduct that led to the generous comments made about her by all members who participated in yesterday's discussion.

In the context of the Canadian practice, and in the absence of specific direction of the House, Deputy Speakers have exercised their discretion to varying degrees. I have some difficulty in agreeing with the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond that the Deputy Speaker is cloaked with the same exigencies that are expected of the Speaker himself or herself, and I am deliberately careful in not extending such a responsibility by way of ex cathedra comments in this decision. I have no hesitation in ruling, however, that the matter as raised by the hon. member does not constitute a prima facie case of privilege.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C), 1993

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates (C) for the financial year ending March 31, 1993, was presented by Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board) and read by the Speaker to the House.

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Supplementary Estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1993, laid on the table on March 9, 1993, be referred to the several Standing Committees of the House, as follows:

Since the list of votes in the Supplementary Estimates to be referred to the various committees is quite long, if it is agreeable to the House, I would ask that the list be printed in Hansard as if it had been read.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

For the benefit in particular of the chief government Whip, I want to indicate to him and to the President of the Treasury Board that the Official Opposition was not given notice verbally or otherwise of the tabling of the supplementary estimates, which is a tradition around this institution.

I am sure the minister is aware that a vote could have been ordered concerning this particular motion of reference to the committees.

I would like the House to know that once again members of the opposition, notwithstanding the breaking of the traditions which seems to happen from time to time by members opposite, are attempting to co–operate with the government at every opportunity so that we can have a full and extensive debate on various subject matters which will come before this House.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his understanding. This was done inadvertently and I do apologize. It is probably due to my lack of experience.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I was not going to respond to this but we were informed just before the House began this morning that the government had inadvertently missed us in notifying the opposition House leaders about the government's intention.

I simply want to clarify that we were notified, though late, but it was identified as an oversight as well and presumably this will not happen again.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT REVIEW COMMISSION

TABLING OF REPORT

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(1), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the two-volume report of the National Transportation Act Review Commission.

[English]

Pursuant to Standing Order 32(5) I ask that this report be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport for review.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport has just tabled a document. I wonder whether he will be making a statement which is customary with tabling of such significant documents. Will he be doing that under tabling of documents or when we move to statements by ministers? Can we anticipate a statement by the minister?

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, we think it is proper for the members and chairman of the commission to make the official presentation publicly and I shall make a statement afterward.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from residents of Saint-Laurent de Gallichan, in the riding of Abitibi, who say that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they act as a stimulus for violent behaviour; that all toys that incite children to play violent games are unacceptable and their manufacture should be banned; and that when acts of violence are reported, freedom of the press should be restricted since the repeated broadcasting of news about acts of violence on television, on all channels, and on radio may act as a stimulus for further identical violent behaviour.

Therefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass appropriate legislation in order to eliminate violence in our society and thus protect our children and give all citizens a better quality of life.

KILLER CARDS

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to submit a petition on behalf of constituents of my riding; Glace Bay, Sydney River, Lingan Road, Gardiner Mines, East Broadway and other parts of Cape Breton county, calling on the Government of Canada to stop the importation of killer cards, which ought to be seized at the Canada–United States border to stop their distribution in Canada.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Parliament of Canada to amend the laws of Canada to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of killer cards in law and to advise producers of killer cards that their product, if destined for Canada, will be seized and thereafter destroyed.

FEDERAL GRANTS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a petition from Saskatchewan with 7,000 signatures. Your petitioners express certain sentiments which I will share with you and which I believe are common to all groups in this country.

[English]

These petitioners ask the government to review its education policies, its cuts to established programs funding, its cuts to training and retraining, its cuts to research and development, its archaic student aid program and the 3 per cent tax it imposes on student loans for those students who need to borrow money in order to go to college or university. As well, they deplore the six-month additional interest on student loans that the government has just added.

I therefore table this petition on their behalf and on behalf of everyone in this country who shares their point of view.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of very thoughtful and concerned constituents from Kamloops who point out that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has announced the government's intention to close Canadian immigration centres in western Canada and to sharply curtail employment and immigration services offered to new immigrants in other centres.

The petitioners point out that this centralized case processing centre in Vegreville is in area far removed from where the new citizens will be living, working and making their applications. It will most surely create undue delay, deferment and confusion for applicants and those who will be called upon to attempt to administer this new policy. They point out that the present system is working very effectively from their point of view.

In conclusion, the petitioners indicate that the new policy will simply serve to undermine the established objectives of the community that works so closely with the Kamloops CIC office now. It will simply result in poorer service to potential investors and immigrants who will be thinking of investing outside the already overcrowded urban areas such as Vancouver.

They point out that the smaller communities cannot offer on the spot assistance and encouragement when investment outside the large urban centres would be less attractive to the potential immigrant investor, plus a long set of other concerns. The petitioners simply ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration not to close immigrant centres that serve smaller urban areas such as in Kamloops, British Columbia.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter, petitioners throughout British Columbia point out their opposition to a firm's plan to divert the North Thompson River near Valemount in an effort to sell the fresh water in the San Diego, California area.

The petitioners are simply asking the Government of Canada to ensure that this does not happen.

BILL C-268

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another issue, the petitioners from a variety of Indian bands from British Columbia are calling upon the Parliament of Canada to enact the content of Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

Hon. Monique Vézina (for the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved that Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with Bill C-73 here in Parliament, a bill which is heading Canada Post in a totally new direction, a bill that many people have commented upon. Many people are very sceptical about the reason that this bill has been put in place and sceptical about what will happen in the future with regard to Bill C-73, a bill to sell 10 per cent of the value of the Canada Post Corporation to people working in Canada Post.

If I look back at the record of the report coming from corporate and consumer affairs and operations in April 1990, recommendations were made there which were at that time a bit alarming. The recommendation coming out of that committee was that the Government of Canada privatize Canada Post once adequate financial performance and comparable levels of practice to making profits in the private sector could be accomplished and once the relationship between employees and Canada Post settled down.

What we are hearing is if Canada Post has a good value and we can solve some of the employee relations problems, we should sell Canada Post, we should privatize Canada Post.

The Liberal Party at that time was very opposed to any moves to sell Canada Post and we submitted a minority report. The report suggested that would be a critically bad move.

However, the committee decided to go ahead with that report and submitted it to Parliament in April 1990. Today we are seeing the result of the beginning part of that recommendation, the part that suggested shares be sold to employees.

Recommendations 36 and 37 dealt with public sales and sales to employees. Step one has been implemented by the government.

I thought this morning at the initial part of this discussion it might be wise to point out what some other people across the country have said about this bill. If we look at articles in The Toronto Star I think we find some good insight as to how Canadians may view this legislation.

I quote from The Toronto Star:

> Lately, Canada Post Corp. has begun to look like a steer being fattened for market.
> The pressure is on to boost profits and squeeze costs so that in two or three years the Progressive Conservatives can sell the politically troublesome beast, or parts of it, to the highest bidder.
> If all goes according to plan, Canada Post hopes to make a 14 per cent return on equity in 1993, and start paying Ottawa an annual dividend of 40 per cent of its operating profits.

That really means Canadians are looking at a new tax as a result of taking the profits of Canada Post Corporation and paying the government a 40 per cent operating premium.

There is even talk of Canada Post being required to pay corporate income tax for the first time. On the surface the campaign to fatten the bottom line is a good process. Unfortunately, if you look beneath that surface you see some real problems.

Much of the Crown corporation's recent business success has been earned on the backs of mail users. We have higher postal rates. Every one of us has gone to the post office and has seen the price of a stamp go up 1 cent, 2 cents, 3 cents, 4 cents on a regular basis.

Since being in Parliament, I have seen it regularly go up on January 1 like clockwork and so has every other Canadian in this country. We have seen this government move toward supermailboxes in new suburban areas, degrading the type of delivery service that Canadians should have.

Believe me, when you go to that post office in Ottawa weather like today and try to get your mail that post box is frozen. After a rainstorm, snowstorm or any difficult weather, you might be two or three days trying to get your mail out of that supermailbox. That says an awful lot about service to Canadians and concern for that person who is getting his or her letter delivered.

When you go to those supermailboxes and there is a snow-drift in front of it, you cannot get into it. This is another problem that is created readily. Already we see Canada Post thinking about paying dividends to Ottawa as a tax on postage. That can only negatively impact the services across this country. Vital postal subsidies in support of a fragile Canadian magazine and newspaper industry have been taken away.

We debated that issue that was gazetted in the last two years where small-town newspapers have had the big hand of this government and the big hand of Canada Post pull those subsidies away, where the profit lines were very close and the newspaper had to be very careful of its operation.

Subsidies to help them continue to get local information out to small communities have been removed. Subsidies to help ethnic newspapers continue to operate across this land have been removed. The result is that every Canadian from coast to coast pays more money for that newspaper or magazine to be delivered to them. Every Canadian pays it in a different way. Previously there was some protection given to these newspapers and magazines to keep the Canadian press going. That has been removed. It is really a passing down of the costs to other people.

A committee of MPs says labour relations in Canada Post have changed very little since 1985. I have heard the minister suggest that this legislation is going to improve the relationship with employees in Canada Post, but those employees have come back suggesting they want no part of this legislation. It seems odd to me that on the one hand the government says this will solve our employee employer relationships but in reality the work force says absolutely no way.

That is a viewpoint from The Toronto Star. Much of that information is what The Toronto Star has said about this legislation.

As well, I want to point out that in The Ottawa Citizen there have been articles about this Canada Post legislation. Mr. Andre was quoted as insisting that privatization was not in the cards. The article goes on to say:

> "If I had to bet, I would bet that in the next couple of decades, you will see post offices being privatized all over the world and I would not mind seeing Canada first."

Yes, Mr. Andre would like to see Canada first. I have a sense that this is the beginning, no matter how much it is denied, of the privatization process.

There is another article in The Ottawa Citizen in which states:

> While saying the federal government will not move to privatize Canada Post before the next election, Mr. Andre refused to rule out taking that step in later years if the Tories remain in power. Such a decision might make sense, he said, if mail service to unprofitable areas can be guaranteed.

The design is there. The plan is there. The comments are there. This is the beginning of the privatization process. Further to that, another article indicates that there may be many problems with this legislation. We are not hearing the full story.

If the government allows Canada Post employees to buy stock in that enterprise, how long will it take Ottawa to conclude that everybody should have shares in Canada Post? I contend here today that it is not going to take the Conservative government very long to decide that everybody should share in this corporation.

• (1035)

Mr. Andre insists that the employee stock scheme is not the first step toward privatization of what is fundamentally a public service, but the Prime Minister once assured Canadians that the Crown corporation Air Canada was not for sale. It was not that long ago that the Prime Minister insisted Air Canada was not for sale, but look at us today. Harvie Andre—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois) According to tradition in this House, the rule is not to name hon. members by their names. I appreciate the co-operation of the hon. member.

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, I stand corrected. I was quoting an article and I carried on. I am speaking of the minister responsible for Canada Post.

An hon. member: Irresponsible in this case.

Mr. Pickard: My colleague suggests the minister is irresponsible. That may be a little bit biased and critical but Canadians are very critical of this legislation and Canadians are very concerned, so I guess I am hearing that from many Canadians.

The point is that the process has begun. We can see from the consumer and corporate affairs committee on April 19, 1990, that the process was suggested and put in place.

We can see from comments that have been made by the minister responsible for Canada Post that he believes that privatization is what should happen. Now we can see steps toward what I would consider a disastrous process.

As politicians, members of this House and legislators, we must examine legislation and decide what the acid test should be for legislation that comes forward. What is the acid test that we use as legislators to determine what type of legislation should pass? What are the things that a bill should address?

Legislation should address changing needs in Canadian society. I think we all agree on that. Bills should answer questions, resolve conflict and establish a framework for the future. Legislation can lead, but not only good legislation. Sound legislation should be accepted by the society it is put in place to serve.

That brings us to Bill C-73. Does Bill C-73, which amends the Canada Post Corporation Act, pass the acid test? Does selling shares of a Crown corporation address the needs of Canadian society? Does that really address the needs of our society today or in the future? Does this legislation answer the concerns and questions that have been raised about the postal system? Does this bill lead one of Canada's oldest and most omnipresent institutions in a direction acceptable to Canadians?

In brief, is Bill C-73 really good for Canada? In creating the Crown corporation in the early 1980s the Liberal government established five principles for the postal system. Those five principles are very clear and are spelled out in the Canada Post Corporation Act.

The first principle was to improve products and services in the changes in our communication. Improve products and services. Help communications in this country. That is a goal of Canada Post.

Two, operate in a self-sustaining financial base while meeting the needs of the people and offering similar services to all communities large and small throughout Canada.

Three, provide for a secure mail service. Four, utilize human resources to attain corporate objectives and to secure employment commitment and dedication. Those are two common goals. Five, maintain a corporate identity that reflects the corporation as an institution of the government.

• (1040)

Does Bill C-73 help to achieve these five mandates? Remember, these mandates are in the present postal act. The present Canada Post Corporation Act includes these statements. The answer to those statements, as far as Bill C-73 is concerned, is that everyone in this House can say no resoundingly. Bill C-73 does not help achieve these mandates. In fact, it fails miserably.

Bill C-73, an amendment to the Canada Post Corporation Act, does nothing to enhance the goals established by legislation for the system we have in place today. What exactly is Bill C-73?

Bill C-73 would establish an employee share savings plan. This employee share savings plan would permit employees to buy shares of the corporation. Participation in the employee share savings plan would be voluntary. It sounds simple. Right? Wrong.

How many shares? We did not get answers to that. What is the worth of the corporation? What is the share value? What is an employee? Can some shares be given away? Are others sold? How will shares be cashed in when an employee is ready to get his money out?

These are just some of the questions raised but unanswered in this bill. In fact, the bill would permit shares to be given away. The bill gives no vote and no voice to the employees who participate and put their money in. The bill is inconsistent and incomplete for everyone.

It is like buying a car and not looking at the price-tag, just handing the salesman a blank cheque and saying that is the car. It is a little ridiculous in my mind and very difficult to justify in the minds of Canadians who have bought and paid for this corporation over history by supporting Canada Post Corporation, through government funding of Canada Post Corporation and by buying postage stamps and postage services. Yes, this corporation has been purchased by Canadians with Canadian dollars.

Now a small group of people are selling it off, the management of Canada Post and the Conservative government. Bill C-73 is vague and provides no detailed proposal on those questions that I raised.

What does Bill C-73 mean for service to Canadians? Does Bill C-73 offer equal service to communities of equal size? Does Bill C-73 advance communication mechanisms to take into account new technology and technological changes? Will the passage of Bill C-73 reopen the over 1,400 post offices closed or converted in the last six years? Will this bill stop the further closures scheduled for this month, next month, this year and so on?

This bill does absolutely nothing to address the single biggest issue in Canada as far as the postal corporation goes, and that is good delivery service to Canadians.

Some six years ago there were over 5,200 post offices in Canada. Today there are less than 3,800. In over 1,400 Canadian communities the institution has been removed. The flag has been taken down. The symbol of Canada has been destroyed. This has not been an act of terrorism, not terrorism as we know it, but rather it has been a systematic dismantling of a great Canadian institution executed by a corporate plan authorized by our government, a Conservative government.

Does this bill say: Stop, enough is enough? No, it does not. Despite the efforts of thousands and thousands of Canadians who, even through countless petitions, have requested that the government stop this closure policy the government continues its course. This bill does nothing to reverse that trend. This bill does not help return the postal institution to communities where it has been so vital historically in this country.

What can Bill C-73 do for employer-employee relations? The minister responsible for Canada Post said that the employee plan can play a significant role in laying the foundation for increased co-operation between employer and employees by augmenting employee interest in the well-being of the employer and its financial success.

What do the employees say about this Bill C-73? Postal workers will not be bribed by the government's employee shares scheme. Read the lead line of the response of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. The Public Service Alliance of Canada labels share-selling by Canada Post a sham. There is not much support from the rank and file workers of Canada Post. In fact there is no support, there is not one bit of support from the rank and file workers.

The only group that we have not heard from is top management. Are the top managers, the high-priced help, perhaps eager for the passage of this bill? They could be, and for a really good reason. Top managers may see this as an opportunity for some freebies, some additional perks. The reason for their excitement is that they could get shares for free. Remember how they criticized the vagueness of the bill. One thing that has been made very clear, one clause in the bill that is extremely clear, is that shares can be given away.

What are the possibilities of giving these shares to letter carriers out there? What are the possibilities of giving shares to the clerks at the counters who we see when we go into Canada Post? What are the possibilities of giving shares to the workers, to the average people in all of our communities? I would submit that the possibilities are very limited.

What are the chances of the corporate president, vice-president or the board of directors of getting some of these freebies, maybe in the form of remuneration, a stock option plan or some other scheme that may well be put in place by the cabinet? It may be in the form of some other perk. How can we rely on a postal service for equality of service when it will not even treat its employees equally? How can we trust this legislation, or indeed the cabinet or government or the board of Canada Post when we see their track record?

This bill does nothing for employee-employer relationships. It does not solve any of the estimated 100,000 grievances. If anything, this bill will create even greater division between the privileged and the non-privileged workers in the postal system.

Therefore, if Canadians will not benefit, if services will not improve, if closures continue and the majority of employees oppose such a plan, who is the winner? What does Bill C–73 do or potentially do for Canadians or for Canada Post? The answer is simple. It is extremely simple. The answer is money. How much money? Nobody knows. What to do with the money? Nobody is saying.

At the legislative committee hearings financial returns from the share sale were said to be in the multimillions. But there is certainly a question here. Nobody knows. What is certain is that the top brass would love to get their hands on a lot more money. Who would not? But the issue is more than that; the employees' stock plan provides no voting rights. Some employees will have to buy stocks at a price yet to be determined. Some employees will get them for free and cash them in the future. However, Canada Post wants money. The corporation is profit driven at this point, not service driven.

The attaining of profits at the expense of service, employee security and good labour relations seems to be okay with the current Canada Post administration. No one will argue that Canada Post should be self–sufficient, but there is a difference between self–sufficiency and profitability when it is done at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer.

Remember, Canadians support the postal system by their patronage and through their taxes. Tax dollars put the postal system in place, expanded it and still subsidize it. Every Canadian who ever paid taxes, every Canadian who ever bought a stamp has contributed to the establishment of the Canadian postal system. Now what right does the current management have to start selling off Canadians' assets?

When the postal Crown corporation was established it was not intended to be sold. It was intended to be improved upon. Contrary to the government's claim that this bill is not the first major step for privatization, the indication is clear that it is. It is a move toward privatization.

At a time when most Canadians anxiously try to have their postal services improved, we continue to dismantle ours and give the current administrators leeway to go in any direction they wish. The corporation would benefit from a share sale in the short term. More money would permit corporate lenders to meet its financial obligations to the government. More money in the till may make Canada Post look a little sweeter to possible investors for privatization. Only a dreamer would think that turning our backs on the problems at Canada Post will make them go away.

Bill C–73 is not a bill for Canadians. It is not a bill to help the average person. It is not a bill to open corporate post offices. As far as I can see, it is a bill based on a money–driven economy which over the long run will reduce services across this land. These include the services of newspapers, the services of small communities and the new expanding areas where more supermailboxes will not be accessible in much of our winter climate. In fact, there are many, many cuts in service.

There are many irritants for all Canadians in this bill. Bill C–73 creates many more questions than it answers. It causes more concerns than it addresses and it does not even come close to tackling the important issues at Canada Post.

Labour relations are very important. Effective postal services to Canadians, equality of postal services, security of the mail, good corporate identity, these five principles of the Canada Post mandate are unaddressed in this amendment. This amendment is a contradiction of the policies and premises outlined in the Canada Post Corporation Act.

We in the Liberal Party, in the opposition, feel it is an ill–founded and very detrimental piece of legislation to the communication system across this country. We could liken it to the removal of telecommunications from many communities. There was the removal of CBC in my local area. Removing what joins this country together will not improve Canada; it will pull us down further.

This government should reconsider this bill. Stop this insane action of putting Canadians second.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to say a few words today regarding Bill C–73, an act amending the Canada Post Corporation Act.

If ever there was a case to be made that spending time in the House of Commons was not always a useful exercise, this probably has to be the best example. Bill C–73 is taking up time in the House of Commons and will do absolutely no good as far as the people of Canada are concerned. It will do absolutely no good in terms of Canada Post. It is a complete waste of time, effort, energy and money. This is probably a good reason that this place should shut down.

That is not our case to make as members of the opposition. For the government to suggest that Bill C-73 will do any good whatsoever shows the government is dreaming in Technicolor.

The purpose of this bill is to make 10 per cent of Canada Post's non-voting shares available for purchase by Canada Post employees on a voluntary basis. The minister responsible claims this initiative will help to eliminate the labour-management tension currently existing at Canada Post.

I wonder if the minister has spoken with anyone who works for Canada Post. If he had, he would know that this is not true at all. I have not encountered anyone who would even indicate there is one slight iota of hope that this is going to improve the working conditions and environment at Canada Post.

I met with some Canada Post employees. As a matter of fact I have had discussions with Canada Post employees and management across the country. Of course off the record, even they agree that this is a complete waste of time. It is an embarrassment because here we are offering the employees an opportunity to buy into the ownership of Canada Post and they tell me that they already own it. Canada Post is already owned by the people of Canada and they are people of Canada. Therefore they are already members and owners of this particular corporation.

They wonder if this is not some kind of a scam the government is trying to pull on employees by suggesting that somebody else owns this corporation. It is a Crown corporation. The people of Canada own that and the postal employees are already owners in a sense.

To suggest employees will now be permitted to buy into Canada Post is laughable. However, we have seen this story before. It ought not to be news to Canadians that the government is trying to give the impression of taking action particularly when it says it is going to eliminate labour-management tension because of this. Nothing could be further from the truth.

One thing we have seen from the government is the dismantling of post offices across Canada over the last number of years. As a matter of fact the evidence shows that over 1,200 post offices across Canada have been closed by this government. It says this is all part of a money saving initiative.

It is something more than that. It is the removal of what has become a symbol throughout much of Canada, particularly in the small communities and rural areas. The one symbol of Canada always seen is the flag flying over the post office. It is much more than simply a government office. It is often the virtual centre of the community, the focus of community activity.

Some of the small rural post offices in my constituency act as a security check for individuals, particularly for senior citizens. In a small community just outside Kamloops last winter the postmaster noticed that a certain individual, an elderly gentleman, had not been in to pick up his mail for a number of days. He would come in regularly at 10 o'clock every morning to pick up his mail. It was part of his regular lifestyle. He had not been in for a few days so the postmaster telephoned the local detachment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and made this observation and it went out to check. Sure enough, the elderly gentleman was extremely ill as a result of a bad fall. Had he been left for perhaps even another few hours, certainly a few days, he would have died. However, they were able to rescue him as a result of the thoughtful initiative taken by the postmaster of this small post office.

That is one of many examples I am familiar with. I suspect I am familiar only with a handful of situations in my own constituency where the post office has played a valuable security role for individuals in the small community or rural area surrounding it.

This is part of the systematic dismantling of Canadian institutions that this government has launched into for over eight and a half years. The post office glue which holds this country together and reminds people daily of the unifying efforts of the Canadian government and how this institution has played such a critical role far beyond simply providing postal services is being dismantled. This is one of the reasons Canadians oppose this general process so much.

I must add that when this bill was in committee, which is the stage where people knowledgeable about the contents of legislation make their views known, there were many criticisms about this legislation. Question after question put during committee hearings went completely unanswered by post office representatives. When the legislation was put to the test in committee more problems and questions came up than answers. For that reason alone the government should be rethinking this initiative as opposed to using its parliamentary majority muscle to push the legislation through. Much more could be done in terms of improving employee-management morale and improving the efficiency of the postal corporation if the board of the post office would simply listen to the people who actually do the work.

One thing has impressed me time and time again. When we discuss with individual postal employees, with representatives of their unions, or simply with groups of postal employees in various situations, there is an abundance of ideas and suggestions on how to make the post office more effective and more efficient. There is no shortage of suggestions, some very creative in terms of using post offices particularly in the smaller communities to provide a range of services otherwise not offered. There is much more in terms of offering a wider range of services throughout the entire postal corporation.

We notice that seldom are those suggestions heard by those who make the decisions. As a matter of fact, with the existing morale situation people presumably are now hesitant about making suggestions in view of the fact that whenever they have been made in the past essentially they have been ignored.

I oppose Bill C-73 on four main points. I believe this is the first step toward full privatization of Canada Post. I believe this will do very little, if anything, to improve the problematic labour-management relations associated with Canada Post. I believe Canada Post has proven in the past that it really cannot be trusted to stop harassing union members who provide the work and cannot be counted on to stick to its word. I will explain that in a moment or two. I suggest that this bill does very little, if anything, to maintain or improve service to many urban and rural Canadians. There is absolutely nothing to enhance postal service at all.

Let us turn to the whole matter of this being the first major step toward privatization. I do not have to remind anybody that privatization has been a policy tool used by this government many times in the past. There is no doubt the government is eyeing the opportunity to sell off Canada Post at some point. The only question is when, not if. The minister responsible has publicly indicated that he does not believe this is the first step toward privatization, but he still clings personally to the hope that one day we will privatize Canada Post.

As I was saying, my thinking is totally different in this matter. The minister responsible has said he sees nothing in terms of problems associated with privatizing the post office and that he would like to see Canada lead the way in this area. As a matter of fact on May 1, 1992, in an article in The Ottawa Citizen, he had the following to say:

> If I had to bet, I would bet that in the next couple of decades, you will see post offices being privatized all over the world and I would not mind seeing Canada first.

That is the minister responsible for the post office indicating his priority in life would be to see the privatization of post offices, with Canada leading the way.

When we look carefully at the contents of Bill C-73, we notice it is really an effort to make Canada Post appear more attractive to outside buyers or to potential purchasers in future. With this bill in place the government can say to prospective buyers that Canada Post employees have a stake in making a profit for the company yet have no say in how the company is run because the shares are non-voting. Therein surely has to be the proof of the pudding. When we actually start to look carefully at it, we notice the shares being offered to the employees are non-voting shares. It does not take much imagination to recognize it means the people most knowledgeable about the postal operations will not have any say in the operation of the company whatsoever. If the post office wanted to be serious about encouraging employee participation, participation in a meaningful way as members of the board of directors would be much more effective. We have seen that model in the past work reasonably well from time to time. However, the offering of non-voting shares is a very empty gesture indeed.

When we talk about privatization let us all recall very carefully a statement by the right hon. Prime Minister when he indicated to the past president of the Quebec Federation of Labour, Mr. Louis Laberge, that Air Canada was not for sale. This was quoted widely in the press because at that time many of us in opposition were saying that we thought the government was going to begin to privatize Air Canada. The Prime Minister went on record and said: "Here is my word. I am saying to the president of the Quebec Federation of Labour once and for all, for all Canadians to hear, that Air Canada is not for sale". That was the quote. It was headlined from coast to coast to coast. We could trust the Prime Minister; he had stated it very clearly.

Mr. Boudria: Did you say "trust the Prime Minister"?

Mr. Riis: Members are questioning whether I was quoting the Prime Minister. Yes, I was. Having said that, within a very short period of time the government began to sell off part of Air Canada. It began to privatize Air Canada.

Mr. Langlois: No. The stock of the company was sold, not the company itself. The assets of the company were not sold. There is a difference.

Mr. Riis: My friend opposite says: "No". The stocks of the company were sold to the private sector. We can quibble over just what it was, but I think the Prime Minister was trying to say: "If I was going to tell the truth here, I would say that Air Canada would not be privatized". That process has begun. The government has said regardless of what its Prime Minister says that it is going to do something totally different. It is fair to say that the government record on privatization speaks for itself.

We have heard time and time again—and I am diverting my thinking to the free trade discussions—the Prime Minister saying that social programs would not be touched, that they were a sacred trust. I guess he was also referring to things like the family allowance. It was a sacred trust. The family allowance would never be touched, he virtually was saying. What did the government do? It totally abandoned family allowance. Family allowance does not exist today. We cannot have a sacred trust and the next day completely abandon the program. It is that kind of hypocrisy we have encountered on a regular basis in this government. Regardless of what anyone says, people are reluctant to have faith in those comments.

I have to acknowledge that the member from Calgary, the present minister responsible for the post office, speaks out from time to time and speaks very truthfully. He had the courage to say it was his hope the government would privatize the post office of Canada. He said that, and I think we have to respect his words because he does tend to speak very forcefully. We can assume the government will certainly plan to follow through on what he says.

On another matter, I wanted to indicate why my party and I oppose the legislation. It is the suggestion that this will bring labour-management peace. The minister responsible for the post office indicates that Bill C-73 is designed only to make Canada Post employees feel proud to be part of Canada Post.

Let us look at the record. As we speak today there are over 100,000 grievances at Canada Post and there are not even 100,000 employees at Canada Post. This means there are more grievances than the number of people working at the postal corporation. Anyone who knows anything about labour-management relations would indicate that this is probably the best barometer of harmonious things within a particular corporation, the number of outstanding grievances. This record is almost unbelievable.

As a matter of fact if we do the calculation it works out to almost two grievances for every employee. It is ridiculous, to say the least. For the minister responsible for the post office to assume that offering a 10 per cent share of the company—and recognizing that they are non-voting shares—would somehow make the atmosphere of resentment disappear is absolute and total folly.

We need only look at the most recent postal strike as a good example. Although CUPW publicly made a commitment to ensure that government cheques would be gladly delivered by its members during the work stoppage, Canada Post refused to ensure that CUPW would not score popularity points. Instead, as we all remember, seniors and the disabled were forced to stand outside for hours at postal distribution outlets to get their cheques.

On many occasions the people who had been forced to wait found out that their cheques were not in and that they would have to come back the next day to stand and wait in line.

We also remember the hiring of scab labour, the helicopter drop-offs and paying non-unionized Canada Post employees room, board and travel expenses to replace the unionized staff all over the country which marked the strike last time. It was one of the most hideous periods in Canadian labour-management history many of us can recall.

As a result, to suggest that Bill C-73 will somehow mysteriously improve this very bad atmosphere in employee-management relations again indicates the government has no idea how to manage the post office properly.

I want to make a couple of points about how much faith we can put in the postal corporation and what it says. I go back to October 1991 when Parliament was considering back-to-work legislation to end the postal strike. Canada Post and CUPW came before the House of Commons committee and met with the Minister of Labour to report on outstanding issues. Canada Post said there were only eight or nine outstanding issues and that if CUPW withdrew its other demands they would come to an agreement quickly.

CUPW did this and the House of Commons passed the back-to-work legislation quickly. We will recall that to help speed up the bargaining process CUPW called its workers off the picket line before the legislation was actually passed. CUPW had been promised, and this was the understanding of the Minister of Labour, that the wage settlement would stand and the remaining seven to nine issues would be dealt with by an arbitrator. Canada Post agreed to have an arbitrator pick up where the two sides had left off in negotiation.

After the legislation was passed Canada Post withdrew all offers and said that it was up to the arbitrator to figure out just where the two sides had left off. It was not until July 1992 that an agreement was finally reached. This agreement was found during private meetings between CPC and CUPW without the arbitrator. This suggests that if the Canada Post Corporation had been serious about reaching an agreement there would have been an agreement much earlier.

Operating in bad faith as the postal corporation did on that particular issue makes a lot of employees and Canadians generally rather doubtful about simply accepting its word when it says what this legislation is all about.

In terms of service to Canadians we do not have to elaborate on that at all. We can look at past practices that have been brought to the attention of the House of Commons: Canada Post using American fuel for its trucks and in some cases U.S. mail services in terms of fulfilling its operations, supermailboxes frozen up in the winter, postal closures, and rate increases. All these matters do not assist in any way to make employees at Canada Post proud of the company they happen to be working for.

In some parts of Canada this past winter the weather has been extremely harsh. We have seen how ineffective these supermailboxes have been and the problems encountered in terms of people not being able to collect their mail.

The most obvious indicator of where we are going in terms of Canada Post has been the tremendous amount of closures across Canada. I can speak with some experience on this matter. I think of one community in my constituency called Westwold in which there was a very dynamic post office. It was really the community centre. The government decided to close it down and did not replace it with anything. Now the people in that small community have to drive many kilometres to obtain regular mail service. There was a furore. The case was made that the government ought not to simply close down this post office. A facility was opened eventually in the Canadian Legion. The Canadian Legion is a wonderful institution. I happen to be a member of it myself. However I do not think it is really the proper place for a postal outlet but that is the reality of it. In this community it is the Canadian Legion that provides some kind of limited service postal outlet for people to pick up their mail.

That is not what Canada is all about. That is not what the postal corporation of Canada is supposed to do. That is not the kind of important Canadian symbolism that is needed across the country. Again, with over 1,200 post offices closed and as we speak another 145 under review for closure, it is safe to say that there is not a single post office in Canada that is safe in the future, safe meaning being kept open for public use.

Finally, if the government and Canada Post really wish to create an atmosphere of good will with the postal workers, there is a very simple place to start and that is to bargain in good faith with CUPW, PSAC and CUPE members. July 1992 marked three years that postal workers were without a collective agreement. It is not for lack of trying on their part because we all know of the many efforts made by the unions involved in trying to come to a successful collective agreement. But alas, the hesitancy of the postal corporation simply made this virtually impossible.

Throughout the 1980s and into the 1990s the government has been pushing Canada Post to make service to Canadians a secondary consideration. If Canada Post could make service its number one goal, certainly there would be much less friction in the setting of goals and working with the postal workers themselves.

In conclusion, I appreciate having an opportunity to say a few words regarding Bill C–73 but I think the government's intent is misdirected. The government is misleading both the employees of Canada Post and Canadians generally if it feels this is going to make any difference in creating more harmonious relations between the workers and management within the post office.

As I said at the outset, there are good reasons why Parliament ought not to consider legislation of this type. When you consider all of the other challenges facing Canada, when you consider all of the other work that must be done in improving the employment opportunities for Canadians from coast to coast to coast, surely wasting time on this type of very misdirected and rather deceiving initiative is inappropriate and a waste of the time of the House of Commons. I think our time would be much better spent in finding ways and means of getting those 1.6 million Canadians who are jobless today back to work in a meaningful way.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C–73.

Members of this House will know that my colleagues in the Liberal Party and I have fought this bill relentlessly. Yesterday approximately two dozen Liberal MPs spoke against it at report stage in an effort to convince the government across the way that the bill should be withdrawn. It should be withdrawn for two reasons.

First of all, the bill itself does not accomplish what the government pretends it is going to accomplish. I will get into that in a minute.

Second, what is wrong is that there are a number of post office issues that the House should be addressing, if that is what the government thinks is the most important thing on the agenda, but this is not one of the issues that is important to the Canadian public.

I will give an example of an issue that is important. For instance, there is a bill on the Order Paper of the House of Commons at the present time. It just happens to be under my name. I want to indicate that this bill would be to establish a postal services review committee, a watch–dog over Canada Post, the same kind of watch–dog that presently exists in the United States and in other jurisdictions. It would supervise that particular agency, review rate increases on behalf of the Canadian public, ensure that there is no cross–subsidization of rates between monopoly rates and rates that compete with the private sector. Why are we not dealing with an issue like that? It was the government in the Marchment committee recommendations of 1985 that decided to go ahead with the postal services review committee. Then it was abandoned.

• (1125)

But why, Mr. Speaker? We still do not know, but some of us think that the government set up such a committee several years ago and that the committee's first report gave the government news that the minister did not want to hear.

If the messenger brings bad news, you know what happens to the messenger, he is eliminated. That is what the government did to this postal services review committee. My colleagues and I would like to take the time in this House to pass this kind of bill, but it is impossible to make the Conservatives opposite listen to reason.

[English]

We could be talking about other issues involving Canada Post. For example, there is ample evidence of cross-subsidization of rates. Let me explain briefly what it all means.

Approximately one year ago, someone leaked to me a letter Canada Post was sending to some of its corporate customers. It went roughly as follows: "Fill up your postal machine today". You know those machines that issue printed postage stamps. I guess it is usual to call them Pitney Bowes machines although I am sure other companies make them too. "Fill your postage machines and get a rebate on priority post courier".

I said that there is something wrong with that. The postage machine is first class mail regulated mail and the price is regulated. The government adopts regulations once a year. It is a monopoly. There is no competition. At the present time Canada Post is offering a discount for people who use priority courier, and priority courier is a competitive business. It competes with Purolator, UPS and everybody else. The post office operates it using subsidized money after filling the postage machines which is first class mail. Surely there is something wrong with taking money gained through a monopoly to subsidize that part of the business that works in a competitive environment.

How much of the money we pay for postage stamps as Canadian consumers goes to cross-subsidize those endeavours of Canada Post which have nothing to do with the monopoly that Canada Post enjoys? Am I paying one cent too much for stamps, two cents, five cents? I do not know. Canada Post will not even let us have a look at the books.

Once a year Canada Post publishes an annual report and that report at best is questionable. It does not refer to many things, such as the unfunded liabilities of the corporation. Canada Post produces the report and tells us what it is doing. It is tabled in the House of Commons. The opposition criticizes it for a day or two and the government says it will weather the storm and it will disappear.

Maybe that works for the government but it does not make for good postal service for Canadians. We need the kind of agency that I am advocating to review applications by Canada Post just as the CRTC reviews increases applied for by the cable operators because they operate a monopoly, or Bell telephone or whoever else applies because they too operate a monopoly on some of the products and services that they sell but not in others. It is a constant battle for companies like Bell to sort out those things which are a monopoly and those things which are not.

That is one thing we could be doing with the time of this House in terms of improving postal services. There are several others. I will give just a flavour of some of these.

Some years ago, Canada Post applied for what has been commonly referred to as the revocation of regulations. It works something like this. Canada Post was previously subjected to regulatory approval from the government through gazetting each year of a new rate for a number of the services it provides. Once a year, apart from approving the first class mail rate, cabinet would approve a number of other things.

• (1130)

A few years ago Canada Post applied for and convinced the government, I do not know how, to exempt Canada Post from future approval of those regulations. What happens? Now such things as certified mail, electronic mail, Envoypost, Telepost, Intelpost, money orders, aerograms, mail to and from the Canadian Armed Forces outside Canada, domestic counter parcels and other items including Christmas greeting cards are no longer subject to those regulations. Why? Because Canada Post did not want the heat of once a year having them included in the Canada Gazette. Now it just increases the rate when nobody is looking and no one can criticize it. The only forum we have is to raise these matters in the House of Commons when we do find out that it is doing something which we do not like or that our constituents do not like.

That is not the right way of doing it. Canada Post should apply, get the process approved, get the rates approved and then live with whatever is approved or whatever is refused. After all, if Canada Post says it can operate in a quasi-private sector type of environment, surely it can be subjected to a regulatory system similar to that which is imposed on Bell, which is imposed on the cable television operators and several others. But no, Canada Post wants to have its cake and eat it too and the minister says that is fine.

The minister's solution to making Canada Post more popular is to sell 10 per cent of the shares to the employees. Here is how this is going to work.

First, it is my belief this is the thin edge of the wedge in privatization. Remember when the government originally started to sell shares of Air Canada? It was only going to sell a certain percentage, and then a greater percentage and so on. For those who say this is not the thin edge of the wedge, nonsense, it is.

Second, the way Canada Post is going about this leaves something to be desired, even if one was in favour of the selling of the shares. I indicated a while ago that Canada Post is not a company like others in the sense that the books are not visible, at least not in the way they should be to most of us. We cannot find out much about how Canada Post operates save and except the very general information given in the annual report. My colleague from Carleton—Gloucester says it lacks transparency. Very well put and I congratulate him for that.

Either Canada Post or the minister wants to have these non-voting shares that can only be sold to employees. They are automatically redeemed when an employee leaves the corporation, they cannot be sold to anyone else and because Canada Post does not pay income tax presumably the dividend tax credit will not apply. It will not pay dividends, it will pay a fixed rate of interest.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you have guessed that already. The only thing the minister wants to do is find a way to get the employees to lend money to Canada Post.

The government provided Canada Post with a line of credit some years ago which appears in the government's estimates. Canada Post has only used a small portion of that line of credit and it is still there so it can borrow if it has a shortage of funds. It can also borrow elsewhere if that is the difficulty. If Canada Post has further difficulty you wonder why it is building a new Taj Mahal in Ottawa for its headquarters. Its present headquarters seems fancy enough as far as I am concerned.

Anyway, I guess it needs that money, or it says it needs that money, and it wants the employees to participate in the share offering.

The other problem is that the bill is wrong in that it does not provide any specifics on the nature of the share offering. There is no value for Canada Post Corporation at the present time. There is no value for the shares. No number of shares or anything like that is indicated in the bill. These things are left to the minister to designate by regulation some time later.

Show me, I am from Glengarry. I want to know. I want to know what the government is up to. Why can the government not tell us now what it intends to offer? If it has not made up its mind, then what is the rush for the bill? I have difficulty understanding that.

Apparently the Minister of Finance, the minister responsible for Canada Post and the Treasury Board have to get together to iron out these things. If they have not ironed them out, why are we doing this now?

The minister says that this proposal will assist in employer-employee relations. The union does not want it. How is it going to assist in relations with the union if the union does not want it? Canada Post is doing it anyway, and the stated purpose is to assist in those relations.

The minister says that this is not privatization. If the government is selling the shares to a private individual then it has by definition privatized at least those shares that it has just sold. Otherwise, it would not be selling them, would it?

I also have a little problem with management giveaways. Canada Post offers huge bonuses to some of its people in the upper echelon. In some cases, $50,000 or $75,000 a year is given in bonuses on top of the salaries that some of these people get. There is nothing in the bill that prevents the minister from issuing some of those shares as rewards to the upper management of Canada Post.

In other words, they can be disguised bonuses for the people at the top of Canada Post. There is nothing that precludes that. I asked that question of the minister at a briefing session that I had in his own office. He had a separate briefing session for the press which the minister specifically said I could not attend. That is the transparency of the minister responsible—or should I say irresponsible—across the way.

We know that presently Canada Post has boxes at the domed stadium in Toronto. The president, Mr. Landers, admitted to me that it buys memberships in fancy golf courses for some of the upper echelon people at Canada Post. He admitted that to me in committee.

An hon. member: That is for motivation.

Mr. Boudria: Very motivating, but Canadians do not want that.

What Canadians want is for Canada Post, and this may sound original, to deliver the mail. I know that is a far-reaching concept. It is absolutely wild for Canada Post to want to deliver the mail. As far as I remember, that is what it is there for. That is what it is supposed to do.

Canada Post is already trying to look like a private corporation. Why is it ashamed of being a corporation of the Government of Canada? I do not know. I have often argued this point with it. Maybe the government across the way does not want Canada Post to look like a corporation of the Government of Canada.

The act is quite clear. Canada Post must remain a corporation of the Government of Canada and it must have a corporate logo that identifies it that way. What did this government do a couple of years ago? It gave a new logo to Canada Post. It removed the coat of arms. It removed the flag of Canada and replaced it with a very Canadian object to symbolize this great country, a pigeon wing. Yes, that makes all of us feel patriotic, a pigeon wing.

The Canada Post Corporation Act describes its mandate. Listen to this. Portion (e) refers to what the corporation is supposed to be structured like. It talks of Canada Post and identified:

> the need to maintain a corporate identity program approved by the Governor in Council—

That is the first criteria. Cabinet must approve its corporate identity. It continues:

> —that reflects the role of the corporation as an institution of the Government of Canada.

It used to say Poste Canada Post. It was the pride of Canada, with a coat of arms and the flag of Canada on the post office. That is what it was like and that is what the act says it is supposed to look like.

What does it look like now? First of all, no Order in Council has ever been issued to change the corporate logo. It changed it anyway. It removed the word "Canada". It removed the Canadian flag and now it says "Mail/Poste" with a pigeon wing. It is closing down rural post offices across Canada.

That is not what it is supposed to look like.

Canadians all over the country are angry. I give the example of the residents of Saint-Clément de Rivière-du-Loup. I went to Saint-Clément de Rivière-du-Loup. I see the member for the neighbouring riding here, and there too post offices are being closed. She knows that the people of Saint-Clément just wanted to keep their post office. Canada Post owns the building. I went there and even had a very good meal. I must say that it was very good and I congratulate the people who prepared lunch the day I went there. I gave a press conference on location.

The people want to keep their post office. They just want Canada Post to hire someone else. What is wrong with that? It is not a dying community. It is not a ghost town with no more customers and another post office a mile away. There are no post offices nearby, but there was one in Saint-Clément de Rivière-du-Loup. Why not keep that post office open? No, Canada Post, under its corporate plan approved by the government opposite, closed the post office in Saint-Clément de Rivière-du-Loup, like others elsewhere in Canada, including my riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[English]

We are debating the wrong bill this morning. The bill we are debating is in itself wrong because it does not do what the government says it should be doing. That too is wrong.

I ask the government to withdraw this bill and let us get on with things that make more sense. If the government wants to talk about Canada Post this morning I have a good idea. Let us talk about Bill C-217. Let us create that structure to supervise the post office rather than letting it run around like a pigeon with its head cut off.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the bill before us today, the proposed government changes to the Canada Post Corporation, I could not help but let my mind drift back to a session in this House a number of years ago when Canada Post Corporation was first created out of the mess that was the post office department before that time.

If we cast our minds back to 1977 and 1978 there was one industrial dispute after another that took place within the Canadian post office, one strike after another. The grievances had piled up—there were 50,000 or 100,000—and everybody, labour, management, public, and government, recognized that something had to be done.

While it pains me to say something exceedingly positive about a former government formed by a party of which I am not a member, one of the things that the late Bryce Mackasey and his colleagues in government did, after a lot of urging from the public, the New Democratic Party, organized labour and others concerned with creating an efficient and competent post office in Canada, was to enact the Canada Post Corporation Act. In doing so they made a number of important changes and also introduced some mechanisms, such as having representatives of employees—although appointed indirectly, which I think is the correct route to go in any case—from the labour movement and from employees within the post office.

At that time Robert McGarry, who was the president of the Letter Carrier's Union, and Ron Lang from the Canadian Labour Congress became two board members of the Canada Post Corporation. The first president of that corporation, Michael Warren, also introduced a new day, a new efficiency and a new spirit of co-operation into the postal system in Canada.

Mr. Warren was pretty smooth. Some people were a little suspicious of him because he was perhaps a little too smooth in their perception. He was competent. He took the public into his confidence. He took key people within the labour movement into his confidence and he dealt closely and on a regular basis with members of Parliament who were interested in the Canada Post Corporation from all parties. He, that board of directors, and that new Crown corporation did wonders in turning what was portrayed as one of the worst messes in Canada into a relatively efficient and competent corporation.

In the early 1980s I was postal critic for my party and I can remember enjoying the fact that I had something good to say about something that was happening with government and with public administration in Canada. As I mentioned earlier, there were 50,000 or 100,000 grievances sitting around stewing and poisoning the whole labour-management situation within Canada Post and across the country. Within a period of about two years that pile of unresolved grievances had been reduced to virtually nil. We went for a number of years without a single major industrial dispute. Deliveries that used to take two weeks from coast to coast now were delivered in a two-day period, deliveries from Vancouver to Toronto or Ottawa to Vancouver. Sometimes a delivery from Ottawa to Vancouver up to the interior of British Columbia only takes two days.

It did not always happen but that became the standard, and it was by and large met. Despite the proclivity of many Canadians, because we love to knock the post office as do people all over the world, a grudging admiration began to develop among the public out there and among people of all parties. They began to say that government could do something right.

Then this government with its agenda of privatization and a real wrecking crew went to work, destabilized the corporation, got into a real slanging match via a new president of the corporation, and I suspect the government, with the labour representatives on the corporation's board of directors. It found an excuse to knock them off, first of all by depriving them of information necessary in order to perform their function as directors of that corporation. When one of them engaged in legal action in order to get information to which he was entitled as a member of that board of directors, the government used that excuse to remove them from the board of the corporation.

We have come full circle to having about 100,000 grievances, undue amounts of time for mail delivery, privatization and closures in almost every rural area of Canada, and a general poisonous atmosphere once again within that corporation, particularly since the labour bashing and employee bashing tactics of the present Crown corporation and the government in the last few years. They were hiring what the government likes to call replacement workers and which most people who work for a living call scabs on a mass basis, bargaining in bad faith with the unions representing Canada Post employees, and generally taking an axe to it.

Now the government has the unmitigated gall to come before the House and the country to say that it will offer shares to its employees and that will patch up everything. That is a crock. If the government were seriously interested in improving employer–employee relations, improving efficiency and restoring what once was the good name of postal delivery in Canada, it would do a number of things.

First, it ought to reinvite employees to have at least an advisory role in the setting of policy within the Canada Post Corporation. It ought to open up those two positions on the board. That is not going to dominate anything. Instead of keeping those members once appointed in the dark it ought to ensure they have the information as do other members of the board to do their jobs.

The government ought to insist the president of the corporation do what a former president of that corporation did: open himself up to the public, to members of Parliament from all parties and to representatives to discuss openly and frankly the problems that beset the corporation and the whole problem with postal delivery in Canada.

I wish I had a little more faith that the self-defined pit-bull terrier, the government House leader and minister responsible for Canada Post Corporation, was really interested in doing what he says he wants to do to improve relations within the corporation. I can still be convinced, but he has to show some good faith in opening up the process again for people who work within the corporation to have some say and some meaningful input in the processes that take place.

I have 15 municipalities and a multitude of post offices within the rural hinterland area of Kootenay West—Revelstoke. In the last few years we have had closure after closure, privatization after privatization. We have had the ending of rural route delivery in a number of areas. It has been replaced by green boxes. There has been one local disaster after another.

My colleague, the New Democratic Party House leader, the member for Kamloops, mentioned a little while ago in the House a number of the services local post offices perform in their communities. One important service is security for the citizens of a rural area. If postmasters or postmistresses know the people in their community as rural postmasters and postmistresses do and a senior citizen does not show up for a couple of days, they ask their neighbours where so-and-so is and whether anyone has checked on him or her lately. They may find out a single person living at home has had an accident.

That is one of the very human functions a small local post office performs in a community, especially in rural communities in a number of areas of Canada that suffer from a lack of policing and a lack of security. It is important to have hands on, to know everybody, to know what is happening in the area and to have the contact everybody comes into communication with on a regular basis. It is something very hard to replace. It is one of those human things I would ask the government to understand we risk losing. It is one of the strong links between government and people in rural Canada which is being destroyed by closing down rural services.

There are many other hardships on senior citizens as a result of the elimination of rural route delivery and its replacement with green boxes which they cannot get into in the wintertime. They have to bring their own snow shovels to gain access to them. They cannot open the locks of the boxes because they are frozen. They cannot even get the Canada Post Corporation to install small devices to protect the keyholes in the green boxes from snow and ice. They shovel their way to their boxes and cannot get at the mail anyway. The postal corporation says it is up to consumers to provide protection for the locks on their boxes. Is it any wonder there is disdain for the government in this country when it has that kind of attitude?

The government wants to show a financial return on Canada Post. The member for Kamloops, my House leader, referred briefly to some areas a little while ago but there are many areas in which we could provide more services and increased revenue to the Canada Post Corporation which in turn could provide again a renewed, efficient and community oriented postal system throughout Canada.

One area is electronic banking facilities in many small rural communities throughout Canada. The British post office was consistently in the black for years and years because it operated a banking service throughout the United Kingdom. In the last 10 years literally hundreds of small rural communities across Canada have seen local banks close down. They have been left with no local financial institutions. Sometimes there is a credit union, but there are no agencies of the major chartered banks in hundreds and hundreds of small Canadian communities.

But we do have post offices, or we used to, and there is no reason in this electronic age we could not have good electronic exchanges and basic consumer banking services in many of those areas, turn a profit and provide important community services at the same time. The private sector has abandoned those communities. Why can we not use an agency like the Canada Post Corporation to provide again those basic essential services to rural Canada?

We had a pilot project a number of years ago in the Canada Post Corporation involving Peterborough and two other communities in Canada to introduce catalogue shopping. Now that Eaton's disappeared from the catalogue shopping business a number of years ago, and now that the Sears catalogue is going to be no more, what could be better than to take another look at the results of that study? We could perhaps conduct one or two other pilot projects to provide many areas in rural Canada with an opportunity through the Canada Post Corporation that is already supposedly in the delivery business anyway to have catalogues available. They could be produced by that corporation or perhaps by a private company in concert with the Canada Post Corporation so that rural Canadians could once again avail themselves of those services. They would not have to send out catalogues through the mail. They could be available at local post offices.

I urge this government or the next government to take another look at the results of the surveys. We spent two years on pilot projects. Perhaps it could embark on another whole area that could provide an important commercial and public service to Canadians abandoned by the private sector through the Canada Post Corporation and reinstall some employment and some services in rural Canada.

I take the opportunity very briefly to congratulate and thank those hundreds and thousands of ordinary Canadians, many from rural Canada, who have been involved in the whole Rural Dignity movement. They have been active on a number of fronts but particularly in their campaign to save postal service and community service in rural Canada. They have done yeoman service.

Whether it is in small communities in the Kootenays, the lower mainland of British Columbia, the north coast, in Atlantic Canada or on the prairies, these people have been active in presenting briefs and sending delegations to Ottawa and across the country at great cost to themselves. They have been demonstrating to save local post offices and have been outlining dozens of alternatives for remunerative services the Canada Post Corporation could provide to Canadians. It could work in the black, earn a profit and put government service back into the good books of a lot of people across Canada.

In looking at the proposal of the government, the bill will make 10 per cent of Canada Post's non-voting shares available for purchase by Canada Post employees on a voluntary basis. The minister, the self-defined pit-bull terrier, claims that this bill will help to eliminate the labour-management tension that currently exists at Canada Post.

Finally, I want to reinforce what I began by saying. If this government or any government wants to restore some feeling of good will among Canadians about the whole idea of government, if it wants to provide an efficient postal service, if it wants to truly establish good employer-employee relations within the corporation or within that service, it ought to open up the board to people from other walks of life, particularly those who work within the post office.

Owning shares that do not even have a vote at shareholders' meetings does absolutely nothing. What they need is input. It needs to open the channels of communication, look at some fresh ideas, perhaps regurgitate some ideas that used to work, and put the whole idea of postal service and government service back into a positive framework that will appeal to Canadians. Then they can say that government is doing something right. Government used to do it. Let us do it again.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to speak on this Bill C-73.

I go back to an experience I had in 1985 and 1986. I worked with a gentleman who I think was one of the most exciting entrepreneurs in Canada, a gentleman by the name of Frank Stronach who runs a company called Magna International. Magna is the most diversified auto parts manufacturing company in Canada. Eighty-five per cent of its sales are exports. The company competes against the Germans and the Japanese. It does very well. The principle behind Magna is its unique corporate culture. Central to that culture is the fact that all employees are shareholders in the corporation.

When I first heard of this bill coming before the House of Commons, I was intrigued. In fact, I initially thought that it was an example of the post office heading in the right direction. However, the closer I got to the bill, the more I read and the more I investigated, the more I realized that this is nowhere near the Magna principle of equity participation and profit sharing for employees. That is why I am opposed to it.

I have said in previous readings on this bill that the concept of equity participation of employees is a principle that I endorse but there has to be a framework. It all has to hang together. There has to be a set of rules and regulations that the directors and management of the company have to follow in order for that arrangement to work properly.

I would like to go back to Magna and take a few minutes to read from its corporate constitution. I will show how its program for equity and profit for employees is different from this particular bill. I believe that difference is why this particular bill will not be of benefit to the employees and is not a good thing to proceed with.

First of all, when the Magna corporation put its constitution and culture together, it made sure that it all fit. One cannot just talk about 10 per cent equity or profit sharing for employees without talking about principles that the rest of management has to adhere to. One cannot just talk about it. One has to put it down in black and white. It has to be there in a form in which everyone in the corporation is totally accountable.

Let me just take two minutes to read the Magna corporate constitution. Under board of directors, Magna believes that outside directors provide independent counsel and discipline. A majority of Magna's board of directors will be outsiders.

Under employee equity and profit participation, 10 per cent of Magna's profit before tax will be allocated to employees. These funds will be used for the purchase of Magna shares in trust for employees and for cash distribution to employees in recognizing both performance and length of service. This is a situation where it is not the employees buying the shares. It is that 10 per cent of Magna's profit before tax is to be allocated to buy the shares for the employees.

Under shareholder profit participation, Magna will distribute on average 20 per cent of its annual net profit to its shareholders.

Under management profit position, in order to obtain a long-term contractual commitment for management, the company provides a compensation arrangement which, in addition to a base salary comparable to industry standards, allows for the distribution to corporate management of up to 6 per cent of Magna's profit before tax.

Another key component of this constitution is research and technology development. Magna will allocate 7 per cent of its profit before tax for research and technology development to the long-term viability of the company.

Under social responsibility, the company will contribute a maximum of 2 per cent of its profit before tax to charitable, cultural, educational and political institutions to support the basic fabric of society.

Under minimum profit performance, management has an obligation to produce a profit. If Magna does not generate a minimum after-tax profit of 4 per cent on share capital for two consecutive years, class A shareholders voting as a class will have the right to elect additional directors.

Under major investments, in the event that more than 20 per cent of Magna's equity is to be committed to a new, unrelated business, class A and class B shareholders will have the right to approve such an investment with each class voting separately.

Finally, any change to Magna's corporate constitution will require the approval of class A and class B shareholders with each voting separately.

The reason that I took the time to go through every aspect of this corporate constitution is because this bill only deals with one facet of the Canada Post corporate culture. Unless the equity participation program is tied in to the whole philosophy of the post office, then there is absolutely no protection for those people who are buying those shares. There is absolutely no accountability.

This idea, which more and more companies are getting into, is a good idea. It will only work when one considers all aspects of the corporation. One of the members said here earlier that when one deals with a company like Canada Post that in the last few years has shown so little sensitivity in terms of its contribution to the fabric of this country as a whole, then if anything, it is like Canada Post has worked at diminishing the trust factor rather than improving it.

We all know that for many years the Canada postal service was not only a service in terms of the small, rural communities of our country but it was also a symbol of the federal presence. It was one of those instruments of public policy that we used to galvanize and pull this country together.

I can remember 1980 when we would make sure, especially during the referendum, that the presence of the postal service in the province of Quebec was refurbished and rebuilt. We made sure that the flags and the wordmark that became the symbol of the national government were brought up to speed to remind people in the community of the services that this government provides to its citizenry.

I have noticed only in the last few years that on the issue of federal presence—it does not matter what province or community—we have run away from it. First we stripped it of the coat of arms. Now we are stripping it of the Canada wordmark.

In my own riding the two operating post offices, stations A and G, provided services not only for small business people but also for senior citizens. There was staff morale at these centres. These stations were part of the fabric of the community. Now they are closed.

I believe that the postal management has forgotten that one of the key ingredients for having a successful corporation is high morale and a positive spirit. I think the actions that they have undertaken in the last few years are working against that spirit. I cannot quite figure out where management is coming from because the principle behind equity—having your employees own a piece of the company and of the action—is to create a better product and better service at a more competitive price and at a higher level of efficiency.

It seems to me that this is being done in a disjointed way. Assume that this particular bill was to indicate to the current employees of the post office that the shares were not to be bought from their own pockets but, as Magna did, 10 per cent of the shares were to be allocated and distributed to all employees of the post office out of profits. Then there might be a chance of turning the spirit of this postal organization around.

It is human nature that if people are treated fairly, then obviously the productivity levels improve. Here is an opportunity where the postal service has really missed the boat.

I support the position that this will in no way, shape or form enhance the postal service of this country. It will not enhance the spirit or the environment of the people who work in the post office. I take that from all levels, from management to people who work on the line.

I do not think this is a good formula and I would encourage the government to go back to the drawing board. It should take what is basically a good principle and put it in a form where there is accountability. This is not tied together in a comprehensive way.

It should go back to the drawing-board and look at some other successful corporations in this country like Magna, which has been doing very well in the middle of this depression. Its earnings-per-share ratio is topping the charts. Its profits are at record levels. The chief executive officer of that company credits that high level of productivity and morale to the fact that there are close to 17,000 shareholders in the Magna corporation. They know that at the end of the year 10 per cent of that pre-tax profit that will go toward buying shares for distribution among the employees.

This allows a company to make a better product at a better price. Magna is now as competitive as the Germans and the Japanese. This is the kind of comprehensive approach that we need for the basic idea of equity participation and profit sharing for employees. It is a totally above the board approach where everything is in the open. Management is as accountable as the employee. It is not something like this which is only a partial measure.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, to begin I would like to congratulate my friend and colleague from Broadview—Greenwood on his speech today.

I would like to mention today that Canada Post intends to close at least 5,000 rural post offices across Canada. The member for Broadview—Greenwood spoke well today about the federal presence in rural communities and I would like to commend him for that. I know that he lives in Toronto and people there tend to lose sight of a country from coast to coast with rural communities. But I know my colleague and he knows Canada. I can also assure my constituents that he knows the situation throughout the country.

• (1220)

I would like to ask the member to give us his opinion on Canada Post's decision to close rural post offices. I know that in my riding of Restigouche—Chaleur, the closure of a post office in Pointe-Verte has just been announced. Mayor Maxime Lejeune and his council oppose this closing; the citizens and I oppose it.

The member spoke about a federal presence in the communities. Could he perhaps comment for us on these policies of Canada Post?

[English]

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question.

One of our members in the House spoke earlier about some ideas that could be introduced into the postal service. He mentioned banking services and I think that is a good idea.

The problem we have is this government. By the way, it does not matter who the next leader of the party is, it can be the member from Vancouver or the member from Quebec. Essentially what we have on that side of the House is a philosophy that it retreats from national government. It has been the greatest retreat from national governance in the history of our country. If it looks at something and it is not showing an instant viability it cuts it, trashes it and just gets rid of it.

I cannot understand the problem that most business people have. I know there are a few people over there that have business experience, but they obviously do not have any influence on this cabinet. In business when your viability is in jeopardy, creativity comes into the boardroom, into the plant or into all facets of the business. The idea is to say that if we are losing sales and we are not viable, how are we going to diversify? How are we going to get more product into the pipe to make the enterprise more viable so we can keep it alive, so we can keep our people employed?

Government has an added responsibility. It is not just that we have to be concerned with fiscal responsibility and with taxpayers' money, we in governance have to make sure that those regions of our country that do not have the critical mass in terms of population have the same national standards as a person does in a richer centre.

That is part of what being Canadian is all about, having national standards or national services. It does not matter what part of the country you are from, whether you are from a disadvantaged region, rural Canada or downtown Toronto. This government has totally missed the boat on that particular feeling or attitude in the country as a whole.

I see the Minister of Supply and Services here. I know in his department of government there is a lot of good creative Public Service talent. Why could we not take some of these rural post offices and make them centres where we would not only supply some of these banking machines but make them centres where small businesses could come in and maybe bid on government contracts?

They could be mini centres where you would have total government service. With the computer technology that we have today you could make these institutions more than just post offices. They could be agents to supply support for getting passports. They could be instruments that could quite frankly take a lot of pressure off MPs' offices and give a more comprehensive service and therefore be viable.

I think that is the type of approach the post office should be taking. Aside from its primary responsibility of delivering the mail, I have always believed philosophically that one of the most important contributions that the postal service of Canada contributed was its federal presence. This government and these members have been trashing the federal presence for the last 10 years and they are going to pay in the next election.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose an idea to the member for Broadview—Greenwood and invite some comment and perhaps an answer. Part of my comment is really a question.

In my view one of the problems we have had in the Canada Post Corporation in the last while is that the systems analysts and the engineers have taken over. Given the lack of meaningful input from employees or people who work closely with the corporation, particularly in rural Canada but in all ground floor operations in communities across the country, everything has been done to make the corporation fit some self-designed system rather than designing the corporation and procedures within the corporation to fit the needs of the community.

I want to give a couple of examples. The hon. member may not be familiar with my constituency of Kootenay West—Revelstoke, coming from Toronto. To mail a letter from Slocan to New Denver, which is 20 miles away, the letter gets shipped across three valleys, two mountain ranges, a couple of hundred miles to the west to get sorted. In order to come back it returns over the three valleys, two mountain ranges and across a couple of ferries or through an airport where often the planes do not land because of the weather. It takes a week to get 20 miles to another community.

That has been done in order to fit the system that some flaky systems analyst or engineer who is completely out of touch with reality has designed. That sort of thing just does not make sense. If those in responsible positions within the corporation had some continuing dialogue with people who actually experience real life in those kinds of communities, whether through a central agency or some other way—we can work out the mechanism later—maybe they would avoid this kind of bureaucratic nightmare.

Another example is having mail that comes from Nelson go to Vancouver to get sorted—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but time is running out and we just have time for a short answer.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to my Magna experience. Do you know, minister, it was quite an interesting two years. It would be a good place to consider after the next election. It is creative, it is positive.

The thing which amazed me about Stronach was that when he would inspect plants, he would inspect the garbage cans because that is where you could tell the morale of the troops. If there was waste of raw materials in the garbage cans you knew that the plant was not functioning. In other words, there are too many MBAs today. I have nothing against MBAs, but the unique thing about Magna was that the toolmakers were running the company. They had a couple of token MBAs trying to look after the books, a couple of accountants, but Stronach had this view, this vision, this feeling and it is working out very well.

I really think it is a model that we have to look at. I never agreed with all of Frank's ideas. Some of them were a little far out. The point is that if you have respect for the person who is working on the shop floor, and if you listen to that person, that is where the real creative energy flows. That is how you make better product and provide better service at a competitive price.

There are too many leaders and too many corporations in this country that are like the post office. I say this with respect to the post office, I think it is lacking in that area too. I think it is time to review it and go back to the shop floor and therein will be hope for all of us.

• (1230)

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I admit I have mixed feelings about taking part in today's debate. Of course I support my colleagues who are against this bill for a number of reasons. First of all, the bill proposes to sell 10 per cent of the shares to employees without giving them voting rights as shareholders. The tax credit is an excellent proposal, but the bill does not provide for direct participation by employees in the management and operations of Canada Post.

The idea is admirable. We must admit that. However, I would like to share a somewhat personal example with my colleagues in this House, having been actively involved when the employees of Spruce Falls Power & Paper Co. Limited in Kapuskasing, in my riding, acquired a majority interest in their company. For them it was a very significant development, because from that moment on they were in control of their own future and participated directly in the company's management decisions. Their attitude changed dramatically. They took a great deal more pride in their work, absenteeism went down and finally they had a sense of belonging and at the end of the day, when they retired, they would have something very tangible and worthwhile to call their own.

That is not what Bill C–73 does. If the government had intended to at least give these new shareholders voting rights, I would have supported the bill from the word go. Unfortunately that is not the case. And add to that the unsavoury developments of the past 10 years during which we saw a Crown corporation, which in the final analysis belongs to Canadians, gradually edge toward privatization.

There is a price to pay and it was paid by closing down many small post offices. Small, because they are located in Canada's rural areas. It is a very high price because in most cases the post office was the only place in the community that had a federal presence. It was probably the only building flying the Canadian flag.

During the debate around the referendum and the Charlottetown accord, we saw that Canadians still have this very strong desire to feel part of this Canadian community. Canada Post was one way to promote Canadian unity.

Those of my constituents who went to the post offices have now been closed—six were closed in my riding—felt very strongly about this presence. To them it was a sign that the federal government took them seriously, that they were important. It is something we tend to forget in our large urban centres, in Canada's largest cities, where because of the population density the federal presence is everywhere and all departments are represented.

• (1235)

In small rural post offices there was also the human factor. I have another experience I would like to share with you. My parents, and especially my mother, ran a post office in the small community of Opasatika for 37 years. I remember that when my mother died there were so many people at the funeral that our small church was full. I felt I had to mention my mother's contribution to this community. Every day she met people from the village who came to pick up their mail at the post office. She always had a friendly word for these people and that is why they liked her.

The post office was also a place to meet people, to talk and get the latest news, because we always had a bulletin board where people could put up whatever they wanted. My point is that the kind of personal contact we had before is now gradually disappearing.

We also had the supermailboxes that caused so many problems, especially in rural areas where in the winter snow removal is sometimes less than perfect. I need hardly mention the problems caused by these mailboxes when they are frozen shut. I think this is ample proof that the purpose of the bill is certainly not to improve operations, especially in rural areas.

Last year, another post office in my riding, the one in Moonbeam, was about to close. People rallied to this cause. They wanted to make sure their post office did not close, since the building as such was relatively new, in good condition and the quality of service provided was also very much appreciated by the people in Moonbeam.

We do not know what happened and probably never will, but believe it or not, we managed to keep this post office open. More power to Canada Post, which realized that the post office was a very important part of the municipality. The question arises now why the same cannot be done for other small communities.

There are minor changes that can be made if Canada Post is losing money. It is not making a profit. And besides, we have to adjust, especially in these difficult times. No one will deny that adjustments and changes are necessary to save money but closing down a post office altogether, especially for the people who appreciate the service, is very difficult to accept. Since Canada Post is aware of this, one wonders why it is pursuing this policy of closing down rural post offices in Canada.

I have another example of service cutbacks. Last week, the post office in Kapuskasing announced that it would be open 16 hours less per week. The important thing is not the number of hours but the principle behind this decision. Let me explain.

First of all, there will be no more mail sorting on Saturday. As a result, on Monday morning letter carriers will have less mail to deliver since it will still be in the bags or on the tables. So one service is being cut. Instead of getting our mail on Monday, as we did for so many years, we will not get it until Tuesday.

Second, people were told that in all cases of address changes the mail would be rerouted to Ottawa. It is very hard to make sense of all this because it used to take one hour a day to do address changes, which meant that the mail was delivered the same day. Sending it to Ottawa means it will now take four days for the mail to come back.

What kind of service is this? What is this about paying $110 for a change of address? What about the fact that first-class mail, which normally should be delivered the same day, will now be delivered four days later? I think the reactions of business people are understandable since they feel they are paying quite enough for a service that is very important to them. Consider the reactions of these business people who in future will be more inclined to use the services of private mail courier companies across Canada. If Canada Post thought it could save money this way it was wrong. It was very wrong indeed.

In concluding, I would say that selling these shares to employees might be very beneficial since the same employees would certainly be more inclined to protect the interests of Canada Post. But that is not the case. The current trend is for employees to be far more involved in their company, whether it employs 1, 3, 5, 10 or even 500 people. It is clear that in future the trend will be for employees to participate directly in the operations and decision making of their companies. Since that is not what this bill sets out to do, I see it as my duty to vote against this legislation.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the member made an excellent speech and I appreciated the points he was making.

I wonder however if he would elaborate a bit on the issue of labour relations within Canada Post. It has been an issue of concern right across the country. The history is that labour relations have been handled very badly at Canada Post. There was a breach of faith by the administration. Does the member see this bill doing anything to help that situation?

Mr. Bélair: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Victoria for his question. No, this bill will not serve to improve employee-employer relations at all.

This is why I was saying in my speech that the actual tendency for employees to participate in their company is not being addressed in Bill C-73. It is not being addressed because the shares that will be sold to those employees are non-voting shares.

If there was a climate and an atmosphere of confrontation before then this bill will not serve to alleviate those confrontations at all. I strongly believe that the government has missed an excellent opportunity to submit to both employer and employees a plan whereby both would participate in the decision process of Canada Post. With time, relations between the two groups—because we have to say it is two groups—would have improved dramatically for the benefit of all Canadians and services would have improved. Also the delivery of mail would have improved and employees would have taken a stronger interest in the future of Canada Post.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in this debate. I might just ask my friend the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception if he would like to speak in the debate before one o'clock, in which case I can try to accommodate him. Is the memeber ready to do that?

Mr. Mifflin: Yes.

Mr. Brewin: Fine. I will try to keep my remarks brief in order to do that. This bill has been thoroughly debated in the House. It was debated at second reading. I had a chance to participate there and put some of my views on the record. I should not take too long.

I do want to speak as forcefully as I can against this bill. This bill would really be a first step toward the privatization of Canada Post and perhaps there are cases where privatization may be valid although, coming from the tradition that I do, there are probably fewer occasions than many other members of this House would see. There may be occasions but this is not one of them.

Canada Post has been run as a corporation of the 19th century variety for a long time. That is the source of the problem. The leadership of Canada Post obviously went to the Ebenezer Scrooge school of labour relations. As a result, the labour relations within Canada Post are abysmal.

Instead of using the term labour relations one might almost use the term management relations because the responsibility for the problems of employee relations in Canada Post clearly rests with management. No other management in the country could pile up over 100,000 grievances so that the whole system is in gridlock. It now becomes impossible for an employee who has a legitimate grievance to expect any industrial justice within Canada Post. The system has failed and it is the responsibility of management. This bill does nothing to address that.

There are problems as well in the simple functioning of Canada Post and without consultation with employees. It is a breach of a fundamental rule of modern management. Canada Post persists time and time again to put into practice new methods that are designed to create anxiety within the work force and to slow down efficiency for the general public.

For example, in Victoria it has just recently instituted a system. Instead of sorting the mail in Victoria on a Friday and over the weekend, it takes the mail from Victoria—if one can imagine it—by ferry to Vancouver to run it through the sorting machine on the weekend. It then brings it back on Monday or Tuesday to deliver it a day late to the people of Victoria. It is typical. It is unfortunately typical. The consequences in service are dramatic.

Probably all of us have experienced phoning Canada Post with an inquiry. You cannot talk to any human being in Canada Post any more. You end up having to phone somewhere else. Victoria is a capital city and one of the growing regions of this country, but Canada Post has moved its inquiry service to Vancouver. You end up phoning somebody in Vancouver who usually does not know what part of Victoria you are talking about.

I had an experience just the other day phoning Canada Post. First, I was put on hold but eventually got somebody who said it was not their department. The call was referred to somebody else who also said it was not their department. Again the call was put on hold. Eventually the line died. There was no answer. Thousands of Canadians experience that in seeking to find out what has happened to their mail or their service.

All Canadians have suffered from the junk mail that gets thrown in. When I was looking into one of these problems in my riding, I came across the mentality that now pervades Canada Post. The officials started talking about service to the customer. It turned out they were talking about service to the companies that wanted to get their junk mail into people's homes.

The customer is no longer the general public, the people who wish to mail correspondence and have it delivered in a reasonable period of time. The customer is the corporate sector. It seemed to me that summarized the problems at Canada Post.

We need to change. Instead of the direction in which this bill takes us, we need to change our whole approach to Canada Post. We need to begin with a thorough consultation with the public. I would say that in each area of Canada, Canada Post and the administration should establish small committees of the public to begin looking at the problems at Canada Post from the public's point of view.

This should be joined by a genuine consultation with the employees through their unions to seek changes in Canada Post. If your work force does not have good and high morale you simply cannot deliver the service that you are asked to.

This bill is flawed. It opens the door to the privatization of Canada Post. It fails to deal with the labour relations problems at Canada Post. It makes no effort to change the management at Canada Post. Until the management is changed it is not going to be possible to change the attitudes that pervade Canada Post, the attitudes that are bringing this great service to a standstill.

I call on the House to defeat this bill at this stage. Send this whole mess back to the government with a requirement that it take a completely different approach than it has been taking on services to the public by Canada Post.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to thank my hon. friend from Victoria for this opportunty. He and I will be attending the same meeting this afternoon. I do appreciate his consideration in giving me the opportunity to speak on this bill at third reading as this afternoon's activities would have precluded this.

I want to make reference to the comments by my hon. colleagues who have spoken on this subject. My colleague from Essex—Kent spoke eloquently and with great substance on the issue this morning. My hon. colleague from Cochrane—Superior was the most recent speaker on the Liberal side. Of course, there was the hon. member for Victoria who is not to be forgotten. They put a human face on what is happening to Canada Post.

I am vehemently opposed to the bill. If anything needs to be done with Canada Post, it is not to privatize it. It is not to put together a piece of legislation that causes the initial steps to be taken for privatization. These are measures that mitigate and almost put the employees in a different category of persons. The idea is that they would have shares but non-voting shares. I do not want to get into the details of this bill because it has gone through committee and has been discussed.

I think the principle of the bill really calls into question the whole business of how the postal service is run in Canada. I am going to read something for clarification and for the benefit of putting a certain aspect to my relatively short presentation here this morning.

When the Crown corporation of Canada Post was created under the Canada Post Corporation Act a few years ago, the mandate had five or possibly six principles. I am concerned with the first principle that is described as: "The desirability of improving and extending its products and services"—I underline services—"in the light of the developments of the field of communications".

If some of the examples we have heard in the last 10 minutes in this House are improving the field of communications, one human being communicating with another, then I think we are far off the mark.

The mandate given in 1986 for Canada Post to close 5,221 rural post offices—not urban but rural post offices—at a loss of 10,000 jobs has been well under way. I am told that 1,200 of these post offices have been closed in rural Canada and roughly 3,200 people have lost their jobs. The principle of people losing their jobs when we have 1.6 million Canadians unemployed today is despicable and shameful. The aspect of this in a generic sense is very disturbing.

I will give the most recent example, but for that example there could have been many others and there are many others. I do not fault the officials involved. Officials working for a Crown corporation or for the government have a mandate. They have a job to do and have terms of reference. If they do not do it, they are fired. Who wants to be fired today when the unemployment situation is as it is? If you lose your job you may not qualify for unemployment insurance, thanks to another recent initiative by this government.

I am quoting the example of Spaniard's Bay, a community of about 3,000 people in my riding. Having set a meeting on short notice for December we managed to get it cancelled and delayed until after Christmas. On January 10 representatives of Canada Post met with the elected representatives of Spaniard's Bay. I was unable to attend.

I was told by the political representative, the member of the House of Assembly for that meeting and the follow-up meeting, that every possible objection in the world was raised as to why Spaniard's Bay, which had already had its postal services degraded by the number of hours two years before did not want to have any change made.

Both the officials sat there nodding their heads. All they could do was repeat their mandate that when a natural opportunity arises the postmaster will have to retire and we will have to resort to another kind of postal service. That is what is being done all over Canada. That is what is being done in these 5,221 cases. That is what is going to be done with this community. Why? Because it is done for everybody. No compassion can be shown because it is their mandate.

Imagine the wrath, the ire, the disappointment and the surprise of the people in Spaniard's Bay when they discovered those five recent cases which happen to have been in the Prime Minister's riding. There are others as well. I am not going to quote the details because I do not have time, but five post offices in towns with populations of 363, 3,733, 4,000, 1,000, 225 and in the most blatant case 121. Canada Post advertised that the post office would have an immediate vacancy. Nobody applied for the job. In accordance with its rule it should have closed it down anyway because of the natural opportunity but it did not and went out again to hire somebody else. This is not applying the rules and the mandate in a fair and balanced manner.

One example of why I believe that if we need anything to improve Canada Post and if we have any bills and legislation to be passed in this House it should be to go back and restore to Canadians the proper service that the Prime Minister promised in an election promise in 1984 when he said that improving the service of Canada Post is going to be a top priority for the government.

If closing down 5,221 post offices in rural Canada is another blow of the demolition derby of this government of destroying rural Canada then I do not see that as an improvement in service. I would certainly say that if this is used in substantiation of trust in the government to approve Bill C-73 on third reading then I think it has gone about it in the wrong way and it is far from receiving the support from this side of the House and many of my colleagues.

TOBACCO SMUGGLING

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, the governments concerned should thoroughly investigate the effects of tobacco smuggling. This is urgent. Merchants find that cigarette smuggling is making life difficult for them. The tax system must be re-evaluated and some Indian reserves and other networks that benefit from this smuggling, which deprives the governments of hundreds of millions of dollars, must be brought into line.

We should recover these amounts by lowering the taxes of the various levels of government. Will we tolerate this flagrant lawlessness for long? I call on the ministers of finance, revenue and justice of the governments concerned to take the bull by the horns and lay down the law for those who traffic illegally in cigarettes and alcohol and evade taxes.

Does the will exist to eliminate this scourge from Quebec and Canada?

OFFICIAL DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, ludicrous, stupid and destructive are just a few of the adjectives that have been used to describe this government's latest round of cuts to Official Development Assistance.

Those of us who have committed our lives to ensuring that the people most in need are the beneficiaries of Canadian aid are flabbergasted at the changed policy directions being implemented by this government, changes which represent the abandonment of our stated official policy to help the poorest countries and people in the world.

The changed policy direction implemented because of a 10 per cent cut to our aid budget has been implemented without benefit of public consultation and in an election year when the government's mandate has run out.

Mr. Mahbub ul Haq, the author of the UNDP report, suggested that a move in this direction "would be an unmitigated disaster". Not only were these cuts implemented without Canadian public consultation but they were also implemented without consultation with the affected countries.

Just as this government has shown through its policies that it has little regard for the people of this country, it is with these measures demonstrating its lack of regard for the poorest people in the world. This government obviously does not comprehend the nature of development assistance and the need for a people first, grass roots development policy which will lift civil societies to self-determination and self-sufficiency.

TAQRAMIUT NIPINGAT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Taqramiut Nipingat is concerned about the budget cuts announced on December 2 for native communities' communications programs.

This organization produces radio and television programs by Inuit people in Inuktitut and distributes them in northern Quebec. As well as preserving Inuit culture and protecting their language, Taqramiut Nipingat provides essential communication services for thousands of people.

I sincerely believe that this communication program must not be cut back, given the economic importance of northern Quebec and this remote region.

I ask the Minister of Finance to revise Bill C-113, because Taqramiut Nipingat is one of the few opportunities for training and employment in the North.

ABORIGINAL YOUTH

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have been shocked by recent news stories about the epidemic of suicide among aboriginal young people. Studies show that aboriginal youth are killing themselves at rates five to seven times that of the national average.

In Big Cove, Davis Inlet, the Nishnawbe-Aski communities in northwestern Ontario, and Stanley Mission in my riding the story is the same. Unemployment rates of 80 to 90 per cent and centuries of cultural genocide are the reasons these young people are giving up hope.

Yet this year the federal government has cut economic development programs for aboriginal people by over $40 million while it has increased welfare budgets by $52 million. Excellent proposals for coming to terms with this issue are coming in from First Nations across the country, but they are caught on the bureaucratic treadmill while the crisis in their community accelerates.

Our First Nations people want to end the cycle of dependency and despair. Canadians overwhelmingly share their vision of a future with hope for aboriginal youth.

It is only this government, which has the primary responsibility for aboriginal people, that is not getting the message. Until it does young people are going to pay the price.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, concerned citizens around the world were shocked by the recent murder of a two-year old in Britain by two 10-year old boys. Unfortunately the same attitude that fostered that crime also exists in Canada today.

• (1405)

People from coast to coast are demanding action to stop the increasing violence in our society. It is necessary for all levels of government to work together in an effort to determine the causes of such attitudes and behaviours and to institute remedies for these problems.

It is indeed difficult to legislate morality and good behaviour, but for the sake of our country and future generations every effort must be made now in many areas to restore safety to our streets.

Some areas of concern include the increasing violence on television and in films, pornography, the breakdown of the family, over-emphasis on rights while ignoring responsibilities, poverty, and the lack of adequate facilities to assist disturbed youth. I ask all governments and society to work together to combat this alarming trend.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the lack of a coherent transportation policy in Canada is nowhere more evident than in northern Ontario. By cancelling VIA Rail in the north and by its failure to act on western grain transportation this government has clearly demonstrated that it lacks the will and the courage to make the necessary changes to treat east and west fairly in Canada.

This government is driving regions toward north-south orientation. They must do this for their economic future. Look at Sault Ste. Marie, linked to the best interstate system in the world, and Windsor and southwestern Ontario and its proximity to Michigan. Sarnia is only the width of a river from the interstate system. In my own area of northwestern Ontario we will be forced into a north-south transportation network. We are 40 miles away from this interstate system.

I wonder how long it will take the people in Canada in those regions to go to Amtrak to look after their passenger rail service? This government's transportation policy is forcing regions to protect their economic future in a way that is not in Canada's best national interest. They are going north and south rather than east and west.

ATLANTIC CANADA ECONOMY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, on February 2 in the House I made a statement and asked the Minister of Agriculture about the proposed changes to the Feed Freight Assistance Program. If the changes are approved as proposed they will penalize Atlantic Canadian farmers unduly and unfairly.

Another proposed change that will harm Atlantic Canada will be the reduction in the maritime freight rate program which assists Atlantic Canadian industry in being competitive. This program has been in place since 1927.

If these long-standing programs are reduced as proposed Atlantic Canada will lose its ability to compete. Both the agricultural and industrial communities have proposals before their respective departments. These plans address the financial needs of the government but do not place an undue burden on Atlantic Canada.

In the interest of government and business working together in Atlantic Canada I ask the ministers involved to implement the proposals submitted instead of the plans presently on the table.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I repeatedly called for an environmental assessment review panel for the proposed additions to runways at Pearson International Airport.

I am dismayed by Transport Canada's decision to disregard the panel's recommendations. The panel's report states that no decision should be taken at this time with regard to the construction of one or more additional runways at Pearson.

Further, the report rightly observes that any decision to proceed will be perceived as a signal that the concerns expressed before the panel, like previous efforts to mitigate the adverse social impacts at Pearson, have fallen on deaf ears.

There are major implications for public policy in Transport Canada's decision to ignore its own environmental assessment panel. Whatever the actual conclusions of the panel, the government's decision simply to overrule its recommendations raises fundamental questions about the efficacy of all such reviews, not to mention the futile expenditure of taxpayers' money.

The residents of Etobicoke and other communities urge the government to reverse its decision and develop a total transportation strategy which alleviates rather than exacerbates the already formidable environmental burdens placed on the communities surrounding Pearson International Airport.

POVERTY

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, it was with shock and horror that I heard the hon. member from Mississauga refer to the subcommittee on poverty as a kangaroo committee.

In doing so she maligned not only the chair but every member of that committee and members sitting on all sides of this House. Her remarks are outrageous.

Has she not heard of the Brighter Futures initiative? Does $2.6 billion mean nothing to her? What about the child tax benefit designed to help low income families? Was the member not paying attention?

• (1410)

It is tragic that any Canadian citizen must live in poverty. The plight of Canadian children is one of great concern to us all. The Liberals and the NDP do not hold a monopoly on compassion. This government has worked hard, not only to provide financial support to disadvantaged Canadians but, more important, to provide them with the tools to become self-reliant.

Perhaps it is time my colleague was apprised of this government's achievements in the area of social—

Mr. Speaker: The members' time has expired.

NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, last week the government signed an agreement to sell uranium to Taiwan in breach of the spirit of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Until now, Canada has always insisted that Canadian nuclear materials would be sold only to signatories to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, which is designed to stop the spread of nuclear weapons.

This treaty is up for renewal in 1995 and faces a very difficult round of negotiations. Canada and the world have a tremendous stake in the success of these negotiations yet the government is undermining the treaty on the eve of the renewal negotiations, contrary to the security of Canadians and the peoples of the world.

To make it worse, the government is routing the sale through the United States to avoid the terms of the treaty and it entered into the agreement after the Minister of Agriculture visited Taiwan, in another breach of official Canadian policy.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, aboriginal communities throughout the country are in desperate need. Aboriginal people know what must be done but this government continues to deny them the tools they need to work with.

A vicious cycle links poverty and inadequate and overcrowded housing to family violence, substance abuse and suicide. Yet this government has done nothing to improve aboriginal and northern housing and economic conditions. In fact, this government has made matters worse.

Despite an aboriginal and northern housing crisis, aboriginal and northern housing funds have been cut. Despite high aboriginal unemployment rates, aboriginal economic development and aboriginal communications funds have been cut.

In northern Canada aboriginal language television provides jobs and information on social issues that people cannot get otherwise due to their remoteness.

A new approach is needed which realizes that all things are connected and solutions will come from the people themselves if they are given the opportunities. This government has failed to provide these opportunities. It is time for a new government.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, in Saskatchewan we have recently experienced the Saskatchewan NDP supporting enhanced trade with Mexico. There has been a weak attempt by the Saskatchewan NDP to say: "Yes, but".

A recent article in The Regina Leader Post states:

NAFTA bashing by NDP becoming a little tiring.

It highlighted this back-and-forth posturing.

I would entreat everyone who truly cares to know more about this trading relationship to read this article. It concludes by saying, and I quote again:

In sum, the NDP/trade union position on free trade is a collection of worn-out clichés that presents the facade of solidarity, while attempting to conceal political hypocrisy and union self-interest.

It is time for all parties to recognize that Canada's economic growth and the maintenance of our standard of living are interconnected. Both should be above partisanship.

ERNST ZUNDEL

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, the decision of the Ontario Provincial Police not to charge Ernst Zundel for promoting hatred and lies about the holocaust is extremely disappointing.

[English]

The decision to lay criminal charges under the hate crime provision of the Criminal Code rests with the NDP Attorney General, Marion Boyd. Instead of recognizing the fact that holocaust denial is one of the most powerful weapons of the neo-Nazi movement the provincial NDP in Ontario is burying its head in the sand.

The German government has complained that materials published by Zundel in Canada are being used to fuel the rise of Nazi and extreme right-wing racist organizations. It is time to put an end to this kind of criminal activity.

I hope that the provincial NDP government uses the power it does have to put an end to this type of hate propaganda.

STANDARDIZED TESTING

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, in Canada we have a lot to learn. International tests have been done in math and science. Canadian students in grade four perform at the international average, but by grade eight they are out-performed by students in many other countries.

• (1415)

Canadian high school graduates have even poorer results. Testing of basic skills over the past 25 years shows deteriorating achievements. Somewhere along the line we are letting our students down.

In late 1991 provinces recognized the need for national standardized testing, but the proposed school achievement indicators program ran into problems along the way.

As a nation we want our graduates to be competitive in the new global economy. We want our students to stay in school, to learn, to achieve and to move into challenging jobs. I hope we will work as a nation toward achieving these goals.

Governments at all levels can put together a system of standardized testing that will help parents and educators to identify and meet the needs of our students throughout their education.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, this government is in an utter state of confusion over its position on the NAFTA legislation and the proposed parallel accords on the environment and labour standards.

The Prime Minister says that perhaps the legislation should be delayed, and in reference to the accords he says: "They have little if anything to do with Canada".

On the other hand the trade minister says they will ram the NAFTA through before July 1 and then again contradicts the Prime Minister by saying that the accords are important to Canada and that we must be at the table.

Meanwhile the finance minister demonstrates similar confusion on the domestic front. He promises a budget some time soon to present a plan to deal with the deficit. This plan, he says: "will probably be based on the previous plan we had which has slipped".

What we have is a new plan based on a failed old plan. It is obvious this government is in a total state of confusion. It has no leader, no direction domestically and obviously no direction internationally.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of defence.

An internationally recognized aviation magazine has reported that Agusta, the Italian company from which the government is buying the EH-101 helicopters, is now $1.4 billion in the red and is now under the bankruptcy protection rules in Italy.

The Italian government appears both unwilling and unable to provide a bailout under the European Community rules.

Why is the minister insisting on risking billions of dollars of taxpayers' money to support a company that is about to collapse? Will she not at least suspend the contract so that we can ascertain that Canadians will not end up subsidizing a bankrupt foreign company?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has no reason to believe that the contract will not be performed as stipulated.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me ask a supplementary question about how this performance will be completed.

In late January the EH-101 prototype helicopter crashed for unknown reasons, killing four people including the test pilot. The Italian ministry of transport has grounded the eight remaining prototypes and has opened an inquiry which has yet to report.

Why has the government made the commitment to buy an expensive piece of equipment which has not yet proven to be either safe or reliable? How much will this government pay for somebody else's mistakes?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the prototype to which the hon. member refers that did crash is not the same model that is the subject of our contracts.

The government has chosen this model to replace the two fleets of helicopters and the fleet of fixed-wing aircraft for the same reason that the member of that hon. member's party who sat on the standing committee supported unanimously with his colleagues the purchase of these helicopters in November 1990.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows full well that when that committee reported the cost of the helicopters was less than 40 per cent of what it is now, before the collapse and crash of the prototype.

In sum, the minister is telling us that the government has committed billions of dollars to buy helicopters it has yet to prove it can fly in a safe and reliable fashion from a company that is going bankrupt, without any protection for the Canadian taxpayer.

Can the minister tell us what guarantees the government has received on non-performance of this arrangement? In the name of honesty, fairness and good government, will the minister table the helicopter contract so there can be an appraisal of just what commitments are made and how the Canadian government can extract itself from the mess this minister has got us into?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has no basis on which to make the claims he is making.

With respect to the crash of the prototype helicopter, which is in fact not the model that is the subject of our contracts, I am more concerned about the more recent crash of one of our aging Sea Kings off Florida.

I think Canadians want a standard of safety in modern technology and do not wish to play politics with the safety of the men and women who serve in our Armed Forces.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the minister of defence.

The minister of defence and the government continue to ratchet up almost monthly the cost of these helicopters. Originally a number of years ago they were announced at $2 billion. That figure subsequently became $4.4 billion. They acknowledged a few weeks ago that it was $5.8 billion.

In the original news communiqué put out by the minister's predecessor the cost then announced at $4.4 billion included the helicopters, spare parts, technical manuals, training and administrative costs. Not included of course was the cost of arms for those helicopters and the cost of strengthening frigates.

I want the minister of defence, because surely she has those numbers at her fingertips, to tell this House, and through this House Canadians, what are the additional costs above known costs to bring these helicopters on stream, to prop up a bankrupt Italian firm and to waste taxpayers' money.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the numbers that have been used in this House by opposition members, are being used footloose and fancy-free. They are dreaming up numbers almost on a daily basis.

From the time of the announcement the price of these helicopters was $4.4 billion. It is $4.4 billion in today's dollars. It has been from the beginning and will be to the end.

The figure they have then used is what is used in every large contract which goes over 13 years, a figure which is in possible inflated dollars for contingencies in case there is inflation. They try to use that as if it is a different figure.

It is $4.4 billion in today's dollars and always has remained the same figure.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, that answer is as bankrupt as one of the partners in the joint venture building the helicopters.

I want to ask the minister of defence a question. It is not a supply and services question; it is a defence question. In the fact sheet put out by the minister's department on these helicopters, describing the equipment the helicopters use it describes two torpedoes per helicopter, 24 sonar buoys, smoke markers and so on. That equipment is not included in the press release put out by the department of defence outlining the cost of the helicopters. That is a fact.

What is the additional cost of strengthening 16 frigates? What is the additional cost of purchasing and supplying arms for the 35 helicopters that are deemed to be appropriate to be armed?

Mr. Minister you haven't told Canadians the full truth. Tell them now.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members on both sides of the House know that it has been our custom and tradition not to use the personal you, no matter how strong one feels about an exchange, and to put the questions through the Speaker.

I would just have to let all hon. members on both sides of the House know I am going to insist on it.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the very first time this issue was brought up I told the hon. member that the cost of the aeroplanes and the systems that were going into them was $1.4 billion plus $1.4 billion for $2.8 billions.

The other costs include the logistics, the spare parts and the other peripheral equipment that goes onto it rather than just the body of the aircraft itself and the systems going into it.

At that time I offered the hon. member, if he wanted, a briefing on this. As a matter of fact he did not go to the briefing until after it closed down. He was not there for the briefing. He was only there for questions that he posed afterward. Only one other member of his party was there for the briefing. He ignored it. He did not want to know the facts.

• (1425)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dick: We would be very happy for this to come up—

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, on your feet. That's a lie.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will retract that statement. The hon. member is not going to get away with that and he knows it.

Some hon. members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure all hon. members would understand that the position of the Speaker is not easy in a situation like this one.

It probably is best, as the hon. member is a very experienced member in this House and has been here for a long time, if perhaps the matter could be settled between myself and the hon. member. It does not need a lot of comment from everybody else.

Mr. Tobin: Out of respect for the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the comment directed at the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. I also thank other hon. members for accepting my suggestion that in a case like this it is best if it is settled by the Speaker and the member who is involved.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your intervention. This is in fact a very serious issue for all sides of the House. I did attend the briefing. Last fall I asked the associate minister for national defence and she acknowledged that these helicopters did not fit on the frigates and required millions of dollars worth of modification.

It has now been brought to my attention that there are even more serious design problems affecting the working relationship between the helicopters and the frigates, problems which go to the very fundamentals of this project and may require its cancellation.

My question for the minister is a very serious one. Has she been informed of any other design problems affecting the capability of the frigates if they have these helicopters attached to them and, if so, will she inform the House?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to inform the minister that tomorrow details of this will be made public.

Let me simply say that yesterday the minister said to the House that the whole project including the frigates and the helicopters should be reviewed. Those were her precise words. The minister inherited this project from previous ministers.

Will the minister who has gainfully defended this project now show some political courage and set up an independent review of this project and save the Canadian taxpayers billions of dollars in wasted money?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did not say I was going to take a review. I simply reminded hon. members that the shipboard helicopters are a completion of the frigate project and if one is going to talk about cutting them back then that has implications for the frigate project.

When I mentioned the possibility of reviewing that there were heads shaking on the other side of the House clearly not in support of that.

I might say that on taking over as Minister of National Defence of course I reviewed the policies to which we are committed. In reviewing the helicopter project I was much comforted by the support of the hon. member for Victoria who as a member of the standing committee was part of the consensus that supported replacing our Sea King helicopters with the EH-101, and I thank him for that advice.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I quote the minister from Hansard yesterday:

> I think this is something that we should review.

I may also make two points to the minister. First, the recommendation was not to purchase the EH-101s but was instead to replace the Sea Kings. The report did comment favourably on the EH-101s but times have changed since this report was filed. We on this side are prepared to cancel this agreement in light of the facts that are now in front of us.

Will the minister not face up to the new facts that are coming in daily on this helicopter and will she not agree that it is important to review this purchase and in fact to put it on hold?

• (1430)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would agree with the hon. member that times have changed since November 1990 after the fall of the Berlin wall and the end of the cold war. That hon. member gave his support to this particular project.

I would suggest that what has changed is less the question of the cold war than a more imminent contest which will probably be hotter and which I think is more the motivation of that hon. member's question.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Defence.

It is true that the situation has changed and that the Italian company in question is nearly bankrupt. It is also true that the prototype helicopter which she recommends had an accident that killed four people. Since this project was announced last year, the cost has risen not just by $2 billion but possibly by $4 billion now.

So I would like to ask the minister this: Since thousands of children in Canada have no food, would she be prepared to cancel this contract for the sake of Canadians?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what concerns me is the recent accident of one of our old Sea Kings. I am aware that the men and women serving in our Canadian forces need to be safe and not made to fly in old, unsafe helicopters.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, if the minister is interested in the women and men in the Armed Forces, why does she want to buy a helicopter of which a prototype had an accident that killed four people?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not the same prototype as our helicopter. I think it must be pointed out that many prototypes of helicopters and other aircraft in the world have accidents when they are being tested out. This is not a reason to cancel this contract.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Defence.

The minister now knows she was wrong yesterday when she told the House that she had not been made aware of outrageous sexist comments made by one of her senior officers. Given that the commandant of the National Defence Medical Centre obviously opposes the government's policy on equality for women in the Armed Forces as stated by the minister in the House yesterday, why has the minister not relieved Colonel G. D. McLean of his duties?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member has raised this question again. On inquiring about the very serious issue she raised, I was advised that the reason why I was not personally aware of it was that it had been resolved. The booth relating to pay equity in the Armed Forces was in fact put in place. The member of the Armed Forces who appeared not to understand the policy was dealt with through the appropriate channels.

That issue was resolved before the hon. member raised the question. I am sure she did not know it when she raised the question but I am sure she will be pleased to know there was a satisfactory resolution of it.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

While the minister is out campaigning she may believe that the issue has been satisfactorily resolved but if she would take off her blue coloured glasses for a moment she would know that jobs performed primarily by women in the Armed Forces are paid at a discriminatory rate compared to jobs performed primarily by men.

If the minister is taking no action concerning Colonel McLean's comments, what specific concrete action will she take today to end pay discrimination against women in her department?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that action has already been taken by the Government of Canada. It is the policy of the Government of Canada. It is the policy of the forces of Canada and it is the policy that is being applied in the Canadian Armed Forces.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

As the minister knows, the rail industry in Canada is in a crisis. CN is getting rid of its main line from Truro to Sydney. CP is getting out of Atlantic Canada altogether. The two rail companies have merged in the Ottawa valley and are now talking about a full merger east of Winnipeg. Last week CN announced 10,000 more jobs will be cut.

All of this is happening in the absence of any national plan by the federal government to determine what the rail infrastructure should look like.

My question for the Minister of Transport is this. Will he immediately assign a task force the responsibility of determining what the basic rail infrastructure should be? As part of that, will he impose a moratorium on any main line rail abandonments and any further job cuts until that plan is in place?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member certainly knows, because he was at the press conference this morning, that the NTA review commission has tabled its report. I officially tabled it in the House this morning.

As a result of the tabling of this report I indicated that it would be submitted to the standing committee of the House of Commons for examination and report. At the same time, the Ministry of Transport will be striking a work force to examine both the Royal Commission on passenger transportation and the report of this review commission.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Perhaps the minister should have listened to the question instead of reading the script he was given. I did not ask about the NTA review. I asked about the future of rail in this country. The best thing that the NTA review can come up with is more deregulation, giving the railroads more power to rip up tracks from one end of this country to another.

I want to put my question to the minister again. Will he impose a moratorium on any further main line rail abandonments? Will he impose a moratorium on the job cuts that CN and CP are conducting until we know what kind of rail system we need in this country?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is really interested in the future of the railway he should applaud that CN is being fiscally responsible and has as its objective to properly serve its customers. It has decided to rationalize itself.

The member should know, and I am telling him if he does not know, that the largest railway in the U.S. has a volume of about $5 billion a year and has 31,000 employees. CN has a volume of less than $3 billion and also has 31,000 employees. It is natural that CN wants to cut, rationalize and become more productive.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. The report of the National Transportation Act review commission also says that the railroads are in worse shape and risk facing a drastic situation by the end of the decade. The commission also adds in its report that the government should privatize Canadian National. The minister has had this report since January 30. CN employees have a right to know what is going on. Why did the government adopt the policy of privatizing CN Rail?

[English]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what this member's policy is and what the policy of his party is on this question. This morning, at his own press conference after the tabling of the NTA report, he said he and his party do not fundamentally and forever oppose privatization.

• (1440)

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister would try answering questions directly and honestly for a change and we might actually have a debate in this House.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think anybody would be too perplexed around here whether anyone on either side of the House wanted either a direct question or a direct response, but I think we can refrain from using the word "honestly" with the imputation that perhaps it is not being given honestly. The hon. member.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I will not use the reference to honest in connection with the minister.

The issue of airlines is also raised in the report. The minister has been saying for some time now that he intends to recalibrate, to use his jargon, the regulatory framework within which the airlines in Canada operate.

His commission's report has not given him any help on that. It is time for the minister to stop waiting for royal commissions, review committees, task forces, transport committees and start answering questions about how he is going to preserve competition on Canadian domestic air service routes in this country.

How is he going to do it? When is he going to do it? When is he going to take responsibility?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my honest answer is that the management of both airlines have recently testified in court that they know what their problem is. It is over-capacity.

If they know what the problem is, then they should attack it themselves. If they do not, then we will intervene.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The minister will note that in the report on the National Transportation Act the commission recommended the removal of regional development as one of the priorities of our national transportation system. He will also know that under great pressure his government was forced to include it in the original 1987 act.

Regional development is absolutely a key component in the transportation systems for all parts of the country. Yet not only when this recommendation came down, but when the royal commission recommendation came down, the minister remained absolutely silent.

Will the minister reassure the House and all Canadians that regional development will remain an effective component of our transportation policy?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the two commissions of inquiry, the Royal commission on passenger transportation and the National Transportation Act review commission, made similar recommendations. Both commissions have transportation experts who devoted a lot of effort to this question.

I think the member should be glad that we will give members an opportunity on the Standing Committee on Transport to examine these recommendations from experts and to provide the Minister of Transport with their own recommendations. At the same time, the Department of Transport will also do its homework to see what recommendations apply, which ones we should accept and which we should not.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplemental is for the same minister.

Some of the issues raised in this report are immediately and obviously incorrect. The one dealing with regional development affects not only cities like Winnipeg and Halifax, but Montreal, Quebec City and Baie Comeau. Regional development is key to these cities. By referring it to study and putting it on the back burner, the minister again puts the stability of these local economies at risk.

I ask again: Will the minister reassure the House that this government appreciates the importance of transportation in the regional economies of this country?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat again that these two commissions were composed of specialists in transportation industries. They have made recommendations for the short term, the medium term and the long term.

The hon. member should be very pleased that we are now going to ask members of Parliament to examine this in the Standing Committee on Transport and report to this House on a proper way to handle these recommendations.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works.

As the minister knows, since August 1989 Mr. Alan Scales has been chairman of the federal Crown corporation, Marine Atlantic, which operates the ferry service from Prince Edward Island to the mainland, a service that will be eliminated to pay for the fixed link.

• (1445)

Is the minister aware that Mr. Alan Scales' law firm has been associated with the proponent of the fixed link Strait Crossing Inc. since May of 1988 and that Mr. Scales has now joined in the Federal Court trial to support the Liberal Government of P.E.I. on the side of the fixed link?

What will the minister do about this textbook case of conflict of interest where during part of the day Mr. Scales wears a paediatrician's gown and the rest of the day wears an undertaker's hat?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, first I want to make sure that he is not the type of transvestite my hon. friend is suggesting. Second, I am going to check very carefully to see that the information he has given me is true and then I will make up my mind.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Transport and it is not about transvestites.

Will the minister explain to Canadians why as the Minister of Transport he employs Mr. Alan Scales as chairman of the federal Crown corporation Marine Atlantic when the same Mr. Alan Scales is before the Federal Court supporting the Liberal government of Prince Edward Island in its push to kill that same ferry service?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of these circumstances. I take notice and I will prepare an answer for the member.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The good news is that the Self-Employment Incentive Program is working very well in northern Nova Scotia, but the bad news is there is one area that is excluded. That is Colchester county.

Will the minister move to extend the application of SEI to Colchester county and give the people there the same opportunities that everybody else around Colchester has?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that under that option of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, I believe $6.9 million is allocated to Nova Scotia.

As the hon. member knows, because of his good work in his riding of Colchester that area is doing very well. There are other places in much greater need. Unfortunately the criteria is such that we have to take care of those parts of Nova Scotia having a greater need. We are piloting some projects in the Halifax region. I will check as to whether or not we could not pilot this good initiative in the member's riding.

TRADE

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. I believe that he is out for a few minutes, so I will direct it to the Minister of Finance.

The minister has said clearly on several occasions that he would begin negotiations about how to obtain additional guarantees for strengthening the North American Free Trade Agreement in the areas of the environment and labour standards. However, so far, he has refused to promise clearly that the main treaty will not be signed until these supplementary negotiations are concluded. This is extremely important and I believe that the people are entitled to know where the government stands on this question.

Can the minister finally tell us if he will make signing one agreement conditional on signing the other?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first let me say to my hon. friend that the government is quite satisfied that the NAFTA agreement itself is in the interests of Canada and should proceed.

In regard to a side agreement on the environment or labour, we were prepared to discuss these matters with the Americans as long ago as February of last year. I put forward proposals, for side agreements on labour and the environment with both the Americans and the Mexicans. These were turned down.

The Americans have now raised the point again. We are delighted to have an opportunity to put our case forward at this time.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, this is a good example of an indirect answer to a very direct question.

No one will understand the refusal of the minister to commit himself on such an important question for all Canadians, especially when President Clinton has just said in a recent speech delivered to an American university and I quote: "That agreement holds the potential to create many jobs in America over the next decade if"—and that is a big if—"it is joined with others to ensure that the environment, living standards, and working conditions are honoured".

• (1450)

Will we see the Americans withholding their signature while this government rushes to the table to sign the main treaty before the conclusion of the parallel agreements? Will this government undermine the American efforts to protect our own environment and our own jobs?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first of all, let me say to my hon. friend that the treaty has been signed. The NAFTA agreement was signed last December. It is now up to Parliament and the congresses in Mexico and the United States to pass it.

The Americans have made a statement that they will not pass this unless their Congress approves the side agreements. It has nothing to do with Canada and Mexico. We will participate in that negotiation as well in order to get the best possible terms on the environment and on labour standards.

I should also point out to my hon. friend that there is nothing in the NAFTA itself that allows any other country to impose lower environmental standards on Canada or another country. Indeed, the result of the agreement will be an improvement in the environmental standards in all three countries.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, General Motors has announced it is going to lay off an additional 8,675 workers by 1994. These are workers in Oshawa, Scarborough, St. Catharines and Windsor.

In light of these lay-offs I ask the industry minister exactly what conversations he has had with George Peapples, the president of General Motors Canada and exactly what he is going to do about it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I met with Mr. Peapples two and a half weeks ago.

We discussed this in the context of the over-all problems that General Motors is having on a world-wide basis. I expressed my deep concern about what is happening to General Motors Canada. He promised that he would take into account these concerns as these decisions are being made.

Let me just point out to my hon. friend that he is referring only to the lay-offs. He has not made any reference at all to the increase in truck production at the plant in Oshawa.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, if the minister wants to look at his record in terms of the auto industry, over the past four years Canada has lost 15 per cent of its auto jobs. The United States during the same period has lost only 8 per cent.

If the minister is so proud of his record, can he explain why under his stewardship Canada is losing auto jobs at twice the rate of the United States?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend would go back to 10 years ago and see the proportion of automotive production in Canada relative to our sales in Canada and compare that to the United States, he will see that the result has been a significant increase in jobs in the auto sector.

There has been a considerable increase in production so that today Canada has I believe 17.5 per cent or 18 per cent of the total production in the United States and Canada, compared to the size of the sales market which is about 9 per cent. That is a very good record.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, despite our recognition yesterday in this House of International Women's Day, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

There are three women in London, Ontario who are still waiting for this government to recognize gender persecution as a legitimate refugee claim. In fact, Mrs. Simret, Mrs. Sighed and Mrs. Bahlebi-Tedia are all single mothers fighting deportation to Ethiopia. In three days Mrs. Bahlebi and her son will be deported to a country where she was beaten publicly and persecuted. She has not lived there for over 17 years.

What will the minister and this government do to end the gender discrimination of refugees and introduce a consistent policy which will allow these women and others to stay in Canada?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will be pleased to know that today the chairperson of the Immigration and Refugee Board, Madam Mawani, has issued guidelines on gender-based persecution.

• (1455)

Members of the board will now assess the particular circumstances which have given rise to the claimant's fear of persecution. They will also assess the conditions in the country of origin before entering their decision.

These guidelines are intended to ensure a thorough and sensitive method in this difficult and complex matter. They will promote consistency across Canada and coherence in those decisions rendered on refugee claimants.

The hon. member will also want to know that in January I asked the department to start discussions and consultations with interested persons and groups across Canada so that as a country we can deal with this crucial and important question. That process will take place.

A former member of this House, Mr. Broadbent, has qualified this development as positive and I intend to pursue it.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in some circumstances the minister of immigration does not need any guidelines. He can glean advice from another government ministry.

A Russian woman in my riding, Irina Aoucheva, and her Canadian-born daughter face imminent deportation if the minister fails to intervene. While immigration officials say that Irina's claim of persecution is unfounded, experts at external affairs tell me that: "The situation is so confused in Russia that there are no guarantees for their safety one way or the other". In fact, while immigration officials go by the book, external affairs advises: "Russian law is not at the state where local authorities could prevent anything from happening to this woman".

Why is the minister refusing to accept this advice? Is he prepared to submit this woman and her Canadian born baby to persecution?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants Canadians to believe we are interested in sending people to be persecuted he has it completely wrong.

This government was the first to introduce in the Immigration Act the authority to require for every failed refugee claimant a case-by-case review where the person will not be deported if there is harsh or inhumane treatment awaiting that person in the country of origin.

These provisions have been introduced in the act which that hon. member voted against.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, last year the consumer and corporate affairs committee tabled a report on credit cards in Canada. The committee recommended that the government introduce legislation which would require standardized information disclosure by credit card companies.

Will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs review the committee's recommendation and work with his provincial counterparts to introduce this badly needed consumer legislation? Consumers then would be able to compare apples with apples.

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his question and for his continued interest in this matter.

We are considering the committee's recommendations and I can assure the hon. member we have already started discussing potential improvements with the provinces.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The minister will know that today the treasury bill rate has reduced by 23 bases points to 5.66 per cent. This is the lowest rate for a long time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blenkarn: Has the minister had any negotiations or conversations with the banks, bearing in mind that the prime rate is the rate on which business loans are judged, to see if he can get the bank rate or the prime rate down to 6 per cent and fuel our economy even faster than it presently is going?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for that question.

The rate today at 5.66 per cent is the same as it was on July 9, 1992. In so far as the prime rate is concerned, the hon. member will know that it is 6.25 per cent. It is 6 per cent in the United States. That is very narrow.

I think the hon. member knows that the banks have been leading and bringing down interest rates. The hon. member will be very encouraged to know that the spreads on short-term money are narrowing very dramatically. It is just over 2 per cent and that is a good sign as well.

MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance as well.

The government, without any consultation, has decided to slice $15 million from grants in lieu of taxes that the municipalities were to receive from the federal government.

Yesterday in committee finance officials admitted that they intend to do this in a completely high-handed fashion without any legislation coming before the House of Commons.

Why does the minister think that he can get away with attacking Canadian towns and cities that are going to be very badly hit by this move without even seeking parliamentary okay through legislation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are not attacking towns, villages and municipalities.

The fact is that where grants and contributions across the board have been cut by 10 per cent, in the case of the grants in lieu of taxes, we have frozen the grant at the $424 million level, the same as it was in 1992-93.

For the information of the hon. member, in 1988 that figure was $250 million. Since 1988 grants in lieu of taxes have doubled. In the last three years they have gone up by 30 per cent. All of us must tighten our belts, including the municipalities, the provinces and the federal government. As the hon. member knows, there is only one taxpayer.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and is along the same lines but not with respect to legislation.

I would like to ask about municipalities where the federal tax base is very significant, such as Oromocto in my riding, where CFB Gagetown is such a large part of the property tax base. What avenues for consultation and negotiation with his department are going to be made available to municipalities such as Oromocto to address these critical factors in their 1993-94 municipal budgets?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from my hon. colleague. He has been very concerned about his municipality, as have other members in the Chamber.

The Minister of Finance has indicated the necessity for re-evaluating the process for municipal grants in lieu of taxes because of the rapid escalation.

I have already had the opportunity to meet with the Federation of Canadian Municipalities on one occasion. I hope to meet with them again this week. We will be exploring ways to try to implement the freeze to which the Minister of Finance has referred in a fair way.

I would suggest to my colleague the best way that his municipality can try to meld itself into this approach is to work with the Federation of Canadian Municipalities as we try to come to some agreement.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a matter of personal privilege regarding comments made by the Minister of Supply and Services during Question Period.

It is my contention that the Minister of Supply and Services has sought to deliberately mislead members of the House and through the House, mislead members of the public with comments he has made suggesting, as he did during the Question Period to much agitation on this side of the House, notably from the member speaking, that I had passed up an opportunity to be briefed by DND on the subject of the EH-101 helicopter.

The minister began his comments by suggesting that I had missed entirely a briefing that was offered to me and to other members. Subsequently, and Hansard will show this, he altered those comments, as the agitation on this side of the House became extremely apparent, to suggest that I came late to the meeting. On the day in question, February 9, at 3.30 p.m., one-half hour after the end of Question Period, three members of Parliament from this side of the House took part in the briefing, the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, the member for Labrador, and myself, and three or four, I do not know the exact number, Liberal assistants.

It is true that I came into the briefing session, as the minister describes it, near the end of a slide show by DND officials. However I was there for all the questions, comments and discussion that took place between officials, parliamentarians and assistants. As well, I might point out that questions and answers were still ongoing. Notably, I was still putting questions and getting answers when the special assistant to the Minister of National Defence stood up and cut off the meeting.

With that knowledge, if the minister's comments that have been made in this House are deliberately misleading and deliberately assign motives to a member of this place, cast aspersions on a member of this place. If the minister is not aware of all the facts then I would seek that the minister would withdraw those comments.

It is my belief, generally speaking, that members should seek and should expect the protection of the Chair when such comments are made.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I assure you I will not take any longer than the hon. member. On the week leading up to Friday, February 5 both the Liberal and New Democratic Parties were offered briefings on the EH-101. On Friday, February 5 the Liberal Party did not show for the briefing between one and two o'clock or between three and four o'clock, but the New Democratic Party, represented by the hon. member for Victoria, showed up for its briefing between two o'clock and three o'clock.

A second scheduled meeting was put forward. It was attended by the briefing team of Colonel Ross; Colonel Daly; Ray Sturgeon, ADM materiel from national defence; Harvey Nielson, PMO-DND; Gary Sager, PMO-DSS; and Commodore Garnett. This was set up for 3.30 p.m. to 4.30 p.m. on Tuesday, February 9.

At 3.30 p.m. the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception and the hon. member for Labrador entered the room and were there for the briefing until 4.25 p.m., for 55 minutes. At 4.25 p.m. the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, who has presented this point of privilege, entered the room, 55 minutes later, at the conclusion of the slide show and the briefing. As I indicated in Question Period he was there for the questions and he did ask some questions but he missed the briefing.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. We are in the midst of a question of privilege. Does the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond have a point of order that might assist me?

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Chair heard point of order. I wish to add some facts with regard to the point of privilege raised by my colleague, in view of the fact that I am intricately involved in some of the facts which the minister has alluded to.

I am wondering if the Chair under the guise of fairness would give me an opportunity to present my intervention.

Mr. Speaker: Somebody said point of order and that is what I did hear. If the hon. member is speaking on this particular point of privilege I will most certainly hear him.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Supply and Services is correct in certain facts on this issue.

I know the Minister of Supply and Services to be an honourable minister and he will recall that on February 2 his colleague, the Minister of National Defence, was the lead minister who offered a briefing to members of Parliament on both sides of the House. On February 3 I instructed a member of my staff to make contact with the minister's office in the person of Mr. Kevin Phillips, who is the associate director of the Directorate of Parliamentary Affairs, to set up the briefing.

On February 5, as the House leader for the Official Opposition I sent a letter to the gentleman in question. I sent not only a letter but a fax as well.

On February 9, which the minister has referred to, at 3.30 in the afternoon, not only was my colleague who has raised the point of privilege present but my colleagues, the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception and the member for Labrador, were also present along with other Liberal assistants.

The hon. minister opposite shakes his head and says no. Was the minister there? No, the minister was not there. I want to make it perfectly clear so that the Minister of Supply and Services, who during Question Period made reference to my colleague and who I know is an honourable person, will stand in his place and admit that he referred to the hon. member in question as lying. That is the word he used, in fact he used it on two specific occasions.

In conclusion, with regard to the point my colleague has raised, the meeting which the minister has referred to has cast aspersions upon my colleague from Newfoundland. His activities as an active member of this House of Commons were cut short, not by members of the opposition but by the legislative assistant to the Minister of National Defence. I would hope, on the basis of fairness and of the title "honourable", that the minister opposite would stand in his place and apologize to this member and to members of this House.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, it is most appropriate that the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond would come to the defence of the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte. I can understand.

There is an error in one of his facts. He said that the hon. member was there at 3.30 p.m. Be that as it may, I have offered before in Question Period and I offer again, if they want to bring this up in the standing committee and go into all the details I would be more than delighted to do that and we can have all the officials there. If by some chance I overstated a case and made a reference which is unparliamentary because of the errors which all so often happen in stating of fact in this case by the members in question then I would certainly want to apologize to the House. I would not want to be unparliamentary. But they should get their facts right.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. minister could assist me a little bit and explain exactly whether the minister is withdrawing anything that he has said. I understand there is an apology for any error he may have made. I think I divined an apology if he did say what he has been accused of saying, but I want it absolutely clear on the record.

Mr. Dick: Absolutely, Mr. Speaker. I agree. If I said anything that was unparliamentary I withdraw it.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, as a spokesperson for the Official Opposition I wish to thank the hon. member opposite, who has made an unequivocal apology to my colleague in this House for his unparliamentary language.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps on behalf of all hon. members I can thank the minister and the hon. members for Cape Breton—East Richmond and Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In Oral Question Period, the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte asked the Minister of National Defence a question and he said this:

[English]

"Mr. Minister, you haven't told Canadians the full truth".

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I understand that accusing someone of not telling the truth is considered unparliamentary. I therefore ask the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte to withdraw what he said, if I heard it correctly, and apologize appropriately to the minister.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: In response to the hon. member's intervention, without presuming too far on the general customs here, the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte is not in the House at the moment. Perhaps we could come back to this matter at another appropriate moment.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise with you for your guidance comments that were made yesterday in committee with respect to testimony dealing with Bill C-113.

During testimony by officials from the Department of Finance with respect to that bill, which has the effect of freezing a number of different expenditures, I raised a question regarding the freeze to grants in lieu of taxation to municipalities and how that will be brought before the House of Commons for debate or discussion.

I was answered at that stage with the following comment: "There is no legislation either in the House or contemplated".

I raise with you the question of order, Mr. Speaker, and whether it is possible to arbitrarily change the legislation or a practice that has taken place under the Municipalities Act since the 1940s. Is it not necessary that some piece of legislation be brought—

Mr. Speaker: I listened very carefully to the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. I was not quite sure exactly what the point of order or the intervention might be leading to and I did not want to be under any misapprehension and I did not want to intervene too quickly.

However, the hon. member is really asking the Chair to make an interpretation on a situation relevant to past legislation and relevant to whether or not it is necessary to bring in any new legislation or amendments to legislation.

That is not a matter that the Chair can comment on. Even if it is a question or a point of order which is somewhat doubtful I do not think I can assist the hon. member any further.

It would be appropriate for the hon. member to pursue the matter at another time.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words concerning this piece of legislation at its final third reading and passage through the House.

The bill itself really will do nothing for Canada Post or mail service in Canada. It will do absolutely nothing. Who invented the legislation or who came up with the idea is unknown to members of the House. The substance of the legislation is to offer something to employees, who are not defined under the legislation, amounting to 10 per cent of the shares of the Canada Post Corporation.

The Government of Canada would of course retain 90 per cent of the shares of the corporation.

The reason we do not agree with this legislation is that we believe it is a waste of time for the Government of Canada and the House of Commons of Canada to be discussing this non-issue in this Chamber and be taking up the time and money of the people of Canada to perform a duty such as this when not even the unions representing the employees are in agreement with it. It does nothing for postal service in Canada. It does not improve the record of Canada Post, which is a very bad record as far as mail delivery is concerned, as far as lost mail is concerned and as far as the destruction of Canada Post and the post office in Canada is concerned.

We have gone from a corporation that had as its main objective the delivery of mail in Canada to a corporation that is now closing down post offices and that has reduced mail service in Canada. We have seen the introduction of so-called supermailboxes in a lot of the rural areas in Canada. We have seen the closing of our post offices that meant so much to people in our rural and urban areas of this country.

Perhaps the most important reason why we are opposed to this legislation is that it will really not do what it appears to be doing. I say that because the shares being offered to the employees—it is not defined and perhaps is meant to be management—will not be voting shares. The say in the corporation will not mean anything at all as far as the administration is concerned, as far as the day-to-day operations of the corporation are concerned or as far as anything is concerned. It will do nothing to lift the veil of secrecy surrounding the corporation.

What is the salary of the chief executive officer of Canada Post, for example? Nobody knows except the chief executive officer of Canada Post. Nobody else knows. Who else might know? The cabinet might know. A committee of the cabinet might know what his salary is. I would say it is somewhere in the order of about $380,000 per year. It is probably about that. The salaries of the chief executive officer, the chief operating officer and the people at the top in Canada Post, paid for from the taxpayers' pockets, have been substantially increased over the years. There has been a substantial increase from about 1987.

The salary jumped. As I recall, the CEO's salary was somewhere in the order of $180,000 per year in 1987—I could be wrong—give or take $50,000. As I mentioned, nobody knows what his salary is. It jumped by about $100,000 a year in about a year and a half and then it jumped again because the margins increased by that amount.

The people talked about in this legislation are the employees who are being given a share in the corporation. The employees of Canada Post are now being told they are going to have to lose their jobs in this and that post office. There are also the people of Canada who depend on the mail service. Neither one of these groups will have a say in the administration of the post office or in the salaries that are paid to the top people in Canada Post. They will not even know what they are. It is a secret. Only the cabinet knows.

How does the cabinet know? The cabinet knows because every year or so it sits down and examines the salary of the head of this corporation.

• (1525)

Mr. Dingwall: How much does he make?

Mr. Baker: The House leader for the Official Opposition asked the question: How much does he make? I suppose we could figure it out if we knew what his Christmas bonus was.

Mr. Dingwall: Is it a whole lot of money?

Mr. Baker: Is it a whole lot of money? Do we know what his Christmas bonus was?

Mr. Dingwall: He did not get a Christmas bonus.

Mr. Baker: Ho, ho, ho. Yes. He gets a Christmas bonus and it is approved by a committee of cabinet.

How much is that bonus? The cabinet sits down and gets a recommendation from the board of Canada Post that is appointed by cabinet that gauges how the head of this corporation behaved. These are the exact words: "If he met important corporate objectives he would be guaranteed 50 per cent of 25 per cent of his salary".

For example, say his salary is $400,000 a year. It is about that for the head of Canada Post. He makes more than maybe three cabinet ministers. He makes three times as much as the Prime Minister makes.

Mr. Bélair: Is it true, Gerry?

Mr. Baker: Oh yes. Oh yes. He makes three times as much as the Prime Minister of Canada makes by decision of the Government of Canada.

None of the people affected by this bill are going to have a say in how much he makes or how much the increase is going to be. They are not even going to have a say in what his bonus is.

Let me get back to the bonus because this is rather interesting. At the end of March, this month, a recommendation will go to the cabinet as to what the bonus will be for this financial year. Somewhere around December the cabinet meets and the Privy Council gives a list to the cabinet on certain specific bonuses to be given. One of them is the bonus for the head of the Canada Post Corporation and that decision will be made.

Remember I said that it is 50 per cent if he meets corporate objectives. What are the corporate objectives? The corporate objective as defined by the government is to cut costs.

An hon. member: Slash.

Mr. Baker: It is to make sure a post office is closed to save money. Make sure the post office is closed in Green Bay or Twillingate Island or in central Newfoundland somewhere or in northern Ontario or in New Brunswick to make sure that corporate objectives are met.

I am willing to guarantee that he gets more than that 50 per cent. How does he get that? The second objective that the head of Canada Post has is for all objectives to be met "with important objectives exceeded". That gives him 75 per cent of 25 per cent of his salary as a Christmas bonus. It is 75 per cent.

I am willing to bet that it is even higher than 75 per cent of 25 per cent of his salary. What does he do for that? I will say what he has done. It says that "all objectives met, some substantially exceeded" equals 100 per cent of the hoard.

An hon. member: Shame.

An hon. member: Unbelievable.

Mr. Baker: How much is 25 per cent of $400,000 a year?

An hon. member: It is $100,000.

Mr. Baker: It is $100,000 to the executive officer of Canada Post, for what?

Mr. Arseneault: For closing post offices.

Mr. Bélair: For firing people.

Mr. Baker: Right. These bonuses are of course nothing short of pay-offs for lay-offs.

• (1530)

That is what has happened with the closure of post offices. You will note there is no category at all for below 50 per cent of the 25 per cent of a salary as a Christmas bonus. There is no 40 per cent. There is no 30 per cent. There is no 20 per cent. There is no 1 per cent. It starts at 50 per cent.

He gets 50 per cent of 25 per cent of his salary as a Christmas bonus. He makes three times as much as the Prime Minister of Canada. Nobody covered by this bill passing the House now is going to have a say in what his bonus is.

Nobody covered by this bill has a say on how well the corporation does. The reason for that is the corporate objectives defined to establish how much his Christmas bonus will be are established by the Government of Canada. It is the Government of Canada that decides what the guidelines will be.

Why is this bill passing the House? This bill passing the House will not increase the efficiency of the post office. It will not cause post offices to be reopened. It will not have anything to do at all with the administration of the post office. What it has to do with is an idea that the Government of Canada has that it is just going to deflect the entire issue, while its members sit down at the end of this month and say no to the employees and yes to another bonus for the chief executive officers of Canada Post Corporation. They get more in the form of a bonus than some of our highest paid Canadians do as a wage for an entire year.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, it is a tough act to follow my colleague. He has certainly put the case before us in good form with some good statistics.

When we look at the purpose of the bill, we find that the bill, as many speakers have already alluded to, will permit the sale of up to 10 per cent of Canada Post Corporation to employees. This would be accomplished by establishing an employee share savings plan.

In my mind this is yet another step toward the continued privatization of Canada Post. I must add that I am opposed to that move. I was always opposed to it and I am still opposed to it. This process has to stop.

This process is pretty obvious when we look at the policies of Canada Post. The main objective in this attempt to privatize Canada Post is to close down more than 5,000 rural post offices. Most Canadians object to this policy, and so do I. As far as my riding is concerned, it has just been announced that the post office in Pointe-Verte will be closed. I strenuously object. The mayor, council and people of Pointe-Verte also object. Regional mayors and councils object as well.

I want to take this opportunity to quote from some of the letters I received about these closings. I have here a letter addressed to Martha M. Peters, Manager, Atlantic Division, Canada Post Corporation, and I quote—

• (1535)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. The Chair is willing to be lenient with respect to relevance, but I may remind him that the bill is not necessarily about this particular matter. In any case, I suggest the hon. member be brief if he wishes to touch on these aspects.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, in my speech I said that the purpose of Bill C-73 is to privatize Canada Post. I want to say at this point that the process has already started as post offices are being closed down. I will quote some examples to show that most Canadians across this country are opposed to these closings. With your leave, Mr. Speaker, I will quote passages from various letters.

The first letter reads as follows: "The Pointe-Verte post office plays an important role in the socio-economic development of our rural community, and considering the increasing use of postal services by the people of Pointe-Verte, we believe that Canada Post should immediately take the necessary steps to maintain the quality of the service provided". The letter is signed by His Worship Mayor Maxime Lejeune.

I have some more letters from residents of the Restigouche—Chaleur area who are also opposed to this policy and who support the mayor of Pointe-Verte. I have here a letter from Her Worship Mayor Jacqueline LeBlanc of Petit-Rocher, which reads as follows: "The municipal council of Petit-Rocher herewith supports the representations made by the municipality of Pointe-Verte to your corporation, requesting that the community's post office remain open". People object to these closings and they object to the privatization of Canada Post. I think there is a clear connection here with Bill C-73.

Mrs. LeBlanc goes on to say: "You must realize that the federal government is using your corporation to destroy the social fabric of a Canada that, lest we forget, consists mainly of rural areas which are the breadbasket of this country".

I have some more letters, including one from the Save the Pointe-Verte Post Office Committee signed by Yvon Arseneau, which appeared in several newspapers across the province, and I quote: "It would seem that in its assessment of the situation in Pointe-Verte, Canada Post failed to consider all the implications. I think this policy of closing down post offices should be reviewed".

[English]

To continue what I was saying, I believe this bill has the intent of continuing the process of privatizing Canada Post. I believe the process has already started in the attempt to close over 5,000 post offices across Canada.

These 5,000 post offices, if we put it in terms of personnel, would mean 10,000 lay-offs. It would mean lay-offs to 10,000 people, of which 83 per cent would be women in rural areas. You know how hard and how difficult it is to find employment in rural areas.

I would also like to point out that when we look at this bill and we talk about privatization, the intent of Bill C-73 is to allow the employees to buy shares. This buying of shares is supposed to improve the service. We have many complaints in our area about Canada Post and about improved service. It is about time that we air those complaints here in this public forum in the so-called highest court of the land. It is important that we put it in proper perspective. I have been listening today to many members talk about their own communities. It is important that everyone across the country realize that problems exist throughout Canada with regard to Canada Post.

In my home town of Dalhousie I have been working on a file for some time now concerning problems associated with twin street mailboxes. It is not a matter of dealing with people who are not understanding, it is a matter of dealing with a corporation that has no feeling and that does not exhibit any common sense.

We have asked the corporation to move those twin mailboxes inside. The answer has been no. We have a little bit of inclement weather in northern New Brunswick so we have asked for protective coverings. The answer has been no. We have asked for outside lighting for the people who come at night to pick up or post their mail. The answer has been no. We have asked for larger print for senior citizens and people who have impaired vision so that they could see the postal codes because mail has to be placed in one box or the other. In light of misdirected mail and the costs associated with that I think it would be a logical idea.

We now hear that Canada Post wants to reduce hours at the Dalhousie post office and ultimately probably try to close on Saturday. We know that it has attempted to reduce hours at Nash Creek. This is going on in my riding.

I heard the member for Cochrane—Superior earlier today refer to his riding. His riding is very similar to mine, a rural setting. We have a couple of urban centres. The city of Campbellton was a sorting centre for Canada Post. It still is a sorting centre but has been reduced somewhat in that capacity. I do not think that is fair. I do not think it makes common sense that mail has to go to another region to be sorted and then come back into the region. It does not make sense.

There have been numerous requests by myself and citizens throughout the riding to have more mailboxes added at post offices and in various communities. The answer has been, wait a little longer. We have no money. The boxes are under production. There is no room at the post office. However, Canada Post still wants to close the post office. It does not make sense to have five families sharing one postal box.

I can go on with different cases. In fact I have one I have to share which is sort of unbelievable. An 80-year old woman received her mail on a rural route and had her post office box at the end of her lane. A car clipped the box off two falls ago just before winter set in, so she could not have the box replaced. She picked up her mail at her neighbour's rural box. When springtime came, she had a carpenter or someone come in and reinstall the box. Canada Post refused to put her mail in her box. She was told to continue to get her mail at her neighbours. This was months and months of hardship for that elderly woman. We worked on the case. I must give Canada Post credit. It finally saw the light and came through at the end, but why put an 80 year old woman through that? It does not make sense.

This bill is not going to do anything to improve the situation. It is not making Canada Post any more efficient. It is still going to continue to close post offices. It is still going to have its labour problems. When we talk about labour problems, when you look at the number of grievances that the unions have with Canada Post, there is something wrong somewhere.

Canada Post likes to say it is all the union's fault. I would like to say that some of the blame should fall on the union but after looking at some of the evidence that I have seen the majority of the blame should fall on Canada Post and its objectives and the manner in which it wants to reach those objectives.

Canada Post has some very loyal, dedicated and efficient employees but their morale is decreasing because of the constant attacks by Canada Post.

In the eyes of Canada Post Canadians are number two and that is the problem. We should be number one. Canadians are number two and big business corporations, their tactics and their profits, are number one on its list. That is a shame. It does not go in stride with the Canadian mentality, with Canadian history or with Canadian tradition.

The minister has claimed this bill will improve employer–employee relations. I say that is hogwash. That is wrong. The unions have indicated it will not. They have indicated they are opposed to this bill. To put it bluntly I trust the union members more than I would trust the managers at the upper levels of Canada Post. I can honestly say that in dealing with the employees out in the trenches, in dealing with persons in areas of responsibility in the regions, they are responsible and reasonable. However their hands are tied by upper level management, wherever it is. That is a shame.

I would like to conclude by simply saying that I am opposed to this bill. It has no meaning. It means nothing. There is no rhyme nor reason to it. Buying shares and not being able to vote does not make sense in the long run.

I am also opposed to the general philosophy of Canada Post and the direction it is going in. I would hope that other members who have from time to time spoken on Canada Post issues and have opposed closures of their post offices will support their colleagues who are going to vote against this bill.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I was asked to speak for 10 minutes on this particular bill, but the events of the day have taken me to speak double that time. Actually I am quite happy to have my time extended. It prompted me to call around the community and find out just exactly what the status was. It is not that I did not know before, but some gruesome details were brought forward today and I welcome the opportunity to raise them.

All members want to highlight their own constituencies and talk about the problems they may have in a particular area. One that has certainly bedevilled me in the four years and four months I have served in this position is Canada Post, the post office workers and the customers. I can safely say after finding out today what is going on that we have reached the zenith of dissatisfaction with Canada Post.

Before you rule me out of order, Mr. Speaker, I want to address Bill C-73 specifically. It suggests the employees will be able to voluntarily buy up to 10 per cent of the shares of Canada Post. Most of the employees in Canada Post are eager to get a buy-out, not a buy-in. The morale is that bad. The harassment of workers is that bad.

It is difficult for us to appreciate the fact that many of us enjoy some freedom in our jobs. Some of us enjoy a great deal of freedom; others have very little freedom. I do not know if I could handle an occupation that measures the number of steps I take in a day. If I take 10 steps too many or 10 steps too few my route might be changed and that has an impact on all of the mail carriers. What kind of flexibility does an employee have working for Canada Post?

I suspect that very few will be buying into the company. You do not buy into a company that obviously is looking to sell out to other people. Bill C-73 no doubt is addressing the beginning of privatization of Canada Post. It has been quoted to me: "There is no doubt we want to sell it but we have to make it very profitable first". That is the bottom line. If it is profitable then it can be sold, but at this point in time it is creating a great deal of problems. In the name of efficiency, in the name of better service, it is going in the opposite direction. What I have uncovered today certainly proves to me and to the residents of my community that it is absolutely true.

Once in a while we have the business community on one side, the residents on another and the unions on yet another side perhaps. In this one everyone agrees that the system has deteriorated. The saga of Canada Post is a sad one.

I remember four years ago. I was new on the job. I fell for it. Canada Post approached me and said it wanted to build a new post office for Sault Ste. Marie. I thought that was great. I talked it over and we found it was reasonably good. It was going to invest $5 million on the outskirts of the community. It would impact on some workers but over-all it looked like an investment in the community.

I foolishly went forward and made the announcement in front of the old post office, a landmark in our community. I said that Canada Post had chosen to invest $5 million in our community. It would improve efficiency. Everything would be better for all of us and it would still maintain the great heritage structure.

I made that announcement for Canada Post, like a fool, like a gullible dolt. I did it. Two months later, much to my embarrassment—it did not seem to bother Canada Post—it said it was sorry but it had changed its mind.

That is good corporate planning. It was going to invest $5 million but two months later the plan was changed. I then asked what the plan would be. A new facility would not be built; the old facility would be renovated. I thought that did not sound bad and asked what exactly would be done.

We went to the site. I was advised that $0.75 million or whatever would be invested to improve the docking bays. Once again I was hesitant but asked if the office downtown would be maintained. Great, it would still be there. It would still be the focal point of our community, as the post office is in so many communities across this country. I was told that things were not going to change. It would be business as usual but we would have a better facility.

This time at least I did not make the announcement. I did not fall for it. Canada Post made the announcement. There was a certain amount of apprehension on behalf of the workers but it looked good.

The saga continues. The building is renovated and rehabilitated. However, what is happening is that Canada Post in its corporate decision making felt it had to centralize the mail. It had to be shipped off a couple of hundred miles to Sudbury. It had to centralize in the name of efficiency, but if efficiency were improved some Canada Post employees would have to be laid off.

Nobody likes that and certainly we did not accept the fact that Sudbury was going to sort our mail. What is wrong with Sault Ste. Marie? We have always sorted it. We have the capacity. Canada Post had invested in new machines in Sudbury and they would have to be used. Canada Post proceeded to do this.

Now we find out that Monday to Thursday all our mail is put in one particular mailbox if it is being mailed in Sault Ste. Marie and another one if it is going out of town. If a letter is mailed on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday in Sault Ste. Marie to a resident of Sault Ste. Marie it will not be sorted in that community. It has to go away. It goes 200 miles to Sudbury and comes back to Sault Ste. Marie.

It is not the same on the weekends. It cannot be sent to Sudbury. It is sent to Ottawa to be sorted. It is shipped off to Ottawa. The crux and climax of the story, the tragedy is that complaints are coming in daily that it is taking four or five days to deliver mail within the community and up to a week if you are mailing outside the community.

People always use letters. I have a letter from someone who mailed a birthday card to their grandson in Wawa which is 140 miles north. He got it after his birthday. He got it 10 days later.

The business community in my riding is upset. I will read what they say: "If a letter is mailed from Sault Ste. Marie on a weekend it goes to Ottawa to be cancelled. So if a letter is to be sent to an address in Sault Ste. Marie it goes from Sault Ste. Marie to Ottawa to Sault Ste. Marie on a weekend. On other days it goes from Sault Ste. Marie to Sudbury to Sault Ste. Marie. The bottom line is if a letter has to go one mile away within the community it may have to go 900 miles to get there". Now is that efficient? It is not efficient, absolutely not.

The minister said on May 1, 1992: "It is a proven vehicle for improving morale if we allow people to buy shares in the company". I am a great proponent of employee shares, of employee ownership, employee buy–out. I introduced a bill and the government killed it. Government members should know it is not a good idea. The minister on the one hand says it is a good idea if Canada Post employees buy it, but on the other hand it is not a good idea if another industry buys it. That is because it is not at the government's behest, its request, its demand or its suggestion.

The saga continues and it gets worse, believe it or not. Canada Post officials came to Sault Ste. Marie and said they had a new deal for us: pilot projects. My community was one of the lucky ones in Canada. I had been tricked before but I listened. I am a good guy, I always listen.

They said Canada Post was now going to become a corporate citizen. It was going to sponsor events in our community. That would make everybody happy and everybody would love Canada Post. It sounded good and I asked what else was going to happen.

They said there was a new commercial outlet system, but our post office would have to be downgraded. If we wanted to buy stamps at the main post office we would have to buy $300 worth. That is a lot of stamps. Not a lot of people buy $300 worth of stamps. We asked where we were going to buy our stamps. We were told that outlets would be put all over the place and that this would be better for us and for business. Canada Post would have sales people go out. It was going to commercialize and privatize it. They would go out and sell stamps to all the businesses.

That did not sound all that great to me. Well, certainly it did not. Within one month that commercial enterprise is now dead. I did not find out until today that it is dead. The proponents told me just a month ago that this would be a raving success. We have not heard from the proponents, the workers told me. It was the workers who asked whether I knew that this was now gone.

I was not fooled this time. I was not fooled, but once again Canada Post has struck a death–knell in the community as far as postal services are concerned. I suppose we are one of the luckier ones as at least we have post offices. We are an urban centre of some size with 80,000 people. I pity those rural towns and villages across this country that have no post office at all. I guess this government will suggest that maybe pony express will be back. The mail will be delivered by horse.

It is criminal and this bill is disguising something else. It does nothing at all. We should not even be discussing it in the House because it is inconsequential. It is a masquerade.

Getting into efficiency, Canada Post has a good media relations group, great government liaison people. They were very upset with some of the people in Sault Ste. Marie who questioned some of their motives. Now they are lecturing to people in a letter to the editor. They said: "You people have to smarten up. Just because you are delivered a letter to your house at the wrong address, do not expect us to re-mail it for you. The onus should be on you. If it is delivered to your house incorrectly, put another stamp on it, even if it is not your letter".

The national media relations from Canada Post came down on the community and said that Canada Post must provide all customers with efficient and reliable delivery of their mail. To do so, Canada Post must have the correct address. The correct address is provided by the sender. It is also the responsibility of individuals to ensure their new address is communicated to all correspondents.

It is not only a question of saving money but of efficiency. Every time a piece of mail is returned into the system that piece of mail is delayed. Proper addressing is essential to the reliability and speed of mail delivery. These are wonderful words, but the system in place is obviously failing. They say every time it goes into the system yet again it is more costly. Whatever is mailed in Sault Ste. Marie goes to Ottawa and it takes seven days or ten days for it to get back to Sault Ste. Marie. That is not efficiency. It is not working.

We always create the wrong villains in society. I admit it. People say to me that mail carriers make too much money and that one does not need a Ph.D. to deliver mail. They are very hard on these people. I do not know who has made villains of those people. I do not want to point fingers. It is unfair, totally unfair.

When the number of steps one takes in a job is measured it is an indication of the sense of responsibility or the sense of pride in working for any corporation, in this case Canada Post. Morale is nil. It is below zero. Many speakers have pointed out the number of grievances, that there are more grievances than the numbers of employees, and they are never settled. They go on for years and years.

During that very acrimonious strike a while back emotions were high and some of our folks got excited and had every reason to get excited. There were charges laid against some of the employees of Canada Post. To the people who were laying the charge the police said: "Look, we are prepared to drop this. Just let these people go. It was in the height of emotion during a labour dispute. Let's forget it. Let's go on to a positive employer-employee feeling". Canada Post said: "No. We do not care who says let's forget it. We want to process the charges. Continue with the charges against these people".

In the meantime it affects their vacation. It affects their retirement. It affects their lives. Obviously in this situation they were guilty before they had a chance of proving any kind of innocence.

Certainly the mail service in our community is up in the air. I suspect that Sault Ste. Marie is only a microcosm of what is going on right across this country. There is complete and absolute dissatisfaction with the system, with the idea that the faster we can be profitable the faster we will be able to sell it off and the sooner the government will have it out of its hands the better off we will all be.

I am mindful of transportation and mail delivery in the isolated areas. More and more the sense of isolation is setting in. When people are paying $700 for a return trip to Ottawa and $560 for a return trip to Toronto, we can imagine what kinds of demands that makes on people. They have to fly. Heaven forbid, they can fly to Europe. They can fly to Asia just about as cheaply as they can fly from Sault Ste. Marie to Toronto or to Ottawa. That sense of alienation of the regions is growing and Canada Post is a classic example of that alienation.

We will be opposing Bill C-73 with as much vigour as we possibly can.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I pose a question to my colleague about the morale issue he mentioned.

The government has said that one of the reasons it wants to proceed with this bill is that it wants employees to have more of a stake in the post office corporation. It feels that if they owned some shares they would feel more proud of it and would be able to contribute more.

• (1605)

We have one of the last remaining large postal services sorting plant in Surrey North. Unfortunately we have been informed that it is to be closed and transferred to downtown Vancouver, to the riding of the minister of defence, as she evidently needs propping up. Two services are being closed and moved into the riding of the minister of defence against the recommendation of the GVRD, the city of Vancouver and surrounding municipalities. Evidently the polls are not too good for her.

That facility is a large postal sorting service. It is also one of the major depots for mail delivery. At least two or three times a month its employees get in touch with me complaining about personnel practices and harassment by arbitrarily reassigning work, harassment by arbitrarily upping the work loads or changing the routes on postal walks, and harassment of employees who are ill such as phoning their homes two or three times a day. Even after they have filed letters from psychiatrists saying that part of the problem is that they are under mental health stress and are having psychiatric problems but they are being phoned repeatedly and threatened that the documentation with respect to their illness is not proper and that their jobs are in jeopardy.

Attempts to resolve any of these issues are stonewalled. Grievances are filed are never dealt with. The union attempts to intervene to resolve some of these issues and they never happen. Employees are given assurances that this is going to take place and it does not take place.

In view of these facts there has been, at least in the postal services I am aware of, a deterioration in the morale of employees. Of course along with a deterioration in morale there is an increasing lack of communication between management and the employees. With the breakdown in communication there is increasing animosity.

The member has obviously had considerable experience with the post office in his area. Does he feel that the share concept is actually going to assist in improving the morale of the postal workers, or does he think better management practices would be more to the point?

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, once in a while I am sure we are accused of exaggerating to make a point. However on this particular issue there is no exaggeration. What the member for Surrey North has said is absolutely true. I have shared those experiences. I think other members in the House right now would say the same has happened to them.

The morale is negligible. It is not a pretty picture. We have created villains of a group that is not guilty of anything. Many people regard them as malcontents and say they act inappropriately, do the wrong things and should be thankful for having wonderful jobs. The working environment at Canada Post is horrendous. There is no trust.

The hon. member talked about arbitrary reassessment. That is what it is, totally arbitrary. When people are ill they cannot have normal sick days; there is harassment. What is the goal in that? I am not sure. One has to wonder. What is the goal? Is it to make them sufficiently unhappy in the work environment that it is easier to reduce the number of staff?

I had a individual come into my office and say that he wanted out. I said: "You are only 45 years old", and he said: "I do not care. Whatever they offer me I am getting out because my mental health will not survive what they are putting me through".

• (1610)

These are true stories. Everything that is said is the absolute truth.

An hon. member: They will not get UI.

Mr. Butland: They very likely will not get any UI because of leaving their positions. I hope that is straightened out. It is a matter of trust. There is absolutely no trust between the employer and the employee. I have learned as well to completely mistrust Canada Post Corporation and its spokespeople.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, listening to this debate today has been an education for me. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie and other members have spoken in the House today about Canada Post and the experiences they have had in their particular ridings. I have certainly had similar experiences.

For a government and for a corporation that are trying to endear themselves to the Canadian public they are certainly not doing a very good job. The stories recounted by the member for Sault Ste. Marie are reminiscent of stories taking place in my own riding.

It is true that there is no trust between the employer and the employee. There is no trust between Canada Post and the public. There is no trust between the government and the public. Much of this has to be blamed directly on the government and, through its directions, directly on Canada Post.

The bill before us now contains the idea of sharing the wealth with Canada Post employees. It is nothing more than a smoke-screen for the proposal to privatize Canada Post. It is part of the slippery slope of privatization. For those people who do not believe Canada Post is to be privatized I simply want to cite a couple of quotes.

On May 1, 1992 an article in The Ottawa Citizen contained the following quote of the minister responsible for Canada Post: "Harvie Andre insisted that immediate privatization is not in the cards". He went on to state: "If I had to bet I would bet that in the next couple of decades you will see post offices being privatized all over the world. I would not mind seeing Canada first".

That is quite a statement. When the government makes that kind of statement we can rest assured that privatization is just down the road. After all, let us remember the words of the Prime Minister in 1985 when he stated: "Some people want to buy the CBC. The CBC is not for sale. Air Canada is not for sale". Air Canada was for sale. It has been sold. It is now a private company.

The bill today is simply one more step along the way toward privatization. It is a thinly veiled sham that the government is trying to put before us to hide privatization. In fact the minister responsible is really not hiding it at all. I remember the minister commenting a year or so ago that until we could get rid of more rural post offices, until we could get rid of more corporate post offices and until we could raise the profits of Canada Post there would be no privatization. Those were amazing statements.

The bill in front of us is supposed to help with employee relations. What will it do? It will allow the employees of Canada Post to buy 10 per cent of the shares of the corporation. Employees are not defined. We do not know exactly who the employees are. We do not know whether it is simply management or whether it is everyone right down to the person just hired yesterday. As well there is no indication of what kind of shares the employees will have once they get them. We do know they will not be voting shares.

If a government is supposed to have confidence in its employees and is to sell them 10 per cent of the shares then we would think they would be given voting rights with those shares. It is only 10 per cent, but no, they will be non-voting shares. Will they get dividends from these shares? There is no indication as to whether they will or not.

The fact is that Canada Post has made a profit for three of the last four years. If one is a shareholder in the corporation, then one expects to get some dividends, but no, there is no indication of that. Chances are, if I was to make a guess, there will be no dividends from those shares.

Canada Post and the government did not even consult with the union as to the sale of these shares. There was no discussion or consultation. There was just an arbitrary decision to sell these shares.

If Canada Post and the government wanted to see relations improved with these employees then something should be done about the grievances that exist in Canada Post. I was amazed, as were members in my caucus, to discover the number of grievances that exist in Canada Post. People in Canada might think maybe there would be 1,000 or 2,000 grievances. No, there are more than that. There are more than 10,000 grievances. Are there 20,000 or 40,000? No. There are only 50,000 employees in the whole corporation, but there are more than that many grievances. Double it. There are 100,000 grievances outstanding against Canada Post. That is almost two grievances for every employee who works for Canada Post. It is unbelievable. Those grievances are backed up for years.

If Canada Post wants to improve relations with employees, then why does it not start to look at some of the grievances and start removing some of the reasons for those grievances in the first place? There cannot be 100,000 grievances that have no merit. I doubt it very much. I am sure there are some grievances that do not have as much merit as others, but there cannot be 100,000 grievances against Canada Post that have no merit.

This idea of improving employee relations is simply nonsense. It simply makes it that much easier for the government to privatize Canada Post when the time arrives.

In talking about relations with the public, I think it was last year when Canada Post had a strike. Canada Post employees offered that during the strike they would still deliver unemployment insurance cheques, Canada pension cheques and so on, but no, the government would not allow that. What it did was to spend millions of dollars to set up these depots. We had the case of seniors and disabled people being forced to stand for up to two hours in sweltering heat waiting to receive a cheque at a depot. In many instances when they got to the front of the line they were told: "Sorry, the cheque is not here so come back tomorrow". That does not endear Canada Post to the public.

My riding of Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, like other ridings across the country, is largely rural. We have had a number of rural post office closings. In fact, in the last five years across this country, 25 per cent of all the post offices that existed prior to that time have now been closed. That is one in four.

Many times these post offices were closed not because there was a need to close the post office or because the post office was not being used, but simply because the post office had been provided with what they call a natural opportunity. This means that either the postmaster or postmistress had died or retired or something of that nature.

When these events occur, Canada Post will roll into town and have a public meeting. It will tell the people at the meeting that it is here to improve their service. I have been to a number of them in my own riding. It is going to improve the service. When the people in the community say that they are happy with their service, then Canada Post simply says: "No, we have to close the post office, but we are going to improve your service".

What happens is that they tell them that they are going to consult with them. There is no real consultation. The only consultation is that they have the opportunity of setting up a retail postal outlet which means a post office being placed in a store somewhere or they are going to have mailboxes and that is their choice.

In my riding the communities have naively thought that they could deal with Canada Post and work with it. I know of one situation in my riding where the people in the community said: "Look, we will give you a free building. We will buy the building and give it to Canada Post. Canada Post can keep the building as long as it operates a corporate post office out of it". There was no deal.

We had another situation where people in another community said: "Look, we will give you one of the staff people from our town hall who can work with Canada Post when it is busy". There was no deal.

We have had situations where people in the communities have said: "Look, we will take less service. Cut the hours down and cut the number of days down". There was no deal.

Yet Canada Post will tell these communities that the reason it is closing its post offices is because it is not making money. It will not tell you how much that community brings in. It will not tell you how much the post office in that community costs, but it will say that it has to close it.

I know that Canada Post wants to make a profit. Let us say it said: "Look, we have to make a profit and we would like to keep this post office open and we would like to provide the best service we can so here is what the bottom line is in this community. It brings in x thousands of dollars and it costs x thousands of dollars". One would find a lot of communities willing to work with Canada Post.

We know we are in debt in this country. We know we have an annual deficit that has not dropped in the last nine years or perhaps it marginally dropped in the last nine years. The people in the community will say: "Let's work with Canada Post to help Canada Post provide a service". That is fair but Canada Post will not give any details.

This idea of saying that it wants to provide a better service is a myth. In fact it is a lie. It is not true. The fact is that Canada Post wants to privatize as many corporate post offices as it can in this country and in doing so make it easier to eventually sell that corporation.

I want to talk a bit about the city of Moose Jaw. In the city of Moose Jaw—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. government House leader.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for interrupting the hon. member. I just wanted to formally designate tomorrow as an allotted day or supply day.

Mr. Laporte: I thought the minister was going to rise and tell me that things would not change in Moose Jaw and that the post office would remain. I am disappointed.

I wanted to comment about the city of Moose Jaw. In the city of Moose Jaw we have our corporate post office. It is viable and it is running. However we have been advised, not by the officials at Canada Post but by other people who have found out information and let us know, that the post office in Moose Jaw is going to close and the wicket service will be gone. We have not heard that announcement yet. If one calls the public relations people at Canada Post they will deny it. They will say that there has been no decision made yet. However, that is nonsense because the decision has been made.

The fact is that not only is Canada Post going to close the corporate post office but it is going to close all the sub-post offices that exist in Moose Jaw. One of them has existed in Moose Jaw since 1928 and it is going to be closed. Where is it going to go? It is going to set up four retail postal outlets in the city of Moose Jaw. This has not been announced publicly yet but that is what the plan is. Where are they going to go? They are going to go to places like Shoppers Drug Mart and Bi-Rite Drugs. I have nothing against Shoppers Drug Mart and Bi-Rite Drugs except that I find it strange that these retail postal outlets find their way into these national chains.

An hon. member: National or international?

Mr. Laporte: In many cases they are international chains. The fact is that some of these sub-post offices have long been in business. One in particular has been there since 1928. It is in Carr's Confectionery in Moose Jaw. Mr. Carr opened a confectionery business in the early twenties and worked hard at that business. His son has taken it over and his son is now running that confectionery.

• (1625)

These are people who live in the community, who contribute to the community and whose children go to school in the community. These people put a lot of hours into their work and they put that money back into the community. It is a small business, a good small business, and it provides a good service.

It is denying those small businesses a chance for a post office. It is already a sub-post office but it is going to franchise them all. It is going to deny those small businesses a chance for the franchise and give it to a national or international chain.

This is a government that is supposed to be for small business. This certainly does not bode well for small business. If a government wants to assist small business then this is not the way it should go about doing it.

I find it ironic. I must say I find it insulting that when one phones up Regina and talks to the Canada Post folks they say there have been no decisions made yet. No decisions have been made yet, but the ripples are there. I have talked to people who own the sub-post offices. I have talked to some of the union people. I have even talked to people in Canada Post who will talk to me and who have told me privately that this is what is happening.

If Canada Post really wants to improve its relationship with the employees of the corporation and with the people of this country then it had better take a new attitude.

First of all, it should be honest with Canadians. If it is going to privatize the corporation then it should come out and say that the objective is to privatize this corporation and this is the plan for privatization. Let the people know what is going on. Do not give these stories that are totally unbelievable.

In fact when Canada Post is confronted with the facts, it still denies it. Oh no, there is no decision made yet. Be honest with the people.

The other thing is to not be so arrogant. I have been told by people who in trying to save their post office talked to Canada Post and were told: "You can always complain to your MP but it will not do any good because we are going to do what we want anyway". Thanks a bunch.

That is an arrogant attitude that I find personally insulting and I know the people in those rural communities find it insulting. If Canada Post wants to improve relationships with the country, it is going about it in exactly the wrong way. Until it improves relationships with its employees and until it improves relationships with the people of this country, it is going to find itself being kicked in the shins like it has been today.

In closing I want to say that Canada Post was here to provide a service to the people of Canada. That was its original intent. It was to provide good mail service. That is not its objective today. Its objective is purely and simply to make a profit. It may step on people in the process. They may be Canadians who receive mail, whether they are in small businesses and have run sub-post offices for some time or for a short time, or they may be employees in its way. That is irrelevant. It may also be an MP who tries to deal with it. However Canada Post is going to "do what it wants", to quote its words.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague a very simple, straightforward question. Why has Canada Post lost the trust of the consumers and the employees to such a great extent in Canada?

We do not find that any part of the community or any of its employees think of it as a service that contributes to Canada. I wonder if my colleague can tell me why he thinks it has lost its trust to such an extent all across Canada and not only here.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, the loss of trust that Canadians have in Canada Post did not happen overnight. It took a lot of effort and it took a lot of doing by Canada Post. It was done in a number of areas.

With respect to the employees, that lack of trust has come about as a result of the inability or the unwillingness of both the government and Canada Post to deal honestly and openly with the employees. If there are 100,000 grievances in a corporation that is an awful lot, particularly when there are only 50,000 employees. The employees have lost trust because of Canada Post's refusal to deal openly with the union.

There was no consultation with the union on this bill at all, no consultation on how services could be improved for the employees or how to better improve the lot of the employee. There was no discussion at all.

With respect to rural Canadians, it has done a very good job of losing trust. It could not have done a better job if it had tried to lose trust with rural Canadians, because it has closed 25 per cent of all rural post offices in this country in the last five years without consultation with rural Canadians.

In fact it is the opposite. It comes into a community and tries to tell it how its service will be improved. People actually laugh at these meetings because Canada Post comes in and says it is going to improve service by closing the post office. People simply scratch their heads. Sometimes in these communities there will be 150 to 200 people at a meeting wondering what is happening to their post office.

They came to the meeting having received a letter from Canada Post in the mail inviting them to a meeting on this particular night to discuss the future of Canada Post. But they are not being consulted, they are being told. They are being hoodwinked. They leave the meeting feeling bitter and confused. That has done an awful lot to hurt the reputation of Canada Post with rural Canadians.

The other way is through public relations. There are people at Canada Post in management with whom I have dealt who are very good. I do not want to label all of them. However, there are others who really should not be in PR. I do not know where it hires some of these people but it should not even interview them as far as public relations is concerned. They are arrogant and they are not helpful. They simply tell people who want to save their post office to go ahead and call their MP. It will not do any good because it is going to do what it wants anyway.

That has also hurt its reputation. Canada Post now has such a poor reputation in Canada that it is going to take a long time to build it up. It is obvious that neither Canada Post nor this government really have any concern about Canada Post's public relations with Canadians. If they did they would not act the way they do. This bill would not have been brought in, and certainly not without consultation with the employees.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the previous speaker has any information as to whether Canada Post has any standards when it contracts with a private operator in a retail outlet.

It was mentioned that there have been difficulties. There was a situation in my riding of Surrey North in which one in a large chain of drugstores had a postal outlet which had been there for a number of years. Then a new owner came in. The drugstore changed hands. Nine women were working there, some of them had been working there for 10 years.

Immediately the new owner arbitrarily started to reduce their wages, reduce the number of hours and change the seniority pattern in terms of working of shifts and was then surprised when the women got hold of one of the more progressive unions and started a unionization drive. They were on strike for nearly 18 months.

That big drugstore chain made a decision that it would shut that whole drugstore down rather than ever agree to allow a first contract with those employees. These were basically postal workers.

Does the member know whether the postal corporation when it is putting in postal outlets in retail stores has any standards about working conditions, wages and the normal things that an employee would expect?

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe Canada Post has any real standards at all. Not only is that true with employees but there is a scenario being played out in Moose Jaw right now that really astounds me and makes me wonder whether Canada Post has any idea of what it is doing.

There is a business called Ottawa Real Estate which has been in Moose Jaw since 1909. This business is a well-established business and has been in the same family for years. The present proprietor, Glen McRitchie, is a very outstanding and well-respected businessman in the community. He has a sub-post office in his store but he has been advised that the sub-post office is going to close and he will not get the franchise.

That post office is the only post office on Main Street. East of Main Street there are a number of senior high-rises. He put out a petition and in just a few days had over 1,200 signatures of people who said they would like to use the post office. When he called up Canada Post it said that his post office was not wheelchair accessible. He said it was, that there was a four-foot door and a ramp which people ride up in their motorized chairs to get service.

Canada Post then said that he could only give 300 square feet. He said he would give them 1,000 square feet. It replied that his hours were not acceptable. He then said he would open his business for postal business any hours that Canada Post asked him to. It accused him of not putting up a sign. He said he never said that he would not put up a sign. He would put up a sign. Furthermore, he said that the post office in Moose Jaw is the only bilingual post office in the city and that people from CFB Moose Jaw—and there are a number of francophones who live in CFB Moose Jaw—come to use his post office. Canada Post said it is going to close it. That is unbelievable.

Since Glen McRitchie took over the post office the business has improved and profits have gone up for Canada Post in that area, and yet it is being closed. This is a situation in which the business has been in Moose Jaw since 1909, it is wheelchair accessible, it is bilingual, it could provide more space if Canada Post wanted it, it would put up a sign and stay open any hours Canada Post wants it to and yet Canada Post wants to close it. In addition, it is the only post office on Main Street.

If Canada Post has standards I do not know where they are. They must have been lost or have disappeared because nobody seems to be following them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. Before giving the floor to the hon. member, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam—Breast Implants; the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands—Northumberland Strait Bridge; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—Manitoba; the hon. member for York West—Toronto Economy; the hon. member for Northumberland—Somalia.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague has just been saying, this debate on Bill C-73 is a debate about the service provided to Canadian citizens by Canada Post.

Over the years Canada Post has been one of the proud institutions of Canada and has provided the kind of service that everybody thought could not be duplicated anywhere around the world and was not duplicated anywhere around the world. The people who worked for Canada Post were a proud part of that organization. They know that the kind of service they used to provide is still possible. However they also know that there is not much chance that the present Canada Post is going to provide that kind of service.

They also know that the employees of Canada Post no longer have any trust, nor do the consumers have any trust, in the ability of Canada Post to provide the kind of service they have learned to expect. They now no longer expect it.

This bill is the first step toward complete privatization. Privatization has been going on for quite some time. The privatization has been of the outlets until now, and a certain number of the post office buildings and so on in many towns and cities.

The city of Prince Albert has a population of something over 30,000 people. It does not have an official corporate post office. It has a series of franchises that are supposed to provide the same kind of service but only marginally do so in many cases.

This bill is the first step toward complete privatization. We know it is privatization because we have models before us. The steps started early. They started a long time ago with the Liberal government of Pierre Trudeau which transformed the corporation from an agency of the government to a Crown corporation.

Now we are going the next step. We are going to sell shares in this Crown corporation. Granted, at the beginning these shares are going to be available only to people who are employees of the Crown corporation.

If we cut down the population of the employees by two-thirds in the last five years there are not too many of them who trust they will have a job within the next while, so why should they consider buying shares?

Then there is the next step after selling or providing shares. If members read the bill they will find that there are two steps in this. There is the decision to make the shares available. This means that the government has to take the assets of that company and divide them into so many parts, with each one represented by a share.

Then it sends 10 per cent of those shares to the employees and the other 90 per cent is for the government to keep. How long does it keep them? There is the question. How long will it keep them? Next year the government might say: "Aha, now that we have made this corporation appealing to the private sector and since we have downgraded the service to the extent that Canada Post does not have to provide this kind of service any longer, we can provide service to parts of Canada that will be adequate and make some money on it".

Canada is a big country. There are thousands and thousands of miles between communities in some cases. There are many small communities between the large communities and many small communities before those.

What we believe we can have in Canada and what we understand that we can have is the same kind of service in every one of those communities. We believe that Canada Post should be able to take the mail to every community. We recognize that we will only get it once a week in some places. Those who have lived in northern Canada will realize that sometimes they get it only once a month. Canada Post was delivering to their community but that is no longer true. Canada Post is not the same as it was before.

As I said, this is a step toward privatization. The model that we can point directly to is Air Canada, and that has been well documented here this morning and this afternoon. With Air Canada, the first step was the division into shares that could be sold to the employees. We were told that Air Canada was not for sale. We know what happened there.

Canada Post has many problems besides the selling of its shares. This bill does nothing and in fact it is intended to do nothing about any of the problems which Canada Post has. The self-proclaimed pit bull terrier that a member was talking about a little earlier said that this will improve employee-employer relations. Since Canada Post is offering shares, it suggested that since the employees own part of the corporation maybe they will work a little harder and the service will be a little better.

Over the last 10 years Canada Post has undermined the trust of those employees to such an extent that offering them 10 per cent of the shares, which are valueless unless they can get a dividend—and it seems unlikely that they will get a dividend—does not sweeten the pot in the least bit. Consequently there is unlikely to be any improved labour relations. The very fact it did not ask the employees whether they wanted this to happen is a good indication it did not even intend to improve labour relations.

The employees ask why would they buy the shares if with the shares there is not some kind of job security. If this bill goes through and the shares are available to employees it does not mean that if they have a good chunk of shares they are guaranteed a job. The next day or the next week you may be laid off. No security goes with these shares.

I started my speech by saying that the debate was about service. It is obvious that this bill is not about service and that is why any self-respecting member in this House would oppose it. The post office is something that every one of us has in our community. It has been downgraded to the extent that none of us can be proud of the fact that we represent a government that has a corporation that gives this kind of service to a community.

It is ironic that this bill is suggesting that the company give its employees an opportunity to buy into this company. First of all it is losing money and is laying people off as quickly as it possibly can. Every privatization of an outlet reduces the number of employees that Canada Post has.

This process of privatization of outlets, if you talk to Canada Post, is done by consultation. Like my colleague from Moose Jaw, I have been there. This government has given the term consultation a bad name. It asks the community to come forward and then decides what should be done about this particular post office. The citizens of those communities have been duped before. They know they are going to be duped again, but they go to the meetings. They have a certain amount of trust in government. They go. They have municipal governments and they have provincial governments and they have a federal government that they can depend on to give them service. The government will tell them they have two or three alternatives.

I am talking now about a meeting that I went to not too many months ago in the small town of Tway. I attended other meetings in the small town of Hoey and one in Cudworth. They are small towns in my constituency. In each of those cases citizens were told they had three alternatives. The first was that, they could have a business outlet where they could have a franchise post office. It does not pay very much for that and in many of those cases not one of those stores or one of those businesses really wanted the post office. They would take the post office because it had some value, because people have to come there and it is a service to the community that they as good citizens feel they should give. The second was that those green boxes beside the road. The third was the post office is closed and the citizens would go to the next community to get their mail and their service.

Before these Canada Post officials came, they had already decided that what this community was going to get was a franchise post office. They come before the community and tell a few lies about how good it is going to be after they have privatized this post office, how much better the service is going to be and then they proceed to tell the community what they had intended to do all along. They tell the community it has a choice: number one, number two or number three. The community is going to choose the least offensive of those three alternatives, which was what was intended all along. In many cases it does not reduce the cost to Canada Post.

That in itself is another complaint that I think we should air here today and should be aired as often as possible. The value of service in a post office is not valued by the number of pieces of mail that is handled. We did a two-hour check in one of the post offices in my region. It sold 100 stamps and handled 2,000 pieces of mail. That does not sound like a very good paying proposition but we were told it was better than usual. That sounds like a losing proposition except that every one of those 2,000 pieces of mail had been paid for as well. That post office was told that it was not making any money because it was not selling very many stamps. It is very unfair.

At one of the meetings that I attended the Canada Post representatives said they had seen no reduction in service in any of the post office changes that they had made in my area. That is a direct lie. I am a farmer. I used to have rural delivery to my door. I no longer have rural delivery to my door. Is that not a reduction in service? When I had rural delivery to my door the service I received stamps, parcels delivered to the door and even some good companionship with the mail carrier as he came around a couple of times a week. Now I drive 20 miles to get my mail and any other postal service I need.

The little community of Brockington in my constituency had a small rural post office. Now it has outdoor green boxes. Is that not a reduction in service? People have to go to Melfort, about 18 miles away, to get service and stamps.

Down the road a little way is another small town where the service was reduced from eight hours a day to twenty hours a week. In other words, the service was cut in half. The Canada Post official stood before the community and said no community in this area had its service reduced. Is the reduction of service from 40 hours a week to 20 hours a week not a reduction in service? We are being told that there are no changes in the post offices and no reduced services.

Let us go back to the consultations I had places like Tway, Hoey and Cudworth. The communities were told they would have something to say about what they got. They did not. In the end they were told what they would get.

My colleagues from every party across the country can tell you exactly the same thing. I know that members of the Conservative Party faced exactly the same kind of treatment from the Canada Post officials in their communities as we did in ours.

This kind of manipulation by civil servants is straight arrogance. They are saying to the people in my communities that they are not smart enough to know what is good for them, they are not smart enough to know that the post office is making money. These civil servants are telling the people that the post office is not making money. They will lie to you and you will not even know that you are being lied to. It is straight arrogance and it is treating the people of Canada in a way that they should not be treated.

It is a treatment of people in a way that we as members of Parliament abhor and should do something about. Passing this bill is not doing something about it, it is just keeping it going on and on.

A corporation's survival is dependent upon the trust that the consumers and the employees have in it. Most people now use the post offices as little as possible, partly because the price of a stamp has gone up but also partly because they no longer trust the post office. They use the telephone. They use the courier service. They no longer use post offices as much as they used to. That is part of the reason that Canada Post is not doing the kind of business which puts it in a category that would allow it to make money.

What we should be doing here is throwing out this bill and taking a look at the kind of service that Canada Post should be giving to Canadians. We should be putting before this House and the people of Canada the kind of corporation that we can be proud of, that they can be proud of and that the employees of Canada Post can be proud of.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the government said that it is proceeding with this as one of the things to improve morale within the postal service. I would like my colleague's comments on the experience that I just had in Surrey North with the government's treatment of postal workers.

For the last 18 months there have been discussions about closing the postal sorting service and moving it to Vancouver. The employees and myself were assured that this was not going to take place as the Vancouver post office was structurally unsound.

About four weeks ago, at seven o'clock in the morning, a letter was delivered to my Ottawa office announcing the closing of the Surrey post office. Along with that was a brief notice which said the postal corporation was going to keep employees involved and knowledgeable about the closing. Three hours later, at 10 o'clock that morning, I telephoned the union to talk to them about the closing of the office. Much to my surprise the union and employees had not been informed. How did the 100 employees know their jobs were gone? Using a speaker phone I told them that three hours before the postal corporation had told me in writing that the post office—

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Pursuant to Standing Order 26(1), I move that the House continue to sit beyond the normal hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C–73.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I was on my feet and speaking. I think that motion can only be properly put when the member has the floor of this House.

An hon. member: A minister can take on that.

Mr. Karpoff: He is not a minister. That motion is out of order. Five o'clock has now arrived and I request that the Speaker adjourn the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member is right but the Speaker does not know what point of order has been raised before understanding the hon. member.

[Translation]

To move this kind of motion the mover must have the floor, which is not the case now. Therefore this motion is inadmissible according to our Standing Orders.

Since it is after five o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

INTERNATIONAL LAW OF THE SEA

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTION

The House resumed from Thursday, December 3, 1992, consideration of the motion of Mr. Caccia:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should, for the benefit of Canadian fisheries, urgently take the necessary steps to ratify the International Law of the Sea, and urge other nations to do so in order to reach the 60 signatures required for the Law of the Sea to come into force.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak in favour of the motion introduced by the hon. member for Davenport, an international statesman for sustainable development if I could give him that title. By introducing this motion he demonstrates that knows what he is talking about.

Canada boasts the longest coastline in the world, 151,489 miles, and the second largest undersea shelf, 2.5 million square miles. Yet we still have not ratified the Law of the Sea.

It is ironic and quite hypocritical of Canada to withhold ratification considering we signed the document in 1982 along with 119 other countries. The hon. member for Davenport tells me that as of March 1993, 56 countries will have ratified. All we need is four more countries and it would become law.

Canada worked very hard to bring many of these countries to the bargaining table in order to secure, among other things, protection of the ocean environment and sovereignty of our coastal waters.

It is also worth noting that some of Canada's best and brightest diplomats dedicated their careers to the signing of this treaty. Now, more than 11 years after the fact, Canada's best interests still lie in the ratification of the Law of the Sea.

This is a highly complex treaty, yet it affirms three fundamental principles. Many Canadians can relate to the first principle, which is the affirmation of our sovereign rights to the waters along our coastline. In the past Canada has been forced to take a number of unilateral actions to protect our rights, often when other countries infringe on our territory or threaten our environment.

For example in 1969, the American supertanker Manhattan sailed through our northwest passage without Canadian consent or notification. What if this giant oil tanker spilled her cargo all over the Canadian Arctic waters? Who would pay for the initial clean up? Who would compensate native peoples for ruining their lifestyles for generations, if maybe not for life?

• (1705)

Canada did respond unilaterally when the Trudeau government brought in the 1970 Arctic Waters Pollution Protection Act. This action was not welcomed by the international community, particularly by the United States. However, in the wake of the environmental catastrophe caused by the 1989 Exxon Valdez oil spill in Alaska I think the Liberal government showed considerable foresight over 20 years ago.

In addition to the rights we claimed in the 1970 Arctic waters act the Law of the Sea acknowledges the 200-mile limit Canada established to protect our fishing industry. Right now the 200-mile limit is customarily respected but the Law of the Sea would establish an exclusive economic zone, EEZ as it is known. It represents the highest long-term economic gain for Canada.

In addition to the economic gains, however, the economic zones would in effect make environmental protection a duty. It would place the responsibility on coastal states to clean up their act and treat our limited ocean resources with respect.

I would like to go on in greater detail but I must proceed to the second major principle of this treaty. That is to make some portion of the sea floor and the seabed part of the common heritage of mankind and to share these resources with all countries.

This part of the treaty recognizes the economic gap between the northern and southern hemisphere and the fact that developing countries must be given a shot at developing natural resources before more technologically advanced countries scoop up all the wealth first.

Over the last week we have had two important speakers. Today it was a doctor who has practised in developing countries and last week it was Mr. Huc, the author of the report Human Development 1992. These experts are telling us to permit these countries to stand on their own feet by allowing them to share in these resources.

For example the discovery of the so-called manganese nodules in the deep seabed, which are usually found thousands of metres deep and far beyond the exclusive economic zones of any one country, will some day allow lesser developed countries to also benefit from this enormous potential for economic growth.

I am quite aware however that our own Canadian mining industry, most of it land based, feels threatened by this part of the agreement. That is because these manganese nodules consist of large deposits of nickel and copper.

I find it difficult to follow the logic of this argument. Experts agree that once the Law of the Sea is ratified Canada will rank in the top five countries to gain sovereign control over more surface area and undersea territory.

Considering the enormous pressure placed on countries in the southern hemisphere to play economic catch up with the north to avoid a massive debt crisis and so on, it only makes sense to adopt a share approach to resource management. The Law of the Sea Convention would therefore serve as an invaluable and efficient instrument to facilitate ocean development.

Remember that we are talking about sharing, not giving away, precious resources.

Consider the economic cost of delaying the development of these types of mineral resources. Why tangle with the World Court in an unending series of resource disputes when the alternative is a rational and fair approach to ocean resource management?

The third major principle of the Law of the Sea pertains to the preservation of the seas and the rights of other states. With certain rights come certain obligations. Consider drift-net fishing and what can be described as nothing less than the wholesale rape of the high seas.

In addition to outlining the rights of states to fish, mine and navigate the sea we must also accept certain obligations to preserve and protect the ocean for future generations. Indeed the International Law of the Sea represents a constitution for the oceans, a means of establishing an international order above and below the sea.

I think the Law of the Sea should be an integral component of the new world order that the international community is talking about. Right now all the G-7 members, the most highly developed economies in the world, are refusing to ratify this treaty. Sadly this government has placed Canada among those nations that are refusing to ratify.

• (1710)

Now I know the game. This Prime Minister and this government are afraid to show leadership. They follow. They are waiting to see what the other G-7 countries will do. In international politics Canada should show leadership. Canada should be the first of the G-7 countries to sign this treaty. If Canada does that I think the other six countries will sign right after. If that happens then this Law the of the Sea does become the law of the oceans.

It is time to take a leadership role and show the rest of the world that Canada is no longer the chicken of the sea. For the sake of present and future generations I encourage all members to support this motion. To the people listening to this debate, phone the member for Davenport and get a copy of this motion because it is so vital. I cannot stress this enough. When we talk about the new world order, this is part of it. This should be an integral component.

I congratulate the hon. member for Davenport for always looking into the future, protecting our planet not for ourselves but for future generations. Congratulations.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, once again we are debating the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Davenport which states:

> That, in the opinion of the House, the government should, for the benefit of Canadian fisheries, urgently take the necessary steps to ratify the International Law of the Sea, and urge other nations to do so in order to reach the 60 signatures required for the Law of the Sea to come into force.

The issue of the ratification of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, commonly referred to as UNCLOS, has been reviewed exhaustively in the previous two hours of debate in this House, on June 23 and December 3 of last year. It has also featured prominently on two other occasions: an opposition day debate on foreign overfishing on March 12 of last year and a special debate on May 7, 1992 on the UNCED which referred extensively to our legal initiative on high-seas fisheries at UNCED in Rio.

During these debates it has been repeatedly demonstrated that this motion subscribes to a simple but wholly ineffective solution to the crisis facing the Canadian Atlantic fishery.

The government's approach to the problem of foreign overfishing has been to seek a solution through practical measures of international co-operation. Ratification of UNCLOS at this time would do nothing in terms of practical results to resolve the overfishing issue. However slowly, significant progress is being made. Overfishing on the high seas is increasingly recognized as an international environmental issue.

In terms of control of fisheries resources, Canada already benefits from one of the most significant provisions of UNCLOS. That is the creation of the 200-mile exclusive economic zone, since this now forms part of customary international law. Indeed the foreign overfishing problem is related to fishing beyond the 200-mile limit so Canada would not enhance its control over this problem whether or not it ratifies the UNCLOS.

Further, it is widely known that the long-standing difficulties within the international community with regard to UNCLOS ratification concern not the control of fisheries resources but the seabed mining provisions. All industrialized countries except Iceland have serious concerns in this regard. Ratification by Canada at this time could well commit the Canadian Treasury to disproportionate financial obligations to the UN authority responsible for the exploitation of deep seabed resources.

Canada is actively engaged in the informal consultations with the Secretary General of the United Nations. It is carrying this out in order to resolve the problems concerning the exploration and the exploitation of these resources.

I would like to talk in terms of the fisheries and what has been done on that situation. Since the House last discussed the issue in early December, we have made important strides in the direction of solving the fishing problems.

Mr. Flis: Let us talk about the Law of the Sea. Protect our fisheries.

• (1715)

Mr. Belsher: If the hon. member opposite will just pay attention we will get to these points. First, the fisheries agreement with the European Community was initialled on December 17 and provides for adherence to the conservation decisions of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, better known as NAFO.

Second, as a result of consultations with contracting parties to NAFO Morocco and Venezuela have agreed to withdraw their vessels from the NAFO regulatory area. Panama has fined several of its vessels fishing in that area and de-registered two. We have also recently held consultations with Korea in which we urged that country to withdraw its vessels from the NAFO area.

Third, on December 22 the United Nations General Assembly adopted resolutions 47/192, formally convening the United Nations conference in straddling fish stocks and highly migratory fish stocks.

This conference will provide for the first time a forum to develop rules for the management of high seas fisheries in accordance with conservation and sustainable development principles within the framework for international co-operation established by UNCLOS. It will also continue to focus international attention on overfishing on the high seas, thereby increasing the pressure to stop this practice.

The conference will start its substantive work with a three-week session in July in New York after a five-day organizational session in April. It aims to complete its work before the 49th session of the General Assembly in the fall of 1994.

Canada is hoping that all countries with an interest in the sustainability of high-seas fisheries will participate in the conference and support a substantive outcome that gives concrete expression to the rights, obligations and responsibilities of states to conserve the living resources on the high seas.

Fourth, to begin to prepare the ground for a successful outcome at the UN conference Canada hosted a meeting of like-minded countries on high-seas fisheries in St. John's, Newfoundland from January 21 to 24. Over 50 countries attended this meeting, including Argentina, Australia, Chile, Iceland, Mexico, New Zealand, Russia and the United States, just to name a few of them.

The meeting focused on four discussion papers. There were three developed by Canada and one by New Zealand. As well, there was a comprehensive report on straddling stocks and highly migratory species, problems being experienced in various parts of the world.

The discussion papers dealt with the following subjects: (a) management principles for the conservation of straddling and highly migratory fish stocks on the high seas; (b) problems related to fisheries by states that are not members of the relevant regional conservation organizations or are new members thereof; (c) surveillance, control and enforcement on the high seas; (d) remedies; and lastly, (e) special problems of developing countries.

There was a consensus on the need for action on all elements addressed in the discussion papers. There was also a shared view that the UN conference must result in an effective regime of conservation and management for straddling stocks and highly migratory species.

By effective it was clear that participants at the meeting meant a regime that works in practice. Workability must be the essential criterion. Nothing less will do. This will require a political commitment on behalf of all states, including the distant water fishing states, to achieve solutions through the UN conference.

Fifth, Canada participated actively in an ad hoc informal group of experts which met from February 1 to 5 in Rome under the auspices of the Food and Agriculture Organization, FAO, to draft an agreement on the reflagging of fishing vessels to avoid compliance with internationally agreed conservation and management measures.

The group managed to agree on a very wide-ranging document which deals not only with the reflagging of fishing vessels but also with their initial flagging and with fishing by vessels flying the flag of states that are not members of relevant regional fisheries conservation organizations. The draft agreement would commit states accepting it to ensure that vessels flying their flag do not undermine internationally agreed conservation and management measures.

Deterrents provided by the draft agreement include mandatory registration of fishing vessels, their licensing to fish on the high seas on condition that they do not undermine internationally agreed conservation and management measures, and inspection and control by flagging in and flagging out states to avoid double flagging and changes of flag to undermine such measures.

There are enforcements by both categories of states, including penalties commensurate with the gravity of the offences, and hopefully an electronic information system centred in FAO but radiating to all parties to the agreement covering registered and licensed fishing vessels, those sighted committing infractions and the penalties imposed.

The member states of FAO will be seized of this draft agreement in the framework of its committee on fisheries which meets in Rome from March 15 to 19. If it commands a consensus the agreement will then be approved by the council in June and adopted by the FAO conference in November. Such a procedure would correspond to the fast-track approach that Canada has been pushing for.

While the results of the discussions in New York, St. John's and Rome which I have just described allow for a measure of optimism it is clear that over the long term much work remains to be done to make the most of the opportunities that have now arisen. These opportunities did not just happen by themselves. They were the result of hard work and singular dedication on the part of men and women in several coastal states, including Canada, who took on the responsibility of putting high seas overfishing on the international agenda.

I hope I have made it clear that, as is all too frequently the case, the opposition has seized on ratification of the Law of the Sea Convention as a simple solution to a very complex problem. Passage of this motion by the House would in effect endorse a facile gesture easily implemented but completely ineffective and potentially costly which would do nothing to alleviate the real problem of overfishing in the high seas.

I trust that the defeat of this motion will reinforce our common commitment to resolve serious crises facing the Canadian fishery by effective means and not through empty rhetoric.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of the motion of the hon. member for Davenport this afternoon.

I would like to draw to the attention of the House how timely this debate is in light of The Fifth Estate on March 2 exposing the gross practice of drift-net fishing off the Pacific coast and the complete abdication of governmental responsibility in addressing this problem.

The ratification of the Law of the Sea is only one step because it takes more than just signatures on a document. It takes government priorities and resources to enforce what is intended in the Law of the Sea. I see neither from this government.

It is very curious. Last summer in my province, when close to 500,000 sockeye salmon went missing from the Fraser River during implementation of the aboriginal fishing plan, a fish war erupted. Commercial and native groups were at each other's throats. Ottawa ordered an investigation by Professor Peter Pearse and the House of Commons fisheries committee conducted its own hearings.

However, when an offshore foreign drift-net fleet—those curtains of death that do not just take B.C. salmon but take everything—routinely takes between 250,000 to 500,000 B.C. salmon per year Ottawa says it is not a major problem and represents only .5 per cent of the total stocks. This does little to inspire confidence that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is considering the $500 million salmon industry in British Columbia.

We must first ratify the convention on the Law of the Sea. We must do that but we must do much more. The member for Fraser Valley East says that as a result of ratification there would be costs to the Treasury but I just do not see the sense in that.

What we are talking about in my province and in his province is a $500 million industry that is at risk. It is his government's responsibility to protect it. Ratifying this Law of the Sea Convention is a minimum. It must be ratified. Then there are the enforcement and surveillance provisions to protect our salmon stocks, for which our tax dollars have funded enhancement programs. Our salmon stocks provide processing jobs, provide food fishery for native people and commercial fishery people, and a livelihood for both native and non-native people.

One becomes suspect at what the motivation of the government is in allotting so many resources to find 500,000 salmon in the Fraser River that had gone missing and yet alloting no resources when a drift-net fleet comes and takes our resource.

The Law of the Sea has been ratified by 56 nations. It only requires four more nations to ratify it before it becomes international law. I do not understand this government dragging its feet on this. Consider the cost to the Treasury in not ratifying this. It is just nonsensical. It is a $500 million B.C. salmon industry. There is no surveillance. The undercover unit from fisheries and oceans has been disbanded and our resource is now being processed in Thailand.

A constituent of mine phoned me late last week in response to a story on The Fifth Estate. He said that he had notified fisheries and oceans three years ago that Canadian salmon was being sold in Germany in product of Canada tins, but was obviously canned in Thailand. Fisheries and oceans did nothing. When there is concern for all the salmon in the Fraser River the fish in the high seas count too.

At a very minimum I ask the government members to reconsider. I ask them to vote in favour of the motion of the member for Davenport and ask that we go on from the ratification of the Law of the Sea to protect our resource on both the Atlantic coast and the Pacific coast.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, just a few words in support of this motion by the hon. member for Davenport.

It is amazing, is it not, when we realize that there is no Law of the Sea. Every time we listen to an official of fisheries and oceans or of external affairs or a cabinet minister talking about the fishery, reference is made to the Law of the Sea. Well, there is no Law of the Sea. The Law of the Sea right now at this very moment is made up by a group of nations that want to catch fish or want to exploit a resource. In support of the hon. member for Davenport and what he is trying to do, let me point this out to the House and to the Canadian people.

After the Canadian fishing industry on the east coast had closed down fish plants and told fishermen to go home and stay there, 1993 opened with 14 factory vessels from Japan, licensed by the Canadian government, fishing 75 miles from the shore of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Friesen: For what?

Mr. Baker: For tuna. Not only that, but they had a quota for bluefin of five times what the Nova Scotians have. They have a quota until March 31 of this year for five times what Newfoundlanders have. They have unlimited quotas.

Of all of the tuna that is bought in the grocery store, albacore, yellowfin, big eye, skipjack, every tuna I can mention is unlimited by the Japanese fleet in January and February of this year and Canadian fishermen are sitting home and cannot get tuna licences. That is reality. That is the Law of the Sea today. There is nothing about conservation at all. The bluefin tuna is an endangered species today because of that. With all of the Canadian fish plants closed, workers are sitting at home and are getting a cheque from the government. They are not allowed to go out in a boat: "You sit at home and take a cheque, Mr. Man, you are not allowed to fish".

On November 27, 1992, while those fishermen were getting a cheque for sitting at home in the province of Newfoundland, there was a Russian boat 50 miles from St. John's, Newfoundland, catching redfish after we closed down a redfish plant. When I say "we" I mean that the Government of Canada closed it down. These were the very fish that those fishermen were not allowed to catch.

On December 10, 1992, after the first year of the moratorium in Newfoundland, there were two Danish ships fishing 80 miles from the Labrador coast for turbot with a 10 per cent by-catch of cod with no quotas shown on any sheet anywhere. Why? That is the law of the sea. That is the law according to the Department of External Affairs and the latest meeting it had in some fancy meeting hall in some capital across the ocean.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has evidence of massive dumping at sea this year, last year, the year before and the year before that because of the technology used by foreign vessels both inside our 200-mile zone and outside our 200-mile zone. Fisheries and oceans has evidence from the observers—because I have it—that shows 10 tonnes of fish dumped with practically every haul-back. When the gigantic nets are hauled over the side of the boat they are filled too much to get through the opening. They jam and then they have to let go of the cod in the end and dump everything overboard.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has the evidence of that year after year after year and even last year. It has the evidence of bribes being offered by foreign captains for somebody to look the other way. It has the evidence of fisheries officers being offered bribes by these foreign vessels. All those foreign vessels want to do is to take every last fish that is in the ocean and they have the technology to do it.

That is the incredible thing. They have the technology to do it. We do not have that technology. We do not have one factory freezer trawler in Canada, not one single factory freezer trawler and we do not want one.

There are 104 observers employed in St. John's, Newfoundland, there are 85 employed in Halifax, Nova Scotia, and there are a dozen in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. What are their jobs? Their jobs are to observe aboard a foreign vessel licensed by Ottawa, and the foreign vessel is a factory freezer trawler. There are 104 jobs in St. John's, 85 in Halifax and a dozen in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. They are observing aboard factory freezer trawlers with a technology that destroys every last thing in the ocean inside the 200-mile zone and outside the 200-mile zone. That is the law of the sea today.

The law of the sea today is that Canadian fishermen will sit at home because the Canadian government will not sign the Law of the Sea treaty that will put an end to dumping and put an end to this business of fishing on every spawning ground in the world. If one follows the Law of the Sea in every article it will talk about—in sections 63 and 64—the transborder stocks and the migratory stocks of fish. That is what the member for Davenport was pointing out to this Chamber the other day. Put an end to that.

We have it in the observer reports at the Department of Fisheries and Oceans today on 200 Kent Street on the tenth floor in a locked compartment. They are sealed away in a room so that no MP can see them and no provincial cabinet minister can see them. You, Mr. Speaker, are not allowed to see those observer reports. You, Mr. Speaker, are an impartial person in this Chamber but you are not allowed to see them. The member for Davenport cannot see them either. Neither can I nor the premier of Newfoundland can see them. He is not allowed to see those reports.

I have seen those reports. I have copies of them. I am going to expose them. Oh, yes. That is the Law of the Sea today. The Law of the Sea is a document in which nations came together and said that they would try to preserve the fish. They would stop this destruction of fish in their spawning seasons and on their spawning runs. They would stop dumping by all of these massive vessels in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. They would stop drift-net fishing. They would stop all kinds of things.

The United States of America to my knowledge has not signed that agreement. I would be willing to bet that all the nations that fish inside our 200-mile zone today in agreement with the Government of Canada and the Department of External Affairs have not signed it either. They are the law of the sea today. It is not on a piece of paper. It is in their quota sheets. That is the law of the sea. We want to get rid of it. We want to get rid of that law and replace it with the Law of the Sea that the Canadian government refuses to sign. The parliamentary secretary stood in this Chamber today and amid all of his gobbledegook that he went on with said it was going to cost us a lot of money.

There should be no limit to cost when we are talking about the conservation of our fishing resources. I hope that the government members will change their minds and vote in favour of this motion by the member for Davenport. It is worth the support of every member of the House and everybody in Canada. Only the government member are not in favour of what he has moved here today.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take part in the debate but I would like to point out that since the arrival of television in this House and after listening to my friend from Newfoundland, the debate has certainly deteriorated. Theatre has improved but debate has deteriorated. At any rate theatre is supposed to reflect reality and even this theatre that we have listened to and watched for the past 10 minutes has no reflection in reality at all.

Mr. Baker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member was recognized to speak. He stands up and says that what I said was not true but he offers nothing, not one argument, to support what he said. I doubt whether he knows anything about the fishery at all and that is why he is not using his speaking time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before giving the floor to the member for Davenport, I see that he wants to use the provision in the Standing Orders whereby the mover of the motion can have the right to reply last. I just want to remind him that in doing so, he will be the last speaker on this motion and will have at most 10 minutes. The hon. member for Davenport.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, since no one else wishes to speak I am very happy to be able to take the floor.

[English]

It is very sad that we could not hear from the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley on what he thinks about the Law of the Sea and whether he has any input to this debate because what we are discussing here today is of course the convention called the Law of the Sea. We are also discussing here today Canada's reputation in the world.

Canada was a pioneer in the time preceding the coming to life of this convention. Canada was among the nations that pushed very hard in the formulation of the contents of this document that finally saw the light of day in 1982. It was the brain-child of former Ambassador Beesley and it received substantial political support from the Canadian government at the time.

The step of signing it was taken by the Government of Canada very shortly after. Canada was one of the nations that signed this document immediately after it was introduced. We were among the first to launch it.

We come to the second step. A convention needs two steps. The first is the signature and the second is its ratification. Now that we are in the ratification stage we find Canada lagging, dragging its feet, and using arguments of the kind that we heard from the parliamentary secretary earlier.

We probably share the longest coastal area of all nations in the world. We are probably ahead of Australia. While we drag our feet as a nation other nations have gradually ratified it. It has now reached the point where 56 nations have ratified it. The world community is only four ratifications short of the convention coming into effect. We are that close. At this rate it looks very likely, unless the government changes its mind, that Canada will not be among the first 60 nations ratifying it or launching it. It is very sad.

Today we heard the parliamentary secretary talking in his speech about this measure as an ineffective solution. That is what he said in his speech half an hour ago. The parliamentary secretary was contradicting the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who said on May 5 in Cancun on Canada's behalf: "The Law of the Sea outlines principles and measures that will give proper effect to the provision of the Law of the Sea Convention". The minister was representing Canada when he said that, and today the parliamentary secretary said that the law would be ineffective.

One wonders who prepared the speech. What is going on in the ranks of the government if a parliamentary secretary contradicts a public statement made internationally on the same convention only six months ago? What has happened in the thought processes of the government since May of last year? One wonders. Has it turned around? Obviously not. At least one would hope it has not gone bananas.

Three very strong aspects of the convention must be stressed again. First, by ratifying the convention Canada would ensure that high sea fisheries would pursue ecologically sound practices. Second, the convention would ensure a much better degree of maintenance of the ecology of the marine system in the oceans.

The member for Gander—Grand Falls referred to sections 63 and 64. It is all there for us to read. It is as simple as that. It is black on white. It is unbelievable the government would have the gall to say that this convention would be an ineffective solution.

Third, the convention would complete the protection of fish stocks within the 200-mile exclusive economic zone and probably permit us to manage better the straddling stocks, as others have already said.

• (1745)

One wonders conceptually what is standing in the way of the thought processes of this government. One can only suspect that there are very strong mining interests and that pressures have been exerted on the Government of Canada, and I suspect on the United States, by large multinationals such as Inco, Noranda and others urging that the convention not be ratified.

There are substantial interests related to seabed resources. For the life of me I cannot understand why sectoral interests must stand in the way of an overwhelming and all-embracing interest in the fish wealth of oceans which touches so closely the livelihood of many communities. We are talking of hundreds of thousands of families and communities whose livelihood depends on fish.

Therefore the convention as such is much more than just introducing strong international law that is badly needed. It is a social and economic instrument of the first order. It is perhaps for the first time the international community coming together and saying that we must jointly manage our fish resources, properly. I suspect the reason for requiring 60 signatory nations to ratify this convention was to develop sufficient momentum, sufficient political will, and it is being developed.

This is a tragedy for Canada. We are not seizing the opportunity. We do not see meaning or the opportunity for Canada in ratifying it. All we can say is that we are using portions of the Law of the Sea that are convenient to us but we will not sign it because the Treasury Board finds it too expensive. This is the logic that we heard today and in preceding debates.

In other words we want to pick and chose. We want to do it where it is convenient for us but we do not want to carry the burden. Probably until now this government has subordinated Canada's fisheries interest to the interests that are being lobbied in Washington and in other capitals by the mining sector.

Canada cannot pick and chose. Canada must join the world community and ratify the convention sooner or later. It was our hope in the opposition that we could draw the government to do it sooner rather than later for the sake of our own reputation, for the sake of our own credibility.

There will be a preparatory conference in New York next April on the question of fisheries. There will be a full-fledged conference in July flowing from UNCED, the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development. How we can go there without having ratified the convention and having credibility I do not know.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

Before the taking of the vote:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Further to the adoption of the 24th report of the Standing Committee on House Management on Wednesday, April 29, 1992, the recorded division will be taken row by row, beginning with the mover. Then I will ask the other members who are for the motion and on the same side of the House as the mover to please rise. After that, the votes of those who support the motion and are on the other side of the House will be recorded. The votes of those who oppose the motion will be taken in the same order.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

[English]

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is rather tough to speak on an issue as important as breast implants with people leaving the House and all of the distractions.

The minister announced on January 13 of this year what most considered would be a ban on the further use of silicone breast implants. He announced that manufacturing would no longer take place and he notified the manufacturers that they would have to have valid notices of compliance for the sale of implants. Only with additional information will the department consider the reintroduction of implants. Is this really the case?

• (1835)

The minister also said that only in exceptional circumstances will women have access to silicone implants and only then on compassionate grounds. What guidelines will be used to determine compassionate? Will it be the persuasive words of the surgeon or the lobbying efforts of the manufacturers?

It should be noted that under the current regulations, physicians are allowed to request silicone implants on a case by case basis. It will be up to the department to determine the merits of the application of the doctor. Again one must ask: What guidelines is the minister using to determine the merits of the application? On what grounds will these applications be judged?

What we seem to have now is not a ban, but just one more bureaucratic hurdle for plastic surgeons to pass before they can use these silicone breast implants.

On January 13 the minister introduced his moratorium or ban on silicone implants. On January 15 in Montreal, within two days of the minister's announcement, the head of the plastic surgeons in Quebec said that what we have is simply the requirement to do follow-up both by the doctor and the department. He said that any woman who wants an implant can still get one. Many plastic surgeons rely heavily on breast implants as it is a large part of their practice, and hence a large part of their income.

It would seem that we have more than enough evidence from women both here and in the United States linking silicone implants to a host of medical problems. While the minister's concern for those women who already have implants is no doubt sincere, why do we need trials based on new recipients of implants when an in-depth study of those currently with implants would provide the type of long-term data that the minister is seeking.

The more cynical among us could be led to believe that the minister is not willing to ban silicone implants outright because of the complaints of the plastic surgeons who rely on the implant business. Further study is no doubt needed into the health effects of silicone implants.

It would seem however that what we do not need is further study based on new implants. The problem is with those who have already had implants. It is those women on whom the minister and his department should focus their efforts. I would like to take this opportunity to further advise the minister that this issue is not dead because of the moratorium on implants.

There are over 200,000 Canadian women who are suffering from the effects or are potential sufferers of the effects of the implants they already have. We will continue to press the minister, first, for support for those women; and second, for some guidelines of what he means when he says that he will require notice of compliance prior to allowing implants on compassionate grounds.

We are advising the minister that we must have those guidelines as to what compassionate grounds mean. There is nothing compassionate about implanting an unsafe product into a woman's body.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has continued to demonstrate his concern for women, especially in the action that he took on January 13 when he announced his concerns regarding implants. At that time the manufacturers were informed that they would have to submit additional scientific information to health and welfare before silicone gel filled breast implants could be reintroduced into the market.

Today there is an epidemiological study being done to assess the long-term effects. It is under way right now. The minister provided results of a major survey done among women in Canada with breast implants. That was also announced on January 13.

Further, in exceptional circumstances on compassionate grounds, on a one-by-one basis, silicone gel filled breast implants may be authorized for individual sale. As for the safety of the saline filled breast implants, manufacturers have been requested to supply health and welfare with the same information that is being submitted to the U.S. food and drug administration.

Now about the media reports regarding the risks from these implants, the infection rates resulting from their use is similar to that for all the other implants that have been utilized. Health and welfare will continue to review all the reports concerning all types of breast implants. We will take the necessary action.

Those steps announced by the minister last January are going to help resolve these particular questions. We will go into further epidemiological studies.

We are concerned and every person in this House is concerned. Indeed there are many women in Canada who do suffer from the problems with regard to losing their breasts through disease or a medical condition. They are foremost in our minds.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT BRIDGE

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): I am pleased to rise again and bring to the attention of the House the problem with the passage of Bill C-110. This concerns the fixed link between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick and the failure of the government to follow its own environmental legislation and provide an environmental assessment on the particular bridge proposal.

This matter has been raised a number of times in recent days and it flows out of my question to the minister asking that he provide an environmental assessment review process on this particular proposal.

This has generated a number of letters. I would like to quote from a letter dated February 9 which I received:

> Dear Ms. Hunter:
> Thank you for your comments in the House of Commons on the fixed link. I agree with what you said.
> Many, if not most islanders do not want this link. We cannot convince our own MPs that it is not for us. I believe they see it as a vote-getter, especially among the unemployed and the businesses hurting in the recession.
> Continue to support our no vote and encourage other MPs that it is not good for our area. A whacko scheme.
> Yours truly, Florence Graham.

So it takes a member of Parliament from British Columbia to defend the interests of a Prince Edward Islander. It really speaks to the kind of ridiculous politics that exists in this House, when the Liberal members of Parliament for Prince Edward Island will not do as their constituents ask on this very important issue.

Today in the House my colleague from Skeena also raised another important aspect of this whole sad story. He asked a question of the Minister of Public Works. He revealed that Mr. Alan K. Scales, who is the chair of Marine Atlantic, the federal Crown corporation that operates the ferry link between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, is the same Mr. Alan K. Scales who in January of this year swore an affidavit in the Federal Court of Canada Trial Division in support of the application of the Attorney General of Prince Edward Island.

This action is to further the interest of Strait Crossing Inc. and the fixed link. That is the firm which stands to benefit from the fixed link. That is the firm which has solicited the contract for the fixed link.

This is a situation where the federal government is pushing a $1.5 billion project that was rejected by the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office in August 1990 when it said that the generic concept of a bridge proposal should not proceed. The government has chosen not to agree with that and it did a typical government routine. It went and asked another panel of experts what their opinion was. Lo and behold, it came up with the right answer.

What we see with Mr. Scales' involvement in this is a clear case of conflict of interest. It is another wrinkle in this whole sad story.

I am pleased to conclude my speech in the House tonight. But this is a debate that is going to be continuing, not just in Prince Edward Island but across Canada, when one can see the kind of contract that goes out from a billion dollar project and the people who are supporting it are the same people who stand to benefit from it themselves.

• (1845)

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to put one or two pieces of information on the record with respect to the question which has just been raised by my hon. friend.

First of all, as many Canadians know, the proposal for the fixed link was put to an environmental assessment. Public hearings were held and the panel, when it reported, established criteria under which such a proposal would indeed be acceptable.

The panel was very concerned about the adverse affects which lingering ice would have on the environment and it was with that criteria in mind that the Minister of Public Works undertook his responsibilities to publish first of all the government's response to the panel and then to examine the feasibility of the fixed link thereafter.

As my hon. friend has just said, in January 1991 the government appointed an independent committee of ice experts to examine the effects of the bridge on the departure of spring ice. That group concluded that it would be possible to build a bridge across the strait that would meet the panel's ice-out requirements, as they are called.

I want to stress that there has been public participation in this process. It is an ongoing process. The government and the Minister of Public Works are very committed to ensuring that our obligations under section 33(c) and (d) of the Environmental Assessment Review Process guidelines are met. In addition, the matter is also before the courts and so perhaps any further comment on my part should be left to a later time.

MANITOBA

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to continue an argument I have had with this government dating back to my first election about economic renewal and economic support for Manitoba.

My specific question arose from a conflict between the premier of Manitoba, the finance minister and the Prime Minister over the support provided by the federal government to the city of Winnipeg.

While it is not my job to defend the actions of the Government of Manitoba I thought that the incident indicated the degree to which Manitobans are frustrated by this federal government and the degree to which they would like to see a more co-operative attitude.

Starting over a decade ago Winnipeg was supported through a core area initiative. Subsequent to the signing of the second accord by this government there were many promises made that there would be a third accord. That has not taken place. Instead we have had a gradual decline in the quality of life and not only in the inner city. Poverty has spread into many older neighbourhoods throughout Winnipeg. Of course the plague of rural Manitoba is well known to anybody who follows the plight of rural Canada.

We keep asking the government these questions because there are things that can be done. There is a need for an economic plan, one of which touches upon the transportation needs of Winnipeg. It should address the international role that could be played by the airport and support for the rail system, the branch lines, making sure that if the two major companies withdraw from the branch lines across western Canada that we have an infrastructure left for someone else.

We have to deal with the port of Churchill which has a very proper role to be played in trade with northern Europe. We have to deal with the questions of research and development in Winnipeg, not only in the health industry but in other industries as well. We have to deal with the question of the cultural industries which on their own in a very lonely fashion produce some of the best works in North America, if not in the world. In fact the Winnipeg film group is world famous for some of its work.

These need the support of the federal government. As cutbacks go from one department to the other for reasons which members from Manitoba simply cannot understand, this province continues to be singled out: transfer payments, support for post-secondary education, support for health care, support for job training, support for aboriginal economic development, support for inner city businesses, support for new immigrants who are looking for English as a second language training. The list is lengthy.

The response of the government when asked a question in Question Period or response in debate is not to respond in a positive way, to pick up the phone and say we know your frustrations, we are trying to figure out what to do, this is the blockage, can you help. When you talk about partnerships in government you do not isolate people who are genuinely concerned about these issues. You try to find a way to get them involved. It does not have to be for public consumption but it can be just to see something happen.

Many groups from the inner cities come to me and say: "We do not want a public confrontation with the minister. We want someone to go to the minister to ask under what grounds he will solve this problem so that we understand what is going on".

The constant failure of the government to reach out to Winnipegers has caused a political alienation that will take years to recover from and years to reform. I continue this debate with the government because it is very important that a new government be formed which responds to the economic needs of Winnipegers.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to respond to the question raised by my hon. friend because it is important to put some of this information on the record.

While my hon. friend spoke only about what the government was doing for Winnipeg I am sure he would not mind if I spoke about the province as a whole, because it is unduly restrictive to speak only in terms of the city of Winnipeg itself.

For example, Manitoba has 4 per cent of the population of Canada. However, the province of Manitoba receives 5.6 per cent of major transfer payments. If we look at total program expenditures, Manitobans actually received $5,039 in 1990 for every person in the province, which is in fact the highest total spending on a per capita basis anywhere in Canada.

In the area of agrifood spending which is so vital to all Manitoba including Winnipeg, although I fear some Winnipegers probably do not appreciate it adequately, $458 million on average has been spent in that province since 1985-86. In Winnipeg, $32 million for improvements to the international airport; air traffic control centre, $27 million; Boeing, $13 million; Bristol, $4 million; forgive me if I mention Ayerst in Brandon, $25 million; the Yellowhead Highway, $10 million; $68 million in social housing in Winnipeg; and The Forks, $12 million.

I know, Mr. Speaker, you will not give me adequate time to do justice to this but let me conclude by referring to the new virology lab which is situated in my hon. friend's constituency and for which I am sure he will show at the appropriate time the right amount of gratitude. One hundred and forty million dollars was spent on a very important lab which quite frankly was transferred there at considerable difficulty from Ottawa, with 242 full-time jobs located at that new site. My hon. friend would probably like additional time to express his appreciation for that very important addition to his own constituency.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In all fairness to the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for External Relations, who is here, I see that the two members in whose names the inquiries were made are not present. Therefore I must conclude this debate on the adjournment motion.

[English]

Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, last week CN Rail announced plans to lay off 33 per cent of its work force over the next three years. This announcement will lead to the loss of approximately 200 jobs in New Brunswick, 11 of which are in my riding of Restigouche—Chaleur.

Furthermore, there is talk of the possible abandonment of the CN line through northern New Brunswick.

[Translation]

I would like to express my complete disagreement with this approach. Over the past ten years, Canadian National has eliminated more than 2,000 jobs in my region, and it wants to eliminate even more. Other communities hit by severe cutbacks by CN received some kind of compensation. Although my region was promised compensation, CN has yet to deliver.

[English]

The government and CN Rail must maintain these jobs and the rail line through northern New Brunswick in order to guarantee the economic viability and development of both the region and the province.

I call upon the government and CN to immediately halt this blatant attack on rural Canada.

• (1405)

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of members the plight of residents in my community who have lost faith with Transport Canada.

Residents in my community were extremely pleased to participate last year in the hearings conducted by the environmental assessment review panel studying expansion at Pearson airport. They were encouraged by the platitudes being uttered that Transport Canada and the airport's management were all for public participation and input. They said that they wanted to keep residents involved in the future of Pearson.

Unfortunately, the government wasted their time. The residents made impassioned presentations about the unbearable levels of noise around their homes. They told of violated flight paths and jets breaking regulations by taking off in the middle of the night. They made it clear that if Transport Canada wanted to listen they had lots to say. Sadly, they were completely ignored.

The announcement of more runways makes it obvious that Transport Canada never had any intention of listening to residents in my community. It seems clear that the pattern of abuse that the airport and Transport Canada have demonstrated to my residents over the years is only going to continue.

STATUS OF THE ARTIST

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-7 respecting the status of the artist was adopted by this House on June 11, 1992 and received royal assent on June 23 that same year. Although the legislation has yet to come into force and is therefore not being implemented, the government is very proud of its up-to-date legislation that recognizes the status of the artist.

Because of this situation, a number of major dossiers are now on hold. This is serious, because artists' associations cannot reactivate these dossiers until the legislation is officially proclaimed, without putting the interests of the artists in jeopardy. It is high time this government stopped congratulating itself and decided to act, because it is one thing to be well intentioned and pass legislation, but another thing entirely to implement that legislation.

FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, free trade is working for Canada. In 1992 our merchandise exports to the U.S. surged to an all-time high of $122 billion, smashing the previous record of $110 billion set in 1990.

Every $1 billion in exports creates or maintains 15,000 jobs. Canada's exports to the U.S. increased by $31 billion in 1989-91, just after the Canada-U.S. FTA came into effect, compared to 1986-88.

According to the U.S. department of commerce, average monthly imports into the U.S. from Canada are up 25.9 per cent since the FTA, compared to the four-year period prior to the FTA.

According to Statistics Canada, 16 of 22 Canadian manufacturers increased their market share in the U.S. under the FTA.

Between 1988 and 1991 Canadian high-tech exports to the U.S. grew from $6.6 billion to $10.7 billion, which is a 63 per cent jump.

CROW BENEFIT

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in its report made public yesterday the national transport act review commission recommended changing the Crow benefit from a transportation policy to a payment to farmers. That payment has already been reduced by 10 per cent for the next two crop years by virtue of the December economic statement by the Minister of Finance.

Is it the government's intention to phase out the Crow benefit? If so, what is the timetable for this phase-out? Those are the questions farm people are asking.

The government should make its intentions clear. Farmers want and need money at the elevator when they deliver their grain. The government's policy thus far increases freight rates and reduces transport payments, which means that the farmer pays more to receive less for his grain.

Tell me, how does that solve the farm income crisis on the prairies?

SEXUAL OFFENDERS

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, recently an Ontario coroner's jury conducted an inquest into the horrifying sex slaying of Christopher Stephenson, an 11-year old boy from Brampton, Ontario. The jury produced a report which recommended that a law be established to allow sexually violent predators to be kept in prison beyond their court-imposed sentences if they are judged still to be a risk to the public.

When a sexual offender is nearing the end of his term, corrections officials should be permitted to assess whether there is a high likelihood of re-offending, and on the basis of that review decide whether the offender should remain in jail.

I understand that officials of the Department of the Solicitor General are considering proposals at this time. I would urge the minister responsible to listen to the concerns that so many Canadians have regarding public safety and introduce the appropriate legislation as soon as possible.

NOVA SCOTIA FISHERY

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the fishing industry in Nova Scotia employs approximately 27,000 people, or 7.4 per cent of the work force in my province. Of this number, over half are employed in the inshore fishing industry. It is obvious that this industry is of vital importance to Nova Scotia.

This industry suffers from declining stocks and increasing processing capacity. The Liberal Party recognizes that declining stocks are the result of foreign overfishing and bad management of quotas both within and beyond the 200-mile limit.

Those who work in the fisheries in Nova Scotia simply want to fish. They do not want to rely on government assistance. The prospective loss of employment coupled with the potential death of their communities and their way of life has many of these people worried. Something must be done.

The government must move away from short-term solutions. Greater responsibility must be taken to ensure that fish quotas are stringently observed by all parties involved, and that includes foreign fishing vessels.

The people in the fishery in my riding want to know what the future holds for them, what is going to happen to their industry down the road, and what is going to happen to them next year. They need answers and they need them now.

COMMUNITY FUTURES PROGRAM

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to voice my concerns to the House and to the government regarding the renewal of various Community Futures programs.

As the House knows, many of these programs are about to wind down as their government support comes to an end.

I can speak best of the Community Futures corporation in my area, which is the Triple S group. This group is being recommended by the department to close down, not because it has failed but because it has been successful.

I find it strange that the department wants to fund failure but fails to support success.

I call upon the minister to review the applications of second generation Community Futures funding with the strategy of endorsing success and eliminating failure.

FOREIGN AID

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the latest government estimates contained many cuts. There are serious cuts to seniors, official languages, literacy and aboriginal programs.

Perhaps one of the cruelest cuts, which is often overlooked, is to foreign aid. With this particular cut contained in these estimates, $4.3 billion will have been cut from foreign aid over the last five years. Yet the government has reported that it is able to find $5.8 billion for helicopters.

This government has gone back on its promise to increase Official Development Assistance to .7 per cent of the GNP. It has now slipped to less than half of that.

The Global Village Voice reported the words of a Zambian woman. She said: "We are burying our children every day as if we were planting beans".

Priorities, priorities, what are the government's priorities?

MEMBER FOR MISSISSAUGA EAST

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to continue the education of my colleague from Mississauga East in the wake of her vitriolic attack on this government's commitment to social programs.

If I had to summarize this government's activities in one word, that word would have to be groundbreaking.

For the first time in Canada we had a government that took the initiative in the fight against AIDS, that recognized the unique and so very serious reality of breast cancer, that instituted tax reform to lower the tax burden of 90 per cent of this country's senior citizens, and that initiated a nation-wide panel to confront the ever growing crisis of violence against women.

I, for one, and the constituents of Simcoe Centre appreciate the government's efforts. In fact, over 2,000 of my constituents availed themselves of the opportunity I offered to contribute input to that panel. I wonder if my colleague can say the same.

The presence of violence and poverty in Canada is a tragedy. However, as one who is deeply concerned about social issues I would hope that in the future my colleague from Mississauga East might refrain from exploiting the disadvantaged in Canada to make partisan statements. Her constituents and all Canadians would be better served if she offered constructive solutions rather than venomous, slanted attacks.

LANGUAGE MINORITIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court of Canada has twice confirmed the right of language minorities to manage and administer their own educational institutions.

Despite these two decisions by the highest legal authority in this country, some provinces are still dragging their feet on a matter of elementary educational justice that was an accepted fact nearly 12 years ago.

Since apparently these rights are closely linked to federal money, it is time the federal government sat down with the provinces, which have jurisdiction over education, and that a decision was made, once and for all.

• (1415)

That language minorities should have to go through all these legal contortions to defend their rights is simply intolerable. Official language minorities are asking only for recognition of their equality rights, no more and no less than the Constitution of our country guarantees: to be treated fairly and equitably without having constantly to ask.

CRIME PREVENTION

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to thank my colleagues on the justice committee for their work during our recent hearings on crime prevention.

The culmination of the committee's work is found in our unanimous report Crime Prevention in Canada: Toward a National Strategy. We have concluded that the conventional crime control model does not work.

As Canadians are aware crime is on the increase. Many offenders are not being brought to justice and others are not being rehabilitated. Our system fails to address the underlying factors associated with crime which, if confronted, could prevent crime.

As a result Canadians live in fear as the cycles of criminal behaviour continue. Our committee has recommended a new approach to crime prevention in Canada. We must reduce opportunity for crime. We must shift our policing efforts to concentrate on the community.

We must address the social and economic conditions that breed crime. We must teach kids about crime prevention at all levels of their education, and we must provide Canadians with a means to avoid becoming involved in criminal activity.

This requires a co-ordinated effort. I am proud to have contributed to what I believe is an outstanding report. My committee colleagues and I are eagerly awaiting the response of the government to our 11 recommendations.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, long-term sustainable development in the Third World only occurs when basic human development needs are met.

Infrastructure and other advanced economic development will only happen when basic health care, nutritional, educational and training needs are fulfilled. Non-governmental organizations are by far the best vehicle for Canada to use to deliver development assistance. NGOs are ideally suited to working with counterparts in developing countries and provide tens of thousands of Canadians with opportunities for direct involvement in development work both in Canada and abroad.

Despite all this the government has so lost touch with the reality of international development that it has decided yet again to slash support to Canadian non-governmental organizations. Instead of undermining their development work the government ought to be asking NGOs to help increase Canada's commitment to basic human development.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Minister for International Trade once again confirmed that the government intends to proceed very quickly with the bill to ratify the free trade agreement between Canada, the United States and Mexico. Yesterday in Washington, however, U.S. trade representative Mickey Kantor stated firmly that the Clinton administration would not proceed with ratification of the treaty until it gets side agreements on labour, the environment and import surges.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he agrees it would be far more sensible for Canada to wait until these parallel negotiations have taken place before proceeding with a bill as important as this one.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first let me say that we believe the North American free trade agreement is good for Canada without having the side agreements on the environment and on labour.

I should remind my hon. friend that in February last year we initiated discussions with the Americans and the Mexicans on side agreements on labour and the environment. They were rejected at the time so we welcome this opportunity to continue the agenda that we commenced in February of last year.

The processes of legislation in Canada, in the United States and in Mexico are under way right now. It is different in each country but it will conclude at roughly the same time. The heads of government of each of the three countries have said that they were committed to the January 1 start-up date. They are committed to not reopening the North American free trade agreement that was signed last December.

• (1420)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the minister that the Americans have decided that they will not proceed unless there are agreements in relation to the environment, labour standards and import surges.

Why is the government not proceeding with its own list, namely a definition of subsidy and a definition of dumping? This week the C. D. Howe Institute said it was a big problem that we did not have clear definitions.

Why does the government not take the occasion to find the solution that Canada needs before getting into that big deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me remind my hon. friend that if we move to a definition of subsidy and changes to the anti-dumping rules we would be reopening the North American free trade agreement.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Each of the three heads of government is committed to not doing that.

My hon. friend cannot have it both ways. If he wants to reopen the North American free trade agreement he has to give something to get, and the Americans want a change in the cultural exemption and a change in the supply management protection. Some members of Congress want to have a change in the dispute settlement system.

Which of those things would my hon. friend like to give to the Americans to get his changes in the dumping and subsidy rules?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand in a business such as this one not having a definition of subsidy or a definition of dumping before we get into an agreement. We are having so much difficulty because we have to follow the wishes of the American Congress. When will this government stand up for Canadian interests?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has not answered my question. What is he prepared to give up? He says he is going to open—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend cannot have it both ways. He says he wants to reopen the agreement but he is not prepared to say what he is going to give up.

Is he going to give up the cultural exemption? Is he going to give up protection for the supply management sector? Is he going to give up the dispute settlement mechanism?

Canadians understand that my hon. friend is trying to bridge the differences between the protectionist parts of his party from Winnipeg and the free trade parts of his party from Etobicoke. Everybody sees through that.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister of trade knows perfectly well that the United States is imposing new conditions on the North American free trade agreement through the device of parallel accords.

Let me ask a question of the Minister of the Environment. Last November the minister issued a statement in which he announced that the North American free trade agreement "adequately safeguards the environment". Yet only a few days ago in this House the Minister for Science conceded "we have finally got the Americans to talk about such things as environmental protection".

What exactly is this government's position? Does the government still claim that NAFTA itself, the NAFTA text, adequately safeguards the environment? Or, is it now admitting belatedly that the agreement falls short on environmental protection and needs to be supplemented by a parallel accord? Which is it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I thought the question was put to me.

I am delighted to answer a question from the free trader from Etobicoke North. He asks about the provisions in the North American free trade agreement as they relate to the environment. These provisions are as strong as any trade agreement in the world today in the protection of the environment, and I am happy to discuss this at length.

• (1425)

He is asking if we are prepared to have discussions to improve on that. Certainly we are. That was the proposal I put forward back in February last year. We reiterated that in September.

One of the results of this is the North American Commission on the Environment. We have been working with the previous administration and the new administration on the mandate of that. The focus of that will be primarily on enforcement and helping the Mexicans in principle to improve their enforcement capabilities.

My colleague, the Minister of the Environment, will tell us that we have provided, I believe it is, $1 million to help the Mexicans with their enforcement measures. That is the direction in which we are going. It is one of the key objectives of the side agreement on the environment.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, let me understand the minister. He says that his objective is some sort of commission on the environment to be created in a parallel accord on the free trade agreement.

Let me ask the minister this question. The United States trade representative yesterday said the United States would walk away from the table, walk away from the agreement, unless it got its three parallel accords.

The minister will know that there is in environment matters, to take one example, a demand on the U.S. part for a trilateral commission which can challenge national environmental law and standards—and that is why I directed my earlier question to the Minister of the Environment—and, second, would impose a broadly based import duty to supplement funding for environmental protection.

Does Canada support that type of proposal? Are we advocating that there be imposed what is in effect a new tariff in what is supposedly a tariff-free zone? Is that the sort of thing Canada wants? Or, has Canada any objectives at all in the negotiation of these parallel accords? What are Canada's objectives?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I will just quote from Mr. Kantor's testimony yesterday as it related to environmental matters. He said: "There is no enforcement mechanism. We are looking at certain national, not supernational mechanisms under the present NAFTA that might be available in connection with the commissions". There is no intent on their part or on our part to impose our views on standards because that would be an incursion into Mexican sovereignty and that works both ways, as Ambassador Kantor said in his testimony yesterday as well.

We are trying to use this North American Commission on the Environment to raise the awareness, the understanding of how enforcement measures could be used more effectively. That is a major advancement we can have as a result of the North American free trade agreement, because without the agreement we would not be having these discussions at all.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

According to newspaper reports today sources including from the Department of National Defence and other industry experts have raised considerable questions about the attack helicopters that are being proposed for $5.8 billion by this government.

Before the last election the Prime Minister and his government were proposing attack nuclear submarines. Those were cancelled. Will the Prime Minister do the right thing again and cancel these attack helicopters which are not necessary either?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to glance at the newspaper article to which my friend refers. The article is false.

Parenthetically I tell my hon. friend, perhaps just for the record and I know that she probably will not follow it, these are not attack helicopters. These are helicopters recommended by the military of Canada for search and rescue, for the preservation and protection of Canadian sovereignty, for the fisheries, plus of course to help us in peacekeeping initiatives around the world. They are not for attack purposes. They are there to modernize Canada's fleet in respect of our international obligations.

Let me make it very clear that this government plans to honour all those international obligations.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

I am sure the Prime Minister knows that there is not another country that is purchasing these helicopters for search and rescue, that in fact they are used as anti-submarine helicopters.

I want to say to the Prime Minister who expressed concern for Canada carrying out its search and rescue obligations that we know now the Labrador has had some very serious safety concerns raised by both those who fly that particular helicopter and their families. Clearly if the purchase of the new helicopters is to replace these it will take at least five years.

Will the Prime Minister say today that instead of purchasing $5.8 billion worth of new helicopters, he will refurbish the Labradors, he will do it now and he will think of the safety of those people now, not five years from now?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is possible to refurbish the Labrador helicopters at a cost of $1 billion. It would probably extend their life maybe five or ten years. The problem, even if that money was spent, is that it would not bring them up to the search and rescue capabilities of the EH-101.

I share with the hon. leader of the NDP a concern about our aging Labrador helicopter fleet. It is why I agree with the recommendation made by the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs that the helicopters should not only be replaced but it should be done as quickly as possible to avoid costly interim measures. When these new helicopters are delivered we will have the finest search and rescue capability possible in the world. The best technology for Canadians.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

For a purchase price of $5.8 billion, it seems to me we could have a national child care program, we could deal with poverty in this society and we could have the best country in the world if we chose our priorities right.

I want to ask the Prime Minister, will he do the right thing now and withdraw the purchase of these helicopters in the interest of the programs that Canadians need?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend said in her prefatory remark that there is not another country that uses these advanced helicopters. She is quite right. They have not been manufactured yet.

That is the reason they are so useful to Canadian forces for instances ranging from search and rescue to helping peacekeeping initiatives off the coast of Africa. They are multi-faceted, they are very much needed in the minds of the military to enable Canadian soldiers to fulfil our international obligations.

My hon. friend raises a very good question. Are there other things that we could do with the money? Yes there are. As a government we have tried to constrain the cost of government. We have tried to constrain the cost of growth in government. The problem is not that we are black-hearted accountants but that the cost of servicing the debt is absorbing a greater and greater amount of every tax dollar, thereby diminishing our capacity if I may say to do certain things like the very important matter raised by my hon. friend.

We have established good credentials I think as a country in social policy. It is not perfect, but good, and we have established very admirable credentials as a country in defence and foreign policy.

It is the view of the government that these helicopters are required to enhance and ensure the maintenance of that very reputation of Canada for reliability and service to the international community. We have made those decisions, we have established those priorities and we intend to honour them.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Yesterday in reference to an accident involving a Canadian forces helicopter in the Gulf of Mexico, the minister stated that the crash occurred with the Sea King because of old, unsafe helicopters.

Is the minister saying the Canadian forces fleet of Sea King helicopters that our people are flying is unsafe?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, nor did I say that the reason for the crash was because the helicopter was old.

An hon. member: It is in Hansard.

• (1435)

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): No. What I said was that it is an aged fleet of helicopters. That is why the hon. member who asked the question was part of a unanimous consensus in the standing committee of this House that the Sea King helicopters be replaced by the EH-101 as soon as possible and I agree with that member.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister who is displaying a frightful ignorance of the matters for which she is responsible.

The quotation yesterday was: "I am aware that the men and women serving in the Canadian forces need to be safe and not made to fly old unsafe helicopters".

The minister knows that the Canadian forces do not have their men and women fly in unsafe helicopters. She should also know that the squadron commander involved in this case stated that it was unlikely that the crash was related to maintenance.

I want to ask the minister why she is playing politics with this important and very sensitive issue?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I am playing politics, I am a real piker in that department I assure you.

I am quite prepared to agree with the hon. member that the crash was not a result of maintenance simply because we maintain our helicopters to the highest standards.

The reason why that hon. member and his colleagues on the standing committee voted to replace the Sea King helicopters as soon as possible to avoid costly interim measures—this is the exact wording of the recommendation—is because they recognized that even with the best maintenance in the world, at a certain age those helicopters will not be safe for Canadian men and women. That is why we are replacing them with the finest helicopters and the best technology that we can provide for our forces.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Defence who has not confirmed that the Sea King helicopter is indeed a safe helicopter for our military crews to fly.

The minister knows that the U.S. navy and marines have retrofitted 239 Labrador helicopters. The job is complete. They have retrofitted over 250 Sea King equivalent helicopters. The job is complete. She knows that only Canada among NATO nations has chosen to spend $6 billion of taxpayers' money at a time when the Minister of Finance promises a tough new budget for reasons that are completely inexplicable.

I want to ask the Minister of National Defence the following question. Does she believe the search and rescue helicopter which is now in service, the Labrador, to be a safe helicopter?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Labrador helicopter is a wonderful helicopter. Those who fly it are very fond of it.

Mr. Tobin: Have you ever been on it?

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Yes, I have been on a Labrador helicopter. What I would say to the hon. member is that the American Labrador helicopter fleet is younger than our helicopter fleet. When our Labrador helicopters were the same age as the American helicopter fleet, we also did a complete refit of them.

However we are now looking to replace our Labrador helicopters because after a certain number of years there is a limit to what one can accomplish by a refit. Those helicopters are aging, the air frames are too old and it is time to think in advance of replacing them so that by the time they become unserviceable we will have replacements for them.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

I would like to know if the minister is aware that on February 9 three members of this caucus and four members of our staff were told by the senior officers of the minister's department that both the Labrador and the Sea King with a retrofit can fly at least until the year 2020 for one-third the cost of purchasing the EH-101. Why is she not acting on that recommendation?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the name and the precise detail because that is not in fact correct. Perhaps if they are only flying 500 off the ground and they are not doing very serious missions that may be true.

However our helicopters have very serious tasks to do, both in their shipboard and their search and rescue capabilities. I believe that Canadians need the technology of the 1990s, not the technology of the 1950s, to serve those tasks.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. It concerns the issue of the NAFTA and parallel accords.

The Prime Minister said ironically but not surprisingly to an American audience that these parallel accords have little if anything to do with Canada. This certainly contradicts the words of the trade minister.

Yesterday U.S. trade representative Mickey Kantor said: "I am prepared to walk away from the table if we cannot get satisfactory agreements". When asked, the minister responsible said negotiations start next week. We know the American position. It is a strong one. We do not know what Canada's position is.

If the minister is not prepared to defend Canadian workers and Canada's environment, why he is going to the table at all?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend refers to a quote where I said they had little if anything to do with Canada.

He should keep reading the rest of the quote. Perhaps when he rises to ask his next question, he could give the rest of the quote where I indicated that the concerns of the United States are principally with the environment and labour laws in Mexico.

If there are discussions of any kind because of the trilateral and tripartite nature of our fundamental agreement, Canada will be part and parcel of all those discussions to protect Canadian interests at all times.

With regard to the suggestion that Mickey Kantor might want to walk away from the table, good for him. Simon Reisman walked away from the table in 1987 and we got a very good deal as a result of Ambassador Reisman's exits.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, some would dispute how good that deal was.

An hon. member: Including Simon Reisman.

Ms. Hunter: Including Simon Reisman. The Prime Minister was quoted as saying that we do not have trans-boundary issues between Canada and the U.S.

Is the Prime Minister aware that there are 43 toxic hot spots in the Great Lakes alone, 30 of them on the U.S. side. Where is the confidence of the Canadian people when these types of people are negotiating our interests?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if there is a recognition of some hot spots around the Great Lakes, it is because through the Great Lakes action plan and the water quality agreement that we have with the United States, we have entered into agreements with the United States to undertake a clean-up of these hot spots.

In fact there are remedial action plans such as the very successful one in Hamilton throughout the Great Lakes. I may add that we are dealing very effectively with these issues and that the American and the Canadian governments have made the Great Lakes a high priority.

I am happy to report to the hon. member that in my conversation with Carol Browner, the new EPA administrator, I indicated to her that the government wanted to maintain the Great Lakes as a high priority issue between both governments.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

His deputy minister has admitted that because of the proposed changes to the UI program, new security measures will be imposed at UI offices across the country.

If the government believes that the changes to UI are fair, why does the government need to take new security measures against violence? To what does the minister attribute the anticipated rise in violence?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in all fairness to the deputy and what he stated, I think he should be quoted correctly in this House.

What he indicated is that the department is concerned about the security of public servants throughout the country. In recent years we have witnessed in different offices across Canada some acts that are unacceptable. In order to protect our people, we had to have security measures.

We are reviewing on an ongoing basis the security measures in our offices to protect our employees and we will continue to do that.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the same minister.

It is obvious to me and to all Canadians that the relationship between the unemployed of this country and this government is deteriorating to the point that new security measures must be imposed in order for dialogue to occur.

• (1445)

Instead of wasting so much political energy on attacking the unemployed, why does the minister not attack unemployment and put Canadians back to work?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the record is clear.

The Liberal Party is still arguing that a person in Canada who chooses deliberately, voluntarily and without provocation to quit a job should be paid benefits.

That may be the position of the Liberal Party. It is not the position of this government.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, today the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre issued 27 recommendations, many of which are stinging indictments of this government's policies.

For example, it calls for expanded federal government programs for funding training. It is calling for this expanded role for the federal government at the same time as over the past four years this government has cut $217 million out of its share of funding for training.

Will the government now consider reversing its policies and assume its fair responsible share of training programs?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if that member were informed before making such statements, he would know that of the training funds spent at all levels of government across Canada, the federal government spends close to 73 per cent of all money on training.

In the last three years this government has increased the training funds for unemployed Canadians from $500 million to $2.8 billion. This year we will be spending $3.1 billion on training for Canadians. That is a record to which the Liberals can never compare.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, this is a sham and a fraud on Canadians.

The minister has not read recommendation 21 which says: "Training course costs should not be shifted from general revenues to the UI account paid for by the workers".

The report concludes that "Canada's record of investment in physical public infrastructure such as for transportation, communications and the environment is one of the lowest of the G-7 countries" and has undermined "the potential of private investment as well as income and employment security".

Since this government has rejected our party's call for a stronger federal infrastructure program, would it at least accept this unanimous view of labour and business including its very good friends in the BCNI?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member likes to read. He should also read the estimates where he will find out about training money in Canada.

The sham and fraud he refers to is that of a Liberal member standing up when the Liberals have opposed Bill C-21 which has seen a 450 per cent increase in training funds for unemployed Canadians. He has the gall to stand in this House and say that he is concerned about unemployed Canadians.

Those members know that training is key to accessing new jobs in this new economy. They oppose every measure that we propose.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Business and labour today released what to us is an exciting report to revive our economy. It has 27 recommendations to which both sides agree. This report calls for full employment, for government investment in infrastructure, for better ways of getting capital to small and medium-sized business, for increased importance for training and child care.

Will the government look seriously at this independent call for a new approach? Will it listen before the next budget to business and labour leaders who have brought forward these unanimous recommendations?

• (1450)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to read the report in detail. However, if the hon. member has an accurate reflection of its summary, then all we would have to do is refer to the economic statement I introduced in December. It covers every one of the points the hon. member made. Therefore, I ask him to re-read it.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, today when business and labour jointly put forward their report they called on the government to re-establish the role of unemployment insurance as income support for individuals by ensuring that training course purchase costs are not shifted from general revenues to the UI account.

This government collects taxes from workers and then collects UI premiums from workers to use for training.

Will the Minister of Employment and Immigration listen to the combined voices of business and labour and take UI training costs out of general revenue? Will the minister join business and labour to rebuild the economy in Canada?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know this government is spending a record $1.6 billion out of general revenue to train Canadians.

The fiscal situation of Canada is such that we have to live within our means and yet even at that level we have to borrow a lot. We have tried to activate some of this income security money in the UI fund so that we can help Canadians acquire new skills in order that they can enter the labour market.

I know the hon. member and her party oppose activation of passive funds where we pay people to do nothing and where we penalize them if they want to get out of that. This government has taken steps to activate these passive funds and I am sure we will continue in that direction.

LOCKPORT BRIDGE

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, as you know I have stood in this House many times voicing the concerns of the community of Lockport in my riding.

There is a problem in the fact that the federal government through Public Works is refurbishing a bridge. However, it has caused a significant problem in the business community because it prohibits traffic from travelling back and forth.

I ask the minister what is happening to the advertising support campaign that I requested a number of weeks ago?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the House is well aware of the tremendous concern of my colleague for this project. He knows that we recently let a contract to repair part of the bridge. During this time, at his suggestion, our department has made arrangements to be in contact with representatives of the Triple-S Community Development Society. Therefore, everyone will know that Lockport is still open for business and that we are proceeding not only to repair this facility but to support the business community in the way he suggested.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

This government is asking too much of New Brunswickers and Monctonians. The Moncton CNR shops closed throwing 2,000 Monctonians out of work. CNR's announcement last week will add another 325 Monctonians to the list. The government's announced closure of the military supply depot means another 450 Monctonians out on the street.

Enough is enough. Where is the fairness? When will the minister bring in a coherent rail transportation policy which will put Atlantic Canadians back to work?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will be pleased to learn that about a year and a half ago the Council of Transport Ministers started elaborating on a national rail network. This group is presided over by the Minister of Transport for New Brunswick.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): That is not really too much help to Monctonians and to New Brunswickers.

• (1455)

The National Transportation Act review says that the government should move even faster in the area of rail line abandonment and the abandonment of the goals of regional development. This is now government policy. Obviously this government and the review committee have no grasp of transportation issues in Atlantic Canada.

When will the government deal with the crisis in transportation in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the premier of New Brunswick who is the leader of the Liberal Party in that province will be greatly moved by the great testimony of confidence the hon. Liberal member from New Brunswick has given to him in this Question Period in the House of Commons.

I reassure him that the recommendations we have received from this excellent review of the NT act of 1987 are thanks to a clause which was put in that piece of legislation in 1987 to review it after five years. We have received a very good report. We have asked the Standing Committee on Transport to review it and give us its sense of what it believes as elected members of this House we should do.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Last month the government announced its intention to move forward with the construction of three additional runways at Pearson International Airport. This was despite the findings of an environmental assessment panel which examined the feasibility of expansion and overwhelmingly recommended that the government reject its expansion plans.

How can the minister condone this government's decision and action when an environmental panel of his own department has strongly recommended the very opposite course of action?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as usual the member from the opposite side is reading into the report something which is not there.

What the environmental panel said was that it was not in agreement with our suggestion to construct a cross-wind runway at a certain place and to a certain length. The panel in the report recommended to put it elsewhere and to put it shorter and that it be submitted to a panel of safety experts which we did. The panel of safety experts said that the proposed cross-wind runway should be built where it was suggested by Transport Canada. This is what we are going to do.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, again I go to the Minister of the Environment because when push comes to shove, whether it is the Oldman River dam, the Rafferty dam or now Pearson airport, the minister's assessment review is not worth the paper it is written on.

This latest panel has been studying this expansion project since 1989. It has received 225 representations and 400 briefs from the public. It has cost over $1 million of taxpayers' dollars. It has recommended strongly against the three runway configuration. Given all of that, how can the minister condone and support such an abandonment of this government's so-called priority for sustainable development policy? What will he do about it?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member is well informed on how the environmental assessment process works. There have been many more environmental assessments than the ones he has referred to in his question. A lot of them meet the exact goal set for them and that is to inform the government about the environmental impacts of major projects as they proceed. As the recommendations are made, the government deals with them.

In this case I think the member is not well informed about the security dimensions of this file. He would do well to go back and read the report and see the reaction from the Department of the Environment.

In closing, may I remind the hon. member that we have just brought forward a piece of legislation on environmental assessment, Bill C-13. It is the first one of its kind in Canada. By the way, his own party supported it.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Will the minister introduce amendments to the Criminal Code which would provide stiffer penalties for using children in the production of pornography?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I know that all members of the House share an abhorrence of pornography and especially pornography that uses children. Members of the House will know that a year ago the Supreme Court upheld the provisions in the Criminal Code vis-a-vis pornography.

• (1500)

I will take his suggestion that we should increase the penalty under advisement. At the same time I think wherever possible attorneys general in all provinces should prosecute the present Criminal Code provisions vigilantly.

EDUCATION

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

The faculty of St. Jean of the University of Alberta is a vital educational resource for Alberta's francophones. I recently met with representatives of Edmonton's francophone community who expressed their concerns for the future of the institution.

I would like to ask the minister—

—what kind of assistance the federal government is prepared to give the community educational centres of the faculty of St. Jean?

Hon. Monique Landry (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, like my predecessors, I am committed to supporting francophone or anglophone minority communities so that they can have access to better education, community and school management services.

As far as this particular project is concerned, it happens to be in line with our policy to help communities obtain access to better education.

In this respect, I can inform the hon. member that the project will be looked at favourably, and together with the community and the province of Alberta I hope to be able to contribute towards supporting this project.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents in my riding of Yukon who are concerned about the crisis in the Canadian airline industry, which is due in large part to government deregulation.

They point out that there will be significant job losses and service cuts as a result of the failure of a major Canadian air carrier. They further point out that remote communities depend on regular safe airline service.

The petitioners therefore call upon Parliament to urge the government to take immediate steps to re-regulate the airline industry.

SRI LANKA

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present this petition signed by approximately 100 individuals within my riding. It is with regard to the unfortunate situation in Sri Lanka.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to call upon the two parties to the conflict, the Sri Lankan government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, to express their willingness to accept mediation in the conflict between them and agree upon a mutually acceptable neutral mediator, and to express their willingness to commence negotiations with a view to entering into an internationally guaranteed accord to establish an associative structure within which the Sinhali people and the Tamil people may live in peace and in freedom.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions contained in Standing Order 36 it is my pleasure to present to this House a petition from several hundred constituents of my city.

They urge that Parliament consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violent and degrading material, such as serial killer board games, can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

I present this petition to Parliament today with my full and total support.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the privilege to present before Parliament petitions that have been given to me from constituents.

They say that the incidence of violence against women and children is unacceptable and the present social climate is such that when many women report incidents of assault or abuse they are victimized instead of helped. Therefore these petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children, encourage and support women to report incidents of assault or abuse, to concentrate special efforts on the training of police, lawyers, court workers and judges to help them become knowledgeable about women and child abuse and to focus public attention on this very important and long ignored problem.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of central British Columbia from a variety of communities, including the congregation of the First United Church of Salmon Arm. They are concerned about the implications of the NAFTA agreement in terms of it likely leading to the exportation of fresh water from Canada. They are not convinced it will not open the door to fresh water sales and transfers to the United States.

They are asking that the Government of Canada take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that our fresh water rivers not be diverted to the U.S.A.

JUSTICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by many hundreds of people from my constituency in memory of Dawn Shaw, a little girl who was raped and murdered in my riding just a few months ago.

They note that children in our communities are increasingly becoming victims of sexual assault and violence. They propose a number of suggestions that could be implemented by Parliament to deal with this problem.

They ask judges that sexual assault charges not be allowed to be dropped if the case takes too long coming to trial and that prison sentences for sexual assault be lengthened. They also call for the permission for police to take DNA samples from persons suspected of sexual assault and that DNA imprints be kept on file in a national police data base.

In memory of Dawn Shaw, they request that Parliament enact legislation to change the justice system to provide greater protection for children from sexual assault and to assure conviction of offenders.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present on behalf of residents of the city of Saskatoon today.

The first petition was originated by the students of the University of Saskatchewan, who point out that the GST was the first ever federal tax to be applied to magazines, newspapers and books in Canada. They point out that the GST on reading material has been particularly harmful to publishers, book stores, library students and writers. They also remind us that the Prime Minister promised in 1990 to have a review of the effects of the GST on reading material after a year.

Obviously that has not happened, and the petitioners call upon Parliament to immediately eliminate the GST on reading material.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, my second petition refers to Bill C-91 which the residents of Saskatoon ask not to be implemented, though of course it has been. They also ask for a repeal of Bill C-22, the predecessor of Bill C-91.

The appropriate action now is that both of them be repealed. I am only too pleased to pass on this message on behalf of the residents of Saskatoon because the effects of the bill, as they point out, will be to enormously increase the cost of drugs to the citizens of Canada and certainly the province of Saskatchewan and the medicare drug plans thereof.

OPPOSITION DAY MOTION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I would seek the unanimous consent of the House for the following:

That the name of the hon. member for Western Arctic be substituted for that of the member for Nunatsiaq for the purposes of moving the motion that we will be discussing immediately at Orders of the Day.

The reason I am seeking this is to permit the member for Western Arctic to appear before the parliamentary committee on Indian affairs later about a land claims issue in the Northwest Territories, an area that is partially represented by the hon. member. Therefore I seek the consent of all of the House because of this situation and because it is vital for the member to be able to be there for the benefit of her constituents.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the request. Is there unanimous consent?

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I would like to say that we agree to give unanimous consent and wish to thank the member for consulting us beforehand and thus respecting us as a party.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I was on my feet earlier but you were obviously not able to see me.

I want to simply say that we have no difficulty in giving unanimous consent, but I do want to use this opportunity to make the following comment.

• (1515)

On a number of occasions when I sought unanimous consent on some very non-controversial issues those in the Liberal Party denied it. We are not denying unanimous consent today. I hope they would be supportive in the future.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—ABORIGINAL FAMILIES AND CHILDREN

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew moved:

That this House condemns the government for its abandonment of aboriginal families and children.

She said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to the motion today to focus on what I consider to be the government's dismal record of dealing with the continuing problems that plague aboriginal children and their families. It makes the future of many First Nations people bleaker .

It is extremely sad and deceptive of this government to wear two completely different hats in its dealings with aboriginal peoples. On one hand, the government continues to speak out to the international community in support of the Year of Indigenous Peoples. In fact,

Canada is seen to be one of the world's leading supporters and promoters of this event. Yet here in Canada this government continues to do everything in its power to diminish the cultural and linguistic rights and existence of aboriginal peoples.

More seriously, this government continues to let the aboriginal people of Canada teeter on the brink of socio-economic destruction. In many aboriginal communities we have a 90 per cent unemployment and an 85 per cent drop-out rate. We have the highest rates of recidivism. We still have a high rate of infant mortality. We have cancer and respiratory ailment rates that are many times the national average in the aboriginal communities. We also have the cutback of aboriginal economic development programs by 28.8 per cent, which will have a devastating impact on these communities.

This year's theme is Indigenous People's—A New Partnership. How can this government morally continue such a political and international charade? It seems to me that this government has no intention whatsoever to deal with the continuing problems that plague aboriginal communities across this country.

There are many Davis Inlets in this country of Canada. How then can the government expect Canadians, aboriginal and non-aboriginal, to believe that in this Year of Indigenous Peoples "new partnerships" will be fostered when the government's record on the state of aboriginal affairs from coast to coast to coast is absolutely shameful?

Clearly this government has completely lost touch with its responsibilities to aboriginal peoples when the finance minister's December 2 economic statement is a perfect example of this. The government's priorities are clear. Moneys will be spent on other priorities such as the obsolete use of helicopters. Their original purpose for a mission is now obsolete. Cruise missile testing will continue in the north although it is no longer warranted.

Aboriginal interest groups, friendship centres and communications organizations have been hit with 10 per cent funding cuts despite the growing need for these social and cultural resources.

I guess there have to be some shining lights in all this bad news. I attended the Dene Family Symposium in Fort Smith two days ago. It is very encouraging to see first hand the Dene people's focus on wellness. Most important is that the Dene people are doing it for themselves.

In the western Arctic, wellness think-tanks are springing up all over my riding. The community of Fort McPherson recently began an initiative called Pathways to Healing. Another community that is not in the Northwest Territories is sharing its expertise. That is the community of Tadoule Lake which has essentially picked itself up and dusted itself off through wellness initiatives and activities by its own people to return to a more productive community. These efforts allow aboriginal people to come together and pool their ideas at a time when alcoholism and other forms of abuse are rampant in our communities.

I believe that no one has the potential to do for aboriginal people what they can do for themselves. The problem is that in order to help themselves aboriginal people need the funding support of the federal government like all other citizens do to help themselves.

What they do not need are more studies. Communities and people know when they have a problem and what to do about that the problem and what healing is needed. This government needs to act—not listen. Funding cuts to desperately needed and already under-funded programs is not the action that needs to be taken.

I have an example that is very sad. As a result of the recent funding cuts the whole Western Arctic Native Communications Society is in jeopardy of going under. The story is the same around the country. The Press Independent, an outstanding newspaper with a readership of 5,700 and which serves the communities in the western Arctic, had its funding completely cut by the Secretary of State in 1990. The efforts to make it a commercial venture have been very difficult.

As one well knows, commercial ventures have suffered grievously over the last number of years. Numerous businesses have gone under and the bankruptcy rates are very high. To expect a small newspaper of this size to survive on its own is just unrealistic at this time and place.

The award-winning newspaper may be putting out its last publication this week. The timing of these difficult cuts at year's end could not come at a more difficult time. While the Press Independent struggles to keep its printers working, book drives have begun in western Arctic communities to satisfy the public's need for more reading materials.

Who tells the story better than newspapers like the Press Independent and Windspeaker? Who tells the story better than those newspapers about the importance of aboriginal priorities, values and traditions? Who puts the pictures out there of our elders and our children and issues that are pertinent to the survival of our people? What tells the story better of the importance of education, of the importance of housing, of the importance of land claims and of the importance of aboriginal rights questions than these newspapers?

There are other areas that are undergoing similar cuts. The National Association of Friendship Centres had a rally this afternoon on Parliament Hill at which a number of members of Parliament have spoken and the leaders of the national friendship centres have appeared themselves.

I have been overwhelmed with letters and faxes as have many members of Parliament, as well as the Prime Minister's office and cabinet ministers' offices I am sure. There were faxes from presidents, employees and aboriginal Canadians who run, work and use the unique services and many resources available through friendship centres and native organizations. From every corner of this country their message is clear to Ottawa. These cuts are unfair and unnecessary. Friendship centres across Canada have closed their doors today in staging a national day of protest.

As I have stated, I spoke at a rally this afternoon. People can best tell their stories themselves and we listened to what they had to say. The Tree of Peace Friendship Centre in Yellowknife is one example of the diversity of resources that friendship centres offer at the community level.

Tree of Peace offers kindergarten programs, adult education, native outreach programs and summer camp programs for children that are very important for single-parent families. It also offers drug and alcohol abuse counselling. All of these services and resources provide the means to develop self-esteem, personal development, cultural preservation and community awareness.

Ingamo Hall in Inuvik, Northwest Territories, will have to start charging user fees for its free programs when their $24,000 federal funding cut comes into effect next month. Can one imagine how heart breaking it is for a community that is known for its generosity to charge user fees to its own people for a service it used to offer free?

Many of the programs offered have become the backbone of this community: teen and elder programs, teen drop-in programs, elder social programs and voluntary programs for mothers. These are just to name a few of the programs that are offered by the friendship centres. There are many, many other centres across the country that deserve praise and they cannot all be named. In all ridings of members of Parliament and in senators' communities there are friendship centres that offer an invaluable service that cannot be measured by the government and have a price tag put on it. What can be offered is continuing support and not more cuts.

Another area that is feeling the pinch because of the government's inactivity is the fur industry defence program. I am hoping that the government will come forward and make a firm commitment. Funding for this program has only been committed to the end of this month, March 31, 1993.

We have checked on this and this is the case clearly as of today. At this very moment there has been no money set aside for the International Organization for Standardization or to continue trap research. The Minister of the Environment has publicly stated that there will be no money in place by the end of the month.

It is critical that the environment and international trade departments and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development come up with this money and come up with a cohesive strategy that makes some sense and that offers some hope to the 85,000 trappers across this country.

The economic livelihood of indigenous peoples is being seriously jeopardized by callous and insensitive and mostly foreign-financed animal rights campaigns. We have not heard a peep in terms of strategy from the federal government on how to respond to these groups that are financed to the tune of $20 million. We cannot as small communities put up the battle on our own. We need the help of the government.

The fur trade industry built Canada and brought the free-market economy to this country. What new partnerships is this government prepared to make with Canadian hunters and trappers to ensure that they meet the European Community requirements in 1995 and allow this economic and sustainable development to continue?

The incomes of 100,000 Canadians depend on access to fur markets. All of these programs enable aboriginal people to make the adjustment and transition from the simple, traditional way of life to the more complex and difficult challenge of integrating into the world of technology.

There is another area. I guess I have talked about friendship centres and also about native broadcast and communications societies that let native people regain their self-confidence and get in touch with their cultural identities through promotion, education and preservation. These are well worth preserving, but there are actually institutes that have been developed by aboriginal people themselves that are undergoing funding cuts. The Dene Cultural Institute in Hay River, Northwest Territories, is one fine example.

It received $200,000 a year from the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs. That is projected to undergo a 10 to 30 per cent cut. This is a cut that will have a direct impact on the future of this institute. Funding cuts will impact this organization's abilities. The Dene Cultural Institute, as small as it is, is a world leader in research efforts to preserve and develop the use of traditional knowledge and the environment and the important need to preserve powerful oral traditions and the knowledge of elders. This does not even mention the work that gets done in the area of sustainable development, conservation and habitat destruction studies and also now in the area of justice program alternatives. Alternative justice programs related to aboriginal communities is something that the Dene Cultural Institute is looking at. A cut as small as this, which to the government may seem harmless, is very much a huge impact on that particular institute and the people who work there.

My hat has to go off to the executive directors of those programs. It has become a very personal mission for those people to stay afloat and to keep the spirits of their personnel high. For people like Joanne Barnaby who has headed up the institute and has worked for years to develop the programs it is disheartening.

Obviously the government does not see the national and international importance of these resources, nor does it see the importance to provide these services. It is making it difficult for these services to continue. New partnerships in 1993 will not develop without the needed funding. Aboriginal peoples have lost faith in this government in these areas.

Aboriginal peoples have lost faith in the actions of the government with good reason. For example, health and welfare announced a plan to launch the Brighter Futures children's initiative. This initiative is in theory only. It does not seem to exist when it actually comes right down to the funding being provided.

The program was announced almost one year ago, in May 1992. However, today funding still has not been made available. Worth-while programs and desperately needed children's centres remain on hold or must be abandoned.

It is a shameful example of the government's smoke and mirror tactics in dealing with aboriginal peoples and specifically children in this case. We have a particular centre in my riding that could use the money. It wanted to fill out the application forms in order to get the money. It has been working on funding for one year and the Brighter Futures program will offer it not even a hope until the end of April.

It is simply an understatement to say that the plight of the aboriginal housing situation is critically serious. The Government of Canada cannot deny that the Third World housing conditions many aboriginal Canadians live in impact on aboriginal families, their children and their quality of life. The standing committee identified the critical need for housing both on and off reserves in the 1990 report Unfinished Business.

I want to talk specifically about the north because I have a very special mission. I know my hon. colleague for Kenora—Rainy River will deal with this issue in more detail.

Other than federal housing, there is virtually no private housing market in the Northwest Territories. Ninety-eight per cent of social housing clients in the north are aboriginals. After months of trying to get the federal minister responsible for housing to reinstate the Northwest Territories housing budget to the 1991 levels, the minister denied this request in September 1992.

Reinstatement of 1991 levels was recommended by the standing committee in its recent report. This federal reduction means that at least 200 fewer cost-shared housing units will be built in the Northwest Territories in 1993. Two hundred fewer. Without reinstatement to 1991 levels the Northwest Territories will only build 153 units across the whole Northwest Territories instead of 372 units.

The need in the north is that 3,945 units are required. There is a huge gap between what the government is able, willing and capable of doing and what it is actually doing or committed to doing, I should say. Without reinstatement to the 1991 levels, the Northwest Territories will only build 153 units.

As you all know, in the Northwest Territories we do not have a private market available to us. We do not have the options available to us as they do in the south. In the past, the Northwest Territories has had a 6.55 per cent protected reserve of national housing allocations. With the projected cuts to the Northwest Territories housing budget, it is now obvious the gap in the shortage of units will never be bridged and will only get wider and wider.

We are all panicking. The minister for housing from the Northwest Territories is extremely concerned about the results and the impact of this reserve not being protected any more and that it will be reduced. This will be reduced and the reason that we have had this reserve is because the need is so much greater and the alternatives and the options are much fewer. It is substantively justified that we maintain this reserve. I appeal to the government not to change this protective reserve.

This shortage in housing has resulted in much higher rates of sexual abuse, family violence, alcohol and drug abuse, suicides and high school drop-outs. The rates are much higher than are found in the south and many would say are directly related and linked to the overcrowding in the housing situation that exists.

How does the federal government justify its current spending priorities when northern Canadians do not have the fundamental necessity of adequate shelter to protect themselves from one of the world's harshest climates?

• (1535)

The housing crisis is affecting aboriginal families and children right across this country. Government restrictions on housing funding are forcing bands to build smaller houses and are forcing larger families and their children to sleep in overcrowded basements risking safety.

The basic amount allowed per housing unit needs to reflect the increase in cost of contracts and materials to accommodate the increased cost of the national building code standards.

Bands across the country are put into the position of having to pick and choose the most desperate family in need of housing in the community because the federal housing allowances are not even closely reflecting the actual needs of most bands.

Another issue that is extremely important is post-secondary education. On November 29, 1991 the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development appeared before the standing committee. He stated that the self-fulfilment of the aspirations and the destiny for aboriginal persons in this country required many things including opportunity and encouragement but that education was the most important ingredient of all.

It is unfortunate that the minister could not keep his commitment. The area of post-secondary education is seriously underfunded. The shortage in funding and the waiting list is so great that students have stopped applying to post-secondary institutions.

If you can believe it, in some areas we have an 85 per cent drop-out rate. That drop-out rate allows very few of our students to make it through high school. How then can you justify denying aboriginal students the right when they are eligible to enter college and university?

I appeal to the government. Please, for our children and for our country we need the help. We need the resources in a number of areas that are very serious and impact on the lives and the futures of our communities. Please support us and please make a difference in the lives of our families and our children.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the member for Western Arctic for her intense and complete submission to us on this opposition day. While it may seem to be opposition business, actually the plight she brings to us is a plight all Canadians share with her.

I have not had an opportunity to tell a little bit of the secrets about the intensity of the member opposite and I hope she will allow this. I do this to give an idea of how we worked together on the aboriginal affairs committee when we looked toward the resolution of the problem. I suggest in all sincerity that is uppermost in everyone's mind.

We recently completed a study dealing with housing to which the hon. member made reference. When we were welcomed in her community of Fort Norman we were not greeted in the normal way opposition members would greet one another. Instead, she met us and gave us all a hug. It was a significant bonding process that I experienced in Fort Norman. We took that with us throughout the completion of the study. I want to commend her for welcoming us into the human family as she did. All too often in the things we do in this building we have a tendency to lose our perspective on the real issues. As a result I think the committee operates in a much more productive way.

The minister of Indian affairs at a meeting held with Chief Roland Crowe in whose presence I happened to be did discuss some of the problems that are confronting some of the aboriginal communities. This particular one was the delivery of child and family services.

I believe that from the meeting's perspective, Saskatchewan and the minister seemed to be heading closer to a resolve of the provision of these services. To point to a statistic, in 1991 DIAND funded 36 Indian child and family agencies covering some 212 bands.

There is some progress being made in this progression toward Indian self-government, one that I support quite intently.

There was as well a comment made with respect to education and the fact that there was a drastic shortage in terms of educational funding being provided to our aboriginal children. The number of elementary and secondary students attending band-operated schools has tripled from 13,133 in 1981-82 to 40,513 in 1990-91. During the same period in 1990-91, the number of band-operated schools almost doubled from 159 to 312.

I do not think it is a secret that some of the communities we visited seemed to suggest that perhaps viability might be a question that should be addressed. Some of them were not experiencing the same kinds of services and facilities some southern communities were experiencing. Also, there seemed to be a great emphasis toward the need for further self-government.

Could the member comment about whether or not there are other solutions than simply sending money? I do not mean that in a degrading sense. Other than just making more money available, are there other solutions that we should be pursuing rather than just simply writing cheques?

Ms. Blondin-Andrew: Madam Speaker, I was very generous and gracious with my hugs because I thought maybe we were going to be given some nice cheques to do a lot of good work.

I know that committees are masters of their own destinies. I have to say the aboriginal affairs committee, many members of which will be speaking today, is a very hard-working and sincere group. I also salute them. We have Mr. Anawak and from the New Democratic Party we have Mr. Bob Skelly. We also have members from the other side, Mr. Schneider, our chairman. There is Bob Nault as well. We work well together and we aim to achieve our goals and make recommendations that sometimes go unheeded.

Having said that, I think it is not an either/or situation of writing cheques, as my hon. colleague puts it. What happens in this case is it brings to mind a comment that was made to me by the minister of housing for the Northwest Territories who said: "We can talk about self-government, but if people do not have roofs over their heads, we are talking about a concept without reality". That is very pertinent.

We have to deal with real issues. Health, education, training, child care, housing and land issues are real issues that require resources. There is not a non-aboriginal community in this country that goes unaided from the federal government. I cannot think of one community.

It is unreasonable to assume that it is an either/or situation. Every community that wants to build an infrastructure and wants to build a firm base needs the assistance of government. I do not think it goes without gratitude and it goes without the best intent to build the best and the healthiest of communities for all people.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. colleague from Western Arctic. As a member from Quebec, I share her feeling to a large extent. I think that there is a fundamental problem with what is called the Indian Act. Personally, I see that legislation as racist, because it treats a whole culture, a whole people as second-class citizens. So I think that the problem before us today is fundamental. This kind of legislation means that thousands of bureaucrats are used to spend this money, so that there is much less left for the very ones who really need it. I remember asking this question on the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee, where some suggestions to improve the Constitution were made. I asked whether this Indian Act was not rather a program for giving employment to white people, white bureaucrats. It tends to drain off the available funds. Instead of going to the native people, it goes to bureaucrats in Ottawa.

That is the problem with the law now in force. I would really like to ask the hon. member if it would not be better to abolish the Indian Act outright. It would be a big step towards recognizing native rights, because since 1985, I believe, the Government of Quebec has confirmed the right of native people to govern themselves. I would really like to know whether abolishing the Indian Act would not be a big step forward for helping native people set up their own government funds.

[English]

Ms. Blondin-Andrew: Madam Speaker, I am glad that my hon. colleague, whom I have worked with, has asked that question. He had a prime opportunity to support aboriginal people, which would have allowed us to abolish the Indian Act, and that was the Charlottetown accord. This accord would have allowed us to remove the Indian Act.

The Charlottetown accord would have allowed us to replace the existing Indian Act structure with the inherent right to self-government. This was an opportunity that was lost. I supported this opportunity. I am not criticizing people, I am just saying that it was an opportunity that was lost. It was a prime opportunity where we could have built something and we could have added on to it. Once that opportunity was lost we no longer have that step to take forward at this point that was there at the time.

Sure we can abolish the Indian Act. I am sure, as are my colleagues across the floor. My hon. colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East and the minister have stated numerous times that we have looked for alternatives. The main alternative that we had looked at was the inherent right to self-government.

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the opposition motion this afternoon. Perhaps I should point out that the amount set aside annually to help aboriginal people has doubled since 1984. We have doubled the amounts spent by the federal government on aboriginal people, and I think it is important to make this clear at the beginning of my speech. Furthermore, in 1993, the department's budget as a whole increased by nearly $300 million.

That being said, today I would like to review with hon. members what I would call the considerable progress made by the aboriginal peoples and the federal government, in a spirit of co-operation, to improve living conditions on Indian reserves. Many of us already know that improving conditions on reserves is one of the four pillars of our government's program for aboriginal peoples.

Hon. members will recall that a little over two years ago, the Prime Minister announced an action plan that would recognize and preserve the special status of the First Nations in this country. This program confirms Canada's commitment to establishing a new relationship with aboriginal peoples. The program supports aboriginal people in their efforts to bring about changes in their communities that will benefit their families and children.

Since the program was announced, hundreds of initiatives have been launched and have had a very positive impact on the lives of members of the First Nations.

Our commitment to improving the social conditions of aboriginal families and children is reflected in the construction of new schools and new housing—for instance in my own region, a new school was opened last summer in Obedjiwan—social agencies offering a wide range of benefits, and assistance in building water and sewer systems. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been earmarked for aboriginal communities from coast to coast to improve living conditions and opportunities for aboriginal people and their children's prospects for the future.

I think we can say that Canadians realize that more must be done to guarantee that future, but I think it is encouraging to see that native health has improved considerably in recent years. These changes are due both to better access to quality health services and to increased community involvement in education and the provision of health services.

If I may, I shall give a brief overview of initiatives that were started in co-operation with aboriginal people. First of all, the health and water initiative which involves accelerating the provision of safe water and water treatment services on reserves. As you know, Madam Speaker, these new water supply and distribution facilities are vitally important to aboriginal communities. Once these facilities have been upgraded, they will not only protect the health and well-being of residents of the various communities but also preserve the environment. Many reserves are located in natural sites where human activity can have a negative impact on the surrounding land and animal habitat. Waste treatment facilities are essential to prevent pollution and disease. Furthermore, this initiative promotes economic development by making the region more attractive to tourists, investors and local industry. The water and sewage treatment initiative is a concrete example of sustainable development.

Substantial progress has also been made in improving housing standards in many Indian communities. The government realizes that the quality and the quantity of housing on reserves are still a problem and that certain steps must be taken to correct the situation. Nevertheless, the House will appreciate the progress made in recent years in this important field. In co-operation with Indian communities and their leaders, the government has worked very hard to reverse the deterioration of housing on reserves and give Indian bands direct control over their housing programs. It is now up to the bands to decide what is best for their families and children, and the department is helping the First Nations obtain adequate housing by subsidizing housing construction and renovation on the reserves. Government assistance is necessary because of problems caused by legal restrictions in the Indian Act and the limited economic resources of many Indian communities.

Annually, the department allocates nearly $136 million to the housing subsidy program. Over the past 10 years, the Canadian government has supported the construction of more than 30,000 new housing units across the country. The Government of Canada also supports the construction of housing units on reserves by guaranteeing loans. So far the department has guaranteed more than $750 million in loans for housing.

It is clear these are tangible benefits for families living on reserves across this country. The government spends more than $300 million annually to support, either directly or indirectly, housing construction, maintenance and repairs on the reserves.

This spending has clearly had a very positive impact. Nearly 30 per cent of the houses on reserves were built in the last six years, and another 35 per cent were renovated in the same period. Today, almost 95 per cent of these houses have electricity and it is estimated that about 80 per cent of the houses have adequate water and sewage facilities. For comparison, in 1965 less than half the houses on reserves in Canada had electricity and only 17 per cent had an adequate water supply, so we see that there has been real progress on this score.

Again, the government recognizes, I think, that even more must be done to solve the housing problem. We must talk not only about money but about a whole series of things for solving the housing problem. Together with the leaders, we are working on developing real, lasting solutions to deal with these various questions.

In another vein, we were just talking about education. In our opinion, the Post-Secondary Education Assistance Program is an investment in the future of native youth. Federal spending on it has not doubled but tripled since 1984. Federal spending on post-secondary education will be about $1.1 billion over five years. I think that is a more than reasonable amount. The government's philosophy is to help education because it is the way to a more prosperous future for this country.

Speaking of native youth, I think that we must also deal with the more serious situation affecting many communities, which is the high suicide rate, particularly among young people, and situations like the one in Davis Inlet or Big Cove must be addressed. I think that it can be said with certainty that we are doing so and doing it in co-operation with the First Nations and the provincial governments, which is important. We will continue to do what is necessary to develop long-term, not short-term, solutions for improving the quality of life and living conditions in the various native communities throughout the country.

I think that we must look closely at the many initiatives which have been taken with government funding to help solve the suicide problem. These initiatives are part of the total package addressing the mental health of native youth. The Canadian government gives $54 million a year for the National Native Alcohol and Drug Abuse Program. Again, I think that we must be aware of the efforts made by the government to help all native communities across the country. Take Davis Inlet, for example, and let me point out the work of the member for St. John's East who was mandated by the government to work on solving the immediate problems and also to handle the issues connected with relocating this community.

As the minister of Indian affairs said in this House, we approve and support the relocation of the inhabitants of Davis Inlet and the work on this must be done with the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador and Chief Katie Rich and her council, both for the interim measures and immediate needs and for the development of a comprehensive long-term plan for the community.

Furthermore, immediate action was taken to treat the young victims of this abuse caused by their problems and in the longer term, we will see to it that these young people no longer have this kind of problem. In Big Cove, the government has done the same thing so that what we have seen, heard and read on this subject will never happen again.

It is important to be aware of these realities and of the importance the government attaches to it, both in monetary terms and in terms of the work done by the minister of Indian affairs, or by yours truly in Quebec, with the different communities for the welfare of native people throughout the country and the relations between natives and non-natives and also the relations between native people and the federal and provincial governments.

I think—and I have said so several times since I was appointed to this position—that it is essential to work as a team on this. Whatever the native issue—health, education, land, et cetera—I think it is essential to work as a team. In this regard, I would like to point out the excellent exchange this afternoon between a Liberal member and a member of my own caucus who work together on the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs. I think that such co-operation is essential in the approach that this government wants to take to solve the problems in the community and in the various communities across the country.

There is also the problem of family violence. Again, the government and the department have acted on it. In a four-year period, a little over $36 million will be spent in order to solve the problem of family violence in the various communities.

Each Indian community must determine its priorities. The government, the department of Indian affairs and the Department of National Health and Welfare must be there to provide money, yes, but also to help each community according to its priorities and its needs. The more we do as a team, the more positive results we will see. Take this year, 1993, for example, when 78 per cent of the money will be spent directly by the First Nations. I think this is a very positive indication of the progress that has been made on native issues since 1984.

Nevertheless, much remains to be done, but I think that we are on the way to solving the problems. We would have liked them to be solved yesterday, but they will be solved today or tomorrow. In any case, these problems are being solved and steady progress is being made. This is important for native people throughout Canada because they have things to say to the federal government and they also have their own work to do, just as the federal government has its work to do. With such an attitude, I think that a tremendous amount can be done to achieve our objectives.

• (1605)

In closing, I would just like to remind the House that the motion being considered today does not quite reflect reality, unfortunately, I think. Considering the amounts of money and the work being done by the government and the minister of Indian affairs right now, great strides have been made and we will continue to work with this philosophy in mind—with the co-operation of the opposition, I hope.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the new minister's speech as it relates to a very important issue, which is what is going on in the country called Canada and how this government and past governments have dealt with aboriginal people.

After listening to the minister's comments one would think that there are not a lot of grave difficulties in the country, things are moving and progressing very well, and aboriginal people should be very happy.

I would like to remind the minister opposite, who is fairly new at the job, that on Tuesday, September 25, 1990 we had a very similar discussion in this House when we dealt with the issue of the crisis at Oka. The discussions we had at that time dealt quite extensively with the same things we are talking about today. There are tremendous problems out there and the government has missed all the signals.

I want to remind the minister what the signals are, just so he will know, and then I want to ask him a very specific question, which as the minister responsible he can easily deal with first hand.

The crisis is happening before the minister's eyes. In Davis Inlet six youths attempted to take their own lives; at Big Cove there were nine suicides in as many weeks; and in my riding, in the Treaty Nine Nishnawbe-Aski Nation territory there have been six youth suicides since the end of December, one as young as 11 years old.

This is not the first time I have stood up in this House and mentioned this problem. So the minister can put this in perspective, since 1988, when I was elected, more than 60 youths and young adults have taken their lives and another 800 have attempted suicide and failed in my riding alone. These numbers reflect that the suicide rate in our part of the country is seven times the national average.

If the minister can stand in his place and say that we are really making progress then he has not been in the same communities that I have.

I want to put a very specific question to the new minister. My understanding is that two weeks ago the minister met with the grand chief from Kanesatake. Two weeks ago he was asked a very specific question and to this date has not given an answer, as far as I know, to the request by the grand chief. In 1990, after the Oka crisis, the committee that I belonged to at the time, the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs, was asked by the people to look at the proposal for healing called Breaking All Barriers. To this day that healing program in Kanesatake has not taken place.

I would like to ask the minister if he would tell me why. This is a very small request in the over-all crisis that we are dealing with for a community like Oka, which went through probably one of the most severe situations that any community would ever want to face in this country or any country in the world. It had the army come in on them and was put in a situation where for generations the scars will be visible to everyone, as we talked about that night.

Now is the opportunity for the minister to do a very small thing, and that is to accept the recommendation of that community for the necessity for a healing program and put it in place.

• (1610)

Mr. Vincent: Madam Speaker, I have taken note of the hon. member's comments, and I would like to say that so far, I have had two meetings with the grand chief of Kanesatake, and I think that in both cases, we had some excellent discussions. One important point was that we should negotiate with him, and so far, that is what I have done. We met again two weeks ago. I noted his comments and I believe he did the same with mine. The matter referred to by the hon. member was raised, and I will report to the grand chief within the timeframe we both agreed on.

[English]

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. minister who has just spoken on this matter before us today. The minister may be aware that I rose in Question Period a short while ago to ask about economic development funding scheduled for aboriginal communities.

The chief of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations, Chief Roland Crowe, wrote to the Prime Minister on February 10 expressing concern about potential cuts to economic development programs as a result of the finance minister's mini budget on December 2. At that time Chief Crowe indicated that the Saskatchewan Indian nations had done a study of what potential cutbacks would mean. He said they would devastate the emerging First Nations economies, create bankruptcies in Indian commercial and industrial fields, result in the countless loss of existing jobs and damage the future of their communities and their memberships. They acknowledged that they are the most disadvantaged and deprived group in the country. Chief Crowe put this on the record on February 10.

Last week the government issued the 1993–94 estimates and confirmed that this government has cut back funds for economic development to the Indian bands for 1993–94. I quote from the estimates that we have from the other day. Economic development is on page 14–7 of the estimates: 1992–93 estimates were $54 million and for 1993–94 the figure is $33 million.

We see the government removing the tools necessary for growth in the aboriginal communities, some $21 million in the coming fiscal year.

I would like to ask the minister how at a time when Indian people require economic development to ensure the futures of their communities the government can justify the removal of money from the economic development portfolio.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Madam Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that, as I said at the beginning of my speech, in 1993–94 the amount the Canadian government will spend on aboriginal people will not go down, it will increase. I think this bears repeating, because the hon. member may not have realized this just now. If the budget increases, I think the hon. member should congratulate us, considering the difficult budget decisions that had to be made by this government in all departments.

• (1615)

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to take part in this debate although it is not a debate that we want to see happen in this House over and over again, as has happened. I should remind the House what the motion is. It states:

> That this House condemns the government for its abandonment of aboriginal families and children.

As one of my colleagues from the Liberal Party pointed out just a few minutes ago, this is not the first time we have dealt with this kind of motion in the House.

As I said before, we deal with it over and over again. It does not really seem to matter which government is in office, whether it is the party opposite or the party to my right, this same motion seems to come up on the floor over and over again. At some point, the people in this House have to take seriously what they are debating and take a serious look at the information that is being placed before them.

I congratulate my colleague from Nunatsiaq for bringing this motion forward. I congratulate my colleague from Western Arctic and the minister for being involved in the debate. It is an extremely important debate.

It was precipitated, as members know, by a number of stories in the media recently that have placed a stain on Canada's reputation as a promoter and supporter of human rights, both nationally and internationally.

The incident at Davis Inlet a few weeks ago was mentioned earlier, where a number of children barricaded themselves in an unheated building with gasoline and other materials, including inhalants to sniff, hoping that they would inhale enough of this material and it would become cold enough that they would kill themselves and not have to face the morning.

What kind of a country is this that Canadian children feel they are forced to do this kind of thing? They are children being forced to commit suicide so that they will not have to live through the terror of the following days.

Members will recall that in the same community the same kind of thing had happened over a year ago. Again children found themselves in an unheated house. Forced to heat the house, they created a dangerous fire situation and burned to death. This was in the same community a year previously.

What kind of people in a country like Canada are forced to the kind of despair where they are willing to burn themselves to death? They really did not care whether they burned themselves to death because it was better to them than facing the terror of the next day.

The same thing has happened, as my colleague from Kenora—Rainy River pointed out, in the area around Big Trout Lake in the Nishnawbe-Aski area of northern Ontario where there have been 800 suicides attempts since he took office in 1988. Eight hundred Canadians, most of them very young, most of them teenagers, attempted to take their own lives rather than face the terror of the following days.

How would you feel if you were a parent of one of those children and you tried to tell them there was a better future for them? Would you feel comfortable taking the minister's comments that we have actually added a few more million dollars to the departmental budget of the department of Indian affairs and that that is going to prevent these children from doing that kind of thing? According to the minister, they will not have to do that any more because the government has added a few million bucks to the department of Indian affairs. Certainly that holds no promise for these children.

At Big Cove in New Brunswick, we heard the same thing. I watched parents interviewed over and over on television being asked about the suicide epidemic. The elders in the community were being asked about the suicide epidemic. They felt almost like a kind of tidal wave, that their own children were doing it and they were powerless to stop it. They do not know which buttons to push. They do not know which arguments to make. They do not know what is going to be affected. Their children simply do not want to live through the terror of the coming days.

There are not many of us in Parliament today, but we in Parliament have been given an opportunity—and again I would like to congratulate the two members who put forward this motion—to take this issue of the suicide of adults, young children and teenagers in aboriginal communities seriously.

It is unfortunate the way the motion is worded but on opposition days that is the way you have to word motions. It means that the government has to vote against it, the opposition has to vote for it and as a result nothing comes of it. If only there was a sense on the part of the people in this House that they really wanted to deal with the issue through a motion like this and that the three parties could get together with the independents and get something going that will stop what is happening in aboriginal communities.

As I said, this is a stain on our reputation internationally. I am astounded at the reaction the government has to the incidents that took place at Davis Inlet, at Big Cove, at Big Trout Lake and in other communities around the country. It sends the deputy minister around on a tour of Europe on essentially a mission of denial, telling people that Indians actually have a great life here in Canada and not to pay any attention to those isolated incidents at Davis Inlet, at Big Trout Lake and Big Cove. They are told to ignore those incidents because that is not the real Canada.

It is a process of denial that we should not be involved in because aboriginal children in this country have the highest rate of suicide in the world. It is not just seven times the rate of other children nationally or other teenagers or other populations nationally, aboriginal people in Canada have the highest rate of suicide in the world. There are reasons for this and we should be looking at those reasons.

Instead of one party attacking the other party attacking the third party over their failure to deal with aboriginal children and families, we should actually be developing solutions and motions that all three parties can vote for so that we can get something done on this issue.

The minister's response is that the government has increased spending by a few million dollars. Nobody believes it. My colleague from Western Arctic pointed out the series of budget cuts that have taken place recently. A lot of those budget cuts have been done on the backs of aboriginal people.

What has been cut? Aboriginal friendship centres that serve a tremendously valuable purpose to people who have left their reserves in the country, have come into the cities and need the kinds of services that are provided by friendship centres in order to survive in what they see as a culturally hostile surrounding. It makes it easier for them to live and work in the urban community when they have support organizations such as friendship centres.

Not only that, those friendship centres have been closely audited by the federal government. I wish it audited those as closely as the helicopter acquisition program because a tremendous amount of the waste and the kickbacks and the money that falls through the cracks in the helicopter acquisition program could fund friendship centres into the next century.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just heard the hon. member opposite state categorically that there were kickbacks involved in the helicopter acquisition program. I would like him to prove those allegations or withdraw.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, as I was saying, the money that falls through the cracks in that helicopter acquisition program could fund friendship centres into the middle of the next century with absolutely no further expenditure on the part of the—

• (1625)

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, I feel it is highly irregular, improper and unparliamentary that the member opposite would allege financial impropriety and a criminal act in this House without offering any justification for that whatsoever.

I would ask him if he has any information to let the House know or certainly the Speaker would ask him to withdraw.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member for Comox—Alberni, the way I heard it, maybe wrongly, was not making accusations when talking about money falling through the cracks. This was not necessarily making allegations of any wrongdoing.

Should he have said anything which I did not properly understand that implied any such wrongdoing, I know he would want to rephrase his sentence and make sure that he does not imply any wrongdoing by anyone in this House or any other place. Or should he know of any wrongdoing, he would tell people who should know and must know.

Mr. Taylor: On the same point of order, Madam Speaker, as I heard the hon. member speak he said very much as you have interpreted his words. I think if the hon. member for Halton—Peel has a question or comment he can reserve it for the question or comment period, but at the moment I would very much like to hear the hon. member get on with the important things he has to say.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake should allow me to do my job properly. I will at this time give the floor back to the hon. member for Comox—Alberni who I am sure will do the right thing by everyone.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a tradition of doing the right thing by almost everyone so if I offended any of the members by any of the words I chose then I most happily withdraw those words.

The issue we are concerned with here is the kind of expenditures and priorities that the government is making. The government on the other hand seems to be ignoring the loss of life, the huge suicide rate, which is the highest suicide rate in the world, that affects aboriginal people. I would have expected the member who was concerned about kickbacks to be on his feet talking about the suicide rate and to be expressing a concern about it but if the word "kickback" that he managed to isolate from my speech did offend him I most certainly withdraw it.

But I want that member to know that I am offended and many Canadians are offended, and many hundreds of millions of people around the world are offended by his government's treatment of aboriginal people. It is a fact that aboriginal people, mainly young people, have the highest suicide rate in the world and they are certainly looking to him to find out what his interest is and what he intends to do about it. I have not heard him lift his voice in this House once on this issue. It is an important issue that affects the reputation of this country internationally.

This country can spend $5.8 billion on helicopters that are of doubtful value to use in a style of warfare that is long in the past, to use against enemies that have long ceased to be our enemies. Yet we are still spending $5.8 billion on those purposes while we are telling aboriginal people that we do not have the money to meet their basic fundamental, social needs in order to come up to the same level as all other Canadians.

What kind of members are they over there? The more I think of it the more this—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is starting to impute motives and this I cannot let go. I think we can discuss the subject that is before us today on this motion without imputing motives to anyone.

Let us stay with the subject and I think we will be on the right track.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): It is hard not to get angry on this issue when, as I said, hundreds of aboriginal teenagers are dying and nobody seems to give it that much attention. That is the whole point of this resolution and the whole point of the member presenting it. I certainly salute those motives and those intentions.

I listened carefully to the minister's response. It is a response that we seem to get all the time when we bring these questions before the House of Commons. The government seems to have this response. In fact it developed the response through an organization that developed a program called Special Words and Tactics.

The government found out through its studies that Canadians were concerned about what was happening to aboriginal people. They were concerned about the high levels of unemployment in aboriginal communities. They were concerned about the high levels of poor health and about the survival of aboriginal children. They were concerned about the high rates of violence in aboriginal communities.

Canadians are sympathetic. They demand that their government deal with those problems. The government says how much money is being spent on aboriginal communities. In order to develop the figure, it uses every stamp licked to send pension cheques to retired Department of Indian and Northern Affairs public servants. It pads that bill to about $4 billion, almost the cost of the helicopter program. It pads the figure unmercifully to show Canadians that it is spending a tremendous amount of money, but in fact it is not and the evidence for that is the rate of suicide among aboriginal kids.

I am a member of the aboriginal affairs committee of this House. Members of that committee work well together because we take a problem solving approach. We have travelled to many of the aboriginal communities around the country and we have seen the problems firsthand.

It does not matter whether members are from the Liberal Party, the Conservative Party or other party members who attend the committee. Once they have seen the problem they know they have to start developing solutions for them. They know solutions cannot be developed unless they enter into a process of consultation with the people involved who are better able to solve their own problems provided they have the resources. Then solutions can be worked out.

I suppose that is what I was hoping would come out of the resolution, but I gather from the minister's response to the resolution that the government intends to vote against it. I really do not see how it could do otherwise.

We did a study on aboriginal housing. We listened to the people from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development tell us that of the 70,000 on-reserve housing units in this country, 35,000 of them are unliveable, as Indian Affairs staff described. Half the housing units used by aboriginal people on reserve are being described by the department responsible for them as unliveable, and 60,000 more units are needed to bring housing standards for aboriginal people up to the same level other Canadians enjoy.

The cost of that program would be in the order of $2.5 billion to $3 billion. That is not a great amount when we compare it to the cost of the helicopter program. When we look at the damage being done to Indian families and to aboriginal children as a result of the housing problems we cannot afford not to spend that money.

I said it would take $2 billion to $3 billion but that $2 billion or $3 billion, if it were spent in the right way, would generate a tremendous amount of employment in aboriginal communities building the infrastructure, the sewer and water systems, the roads, the foundations and the houses. All this effort, all this work, could provide employment for aboriginal people currently unemployed and drawing welfare. It would draw down the deficit of the country and make those citizens producing, contributing citizens again. They want to do it. It is just that the government has not taken its place in the partnership and has not provided the resources.

We found that bad housing causes a lot of problems when we visited those communities where housing is a problem. It causes problems such as alcoholism, abuse, domestic violence and sex abuse. It causes problems with education. All those problems related to housing cost the country millions of dollars. We could deal with the problems by reducing the amount of overcrowding in housing and making good quality housing available to aboriginal people.

I will wind up by saying that it is a good resolution. The government should pay attention to it. We are not providing enough resources and the government has the resources. The helicopter program has shown that. Why does not the government respond to this situation and do what should be done rather than hark back to the amount of money it is currently spending, which clearly is not enough or we would not see the symptoms we are seeing in aboriginal communities?

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to my colleague with whom I have sat for a number of years on the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs. He will know that since we have been involved on the same committee there have been discussions and studies dealing with housing.

The issue in a nutshell is simply that since 1983 we have been in the process of studying a housing policy for aboriginal people. Later when I have an opportunity to speak I will give the numbers of the backlog and the percentage of those who do not have sewer and water. We could go on and on about how grave the issue is.

Could my colleague give us some indication from his perspective of why it is that the government, knowing the particular backlog and knowing how overcrowding can affect the lives of young people, cause mental stress and anxiety in these communities and result in the suicides we talked about, would not come forward with a comprehensive policy program to deal with the very real problem of a tremendous lack of good housing in First Nations communities?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, it is an excellent question. One of the reasons the aboriginal affairs committee dealt with the housing issue in the first place was that the member lobbied the committee because of the concerns he had for housing in his riding and in northern Ontario. It is a major issue.

It is surprising that the government does not deal with this issue. The government says that it wants to get the economy of Canada going again. It wants to get us out of the recession. It wants perhaps to focus its programs on some of the poorest of poor Canadians so that they can begin to lift themselves out of the recession. It wants to do away with and reduce the amount of welfare and unemployment insurance it is paying.

Here is a clear opportunity for the government to do that. It could start rebuilding the aboriginal housing stock and providing some of the 60,000 new units needed to accommodate the growing aboriginal population. It would create tens of thousands of jobs, as I pointed out. It would restore hope in aboriginal communities. It would get people away from the kind of desperate life-style that drives them toward substance abuse as we have seen in Davis Inlet.

This is the kind of thing the government should be doing to bring Canada out of the recession. In addition it would bring the welfare charges down, as I pointed out before.

This has all the elements of something a government should be doing to cure the problem of the recession. Why do government members not do it? I suspect it is because they are Tories. They do not really feel that the government's role is to get involved in the economy that way. As a result, it is ideology that is preventing them from doing something that would be valuable for the Indian people, valuable for the country and valuable for all Canadians.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I take great exception to the slurs the hon. member has cast on this side of the House in his last comments. They are totally unfounded. They are totally uncalled for. They are totally inconsistent with the record of the government.

If my hon. friend would look at the level of funding and the increase in the level of funding to health, education and housing for aboriginal communities he would withdraw that statement. Those areas of government spending have grown faster than anything else in the budgets of the country.

Mr. Mills: You should go to look at some of these places.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I say to my hon. friend from Broadview—Greenwood that no one in this House is happy with the state of some aboriginal communities.

What I am calling into question with my hon. friend from the New Democratic Party is his motive for saying that we do not care because we are Conservatives. People on this side of the House do care deeply and that is why the funding in these programs has increased as quickly as it has.

Mr. Nault: Housing funding has gone down.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I say to my hon. friends on the other side that these areas are of deep concern to the government. This is why these areas have received the levels of funding they have. I would ask my hon. friend to withdraw his statements.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have no intention of withdrawing statements made by me in the debate when I repeated statements that have been made around the world, condemnations of this country and the way it treats its aboriginal people. My understanding is that this year those condemnations will appear in the UN development report which this minister touts around the country to show that Canada has the highest standard of living in the world.

Women rank number seven or even lower in terms of their standard of living in Canada. Aboriginal people rank far down on the list. Everybody knows that Canada is not doing the job it should be doing.

You are one of the ministers responsible. You should read your own budget and you would find out exactly what—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has been here long enough to know that he should address the Chair and not the minister directly.

There are three minutes left. I will recognize someone else on questions or comments.

Mr. Nault: Madam Speaker, for the record I will correct the minister who mentioned that the three areas of funding have gone up. Since 1983 on-reserve housing funding has not gone up. That is one of the major problems and one of the reasons we are in a crisis position now.

If the minister wants to put facts before the House he should perhaps take a closer look. The population on reserves since 1981 has grown by 37 per cent and housing funding has not kept pace. Therefore we have a tremendous backlog.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It has gone up.

Mr. Nault: No, it has not gone up.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Check the figures.

Mr. Nault: No, it has not since 1983. I would like to get back to my friend in the NDP for a second and ask him a question directly. If his party were to be in government, how would he perceive it dealing with the crisis and getting housing stock back up to the level it should be for aboriginal communities?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, as the member knows, I was one of the members on the aboriginal housing committee who made a number of recommendations to government. The report of that committee was a unanimous report and I stand by the recommendations made in it.

The problem with this issue is that the government, as I said in my speech, has to make the resources available. It has to give aboriginal peoples the right to be involved in the design, the development and providing housing to the standards needed in their own communities. I know the member is familiar with the contents of the report, but I think what is needed in this case is the money and that is $2 billion to $3 billion to provide that kind of housing. The infrastructure is also needed but also we need to permit aboriginal governments to develop housing and to design housing that suits their needs rather than to allow the department of Indian affairs to acquire housing for them on a low-bid system outside aboriginal communities.

• (1645)

There is a tremendous possibility for job creation and for the enhancement of aboriginal governments if they are allowed to develop their own housing programs but they need those transfer payments, resources and the power to develop their own housing.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I am extremely pleased to be given the opportunity to address this particular topic today.

It would seem to me that what we need to do is to highlight one flagrant contradiction. The government, it seems to me, without exaggerating the discussion that has just preceded, is in fact speaking with a forked tongue. The government is speaking internationally about aboriginal rights and the importance of the aboriginal year. Yet, at the same time, there are serious cuts that are being undertaken to aboriginal programs. I will give those in some detail shortly.

What we have to recognize is that the aboriginal people are really suffering a double or triple hit because they have an extremely unique and distinct situation in our society that I would like to explore with my colleagues and with Canadians who are listening.

Let us look at the government's record on education. When we do that let us remember that we are talking about all Canadians and that includes in a number of instances many aboriginal Canadians that are being affected. If we look at EPF reductions, cuts in transfers for health and education, from the government in Ottawa to the provinces and territories, we will find that roughly $30 billion will have been cut in the course of a decade. It is about $20 billion for health and about $10 billion for education.

It is important to recognize that it is not only all Canadians, but within that particular group our aboriginals are also being hit. Look at training and retraining. There are a lot of debates about increases in funds. There are increases in funds but it is Canadians who are paying those funds to the government to use for training and retraining. It is not from the general revenues. Look at the need, at inflation and at what was promised Canadians in terms of the best training programs in the world. We should recognize that not only all do Canadians need more training to bring them up to date, make them more productive and make them more competitive, but aboriginals are also involved there. They are being hit here as well.

Look at research and development. The government promised to double its investments in research and development. We know that it slipped dramatically. It is not even close to what it had hoped. In fact, it has slipped from what it was. It was 1.40 of Gross Domestic Product and I think it is around 1.20 right now while our major competitors are at 2.80. That affects our aboriginal communities. Within the area of research and development is the whole field of social sciences that looks at questions of abuse, poverty and many other social challenges that this nation faces.

Of course we recognize that our aboriginal peoples are affected in a very dramatic way by some of the social difficulties that Canada is experiencing as a whole. Any reduction in over-all funding will affect them too.

Look at illiteracy for example and the number of functionally illiterate Canadians. We recognize that there is a disproportionate number of aboriginal people. Yet there was a reduction in the most recent government estimates on investments in literacy. Therefore, our aboriginal peoples are being affected negatively over all.

Let us look more specifically at aboriginal people per se. We know the plight of native Canadians. We can argue all we want whether or not the government has been fair or unfair. I do not think that is the issue. The issue is how much is needed to correct the situation. What is it that we need to do to make sure that they get the same opportunities that the rest of Canadians do? That is the question that we need to be addressing. Look at the unemployment rate, for example. It is high. It is in excess of 11 per cent. There are over 1.6 million Canadians unemployed. However, if we look at aboriginal peoples per se, we find that they are hit dramatically. Look at social assistance. There are over two million Canadians who are on social assistance. Look at the number of aboriginal peoples who need social assistance and compare their numbers as a proportion of the whole. Look at illness and suicide and other measures such as that. We find that our aboriginal people do not compare favourably at all.

If we look at housing there is an awful situation. It is extremely disappointing. Look at the drop-out rates in elementary and secondary schools and at the number of graduates in colleges and universities and then compare that to the whole population. We find that they do not compare favourably.

I maintain that it is not their fault. I maintain that a series of governments over the years, perhaps well intentioned, have not been able to make the progress they should have made. What we need is more assistance. What we need is a renewed commitment. What we need is a recognition of the problems. What we need is to stop arguing about whether we increased it or decreased it. What we need is to put forth the resources that are required in order to permit aboriginal people to compare favourably with their Canadian counterparts who are their Canadian brothers and sisters.

Look at post-secondary education specifically. You would know, Madam Speaker, that there has been a cap placed on it. Of course, that has been increased somewhat and I do not want to get into that argument. However, let us remember that there are more aboriginal peoples today who want to go on to post-secondary education. Obviously it needs to be increased.

We have new legislation that permits members who were otherwise outside of the aboriginal community now to get into the aboriginal community. The ranks have swelled. Look at the cost of education over the last few years. Those costs have skyrocketed so any kind of cap, whether it be minimal or otherwise, needs to be increased substantially under those circumstances.

I want to share with my colleagues here in the spirit of openness and debate some of my concerns. I have a memorandum and I just want to raise a couple of frustrations that have been shared with me. I quote from this particular memorandum from MMC in Ottawa: "To date there have been no self-government agreements concluded with Métis people". There is a great sense of frustration.

I want to share with you the sense of frustration that our aboriginal peoples have had when $21 million has been cut from economic development for Indian Affairs. Economic development provides education, jobs, training and learning. There was a further cut of $6 million from the aboriginal economic strategy by ISTC. There again was a major blow or hit suffered by our aboriginal peoples.

Why was 10 per cent cut from the native friendship centres?

[Translation]

We know these friendship centres not only welcome the people from these communities who come to our cities but also provide all kinds of support, including apprenticeship programs.

[English]

One million dollars have been taken away from the Northern Native Access Program.

[Translation]

Why? This was a very successful program that gave our aboriginal people access to some very important positions.

[English]

Why has government reduced funding to aboriginal political organizations? I know that they can be somewhat difficult on governments no matter what governments they are, but surely this is a problem. There is the Arctic Environment Strategy, which is a program that affects our aboriginal people. Why has this been cut by $2 million?

Here is the basic question. I do not want to raise the question of helicopters again, but I do want to raise the question of priorities. These are important dollar cuts to these small groups of people that are not being given the same opportunities. Look at large expenditures in relation to those smaller expenditures. Canadians and aboriginals are asking why this is happening.

I simply say that I do not think it is people——who are knowingly intent on doing the wrong thing. I think they just do not have their priorities straight.

[English]

It was a year ago today that this House honoured Louis Riel. I shall terminate with a quote from my address on that particular day. I am sharing my time with my colleague the member for Kenora—Rainy River. I want to leave perhaps on a note of some optimism. Last week in Manitoba there were two important historical events. A Métis was named Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. Hopefully that appointment will permit our aboriginal peoples to re-energize, to go forward and to realize some of their goals that have been long outstanding.

• (1655)

Last week in the province of Manitoba, the Supreme Court decision with respect to the government and French language schools was also important. It has implications——for Francophones across Canada, and I imagine for Anglophones in Quebec as well. But I think it could also have implications for our aboriginal people.

[English]

If francophones and anglophones can manage their school systems, as I think they should—

—why not aboriginal people?

[English]

It would be a great step forward if somehow we could empower them to take over their education and training and retraining opportunities for their peoples.

I want to conclude with the following quote:

[English]

In the spirit of justice, and at a time of great instability in this country, I urge the House to take one more step to recognize Louis Riel not only as a founder of the province of Manitoba but also as one of the Fathers of Confederation. A year ago we made that statement.

I am hoping that these gestures, along with political will, will permit us to go forward.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to be able to listen to the comment of my friend from St. Boniface across the way.

In his day he has been an educator and an administrator in the field of education, both in Manitoba and northern Ontario. He and I have had a number of opportunities to discuss the concept of minority education. We discussed education for those groups in which he is particularly interested, the francophone communities of Manitoba and Ontario, as well as the aboriginal communities of Ontario and Manitoba and others across the country.

He quoted a number of figures. I am sure he would like the opportunity to comment or correct me if I am wrong. I know he would want to be as accurate as possible. He always has and always will.

There is never enough money for education. There is never enough money for a lot of things. However, in my mind and in the mind of the hon. member for St. Boniface, there will never be enough money for education.

Despite that, in the area of education for aboriginal communities expenditures for education have increased by $80 million, by 9 per cent. In fact there has been an increase in spending for education since 1981–82. The amount spent on elementary and secondary education has gone up 9 per cent a year, from $272 million in 1981 to $683.7 million in 1992–93.

The number of elementary and secondary students has grown 1.8 per cent annually from 80,000 to 96,000. The most important number to me, and this does not refer just to education, is that 77 per cent of the nearly $5 billion that the Government of Canada spends in this area is spent by band councils. Of the money that we spend, 77 per cent is spent by band councils.

In band-operated schools the number of students has increased from 13,000 to 40,000 over the past 10 years. Thirty per cent of the teachers in band schools today are Indian teachers. That is a direct result of the efforts that have been made to expend moneys to ensure that aboriginal students can take advantage of post-secondary educational opportunities.

The funding for post-secondary education has increased from around $200 million to around $213 million. The pathways program has not been cut this year. It is a very important program in which people come together co-operatively to address some of these issues.

I know that my friend from St. Boniface would allow me to make sure the record is straight.

[Translation]

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's comments and the statistics he shared with us. I do not challenge them, because I did not have a chance to look at them.

[English]

As I indicated before, the debate should not be so much about how much the increase or decrease has been. Decreases are serious in any programs because our aboriginal peoples have so many needs.

• (1700)

If I, for example, were to take a decrease in salary of $1,000, $2,000 or $3,000, it would not be nearly as serious as if I were earning $12,000 or $13,000 a year. That is the issue that we are debating today. Of course there will never be enough money for all of the things that we want to do for our society, I appreciate that. However, at the same time we must continue to strive to remedy that which is wrong. This is definitely wrong.

I know my colleague well enough to know that he shares a belief in the direction in which I want to go. That is, to respond to actual need to the extent that we can and to try to avoid cuts affecting those small groups who depend very much on that kind of support and whose only real opportunity to get out of the cycle of poverty and some of the social difficulties they are encountering is through education, training, retraining, and economic development.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I would like to enter this debate by making a similar suggestion to the members opposite as I did many months ago in September 1990 when we discussed this same kind of situation as it related to another crisis that was at hand, which was the crisis of Oka.

At that time I said to the people across the way that it is important that they listen before the crisis takes place. The problem we are facing again today is the same problem we faced in 1990. It is that the government goes through the motions and pretends to be listening to what Canadians and members of Parliament opposite are saying, but in fact it is not.

I am going to put some things on the record and would be very pleased if anyone would wish to dispute them and get into the argument.

The government has abandoned aboriginal families and children by ignoring the socio-economic issues after the failure of the Charlottetown accord. It has washed its hands of all aboriginal issues, resulting in families and children being ignored. Examples of that, and there are many more, include Davis Inlet where six youths attempted to take their own lives and Big Cove where there have been nine suicides in as many weeks.

In the area where I come from in northern Ontario, which is Nishnawbe-Aski Nation territory, there were six youth suicides since the end of December, one as young as 11 years of age. Since 1988, and this is something that I have raised on many occasions, there have been more than 60 youths and young adults who have taken their lives and, this is something which the people across the way sometimes tend not to focus on, there have been 800 other suicide attempts that have failed.

We do not have to ask ourselves why on this side of the House. We know why. Aboriginal youth in northern Ontario feel a sense of abandonment by their governments. The suicide rate in Canada among aboriginal peoples is seven times the national average. We have to ask ourselves why.

I will explain why. It is because this government has failed to implement a mental health policy for aboriginal peoples. That is why. It is not that we have to do more studying. It is not that we need to consult any more. The time for consultation and study is over. It is now time for action. We need a mental health program in this country.

Wellness does not only include physical well-being. It is absolutely essential that a national aboriginal mental health policy with programs aimed at dealing with suicide and the crisis in aboriginal communities be implemented immediately. We do not need any more studies, we need action.

Let us look at some of the root causes of aboriginal suicides. As has been mentioned in this House today, there is a housing crisis in aboriginal communities. We all know that overcrowding in aboriginal homes is 16 times the national average. Half of on-reserve housing is inadequate and unsuitable for living in. Those numbers are well known.

We as a standing committee, as I have mentioned before in this place, and other members across the way have studied the issue on behalf of aboriginal people. We know what the numbers are. We know what the statistics are. It is now time for the government to come out with a policy to deal with this situation.

• (1705)

As a result of this kind of situation aboriginal youth have no privacy for studying and no space they can call their own. They are surrounded by too many people in these small houses.

Has the government moved to address the on-reserve housing crisis? No. The funding levels for housing, as I mentioned to the Minister for International Trade, have not increased since 1983. Family violence is an offshoot of overcrowding, the lack of funding for education, and the lack of a mental health program.

Aboriginal youths are finding it impossible to deal with violence that they live with on a day-to-day basis. Many see committing suicide as the only way to escape that violence.

Another issue is the economic development situation. This government likes to talk about the importance of economic development for the future of Canadian citizens, and of course aboriginal people are a big portion of that.

On June 12, 1989 in Calgary, the minister of state for small businesses announced the creation of the Canadian aboriginal economic development strategy, known as CAEDS. The minister remarked that: "Even in this day of expenditure restraint the federal government has demonstrated the importance it attaches to aboriginal economic development by maintaining and indeed somewhat increasing the level of resources that it will devote in this area. As important as the amount of money so allocated is to the Government of Canada, it has decided to commit itself to long-term support for aboriginal economic development. Unlike previous programs that had sunset dates this money will form part of the government's base budget and will not have to be renegotiated every five years".

As we all know in this place, that is a false statement as of this date. We all know that the Main Estimates for 1993-94 tell another story. Funding to economic development has been cut for this year from $69 million to $48.7 million, a reduction of 28.8 per cent.

What we can read into that whole process is that we would rather pay welfare than stimulate economic development and get aboriginal people back to work. Welfare payments to aboriginal people also come from the public purse so if we want to continue to pay welfare payments in this country then we will continue to do what the federal government has done in its estimates, which is cut the tools that will give people the ability to have jobs and create jobs for their own people.

The unemployment rate in aboriginal communities in my riding stands at over 60 per cent in some cases and is as high as 80 per cent in others.

Aboriginal youths have very little opportunity to find jobs on reserves. Now that economic development funding has been cut their chances of finding a job are almost nil.

Aboriginal youths feel a sense of despair. They have lost hope in their future. They see no way out of the cycle of poverty and dependency. They see a government that does not give a hoot. They feel abandoned. They take what they see as the only avenue left, which is to take their own lives.

This is a national tragedy and an international disgrace. We are supposed to be a caring and compassionate society, but instead our national government has abandoned aboriginal families and children.

It is unfortunate that we on this side of the House have to come forward with a condemnation of the government's record on aboriginal issues and suggest an opposition motion which would say to people in Canada that we as parliamentarians in the federal government have done a disservice to our people and their future by not taking this issue as seriously as we should.

We have also done something else. We continue to not listen to people when we are told as parliamentarians that a crisis is looming in particular sectors of our society.

• (1710)

As was mentioned before, and I think it is important to put this on the record as it relates to housing, overcrowding in housing is 16 times the national average. The backlog requires 12,000 units to address it. Funding has not been increased since 1983.

If we want to seriously deal with aboriginal youth suicide in this country we are going to have to deal with the causes. The causes of course are the despair that people feel because of the lack of a mental health policy by the Government of Canada and the resources necessary to have good mental health programs. There is the very important issue of a stable environment through a decent place to live without which causes family violence and with that the despair I have been talking about.

I hope we have been able to suggest to government that there is a crisis and that it not continue to bury its head in the sand and say: "Look at all the nice statistics. The budget has been increased in certain areas by 5 per cent, 10 per cent or 12 per cent". When the population is growing on reserve four times higher than the national average, a 37 per cent increase in the last 10 years, these piddling increases to the budget are not going to resolve the difficulties and the crisis in those communities.

If members opposite and the ministers that are responsible want to give aboriginal youth a chance and a decent hope for the future, they have got to get on with the job of creating programs that are effective and that will work.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief comment to make. The hon. member talked at some length in his remarks about housing.

I have the honour to represent 22 bands in northwest Saskatchewan. Every single one of them has housing as a priority. The report on housing by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs outlined these circumstances quite clearly as a situation affecting aboriginal people in Canada.

I support as strongly as I possibly can the report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs entitled A Time for Action: Aboriginal and Northern Housing. The report indicates that the shortfall in aboriginal housing today is about $3 billion. It is a shortfall that the people living on the reserves within my federal boundaries know all too well exists.

When I visit with the chief and the councillors or when I visit with the band members living on these reserves, I am constantly made aware of the lack of housing available to the individuals living there. I am appalled at the circumstances that have resulted in large families having to share very small and outdated accommodation.

I am overwhelmed by the lack of ability of the government to respond to those needs, given the political will and the finances that have been made available to the department.

Just this year alone I have had several bands approach me and talk to me about the funding that was available to them at the beginning of the year. They made housing starts during the year only to be told once the basements were dug and the foundations were poured that the department had no more money. Those housing starts would have to be put on hold until the following year. Basements sat throughout the winter months with the snow falling, accumulating and melting in them without the ability of the bands to complete those houses.

I simply want to state that I would like to see the government take immediate steps to correct the deficiencies which exist in the housing program. It would like it to accept and implement the recommendations that are in the report of the standing committee that indicates housing matters must be addressed and must be addressed immediately.

• (1715)

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, of course it is very important that members get their statements on the record and I appreciate that the member has done that.

I also suggest to the member that one of the major problems with housing as far as aboriginal people are concerned is that the Government of Canada has not, at this moment at least, put forward a policy on housing to deal with the crisis we are talking about. It also has not recognized that housing is classified as a treaty right.

There is one thing that should be put on the record for people who are watching and listening to these speeches today. That is that the dollars given to aboriginal communities for housing are a subsidy. In essence the government tells the aboriginal people that it will give them a certain percentage.

In my region for example, they will be given roughly $27,000 toward a house. We all know a house cannot be built for $27,000. Then the government tells the aboriginal people they can get the rest of the money for that particular program either on the open market by borrowing from the banks or by going through CMHC. Or they can do it another way and that is to take it from their minor capital.

For those who are not aware of what the minor capital money is for, it is normally used to help with infrastructure. For example, it is used for roads, water, sewer, band offices, street lighting. What has happened is that because the minor capital in some communities is so small, the chiefs and councils are forced to have to make tough decisions as to what is more important, the housing that people are asking for or the other infrastructure problems they are facing.

In the 46 reserves that I represent in Kenora—Rainy River, on average we build two to three houses. When there are known backlogs of 50, 60, 70 houses in some of these communities, we are forced to build only two or three at a time.

If the government is serious about dealing with this crisis it will have to first of all recognize housing as an important part of the treaty right and second, put funding toward it.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River.

A short time ago we were all shocked to learn of native young people sniffing gasoline and the terrible consequences. We know that gasoline in Canada contains various toxic substances, such as toluene and manganese. We know that in the penal systems in the state of California studies show that the most violent offenders have higher levels of manganese in their hair samples.

Is the member aware of any studies conducted in Canada on the impact and consequences of sniffing gasoline containing MMT? Of course MMT is not allowed in the United States.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, this is a very important question and one with which I have been dealing. Those of us who are involved in aboriginal issues across this country will know that one of the biggest problems besides youth suicide is the fact that youths are now heavily involved in the sniffing of gasoline.

One of the things we have been looking at is the issue of MMT and manganese which of course is banned in the United States. I thought we should find out what drives young people in this country to sniff gasoline. I thought we should also find out whether any studies had been done in this country from the department of health and welfare and the department of Indian and northern affairs to ascertain the reasons that this particular solvent seemed to be of interest to young people in the First Nations.

I then went a step further on the advice of my colleague. I went to the United States and asked if any studies had been done on this particular issue. We found that there were learned professors who had looked at the causes and the reasons for this situation and why it was happening in the United States.

We did find that in the United States there is a smaller amount of aboriginal people using gas as a means for getting high. Of course we all know the effects of gas as far as our First Nations youth are concerned and the effects it has on their health and of course their well-being in the long run.

• (1720)

We would also like to go a step further on one of the matters. I suggest to the House that we should as a Parliament and as a government on the other side look at the effects of manganese on young people when it is in their systems. We should determine whether that is the particular substance in gasoline that makes young people high and determine the reasons they use it.

Because my colleague has a private member's bill to ban MMT in gasoline I think we should seriously look at the ramifications of that. That is because sniffing gas is one of the biggest killers in aboriginal communities.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to enter the debate in the House today on this very significant issue and to lay before the House some information that I think is necessary for the public to hear.

Aboriginal programs continue to be one of this government's highest priorities. Between 1984–85 and 1992–93 the total federal expenditure on programs for aboriginal people has grown from $2.6 billion to over $5 billion.

In spite of the current effort to reduce government expenditures, the 1993–94 Main Estimates reflect a further increase of over $351 million in over-all funding to aboriginal people. This represents a 7 per cent increase government-wide.

The government remains committed to implementing with aboriginal people the native agenda that was announced by the Prime Minister in September 1990.

That initiative focuses the government's attention on four fronts. First is the settling of native land claims. Second is to improve the social and economic conditions in aboriginal communities. Third is to build a new relationship between aboriginal people and governments. Fourth is to review the fundamental place and role of aboriginal people in a contemporary Canada. Substantial progress has already been made on all of these pillars of the agenda.

The government's continuing financial commitment is again evident in the 1993–94 Main Estimates. For example, funding for specific claims will grow 74 per cent to $136.5 million. Comprehensive claims funding will grow 24 per cent to $95 million. Funding for elementary and secondary education on reserves will increase by 9 per cent to $745.2 million. Funding for the Inuit and Indian post-secondary education program will grow by 6 per cent to $213.3 million. Social services expenditures will rise by 10.1 per cent to $898.9 million.

In recent years the growth rate of expenditures on aboriginal programs has exceeded the over-all growth of federal expenditures. While the over-all growth in federal expenditures between 1991–92 and 1992–93 was limited to 3.1 per cent, funding for aboriginal programs increased by 7.9 per cent. Even with tighter restraints on federal spending in 1993–94, expenditures on aboriginal programs will still grow by 7 per cent.

Within the department of Indian and northern affairs, four main activities accounted for about half of the estimated 1992–93 expenditures. While most of these activities are akin to those provided to non-aboriginal people by provincial and municipal governments such as elementary and secondary education, social assistance and welfare services, they also include post-secondary education.

Since 1981–82 the total of these four activities has grown at an average annual rate of approximately 12 per cent. Of course expenditure levels are only part of the story. What aboriginal people are doing with these funds is the real indicator of progress.

This government continues to support the devolution of responsibility for the delivery of services and programs from DIAND to the direct control of First Nations.

• (1725)

A range of innovative funding mechanisms has been developed and introduced to aid in this process. This includes contributions, alternative funding arrangements, flexible transfer payments and grants. By the end of 1991–92, 77.3 per cent of the expenditures of the Indian and Inuit Affairs Program of approximately $2 billion was fully administered by First Nations through band councils, tribal councils or other Indian organizations. This figure has increased by 15.2 per cent since 1985–86 when bands administered 62.1 per cent of Indian and Inuit Affairs Program spending. Indeed, the control is moving to where it belongs, which is to the Indian leaders.

Since 1981–82, federal funding for elementary and secondary education has increased approximately 9 per cent annually from expenditures of $272.9 million in 1981–82 to an estimated expenditure of $683.7 million in 1992–93 and planned expenditures of $745 million in 1993–94.

In the process the number of elementary and secondary students has grown from 80,466 students in 1981–82 to 96,594 in 1991–92. The participation rate of on-reserve children aged 4 to 18 in elementary and secondary schools has increased from 87.6 per cent in 1985–86 to 91.4 per cent in 1991.

At the same time, Indian children are staying in school longer. The percentage of children reaching grade 12 or 13 through normal progression has risen from 33.9 per cent in 1985–86 to 47 per cent in 1991. More of these children are being educated by their own people. The number of elementary and secondary students attending band-operated schools has tripled from 13,000 in 1981–82 to 40,513 in 1991. During the same period the number of band-operated schools has almost doubled from 159 in 1981–82 to 312 in 1990–91.

As a result of special post-secondary education programs providing opportunities for Indian students to become qualified teachers, 30 per cent of the teaching staff in bands schools are now Indians. Since 1981–82, federal funding for DIAND's post-secondary education assistance program has increased more than eightfold from an actual expenditure of $25.1 million in 1981–82 to an estimated $201.3 million in 1992–93 and a planned expenditure of $213.3 million in 1993–94. This has more than quadrupled the number of post–secondary students receiving assistance from 5,467 in 1981–82 to an estimated 21,442 in 1991–92.

Indian communities are also improving living conditions with DIAND funding. We have heard comments from earlier speakers about housing. On–reserve housing expenditures, including the construction and maintenance of houses, schools, roads, bridges, sewers and other community facilities have increased 34.2 per cent since 1985–86 from $102.7 million to $137.8 million in 1992–93.

In 1991–92, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development allocated $131.6 million in direct capital subsidies, and $127 million in loan guarantees to housing. Between 1983–84 and 1991–92, an average of 3,212 new homes per year were built on reserves. Just under 4,000 homes per year were renovated during the same period. In 1991–92, about 91 per cent of dwellings on reserves had an adequate water supply compared with slightly over half in 1977–78. The proportion of dwellings with adequate sewage disposal has increased considerably from about 47 per cent in 1977–78 to almost 80 per cent in 1991–92. Electrical service had reached less than half the houses on reserves in 1965. In 1991–92 it reached 88 per cent.

The government also continues to support increased Indian control of development, design and delivery of child and family services. In 1992–93 the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development funded 41 Indian child and family agencies covering 213 bands. Between 1980–81 and 1990–91 the percentage of children in care has decreased from 6 per cent to 4 per cent.

Throughout this period of devolving responsibility for delivering programs and services to First Nations, DIAND itself has been shrinking. The number of authorized person–years in Indian and Inuit affairs programs has decreased 42 per cent from 4,463 in 1982–83 to 2,608 in 1992–93.

The percentage of the budget of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that is directed to administrative overhead has declined steadily through 1980 and the early 1990s.

In 1985–86 the department overhead was 6 per cent of the over–all budget administered by DIAND. In 1993–94 the rate is expected to be 3.2 per cent. Yet the statistics for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development do not tell the whole story of this government's commitment to aboriginal people.

In 1993–94, federal expenditures on aboriginal programs were administered by 12 departments. Of these, 98 per cent came from the following departments: Indian Affairs and Northern Development, some 72.2; Health and welfare Canada, 14.9 per cent; Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, 5.1 per cent; Employment and Immigration Canada, 3.7 per cent; Industry, Science and Technology, 1.3 per cent and Secretary of State, 0.8 per cent.

There are many departments within the federal government working to make conditions better for aboriginal people. This reflects both the diversity of the federal programming for aboriginal people and the many co–operative government–wide programs that benefit their communities.

For example, the quality of health care available for Indians is improving considerably. Between 1976 and 2001, the life expectancy of status Indians is expected to increase by approximately 10 years. Health and Welfare spends more than $735 million annually on programs and services to further this goal, of which approximately 25 per cent is managed by the First Nations people themselves.

In 1992–93, as part of a $136 million federal initiative on family violence, $36 million was provided directly to Indian communities to deal with family violence on reserves, including $22 million from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and $14 million from Health and Welfare Canada.

This represented a fivefold increase in DIAND's share from $4 million in 1988 to $22 million in 1992. Another $160 million will be provided to promote community health and the well–being of Indian families through the aboriginal component of the Brighter Futures strategy.

The federal government's commitment to improving the quality of the environment for all Canadians was confirmed when the cabinet approved the green plan in 1991. The green plan included two programs that are particularly important to aboriginal people: the Arctic Environmental Strategy administered by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Indian Health and Water Initiative, a co-operative initiative administered by DIAND and national health and welfare.

The $92 million Arctic Environmental Strategy is not limited to aboriginal communities, however, since it is dedicated to cleaning up the environment in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories where aboriginal people account for substantial portions of the population, it is of intense interest to them. Indeed, when we were having hearings on the green plan I was fortunate enough to attend the hearings in Yellowknife, Whitehorse and Iqaluit and I had the opportunity to speak with Inuit and Indian people. I know how important the environment in that part of the country is to the Inuit and Indian people.

The Indian Health and Water Initiative was launched in March 1991 as part of both the green plan and the native agenda.

• (1735)

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's $250 million share of this program is being used to upgrade water and sewer services on reserves while Health and Welfare's $25 million contribution is helping to improve the quality of drinking water.

Some 125 communities have been identified as priorities for work under this initiative and are already benefiting from the program. Most of them are managing the funds and projects themselves, as it should be.

This government is also committed to closing the gap between the availability of adequate housing for Indian people and the growing need for it. That commitment involves increasing Indian control over the design and management of the program.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Central Mortgage and Housing are working together on a new housing policy that will meet this need.

Meanwhile, DIAND's housing program and CMHC's on-reserve housing program have been exempted from the government's current deficit reduction measures.

In 1993-94, expenditures by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development alone will be $137.8 million and will provide for the construction of approximately 3,300 houses and the renovation of an additional 3,200 housing units.

CMHC will continue to provide planned, new on-reserve housing. Nearly 25 per cent of all new moneys under its social housing program, $41 million in 1993-94, will be directed to native people living off reserves.

The Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy that was mentioned in the House earlier, CAEDS as it is called, was launched in June 1989 to provide the means to help aboriginal people manage business enterprises, economic institutions, job training and skill development.

Three government departments are contributing to the five-year program: Employment and Immigration Canada, Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Industry, Science and Technology. By bringing together aboriginal people, governments and the private sector, CAEDS is making a substantial contribution to expanding First Nations' capacity to build their economic future and has considerably enhanced their prospects for success.

The strategy is channelling federal support and assistance to hundreds of new and maturing aboriginal enterprises. This includes everything from gas stations to motels to grocery stores to airlines.

Since its launch there has been tremendous growth in the capacity of aboriginal communities to initiate and manage their own development projects. There are now more than 10,000 Indian businesses both on and off reserves reflecting Indian entrepreneurial activity and participation in the larger economy.

In 1991, DIAND approved 22 direct loans valued at $1.2 million to Indian and Inuit businesses, 46 loan guarantees valued at $3.2 million and 4 fee-for-service contracts and loan portfolio sales totalling $723,000.

Industry, Science and Technology Canada, which has the lead responsibility for financing native businesses, provided $72 million.

Training opportunities under CAEDS hold special promise not only for aboriginal people but for Canada as a whole.

Demographic projections clearly demonstrate that Canada will face a severe shortage of skilled labour within the next few decades. With a younger population than non-natives and with increasing opportunities for training and education, aboriginal people are in an exceptional position to play a greater role in Canada's economy.

Pathways to Success, the aboriginal component of Employment and Immigration's Canadian Jobs Strategy, is one such opportunity. It continues to contribute $200 million a year to training and employment initiatives for aboriginal people. Under the pathways program, aboriginal management boards at the national, regional and local levels decide on their training priorities and how available resources can be used best to meet their own people's labour market needs.

The funding for Pathways to Success is part of the $347 million this government will spend on aboriginal economic development in 1993-94. While this represents a reduction of 7 per cent over all from 1992-93 levels, it is still a significant investment in the future of aboriginal people in their communities.

On another front, many First Nations are anticipating future land claim settlements by eagerly exploring joint ventures and business possibilities in mineral development, oil and gas and tourism just to cite a few examples.

• (1740)

In addition to having access to specific aboriginal programs, aboriginal Canadians are also eligible to participate in federal programs for non-aboriginal Canadians. Examples are old age security and unemployment insurance.

Moreover, the Indian Act exempts from taxation the property of an Indian, including income, that is situated on reserve. Where purchases are made on reserve, and in certain other cases, the exemption applies to the goods and services tax as well.

In spite of the significant gains aboriginal people have made, there is still considerable room for improving their social and economic conditions. The federal government recognizes that aboriginal people are still among the most disadvantaged Canadians generally, and remains committed to helping them overcome this disparity.

I know that all of us here today share one objective: healthy and satisfying self-sufficiency for aboriginal people.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the minister's remarks. I know she has held responsibility for Indian affairs in this country for a couple of years. I know she has been on many reserves throughout the country, therefore this is not a new subject for her.

As I listened to her remarks, I tried to make the linkage to what the percentages were, the dollars were and what was really going on in the reserves. This is what really troubles me about the debate so far today.

I forget who it was who made the statement: Seeing something once is better than reading about it a thousand times. In the last three or four years I have had the opportunity of visiting a few reserves, certainly not as many as the minister has. I have been to Iqaluit, Whapmagoostui, James Bay, Oka and other places across the land, like Barriere Lake. What is going on in those places is just not good enough.

I think of Whapmagoostui in the northern part of Quebec where we have an arena structure. The arena beams have been set up for three years and the rink has not been finished. There is a little community hall for the kids to play in but no other facility where they could get exercise, get involved in figure skating, hockey or other community events. We have to wonder what is going wrong.

I am not talking about a lot of money here. I think there are a lot of things that could be actioned that would not cost the taxpayers of Canada a lot of money. A number of these things would somehow give the communities a better quality of life. Somehow we are missing getting some of these things done.

From time to time when I turn on television and I see the program World Vision I watch the suffering, the lack of facilities, water, sewers, educational facilities of people from disadvantaged countries. We look at all of these places from all around the world but the reality is we have conditions in our country that are just as bad as anything we see on World Vision.

• (1745)

I do not agree with the NDP, by the way, that government members do not care about the aboriginal community. I do not believe that. I cannot believe that. I do believe there is a problem in actioning some very simple things that could be done to make the quality of life better for our aboriginal community.

The minister has had this wealth of experience working with aboriginal people, having visited the reserves. Let us forget about the statistics, let us forget about all the numbers for a second. From her own personal point of view does she not think that for minimal tax dollars there are a lot of little things we could do to really make the quality of life a lot better on our reserves, that somehow it is the bureaucratic process that seems to be bogging us down and slowing up getting these things completed.

Mrs. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's comments. The 14 months that I spent in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development gave me an opportunity to travel from coast to coast and visit many reserves.

Yes, I have seen exactly the same situations that the hon. member mentioned. I have also seen the growth and commitment of our native people on other reserves as well.

In Tionaga, just down by Belleville, a group there started their own charter company with one plane. Two years later they have nine planes which they bought with their own money and are running a very good charter service.

The Six Nations Reserve, which is close to my own home, has a beautiful new senior citizens and nursing home so that elderly native people can stay on their own reserve and be well cared for.

There are reserves in British Columbia and the Atlantic provinces that are showing this type of growth and development but we still do have areas that need more help.

Where they need the help, and what we have tried to do to get the bureaucratic problem out of the way, is to devolve responsibility to the native people so that those people that are on their own reserves set their own priorities as to what they want from life on their own reserve. Maybe it is not a hockey rink, maybe they would sooner put the money into housing. In another case they might want the rink because they want their young people to be able to play hockey.

I think the best growth and development and help that we can give the native people is to give them the responsibility, along with the funding, to allow them to move forward and make their own decisions. Not decisions made by us sitting in this House and debating or by the members of DIAND, but rather let them make their own decisions and plan their own future.

This is why education is so important and why I am so pleased to see the growth in post-secondary education. Those young native people are leaving reserves, getting a post-secondary education, coming back and applying that knowledge to the growth and development for their younger brothers and sisters that are on those reserves.

That is where I think we have to concentrate. We have to concentrate on allowing our aboriginal people to make their own decisions, to conduct their own lives, to have the funding but let them make the decisions as to where they should spend it.

It is only by making their own decisions, by making their own commitments that things will begin to happen, so that they will have what they want on their reserves to better their particular way of life. I think that is the move we have to make. The fact that we have devolved the control of some 77 per cent of the spending back to the native people where I think it should have been all along is a step in the right direction. I would like to see more of this continue.

I am very proud of the accomplishments so many of our native people have made. The work they have done under the CAEDS program, the businesses they have gone into, the employment they have created for their own people, speaks very well of their ambitions and their abilities to make a difference in the lives of their own people and I think that is the most important part of it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is only 30 seconds left, so I will hear the hon. member for Comox—Alberni. Thirty seconds, now.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to do this in 30 seconds. The minister outlined a whole series of programs and the funding for those programs and yet a lot of these problems, the suicides we were talking about, the poverty among aboriginal people, the health care problems, continue to exist.

I want to ask the minister if she thinks enough money is being spent right now to deal with these problems but it is just being frittered away through the bureaucratic system or does she think that more resources are required.

She went through the budget in great detail, through the programs in great detail, but at the very end of it said that yes we do have problems. Is there enough money in those programs to deal with the problems we have now or are more resources required and, if so, where are those resources going to come from?

Mrs. Martin: The budget for DIAND and for other departments working with our native people, within the constraints of the federal government's position right now with our deficit and our debt situation, have been spared from cuts, unlike what all other departments have been facing for the very purpose that we know we need money in order to make changes.

The money is there. It is being used and I think the more control we give to the native people to spend those dollars the more progress will be made.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I too listened carefully to the minister and I agree with my colleague from Toronto that this is not a question of laying blame on one side of the House. We all share as legislators—they happen to be the government at the moment—some responsibility for what is happening.

I listened to two particular points that the minister made. It seems to me they are key points. One was the issue of education and one was the issue of self-government. What she says makes a lot of sense. Those are the things that had to be emphasized. The unfortunate part of it, as I understand it, is that not only have the funds for post-secondary education been kept but the funds for native communication programs, native broadcasting, have been diminished if not completely eliminated.

How can people devise their own future? How can people talk among themselves about what should go on if they cannot communicate? We have had native radio and television broadcasting systems that broadcast in Inuit that have been scaled down to the point where they are ineffective. This is key for people, if they are going to talk about their own future they have to talk together in their own language.

In the north we are inundated with signals from the south. We are inundated with sitcoms from American producers. The diminishing of post-secondary education funding and the diminishing of native broadcasting systems needs to be reviewed.

I have a good idea, Mr. Speaker, and maybe I will try it on the minister now. We talk about self-government. Clearly that is a key issue if people are going to make any progress at all. I listened to what the minister said about CAEDS. She told us about certain native groups across the country making progress, developing their private sector and their entrepreneurial skills and their ventures. Some of that is happening.

My colleague talked about James Bay. The Indians in James Bay are a case in point. The symptoms that we see across the country of alcohol abuse and family violence surely point to the fact that by and large our native people are in a desperate situation. Getting control of their own lives, getting an independence, is key for them. Self-government is the key issue for that.

There are still 600 unsettled land claims. The question becomes how and when they are going to be settled. They are still unresolved. There is an Indian Claims Commission which does not have the authority to advance a claim but only to make recommendations to the government and to mediate. Clearly the quick resolution of specific claims is urgent.

What is the policy of the government? We might remind ourselves of the debate about helicopters that has been going on in this House this past week. It is prepared to spend $6 billion for new helicopters. We could argue that they are needed or that they are not needed. I am not arguing whether they are or whether they are not. We on this side happen to think they are not and the government thinks they are.

The point is that to govern is to choose. If we set a priority that this is more important than settling land claims, do we have our priorities straight? We do have a responsibility for the Armed Forces but we have a responsibility to the first people. That should be our first priority. If we are looking at a meagre supply of resources available to the government for doing things that need to be done, surely the land claims settlements of aboriginal people have to be at the top of our list.

I want to get back to symptoms again. Recently a community in my riding was in the news quite a bit, the community of Davis Inlet. I just want to put on record some of the statistics with regard to that community in case the camera lens has now left Davis Inlet and moved to focus on some other part of Canada or on some other part of the world. We happened to be in the range of the camera for a while and that was great, but now the camera lens has moved away.

I want to remind the House and the people of Canada that Davis Inlet is still there. There are 465 people in Davis Inlet, 297 of whom are youths. Of the 297 youths, 42 are habitual sniffers. Of the 42 youths, 14 are chronic sniffers and some may have suffered permanent damage from sniffing. Of the 168 adults, over 100 abuse alcohol. Of the 100 adults, some 31 are chronic alcoholics.

I know the hon. member across the way is doing his best to resolve the situation. I know he is providing leadership on behalf of the Government of Canada in consultation with the Government of Newfoundland to come to grips with this. I know discussions are going on between the two governments and with the community to try to resolve it. In the final analysis it is that community which must make its own decision, must take control of its own life and must plan for its own future. The impetus for the future prosperity and well-being of that community must come from within. I hope it will.

I know the process is in place whereby we can deal with this, but I wanted to put on record some of the statistics we may have forgotten, because that camera lens has deserted us and moved elsewhere.

These are symptomatic. I do not know how my time is going. I want to leave enough time for my colleague from the north who gets a lot of credit for bringing this resolution forward. Let me say again that the symptoms are conclusive that there are serious problems across the country: a problem in health and a problem in education which must be addressed immediately. We must have the funds to deal with them. We must have a mechanism for speeding up the settlement of land claims. Within that land claims settlement self-government is a key issue, a priority issue, an issue that must be addressed.

We have to put it at the top of our agenda. We cannot say that we are going to deal with it at some time. This is a problem we have as responsible people on both sides of the House. We owe it to first citizens to show them we are prepared to deal with it on an urgent basis.

I compliment my colleague from Nunatsiaq for the motion and for bringing this matter to the attention of the House and to the people of Canada. I hope, as a result of the debate we have had today, progress can be made not simply in Davis Inlet or in Sheshatshits in my riding, not simply in Nain, Makkovik, Hopedale, Rigolet and all along the Labrador coast where we have serious problems that must be addressed, but all across the country.

• (1800)

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to thank my colleague for his remarks and his sensitivity to the issue.

One thing I sometimes try to focus on and to elaborate on as often as I can for members of Parliament who do not represent First Nations communities is the necessity to be much more sensitive to a particular culture that is not the same as their own and to try to put themselves in the shoes of a First Nations person.

In the discussion in the House today, and I want to ask the member to comment on it if he will, it was interesting that the minister who spoke just before him talked about how the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development passed on in the last few years a lot of the responsibility to First Nations to run their own lives, to the tune of close to 70 per cent, if I am not mistaken.

I am concerned that there is a suggestion by the minister in that statement that First Nations have the power now to make the decisions to improve their lot and the way their lives are looked after at the grassroots level or at the community level. My concern is that in fact all we are doing as a government when we make those suggestions is misleading the public.

What we are asking First Nations to do is to administer policies that are within the department, policies that have been made by non-natives. If we want to take it a step further, that suggests to me that chiefs and councils probably have less powers than mayors or reeves in municipalities would have.

Would the member tell me and tell the Canadian people—and he could use Davis Inlet or some such community in his riding as an example—how much power those people have over their own lives to improve their lot, to make a go of the community they so desperately want to improve, and to give young people the future they expect to have?

That is really the essence of this debate. It is not the numbers the minister across the way is throwing at us. The government is suggesting that it is trying to put more money into it. It is the responsibility and ability of First Nations to truly make a difference in their own lives that I think we should deal with in this debate.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, I want to comment on that question. There is a fundamental truth in what the hon. member is saying. I think he is saying that it is power. That involves some resources but maybe not so much resources or certainly not only resources as power. Politics is a question of power.

We understand that there is a federal system whereby power resides in the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipal governments. Everybody quarrels that they do not have enough.

In the communities in my region there is, as the member says, less power to govern those communities than municipalities would have. For example, there is not control over their own schools. There are no native health people in the communities I am talking about.

I have to make a distinction between Inuit communities and Innu communities. The Innu, as the House knows, are Indian people and the Inuit are not. I have to make a distinction between those two types of communities.

In the Indian communities in my riding there is a clear lack of local control for the institutions and for what could be called the municipal structure. There is a long way to go in creating that but that is what we must aim toward. We must give people control over their own lives. It is not easily done, but it must be done. It is fundamental.

If any of us in this Chamber do not have control over our lives we do not have any self-respect; we do not have any direction; we do not have any identity.

• (1805)

The essential problem is how to give people back their identity. We should give them back control over their own lives. What that means is saying to them: "We do not tell you what to do from Ottawa or St. John's or anywhere else; you decide". As with Moosonee, Moose Factory, Winnipeg, Trois-Rivières, or any other place in this country, they decide where they want to go as communities. Davis Inlet, Sheshatshits and those other communities have to do the same. They must have that element of self-government.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

[English]

We have proposed this motion today to bring attention to the many unmet needs and aspirations of the aboriginal peoples in Canada.

This year, 1993, is the year the United Nations has designated as International Year of Indigenous People. It is surely appropriate for the House at this time to examine the government's performance on issues of concern to aboriginal people.

On a wide range of issues basic to aboriginal families and children from coast to coast to coast this government has failed to act. Where there has been activity it has been piecemeal, sporadic and ad hoc.

This House and Canadians have to know that behind all the big numbers and fancy rhetoric tossed out by the government, aboriginal peoples and communities throughout the country are in real distress.

Recently the tragic situation at Davis Inlet to which the hon. member who just spoke before me referred shocked Canadians and many other people throughout the world. Under the intense media scrutiny and outrage of ordinary Canadians the government was forced to take some action. Beyond the government's initial response much more remains to be done. It is more important than ever, now that media attention has abated, for all of us to ensure the government follows through in a fair and just way.

Today I would like to draw attention to the many other aboriginal communities in Canada which are in similar despair. Many of them are remote, far from the political and media centres of Canada. From time to time a story will be written in the newspapers or graphic images will make the television news but this attention is not sustained. I am sure that the government would do much more if only Canadians knew more about the issues confronting aboriginal peoples.

What if there had been massive media attention in the 1950s when several Inuit families were relocated from communities in northern Quebec to the isolation of Resolute Bay on Grise Fiord in the Northwest Territories? What if their suffering and hardship had been chronicled daily for all Canadians to see?

Without that media attention we only have firsthand accounts of the survivors and their descendants. Their words, however, are not good enough for this government. For the past several years the High Arctic exiles, as they call themselves, have documented the circumstances and consequences of this relocation and have tried to obtain an official apology and compensation from the government for the suffering they endured. Having heard their testimony the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs has twice since 1990 asked the government to respond positively to these requests. The government has refused.

The Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples is holding a special inquiry into this issue. Zebedee Nungak, a spokesperson for the exiles, summed up the government's attitude in this way:

> They have condemned the exiles to a second exile. The first exile was the relocation itself and the second exile was the government's determined effort to ignore the claims and allegations of these people.

Relocations, loss of land base, loss of traditional economic activity, erosion of language and culture, and loss of control have created tremendous strains and pressures in aboriginal communities. In the most remote communities these pressures are more recent, but recent or not the consequences are the same. The repeated and continuing impositions and encroachments of non-aboriginal cultures, values and governments on aboriginal peoples have had and are having devastating results. The government has failed once again to recognize these strains and its own role in contributing to them.

The activities of animal rights groups destroyed the sealing economy in the eastern Arctic. Unless the government acts quickly, Canada's European markets for wild fur will be lost and so will the livelihoods of many aboriginal trappers. The government knows that by 1995 Canada has to meet certain international humane trapping standards to keep our European markets. Yet last June the federal cabinet refused to provide any new money to continue on expanding its humane standards development program. Aboriginal trappers are already having a hard time trying to provide for their families and this government is just making it harder.

Throughout the country aboriginal unemployment rates continue to be unacceptably high. It often reaches 70 or 80 per cent or 90 per cent in very remote communities. Aboriginal per capita income levels are well below those of non-aboriginal Canadians.

Aboriginal health conditions have been described by health professionals as Third World conditions. The rates of aboriginal violent death and suicide are many times greater than the average Canadian rates. Aboriginal housing conditions are far below Canadian standards and yet progress on these and many other issues is painfully slow or non-existent.

Study after study has documented inadequate, unsuitable and overcrowded aboriginal housing conditions and a backlog of crisis proportions and yet the government has not acted. In fact it has cut housing funds. The last time any additional housing funds were provided to deal with the housing backlog was in 1983, 10 years ago, under a Liberal government.

This government's refusal to act has made aboriginal and northern housing problems worse. Despite a housing shortage of 3,600 units in the NWT, the federal government reduced its funding for cost-shared social housing. With the full knowledge that current housing construction rates are not keeping up with the expanding northern population, the government instituted cutbacks.

The crisis continues, the backlog worsens and the problems increase.

By failing to respond to the north's critical housing needs the government has failed to deal with the quality-of-life issues associated with housing. It has ignored the impact of the lack of available, suitable and affordable housing of all areas of life.

Post-secondary education plans are postponed or not pursued at all due to the lack of housing. If someone has a house they risk losing it to someone on the waiting list if they leave their community to go to college or university. The severe overcrowding creates stresses that contribute to family violence and other social problems. There are homeless people in the Arctic. There are families living in shacks on the edge of Iqaluit and Frobisher Bay and this government has turned a blind eye to their plight.

Last year the federal government turned down a request for more housing funds for the Northwest Territories. Related to family violence and housing is the north's urgent need for more shelters, facilities and services to support victims, offenders and their families. There is also a need for more child care facilities and spaces. This government promised a day care program that never materialized. As a result, northern child care needs are not being met. About 2,300 children in the NWT require child care yet there are only about 700 licensed spaces available.

Health conditions are also related to housing conditions. Tuberculosis is still a problem in the Northwest Territories. Meningitis occurs at higher rates in the Northwest Territories than in any other part of Canada. Deaths among Dene and Inuit babies in the NWT still occur at twice the Canadian rate and the gap between aboriginal and non-aboriginal death rates in early life is increasing.

From 1984 to 1989 in the Northwest Territories over 30 per cent of all deaths were the result of injury and violence. The NWT suicide rate is more than twice the Canadian rate. In the 15 to 24 age group the NWT rates are more than five times the Canadian rate.

Something is terribly wrong. Why are so many aboriginal young people killing themselves? They seem to have no hope and they do not see any prospects of improving their lives. They have no jobs. Aboriginal employment rates are not improving. Aboriginal unemployment is not decreasing. It is getting worse. An unemployment crisis threatens the use of the north and yet the government has done absolutely nothing and is doing absolutely nothing.

Between 1986 and the year 2016 the population between the ages of 15 to 64 will increase by 137 per cent in the central and eastern Arctic or Nunavut. The present rate of job creation is hardly sufficient to absorb the growing population. Excluding opportunities that arise through the creation of the Nunavut government, at the current job creation rates fewer aboriginal people will be employed in the year 2016 than were employed in 1986.

Without concerted and dramatic attention to this problem and the need for much greater investment in education and training the aboriginal people of Nunavut will become increasingly unemployed.

• (1815)

Perhaps this government's greatest failure has been its lack of vision, its failure to see the whole and its refusal to listen to the solutions offered by the aboriginal peoples themselves.

All the issues I have touched on are interrelated and interconnected. Aboriginal peoples want these issues addressed urgently and holisticly. They want long-term preventative strategies developed which reflect their priorities and goals. All too often however, the government has provided only short-term reactions when it responds at all.

The aboriginal peoples of Canada have contributed much to the building of this nation and they have much more to offer. While several of them have managed to circumvent the obstacles placed before them, too many others are being lost. This tremendous waste of energy and talent cannot continue.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleague for his remarks.

Of course as an aboriginal person himself he has a much larger understanding of the issue than any of us in this place. I think something we desperately need is someone who can tell us firsthand just what is happening.

One of the things that I wanted to ask my colleague relates to post-secondary enrolment. Ministers have spoken today and the minister of Indian affairs is going to speak later this evening in this debate. He could probably help clarify this as well.

The number of aboriginal people enrolled in post-secondary institutions nearly doubled since 1985-86 to 11,170. It ended up in 1991-92 to be 21,442. It is easy to see that there has been almost a doubling of the amount of young people who are interested in and are enrolled in post-secondary education as far as aboriginal people are concerned.

I am interested in asking my colleague this. The ministers opposite continue to say that funding for post-secondary education for aboriginal young people is going up and that it is really improving.

In the capping that took place a few year ago, we found that between 1990-91 and 1991-92 only 142 students more were enrolled than in the previous year. If one looks at the numbers that I gave regarding 1985-86 to 1991-92, a rough estimate shows that there's an increase every year of almost 2,000 students per year going to post-secondary institutions.

We find in a recession that most people tend to go to school because they cannot get a job with times so tough. They go to school to upgrade their skills and training. In fact, only 142 more young people went to school than in the previous year.

That number interests me in that it suggests that the capping has had an effect on young people and their ability to go to post-secondary institutions.

I would like to know from my colleague's perspective from the north whether he is aware of young people who have not been able to go and are on some sort of waiting list because of the effect of the cuts in post-secondary education to aboriginal students.

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question.

First of all, one must understand that young people have to want to go for post-secondary education. We should be giving them every opportunity to do that. However the incentive sometimes is not there because they have to move somewhere else where the environment that they are used to is not there.

In the area of post-secondary education in the north that we are talking about, unfortunately the enrolment rate is not very high. It is partly because of the amount of paperwork that is required to take the step to go into post-secondary education. I have a nephew who wanted to go into post-secondary education yet decided not to at the end because he could not get through the paperwork.

However, I remember when this government wanted to cap the post-secondary education funding. The cry from the aboriginal people across the nation was heard by the Canadian people, yet it took the government so long to respond that at the end only so many took advantage of it as the hon. member just mentioned. They get to a point where they give up because they are not given the incentive. They do not have the faith in this government's ability to react to the issues that they want to get involved in. I think it is time the government realizes that it has an obligation to the aboriginal people of this country and realize that aboriginal people will take over only when they have the post-secondary education needed to take over the kind of jobs they want and the kind of government that they want.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I am pleased to participate in this debate on a motion sponsored by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq. I am glad that he is in the House to be present for my comments in this very important discussion.

First, I would like to say that I share the member's concern and that of all members, for the condition in which many aboriginal people find themselves in their communities across Canada. For anyone who watches television or reads the news it is evident that there are indeed very sad and even tragic circumstances in some of the aboriginal communities in Canada today. I think we all feel a deep sense of conscience and obligation to do everything within our power to alleviate these conditions.

At this point I depart from the language of the motion before the House where it condemns the government for abandoning aboriginal families and children. I sincerely believe that this government has done more to improve the situation of aboriginal peoples in Canada in the space of the last eight years, and certainly in the last three years while I have been minister, than has been done since the time of Confederation.

Assume one judges improvement by the level of financial support from government that now exceeds $5 billion a year to status Indian and Inuit peoples. If one multiplied that by all the years that the government has been trying to help through subsidies and welfare in overcoming these problems, one would have to admit that the policies and programs of successive governments of the past have been an abysmal failure. If we still see these tragic scenes on our televisions of any child without a bed in which to sleep, of inadequate conditions, inadequate housing and health problems then one must admit to the failure of policies of many decades.

Therefore, I want to speak today about the successes of the last few years, many of which will not be fully understood and measured until some years into the future. I believe it is important to accept that funds alone and the recognition of rights alone will not solve these fundamental human problems.

Let us set the record straight at the outset.

• (1825)

Within First Nations communities in Canada today, compared to 20 years or 40 years ago, on average all of the statistical indicators show that educational levels are much higher, life expectancy is significantly improved, the level of infant mortality is far lower than it was even 20 years ago, employment levels are higher, and economic development opportunity is greater. I am told there are now 5,000 aboriginal businesses in Canada today, compared to less than 1,000 a decade ago.

Housing quality and standards are much improved. There are new schools. I have visited and opened many of them. There is cleaner water and running water, and there are improved services in most communities and much higher standards of health. I am not saying this to erase the truth about the tragic situations that still exist, but there has indeed been a significant improvement.

It is important to recognize something about the system of paternalism created by our well-meaning ancestors who thought the European ways of raising children, harvesting crops and building communities were superior to the aboriginal ways, their languages, traditions and form of subsistence. We tried to make them be like us.

We created an Indian Act shortly after Confederation and immediately put First Nations people on to small parcels of land—some called them concentration camps without fences—and told them we would protect them and ensure that their rights and their special relationship to the Crown would always be respected.

In doing so we took away the freedom of aboriginal people to make choices for themselves and gave to a person in Ottawa—I happen to presently be that person—the power under the Indian Act to make all decisions affecting their lands, resources, education, and way of government. That person essentially exercises a veto over any choice they might wish to make about their own destiny.

In retrospect that has been a case of very bad judgment. If we are to continue to see progress in the living conditions and in meeting the needs of young aboriginal children growing up in a modern and rapidly changing world we must end the paternalism that the Indian Act, my ministry and Indian reservations represent.

There are three keys to a brighter future for aboriginal people, who one day we hope will come into a full and complete partnership with all other Canadians, into a true equality. The three keys to getting to that brighter future are education, adequate resources, including land, and self-government. Of those three the one that is of fundamental importance is education.

On coming to this portfolio I discovered that in 1960 less than 4 per cent of all young aboriginal people made it to or through high school. In 1985 that figure had risen to 40 per cent. In 1980 less than 1,500, perhaps 1,000, aboriginal students were getting into post-secondary programs. Now that number is more than 20,000. In 1984 when we formed the government there were approximately 4,000 to 5,000 students in post-secondary programs. Now that number exceeds 20,000.

Education is a fundamental tool for self-reliance and self-determination. At the same time there must be something to do with that education, and while preserving a traditional way of life it is no longer possible to live on the resources of the land in traditional ways.

The First Nations, the native communities of Canada, are surrounded by forests and have largely survived economically since the encounter with European civilization through the fur trade. It is a strange paradox that the fur-bearing animals are no longer accessible to them nor can they be sold in adequate abundance because of policies and environmental changes.

The forests which we cut down and convert to newsprint and two-by-fours from which we build our homes are largely used and enjoyed by non-aboriginal peoples, even though that is the primary resource that surrounds most First Nations communities.

We need to settle land claims and deal with the question of sharing more equitably in energy resources, mineral resources, forest resources and the power that can be generated from water.

Even if we can settle land claims, honour treaty obligations, provide enough land and resources, and the level of education is adequate we will still not see thriving, successful and self-reliant aboriginal communities without self-government.

In the years ahead that is going to be a fundamental challenge to all the members of this Parliament and those who come after us. We might achieve a recognition of the inherent right of self-government through constitutional change or accelerate progress in replacing the Indian Act with something more practical and more appropriate to the needs of aboriginal people. We might do so by eliminating the department of Indian affairs and replacing it with an Indian governments agency, an agency administered by aboriginal peoples not by government bureaucrats here in Ottawa, and one which gets its political guidance from an aboriginal assembly in which elected aboriginals can establish national policies on how funds will be distributed and how many of these problems will be addressed.

Unless we are prepared to think creatively about those kinds of changes then the mere appropriation of funds by Parliament directed through the existing kinds of programs that we can stand here and talk about will not solve the problem.

When the Prime Minister appointed me and shortly after the very challenging and significant summer of 1990 which we all experienced, when that was past the Prime Minister made a speech on October 24, 1990 to set out a new course of action. We called it the native agenda. Its purpose was to really create a new kind of relationship that would hopefully lead to a full partnership between First Nations people and all other Canadians.

One of the important aspects of that native agenda was that we would try to deal with some immediate problems. So the Prime Minister spoke of accelerating the settlement of land claims and unfulfilled treaty obligations. He spoke of introducing programs to improve conditions on reserve. He spoke of initiatives to develop a new relationship between the Government of Canada and First Nations, a relationship built on trust and respect. He spoke of trying to improve the role of aboriginal people in mainstream or contemporary Canadian society.

There were many initiatives that we took following those four themes: accelerating settlement of land claims, improving conditions on reserves, and developing a new relationship government to government. There was the constitutional process and the Charlottetown accord proposals. But we did not come with all the answers.

In fact, if self-government means anything to aboriginal people it means they cannot look to us and to this Parliament for all the answers, so we should not stand up here and give speeches pretending we know what all the solutions are. I will come back to that in a moment.

Where we did not have short-term answers, for the first time in the history of this country we set in place a process of seeking answers from experts to some of these most profound questions. The Prime Minister in May 1991 announced that we would strike a royal commission on the aboriginal question.

Rather than just striking a royal commission in the usual way and announcing who would be on it he said: "We will consult with First Nations leadership as to who should be on the royal commission and what questions it should address". He asked the former Chief Justice Brian Dickson to give some thought as to how to create this royal commission. That was the first time that the federal cabinet and the Prime Minister turned the assignment of striking a royal commission over to an outside group. We will see in a few months time what kinds of positive suggestions will come from the royal commission to deal with the long-term question.

Let me mention what I told the Chief Justice when I met him before he submitted his report to government. I said that the fundamental question we must wrestle with is the question of the destiny of young aboriginal children growing up in Canada today: What will be their future? What can governments and their own people, their own leaders, do to help ensure a future of equal opportunity, equal quality of life and the right to have the same freedoms of choice in society as all other Canadians while preserving the aboriginal languages and cultures and traditions, which are so precious and important to First Nations people? How can we construct a better destiny for the children of the aboriginal peoples.

The first answer is that it is not up to us. We have something we can give and we must continue to give in material ways. However, if we lived in a remote northern community whose population was doubling every 10 years, surrounded by trees and with or without a road, and we were in a modern high school with computers and watching rock videos on television, what would we struggle with inside if we were a teenager thinking about our future? Would we want to get out? Could we afford to stay? If we stayed in that community without work, what would be our destiny? Would it be alcohol, other substance abuse or some of the other social tragedies we hear about?

The fundamental question is: What will be their destiny? I think we all have a responsibility.

I came prepared to talk about our progress on land claims and treaty issues. There is also the hundreds of millions of dollars in additional funds we have committed to increasing the budget for post-secondary education and to improving the sewers and water within Indian communities. There is the package before cabinet now dealing with an enhanced housing program for aboriginal communities and dealing with tragedies like Davis Inlet, Big Cove, and Fox Lake which is in northern Alberta.

I could talk about all the statistics and all the funds. The budget of my department is now more than twice as large as it was in 1985 and it is not nearly adequate. Each year we have had significant increases in our budget at a time when all other government budgets have been frozen or near to that.

Assuming we can find the financial resources, the real question is the destiny question. It is important that we create a legal framework that is acceptable to First Nations, to native people where they no longer have to live in a sense feeling like subjugated people, subjugated to our Crown, to our laws, to our way of life, to our values and to our system which revolves around the dollar.

I hope the royal commission will give us some more profound wisdom. However, between now and whenever we find the magic formula we must continue to encourage increased levels of education. We must take away the shackles of the Indian Act and paternalism and create a climate where native people are free to risk, to succeed and yes, to fail in their own endeavours. And for their part, when they fail they should not come back to government expecting a solution.

I know we must be a caring society and a caring Parliament but we have to create a climate where social welfare is replaced with the freedom to choose, to succeed and to risk. We should help by providing education and by settling land and treaty issues and then by reaching out the hand of friendship. That is because I sense the one thing that has been lacking and which I find astounding is that in a country with 28 million people there has not been enough person-to-person bonding, where a First Nations person can say: "I really have a friend who is not of my own", and some of us can say the same. I will say that to the hon. member for Western Arctic whom I have come to know, respect, admire and feel great affection for.

When I travel across the country and in and out of aboriginal communities, I think it is such a tragedy that we really live in two worlds. Those of us who have so much to give expect government to do it and we are not prepared to reach out our own hand and offer help as we should.

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for his kind comments.

We all have our parties to which we belong and our partisanships sometimes. However, I think we all recognize the common struggle and we do our best to try to achieve our goals. Sometimes things are a little difficult and a little tense but I think we manage to work together. I just wanted to say that I appreciate his comments.

Back to the matter of business. I have a couple of very specific concerns. One has to do with the Métis agenda. Following the 1985 First Ministers' Conference on Aboriginal Constitutional Matters, the federal government developed a policy to enter into tripartite self-government negotiations with provincial governments and the Métis.

• (1845)

To date, there have been no self-government agreements concluded. No agreements in principle have been reached. No major policy changes affecting Métis people have been adopted. Currently there are six sets of negotiations being conducted. These are in Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

While little is known about the federal policy framework, we do know that federal officials refuse to deal squarely with Métis land claims. They have indicated that land can be considered under economic development. What this means in practice is a mystery to the Métis.

I would like an update on what has been happening with the Métis interlocutor and the Federal-Provincial Relations Office. What is the current state of affairs with regard to any kind of constitutional recognition for the Métis people?

Having said that I know I will not get a chance for another question, but I have another one which deals with the Inuvialuit.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has an agreement with the Inuvialuit that it would clean up the Horton River site which is a DEW Line site. There are approximately 5,000 to 10,000 abandoned fuel drums scattered along the beach. In the vicinity of the site, on-site buildings, pipelines, fuel tanks and a large conveyer must be demolished and disposed of off site. As well, landfills used by the DEW Line must be cleaned and capped with gravel. Since the site is very difficult to access and since the terrain around it is very rugged the clean-up will be very difficult and costly.

I have spoken with the officials of the Inuvialuit. Mr. Gruben has provided me with a briefing done by his staff. I am very thankful for that because we would like to know what exactly the government is going to do with respect to the time line of the clean-up. It has agreed that this would provide employment as well as business and training opportunities in a very depressed economy. It has agreed that the Horton River clean-up will be done. However, the disagreement is on—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order please. That might be a pretty good question to put on the Order Paper. The minister would have a better opportunity to answer. I will allow him to answer at least part of it.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Western Arctic will understand if I do not give detailed answers.

On the first question about Métis and the recognition of Métis rights and claims, I think she knows that the minister for intergovernmental affairs has been given that responsibility as interlocutor for the Métis people.

The federal government has always wished to provide a proper recognition of the Métis people. They are in a category different from those of other than North American aboriginal descent and those who are full aboriginal. They are unique.

In the constitutional discussions, it was recognized that that uniqueness of the Métis people should be recognized and reflected in our Constitution. The recognition under section 91(24) should be accorded. With the failure of the Charlottetown accord or at least that stage of the process, that question remains to be resolved.

Meanwhile it is our view that where federal government dollars are transferred to provinces for health and welfare and educational purposes off reserves, provinces then have a responsibility to provide adequate programs for the benefit of Métis people.

Some provinces, for example the province of Alberta, have been quite generous in setting land aside and creating new communities for Métis people. I would not want to call them reserves because as I was saying in my remarks, a very unfortunate stigma goes with that.

In the case of the western Arctic, the hon. member knows that in the land claims process Métis people are being regarded as having equivalency to status Indian people. I think that is a step in the right direction.

I could not really speculate. I suppose it will take until after a federal election to come to terms with constitutional questions again. I could not speculate on how quickly that aspect of the Métis agenda might be advanced.

I just want to say in conclusion that we are all delighted to see Mr. Yvon Dumont named as Lieutenant–Governor of Manitoba. That is another measure of recognition of the important and rich contribution the Métis have given to Canada.

• (1850)

In regard to the Horton River DEW Line site, our government announced the $100 million Arctic Environmental Protection Strategy. I had the pleasure of making that announcement two years ago. One important aspect of that project is the clean–up of Arctic DEW Line sites and other unsightly dump sites across the Arctic. We are trying to facilitate these projects where local aboriginal people will do the work under supervision and at the same time get the best value for money so there is a competitive process of receiving proposals.

I cannot tell the hon. member for sure where the proposal she spoke of from the Inuvialuit Regional Corporation is, but I can certainly get her that material by way of a letter or report tomorrow.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the minister. I noted the minister went on at some length on the anticipated changes in his department.

The minister stated the recognition of the inherent right to self–government. Logically, from that flows that his Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development becomes much more responsive to the needs of the aboriginal people, that the department will start listening to the advice and the direction of the aboriginal people. I commend the minister if that indeed is the direction.

What puzzles me is that about three weeks ago a delegation from the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations pointed out there was going to be a 31 per cent decrease in the economic development funds available in the province of Saskatchewan for economic development on and off the reserves.

What struck me besides the fact that there was a 10 per cent cut in the department, of course there was no consultation. One can make an argument, given the dire economic conditions. What struck me the most was that the people of the FSIN heard about it through the back door. There was a leak in the department. It was a decision that had already been made. The FSIN was never consulted. Nobody from the department went to the FSIN and told it of the situation, that there would be a reduction in the budget, and that it should indicate where the reduction should be. The bureaucrats made that decision.

When is the minister's policy of having the department more sensitive to the aboriginal people and consulting with them going to come into effect? Why was this decision to reduce the economic development taken unilaterally and not after consultation?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question. The fact of the matter is that as with all governments these days, this government has a limited budget. The budget of my department has grown by $285 million this year. That is almost a 7 per cent increase. The budget of government programs for aboriginal peoples has grown $350 million, a 7 per cent increase on an over–all projected spending of over $5 billion.

Most government departments have their spending frozen. In the case of certain projects there are cuts of 10 per cent in grants and contributions for example.

It is necessary to decide how to preserve the important programs such as housing, where the funds were not diminished, such as education, where the funds were increased, such as welfare, social support, and child and family counselling. A decision had to be made about how we could fit within the budget.

In the final analysis the access to the treasury can only be had by the government on behalf of Parliament. Therefore it is not possible to have budgetary or over–all spending decisions the subject of consultation in advance. Funding for economic development this year will be $347 million, plus the funding of some $200 million in Pathways to Success.

• (1855)

The funding is not the problem, it is the management of the funding. We have created through alternative funding arrangements the flexibility for First Nations and tribal councils to adjust their priorities within budgets. If we reach the day where we see a transfer of global funding to an Indian government agency, then aboriginal leadership will have the delightful challenge of making decisions that would include cuts or rearranging priorities, which is the way it should be with self-government.

We want aboriginal people to control their own funding. That is why over 75 per cent of my department's budget is presently administered by First Nations people.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, when the minister spoke it was interesting to note that he made it sound as if whatever problems prevail today is the fault of the previous Liberal governments.

We have to understand that this government has been the Government of Canada for the last nine years. Its members keep blaming the previous Liberal governments for everything that goes wrong. They talk about how well they have treated the aboriginal people. They are now proposing, under the Department of National Revenue, to tax status Indians off reserve, which they previously never did. I do not call that treating the aboriginal people in the best of ways, when they are proposing to tax them when they had not previously taxed them. They are proposing to cut the economic development programs of the aboriginal people by 28 per cent. They have done an across the board 10 per cent cut to aboriginal organizations funded by the Secretary of State.

All these things have been cut. They cut the housing funds, even though there is a severe housing shortage in the Northwest Territories. If the government does not reverse the decisions it has made on these issues, as far as we are concerned all this will be likened to a full-grown male caribou's droppings.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member thought I was accusing previous Liberal governments. I do not think I even used the term.

I was saying that a system of many decades duration which is based on the Parliament and the Indian affairs minister deciding what is best for aboriginal people, where we spend money to solve every problem, that that system has failed. I said we are trying to turn in a new direction and establish a new relationship where we can make adequate funds available within the usual budgetary limits, but the difficult decisions and choices in future will increasingly be made by First Nations leadership. That is what I was saying.

I want to make it quite clear that the government has over $350 million available for economic development under the Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy, and there is no 28 per cent cut in that amount. In fact, the government has increased significantly the funding for economic development. The results show that since 1984 we have seen the creation of several thousand new aboriginal businesses.

I should also point out that this year the funding for aboriginal education at all levels will be almost $1 billion. There are significant increases under this government which never occurred under previous governments in all of the history of Canada.

What I am trying to say to the House today is that all the money in the world will not solve these problems if the system is wrong. It is the system that this Parliament has to change.

• (1900)

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am very delighted that the minister is here today to participate in this debate, given the serious nature of it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Would the hon. member like to ask the minister a question?

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your flexibility and leeway in this regard.

The minister is defending the position of the government on economic development but there is no doubt when one reads the estimates that the economic development funds have been reduced by 31 per cent.

The aboriginal people in Saskatchewan, in particular, and across Canada say that the funds that are available for economic development are reduced from what they were expecting this year. They are suggesting there are unhonoured commitments that have been made which will go unfulfilled.

My question to the minister is—and I thank you for the opportunity to ask it, Mr. Speaker—are we not sending a poor message when the estimates show an increase in funding for welfare but a decrease in funding for development?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I have been approached by many native leaders who would like us to convert welfare dollars into economic development dollars.

In the spirit of self-government I think there is now an opportunity if this Parliament is prepared to encourage these changes to allow chiefs, councils and tribal councils to have more control over the global funding, which is what we are already doing under alternative funding arrangements, and convert welfare dollars into economic development dollars.

What we are doing with the aboriginal economic development strategy is funding major kinds of programs and entrepreneurial initiatives with great success, but at the band level we cannot put money into having economic development officers to the same degree we could before if we have to keep the welfare payments up.

If the hon. member for the NDP says we should cut the welfare payments in order to encourage more economic development I am all for it.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to be able to participate in this debate both because of the substance of the motion before us and the very timely nature of its presentation.

I would like to compliment the member for Nunatsiaq for having the foresight to bring this motion before us. From what I have heard so far, I think the hon. members are certainly making use of this opportunity to put some very important points on the record.

I also appreciate being here to listen to the speech of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in this debate because after all he is the individual who most bears the responsibility for giving reality to the goals and aspirations of this House and indeed the Canadian people with respect to the aboriginal people.

The debate which has just preceded this, the discussion between the minister and hon. members with respect to what has happened with economic development cuts, indicates that in fact there is a problem, not only with the minister but with many participants in these kinds of debates at squaring the rhetoric that goes with these kinds of issues with the realities which often accompany them. I would like to deal specifically with some of those aspects later on.

I agree with the minister that a new vision is needed in this country. Also I agree with the minister that the system as we have known it since the time of contact has led us down a blind alley. The system we know has led us to a situation where we have to deal with questions such as the epidemic of suicides in many Indian communities and certainly that is a trend we have to reverse.

At the outset of my remarks I want to pay tribute to the aboriginal families in this country. The motion before us says that this House condemns the government for abandonment of aboriginal families and children so this debate is really about aboriginal families and children.

In that context I would like to give credit and pay tribute to the aboriginal families that have touched my own life. I had the experience at the age of eight of coming into contact with people on the Beardy's Indian reserve, to get to know those families long before I knew anything about politics or issues or differences between people or the many kinds of dimensions to the whole question that one comes to later in life.

I very much value that childhood experience, the experience of Indian family life at its best.

In representing the constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River, I come into contact with any number of Indian families in the course of my duties. There are 46 aboriginal communities in my constituency, including Métis communities, Dene communities, Cree communities and Dakota communities. I have had the experience of listening to the concerns of those families and of being able to experience their family life in a small way. To be able to have the opportunity of presenting the issues that arise from those contacts in this forum is certainly a rare privilege for any individual Canadian to have. Therefore I am grateful for that experience.

However when we are talking about what is happening to aboriginal families, it goes beyond simple issues of control, of funding, of parliamentary legislation and so on. It goes to questions of what is really happening to real families. Historically the record of what has happened to aboriginal families is extremely bleak. It is probably the darkest blot on the Canadian record.

We pride ourselves on being a peaceful, compassionate and sharing kind of nation, that we play that kind of role in the international arena. Certainly many people have developed the critique that before we get on a high horse and take too much pride in who we are as a people, we need to look inward at the historical record of the interaction between the majority of society and the aboriginal people.

Certainly it is not a bright record, not if you look at the whole situation of residential schools. There was a concerted effort, a comprehensive policy of alienating Indian, Métis and Inuit children from their own family heritage, from their own culture. It was a deliberate policy to assimilate the aboriginal people into the mainstream of society, no matter what the cost or what the consequences. We see those consequences on a daily basis today.

How could it be otherwise? We had two generations of aboriginal people who were torn from their family life, away from their communities, placed in an alien setting and punished if they in any way exercised their traditional ways, their cultures. After a situation like that, should we wonder why today we have problems of family breakdown, of alcohol abuse and of child suicide in our aboriginal communities. There is very little that is left to the imagination when you look at the historical record.

This was expanded by many of the social programs, the social policies that governments, both provincial and federal, exercised toward aboriginal people. One need only look at adoption policies, where it was considered a hallmark of progress to remove aboriginal children from their families and communities and to place them in white families far from their people, far from their culture and sometimes even far from their country.

What kind of a message did that send to the aboriginal communities? What kind of message did that send to aboriginal families, when federal and provincial governments had, as a matter of policy, the notion that it was best on a blanket basis for aboriginal children to be removed from their families and from their culture? That is part of the Canadian legacy that we need to examine. Certainly there has been a growing recognition of the abomination which this whole line of policy development represents in our history. We talk a good line about coming to terms with these problems. We talk a good line about providing new resources and coming to these problems with new insights. But what is really happening?

Let me run through a very few specific examples. One is the Brighter Futures Program which the government has proclaimed with a great deal of fanfare. However that is all it is, a great deal of fanfare. Certainly we have all seen the press releases. The aboriginal communities have seen the press releases. As a result of that, the aboriginal communities developed proposals, very good ideas, on how to come to terms with the family violence issues, with suicide issues and with the abuse issues in their communities.

They develop proposals, think these things through, and set in motion a healing process in their own communities expecting that the government is going to make good on its word. Where is the Brighter Futures funding?

There is no such thing. There is no process by which people can access this money. There are no guidelines by which this money is distributed. This is a situation in which there seems to be a recognition of what the problem is but no way to access the resources.

In my own province of Saskatchewan in this very year, and in fact in the weeks leading up to the end of the year, $8.2 million will revert to the Crown, to the Treasury. This is money that was earmarked for family and social services for Indian people in that province. Those funds will be going unspent.

On the one hand, we have a situation in which there is a desperate need. It is a situation in which we have all kinds of ideas and proposals to perpetuate the healing process and to get it under way. On the other hand, because of jurisdictional arguments and the government having to prove a point, we have a case where if aboriginal people do not knuckle under to provincial jurisdiction they are not going to get access to the $8.2 million which they need.

The government is going to withdraw it at the same time as its members speak in the House to outline its commitment to dealing with these problems.

I just had the opportunity of participating in the discussion in the aboriginal affairs committee. The minister of Indian affairs appeared before the committee to outline his role in the settlement of land issues.

In talking about aboriginal families and communities one cannot separate those issues from land issues because that culture is fundamentally rooted in its attachment to the land. Its whole way of life and of viewing the world is attached to the land. We cannot separate these issues.

This is a situation in which the minister of Indian affairs is on the verge of introducing legislation in this House to create the Nunavut territory and settle the outstanding Inuit claims. All of us welcome the fact that those rights will finally be recognized and that a resolution of those issues is coming.

At the same time, the minister today took the position that the Dene people of northern Saskatchewan and Manitoba will be shut out of this process. These are families that from time immemorial to this very day have spent a good part of their time and made a good part of their livelihood from lands that are included in that settlement area.

This has been documented all the way back to Samuel Hearne. At his first point of contact he found Dene people in those areas. There has been continuous use and occupancy. It was only after the policy began of moving Indian families to where schools and missions were that people did not continuously live in those territories.

Now the minister of Indian affairs says that if those families want to continue to exercise their treaty rights in that area he as the trustee is not going to do anything to help them. Instead, he is saying that these communities are going to have to go to the Supreme Court to exercise the rights that he is supposed to be protecting.

The minister is saying that families in those communities who are suffering from tuberculosis, malnourishment, alcohol abuse and a hopeless economic situation are going to have to take funds they should be using to meet their basic human needs in order to fight the minister in the courts. It is very hard to reconcile the minister's words with his actions when one sees cases like that.

As well, we have recently become very conscious of the whole question of suicide among aboriginal youth. It is very ironic in the international year of indigenous people that Canada's contribution to this whole discussion on the role of aboriginal people should lead off with the tragedy of Davis Inlet and the tragic situation of the young people there.

That is no different than what is happening in Big Cove or in the Nishnawbe-Aski Nation in northwestern Ontario. It is no different than what is happening in Fox Lake in Alberta or in Stanley Mission in Saskatchewan.

There is an epidemic of suicide in this country among aboriginal youth. But at the same time this is going on we are on the international stage saying that Canada is playing an exemplary role in the way it is treating aboriginal families.

• (1915)

It is quite ironic that in the very year we are doing that, on virtually a daily basis, we are being confronted with the fact that this is not the truth at all.

Another issue that I would like to raise is the situation of the Métis people in this country. In many ways the Métis people are the forgotten people of this land. They are the product of the interaction that happened between the European and aboriginal peoples at their first point of contact, which was the fur trade.

They evolved a way of life, a distinct culture and a unique language, which resulted in the Métis people being very central to the formation of the province of Manitoba in 1870. Indeed it was just one year ago today that this House very belatedly passed a resolution recognizing the role of Louis Riel in creating the province of Manitoba and thus contributing to the fundamental development of Canada.

It is timely that we again examine the role of the Métis people because when we look historically at what happened at the point of contact and what evolved out of it, the Métis nation, an argument can be made that in fact the Métis nation is central to the Canadian identity. The Métis have been the agents of change. They are the ones who best exemplify the issues that are involved in the contact between European and other cultures and the aboriginal people of this country.

Rather than having that role recognized, apart from a belated recognition of Louis Riel, the Métis people continue to struggle with the fact that they experience all the disadvantages of aboriginal life—the racism, the economic deprivation and the lack of access to their historical resources—while at the same time they enjoy very few of the benefits that accrue to people under treaty.

I recognize that there are tripartite agreements under way. Nevertheless the situation in Métis communities is extremely acute because for 100 years there have existed no mechanisms by which those people, who have been the harbingers of change in this country, can even meet their basic needs.

I would also like to turn to the issue of what happened in the recent estimates that the government placed before the House and in the economic statement that the Minister of Finance presented to this House in December.

As previous speakers have pointed out, there were some very startling numbers in those estimates that were presented to us. On the one hand, there was a 31 per cent cut in the Indian affairs budget for economic development. It was a cut of approximately $21 million. There was also a cut in the aboriginal economic program, CAEDS, which amounted to approximately another $6 million. So $27 million to $28 million was cut in economic development.

What does economic development mean? It means that people will be able to take control of their own lives. It means that the bread-winners in these families can provide for their own families. It means that there is hope for the future. It means that the aboriginal young people of today can envision a future in which they are contributing members of society and play a proper role in society. That is what economic development means. It means self-respect. It means self-reliance. It means pride and all those things.

What does this government do? It cuts those budgets, which would help lead to that kind of an outcome, by 31 per cent.

At the same time the government saw fit, and probably saw it was necessary, to increase the welfare budget by 12 per cent, by $52 million. The government says that it has $52 million for welfare but in order to pay that it must cut $28 million in economic development.

I see that very phenomena in my own riding. I am not surprised. This year the government is spending $170 million in one riding, most of it on aboriginal people, for welfare costs and income maintenance. The elders and these families will universally say that welfare has been the ruin of the aboriginal nation. The welfare system as we have developed it has helped to ruin family life and has helped to ruin self-sufficiency. It has taken away meaning in life. The elders are unanimous in their condemnation of the welfare system as we know it.

Yet, what does the minister do? The minister perpetuates the welfare system while at the same time cutting drastically, by 31 per cent, the mechanisms that could lead away from that welfare state.

• (1920)

When questioned about this earlier he said: Yes, it would be an ideal state of affairs if the aboriginal communities were in the position so that they could reallocate this money from spending on welfare to spending on meaningful work and meaningful economic activity which would build up the communities. He said it would be a wonderful thing if that were to happen.

I would like to remind the minister that he has it in his power to make that happen. Rather than creating a situation in which that is going to happen the minister has gone the other way and without consultation perpetuated the welfare system for aboriginal families and drastically cut back their ability to do anything about it.

It is indeed true that not only this government but past governments and we as a Canadian people have in many cases and in far too great a way abandoned aboriginal families—Indian, Métis and Inuit families.

I would like to conclude with the point that not only do those aboriginal families need the support, partnership and assistance of all of Canada, but we as Canadians need the contributions of those families.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have found this debate today to be particularly interesting as it focuses on an issue that, through very sad events in the last number of weeks I have been forced, like all other Canadians, to come to grips with in real terms.

The situation at Davis Inlet that my friend from Labrador referred to earlier is a situation that has saddened Canadians and people around the world. It has brought many of us to the realization that these conditions exist in our country. They are conditions that many of us would not accept as being prevalent in 1993. For those of us who live in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, and for people who live across the north generally, this situation is one we are reminded of often, and tragically perhaps not often enough.

At the end of January we saw some pictures that reminded us that children and families were suffering. They made us see a community that was having a great deal of difficulty in coming to grips with itself and with some of the problems before it. What is clear though is that this community, with the help of the Innu Nation, with the help of aboriginal people across Canada and with the help and encouragement of non-aboriginal people across Canada, is coming together to face the reality of the question.

Last summer, after a tragic fire in February 1992, the people of Davis Inlet decided in a report called Gathering Voices to look at the community of Davis Inlet, to look at the people, and to look at the families. They would try to judge for themselves what it was that was having an impact on their community, what the current conditions were that were having an impact on their children, what some of the historical realities were that led them to this position and this condition, and what some of the future opportunities might be. All of us, from time to time, are forced to look at ourselves and accept some hard realities. All of us from time to time should be prepared to suggest to ourselves that things need to change. The people of Davis Inlet went through quite a process. The reports that they have written, the comments that they have made and the talk about alcohol abuse, substance abuse, physical abuse, sexual abuse, child abuse and spouse abuse could not have been easy for the more than 460 people of Davis Inlet to talk about and to come to terms with. It could not have been easy to talk about it to the outside world and to write it down and publish it in a document that goes from testimony to commentary with photographs and poems and writings of young people and old people from today and from the past.

I hope I am not being presumptuous, but I think the report said that the healing must come from within. The report also said that the people felt that they could and must take that step and that the hope was there.

What also rings through, tragically enough, from the young people and from the children is that what drives them to the abuse and what has some impact on suicide is the lack of hope. None of us individually or collectively can live in this world without hope. They talk about nothing to do. They talk about an inability to see the future. They talk about the lack of hope.

Where do we go from here? Where does the community of Davis Inlet go from here? I think many in the country are aware that the Innu people of Davis Inlet were moved on to the island that they occupy today in the mid-1960s. I think many are aware that in the late 1940s the commission of the government tried to relocate about 75 people to the north. Two years later they were back in old Davis Inlet. During the first war when the caribou stopped moving through Labrador for a period of time, the people of Davis moved to where the trappers were and where the merchants were.

Today they live on an island in just under 100 houses that lack water and sewers. Many of the homes are in terrible repair and have insufficient insulation, roofs and foundations. Water is available from a central spout. It is not so much the physical condition of the community that I read about and the people of Davis that I talk to speak of. It is the culture, social relations, emotions and gut of the community that they are most concerned about because those are the future.

As we talk about relocating the community and the future of that community it is not again the physical movement of the community and what it will look like in terms of cluster houses or spokes. It is what that community will be.

The most important thing of the process that we are going through is to ensure the vision that the people of Davis Inlet have for their community. This will lead them to decide on how that community will work, to deal with the questions of how the education system will function and to see how health care will meet broad family needs that deal not only with the substance abuse question but wellness and all that that means.

• (1930)

This is the vision that will incorporate the social fabric of the community where extended families have always been so important. It will take into account the cultural realities of the Innu, the Naskapi, the people of Davis Inlet and will address what the economic opportunities are for those people.

What are the things that in the future the children of Davis Inlet will do? It is that vision that must guide what this new community will be, how it will function and how the people of the community will relate to each other, to the community and to the people around them.

It is no good for the Government of Canada or the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador to go in and say, "We will move the community and this is what it will look like". It will not work. It is inappropriate and it will be ineffective.

We all want to ensure that we do not simply transfer the problems of Davis Inlet to a new community. No one feels that stronger about that than Chief Katie Rich and her councillors, the people of Davis Inlet, the Innu nation as a whole and certainly the governments.

What do we do? How do we avoid that?

First, we have agreed to try to reach an agreement on a memorandum of understanding. That will lay out an agreement on what it is we want to accomplish here.

Second, there is the process by which we will get there. Obviously there is community consultation and planning such as what went on last year around the report entitled Gathering Voices. That has to be an important part of that as does the funding.

The Government of Newfoundland and Labrador, I think I can say without fear of contradiction, recognizes that it too has a role in this process and has a role financially.

The Government of Canada has made it very clear that it will support the process that will ensure the participation of the people of Davis Inlet and the Innu nation. More than the participation, it will ensure that the vision that I spoke of a few moments ago will be incorporated in every aspect of that community: education, culture, social relations, economics. That essence of the community will be evident as they deal with the conditions that have led to the abuse and the tragedy we have seen around the children today.

There is more than that in the short term. We certainly have some situations that must be addressed immediately if those people are to live with minimal comfort over the next two or three years in the community that they presently occupy.

I have written to the chief and I have committed to her that we will provide the funding necessary to catalogue those needs and to look at some early solutions perhaps to some housing problems and perhaps to the provision of water. This is not to make big expenditures that will not be of any value to us after two years, but to ensure that the quality of life for the people that remain in Davis Inlet over the next little while is made a little bit better.

The question of health is particularly important to the community and for all of us that share the concern. There has been a suggestion that a wellness centre or a family well-being centre could be constructed. I think this is a good idea and I have given them the commitment of the government that we will with them do an assessment of what the health needs are in the community.

The nurses are in place now, the doctor that moves from place to place, the role of the social workers and the employees of the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador all have to be incorporated into providing the type of health care that ensures healthy babies, safe pregnancies and that the sick get the help they need and the aged get the comfort they need.

Help that focuses on preventive medicine and traditional medicine and medicine that reflects the needs of those people who have lived so long on the land in Labrador should be taken into account.

• (1935)

We are dealing together with the tragedy of the young children who are chronic abusers. They are now spending time in Alberta in an attempt to give them the support that is so essential and what they need.

The minister of Indian affairs and others have talked about ultimately changing governance in a fundamental way and the way aboriginal communities control themselves and have the decision-making power that they need so much. Self-government is a concept that has been in this country for a long period of time. Some worry that it has no definition. Some worry that they cannot lay it down on a sheet of paper and follow it through. I understand that concern but it is not one that I particularly share myself.

To me self-government meets the concept of self-determination: responsibility for oneself and one's people. Self-government means that you have, as one of my colleagues today referred to, the ability to manage oneself and take the risks that are involved in that. It is to be able to ensure that the community says what happens to the community. The community makes the decisions not only in what it does but in the values that are the guideposts to those decisions. They are not values that are set or perceived in Ottawa or Vancouver or Halifax or, for that matter, perhaps Yellowknife or Whitehorse, but values that are of that community.

Because the history, the culture, the social conditions, the economic opportunities and the value systems change from community to community, the actual definition of self-government will change. Self-government for the Innu people and ultimately the people of Davis Inlet, or whatever term one wants to use, is the ultimate goal. The achievement by those people to be able to manage their present and therefore their future without the encumbrance of government but with the responsibility for themselves and their children and the responsibility over the resources that they will manage is something they want to attain. It is something to which I, this government and the members opposite are fundamentally committed.

The attainment of that is essential. It is an expressed wish of the people of Davis Inlet and the Innu nation that we reach conclusions on land claims in this area. I have given them my commitment. The minister has written that it is very much our interest to continue to pursue that.

We all recognize however, including the people in Labrador, that this will take some time. It is essential to me and to all the people I talked to that we not lose focus in dealing with Davis Inlet. We must recognize that the people of that community are our number one concern. The families, men, women and children of Davis Inlet can never leave our minds in light of land claims, the concepts of self-government and major and substantial policy issues that are on a national stage that involve all aboriginal people and that must be solved and that do impact on the people of Davis Inlet.

However, if we are going to tie the success of the transfer of the community to the resolution in absolute terms of those issues, then we will never get to the problem of the people of Davis Inlet. This is a problem that they want to resolve and we have the obligation to work with them to resolve it. It does not mean that we turn our back on land claims, absolutely not. It does not mean we abandon self-government. Quite the contrary. It means that we look at things in context. We look at what is important, the people of the community.

• (1940)

In response to some very serious needs in the community we were able to provide some emergency short-term funding, quite substantial funding I might add.

We recognize the process that must be used by the community and the Innu people to reach agreement on the wording of the memorandum of understanding. It will lead us to the process of defining the new community based on the vision of the people of that community and is one that will primarily involve extensive consultation.

Yes, it will involve engineers, planners, economic experts and health experts. Even they ultimately must be prepared to respond to what it is the people of Davis Inlet feel will make their community work for them.

I believe absolutely that when the Davis Inlets of this country work for the people in those communities, they will work for every one of us in this country. They will work for all Canadians. As every Davis Inlet in this country becomes a better place in which to live, this country becomes a better place in which to live.

I believe absolutely that we together, led by the people of those Davis Inlets will find the solution so that the next generation does not go through this, so that we avoid that. We must be there with them to find those solutions.

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting to listen to the speech by the hon. member. He has spent a lot of time on aboriginal issues in our committee as well as with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and his department.

It cannot be easy because the Davis Inlets of Canada are many and the problems have accumulated over the years. Having said that I would like to look at a more futuristic agenda that will deal with the lives of children and families ultimately if people are empowered to do so.

I think in particular of two groups that are well on their way to working out land claims packages. One is the Inuvialuit who would like very much to be resourced to work on a self-government regime for their people on a regional self-government basis. That is much warranted and is to be supported. The other specifically is the Council of Yukon Indians which is working on an agreement and is under a very tight deadline. It has to have the agreement of four First Nations in order to complete the arrangements. It is under-resourced. It would like $1.2 million worth of bridge funding for those four First Nations as well as $500,000 to cover some debts it has in working very hard to achieve this claim.

I am wondering if the hon. member has any good news for us on this front.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I wish I had but that does not mean I will not.

I think my friend knows that we all have to be prepared to commit to the processes that the Inuvialuit and other communities go through. The bridge funding issue for the four different groups is one I know the department will deal with and is one I will raise with the minister.

We get into this political world and we get constantly fixated and tied up with money. We all get into it. As I said earlier to my friend from St. Boniface, the question of available resources is one where there is never enough money. There is never enough money.

I look at the situation in Davis Inlet and realize that we could spend huge amounts of money. I will be frank and say that the amount of money we have spent in the short term and will spend in the long term in Davis Inlet will be very substantial.

• (1945)

Frankly, some people in other communities wonder why we would spend that amount of money, particularly in the short term. My answer is that we spend it now in perhaps large amounts or we spend it in the future in huge amounts. That is applicable across the country.

However, it has to be said that it is not a bottomless pit, that resources have to be spent wisely. I have to say that my experience with aboriginal communities in the west, in the north and in Ontario, is that they understand very well how to get best value from the resources, be they money or natural resources or others. It is something a lot of us could learn from and about. I hope that we would and benefit from it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 7.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply under the provisions of Standing Order 81(14).

Accordingly, the question is on the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

AUTOMOTIVE POLLUTION REDUCTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Thursday, December 10, 1992 consideration of the motion of Mr. Ferguson that Bill C-226, an act to reduce automotive pollution, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on debate to support Bill C-226, an act to reduce automative pollution and to applaud the initiative of my colleague, the Liberal member for Lambton—Middlesex who introduced this private member's bill.

The federal government has a duty to protect Canadians from harm, to shelter them from danger. This bill presents the government with a timely challenge, namely to ban the use of methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl, for short MMT, from our gasoline and require all gasoline in Canada to have a minimum oxygen content of 3.2 per cent.

As the critic for the Department of National Health and Welfare for my caucus, I shall focus my debate on health issues. Suffice it to say that the bill will also be an advance in so far as the change would be environmentally friendly for our users of automobiles.

MMT has crossed the American-Canadian border to the Canadian automobile gas tanks. MMT also is known to cross through the placental barrier of a pregnant woman to affect the unborn child. Foetuses have been found to have almost 10 per cent more manganese in their bodies than their mothers. This is frightening, considering the fact that the substance, the key additive in MMT, can damage brain cells and is linked to many diseases such as Huntington's chorea, amyotrophic lateral sclerosis and others. It also can cause displays of symptoms of Parkinson's disease and Alzheimer's disease in patients, as well as influence violent behaviour, hallucinations and loss of libido.

This metal can adversely affect many vital systems in the human body, such as the central nervous system and the reproductive system. It can damage not only the physical human body, but as well the human mind.

I understand that in the United States, where MMT is currently disallowed by the Environmental Protection Agency, the argument rages over whether MMT contributes to efficiency of automobiles. In Canada, I submit we should rise beyond that debate, saying we care far more for the health of our people than we do for the health of our automobiles.

I ask the industry to give us gasoline that does not interfere with hormones of reproduction, make people violent or cause paralysis and tremors in its victims.

I know representatives of Health and Welfare Canada have said MMT should hold no fear for Canadians. I also know, however, that recent studies at the Albany Medical College in New York have shown that iron deficiencies can lead to a magnetic-like attraction to manganese.

In my work as a physician and as Liberal critic for health and welfare, I have become aware of the profile of iron deficient people. Usually they are those who have poor diets. Those people with a poor diet are usually the same people who live in poverty. Coming from the urban area of Winnipeg, I have seen the inner city poverty that would help pinpoint those most susceptible to manganese poisoning.

These people have already been dealt enough hard knocks in life. Why add to their burden? Why when we have seen the work of Dr. John Donaldson, whose paper for the National Research Council showed that a manganese "hit" in the womb can trigger an acceleration of the brain's aging process?

• (2020)

Where are the defenders of MMT? One of those defenders would be Ethyl Corporation of the United States, which currently produces 60 million pounds of tetraethyl lead for gas in Canada, shipping it to the Third World countries and other less industrialized nations. So Canada has quietly aided and abetted the poisoning of fathers, mothers and children from South America to Asia.

Now this same company is preparing to bring MMT into the United States if it can get past the EPA, which has denied the application three times. The company had argued that Canadian data supports its position. I submit that we have an obligation to set an example for the international community and thereby not be seen supporting the use of this metal.

I ask again: Why is this additive allowed in Canada? Dr. Donaldson, who began his work on brain cells—and I am proud to say at my own former university, the University of Manitoba—has found that manganese, although found naturally in many foods, is toxic when inhaled into the lungs or absorbed through the skin. It causes brain cells to die, according to Donaldson's research.

Let me quote from an article by Nicolas Regush, a Montreal Gazette reporter who has also chronicled the medical devices catastrophes at the Health Protection Branch. I have chosen to quote from him because he is able to narrate to us in the language of many his observations on this issue. He states:

> Biochemical analysis of the central-nervous-system tissue in humans and monkeys poisoned by manganese showed that the metal reduced the levels of dopamine—a brain chemical which seems to prevent nervous system disorders—causing brain cells to die. The data suggested that manganese could target the region of the brain known as substantia nigra, where dopamine-containing cells originate and then project into the basal ganglia region. Brain-chemistry disruptions and cell death in these regions appear crucial to the development of other progressive neurological disorders. Probably most vulnerable to the metal's toxic "hit" are infants, young children, and women, whose defense systems against the retention of excess manganese—the blood-brain barrier and the excretory system—have been shown to be less efficient.

I have read the speech of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and find her arguments ignore any of these studies. Interestingly, she supported her resistance to this bill by saying the Environmental Protection Agency in the United States had found no health risks in MMT. The EPA hearing documents reveal findings were inconclusive and that the studies did not show that MMT did not harm humans.

Could this government not fall on the side of safety for once and believe our own scientists at home who testified that manganese intoxication mimics Parkinson's disease?

Let me conclude by saying that this is a bill that has been introduced by my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex and we should all salute him. It seeks to protect the health of Canadians in addition to the cleanliness of our air and helping the farming economy. Yet for reasons I cannot comprehend, the government remains adverse to this bill. I hope one day soon the government will change its mind and its heart for the future health of all Canadians.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-226, a private member's bill, which is entitled an act to reduce automotive pollution. With that in mind, it also states "the purpose of the bill is to reduce automotive pollution".

Who can argue with that kind of a purpose in legislation? I think all of us are environmentally conscious enough to realize there is a real need to do this.

I remember when we moved to the Fraser Valley back in 1938. On any given day you would wake up in the morning and get a pristine view of the north shore mountains. They were never shrouded in pollution or smoke, even though there were numerous sawmills around. There was always a clear view.

Now in Vancouver on any day when there is an inversion there is a yellowish-purple cloud hanging over the city and shrouding the mountains. As the wind blows up the Fraser Valley it acts somewhat like a chimney. It funnels that pollution up the valley and cities like Abbotsford and Chilliwack and Hope which do not have an industrial base are now getting the so-called benefit of the automotive pollution from the Vancouver area. The air is more polluted up the valley than it is in the lower valley.

We recognize there is a need to reduce automotive pollution. There is an urgency to that need so we cannot argue with the purpose, nor can we argue with the goal. The goal is stated in clause 3 first of all to eliminate MMT. We cannot argue with that. It is a long chemical term that I cannot even sneeze out. I will not even try. My scientist friend, a former university professor who will follow me on this side, can deal with the scientific side of it.

The purpose is to eliminate MMT. Regardless of whether the Royal Society of Canada's commission on lead says it is not a serious pollutant, it is a pollutant. Therefore the day should come when we get rid of it. We cannot argue with that goal, nor can we argue with the ultimate goal of 3.2 per cent oxygen in the gas.

We already have the 10 per cent ethanol in gasoline. In fact this government is participating in a program with Mohawk Oil Company in British Columbia to have ethanol gasoline distributed all through the Fraser Valley. I use that gasoline whenever I can because I know it will help reduce the amount of destructive emissions in the air. That is a laudable goal.

There is a problem with the bill. That is the guillotine. It says in clause 10 that with the passage of this bill the act shall come into force six months after it is assented to. The bill actually ignores what is going on in the entire scientific and government communities.

The fact is that a tremendous amount of research is being done in the industrial community, in the research community outside the industrial components, by the provincial governments, by the federal government. This is research that is in train to arrive at some of these goals to reduce the pollution.

The six-month guillotine that this imposes on all that research says in effect that while the research is going on it may not come to its conclusion of the 3.2 per cent oxygen or the elimination of MMT. Regardless of what the stage of research is at that moment, forget it all.

An illegal product is now being produced. You can neither produce whatever you were working on nor can you sell it. The sale of a product that contains MMT or has an oxygen level below 3.2 per cent is in contravention of the act and is liable for a fine up to $100,000. That is where I have a problem with the bill, not even with a fine, or even the sale of it if the technology has arrived at that level.

• (2030)

The problem is if it could be done then it would be great. But this bill introduces the notion that you have to be able to accomplish this and if you do not you will be fined. If the scientific community does not achieve what this bill says, folks, you are out of business and everybody is violating the law whether the marketplace has any in place at all. So the scientific community better produce the research and produce the product. If there is no product, there will be a shortage.

I have a problem with that. What happens to the entire Canadian scene if the product line has not yet been developed but you are supposed to use it? How do you go about maintaining an economy if you do not have the resources to do it and you are going to be fined if you do not obey the law? There is a slight problem here.

I say to the member I would vote for this if it could be done. He can say that this is an opposition bill and that we are are voting against it because it is an opposition bill. Well I want to say to my friend, the member who introduced the bill, those of us who have been here since a few years before the last election—I know he had a bit of a hiatus there, a little vacation—some of us have voted for opposition bills.

I voted for Bill C-204 which was an opposition bill put forward by a member of the New Democratic Party who is now on vacation from this place. She brought forward that bill. I voted for it as did a lot of government members. It passed and it is the law today. Sometimes it is honoured in the breach, but it is the law. So I say to him that I would vote for it if it would do the trick.

I know there is another bill coming forward to protect firemen sponsored by a New Democratic member. I want to tell the hon. member that I intend to vote for that bill if it comes forward to a vote. I think that is a good piece of legislation. If he smiles and laughs that I am going to vote for it because it is an opposition bill, forget it. It is not right. It is not true.

I will not vote for this because the goal is not an attainable goal. Also the technology, as sincerely as the provincial governments and the federal government and the industries have tried to achieve this goal they have not done it yet. Surely we cannot impose a fine of $100,000 on people for using the product that is now illegal but there is nothing on the market that is legal to replace it.

I say to him if he would do it, if he would draft a bill like this that would be consonant with the findings of science up to this point, the calendar, the progression, the time line that research can do, that technology can produce I would vote for it, because who can argue with the purpose of it. All of us here look forward to the day when our atmosphere will return to the kind of purity that we at one time enjoyed.

We want to see the emissions reduced. I want the hon. member to know that if we can find the technology and the legislation to back it up, we will do it. I will support it and both of our purposes will be met and all of us will be happier for it.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I think this is one of those rare occasions on which we have a bill before us which actually can succeed in dealing with a potentially serious health question.

At the same time it can assist part of our economy that needs assistance, the farm sector. Frankly, it does not have serious problematic consequences for our existing automotive industry in this country nor indeed even in the end for our present petrochemical and petroleum refining industries. I think that what we have here is in fact a piece of legislation which, if we look at it in completely literal form and we say well, yes, this would require us to replace our present system of gasoline in six month's time, might appear to be too extreme. But that is not what we are being asked to do at this point. What we are being asked to do is, frankly, to look at this and ask ourselves do we in principle agree with the direction in which this piece of legislation is going; does it make sense to send it to committee; and, can we in committee bring before us some of the experts who might improve some of the technical elements of the bill?

• (2035)

For myself, there are two major reasons why I think this bill makes sense. The first is that environmentally this would create for us a situation significantly better than the situation which we presently have in which MMT is used in gasoline and the connection between MMT and various neurological disorders certainly is suggested by much of the work which has been done scientifically.

If we were to move in the direction this bill suggests we would see ourselves replacing MMT with ethanol. If we were to bring forward a regular unleaded but MMT-free gasoline with a 10 per cent ethanol blending, that would reduce automotive emissions in this country, studies have suggested, by the following amounts: In the case of carbon dioxide by 5.9 per cent; in the case of carbon monoxide by 25 per cent; in the case of volatile organic compounds by 8.5 per cent; in the case of nitrous oxide by 5.7 per cent; and in the case of urban ozone, so serious to our ozone layer, by 5.3 per cent.

I think that is something which is an important accomplishment to aim to achieve.

Second, and I say this as someone who represents a constituency with a significant number of farmers producing both corn and wheat, we would produce for people in my constituency and for people in many agricultural producing constituencies across the country an important new market for the output from corn and wheat which is grown in this country. It is even conceivable that we could see 20 per cent of the grains produced in this country going into ethanol production to be used to produce these 10 per cent blended ethanol gasolines, which would be so much better for the environment.

We have something here which would be better for the environment, something which would be better for farmers, and something I am convinced, as a representative of a constituency that produces automotive vehicles, which our automotive companies would be able to adjust to very, very easily.

These kinds of requirements have been in place in California for a significant period of time. The car manufacturing companies have found it possible to adjust. There would not be a problem in this country for our automotive producers to make a similar adjustment.

I suggest strongly that this House look positively at this piece of legislation. It is a piece of legislation for which the member from Lambton deserves considerable credit for bringing before this House. He has worked very hard to bring before all of us in the House a great deal of information with respect to the health benefits and the economic benefits associated with this legislation.

I think all of us should accept this piece of legislation as something which takes us in the right direction, something which therefore gives us a positive movement forward which we can analyse in committee, perfect in committee, and deal with any problems that might exist in terms of timing in committee. I think therefore that it is a good piece of legislation.

I would hope for instance that the previous speaker would look at this piece of legislation as he looked at the legislation from my former colleague in this House, the former member for Broadview—Greenwood, Lynn McDonald, and see that in fact it makes sense for him too to support this piece of legislation because it has the same kinds of positive benefits that the piece of legislation from Lynn McDonald had in the previous Parliament.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Guelph—Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the previous speaker that indeed we should look positively at the concepts involved in this bill. There is no question that it would certainly help my agricultural community if we could promote the use of more and more ethanol in gasoline mixtures.

I am certainly quite prepared to look at banning MMT, methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl, which as we know may indeed have some health effects although the Royal Society's commission did not determine that that was so.

I would like to see, as I said earlier, the use of more ethanol in gasoline mixtures. My concern about the bill is that it assumes a simple, quick change that I do not believe is easy to bring about. It is not I believe in the best interest of Canadians in the short run to move very quickly to what the hon. member wants.

Is my time up?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes.

Mr. Winegard: That is the longest speech I have been able to make in this House for quite a while.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

It being 8.42 o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 93, the time provided for debate has expired.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

An hon. member: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

• (2100)

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Following the adoption of the 24th report of the Standing Committee on House Management on Wednesday, April 29, 1992, the division will be taken row by row, starting with the mover and then proceed with those in favour of the motion sitting on the same side of the House as the mover.

Then those in favour of the motion sitting on the other side of the House will be called. Those opposed to the motion will be called in the same order.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

CONFLICT OF INTERESTS OF PUBLIC OFFICE HOLDERS ACT

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-116, an act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of office of public office holders, to establish a Conflict of Interests Commission, to amend the Parliament of Canada Act and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

M. Andre (for the Prime Minister) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, once again it is an honour and a privilege to present petitions this morning on behalf of the residents of the Clearwater, British Columbia region. They have a very elaborate petition pointing out basically that they are concerned about the proposal in British Columbia by a firm with business relations with American firms to divert the North Thompson River near Valemount in order to sell one million acre feet of fresh water to California purchasers.

They say this would result in a 35 per cent reduction in the river flow at the point of diversion. They suggest that this seems to be part of the proposal of the Ralph M. Parsons Company of Pasadena, California called the North America Water and Power Alliance Project.

• (1010)

They are simply asking with the North America free trade agreement which is before us that the Government of Canada take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that water is exempt from any provisions attached to NAFTA.

CHRISTINE LAMONT AND DAVID SPENCER

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition on behalf of many Canadians, some of whom reside in my constituency of Brandon—Souris.

The petitioners note that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, have been sentenced to 28 years in a Brazilian prison. They have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons and discrimination of sentencing and parole. There have been riots in the compounds in the prisons. The only relief from such severe punishment is for Canada to request expulsion in accordance with Brazilian law.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the Prime Minister to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada in accordance with Brazilian law.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure today to speak to Bill C-73, an act amending the Canada Post Corporation Act.

I have followed this issue for some time, having been the postal critic for the New Democratic Party for the first two years of my sitting as a member of Parliament in this House of Commons.

I represent a constituency with approximately 50 postal operations, 50 rural post offices and an urban post office in the city of North Battleford. I have always considered the postal operation to be a very significant part of the rural economy that allows services and people to work in our communities. Of course agriculture is the key that drives the constituency I represent but the post office is a representation of federal services in rural and agricultural Saskatchewan.

This bill before us is a significant change in the way Canada Post operates. It is a significant change in the way in which the public can perceive the operations of Canada Post. Members of Parliament in this Chamber today, the people of Canada, including those watching on their TV screens, should understand what the government is doing with Canada Post through an amendment to this act. It is providing us with a corporation that is moving toward a private sector operation and away from the service-oriented corporation that Parliament created on behalf of the people of Canada back in 1981.

It will be remembered quite clearly that the original mandate that was set up and that this Parliament established to govern Canada Post was one that put service first. The mandate said very clearly that postal service was the number one priority of the people of Canada in having a communication network at Canada Post.

The minister was quick to tell us on many occasions that the mandate also said that this Parliament gave Canada Post the mandate to be self-sufficient. I cannot disagree with that. I agree that the post office was working toward and should operate on a self-sufficient basis.

• (1015)

In rural communities there are times when the taxpayers' only visible return from the federal government is the operation of the post office in their community.

This government has allowed Canada Post to operate beyond self-sufficiency. Nowhere in this mandate is Canada Post required to turn a profit. There is nothing in this mandate that says Canada Post is supposed to return 16, 17, 18 per cent on investment which is one of the goals that Canada Post Corporation management has placed for itself. Certainly a return on investment of 16, 17, 18 per cent above a break-even point is creating an additional tax on Canadians to run a service that in a sense they are already paying for.

I am quite concerned about some of the directions Canada Post has been taking.

This amendment today moves us clearly into the area of privatization of Canada Post. Specifically this bill will make 10 per cent of Canada Post's non-voting shares available for purchase by Canada Post employees on a voluntary basis.

Essentially Canada Post is saying that it wants to relieve labour-management tensions by allowing Canada Post employees to put some of their wages back into the corporation without any input. These are non-voting shares. In putting part of their wages back into the corporation by purchasing these shares they would feel as if they were contributing to the operations of Canada Post. I do not understand it.

It is the beginning of the process of establishing a share structure in Canada Post that will eventually allow for the sale of shares that go beyond 10 per cent. If there is a 10 per cent share offering to employees today, what is to prevent a simple amendment to this act to allow for another 10 per cent to be offered to the rail lines, or another 10 per cent to be offered to the book publishers or the newspapers, or an additional 10 per cent to be offered to the banks for mailing out their bills to everybody in the country? It would be a fine thing to see the banks having a share in the operations of Canada Post some time down the road.

If the objective of the government is to relieve the tension and stress between the employees and the management of Canada Post, there are many different ways to achieve the relief of that tension than to simply ask the employees to put their wages into a share offering.

It is clear that Canada Post employees, those who are members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers in any case, have rejected the idea that they should be asked to pay to help relieve the stress in the work place.

Canada Post should provide the people who work within the corporation with a real say in how that corporation works. It is the only way the employees are going to feel a much greater part of their work place.

I have a number of things to say in this regard that I will get to in a minute. However, the very best share offering that Canada Post could offer its employees is a good contract, one that provides good wages and job security for all who work there.

Some time ago just prior to my giving up the position of postal critic for the New Democratic Party and moving at the request of my leader into environmental protection areas of expertise, after significant study of Canada Post operations I wrote a report on the future of the national postal system.

At that time I recognized clearly the problems between management and employees at Canada Post. I offered many recommendations to the government and to Canada Post on how to better run the corporation. Among those recommendations were a number that dealt specifically with how to make Canada Post a better place for the people who work there. It would then be a better place for the consumers of Canada Post, the people who receive the services.

• (1020)

I want to go back and quote from the recommendations that I made in my report, recommendations that the government and Canada Post have so far chosen to ignore. These recommendations are as follows.

First, technological change in the work place should occur only after evaluation of health and safety factors and should be introduced and operated with agreement of the unions affected by the change.

Second, in order to develop a more efficient, healthy, safe and productive work place, the employees' unions should play a greater role in the decision-making process within all levels of Canada Post.

Third, the Canada Post Corporation should end its harassment of sick and other employees and its intimidation of employees in the work place and at home.

I travelled the country the first two years I served as a member of Parliament talking to postal workers from St. John's, Newfoundland to Victoria, British Columbia, and in every single community and work place that I visited the people talked to me about the harassment of sick and injured workers, to get them back into the work place and get them working at reduced rates. Clearly it was an attempt to force them out of that work place so that they could bring in junior and lower paid employees.

When I talk about Canada Post Corporation, the best share offering it could make is a contract with good wages and job security. Canada Post is asking its members to buy shares. The only way in which these shares are going to produce any return for the employees, and the employees know this, is if the corporation continues making profits, by cutting services and cutting jobs.

When employees buy into this share offering they are in fact buying into a plan that will eventually eliminate jobs, perhaps even the job of the person who has purchased those shares.

Fourth, the corporation should provide the time, personnel, authority to and finances for health and safety committees which would be able to make recommendations and monitor the development of changes aimed at transferring Canada Post into a healthy and safe work environment, paying special attention to addressing the root causes of repetitive strain and other frequently occurring injuries.

Fifth, the corporation should address absenteeism from the perspective of recognizing a healthy, safe and creative work place with reasonable demands in compensation as the best way to ensure productivity increases and absenteeism decreases.

Sixth, the corporation should develop a management strategy aimed at addressing the preponderance and promulgation of the number in management at all levels both in the context of cost and efficient and responsible decision making.

Every single employee of Canada Post knows, especially the employees who work in the rural parts of Canada, that the management levels of Canada Post have grown five times in the last four to five years while the service sector part of Canada Post has felt decreases in employment.

Seventh, the corporation should improve its work scheduling to ensure that all work possible is contracted in and performed by full-time well-trained employees.

Some of the things that the Canadian people recognize first when they talk with Canada Post employees is that some of the people they are talking to are not very well trained and not very well versed in the matters they are addressing.

For the most part those people are the contracted out employees, the employees that are brought in to do part-time or casual work. They are put on the front line to deal with public concerns and complaints in the post office and elsewhere. We need full-time, well-trained people at Canada Post and it is a first responsibility of the corporation.

• (1025)

When I put this report together the one element I noticed that was really missing was that the government refuses to be accountable for the operations of Canada Post. It is simply allowing the management to do what they wish to do. I recognize that is a result of the government agreeing with what Canada Post has been doing, moving toward the privatization of the corporation.

However, the government is accountable and somehow we have to find a way to make the government accountable to the people of Canada for the operations of this Crown corporation, Canada Post.

The very first recommendation I made after my two years of work and study in this area—and I want to remind the House I raised this on many occasions as the post office critic—was that a permanent, full-time Canada Post commission should be established to oversee its operations. The prime function of this commission should be to ensure the corporation adheres to its mandate in the context of placing accessible, quality service for all Canadians as its first priority.

The commission would be directed by a board composed of equitable representation from rural organizations, consumer organizations, the postal unions, small and big business, including the major mail users because I realize that the major mail users are a significant contributor to the financial operations of the corporation. Seniors, the disabled, environmental and native Canadian representatives would also be a part of this board because they are all directly affected, as all Canadians are, by the operations of Canada Post, the one real means of communicating by paper we have.

The board should ensure that there is equitable regional, provincial and territorial representation among its members. I asked that the Canada Post commission have the power to interpret the actions and policies of the corporation in the context of the corporation's mandate and enforce adherence to that mandate, that mandate being service as number one.

This corporation has made profits in two of the last three years and intends to make profits this year again at the expense of service, particularly in the rural areas, but service is being affected now in the urban areas with the consolidation of postal areas.

Input from the public should form a significant part of the operations and decision-making of the commission.

Madam Speaker, you will remember the Marchment commission. The government recognized that the public had something to say about Canada Post and a few years ago established the Marchment commission to look at its operations. The Marchment commission came back and told the government that there were significant deficiencies in the operation of Canada Post, that the service mandate was being ignored and, more important, that rural post offices were being closed when they did not have to be closed. The response of this government was not to listen to the report of the commission but rather to shut the commission down, fire the people who worked for it and then carry on with its operations, having said: "We listened to the Canadian people," and that was the end of it.

Finally, the Canada Post commission, as I see it, should have the authority to receive from Canada Post whatever information the commission deems necessary for its deliberations. I say that because we found Canada Post to be one of the most secretive of the Crown corporations. When you need something from Canada Post, likely what you get is not what you want, not what you have asked for and not what you have needed but something else, something that completely alters the way in which you want to respond to some of the information that is available.

I am appalled with the way in which Canada Post has been treating some of the people in Canada. This goes back to the closing of rural post offices, the increasing of postal rates and the working with Communications Canada to eliminate the postal rate subsidy for community newspapers.

• (1030)

We continue to see Canada Post tramping on the needs of Canadians. We found this horrible situation a month ago where Canada Post now says that if it delivers a letter to the wrong address, then the person who gets that letter has to pay to have that letter sent to the right address. Of all the crazy things to have to do.

When a letter is supposed to be going to one person and it goes to someone else, it may end up getting thrown in the garbage because that person is not going to go out and buy 43 cents worth of stamps, or whatever it costs now plus GST, to send that letter to the right addressee. It is a crazy situation. Why is Canada Post doing this? It says to save money within the corporation.

As my colleague from Chambly just said, it is a move to punish Canadians. I agree entirely. Canadians right across the country have been punished by Canada Post enough and it is time it was stopped.

I also want to take a few minutes to put on the record a couple of other conclusions I reached in looking at the operations of Canada Post. These relate to the operations of rural post offices because they make up the bulk of service to the large rural and remote areas in this country.

After having talked to Canadians from coast to coast to coast, there is no question; Canada Post has to halt the closure of rural post offices, the divestment of its property and, as a result, the withdrawal of the presence of Canada Post in rural Canada. There is no way that a post office sign on the side of a convenience store or a gas bar or even an elevator in rural Saskatchewan is a presence in rural Canada.

All too often we have seen a situation where on one street you have the building which used to be the post office standing with windows boarded up and a "for sale" sign on the front door and right next door you have a drugstore with a little wee sign in the corner that says "stamps for sale here". That is not the presence the federal government or Canada Post should have in rural Canada.

These matters can be addressed in many ways by this government. Bill C-73 is taking us in completely the opposite direction that Canadians would have us go. Find a way to return by contract, good wages and job security to the people who work for Canada Post and provide a service to Canadians from coast to coast to coast and we will have a country where we have good postal service and a public that will respond appropriately. The government that is held accountable for that action would be held in a lot better repute than it is today.

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, this Canada Post bill is very important for all Canadians. My hon. colleague has raised issues which I think are pertinent and important for all Canadians. Canada Post touches everyone. Every person in Canada who writes a letter, for instance, is going to be affected by the move to pay for redirected mail.

It is totally unforgivable and totally unacceptable in a time of high unemployment and a time when people have to be mobile to seek employment elsewhere that they have to be punished. In fact, I see this move of having to pay the additional 43 cents for a stamp for people who are out looking for jobs elsewhere as another tax on the poor and on the unemployed.

I would like to ask the hon. member who spoke this. How does he believe the government can justify such a move when, I believe, Canada Post is one of the Crown corporations that is doing very well? In fact, I have heard this mentioned numerous times in different debates and different speeches made by ministers of the Crown, as well as members of Parliament and the public at large who have concerns regarding Canada Post.

• (1035)

How can it justify this move and other moves that it has made while there are still reams of people who are not getting the proper service and when it is able to turn over a profit, when it is able to have revenues? How can it justify a move like that to pay for redirected mail when this Crown corporation is reputed to be doing so well? Why is it being so greedy? Why is it mismanaging those revenues so that it again has to tax and punish the unemployed and the poor of this country?

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I very much appreciate the question. The issue that the member raised concerning redirected mail is one that has been bothering me since I first heard about it on February 17.

As my friend from Chambly mentioned, it is a matter that punishes Canadians in a way that no government should even attempt. Forty-three cents does not sound like much. The government and Canada Post—I do not think we should distinguish between the two as they are virtually one and the same when we look at the bottom line—are asking a simple thing of Canadians, they think: If people get a letter that is not theirs and they have to drop it back in the mailbox with another address on it then they must put a new stamp on it.

That does not sound unreasonable except when we consider that people may not want to send the letter on. They do not want to walk down to the post office and buy that 43-cent stamp for this person who they might not even know. That letter may end up in a person's mailbox and it might contain a letter from Revenue Canada that says the recipient of the letter is supposed to pay some big bill or get stiffed with further penalties from the government. It might be a letter advising of a refund, or it might be a letter advising of the passing of a relative and the notice of the reading of the will and the estate. There could be any number of important things that go beyond the simple 43 cents.

It is not just a matter of somebody trying to rip off the system, and this is another case in which the victim is being blamed by this government, that there may be people who try to take advantage of the situation by moving and asking their relatives to readdress their mail for them rather than paying the fee for redirecting their mail. It goes much beyond this situation.

The member's question was: How can I justify this? I cannot and I will not justify what this government is trying to do on this matter which I do not agree with at all.

In trying to justify this the minister responsible for Canada Post the day after, February 18, said in this House that it was justified because it could save millions of dollars within the corporation. When the corporation is expecting to earn a profit of $130 million or more this year, this is not the time for the corporation to be looking at trying to increase those millions of dollars, especially when the mandate of the corporation is quite simply to provide a service and provide self-sufficiency, which in my book means breaking even. If it collects the same amount of money that it spends then that is the bottom line. If it makes money over and above that then it has gone beyond the line.

Ask the employees of Air Canada who purchased shares in their corporation what they think about employee share offerings. The employees of Air Canada today are seeing that the shares they purchased are down in the dumps.

If this government continues to operate Canada Post the way it is operating it the employees who do take an opportunity and a chance to purchase the shares in their corporation will regret it some time down the line.

• (1040)

Canada Post will continue to operate after this share offering, after this act is put in place and the share offering is made, without any employee involvement in policy decision making in any case.

This act will do nothing to enhance employer-labour relations or to provide better service for Canadians. Therefore one can only conclude that since the act will not do what the government says it will do, it will do something else, and that is simply the beginning of the end of the post office as a public corporation. It is the privatization of Canada Post.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. colleague one question but first I have a very short preamble.

I am not surprised by what is happening at Canada Post when we consider that the former president of Chrysler Canada was put into Canada Post and if we consider what he did to Chrysler Canada. I remember when working as a consumer advocate that during the tenure of this gentleman as president of Chrysler Canada we had some of the worst warranty claim experiences with Chrysler that we ever had over a ten-year period.

When we take a look at what this gentleman is doing as head of Canada Post, actually punishing Canadians because of misdirected mail, I can only come to the conclusion that this is only going be an incentive for mistakes to be made. It is a disincentive for Canada Post to improve the way it directs mail.

In the final analysis Canadians will be paying for the mistakes of Canada Post. If Canadians want to direct misdirected mail to the right place and put it back into the system then they will have to pay. They will be penalized 43 cents. Where is the incentive?

My question to my colleague is: Where is the incentive for Canada Post to improve service to Canadians if it realizes that every time it makes a mistake with misdirected mail, and it is already making many millions of dollars in surplus right now, it is going to make the passive receiver of that misdirected mail, that mistake, pay for Canada Post's mistake. Where is the justice in that? Where is the incentive for Canada Post to direct mail to the correct address in the first place?

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the lack of time. What the hon. member for Chambly points out is a very important part of the future of Canada Post and its service to Canadians.

We have to find a way to ensure that the good work the employees of Canada Post are already doing, which is being hindered by technology and harassment in the work place and other things and is affecting the way in which mail is being delivered at the moment, continues.

I want to strongly support those employees who are working at Canada Post today. They are struggling against very difficult circumstances in the work place and a management that is doing its best to ensure that the work that is being done on the floor is not being respected because of the policy decisions that are being taken that in fact lead to the problems out there on the street and in the local mailboxes.

When we have good contracts and job security then the public will fully recognize the good work that is being done by the people who work for Canada Post.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

• (1045)

And the division bells having rung:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the chief government Whip to defer the vote until a later time.

[Translation]

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the recorded division on the question now before the House stands deferred until the ordinary time of daily adjournment on Monday, when the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

SASKATCHEWAN TREATY LAND ENTITLEMENT ACT

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-104, an act respecting an agreement regarding treaty land entitlement in Saskatchewan entered into on September 22, 1992 among Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada, Her Majesty the Queen in right of Saskatchewan and the Keeseekoose, Muskowekwan, Ochapowace, Okanese, Piapot, Star Blanket, Yellowquill, Beardy's & Okemasis, Flying Dust, Little Pine, Moosomin, Mosquito Grizzly Bear's Head, Muskeg Lake, One Arrow, Pelican Lake, Red Pheasant, Saulteaux, Sweetgrass, Thunderchild, Witchekan Lake, Canoe Lake and English River bands, and respecting an agreement regarding treaty land entitlement in Saskatchewan entered into on September 23, 1992 among Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada, Her Majesty the Queen in right of Saskatchewan and the Nekaneet band, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise today to address the House on Bill C-104, the Saskatchewan treaty land entitlement act.

This bill will provide for the implementation of two historic agreements signed on September 22 and September 23, 1992. The first is the Saskatchewan treaty land entitlement framework agreement and the second is the Nekaneet treaty land entitlement settlement agreement.

Together these agreements will bring to an end more than 100 years of uncertainty, frustration and missed opportunities for 27 First Nations bands in the province of Saskatchewan. The legislation before the House today is technical in nature. It essentially provides a legislative framework for implementing certain elements of the treaty land entitlement agreements.

However the historic, social and economic significance of Bill C-104 must not be underestimated. I want to use my time today to put that significance in a proper perspective.

This is truly a major achievement for the Governments of Canada and Saskatchewan but it is most important for the 27 remaining bands in the province of Saskatchewan which have had the shortfall in their treaty land entitlement validated and accepted by the two governments but never fulfilled. It now falls to us, through this legislation, to complete those undertakings made in solemn treaties many decades ago.

Hon. members may recall that more than two years ago, on September 24, 1990, the Prime Minister stood in this House and outlined an ambitious program to create a new relationship between aboriginal and non-aboriginal Canadians. A principal element of this native agenda was a commitment to accelerate the settlement of specific and comprehensive land claims and treaty land entitlements.

Over the past 24 months remarkable progress has been made toward achieving this important goal. Among other things, this government has introduced a new initiative to ensure that specific claims are dealt with more quickly and equitably.

The results speak for themselves. Dozens of specific claims have now been settled using the new process and many more are being actively negotiated. Under that initiative the government proceeded to establish a specific claims commission to provide, independent of the prerogatives of the government, of my department and the Department of Justice, a means of independently reviewing specific claims under an independent commission to determine if all measures of fairness were being applied.

• (1050)

Progress has been equally exciting on the comprehensive claims front. In November of last year the Inuit of the central and eastern Arctic region voted in favour of ratifying their settlement agreement, the Nunavut land claim agreement, which will be, upon passage by this House, the largest land claim settlement in Canadian history.

As well, the Governments of Canada and British Columbia and the First Nations summit chiefs, comprising most of the chiefs of First Nations in the province of British Columbia, have agreed to establish a British Columbia treaty commission to facilitate the settlement of some 20 comprehensive claims in that province, to enter into treaties which probably should have been negotiated and settled over a century ago in that province.

The Prime Minister of Canada, the premier of the province and aboriginal leaders on September 21 last year signed an historic agreement at the Squamish Indian Nation to initiate the treaty commission. Within days the members of that treaty commission will be named by the governments and First Nation leadership.

Today this House has the opportunity and, in my mind, the obligation to take action on a third very distinctive kind of land claim described as treaty land entitlement. In simplicity, this means living up to the promises that were made when the numbered treaties were signed many decades ago.

By supporting Bill C-104 we will provide long overdue justice to the 27 Saskatchewan First Nations which have been denied land that was promised to them in those numbered treaties in the late 19th century and early part of this century.

To put this issue in perspective I think it is important for hon. members to be aware of the historical record. Between 1871 and 1910 Canada sent treaty parties across the west to negotiate a series of treaties with First Nations in the prairie provinces, the so-called numbered treaties. Among other things, these treaties provided for the establishment of reserves for the various bands which were surrendering their aboriginal title to the vast lands that were wanted for settlement and for the development of a new nation.

The size of each reserve was determined according to a very simple formula; by multiplying the band population at the time the reserve was surveyed by either 32 or 128 acres, depending on the treaty. The later treaties granted one square mile or one section of land for every family of five persons which amounted to 128 acres per person.

While the majority of bands in those times received their full land entitlement when they signed the treaty, about 60 First Nations across the prairies did not receive their full entitlement. There were a number of reasons for this. Around the turn of the century many bands in the prairies still followed a nomadic way of life. They did not have year-round, permanently located communities or village sites. The concept of settling in permanent villages was alien to them. Some bands postponed a dramatic change in lifestyle to settle down and perhaps to live a lifestyle more of our concept, but this was alien to many of them. In some cases these bands took several decades to find a location and to lay claim to particular pieces of land on the prairies.

When these bands did decide to choose their lands, it was inevitable that some individuals were missed during the band population count. It was also apparent that the population of these bands had changed in many cases and had increased significantly from the populations of those earlier days when the treaties were signed. It is worth noting, therefore, that bands did not always select all the land that was due to them. However, in more recent decades another problem developed. It appeared that much land had been deeded and developed, particularly after the passage of the National Resource Transfer Act, and deeded to other interests. It has become a major difficulty that First Nations have not been able to share in the development of those vast Crown lands of the prairies.

In recent years successive federal governments have endeavoured from time to time to add new parcels of land to the original reserves of entitlement bands. Unfortunately, these efforts have achieved only limited success and it has been a rather ad hoc process, not producing a great deal of satisfaction to the respective First Nations. The end result is that today we can confirm that at least 27 bands in Saskatchewan alone have not received all the land promised to them under the various treaties, a situation that is no longer tolerable and that this bill proceeds to correct.

The government has tackled the treaty land entitlement issue with a renewed commitment and vigour. Although the matter appears to be simple on the surface, it is in fact an extremely complex and difficult issue that has repercussions not only for the governments and First Nations people, but for non-aboriginal residents of Saskatchewan, whether they be farmers or city dwellers, in terms of the changes that will evolve from this agreement.

In recognition of these complexities and of the need to address the entitlement issues once and for all, my immediate predecessor took the action to establish an office of Treaty Commissioner for Saskatchewan in June 1989. The idea was to insert into this confused and unsatisfactory situation an independent commissioner, the former mayor of the city of Saskatoon, Commissioner Cliff Wright. An office was established and he was appointed to work in consultation with the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations and the two governments, federal and provincial, to find a solution to this problem.

The agreements that were signed in September, which I spoke of in my opening remarks, are a direct product of the excellent work of Commissioner Cliff Wright. Also, I want to pay a very important and generous compliment to the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations, in particular to Chief Roland Crowe, who headed up and pursued the successful resolution of this problem for several years and to his senior officers and officials, Vice-Chief Dan Bellegarde, Lester Henry and others. The FSIN played a fundamentally important role on behalf of the 27 entitlement nations in bringing us to this historic moment.

Treaty Commissioner Cliff Wright came to my office in Ottawa in May 1990, not long after he had received his mandate and presented a comprehensive and analytical report, in fact a formula for solving the treaty land entitlement problem in the province of Saskatchewan. He did this after extensive consultations with Indian people, interested parties and residents of the province.

• (1100)

We will not have the opportunity in the House today to examine the genius of his proposal. I could say that in a rather creative way he was able to account for the shortfall of something in excess of one million acres, approaching a million and a half acres of land, to establish a value for those lands and, in agreement with the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations, moneys would be paid out appropriate to the value of those lands and to account for the increase in population and the appropriate equity that must be realized in dealing with the modern day populations of those communities, while maintaining fairness with other First Nations which had accepted their treaty land entitlement generations ago.

This was a horrendous and challenging task but it was one very well done and I want again to compliment the commissioner for his leadership there.

That led to a prolonged period of negotiation with the former government of the province of Saskatchewan under Premier Devine's leadership, leading to an agreement which was signed in September 1991 for cost sharing the cost of settling this treaty land entitlement matter.

The reason for Saskatchewan's involvement is quite clear. Since 1930 Saskatchewan has had an obligation under the natural resources transfer agreement to provide to Canada lands adequate to fulfil treaty land entitlement obligations and to provide for expanding aboriginal populations in terms of the reserve requirements.

We were able to negotiate with the previous Government of Saskatchewan a cost-sharing agreement whereby Saskatchewan would provide 49 per cent of the cost of purchasing lands which would be purchased by funds put in a special account, a special treaty land acquisition account, and those lands would be purchased by the respective bands to be held in trust on their behalf in perpetuity; 51 per cent of the funding to be provided by the federal government and 49 per cent by the province of Saskatchewan.

It took several more months to conclude the framework agreement which is attached as schedule II to Bill C-104. The framework agreement deals with a wide range of issues which I will take a few moments to elaborate upon. This framework agreement was finally concluded during the summer of 1992 and signed. I think it was a very rewarding and emotional moment for the 26 treaty land entitlement bands which participated in the signing ceremony at the Wanuskewin Heritage Park just north of Saskatoon on September 22, 1992.

At that ceremony the Prime Minister, Premier Romanow of Saskatchewan, Chief Roland Crowe and several hundred witnesses and representatives of the entitlement bands participated in the signing ceremony upon which this legislation and this agreement is based.

I should indicate that Bill C-104 encompasses a second specific agreement entered into with the Nekaneet First Nation which preceded in its negotiation the framework agreement which was signed and concluded one day after the framework signing.

Included in these agreements are undertakings by the Government of Canada and Saskatchewan to provide close to $500 million over the next 12 years to resolve the treaty land entitlement issue.

The agreements allow First Nations to acquire land as soon as possible. The federal government has agreed to accelerate its payments to add additional amounts or value to the payments in the first two years in order to allow early purchase of lands which the entitlement bands will select.

As well the agreement provides for some $50 million to be paid in the form of funding, a revolving fund to rural municipalities and school divisions to compensate them for the loss of tax revenue as a result of treaty land entitlement settlements. This means that when new lands are added to reserves and services are provided by the First Nations within that expanded land base there will be less requirement to draw services from local school districts or local rural municipalities for road maintenance, hospital, library, the provision of schooling and other kinds of services. As those services are withdrawn it would represent a capital cost to municipalities and school districts that is being offset by a special compensation fund contained in this agreement.

In order for the federal government to satisfy a number of undertakings it made in the treaty land entitlement agreements certain legislative authorities and clarifications are needed. That is the purpose of Bill C-104. I want to outline some of those authorities and clarifications today.

Over the next few years hundreds of real estate transactions are expected to occur in Saskatchewan as a direct result of these two agreements. In due course the lands purchased by entitlement bands will be transferred to the federal Crown as those parcels are purchased, to be held in trust pending the creation of new reserves or extensions to existing reserves. The bands will have the complete freedom to select land either from existing Crown reserves or through the private purchase of lands to expand their reserves in this way.

While entitlement land is held by the Crown revenues accruing to the band as a result of leases, royalty agreements or other contracts will be collected by the federal government on behalf of each band. For example, there may be oil or gas leases, potash, uranium and other minerals being extracted, or timber rights. Any third party interests or activities which produce revenue will result in a payment of royalties or revenues that will be collected by the federal government on behalf of each band.

Bill C-104 authorizes the Government of Canada to transfer these revenues to the entitlement bands, something that is not provided for under the Indian Act as it presently exists. The earnings of these funds can be transferred through a special means set out within the Consolidated Revenue Fund so that these funds will be managed in trust by the federal government but paid to the respective bands.

Bill C-104 will authorize the federal government as well to collect and transfer to Saskatchewan mineral revenue payments for certain entitlement lands where the province has an interest in the mineral rights. The government has undertaken to do this so that bands will not have to repay mineral revenues to the province in the form of royalties in order to obtain all subsurface rights to land before it can be transferred to the Crown.

Bill C-104 will also permit a surrender to take place before entitlement lands are transferred to reserve status. Generally entitlement lands must be free and clear of all existing third party interests before they will be accepted by the government for reserve creation. However, if there are third party interests, for example small parcels owned by private parties, and if the entitlement band in each case agreed with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that established third party interests should prevail and be protected, they could agree to protect those third party interests through a lawful surrender by the First Nation of interest in that third party right within the area of the entitlement lands. This legislation provides means of securing that surrender in a way other than that provided within the Indian Act.

Another objective of Bill C-104 is to release the province of Saskatchewan from its obligation, the one I spoke of earlier, to provide unoccupied provincial Crown land to the federal government for the creation of reserves. As I said this is a constitutional obligation contained within the natural resources transfer agreement of 1930. As a consequential element of this legislation there will be an amendment to the natural resources transfer agreement.

Bill C-104 will also establish a legislative basis for the co-management agreements that are contemplated between entitlement bands in the province of Saskatchewan and the Saskatchewan Water Corporation. Saskatchewan wanted to ensure that its ability to manage bodies of water, rivers, reservoirs, et cetera, and its authority to manage those waters would not be fettered by way of those waters coming within the boundaries of entitlement lands that would be added to reserve holdings.

Entitlement bands by way of this agreement will also be able to enter into binding agreements with urban and northern municipalities and school divisions on the provision of services. This too is provided for within Bill C-104.

A legislated provision is also required to ensure that moneys paid under the treaty land entitlement agreements are not to be defined as Indian moneys under the terms of the Indian Act because there are very stringent conditions associated with aboriginal communities having access to those funds for their own purposes. The legislative provision with respect to moneys provides a special account to be established to collect the moneys, the proceeds from the settlement under this agreement, and the earnings of those proceeds. This special account will enable the collecting of interest on moneys paid into the treaty land entitlement Saskatchewan fund, to be administered for the benefit of the entitlement bands and in joint consultation with the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations.

Finally, the framework agreement acknowledges there may be other Saskatchewan bands without standing treaty land entitlements. Bill C-104 includes a provision to accommodate these bands, any which may have additional land entitlement accepted and validated, under the provisions of this framework agreement, under the same terms and conditions that applied to the original 27 entitlement bands.

I indicated at the beginning of my remarks that Bill C-104 was an extremely technical piece of legislation. Hon. members can now appreciate what I meant in saying that. I hope I have not confused the House unduly. In endeavouring to understand the legal mechanisms this mechanism will put in place, I urge members not to lose sight of its primary objective which is to continue to address past commitments to the aboriginal people of Canada and to honour them.

Bill C-104 is concrete evidence that this government is committed to living up to its historical and contemporary obligations to First Nations. It is a major step forward in achieving our native agenda commitment to resolving treaty land entitlements.

Hon. members should know that work is also under way on resolving related treaty land entitlements in the provinces of Alberta and Manitoba. We have already settled some five TLE shortfalls in the province of Alberta and we are negotiating another five at the present time. We are commencing negotiations with entitlement bands in the province of Manitoba as well. I am sure that the speedy conclusion of the agreements in the adjacent prairie provinces will be facilitated by the work already done and by the principles set out in this framework agreement with the entitlement bands of Saskatchewan.

For the 27 entitlement bands in Saskatchewan the framework, Nekaneet agreements and this supporting legislation will end decades of uncertainty and enable them to recover what has always been theirs. It will dramatically improve their prospects for self-sufficiency by expanding their reserve land base and providing new opportunities for economic development.

The Government of Saskatchewan will also benefit, as will all the people of Saskatchewan. The treaty land entitlement agreements will end decades of acrimony, create certainty about future land use and provide a significant financial injection into the provincial economy on the scale of a half billion dollars.

• (1115)

Bands are expected to begin almost immediately to purchase land and to inject money into the economy. Once that land has been transferred to reserve status we can be assured that bands will be aggressively pursuing development opportunities. In other words this is a good news scenario for all the players and for all Canadians. As we proceed through the stages of this legislation I urge my hon. colleagues to endorse Bill C-104 so the First Nations of Saskatchewan can build for a more prosperous future.

It was my understanding that this legislation was to be referred to a special legislative committee. However, more recently I gather that talks have been held among the parties and I think Your Honour will find consent to do all stages of Bill C-104 today including referral to Committee of the Whole in order that we might complete consideration of this important legislation in one sitting.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to proceed with all stages of this bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I am happy to speak in the House this morning on Bill C-104, the treaty land entitlement in Saskatchewan.

For over 100 years at least 27 First Nations did not have the full use and benefits of the land stipulated under treaties with Canada. First Nations people referred to this unfulfilled obligation as treaty land entitlement.

On September 22, 1992 a modern day settlement of this historic land debt was reached. This settlement has been secured through the process of mutual discussions and negotiations rather than confrontation. This is the preferred route for many land negotiations.

The purpose of Bill C-104 will help to facilitate the implementation of the Saskatchewan treaty land entitlement framework agreement based on certain undertakings given by the Government of Canada and the province of Saskatchewan during two and a half years of negotiations.

Once legislation is passed—and we have all agreed to go the whole route today on this bill—Bill C-104 will enable 27 First Nations bands in Saskatchewan to begin acquiring land, resources and improvements which Canada undertakes to grant with reserve status. This is badly needed in a time when we are experiencing a major downturn and Saskatchewan is having its fair share of problems. As we know only too well, in economically depressed times we find certain groups at the bottom rung of the economy. Those groups are generally aboriginal peoples, women and children.

This legislation is highly appropriate and much needed. Appropriate provincial legislation is also being drafted to facilitate this process. It is always the struggle of the federal government and the claimants to reach an agreement with provincial and territorial governments on any land resolutions. Most important, this piece of legislation will create a special account or a consolidated revenue fund for both the federal government and the province of Saskatchewan to make payments with interest to the settlement bands. It is estimated that the framework agreement and the accompanying legislation will add approximately $450 million in interest.

I have consulted with the parties who will be affected by Bill C-104. I have written to the treaty land entitlement bands affected by Bill C-104: the Minister of Indian and Métis Affairs, the hon. Robert Mitchell; Lynda Haverstock, the leader of the Liberal Party and MLA from Saskatchewan; the Assembly of First Nations land rights co-ordinator, Mr. Rolland Pangowish; Mr. Harry Laforme of the Indian Claims Commission; and Vice-Chief Dan Bellegarde of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations. Bill C-104 has and is still being studied by the party. From the responses I have received, I believe there is a strong sense of support for the passage of this bill immediately. In fact the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations is very anxious for this legislation to receive Royal Assent as soon as possible.

However there are concerns. I have received a few questions regarding concern over the taxation of settlement money. In relation to that, it should be known by all First Nations that on March 29 there will be a major conference held on taxation in Ottawa with all of the chiefs across the nation.

In relation to this, the treaty's First Nations in Saskatchewan support Bill C-104 but concern has been raised about possible tax liability of the principal and interest earned on money held in the treaty land entitlement fund and possible tax liability once the money is transferred to the trust accounts of the First Nations.

If First Nations are assessed by Revenue Canada they would have to go through a process of proving that these funds are exempt from taxation pursuant to the framework agreement. We intend to have this question raised in other venues, in fact in the committee that I work in, to determine whether it is possible to include express wording or perhaps a consideration by the minister and his staff to look at the whole issue of taxation, acknowledging that the money appropriated by Parliament pursuant to an agreement to fulfil understanding land treaty entitlement obligations are therefore deemed to be the personal property of the First Nations on reserve pursuant to the Indian Act. This would ensure that the money will not be subject to taxation.

This is a major consideration for all First Nations. Taxation is a major issue that arises in the dealings of all land questions and all of the agreements, be they specific or comprehensive or treaty land entitlements. Taxation is a major issue that comes to the forefront in that it has a great deal of impact on what happens to the revenues that are accrued from any kind of activities that the bands and the various reserves of First Nations undertake with the compensation money they receive from the government under these claims.

The second issue is on riparian rights. To date we have not heard any concerns about the provisions in the framework of agreement whereby the First Nations in certain circumstances waived their riparian rights to try to prevent a provincial water project.

Section 7 of Bill C-104 confirms the riparian rights provision of the framework agreement. It is our understanding that the bands will retain their common law riparian rights to water bodies adjacent to a reserve to ensure that water quality and quantity are maintained.

However the bands will not be able to assert their riparian rights to stop a provincial water project as long as the band has been given six months' notice and is allowed to participate in the decision to approve the project.

The most that the band can sue for is damages. It cannot use the courts to try and stop the project. If any bands have concerns about the riparian rights provision of the framework agreement which is confirmed by Bill C-104, these will have to be taken up with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or senior staff so assigned.

At this time I would like to extend my personal congratulations and best wishes on behalf of my Liberal colleagues to all of the treaty land entitlement bands. In particular I believe that when you undergo a process to engage in negotiations which are sometimes very difficult, there is the opportunity for much conflict and confrontation.

There is also an opportunity for co-operation and diplomacy. Bearing those words in mind it brings to mind the leadership that is required to undertake these negotiations to come to a resolution as we have today and for the speedy passage of Bill C-104, the treaty land entitlements act.

I would like to say that there are individuals who have expressed leadership and negotiating skills. In particular I would like to congratulate Chief Roland Crowe of the FSIN and all of the chiefs of the entitlement bands who have made a tremendous effort to achieve this historical agreement.

• (1125)

It is truly historic that these people, because of their ability to negotiate, their ability to set goals for their people within the framework of this country and within the boundaries of Saskatchewan, have managed to come up with a plan of action that they feel will work for their people. They are to be congratulated. In a sense it not only sets a political precedent, a legal precedent, it also sets an example for the citizenry of Canada that aboriginal people, given the opportunity, can show the ingenuity to come forward with the goals and the plans that work best for them.

They identify the goals. These are the options they prefer and these are the ones they have advanced, so I would like to congratulate them.

In doing that, it is always so important to recognize that behind Chief Roland Crowe we have a number of chiefs, 27 in particular. Since it is such an historical event that I would like to take the time to reflect on some of these bands and their chiefs. In the true treaty making process and in the fulfilment of those outstanding obligations or debts I would like to say that it has always been known that the chiefs get the front seats and that they should be named.

The are the individuals who have been involved. We also have Chief Louis George from English River; Chief Joseph Waskewitch from Onion Lake; Chief Gabriel Gopher from Saulteaux; Chief Richard Gladue from Flying Dust; Chief Johnson Kakum from Little Pine; Chief Clarence Louis from Moosomin; Chief Blaine Favel from Poundmaker; Chief Edward Standinghorn from Sweetgrass; Chief J. Guy Larivière from Canoe Lake; Chief Clarence Stone from Mosquito Grizzly Bears Head; Chief Michael Baptiste, Red Pheasant; and, Chief Winston Weekusk from Thunderchild Band.

These are all of the chiefs that have been involved along with Chief Roland Crowe. I would like to congratulate them. They will have to forgive me because Cree and some of the other aboriginal languages from Saskatchewan are not my first language. I have attempted to do justice by naming all of the chiefs. I would like to congratulate them once again. I approve going through all readings of the bill for speedy passage.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to speak on Bill C-104, an act respecting an agreement regarding treaty land entitlements in Saskatchewan. There is no question that this is a matter that is long overdue for consideration by this House and by the people of Canada.

It is a great credit to all of those who have been involved in this process that we have achieved the conclusion we are seeing today. Before I begin my remarks, I want to indicate that there are unresolved issues remaining which will require the continued concentration of this government and the people of Canada with the aboriginal people in our province to adequately resolve issues, some of which I will discuss shortly.

Essentially what we have here today is an approval of a process which ratifies a tripartite framework agreement involving the Government of Canada, the government of the province of Saskatchewan and Indian bands in the province in Saskatchewan. It provides the basis for individual negotiations designed to fulfil outstanding constitutional obligations to provide treaty land.

The bill ratifies the federal-provincial First Nation's framework agreement which will be followed by individual negotiations and agreements to take place in the near future.

I stress that it is important for everyone to recognize that this is a negotiated agreement that will be ratified by referendum process by the bands themselves. It is a process that I very much agree with and as a non-Indian person I find most acceptable in reaching agreement on a matter of such significance.

As a result I am very happy today to be able to say that we also want to see the speedy passage of this legislation because it allows us to put behind us one part of an ongoing and difficult matter and process and carry on with the significant other matters which must be dealt with.

I recognize through my involvement with this process for quite some time that there are conflicting interests throughout the aboriginal community as well as through the non-aboriginal community which must be discussed in response to all the matters which are in front of us today.

The bands in Saskatchewan have played a very important role in the process leading to the conclusion of the agreement. The bands in Saskatchewan have worked long and hard, and have sat down to discuss with the province of Saskatchewan and with the Government of Canada through some difficult times and reached an agreement. They are now dealing with members of their own bands again through some difficult times. But they will reach agreement. It is important for members of this House today to recognize that this is a negotiated process which we are concluding today.

As a member of Parliament from Saskatchewan representing a large rural constituency, I have had a very important interest in this matter since my election in 1988. I have discussed this entire agreement with a number of the chiefs in my own constituency. I have attended a number of the meetings in which the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations has discussed this at open forums.

I have recognized the significant contribution of each of those who have participated in this process. Of the 27 bands referred to in the land entitlement process, the majority reside on reserves in my constituency: Canoe Lake Band, Chief Guy Lariviere; Flying Dust Band, Chief Richard Gladue; Joseph Bighead Band, Chief Ernest Sundown; Little Pine Band, Chief Johnson Kakum; Moosomin Band, now Chief Clarence Louis; Muskeg Lake Band, Chief Harry Lafond; Pelican Lake Band, Chief Edward Bill; Saulteaux Band, Chief Gabriel Gopher; Thunderchild Band, now Chief Winston Weekusk; Witchekan Lake Band, Chief Mike Fineday; Mosquito/Grizzly Bear's Head/Lean Man Band, now Chief Clarence Stone; Onion Lake Band, Chief Joe Waskewitch; Red Pheasant Band, Chief Mike Baptiste. These are all bands within my federal constituency. These are bands that have actively participated throughout this process and have done a tremendous service to their people and to the people of Saskatchewan.

We will recall, as the minister of Indian affairs noted in his remarks, that the framework agreement was signed on September 22, 1992 by the premier of Saskatchewan, the Prime Minister of Canada and the chiefs of the entitlement bands at a ceremony at Wanuskewin Heritage Park, north of Saskatoon. I attended it as a member of the audience. It was a very proud moment for all the chiefs in attendance.

The agreement makes funding available from Saskatchewan and the federal government to the entitlement bands to assist them in the purchase of private and Crown lands to fulfil the outstanding treaty land entitlements.

Just to review this for all present in the House and for those who are watching, five treaties were signed by Canada with Saskatchewan Indian bands between 1874 and 1906. The bands were promised reserve land based on their population. In 1992, when the framework agreement was signed, 27 bands in the province still had not received all the land owed to them under the treaties. The entitlement framework agreement provides the way to rectify this situation.

I must stress once again that this has been a long time in coming. In 1976 the then New Democratic Party government led by Allan Blakeney reached a conclusion that now forms the basis of the agreement that has been reached by the bands, the province of Saskatchewan and the Government of Canada today. The 1976 formula was the basis on which Treaty Commissioner Cliff Wright established the final package.

Under the framework agreement that we are dealing with the bands can purchase a minimum of 421,000 acres and are eligible to buy up to a maximum of 1.693 million acres for reserve status. All land purchases will be on a willing seller–willing buyer basis.

Bands are able to purchase private lands as well as federal and provincial Crown lands. Before the sale of Crown land the interest in the land of any occupants or other third parties must be satisfactorily addressed. In the case of private land, third party interests must be suitably dealt with as a part of the purchase and reserve creation process.

This is part of the agreement because the Indian people throughout Saskatchewan have recognized very clearly that there are other people currently utilizing the land base they have claimed. They want to ensure that there is a continuation of the good rapport of people who share the land in that particular area. Indian and non–Indian people alike will be living and working together in the same areas.

The framework agreement provides bands with approximately $450 million, spread over 12 years, to purchase the land. Once a band's minimum reserve acreage is obtained any remaining money can be used for other band purposes.

Many of the bands are currently examining economic development avenues, which will lead to better utilization of the land and the return of additional revenues for use by the aboriginal people themselves for purposes that are very important to the development and continuation of those aboriginal communities.

The minister mentioned it but I thought I should as well and that is: Why is Saskatchewan a party to this agreement? Why do we single out Saskatchewan in this case and not all Indian people?

In 1930 the federal government transferred the bulk of the Crown land and resources in Saskatchewan to the Saskatchewan government. The federal government was aware at that time that more land might be required in the future to supply the number of reserve acres promised in the treaties.

The natural resources transfer agreement of 1930, which transferred the Crown land to Saskatchewan, enables Canada to request the province to provide unoccupied Crown land to fulfil outstanding treaty land entitlements. This is the basis for the Government of Saskatchewan's involvement in the treaty land entitlement process at this time.

Past efforts to settle treaty land entitlement with Crown land alone have met with only limited success. Most Crown land has interests of various types associated with it. Without funding to provide compensation it has been difficult to satisfy the interest holders on Crown land. This was a matter that Treaty Commissioner Wright tried to address, and addressed quite well.

The treaty land entitlement framework agreement provides a new and more promising approach that will work to all parties' advantage. Bands will have more choice in the land they acquire and will have the option of purchasing private land from parties that want to sell.

Entitlement bands will now perhaps be able to obtain more productive land than they have in the past and as a result can possibly become more economically self-sufficient in the future.

Certain categories of provincial Crown land, such as parks, heritage properties, highways and ecological reserves, are only available for purchase under this agreement under very exceptional circumstances. Other categories of Crown land will generally be available for purchase, with the sale decision depending on specific circumstances.

One of the important parts of this whole process is that bands can buy private land that is for sale anywhere in the province just as any other purchaser could.

Crown land in urban areas, as elsewhere in Saskatchewan, may also be available to bands for purchase. Therefore we can see that urban land, economic development land, and industrial land is eligible for purchase under these agreements. The establishment of urban aboriginal industrial economic communities is most viable under this process.

When lands gain reserve status, and this is important to all the rural municipalities in Saskatchewan, it is no longer subject to municipal or school taxation. Recognizing this fact the governments have agreed to compensate for this tax loss in the rural areas. Two $25 million compensation funds have been established, one for rural municipality tax loss and one for school division tax loss.

The rural municipality fund will be administered by the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities. The school division fund will be administered by the Saskatchewan department of education in consultation with the Saskatchewan School Trustees Association. They are moves that both groups have accepted and agreed will provide for their interests.

After signing or adhering to the framework agreement a band must also conclude a specific agreement, a trust agreement, with Canada before receiving funding for the land purchases.

• (1145)

The length of time taken to conclude these may vary from band to band but the process need not be long. Depending on how quickly these agreements can be finalized, many of the bands will be in the marketplace quickly. We have to recognize that a number of bands have already taken these steps and are currently in the marketplace.

One of the problems inherent in this process is the resources available to the bands to ensure that members of each reserve, of each band, are adequately informed about what is in the agreement. Many of the chiefs and the councillors involved in this process from the very beginning understood this agreement inside and out and can quote it chapter and verse. Many of the ordinary people living on the reserves have not been part of the process. They have questions. They are sceptical about what it means for their future and about what it means for the future of their children. They are trying to find a way to get as much information as possible.

The entitlement process requires a referendum of band members before any of the bands can finalize and reach individual agreements. The framework agreement understands that this is important and has agreed to provide reasonable funds for the holding of public meetings and the contacting of band members, some of whom may not live on the reserve but have chosen to live in an urban centre at some distance from the reserve.

The government has agreed to provide reasonable funds to ensure this referendum process is carried out and the people are adequately informed. I have been informed by a number of chiefs involved in the process that the government's interpretation of what reasonable means is different from what is actually necessary to get the message out to these bands.

I urge the government today in my remarks on this important bill to interpret the section about reasonable costs more liberally than it has been doing and to ensure that the flexibility exists for the chief and the council who understand their band membership better than anyone in Ottawa possibly could to interpret the adequate resources required to ensure the referendum process is carried out by a knowledgeable membership. I ask the Minister of Indian Affair and Northern Development to take this back, discuss it with his officials, and ensure that the chiefs and councils have the adequate resources they need to conduct a fair and knowledgeable referendum on each of their reserves.

We are asked a question about the treaty land entitlement framework agreement settling all land claims in the province of Saskatchewan. We all recognize this is not the end of the process. Treaty land entitlement is land that a band is owed under the terms of the treaties but which has not yet been received. Some bands have other claims with a different legal basis. These other specific claims often arise because reserve land was improperly taken away by the federal government in the past. Specific claims by some of the bands have recently been settled by the federal government, but there are other specific claims outstanding. Those specific claims will be advanced by the bands for negotiation and the government has made clear that it will negotiate on these specific claims issues.

What we have here is simply a framework agreement to provide the basis for the settlement of outstanding entitlements on these 27 bands stemming from the treaties. Specific claims are not being addressed by this particular bill.

The framework agreement costs are shared by the federal and provincial governments with the framework agreement requiring the province of Saskatchewan to cost share land purchase money and purchase money for minerals and to honour payments, for example the reductions in the 1976 formula and the municipal school tax loss compensation. The funding, as I understand it at the moment, is shared 30 per cent provincially and 70 per cent federally. Canada and Saskatchewan have agreed that the province will experience savings as we move along and that Saskatchewan will eventually reimburse Canada an additional amount up to perhaps 19 per cent of the agreement cost based on actual savings over 15 years following the signing of the framework agreement. I am told that Saskatchewan's total cost to be paid out over 12 years is projected to be about $247 million.

This is an important matter that I could spend a tremendous amount of time speaking about. I simply want to thank the House for the opportunity to say a few words on this legislation and I look forward to the conclusion of this important process.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before I read this motion I should first apologize to all the bands whose names I am sure to mispronounce. I will attempt to do my best.

An hon. member: Could we dispense?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Yes, we could dispense, but I think it is important for all to know that they are part of this bill.

Mr. Siddon, seconded by Mr. Loiselle, moved:

That Bill C-104, an act respecting an agreement regarding treaty land entitlement in Saskatchewan entered into on September 22, 1992 among Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada, Her Majesty the Queen in right of Saskatchewan and the Keeseekoose, Muskowekwan, Ochapowance, Okanese, Piapot, Star Blanket, Yellowquill, Beardy's & Okemasis, Flying Dust, Little Pine, Moosomin, Mosquito Grizzly Bear's Head, Muskeg Lake, One Arrow, Pelican Lake, Red Pheasant, Saulteaux, Sweetgrass, Thunderchild, Witchekan Lake, Canoe Lake and English River bands, and respecting an agreement regarding treaty land entitlement in Saskatchewan entered into on September 23, 1992 among Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada, Her Majesty the Queen in right of Saskatchewan and the Nekaneet band, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Champagne in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-104, an act respecting an agreement regarding treaty land entitlement in Saskatchewan entered into on September 22, 1992 among Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada, Her Majesty the Queen in right of Saskatchewan and the Keeseekoose, Muskowekwan, Ochapowance, Okanese, Piapot, Star Blanket, Yellowquill, Beardy's & Okemasis, Flying Dust, Little Pine, Moosomin, Mosquito Grizzly Bear's Head, Muskeg Lake, One Arrow, Pelican Lake, Red Pheasant, Saulteaux, Sweetgrass, Thunderchild, Witchekan Lake, Canoe Lake and English River bands, and respecting an agreement regarding treaty land entitlement in Saskatchewan entered into on September 23, 1992 among Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada, Her Majesty the Queen in right of Saskatchewan and the Nekaneet band.

On Clause 2—Definitions

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Chairman, I want to express my appreciation to all members for bringing Bill C-104 quickly to this stage. I also want to give notice that we will be proposing minor technical amendments to five clauses of the bill that have been totally endorsed by the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations on behalf of the entitlement bands and the province of Saskatchewan. As I say they are technical and not substantive amendments. They have been prediscussed with and approved by the opposition parties.

As well there are minor but important corrections to the French translation of the schedules. In schedule II and schedule III of the bill there will be four amendments to the French translation to improve the accuracy of the translation which was not available at the time the schedules were originally signed with the original treaty land entitlements agreement. With that, I hope we can proceed smoothly. I will introduce these amendments clause by clause as they arise.

• (1155)

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Chairman, I wonder if I might just ask the minister some questions. It is so seldom we get the land claims issue before the House of Commons that I want to be able to use this opportunity.

I congratulate all parties involved in the process for bringing the measure before the House today. It is an important step forward for the aboriginal people of Saskatchewan. I congratulate them and the two levels of government on the comprehensive agreement that has been reached and the important measure before the House. I want to say in that context that this is a very important issue, one of the most important issues in the country. That is why I want to take a few minutes to reflect on it.

We have before us a measure on behalf of the aboriginal people of Saskatchewan. The minister may be able to confirm this point, but there are something like 600 land claims across the country, all of which are in various stages of being addressed at this time. There is a limited budget on the part of the Government of Canada. Obviously there is a process to be followed. There is an order of precedence. There is a long list of people.

First, how does the minister intend after today to set up a process whereby we can see a speedy resolution of the rest of the land claims across the country?

It is important we are taking this measure today. It is very important for the people of Saskatchewan and they should be congratulated. However there are many other instances across the country where land claims are pressing issues.

We talked in the House of Commons yesterday about the rampant symptoms of alcoholism, substance abuse, sexual abuse and child abuse. We have heard of those symptoms and we deplore them. We carry our own responsibility on both sides of the House that this sort of thing is happening. It underscores the importance of speeding up the land claims process.

Second, would the minister take some time to reflect on how he intends to do that and what process he intends to use to speed up the settlement of land claims across the country?

I also want to ask him a supplementary question and in so doing read to him a news account of what happened in St. John's, Newfoundland, within the past two days. As he knows, the news report I have before me says that at a news conference on Tuesday at the Hotel Newfoundland, Labrador Inuit Association President William Andersen III presented Premier Clyde Wells with a thick black binder containing what he said he hoped was the future of the Inuit in Labrador. Federal officials were absent from the ceremony. The article says that the federal government pulled out of the land claims process in June 1992 when it was unable to reach an agreement with the province on sharing the cost of any settlement reached.

Now that we have the Labrador Inuit land claims on track, now that we have a preliminary proposal on paper, not a total proposal but a preliminary proposal on paper, now that there is a time track agreed to for a response from the province within three months, and now that there is the undertaking to speedily resolve this particular land claim, does the minister see his way clear to overcoming whatever obstacles were there in the past between the two governments to study this document carefully, to consider it carefully in a comprehensive way, in dialogue with the province and with the Inuit of northern Labrador? Does he think it is possible for all three parties, without preconditions, to go back to the table to study and consult in a serious way with a view to resolving this land claim as quickly as possible?

The other supplementary question I should like to ask him, because it is a pressing issue too, concerns the land claim of the Innu nation in Labrador and in Quebec as well. I do not have to mention it to the minister. He knows as well as I do and as well as all members of the House and all Canadians do the serious and tragic events that took place recently in Davis Inlet.

As I said in the House yesterday, now that the camera has moved away from Davis Inlet and has focused on other places, it is important that we not forget our responsibilities to that particular community, but we have to see that in the context of a settlement of land claims.

I know this is not completely on topic, but I think the people of Canada, the House and you, Madam Chairman, understand it is so seldom we have the opportunity to put these serious and important questions that I wanted to take the opportunity to do so today.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Chairman, I say to my hon. colleague that I appreciate the questions. While we do hope to conclude consideration of this piece of legislation today, and I am sure there is other pressing House business, I certainly welcome the opportunity to take a few minutes to respond to his questions.

First, on the question of moving more quickly toward the settlement of land claims I would like to suggest that is a commitment I have taken very seriously in the last three years as minister. Shortly after my appointment I had the privilege of concluding and initialling an umbrella final agreement with the Council of Yukon Indians, of initialling the Dene–Métis final settlement agreement in the western Arctic within a week, and within a month, on April 30, 1990, of having signed the agreement in principle with the Tungavik Federation of Nunavut which will lead to the ultimate conclusion of the land claim agreement of the Inuit of eastern Arctic.

The Prime Minister gave a speech in the House on September 24, 1990 as part of a comprehensive set of accelerated initiatives on behalf of Canada's aboriginal people. He said that we would give high priority to moving land claims to completion and that both in the area of specific claims and comprehensive claims we would hope to achieve major progress, if not to settle all those claims by the end of the decade, by the turn of the century.

It is important to realize that in the area of land claims there are three categories. The first one is those areas where we made treaty commitments and did not keep them. Today's bill is an example of fulfilling that commitment in Saskatchewan to treaty land allocations that were promised in those early numbered treaties across the prairies.

I indicated in my remarks at second reading that in the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta we were also trying to emulate the process that led to this framework agreement embodied in today's legislation, although it would take a somewhat different form in Manitoba and Alberta. I also indicated that we had already concluded treaty land entitlement agreements with five Alberta First Nations and that we were negotiating with another five. I believe we have in the last three years made more progress on treaty land entitlement than has been made in this entire century in fulfilling those commitments.

Second is the area of a large number of claims called specific claims. The hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake indicated that specific claims were areas wherein certain legal commitments were made or were thought to have been made by bands at some point in the past and never honoured. A specific claim deals with a particular parcel of land and a particular decision-making process at some time in the past which led to an undertaking, usually in writing, supported and recognized by the band council, usually through a band council resolution wherein it was argued that we did not live up to that commitment.

It had been a sad truth that our budget of $15 million a year had not allowed us to move rapidly in the settlement of specific claims. As a result of the new initiative, the budget for a specific claim settlement was increased from $15 million to approximately $75 million a year, a quintupling, a fivefold increase in funding.

Whereas we had been able to settle only two or three claims a year prior to 1991, in the first year with the increased funding and by certain technical measures which allow us to fast track the settlement of specific claims, in the most recent year we have now settled between 25 and 30 specific claims across Canada.

With specific claims there is also often a dispute as to whether we have a legal obligation or a lawful obligation or not. Perhaps the Department of Justice says the federal government does not have an obligation, that it is not a legitimate specific claim. First Nations have often been very frustrated because they believe there is a claim.

The traditional position of government was to say take us to court because the Department of Justice believes we will win in court. We have now created a separate commission under the provisions for commissions of inquiry called a Specific Claims Commission, chaired by Mr. Harry Laforme, the chief commissioner, and six other commissioners. It is dealing with these myriad of specific claims across the country where the claimant, the First Nation, believes we have unfairly rejected its claim. We have great hope that the Specific Claims Commission will produce further justice on behalf of those First Nations when they do not feel the Department of Justice is doing justice to their claim.

The third area we call comprehensive claims. Comprehensive claims arise in a territory where the jurisdiction has never been ceded or surrendered or determined by way of a treaty between a population of First Nations people who believe that it was always their traditional territory and the federal and provincial governments that established a legal regime and developed and dispersed land under land titles processed without regard for the aboriginal title or aboriginal interest in those lands.

The major number of remaining comprehensive claims are to be found in British Columbia where we have at least 28 and perhaps more separate comprehensive claims where there were no treaties. There are other cases with the Labrador Inuit and the Innu of Labrador where there were not treaties. In the province of Ontario there is one comprehensive claim which we have agreed to negotiate with the Golden Lake Algonquin people who in fact claim a good part of eastern Ontario under their comprehensive claim.

We have agreed to no longer limit the number of comprehensive claims to five at any one time, which was an earlier policy, and to facilitate as rapidly as we can all of the comprehensive claims in parallel within the financial limitations of Parliament's capacity to settle, but to facilitate negotiations in good faith and not stall people because of the artificial barriers of inadequate financial resources or other legal arguments which may in the past have been convenient ways of delaying the process.

In response to the first question of the hon. member for Labrador I want to say that we are sincerely committed to accelerating claims in all three categories.

With respect to the two Labrador claims—and I will focus on the one with the Labrador Inuit in particular—we have been engaged in a process of setting the stage for negotiations going back to at least 1989 and perhaps earlier in the case of the Labrador Inuit Association. I was able to travel to Nain in Labrador and sign a framework agreement, I believe in November 1990, which set the stage for negotiating what was then called the agreement in principle. Our policy is that when we are going to negotiate an agreement in principle we have to know that the provincial government, within whose jurisdiction this claim is to be settled, must be a partner in those negotiations. To be a partner we have to know what its role and responsibility is going to be and how it intends to share in all of the elements of settlement—dollars, land, mineral rights, timber rights, water resources, et cetera.

• (1210)

It is not fair to sit down at the table with a First Nation such as the Labrador Inuit Association and go through the process of trying to negotiate a land claim settlement if the province is not a committed partner. We need commitments of the jurisdictions the province is prepared to cede, the land it is prepared to make available and the financial burden that it is prepared to bear.

In our policy we require a cost-sharing agreement before we get into the agreement in principle stage. The agreement in principle negotiation encompasses the global magnitude of the land claim settlement, how much land, how many mineral rights, how many dollars.

We told the province of Newfoundland and Labrador that we needed a cost-sharing agreement but we agreed to take 18 more months, until June 1992, to achieve it. I am sorry to say that we have not made the kind of progress we should have made because the province of Newfoundland and Labrador has not been prepared to quantify what it will accept as its role, its responsibility and its share of the financial and material burden of settlement.

It is not correct to suggest that the federal government has not tried to advance the Labrador Inuit claim, nor the claim that we have agreed to negotiate with the Innu Nation, which I accepted I believe a year and a half ago. In both cases we need to have a clear statement of the commitment of the province of Newfoundland and Labrador toward its share of the obligation to settle. It will have to cede jurisdiction in certain areas, and particularly if we get into discussing self-government in the context of the claim, it will have to give up land rights and forestry rights and water rights, et cetera.

That is the reason why we have not been able to move to the next stage of concluding agreements in principle with the Innu Nation or the Labrador Inuit Association. I commend the LIA for the proposal it presented to the province a week ago in St. John's because it shows its recognition that the province, the premier and the government of Newfoundland and Labrador have to be at the table and to participate. We will review that proposal very thoroughly. We are prepared to continue negotiations but there has to be a clear understanding of the role and responsibility and the degree of commitment from the provincial government.

Mr. Rompkey: Madam Chairman—

The Chairman: I will recognize the hon. member. I do have to remind the hon. member and the minister that getting into the very important question of Labrador takes us somewhat outside the scope of the bill in front of the House right now.

I will recognize the hon. member from the New Democratic Party and I will come back to the member.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Chairman, I do appreciate that ruling very much. In the limited time we have available there are some important matters specific to this bill that should be addressed.

I have a couple of questions. I will put one and hopefully I can be recognized again on another question.

I am interested in knowing specifically about some of the negotiations that the minister may be involved in concerning the trusts. I am told that under this bill the department and the bands are actively engaged in trying to settle a Revenue Canada issue related to the trusts. I wonder if the minister could tell us where this matter is now.

Mr. Siddon: If I am correct in anticipating the substance of the member's question, Madam Chair, it has to do with whether the earnings of the trust will be subject to taxation.

Let me say first of all that there is a schedule of payments associated with this agreement whereby the individual bands which complete band specific agreements will receive payments over the next 12 years. There will be a larger payment in the initial two years because the federal government has essentially doubled its payment in those first two years.

• (1215)

Those payments will be deposited to the Consolidated Revenue Fund in a special treaty land entitlement fund that Treasury Board has agreed to create so that it will not be subject to the usual conditions that apply to Indian or aboriginal trusts.

In this fund there will be a number of drawers which will hold money each year until there is a band specific agreement and the band is ready to draw out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund the payments due to them.

Those payments, while they are being held in this special fund within the CRF, will capture interest according to the usual Treasury Board formula. The question is, when they are drawn out, will the earnings on those funds be subject to taxation? I am advised that the provisions of this legislation are such that they are neutral on that question because it is presently before the Department of Finance and national aboriginal leadership as it pertains to all aboriginal trust accounts.

From one perspective I am sure First Nations would argue that if that money is earned on reserve as a result of the investment of the assets of the reserve, then it should not be subject to taxation. If it is earned off reserve, the policy of the government is that it is not then subject to immunity from taxation. That matter has to be resolved. It will be resolved on a level beyond this particular agreement but the agreement in no way precludes a determination that it not be subject to taxation. I cannot speak for the Minister of Finance in that matter. Is that an adequate explanation?

Mr. Taylor: Yes, Madam Chairman, and I thank the minister.

My subsequent question is one that I raised in my remarks at second reading and relates to the adequacy of resources for the referendum process.

As I indicated in my remarks, the bands must hold a referendum to ratify the terms of the agreement. The agreement allows for reasonable costs to be covered. A number of the chiefs have indicated to me that the department's interpretation of reasonable costs is actually inadequate to meet the needs of informing their membership; some of the band membership live some distance from the reserve but also have a stake in the settlement of this agreement and are included in the referendum process.

I wonder if the minister can tell me if the department is considering allowing for flexibility in this reasonable cost element, ensuring that there are adequate resources available for the conducting of the referendum.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Chairman, the department over the last three years that I have been associated with this process has attempted on every occasion to provide adequate funding for the necessary research on the public information process. Any time that Chief Roland Crowe of the FSIN sat down and said he needed some assistance for some aspect of ensuring the bands are fully informed and committed to this process, I tried to be as helpful as I could.

It is a credit to the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations that it provided a co-ordination of all the bands so that it could collectively bring us to this day where we can I think finally see a solution to this problem.

In that process I am told the FSIN has discussed with the various claimant bands a means of preparing each band for the referendum which is required in order to ratify its band specific agreement.

I understand there were negotiations and a formula was established whereby funding would be made available for this process on a formula basis, which I am told at least the majority of the Saskatchewan First Nations claimant bands agreed to, and that $2.5 million has been set aside for this purpose. Individual bands then will be able to draw their share, I would say, of approximately $100,000. If the funds were not adequate or there was the need for some flexibility, as I said at the outset, I would like to try to be flexible but we also have to respect the role of the FSIN in co-ordinating this process. That can be pursued further through it and directly with the individual bands.

• (1220)

Mr. Taylor: Madam Chairman, if I could indulge for one more moment. As I indicated in the preface to my remarks earlier and also at second reading, I talked about this being the important conclusion of a process but said that there are other matters that have to be dealt with.

The FSIN and the individual bands, on the settlement of the land entitlement agreement here, will be turning their attention to matters such as that addressed in the recent standing committee report on housing about the inadequacy of housing on reserves. I am wondering if the minister and his department, on the successful conclusion of this agreement, will begin to turn their attention toward dealing with matters relating to the unanimous report of the standing committee on housing and address some of these other major concerns on reserves.

Mr. Siddon: In danger of getting into a prolonged response as I did with the hon. member for Labrador, I would say that the hon. member should be assured that it is not a matter of turning our attention from one important issue to another. Somehow I am expected to maintain my commitment and concern for a large number of files all at the same time.

The question of the adequacy of our housing program has been extensively reviewed over the last three years. Funds have been constrained, as the hon. member knows. This year I was able to ensure that the funding for aboriginal housing was not reduced, but it has not yet been increased.

As a result of consultations with First Nations' leadership, focused through the AFN in particular, and many discussions with bands and regional organizations we have developed a housing policy proposal, I and my colleague the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We trust it will involve adequate funding, significant additional funding, but also elements to ensure that housing will last on Indian reserves.

There will be more training, more responsibility for the financing, maintenance and upgrading of housing, and planning of the housing requirements of individual First Nations. I hope to be able to bring these initiatives forward in the next couple of months. I am certainly hoping that we can have a new housing policy before the end of June. That is a priority with me.

The Chairman: As we are on clause 2 I would like to put to the House the amendments which the minister has brought to this clause.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved:

That clause 2 of Bill C-104 be amended

(a) by striking out line 19 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"September 22, 1992, pursuant to which Canada's outstanding treaty land entitlement obligations are to be fulfilled in respect of those bands that are parties to that Agreement, certain provisions of"

(b) by striking out line 26 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"1992, pursuant to which Canada's outstanding treaty land entitlement obligations are fulfilled in respect of the Nekaneet band, certain provisions of which are set"

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Chairman, this is a prime opportunity to be specific and true to the claimants who are dealing with this treaty land entitlement. In doing so I think there is a broader picture and the minister has the expertise to deal with these questions.

First of all, we know that on September 22, 1992 federal, provincial and Indian representatives signed the treaty land entitlement framework agreement. This is a very specific and defined process, geared only for full and final settlements. It makes everything so much easier, or so it should. The down side in the bigger picture is that—not specific to this, this is the bright side I would say—this agreement also represents significant progress on only one of at least last nine different kinds of claims in Saskatchewan, numbering at last count 105 individual claims.

Given that outstanding treaty land entitlement has now been dealt with, the question then becomes which of the remaining eight categories of claims is our next priority and how do we deal with it. To answer that question it is necessary to review the history of claims in Saskatchewan and to survey the current Saskatchewan Indian environment.

However, before talking history and environment let us review the nine different kinds of claims. I would like to ask the minister, once I list those nine claims, what his next priority is. First, I will just list them and not go into the details because, as the minister will know, one of the opportunities we have as members of Parliament and they have as ministers of the Crown is to enlighten Canada on the specificity of these very complicated claims, be they specific or comprehensive. The basis on which land questions come about is so interesting and so complex that we take the opportunity to inform people.

Having said that, I will list the different kinds of claims: first, the outstanding treaty land entitlement; second, the outstanding supplementary treaty land entitlements; third, invalid treaty land surrenders and expropriations; fourth, invalid supplementary treaty land surrenders and expropriations; fifth, misappropriated treaty territory resources; sixth, unfulfilled terms of treaty, and this is the grand-daddy of them all because it includes on a regional and national scale claims related to the government's unwillingness to live up to rights and guarantees concerning self-government, education, health, and taxation; seventh, fraudulent and unlawful acts; eighth, intrusions on to sacred territories; and ninth, unpunished criminal acts.

I do not know how many instances of the last category there are or are likely to be but one that immediately comes to mind because it is so specific and so graphic is the 1873 massacre involving the Carry the Kettle Band. Another one is the 1885 point-blank shooting of a blind elderly Cree at the Steele Narrows, and yet another involves several cases in which smallpox and other infectious diseases were deliberately spread throughout a band or group of bands. Since these incidents involve very serious charges it is important that we not just come out and clearly judge these cases, but rather report that they do exist and are out there in the minds of Saskatchewan people.

Having covered environment and history, I would like to ask the minister: We have covered one very successfully, this particular TLE. I would like to know which of the other eight is a priority and where most of the resources and the effort would go.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Chair, first of all in regard to the first amendment that the Chair has put before the House I should indicate that this amendment, and I do not know that the question bears directly upon the amendment, was put forth and requested by the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations because it adds language which ties the settlement agreement, the TLE legislation, more closely to what the Saskatchewan First Nations believe to be our treaty obligations. It wanted that clearly specified. I trust this amendment will be approved without further discussion.

With regard to the question about which priority I would give to the various categories of claims the hon. member has listed, without diminishing the importance of any of those issues I think this initiative has had to be a priority of this government, as it has been of previous governments. I am very pleased at the co-operation we are getting as we move toward concluding this matter.

It in no way reduces the importance I attach to all of the issues that might be considered under the classification that the hon. member has listed. I do not know where that comes from and if she wants to give me the document she is reading from I would like to take a look at it. I am told it is not a classification that exists within the Department of Indian Affairs.

We categorize claims as unfulfilled treaty obligations, which we are dealing with today, comprehensive claims, on which there were no previous treaties or any negotiations with a particular First Nation, and specific claims.

• (1230)

Specific claims can encompass a broad range of grievances such as those that have been listed under the nine categories that were given. In each case, if there is a lawful obligation which can be argued to the satisfaction of the Department of Justice as a default, malfeasance or error on the part of past governments or this government then we will accept that as a specific claim without ranking it as to priority and we will fund the research and prepare for negotiation of a settlement of that claim.

If the government, on the advice of our Crown legal adviser, says there is no provable lawful obligation then the remedy is normally through the courts. For First Nations that are not satisfied with going to the courts, which entails considerable cost, we have created a specific claims commission for external recourse to an impartial third body to give the government advice as to whether we are getting valid advice from the Department of Justice.

I would respond in that way and indicate to the hon. member that when specific matters arise in the province of Saskatchewan or elsewhere which I can deal with, and which are often brought to my attention, I try to move forward as quickly as I can.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Account to be established

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved:

That clause 4 of Bill C-104 be amended by striking out lines 4 to 14 on page 3 and substituting the following:

"(a) credited to the Treaty Land Entitlement (Saskatchewan) Fund the balance remaining of all amounts that were paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, prior to the coming into force of this act, as contributions by Her Majesty in right of Saskatchewan pursuant to section 3.07 of the Framework Agreement, together with any interest credited to those amounts by Her Majesty in right of Canada pursuant to subsection 3.07(c) of that agreement;

(b) paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and credited to the Treaty Land Entitlement (Saskatchewan) Fund all amounts that are contributed, after the coming into the force of this act, by Her Majesty in right of Saskatchewan pursuant to section 3.07 of the Framework Agreement; and

(c) credited to the Treaty Land Entitle-"

He said: Madam Chair, this is a technical amendment to allow for the correct establishment of a sub-fund, the Treaty Land Entitlement Fund, within the Consolidated Revenue Fund. It is something that Treasury Board has requested and that has been discussed and agreed to by the other parties, the FSIN and the Government of Saskatchewan. It is purely technical so I trust that members will support it.

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Chairman, I would not want to miss the opportunity to once again bring up the issue of treaty exemption. Maybe I can ask the minister why there was no consideration given to looking at some kind of mechanism for recognizing treaty land entitlement obligations and I quote: "moneys appropriated by Parliament pursuant to an agreement to fulfil outstanding treaty land entitlement obligations and are, therefore, deemed to be personal property of First Nations on reserve, pursuant to the Indian Act". This would have ensured that moneys would not have been subject to taxation. Why was an appropriate additional amendment not sought in this area or this particular amendment not further fortified to give maximum economic or financial leverage to FSIN and other First Nations of Saskatchewan involved in this TLE so they could benefit from it?

• (1235)

I support the amendment but I wish we could have found a way to do that.

Mr. Siddon: I am told, Madam Chair, that the first amendment to clause 2, which the FSIN requested, which was to clearly tie this agreement to our treaty obligations, was the comfort it needed to accept the language of this agreement insofar as the handling and treatment of funds deposited to the special treaty land entitlement fund were concerned.

I indicated in an earlier response that the bill is purposely neutral on a question which has much larger implications. I stand corrected. It is not the Department of Finance but Revenue Canada which is engaged in a major national discussion which will lead to a decision about the tax treatment of trust accounts and their earnings. It was not felt necessary to pre-empt that or create a precedent for a decision in this agreement by the First Nations of Saskatchewan. They understand this is a difficult issue which will be resolved in due course.

Ms. Blondin-Andrew: Perhaps it should be considered by First Nations that Revenue Canada, with its policy move to change the status quo of tax exemption for First Nations, is essentially putting a stranglehold and a very limiting factor on land questions that are to be resolved in terms of what happens to the money First Nations receive in full payment from consolidated revenue. Perhaps it is more a comment than a question. Perhaps that should be in the minds of all people who go for a specific or comprehensive land claim. They should note that Revenue Canada is essentially putting a restriction on exactly what the maximization of these funds would be by not allowing for the exemption to be maintained.

He said: Amendment 2 was requested by the province of Saskatchewan and does not have any substantive effect on the recognition of future claims by other entitlement bands.

as amended, agreed to.

The Chairman: When we get to the schedule, as hon. members can see, the department has presented some amendments to schedules I, II and III. Beauchesne's tells us that when a bill is introduced, to give effect to an agreement or confirm a scheme, the text of which is contained in a schedule to the bill as an independent origin and status of which is described in the introductory provision of the bill, amendments cannot be made to the schedule.

If members look very closely at what the amendments do propose, it is really a technical amendment in the translation. It was really an error of translation and not a change in the schedule itself which is why we have agreed to make those changes.

In schedule I, the amendment has the effect of adding the date only.

Shall the amendment carry?

Bill reported.

Mr. Siddon moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Siddon moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Madam Speaker, I will not proceed to read the title of the bill again to name and compliment each of the individual entitlement bands that have helped bring us to this historic day.

I just want to thank members of the House, particularly the critics of the opposition parties, for facilitating the swift passage of this very important piece of legislation.

It is a very complex matter designed for accountants and lawyers, but it has very significant meaning to the thousands of members of the 26 entitlement bands who will benefit from this legislation.

I compliment the treaty commissioner, Mr. Cliff Wright, the chief of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations, the premier of the province of Saskatchewan, all those who worked for the various jurisdictions who are parties to this agreement and I thank you, Madam Speaker, for facilitating the passage of this legislation.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I have just a few words in conclusion on this important bill.

It has been brought to my attention that despite the fact that I had the list in front of me, I inadvertently missed naming two of the chiefs who have been important to the conclusion of this process and reside within the boundaries of the constituency I represent. Chief Wayne Standinghorn from the Sweetgrass band and Chief Blaine Favel from the Poundmaker band have also been very active chiefs with their councils in the development of this process.

It has also occurred to me that because this process has been a long one, there are numerous individuals who have represented their band members, either as councillors or chiefs through this process, who are no longer directly associated with their councils.

Some chiefs have chosen not to run in new elections. Some members of council have chosen not to run, or have been asked by their respective bands to have a bit of a holiday as it is sometimes referred to in this place.

I want to pay my respects to those chiefs and council members who are no longer currently serving their bands in elective capacities but have played significant roles in bringing their bands and band memberships into this process. Their contributions are as great as any of those who are still in office.

At the same time I do want to indicate that I am aware there are conflicts within some of the bands. I am aware some of the bands are anxious to resolve other significant issues such as housing, which I mentioned earlier. I am very anxious to see that issue resolved and I commit myself to work with the bands, chiefs, councils and band members to help resolve some of these outstanding issues in the weeks, months and perhaps years to come.

• (1250)

Taxation is a major issue that I am personally committed to. A tremendous amount of work has been done in the past that has been allowed to drift somewhat with regard to aboriginal people living on reserve with disabilities. These people face challenges that many of us will never be able to fully understand or appreciate. We must meet the needs of the physically challenged who live on reserve and commit resources that will be of greater assistance to them.

I am pleased that this process has concluded here today and I thank the minister and members of the House for all the work they have contributed to the process.

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, it has been my pleasure to work on the passage of this important piece of legislation, Bill C-104. There is a clear indication of a commitment to land resources and jurisdiction. To me those three elements are fundamental to people becoming self-determining. They are the foundation for self-government. I just want to congratulate all those people and wish them the best in their future endeavours.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Taylor: Point of order, Madam Speaker. I wonder if it would be in the interest of the House to call it one o'clock and begin the debate on Bill C-103 immediately following Question Period.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion by the hon. member.

Is there consent to call it one o'clock?

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, I think we are prepared to call it one o'clock. I think the bill that has been passed this morning is very important. I think Bill C-103 will pass with somewhat the same sense of decency and urgency. We are intending to refer it to committee, so I think the intent is that each party will have one speaker and we will go on so we can move into orders of the day.

I am more than happy to agree.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock p.m. I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

The House took recess at 12.53 p.m.

LLOYD EISLER AND ISABELLE BRASSEUR

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron—Bruce): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the people of Huron—Bruce and Saint-Jean and all Canadians, my colleague, the member for Saint-Jean, and I would like to convey our best wishes and congratulations to Lloyd Eisler, from Seaforth, Ontario, and Isabelle Brasseur, from St. Jean-sur-Richelieu, Quebec, on their winning performance in pairs figure skating at the World Championships in Prague.

After seven years as a team they have proven to be the best in the world at their sport. Their sense of accomplishment is matched by the pride Canadians feel for the world class excellence they both have achieved. They have demonstrated the spirit and determination that characterizes all Canadian athletes.

I ask my colleagues in the House of Commons to join us in congratulating these two great Canadians on winning the gold medal.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

FORESTRY

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, it was more than one year ago that I rose in this House and asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration what action this government intended to take vis-à-vis the crisis in the forestry industry, and specifically the situation in my riding of Restigouche—Chaleur.

[Translation]

In response to this crisis, a number of committees were formed to examine the problems facing the forestry sector. Although the committees have done valuable work, the Atholville mill is still closed and the Dalhousie mill is operating only two of its four machines. The study has now been going on for more than a year, but thousands of people are still looking for work and are fed up with the federal government's failure to act.

[English]

I call upon the government to stop running from its responsibilities. The local committees, the provincial government, the municipalities and the laid-off workers have all done their part in addressing this crisis. It is time for the federal government to live up to its responsibilities and to act on this urgent matter.

NATIONAL SOCIAL WORK WEEK

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, this March the Canadian Association of Social Workers celebrated the third annual National Social Work Week.

Social work is a proud profession with a long history of commitment to improving the well-being of people in society, particularly the disadvantaged. Today social workers are involved in direct practice, teaching, policy analysis and research as well as community organization, planning and program administration. They may work directly with individuals, groups and communities, or on their behalf through research, social policy and planning.

The 13,500 members of the Canadian Association of Social Workers should be recognized for their contribution to the betterment of society. We wish them every success in the celebration of National Social Work Week.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, International Women's Day, the minister granted landing to Ferdousi Bhuyian, a 28-year old battered wife from Bangladesh. She was one of 14 women for whom NAC is pleading that this government allow them to remain in Canada.

Now three women from Eritrea, living in London, are subject to removal to the United States, one on Friday, tomorrow. They are all pleading for Canada's mercy.

There is no guarantee that the United States will not send these women, and all such people, back to Eritrea or whatever country forces them to leave.

I call on the minister to review the cases of the 13 women presented by NAC and the cases of Ms. Tebletz Bahlebi-Tedia, Ms. Simret and Ms. Seghid under the new guidelines announced by the IRB on March 9 so as to consider allowing all these women to remain in Canada on humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

• (1405)

I also call on him to immediately place a moratorium on removal of rejected refugee women claimants to the U.S. or other countries so as to review all pending cases in the same way.

CHILD SEXUAL ABUSE

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative family caucus has recently concluded a study on child sexual abuse and has made 11 significant recommendations to the government.

Some of these recommendations are: first, to establish a national child abuse register to enable screening of those seeking paid or volunteer positions of responsibility for children; second, to amend existing dangerous offenders provisions in the Criminal Code for anyone convicted of sexual offences against children; third, to amend the Criminal Code to include the depiction of children in a sexual manner in the definition of obscene and to create a separate indictable offence with greater penalties for the distribution of obscene material to children; and fourth, to amend the Criminal Records Act to prohibit pardons for those convicted of sexual offences involving children.

The committee also recommends the prohibition of the killer cards, the serial killer board game and similar objects directed at young people.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post condones advertising 1-900 fantasy phone numbers. Canada Post has authorized delivery of unaddressed postcards advertising female names and phone numbers.

During this age of heightened awareness of sexual exploitation this Canada Post practice is objectionable and offensive. Despite complaints from citizens and postal employees Canada Post maintains that the postcards are not pornographic.

In fact, Canada Post managers suggest that if people think it is objectionable their recourse is to call the sender. Imagine encouraging the use of a 1-900 number, at a cost of $10 per call, to complain.

I implore Canada Post to show some moral judgment and common sense. Let us not sacrifice basic values in the pursuit of profits.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support the sweeping changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act, which were passed by the House two weeks ago.

At the legislative committee I pressed for significant improvements to Bill C-99 and a number were made. Others which also surfaced at report stage were the innovative provisions seeking to free up working capital for our small businesses.

Under the bill, retroactive financing of up to 180 days will now be available. The value of an asset for financing will be increased to 100 per cent of the purchase cost. Personal guarantees by borrowers will also be kept at 25 per cent of the loan.

I support these changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act in that they seek to facilitate better access to start-up cash and expansion of capital for our small businesses. At committee, the Canadian Bankers' Association publicly made that commitment.

I have noted the work, enthusiasm and optimism of the Minister of State for Small Businesses about the changes to the SBLA. I will be watching with great interest to see whether the members of our financial community can emulate that enthusiasm and support.

TAXATION OF TOBACCO PRODUCTS

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, a number of retailers and distributors in the food business in my riding phoned me last week about the financial problems they are facing as a result of widespread cigarette smuggling.

The Tory government's decision to raise taxes on tobacco products has not only harmed Quebec's economy but has actually created an underground distribution network. What was intended as an incentive to cut back on cigarette consumption, which would reduce the harmful effects on health, has become a nightmare for retailers and many workers in the retail sector. Since January 1991, Quebec has lost 5,900 jobs, and distributors and retailers lost more than $150 million in revenue in 1992. This means that federal and provincial governments have lost about $500 million in revenue and taxes, while there has been an increase in cigarette-related thefts and more money has been spent on helping the unemployed as a result of plant closings.

Considering this disastrous ripple effect, I want to ask the government to review excessive taxation of tobacco products in the next federal budget.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, last month I had the pleasure of participating in a forum on the Young Offenders Act in my riding. Also participating was a young offender, a youth court judge, a defence attorney, a crown attorney, a police officer and two individuals who work with young offenders in the detention facilities.

This forum was very informative and provided the almost 100 participants with a good opportunity to have a dialogue on the problems and strengths of the Young Offenders Act. We also heard about the resources available to rehabilitate young offenders.

Suggested changes to the Young Offenders Act include: the release of more information about young offenders, reducing the age for which it applies, and adding the option of conditional discharges and suspended sentences.

I want to thank Pat Fowler of Ajax for organizing this very informative forum, Archbishop Dennis O'Connor High School for its facilities, and the many citizens of Ajax for their participation.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, in 1988 Du Pont of Canada established a policy to phase out CFC production as soon as possible. Alternative technologies have now been developed and adequate supplies of alternatives to CFCs are available. The CFC phase out and transition to alternatives is well under way around the world. We support all activities that accelerate this transition.

Du Pont of Canada announced last week that it has ceased production of CFCs at its Maitland site in my riding. As the ozone layer over Canada shrunk last week to the lowest levels ever, Canadians everywhere will applaud last week's announcement by Du Pont of Canada to cease production of CFCs at its Maitland site and further concentrate on producing alternative products.

I commend Du Pont of Canada for not only meeting but exceeding the Montreal protocol as it relates to the production of CFCs. The thinning of the ozone layer is one of the major causes of skin cancer. Du Pont of Canada has responded with its latest announcement and I am sure all Canadians wish Du Pont well as it develops alternatives to CFCs.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the encouraging news about the economy just keeps rolling in.

Last week I reported 1992's record-breaking exports, totalling over $150 billion. This week the good news is in the retail sales sector with an increase of 3.4 per cent over last year for the month of January. The statistics also indicate a rise in the help wanted index, up 4.5 per cent in February. This is an early indicator of labour demand.

Combined, these numbers indicate a growing consumer confidence which can only mean one thing: more jobs and more opportunities for all Canadians.

STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the federal government's plans for student aid keep getting worse and worse. Last year it was the introduction of a 3 per cent tax on student loans. Earlier this year it was the elimination of the six-month period of breathing room that students enjoyed after graduation before the interest began accumulating on their debt.

Now to add insult to injury after injury, the government will no longer guarantee student loans. Instead it will pay a 5 per cent risk premium to whatever bank it decides will have a monopoly on those loans. That lucky bank is going to take as little risk as it possibly can. How? It will do so by taking on as few risky students as it can get away with. Who are the risky students? They are the ones who cannot afford an education in the first place, the ones who are already paying the price for 20 per cent youth unemployment in a Tory recession.

These students deserve better. They deserve a student loan system designed to help them get an education and an economy strong enough to ensure that they can pay back what they owe.

Under Clinton the Americans propose doing better. Why can we not?

POVERTY

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada produces the low income cut-offs which count Canadians falling below an income level at which 58.5 per cent of their income is the average amount all Canadians spend on food, clothing and shelter. Income includes business losses and taxes but excludes loans, savings and in-kind benefits.

These statistics were never intended to be a poverty line and certainly do not tell us which Canadians suffer hardship or whether government income supplementation or job creation programs help the most needy.

• (1415)

If the House of Commons wants to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000 we need achievable goals, not a moving target that gallops off with every step forward we take.

Progressive Conservatives want to take real action to combat child poverty and assure every child in Canada an opportunity to thrive, but not through a scatter-gun approach that misses the target.

MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the lack-lustre coronation campaign almost got off the ground when a declaration speech by the minister of defence was leaked.

Rather than admitting that a member of her team had mischievously leaked the speech, the minister without foundation placed blame on young Liberals, among others. Her accusations are irresponsible. Furthermore, why is the minister who is trying to sell herself as a new and fresh face showing such contempt for the ideals of Canadian youth?

I would remind her that it was not young Liberals who made her flip-flop on aboriginal student funding when she was minister of Indian affairs, nor on gun control when she was Minister of Justice, nor now on the $5.8 billion purchase of helicopters.

Instead of denigrating Canadian youth, why does the minister not accept responsibility for her own actions rather than sounding like her old boss?

The first draft of her infamous speech claimed that she was not a traditional politician. Well, she may have packed halibut and worked on the mayonnaise line. However, today her allegations are not only fishy, but the attempts of her spin doctors to portray her as the northern Clinton are really piling the mayo on just a little too thick for Canadians' taste.

GASOLINE TAXES

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, last Friday's edition of The Vancouver Sun contained a front page article on a Peat Marwick report which studied the costs of different methods of transportation in the greater Vancouver region.

The study concluded that each year, lower mainland motorists are undercharged by $2,600 for the actual costs incurred by their driving activities. The report went on to say that if drivers were held accountable for all costs associated with driving, the price of gas would rise by $1.60 per litre.

I seriously hope the B.C. government will think twice before raising taxes as this report suggests.

As an MP for a riding adjacent to the United States, I also know that increased gas taxes will cause more people to go south to purchase their gas. Once there, they will also do some other shopping. Over the past year, as the Canadian dollar has increased in value and Canadian stores have become more competitive, we have seen a steady decrease in the number of cross-border shoppers.

Additional gasoline taxes in British Columbia would put a stop to the improving cross-border shopping picture and hurt our recovering economy at the same time. I urge the premier and the B.C. New Democrats to think again before taking this short-sighted step.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

BUDGET

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

Last December when the Minister of Finance made his economic statement he promised a budget in the month of February. When 1993 arrived he said that there was to be a budget but not in February, probably in March.

Last week his press secretary said that the Minister of Finance would not run for the leadership of his party because he was extremely busy preparing the budget.

Yesterday we heard there will probably be no budget at all. Will the Prime Minister tell us what is the most important thing: the future of the Conservative Party or jobs for Canadians? We need jobs very badly.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one of the things we have tried to do in the last eight or nine years is to introduce budgets on a fairly regular cycle. They have been preceded by budgetary consultations with the budget usually presented in the first quarter of the year, or thereabouts.

It is helpful for provincial governments and for others who have to go into the market. We have found that to be quite a helpful national issue.

Because of the referendum, that was slightly changed inasmuch as the government felt it appropriate to bring in a major economic statement on December 2.

The Minister of Finance is presently evaluating the impact of this and is continuing this very day his pre-budget consultations across the country. When the Minister of Finance returns from his consultations he will meet with cabinet and recommend a course of action in regard to a budget or an appropriate economic statement.

• (1420)

I will wait for him to return and listen to his advice. Cabinet will make a decision at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to hear the point made by the Prime Minister.

However there was another point made yesterday by the Minister of Finance when he said he might not have a budget because there is a Tory convention going on and the candidates do not want to have a budget too close to the leadership convention of the Conservative Party.

I ask the Prime Minister what is important in Canada, the leadership of the Tories or the economy for Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows of course that the Minister of Finance did not say what my hon. friend has just ascribed to him. That is a complete distortion of what the Minister of Finance said.

I point out to my hon. friend that the Minister of Finance and his predecessor the Minister for International Trade have brought in policies that have resulted in the interest rates today which are the lowest in 20 years and the inflation rate which is the lowest in 30 years. Economic growth is strong. We will be leading the IMF countries next year. Employment growth will be the highest of the OECD countries.

We want to maintain those policies on behalf of all Canadians. I look forward to the recommendations of the Minister of Finance. My hon. friend can be absolutely certain that his budget and/or his economic statement will contain policies fully consistent with those that have provided such sound economic management for Canada in the past.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I find the Prime Minister's answer quite incredible. It was reported in The Financial Post this morning that the minister said he did not want a budget now because of his party's leadership race.

I would therefore like to know from the Prime Minister if we will have a budget at this time, when reports from all over say that the deficit will be even worse than predicted in December and since the Minister of Finance in December categorically promised a budget for February. Will the government keep its word to the Canadian people and tell us what the future holds for the Canadian economy, instead of being preoccupied with the whims of the conservative Party?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in fact, from 1984 to 1991, employment grew at an annual rate of 1.7 per cent, the highest in all the G–7 countries. Inflation is now at 1.5 per cent in Canada, the lowest rate in the last 30 years. Interest rates are at their lowest in 20 years; the growth rate forecast for next year will be the highest of the G–7 countries.

These are economic policies that have brought significant worthwhile results for the country. As we speak, the Minister of Finance is on a pre–budget consultation tour. He will make recommendations to cabinet at the appropriate time. In the near future, the Minister of Finance will be able to advise the House and my friend of his intentions in this area.

But be assured that the policies will be essentially the same as far as the basic principles which have brought the lowest inflation and interest rates in the past 20 years are concerned.

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

It is most crucial for the Minister of Finance to table a budget as soon as possible. Without a budget the Conservative government is hiding the nation's financial situation.

Would the government prefer to tie the hands of the 1.6 million unemployed people, the thousands on welfare and all those taxpayers in financial difficulty instead of presenting a budget that would show the government's true face and tell Canadians the whole truth?

• (1425)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the truth is that the gross domestic product rose at an annual rate of 3.5 per cent in the fourth quarter. Furthermore, 161,000 full–time jobs have been created since last August, with 35,000 to 57,000 new jobs every month in the last few months. Exports reached the record level of $157.5 billion in 1992, 11 per cent more than in 1991. Deliveries of manufactured goods in the fourth quarter were up 13.2 per cent on average over the third quarter. Productivity rose 1.9 per cent and all this will no doubt be confirmed in a budget or financial statement by the finance minister as soon as possible.

There will be good news, my friend. You lose nothing by waiting. I know that is bad news for the Liberals, but wait, it will do you good.

[English]

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Yes, it is a question of credibility, Mr. Speaker. Nobody believes that. Let us have a budget then if he is so sure of himself.

We are now getting the suggestion that we may have an economic statement or we may get a budget, who knows? Last week we were told by the Minister of Finance that he was too busy writing a budget to run for the leadership of the Progressive Conservative Party. This week it does not seem to matter very much to him. He is out there doing something else, apparently working on some budget.

Mr. McDermid: Be careful, he might run.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gauthier: Are you going to manage his campaign?

I ask the Prime Minister what has changed? Are these Tories so ashamed of telling Canadians what the budgetary position of the government is, or is it that the Minister of Finance changed his mind? If so, for what did he change his mind?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend makes a good point. Maybe it would be a great and significant day for the nation. I will talk to the Minister of Finance about his idea of bringing forward a budget if on the same day my hon. friend can convince the Leader of the Opposition to tell us and the country where he stands on the GST.

I do not want to be unkind or difficult but they are talking about economic credibility. What could go more to the heart of economic credibility than the Leader of the Opposition finally having the gumption to stand up and tell Canadians once on a major issue what he stands for. Either he is for it or against it.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

We understand that pre-budget consultations are going on in Ottawa today. The Minister of Finance may or may not bring in a budget. He has been quoted as saying to the effect that he would not want to saddle a new Tory leader with a five-year budget. Well, Canadians have been saddled with Tory budgets for the last nine years and it would be wonderful to have a change.

Obviously it would be good news not to have another Conservative budget but I think that Canadians deserve to know what this government's priorities are. That is done through a budget.

I ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared to look at a change of course, to look at relief for the 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed, to bring in a budget now that will be based on a full employment strategy for Canada. Will he give Canadians that kind of hope?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to take the views of my hon. friend and convey them to the Minister of Finance who is indeed consulting Canadians in regard to pre-budget possibilities for Canada.

My hon. friend says that it is good news not to have another Conservative budget. She asks for a Conservative budget and then says it is good news not to have one.

I cannot guarantee what the Minister of Finance will say or whether there will be another Mazankowski budget. However, I can guarantee there will not be a Rae budget.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary.

I find that the refuge of the government when it cannot support its own policies is to talk about another government's policies. It would be really interesting to hear the government talk about its own policies for a change. I would suggest that the Prime Minister might have wanted to listen to the second part of my question.

While it would be bad news to get another Conservative budget, the government has the responsibility to tell Canadians what it will do, to speak to the the 3.8 million Canadians who are still on welfare, the 1.5 million Canadians who cannot find work, the 4.2 million Canadians who still live in poverty.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister, is the government going to spend the next three months only concentrating on one job and abandoning the millions of Canadians with no jobs?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course the answer is no. We will continue to work at keeping inflation very low.

We are working at programs that enhance our productivity which has already increased significantly. We are looking at ways to further lower our unit costs which are down by 6.6 per cent compared with the United States. This explains in large part our record exports to the United States and around the world. We are looking at the kinds of policies that create durable jobs in the private sector.

My hon. friend I think perhaps misunderstood what I was saying. She took umbrage at the fact that I appeared to be criticizing NDP policies in Ontario. I was not doing that. I was just agreeing with the auto workers in Oshawa.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it will be the first time that this government ever stood up for labour in this country if the Prime Minister says he stands up for the auto workers. I will say that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this government is no longer acting like a government. It is once again ignoring its responsibility to ordinary Canadians in order to concentrate on the leadership campaign. There are plenty of crisis situations that require immediate action. For instance, 60 per cent of single parent families led by women are living in poverty.

What is the government going to do for these families? Will they have to wait until the government has time to deal with this problem?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my honourable friend raises an extremely important question. All governments have an obligation to look at lasting solutions, despite an international recession that has affected all western economies, including Great Britain, France, and now Germany.

This is being done by creating new job opportunities, keeping inflation in check—which we have done by lowering interest rates—introducing policies for economic reform, opening up new markets for Canada through the free trade agreement with Mexico, and controlling government spending. These are all policies that were opposed by my NDP friend. Perhaps she would consider changing her position and support government policies that have achieved quite impressive results.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

I want to say to the Prime Minister that the issue that has been raised today is a serious one. The primary purpose of Parliament is to hold the government responsible and accountable for its economic policy. It is not a joking matter to suggest the government is not sure whether there will or will not be a budget, whether a Conservative leadership convention takes precedence over a budget.

The Prime Minister has said that there has been no suggestion by the Minister of Finance that the budget, the need to stimulate the economy, the need to create jobs, the need to combat poverty is being held secondary to a Conservative leadership convention.

I want to quote the Minister of Finance from today's Financial Post: "'Obviously, with the leadership issue, that has to be taken into consideration. There will be a new Prime Minister in June', says Minister of Finance in suggesting he may delay the budget," which is now overdue.

I want to ask the Prime Minister which takes priority, the economy of Canada, creating jobs, combating poverty or playing partisan political games with the lives of Canadians?

• (1435)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend of course knows the answer to that question, as he would in regard to any political party that had the privilege of forming the Government of Canada.

Leadership conventions will go on from time to time but the primary obligation of Parliament, the primary obligation of the Government of Canada is to look after the national interest.

The Minister of Finance is presently meeting with Canadians across the country. I think he is in Winnipeg later today and then in western Canada after a meeting earlier today in Ottawa. The object of the exercise is to pursue policies that keep inflation down around 1.5 per cent, which is the lowest in 30 years, to keep interest rates down, to stimulate economic growth, to encourage the private sector so that new jobs can be created.

This is the foundation on which we have sought to build growing prosperity and this is the foundation on which we will continue to build.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance said a week ago that he intended to deliver a tough new budget. Those are the minister's words.

The minister said the budget was required because of a shortfall in revenue projections. The minister also said he wanted to calm jitters in the international financial committee. If those reasons were valid a week ago, one would assume that those reasons are valid today. Will the Prime Minister make a clear statement today, not just for the international community, but for Canadians, that an economic plan is forthcoming. Will he assure Canadians, that the government has its priorities straight by saying to us today that a $6 billion unnecessary helicopter purchase will be part of that new economic policy and that a budget should be forthcoming any day in this House of Commons?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why when he gets to quoting The Financial Post he is so selective. Surely he could have been a little more careful and quoted the relevant part of the statement by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Tobin: Pretty relevant.

Mr. Mulroney: Pardon? My hon. friend said pretty relevant. Let me read what the Minister of Finance said which my hon. friend no doubt inadvertently neglected to quote.

The Minister of Finance said: "At the present time I am preparing what is the equivalent of a budget. Cabinet will consider a budget-economic statement". That is exactly what he is going to do. He is consulting, he is preparing a budget, it will be brought to cabinet, cabinet will consider the matter and the House will be fully seized of the plans of the government.

I can assure my hon. friend that it will not deal with matters such as took place when my hon. friends were in government, when interest rates went to 22.75 per cent, when inflation went to 12.9 per cent and unemployment was 11.8 per cent. They devastated Canada with a national energy program. It will never, ever happen again with this government.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. We know that the ministers who are seeking the leadership of the Progressive Conservative Party all have different views as far as the budget is concerned, but their main concern is for their own jobs, not the jobs of Canadians. However, 1.5 million Canadians are waiting impatiently for a budget that will restore their hope in the future.

I want to ask the Prime Minister to tell the House and Canadians today whether they can expect a federal budget within the next few weeks.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is still the same. As I told the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, considering the importance of these major economic issues, perhaps the hon. member from Hamilton would care to speak to her leader and ask him once again where he stands on the GST. Does he support it, yes or no? Does he support the free trade agreement, yes or no? Then, if the Minister of Finance brings down a budget, perhaps for once the Leader of the Opposition will rise in the House and give us a straight answer.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister wants us to put forward a budget. Just tell him to have the guts to call an election.

• (1440)

It is obvious that the Prime Minister is playing politics with the lives of hundreds of thousands of Canadians. It is obvious that his only interest right now is in crowning his successor as opposed to reaching out to—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. We are getting unnecessarily personal. Would the hon. member lay the basis for her question and put it.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I do take the fact that there are 1.6 million Canadians looking for work in this country rather personally. I just wish the Prime Minister did.

I want to ask the Prime Minister very directly—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Order.

Ms. Copps: I want to ask the Prime Minister this. Given that his own Minister of Finance is asking Canadians to tighten their belts, will he tighten his belt and abolish a helicopter program that is going to cost every single Canadian taxpayer $400?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that she takes the unemployment figures personally, as she should. Unemployment today is about a full percentage point lower than where it was when she was a member of the outgoing government.

Ms. Copps: You're wrong—

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says that I am wrong. The numbers are there. She can check them.

Ms. Copps: I wasn't in the outgoing government.

Mr. Mulroney: You were a supporter of the outgoing government.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister would like to proceed with the answer.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, Hansard did not note the great pride with which the member for Hamilton East said: "I was not a member of the former Liberal government".

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): But her chief was, Chrétien was.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance will be back in the House very soon, when he concludes his consultations. He will be advising the government and the House of his intentions.

So far the economic program of the government has brought about the kinds of fundamental changes that we want with low inflation and low interest rates and so on.

I think my hon. friend can look forward to an occasion of supporting these kinds of policies at probably an early moment. I know she will rise in her place and say on behalf of the unemployed: "The time has come to lower interest rates; the time has come to get inflation down and I, the member for Hamilton East, am going to vote against spending—"

Mr. Speaker: I think we must move on. The hon. member for Surrey North.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

A study by the C. D. Howe Institute has confirmed yet again that the spending cuts by this government and by the previous Trudeau Liberals have jeopardized the availability of health care services to Canadians and are making national standards for health care meaningless.

Can the Prime Minister indicate when the federal freeze on contributions to provincial health plans will be lifted and when his government will stop fighting the deficit by sabotaging medicare across Canada?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I looked with great interest at the report of the C. D. Howe Institute. It is fundamentally flawed.

One of the points it does not take into consideration is the tax points that are transferred to the provinces, but only the cash changes. If the hon. member understood the system, provinces asked some time ago for tax points as opposed to cash. Had those been taken into consideration, the hon. member would have found that total transfers between 1984–85 to 1993–94 increased by some 60 per cent to the provinces from some $25.6 billion to $40.5 billion in this fiscal year 1993–94.

• (1445)

When both the tax points and the cash transfers are taken into account the hon. member would find that we have not off-loaded to the provinces but have been, due to the fiscal situation, very generous with the provinces.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, federal transfer payments to the provinces for health, higher education and social welfare account for only 20 per cent of the federal budget, yet the cuts to these transfers account for over 40 per cent of the total expenditure cuts.

Why is this government singling out health, education and services to women and children to carry out more than twice the reduction to other programs? Why is medicare being sacrificed for helicopters that we do not need or want?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member is saying is inaccurate. Only the NDP would say that an average increase of transfers to the province of 5.2 per cent per year over the last nine years was a cut. I do not understand that mathematics and I do not think Canadian people do as well.

TRADE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The Prime Minister told a U.S. television audience that the environmental parallel accord under NAFTA has: "Very little if anything to do with Canada"; it is not important to us. The Americans, however, say that they will pull out of NAFTA unless they get what they want on the environment.

Will the minister take a tough stand similar to that of the Americans on this issue at the negotiations and demand environmental protection for both the Canadian environment and Canadian workers who will lose their jobs because of this deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend had been in the House yesterday he would have heard the Prime Minister refute that statement and elaborate on exactly what was said. If he would read Hansard from yesterday he would see that.

Let me make it very clear that we believe the NAFTA as it stands is in the interest of Canada. In addition we have the two side agreements on the environment and on labour which is consistent with the agenda we have been following since February of last year when we proposed similar side agreements.

The outgoing administration did not want to pursue those side agreements. The incoming administration does. We are prepared to sit down with them and negotiate them together with the Mexicans.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, this government is putting at risk the jobs of Canadian workers and the livelihoods of Canadian farmers because it will not deal with these issues.

The government refuses to negotiate a set of subsidy and anti-dumping rules as promised under the free trade deal. Why will Canada not demand a parallel accord on subsidies and anti-dumping which will give Canadian workers the tools they need to compete in a North American market?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I wish my hon. friend would elaborate on why he said we are putting at risk the livelihood of Canadian farmers. He comes from a farm community. If he asked the farmers in that community they would tell him that the supply managed sectors are specifically exempted from the NAFTA.

An hon. member: You're selling them out.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend has to have a comeback on everything. He will not face the facts of the agreement because he knows the facts support what I have just said.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. On the very day the government introduced conflict of interest legislation I want to ask him about the sale of properties at the airport in Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu.

There are serious allegations that the properties were not sold by public tender, that the land was not even offered to the previous owners, and that the land was sold to a supporter and friend of the Conservative Party for a fraction of what it was worth.

What will the minister do to restore the integrity of tendering process of this government?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I want to tell my colleague opposite for whom I have a lot of respect that perhaps he should not be jumping to too many conclusions too fast.

The newspaper report from which I believe he is quoting is somewhat misleading. In fact it mixes up to some extent two separate parcels of property at the Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu airport. This property was expropriated in 1963 for runway extension at the time. When it was not proceeded with it was decided in 1988 to sell a portion of the property on the western end. It was in fact sold and the remaining portion at the other end of the runway was recently cleared for disposal by Transport Canada, late last year.

• (1450)

I know my colleague will have a supplementary question so I will respond to that.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I know very well what the minister is saying, but he has not at all addressed the issue about the properties that were disposed of without public tender.

[Translation]

How can the minister justify not giving the neighbouring owners who wanted to buy back their former land the opportunity to do so? How can he justify going beyond the whole public tendering process and selling to an individual without informing the public? How can he justify that?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to my colleague on this part of his question as well.

In this particular instance I wrote to a solicitor almost two years ago for one of the people who felt aggrieved because she was a previous owner of part of the property. I said at that time to the solicitor, Marco Gaggino of Stikeman, Elliott, that at the time the federal government decided to negotiate directly with Carrière Bernier Limitée because of circumstances.

I will read the letter exactly: "Because of existing circumstances that company had expressed an interest in buying these properties and it was according to us a realistic buyer because he owned most of the north and south of the federal property. On reflection", and I repeat this to my colleague, "the department should have proceeded with a public tender call which is my intention with the other parcel of land".

I agree with him that in this case there was a departure from good public policy, and I apologize for that.

HIBERNIA

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Prime Minister.

MIL Davie has released a shameful letter from the former minister of energy which indicates that he went cap in hand to the Hibernia consortium begging for Canadian participation in the construction of the supermodules, the contract for which ultimately went to Italy and South Korea. With a 25 per cent tariff forgiveness in hand they told him to forget about it.

Does this not indicate that in fact the government did diddley-squat to ensure that the $3 billion spent on Hibernia would provide the long-term value added benefits to Canadian shipyards that were in fact promised by this government when Hibernia was raised in this House?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I must mention to my colleague on the other side that the contract was made over a year ago by the Hibernia management division. The decision to review was made by the owners at the highest level. The government has no legal or contractual means by which to force the owners to allow Canadian companies to bid.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is very simple. With Canadian taxpayers paying $3 billion for this we would expect long-term industrial benefits.

Why would he consider that anything but the most utter incompetence when those benefits are not coming to Canadians?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, before my colleague blows a gasket maybe he should understand that 80 per cent of the products, to the tune of $800 million, were purchased in Canada so far employing Canadians and giving Canadian firms the opportunity with regard to the purchase of materials.

I think the hon. member is off beat with what he is trying to say.

VIOLENCE

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of revenue or the minister acting on his behalf.

I do know that the government is looking at how to stop killer cards and related board games from entering Canada. However I do not feel it is moving fast enough.

I cannot help but think of that horrific murder in Liverpool where two ten-year olds abducted and murdered a two-year old child. It would seem that board games that have as a goal the collection of dead babies treat such anti-social behaviour as socially acceptable. Well, it is not. My constituents and I want to know what progress has been made to block the entry into Canada of these horrid games.

• (1455)

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of revenue who is out of the country on important business, I assure my colleague that according to my information all customs officers have been put on full alert. These games are being interdicted as they come to the attention of the department.

The Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Justice are fully apprised of the problem. They are taking immediate steps to try to correct it in accordance with every means available to them.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

My question is for the Minister of State for the Environment. Despite strong objections from northern residents the Department of the Environment has recently approved a permit for Panarctic Oils to dump as much as 400 tonnes of scrap metal into the Arctic Ocean.

The people of the north are sick and tired of northern lands and waters being used as dumping grounds for other people's garbage.

Will the minister tell the House why her department has approved the use of the Arctic Ocean as a garbage dump and why Panarctic was not asked instead to completely remove its garbage from the north?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, like all colleagues I am working very hard to ensure that environmental standards are maintained. Every effort is to ensure that anywhere garbage or refuse is to be brought has to come within our standards.

The particular situation my hon. colleague refers to obviously must be addressed. I will provide further information to him on it.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, this proposed dumping is simply not acceptable to the people of the north who live in this area and who depend on the resources of the ocean for their food. Will the minister agree today to put an immediate stop to this proposed dumping?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the details of that particular situation. I will certainly take it under advisement and get back to the hon. member.

MINING

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): My question is for the Minister of Labour.

The strike at Giant Yellowknife mine is in its ninth month. Nine lives have already been lost. It has been the most divisive, destructive labour dispute in Canadian labour history.

The minister responsible has not exercised his jurisdiction to the fullest on this matter. What contingency plans does he have to deal with the aftermath of the decision of the disputes inquiry?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be most inappropriate for me to answer the question as put by my hon. friend when now in Yellowknife an industry inquiry is under way. The CLRB, the Canadian Labour Relations Board, is there. To ask me now what I will do when the decision is made is totally inappropriate, and I cannot answer that question.

Ms. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the minister. What is inappropriate is his not spending as much time in the cold and the snow with the rest of us in Yellowknife as he does basking on the beaches in southern climes.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may wish to put a question. Please put it.

Ms. Blondin-Andrew: Mr. Speaker, the economic and community structures of the city of Yellowknife are falling apart as a result of this strike. Businesses are faltering. Some have even gone under. Families and friendships have been destroyed through the violence.

When will the minister take direct action and set up a contingency plan—it is also inappropriate to be unprepared in the event that this fails—to end this destructive situation? What plans does he have?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the reason I have a tan is probably because I spend a lot of time in the House of Commons with these lights, more than the hon. member does.

The issue raised by my hon. friend is a most serious one and of course the government recognizes it.

• (1500)

I must tell my hon. friend that I met with the parties in this dispute a number of times. I suggested to them that the best way to end this dispute would be for the parties to agree to binding arbitration.

The parties have refused. As a result, we appointed what we felt were the best mediators possible in British Columbia and the Northwest Territories, Mr. Munroe and Mr. Reddy. They met with the parties. They prepared the report. After that was unsuccessful, I then went ahead with the appointment of an industrial inquiry commission which is now sitting. On top of that, there has been an additional request by a new union which has asked to be accredited. The Canadian Labour Relations Board is looking into that.

Therefore, labour department has done everything that is possible. I hope that after the recommendations of the industrial inquiry commission we will get a peaceful resolution of this dispute.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

Over the last 18 months, there has been a great concern among retailers and tourist people in Canada over cross-border shopping. However it would appear that this problem is easing off somewhat.

Could the minister give us the current statistics on this problem? Could he also tell us what his department is doing to further remedy the situation?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my hon. friend that confidence in our economy is up. The Ernst Young report tabled today said 60 per cent of entrepreneurs are optimistic about the future.

StatsCan reports that same day auto travel to the U.S. moderated in December 1992 from the previous month. Auto trips of one or more nights have dropped 6 per cent from month to month. Also, cross-border shopping is down 20 per cent over two years.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE ON BILL C-113

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege concerning the decision by the majority of the committee studying Bill C-113, which includes proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, to expunge the testimony of witnesses who appeared before the committee yesterday.

The censorship of this testimony raises a number of important questions for the functioning of this place on both procedural and substantive grounds.

This is a matter which affects the functioning of this committee but also affects the functioning of all committees of this House. If this decision is allowed to stand it unleashes the spectre of direct censorship of witnesses based on nothing more than the whim of the majority of the committee.

The majority of members on a committee have a number of options in accordance with the rules and traditions of this place. However, they do not have the right to expunge the verbatim reports of the proceedings of the committee.

In Beauchesne's sixth edition citation 106 clearly states:

> Committee reports and the verbatim transcripts of committee hearings are documents published under the authority of the House and are entitled to the same absolute privilege as House documents.

If there is to be censorship of the evidence tendered before a committee of this House, history will have no record of the testimony on which the recommendations of the committee were based.

A member who wishes to dissent from a majority report would have no record of the testimony except for his or her own notes or recollection. How would that member or any other member at some later date be able to cite the testimony of a witness with whom the majority of the committee disagreed and whose testimony was expunged? This is clearly an infringement on the privileges of all members.

Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 827 states that a committee has the power to print a document entitled Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence for each meeting. Citation 827(3) goes on to state that "the evidence is a verbatim record of the debate of the committee".

Beauchesne's sixth edition further discusses what changes are allowed to be made to these verbatim transcripts. Again Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 828, notes:

> Minor corrections can be made to the Evidence by informing the clerk of the committee who causes to have printed an Erratum to the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence.

More importantly it states that:

> Corrections of an important nature can only be made by the adoption of a motion in the committee.

• (1505)

The key point is the use of the word correction. The dictionary definition of the verb correct means to amend, set right or make free of errors. In no way could the word correct used in this context imply the complete expunging of the record of the testimony of a witness. It is my respectful submission that in passing the motion to expunge the testimony of the International Association of the Machinists and Aerospace Workers, the committee exceeded its jurisdiction. This makes the question of privilege a matter for the House and for you, Mr. Speaker.

This is made even clearer by the fact committee and the Chair have other means of dealing with the witnesses who are unruly, defamatory or otherwise disrupt the workings of the committee. Beauchesne's outlines several of these options, none of which were followed in the committee last night. Beauchesne's 6th Edition, Citation 820 (1) notes that:

> The Chairman of the committee is responsible for order and decorum in the committee.

There are a number of ways the committee chair can preserve order, ranging from cautioning the witness to having the witness removed from the committee hearing.

The chairman did not caution the witness during the testimony but allowed the testimony to be given in full. Only after the testimony was placed on the verbatim record was a motion presented to expel the witness and wipe out the testimony unless the witness withdrew certain remarks. The witness refused and was expelled on the verbatim and the verbatim record expunged.

This, too, is clearly beyond the jurisdiction of the committee. Again, Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 820, states that:

> Disobedience to the orders of a committee, provided those orders are within the scope of the committee's authority, is a contempt of the House—

As I have already outlined, those orders were clearly outside the scope of the committee's authority. However, even if it were within the authority of the committee, Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 820 (2) states:

> A committee has no authority to punish one of its members or other persons for an alleged offence committed against it. Only the House can decide that an offence has been committed.

The fact that these steps such as adjournment or cautioning the witness were not taken should indicate that the committee members and the chairman did not find the testimony disruptive, defamatory or otherwise interfering with the work of the committee.

Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 109, clearly states that:

> Witnesses before committees share the same privilege and freedom of speech as Members.

Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 75 states that:

> The privilege of freedom of speech is both the least questioned and most fundamental right of the Member of Parliament on the floor of the House and in committee.

Although I have outlined a number of serious, in fact fatal procedural flaws in the proceedings of the committee last night, the essence of my point of privilege is that the witness before a committee of this House has been effectively silenced by the government majority on that committee. It is vital that you deal with this very serious breach of privilege with the utmost dispatch.

The remedies I seek are as follows. First, the motion to expunge the verbatim record be declared void.

Second, the testimony of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers be restored to the verbatim record of the committee. In the alternative, if the record has already been destroyed that the committee be required to rehear the entire testimony of the witness from that union.

Third, a declaration be issued in the clearest terms possible to all members that the destruction or expunging of a record of a committee is unacceptable, unparliamentary and a breach of our privileges as Members of Parliament.

Fourth, the conduct of certain members of the legislative committee be referred to the appropriate committee of this House for the proper disciplinary action.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce for the Liberal Party, the loyal opposition and then I will recognize the chairman of the committee and the mover of the motion. I think that will be sufficient.

• (1510)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, as a member of this legislative committee, I want to fully support the question of privilege just raised by my colleague from Timmins.

In all my years in Parliament I have never seen such action as was taken by that legislative committee last evening, which I believe to be totally unprecedented. The majority of the members on the committee who represent the government side were so upset by the testimony of the witness—the witness we invited to the committee, the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers—that not only did they vote to expel the witness from the committee, but to totally expunge all the testimony the witness from the union had given up until that time.

One might understand, as in this House, if the witness before the committee had made one statement or phrase that was unacceptable or unparliamentary, which he was asked to retract. But that was not the case. The committee voted to expunge not simply that statement which seemed to offend them, but the entire testimony of the committee as it took place last evening.

I want to fully support this question of privilege raised by my hon. colleague. If we accept that kind of procedure in a committee or in this House, as a matter of fact, where if we simply do not like the tone of debate or what is said we can expunge the entire proceedings, then we end up in a situation which is totally unparliamentary, totally contrary to our democratic procedures.

I think at the very least, Mr. Speaker, you should accept this question of privilege and rule that the testimony must be accepted. If there is one particular phrase in the testimony that is unparliamentary then perhaps that might be deleted from the testimony.

One certainly must accept that the great bulk of the testimony, which included questions and remarks by members of the committee and the chairman as well, should remain for the historical basis of the committee. Many very good, telling points were made by the union, which was a witness before the committee.

There were other requests made by the hon. member in his question of privilege which I think have to be looked at as well. I have never witnessed, in my experience as a committee member, the expulsion of witnesses from a committee because we did not like the tone or substance of what they were saying. I think that is uncalled for as well.

This is a very serious matter and if we allow this sort of precedent to stand in our committees, I think we are going on a long road toward destroying our committee and parliamentary system.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rose in this place on February 26 to explain why I abstained from voting on the two motions on this bill. I implied that it was an honour your office was giving me to chair this committee. A number of people laughed and said I was going to find it was not much of an honour. It has indeed proven to be an interesting experience.

To help in your deliberations, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to give you my recitation of the events of yesterday afternoon as I recall them without my notes in front of me.

To begin with, during the testimony there were a number of references which, in my judgment, I perhaps could have called the individual making the presentation to task on. I chose not to. Had they occurred in this House, the Speaker would have ruled them out of order and called them to point at that time. However, because the witnesses were not members of this House, I allowed a fair degree of latitude in their comments.

They concluded their remarks with one extremely inflammatory and accusatory statement about government members to which a member of the government side of the committee took exception and, on a point of order, asked to have it withdrawn. At that point I asked the witnesses if they would be good enough to withdraw their remark so we could carry on with questioning. They refused.

Subsequently, the government members indicated they were going to introduce a motion asking for all the testimony to be struck if they did not withdraw the testimony. At that point I again asked if they would not please remove the offending remarks so we could carry on with the questioning. Again they refused.

At that point the government members gave me the written motion insisting that the testimony be struck from the record and we adjourn the committee. The hon. member who brought up the point of order then offered an intervention and also asked the witnesses to withdraw the remarks so we could carrying on with questioning. They refused. The Liberal member in response to the motion in the committee made a very eloquent intervention. He too asked if they would not withdraw the remark. They refused.

At that point we then read the motion as presented by the government members. For a third time I asked the individual witness if he would not please remove his remark. He looked at me and said to call the question. I put the question and the motion carried. At that point the committee asked the witnesses to leave and adjourn the hearing until the next witnesses showed up half an hour later.

To the best of my knowledge that is an accurate summary of the events of yesterday afternoon. I hope that helps in your deliberations, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I too want to want to speak on this question of privilege.

I believe that the privileges of the House and the privileges of all members of this House were being protected when I put that motion yesterday in committee.

In fact, the recollection the chairman of the committee has presented today is very close to the recollection I have. The only addition I would make is that the Liberal member who indicated he had never seen such action did not in fact see it last night either.

The fact of the matter is that this committee has been functioning under the Standing Orders and under Standing Order 116 which states:

> In a standing, special or legislative committee, the Standing Orders shall apply so far as may be applicable.

I refer to Standing Order 117 which says:

> The Chairman of a standing, special or legislative committee shall maintain order in the committee, deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the committee;

In fact there was a motion put. That motion was put to protect the interests of all members of Parliament. I would refer to Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 33 under "Privileges of the House" which states:

> The most fundamental privilege of the House as a whole is to establish rules of procedure for itself and to enforce them.

Citation 34 says:

> The power of the House to enforce its rules extends not only to Members and others admitted within the precincts of Parliament, but also to members of the general public who may interfere with the orderly conduct of parliamentary business.

I would suggest that is exactly what happened yesterday with the witness who appeared before the committee.

I refer as well to citation 77 of Beauchesne's relating to freedom of speech because the member, as the chairman of the committee has pointed out, made some rather inflammatory comments about members of Parliament. Citation 77 clearly states:

> Freedom of speech does not mean that Members have an unlimited or unrestrained right to speak on every issue. The rules of the House impose limits on the participation of Members—

Having asked that member to limit his comments, he so refused on numerous occasions including requests that I extended. If it goes any further than that, extensions of privileges within committees is dealt with on page 27 of Beauchesne's sixth edition. Citation 106 states:

> Many of the privileges of the House extend also to its committees. They may exclude the public from their meetings and commonly do so, particularly while considering their reports to the House.

I suggest that although we were not considering a report to the House, we had every right by that section to exclude the evidence and the witness who had presented.

I also refer to citation 107 which states:

> Breaches of privilege in committee may be dealt with only by the House itself on report from the committee.

I note you have not as yet received a report from our committee. Further, concerning witnesses citation section 109 states:

> Witnesses before committees share the same privilege of freedom of speech as Members.

On more than one occasion in this House the Speaker has risen to challenge the words, the insults and the accusations thrown by one member of Parliament against another and has immediately demanded a retraction.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest you will find that is exactly what I did because in the concluding comments of the witness who appeared before us that member cast an aspersion on all members of this House. I immediately raised a point of order asking the member to withdraw. He refused on more than one occasion as has been clearly indicated by the chairman. I think the steps we took were most appropriate. We defended the privileges of all members of this House.

• (1520)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member for Kamloops have something else to add to the arguments?

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I would not be standing up if I did not, Mr. Speaker. I just want to say that if I felt that all the points had been made adequately I would not have asked for recognition, Mr. Speaker.

I have listened carefully to the words of my hon. friend. I believe that the emphasis of this discussion so far has eliminated or ignored perhaps the most crucial part. That is that the majority of the members of the committee decided they would remove the record of what had been discussed including not only the alleged offensive comments but the entire presentation itself.

We get into extremely dangerous territory when a government majority on a committee or perhaps even in the House of Commons if we want to extend this, on a simple motion can decide that the record of that committee or the record of the House of Commons can be eliminated and what was said will no longer be stated on the record.

Mr. Speaker, this surely has to be one of the critical aspects that you must now consider before you make your judgment. That is because once it was decided, if your judgment were to go this way, Mr. Speaker, that the majority of the committee could simply eliminate for all intents and purposes all of the transcript of remarks from that committee, where would that lead us in the future? In other words, whenever there were critical comments being made of course the majority of them would have a clear indication of what option may be available to them.

I just simply wanted to emphasize that there are two aspects to this. One is that yes, we can expel witnesses, but whether or not we can eliminate the record is another question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think the Chair has had enough testimony from all members. I particularly want to thank the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, the hon. member for Red Deer and the hon. member for Ontario.

I will take this under advisement and will come back with a ruling on it.

Mr. Samson: I just want to correct the record, Mr. Speaker.

The member for Red Deer indicated that I encouraged the withdrawal of the comment that was made by the witnesses. Just for the record I want to clarify that I was not asking them to because I felt that in the theme of freedom of speech they had the right to express themselves and if we cannot take the heat—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will take that into consideration also.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I was prepared to let this go because the arguments have been made. However, as I understand the facts, some outrageous, slanderous and libellous comments were made and they were withdrawn and withdrawal was asked for. If any member in this House refused to withdraw those remarks they would be turfed out as has happened before.

I find it offensive that the hon. member should defend such actions by some witnesses before—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I said I will be taking this under advisement.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, it being Thursday I would like to ask the House business question to the hon. government House leader. Could he tell us what will be the business for the rest of this week and for next week?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we will do second reading of Bill C-103, the Land Titles Repeal Act, after which we hope to complete second reading of Bill C-72, an act to establish a national round table on the environment. Tomorrow we hope to complete second reading of Bill C-112, the Excise Tax Act as well as second reading of Bill C-102, the Customs Tariff Act.

Monday will likely be an opposition day. On Tuesday we hope to complete report stage and third reading of Bill C-95, the Farm Credit Corporation Act as well as second reading of Bill S-17, the intellectual property act.

I will of course carry on discussions with House leaders of the opposition parties in terms of business for the remainder of next week.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we had some understanding and were expecting a budget to be introduced perhaps later this month or early in April or perhaps an economic statement.

Can the government House leader give some clarification? Are we still anticipating that there will be at least an economic statement made either at the end of this month or sometime in mid-April?

• (1525)

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, my recollection is most of Question Period was spent answering that question and I think the answers are on the record.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

LAND TITLES REPEAL ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-103, an act to provide for the repeal of the Land Titles Act and to amend other acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak on behalf of the government to Bill C-103, the repeal of the Land Titles Act.

This morning I was very pleased to see Bill C-104 which deals with the situation in Saskatchewan move ahead after some very good consideration and certainly agreement among members of this House.

I will speak briefly as I expect other members will. I want merely to explain what Bill C-103, the repeal of the Land Titles Act in fact does.

First it should be recognized that the whole question of land titles and registration is a provincial responsibility. This legislation transfers to the territorial governments that same responsibility in accordance with the government's policies of devolution. I do not think there would be anybody in this House who would disagree with the principles of devolution. I am sure the territorial governments and legislatures have the responsibility comparable to the provinces in a number of these areas.

This transfer will have no effect on land claims. What we are merely doing is ensuring there is a system in place for the registering of title and other interests, such as easements.

There is however some minor effect on other pieces of legislation, for instance the Navigable Waters Protection Act and certainly the Northwest Territories Act, the Yukon Act and the Territorial Lands Act. Both cases are mechanical amendments and involve for instance the depositing of plans and clarifying authority in some cases.

Obviously there would be some concern about the implementation of transferring responsibility from the federal government to the territorial government. That happens in all cases and there is no doubt that those questions might arise. However, it is important to recognize that Bill C-103 provides some protection for the federal interest and therefore for those who deal in this system.

First of all it has been agreed that the territorial legislation which we have put in place will be based on the Torrens system. Territorial legislation will provide that the new system will be similar to the current system and that is a logical progression.

Further it will provide the title can be issued to the Crown for the registration of statutory easements. It will prohibit the registration of caveats against unpatented Crown land.

A question which I am sure will also arise is that of the financial implications and there are some. They are not particularly substantial.

One will provide for an assurance fund that will guarantee the accuracy of documents in the registry that will be transferred to the two territorial governments. That is particularly important for anybody who is going to depend on the accuracy of those documents. That involves about $900,000 to the government in Yellowknife and about $760,000 to the government in Whitehorse. Any revenue that is generated from this system will be deducted from the transfers. However, the funds from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development A base that are now used to support these operations will be added to the territorial government's revenue base. It is about $21,000 for the Northwest Territories and about $10,000 for the Yukon.

It is important to note that both territories have prepared the appropriate legislation that will come into effect once this legislation is enacted or this federal legislation is replaced by an order of the Governor in Council. Certainly every effort is being made to ensure a smooth transfer, which I think one would expect, which will come from the co-operation of both levels of government.

One of the questions that many will ask is what has been the nature of the consultation. That is a legitimate question. The Government of the Northwest Territories, because territorial governments have been responsible for consultation, have canvassed twice by letter the Inuit, Dene and Métis. Concerns have been raised by one band and the officials of the territorial government have been advised of those concerns. There was a meeting held with the Inuvialuit. That discussion focused mainly on the assurance fund and making sure that the fund was maintained.

In the Yukon, the federal territorial and CYI group met twice to discuss the issue of land titles. The issues have been resolved. There was some discussion about separate systems and I think there is now an agreement on the best way to proceed.

It is important to reiterate that the transfer will not affect land claims. It simply is an administrative system to record land titles similar to those operating in the province. By agreement the system will be similar to the one that is in place now. A system that in its transfer and therefore its adaptation will take into account the necessity for a smooth change in style and a smooth change in system.

I should also point out, Mr. Speaker, that I think you will find in this House consent to amend the motion for second reading on Bill C-103, the proposed Land Titles Repeal Act, to refer the bill to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope rather than the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity today to speak on Bill C-103, an act to provide for the repeal of the Land Titles Act and to amend other acts in relation thereto. This bill's short title is the Land Titles Repeal Act.

Bill C-103 will repeal the existing federal Land Titles Act which was originally passed in 1894. The original act has been amended from time to time and most recently in 1991 as part of the Federal Real Property Act.

The federal Land Titles Act provides a legal and administrative framework under which all land owners in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon may register their interests in land. The act is strictly a system of registration and thus does not grant any powers to administer land.

Both territorial governments have been administering provisions of this act on behalf of the federal government for the past several years. The Government of the Northwest Territories assumed administrative responsibility for the NWT land titles office in 1967 and the Yukon assumed this responsibility in 1975.

In 1986 both territorial governments formally asked the federal government to transfer the legislative responsibility for land titles to them. They subsequently passed their own land titles legislation which will replace the federal Land Titles Act in their respective territories. Their legislation, however, cannot come into force until the federal government formally transfers its responsibility in the field of land titles registration in the territories. Bill C-103 is enabling legislation. It will repeal the federal Land Titles Act and transfer the legislative responsibility for land titles registration in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon to the two territorial governments.

It will allow the territorial government's own land titles legislation to come into force. The territorial governments, after passage of this bill, will gain legislative authority for powers they are exercising now as an administrative delegation from the federal government.

Bill C-103 makes consequential amendments to other federal legislation such as the Navigable Waters Protection Act, the Northwest Territories Act, the Yukon Act and the Territorial Lands Act. Through this bill the federal cabinet will receive specific authority to transfer federal public lands in the territories to the commissioners. This bill also authorizes the retransfer by the commissioners to the federal government of lands administered by the commissioners.

The government has included this matter in Bill C-103 to clarify the authority of the federal cabinet to transfer lands to the commissioners and to clarify the authority for the retransfer of lands to the federal government by the commissioners. Apparently federal ministers, including the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, now lack specific statutory authority to recommend to cabinet the transfer of land under a minister's administration to a commissioner. The commissioners' authority to retransfer lands to Canada also lacks a specific statutory authority. Through Bill C-103 the Northwest Territories Act and the Yukon Act will be amended to provide these specific authorities.

Land issues are extremely sensitive and emotional issues in the north. I could easily get into a lengthy debate about who has the right to claim title to the lands in the north where aboriginal land rights have not been dealt with. I have expressed my views on aboriginal title and land rights on many previous occasions, both within and outside this House, and I am sure there will be further opportunities. For the moment, however, I will restrict myself to the more narrow focus of this bill.

The government says this bill is only devolving to the territories a power which they are already administering on behalf of the federal government, namely, the power to register land titles. This transfer of federal responsibility is a natural one in the sense that land titles registration is a provincial responsibility in the rest of Canada. I want to make it clear that we on this side of the House support the principle of northerners having more control over matters that affect them. The federal policy of devolution of powers was, after all, begun by the Liberal government.

We also want to examine this bill closely to ensure that it does not negatively affect the rights of aboriginal people in the territories.

The minister has said that the settlement of land claims in the territories is unaffected by this bill because the authority for the administration of Crown lands remains the responsibility of the federal government. The minister has also stated that northern aboriginal residents have been consulted about the transfer and that the federal government is satisfied this transfer of powers will not impede the land claim settlement process.

I am sure the minister understands that we have an obligation to Parliament and to the people of the north to assure ourselves that this is in fact the case.

We have therefore sought the views of northern governments, aboriginal organizations and other interested parties. Both the Yukon and NWT governments have expressed support for this bill and have further expressed a desire to have it passed in the current session. The response of the aboriginal organizations we have contacted, however, has not been as clear. Some concerns have been expressed which require further clarification.

It may well be that satisfactory assurances can be provided in short order, but to ensure that this bill receives the attention it deserves and is well understood by all affected parties, we believe it merits some time in committee.

• (1540)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words at second reading of Bill C–103, an act to provide for repeal of the Land Titles Act and to amend other acts in relation thereto.

At this stage we are discussing the principles of the bill and the major objectives we hope to accomplish by its passage. The main objectives that are being presented here are threefold. One would be repeal of the federal Land Titles Act which will be replaced by territorial legislation and make consequential amendments to existing federal legislation in relation thereto.

My hon. friend who has just spoken indicated that all actions which will give more control of the north to northerners is something we want to encourage and support.

Also, an objective would be to provide for the transfer of legislative responsibility for land titles registration in the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory to the respective territorial governments which will provide legislative authority for what they are currently administering. This by and large is an updating of a process that has been under way now for some time. This seems to be the appropriate conclusion of that process.

As well, I should indicate that another objective would be to specifically authorize the transfer of public lands in the territories to the commissioners by the Governor in Council and that the retransfer by the commissioners to Canada of lands administered by the commissioners as well.

For background, I simply want to say that the Land Titles Act, originally passed in 1894, almost 100 years ago and amended from time to time, is a federal statute applicable to both the Yukon and Northwest Territories and provides a fundamental legal and administrative system under which all land owners may register their interest in the land.

In 1986 the territorial governments requested in a formal way the transfer of the legislative responsibility for land titles to enable them to update the legislation affecting their respective jurisdictions. Certain paragraphs of the Yukon Act and Northwest Territories Act provide for the authority for the commissioners in council to make ordinances for property and civil rights and generally all matters of merely a local or private nature. The system of land registration is perceived to be a matter of local concern which is obvious to anyone who has examined and studied the north or particularly spent time in the north.

Once the federal government divests its interest in the field of land titles registration, the territorial governments will then assume complete legislative responsibility in this field.

The proposed transfer of legislative jurisdiction of land titles is certainly consistent with the devolution component of the present government's northern political and economic framework policy which was approved by the cabinet, if my memory serves me, back in June 1987. Of course, this would also transfer provincial type programs to northerners consistent with their ability and readiness to absorb new responsibilities. In light of recent developments that is virtually total now. This particular transfer of responsibilities, which was begun some 20 years ago, completes this process.

The authority of the Governor in Council to transfer lands to the commissioners and the authority of the retransfer of lands to Canada by the commissioners requires some clarification. This issue arises from the lack of any specific statutory authority for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and other ministers to recommend to the Governor in Council a transfer of land under a minister's administration to a commissioner. The commissioner's authority to retransfer lands to Canada lacks unfortunately a similar specific statutory authority. The Northwest Territories Act and the Yukon Act are being amended to provide that specific authority and we want to applaud that particular action.

The Land Titles Act controls the registration of land titles under a Torrens system. The Torrens system as we know is one where each transaction concerning a piece of land is submitted for registration. It is then carefully examined and approved before being recorded against the title of that property. All outstanding interests are up to date as recorded on the certificate of title and certified by the land titles office. The government then guarantees the accuracy of this title as shown on the appropriate record. This is what we refer to as the Torrens system.

The act is simply a system of registration and does not grant any powers to administer lands. Land titles are a provincial responsibility in the rest of Canada. The administrative responsibilities of the land titles offices in both Yellowknife and Whitehorse were assumed by the territorial governments back in 1967 and 1975 respectively.

I simply want to say we will support the passage of Bill C-103 at second reading because we certainly agree enthusiastically with the principle of this bill. However, I do feel it would be inappropriate if I did not mention a serious concern we have. Hopefully, we can have this clarified before this goes to committee.

In our discussions with the principals involved, we believe not enough attention was paid during the consultation process. I think my hon. friend referred to this in his comments as well. The department claims that consultations were conducted and various groups chose not to respond. It nevertheless feels the matter has been satisfied to its purposes while I think my view would be quite different.

What prompted that view was the receipt of a copy of a letter from the Yellowknife Dene band which pointed out it was informed through a news release of this very important gesture. Now whether that is true or not, and I understand there is some question whether it is, I think the important thing is that there are groups of people in the north who have not been adequately apprised of this. Perhaps there were opportunities in the past. I understand many years ago when this was first noted they had a chance to respond. But the reality of this world is that a simple letter going out three or four years ago may not have elicited the appropriate response for something we are dealing with today.

We all recognize that some further consultation and discussion is now required. I urge the government to do this prior to any serious deliberations in committee so we can have adequate input from all stakeholders in this particular decision.

I think that indicates our intent to support this bill at second reading. Again, any initiative that would empower northerners to take control their future through decision-making is appropriate and should be encouraged. But we do have this particular concern in terms of the major stakeholders at this point not being adequately consulted. They should be consulted either before or certainly during the committee process.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I put the question, I believe the hon. member for St. John's East said the bill would be referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

Could I call upon the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, anything to help you along here.

I suggested that I thought you might find consent in the House to refer it to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope instead of referring it to a legislative committee based on the department. That consent has been sought and I think received. That was merely the intent of my comments.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say there have been adequate consultations in this case, the suggestion is an excellent one and we will certainly support it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

Government Orders

NATIONAL ROUND TABLE ON THE ENVIRONMENT AND THE ECONOMY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gerry Weiner (for the Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C-72, an act to establish the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

• (1550)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure once again to have an opportunity to debate Bill C-72, an act to establish the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy.

I simply want to say we have waited some time for this opportunity and I am pleased it is happening today. I think this is an excellent initiative. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the round table has essentially been constituted and this will really give it the formal acknowledgement and recognition it so justly deserves.

I know there are others who wish to share their comments on this so I will keep my comments extremely brief.

We have some concerns in terms of this particular bill. It may give the impression that the government is very serious in terms of dealing with some significant environmental issues confronting the country. I think it may be that, but we hope it is much more. We hope it can set the stage for a much greater set of initiatives in the future. When we look around Canada today and consider the commitment, or lack of commitment to environmental assessments on some of the critical major resource projects in the country, we wonder just how serious the government is.

At this point I want to say we support Bill C-72 with some enthusiasm. I look forward to the discussions that will occur later once this gets to committee.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I will not be quite so brief. We have a number of things to say concerning the bill. However we reiterate our general support for the bill and in particular our support for the work of the round table.

At the same time we must express some concerns, which we will be raising in committee, about the independence of the round table now that it is to be established in legislation. We have seen a number of situations where other independent bodies that were set up to provide independent advice to Canadians, government and Parliament were jeopardized in their independence. In some cases they were in fact eliminated when the government was not entirely happy to have the advice it was getting from such bodies as the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council of Canada and numerous others that we have debated in this House at length.

As I said, I do want to pay tribute to the round table for some of the excellent work that has been done. It has played a co-ordinating role with respect to the provincial round tables to ensure the bringing together across Canada of environmental, business and labour organizations and numerous interests in Canadian society, to address this all-encompassing and urgent issue of sustainable development. This work of the round table has been extremely valuable and has laid a good foundation for its future work.

It has produced some excellent reports and is in the process of producing more. The report that was done on the road to Brazil concerning the earth summit and Canada's role with respect to the earth summit was significant in the contribution that private organizations, government and parliamentarians were able to make at the earth summit.

I note as well its significant work on greening agriculture and keeping an eye on trade developments as they affect the environment and our objectives of sustainable development. There has been ongoing work on trade, the environment and competitiveness and I think one of their more recent reports was on the tax aspects of ecologically sensitive lands.

Globally, it is looking at opportunities for government action to require and impose protection of the environment. At the same time it is looking at those things in the system that can actually punish people who do what we really want them to do.

• (1555)

The role of the round table is fundamental to changes we need to make in how we function as a society and a government. We must ensure we have the resources for a sustainable future so we can enjoy prosperity and preserve the very fragile ecosystem upon which we depend for life.

To do that, it is not enough for governments to act. It requires the full participation of all citizens of all interests in Canadian society. In a sense, that is the process the round table has begun and will continue. We see a great need to bring together the many different forces at work to try to implement what we have recently started to understand, that how we operate as human beings in this world, especially when it comes to economic activity, is devastating our very ability to survive on this earth.

We have a number of different actors in the field and there is going to be a very important need in the next short while to ensure that all those forces are working together toward the same objective.

We came away from Rio knowing that transparency, doing things openly, publicly and with the participation of all sectors of our communities is essential to solving some very fundamental problems. I believe one of the challenges facing the round table is how to bring the public into the dialogue. How do we ensure that the very valuable work it has done and continues to do gets the kind of public dissemination that leads to real action at all levels?

At the same time we must ensure that the process is participatory. The public should be involved in the dialogue as issues are addressed. It should not merely be presented with recommendations as to what needs to be done and then expected to come on board. What is needed above all is political will on all sides of this House, at all levels of government and in all areas of human activity. There is no pure environmental issue anymore. On the other side of that statement, there is no issue that is not environmental.

I want to review a few of the issues that have become urgent with respect to the environment and to perhaps demonstrate how far short we are of where we need to be. I want to deal with some specific areas of public policy that I feel have been inadequately addressed.

Public policy must be consistent with the mandate being given to the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy and the tremendous job it and all other organizations in Canada have ahead of them to start truly protecting this world for our children and our grandchildren.

Let me talk about the green plan. This is a good example where words are not enough. The green plan was tabled with great fanfare and great expectation in 1990. Since then we have seen a pretty steady whittling away of the commitment to the green plan. We saw almost immediately a budget that was supposed to be $3 billion over five years transformed into a $3 billion budget over six years. That translated into better than a 20 per cent cut in the very first year of the green plan. There were cuts in last year's budget and we saw further reductions. The same thing happened again this year.

• (1600)

What initially was supposed to be an expenditure of over $550 million in this year on the green plan was reduced to $415 million and then further reduced to less than $400 million. In each of the years since the green plan was tabled the resources to actually implement it have been steadily reduced.

The other fundamental thing that we have come to understand about protecting our environment is that it is a very complex issue that goes to the very heart of how we relate to other peoples of the globe.

We know now that environmental degradation will come from growing population, growing demands for prosperity around the world, growing demands for energy. We know that poverty is the greatest destroyer of the environment as people destroy their soil, destroy their forests simply in an attempt to survive.

What that means for countries like Canada with all the resources and with all the wealth we have, is that if we are sincere about saving this globe for future generations then we need to be sincere about saving the people of today from poverty, starvation, rampant disease, unclean water, not just in our own country but around the world.

That is why it is tragic the direction that is now being taken with funding for development aid and withdrawing hundreds of millions of dollars from what we provide to help the poorest of the poor in the world. This has been Canada's policy on development aid for well over a decade now. To start taking money away is undermining all that we are asking the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy to do. To take money from those who are hungry and give to those who can spend where it will most benefit our trade is nothing short of immoral.

We know that just small amounts of money, well spent on basic health care, on the education of women, will do more to save our environment than building megaprojects, whether it is dams or huge energy facilities. Yet we seem to have trouble learning that very basic lesson, that a small amount of money spent on human development is the most important thing we can do for our world. So we see a shift of money away from those in the world who most need it to where it is going to help us trade better and make more profits.

At home we have not even addressed how we are going to cut our own energy use. We keep taking money out of energy conservation and alternative energy sources and putting it into megaprojects for energy production, encouraging us to be more consumptive and more wasteful. This is exactly the opposite direction to what would be indicated by the kind of work, the kind of onerous responsibility we are asking the national round table to take on and which it has been taking on.

• (1605)

We have not addressed the issues of how our trade affects poverty around the world and the pressures on the environment resulting from that poverty. It is shameful that in 1993 the richest countries of this world take from the poorest $50 billion a year more than we put into them and now we who consider ourselves one of the most progressive nations of the world have just said we are going to put even less into those poorest countries. We are profiting from their poverty and our earth, our air, and our water are the victims of that profit.

We have seen government refusing to take its responsibility and play a leadership role by even looking at its own operations and ensuring we are conducting the business of government in the most environmentally sound way possible. We have ignored our own legislation on environmental assessment to the destruction of the environment and of our own aboriginal people.

We are continuing a world where 20 per cent of the population consumes 80 per cent of its wealth and resources. If we are serious about the job we are now formally and legally giving the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy, we have to look first to ourselves in this Chamber, to those who are in the cabinet room, to heed the lessons and the wisdom that have already come from the round table and to act in ways that are supportive of their mandate, not destructive.

The round table has played a crucial role in bringing many different forces together in creating a focus and a force for change that must keep growing if we are to leave the next generation a world that is even habitable, much less prosperous.

We look forward to supporting this bill, seeing it go to committee and discussing the legislation in particular in committee.

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to rise today in support of an action that is in the interest of all Canadians, and that is Bill C–72, an act to establish the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy.

Canada has a very distinguished history in environmental leadership dating back to early in this century. We are a protector of great natural resources. It has been of interest to Canadians and the establishment of the Commission of Conservation in 1909 was in retrospect a far–sighted action for any government then existing.

In 1972 Canadians supported and played a leadership role in the ground–breaking Stockholm Conference on Human Environment. Then in the 1980s, Canadians led the way in building international consensus and preparing the original world conservation strategy and its recent successor Caring for the Earth.

A few years ago in this Chamber, I think it was in 1987, we had an opportunity to debate at some length the World Commission on Environment and Development. This was a United Nation's report, commonly called the Brundtland commission or Our Common Future. The commission was put forward by the United Nations, chaired by the then Prime Minister of Norway, Madam Gro Brundtland. We had two Canadian representatives. A very distinguished Canadian, Jim McNeill, was the secretary of the Brundtland commission. In the report it had a recommendation that there would be round tables where people from different parts of the community could come together and discuss issues that were important to the environment.

Canada's National Task Force on the Environment and Economy prepared the earliest and still the most comprehensive national response to the challenges that were presented by the Brundtland commission. It was not all talk. There have been a lot of reports about the environment, but this was a very significant report. In response to the task force each province and territory in Canada and the federal government established round tables to address the pressing issues of sustainable development. This round table involved people from all sectors of our community coming together, sitting down at a table and building a consensus.

There are now dozens of local round tables across the country. Some municipalities have now established round tables. In my own constituency of Scarborough Centre, we have just recently started the process of getting this round table set up by bringing people together. These round tables are established all across the country in municipal and regional areas to discuss the conflict for the common good of bringing people together. These uniquely Canadian round tables have two things in common.

First, unlike previous associations and interest groups, their members have divergent interests and opinions, but a common interest in resolving problems of environment and economy. Second, they have a remarkable record of achievement, based on open discussion and consensus decision-making. While in 1987 it seemed terribly naive to suggest that Canada would launch dozens of new institutional experiments in democracy in response to a United Nations' report, a task force of industrial leaders, the environment minister, and environmentalists from all parties recommended exactly that and that is exactly what happened. Canadians right across the country in every province and the two territories formed an entirely new institution to address the new challenges of this new concept called sustainable development.

This past summer Canada was a very energetic and enthusiastic participant at the unprecedented earth summit held in Rio de Janeiro in June of last year. The delegation from Canada was extensive, made up of members from all the parties in the House of Commons, as well as numerous environmental groups and non-government groups. Many people gathered in Rio de Janeiro to discuss these issues some 20 years after the Stockholm conference. It was truly the largest United Nations conference of any proportions and uniquely it was concerning the environment.

The Minister of the Environment led the delegation for that two-week conference in Brazil. Our Prime Minister was there to give an address on behalf of Canada and to sign two very important conventions, the biodiversity convention and the global warming convention. More important, we were leading the way. As other countries were concerned about signing the biodiversity convention, our own Prime Minister said: "We will be the first to sign this convention". Indeed, the Prime Minister did sign on behalf of Canada, the first nation to sign that biodiversity convention to protect the flora and fauna of the earth.

In this regard the process of setting up a round table was a most important aspect of what we were wanting to do in terms of having organizations and people from all different walks of life come together and have this round table as a meeting of the minds.

I might say in response to my colleague who just spoke concerning Canada's green plan, the United Nations Environment Program chairman, Mr. Tolba, stated at the Brazil conference that Canada's green plan was an example for all nations. It was hailed as the example of what Canadians could do together and as a nation come forth with a green plan. In fact nations that participated in that conference were anxious to find out what the green plan was. They wanted us to tell them about the plan, to give them copies of it.

The $3 billion in funds attached to the commitments of the green plan is a very, very substantial commitment on behalf of all Canadians. This year alone there is a 30 per cent increase in the amount of funds attached to the environment programs, initiatives that take place out of that green plan. As we are pressed in terms of our financial resources, our commitment to the environment has been steadfast in the increase of that amount of money.

At a time in history when all of us need some encouragement about our ability to respond to rapid change, we have an opportunity to build on our tradition of forward-looking institutional adaptation in the interests of improving our environmental and economic quality of life.

The United Nations recently named Canada as the best place in the world in which to live. We are very proud of that and I believe that Canadians are proud. We want to keep it that way, with our social structure, with our opportunities for people to fulfil their lives, our health care, our educational system. All of those items are very important in terms of our quality of life and the United Nations has recognized that.

The purpose of Bill C-72 is to bring people together to help ensure that Canadians working together will keep it the finest place in the world in which to live. It provides a mechanism for leading thinkers and practitioners from many sectors of Canadian society to work together, to build consensus and help set the standards for a sustainable future. We improve this mechanism successfully dealing with the environmental and economic challenges that face us through this particular piece of legislation. I am very pleased that my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood is nodding his head in agreement to this initiative. We are very pleased for the support of the opposition.

Many developing nations are considering the Canadian round table as a model institution to assist them in designing and implementing policies for more environmentally sustainable forms of development. Several states within the United States are taking a careful look at copying our round table model as a means to address some of their most controversial and pressing environmental and economic challenges.

The round table model is the opportunity for participation and consensus building. Let me say that the greatest challenge of sustainable development is to apply more effectively the full range of human intelligence, knowledge and experience to the problems that we will face in the coming decades.

• (1620)

It is critical for us to increase the opportunity for Canadians to participate in the decisions that affect them all. We have had some outstanding members sitting around the Canadian round table for the last few years. Dr. George Connell, the former president of the University of Toronto is the present chairman of the round table.

This piece of legislation gives us the opportunity of putting this institution into legislative form. Sustainable development will require a democratization of decision-making beyond the comfortable status quo.

Compartmentalization of responsibility no longer works. We cannot put everything just in compartments. It is a holistic approach. Cross-sectoral, cross-disciplinary and cross-jurisdictional thinking is a better way to deal with an uncertain future and round tables reflect that reality.

This act will sanction the importance and continuing existence of the national round table. Bill C-72 will validate and encourage the continuing support of the private sector and others for this new form of public involvement.

Passage of Bill C-72 will enable this organization to retain the private sector support so essential to its success. Many sectors of Canadian society and business have made substantial personal commitments and organizational contribution to the work of the national round table.

Now this national round table must have greater autonomy to continue to build partnerships independent of government for the benefit of all Canadians. Providing that independence through Bill C-72 will allow the national round table to maintain its distinctive nature separate from government direction but with the full commitment of government as partner.

By empowering the members of the national round table, government can promote the understanding and trust that leads to a well-considered, honest and direct advice that is grounded in the real world.

The national round table is an important step in the continuing transition to sustainable development in Canada. As an institutional experiment it has a proven track record and has wide international support. Many of the most important groups affecting Canada's environment and economy are involved in support of the work of the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy.

With the consent of the House of Commons, Canadians will look back on this day with pride as the day our nation again took the lead on the long road to a sustainable future.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. minister.

The remarks she made with regard to this legislation and the establishment of the national round table were extremely interesting. I may have been able to make those remarks myself, perhaps with a few more adjectives in them. They could have been made at anytime. Obviously there was some urgency in the creation of the round table.

I have in my hand the "National Round Table Review, Spring 1992". It is almost a year ago that the national round table itself issued this report.

On the front page of the national round table review is a story about the introduction of this legislation. If I might just quote for the hon. minister from the review: "Delivering on a promise made last June"—that would be 1991—"subsequently supported by the Prime Minister, the hon. Minister of the Environment rose in the House of Commons on April 10, 1992 to table for first reading Bill C-72 legislation to make the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy, a permanent independent body charged with the responsibility of acting as a catalyst in identifying, explaining and promoting in all sectors of Canadian society and in all regions of Canada principles and practices of sustainable development".

• (1625)

The important part of what I just read is that the promise was made in June 1991. The legislation was tabled in April 1992. Here we are almost one year later. We have had this legislation on the table. It is important legislation. It has support of most, if not all, members of this House. Why has it taken this government a full year to implement this very important piece of legislation?

Mrs. Browes: When this legislation was tabled in the House of Commons in April of last year, it was after a great deal of consultation with the round table itself as well as with others. It was an important decision to make that we would bring in legislation in order to establish this round table as an entity separate from government and, as I said, in partnership.

We should think back to the sequence of events since April 1992, which is less than a year ago. We have had the Brazil conference which included people from all walks of life. Hundreds and hundreds of Canadians were involved in the preparation of Canada's presentation to the Rio summit. The round table took very much of a lead on the discussions leading up to its preparation.

In the interim the round table has been very active on the issues it has been dealing with. Economic instruments is an area that the round table has taken some considerable interest in. There is the use of economic instruments as it relates to the environment, environmental indicators, whether we have the use of taxes. There is the various economic experiments we could use in order to deal with the environment and whether there is some way that we can use the economy in terms of getting people to do the right thing.

That has all been part of the discussions of the round table. In fact the round table's work has been instrumental in the discussion paper that is presently out in the Canadian community to get information, suggestions and ideas back on the economic indicators in terms of how we do that.

The round table itself has been extremely active all along under the leadership of Dr. George Connell. I have been to a few of the meetings myself. The members are very dedicated Canadian citizens who spend much of their own time discussing these issues, coming together from all walks of life and building a consensus.

It is now time for us to come forth with this legislation in order to institutionalize this round table that has been working so well over the last few years. It has really been an example to the provinces, an example to the municipalities and regions that have also set up round tables.

We can look very favourably on the work that the round table members have done, the direction they have been able to present, not only on the policy side, but also to really institute and instigate some real action. That has been beneficial not only to us in Canada but it has also been an example for the international community.

I wish to thank my colleagues on the other side of the House from both of the opposition parties for their enthusiastic support for this particular piece of legislation that the Minister of the Environment has set forth. We look forward to early passage of this legislation.

• (1630)

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. At the same time as I put this, I also wish to ask if the order of speaking is out of order because I also wish to enter the debate on this bill this afternoon.

I have had the opportunity to review the estimates that were tabled the other day in the House of Commons. While I very much look forward to the operations of the round table, I notice that there is no mention at all of round table expenditures. However I did notice that grants to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon for an Arctic environment strategy were cut by about $2 million in the estimates; about 40 per cent of their budget has been removed.

I noticed that many environmental non-governmental organizations have had their funding cut in the estimates from the Department of the Environment. I noticed that the contributions to the University of Saskatchewan for the Canadian Wildlife Health Centre, particularly the wildlife disease component, have been cut from $380,000 to $200,000. Canadian organizations like the Canadian Environmental Citizenship Program have had their funding cut by more than 50 per cent in these estimates.

When I do not see the round table mentioned in the estimates and I see these other recent cuts to valuable programs that the Department of the Environment has been supporting I wonder if the minister can tell me what the commitment of the government is toward the maintenance of existing programs and how is the national round table going to fit into the expenses of the 1993-94 year?

Mrs. Browes: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should wait until we get this piece of legislation through before expecting to see it showing up as a separate entity in the estimates. The first step is to get this legislation through, which we are hoping to do in very short order.

In terms of some of the selective items the hon. member has mentioned, we need to look at the larger context of what we have been able to do concerning the environment.

The green plan which was set forth in 1991 set forth a plan of some 100 initiatives. It was a very comprehensive plan of 100 initiatives that we wanted to deliver on behalf of Canadians for clean air, clean water and clean soil.

Three billion dollars were set aside for those kinds of initiatives over a seven-year time period. In this year alone, there is a 30 per cent increase in our expenditures and commitments on behalf of all Canadians for our environment. That is a very significant amount of taxpayers' money. We all know how difficult it is, in terms of taxpayers' dollars, to have the best bang for the buck.

In my opinion and in the opinion of our government Canadians want a clean environment. This particular piece of legislation gives the opportunity for Canadians from all walks of life to come together in a consensus-building approach. Canadians themselves will be coming forth with ideas and suggestions in order to reach the sustainable development concept that was developed by the Brundtland commission in Our Common Future.

In 1993 we are being a leader once again, as we were 20 years ago in Stockholm. We played an important role on the Brundtland commission. We were an active participant in the Brazil conference and are now leading the way again with the green plan and with this round table being established as it is in this legislation. This is another commitment resulting from the green plan. It will be truly funded when it is passed in order for Canadians to participate to their fullest.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The period for questions and comments is now over. Before recognizing the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Grants to Municipalities; the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway—External Affairs; the hon. member for Halifax West—Westray Mine Disaster; the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair—Industrial Research Assistance Program; the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Peacekeeping.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am really happy to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-72 because my relationship with the round table is a close one.

I would like to recall my last campaign in which I made a commitment to my constituents concerning the Don River which flows through my riding and is the most polluted river in Canada. It is a chemical cauldron filled with toxic and biological waste flowing into Lake Ontario, which is our drinking water.

The commitment I made was that one of the things I would do is make sure that we brought the awareness level of the problem with the Don River to the forefront among all people in our community. Hopefully by bringing the problem concerning the Don River to public attention we would then get the support of all levels of government—municipal, provincial and federal—to maybe do something about reclaiming the Don River.

One of the things we did to enhance awareness of the problem with the Don River during my first year as an MP was to organize a people's summit on the environment. It was an event that took place at the Ontario Science Centre and over a period of 10 days we hosted close to 42,000 people. There were representatives from over 40 countries and over 100 speakers. The then Minister of the Environment, the member for Lac-Saint-Jean, opened the people's summit. It was just a tremendous event. It was a very successful event. All kinds of Canadian artists performed. John Denver flew in from Colorado to perform at this summit. We had the tremendous support of many corporate sponsors.

One of the individuals who worked with me on that event, a young gentleman who used to be on my staff, Dan Donovan, left my office shortly after the people's summit on the environment and joined the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy. It was because of that close personal relationship that Dan and I have had over the last three years that I became intimately aware of this very special instrument in support of this country's environmental work.

When I talk about the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy today I want to refer to some of the specific work that it has performed. It is an outstanding effort by very few public servants but many individuals from all walks of life and from all parts of the country who have come together, many of whom have donated their time. I think of the chairman, George Connell, and many others on his board.

I just have to read a few of the names of people on the board who come here from all over Canada. They include: Jim MacNeill, who is really the godfather of the environment in this country; Jack MacLeod, from Shell Canada; Geraldine Kenney-Wallace, the president and vice-chancellor of McMaster University; and the previous chairman David Johnston. This round table is really a gathering of one of the finest groups in the country.

What I have always liked about the round table is that it has been able to do joint venture work for all of its promotional and communications activities. It is not a question of getting together just using taxpayers' money. It has in nearly every case used a small amount of taxpayers' money and then it has gone to the private sector to sponsor the various projects it has undertaken.

Some of the work it has put out over this period is just amazing. I wish there was a way we could communicate to all people in Canada the work that has been done and some of the material that is available. Trade, Environment and Competitiveness, edited by John Kirton and Sarah Richardson, is a fantastic piece of work that is very important in terms of linking the environment to the economy, especially trade which is the backbone of our country. Some of the authors it has been able to get to participate in this are great and of course it was sponsored by someone on the outside.

It has an incredible list of publications: The National Waste Reduction Handbook, Preserving our World by the late Warner Troyer, On the Road to Brazil, the Earth Summit, A Manager's Handbook on Sustainable Development, and Decision-making Practices for Sustainable Development. The list goes on and on. There is a Small Business Guide to Environmental Management.

What it has been able to do is so unique. So often in government when a department of government wants to organize a communications policy it tends to basically use its own budget while this particular group, the round table, has always gone out and got joint venture sponsors.

One project that is extremely popular and relevant was a project that happened not too long ago. It was a project launched at the museum of man. I have talked a little bit about its effort in terms of communicating with business but it is also very strong in its ability to communicate with youth. It has developed this video and tape entitled Courage which is available if people write the round table. It is sponsored by Hostess Frito-Lay. It is a song and video written and performed by Molly Johnson and Norman Orenstein of Infidels with special guest star Meryn Cadell. It is an effort through Canadian artists through video to communicate to our youth.

How many departments of government are using these contemporary ideas to communicate public policy? There are not too many and that is another credit to the national round table.

Mr. Speaker, you might think I am trying to take advantage here today but I am not. I have to mention another project it organized. It is with the same company, Hostess Frito-Lay. It has this Environmental Citizenship, Take the Pledge, We did it campaign.

It says that Hostess Frito-Lay is pleased to be working with the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy to promote sustainable development and environmental citizenship in Canada. They have the citizenship pledge: "We will continue to reduce, reuse and recycle. We will be efficient in the use of our energy resources. We will do our part to conserve, protect and nurture the air we breath, the water we drink and the land on which we live", and on and on.

• (1645)

An hon. member: Pass that around.

Mr. Mills: Okay. Can the pages pass these around to my NDP friends?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That would be very nice, but we will not have it here. Outside the curtain.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, it is the entrepreneurial marketing background I have. When I see an agency of government that is using private sector techniques of communicating public policy I get excited. When I think of the millions of packages of Hostess Frito Lay potato chips sending out the message of sustainable development, I know many people in this House might think that would probably be a bit of a gimmick in terms of communicating public policy. I happen to believe it is a good approach. I think it is a good approach that we are using Canadian artists on videos to communicate our message.

Mr. Speaker, obviously you can tell I am in full support of this piece of legislation. In one month I find myself supporting the government on the Small Businesses Loans Act and now on an issue related to the environment. I am getting nervous here. I have agreed with the government on two bills in the last three weeks.

At any rate, the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy's approach to joint venturing many of its projects and getting private sector support is a very good one. It is a technique that we in government should adopt as we are forced, because of fiscal constraints, to be much more accountable and responsible with taxpayers' money.

We also know of the work it is doing in trade shows across Canada and in schools. We know of the work it is doing when it goes into businesses across the country. I think it is the kind of initiative we must get behind. We must give this department, which will be an agency of government, our full support.

I have declared my relationship with certain members of the round table: Ann Dale, Ron Doering, Dave Baslow and Patti Bacon. These are people who are passionate in their belief and service to the community on this issue. The fact that they are using all these different techniques will go a long way toward exciting and galvanizing the commitment of our country toward this very important and really only issue right now, saving the planet. We have an agency of this government that is going to be committed to using all the contemporary techniques of communication. The members who are sitting at the round table have substantive expertise in helping develop policy for all sectors of the economy with regard to sustainable development. I think it is a great initiative.

Despite the fact the legislation might have been a little late in getting to the House the bottom line is they have been doing all this work as if the legislation had been approved.

We co-operated with the minister responsible for small business last week on the Small Businesses Loans Act. I tried to call that office the other day to get some support in communicating this initiative which is a good one for the government. The department said it had not been approved by the Senate and I should not be out there promoting a piece of policy that has not been approved. I was sick when I heard the response from the officials when they said I could not promote something that had not gone through the Senate when we know the government controls the Senate right now.

• (1650)

Here is an agency of the national government that has been working as if it had legislation for the last year and one-half. It has been doing all these things. I have enough books, chips, videos and tapes here I could probably fill a small library.

It has been doing good work and I am happy to stand up here and support this initiative. I hope it will carry on and I know it will continue to use the same spirit and passion to keep spreading its message. We on this side of the House are only too proud to encourage it to continue.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity today to speak on Bill C-72, the act which will bring us the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy.

The first reading was April 10, 1992 almost a year ago. While the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood indicates the committee has been working since then or even before that, the round table was anxious to see this legislation dealt with by this House some time ago. I am quite disappointed it has taken this long for us to get here.

Canadians and particularly environmentalists are quite confused by the federal government's desire to entrench in legislation the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy. They are confused first because of this government's embarrassing record of trashing advisory councils and bodies, particularly those that might offer creative and accurate criticism of this government's policies and practices. The second reason is this government's track record on the environment.

In March of last year in an astounding display of public paranoia and economic mismanagement, the government did away with 46 government agencies in one way or another. The March budget of last year proposed to axe 21 federal government agencies, boards and advisory bodies and merged, privatized or deferred another 25 agencies.

Winding up government agencies and privatizing have been the big business buzz words of this government's efforts to sell out the Canadian people's future at bargain basement prices. Cuts to jobs and services have led to wounds in our environment, which include our economy. For example the Law Reform Commission was axed, the commission that provided independent advice to the Minister of Justice.

It is interesting to note the Law Reform Commission was axed only two months after issuing a report on aboriginal peoples and criminal justice with which the minister disagreed.

The government also ended the Science Council of Canada just when Canada so desperately needed to improve its research as well as core basic scientific research which has been so devastated by this government and the former Liberal government before it. It will set Canada way behind in the international scene of future innovation and development for years to come.

Curiously, the government also wiped out the Economic Council of Canada which had become increasingly critical of this government. In fact it had suggested some courses of action which might have tread however lightly on the toes of the narrow interests of the big multinationals which fund the Conservative and Liberal Parties at election time.

Now even more curiously this government is moving quickly to entrench in legislation a new advisory body, research and public awareness body so similar in purpose to so many done away with by this government. It did away with them in its blind drive to buy back votes from the right wing Conservatives, cranky with the government and eyeing the ultra right Reform Party as a safer haven for destructive economic and social policy.

Canadians and environmentalists are asking why the government is moving ahead with the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy at this time? Is it because the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy has been unable to function effectively without the legislation? No, Mr. Speaker. Currently there are functioning round tables, not only at the federal level but also in every province and territory in Canada. Only one is enshrined in legislation. That one, by the way, was legislated when the Yukon had a New Democratic Party government. That legislation made sense as it is one of the many steps taken by a tremendously pro environment government which has also passed Canada's first environmental bill of rights.

• (1655)

Again I ask the question, is it because the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy has been unable to function without legislation? No. The National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy has been able to function without legislation. It has produced publications, several of which I have had the opportunity to read and use in my own work. One, the five book series leading up to the Rio conference entitled The National Round Table Series on Sustainable Development was of particular interest. The Round Table's regular newsletters on issues like biodiversity and other joint products have gone ahead unimpeded by the fact the round table was not enshrined in legislation and has played a useful role.

Can it function without legislation? Sadly, the reasons for the government moving ahead with all this are all too clear. The government has placed the environment way down on its agenda and seeks to put on a greener face by passing such bills as this one while reducing its commitment in other areas. The ones with the truly green faces are the environmentalists and Canadians who have turned a sickly shade of green with nausea over this federal government's inability to protect and preserve the environment for future generations. Canadians are still waiting for legislation to drag environmental assessment out of the 19th century.

Bill C–13 where are you? Perhaps the first act of the newly legislated round table might be to send out a search and rescue team to find out where Bill C–13 is, so extensively rewritten by environmentalists and New Democrats during the process that led up to its passage in this House during an excellent session of committee hearings.

Maybe this newly entrenched round table can find this piece of legislation which has gone missing somewhere between justice and environment departments in this government's toxic cabinet. If the round table finds the environmental assessment legislation currently missing in action, perhaps it can put it to use in dealing with the Northumberland link in Prince Edward Island, or in fact even dealing with legislation like the North American Free Trade Agreement.

If it can find Bill C–13 and put it into action maybe it can find another missing treasure too. Maybe the round table can find all the funds committed to the environment in the green plan. All Canadians have seen so far is old money being reshuffled over and over again and given a new coat of paint to appear as if the environment is really being made a priority.

The government knows full well that our air, water, land and wildlife are not only threatened, they are sick and dying. Yet this government's green plan to date has offered more disappointment than hope to the growing number of environmentalists from coast to coast. Maybe this round table can find those funds.

What else could the round table do in its research and advisory capacity as outlined in the section dealing with purpose and powers in clauses 4 and 5 of the bill? Does it truly help the environment beyond calling for an election to defeat this noxious government and its economically and socially toxic effluent it calls its policy. Maybe such a newly entrenched body, in fulfilling its proposed mandate to promote principles and practices of sustainable development in all regions of Canada could advise government to move ahead with a bill of rights on the environment. I would like to go beyond just suggesting what this round table and government might do. I am willing to help as well.

As you know, on June 5, 1991 I introduced a motion in this House to establish an environmental bill of rights to empower Canadians to fight polluters and guarantee all Canadians the right to live in a healthful environment. This bill of rights would finally enable Canadians to sue polluters, allowing us to truly become caring stewards of our own land. Perhaps in fulfilling its mandate outlined in Bill C–72, the round table could use clauses 4(b) undertaking research and gathering information and analysis on critical issues of sustainable development to deal with global warming. Most of this has already been done. We know global warming continues to worsen.

We know that the ozone has deteriorated to the point that the Minister of Environment has warned children not to play in the sun. We know that the government refuses to clamp down on business.

I see that my time is almost up. I would like to say that energy efficiency, recycling, sewage and water, CFC recycling, reinstituting railway use, major clean-up and ecological renewal initiatives should be sound advice which this round table could provide to the government. Perhaps the most green of of solutions could be that the round table would advise that this government, this toxic government, should resign and call an election so that the next government can have—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next time Bill C-72 reaches the Chamber, the hon. member will have 10 minutes remaining in his speech plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business, as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, December 10, 1992 consideration of Bill C-227, an act to amend the Criminal Code (desecration of the flag) as reported (with amendment) from the legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I think you would find consent for the following motion.

That the order now before the House be discharged and that Bill C-227, an act to amend the Criminal Code (desecration of the flag), be referred back to a legislative committee for the purpose of reconsidering clause 1, and that the legislative committee on Bill C-227 be reconstituted for the purpose of this reconsideration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I believe that we normally at this point proceed to the Adjournment Debate of the House. However I am informed that the participants in that debate, while they have been called, have not yet arrived.

I would propose that if Your Honour approves and the House approves that we might consider suspending until those individuals are available.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it so agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I shall suspend the sitting to the call of the Chair, hoping that maybe the parliamentary secretaries and the members who are watching us here in the Chamber will hurry back to the Chamber so that we can perform our duties.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 5.02 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 5.34 p.m.

PROCEEDINGS OF ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pursue a question which I have asked in the House on a number of occasions of the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the tragic plight of two young Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer.

I am sure that members of this House are well aware of the fact that Christine and David were victims of a harsh and quite unfair Brazilian justice system which resulted in sentences of 28 years of imprisonment for each of them.

That would be bad enough but in addition, because of the lack of response of the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs, their injustice at the hands of the Brazilian system has been compounded by the injustice of their own Canadian government.

I am sure that Canadians from coast to coast to coast have rallied to speak out in support of Christine and David in their struggle and I really want to pay tribute to those Canadians and in particular to the families of Christine and David who have waged a tireless and energetic campaign on their behalf.

The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has twice urged the Secretary of State for External Affairs to finally recognize the injustice of the situation and to seek the remedy of expulsion which is provided by the Brazilian constitution. The minister has refused to do so. She wrings her hands and says we are waiting for the transfer of offenders treaty to be ratified. Then she says she is waiting for the appeals to be dealt with and it will be done soon. Meanwhile, we are still waiting for that transfer of offenders treaty. The appeals which were supposed to be heard this week we are now told will be heard some time, maybe next week. The support for Christine and David grows. Meanwhile, the threats to their health and safety are even greater.

I was very pleased to note that recently, just in early January, representatives and leaders of four Canadian churches wrote to the Prime Minister urging that the Prime Minister do the right thing and seek expulsion. The original letter was written by Archbishop Edwin Lackey the day before his sudden death on behalf of Archbishop Marcel Gervais, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Ottawa and the chair of the Catholic Conference of Bishops. It was signed by the Moderator of the United Church of Canada and the Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of Canada as well. They have not even had the courtesy of a reply.

This injustice demands a response from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Brazil has said it does not understand why the Canadian government has not made a request for expulsion. The former minister of justice, a very respected individual, Mr. Harbez Piccarino, recognized the injustices in the case and he has recommended expulsion.

The time that Christine and David have already spent in prison would qualify them for a parole if they were eligible for parole. As foreigners they are not eligible for parole, however. These sentences are cruel and unusual treatment. The original convictions were an appalling injustice.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, who apparently is thinking about seeking the leadership, of becoming Prime Minister of Canada, cannot even act on behalf of two young Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who are entitled to justice. She does not even deserve to be Secretary of State for External Affairs, let alone the Prime Minister of Canada.

I want to again take this opportunity to appeal through you to the government to recognize the injustice of the situation of Christine and David, to heed the unanimous appeal of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and to at last, finally, seek the expulsion of Christine and David from Brazil so they can return home to their loved ones.

These young Canadians are respected individuals. They have no criminal record whatsoever and a terrible injustice has been done. I hope that this government will finally show the leadership it so far has been lacking.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the member for Burnaby—Kingsway, who sits with me on the external affairs committee, for his interest in the case of these two young Canadians outside the country who are detained through a miscarriage of justice.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs set out her views on this case in letters dated August 13 and December 8, 1992 to the chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

• (1740)

It cannot be assumed that if Canada asked for the expulsion of Christine Lamont and David Spencer, it would be granted automatically. While the Brazilian President has the discretionary authority to grant expulsion, it has been emphasized to us that there is a clear distinction between the authority as set out in the Brazilian constitution and the practice according to which the authority is exercised.

We have been told that in principle, expulsion would not be granted while appeals are under way or before the convicted prisoner has served his or her sentence.

We have also been told that the Brazilian government would not agree to expulsion in these circumstances because it would amount to unwarranted interference by the executive branch of government in the affairs of the judiciary and would discriminate against the other defendants who would not be released or expelled.

On many occasion, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has expressed concern over the severity of the sentences received by Miss Lamont and Mr. Spencer. These sentences, and the convictions themselves, are being appealed in the Brazilian courts.

The Canadian embassy in Brasilia has been working actively to ensure that both the appeal of the convictions and the appeal of the sentences move forward as quickly as possible. The Brazilian courts are now in session. The embassy will continue to do all it can to ensure that the appeal process keeps moving expeditiously.

The embassy's efforts to hasten the ratification of the transfer of offenders treaty between Canada and Brazil which was signed last July 15 have also been achieving some success. The treaty would enable Miss Lamont and Mr. Spencer to serve the rest of their sentences in Canadian facilities, where they would be subject to Canadian parole laws. As you know the treaty was approved by the Foreign Relations Committee of the Chamber of Deputies in December and will be considered by the Justice Committee when it reconvenes under a new chairman this month.

The embassy has been assured of support for the treaty both in the justice committee and in the Senate which will consider it following approval in the justice committee.

WESTRAY MINE DISASTER

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, in questioning the Prime Minister on December 1, 1992 I wanted to address some of the concerns that have arisen in Nova Scotia and across Canada with respect to the tragedy in the Westray coal mine in Pictou County, Nova Scotia.

For the record let me express the sympathy shared by all Canadians for the widows, families, and friends of the 26 miners whose lives were ended by the mine explosion that occurred at 5.20 in the morning of May 9, 1992, another tragic day in the bitter history of coal mining in Nova Scotia. These brave men will not be forgotten but their memories will be preserved with those who perished at Springhill, in Cape Breton and elsewhere in mining disasters.

I hope what I will now say will not in any way add to the grief or detract from the hopes for the future of our mining families. Let me begin by stating my concern for and solidarity with these family members and friends who seek a just accounting for the Westray disaster. I am shocked and disturbed by the chain of events that left widows, parents and children asking whether there is any justice for them and the deceased miners.

Even recognizing the needs of people and even realizing that only employment opportunities will satisfy many of these needs, let me say clearly and categorically it is my view that Westray and its parent corporation, Curragh Resources Inc., must be separated totally and completely from government funded mining operations in Pictou County. I can envision no hope whatever that this organization can resolve the problems associated with management of this coal resource and I can see nothing but grief from continuing the involvement of Westray and Curragh.

Let me be very specific. Not one more cent of taxpayers' money, federally or provincially, should be directed to Westray or Curragh. Certainly the $16 million apparently available from insurers should be held for the benefit of the people involved in the mine operation and not the corporate owners. In fact the appropriate government authorities should separate Westray and Curragh from the mine assets and seek recovery of the moneys lost from whatever assets the corporations may have left.

I ask simply: How can a corporate organization cause a taxpayers' loss in the area of $100 million and still claim dominion over a public resource?

Let me state some other points related to the Westray mine disaster that must shock the grieving families and demand public attention.

First, Curragh sought to dispose of the Westray mine in November 1991 according to Maclean's magazine in order to improve its financial position, showing that the corporation had no real commitment to Nova Scotia or its people.

Second, there is mounting evidence that the coal resource cannot be mined economically without real risk to the lives and safety of miners or without further massive government aid that would be better utilized elsewhere.

Third, if there is a determination to mine the coal seam at Plymouth it is clear that the operation should be turned over to an organization with an established record for safety and fair employment practice.

• (1745)

Now let me address what has become the unfortunate politicization of the Westray tragedy. When the explosion occurred the premier of Nova Scotia immediately responded by saying there would be a full and complete public inquiry by way of a royal commission. This action by the premier has proved to be as destructive and demoralizing as the mining tragedy itself. Let me tell the House why.

First, the premier of Nova Scotia must have known that the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act require an immediate investigation of a mine fatality and a report on the apparent cause. Had this statutory process proceeded there would have been a factual and public report that could have been examined and then amplified by subsequent further inquiry.

Second, it is inexcusable that the premier's advisers were not aware of the Supreme Court decision in the Patricia Starr case. This case received national attention and severely restricted public inquiries in circumstances that might produce criminal charges. From the very beginning there was an indication that criminal negligence was involved. The province should have known a broad based inquiry beyond the Coal Mines Regulation Act would be derailed by the courts.

What is left for the grieving families and the public? Over the months an RCMP investigation was announced and charges were laid under provincial safety laws and later stayed. The over-all impression is one of legal incompetency on the part of ministers and officials. Criminal negligence is a simple charge under the Criminal Code involving only proof of legal duty to act carefully and evidence of wanton or reckless disregard for life in performing the duty.

Here are my recommendations: Get rid of Westray-Curragh, make the case for criminal negligence, find another mine operator. Let me add this. The royal commission, whatever its good intentions, will add nothing to solace the widows and families of the deceased miners and it will not benefit those who follow them.

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Halifax West for his question. I would like to commend him for his interest in this issue.

The federal government provided assistance to Westray principally in the form of loan insurance as well as an interest rate buy-down on that same loan. The assistance was provided because the development of the mine, with its potential to create approximately 240 new jobs, was a regional development priority for the government.

Our involvement was strictly financial in nature. The extent of the federal government's jurisdiction with respect to this project was limited and did not include mining regulations or occupational health and safety issues.

The regulation of mines, under the Constitution is a provincial responsibility and pertains to all aspects of mine plan approval and monitoring. The only exceptions are the Cape Breton Development Corporation and uranium mines.

The Government of Nova Scotia established a commission of inquiry with the mandate to examine events leading up to the accident and to establish the cause of the accident. In order to assist the commission the federal government undertook the enormous task of compiling and cataloguing all federal government documents related to the Westray project. This involved 24,000 pages of documents dating back several years.

Prior to the constitutional challenge of the commission 8,000 pages of closing documents had been released. Initially, the Nova Scotia Supreme Court ruled that the commission, under its original terms of reference, was unconstitutional.

The decision was appealed by both the miners' union and the Nova Scotia government. In the ruling by the appeals division of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court in January 1993 the status of the commission was confirmed as valid. Once the criminal investigation by the RCMP is complete and any subsequent charges are dealt with the commission will be free to resume hearings.

The federal government will fully co-operate with any agency mandated by the Government of Nova Scotia to find the causes of the accident at the Westray coal mine.

INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH AID PROGRAM

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, in his financial statement of December 2 the Minister of Finance said the following: "Funding will be increased for the highly successful Industrial Research Assistance Program which provides technology support and financial assistance to businesses".

On February 25 I quoted that to the Minister of Finance and asked him why the estimates showed that the Industrial Research Assistance Program was cut by $1.333 million.

• (1750)

The answer to the question was provided by the Minister of State for Science who said that there had been an increase of $14 million for science and technology. That was a very interesting answer because it did not refer to the Industrial Research Assistance Program at all.

On February 26 I repeated that question quoting again from the December 2, 1992 statement and we got this peculiar answer from the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

I tell my hon. friend that we were both right yesterday. First, S and T funding has gone up considerably over last year. He still did not answer the question about IRAP, but I did point out that if there were in fact a $14 million increase in science and technology in the face of an over-all rate of government expenditures of approximately $5 billion, that really did not amount to very much.

The minister of state came back to answer the question of what happened to the funds that were promised for IRAP and indicated that IRAP spending would be the same or up. "This is a very important program", he says. "I agree with the hon. member. We are defusing technology in an unprecedented way. It is a core part of what we are trying to do under S and T."

He says he is going to somehow backfill IRAP in order to bring it up, if it is going to go up. Moments ago after many calls to the minister's office we got what he was referring to, and what he was referring to was the National Research Council estimates which from the 1992–93 Main Estimates to the 1993–94 estimates indicate about a $14 million increase in grants and contributions.

However, that is not an answer to the question about expenditures in science and technology because if we look at science and technology generally there have been a number of cuts, not the least of which was the revocation of the 4 per cent increases given to the granting councils, in addition to the decrease in IRAP, the $13 million cut in the DIPP, the $4.75 million cut in NSERC—that is beyond the 4 per cent revocation of an increase—and the SSHRC budget was cut by $582,000. If he is talking about science and technology surely the answer he has provided to me today does not answer the question about science and technology.

I really would like somebody to answer the question: How is it the Minister of Finance promised an increase in IRAP but in fact IRAP was cut? I want to know why there is this inconsistency. I do not want another non sequitur as was provided by the Minister for Science. I do not want another non sequitur as was provided to those others in this adjournment debate who have been trying to get clarity in response to their questions.

If the parliamentary secretary is going to do the same to me as he did to them, he can spare his time because it will be a non-answer. We will still not understand why the minister made his promise and failed to meet it.

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair for his question. I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on behalf of the government on this important program.

There is no doubt the National Research Council Industrial Research Assistance Program, IRAP, is an outstanding success that we should build upon. Few people in Canadian industry would question IRAP's significant benefits in terms of jobs, exports and new technologies. Although IRAP could clearly do more with increased funding, it is important to note that IRAP has done extremely well during a period of strict restraint in government spending. Not only has it been maintained but it has received increases in its funding. An allocation of the additional $27 million was announced last year.

Additional funding and strengthening of IRAP's role were also among the commitments made by the Minister of Finance in his December economic statement. Although this new funding is not included in the Main Estimates, decisions on the price levels will be made soon and will be announced in due course.

• (1755)

This will be a substantial recognition of our values and potential. Two years ago some concerns were expressed over the new strategic plan on the program. But evidence now shows that the plan was the right way to go.

Our most recent annual report shows a 5 per cent increase in the number of its projects. There is improvement in efficiency and a clear focus on IRAP's premier clientele for small and medium size businesses. IRAP is now in a good position to assume an even stronger role in building national competitiveness.

The government has already committed itself to ensuring that IRAP has the power and the resources it needs.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise to follow up a question I asked of the Minister of National Defence on peacekeeping. I appreciate that in Question Period there is a very short time for questions and indeed for answers.

I felt it necessary to follow up on this because I have a legitimate concern and whether it trends out or not is to be seen as the history book unfolds. I am not claiming to be any visionary but I do see certain trends that bother me. I am speaking out tonight because I am not sure there has been a total recognition of the two conflicting trends that bother me.

The first one is on the subject of peacekeeping and the very fact that in the last four years we have seen as many peacekeeping operations take place as we have in the last 40 years. That is an indicator in itself.

There is the very fact that at last count we have 179 countries in the world today. Of these countries, only 10 per cent of them have any homogeneity in their populations. Of that 10 per cent, only half have ethnic groups that account for 75 per cent of the population. In other words, most of these countries have very small, chopped up ethnic groups. We are seeing it in the world today. We are seeing what amounts to tribalism. It is not a question of countries fighting countries; it is a question of tribes fighting tribes. Sometimes they forget why they are fighting.

If you add to this an increasing problem with social intolerance, cultural and ethnic intolerance, I believe you are going to see the requirement for more and more peacekeeping operations throughout the world. Not only will it be more peacekeeping operations but different kinds of peacekeeping operations. We have already seen a deviation from the standard peacekeeping operation like that in Cyprus to now what is certainly the edge of peacemaking, humanitarian support, food control and that kind of thing.

The point I am making is that peacekeeping is increasing and the nature of peacekeeping is increasing.

Another point is that I believe, as this continues to increase, like-minded countries are going to have difficulties coping with this.

We now have roughly 4,500 troops participating in peacekeeping operations. Canada has participated in every single one of them and I think that is great. Our contribution to international peace is laudatory. Soon the time will come, and I believe we are very close to it, closer than we would care to admit, where we will not be able to participate. I believe that for the following reasons.

At the time we were preparing for the cold war. This is nobody's fault. You cannot plan for uncertainty and be right all the time. Three years ago we decided to close our bases in Europe. We decided to reduce the army by around 4,000 and we took other measures with respect to equipment.

As the facts show those decisions perhaps in retrospect were not the best ones. The fact remains we did take those decisions. Another decision was the total force concept where we used more reserves to make up the standing army and navy. A good decision. It was a good one and continues to be good.

Right now, because we are short of regular force troops, we have three major army groups deployed right now, 4,700 troops. We had only planned ever to have 2,000 when we had 4,000 more soldiers. That in itself is a very dangerous trend.

We are going to have to have a very close look at the increasing demands on our peacekeepers. We are going to have to have a look at the difficult areas we are getting into with respect to the number of regular force soldiers we have and what level at reserve and militia force should we supplement them.

There is also the equipment. I just came from a defence committee meeting where there was some concern shown by the expert witness on the kind of equipment we have, whether it was the right kind of equipment and whether or not it was deployed in the right manner.

In summary and conclusion of my remarks here this evening, I would like to ask purely and simply and in a non-partisan manner that the Minister of National Defence be cognizant of the increasing trend and the demand on Canadians because of our expertise and record in peacekeeping. She should look at the trend on decisions that were taken which would permit us to less and less be able to contribute to more and more. She should take cognizance of that and respond with perhaps a new defence statement or new priorities of defence that will show how we are going to cope with that. Before we commit any other sizeable groups of Canadian soldiers, sailors or airmen I believe that there has to be a full discussion in Parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception for raising this important matter and I welcome this opportunity to respond on behalf of the Minister of National Defence.

The priorities identified in our defence policy published in April 1992 are based on our commitments to the defence of Canada, domestic security, arms control and disarmament, and peaceful dispute settlement.

In a field in which Canada has been active for the past 40 years, our peacekeepers have acquired a reputation for professionalism that is recognized the world over. Our contribution to UN peacekeeping operations is a source of great pride to the members of our armed forces.

It is an indication of the trust we enjoy on the international scene and of the support in this country for our efforts to maintain world peace. It is true that certain specialties are in great demand. Nevertheless, our regular and reserve forces are capable of meeting our various commitments. As for the ability of our reservists to perform their duties in the armed forces as a whole, so far we have had no trouble finding the necessary numbers to bring our regular forces up to the strength required to perform these missions effectively.

At the present time, the system works. Peacekeeping operations are reviewed regularly which means that resources assigned to the various missions are reviewed and modified as appropriate.

[English]

At the moment there are some 4,700 Canadians taking part in peacekeeping operations around the world. Of these, approximately 475 are members of the reserve. Under total force, increasing numbers of reservists will be available to take part in peacekeeping operations. These troops are well-trained, prepared members of the Canadian forces and ready to serve alongside their regular force counterparts under any circumstances.

As evidence of our commitment to making total force work, in 1993-94 total expenditures of the primary reserve will rise by nearly $46 million over the forecast in the current financial year. This is a 6 per cent increase. In addition capital expenditures of the primary reserve will rise to 25.6 per cent of the total reserve expenditures, up from 16.1 per cent in the last fiscal year's estimates.

The purchase of new equipment will ensure that the Canadian forces, reserve and regular alike, will have what they need to fulfil their roles, both at home and abroad. Important acquisitions include many types of equipment which will be used to ensure the safety of our troops on peacekeeping operations.

[Translation]

I will repeat what the Minister of National Defence said not long ago when she appeared before the Standing Committee on National Defence, namely that the government is considering some new approaches to participation in peacekeeping missions throughout the world.

Again, I wish to thank the hon. member for raising this question which is of interest to us all. I trust I was able to provide the requisite clarification.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.04 p.m.

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-112, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Access to Information Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Customs Act, the Federal Court Act, the Income Tax Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and a related Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak on second reading of Bill C-112.

This bill contains amendments that were proposed in the notice of Ways and Means motion tabled on December 9, 1992. It contains refinements to the goods and services tax that have been developed through extensive consultations with businesses, organizations, tax professionals and individuals during the first two years that the tax has been in place. These measures reinforce the government's commitment to the smooth and efficient operation of the GST.

With a major tax reform such as the replacement of the federal sales tax with the GST inevitably refinements must be made to the system as the government and the private sector together draw on the practical experience of seeing the tax at work in the marketplace.

The proposed amendments are technical in nature. As such, they do not substantially alter the way in which the GST operates. But this does not diminish the importance of this legislation, for these measures represent a rigorous fine tuning of the details of the tax. They simplify GST compliance across many sectors of the economy.

Over the past two years since the GST was implemented we have actively consulted industry associations, organizations and businesses, large and small. We responded to their suggestions with concrete proposals on how to improve the operation of the tax in specific industries.

• (1010)

Allow me to mention just a few examples of the changes that are contained in this bill. Following consultations with the Canadian taxi-cab industry the government proposed adjustments to the operation of the GST in this industry so that it could use a consistent pricing structure.

We heard representations from direct selling organizations whose sales contractors sell household goods door to door. As a result of these discussions we are proposing new rules under which hundreds of thousands of independent sales contractors do not have to register and file GST returns.

For retailers the bill contains amendments that would simplify the operation of the tax for a wide variety of special types of transactions, ranging from the treatment of discount coupons to the treatment of returnable beverage containers. In addition, simplified rules have been designed specifically for situations where retailers make purchases through buying groups. These special rules would significantly reduce the amount of paperwork that would otherwise be required under the normal rules of the tax. These changes have also been supported by associations representing manufacturers and distributors of grocery products.

We also introduced changes simplifying the operation of the tax in areas where activities are often undertaken by joint ventures. These proposals have been supported by the oil and gas industry.

The improvements to the tax system that are reflected in this bill will make Canadian industry more efficient and competitive, both in foreign and domestic markets. For example, there is a proposal that would improve the competitive position of service exporters by allowing them to import goods for servicing without having to pay tax on the importation.

In addition, the bill provides broader relief under the tourist and foreign convention rebate program, a program that is already unequalled among other countries that have similar tax systems. This would enhance the competitiveness of our tourism and convention industry by helping to maintain the attractiveness of Canada as a destination for foreign visitors.

These are not the only measures that would strengthen the international competitiveness of Canadian suppliers. We received representations from businesses requesting changes to the GST to facilitate the export of goods and services by these companies to their foreign customers. In response to these representations this bill proposes refinements that will be particularly welcomed by auto parts manufacturers in southern Ontario centres such as Windsor and Oshawa.

The Bill also contains proposals that would directly benefit consumers in need. These include additions to the list of tax-free medical devices and prescription drugs.

Finally, the government is also proposing a special credit for certified institutions that employ mentally or physically disabled individuals. This credit was designed in recognition of the unusually high costs faced by these institutions during the transition to the GST.

This bill contains proposals to allow Canadians who live year-round in travel trailers to rent their trailer sites on a tax-exempt basis, thereby providing them with the same treatment as other residential tenants. In addition, this bill provides a simpler and more generous GST housing rebate to individuals who build their own homes.

The measures included in this bill improve upon the operation of the GST in the retail, farming, oil and gas, export and tourism sectors, to name but a few.

• (1015)

This bill makes the tax fairer for tenants and homeowners alike, and helps consumers in need. All of these stand to benefit in one way or another from specific amendments contained in this bill.

An important objective of the government is to simplify compliance with the tax system, especially for small businesses. To this end the bill contains measures that would allow for greater flexibility with respect to reporting requirements. These measures include a plan that would make it easier for up to one million businesses to file GST returns only once a year.

The Bill would make the GST not only simpler but fairer for businesses. It gives the Minister of National Revenue discretion to waive penalties and interest in cases where someone is unable to file a return or make a remittance on time due to extraordinary circumstances beyond his or her control.

When this legislation was in draft form it was studied by tax experts. It is indeed noteworthy that they applauded the many streamlining improvements and clarifications contained in it. They have also urged speedy passage of the legislation in order to reduce uncertainty in the application of the tax.

In closing, I would like to emphasize that this bill is the result of extensive consultations with businesses, organizations, individual Canadians and their professional advisors. We have worked together to identify specific problems in particular areas of the GST and today we are proposing workable solutions that are tailored to the realities of today's marketplace.

This bill reflects representations made by members of all major parties on behalf of their constituents. It corrects anomalies and clarifies the application of the tax laws. Therefore I urge hon. members to give their full support to this bill and to ensure that it is approved as soon as possible, because these adjustments will make life easier for many people.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member on the government side while he was giving his speech and I heard the words: a simpler GST, a fairer GST and the fact that the government was working together with business in refining the GST.

Here we are almost three years later with 350 pages of simplification. This whole GST operation by the government has been the worst initiative that any government has ever perpetrated on a people.

Today people want their politicians to focus on one issue: putting people back to work. That is the priority issue. Whenever an initiative or a bill has come before this House that would help in any way, shape or form to put people back to work we on this side of the House have co-operated.

Madam Speaker, two weeks ago you were sitting in the chair when we debated the Small Businesses Loans Act. It was a Friday, it was third reading, but I can remember we also sat on the previous Tuesday. We worked with the government uninterrupted for 10 hours to make sure the Small Businesses Loans Act was put through this House in record breaking time so that it would be an instrument to assist the small business community, the 960,000 businesses whose sales are under $5 million. We, the Liberal Party of Canada, co-operated with the government. We applauded the government for this initiative. Small businesses can go to their local financial institutions or credit unions and get a Government of Canada loan guarantee of up to $250,000.

When government members from time to time hurl insults across this way suggesting that we are not working with them, that we are not constructive, they cannot say that we did not co-operate on that specific bill, a bill that could put people back to work immediately if properly utilized.

I have observed two things since that bill was passed. First, the government made a commitment that it was going to promote the bill, that it was going to make sure the small business community knew about it. I know in my own community I sent at least five small businesses to the local banking institutions. I can tell you five for five, they came away with no help at all from the banking community. Either the banks did not know about it or they did not care to know about it and this government was sitting when it made that commitment.

The second thing I noticed—and then I am going to come immediately to the bill because it is relevant—was that I thought it was a pretty productive day in the House. We were working together on a very good piece of legislation. However, in all of Canada there was only one small news story on the very important legislation we passed that day, legislation that would give hope to a lot of small business people and a lot of people that had not even started their businesses but wanted to. That is what it was designed for.

I forget what newspaper carried the story, but in my city the only paper that covered it was the Corriere Canadese which covered it in Italian. That is important as we have a large Italian community in our city, about 700,000 Italians, but it was not covered by The Toronto Star, The Toronto Sun or The Globe and Mail. It was good news. It was a positive story and the press never covered it. This is the reason why I say to the government that it has to promote the Small Businesses Loans Act.

It is a specific example of the opposition working with the government because it is legislation that will help put people back to work, it is going to be something that could help create more jobs.

Today we have before us Bill C-112. It is sort of the son of the son of GST, three years later. It is another attempt at refining a tax that has done a great deal to dampen and suppress entrepreneurial spirit and consumer confidence in this country. I know in my own riding it has practically cut the restaurant business in half, not to mention what it does to students who tend to work their way through either high school or college by working in restaurants part time. They count on not only this type of work in the restaurant-tourism business but on the tips. It has just gutted the hopes for half-decent, part-time income for tens of thousands of university students right across Canada.

This poorly designed GST has brought further red tape to all the small business community in Canada, surprising for a Conservative government which tends to be a little bit more sensitive, which is supposed to be more sensitive to business. It has throttled people with this bureaucratic nightmare of a GST. Here we are three years later with some amendments, some refinements.

This bill that the government has put forward is proof positive of what we have been saying about the complexity, about the unfairness and about the inefficiency of the GST during the last three years. The government is now admitting, three years later, that what it had really was not that great.

My leader three weeks ago said that this GST will be scrapped. Make no mistake about it, the GST will be scrapped if we are given the trust to run the Government of Canada.

When we talk about scrapping the GST, the most common question we hear from the other side, from the street or sometimes from journalists is: What are you going to do to replace the $15 billion worth of revenue that the GST delivers? What is the Liberal Party of Canada going to do to generate the $15 billion?

For starters, this GST has done much damage to the retail business in this country. It has done much damage and caused much unemployment and welfare. Yes we have had a world recession, but this GST has exacerbated the confidence problem in this country. Therefore, when we talk about revenue this tax has caused a situation where our welfare and unemployment insurance payments, including interest rates, are over $30 billion.

If you developed a fair tax system in this country and if you put 400,000 or 500,000 people back to work you could find $15 billion within four or five months, not to mention the fact that we would start giving people back their dignity. We have to understand that there are close to two million people in this country who are out of work.

I cannot imagine a single member of Parliament in any party in this House of Commons wanting to defend the status quo in terms of tax law in this country. In fact I have not met a member of Parliament who believes that the tax act of this country is fair, simple or efficient. We all agree that this 2,400-page document, with its rules and regulations and its exceptions and its exceptions to exceptions, is no longer intelligible. This tax act, combined with the GST, has caused an underground economy of cash deals in this country. Experts estimate that right now there are over $100 billion of cash transactions in this country.

Why do people want to do cash deals? They want to do cash deals because they feel that the current tax system is unfair. Everyone in the country feels it is unfair. Because the GST has exacerbated that feeling of unfairness people collaborate with one another. They say "I will paint your house at half the price if we can do a cash deal". He will pay GST on half that amount because on a cash deal he would not pay any GST. Sometimes it is half cash and maybe a third on an invoice so they pay the GST on the smaller amount. All kinds of schemes are going on in this country right now. That underground cash economy is just out of control.

The question comes to us in opposition: If you are going to scrap the GST what are you going to do to find $15 billion? For the twentieth time in this House of Commons I am going to plead with this government to look at reforming this system. There is an alternative to the GST and there is an alternative to this current tax act. You do not need to defend the status quo. This is just one option—there are many—and it is the single tax.

People want accountability. When you have a tax act where there is absolutely minimal accountability, and that is reinforced by the GST because of the underground economy, you have to look at the single tax. What is the single tax? The single tax system essentially would say we have to stop running every aspect of the economy through the tax act of Canada. Right now, for every sector of our economy, whether it is the forestry sector, the mining sector or the environment, we run all kinds of tax preferences, special preferences, through the tax act. We have tax loopholes in this tax act that go back 20 years that have not been reviewed in terms of accountability.

Just this year, two offshore drilling projects cost the taxpayers of Canada close to $2 billion. They did not create hardly a single job in Canada because of a loophole that was buried in that tax act from 20 years ago. All of those tax preferences should be flushed out of the tax act. If any sector of our economy wants a tax grab or a tax expenditure it should go to the line department, justify it and link it to job creation.

Right now there is very little linkage, if any, in terms of the preferences in here and how they are meeting job creation possibilities.

If we had a single tax system in which we basically asked people on the corporate side for 20 per cent of their net income and the same on the personal side—after allowances were made for seniors, families with children, and charitable donations, and we could keep the RRSP structure in place—then that would empower people and get them back on stream. Right now people are running away from the tax act of this country because they can no longer understand it. It is so complex.

The GST has exacerbated that. No matter how many amendments or refinements the government brings in on this bill it cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. The GST is a sow's ear and the Canadian public is never going to accept it. One of the reasons the Canadian public is never going to accept this bill is because the government introduced it at a time when people were on their knees. They were crying out for some hope, looking to the national government for some confidence and it threw this bill at them.

Going back to the single tax, if we have a system which everyone in the country feels is fair then people work harder, they work smarter, and productivity levels rise. When productivity levels rise then that is how jobs are created.

If we could put 400,000 or 500,000 people back to work in the next four to five months and if we could regain some of that underground economy, cut it in half to about $30 billion or $40 billion, just think of the amount of revenue that would bring to this Treasury.

I hear criticism and people asking: Where are you going to get the $15 billion? That is a defeatist attitude. Does the minister want to defend the status quo?

This is going to be a great six months, because I love people who defend the status quo. The status quo is a GST that has exacerbated the underground economy in this country to the point where it is over $100 billion. The Minister of Transport knows that. There are two million people out of work and he wants to continue to promote the status quo.

Is the government saying that it cannot do better? The government is essentially saying it cannot improve on the status quo. Canadians do not believe that for a second. They do not believe for a second that we cannot regain some of the underground economy. They do not believe for a second that there are not ways to put people back to work.

The problem with this government is that it talks a good deal but it has no action plans. I refer specifically to that Small Businesses Loans Act where the Minister of Finance committed to do something about it and the minister for small businesses committed to do something about it. I called the department this week and it said not to start promoting the Small Businesses Loans Act right now because it has not even gone through the Senate, which the government controls.

That is how much this government really cares about the small business community in this country. The government has this smug and arrogant attitude that it cannot improve on the status quo. Canadians are not going to accept it. They want a debate on tax reform.

• (1040)

I am not saying that the single tax is the panacea for this country. I am not saying that it is the only alternative. I am saying that when there are $40 billion worth of tax grants to business in here, which have been mostly put in by lobbyists and people that have been able to influence the Department of Finance, and if the government refuses to review these from time to time and not have some form of accountability then how can it say it is serving the taxpayers of Canada?

Is it telling me that in $40 billion worth of tax grants there is no room to flush some of those out or review them? Does the minister agree with the offshore drilling that happened with two oil companies last year, which cost the taxpayers of Canada $2 billion? How many jobs were created in Canada? That is defending the status quo.

I think it is wrong. Canadians know it is wrong and they want a fair, simple and efficient system. Did you know, Madam Speaker, that 80 per cent of the tax returns filed in this country had to be returned because of mistakes made in the system. Does this government want to defend that? If it sits there, smiles and says that it cannot do better then that is defending the status quo. Canadians want better. We need better and we can do better.

The government says that we are not constructive, that when something good comes along in this House we do not co-operate. The government fooled me two weeks ago because I really believed that this government was sincere and serious about trying to get credit for the 960,000 small businesses in this country.

This government is not sincere when it makes a commitment to help small business. It brings a bill before this House, gets it before the House, we co-operate, and then nothing happens. That is wrong.

Mr. Domm: That's not the case.

Mr. Mills: The member for Peterborough says that is not the case, but I can tell the House that it is. We co-operated. The member knows it, he was there. I called the minister's office on Monday and I do not want to repeat the answer in this House.

Mr. Domm: Put it on the record.

Mr. Mills: I will put in on the record. I was told that I should not be promoting that bill right now because it has not gone through the Senate. Does the hon. member for Peterborough agree with that? He does not believe that. Do not tell me that the member was not in his riding last week trying to promote and help small business. He was.

Mr. Domm: It's not proclaimed, but it's through the Senate.

Mr. Mills: Another excuse. This is the GST government, the defenders of the status quo and it makes these nice announcements before Christmas about the Small Businesses Loans Act. What a great bunch of teasers we have here. They are a great bunch of teasers. They come in today and talk about simplifying the GST; 350 pages of simplification.

In this country today there is a crisis of confidence. We have to do something in order to get the entrepreneurial spirit of this country moving again.

Mr. Domm: You better get your party together.

Mr. Mills: This is what happens when a government has been around for 10 years and we try to make a point on behalf of those people in our community who are crying out for help right now, the 960,000 small business people. We try to make a constructive point on the fact they are not operating the Small Businesses Loans Act, that they are not actioning it, and they come back with smug, arrogant remarks. Instead of making smug, arrogant remarks, why do they not go to their Minister of Finance and their minister for small businesses and do something about it? They are in charge. Why do they not ask them to live up to the legislation that went through this House?

• (1045)

This is one of the reasons people have lost trust in the government. The government has lost its feeling for the pain out there in the community. It has lost feeling for the fact that two million people right now are crying out for help. They want work. They want more jobs. It is not right to laugh. I am not treating this issue lightly. It is serious.

We have a situation today where the government wants us to support a bill to refine the GST. I am totally opposed to the GST. It is an inefficient, unfair tax. Small businessmen despise the GST. They want it replaced. They definitely want to make sure we do it in a responsible way. We cannot just snap our fingers and pull something out of the hat. There has to be a serious debate on tax reform, but they do not want us to defend the status quo which the Conservative government wants to defend. We are not going to defend the status quo. There is no way. There is absolutely nothing that could ever make me change my attitude toward the GST.

For the last three years I have seen the pain. I have watched people lose their businesses. I have watched retailers lose their stores. I have seen people lose their homes. A leadership change does not matter. It does not matter whether it is the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Transport or the Minister of National Defence. This is the GST government. Two million people out there are in pain and have been in pain for the last three years. They are not a mirage. They are real.

Believe me, the people who are working care as much and more about the people who are not working. They think if they ignore the two million unemployed that the ten million or eleven million who are working will support what they are doing to the others. They are making a mistake. It is not going to happen.

There are alternatives to defending the status quo. The status quo is unacceptable when we have over $100 billion in underground economy. The Auditor General said last year that most Canadians could not even understand the tax forms.

I am totally opposed to the bill. I cannot wait for the next election when the GST will be the singular issue hanging over this government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I see the hon. member rising on questions or comments. He can do so with unanimous consent. This is first-time debate at second reading so the first two speakers are allowed up to 40 minutes and there are no questions and answers unless there is unanimous consent.

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if there is unanimous consent so that I could make comments and ask questions.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to make a comment or ask a question?

Some hon. members: No.

• (1050)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I join with my colleague who has just spoken to speak out as strongly as I can against Bill C-112, an act to fine tune the goods and services tax. That is what it is all about.

What will the people of Canada say when they see this document containing hundreds and hundreds of pages to fine tune the GST? It is already an impossible task for most people to handle. This is what makes small business operators, people running small firms, shake their heads in disbelief. An effort to improve the tax, from the government's point of view, is good news, but it cannot improve a tax that does not make any sense. It cannot improve a bad tax by introducing in the House of Commons hundreds of pages of detailed changes. That is not the way to deal with the GST. There is only one way for the country to deal with the GST, that is to scrap it as soon as possible to allow people to get on with rebuilding the economy.

An hon. member: What would you replace it with?

Mr. Riis: My hon. friend on the government benches asks me what we would replace it with. I would ask him to take the time to read the economic recovery report presented by the federal New Democratic Party. It lays out in very specific detail the set of alternatives to the goods and services tax. I tell my hon. friend opposite that because of the GST and a whole range of government policies regarding taxation there is absolutely no faith at all in this country in the tax system of Canada. People have long since abandoned any hope that it is fair, just and equitable. They know this is a tax system dedicated almost exclusively to serving the wealthiest people of this country and the very largest corporations of Canada.

The best example of that is what the government introduced in the House a few days ago: a special tax loophole for the wealthiest families of Canada. The tax loophole was originally introduced in the early 1970s by the Liberal government of the day. It provides for tax-free family trusts. By rolling money into a family trust no income tax is paid for 21 years. The 21 years under the Liberal administration was about to run out. Now the government steps in and says that it has a new twist to it. It is going to continue the tax gift to the richest people of Canada, to the richest families of this country, and they will not be paying any taxes until their children die.

In other words, the $70 billion in these special family trusts is not being taxed. That is wrong. That is unjust. That is unfair. That is why the people of Canada have lost complete faith that the government has any intention of trying to bring in a fair and just tax system. That is only one example.

Today, as we speak to this bill in the House of Commons, there are thousands and thousands of individuals with incomes over $50,000 a year who do not pay a single penny in income tax, not a single cent in income tax. There are hundreds of people whose incomes are over a quarter of a million dollars a year who do not pay one penny in income tax, to say nothing of people who make $100,000 and pay $10 in income tax.

It is an unjust system. It is an unfair system. It is a system the people of Canada have long since jettisoned in terms of being a reasonable system. Day by day by day the government makes it worse. Family trusts to give a tax loophole to the wealthiest people of Canada are ridiculous. The people of Canada are disgusted. That is why the minute there is an election call the Conservative benches across the way will be literally jettisoned as those people become new kinds of Tories. We will call them migratories, as Tories migrate away from Parliament Hill.

The GST, special tax breaks for the largest corporations and special tax breaks for wealthy people have turned Canadians into a population that has lost confidence in the tax system. Consequently much of our economy has moved underground. The best estimate we have is something in the neighbourhood of $100 billion annually in transactions that are untaxed because they are underground, they are on a barter system, they are on a cash system and no records are kept. Imagine if those $100 billion of annual transactions were taxed at the regular level of taxation. It would take care of our deficit. The deficit of this country alone would be dealt with on that one aspect alone, the $100 billion now in the underground economy.

No wonder we are in such difficulties. No wonder we have a deficit problem. No wonder we have a debt problem. People have lost complete faith in our tax system.

Here we have the government's effort to simplify the tax system. If people are watching television today and hear us saying that this is a way to simplify our tax system it is no wonder that people have lost faith not only in this government but in a tax system as it is presently constituted.

However this bill deals specifically with the GST. One of the things it does is stated in clause 211. What clause 211 states is that information about the GST is to be kept secret from the people of Canada. It bars information about the GST. Therefore under the freedom of information legislation when we try to get information about how the GST is being handled in the country we will be barred from that information.

I ask the government members opposite: What is it that you are trying to hide? How can you support legislation that keeps valuable information about the GST from the people of Canada? What is it that you are trying to hide? I think these are fair questions and perhaps at the end of my presentation I can ask some of my hon. friends across the aisle to explain that. Why would you support legislation that keeps information about the GST from the Canadian public? Presumably you have a good reason and I am looking forward to hearing your speeches later. That is one clause.

The bill goes on and on. For example, one of the clauses covers yoghurt. It states that if you buy six containers of yoghurt you will not have to pay the GST. There is another clause relating to bull semen. It states that if you pay GST on bull semen it is refundable. For all the people who are interested in purchasing bull semen this is great news, the GST will be refundable. That is probably a good provision if you are a cattleman.

What about reading? Why do we have GST on reading material? Why do we have GST on children's story books? I look forward to hearing my friends across the way explaining, when they speak today, why they support one of the only tax systems in the entire world that taxes children's books, that taxes the Bible and that taxes reading material. Why would people support a tax regime that does that? Why would they not at least now, when they are supposedly improving the GST, bring in legislation that would exempt reading material so that we can encourage people to read and work to fight against the high rates of illiteracy in this country?

Madam Speaker, you might detect a certain anger in my voice. I am angry because I have just spent two weeks in my constituency visiting people who operate small businesses, small retail stores, small manufacturing firms—

Mr. Fee: Theatrical firms.

Mr. Riis: Yes, as a matter of fact, as my hon. friend calls out, a number of organizations involved with the arts have just been informed they are going to have their arts funding slashed. Is this not an intelligent approach to take to the arts organizations across Canada, to slash budgets for another year, after years and years of reducing their budgets, now to make them almost totally inoperable? I am pleased that my hon. friend reminded me of that.

As I visited business after business there was one common concern raised at every single visit. I cannot recall a single firm I visited that did not have this to say. They said: "As our federal representative do what you can to have this government reverse its position on the GST and drop this tax because of what it is doing to our business".

• (1100)

It is not the only problem that businesses face but for many it is the straw that breaks their backs. It is the reason that people lose their homes, it is the reason that families break up, it is the reason that there are thousands and thousands of bankruptcies every month in this country. One of the critical reasons is the GST. It puts the cost beyond what is reasonable. It eliminates those extra few customers that make the difference between a successful business and an unsuccessful business.

In conclusion, as we break for Question Period, I want to say on behalf of my party that we will oppose this legislation. We will oppose it as strongly as we can because even by changing the GST we cannot make this bad tax a good tax.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to continue after Question Period there will be nine minutes left. We will now proceed with statements by members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

FIGURE SKATING

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, Canadians had just reason to feel pride last night after the greatest day in Canadian figure skating history. Not since our own Otto Jelinek and his sister Maria along with Don Jackson won 31 years ago have Canadians won both the pairs and the men's world championships.

Following Isabelle Brasseur and Lloyd Eisler's victory in pairs, Elvis Stojko skated almost flawlessly to claim a silver medal in the men's championship.

My pride and the pride of everyone in central Alberta was absolutely unlimited as Kurt Browning clinched his quad, a fourth world championship.

Four times I have had the pleasure of rising in this House to share our pride and congratulate Kurt Browning. He is an outstanding athlete, a fierce competitor and a proud Canadian. Kurt not only expresses his pride in Canada but by his skill and his actions he brings pride to this country. I am sure that all members of the House of Commons join me in congratulating Isabelle and Lloyd, Elvis and Kurt. They are the best in the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I am concerned about Canada's ability to sustain our current level of peacekeeping operations. In the past five years more peacekeeping operations have been approved than in the previous 40 years. There is every indication that this trend will continue as ethnic tensions throughout the world increase along with the inability of smaller countries to cope.

Canada has 4,700 peacekeepers deployed around the world in 15 different locations. The size and scope of operations are increasing dramatically. On the other hand, our contingency planning is based on deploying half that number with a force structure of 4,000 more soldiers. Too much slack is being taken up by reserve forces who will comprise 55 per cent of the relieving battalions scheduled for Croatia in April.

There are disturbing problems with United Nations command and control, and defence analysts are expressing concern to the Standing Committee on National Defence about the adequacy of equipment in use by our peacekeepers and the depth of training for our reserves.

Both the minister of external affairs and the Minister of National Defence have expressed concern over this and I believe that—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I regret the member's time has expired.

NATIONAL DEBT

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, this country is now in a debt crisis, both nationally and provincially. I would like to recommend to the federal government that it take a serious look at the call made by Saskatchewan premier Roy Romanow and other premiers that there be a federal-provincial conference on the debt crisis in this country, in other words a conference on fiscal management or fiscal federalism in this country.

It is important that we have a federal-provincial conference. The debt now is an interprovincial debt, not just a federal debt but a provincial debt as well. The debt-GDP ratio in this country is almost the highest of any country in the industrialized world. It is more than twice as bad in our country as it is in France or Germany, and many times higher than in countries like Sweden or Japan.

Another reason for this conference is that we must take a look at the question of transfer payments. The C. D. Howe Institute said recently that the federal government should be admonished for the way it is transferring part of its debt on to the backs of the provincial governments.

S. O. 31

AIDS

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, at a time when government expenditures are being reduced in order to combat the deficit and stabilize the economy it is important to note that the federal government has recognized the significance of the fight against AIDS and has made a commitment to spend $42.2 million a year over the next five years.

While everyone would like more funds to fight AIDS, in boosting AIDS funding by 13 per cent the federal government has emphasized its strong commitment to finding a cure for this disease while at the same time maintaining a realistic attitude toward our fiscal situation. Finding a cure and promoting awareness of HIV infection and AIDS continues to be a priority of all Canadians.

• (1105)

I am pleased that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has especially recognized the important work of the AIDS Network of Edmonton Society. This organization has experienced tremendous growth since it was established in 1986 and today has a staff of 15. Over 200 trained and active volunteers deliver a comprehensive range of outreach training and prevention education programs which serve almost 500 clients.

I commend the society's tremendous efforts in the continuing fight against AIDS and I am pleased that the Department of National Health and Welfare—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired.

FIGURE SKATING

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, today we can say: We are the champions. The world should nod heads and agree. The pride shining in Kurt Browning's face last night was as bright as the gold medal around his neck. By his side stood Elvis Stojko with the silver medal around his neck.

How often do we get to see heroes in the making? Better yet, how often do Canadian heroes emerge while the entire world is watching? It happened last night in Prague during the World Figure Skating Championships.

Alberta native Kurt Browning won the gold medal for Canada and Elvis Stojko won the silver. One and two. It is the first time Canadians have ever finished first and second over-all.

As if that was not enough, Isabelle Brasseur and her partner Lloyd Eisler won the pairs competition the night before. They persevered. They tried for six years to win the gold and it finally paid off. Not since 1962 when Donald Jackson and Maria and Otto Jelinek won two gold medals for Canada have we come out so far ahead. That was 31 years ago.

These past two days will go down in figure skating history throughout the world, and here especially. The 26-year old Kurt Browning was quoted by one local newspaper as having said: "I'm back on top. That's something, when I decided to stay around for two more years, I wasn't sure—"

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry. Everybody is taking more than their allotted time. I have to stop everyone. The hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

NEW BRUNSWICK CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, today marks an important chapter in the constitutional history of both New Brunswick and Canada. Today the resolution respecting the equality of New Brunswick's two official linguistic communities is proclaimed by the Governor General and becomes an official amendment to Canada's Constitution.

Most New Brunswickers have long accepted and supported the reality of two official languages as a fundamental concept of society in our province. Our province has long recognized that the most effective way to an harmonious and prosperous society is to exercise policies that will help develop communications, confidence and mutual respect among the two linguistic communities which derive from those official languages.

Part of doing that is to ensure that each linguistic community feels secure in its right to government services in official languages, particularly with respect to provisions for education and cultural development. These two areas are basic to the preservation of either official language.

Although we continue to have some intense political debate about linguistic matters in New Brunswick we have made tremendous progress in building a peaceful and productive society together.

If the rest of Canada can catch the spirit of what New Brunswick has been able to achieve then I believe that the proclamation ceremony today will prove a milestone toward the ultimate lasting unity of our nation.

PREMIER CATHERINE CALLBECK

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Madam Speaker, on September 17, 1991 a former colleague in the House of Commons and a fellow Prince Edward Islander, Premier Catherine Callbeck, introduced a private member's motion calling on the federal government to honour the contributions made to Canada by our late former Prime Ministers. This was to be done by placing a commemorative marker near their burial sites.

Yesterday in an historic event hosted by the Speaker of the House of Commons and attended by the Prime Minister, the former Prime Minister the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, and members of the families of our past Prime Ministers 14 commemorative plaques were unveiled.

I want to take this opportunity to congratulate Catherine on the success of her initiative to honour our past leaders. I also want to congratulate her on her successful quest for the leadership of the Liberal Party of Prince Edward Island. This made Catherine the second woman to hold the office of premier of a province in Canada.

I look forward to March 29 when the voters of Prince Edward Island will make her the first woman to be elected premier in the history of Canada.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, there is overcapacity in our airline transportation system. Canadian Airlines recently announced a reduction in capacity and Air Canada effectively refused to respond.

Air Canada continues along its self-destructive path. It refuses to recognize that it made a colossal blunder by pushing its monopolistic made-in-Canada solution. This strategy will be recognized as an error in judgment of historic proportions. Its management team, which is bound by a paradigm of bureaucratic inertia, has failed to respond to competitive pressures by reducing capacity and cutting costs. Instead, Air Canada tries to side-step the issue by driving toward a monopoly.

I call on both major airlines to face reality, reduce capacity and restore order to Canada's transportation system.

FIGURE SKATING

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Madam Speaker, all Canadians take tremendous pride in the outstanding achievements of our figure skaters. It was not luck but a combination of hard work, perseverance and a very legitimate desire to win for their country.

• (1110)

Emotions ran high as we watched remarkable performances by Isabelle Brasseur and Lloyd Eisler, Kurt Browning and Elvis Stojko. Today, our hearts will go out again, this time to Josée Chouinard and Karen Preston, as they too go for the gold.

To all these outstanding athletes we offer our warm congratulations on reaching the top of their discipline and being the best in the world. Their determination, strength of character and courage are an inspiration to Canada's youth. Truly, they are the best ambassadors Canada could have.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, today's report from Statistics Canada shows that since free trade youth unemployment has soared from 11 per cent to almost 18 per cent. This is so despite a 14 per cent increase in the number who have given up hope and have left the work force altogether.

Worse still, the figures show that the employment losses were all in full-time employment. People who should be working as professionals, business people, engineers or workers in plants are instead working as temps, bicycle couriers and waiters. Why? It is because this government, in failing to adapt to a change in the economy, has failed to create enough new value-added employment and has done its utmost to slam the doors to our universities, colleges and other training opportunities.

The figures are numerical proof of what Vancouver writer, Douglas Coupland, calls the McJob phenomenon. Young people are being knocked off the career ladder and forced into a succession of low-paid, dead-end service jobs. But then, perhaps McJobs are all we can expect from free trade and Tory McGovernment.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I am rising to register my opposition to the absurd and blatantly political proposal by this government to close some 45 regional immigration offices across Canada and set up a mail-in centre for work permits, visitor visas, student visas and family applications in Vegreville, Alberta, right in the Minister of Finance's own riding.

One of the offices slated for the chopping block is the Canada Immigration Centre in Sydney, Nova Scotia. This centre in Sydney not only processes student, worker and tourist visa extensions, as well as family class applications, but also provides valuable support and monitoring of business and entrepreneurial immigrants to Cape Breton. These prospective immigrants from countries such as Germany, Austria and Switzerland provide investment and badly needed jobs in Cape Breton.

Closing down the Sydney immigration office, as this government seems set to do, will only hurt our efforts to bring badly needed jobs to eastern Nova Scotia. I urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am afraid the member's time has expired.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I take this opportunity to speak today on a subject of growing concern among many Canadians. That is the question of how we can best deal with crimes committed by young people.

I will be presenting petitions today from 9,000 of my constituents who wish to see Parliament reduce the maximum age from 18 for those youths who commit crimes. I applaud their initiative and support the intent of their petitions.

I am particularly supportive of the private member's bill of the hon. member for Calgary Southwest. Bill C-354 would see the maximum age of young offenders reduced from 18 to 15. As well, it provides for young offenders who have been twice convicted on indictable offences to be tried in adult court.

I believe that legislation such as the bill standing in the name of my colleague and seat-mate from Calgary Southwest is a step in the right direction—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, the member's time has expired.

ELVIS STOJKO

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, Canada's domination at the World Figure Skating Championships continued last night as Elvis Stojko followed Kurt Browning's gold medal with an inspiring silver medal skate.

Heading into the final program, Elvis was well back in fifth spot. However, he showed incredible determination and desire and skated the performance of his life under incredible pressure. Landing eight consecutive triples, he scored the highest marks of the evening for difficulty.

To go from fifth spot to second is an incredible feat, and given the high level of competition that he faced many would say that such an accomplishment was miraculous. The ability to fight back under difficult circumstances, combined with his sportsmanship, embodies the true quality of Canada and Canadians. His performance is something we can all take pride in.

I am sure that I speak for everybody in the House of Commons and across Canada when I say congratulations, Elvis, for a job very well done.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Madam Speaker, I rise to alert Canadians, and especially Canadians in southern Alberta, to a very dangerous plank in the Reform Party platform.

• (1115)

The Reform Party promises to balance the budget in three years. That sounds good but it is very dangerous. If $34 billion of purchasing power were to be withdrawn in three years from Canada, we would be plunged into a very deep depression. In fact land values would drop by some 75 per cent. Tens of thousands of retail stores would close. Seniors' pensions, student loans and many other programs would virtually disappear.

For southern Alberta the Lethbridge Research Station, the Animal Diseases Research Institute, Waterton National Park, the Lethbridge Airport and Lethbridge as a regional suboffice for many civil servants would be drastically cut back.

In summary I warn Canadians, especially southern Albertans, about this very dangerous policy.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, the House congratulates Kurt Browning, Elvis Stojko, Isabelle Brasseur and Lloyd Eisler, the whole figure-skating team, and recently the World Cup wins by Kate Pace and Myriam Bédard.

Unfortunately the government has not matched the performance of our athletes. The government is inflicting very deep cuts on sport and active living funding, jeopardizing programs, off-loading more on to the provinces, schools, municipalities and the volunteer community.

It is blatantly disregarding recommendations of the progressive Best task force report and is fundamentally undermining the opportunity of Canadians to pursue excellence in sport.

This week the government devastated the active living community in an outrageous fashion when it shepherded 50 staff of the active living organizations into the Congress Centre and fired 21 of them. It reneged on its promise to give them—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired.

APPOINTMENT OF JEAN-CLAUDE RIVEST TO SENATE

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, as a Quebecer I feel I must comment on the appointment of Jean-Claude Rivest to the Senate by Prime Minister Brian Mulroney. I was astonished to hear that someone so closely involved in drafting the Allaire Report, which in its initial version demanded the abolition of the Senate in Ottawa, should now accept an invitation to join this old fogies club, while the role—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to sit down. Insults are not on the agenda today. We will now proceed to Oral Question Period. The Leader of the Opposition.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the government House leader.

The House has been informed that there is a big rush to pass the NAFTA deal. Yesterday in the United States Congress it became very clear that the United States legislation was not about to pass unless there were some major changes in the form of new agreements.

Now that it is evident this deal will not easily pass in the United States, will the government wait to learn exactly the results of the negotiations that will start next week and act only after that? Why not use the occasion to get clear definitions of what is a subsidy and what is dumping so that everybody will be happy?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the deal is signed and remains a deal to which all governments are committed. It of course needs to be ratified in all of the legislatures.

The U.S. is talking about a side deal and negotiations will be going on in terms of a side deal with respect to the environment and labour and that was something our government talked about last February.

In terms of this House, I have offered to the opposition that the proposed legislation be referred to a committee so it can be studied by Canadians. So far I have not been able to get the co-operation of the opposition parties, although not the Liberal Party, in terms of doing that.

I do not see anything wrong with the opportunity of having a committee of the House of Commons study the deal while negotiations on the side deal are carried on.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the opposition will be ready to guarantee to the House of Commons that this bill will not be passed in Canada until it is passed in the United States. To study the bill is one proposition, but to pass it is something else. The indication we have received from the government is that it wants to pass the bill before June.

The United States has decided it will not submit the bill to Congress before this summer. There is some indication that if it is not ready before the summer in the United States it probably will not be passed in the United States before the end of the year.

• (1120)

Can we have a guarantee from the government that the bill will not pass this House of Commons until the bill is passed in the United States?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, that does not make a lot of sense to me.

The reality is that it only becomes law if all governments, all legislatures pass it. Who is first or who is second seems to me to be rather immaterial.

The deal is that the agreement as negotiated will proceed. We want to have the fullest of discussion. We want to have an opportunity for people to examine it, to have this House of Commons examine it. However, at an appropriate time we must make a decision. The fact of the matter is the government stands committed to this deal, which is a good deal for Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, they want us to adopt the bill as is, but in July or August the Americans may decide to adopt a different version.

We have no objection to discussing and examining the bill. However, we want the government to guarantee that the bill will not be approved in Canada until the Americans have obtained what they want to obtain and until we are satisfied with the content of this potential agreement between Canada, United States and Mexico.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the agreement will not be amended. The agreement is the agreement as it stands.

Whether it passes the United States Congress is a question for the United States government to deal with. Presumably some of these comments we read in the press are part of the political manoeuvring going on down there.

The United States cannot unilaterally amend the deal. It has been signed by the three governments. It remains in effect. President Clinton said he supports the deal. The Mexicans clearly do. This government clearly does. It makes sense.

An hon. member: What about changes?

Mr. Andre: No. I am sorry, no changes to the deal.

They are talking about side agreements, which are something else. We are participating in those negotiations. Frankly it just makes sense for us after proper discussion and consideration here in Canada to pass the deal and have it in place because it is a good deal for Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the government House leader.

Today, according to the press, the U.S. House of Representatives majority leader, Richard Gephardt, said: "I will not support and I think a lot of members will not support NAFTA on a leap of faith". Also Robert Matsui a prominent Democratic congressman said: "I have to tell you that my reading on the floor of the House at this time is that the votes are not there for the approval of NAFTA".

I ask the government House leader, what sense is it? How does it serve Canada's interests for the government to force through this House a measure which may turn out to be disapproved by the U.S. House of Representatives? How does this serve Canada's interests if Canada is left out on a limb because of this government's foolish approach to this unwarranted and bad NAFTA deal?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, first of all Canada is not left out on a limb at all.

The Liberals talk about sovereignty. They talk about the independence of Canada. They talk about how the Americans dictate what goes on in Canada. Now they are standing up in the House today and suggesting that Canada should not move until the United States moves.

There are three different governments with three different systems of government examining this particular bill. I might remind the hon. member, and I think he knows this because he has been through the free trade agreement, that this is on a fast track in the United States. The United States cannot amend the agreement as such. It either has to approve it as is, or turn it down as is.

All we are trying to do in Canada is get the committee to start studying this bill. The hon. member knows he would be the first on his feet to complain if we did not have the full time to study this bill and tried to speed it through in a few weeks after the Americans had approved it. He would be up on his feet screaming that we have not had time to study it. Well we are giving the Canadian people and this House of Commons time to study it now.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, surely the minister will have to recognize that the fast track in the United States Congress does not start until the legislation to implement NAFTA is submitted to Congress. President Clinton has said he does not intend to present the legislation unless he gets appropriate side deals on things like labour standards and the environment.

• (1125)

So there is no need for any rush in Canada. Therefore, I ask the minister how does it help to protect Canada's sovereignty if after rushing this bill through this House, the U.S. Congress does not approve the deal?

Is this government claiming it is going to be able to force the NAFTA on the U.S. Congress? Surely that is a lot of nonsense and the minister knows it.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, not at all. As a matter of fact, no more than it can force NAFTA on us or on Mexico. Three independent governments will be studying this.

What we are suggesting here in Canada, and I think the House leader made it very clear and he is absolutely correct, is that this will give Canadians an opportunity to study the agreement and to make comments. These additional agreements will be negotiated. As far as fast track is concerned, in the United States once it is presented to Congress it has 60 days to either approve it or not approve of it.

If we said we only had 60 days or less to approve it in Canada and if the Americans did not approve it until the fall and we then came back saying that we only had 30 days or 15 days to approve it, that hon. member would be up on his feet screaming like the devil here in the House that we had not given Canadians enough time to study it. Well, we are giving Canadians enough time to study it now.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

A report today prepared by the Mexican Centre for Border Studies and Human Rights has said that the North American free trade agreement will cause further environmental degradation. The centre's president further says that parallel agreements will not work because they already exist between the U.S. and Mexico and are not enforced. It is clear that NAFTA is fundamentally flawed.

Will this government stop simply trying to rush legislation through before an election? That is what is driving this. Come clean with the public. Will the government withdraw this so that there can be real study in all three countries about NAFTA?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I wish the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party would talk to her caucus about honest study. I am unable to get the commitment from her caucus to proceed with referring this bill to a committee so that the study could begin.

How much time is required? If in fact we could do that and they want us to provide the same kind of studies as in the United States 60 days would put us sometime in May. Is that an appropriate time? Would 90 days be necessary? What is the appropriate time required?

I suggest the faster we get started, the greater the opportunity for Canadians to examine it. The hon. member is becoming increasingly isolated in her position that this is a bad deal. Everybody knows that it is a good deal.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I suggest to the Acting Prime Minister that we test his hypothesis about who supports NAFTA and who does not support NAFTA in an election. Stand up and have the courage of your convictions. Put this issue before the electorate. Then we will see what Canadians think.

Today there are reports on the concerns about NAFTA. In the United States there are concerns about the fact that NAFTA will benefit multinational companies to the detriment of consumers. A Canadian steel company has said it is going to set up shop in the United States. The U.S. Congress has expressed very grave concerns which we have just heard. As mentioned earlier, NAFTA will seriously harm the environment.

My question to the Acting Prime Minister is simply this: Since he is always defending NAFTA and his government with the argument that NAFTA will benefit Mexican workers, could he tell this House how harming the health of the Mexican people and Mexican workers will benefit the Mexican people?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, we did have an election over free trade. We were taunted and threatened into it. In the end because of the Liberal majority in the Senate we had to have an election on free trade. We know the results of that election. Therefore, threatening us with an election on NAFTA is hardly a scary prospect.

The New Democratic Party was quick on its feet to say that the free trade agreement was going to destroy the auto industry in Canada. We know it was wrong. It was adamant in terms of opposition to the free trade agreement. We know that our exports are booming. We know that those exports made up of manufactured high value goods have been increasing and that Canada's share of the total trade in North America has been increasing. All the numbers show it is a success.

• (1130)

Only the New Democratic Party and maybe the Liberal Party think that trade is bad for us. Everybody else knows trade is good for everybody concerned.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, this debate is not about whether trade is good or bad and this minister is misleading the House when he says that is what the debate is about.

The debate is about a specific trade deal which trades away the sovereignty of Canada. That is what the debate is about.

[Translation]

It is clear the U.S. Congress in Washington has second thoughts. The Mexicans have second thoughts. Union members and environmentalists in Quebec have second thoughts. Only this government remains uncritical of NAFTA. Why does the Deputy Prime Minister not stop the ratification process? We need more time to discuss issues that are crucial to the economic future of this country.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I welcome the suggestion of the New Democratic Party leader that we examine this deal. I would ask her again to talk to her caucus so that we might get approval of a motion in the House to refer the deal to a committee so the examination could take place. That is what we would welcome.

I know that in certain quarters there is a feeling that we must retain the ability to maintain high tariffs and restrictive laws to protect little Canada. We believe in a larger Canada that competes with the rest of the world. We do not believe in the view—and nobody in the world believes it any more except a few dinosaurs—that restrictions on trade and obstacles and all those things are good.

We welcome the opportunity to examine the benefits. We are sure people will find, just as the auto pact was tremendously beneficial to Canada and just as the free trade agreement is proving to be tremendously beneficial to Canada, that NAFTA will be tremendously beneficial to Canada.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

He will know that 434,000 Canadians have lost their jobs according to Statistics Canada since the recession, which was induced as the Prime Minister has said publicly by this government. In the last month alone the number of full-time jobs has dropped by 5,000. In my province the jobless rate is now over 20 per cent.

If the government's policies are as magical as he has been suggesting, how does he explain those figures? Why does he not admit that despite all the rhetoric he and the government do not have the foggiest idea how to deal with this problem?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, once a month over the last few months the Liberals stand in the House when the employment figures come out and talk about all the doom and gloom. Yet we had 9,000 more jobs created in February than in the month before. We have had an increase in employment in nine of the last ten months. There have been 155,000 full-time jobs created. As a matter of fact in February, and I was pleased to see it, unemployment figures were still very high for youth but there were 14,000 more young people working in the month of February, which these statistics show as well.

There is a litany of good-news stories coming out now. When will the Liberals finally wake up and start talking positively about Canada instead of negatively about Canada?

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, the minister talks about the 9,000 jobs. Why does he not for a change tell the truth and say they are part-time jobs he is talking about when he quotes that 9,000 figure? Or, was it not convenient to say that? Why does he not tell about the thousands who have dropped out of the labour force altogether?

• (1135)

Since the last election, if he wants statistics, Canadians under 25 years of age have lost 409,000 full-time jobs. Is that the good news he is talking about? Or is it that 19.3 per cent of young men are now unemployed in Canada?

The x generation does not want those McJobs he is talking about, slinging burgers on the midnight shift for four bucks or four loonies an hour. They want a chance at a career.

Why is the government so maliciously strangling and squandering the talents of our young people?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, it is very obvious the government is not doing that and the hon. member knows it. If he got into the statistics and took time to examine them he would also see that manufacturing jobs have increased rather dramatically by some 33,000 jobs.

Mr. Simmons: It's a lie.

Mr. McDermid: No, it is not. He is saying it is a lie, Madam Speaker. I am not sure that is parliamentary, but it is a fact that there were 33,000 more manufacturing jobs in the last few months in Canada. As a matter of fact in the province of Ontario there have been 91,000 new jobs created in the last 10 months. Those are positive stories. As I said to the hon. member, there were 14,000 more young people working in February than there were in January.

I agree with the hon. member that unemployment is too high, but the rate has dropped from 11.8 per cent to 10.8 per cent. It is heading in the right direction. The policies of this government are working and we are going to continue to see improvement in employment as the economy improves. The hon. member should be happy about that.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It would be useful if the Speaker could be allowed to hear what is going on instead of people screaming. This is the House of Commons, not a school yard.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

We know that unemployment among women rose by 11,000 in the month of February. This will push even more single parent families into poverty and already we know that one million children live below the poverty line.

Will the minister please come forward with a budget to address this grave crisis among women and children in this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is correct. There were fewer women working in the work force in the month of February. We do not like to see that at all, though I must point out to her that there were 35,000 more working by the end of February than there were a year ago. This is a one-month drop, but the record over the last number of months has shown that it has increased.

I cannot explain the reasons for that. I am sure there are reasons that drop in the month of February took place. Unfortunately a lot of the part-time jobs that take place over the December-January months for Christmas and for sales in January disappear in February. I am sure that has something to do with it.

I agree with her that is a major problem, but this government is spending a tremendous amount of money, well over $3 billion, on training and retraining to try to get people into the work force with the skills they need for the jobs available today.

The hon. member knows, if she read it this week, that the help-wanted index is up rather significantly. Employers are now starting to look for employees. There are some very good signs in the economy. I believe we will see a marked improvement in employment as this year progresses and as the economy improves.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, we also know that many of these single parents, women in particular, are working in jobs in the service industry that are low paying and they are hurting very badly.

It is also a fact that the unemployment rates are highest among single parents: 16.8 per cent unemployment for women led families and 15.7 per cent for male led families. That is far above the national average. We know this is caused mainly by an inflexible job market.

Why is this government failing to develop coherent policies that will empower these people to break this cycle of poverty?

• (1140)

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I can speak fairly authoritatively about what goes on in my community in the city of Brampton in the region of Peel where in fact there are very significant ongoing programs for single parents to get them back into the work force, training programs together with support for day care while the single parents are out working.

These programs are ongoing. I know they are taking place across this country. I can speak more authoritatively about the ones in my area because I keep a very close eye on them. As a matter of fact we are meeting with the region of Peel this afternoon to cover a number of these subjects.

That is a great concern. There is no question about it. There are programs in place, as the hon. member knows, in which the federal government funds the provinces very significantly when it comes to social assistance, trying to get people off social assistance, back into the training market and into the job market. Those programs are ongoing and will continue to be ongoing because they are a priority of this government.

TRADE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, U.S. President Clinton has recently stated that he will not ratify the North American free trade agreement unless substantive parallel agreements are made, including an environmental accord.

Is the minister or whoever is answering for the Minister of the Environment aware that through articles 301, 309, 310, 314, 315, 708 and annex 702.1 of the proposed NAFTA agreement and article 2201.9 of the harmonized coding system Canadian waters are treated as a commodity of trade and are exempted from environmental safeguards?

Will the minister seize this opportunity, an opportunity presented by President Clinton, to press for an irrevocable exemption for the export of Canadian waters under NAFTA?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, that was pretty impressive. I do not know if the member has read the agreement or a researcher gave him those numbers, but let me just read a very brief clause in the agreement, which says: "For greater certainty nothing in this act or the agreement, except article 401 of the agreement, applies to water. In this section water means natural surface and ground water and liquid in gaseous or solid state but does not include water packaged as a beverage or in tanks".

NDP members went through this export of water under the free trade agreement. They were shot down then and they are going to be shot down again under NAFTA.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, the minister knows that all it takes is one line change in legislation to let water flow under the NAFTA to the United States. He knows that.

God knows that in the past the government said it would not sell Air Canada and all sorts of other things that it changed in the future. The NAFTA allows water to flow. The government knows that.

An American congressman is quoted this morning as saying that NAFTA will mean windfall profits to U.S. based multinational pharmaceutical companies. Why is this country allowing this to happen? It is one of the changes we are not asking for to make sure that generic drugs can be sold cheaply to consumers and to hospitals right across this country.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There seems to be a supplementary question from water to drugs. The hon. minister.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I will try. I am not sure how we got from the export of water to generic drugs, but let me say the hon. member is totally wrong on water and he knows it. He is totally wrong. I want that to be clearly understood by this House and by Canadian citizens.

As far as generic drugs are concerned, I just happened to read in the paper the other day where an individual announced a major expansion in the city of Toronto of a generic drug company. That same individual said a year ago it was dead. Now that company is expanding and doing very well.

I think the generic drug companies are doing fine under the very progressive legislation brought forward by this government. This will mean a great deal for research and development and high-tech jobs—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think we will go on.

OZONE DEPLETION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, my question is directed to the Minister of State for the Environment.

As she knows, the levels of ozone, the atmospheric gas that filters harmful ultraviolet radiation, reached historic lows over Canada this winter and are likely to remain significantly below normal at least until the fall. The trend is posing a threat to the health of Canadians, particularly in relation to skin cancer.

My question is this: What is the minister doing to assure the public that the government is taking the necessary steps to protect the ozone layer and thus the public?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Madam Speaker, first of all I think it would be helpful to tell my colleague what we expect the situation to be over the next few months, during the summer, if we ever get summer here.

The ozone depletion this summer is expected to be just slightly greater than observed in the last few years. Summertime values will be between 3 per cent and 7 per cent below the pre-1980 normal.

As the hon. member knows, we started a system of providing information about the ozone layer and ultraviolet radiation to Canadians so they could have that information. I would certainly suggest they take advantage of it and take precautionary measures to keep out of the sun when there are conditions that are particularly dramatic during the summer.

I know my hon. colleague is aware of the fact that Canada has been the leader in promoting the international protocol. In Montreal last year, again we played a very active role in putting forward and strengthening that international protocol. In fact at that meeting the protocol was strengthened and the agreement that has been reached at Copenhagen calls for—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think we are getting into a speech now and the hon. minister will agree with me.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, while the protocol, as the minister says, has been strengthened, one of the dangerous chemicals which is damaging the ozone layer is methyl bromide.

Methyl bromide has been banned in Holland and will be banned in the United States by the year 2000.

My supplementary question is this: Why is the government of Canada so hesitant in protecting the public and not acting in banning methyl bromide?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague mentions methyl bromide which was one of the issues considered in Copenhagen.

As a party to the accord that was reached, Canada supports the initiatives put forward in the protocol. We will be reducing the use of methyl bromide by 1995 down to the levels it was prior to 1991. We will be committed to recover, recycle and reclaim methyl bromide and to reduce emissions. Canada, as one of the partners around the world, will be ensuring that we all work in a concerted fashion to ensure that this does not continue to be a contributing cause to ozone depletion.

MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works.

In his economic statement last December the Minister of Finance froze to 1990 levels all grants in lieu of taxes the government pays municipalities on its properties across Canada. A great number of these government properties are located in the national capital region.

Does the minister intend to rescind this unfair freeze on grants in lieu of taxes or does he intend to freeload on the increased cost of municipal services and bully the rest of the property owners in the national capital region into paying for the shortfall?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): On the contrary, Madam Speaker, we are hoping to find an equitable way to cope with the escalation in the costs to the government because of the rapid increase in grants in lieu assessments.

This has been done across the country under different methodologies. We are hoping as a result of meetings which we will have with the Federation of Canadian Municipalities and other people that we will be able to find an equitable and consistent way to restructure the process. We are not trying to bully anyone and to the extent that we can we would like to try to be as equitable as possible under the constraints of the freeze.

• (1150)

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, the minister seems to have no immediate plans for dealing with the freeze.

The Ottawa-Carleton regional government recently approved a report by the province of Ontario which reassessed all property categories in the region. The regional government was aware of the implication that federal properties would yield about 3.4 per cent less in revenue in 1993. Will the government accept or reject this new lower assessment of its properties in Ottawa-Carleton?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, this is encouraging news. The government would welcome any change in methodology that would allow the taxation system to be fairer to special use properties that the Crown has in Ottawa and in other areas.

The point is that we do have this constraint and we do have this freeze. We are trying to cope with it as best we can and as equitably as we can until we can get a better methodology across the country that will be consistent and will reduce this rapid escalation in grants in lieu.

JUSTICE

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Solicitor General.

In our recent hearings on crime prevention, the justice committee examined ways to speed up police response times when dealing with parolees. One valuable suggestion was to enter the individual's parole conditions into the police computer system. Today it only tells whether a person is on parole but not the conditions.

Will the minister require parole conditions to be entered into the national police computer system so that police officers can determine if a person is violating the terms of his or her parole?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his excellent question.

At the present time, general information on transfers and release on parole is available to all police forces through the Canadian Police Information Centre. Any other details on a specific case are communicated in writing to the police in the area where the parolee is released.

However, in accordance with the intent of the new legislation on corrections and parole, a new system aimed at providing better protection for the public will be operational this summer. Furthermore, police will be able to obtain through the CPIC a detailed profile of each parolee, including conditions of parole, which will reduce the response time.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, my question is for the government House leader.

The National Transportation Act review commission report that was presented this week recommends phasing out the subsidies to transportation.

Since the government has already cut 10 per cent from the Crow benefits on grains, oilseeds and their by-products for the coming crop year, what is the government's timetable for the phase-out of the rest of the Crow payment in light of this recommendation?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as I said earlier in the House this week, as the result of the tabling of the report of the National Transportation Act review commission we have sent this report to the Standing Committee on Transport. It will examine the conclusions, tell us what timetable it would prefer for all the different recommendations and whether some of them can be implemented on a practical basis.

At the same time we have set up an internal work force comprising officers of the Department of Transport and people from the different modes of transportation to make their own appraisal of this very excellent report so that at the end of the day we will be able to come to this House with the proper amendments to the legislation.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, the government seems to have already adopted the phase-out portion of the report with the 10 per cent reduction it announced in the economic statement in December.

Is it also the government's intention to pay the Crow benefit to the producer, as was recommended in the report? Has a decision been made to make that payment to the producer on the declining subsidy that is left?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): The answer to this question is no.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and it concerns Panarctic's proposed dumping of 400 tonnes, or 800,000 pounds, of scrap metal into the Arctic Ocean.

The government has a policy, the Arctic environmental strategy, for which this minister is responsible. It is supposed to protect the Arctic environment and fully accommodate the views of the aboriginal people. Given the absolute and total opposition of the Inuit to this proposed dumping, how can the minister allow it to proceed?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I heard the Minister of State for the Environment respond to this question yesterday. She indicated that an appropriate environmental screening of this project was conducted under the provisions of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act and the environmental assessment process.

I was disturbed to learn that we might permit the dumping of such a large amount of steel into Arctic waters. I know the Department of the Environment is similarly concerned. I am told there were public meetings in Resolute before the permit was authorized. In view of the concern that has been expressed by northern leaders, I am told there will be meetings with community representatives to further review those concerns and to see if further appropriate steps are necessary.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, having an environmental assessment review would be welcome news but the first preference of northerners is to see that these metals are removed to the south from where they came.

Has the government rejected the option of totally removing this garbage from the north?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could respond to that.

I understand a number of options have been looked at as to what can be done. One of the requirements of Panarctic is that it clean up its site. That is under the legislation.

Certainly other options were looked at. Land disposal was looked at but given the conditions of permafrost this really was not a feasible option.

The option of transporting these materials south was examined. However, it would cost I understand something in the order of well over $1 million to do that and it was obviously considered excessive considering the situation involved.

As my colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has indicated, there will be further meetings about this. The bottom line is we want to ensure that any disposal is environmentally safe. Certainly the information we have would indicate that it would be safe but obviously further consultations will be under way.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and it concerns the Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu airport land deal.

Yesterday the minister apologized for what he called a departure from good public policy in the sale of the land without tender. I want to thank the minister for his candour yesterday. Perhaps other ministers should do the same every now and then.

Canadians still deserve to know why the policies were not followed. Will he order an inquiry into this land deal and will he table the result of that departmental inquiry in the House of Commons?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, sometimes these things escalate. I think it is a bit of an exaggeration to call it a land deal in the general sense.

I am not happy about the way it was handled. I can tell my colleague that when these long negotiations began the property was of a different configuration than it was when they ended, but nonetheless it should have been tendered.

I have asked my department to look into it fully, to get all the documentation it can and I will table it as soon as it is ready. If there is any need for a more formal inquiry I will consider it at that time, but I believe there should be enough documentation around that he can be fully satisfied as to all of the background.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the minister's reply.

However, could the minister tell the House whether a complete assessment of the property was made before the sale, as required by Treasury Board guidelines? Will he undertake to table this assessment in the House, with the documents he intends to table here later on?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I see no reason why that is not a reasonable request. I will undertake to do it unless there is some procedural requirement that prevents me.

• (1200)

I want to point out one more time that there are lands on both ends of the runway as my colleague probably knows. A portion of the land at one end of the runway has not yet been sold. It certainly will be put up for tender.

IRAN

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

As the minister knows, both Amnesty International and the United Nations have renewed their condemnation of Iran for gross and systematic violations of human rights.

For example, Zarah, an Iranian woman who was beaten, raped, threatened with death by her husband and refused a divorce by male-biased Iranian law escaped to claim refugee status in Canada but was rejected by the IRB and ordered to return to face beatings, prison or even death under Iranian law.

Will the minister, in light of the new IRB regulations offering protection to unprotected battered wives, use his humanitarian and compassionate powers to land Zarah in Canada? Will he deal similarly with the 14 hunger strikers in their eighteenth day of a hunger strike in Vancouver and at least agree to let them stay in Canada until the United Nations has said Iran is a safe country to return to?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, refugee claimants refused convention refugee status by the IRB have their cases reviewed to ensure that they will not face unduly harsh or inhumane treatment upon returning to their country.

That is done in each and every case. The people he referred to will be offered the same treatment. Of course we will review each case individually. In 1992 we had 1,194 claims from Iranian nationals that were accepted and only 12 people were returned to Iran because the circumstances warranted their return. This will also be the case for the ones the hon. member just mentioned.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I would like to inquire about the policy of his department with respect to liability arising from large construction and engineering projects on Indian lands where debts remain unpaid.

Many suppliers and contractors presume that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is essentially a guarantor of Indian financial commitments when the funds are advanced by his department. I would like to understand what his policy is, both in the ethical and in the legal sense.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, this is a very important question raised by the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury and one which other members have also asked me about.

I should begin by indicating that the majority of the bands which are administered across Canada by chiefs and councils handle their own financial arrangements, both their O and M funding and the capital funding they administer, often under multi-year operating budgets. We call them alternative funding arrangements.

The majority of these communities and their leadership pay their bills and meet their financial obligations. There are exceptions. Our position is both legally and morally that in the spirit of the self-government ethic that First Nations are seeking, the minister of Indian affairs and the government should not guarantee bills which are not paid.

There are remedies through the courts and the legal system. It is important for contractors and those who do business with aboriginal communities to realize that they are dealing as they would with any other commercial entity. They are dealing in a situation where contract law must be respected and where it is not, the remedies are to be found through normal legal recourse, notwithstanding my concern that native leaderships live up to their obligations.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I would like to designate Monday as an allotted day or supply day.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

71ST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the 71st report of the Standing Committee on House Management concerning the list of members who are to be on the legislative committee on Bill C-109.

Pursuant to Standing Order 113(1), this report is deemed adopted once it is laid upon the Table.

POINT OF ORDER

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1993-94

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I assume the bill that is about to be introduced is the new borrowing bill which the government proposes to put to the House. If so, I would like to raise a point of order as to its procedural acceptability.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Milliken: Yes, very good, that is the bill that is about to be introduced.

Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 595, states that:

> The Crown, being the executive power, has the responsibility for the raising and spending of money. Acting through responsible Ministers, the Crown makes known to the Commons the financial necessities of government. The Commons grants such aids and supplies as are necessary to meet the demands of the Crown and provides through taxes and other sources of revenue the ways and means to meet the supplies that have been granted. The Crown, therefore, demands money, the Commons grants it and the Senate assents to the grant. The Commons does not vote any money except for the necessities of the country as defined by the Crown.

This particular bill is a borrowing bill. I assume that since it applies for the following year it is a borrowing bill for money for the new financial year. It has been the accepted practice in this House over the last decade and a bit that any such bill will be preceded by a budget or an economic statement that defines, within the meaning of Beauchesne's, the financial requirements of the Crown.

We have had no explanation as to any funding that may be required for borrowing purposes for the new financial year. Indeed, we were given conflicting answers as to whether there is going to be a budget. One day the Minister of Finance thinks there will be and the next day he is thinking about leadership possibilities instead.

I want to look at the practice and I urge Your Honour to look at it also. I have done some research on this and I want to point out that in May 1980, I have gone back that far, following an economic statement in April, a borrowing bill was introduced in the House and that practice basically has been followed ever since.

On two or three occasions during the period of 1981 and 1982 the borrowing authority was included in a supply bill. The Speaker in 1981 ruled that it was improper to include the borrowing bill in a supply bill and had it removed. The government then reintroduced a new bill that gave borrowing authority. That practice has been followed ever since. It was tried again in 1982 in a supply bill but, again following complaints from the opposition, which is the government side at this time, the borrowing authority was removed from the supply bill and placed in another bill.

It has been a very consistent practice since that time that the borrowing bill be introduced separately and that it be introduced following an economic statement. I note for the record that in December of this year in the economic statement, borrowing authority was requested and that borrowing authority has been granted. It was additional borrowing authority for the current financial year. The borrowing authority for this year was originally requested in last year's budget on February 25 and the borrowing bill was in fact introduced immediately the budget was presented.

That has been the practice throughout the term of the government. It was the practice for the few years preceding this government coming to office. I could cite every bill.

I realize I am rising on a procedural point and it would be quite out of order for me to refer to incompetent management on the part of the government as the reason for this bill coming forward and I would not want to do that. It would also be wrong for me to suggest that the government in introducing the bill really does not know what it is doing or that it is busy in a leadership campaign. I will not go into that area because I do want to make the point procedurally. The government is by-passing the normal requirement that it come to the House and present a statement as to the country's finances and explain why it is the government—

• (1210)

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have listened very patiently to the hon. member on his point of order, which in a way is very premature. He based his point of order on a nod of my head when he said: "I imagine the bill is a borrowing bill". As the bill is not yet in front of the House, it has not been printed. I think the hon. member's point of order is somewhat premature.

I will put the motion to the House and once the bill has been printed and comes back to the House at second reading we will hear the hon. member again.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1993-94

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Thomas Siddon (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-117, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1993.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Siddon (for Mr. Mazankowski) moves that this bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BILL C-275

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I ask permission of the House to withdraw Bill C-275. Is this the appropriate time to do that?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to withdraw this bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Bill withdrawn.

Mr. Fisher: Madam Speaker, if I may just explain, it is a bill which has been introduced and printed, unlike the debate a few minutes ago.

It was a bill introduced on the subject of conflict of interest in the House and the Senate. Of course, since the government introduced legislation on the very same subject two or three days ago my bill has become redundant. I would not want to waste the time of the House by insisting that it go forward.

I thank the members for giving me permission to withdraw the bill and I thank you for your time, Madam Speaker.

PETITIONS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present some 9,000 signatures from constituents in the Peterborough federal riding and some of those surrounding it, calling on Parliament to consider major amendments to the Young Offenders Act. The majority of Canadians who signed this petition support equal treatment of criminal offenders but with legislated age shelters from criminal law for very young adolescents.

The petitioners request that Parliament give consideration to revising the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lower maximum age of 13.

WAR CRIMES

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I submit approximately 525 signatures from people from Nepean, Gloucester, Ottawa, Hull and Gatineau, all communities in the Ottawa–Hull area.

These petitioners ask that Canada recognize rape as a war crime and they ask that Canada, through the United Nations, place more emphasis on resolving the deplorable situation in Bosnia and that Canada also communicate its displeasure to governments that promote and condone rape as a means of controlling their people as a weapon of war. For example, they mention again Bosnia, Croatia and India.

• (1215)

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present to the House today. The first petition is from residents of Essex—Windsor and results from a petition drive across the constituency on a single day.

The petition calls the attention of the House to serious problems with the North American free trade agreement. It suggests that Canadians will lose more good jobs as a consequence of this agreement. It suggests that there will be further restrictions placed on the ability of Canada's various governments to assist Canadian industry. It suggests that there is no possibility of this being remedied through renegotiation.

The petitioners therefore call upon the House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the U.S.–Canada free trade agreement.

KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): The second petition I have also comes from my constituency. It is from a group of people who are very concerned about the serial killer board game which has been for sale in Canada. They are concerned that the laws of Canada do not deal with materials portraying torture, rape and murder as fun such as this game.

The petitioners therefore request Parliament to consider amending the Criminal Code so that violence and degrading material such as this serial killer board game can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I too have a petition to present under Standing Order 36. There are slightly more than a thousand signatures on it from residents mainly of the Caroline–Rocky Mountain House area in my riding.

These people recognize that treaty rights entitle treaty Indians to preserve their traditional way of life including hunting, fishing and gathering. However, they point out that there are no bag limits in enforcement of hunting regulations for treaty Indians. They express concern that completely unregulated hunting interferes with good conservation and sound wildlife management practices.

The petitioners therefore call upon us to conclude an agreement with Canada's treaty Indians regarding sound wildlife management practices restricting native rights to hunt, fish and gather for personal consumption and prohibit the sale for profit of wildlife meat or parts obtained by treaty rights.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition duly authorized under Standing Order 36 concerning the Income Tax Act. The petitioners are residents of the federal riding of St. Albert.

In support of automotive technicians the petitioners wish to draw to the attention of the House that many automotive technicians as a condition of employment must provide for all costs including purchase, maintenance and insurance pertaining to their hand tools. Those costs are excessive and the annual updating and replacement of tools are additional costs. Automotive technicians receive no income tax assistance.

The petitioners therefore request that Parliament amend the existing Income Tax Act to address the plight of automotive technicians.

DRUGS AND PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions. The first one states that Bill C-91 allows brand name drug companies to market their drugs without competition from generics for periods up to 20 years. The prices of both new and existing drugs have already increased substantially as a result of Bill C-22 which allows a 10-year period of no generic competition.

The petitioners ask the House not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22, which was passed in 1987. Therefore Canadians will have the full benefit from lower priced generic drugs and provincial and private drug plans will be able to serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees or provide less coverage.

• (1220)

KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): My second petition relates to petitions presented previously by a number of people in the House concerning the serial killer board game.

The petitioners call on Parliament to consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violent and degrading material such as the serial killer board game and the mass murderer trading cards can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

CHRISTINE LAMONT AND DAVID SPENCER

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition from numerous residents of my riding concerning Christine Lamont and David Spencer. They have been sentenced to 28 years in a Brazilian prison and have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment and discrimination in sentencing and parole.

The petitioners urge the Prime Minister to request of the Brazilian government the expulsion of these two Canadians and return them to Canada.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour to present three petitions which include the names of hundreds of Canadians in and around the Elk Island riding. Many of these people are from the communities of Fort Saskatchewan, Beaumont, Sherwood Park, Gibbons, Redwater and the entire Edmonton area.

The petitioners ask Parliament to revise the Young Offenders Act. They are concerned that there should be harsher penalties for young offenders and the act should be changed to make young offenders more accountable for their crimes.

KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present to the House today pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first group of people from the city of Penticton in my riding are concerned about the links between violence and entertainment. They are petitioning Parliament to consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violent and degrading material such as the serial killer board game can be kept from distribution in Canada.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, my second petition is from citizens of the city of Grand Forks. It concerns the present telephone system and their fears under the Unitel thrust that there will be increased costs to local communities.

The petitioners urge the Government of Canada to consult with all affected parties, especially rural residents who are at risk of substantially increased costs for local telephone calls. They further urge the government to hold hearings in rural communities before deciding the fate of Canada's telephone system.

KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I wish to table today an additional 10,180 signatures in a petition asking the government to ban the serial killer board game.

This is in addition to the 14,222 signatures that I tabled some days ago for a grand total of 24,402 people who have expressed their displeasure at the possibility of this product coming into our country.

I want to thank all Canadians who signed this petition. I have several thousand more signatures that I intend to present in the next two weeks.

TAXATION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to table a petition signed primarily by the residents of Prince George and Fort St. James in my riding.

These constituents continue to express their concerns about the goods and services tax. They call upon the government to bring in legislation to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations and to develop a fair tax system in Canada.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege and duty in accordance with Standing Order 36 to present a petition from a number of residents of Kamloops, B.C.

The petitioners point out that Multinational Resources Company has announced its intention to divert the North Thompson River at Valemount in order to sell the water in the region of California, U.S.A. They point out also that the federal government does not prohibit the diversion of Canadian rivers into the U.S.A.

The petitioners therefore urge the government to state categorically that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be diverted into the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, question No. 468 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 468—Mr. Proud:

How many programs does the government presently have that offer (a) direct assistance or grants to businesses (b) indirect assistance or grants to businesses?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): The 1993–94 Main Estimates tabled by the President of the Treasury Board on February 25, 1993, contain a number of federal programs which provide assistance to business.

The main financial assistance programs can be found in the following departments and agencies: Industry, Science and Technology Canada, Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Western Economic Diversification Canada, Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Export Development Corporation, Canadian Commercial Corporation, Farm Credit Corporation and Federal Business Development Bank.

Other direct and indirect business support programs are provided through sectoral activities which can be found in departments and agencies such as Agriculture, Forestry, Energy, Mines and Resources, Transport, Employment and Immigration, Indian and Northern Affairs, External Affairs and International Trade Canada, Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada, National Research Council, National Sciences and Engineering Research Council, and Canadian International Development Agency.

Details could be examined in the respective part IIIs of the departments and agencies noted above.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cardiff: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-112, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Access to Information Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Customs Act, the Federal Court Act, the Income Tax Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and a related act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I have a few words to say on Bill C-112.

Maybe by way of background we could recall the events of 1990. The government told Canadians and Parliament that it was going to have some tax reform. It went on to say that it would not just be tax reform, it would be tax reform in the best tradition. The government undertook to ensure that the reform would result in fair and simplified taxation.

It spared no effort, as will be remembered, in ensuring that its tax reform package got through the system. It used every rule in the book and invented a few rules. It broadly interpreted some other rules to ram the tax changes through this House.

Mr. Whittaker: To say nothing of the eight GST senators.

Mr. Simmons: My friend from Similkameen feels a speech coming on. I did not hear what he was saying. I was coming to that but he reads my notes well from back there with those glasses.

My friend from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt just reminded me of something I want to mention to the House. The government used every rule in the book and every perversion of most of the rules to get the GST, and that is what I am talking about in case some of my friends on the other side of the House have forgotten so soon, the goods and services tax. It is called many other names by those 85 per cent of Canadians who vehemently and strongly oppose that tax measure.

[Translation]

I see my honourable friend, the Minister of Transport, has entered the House. I hope he will make a speech on the subject later on, to indicate to Canadians whether he still supports these measures.

[English]

Mr. Corbeil: Like the Grit sneaky tax.

Mr. Simmons: I would love to hear the Minister of Transport tell us. He seems to be seized with the—

Mr. Siddon: Can I not get an honourable mention here?

Mr. Simmons: They are all excited over there this morning. It must be the leadership. They all see themselves as the Prime Minister of this country. God knows we need a Prime Minister for this country. Need we look further? Why the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Indian Affairs are not out there running, I do not know.

We were talking about the GST, so understand the diversionary tactic. They are not particularly excited about having anybody talk these days about the GST, but I want to do it for a few minutes for old times' sake. I want to one more time before this administration disappears because we are told that as of June 15 it is a whole new millennium, a complete change. All the bad deeds of this administration are going to be swept under the rug, all will be new, there will be a new day dawning around June 15, and all the bad, terrible policies of the Conservative administration will be forgotten by Canadians.

I do not know if the Conservatives are going to invent a new pill, a kind of amnesia pill. Is that what they have in mind? Maybe they are going to administer to all Canadians some kind of a prescription for a pill that will make them forget the bankruptcies of the last eight years. I am not talking only of the bankruptcy of ideas, there has been that as well, but about the pain that has been inflicted on individuals, families and corporations out there, on people trying to do business, trying to run their homes, and trying to maintain and manage their family budgets. I am talking about that kind of bankruptcy, that kind of pain.

What kind of amnesia pill are they going to need—in a quantity of 27 million, and some of us might need a double dose so they had better make a few extra—to get Canadians, including the 12 per cent who still support the government, to forget the pain that has been inflicted by this administration over the past eight or nine years?

Before that millennium arrives and before we get into that brave new world let us talk about another brave new world, the one of late 1988, 1989 and 1990 when this government came before this House and before Canadians and said: We have a great idea. It is called tax reform, it is called the goods and services tax, and we promise it will be fair.

Now that it has been implemented for just over two years, since January 1991, go out there and ask almost any Canadian how fair the GST has been for him or for her. Ask the person who is in university and who must buy some books how fair the goods and services tax is. Then remember that the goods and services tax was going to lower prices.

The Minister for Indian Affairs needs another honourable mention. We need to tell Canadians that he is here signing documents in the House, placing his x on every sheet he has in front of him.

The goods and services tax was supposed to lower prices. It was supposed to be simple. We all remember the very thick document that was put through this House over our objections, over my objections. That was only two years ago. Remember what this tax instrument was going to be. It was going to do away with the manufacturing tax, and yes it did that. It was going to collect some money, and it has sure done that; ask almost any Canadian. It costs a lot to do it. The government will not tell us how much it is costing but it is costing an awful lot of money to collect this goods and services tax. It is costing so much that the government has elected to hide the totals on that particular issue.

It was going to be a simple tax. That is what the former Minister of Finance said the government wanted. He said that it wanted to simplify the tax system. If we want to understand how it has simplified this particular tax then we have to understand the double-talk of this government on many matters. When it says it is going to do something then that is code for saying that it is really going to do the opposite but for the record it has said it will do something else.

On this issue it has been no different. It said it was going to have a simple tax, it was going to have a GST and, boy, girl, is it going to be simple.

After two years Canadians love the simplicity so much that the government has come up with a bit more simplicity, another 350 pages of simplicity. How is that for keeping its promise? The most convoluted, diabolical, and unpopular tax in Canadian history now becomes the most complex tax in Canadian history.

• (1235)

Now, two years and two months into the new tax regime it needs another 350 pages of rules to explain it and make sure it is milking every last cent from those who have to buy books to go to university and from those who are trying to operate small businesses.

I suppose this bill is not a bad opportunity to also remind Canadians about this government. I am not just talking about the gentleman from Baie-Comeau. Sure, he is the leader of that government and leader of his party but he is not the only one responsible for the government's policies, unless the Conservatives have been having a one man show over there. I understood it was a great democratic institution in which everybody had his say. I suppose they mainly say: "Me too", but they have their say.

I am sure the Minister of Indian Affairs has his say. He is known to have not only a considerable mind but a fairly independent mind so I am sure he has his say. Nobody would suggest that he would be a sheep in any administration or any caucus, so we know there is one voice over there speaking out. I know the member for St. John's West, the minister of fisheries, is a man who would not sit quietly by if he saw something of which he did not approve. I could go down the line and mention other people on that side of the House who have established their reputations in their constituencies and across this country as people of integrity and independent mind. I believe that, but which is it? Are they, generally speaking, people of independent mind and integrity, as I believe, or are they a bunch of sheep?

Are they a bunch of sheep saying: The devil made us do it, the only reason we went along with all these policies over the last eight years was that we had a fellow from Baie-Comeau who was leading the charge. That is what we are going to hear over the next few months. They are going to say: All those tax measures are all the legacy of one man, but he is gone now and it will be a brave new world. Which is it?

Were they the team of men and women pooling ideas to put before the House to help run the country, the team they pretended to be and said they were for the last eight years, or were they a bunch of people in bondage? Were they 150 or so people in bondage, being slave-driven by one man from Baie-Comeau who foisted his unpopular ideas and theories of government on everybody? Which is it? It cannot be both.

If this tax measure today and the one that it addresses, the GST, is the brain-child of this government then by extension it must be the brain-child of the minister of employment, who would like to be Prime Minister. It must be the brain-child of the Minister for International Trade, who would like to be Prime Minister. It must be the brain-child of the Minister of National Defence, who would like to be Prime Minister. It must be the brain-child of the Minister of Communications, who would like to be Prime Minister.

I put that on the record because we are going to see the reintroduction of the Tory two-step during the next three months leading up to the leadership convention. The old Tory two-step, in philosophic terms, tends to have it both ways. It tends to move in both directions at once depending on what theory is being supported at the moment.

I have seen a bit of it already, and I am looking forward to that exercise, that fast dance which allows the Minister of Employment and Immigration, Minister of Communications or Minister of National Defence to say in the same mouthful: "Yes, I fully support the gentleman from Baie-Comeau but if he did not have me in complete bondage I would have done it differently".

What we are dealing with here today on March 12 is no different than what we will be dealing with on June 20 or 21, 1993, after the Tory leadership has been resolved. That is the record of an administration of 35 or 38 people, one of whom will likely be the new Prime Minister at least on an interim basis. That is what we are dealing with.

• (1240)

That record is the record of that government, that administration, and not the record of one man. It has to be, particularly when it comes to matters of taxation and tax reform, one of the most arrogant records in Canadian history. Why? I say that because this is the administration that imposed the GST, the most hated tax in Canadian history, not only without proper consultation with Canadians but over the almost unanimous objection of Canadians. Fully 85 per cent had voiced their opposition to this particular tax.

This is the administration that imposed the GST on small businesses, despite their strenuous objections. This is the administration that imposed the GST on provincial governments, despite their objections.

It is true that these changes do not portend any brave new world. They are a bunch of technical changes that will facilitate certain matters and perhaps make the tax grab a little bigger here and there and that kind of thing. The deed was done two or three years ago when the GST was rammed through this House. This is just sharpening the guillotine blade. That is all it does. This is not the policy instrument, it just sharpens the guillotine blade to make sure the head is completely severed rather than doing a clumsy job as in the past couple of years.

Let us be clear, whether they cut my head off cleanly or clumsily they have decapitated me. Whether or not we have another 350 pages of amendments and technical changes is not the real issue here today. I am sure that as we get to clause by clause it will become the issue because the rules require that.

Surely at this point in time the issue is very much the principle of the kind of legislation and the kind of tax reform and taxation measure which this bill is based on. That is why I have used my time to remind us of what this tax was supposed to do. It was supposed to be simple, but I think we can lay that promise to rest. It has gone the way of a lot of those other promises. When the government says simplicity it does not necessarily mean simplicity. When it says fair it does not necessarily mean fair. Do not take my word for it. Ask almost any Canadian who has been paying the GST over the last couple of years.

This is the administration that has increased taxes on Canadians 38 times since 1984. Do not forget that the GST is just one of them. Is it any wonder that the public has no real confidence in the fairness of our tax system? One of the effects of the machinations of the Tories on these issues, on tax reform, other than destroying confidence, has been a larger underground economy than ever before. If there is one area in which this government can take some backhanded credit for improving the economy it is the underground economy, which is the people who have found it convenient to engage in peddling services and goods in such a way that there is no record of the sale and therefore no particular need to collect the tax.

These machinations by the government have undermined consumer confidence. This undermining of consumer confidence is one of the reasons that the recession we are gripped by continues and has deepened.

• (1245)

There will be an election some time in the fall or some time between now and the fall. I suspect it will be in the fall. It is very likely there will be a change of party in power. That is certainly one of the possibilities. I will not be partisan on that point because I see my time is up. However there will be a change and somebody will have to deal with this.

In conclusion let me say how we in this party propose to deal with the issue. We have said we would wipe out the GST. We intend to do that. We are not going to be like our friends in the NDP who think it can just be cancelled and $15 billion will come out the sky from somewhere. Nobody in this party has said if we became the administration we would have what we used to call in high school the big rock candy mountain where everything was free.

There will be taxation. That will come as no surprise to any Canadian. There will be taxation. What we have said and continue to say is that it will be fair taxation. To do that we have said that during the first year of our mandate we will consult Canadians, which is more than this administration has done.

I see my time is up. I wish I had a little extra time to explain to the minister because he is a doubter. He may not vote for us anyway, but I want to tell Canadians who were not consulted last time that this time they will be consulted.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, I have listened with rapt attention to my hon. friend from Burin—St. George's. I have a couple of comments and questions for him.

I noted during his speech that he talked about how the GST had led to massive numbers of bankruptcies throughout Canada. As I travelled across Canada on the GST hearings I noted this was one of the things we ran into. People were predicting the problems the GST would cause them as small business people and people who had to deal with the tax on an ongoing basis.

Another thing became clear to me, particularly in the province of Newfoundland, the Northwest Territories and Yukon, that the cost of living in these three areas of Canada was substantially higher than many areas in central Canada and in my western province of British Columbia.

I wondered from his perspective whether it has been shown that the cost of goods and services is often higher. In some cases in the Northwest Territories, for instance, it was quoted as high as 58 per cent above what it was in centres such as Edmonton and Toronto. In St. John's, Newfoundland the predictions were that the cost of living was some 21 per cent higher. It seemed to me this was an unfair tax.

I have looked at Bill C-112 and I have not been able to find any amendments to make the tax fairer for people in these regions who are already paying more than their full share of taxation, who are already in some cases the most impoverished people in Canada with the highest unemployment rates. Yet this government through its GST legislation appears to be hitting them harder than those in the rest of Canada with a consumption tax.

I would like the member's comment on that. I would also like his comment on whether there is anything within the particular bill that would lead us to believe they will use any of their amendments to help with the education of Canadians through removing taxes on books and publications for educational purposes, or even for casual reading.

Is there any amendment to help people in the educational area and to help the people in Newfoundland, Labrador, Yukon and the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, I thank my friend from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt. He rightly zeroes in on two important issues that flow from this debate.

• (1250)

The cost of living differs from place to place in this country, as he has so kindly drawn to the attention of the House. It is different in Newfoundland, in the Northwest Territories and in certain more geographically remote and less populated parts of the country. In normal times that places an extra financial burden on people who make their lives and their homes in those places, such as in my province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

That problem, as my friend from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt has rightly implied, was aggravated with the introduction of the goods and services tax. The way it is manifested now, to respond to his question, is that I find people are saying to me quite candidly that they want to buy an item but with the extra 7 per cent GST they cannot afford it. They are delaying purchases or they are avoiding purchases.

I will give one example arising from a conversation I had in the last few days. Many people in rural parts of the country rely on all-terrain vehicles and/or snowmobiles or ski-doos as we call them, which is one of the trade names, to get their firewood, in some cases to get their water supplies and for transportation itself. I was talking to a person a few days ago who wanted to buy a ski-doo for about $4,500. Some cost more than that, as we know. He wanted to buy the ski-doo but the extra 315 bucks federal tax on it made the difference between his being able to afford that item and not being able to. For him it is not a luxury or recreation vehicle; it is a work vehicle. That is the way he hauls his wood. That is the way he gets his water. That is the way he goes to work in some cases. That is the way he travels. That is his transportation. That is his wheels, as we say.

The short answer to my friend from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt is that the GST for those people already clobbered by a high cost of living clobbers them to the point where they are foregoing purchases really necessary to their lifestyle, to their way of living.

The second point he raises relates to books. I have always thought that surely even a government so ruthless as this government must have some limits. I thought that books would have been the limit. When that furore arose at the time debate on the bill was in progress, I thought the government would have at least had enough political moxie—if no conscience at least enough political smartness—to smarten up on this one.

The government said in one mouthful: "We want to help Canadians become functionally literate". In the next mouthful it said: "But we are going to tax your effort to become literate. We are going to tax books for leisure reading, casual reading, in the main flow of education at universities and so on. We are going to tax books". That has to be knee-capping of the worst order. A government that perhaps has no sensitivity should at least have had some sensitivity to its own survival, some basic political smarts.

I thank my friend from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt for his question. I am as appalled as he is that on the matter of books the government did not see fit to act differently. I can confirm to him that after the fact, two years into the GST measure, this tax on books is an inconvenience. It is dissuading people from pursuing as aggressively as they would like matters related to education and literacy.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, I rise today to put my comments with respect to Bill C-112 on the record. Sometimes I can say it is a pleasure to rise to speak on bills. However, with respect to Bill C-112, rather than it being a pleasure it is a somewhat painful experience.

After going through some of the amendments in this massive bill I recalled the arguments of the government as it was bringing in the GST. Under the manufacturers' sales tax and the federal sales tax regime there were so many interpretations of the former taxation rules and laws the government wanted to change them for a number of reasons, one being simplification.

We have already had some simplification as a result of its amendments. Now we see in 348 pages of amendments a further simplification of the goods and services tax, further exemptions and further deletions.

Previous speakers have spoken on some of the things not included in this bill that have been requested by thousands of Canadians. I refer very specifically to the deletion of taxation on reading materials. We have just come through literacy day, literacy week and literacy month. The government pays lip service to doing what it can to increase the literacy of all Canadians. The statistics are clear. Those who are functionally illiterate are often the ones who have to take the lower paying jobs and have a harder time surviving in the job market in Canada.

Essentially the government has placed a taxation on education on the one hand with the GST. The majority of Canadians would shake their heads to realize that on the other hand it is putting money into trying to increase literacy in Canada, paying it lip service.

Do not get me wrong, Madam Speaker. More money has to be put into trying to educate Canadians and to ensure that we are the tops in the world with respect to literacy, job availability and income. We can do that through ensuring that the majority of our population, wherever they live in Canada, has equal opportunity to education, to learn to read at least functionally, and to survive in today's modern and technical world.

When we look at Bill C-112 we expect to see a small amendment to encourage people to read rather than the addition of a 7 per cent penalty on learning. We look through the bill to see whether it is one of the amendments and we see the changes mentioned earlier. We can now get a six-pack of yoghurt tax-free and the tax on bull semen is rebatable although not tax-free. However we still have a 7 per cent penalty on education through the taxation on reading materials.

Even though I speak of that specifically I do not suggest for a minute that the goods and services tax is a tax that should have been passed in Canada. Almost 85 per cent of the people of Canada did not originally want the GST. Now that they have seen it, they would like to see the GST scrapped. That is something that we should be discussing, not 348 pages of amendments. We should be discussing legislation that does away with the goods and services tax, that repeals this regressive taxation of Canadians.

What has the GST done for Canada? Why was it put into effect? I do not deny the fact that it was time to get rid of the manufacturers' sales tax.

• (1300)

The argument was that we had to be more competitive on international markets by getting rid of the manufacturers' sales tax. We had to bring in fair taxation. The government chose its version of a value added tax in order to help its wealthy friends, those who were pushing it, who saw it as a benefit to themselves.

When the GST was brought in there was supposed to be a drop in certain retail prices. I recall in one of the hearings a manufacturer of auto parts, a person who very truthfully sat before the finance committee and when asked if Canadian consumers would see a drop in the price from the plant gate as a result of the saving on the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax answered no. He said it would not be passed on because of the administrative costs of the goods and service tax for business and for other sundry events that would occur. He told us that if anything was left over it would be built into profit.

I think over the period of time we have had to look at it and particularly when you talk to auto parts dealers, that is exactly what happened. They got new price lists that simply were the old price lists with increases of 7 per cent for the GST.

This tax has not only hurt the small business community but in some cases in many border towns it has destroyed many businesses.

Walking up Bank Street in Ottawa you see every few blocks a number of stores that have closed down, with signs in their windows saying "Bankruptcy Sale, Going Out of Business" or "Bankruptcy Sale, Pre-Closing Sales". Some of these businesses have been established for a long time.

When you talk to these business people, a number of factors have pushed them to the conclusion that they must go out of business or that they are now to the edge and must declare bankruptcy or the receivers will move in because they cannot pay the loans they have incurred in order to stay in business.

When you talk to them it is the cost of the administration of the GST that is always mentioned. People no longer come in and buy some of the articles because the 7 per cent GST has put the articles out of the range of some low income earners.

For those with higher incomes, 7 per cent on an article they may want to purchase will not make that much difference as to whether they buy it or not. If they want it and they have the money they will purchase it.

People on fixed incomes have to watch money carefully to ensure they have food and clothing for their children and a roof over the heads of their families. That 7 per cent is a major chunk out of their income.

The government will argue that they get a rebate, that each quarter they get some money back. What you find in talking to some of these low income people is that the rebates often go in the fall, for instance, to purchase something for the children so that they have something new to wear to go back to school.

As winter comes along the children need winter boots and overcoats. Often they are forced to purchase these things not at the regular price but at second hand stores and taking hand-me-downs. The 7 per cent on top of that makes a lot of difference to them.

• (1305)

What can we get out of this bill? Who does it help? I suggest it has helped those who have pushed it, such as large business corporations. Those with a lot of money are getting more as a result of this. The middle income class once again is getting the shaft.

I recall a prediction that the manufacturers' sales tax was supposed to bring in $18.5 billion in net revenues to the government coffers in 1991. In the public accounts I see that the GST has brought in gross revenues of slightly over $28 billion but of that $28 billion over $13 billion is paid out in administration and tax rebates. There is slightly over $15 billion in revenues as a result of this, a $3 billion shortfall over what was originally anticipated with the manufacturers' sales tax. Why is that?

It seems that what has happened is that the cost of administering this was much higher than we had been led to believe. The monetary and fiscal policies of this government have driven us into the deepest recession probably in Canadian history and people are not purchasing. Part of the reason they are not purchasing is the high interest rates we had until recently, high dollar, import goods and the GST.

I live in the border town of Osoyoos, British Columbia, and I watched the effect of the goods and services tax on the business communities in our area. As the dollar rose, more and more people flooded across the border, purchasing a lot of goods and many services where they did not have to pay tax. A survey was done of those crossing the border over a two-week period and well over 80 per cent of those surveyed said they were shopping in the United States because they were fed up with taxation in Canada and specifically the goods and services tax was the straw that broke the camel's back. They were not going to pay it and they did not care what the effect was on Canada. They did not want this tax. They could see that large corporations were benefiting and that they as low and middle income earners were hurting.

Almost 30 per cent of the population of the Okanagan Valley is over 65 years of age. Those on fixed incomes said they could not afford the extra 7 per cent they had to pay out for their goods and in some cases their services. They went across the border to get the goods they felt were cheaper.

It had a devastating effect on the small business community of Osoyoos but we watched it tremor up through the Okanagan Valley so that when you went up to Kelowna, some 80 miles to the north the merchants there said that even they were feeling the effect of the goods and services tax and cross-border shopping.

What is the solution? The Liberal member for Burin—St. George's says that the Liberals would wipe out the tax. I would suggest that that is the Liberal position today, but as we have seen the Liberals have changed their position several times. When the GST was introduced by this government the Liberals were split. They could not decide whether they liked it or whether they did not like it. They could not decide whether to bring in alternatives or not. What they finally said was: "We just do not like it. We have no alternatives but we are going to watch this tax".

• (1310)

Later on, after it was brought in, they said: "Well the people of Canada do not like it, perhaps we should get rid of it and maybe we should bring in this little sneaky tax, a tax that will be hidden". They looked at that aspect and how to change it but they knew that would not be popular because it would tax everything, including food, it would be a hidden tax and people would not truck with that. Therefore they said that they would not go along with that.

All of a sudden they said: "Maybe we would make some amendments to the tax". Today they are saying: "We will wipe out the GST".

However I was pleased to see the member finally come around to the position of the New Democratic Party when he said that it would be phased out. I just hope that the Liberal Party will recognize that the phase-out period must be specified and the alternatives that they have to the tax must be specified before an election is called.

I am also pleased to see that the Liberals are finally talking about fair taxation, something that they did not understand when they were in government prior to 1984 and certainly something that the Conservative government has had no inkling about over the last nine years of their short stay in power.

What has happened over the period of time with this tax and who are these amendments in Bill C-112 going to help? I would suggest the same thing once again; that it is not going to help anybody but the large business community. It is not going to help education. It is not going to help the people in Newfoundland and Labrador, the Northwest Territories or Yukon in equalizing taxation and equalizing the cost of living for them.

One other point I would like to make is not on the GST but another amendment concerning the Unemployment Insurance Act. While a minor amendment, it reminds me of the inequities in the Unemployment Insurance Act which was before this Parliament last week and which increases the power of unscrupulous employers.

It seems to me that we should be seeing some changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act ensuring that employees are treated fairly and that unscrupulous employers are not able to use glitches within the system to blackmail their employees into staying and working for them in circumstances under which nobody would want to work.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt has a large seniors' population in his constituency. I also know he is a man who would want them to be fully and correctly informed about the facts.

In reading the local newspapers in the member's riding and listening to his intervention today, I have been troubled by the fact that he is not telling the whole story. I think it is important that the record of the House show that is the fact.

In fact, under this government since 1985, but in particular during the last three years, we have seen the net disposable income of our senior citizens increase after correction for inflation and taxes. I think he would want his constituents to know that.

In fact, the policies of this government which have brought inflation down to its lowest level in more than 25 years represent a net saving to Canada's senior citizens, the persons most in need of assistance from the government. Those inflation controls have reduced the escalation of all the costs that senior citizens and the disadvantaged in society have to bear because of the policies of this government.

The GST tax credit, which the member did not speak of, puts dollars right into the pockets of senior citizens. He has not recognized that it offsets any negative impact for the vast majority of Canada's senior citizens. In fact, most of them come out dollars ahead because of the GST tax credit.

• (1315)

I should also point out that the exemption of food, pharmaceutical products and rent from tax also helps senior citizens and the disadvantaged in society.

The bottom line is that the tax on manufacturers was penalizing and crippling Canadian manufacturers and killing jobs in Canada. By removing that tax we have created a situation where there is much more competition in the marketplace.

Prices are lower and there is more variety. I defy the hon. member to go to the Canadian Tire stores, the grocery stores, the shopping centres in his constituency. He will find more variety, more sales and better choices for consumers of higher quality products than ever before. This is because we removed the tax on Canadian manufacturers. He would be irresponsible in suggesting that we do not have to make that tax up in another way, which most Canadians now have come to understand and accept as necessary to avoid creating a mortgage for our grandchildren to pay.

The question is simply this: Why does the hon. member not tell the senior citizens and the disadvantaged in his constituency that the disposable income of Canadians is $1,500 greater per capita today than it was three years ago?

During the life of this government the disposable income of Canadians, the additional money they have to spend, has increased. That applies more to senior citizens than to the average middle-income Canadian. It is time he told his constituents the truth and the whole truth and not embellish the truth the way he has done.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure to speak to one of my part-time constituents, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. He has a residence in Kaleden which is in my area. I hope he will be able to vote for me in the upcoming election. I know he realizes that I have been telling the truth about this government and that I have done a good job in this area. He even hears that from members of his own party in Penticton which I am always heartened by.

Let me just point out to the minister as well as to the people in my riding and the rest of Canada that what the minister has not told us is that since this government came into power Canadians are paying approximately $1,858 more every year in federal taxes than they were in 1984.

Look in the estimates to see what this government has done with respect to seniors. It has chopped the Seniors Independence Program and cut the New Horizons Program by 40 per cent, a program that has been well used by seniors in Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt as well as the rest of Canada.

He talks of inflation control. Just last Friday in my riding office I was speaking to a senior woman who brought in her old age pension cheque. She explained to me that she had received an increase in that particular cheque of $2.17 over the previous period. I tried to do what the government would do. I explained to her that the inflation rate had dropped and that the Old Age Security was tied to the inflation rate.

She mentioned to me something I already knew and which I would like to pass on to the minister and the government. That rate is based on the food basket and other things. In her area the cost of her housing has gone up something like 15 or 16 per cent over the last year, yet she received an increase of 1.2 per cent. Her heating and utility bills have gone up substantially. The cost of food and related things has gone up. Therefore, her cost of living has gone up 12 to 15 per cent over the past year. However, she was receiving based on the cost of living index across Canada an increase of something like 1.3 per cent on her Old Age Security cheque.

That is the reality of what is happening to the seniors community in my riding and I would suggest the seniors community across Canada.

• (1320)

I dealt with the tax rebates and I know exactly what happens. If the minister were to look at the statistics he would see that often the tax rebates in some cases and in some income levels, yes, are up and above what would normally be paid out in taxes. I do not deny that. My point is that as predicted what is happening is that as these quarterly payments come in people are so up against the wall they are using them to purchase necessities of life.

Recently because one woman had to call in a plumber she did not have sufficient money by the end of the month to buy food for her three children. The GST rebate is being used for things such as that.

The minister mentioned that passing on the taxation was a mortgage for our grandchildren. Let me point out to Canadians and to this minister that under this government our national debt has more than doubled. We are now $460 billion behind the eight ball. Look at the budgets over the last two years. We see predictions of a year and a half ago that our deficit this year would be $22 billion. In October last year, a scant eight months after the last budget, we saw that the prediction was $34 billion.

Now we are hearing sounds from the Minister of Finance that our yearly deficit will be over $34 billion because of this government's monetary and fiscal policies even though the interest rates have dropped, saving this government a couple of billion dollars in interest. This government can still not face up to the fact that it has made a mess of its tenure in office. It has made a mess of the finances of this country. This government is leaving a negative legacy for our grandchildren.

I have this to say to the government: Shame on you, good-bye after the next election.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the recorded division stands deferred until six o'clock p.m, Monday, March 15, 1993.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-102, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming—French River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to rise in the second reading debate on Bill C-102. It is an important bill which will give legitimate legislative effect to excise and tariff measures announced over the past 18 months.

• (1325)

The primary purpose of this bill is to implement a range of measures developed in response to serious problems Canada is facing in the areas of cross-border shopping, tobacco smuggling and tobacco tax evasion. The bill also contains routine administrative and technical tariff changes. I will take a few minutes to review a few of the proposed changes in the legislation.

There is the broad series of measures to address the problems of tobacco smuggling and tax evasion. These measures were announced in February and April 1992.

Last week I was in my riding of Timiskaming—French River. I was talking to a grocery store owner. Until a very short time ago he averaged around $3,000 a week in cigarette sales. As we all know, the government and individual Canadians are very concerned about the health factors of smoking. This gentleman indicated it was not that individuals had stopped smoking. It was more a matter of the number of cartons of cigarettes coming into northern Ontario that had been smuggled across the border and the resulting tax evasion. His sales had dropped from $3,000 to something under $1,000 a week.

One regrettable aspect is that as a small businessman he has lost those sales but for Canadians there are all those taxes that were not paid. It is also regrettable that those cigarettes are still being purchased but they are being purchased at a very reduced price. In fact, it is somewhere around $4 a package under the table.

I applaud the government and the minister for taking these steps. For all Canadians, both those who may have the habit of smoking and those who do not, it is only fair that there should not be a break. There should not be an opportunity for the evasion of taxes by smuggling cigarettes into this country. I believe the proposals in both these budgets made a great step forward.

The adjustment to the excise tax rate on cigars to ensure that cigars are not taxed at a lower rate than cigarettes was announced in September 1991.

I really want to applaud the government and the finance minister on the elimination of the excise tax on ethanol and methanol portions of motor vehicle fuels. This is to encourage the development of fuels made from renewable feedstocks announced in the February 1992 budget. Again, I must say that it is a step in the right direction. Until this morning I was Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The individuals within the energy sector I have talked to over the past four and a half years were certainly very pleased to see that the taxation was taken from that.

Let me again refer to the great riding of Timiskaming—French River where we are looking now at the opportunities for getting an ethanol plant into that region. It is a region that certainly has a heavy base of agricultural products. We can look at using corn stock, grains, artichokes, sugar beets or whatever. We will also be able to use wood products and wood waste. That is another resource which is abundantly ready for us there.

Until the changes which took place in the February 1992 budget it was next to impossible to get anyone interested in investing in either ethanol or methanol. It certainly shows the vision of this government. It is a vision of ensuring the expansion and opportunity for the rural parts of this country. The fact is the finance minister listened to the people in the industry and the agriculture community in the rural parts of Canada. They stated that we had to have a resource that we could develop and enhance and that was ethanol and methanol.

Another item I would quickly like to review is the removal of customs duties from about 25 consumer products announced in the February 1992 budget to help address the cross-border shopping problem. That is another indication of how the government has listened to consumers and retailers, and to members of our caucus who were greatly concerned that changes be made.

Finally, there are the technical changes to the Customs Tariff to respond to industry concerns and meet our international obligations announced in the April 1992 economic statement, and some minor consensual amendments to the Criminal Code and Customs Tariff related to last year's gun control package.

I could certainly go on for a great deal of time on these subjects. The changes we are looking at are correct and are aimed at helping individual Canadians and those involved in the business side, or Canadians over-all, in regard to customs and excise.

I hope that we can see quick passage of Bill C-102 this afternoon because it certainly takes a correct step forward for all Canadians.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this bill which, as the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River said, is an act to amend the Customs Tariff, the the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, Customs Act, Criminal Code and a related act, one would have difficulty in speaking about this or any other method of taxation without the total perspective of where we are coming from.

I think most of us in the House at one time or another in the last four and one-half years have made many presentations, addresses and statements and have asked many questions in Question Period on the economy. I had some indication I would be speaking on this today and I want to put it into the perspective of where we are going with the business of raising money in Canada and spending it.

I thought I would go back to 1984 when the government took power. I want to have a look at some of its promises and aims and I want to look at how they may have been achieved. That might take a long time but I promise that it will not take as long as it might seem. I am not going to go through every budget. I am not going to read every single aim for every single year.

It might be instructive for the House to recall the first budget that the Conservative government put forward on November 8, 1984. I would like to put on the record what the four aims were. The first aim was to put our own fiscal house in order so that we limit and ultimately reverse the massive build-up in public debt and the damage and impact this has on confidence and growth.

The second aim was to redefine the role of government so that it provides a better framework for growth and job creation and less of an obstacle to change and innovation.

The third aim was to foster higher investment, greater innovation, increased international competitiveness and a positive climate for the growth and birth of new enterprise.

The final aim was to bring about these changes in a way that is fair, open and consistent with the basic sense of compassion, tolerance and justice that is characteristic of Canadian society.

When that presentation was made the deficit was believed to be $35 billion and the national debt was $168 billion.

In the budget the following year, May 1985, the four aims were slightly different but in principle fairly similar. They are much shorter so I am going to read them as well. The first aim was to create a tax structure that gives greater encouragement to individual enterprises, risk taking, entrepreneurship and investment. The second aim was to improve the fairness and equity of the tax system. The third aim was to reduce the deficit in the short run through the imposition of temporary surtaxes. The fourth aim was to put in place a revenue structure that would generate resources growing slightly faster than the growth in the economy, thus providing continuing help in the reduction of the deficit over the medium term.

That was in 1985. The annual deficit was about the same at $35 billion, but the national debt had grown beyond $168 billion. I will spare the House going through every budget, 1986, 1987 and 1988. Those were years when growth was big. The country was growing and the western economies were growing. We went through 1989, 1990, 1991 and 1992. On December 3, 1992 the Minister of Finance, a new Minister of Finance, introduced his mini budget, as it was called, which said how terrible it was that the deficit was still $35 billion and that the national debt, despite these great aims and despite the efforts in years of growth, had miraculously more than doubled from $168 billion to, at the time, around $450 billion.

I do not know where to go from here. This is the aim and it has been the same for eight and half years. Now we are told that we are not going to have a budget because there is a leadership race on. We are told that it probably would not be a good thing to introduce a budget. We might have a financial statement.

The reason we may have a financial statement is the same reason we had a mini budget in December. In the words of the finance minister, it was to bolster the faith of the international community which wants to kick us out of the G-7 because of our deficit and debt record. The finance minister says we might have to have some kind of a financial statement and another projection of what the deficit and debt is going to be because we do not want the international community to think that we cannot pay our bills.

I am not surprised that at a minimum the finance minister would want to reassure the international community that we can pay our bills because when the budget was introduced in 1984 we owed roughly 42 per cent of what we made. Our accumulated debt was around 42 per cent of what our Gross Domestic Product was. More important, we owed only 9 per cent of that amount to foreigners.

Today we owe close to 70 per cent of what we make. Our accumulated debt is 70 per cent of the goods and services that are produced in this country, but more important, 30 per cent of that is owed to foreigners. Is there any reason why they should not be concerned that we may not be able to pay our bills? Is there any reason why, at a minimum, as the finance minister says, that we should not have some kind of a statement, never mind the leadership race? We owe it not only to Canadians but to the international community. We owe it 30 per cent of what we make.

We owe the international community a statement to reassure it, to tell it that maybe the deficit will be the same as it was eight and a half years ago and that the national debt will be a little bit more than 70 per cent of what we are worth. We are going to tell it not to worry because we are going to do something that is incredible. We are not sure what that is, but we certainly look forward to it whenever that day happens.

This is serious stuff. Somewhere in Vancouver, I have not seen this, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps you have, I am told there is a clock in Vancouver called the doomsday clock. It shows how much our national debt is increasing. According to this clock it goes up over $1,000 a second. Imagine making that kind of money. That money is owed to foreigners.

I am as concerned as the government is about this problem. On this side of the House we have been criticizing its policies. In general terms one would have hoped that when the economy was increasing and booming in those years I have mentioned, 1984 to 1988-89, the government would have been able, as its aims were in the two years I have mentioned, to reduce the debt and deficit. It was not able to do that.

If the government was unable to reduce the annual deficit and the accumulating debt when times were good and when we were making more, when our gross domestic product was increasing at roughly 3 per cent a year on average over that period of time, how in the name of everything holy with the world recession and our own recession, which at the government's own admission was made in Canada and exacerbated by the ugly and hated goods and services tax, are we going to be able to reduce it? The government has run out of tactics. It has run out of tricks. Now the only thing the government does is blame it on the Liberals, after eight and one-half years.

Maybe it could try to after the first or second year, but as a Liberal I certainly do not believe that I should take credit for something that the government could not do in eight and one-half years.

As if to add insult to injury, all this took place when Canadians were subjected to 38 tax increases. I like numbers because numbers are objective. I distinguish numbers from statistics. These numbers that I have in front of me indicate things like compassion for the individual, tolerance and justice, job creation, growth, a better tax system, temporary surtaxes.

In 1984 personal income taxes as a percentage of total budgetary revenues for the Government of Canada represented 41.2 per cent. This is a Statistics Canada figure. Last year that figure increased to 47.7 per cent. That is an increase over this eight and one-half-year period that I am talking about, this critical period, of 15 per cent for individuals.

What happened to big businesses? What happened to corporations? The percentage of the budgetary revenues they paid went from 13.2 per cent of the national collection in 1984 down to 7.2 per cent last year. That is a decrease of 50 per cent.

I am still talking about taxes. I am talking about the effect that this goods and services tax and the 37 other taxes have had on Canadians. 1990 and 1991 were the last two years for which I can get figures. In 1990 individuals in Canada paid $92.7 billion in taxes. The following year they paid $104.6 billion, which in any man's mathematics is an 11.5 per cent increase in one year in what individuals paid. What about corporations? In 1990 corporations went from $14.6 billion down to $12.4 billion. In other words they had a decrease of 15 per cent.

I could give more figures but I wanted to use those two examples to let everyone know that the Canadian individual on surtax, on real tax, on income tax, on petroleum tax, on cigarette tax, is taxed to death. We are now at the point where if an individual is taxed any more he or she will not be able to contribute to the economy in the best possible efficient manner.

This is hard to explain without graphs but basically we have passed the break-even point where individuals contribute efficiently to the economy. In other words they are paying so many taxes they will not be able to have disposable income to spend in the economy so that the economy can be assisted and helped.

Add to that phenomenon the $100 million that we are losing through the underground economy. That is an estimate. It could be $200 million, it could be $75 million, but it is a lot of money.

This is all related to putting people back to work. I believe the government has attempted in its policies to rectify this serious situation, has tried to create growth and has tried to better the unemployment situation but it has not succeeded. If it were to create a better situation for jobs it would certainly better the situation for the debt and the deficit.

The figures that I have say that for every 100,000 unemployed Canadians getting back into the work force, the federal government would collect $360 million in income tax, providing we do not increase the income tax any more.

For the same 100,000 people getting back to work the government would save $900 million in support payments, welfare and UI that it now costs. For every 100,000 people that go back to work the government in fact is better off by $1.2 billion. If we put a million people back to work, which is three-quarters of what we have unemployed right now, basically we are looking at $12 billion that would help with the deficit this year alone.

Last year we had 77,000 corporate, mostly small business, and individual bankruptcies. That is incredible. It is a record high in a year when the jobless rate was at a record high, over 1.5 million Canadians without work.

It is not me saying that. It is not this side of the House saying that. In a recent CFIB, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, survey conducted in 1992 when concerns about taxes and regulation continued to be the dominant issues, of those people who were surveyed 82 per cent said their main concern was over taxes and 72 per cent said their concern was on regulations. Eighty-eight per cent stated dissatisfaction with the federal government's progress and expenditure reduction that was promised on November 8, 1984.

As I said in this House before, people turn to me and say I am from Newfoundland and that I should know the reason we cannot do anything with our deficit, that I should not have trouble understanding it. After all, a lot of money is spent supporting people on social services and unemployment insurance. Canada cannot afford to spend that kind of money on social programs any more. They are wrong. Not only are they a little bit wrong, they are dead wrong. They have not checked their figures. They have not done their homework.

Canada's social spending is one of the lowest in the world as a percentage of our gross domestic product. I am quoting Statistics Canada figures. Our social spending is 21.5 per cent of our gross domestic product and this compares with an average of 25.6 per cent, almost 20 per cent higher, for all the other industrialized countries in the OECD.

Many of the European nations that we have a lot of respect for financially, whose debts are much lower and whose financial management is considered to be more successful, have high standards of living and successful economies, spend considerably larger percentages of their gross domestic product on social programs. Let me give you some of the figures: Belgium, 37.6 per cent; Holland, 36.1 per cent; West Germany, 31.5 per cent; France, 29 per cent.

The only industrial countries in the world where social spending is lower than Canada's is the United States, with an expenditure of 20.8 percent and Japan at 17.5 percent. But I am not going to talk about Japan.

We know about the current debate concerning socialized medicine and medicare in the United States. A large proportion of their people cannot afford to be sick. The reason their bills get so high and that old age is such a problem in the United States is that when people are in their middle age they are afraid to go to see doctors because they cannot afford to pay the horrendous bill that is facing them, so they wait until it is absolutely necessary to see a doctor when they are older. However, by the time they get to see the doctors they still cannot afford it but they have to go because they do not have a choice. When they get there the financial impact is disastrous.

I have relatives in the United States and they tell me that it is their children and in some cases their grandchildren who have to pay exorbitant sums of money, and I am talking about tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars, that in Canada would not cost you a penny other than your contribution in taxes.

Mr. Speaker, I say to you that whatever the reason for the almost incredible situation with debt and with our deficit we are in, it is not because of social spending.

I want to make this one point before I finish my presentation. I will give one example that I have been involved in to give the House some idea of what it means to the well-being of this country.

I am going to make reference to the EH-101 helicopter program. This is a program that is currently under a lot of fire and is being looked at from many angles. It has come under scrutiny in the last two months because of the Auditor General's report, because the minister showed some ambivalence toward it and because now defence analysts are looking under doormats and through cobwebs for every little thing here and there.

Some of the scrutiny is not exactly accurate, some of it is biased against the program. Certainly one of the jobs I have as defence critic is to sort out the wheat from the chaff. Quite frankly, I am disappointed that there are some areas where the articles written against the program are just not accurate. They are biased against the program. I do not think that is necessary and I do not support it.

On the expenditure of the money involved, the Minister of National Defence, and I hope she is not using this as a ploy, on three occasions that I am aware of and perhaps more has said in the House in opposition to our questioning of the expenditure on these helicopters at this time in our history and our economy that she does not understand what all the fuss is about because in 1990 everyone agreed that the EH-101 helicopter, the Merlin helicopter, was a suitable replacement for the Sea King. It was agreed by all members of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs. This happened in 1990, and now she says: "I do not understand why all of a sudden you are now saying we have a problem with the program", quite apart from the fact that the geostrategic situation has changed tremendously in the period we are talking about. The cold war was pretty cold in 1990.

• (1355)

However I want to focus on the point that I am making on the management of the economy of the country. The deficit at that time was projected to be around $18 billion that year. Let us say it was $20 billion. As 1993 is upon us and as this program is under scrutiny, the deficit is not $20 billion, the deficit is $34.5 billion. If the deficit were what the government had projected it to be in 1990, we could have had not this program but two and one-half of these programs at the same cost. I think that illustrates the difficulties one has in making projections and making promises and trying to do things you do not end up achieving.

Where are we spending money we do not need to spend? I just talked about the $100 million in the underground economy. I just talked about $12 billion if you put one million people back to work.

I was horrified in November when the Auditor General's report stated, and it was substantiated by the Auditor General himself, that hundreds of millions of dollars in corporate tax revenue was lost through offshore tax schemes.

When this first came out the finance minister himself—I was in the House when it happened and I am sure he was doing it with the best information he had—denied that was the case. He said there was something wrong, that we do not lose money through these offshore tax schemes. We tax everybody the same. He did not say that but that was the proposal, that was the information that was involved.

It was a couple of days later at a session of the public accounts committee where the finance officials admitted—I think it was a Tuesday after the Auditor General's report which I believe came out on Wednesday or Thursday of the previous week—they had checked their books and now believed that hundreds of millions of dollars were being lost.

In fact my hon. friend from Broadview—Greenwood suggested it was in the vicinity of $2 billion. Well you can add that $2 billion to the $12 billion and there is $14 billion. That is half the deficit right there.

There was $8 billion in grants and loans to businesses which the businesses themselves have said does not help them. Here is $8 billion more, add that to the $14 billion, that is $22 billion.

Where else do we go? Well, we have a cabinet. I do not make these decisions, it is an observation. We have 36 ministers with their staffs and the overheads to run this country. The United States with 10 times the population is run with 15 cabinet ministers. I suggest there might be some rather large savings there. Some might say I am nickel and diming. Well, I am up to $16 billion without even sitting down with a pencil and paper.

Let me mention another area. My colleagues have gone on about the goods and services tax. I am not going to drive that home any further, but I do want to say that at a time when the recession was with us, when the economy was bankrupt, the idea of a consumption tax that was not in harmony with provincial taxes would not have been introduced by anybody with any financial moxie whatsoever.

Not only did this government insist on doing it but it brought in extra senators, invoking a part of the Constitution that had not been used in 125 years at the cost to the taxpayer of around $30 billion.

I have only one other comment I want to make on the goods and services tax and the economic state that our country is in.

• (1400)

I find it passing strange, I really do, that the government could talk about a goods and services tax in the campaign election of 1988. It was not really identified as a goods and services tax, but was referred to by pessimists as a hidden tax. It was not discussed. It certainly was not introduced as a goods and services tax. It was going to be revenue neutral. It was just going to be a restructuring of things. We were not going to make any money on it. It was going to be simple.

It is so simple that this morning 350 pages were introduced in this House to further simplify it. If that is simple I do not know what the government would consider complex.

My figures say that the manufacturers' sales tax was raised from 8.5 per cent to 13 per cent by this government. It was one of the 38 that I mentioned. It jacked it up and then complained about it. It said that it was too high. This government was the one that raised it, on the backs of the manufacturers. It was discussed in the House this morning.

The government said: "The goods and services tax will make up for that. We will just rearrange things". Then in the midst of the debate the government said: "No, what we will do is use the goods and services tax to help reduce the national debt and the deficit".

The aim was changed but the effect was the same. The manufacturers' sales tax took in $15 billion. Now we are told that the goods and services tax took in about the same: $15 billion. That may not have included the $1 billion or so it cost to introduce the tax. We do not know how much it cost. I would propose that with 350 pages of amendments and efforts to further simplify the goods and services tax we may never know how much it cost to introduce it.

There again is an area that causes great concern. There are other areas that I would like to speak about, such as the transfers to the provinces and the CAP for the wealthier provinces. I would like to discuss the reduction in transfer payments to Newfoundland. It is not a wealthy province and had relied on the federal government for 49 per cent of its income to run the province. That figure has now been reduced to 43 per cent. Over time it has cost the Newfoundland government somewhere in the vicinity of $800 million. This year alone the figure will be $150 million, which is 5 per cent of what it takes to run the whole province. The government cannot tell me that this is not causing a lot of difficulty to people who can least afford it.

I wanted to have on record these remarks on the economy in the context of this bill in front of us. I am sure as it comes up for discussion and further reference, up to and including third reading, and in the minds of those people who look at any subject that refers to taxes and the economy that they will have the macro-economic picture concerning raising taxes to run this country in mind.

I am sure that this side of the House will be ever cognizant of these measures in our resolution to put us back on track and to allow the country to move onwards and upwards in the future.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a few comments on record with respect to Bill C-102.

It is a bill that was brought about partially in response to the bleeding of the Canadian economy across the border as a result of our high dollar, the goods and services tax and taxation that was perceived by Canadians, and rightfully so, to be too high.

The flood of people going across the border and purchasing their goods and services caused a lot of problems for Canadian retailers. From that perspective, I would suggest that there are parts of this bill that are positive for business people within my community and other border communities such as Grand Forks, Midway, Osoyoos and others where businesses directly felt that bleeding of the Canadian economy.

• (1405)

In this bill there are some 30 measures that reduce various tariffs on various goods coming into the country in an attempt to allow our entrepreneurs, our small business community and our retailers to compete a little more successfully against those businesses directly across the border in the United States.

Although it did little at the time when the problem was at its height it was a recognition that a problem was there and something had to be done. In that way I am pleased that some of these changes have been made to assist our small business community, hopefully making it a little more viable given the high number of bankruptcies we have had over the last two or three years within that same business community. Bankruptcy rates have been far in excess of anything we have witnessed in recent Canadian economic history.

One of the areas of the bill I would like to specifically speak on is that part which affects a specific part of the small business community. Some years back the government encouraged entrepreneurs to make bids on opening up duty-free shops along the border crossings into the United States to try to get a little bit more money generated before people left the country and came back into the country.

Within my riding there is a very successful duty-free shop, the Osoyoos duty-free shop run by the Bissonette family. It also runs a similar duty-free shop over in the Cranbrook crossing, at what is called Kingsgate. These shops were set up across Canada. The various bidders on them spent a lot of time putting their bids together and spent a good deal of effort, time and money in setting up their shops once their successful bids were accepted by the government and set into place.

In speaking to other members of Parliament from all sides of the House—Liberals, Conservatives, and New Democrats—who have border communities and duty-free shops, I am told, and it is confirmed by those entrepreneurs operating the duty-free shops, that a good portion of the income of those shops comes from people leaving the country. As they leave the country to go down into the United States for a month, two months, or whatever, they will pick up their supply of Canadian cigarettes and Canadian alcoholic beverages and take them into the United States duty free.

What was proposed in February 1992, under the original section of this bill, was that because of the valid concern of the Canadian government over smuggling of tobacco products into Canada it had to do something to stem that tide. Canadian cigarettes were ending up duty free in the United States, being smuggled back into Canada and then sold, thereby undermining not only our small businesses but our tobacco manufacturers.

While I do not smoke myself and I would encourage others not to smoke because of a number of reasons—health, safety, and environmental—I also appreciate the right of those who so choose to have the availability of cigarettes for their consumption.

• (1410)

The Department of National Revenue turned its guns on the duty-free stores and said that the smuggling was taking place as a result of people taking cigarettes from the duty-free stores and bringing them back in. Subsequently that was found not to be the case.

A recent letter which I received on February 26, 1992 from the Frontier Duty-Free Association said: "A memo indicates that export of cigarettes and tobacco has increased from 3 per cent in 1986 to 14 per cent in 1991. This is a rather considerable figure considering other commodities have increased considerably more. Also, please be aware that in 1986 there were only approximately 10 duty-free shops on the international border whereas now there are 35".

Last week an executive of one of the major tobacco companies in Canada said that of the total amount of cigarettes being exported out of Canada only 4 per cent of the total amount is being exported through duty-free shops, leaving 96 per cent being exported by other means. That shows the small amount that goes through duty-free shops.

The government backed off after negotiations with the duty-free associations and said that because of the co-operation of the duty-free associations across Canada in limiting the number of cartons of cigarettes and tobacco products any one person could take out of their shops it would back off on the duty. It did back off on the duty that was placed, and it was suspended on April 8, 1992. As I understand it, in this bill the tax can still be imposed by Order in Council should the cabinet consider that action is warranted.

I think at this time it would be helpful to the House, to the minister and to the Department of National Revenue to hear the contents of a letter I received in November of last year from the Osoyoos duty-free shop in which the president, Denis Bissonette, sets out some of the problems involved within the duty-free association.

He states: "On behalf of the Frontier Duty-Free Association I wish to express my very serious concerns about the current efforts being made by the members of the departments of finance and revenue to legislate restrictions on sales being made from Canadian duty-free shops.

Presently all Canadian duty-free operations are adhering to a one carton and two-tin limit on all sales of cigarettes and fine-cut tobaccos respectively. These items were voluntarily imposed by each Canadian duty-free operator for the following reasons: one, to gain exemption from the $8 a carton export tax or equivalent from February 12, 1992 and therefore maintain at least some form of a level playing field with our U.S. competitors; two, to demonstrate to the various departments that the Canadian duty-free operators were not involved with the problem of tobacco smuggling into Canada.

Even though the implementation of the export tax was subsequently suspended by our government the Canadian duty-free operators continue to hold true to their volunteered tobacco limits. This was done on the understanding that once officials from the departments of finance and revenue were reasonably convinced that Canadian duty-free operators were not involved with the tobacco smuggling problem discussions would be held to bring the tobacco sales limits to more constructive levels.

At meetings held with representatives of the departments of finance and revenue on June 23, 1992 and September 28, 1992 it was clearly stated by some of the officials present that they were satisfied that all Canadian duty-free shops were complying to the volunteered selling limits and that they now recognized that the Canadian duty-free shops were not part of the smuggling problem.

Therefore the question is why proceed with legislation to limit the sales from Canadian duty-free shops if it has been demonstrated and recognized that Canadian duty-free shops are not part of the smuggling problem. At a time when the Canadian duty-free industry as a whole is facing significantly increased competition from the United States the only consequences of such restrictive actions will be to provide U.S. retailers with an additional competitive advantage and subsequent loss of millions of dollars in tourist revenue.

The Canadian duty-free industry plays a key element in the Canadian economy through its employment of hundreds of Canadian workers and the generation of substantial tax and revenue dollars to the federal and provincial governments. The vast majority of Canadian duty-free industry is composed of small to medium businesses owned by Canadian citizens.

The political agenda of our current government has been to energize and support Canadian small to medium businesses to stimulate the employment of Canadians and to promote exports in other countries. The current actions to legislate limits on the sales from Canadian duty-free shops directly contradicts such agenda. Therefore, on behalf of the Canadian Frontier Duty-Free Association I ask for your support on this most critical of issues to presently face our industry".

That sets out in capsule from what the position of the duty-free people is; that there is no need for the legislation. They are willing and have been co-operating and reporting to the revenue and customs departments any substantial increases in sales to any particular people. To proceed on anything that would unduly limit these entrepreneurs, or in fact force them out of the business or into bankruptcy would be wrong.

Let me move briefly to another area that has opened up by the very fact of this bill and the other bill before the House today. This was mentioned earlier by the hon. member from Newfoundland in his remarks. That is the loss of billions of dollars to the Canadian coffers as a result of the offshore tax havens. We have been talking about that in this party for a number of years. In last year's report the Auditor General confirmed that in his opinion hundreds of millions of dollars were leaking from the Canadian tax base as a result of offshore tax havens.

The response from the Ministry of Finance was that in the guise of competitiveness we had to allow these tax loopholes. It is interesting that when talking to Revenue Canada officials there appears to be a major rift between the Department of Revenue and the Department of Finance with respect to this. Revenue agrees it is a major problem. There is a major bleeding of our taxes through these loopholes. There are some 360 very large corporations using various tax loopholes to benefit their profits.

Revenue officials tell us that the loopholes could be closed without hurting our competitiveness. The competitiveness thing is simply a red herring. There would never and should not be taxation or double taxation of offshore income in Canada. If income is legitimately earned offshore and is brought back in and dividends are paid out to the shareholders or the corporation in Canada, there should not be taxation of that a second time if it has already been taxed in the other jurisdiction. Revenue Canada states that and I do not have a problem with that.

The key crunch is that Revenue Canada officials tell us that it is not hundreds of millions of dollars that are lost, it is billions of dollars. The member mentioned $2 billion. In fact, revenue officials have told me that it is probably higher than that. Billions of dollars per year are lost in taxes to these large corporations using their shell companies and paper transactions.

In two areas the loophole could be closed in what is called loss importation. That is where there are losses offshore, in offshore corporations. Under the present legislation those losses can be brought forward and offset against the profits of the corporation in Canada. That is a major loophole which amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars right there.

There is another one with Canadian source income that is allowed to be funnelled out through an offshore company. An example of that is the Canada Trust Co. case which is a fairly small one. I believe it is before the courts now. Approximately $30 million of mortgages guaranteed by CMHC were sold to a Shell company in the Netherlands. That company apparently then made the income from these CMHC guaranteed mortgages in Canada. Therefore it was income earned in Canada, taken offshore and declared as income of the offshore corporation and dividended back to the same company. The income lost in that particular case appears to be somewhere in the area of $3 million to $4 million. This is fairly small on the whole scale of things but it is an example of what I mean when I say that these tax loopholes could in fact be closed with major consequences.

Those types of things would help the totality of the Canadian economy. It would assist the regular taxpayer in understanding what is going on within the tax regime, that in fact there is a level playing field and that lower income earners are being treated the same as the huge multinationals and the wealthy corporations and taxpayers within Canada.

I just wanted to mention that and point out that there are many things we can do to try and increase the tax fairness in Canada, to try to ensure that we get back the credibility of our government and the credibility of our parliamentary system.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make a few comments with respect to Bill C-102. This bill of course is seeking to enact several tax and tariff measures that have been announced recently.

Some of the measures are notable, for example those addressing tobacco smuggling and tax evasion. The bill also addresses the excise tax rate on cigars and other tariff reductions in order to reduce the cross-border shopping that has been a problem until recently with Canada's high interest rates and high dollar.

Although the bill has some good points, I submit it does not really solve the initial problem which is the fact that we have the GST in the first place. The government knows full well there are many things wrong with this tax. The tax has been a real burden on the economy. It has been difficult for our small business sector to adjust to the administrative costs of this tax. It has been difficult for consumers to put up with the extra financial burden caused by this tax.

The government would solve all problems at once by simply scrapping this tax, phasing it out, getting rid of it and imposing the kind of tax reform we have been requesting for some time. I think the GST is the real source of our misery here. It is not fine tuning of some of the changes that should be made, but take the whole darn thing, do away with it and bring in a system of real tax reform.

I want to cite some very specific problems which have been brought to my attention with respect to the application of the GST. I want to turn to a very specific situation such as the purchase of a new vehicle. Let me break it down into two arguments.

First I would like to look at a private citizen, a person who does not own or operate his own business, purchasing a vehicle. Then I would like to look at the situation of a business registrant purchasing a vehicle. This is someone who pays the GST, has a small business and uses a vehicle as part of that business. This is to show some of the specific problems that have not been addressed by this particular legislation.

• (1425)

First of all the private citizen who trades in his vehicle on a new one has to pay the full cost of the GST on the purchase of that new vehicle. That is fair enough if the consumer also recognizes that in fact there is essentially a tax credit being applied with the trade-in vehicle. That tax credit however goes to the dealer who purchases that vehicle.

Here is where the problem lies. When that consumer trades in that vehicle he is bartering or negotiating on a fair trade-in value for the vehicle. He or she does not realize that what they are bargaining or bartering on in fact includes the 7 per cent GST. The car dealer will then get a GST credit for that when accounting for the sale of that vehicle on his books.

While the private citizen thinks he is getting 100 per cent of the value of the vehicle the situation can be seen where the car dealer would negotiate the price of that vehicle down by 7 per cent to accommodate the cost of the GST, pick up the 7 per cent GST credit on the other side and basically walk away from the deal really without having paid anything in terms of the GST.

It is not the car dealer who has borne the brunt of the 7 per cent GST in that kind of situation. It is the purchaser of the new vehicle. The purchaser has paid the full price of the GST on the new vehicle and very likely may have unknowingly paid the 7 per cent GST on the trade-in value he received on that used vehicle.

I ask if that is fair. I really do not think it is. First of all, each individual dealer should be responsible for telling purchasers that the 7 per cent GST is rolled into that trade-in value and therefore they have to negotiate the cost of that trade-in based upon the 7 per cent that is applied. However, that is not happening so people are trading in vehicles not realizing they are essentially paying that trade-in cost.

The other situation is even more difficult. A business registrant purchases a new vehicle and has a vehicle which has been used at least 90 per cent of the time for business. That individual trades in that vehicle. The GST again is rolled into the trade-in value of that used vehicle and the car dealer who purchased that vehicle will of course be given the GST credit. What will happen is that the business registrant will pay the GST on the value of the new vehicle and on the value of the trade.

Here is where the real problem exists. I submit that probably 90 per cent of business owners who trade in a vehicle on a new one do not realize that they will be assessed through the business taxation for the trade-in of that vehicle. This is because as a business they are in fact selling that vehicle to the car dealer and they will be assessed. If the books are audited, you can be darn sure that Revenue Canada will assess the 7 per cent GST on the trade-in of that vehicle. I want to restate that business owners are unaware that they could be audited and assessed the taxes on that vehicle.

That is a difficult situation because the car dealers are under no obligation to explain to the businessman or the individual citizen when they come in to purchase a new vehicle and trade in their old vehicle that the trade-in price actually includes the GST.

I want to read a letter from a chartered accountant in my home town of Vernon, British Columbia, which I think clearly lays out the argument. As I was mentioning, a business registrant negotiated the trade-in of a vehicle on a new vehicle and then was assessed the GST on the trade of that vehicle. He wrote: "The GST office states that unless a policy directive comes out from Ottawa they have no other choice of action and will not put in writing that the dealer is responsible to reimburse the registrant. They maintain that the only recourse open to the registrant is for him to take the matter to court".

Essentially he is saying that unless the purchaser of the new vehicle, the business owner, goes in and assesses the car dealer for the 7 per cent GST after the purchase goes through, there is no way of going back on it once he finds out. The car dealers are saying that the GST price is rolled into the negotiated trade-in value. Because they do not mention that to the customer, in this case the business customer, the customer has no way of knowing and after the fact has no way, other than through the courts, to reclaim the 7 per cent on the trade-in value due and owing to him.

To go back to the letter, Mr. Beardsell wrote: "This situation is unreasonable and could very easily be rectified by a change in assessing policy. Presently the dealer claims a notational credit of 7/107 on the trade-in received and the registrant is taxed by audit assessment on the trade-in. The government comes out even but the registrant is out of pocket by 7 per cent since the dealer is after the fact stating that the trade-in price includes the GST". He goes on to state: "If the auditor was simply instructed to assess the dealer instead of the registrant when he finds no GST is charged on the trade then fairness would be achieved".

The letter points out that a lot of business people are trading in their vehicles and paying the GST, not collecting it from the car dealer, not knowing that they have to, and later being hammered by Revenue Canada for the 7 per cent of the cost of their vehicles. That is simply unfair. It is also unfair that the government does not make clear in applying the GST toward the trade-in and the purchase of new vehicles that the onus is upon the purchaser of the vehicle, if he or she is a business person and uses the vehicle for business purposes, to collect the GST from the car dealer. It is terribly confusing. I am sure the people who will read my explanation of it will be as confused as members sitting here listening to my explanation of it. The whole process is terribly confusing.

With the confusion many people are being unnecessarily penalized by the 7 per cent GST on the trade-in of vehicles because they do not find out until well after the fact and there is no process for them other than through the courts.

This is only one aspect in which the GST has proven to be such a terrible headache. There are many other horror stories in terms of the application of this tax. But, for goodness sake, at least we could make things clear.

The government through its GST offices could clarify the point for the purchasers of vehicles. It could put the onus on car dealers to make sure that when people buy vehicles they know, if they are a private citizen, that the negotiated price of that trade-in includes the GST. They should also know that if they are a business registrant who is selling a vehicle to a car dealer to buy another vehicle from him they have to assess from the car dealer that 7 per cent GST on the cost of the trade-in vehicle they are selling the dealer. If they do not do so, come the end of the tax year they are going to be assessed through Revenue Canada.

How many business people know that? How many business people have been screwed on this? It is terribly unfair.

• (1435)

The government has to bring in some clarification. Tax accountants have been calling for them. I understand the car dealers lobbied to have it this way so that they could get away with this kind of stuff. I am not saying that every car dealer out there is surreptitiously using this little loophole to slide 7 per cent into their pockets. I am not saying they are all doing that, but I submit the option is there should any unscrupulous dealer wish to do it. It has to be cleared up.

The government should instruct the car dealers through Revenue Canada that they have the responsibility to make this point very clear upon the sale of any vehicle. They have the moral responsibility and I would suggest the legal responsibility to make it clear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

NATIONAL ROUND TABLE ON THE ENVIRONMENT AND THE ECONOMY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Thursday, March 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Charest that Bill C-72, an act to establish the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us today carries the title, an act to establish the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy.

In the limited time available I will focus on the weak side of this bill which as in many legislative measures also has positive and strong aspects. I will bring to the attention of the House what in my assessment is weak and requires modification.

Clause 4 of the bill outlines its purpose and subclauses (b) and (d) are not strong enough. Perhaps they are not clear enough. When defining the role of this round table to the effect that it advises the government on ways of incorporating environmental and economic considerations, the approach ought to be modified, re-examined and written in a different manner.

If we incorporate environmental and economic considerations we do not necessarily intend to mesh the two and integrate the two. Therefore we still treat the environment as a separate entity from the economy. It seems to me the purpose of this round table would be much better defined if it were instead to read under subclause (b): "advising governments on ways of meshing environmental and economic considerations". In so doing we will have said in different words what sustainable development is all about. That is the point I wanted to make.

In subclause (d) the round table should and is doing more than increasing public awareness. It is also promoting the understanding of sustainable development. That particular aspect of the role of the round table ought to be defined in subclause (d) of the purpose portion of the bill.

Finally, it seems to me that since the words sustainable development pop up on almost every page of this bill, particularly in the definitions section, setting the pace for the framework within which this bill is established and for the raison d'être of the round table, actually the name of the round table ought to be changed and reflected in the title of the bill. Instead of the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy it ought to be renamed the national round table on sustainable development. That is what this round table is all about.

While this may seem to be semantics I would suggest it is more than that. What is being attempted here is to get across the importance of a concept that has emerged since the publication of the Brundtland report, Our Common Future, in 1987, namely the integration of the environment and the economy rather than their separation. We treat the environment and the economy as separate entities, but when we refer to a round table on sustainable development we automatically, by virtue of the use of the term sustainable development, integrate the two. I hope I have succeeded in conveying the importance of the concept of sustainable development and what it is all about.

In receiving this bill and debating it today there seems to be strange behaviour on the part of the government. Having axed the Economic Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission, the Science Council of Canada and the Peace and Security Institute, we wonder why the government sees the necessity at this stage to give legislative status to the national round table. It almost makes us think of schizophrenic behaviour in a sense, having demolished on the one hand and on the other hand seeing the necessity to make up for its sins and giving the round table a legislative status. The round table can function with or without it, as we all know.

We are glad to support the initiative but we are puzzled when we ask ourselves how it fits into the over-all policy scheme of the government. This leads me to the third point I would like to make this afternoon.

I would like to compress my time so that my colleague from Edmonton Southeast can make an intervention before the adjournment. The basic question as we debate Bill C-72, an act to establish the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy, is how much of an impact the round table has had on government policies, on government decisions, since its inception.

The question must be put and not because the round table has been idle and unproductive. On the contrary, the round table has produced a wealth of documents, a wealth of intellectual input as already described in the debate yesterday by my colleagues. There is phenomenal enthusiasm and desire to advance the cause of sustainable development within a clear, cohesive and convincing intellectual framework.

What has been the impact on energy policy, on transportation policies, on agriculture, or most recently on overseas development? What has been the impact of the policy input that has been made available and which the government could have picked up on but by all evidence so far has not? Let me bring a couple of examples to your attention and then I will conclude.

• (1445)

First of all I will give you a minute example in the agricultural policies. I learned in March of last year of the decision of the Minister of Agriculture to exempt fertilizers from the GST. It does not make sense. Apart from the fact that the government lends itself to fierce criticism when people would understandably and quite rightly so inquire why exempt fertilizers but not books? What is so special about them?

As we stand here today in debate on this issue it has been a full 12 months since this harmless looking little regulation was announced by the Department of Agriculture in March 1992. Chemical pesticides are exempt from the GST. How do you reconcile it? It may have been only an anomaly, a strange behaviour on the part of the Minister of Agriculture under pressure. I do not know.

In last week's report by the National Transportation Act review commission we find another little item, recommendation No. 6 which reads: "We recommend that consideration of environmental methods not be addressed specifically in the National Transportation Act, but rather continue to fall under environmental protection statutes of general application". This is business as usual, the old outdated approach. It is not the approach the round table is desperately trying to advance on its agenda. In other words it does not make sense.

The mindset of those who have power does not take into account the changing times and the efforts being made by agencies and institutions such as the round table. Therefore the legitimacy of the question is whether it has an impact at the centre, whether it has an impact where it matters.

The most significant and disturbing example that one can raise in connection with this debate is the decision of the Government of Canada to reduce its aid to developing countries and in particular to the less developed countries.

It does not make sense to learn as we did some 10 days ago that countries such as Niger, Ethiopia, Uganda, Mali and a number of Sahara region nations and others struggling desperately at the bottom of the human resources index produced by the UNDP will be cut by the Government of Canada in the name of debt reduction at home.

It does not make sense because if you look at the projects in which CIDA is engaged on behalf of Canada in those countries, in those regions, you will see they are oriented to water, public health, agricultural rehabilitation and to fight desertification. All these are initiatives I am sure members opposite are very familiar with and actually which everybody in this House would want not to abandon, would want if anything to strengthen and expand.

One has to raise this issue in the context of this debate because it raises the question of the fight against poverty, on the issue of helping those who need help the most and within the broader concept of sustainable development which is the kind of development in which we believe at home as well as abroad. The round table has a big stake in the promotion of this agenda, in the movement toward these objectives. When you read that the Government of Canada decides to abolish, as in the case of Niger, a program that over five years amounts to some $12 million in water, in agriculture, in alternative sources of energy and in health, then you wonder what kind of contradictions we are facing and what on earth is going on.

My time is not quite up but I will be glad to share it with my colleague from Edmonton East. This is a very important issue and I thank you for your attention.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have another member who wishes to speak also. That is why I am looking at the hon. members. I have the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap and I have the hon. member for Edmonton East. I have ten minutes, if we can divide the time equally.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. For your information, Mr. Speaker, my intention is to speak during private members' hour on the motion that will be before the House at that time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, when we are both from Edmonton it is a little painful to think, Sir, that you do not know that it is Southeast. You have been reading a lot about Edmonton East in the Edmonton papers lately, I think.

To pick up, if I may, where my friend left off, and my friend's sincerity in this House is with only that of the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka.

An hon. member: It's worth waiting for to hear that, isn't it Stan?

Mr. Kilgour: I would like to pick up the point of the question of cutting aid to countries like Niger and Uganda. I think it is one that all of us should be reflecting upon. Canada's aid has gone down from a peak of 0.5 per cent of GDP and could drop down to 0.3 per cent in the next three years.

It was pointed out this morning by The Globe and Mail, which is not always cited by those of us on this side of the House:

> In 1974, when the debt was $25 billion, the federal government spent about one-tenth of its revenues on interest payments. In 1992, when the debt had soared to $425 billion, the proportion had risen to almost one-third.
> Under pressure to stop the tide of debt, Ottawa is cutting $4.4 billion from its planned aid spending over five years. This may cause the cancellation of excellent programs such as the Canadian effort to rebuild the health system in Uganda. Unless something else happens and steps in to help health problems that are often lethal, impure water and poor hygiene will remain and people will die.

On the subject of Uganda I might point out to the members that the former High Commissioner of Canada to Uganda, who is a friend of mine, was working on AIDS research in a hospital in London, England when the new government asked him to come as their High Commissioner. He came for four years. He got aid re-established to Uganda. Now I understand that all of our aid to Uganda is going to be ended.

The question about a world in balance is one that is, I think, troubling to all thoughtful members in this House and one I think we all feel is a vital part of sustainable development around the world. The National Round Table on the Environment and Economy, as you know, has produced a series of excellent policy papers, for example, "On the Road to Brazil: The Earth Summit", "Trade, Environment and Competitiveness", "Discussion on Decision-Making Practices for Sustainable Development", "Sustainable Development: A Manager's Handbook", the "National waste reduction handbook", "Preserving Our World: a consumer's guide to the Brundtland Report" and "Toward Sustainable Communities: A resource book for municipal and local governments".

What Brundtland has said, as members know, is that sustainable development has to become a responsibility of all departments of government, probably most of all the Department of Finance which sent money off only recently for a project in the developing world which by any concept of sustainable development and human rights strikes me as at the least simply bizarre.

We have to get it into the heads of the people in the finance department, particularly the international section of the finance department, that they have to take greater account of sustainable development issues like population control around the world if we are to use Canadian tax dollars with some sense of stewardship. This is something that many Canadians feel is not now being done, particularly when the government is proposing to further reduce grants to the poorest nations in the world, quite contrary to CIDA's mandate, in favour of reallocating money to eastern Europe.

I am not saying that money should not go to eastern Europe, but for heaven's sake how can we spend $5.8 billion on submarine-chasing helicopters and yet turn and say to Uganda or Niger or many other nations in the developing world that we have no more money for them, but that we have money for the Rolls Royce of helicopters? It is something that I hope those on the other side will consider more and more. The public of Canada is firmly behind both opposition parties and I am sure members on the government side are saying this is the wrong expenditure at the wrong time and in the wrong way.

I have just a few thoughts, if I may, on the bill itself. I guess one is allowed to speak about the bill specifically when we are discussing a bill.

An hon. member: That is a good idea, David.

Mr. Kilgour: Thank you. I believe this is virtually the first any of us have seen of this bill. We have just abolished something like 46 agencies and other actors on behalf of the government, including the Economic Council of Canada, and now it wants to set up a new one.

I have read the bill quickly and it certainly has the earmarks of many bills that appear in this House. It is interesting to see that the government's definition of sustainable development means development that meets the needs of the present generation without compromising the abilities of future generations to meet their own needs.

How could we compromise the future of our children and our young people, including the pages, by running up what now appears to be a net federal-provincial government debt of very close to $660 billion?

As Premier Wells said the other day, in the mid-1970s each family's share of our national debt, or mortgage if you like, was about $50,000. Today each family of four share of our national mortgage is about $660,000. What have we done to sustainable development both in terms of our children's futures and in terms of not overtaxing resources and not doing precisely the kinds of things that the Brundtland commission said we should stop doing around the world, including in Canada?

I wish this round table well, as I am sure all members do, but again let me go over to the section on members. "Members to serve three years", and then there is this quotation: "the members shall maintain a broadly representative membership that reflects the needs for concerted actions in all sectors of Canadian society and all regions of Canada to attain sustainable development", and then: "a person is not eligible to be appointed as a member if the person does not have knowledge or experience to assist the round table in fulfilling its purpose".

I must say, Mr. Speaker, because you are from Edmonton and you know that 14 Albertans have been murdered since 1986 by what I would consider to be moronic decisions of the Parole Board. I think you will perhaps agree that the prairie panel of the National Parole Board consists mostly of people whose service to the community has been in the service of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada. I am thinking of the former campaign manager for the Minister of Constitutional Affairs, former president of his constituency—

Mr. Whittaker: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am very reluctant to interrupt but I see we are just about out of time. I have had discussions with the other two parties with respect to the vote on Bill C-112 and I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow that vote to go on division as opposed to a standing vote. I believe all parties in the House have agreed to that.

• (1500)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered. There is another minute for the hon. member.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, it seems absolutely vital that on this organization we not use it as a patronage dumping ground, that we do what the bill says: We appoint people like the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka who have a deep and abiding knowledge of this issue rather than somebody who happens to need a kind of plum to sit on.

I hope that the next Government of Canada, if this thing goes ahead before there is a new election, will take very seriously the need to appoint only qualified men and women to the body.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

SMALL BUSINESS SECTOR

"BUY CANADA" PROGRAM

The House resumed, from February 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Whittaker:

Private Members' Business

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of developing a healthy small business sector in Canada by targeting more federal contracts to the small business sector and establishing a more aggressive "Buy Canada" program.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure to support the motion of my friend and colleague, the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

This is a very important motion for small businesses right across Canada because it talks about the need to assist our small business community with an effective and aggressive buy Canada program.

I want to recite some statistical information relating to Canada's small business sector because I think a lot of people do not understand how important this particular sector is to the national economy. Certainly it is important to the economy throughout the Okanagan Valley which relies very heavily on tourism, the forestry sector and the agricultural sector, much of which employs our small business community.

Over 97 per cent of businesses throughout Canada are small businesses. Small businesses are defined as having under 50 employees. Looking at the figures from 1981 to 1989 over those years, small businesses created almost 82 per cent of the new jobs in Canada.

It is interesting to look at the number of jobs created by the small business sector compared to the number of jobs created over the same period of time in the large corporate sector, particularly the foreign-owned corporate sector. What we find is that with the foreign-owned interests in Canada there is actually a net job loss even though there is a substantial increase in net profits. There was a job loss from our large foreign-owned corporate sector whereas small businesses in Canada, taking the brunt of the responsibility, taking the brunt of the impact of the recession, were the ones still able to produce 82 per cent of the new jobs.

Almost 14,000 businesses declared bankruptcy in 1991 when the recession really started to take a bite. Business bankruptcies in the small business sector are up over 50 per cent since the recession began, with over 3,600 companies going under in the first three months of 1992 alone.

Small businesses are risky. They have difficulty in raising capital, in finding venture capital, in finding high-risk capital for acquisition and for expansion of the businesses. They have difficulty securing loans to maintain their businesses. The banking community is certainly no friend of the small business community. They continually have to fight the high interest rate policy that this government has followed. Even though interest rates have come down somewhat over the past little while, our real interest rate, which is the difference between the interest rate and the inflationary rate, is still very much higher than it is in the United States. We still have a long way to go to bring that down to some degree of sensibility.

Another thing that has really hurt small business is the imposition of the GST. We know that the GST was introduced in large measure because the government was going to lose billions of dollars of revenue from the imposition of the tariff reductions under the FTA. In the first year alone over $2.2 billion was taken out of the revenues of the federal government as a result of the FTA. Who had to bear the burden of that? It was our consumers and our small business sector.

It needs some help. It is a vibrant sector of our economy, but it is a sector that is also the most vulnerable to the swings in our economy.

I would like to point out that the federal Department of Supply and Services purchases some $8 billion in goods and services on a competitive basis each year and some $3 billion on a non-competitive basis. These bids are solicited from lists of companies or individuals who have registered as potential suppliers. For low-dollar bids, less than $25,000 on a bid, Supply and Services Canada uses a rotational bidding system.

This bidding system requires that procurements be advertised to give businesses better access to government contracting opportunities. The Canadian sourcing policy limits competition for government procurement to domestic suppliers wherever possible. We also have some other programs in place, such as the Canadian content premium policy and the area buy policy, that have helped somewhat.

I want to point out a problem we have had since the free trade agreement was implemented, which has really put the concept of buying Canadian and helping our small business sector into jeopardy. According to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, Canada and the U.S. cannot protect domestic products or suppliers or discriminate against foreign products or suppliers who bid on purchases with a value of over $204,000. That is a pretty high value.

The Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement dropped that threshold for competitive foreign bidding down to $29,000, which has had a very significant impact on our Canadian small business sector.

Let me point out that American federal departments and agencies are required to participate in a similar program in America. It is called the buy America program and favours suppliers based in the United States and gives preference to U.S. products. It is similar to Canada.

This act is also overruled somewhat by both the FTA and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, but there is a real difference between the limitations placed on Canadian small businesses and the limitations placed on small businesses in the U.S. Let me point out what the difference is.

In the United States the small business administration defines a small business as having up to 500 employees—that is considerably different than the definition in Canada—and up to $3.5 million in receipts. In Canada companies of this size are not considered small businesses. That is a fairly large corporation in Canada.

The U.S. small business act and small business set aside program are not affected by either GATT or the FTA, but the FTA prevents an effective buy Canada program. It affects the Canadian sourcing policy and the Canadian content policy for any purchases over $29,000. In the United States there is a similar situation but the dollar value is not anywhere near as low as Canada's.

Why is the United States allowed to effectively use protectionist trade practices that provide a much greater incentive to small businesses as they are defined in the United States than Canada is allowed to provide to small businesses as we define them in Canada? There is a substantial difference both in the definition and in the allowable limits.

Just to sum up very briefly, this points out one very particular way in which the provisions of the free trade agreement, as they are applied to the small business sector in Canada, have had such a dramatic impact in terms of allowing competitive foreign bids to come in for government procurement. This was one of the reasons the government wanted to initiate the free trade agreement in the first place. It said that it would allow access to U.S. markets and U.S. government procurement. We see that the programs in the United States have protected its small business sector even under the provisions of the free trade agreement much more so than we have in Canada.

What I am saying is that we have a situation where on the one hand small business in Canada is really under the gun as a result of the free trade agreement. On the other hand, small business in the United States has been given much more latitude and much more protection.

As a result of that, my colleague the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt has brought in this private member's motion to try and convince this government of the error of its ways. It is hoped this will convince the government that we need some action to help our small business communities, our entrepreneurs from Victoria to St. John's. We need to help them not with a hand-out but with a hand-up. Give them a boost so we can put people back to work in Canada and help our small business community once again become the vibrant job-creating engine it has been in the past.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate, the hon. member for Red Deer. The hon. member has two minutes.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that I will need two minutes. The hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt asked me for an indication as to whether or not I was going to support his motion. He knows very well that I have relatives who live in his riding. Unfortunately one of them voted for him which shows a little bad judgment on her part.

I do think this member has shown a little bit of good judgment in this motion and I have no trouble at all in supporting it. The principle in it is real. The government should be supporting small business because, as the previous speaker indicated, small business is the heart of our economy. It is what makes this country go.

While I have the floor I also want to indicate that the Chamber of Commerce in my riding of Red Deer has connected into a computerized program of electronic bulletin boards. It is making information available to its members. Its members in Red Deer have had access to three times as many government contracts during the past year as they have had in the past two years. It is working. The contracts are available to small business.

I am not sure what the hon. member is intending with this motion but it is certainly not going to hurt us to discuss it a little further and to encourage it. It is a good objective and I definitely support it and will be indicating so later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 3.14 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 93, the time provided for the debate has expired.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay. Carried.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 3.14 p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday, March 15, 1993, at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 3.14 p.m.

NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS TAX ALLOWANCE

CONTINUATION OF BENEFITS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the discrepancies in the Northern and Isolated Areas Tax Allowance should be cleared up and the tax benefits continued.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House to speak to a motion sponsored by me that has been chosen for debate today.

The motion first presented some time ago reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the discrepancies in the Northern and Isolated Areas Tax Allowance should be cleared up and the tax benefits continued.

I have reviewed some of the previous debates on this issue. It is interesting to note that this may be the first real debate this House has had on this issue, certainly since changes were made to the program by the government in late 1990.

Before proceeding I want to thank a couple of my colleagues who have been helpful in our northern caucus in doing research and following this issue very closely. The member for Churchill has done much of the work for our caucus on this issue. I thank him and his staff for their assistance. As well, the member for Skeena, whose seat adjoins mine to the west, has had much experience on this particular issue and has also provided valuable information. As well, my colleagues from Prince Albert—Churchill River and The Battlefords—Meadow Lake have participated in our caucus discussions. This is a very important issue to our constituents.

I thank them and others who have expressed their ongoing concern over this issue. I look forward to the debate and discussion today.

• (1115)

Canada is a northern country. Many of us now recognize that with the subtle change in our description of Canada as being from sea to sea to sea.

We now recognize that a large part of our country exists beyond the 49th parallel and our close relationship to the United States. Many of us who represent constituencies like mine also have communities that are remote even from the major centres in our own ridings. In my area, for example, communities like Fort St. James, Granisle and Valemount come to mind.

The important point to make is that these communities are just as much a part of Canada as are the cities we see most often on television and in the news. Our communities may not be the setting for programs like Street Legal and the like but they are part of what makes our country.

In fact many have argued that the wealth of Canada has been largely created by these remote areas. One just has to look at the forest industry for example. Over 300 communities in Canada depend on the forest industry for survival. Many communities live or die by the mining or fishing industry and their success or failure. It is the financial return to those businesses and the tax revenues to government that have enabled us to have many of the services we have today.

However, inherent in much of the way the system has evolved is that it is not fair in the way many of these communities are treated by the tax system and generally speaking, by the lack of services and programs that government provides.

It is my view that the northern and isolated areas tax benefit program helped many of these communities and the rationale for reinstating the program in those areas that this government cut it from is still relevant today.

In a report prepared by the Library of Parliament a number of reasons were given as to why such a program was needed. The higher cost of living is mentioned, as is the lack of services that do not exist in many large centres or are taken for granted in many communities. It also notes that the northern tax benefit helps offset the higher tax burden on those who receive higher wages for just living and working in a community like this.

As a country, if we are to develop and gain from our resources we must be able to attract the people to those areas to help extract those resources and of course to hopefully add value to those raw resources. A benefit program helps with that. The development of these resources and these communities clearly helps all the people of our country.

I want to make the point as well that while my interest is in those areas which might normally be defined as northern, the original program was also for isolated areas. Living in certain parts of the Kootenays in British Columbia or parts of New Brunswick or Saskatchewan is just as remote as living in a northern community.

It is my view that not only should the program be reinstated, it should also be returned to those areas deemed remote that might have been eligible before. I will return to that point later.

Under the original program which came into effect in 1987 all individuals residing for at least six consecutive months in qualifying communities received a deduction of up to $450 per month. The key object at that time according to the Minister of Finance in a May 1990 response to a petition I tabled in the House was to "encourage workers to move to and settle in northern and isolated areas where recruitment is difficult".

The administration of the program was clearly a problem at the start. Members who have had experience with the system can cite many of them. Most of the problems resulted from boundary disputes—a point I will discuss later as well—in determining which communities were eligible.

As well, it would seem that the department, in this case National Revenue, certainly was not prepared for the administration of the program. Just to use one example in my riding, McBride which is east of Prince George was confused with McBride Lake which is south of Houston and a four hour drive from Prince George.

I am sure other members dealt with many similar problems my office had. Those of us who represent these northern communities, ourselves and certainly our staffs, have become somewhat expert in having to deal with the particular program and some of the discrepancies in it.

• (1120)

The problems were immense. In April 1988 the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas was established to look at these problems. After public hearings were held throughout many areas the report was presented to the Minister of Finance on October 27, 1989. The report's recommendations were not well received in many parts of the country. Even the current Minister of Forestry, the member for Prince George—Peace River, said in the November 17, 1989 Prince George Citizen that he was disappointed with the task force recommendations.

Among the problems with the task force was its initial instruction to produce a revenue neutral recommendation. This direction could only lead to a reduction in the program. I want to spend a bit of time on the next point because it goes to the crux of the problems the government has accepted and the alternative I wish to present.

The report's main recommendation was to reject the community-by-community approach. They argued that it was difficult to administer the program because of this and they developed a strict northern zone. Their argument was that the communities in the northern zone had the characteristics of being in the north. The question of being remote, that is a community in the Kootenays of British Columbia, was rejected out of hand.

Finally, after much prodding the government released its position in December 1990. The government's position was to accept the northern zone as recommended by the commission but to create an intermediate zone which reduces the program in that area to 50 per cent of the benefits by 1995, for example the community of Mackenzie which is not in my riding but north of Prince George. Communities outside the new area that were previously eligible would see their benefits reduced by a third each year to the point where this year, tax year 1993, two-thirds of the benefit will be available. Then in tax year 1994 the last third will be provided. In 1995 the benefit would disappear completely.

I am calling for a return of the program to its original concept, including a return of full benefits and the inclusion of remote areas. I cannot see why we could not start with a new program of phasing in the new areas starting in tax year 1995 where we would start building the program back with two-thirds of the benefit being available again. This would mean that in 1996 the full benefit would be returned. Those communities which will only be receiving 50 per cent of the benefit in 1995—for example, Dawson Creek in northern British Columbia—could be returned immediately in my view to full benefits in the tax year 1994.

The main reason for the commission and the government to reject the program was that the community-by-community approach was too hard to administer; it was confusing and created too many discrepancies. It is my view that time has proven the government and the commission wrong on this point.

There is no doubt that the original program had many problems, as does the current one though on a much reduced scale. My research indicates that the problems on the whole have been resolved. For example, the Auditor General who had a team of auditors working on this program in the department removed them saying that the problems had largely been resolved, at least to the point where he no longer felt a need to have a specific monitoring of the department's administration of the program.

I have also discussed the problems with accountants in my riding who say that the number of problems has gone down dramatically. One firm reports that Revenue Canada reviewed 20 per cent to 30 per cent of northern tax benefit claims when the program started. This accountant now says that it is down to at most some 2 per cent. In other words, as soon as the government figured out how to run the program, it cancelled it. Unfortunately the government is not listening to people in those areas that want to see a return to the program.

In the December 21, 1990 Prince George Citizen the mayor of Mackenzie, British Columbia, just north of Prince George, a community in the phase-out area, hoped that there was "still an opportunity to talk to the government". Unfortunately that opportunity has come and gone. In an August 14, 1992 letter to me the Minister of Finance said that the government "was not contemplating any change to the new program at this time".

It is unfortunate the Conservatives will not listen to northern or remote communities to have the program reinstated. They may be taking their cue from the Reform Party which apparently wants to axe this program completely. Northerners are obviously concerned about this lack of support from that particular party.

It is my view that a properly developed, well-known community-by-community system is the best approach to take. As we all know there are degrees of remoteness. A system well designed could be an ongoing measure of the level of services to a community. The more in improved services the less the benefit might be. It forces governments at all levels to be aware of the needs of remote communities, be it airport expansion or the provision of medical services.

Collective agreements already recognize the needs of employees who live in remote areas. For example, the isolated post directive is part of the collective agreement between the federal government and its employees. While these collective agreements recognize the needs of employees it is time the government did as well.

According to the Library of Parliament research paper on this issue, some 296,000 Canadians claimed the northern residence deduction. The "cost" to the government was thought to be around $305 million. That is a fraction of the defence department's $5.5 billion helicopter acquisition program and is a program that clearly would extend all across the country.

This program was a valuable one. It was well received by the public and once in place for some time the government departments charged with administering it were able to run it properly. In other words, it is a program worth keeping.

New Democrats have recently released a jobs paper that outlines our economic alternatives to this government and most important it clearly lays out our alternative in the tax field, something we have not heard from other parties. The measure alone on the GST would put at least another $600 a year in the pockets of each Canadian, not just northerners.

I welcome the comments from other members and hope that they will consider supporting this motion and allowing northerners the fairness we deserve.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with hon. members my views on motion M-376, which suggests that the alleged discrepancies in the northern and isolated areas tax allowance should be cleared up and the tax benefits continued.

First of all, I would like to give you a brief history of these tax benefits for residents in northern and isolated areas. In the late 1970s a routine audit by Revenue Canada, Taxation revealed that many employees in northern and isolated areas received assistance from their employers for housing and travel. The value of this assistance was not always reported on information slips, even though it clearly constituted a tax benefit under the Income Tax Act. A proposal by Revenue Canada to adjust the tax returns of affected individuals generated great concern. In order to study the issues, the government announced a moratorium on taxation of these benefits.

This moratorium was implemented by means of a remission order. From 1978 to 1986 certain employer-provided travel and housing benefits for workers in eligible isolated areas were exempted from income tax. In his budget of November 12, 1981 the Minister of Finance announced his intention to limit the application of the remission order to employees who had participated in benefit plans established on or before that date. On December 2, 1982, plans for phasing in the taxation of these benefits and rules for their evaluation were announced. Evaluation rules were set up in a second remission order. However, the proposal to phase in taxation of these benefits was subsequently rescinded.

The government continued to study the issue. Concerns were expressed at meetings held in Northern Canada with local residents and groups representing employees, entrepreneurs, native people and others.

Two themes were a constant in these discussions. First, employers reported difficulties in attracting and retaining employees. Second, certain aspects of the remission orders were felt to be unfair because they benefited only workers receiving housing and travel assistance from their employers, and only employees covered by arrangements made prior to November 13, 1981 were entitled to a full exemption.

Acknowledging the inequities of the remission order system the Minister of Finance proposed in his budget of February 26, 1986 that the tax benefit should apply to all residents of qualifying areas. These areas were identified community by community, on the basis of factors such as distance from an urban centre, condition of roads and latitude. According to this approach, which was applied from 1987 to 1991, all employer-provided benefits became taxable but certain tax deductions became available to all residents of qualifying areas. A transitional deduction was granted to residents in areas that were previously covered by remission orders but no longer qualified for the tax deduction.

Unfortunately, determining qualifying areas on a community-by-community basis did not prove as effective as the government had hoped. Although many of the discrepancies referred to in the hon. member's motion were eliminated the government continued to receive many representations stating that the northern tax benefits system remained unfair, mainly because some communities located near qualifying communities were not eligible.

On December 10, 1987 the Minister of Finance announced his intention to establish a task force to study the appropriateness of changing the eligibility criteria for determining the Northern and Isolated Areas Tax Allowance. The task force was instrumental in moving this debate forward, suggesting in its report published in 1989 that a zone system should replace community-based determination of qualifying areas, in determining eligibility for benefits available to residents of northern and isolated areas.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, and as some members of this House may be aware as well, a zone system was introduced in 1991. The zones did not cover all communities previously covered by the remission order system or community-based determination of qualifying areas. However, residents of these communities were and still are receiving benefits on a transitional basis. These transitional benefits will be phased out gradually by 1994, by which time we will have eliminated many of the inequities of the previous systems. The new zone system has already simplified the process considerably and is a more effective way of assisting residents of northern and isolated areas.

Considering these developments, I think all hon. members will agree that previous measures to determine eligibility for the Northern and Isolated Areas Tax Allowance have proved unfair and ineffective. Perhaps it would be easier to understand the problems that existed under the old system and the kind of discrepancies involved if I were to describe a typical case.

Consider the person who lives just outside the perimeter of a qualifying community. He works for the same employer, goes to the same grocery store, has the same family doctor and has access to the same local school as another person who lives within the perimeter of the qualifying community.

Under the old community-based system for determining qualifying areas one person was eligible for tax benefits while the other was not. To make matters worse, although the person outside the perimeter of this community was actually living in greater isolation he was nevertheless not eligible for these benefits. It has been said that the community-by-community method for determining qualifying areas was inherently unfair because it created border problems between adjacent communities that were treated differently for income tax purposes.

• (1135)

Mr. Speaker, let me tell you now why I believe that the present system of zones is a better solution and probably the best solution for determining eligibility for these benefits.

In its report of October 27, 1989, the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas proposed creating only one northern area in which residents have major problems and are isolated. The task force recommended that only residents of the northern area continue to receive tax benefits and that the transition period for communities losing benefits not exceed one year.

The task force stated just as clearly that the then-current method of determining prescribed zones community by community could not be maintained. The government therefore had to choose one of two alternatives: either a modified method of determining prescribed zones community by community, like the one that existed before, or a zone system. Since experience had shown that a system of determining prescribed zones community by community was untenable, the government accepted the task force's proposal to establish a zone system.

The present system of zones is based on recommendations from the task force and many other presentations received throughout the country. Areas eligible for the deductions given to northerners, which are areas in the north and in the intermediate zone, were defined using two classification systems developed by the task force.

The northern area classification system included mainly environmental factors like the severity of the climate, the growing season, the heating season, plant cover and permafrost. The classification system for isolated regions put more emphasis on community characteristics such as population and distance from urban centres. This is an effective and objective way of determining eligibility for the deductions given to northerners.

According to this method, northerners are eligible for full benefits, while residents of the intermediate zone are eligible for half the benefits. Furthermore, as I already said, transitional provisions were established. Residents of communities that are no longer eligible under the zone system will receive two-thirds of the benefits in 1993 and one-third in 1994. Only after that date will benefits be fully eliminated.

No perfect system exists. Whatever solution we decide on to determine eligibility for the northern benefit some people will still believe that they should be included if we want the system to be fair.

Nevertheless, extending the benefits further south would reduce the relative advantages for those who are really isolated. I believe that our present system is the best. It is based on the objective opinions we received from an independent task force. It gives a temporary break to those who are no longer eligible for benefits or those whose benefits will be reduced. At the end of the transition period, the new system will have eliminated many, if not all, of the inequities in the former system.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to enter into this debate today to talk about a very important issue to northern Ontario and to northern Canada in general.

In discussing the northern and isolated areas tax allowance, first of all we have to put into context the reasons that this legislation was introduced and try to focus on that particular issue so we do not get side-tracked concerning what we are talking about today.

This measure was put in place by the Conservative government in 1987. The main reason for its implementation on January 1, 1987 was based on the theme of economic development in the north. When this initiative was put in place, there was some discussion about the inequities of the system and because of that the Minister of Finance established a task force on April 29, 1988.

The task force was to find alternatives to the community-by-community approach to allocating these benefits. One of the reasons we are having this debate today is that there was a feeling among communities that the system which was in place before 1987 was not a completely fair system for all northerners.

I want to suggest in this debate that the new system, as defined by the zones created by a task force and put in place by the Minister of Finance as of December 1990, has again not met the major initiative that was undertaken during the process of the task force hearings, which was to put fairness into the system.

Let me give some examples that show why. The issue in this debate is what is the north. We all know, those of us who live in northern Ontario, that the north can easily be defined with a map and a ruler and a pen. Once we had defined the north, which is based on a different climate, vegetation and the large geography of these particular regions, the issue at hand was the one that dealt with isolation and how to set in place the criteria that would best ensure that benefits were given to areas most in need based on their isolation. At the same time we kept in mind that they were still part of the whole criteria, which is that they were citizens living in the north.

The task force recommended two zones: a northern zone and an intermediate zone. The reason for this is that it wanted to get away from a community-by-community criteria to determine how people would get benefits under the northern tax allowance.

What it has done is simply create more problems for us in northern Ontario. I want to tell members exactly what I mean by that. Since the changes to the northern tax allowance the roughly 50 communities in Kenora—Rainy River, in northern Ontario, were broken down into zones. Originally there were close to 50 communities and now there are 16 communities in the northern zone and 9 communities in the intermediate zone. Through this new process it phased 24 communities out of the northern tax allowance as of 1995.

Mr. Speaker, you would ask, and people watching would want to know, why I would be opposed to that if those particular communities should not have access to the northern allowance and the benefits that accrue from it. Let me give an example of why the inequities that were looked at under the task force still remain.

In the northern zone there are communities that are only accessible by air. The majority of communities in northern Ontario that still meet the criteria of the northern zone are all fly-in communities. However, in the phased-out zone, the one that we objected to severely, there are also communities that are only accessible by air. Lac la Croix, which is in the southern section of northern Ontario, is only accessible by air and therefore has the same isolation problems as the communities that are still included in the northern zone.

I have suggested to the government, and would like to suggest it again today, a formula which is much more effective than the one that was originally put in place. The formula should be based on the fact that we all know where northern B.C. is, we all know where northern Alberta is, and we all know where northern Ontario is. So that issue is easily resolved.

The next issue is the one dealing with isolation. Isolation can be easily broken down into certain categories: one, the availability of basic services in a community; two, the availability of basic goods in a community; three, where goods are regularly available, their costs including transportation and transportation taxes; and four, where goods and services are not available, the availability and cost of transportation to and from the closest service centre.

In my mind it is easy to make a decision as a government as to whether people meet certain criteria based on living in northern Ontario and establishing criteria to deal with isolation. For example, in some communities in northern Ontario there are no publicly funded elementary schools. In some communities there are no publicly funded high schools. In some communities there are no publicly funded medical facilities. In some communities there are no banks or other financial institutions, no post offices or no telephone service.

Those unique needs require some sort of northern tax allowance benefit. If they can easily be put into a criteria, then based on that criteria we could decide what level of benefits would be given. It could then be phased in depending on where communities would fall in terms of the kinds of services and products they would want to offer.

For example, let us talk about transportation. Some communities are only accessible by air. Communities in northern Ontario that are only accessible by air should get 100 per cent of the northern tax allowance because it makes obvious sense that if a community is so isolated that it has no road, no railway, no bus, and only possibly air access, then more than likely it does not have very good medical facilities and those other kinds of situations that we are talking about.

To identify isolated areas we could also use the costs of goods that come to people in that community. We could easily use the CPI standard. Let me give an example of how we could do that. Lac la Croix is a community that was phased out under the new northern residence deduction system that the minister implemented in 1990–91. Lac la Croix is being phased out and should not be simply for the reason that it is only accessible by air. So it should get 100 per cent of the NRD. Ignace, which is a community in northern Ontario that is on the Trans–Canada Highway, only has bus service so it should be allowed, and this is only a suggestion of course so we can fool around with the numbers, to get 25 per cent based on the fact that it only has bus service.

Then there is the CPI which is much higher than in southern Ontario. It would give them about another 20 percentage points so a community like Ignace which was completely phased out should get roughly 45 per cent of the tax benefits under the northern tax allowance. Savant Lake has no public transportation, no banks, and no high schools so based on the criteria that I have outlined it would get 110 points, which is over 100 so it would get 100 per cent of the northern tax allowance.

That is how the system should have been put in place to deal with the isolation of northern Canadians. It should not have suggested that now we will arbitrarily create a zone somewhere in northern Ontario, northern B.C. or northern Alberta. In effect, that pits one northerner against another.

The whole objective was to give benefits to people who would not be able to access the services that we just take for granted in urban centres in this country.

I suggest to the government that if it had listened to the suggestions that were made by northerners and by members of Parliament on this side of the House then it would have implemented a system that was much more acceptable to all of us and which would have met the criteria it established when it first tried to implement this new system. That criteria was to stimulate economic development and growth, entice people from southern portions of our country to come to northern Canada to work, and to give them those benefits which would reduce the cost of living for those northerners.

I appreciate the short period of time I was given to outline a much more acceptable way of giving northerners the northern tax allowance.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be able to participate in this private members' debate today because it directly affects many of my constituents.

The motion that we are considering, as proposed by the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the discrepancies in the Northern and Isolated Areas Tax Allowance should be cleared up and the tax benefits continued.

I would like to compliment the member for putting this motion forward because there are many of us from northern isolated areas of the country, members from all three parties, who have experienced a great deal of frustration in dealing with this issue for the last number of years. I also had the opportunity to argue on behalf of the hon. member, who could not be here that day, that this motion should be a votable motion and subject to five hours of debate.

I made that intervention because it is all too rarely that these kinds of issues come before the House. It is all too rarely that the isolated northern areas of this country have the issues of daily life, services, and how the benefits of Canadian life affect them debated in this forum.

Certainly there has been an ongoing evolution with respect to the northern tax benefit. As originally envisioned, the tax benefit was to apply to both northern and isolated communities and a series of formulae were developed in order to determine what communities those would be.

There is no doubt that in the initial stages of implementation there were problems in determining how to fairly designate which communities should or should not be included. There were certainly some administrative problems.

When the government sent in the René Brunelle task force to hold hearings and come up with recommendations it went way too far in the recommendations that came forward because the net result of those recommendations was that only the most isolated northern communities ended up being eligible for these benefits. Many other communities that were in the mid-north—

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon) moved:

> That this House recognizes that the government's economic recovery plan, including the free trade agreement, the North American free trade agreement, the goods and services tax, privatization and deregulation, reduction of transfer payments and off-loading onto provincial governments, has been a failure and that this House acknowledge that a comprehensive economic recovery program must endorse a strategy for a full employment economy which entails abrogating the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, not implementing the North American free trade agreement and includes such actions as a jobs plan, an infrastructure program, and a national child care program in order to ensure job creation and prosperity for Canadians.

Mr. Angus: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. Before my leader rises to commence debate, I wonder if there is consent from the House to allow her to go slightly over the allotted time of 20 minutes. She anticipates perhaps 22 to 23 minutes. I wonder if that would be agreeable to the House.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, we would be pleased to agree with that and I am sure with the wild applause it will probably go 25 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the suggestion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today on my party's motion to speak about a new vision for Canada. As the motion we put before the House outlines, this vision is based on an economic recovery program that must endorse a full employment strategy. We have seen the results of the old vision. We want to present a new vision.

The results of the old vision are quite clear: a huge debt, started by the Liberals and doubled by the Conservative Party, off-loaded onto the provinces and territories; over 1.5 million Canadians officially unemployed and thousands more having left the work force after giving up hope completely; and a 17 per cent unemployment rate in the youth of our country, and this is of particular concern when the youth cannot see a future for themselves, and four million Canadians living in poverty. We have seen the results of the old vision.

The Conservatives can select a new leader. They can put a new face on old policies but they remain old policies and they remain failed policies. More than a new face, Canada requires a new direction.

My party has put forward a detailed jobs plan which presents that new direction, which proposes a fundamental reorientation of economic policy away from the failed trickle-down approach to a policy founded on a full employment strategy. We have to destroy the myth that the economic policy which puts 1.5 million Canadians out of work is good economic policy. We have to destroy the myth that words such as a jobless recovery even mean anything. We need an economy that puts people first. We have to destroy the myth that the answer to our problems is to attack the unemployed.

The answer is not to attack the unemployed but to attack unemployment. A full employment strategy allows us to do just that.

What is a full employment strategy? It means that every economic policy would be reoriented so that every government action affecting the economy would ask the question, will this protect jobs, will this create jobs? This includes training policies and education policies. All of the actions the government would take would be oriented to ensuring that Canadians are working.

The jobs plan that we put forward would create 1.6 million new jobs over the length of the next Parliament. That is 500,000 more jobs than if Canada continued under the current policies. At the same time our plan would lower the deficit, would bring down inflation and hold the line on taxes for middle-income Canadians.

That is not just the New Democratic Party talking. Our plan is supported by an independent analysis performed by one of Canada's most respected firms. I challenge the government and the Liberal Party to produce a plan that would get the same results.

[Translation]

We succeed because we recognize that the government has a constructive role to play in the economy. The other parties do not admit that.

The economies that came out of the 1980s in good shape are those where the governments played a constructive role in co-operation with business and labour. The economies that came out of the 1980s in very bad shape are those where the governments withdrew completely, as in the United States, Great Britain and Canada, and everything is left to the market. The privatization and deregulation begun by the Liberals and enthusiastically pursued by the Conservatives have had disastrous consequences.

• (1240)

[English]

The marketplace and the private sector do many things and they do many things well, but there are other things that they simply cannot do, nor should they be expected to. They are not in a position to ensure a national transportation, national communications and national environmental infrastructure. That is a responsibility for government.

They are not in a position to do long-term national economic planning. That is a responsibility for government in conjunction with other sectors of society. They are not in a position to provide universal health care, universal education and a social safety net. That is a responsibility for government.

A government willing to play a positive role will complement the private sector, will work with the private sector and will support the private sector in doing what it does best: generating economic growth, providing goods and services and creating jobs for Canadians.

The Europeans provide us with an example of positive government-business-labour co-operation. One example is the recent development of the Airbus which has been extremely successful. It had the involvement of governments and the private sector and has created a very important market niche for Europe.

The Japanese provide another example in the way they join together to identify niche markets with the government purchasing domestically developed new technologies, providing an initial market and stimulating research and development into new products.

Our neighbours to the south are also talking about a similar form of co-operation and a similar role for government in the United States. Like our trading partners, the Canadian government can and must undertake new initiatives to create jobs and build a forward looking, smarter economy.

If I may, I would like to briefly highlight a few of the initiatives that we propose in this new vision.

[Translation]

First there is the physical infrastructure. Canadian businesses need good transportation systems. They need modern telecommunications systems and healthy communities. What they have is an infrastructure that has been deteriorating for 20 years through negligence.

We have a choice: either invest now or wait and pay 10 times as much. In our plan, we have chosen the most sensible approach, a national infrastructure program that will take us into the 21st century and create 130,000 jobs.

What the government has neglected in recent years is the social infrastructure—social programs, education and the health system—which is the basis of a strong, sound economy. We must rejuvenate our social infrastructure and fill the gaps in it, the biggest one being the lack of a national child care program.

A national child care program would give our children a sound pre-school education and enable parents to devote themselves to their own training and to finding work. This is now impossible, especially for single mothers.

Our action plan proposes a national child care program that would double the number of places in Canada in five years and create 70,000 jobs.

[English]

A third issue in our plan addresses the need to get more capital into the hands of small and medium-sized businesses. It is these businesses that create 75 per cent to 80 per cent of employment in Canada. It is a particularly important issue, I might add, for those entrepreneurs who live outside major cities and in less populated regions.

We see an important role for government here in helping to establish pools of capital that will invest in innovative Canadian-owned companies that create jobs here at home. Our plan presents a national investment fund that has a potential to create 200,000 new Canadian jobs.

• (1245)

Another important initiative we propose is a fair tax system, an important part of providing revenues and also providing a climate of fairness in our country. A part of that is the elimination of the GST. By the way, I am pleased to note that this past weekend Australia learned from our experience and elected a Labour government opposed to the GST.

In Canada, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has estimated that the GST costs businesses in this country about $10 billion to collect and has cost the country 100,000 to 200,000 jobs.

Of course, any responsible party advocating the elimination of the GST has to spell out exactly how it would plan to replace revenues. We do that in the jobs plan. I want to say that these options are reasonable and indeed, by eliminating the GST, maintain a low rate of inflation, something that has not happened with the continuation of the current economic policies.

Of course, the Liberals said that they too would eliminate the GST, but they do not tell us how. They talk about another kind of consumption tax, maybe a tax on everything, maybe a tax on food. If it looks like a duck and walks like a duck, it must be a duck. We are saying that it is in the interest of the country and the economic interest to eliminate the GST. We are serious about it and we provide the alternatives.

The final policy I want to mention today is trade. Our party's policy is very clear. We believe that the Canada-

U.S. trade deal must be abrogated and that NAFTA must not proceed.

Why is that so crucial? It is crucial simply because Canada cannot pursue a new vision and cannot pursue the kind of new economy that we are talking about if we are bound by trade deals that entrench the old vision and the old way of doing things: trade deals which prevent the government from playing a positive role in the economy and which take away from Canadians the instruments of regional development, resource development, value-adding and strategic investment.

Let us be clear about what these trade deals represent. They represent taking power away from elected, accountable people's democratic governments and transferring it to unaccountable, unelected multinational corporations. This is not in the interest of Canada nor, I might add, of any other country.

We believe that if we are to ensure the long-term viability of Canada as a great trading nation, we must replace the so-called free trade agreements with a fair trade strategy based on sectoral agreements, improved multilateral arrangements and aggressive trade diversification to areas like the Pacific Rim.

[Translation]

These are the highlights of our action plan to create jobs and revive our economy. I did not mention all the initiatives in this plan for research and development, for example, to increase opportunities for training, to create opportunities for our young people, to develop our rural communities and those that depend on natural resources.

How do we create 1.6 million jobs while reducing the deficit and controlling inflation, without increasing taxes for our families? The answer is found in my party's innovative approach to the economy.

[English]

There are two deficits in this country, both of which we take seriously. There is the fiscal deficit, which is very real and which we must all be concerned about. There is also the human deficit, the energy, talent and potential we are losing because so many people live in poverty, are unemployed or are in part-time, short-term jobs.

The approach taken by the Conservatives and the Liberals is that the only way to improve the fiscal deficit is to worsen the human deficit. In fact, through that approach they have worsened both.

• (1250)

Our approach is that the only way to improve the fiscal deficit situation is to work to eliminate the human deficit. Our plan will generate 1.6 million new jobs, 500,000 more than under current policies. Think of 500,000 additional workers able to pay taxes. Think of 500,000 fewer Canadians dependent on government support. Think of the resulting reduction in the deficit and the debt.

It has been estimated that the gap between Canada's actual economic output and its potential output is $70 billion. Not only does that represent an economic deficit, a fiscal deficit, but it clearly represents the human deficit.

Getting Canadians back working again will fill that gap. Filling that gap will contribute to substantial deficit and debt reduction. The reality is we have a choice in this country: We can carry on with the slash and burn or we can start to plant and grow.

That is our plan. Perhaps because the logic has not been fully grasped by some of our colleagues in the other two parties our plan has been opposed by the two old parties. I invite a debate. I invite the Conservatives and the Liberals to produce their own alternatives.

Politics in this country has changed. Canadians have come to expect an open and thorough discussion of issues. They want and deserve to know where political parties stand before an election, not after.

Canadians deserve to be listened to. Canadians deserve to be involved. Only in that way can we determine Canada's economic future. Only in that way can we restore Canadians' confidence in the political process. Only in that way can we restore optimism and hope to the people whom we are here to serve.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the speech of the hon. member for Yukon.

An hon. member: Tell us about David Peterson.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says: "Tell us about David Peterson". I was waiting for a reference to Bob Rae, but I did not hear one in this speech. I made a few from my seat, but they were not responded to. I do not want to get into the story of Bob Rae today. I have a more general question I would like to ask the hon. member.

It is about policy and concerns what I did not hear in the speech. I listened very attentively to hear some reference to the nationalization of the chartered banks.

I understand that is a New Democratic Party policy, but I did not see it in the five-year plan nor did I hear it in the speech of the hon. member for Yukon. I wonder if she could enlighten the House and Canadians as to whether it is still NDP policy to nationalize the banks.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I recommend that my hon. colleague read the strategy for a full employment economy. We speak very clearly about the national investment fund. I think everyone recognizes, and I assume the member does as well from the region he represents, that there is a grave problem in terms of getting capital into the hands of those innovative entrepreneurs all of us know. They may want to begin fairly small businesses and may not be huge employers. They may be interested in developing new products. However, getting capital is very difficult. Therefore we propose a national investment fund which addresses that very need.

We based the projection of the 200,000 jobs we say this will create on a very important Coopers & Lybrand study. It has done a very interesting research study on how developing this availability of capital, particularly in those regions where it is so often difficult to access capital, has been a targeted way of getting funds into the hands of those small businesses that create most of the jobs in our country.

When the member has an opportunity to read this, he will also see that we talk very much about democratic participation in the economy. Through a national investment fund, we see supporting things such as credit unions, instances where workers come together and decide to buy out a particular firm, involvement of labour in the work place and involvement of those in a particular region in helping to make the decisions about what long-term economic development will be best for their society. I am sure the hon. member will particularly appreciate that last point.

• (1255)

The member will therefore find that the national investment fund we are proposing is an extremely important contribution to enlarging the base of capital for all Canadians and particularly the small business sector.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the hon. member's remarks. I would like to remind her that actually there are many things she said in her speech today with which we in the Liberal Party agree.

We also agree with a fair tax system. We are working on many options in this area. The member talks about fiscal deficit and human deficit. We also care about these things.

I want to ask a specific question of the leader of the New Democratic Party. She mentioned in her remarks there might be or could be a difference of $70 billion between the actual output, and potential output, and there was room for growth in that area. That is a tremendous number in terms of hope and possibility for new revenues, et cetera. How did she get that number? Where did she get that number? How did she calculate it and what was her source? I think it is worth while to debate that because it might allow us to come up with ideas if we know that is a really solid number.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, my colleague is making an extremely important point. The number comes from several economists. They have estimated this and compared it in Canada as being a 10 per cent gap, whereas in the United States now it is about a 2 per cent gap. It has been reported in a number of places in the literature.

What is important about it, as my colleague mentions, is it points out that we have the opportunity in our economy and in our country to expand because we have the ability to be more productive. It is not that we need to create that ability. What we need to do is have the kind of training available. We talk about that in our plan as well, the importance of business as well as governments being involved in training. We know now it is continuous, lifelong training that all Canadians in the work force will undergo.

So the gap, as my colleague says, is quite a shocking number. It is something we should be looking at in terms of how to narrow that gap and match the potential closer to the actual. We talk about doing that, as I mentioned earlier, through the national investment fund. We get more entrepreneurs working and get people with creative ideas being able to implement them and having the funds to do so. We also are very strong in our proposal on research and development, on increasing funding for the National Research Council, so much of which has been decimated in this country. It is shocking.

I am sure my hon. colleague will agree that the Conservative government has talked about competitiveness. It has talked about how it is a global economy and Canada must be there and be able to participate. It has a multimillion dollar prosperity agenda but at the same time it cuts training and research and development. In fact, it makes absolutely no link between the rhetoric it has proposed and the actual investment in ensuring that is going to happen.

We have to address the fundamentals of preparing the work force and allowing for opportunities for our young people. That estimate of 17 per cent, and that is just the reported unemployment for young people, has to be distressing to every Canadian. I do not visit a university where people do not ask me what we see as the potential for them to have jobs. What I say and what we say in this jobs plan is that we have to focus on how to get Canadians back working.

• (1300)

I invite the Liberal Party, often called the policy challenged party, to put forward its ideas. Let us have a real debate. I am glad that the Liberal member says he cares. That is very nice, but that does not put food on the table, so I challenge the hon. member to put forward his alternatives.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I would take up that challenge. I will debate the leader of the New Democratic Party anywhere, anytime, no problem.

The question has to do with the opening remarks in her speech. She talked about the importance of a telecommunications network system that we must build. A little later she talked about this basically not having anything to do with NAFTA.

This is an area where we have a very special skill in this country, the area of telecommunications. There are a lot of very important potential export opportunities in that area, specifically in Mexico. There is great hope and great potential for telecommunications exports there.

How does the hon. member square basically not having anything to do with NAFTA on one hand and yet at the same time talk about moving out in this telecommunications—

Mr. McCurdy: Now you support NAFTA.

Mr. Mills: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, I am asking a civil question in a constructive way. Through you, Mr. Speaker, you talk about debate and yet this is the kind of reaction you get. It is really quite amazing.

At any rate, how does the hon. member square telecommunications exports and shutting down NAFTA at the same time?

Ms. McLaughlin: I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member from the Liberal Party has finally clarified that his party is supportive of NAFTA. It was not very clear before but it is now clear.

I want to say to the hon. member that concern about NAFTA is very widespread in this country. The concern is not about increasing trade. Of course it is not. It is about an agreement initialled by this government which basically takes away the ability of this country to have control over our energy resources, water resources, transportation, foreign investment in this country, regional development and processing of our natural resources.

The NAFTA would make it impossible for us to develop in many regions of this country. I am sure the hon. member knows this. I understand that he and the Liberal Party support NAFTA. We stand against NAFTA because we do not want to sell Canada down the tubes like the Liberal Party and the Conservatives do.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. friend, the leader of the New Democratic Party, who is now fleeing the House because she does not want to hear what the Conservatives have to say.

I find the New Democratic Party's policies rather fascinating. I have spent time reading its economic document. Let us get this straight. The NDP proposes cancelling the free trade agreement. That is the first thing it is going to do, cancel the free trade agreement. In doing that, it is obviously going to bring back all the tariffs on the products that we ship into the United States, primarily further manufactured goods—there were no tariffs on the raw materials and so on—where we have made the most progress in the free trade agreement. It is going to bring the free trade agreement back and put all those tariffs back up again.

Not only are the NDP putting tariffs on Canadian goods going into the United States, it will be putting tariffs on American goods coming into Canada which will jack up the price of the goods that we consume in this country. Therefore inflation is going to increase. It does not talk about that.

• (1305)

As a matter of fact, in its economic program it did brag about a company that did a study on it but did not take into consideration what cancellation of the free trade agreement would do to the economy of this country. It was not taken into consideration.

The next thing the NDP is going to do is stop the negotiations on NAFTA, just stop them. Never mind that almost everything Mexico ships into Canada now is duty free. The problem is getting our further manufactured goods into Mexico with high tariffs on them, some of them up to 25 per cent.

My friend from Broadview—Greenwood talked about telecommunications. I can tell the House that telecommunications is one area where we have great expertise and are doing extremely well, as well as in the environmental end of things. There are companies in Canada producing wonderful environmental equipment which is now being exported world-wide and in which Mexico has a great interest. Reducing the tariffs on these particular items will be beneficial to this country.

The NDP is going to cancel the North American free trade agreement. Then it is going to cancel the goods and services tax. I am the first to admit that the goods and services tax was probably not one of the most popular policies that any government in the last half century has brought in. However, I want it made very clear that there were innumerable studies, two royal commissions and joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons. House of Commons committees over the last 40 years have recommended that Canada get out of the manufacturers' sales tax, which was at 13.5 per cent, and get into a form of consumption tax.

In our first mandate between 1984 and 1988 broad discussion took place across this country on the type of value-added tax we might have. A decision was taken by this government and in the 1988 election campaign one of the planks in our platform was the goods and services tax. Nobody can deny that. It was there. It was debated. I remember the Minister of Finance at the time made two commitments during the campaign, no tax on food, on basic groceries, and no tax greater than there was on housing under the manufacturers' sales tax.

I remember very clearly that that was debated in 1988. It was not a surprise. It was part of the tax reform program and it was coming. The opposition can talk about free trade getting us elected, not the goods and services tax. That does not matter. We got elected, we formed the government and that was part of the plank of the platform. It was brought in.

I think manufacturers and exporters will tell you that one of the reasons we are more competitive in the international marketplace today is because of the goods and services tax, absolutely. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association will tell you that and the exporters will tell you that. We are not taxing our Canadian manufactured goods more than we are our imports as we did under the old system. We are not doing that any more. The NDP is going to cancel that.

It is $15 billion, $16 billion, $17 billion in income for the government. How is the NDP going to make it up? It has listed a number of things as to how it is to make it up, but at the same time it is going to bring in a national child care program costing about $6 billion. It is going to bring in a make-work project. It does not have a price tag on it, but it is a very expensive one. As is pointed out in its paper in the near term it is going to have to borrow. But it also says that in the near term it is going to get interest rates down.

When governments go out to borrow and increase their deficits, interest rates will follow because there will be insecurity throughout the financial markets where they must go to borrow and they will have to pay a premium to borrow money which will crank up the interest rates and start this old cycle of inflation up again.

• (1310)

The piece of work that the New Democratic Party has come out with is Alice in Wonderland. Grimm could not write a better fairy tale. There is no realism in it at all. It sounds beautiful and it looks beautiful on paper but if the NDP does everything that it says it is going to do in this paper then we are in for one terrible financial situation. There is no question about that. We would be in more financial problems that you can imagine.

I want to state something that is rather interesting. I am fortunate enough to sit around the table with the Minister of Finance and the other finance ministers of this country. In the last while the New Democratic finance ministers are all of a sudden singing a little different tune than they did when they were campaigning or when they were in office for the first year or two. All of a sudden reality struck. Lo and behold they are talking about cost cutting. They are talking about deficit reduction. They are talking about reducing their borrowing requirements. Surprise, surprise. All of a sudden reality has hit.

I and a number of my colleagues will be speaking about some of the initiatives that were brought out in detail by the New Democratic Party. What I would like to do for a few moments is take a look at some of the things that are affecting Canada today and why the government has to move in the way it has been moving and I assume will continue to move.

There is a quickly moving global economy out there. The new world order for Canada's main street is Rome to Rangoon. It is not just Halifax or St. John's, Newfoundland, to Vancouver or even just down to New York, Chicago or Atlanta.

This is an environment where brainpower, technology and competitive muscle, not just our natural resources, are keys to our economic prosperity. This is a context where we transmit knowledge and money at the speed of light to and from every corner of the world.

These forces have led to a world of greater interdependence and competition than ever before in history. It is having a tremendous impact everywhere, but especially for Canada. In a world that is trading more Canada has become one of the great world traders. There are 114 separate countries whose yearly trade with Canada exceeds $10 million. Exports account for about 30 per cent of our economy, millions of jobs. Of the world's seven largest economies, only Germany depends more on trade than Canada.

Much of our exports are natural resources such as paper products, ores and fuels. These are commodities marked by low prices that offer few new job opportunities. The direction Canada must now pursue is toward the knowledge-based higher margin products that can deliver good products and good jobs, and it is happening. We have had success stories that are second to none, such as large firms like Loblaws in food products and Spar in aerospace technology.

Canadian firms are finding niches around the world. I look at my friend from London, Labatt's, which bought Italy's Moretti SPA which now brews Italy's third largest selling brand of beer and smaller firms such as Montreal's Soft Image Inc. whose technology has cornered 70 per cent of the Italian market for 3-D computer software. There are stories after stories after stories, which I know my friend from Broadview—Greenwood agrees with, of successes of Canadian entrepreneurship and expertise around the world.

Mr. Keyes: What about your friend from Hamilton and Stelco?

Mr. McDermid: I will tell you what is going to happen to Stelco in Hamilton. Once it modernizes, streamlines and reorganizes it will become one of the best steel companies in the world and will be back on its feet doing extremely well. I predict that Dofasco will do the same, but it is experiencing the same problems that steel companies around the world are experiencing, which are reorganization and the reality of what is happening in the world today.

• (1315)

That is one of the things that I think all members of Parliament understand is going on in the world today. We see it time and time again.

Mr. Keyes: You don't know what the problem is.

Mr. McDermid: My friend from Hamilton West will have ample opportunity to debate today. I will be pleased to sit and listen to his side of the argument if he would just give me a chance to give my side of it. I would appreciate it.

At a time when these jobs are so important and so mobile, a nation's tax system must play a critical role in attracting or driving away business. We have met that challenge by reforming our tax system. I talked about the goods and services tax but we also changed our business tax and the income tax system to make it fairer and more responsive to what is going on in the world today.

I notice that the New Democratic Party now wants to add a number of tax categories to income tax, and that is fine. It wants to go back and I understand that. The New Democratic Party wants to go back to the old ways. It wants to bring in the high tariff barriers again and the old tax systems again. It wants to go back.

We cannot go back any more. The New Democratic Party must understand and must learn that. As a result of the changes that we have brought about, Canada is now in the position of having very positive growth potential. There is not a think-tank around that is not saying that Canada is going to have the best growth in the OECD this year. The reason they are saying that is because interest rates are down and inflation is down. A lot of people do not understand the importance of getting inflation down.

Let me just talk about that. Inflation is a hidden tax, and I want people to look at it that way. Inflation is a hidden tax on young and old and on our ability to compete in the global marketplace. It eats up savings, making it harder for a young Canadian to buy a home or for parents to put aside money to help pay for their children's education. It costs workers jobs by pushing up wage demands and the costs of doing business, making it harder for us to export and leaving us more vulnerable to imports.

Inflation is no longer stealing Canadians' savings and killing jobs. Our average rate of inflation for 1992 was 1.5 per cent, the lowest in 30 years. It was also the lowest rate among the world's seven largest economies. Bringing down inflation has been a success that we can take to the bank. The simple fact is that lower inflation is the key to lower interest rates, and we are seeing results.

Low inflation has not only reduced interest rates but has also helped bring the growth of labour costs down sharply. This translates into Canadian companies being better able to compete at home and in the global marketplace.

The global economy has been struggling. Time after time we see these announcements of other countries with restructuring problems and lay-offs entering a recessionary period such as we are now seeing in Germany and France.

As a result of that and because the economy's growth is slow the Minister of Finance introduced some help for the small business sector last year. The hon. leader of the New Democratic Party touched on the small business sector today and she is absolutely right. It is very important since between 1979 and 1990 it created some two million new full-time jobs, more than 80 per cent of all new employment. As a result of their importance, small business corporations enjoy a special deduction which holds the federal income tax rate to 12.8 per cent on the first $200,000 of business income. In the United States federal rates for small firms range from 15 per cent to 39 per cent over the same income range.

We have put in place a tax situation for small businesses to help them. As well, in the financial statement we helped them with their unemployment insurance employer premiums for jobs created in 1993. We have encouraged increased investment with the one-year 10 per cent investment tax credit for machinery and equipment which will apply to small businesses in farming, fishing, mining, oil and gas, manufacturing, construction and long-haul transportation.

We have also taken action to help small businesses secure financing. I could list the things we have done there but I can only say that time is running out and I cannot run through them all. I want to touch on a couple of other things.

The policies on housing have been very positive. There was the reduction of the required down payment from 10 per cent to 5 per cent, which 69,000 Canadian families took advantage of last year. I know my hon. friend from London was urging the government to do that, as were the real estate associations.

Then there were the RRSPs. We do not know exactly how much went into housing but we do know that 127,000 withdrawals were made in 1992, totalling $1.2 billion. We have to assume that a good portion of that amount went to housing.

Housing starts grew by 6.3 per cent last year and we are expecting a further 5.2 per cent growth this year. As a result of the affordability due to low inflation and the sharp decline in mortgage rates, the proportion of renters who can now afford a home has surged. For example, the proportion of renters in Toronto who can afford to buy a home jumped nearly five times, from 7.3 per cent in January 1991 to 35 per cent by October of last year.

We have to continue our fight against overspending in government at all levels. The Canadian people are telling us in no uncertain terms that co-operation between all levels of government must intensify when it comes to tax matters and wisely spending the taxpayers' dollar.

That is probably the strongest message being received today from people from all parts of our economy. It is incumbent upon us to do that very thing. In co-operation with provincial and municipal governments we must get our act together, if I can use such a hackneyed expression, because that is what they are asking for.

That is what Canadians are encouraging us to do. We have provided the leadership in that area with the suggestions contained in the proposals in the Constitution which can be used as a basis for discussions between provincial governments and the federal government to assure that the taxpayers' dollar is being spent wisely or being saved wisely. We tend to forget that it all comes out of one person's pocket, the taxpayer, whether it is at the federal level, the provincial level or the municipal level.

I believe our policies are working. We are positioned to take advantage of economic growth this year. We will see a real gross domestic product increase of some 3.5 per cent, marking the seventh consecutive quarterly increase which is the largest since the second quarter of 1991. We must stay the course. If we deviate from this course then the financial markets will let us know in no uncertain terms and we will experience uncertainty once again.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the member has put before the House some propositions with respect to our jobs plan that I just want to briefly note and then I would like to put a question to him if I could.

He suggested first with respect to the GST if I quote him correctly that our figures show there will have to be extra borrowing as a consequence of the move to phase out the GST. In fact, the plan shows quite clearly that there will be an improvement of close to $11 billion in deficit reduction over the present Conservative approach. That means at least $11 billion less will have to be borrowed.

In addition a lower rate of inflation will come from phasing out the GST. My former colleague on the finance committee knows the real rate is almost 5 per cent which is at an unprecedented high in this country. In Canada the real rate which is the nominal rate compared with the rate of inflation is much higher at this point than it has been in many previous years. In fact it is higher than when the previous chairman of the finance committee launched his famous attack against interest rates some years ago.

In any event, the interest rates we would expect would be lower because the cost of living would be lower as the GST was phased out. For both of those reasons one simply cannot make the case with any sense of truth that phasing out the GST would lead to more having to be borrowed and therefore to higher interest rates.

Also, the minister has suggested we would want to get out of the FTA and simply push the tariffs up to where they were in the past. We recognize that we have gone through five years of reductions in the FTA. We are not going to turn the clock back. We do not anticipate we are going to wind all those tariffs back to the level they were at five years ago. The reason to get out of the FTA is that we want to be in a position to be able to act freely, to be able to act with a sense of liberty with respect to policy matters.

What the minister has stated is simply not accurate. The rosy picture he has painted is also not accurate. I want to ask him why it is that his government is playing politics. Why is the government not acting to bring forward a budget as it should be doing right now? Then people in this country, the very business people, the very international investors that he talks about would have a sense of confidence in this country and a sense of what the future is going to bring in terms of financial matters this year. Why is it that the government has not committed itself to bringing a budget forward in its full sense within the next month or two?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I will take that as a representation. I am sure the Minister of Finance in the not too distant future will have something to say about that.

I am not the finance minister. A lot of people out there watching are saying: "Thank God". The minister will make an appropriate announcement at the appropriate time. I will take it as a representation that the hon. member would like to see a budget within the next month or so. I will pass that on to the Minister of Finance. I am sure the hon. member will hear from him in the not too distant future.

• (1330)

The New Democratic Party says that we are playing politics. That statement was just made. Here is a party that is going to cancel the free trade agreement, but it is going to keep the good parts of the free trade agreement. Is that not interesting? Absolutely. That is a gutsy statement: "We are going to cancel the free trade agreement but we are going to keep what has happened so far because it has been good". That is wonderful. It makes sense to me. It is a wonderful way of developing policies.

As I understand it today, this is great. I am going to be interested to hear how the New Democratic Party carries this further. Am I to believe it is going to cancel the free trade agreement but is going to keep the tariff reductions that have taken place to date? I wonder if that includes the tariff rates that will be coming off over the next five years as well. Will it be doing that as well? Will it be carrying that part of the free trade agreement on? Will it be wiping out the bilateral free trade dispute settlement mechanism? Is it going to wipe that out with the cancellation of the free trade agreement, or is it going to keep that part too? That is a pretty good part.

Canada has done pretty well with the dispute settlement mechanism. We have won a great number of disputes. Is the New Democratic Party going to keep that because it is a good part, but cancel the free trade agreement?

I have heard everything today. I cannot believe that the New Democrats are going to keep the free trade agreement to date, how far we have gone, but then cancel the rest of it. They now have a lot of explaining to do to the public. The New Democratic Party cannot have it both ways. It would like to have it both ways but will not have the chance to do so because it will never get elected as a national government in this country.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization, or the minister of "it's quite a state we find ourselves in today", is either totally ignorant of the problems facing Canadian steel makers or he is being conveniently evasive. I would think, given the member's intelligence on such matters, that it would be the latter.

Our Prime Minister's big promise was that he vowed the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement would give Canada special protection from U.S. trade harassment. However, the rulings in Washington against Canadian steel exports showed that it was not a promise the Prime Minister could deliver on despite his much touted special relationships with former Presidents Reagan and Bush. Of course, the chances of it ever becoming a reality are at best slim.

It has been written in different newspapers, and I am looking at The Ottawa Sun from the end of January, that what we have now is something well short of the goal I have just been speaking about. U.S. industries are still free to lay their complaints of alleged unfair subsidies for or pricing of Canadian exports.

On top of that, this government should not have rushed headlong into negotiating a North American free trade agreement when there was unfinished business. In particular the Canada–U.S. free trade deal resulted in Canadian steel makers being charged with dumping in the U.S. The verdict of guilty being handed to us by the U.S. against our steel industry shows how the FTA has failed this country.

My question is simple. Does the minister truly believe that the Canadian steel industry, with the problems I have just outlined, would be any better off today under NAFTA than it was yesterday under FTA? Or is the minister going to rely, as this government so often does, on the market forces to prevail and on the market to look after itself? We can see that the big brother government south of us is definitely going to have an upper hand on our steel industry.

• (1335)

Mr. McDermid: That was a long question. I need to be given the chance to answer it because he asked about three or four things.

First of all, the Prime Minister and I, when I was involved in international trade and the others who were involved in the free trade agreement, never said that trade problems would end. We never said that. If we thought that would happen, we would not have brought in the trade dispute settlement mechanism that is in the free trade agreement. What we have said all along and what we said then—the hon. member was not here then, I was—was that we now have a vehicle to handle these disputes. That is what we have had.

Let us put this in perspective. We do about $285 billion worth of trade both ways each and every year. It is growing, by the way. We are going to have a surplus of some $18 billion this year. It has grown dramatically since the free trade agreement has come in. About 3 per cent of all that trade is under dispute and 97 per cent of the trade goes on dispute free. There are some areas where we have disputes.

The hon. member said: "The Americans can lay claim against Canadian goods coming into the United States", and so on and so forth. So can Canadians do that against American goods and they do it.

Mr. Keyes: We are talking about steel here.

Mr. McDermid: The hon. member was very general before he got into steel. He was talking about the agreement. We now have mechanisms to deal with these problems which we did not have before. We can deal with them on a much better basis because of the free trade agreement.

I am going to ask the hon. member: Is he like the New Democratic Party? Does he want to wipe out the free trade agreement? Is that the policy of the Liberals when they come in? Are they going to wipe out the free trade agreement and all it has brought to Canada in the form of exports? These have grown dramatically, even during this recessionary period and have been very beneficial to our economy.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, for all its ambiguity it seems that the motion we are being asked to address today offers a simplistic and flawed prescription for the ailing Canadian economy. It seeks to turn the clock back in effect on eight years of Conservative rule.

It is true that the motion contains a rather woolly reference to a jobs plan, whatever that might mean in an era of federal and provincial fiscal crisis, and an infrastructure program. There is vague reference to a national child care program.

The real essence of the motion is profoundly reactionary. It holds out the deceptively simple idea that by attempting to reverse the course of Conservative policy over the last eight years, by abrogating the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, terminating our participation in the North American free trade agreement, renationalizing industries and reopening the fiscal sluices to the provinces, we can somehow return Canada to a golden age of full employment.

In one of the ironic twists of history the New Democratic Party, once one of Canada's great agents of reform, has become profoundly conservative, a party of resistance to change, a party yearning to return to the status quo ante.

Let me say first of all that we in the Official Opposition reject any such course of action or reaction for two principal reasons.

First, it is simply impossible to turn the clock back. Of course policies can be undone, legislation can be rolled back and international commitments can be terminated. That much is relatively easy, if costly, for a future Canadian government.

What cannot be reversed, however, are the forces of technological and global change. Microprocessors, fibre optics, telecommunications satellites, transnational corporations are the real factors, are the fundamental factors that are driving the transformation of the Canadian economy. It is not the FTA or the GST or any other policy acronym which the New Democratic Party may choose to target. These developments are ensuring that the Canadian economy will be pried open, not just to the United States, but to the world whether we like it or not.

• (1340)

To this extent policies such as the free trade agreement mark an accelerated reflection of changes that were already occurring world-wide.

The real question is what the Canadian government should offer Canadians to help them benefit from, and not be victimized by, these global changes. Canada cannot hide itself from these changes.

As we see from its motion today, the NDP would have us believe that the best response to globalization is to rebuild the walls around Canada and attempt to hold back the forces of world change. Such an approach would simply reduce the ability of the Canadian economy to modernize and adapt to the emerging international market. Far from creating jobs and prosperity, such an approach would further erode the living standards and prospects of all Canadians.

The immutable fact is that globalization currently requires, and will continue to demand, important restructuring in industrial economies including that of Canada. This is regardless of which federal or provincial party is in power and the ideologies that it espouses. In particular, economic transformation, emphasizing product and process innovations, improved product quality, reduced costs, greater labour skills, more effective marketing and increased productivity and flexibility in the economy is now a prerequisite for Canadian competitiveness across all sectors, from resource industries to high technology.

Canada's future lies in global links and in securing access to the world's dynamic economies, not just the United States but with the Pacific rim and the increasingly integrated European Community.

The salient question is no longer whether we should limit ourselves to fortress Canada, as the NDP would have us do, but whether we can afford to limit ourselves to fortress North America.

The second and more important reason that we reject the approach implicitly advocated in part of this motion is that it misses the real implications of eight years of Conservative rule, irrespective of the government's rhetoric about the tough and politically costly decisions which it has taken on behalf of Canadians. The real story is not what the government has done over the past eight years to help prepare Canadians for globalization, but what it has failed to do on the debt, on economic restructuring, on reforming social programs, on investing in Canadians and so forth.

When future historians write of these eight years of Conservative government rule, it will be a story of years of delayed decisions, of uncertain and irresolute leadership and, most of all, of missed opportunities.

Of all the government's failures, the one that is most central to Canada's current economic malaise and the one that, significantly, today's NDP motion simply ignores is the inability to arrest, let alone reverse, this country's accelerating debt crisis. Underpinning the current economic crisis is the fact that consumption in Canada has consistently outpaced savings and real economic growth.

The Conservative Party that came to power in 1984 promising debt reduction above everything else chose to attempt to solve the problem not through the restructuring and streamlining of government—spending reductions have in fact received only perfunctory treatment by this government—but through massive increases in taxation.

Under the Conservatives, profligate government spending and constantly increasing taxation, both at the federal and provincial levels, led in turn to the over-stimulation of an already stimulated Canadian economy. In order to take inflationary pressure out of the economy, the Bank of Canada raised interest rates. Higher interest rates led to higher debt service costs and yet more deficit spending. This, in turn, resulted in further stimulation of the economy and yet more inflation.

The result of these policy failures is today a net public debt amounting to more than $650 billion. Meanwhile, we are running a current account deficit of well over 4 per cent of our gross domestic product, which is by far the worst performance among OECD countries today.

• (1345)

A less obvious result of this prolonged period of over-consumption has been a growing foreign indebtedness and a weakening of Canada's economic base. Indeed Canada has rapidly become such a large offshore borrower that the level of foreign debt has risen to over $200 billion, not to mention an additional $100 billion in private debt.

What are the costs of all this to Canadians? Instead of undertaking the kind of investments needed to prepare for a globalized economy, we are faced with unacceptably high real interest rates—I say real interest rates—needed to attract offshore capital, a dated and declining infrastructure, growing deficits in skills, training and education, and of course a mounting foreign debt which will inevitably be paid back out of the future living standards of Canadians.

The challenge is obvious and fundamental. There is not a word in this NDP resolution about the need to resolve our fiscal imbalances and foreign indebtedness. By contrast, the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, has been clear about the tasks before the next government.

Recently the Leader of the Opposition said that never before has Canada been so much a prisoner of foreign creditors. The Conservatives have borrowed too much abroad and they have borrowed too much in the short term. Canada has too many IOUs in the hands of foreigners. A Liberal government will aim at paying our way in the world. We must balance our international current account so that we can create jobs at home and not export them abroad.

The Conservative failure to restructure government over the last eight years has not just resulted in a mounting debt crisis and the high levels of unemployment that we have experienced recently. By refusing to confront the need for root and branch reform to the way government services are delivered in this country, the government has also refused to recognize the direct linkage between economic liberalization and the need for major domestic reform and adjustment.

During the prolonged debates about the merits or demerits of freer trade, whether it was about the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement or NAFTA or the pending but far more pervasive Uruguay round of the GATT, there has been singularly little discussion of adjustment assistance. The phrase has a boring or even bureaucratic ring about it, yet it is adjustment assistance in all its many forms that can make the inevitable dislocations engendered by freer trade more understandable and more palatable even to those who are adversely affected, as some always unfortunately will be. Instead today, unlike in past years, large numbers of Canadians are left bewildered by freer trade.

For more than four decades Canadians have been assured by their governments that as a people heavily dependent on exports for their prosperity improved access to foreign markets and the parallel opening of our own markets was unquestionably good for them. The successive freer trade rounds of the GATT, although perhaps invisible to many, did undeniably contribute massively to Canada's affluence. However, part of the reason the Kennedy or Tokyo rounds did so was that they were matched by a commensurate degree of adjustment assistance, which were government initiatives that helped business and labour adapt to new opportunities and to new competition.

Following the precedents of the various GATT rounds, the Macdonald royal commission in recommending the negotiation of a free trade agreement with the United States urged repeatedly that any such agreement be matched with comprehensive adjustment assistance in the form of training and retraining, investment incentives, the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers and so forth.

The government did not do this despite promises that it would. It sought a free trade agreement with the United States but it did not devise, based on its own studies of the likely impact of free trade, those sectoral, regional or other assistance programs that would have helped to lessen the inevitable dislocation and assist Canadians to compete more effectively.

Instead of additional jobs many Canadians have seen unemployment. Tariff reductions in the GATT rounds have disrupted some Canadian industries but most dislocations in the past have been anticipated and assistance had been designed to help. In the case of free trade with the United States, the loss of manufacturing jobs has been visible enough but not the matching adjustment assistance. The adverse impact has been yet more visible as a result of being concentrated in specific areas of manufacturing and in specific communities that remain unaware of any effort to assist them to cope with the inevitable dislocation.

Some part of the all too evident job loss is a result of new international competition and a global recession and of continuing fiscal excess at home and an overly enthusiastic anti-inflationary policy in Ottawa, bringing with it high interest rates and a greatly inflated Canadian dollar. However, some part of the job loss is as a result of the absence of effective adjustment assistance, especially with regard to the access to capital by small businesses whose equity base is too weak to borrow against.

The need for innovative measures to assist small businesses to do their jobs was well identified by the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre when it said in its recent report: "The continuous innovation and investment required to support a high value-added economy will not occur without supportive financial assistance".

Even in this area of trade policy the government's work is at best half finished. Only the most sanguine among us today would argue that the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement has lived up to the extravagant promises made by the government in 1988. Its central justification was to secure access to the American market in the face of rising U.S. protectionism, yet a whole series of recent trade disputes have demonstrated just how tenuous that access is.

One of the principal reasons that the Liberal Party supported Canada's participation in the North American free trade negotiations was to correct shortcomings in the original Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. We called for tougher environmental and labour standards. We called for an accession clause to make it easier for other countries to join and thus to expand Canada's free trade options beyond the United States. Most important, we called for the inclusion of a subsidies and anti-dumping code, one which would put to an end the kind of trade harassment that has been eroding the free trade environment between the two countries and that would introduce a badly needed degree of predictability in our entry into the yet untested waters of Mexico.

As the House knows, there remains a great flaw in the NAFTA, or a black hole at the centre, which threatens to undermine the success of the entire regime. That is the continuing absence of a common set of trading rules. Not only is there no definition of subsidies in the agreement or a commitment to replace countervail action with competition law, but even the agreement's modest provision to pursue these objectives with in a specified time has been quietly dropped in the NAFTA, to be replaced by a woolly commitment to pursue the goal in some future consultations.

It is most important and most regrettable that there is an absence of common trading rules embedded in either the FTA or the NAFTA. In the long run it will undermine the legitimacy of the entire arrangement. The NAFTA is essentially a political document. However, its authority ultimately rests not on the letter of the text, but on the support it enjoys among the electorates of the three countries.

Nothing has done more to undermine enthusiasm in Canada for freer trade agreements than the highly public spectacle of ongoing punitive and seemingly groundless U.S. trade actions launched during the four years since the beginning of the supposed era of free trade with the United States. Beyond all others, it is this central question that must be addressed.

It is for that reason the Leader of the Opposition has called for amendments to the North American free trade agreement. "A Liberal government", he has said, "will seek changes to the agreement and to the North American free trade agreement". He went on: "Unlike the Conservatives, we know an opportunity when we see one. There is a new administration in Washington. It has said it wants to reopen a number of these same areas. A Liberal government will take it up on that. Not only will we seize opportunities", the leader continued, "we will create new opportunities. If it is inevitable that a western hemisphere trade bloc evolves, Canada must play an active and independent role in defining that bloc instead of always reacting to Washington's hub-and-spoke approach to trade in this hemisphere".

• (1355)

"Canada", he concluded, "should be working with other countries to minimize dominance by the stronger partner. While we must seize the opportunity to have trade in the Americas, a Liberal government will not turn its back on the rest of the world. The fastest growing economies in the world are in the Pacific basin. The current government has ignored that region although Canada is a Pacific basin nation. A Liberal administration will put a high priority on existing trade with that dynamic region".

For the reasons that I have touched upon and others that would be easy to elaborate on, I want to move an amendment to the motion before the House.

I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all words after the word "entails" and by substituting the following therefor:

renegotiating the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the North American free trade agreement and includes, within a framework of fiscal responsibility, such actions as a jobs plan, an infrastructure program and a national child care program in order to ensure job creation and prosperity for Canadians.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take the motion in amendment, moved by the hon. member for Etobicoke North and seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West, under advisement.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I think the electorate will be interested in this latest brand of medicine being sold to cure the country's ills by members of a party who, when they last formed the government, produced interest rates at 22 per cent, initiated the terrible burden of debt, were absent to any significant economic policy and led us to higher unemployment rates than this government has.

What do we have? First, we have a clear indication of the honesty that is to characterize the Liberal Party. For example, it is alleged by the member for Etobicoke North that we are advocating nationalization in the resolution the New Democratic Party has submitted today. Nationalization, whether advocated or not, is not in the motion here. He then criticizes us for what is not in the motion.

I think the Canadian people will catch the message of the amendment. Note that a party which has yet to produce an economic plan, whose leader has steadfastly resisted propounding an economic plan and would suggest to the Canadian people that it will renegotiate and redefine NAFTA has amended the motion to do just that.

An hon. member: Based on what motion?

Mr. McCurdy: It would do just that and include in the motion the approval of the free trade agreement and of NAFTA but it would steal—as the Liberals are wont to do so frequently—the fundamental economic portions of this platform. The only thing that is negated is the cancellation of the free trade agreement and our insistence that NAFTA not be proceeded with.

The question I have to ask is whether this party will ever have an economic plan. How does it perceive that it can proceed to renegotiate the free trade agreement when there is no provision for renegotiation?

I can just see it all now. The leader of the federal Liberal Party, that other Darryl, will go to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Time is running out. The hon. member for Etobicoke North for a short answer.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to give a short answer to all that stuff.

Since the motion suggests that the NDP is against privatization then I assume it means to renationalize industries, but perhaps its language does not really mean anything.

On the question of government spending, the member will recall that prior to the 1984 election, real interest rates in Canada were lower then than they are today. If the member has some difficulty with real interest rates then he should address himself to that side of the House, to the government, which has consistently—

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

NATIONAL NUTRITION MONTH

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, March is National Nutrition Month. This year, the national campaign of the Canadian Dietetic Association will emphasize the fact that eating better is good for you and the search for answers to women's nutritional needs.

The purpose of this campaign is to make women more aware of their diet and the importance of what they eat. It considers the diet-related health problems women face these days, including cancer and cardiovascular disease, the thinness craze and the concept of healthy body weight. During the campaign consumers will take part in activities and receive information to help them make sensible choices when planning their meals.

The Canadian Dietetic Association and its members are to be commended for this campaign and I wish them every success. The Department of National Health and Welfare is to be commended as well since its Canada Food Guide was used for this campaign.

THE PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, there are strange things going on with the Conservatives. The Prime Minister says his party is in great shape financially while headlines consistently confirm that the country is in an economic mess.

Conservatives claim to be insistent on the need for a regular accounting of the nation's finances. Yet there is talk that the budget will be put off until after the leadership convention in June or perhaps later, or perhaps not at all. They say they do not want to further tie the hands of the next Prime Minister beyond what an eight and a half year steady $35 billion deficit has already done.

The Titanic ship of state is on a course at full speed headed irreversibly for the mother of all icebergs in the midst of the storm of the century with no radar. The captain has abandoned ship while the senior officers who helped plot the course are not exactly clamouring to assume command. In fact, many are joining the 100 of the 157-member ship's company who are also abandoning ship.

The country is sinking and the lifeboats are going down with the ship. Only a change with a Liberal captain and crew will be able to refloat the ship of state and put it on a safe course.

THE CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt that the free trade agreement has been very beneficial to Canada's agricultural sector.

In fact, exports of durum wheat to the United States have increased 52 per cent since 1988 while exports of refined canola oil are up 77 per cent.

The success of the FTA is augmented by the inclusion of the dispute settlement mechanism which has yielded one positive result after another.

Recently the FTA panel report on exports of durum wheat rejected American allegations that our wheat is shipped into the United States at unfairly low prices.

In fact the panel ruled that the practices of the Canadian Wheat Board and the Western Grain Transportation Act are within the bounds of the free trade agreement.

History will show that this government made the right choice in its adoption of a policy of freer trade.

FOREIGN AID

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in 1987 the Government of Canada, in a policy statement entitled Sharing Our Future, said that its top priority is the alleviation of poverty in the Third World. Last June at the earth summit in Rio the government promised new and additional aid to help poor nations in Africa and elsewhere.

Now we learn that the government is cutting aid to the poorest in Ethiopia, Uganda, Kenya, Tanzania, Madagascar and Niger. We have urged these countries to adopt democracy and human rights. Now we are abandoning them to their fate at a time when they actually need our aid more than ever to improve health care, water quality, and agriculture, and to reduce desertification.

This cowardly and insensitive decision to cut aid to the poorest of the poor is not worthy of Canada's reputation abroad. This decision should be reversed in our common interest. Canada should not break its promise.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, a year ago the president of the generic pharmaceutical manufacturer, Apotex, said that Bill C-91, the drug patent bill, would destroy the generic drug industry.

Last week Apotex officially opened a new $200 million facility, which according to the president is the largest expansion in the history of the pharmaceutical industry in Canada. At the same time the deficit-ridden Ontario

NDP government announced that it is providing a grant to Apotex of $1 million. Apparently Bill C-91 has not destroyed the generic drug industry. In fact, it seems to be thriving.

By the way, whatever happened to those corporate welfare bums the NDP used to tell us about?

THE PREMIER OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the premier of Newfoundland has learned nothing from the tragedies at Davis Inlet during the last year. The Innu find his assertions that self-government has nothing to do with the problems at Davis Inlet as arrogant and contemptuous as Newfoundlanders found the comments of Charles Lynch about their opposition to Meech Lake.

The premier says the Innu are being manipulated by their elected representatives and that unlike him they do not know what is good for Innu communities. The premier wants the Innu moved to Goose Bay or Schefferville.

The member for Chateauguay would have all Indians moved to Labrador and Charles Lynch would have all Newfoundlanders dragged out to sea.

If mainlanders talked about Newfoundlanders the way the premier talks about the Innu he would go ballistic.

The Innu have completed a study recommending relocation of their community to Sango Bay. A federal-provincial study has confirmed that relocation. The premier's comments are a good indication of why the federal government should assert its jurisdiction and negotiate directly with the Innu.

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION ACT

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, in its report on the St. Lawrence seaway the transport committee recognized that the seaway system is dependent upon eastbound grain traffic for its survival.

There is evidence that the current method of payment of the western grain transportation subsidy is distorting the natural directional flow of grain shipments. As such, the committee recommended that until various discrepancies caused by the Western Grain Transportation Act are dealt with, the subsidy should be extended to include grain export movements through the seaway.

I believe that the subsidy is causing a directional bias in the shipment of grain in this country to the detriment of the seaway system. This distortion not only affects grain traffic flowing east but also has an effect on cargoes that move in a westerly direction through the seaway, such as iron ore. This further impacts on a steel industry that is already suffering.

Changes are being considered in the Western Grain Transportation Act. These changes must take into consideration transportation issues in addition to the welfare of our western farmers. I ask the government to eliminate the current directional bias that is having such a great impact on the St. Lawrence seaway.

THE GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, Australian voters have said no to the GST and therefore will not suffer the disastrous effects of such a tax. Congratulations, Australia.

Here in Canada citizens did not have the same opportunity for honest and open debate to either approve or reject this tax before the Conservative government railroaded us into this terribly complex GST regime.

The Minister for International Trade has decided not to run for the leadership of the Conservative Party because he cannot divorce himself from Conservative policies like the GST.

It matters not who leads the Conservative Party. Canadians remember that this is the party that, among other disastrous policies, imposed the GST. Canadians have and are suffering the consequences.

Soon Canadians will have a say and then this government will pay the price.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, although staffing of the CEIC office in Springhill, Nova Scotia has recently been reduced I am assured that services will be fully maintained and the office will remain open.

This office has served the western part of Cumberland county for many years and plays an important and essential role in the lives of people in the area.

Western Cumberland county has suffered several negative economic impacts, and although there are now some promising developments the office must be maintained.

I will be monitoring the future of the Springhill office and working with the minister to ensure that traditional services continue and the Springhill office stays open for business.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, thousands of people came out in Toronto on Saturday in the storm of the century to produce a storm of their own in protesting the UI cuts. These people obviously agree with the 58 per cent in an Ekos research poll that the proposed changes are a clear departure from the Canadian tradition of providing income support for the unemployed.

They were warmed by their concern for the unemployed and the impoverished and their outrage against the government's attack on the unemployed, both of which led them out into the bitter weather conditions.

The government should be listening to these dedicated individuals and to the majority of Canadians. The government's economic failure to control unemployment should not be shifted onto the backs of the unemployed.

WORLD CONSUMER RIGHTS DAY

Mr. Michel Champagne (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, today is World Consumer Rights Day as proclaimed by the International Organization of Consumer Unions. This year's theme concerns transnational corporations and consumer interests. Throughout the world, consumers will celebrate this anniversary by taking part in activities emphasizing their contribution to society.

Consumers have a vital role to play in maintaining Canada's prosperity and competitiveness. Volunteers who work for consumer groups have spoken up for their rights as consumers and have been acknowledged by the Government of Canada.

We want to see a strong consumer movement that continues to promote the needs of consumers. Founded in 1960 by five consumer associations from the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia, the Netherlands and Belgium, the IOCU now has 170 organizations representing 65 countries on five continents. The IOCU deals with consumer problems at the international level, including those related to medical products, pesticides, tobacco and infant formulas.

That is why, as Canadian parliamentarians, through our Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, we support a movement that is so important for Canadian consumers.

PEACEKEEPING

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not generally my custom to wear any insignia or badge on my lapel with the colour blue on it. However it is with great honour that I am wearing a blue ribbon today to salute the creation of the blue beret group, designed to honour and recognize the men and women serving in our peacekeeping missions in widespread areas around the world.

This blue beret group is the idea of Mrs. Cathy Sargent, who is the wife of a peacekeeping officer. In this new age of peacekeeping in which an increasing number of Canadians are putting their lives at risk it is critical that we find ways to say to them: We take pride in their actions; we support their efforts; and we have not forgotten them.

Other members on both sides of the House should also consider wearing a blue ribbon. I would be glad to supply them with these ribbons.

I also call on the government to endorse the notion of a blue beret day in Canada to honour our peacekeepers. I urge the Minister of National Defence to meet with the founding members of this group in Winnipeg so we could perhaps make this a national identification.

Members will remember that during the gulf war thousands of American citizens wore yellow ribbons to support their troops in that area. Let us make the blue ribbon a nation-wide symbol in recognition of our peacekeeping troops and their courageous efforts to try to maintain peace world-wide.

THE BRIER

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, Ottawa was the site of some exciting curling this past week as the Brier came to town. Congratulations are due to Russ Howard and his Ontario rink who won the right to represent Canada at the world tournament in Geneva at the end of the month.

Those watching the Brier saw all sorts of red stetsons in the stands. The trademark hats are being sported by the 1994 Brier committee. They were here to promote next year's event in Red Deer, Alberta.

They did a fine job. Tickets for next year's Brier were snapped up and people are in for a treat when they visit Red Deer next year. There is not a bad seat in our new Centrium and there will be plenty to do between draws. Red Deer is one of the smallest cities to ever host a Brier but the 1994 Brier will be big on hospitality and the enthusiasm of the organizing committee promises a great time for all.

I encourage all curling fans to hightail it to Red Deer for the Brier in 1994.

PARLIAMENTARY EMPLOYMENT AND STAFF RELATIONS ACT

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, this government clearly does not know its own mind with regard to its own staff relations. Six and three-quarter years ago, in June 1986, this Tory government drafted, introduced and, with all-party support, passed Bill C-45, the Parliamentary Employment and Staff Relations Act, through both the House and Senate and Royal Assent was given.

However the cabinet has still not acted to proclaim the operative sections, parts II and III, which simply extend to parliamentary employees the same labour standards and health and safety protections enjoyed by all other federal workers.

• (1415)

This almost seven-year delay has to be the longest legislative pregnancy in history, and it was not an immaculate conception. It is a Tory baby and it begs the question: Did the government not know what it was doing in 1986 or does it not know what it is doing now? When is it going to deliver?

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, on March 4 I hosted a special town hall meeting in my riding. The subject of the meeting was public safety and the Young Offenders Act.

We had a high turn-out, which clearly shows the level of public concern about this issue. A panel of experts was on hand to answer questions. The discussion was lively and often heated.

My constituents were very clear. They are tired of seeing a disproportionate amount of crime committed by young offenders. They want major changes to the Young Offenders Act so that the act can serve as a real deterrent. They recognize that it is only a handful of repeat young offenders who give all youth a bad name and they want the means to deal severely with these few.

Once again I urge the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General to overhaul the Young Offenders Act. It is painfully clear to the residents of Edmonton—Strathcona that the act is not working. The age for transfer to adult court should be lowered and penalties for repeat offenders should be strengthened. A review of the act has long been promised but the time for action is now.

POULTRY INDUSTRY

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, when is chicken not chicken? When it is left to this government and its trade negotiators.

According to article 706 of the free trade agreement with the United States, import restrictions do not apply on 13 different types of further processed chicken. The definition states that chicken and chicken products do not include chicken cordon bleu, breaded chicken cordon blue, chicken Kiev, chicken breaded Kiev, boneless Rock Cornish with rice, stuffed Rock Cornish, boneless chicken, chicken Romanov, chicken Neptune, chicken TV dinners, old roosters and spent fowl. Of course we see a lot of old roosters across the way.

This is a loophole large enough to drive a truck through. Indeed Campbell's Soup has decided to do just that: bring truckloads of further processed chicken into Canada. Campbell's is selling its St. Mary's, Ontario, plant which supplied chicken for its soup and TV dinners and will import lower quality U.S. processed chicken instead.

I call on the government to take advantage of the U.S. government's desire for side trade agreements to close this and all similar loopholes that are haemorrhaging jobs out of Canada.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister who I understand today is the minister of fisheries.

Last week the Minister of Finance said that he did not want to bring down a budget in the middle of a Tory leadership race. Today it is clear there is no Tory leadership race. The only race is to see who can get away the fastest from that sinking ship, the Tory record.

If last week's excuse for not presenting a budget was the Tory leadership race, what is the excuse this week?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): First, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance did not say that last week. The hon. member knows that is not what the Minister of Finance said at all.

The Minister of Finance is carrying on his pre-budget consultations. He is in Montreal today carrying out that task. I am sure he will be making an announcement to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada in the fullness of time.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister.

The number of Conservative ministers who want to run for leader is shrinking by the hour as they recognize that after nine years of Conservative policies their chances of being Prime Minister for very long after their convention is not that great.

One of the ministers who has made up his mind is the Minister of Finance. Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House today whether the Minister of Finance will put the interest of the country ahead of the interest of his party? Is there going to be a new job creating, growth creating budget before the Tory leadership convention? Yes or no.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, this has been answered on Thursday and Friday and again today by myself.

I might say to the hon. member that in December the Minister of Finance brought forward an economic statement which included a number of job creating proposals especially aimed at helping small business to create jobs in this country and brought forward an infrastructure program within that budget. Although it was a modest infrastructure program it was one that was responsible within the fiscal restraints that we have.

• (1420)

The Minister of Finance has already put in place these economic stimuli for the economy. We are starting to see some very positive results from that and we will continue to through 1993.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the minister that it is his government which was in the habit of boasting about the merits of a regular budget cycle, but he no longer talks about that today. I would like the minister to tell us right away what must come first, the whims of the Conservative Party or the economic needs of Canada?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): The economic needs of Canada, Mr. Speaker.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The truth is that the government seems to be more concerned about the state of the Conservative Party than about the state of the country's economy. The party is collapsing like a house of cards. Senior minister after senior minister is withdrawing from politics rather than having to defend the government's record. Over 400,000 people have lost their jobs in the last recession.

I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a simple question. Will there be a jobs budget? Yes or no.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question. The Minister of Finance will make an announcement in the House at the appropriate time.

She will have to wait for it. She will have to show some patience for a change.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, everyone knows that the Prime Minister is rigging his own succession. However, his strategy is collapsing with the retreat of several senior ministers. Instead of preparing his budget, the Minister of Finance is playing with the budget in order to boost his own leadership bid.

I would therefore like to put my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Since more than 400,000 people have lost their jobs in this last recession will he present a job-creating budget? Yes or no.

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance brings down a budget it will certainly be a job creation budget. When I brought down a budget the House brought me down so we are going to approach this very carefully.

TRADE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I suppose, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people will have a chance to bring the Tory government down in the next election.

My question is for the minister of trade. It was announced last Thursday by the U.S. that it wanted another form of parallel accord to protect U.S. interests from potential import surges from Canada and Mexico as a result of NAFTA. It seems that virtually every week the U.S. administration is raising some new concern about the NAFTA deal while this government clearly has been silent. In fact the government insists on ramming this deal through Parliament without any clear sense of where NAFTA is actually headed.

Clearly there are many outstanding questions about NAFTA. Will the Minister for International Trade and his government withdraw this piece of legislation?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer to that question is no, but I want to draw my colleague's attention to the fact that in February 1992 the government put forward some proposals for side agreements which covered a number of the areas being raised by the U.S. administration.

The Bush administration turned down those proposals. The Clinton administration has said that it is willing to talk about the Canadian proposals. This is the basis on which we will be going into the negotiations later this week.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Clinton administration has told the government that it wants an arrangement on import surges and that trade actions should be permitted where environmental standards are not enforced.

The government has acknowledged that were this to proceed it would mean that the NAFTA deal would have to be reopened.

• (1425)

My question is again directed to the minister of trade. Clearly this is not a deal that has been completed. Yet the government insists on putting it before the House of Commons when there are many other negotiations taking place that will fundamentally affect the deal itself.

Will the Minister for International Trade and his government not remove this piece of legislation from the House of Commons until Canadian people and members of the House of Commons really know what they are voting and debating?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me just say for the umpteenth time that the agreement signed on December 17 will not be reopened. President Salinas, President Clinton and the Prime Minister have all agreed that it will not be reopened. The House is being asked to consider the legislation to implement the agreement.

In addition there are the side agreements which, as I said, are a continuation of the Canadian agenda as put forward last February. We will be fully equipped, having had consultations with environmental non-governmental organizations and with labour organizations, to develop the negotiating mandate. It is that mandate the negotiators will be following when they sit down at the table, which I believe will be on Wednesday.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, clearly, as far as NAFTA is concerned, the President of the United States has decided not to present the bill to Congress before negotiating the parallel accords.

Given the concerns in Congress and the decision by the President of the United States, why does the Government of Canada insist on presenting a bill here in the House before the parallel accords are negotiated? Furthermore, why does the government not recognize the need to present a total agreement to the House of Commons and to Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we are presenting legislation covering a total agreement, the agreement that was signed on December 17.

The legislative process in Canada has been under way with the hearings that have been held. It has been also under way in the United States. The negotiation on the terms of the implementing legislation in the United States is also under way. It will commence on April 1 in the Mexican Congress. The processes are all under way at about the same time.

I also want to underscore the point that the NAFTA, the agreement we signed on December 17, is a good deal in itself. It is for that reason we want to tie that one down and make sure we have the approval of the Parliament of Canada to ensure we get the full benefits of the agreement.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister for International Trade said that in any negotiations surrounding the North American free trade agreement: "A country has to be willing to give something in order to get something".

Now that the United States has reopened negotiations by demanding three parallel accords, could the minister explain what the Americans are willing to give in exchange for their three parallel accords, in exchange for Canadian government support? Is the Canadian government seeking a parallel accord on subsidies, a code which, for example, the C.D. Howe Institute in the last few days has again emphasized is critical to the success of any free trade agreement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me say for the umpteenth plus two times that this agreement is not being reopened. The agreement that was signed on December 17 is not being reopened, and I see my hon. friend nodding his head in agreement.

If there is to be any change in the subsidies code, that would entail a reopening of negotiations. Under way right now there are proposals under the GATT made by Director General Dunkel that satisfy the requirements of the Canadian government.

• (1430)

It is those proposals that we are pressing hard through the GATT negotiations. I would say to my hon. friend that by having these side agreements we are getting things that we sought in February 1992. These are going to improve upon the broad relationship between Canada and the other two countries, but they are not a change. They will not result in changes to the NAFTA that was signed on December 17.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): The minister knows that the parallel accords will modify or in some ways alter the content and the terms of NAFTA. Otherwise, they would be meaningless. They would have no purpose. If the United States government attaches such importance to its three parallel accords it must be asking the Canadian and the Mexican governments to support it on those three parallel accords. I ask the minister, what are Canada's interests? Why does the Canadian government not advance a proposal for a parallel accord in an area of prime concern to Canada, the subsidies code?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if we proposed changes in the subsidies code we would be reopening the agreement. What we put forward as of February 1992, and which will be reiterated at the meetings on Wednesday, are proposals that we believe are important in the relationships on the environment and on labour in particular.

Let me remind my hon. friend that there are five areas that Mr. Kantor has said are the object of U.S. interest: border clean-up between Mexico and the United States, nothing to do with Canada; stronger enforcement of national laws, primarily focused on Mexico; North American commissions on environment and labour standards which are the two areas that Canada proposed in February 1992 so that it is a continuation of the Canadian agenda; and worker adjustment and retraining, which is a matter between the U.S. administration and U.S. Congress. It should be done because Canadian laws or Canadian training programs are about two to three times more generous than the U.S. laws. The fifth area is that of import surges and we are not sure precisely what the Americans have in mind on that one. We will know better as we go through these discussions later on this week.

RUSSIA

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The government has reiterated its support for Russian President Yeltsin. According to government spokesmen on the weekend, the Prime Minister wants action taken by the G-7 countries. Apparently the Prime Minister wants "an urgent and visible infusion of aid to Russia" now. The Prime Minister does not have to wait for the other G-7 countries. Our grain shipments to Russia have been stalled for months. They could be resumed if the government extended a new line of credit.

My question for the minister is whether the government is prepared to do that to help Russians, at the same time help prairie farmers.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be in a position to give the hon. member a more complete answer tomorrow. As he knows, there is a sherpas' meeting having to do with the G-7 meeting going on at the moment. Mr. Fyodorov gave the Russian position as to what they felt would be needed over the next little while. I think it is important that we not treat President Yeltsin and the Russians as a supplicant. This is a very important country in terms of the stability of the world and it is a country that has been a superpower.

We will be looking at all aspects of aid. We want to be as creative as we can. We recognize the position of western farmers, but we also want to ensure that whatever aid we give, whether it is bilaterally or multilaterally through the G-7 or other support systems, is the right kind of aid and what is needed at this moment.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, it seems to us on this side that if the government was really sincere about helping Russia it would tackle the wheat issue. Resumption of wheat shipments would help cash-starved prairie farmers. It would provide employment to seaway workers and it would restore hope to the port of Churchill which is slowly dying under current government policies. Moreover the Russians, who are good customers, want more wheat shipped through the port of Churchill. So what is it, an offer to help the Russians or just talk?

• (1435)

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is definitely not just talk. On a per capita basis Canada has been among the most generous of western countries and we will continue to be in the forefront of what needs to be done.

I think it is also important to know that those have been commercial arrangements with Russia in the past that have gone on for some 35 years and they will continue to exist in the future.

There is obviously some bridging needed but it is also important to indicate to the Russians and to the Russian people that the economic reforms and the economic disciplines are important as well. We are going to be there for Russia and we are going to be there to ensure that economic reform and democratic reform proceed in Russia.

That is exactly what this meeting is about right now. That is why Mr. Fyodorov is at the sherpas' meeting. When we get a full report then we will be actively considering the most imaginative and creative programs that we can bring forward to help Russia and the other countries of the former Soviet Union as well.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Finance. Despite the Minister of Finance's attempts to interfere in Australia's election the GST claimed another victim with Labour's victory there this past weekend.

I want to ask if this government is now going to concentrate on economic issues here in Canada. Is it finally prepared to recognize, with 1.5 million people out of work, that it must bring forward a full scale budget to present to this House of Commons immediately?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the House today I explained to my hon. friend that this government put before the people in 1988 a goods and services tax. They elected this government and we implemented the goods and services tax. The hon. member has a short memory.

As far as the budget is concerned, that question was answered on Thursday, answered on Friday and answered again today. The Minister of Finance is carrying on pre-budget consultations at the present time and he will make an announcement in this House in due course. The hon. member will just have to be patient until the Minister of Finance returns.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the GST will become known as the Goodbye Sorry Tories tax.

The United States federal reserve chairman, Alan Greenspan, warned that the American recovery is the weakest on record, yet the government continues to rely on export increases to the United States to push Canada ahead.

Will the government recognize that we need our own domestic economic moves here in Canada? We have set out our New Democratic jobs plan. Why will the government not set out a plan for the economy?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance laid out a pretty comprehensive plan in December which has been well received and which is operating. I might note that the unemployment rate has dropped in the last couple of months. It stands at 10.8 per cent. It is still too high and we readily admit that, but it has come down from 11.8 per cent. It is dropping and is heading in the right direction.

The Minister of Finance brought forward what I believe and what most people believe to be a very responsible statement in December, giving modest help to the economy while at the same time keeping in mind the fiscal constraints in which we are operating.

One of the things the New Democratic Party's economic plan does not factor in is all these things they are going to walk away from like the free trade agreement, the NAFTA and the GST. They are not factored into their over-all plans. Once those are factored in to the over-all plans, again it is typical Alice in Wonderland financial policies of the no down payment party.

STUDENT AID

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. For over eight years the government has promised to bring forward a sensible and modern student aid program.

• (1440)

What has it done? It has imposed a 3 per cent tax on student loans. It has added six months' interest to student loans. Now it has brought forward a request for financing Canada student loans which does nothing to respond to the educational needs of the students, nothing whatsoever.

In fact, it is the beginning of privatization. Canadians want to know, students in particular, what will be the future eligibility requirements for student loans? Who will establish the requirements and what will be the role of the banks in the establishment of those requirements?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a question in which certainly many Canadians have shared an interest.

This year alone over 250,000 students will be receiving close to $800 million in loans to attend post-secondary institutions.

The hon. member is aware that the program has been undergoing a very careful review. The minister has promised to bring forward very soon an improved plan which will help those who are most in need. I too am looking forward to that very soon.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, promises, promises and there are no answers to the questions.

[Translation]

The government has set up some initiatives like Stay-in-School and Learning Well—Living Well. That is laudable. But this new program that it is proposing for student aid is contrary to these initiatives and does absolutely nothing to encourage students to continue their education.

What message is this government sending to students? What is it doing to our young Canadians?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, since the program began in 1964, more than two million full-time students have received more than $7.6 billion in aid from this program.

I am sure that the hon. member will be very grateful that the minister has already consulted. She has many ideas and will soon announce an improved program that will certainly help those who need it most.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The Campbell's Soup Company is closing its doors in my riding next month with the loss of over 300 jobs and a ripple effect of $15 million lost from our already battered agricultural economy. It is just one of over 100 food processors to die or scale back since the free trade agreement.

What will the minister do to keep this plant open?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture is actually with his counterparts in the prairies. I will take note of that question and we will get an answer on that.

We should remember that so far with the free trade agreement, we increased our exports in the agrifood area by something around 30 per cent over the first two years of the agreement. It is really booming. We are talking about billions of dollars of exports to the United States.

Obviously in some areas, like canning, we have to get some redefining in the structure of the industry. If you look at the agrifood sector as a whole, we have had great success over the first two years of the free trade agreement.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, by my figures it has been decimated in our area.

The minister is aware that over 7,000 jobs in Ontario have gone in this industry since 1989, out of 11,000 jobs across Canada. Campbell's has been in Chatham for nearly half a century. My local tomato, pea and carrot growers have lost over $3.5 million in contracts from the Campbell's closing alone.

What will the minister do to save this crucial industry from being decimated?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned to my hon. friend, with those complex issues where industry is restructuring, we do not have simple answers to complex questions.

As I mentioned, we have created the SAGIT committee on international trade in order to get people involved in industry in the agrifood sector to work together with government at the provincial and federal levels in order to work out ways and means on how to address those problems.

Obviously plants are closing but the industry as a whole has to be looked at. I repeat that there was an increase of 30 per cent in exports to the United States for the first two years of the free trade agreement. Sometimes when there are problems they are not related to the free trade agreement. As far as I know, it is related to the whole restructuring of the industry.

ARMENIA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

For the fourth year in a row the government of Azerbaijan has continued its blockade of Armenia. This winter has found the people of Armenia suffering extreme hardships. Many have died. With the melting snow and floods of spring, epidemics can be anticipated to rage out of control. This desperate situation has reached a crisis.

Will the Canadian government move quickly to ask for an urgent meeting of the United Nations Security Council to address this critical situation to find a way to force the removal of the blockade of Armenia thereby allowing food, medical supplies and fuel to reach these desperate people?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let me say first that like others the Canadian government is very concerned about the situation in Armenia and what has happened there over the past few years. We have taken a strong role in the CSCE in trying to bring about a solution in a series of negotiations that might help to bring this situation to an end.

I appreciate the hon. member's suggestion that this should come before the Security Council. I do want to report to him that through the CSCE, in part because Canada began the process in the CSCE well over a year ago, there was a bit of a breakthrough last Thursday in terms of bringing people to the table. There was a meeting in Vienna. There will be an eight-member mission to Armenia and Azerbaijan to lay the groundwork for negotiations in the future working toward a ceasefire.

That has not stopped us from urging that all the parties bring this to a solution, nor has it stopped us from giving humanitarian aid to Armenia and to others in the region to try to alleviate the immediate suffering.

We will not hesitate to propose taking it to the Security Council should the CSCE efforts fail. However, we think we are seeing a breakthrough at the moment.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the seatmate of the Minister of National Defence, the Minister Responsible for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

From rowing to the biathlon, from figure skating and skiing to track and field, the Canadian sports system is now producing world-class performances and world champions in a wide range of sports.

In view of the many benefits to Canada and Canadians of offering opportunities for our athletes to compete effectively at international levels of sport, why has the government chosen this moment to administer devastating cutbacks to the Canadian sports system?

If the minister is inclined to blame fiscal realities, how can he explain to Canadian athletes, the Canadian sport community and to the Canadian people how there is less money now for sport on the one hand but there is $5.8 billion for helicopters on the other?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I will allow my seatmate the privilege of dealing with the helicopter issue as she did so well last week.

The hon. member raises a very important question. Sports is extremely important in Canada and the hon. member deserves an answer. Of course I did not agree with the preamble and all that, but with respect to the very serious question relating to the important issue of sports in Canada, particularly the tremendous success of some of our athletes in particular in the last week or so, whether it be in Prague, in Toronto, or elsewhere in Europe, the government has a fiscal situation which applies to everything including the budgets with respect to sports. I am sure that with my hon. colleague's support, we will get a response from the government to the task force which makes recommendations to deal with such issues.

• (1450)

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question concerns the other part of the minister's portfolio, the fitness side.

Is the minister aware that the health care costs arising out of inactivity by Canadians exceeds the costs attributable to smoking? If so, how does he justify the Draconian cutbacks he imposed on federally funded fitness programs last week and the demolition job he performed on active living organizations responsible for carrying out those programs?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I suppose vocabulary is very easy and very cheap sometimes, but Draconian and demolition, I think my hon. friend would want to look back on those words.

If, as he suggests, I did a demolition job last week, I was responding to recommendations from the fall forum and from the steering committee that was set up to look at those recommendations and propose infrastructure changes with respect to active living.

This is extremely important in Canada and we have to encourage active living because it does save health costs. I am sure that with those savings we will be able to do more not only for the sports community, but also for the active living community.

FEED FREIGHT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Another important area which is about to receive cutbacks is the Feed Freight Assistance Program in Atlantic Canada. Farmers accept that is their share and they have to play a part in the reduction. The only thing they take exception to is the formula used. They have proposed a much more fair and equitable formula that still maintains the principle of the Feed Freight Assistance Program.

Can the minister give us an update and explain if we have accepted that proposal?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): My hon. friend is raising a very important point. On February 25 Agriculture Canada officials met with their provincial counterparts involved with this issue. There were discussions as a follow-up to this meeting.

A compromise proposal was offered and put on the table to our counterparts in the maritimes last Friday. The proposal is now in their hands. I am told they are considering it and will get together again this week or next week. It is moving in the right direction. We are trying to get an honourable compromise to make sure that the program is working well.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration.

Last week my colleagues from London East and Hamilton West asked why certain women subject to gender persecution were being deported to their countries of origin. In answer to their questions the minister referred to the new guidelines issued that day by the Immigration and Refugee Board as if this was a solution for these women.

Since these women from Eritrea and Russia were already rejected by the refugee board before the new guidelines were issued, will the minister now grant them entry to Canada on a humanitarian and compassionate basis and be consistent with the new guidelines?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated last week, every case of rejected refugee claimant is subject to a case-by-case review where the principles of humanitarian and compassionate considerations are given.

These cases to which the hon. member refers will go through that process absolutely.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): With respect to the new guidelines of the refugee board on gender persecution, the chairperson said when she announced these new regulations that first of all, they were not binding on the board and second, that gender persecution would not stand on its own as a ground for refugee status but must be linked to an existing ground in the law.

In these circumstances will the minister table amendments to the Immigration Act to specifically include gender persecution as a ground for refugee status? I want to tell him that if he does so this party will give him rapid approval of those amendments.

• (1455)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, they were not there to protect the Canadian public from criminals and terrorists. However, they will be there to do something which, the hon. member is asking the government and the Liberal Party is advocating that the Government of Canada do, would unilaterally amend the Geneva Convention. That is not in the best interests of Canada and I will not follow Liberal advice.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

He will know that had the Minister of Finance been here today for Question Period he would have indicated that one of the prime planks in the government's current policy platform is the reduction of interest rates. Interest rates have gone down in the last few months. They have, for the bank rate and the prime rate—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Milliken: I am glad to hear the applause because I know members opposite will want to ensure that interest rates go down for all Canadians. However, if the minister looks at the rates charged by the chartered banks on their principal credit cards, he will see the rate has stayed at about 17 per cent, in spite of the bank rate being at about 6 per cent. He will also notice that the other major credit card companies are charging rates of 28 per cent which have not decreased.

When will the minister take action on behalf of consumers whom he is supposed to be representing and end this usury?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member of the opposition is to be commended for his question, which is an opportunity for Canadians to become more aware of credit card interest rates and, especially, the fact that other, cheaper sources of credit are available. I think it is important to stress this point, as my department does in its regular bulletin.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I asked the question because I read the bulletin published by the minister and he has not done a thing.

However, I have another question for the minister. The government stated this morning in a press release that 9 per cent interest would be payable on unpaid income tax. My question to the minister is this: When will the government reduce interest rates for people who did not pay their income tax? The 9 per cent rate is too high, since other rates are around 6 per cent.

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member on his French. I also want to thank him for saying he read the information bulletin and I hope he urges all Canadians to read it so they will of current credit card rates.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

I would like to raise the issue of the leasing and vesting arrangements which take place at federal airports. The House knows the department has been looking at these present leasing arrangements and looking for some changes. Members of the business community would like to know when these changes will take place so that they can make their long–term business plans.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the member for his continued interest in this very important subject for the people in his area. The member knows we have been working at this very diligently over the past few months and we have made progress.

My understanding is that officials from my department are meeting with people in the hon. member's area later on this week. We certainly hope to have a proper vesting policy some time during this spring.

LUBICON NATION

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The Lubicon Settlement Commission of Review has presented its final report. Among its many constructive recommendations are that the previously secret discussion paper prepared for the government by the Hon. E. Davie Fulton in 1986 be the basis for renewed negotiations, that irresolvable issues be submitted to three-party mediation, and that the Lubicon Nation itself be allowed to determine its membership, as all other bands adhering to treaties have been allowed to do.

• (1500)

Will the government now commit itself to resuming open and public good faith negotiations with the Lubicon people using the commission's recommendations as the basis for those negotiations?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his important question.

We must remember that when negotiations started in 1986 federal negotiators indicated that the federal government was prepared to use the document that had been prepared as a basis for discussion. So far, the government's position has remained unchanged in this respect.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I will take that as a commitment that the government will now commence open and public good faith negotiations on the basis of the Fulton document.

As I requested in a letter to the minister last Thursday, will the government at least withdraw from circulation in Germany its "official statement concerning the Lubicon claim question", a document shot through and through with inaccuracies and outright lies?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite wrote to the minister on March 11 and the minister's officials are now reviewing the hon. member's allegations. Since the document was drafted in German the text is being checked, and as soon as we have an answer we will report back to him.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Last week the minister responded to my question on credit card disclosure legislation by saying that the government was beginning consultation with the provinces on this matter.

The government responded to a 1989 report called Charge It in March 1989 by saying that it would: "raise the standardized disclosure recommendation for consideration in current consultations with the credit card issuers and provincial consumer ministries".

When will federal and provincial governments end the discussion phase and act to benefit consumers?

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, the government's position is that a wide variety of initiatives and undertakings exists in the provinces at this time. I think it would be appropriate to wait for these initiatives to expire before we give further consideration to the hon. member's question.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to four petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PETITIONS

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present from Canadians who are asking that the Parliament of Canada regulate the use of foul language and violence on radio and television.

They point out that foul language need not be used to entertain in English or in French.

[Translation]

They also emphasized that violence, either in the form of acts of violence or inappropriate language, undermines the efforts of parents and society.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): I have another petition here from Regina and Winnipeg about the GST on books and learning materials.

[English]

These petitioners deplore the fact that there is a goods and services tax on books and reading materials. They point out there has never been such a tax before. They feel it goes against one of our fundamental principles as a democratic state and that reading and literacy are cornerstones of societies such as our own.

They also accentuate the need to make sure we have a literate and numerate society in order to be competitive and increasingly productive. They ask the government to remove this tax.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions from residents of my riding of York West who are petitioning this Parliament, and particularly the government, to rescind Bill C-91, the pharmaceutical legislation that did away with the compulsory drug licensing system.

Over the weekend we in Toronto had a very impressive public debate on the future health care system of this country. One main point that repeatedly came up was the increasing price of prescription drugs. Just when the Americans are beginning to see the light and contemplate copying the old system, we in this country are doing away with compulsory drug licensing, allowing prices to increase, increasing the cost of health care, and discouraging Canadian entrepreneurs and Canadian pharmaceutical companies from doing well in Canada and across the globe.

Therefore the petitioners are hopeful the government, perhaps under a new leadership that we will soon see, will take a second look at pharmaceutical legislation that has clearly hurt the Canadian interest.

JUSTICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have close to 800 names on two petitions from my riding. The petitions are submitted in the memory of a little girl, Dawn Shaw, who was raped and murdered in the Comox valley.

The petitioners note that the present justice system fails to protect the children of our communities who are increasingly becoming victims of sexual assault. They make a number of suggestions for parliamentarians.

They suggest that judges should not be allowed to drop sexual assault charges because of delays in bringing a case to trial and that the jail sentence for sexual assault offenders should be lengthened for any person convicted. They also suggest that the police be permitted to take DNA samples from persons suspected of sexual assault and that DNA imprints of paedophiles and sex offenders be kept on a national police database.

They propose that sex offenders should undergo monitoring by police when they are released from jail, even after parole, that paedophiles and sex offenders should be required to register with police in their communities of residence, and that the police should be required to contact schools and other agencies dealing with children regarding the whereabouts of such paedophiles and sex offenders.

The undersigned residents of Canada, in memory of Dawn Shaw, request that Parliament enact legislation to change the justice system to provide greater protection for children from sexual assault and to assure conviction of offenders.

MULTICULTURALISM

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have petitions that were prepared by the British Heritage Institute of Canada and are signed by almost 1,200 people.

They acknowledge the fact that Canada has adopted a policy of official multiculturalism, allowing peoples of all racial origins and ethnic backgrounds the opportunity to retain and enjoy their native heritages. They acknowledge as well the fact that funding has been provided to allow multiple heritage actions and activities and yet there have been no such provisions for those of British origin or background to secure their heritage.

They indicate there is a strong conception among many Canadians that multicultural provisions do not apply to Canadians of British heritage. They call upon Parliament to take whatever action is necessary to ensure that the provisions of official multiculturalism apply equally to all ethnic groups regardless of origin.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege of presenting to Parliament petitions signed by many of my constituents.

The undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children, to support women and children who report incidents of assault or abuse, to provide assistance and support for women and children reporting assault or abuse, to provide relief and support to women as mothers to protect their children, to concentrate special effort on the training of lawyers, medical and therapeutic communities, court workers, judges and police to become knowledgeable about women and child abuse, and to emphasize the need for realistic and adequate child support orders and enforcement to focus public attention on this very important and long ignored problem.

SERIAL KILLER GAME

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by many people in my riding.

[English]

This petition is with regard to a board game. Parents and grandparents seek a ban on the new game to be introduced in Canada called serial killer board game, first edition. The game comes with a body bag, 25 babies and four serial killer figures. Its object is to commit murder and the person with the highest body count is the winner.

The game is not in the best interests of children and in the wrong hands could become dangerous and suggestive to easily impressed young people.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament and I support them whole-heartedly, to urge the Government of Canada to ban the sale of the serial killer game and prevent any other such game or material to be made available in Canada in order to protect innocent children.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 437 and 457.

[Text]

Question No. 437—Mr. Althouse:

Regarding the competitiveness conference held in Saskatoon in November 1992 (a) what was the attendance (b) of those attending how many were (i) Agriculture Canada employees (ii) provincial government employees (iii) industry representatives (iv) university personnel (v) others (c) what would be the breakdown of the costs associated with the conference, including total travel costs for Agriculture Canada employees?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): (a) Approximately 600 people attended.

(b) (i) 64 Agriculture Canada employees (ii) 40 provincial government employees (iii) 354 industry representatives (iv) 25 university personnel (v) Others: 32 registered and 85 non-registered.

(c) Including departmental planning costs, such as the coordinator's salary and research contracts, the total cost of the conference amounted to $989,000. Travel costs for Agriculture Canada employees were approximately $91,000.

Question No. 457—Mr. Edwards:

With regard to the supplying by Siemens Co. of airside guidance signs for Moncton airport, (a) were objective tests conducted concerning (i) frangibility (ii) alignment of output bundles (iii) maintenance access (iv) redundancy and are mirrors used to simulate redundancy (v) visibility (b) was the Siemens product subjected to two winters of on-site testing?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): (a) (i) Yes. Review of conformance to specified requirements was conducted and certified by a recognized independent testing laboratory.

(ii) No. Test of the alignment of output bundles is not a requirement of specification. The photometric performance of these output bundles, however, is a test requirement and this was conducted and passed by the Canadian Standards Association (CSA).

(iii) No. This aspect of design is not specifically subject to a particular test requirement of the specification. However, it was addressed during trial at the Lester B. Pearson International Airport and judged to be acceptable by the approval authority.

(iv) Yes, through the Toronto evaluation. The mirrors do not "simulate" redundancy, but are used in a manner which provides such redundancy. Siemens has adopted the mirror technique which has proven successful for European roadway sign application.

(v) Visibility of the Siemens sign was verified during the evaluation at the Lester B. Pearson International Airport. As well, since visibility relates to photometric performance, this was addressed through the CSA photometric tests mentioned above for alignment of output bundles.

(b) There is no requirement for any airports product to be subjected to two winters of on-site testing. The Siemens product was installed for one winter at the Lester B. Pearson International Airport. However, the process of evaluating the Siemens product, including site testing and testing by the Canadian Standards Association, extended over a period of two years.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Cardiff: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. McLaughlin (p. 16964) and of the amendment of Mr. MacLaren (p. 16978).

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): This morning, the hon. member for Etobicoke North presented a motion in amendment which, upon consideration, was ruled admissible.

[English]

There are six minutes remaining in the question or comments period after the speech of the hon. member for Etobicoke North.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his insightful and comprehensive address with respect to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and NAFTA and for his questions in the House today.

I want to ask three very quick questions. The first one is with respect to the amendment. Does infrastructure refer in any part to education, training and retraining programs?

The second one relates to his mention of the black hole. As I understood it he was referring to common trade rules, the lack of definition of subsidies and anti-dumping rules, and the insistence I believe by our party—and I would like some confirmation of this—of protection of our energy sources, our labour standards, and our environmental standards. Would my colleague from Etobicoke North in fact address these particular issues?

A final point is that he did make very clear the difference between our party and the governing party. Perhaps he could say a word on what the differences are between our party and the party to my left. I would appreciate that.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, on the question of whether infrastructure includes training and retraining, yes, indeed. Central to our policy going into government will be to emphasize the ways in which Canadians can be helped to benefit from freer trade, whether it be global or hemispheric. That includes the necessity for much more effective training and retraining programs as supported by labour and government as outlined, for example, in the recent report of the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre.

Second, dealing with subsidies, the black hole that I spoke of and which the member has in mind is the absence of any agreement on trade remedy law or, to put it another way, on what is a subsidy. There is a need to fill that hole to complete what is unfinished business. The opportunity is there, presented by the American interest today in parallel accords. Why not seek a parallel accord with the United States and Mexico based on the proposed GATT wording with regard to subsidies and take that as a Canadian initiative to improve our opportunities in the world of freer trade?

Third, on energy, our party is committed to protecting Canada's energy interests in accordance with our international obligations. It will remain a principal concern as we review all questions surrounding freer trade on a hemispheric or on a global basis.

Finally, I thank the hon. member for his kind words and appreciate his continuing involvement in the further definition of the areas of prime interest to Canadians in the question of freer trade.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I have a short question, Mr. Speaker.

Yesterday during Question Period the leader of the Liberal Party when asked about how the GST would be replaced twice mentioned the manufacturers' sales tax which existed before the GST. I wanted to ask the member who has just spoken for the Liberals if this indicated that the Liberal Party is now looking at the manufacturers' sales tax as one of the replacements for the GST?

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House regard the goods and services tax as flawed and as having been introduced at the most inauspicious time imaginable, exactly when the Conservative government did so.

With regard to alternatives, it is the commitment of our leader and our party to review the issue in a parliamentary committee when we form the government and give to that committee a mandate to review all aspects of taxation questions and to report back to the House within a year.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, let me start, if I could, by giving the House and the people of the country some sense of just how seriously we see the decline this economy has experienced in the past period of years.

Frankly, we see a devastating reduction in economic opportunity and, most important, the elimination of hundreds of thousands of jobs in manufacturing, but not just in manufacturing. There has been a record number of bankruptcies across the services sector. There are serious problems in the farm sector of this economy, and the resources sector has run into considerable difficulty.

It is quite clear that under this government's leadership we do not see prosperity developing or movement toward full employment, which are so crucial for Canadians across this land.

We have tried to put forward a counter-position to the government's approach. Each time we say to the government that it must do something different it says: This is it, this is the only direction we can take; we have to stay the course, we have to keep to this path because it is the right approach. It has kept saying that as unemployment has mounted, as the numbers on the welfare rolls have mounted, and as the misery of many Canadians has become worse and worse.

• (1520)

We do not believe that just staying the course is a proper response to one of the worst recessions that we have seen in this country. We do not believe that it is a proper response to one of the weakest recoveries we have seen in this country, a recovery which has been called a jobless recovery. It is such a contradiction in terms that there should be a jobless recovery. For us the only recovery which makes sense is a recovery that puts people back to work and lets families again feel a sense of hope about their future.

What is the different approach that we would take? It is based on three crucial points. First, we believe that it is time to stop following the Reagan–Thatcher–Mulroney approach of trickle–down economics, which says we should give huge new tax breaks to those at the top of our income structure and load new taxes, like the goods and services tax, on those in the middle and then somehow expect that new growth and new prosperity will result for everyone.

This trickle–down approach has not worked in the United States, where it has vastly increased the differential between rich and poor in that country. It has not worked in Britain, where the British economy has found itself limping badly in comparison to its European partners. It has certainly not worked here in this country, where a trickle–down approach has simply meant an increase in poverty, an increase in joblessness, and an increase in the welfare rolls across this country.

We think it is important to instead have a trickle–up approach which gives the tax benefits to that 80 per cent of the population that has been hit so hard by this government and so badly deserves some tax breaks for the future.

We want to have those at the top of the income system pay not an exorbitant share but their fair share of what is required as revenues in this society.

Let us stop giving the benefits to those at the top and give benefits to the vast majority in our economy through the tax system and then let those benefits trickle up and give us prosperity that way.

Second, it is time to stop tying ourselves so closely to the United States and hoping that foreign investment from the United States will solve our economic problems in Canada, hoping that we can attract new capital and new entrepreneurs to come in from the United States and give us a set of new jobs for our people and new opportunities. If we have learned anything from the free trade deal, from this experience of relying on the United States, it is that we cannot depend on what happens to the south of us to give us a future in Canada.

We need to try out our own freedom as an advanced, high–technology economy able to use measures such as Canadian content laws, which we are stopped from using under the free trade deal, to build new jobs in this country and establish trade ties with the entire world, not just to increase our ties with the United States.

Finally, third, it is time to stop attacking the unemployed as the Conservatives have done with their changes to the unemployment insurance system and as the Liberals did in the last recession when they attacked the unemployed in exactly the same way. It is time to say that the problem in a recession does not lie with the unemployed. The problem is unemployment, the joblessness that has been created as part of these recessionary conditions.

We need a jobs first strategy. That is why we have brought before the country and we bring before this House this strategy for a full employment economy, a jobs plan for Canada from the national New Democratic Party. It is a plan that would show us how to stop this trickle–down approach and how to free ourselves from the United States trade deal and improve our world trade ties. It shows us how we can create half a million additional jobs over the next five years for a total of between one and a half and two million jobs to be created in this country. That is an extra half million over what the different projections suggest we might achieve with the present approach.

This is not a plan that would achieve Utopia in a first parliamentary term. It is a plan that would give us a significant reduction in our unemployment rate to about 7 per cent. That is not good enough but it is much better than the 9 per cent to 10 per cent unemployment rate projected by all the economic forecasters if we continue to follow the present plan this government is following.

At the heart of this plan is a commitment to the step-by-step elimination of the goods and services tax. In our first budget we would remove the GST from four or five key areas that have important job benefits for the country. In our second budget we would reduce the GST from 7 per cent to 5 per cent. In our third and fourth budgets we would reduce it to first 4 per cent and then to 3 per cent. In our final budget, under this plan, we would eliminate that final 3 per cent of GST.

We would do so because we think it is a bad tax. It is a tax that hurts small business. It is a tax that kills jobs. It is a tax that damages the drive to improve our economy. It is a tax that hurts consumption. It is a tax that hurts our border communities.

Taking this step-by-step approach would permit a big job push at the start of our plan, partly through job gains from eliminating the GST step by step and partly through initiatives that would come from cutting existing expenditures, especially in the area of defence.

It is also important to recognize that moving forward with the elimination of the goods and services tax would stop our cost of living from rising as quickly as it otherwise would.

• (1530)

This would mean a lower rate of interest and that means lower expenditures on the interest payments that we have to make on our national debt.

About 25 per cent of our replacement for the goods and services tax would come from extra employment. Another 25 per cent would come from cutting expenditures. The final 50 per cent, to get rid of the GST, would come from making our tax system fair through three steps.

First, we must see to it that four existing and damaging loopholes in our tax system that help the large-scale corporations and benefit the wealthy in this country are plugged. We would change the present system that allows corporations to deduct interest payments so that they can then take the loans that they are taking out and invest them in foreign countries. We would plug the possibility that exists for corporations to deduct their entertainment under the present tax system. We would change the capital gains tax system so that the unfair benefits for the wealthy no longer exist. We would see to it that there are steps taken so that the family trusts set up over many years under the Liberals and under the Conservatives start to have to pay the capital gains taxes they owe. That is one set of changes to make the tax system fairer.

A second set of changes would be to put into effect a wealth transfer tax. This is something they have in the United States. This requires that when people receive inheritances from estates of over, let us say, $500,000, or $1 million as it is in the United States, they pay normal tax on the income which they get from those inheritances. Again, this is something that is perfectly straightforward and fair and something the U.S. has had in effect.

Finally, we see it as crucial the benefits that have been established by both Liberals and Conservatives in the income tax system should change. These are benefits that give tremendous handouts to those at the very top of our income structure. People whose individual income is over $100,000 per year would pay income tax on that last amount over $100,000 at a rate of 35 per cent federally instead of the present rate of 29 per cent. Those whose individual income is over $135,000 would pay at the rate of 40 per cent instead of the present 29 per cent.

These changes would make it possible to completely replace the GST, to establish an extra 500,000 jobs and to reduce the level of deficit over the next parliamentary term by $11 billion.

It is not just New Democrats who claim this. We have had this plan tested and tested carefully by an independent organization that even Conservative spokespeople have said do a good job in making these kinds of assessments. Informetrica has said that this will work and will achieve the goals that I have been talking about. By achieving these goals we will put this economy back on the road to recovery.

• (1535)

We will do it as my leader has suggested today by recognizing that there is a human deficit and not just a fiscal deficit in this country. To attack that fiscal deficit we must attack the human deficit too. We must do so by getting people back to work. We must do so by making our tax system fair. We must do so by being honest and up front about exactly what we would do in government.

This disappoints me the most about my friends in the Liberal Party in opposition. I would have hoped that they would have been challenged by the issuing of our plan last month to issue something that says what they will do about the GST, free trade and the NAFTA.

However, this is not so. On the GST we just heard the spokesperson for the Liberal Party say that the Liberals will set up a committee after they are elected to sort things out and come back with an answer after a year. There you have it, ladies and gentlemen across the country. Vote for the Liberal Party and you might know what you get after a year.

The same spokesperson has said that they want to renegotiate the NAFTA and the free trade agreement but they do not say what they will do if they do not succeed in everything they want in their renegotiation. They do not say: "We need this or else we would scrap it. We do not need that in order to stay in". They simply say: "Trust us just as in the past". They want you to trust them as in 1974 when the Liberal Party ran a magnificent election campaign and said to the people of this country that it was a terrible idea to freeze wages: "It is a terrible idea to have a wage freeze. It is terribly unfair so we will not do it. We are against it". Then, when they were elected, they put that very wage freeze into effect a short eight months later.

I say to the people of this country that they should not trust the Liberals again. Do not give us nine more years of Conservative rule. Adopt the jobs plan of the New Democrats and we can put people back to work and make this country work once more.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attention to my hon. friend, the member for Essex—Windsor. While I do not always agree with everything he says I must give him credit, as my leader and our Prime Minister has said, because at least his party has clear and unequivocal policies.

I know there are individual members of the Liberal Party, like the member for Broadview—Greenwood, who have put forward many policies, as has the member for Etobicoke North. In fact, I have never understood why the member for Etobicoke North sits on that side of the House since he supports the policies of this government.

In any event I want to address two questions to my hon. friend because I find myself somewhat confused with some of the things that he and his colleagues have been saying. In particular I want to ask him about this oft-repeated proposal that they have to not allow businesses to deduct as tax expense items hospitality and lunches and so on. This is notwithstanding the fact that I have noticed that when various organizations around the country have come to Ottawa and put on receptions the New Democratic Party members are glad to avail themselves of those receptions.

Here is my specific question with respect to that. Can my hon. friend tell me what studies his party has done that will show the impact of such a proposal on the hospitality industry in Canada and could he table these in this House? How many restaurants in our cities will go out of business, for example? How many hotels will go out of business? Clearly a major part of the business done by restaurants and hotels in the hospitality industry in this country is business related. I know my hon. friend would not suggest that such a proposal, if implemented, would not have an absolutely devastating effect on the hospitality industry in this country.

I would ask him to advise us about the studies they have done. I would ask and invite him to table those studies in this House.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the various receptions that take place here, I think that those reception are paid for out of money they have raised. Various organizations such as the Federation of Canadian Municipalities that raise money and put on receptions do not get a subsidy from the taxpayer. There is no subsidy that the Federation of Canadian Municipalities gets from the taxpayer. There is no subsidy that the trade unions get for any reception they put on. There is no subsidy for the Canadian Federation of Agriculture if it puts on a reception.

However, when the Canadian Petroleum Association comes here and puts on a reception it is able to deduct money that is spent by individual firms that help sponsor it from what is paid in taxes. One always notices on the program that there are certain individual firms that helps sponsor the reception.

I do not think people realize what this means. It means that instead of paying a full level of corporation tax on their profits the money is taken and spent on this reception. It comes right off the amount that would have been paid as taxes to the people of Canada. This means that each and every one of us as taxpayers across this country is subsidizing Imperial Oil, Shell Canada, or the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Royal Bank, or some of the biggest, richest companies in this country, to wine and dine members of Parliament. With all due respect, I think these companies are sufficiently rich that they ought to be able to pay the amounts involved.

The member has suggested that surely there will be damage done to the tourist and hospitality industry. I want to tell the member who raised this question that it has become virtually impossible for me to go out and visit a restaurant in my constituency in the Windsor area because restaurant after restaurant has just been hammered by the goods and services tax. If you ask any of those restaurants if they would prefer to have the hospitality deduction kept or if they would prefer to have the GST eliminated, there is no question that their answer would be to get rid of the goods and services tax.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the 300 restaurants in my riding will appreciate hearing that the NDP is doubting the legitimacy of a true business expense in their restaurants. To me it is just beyond comprehension. However, I do not want to focus on that. I have a lot of respect for the finance critic of the New Democratic Party.

• (1545)

In the centre of my riding on a side street is Hampton Variety. This variety store is operated by a young entrepreneur whose name is Terry McAdorey. The basis for his work is the community, not competition. He bakes his own muffins and bread. He makes his own soups and stews. He buys his cheeses from small family farms. He is the spirit of neighbourly love in the community. He employs and encourages young people. He represents a contrast to the existence one experiences when working for a transnational corporation.

It seems to me that we need to revisit and review the contribution of community-based work as a contrast to the type of work that is imposed upon us because of these exercises in the free trade agreement and NAFTA. Could the New Democratic member give his party's position on that community-based work and its importance to the economy?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. I am not sure whether I have told my friend this before but I started in politics by canvassing in Broadview in the first election of the New Democrats back in 1965. I know his constituency well.

He mentioned the many small restaurants and I ate in a lot of them when I was part of that community. I know those restaurants would be much more concerned with the elimination of the goods and services tax and the benefits that would bring to them than with the potential benefits business deductions bring.

After all, we already treat deductions for business luncheons differently. We only permit the deduction of 80 per cent of them. That shows there is something we are a little suspicious of with respect to them to begin with.

The second point he raised is an excellent one. Part of our effort with this plan and with a number of the approaches to changing the economy we have tried to put forward over the last four or five years have been to say that we have to start looking at economic development from the bottom up instead of the top down.

Now that includes establishing things like a national investment fund which my leader talked about this morning. This would be of particular benefit to small business. It gives small business people the potential for access to capital which they so rarely have at the moment without having to mortgage houses or, it almost seems sometimes, having to mortgage their families.

That is important but we also see as part of our jobs plan a crucial emphasis on community development. We see the establishment of community development organizations and support for community development groups. We see support for co-operatives and credit unions based in the community as all part of that same effort to build from the ground up. This is instead of assuming everything will flow from some great new enterprise that is attracted in from the outside. Yes, that does give us some jobs but it does not give us enough jobs for the future.

• (1550)

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate. I am glad the New Democratic Party has put the broad spectre of economic issues before the House and the nation today because I think these are things that are very much on the minds of Canadians. These are issues that should be debated seriously and frequently in this House.

The particular motion the New Democratic Party has put forward causes me some concern. It seems to me it is in conflict with itself. When one talks about an economic recovery program that must endorse a strategy for full employment which entails abrogating the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and not implementing the North American free trade agreement, it seems to me that those concepts are very directly in conflict with themselves. They do not seem to make any sense at all. I do not know how the New Democratic Party proposes that our economy and the standard of living of Canadians should grow if we are going to turn our backs on the opportunities to sell the products that are the absolute basis of that growth.

I listened earlier today when the leader of the New Democratic Party spoke. She talked about not being dependent on the North American market. She talked about reaching out to other markets in other parts of the world.

With the greatest respect, that is precisely what Canadian business people are doing. They are doing it already and they do not need the government to suggest to them that they should do that. They know perfectly well where their market opportunities are. They want the government to create the climate and the opportunity in which trade growth can take place. Through trade we have an opportunity to see economic development in this country. This country is a trading nation, first and foremost.

A couple of realities have been ignored by my hon. friends in the New Democratic Party in the position they have taken with respect to the free trade agreement and the NAFTA. I would love to have an opportunity to discuss a number of the issues that are included within the resolutions they have put forward. Time will not permit it so I am going to focus on these trade issues.

First, I think the New Democratic Party has to realize that the Canadian market is not big enough to sustain the standard of living that Canadians expect. It is as simple as that. We export a quarter of what we produce in this country. We must have access to markets abroad.

We have only one alternative if we are going to build big walls around Canada and turn down the opportunity to trade abroad. Realistically, we are not going to trade abroad unless we wake up to the reality of global competitiveness. Then we have only to sell internally in Canada.

If we are ever going to achieve full employment, which the New Democratic Party says is its goal and aspiration, then the only way we are going to do that is to have the government put everybody on the payroll.

That would not work either. The Liberal Party tried that for 15 years and we know what the outcome was. You just spend yourself into a cycle of debt and nine years later we are still trying to dig ourselves out. I have a feeling there will not be too many of us left in this House by the time we do get around to digging ourselves out of that cycle of debt which was imposed on us by 15 years of irresponsible spending by the previous government.

The second reality the New Democratic Party is ignoring is what is happening in the world today. There is a change in trading patterns going on around the world. It is not just in this country or just on this continent, but indeed all over the world. Global trading blocs are developing. The nations of the world are negotiating new sets of trading rules. This will facilitate as well as liberalize trade around the world.

The name of the game, whether the New Democrats and the Canadian Labour of Congress—and I realize they are relatively indistinguishable—recognize it or not, is that the world is going to go on with or without us. What is in the interests of Canadians is that we be there and we be there to benefit in what is happening.

The New Democrats do not have to take it from me, this business about competitiveness. They think barriers can be erected around this country and high wage levels can be protected forever but it will not work. You have to be able to sell your products. You cannot sell your products, quite simply, unless you can offer competitive prices. That is the name of the game from now on whether we like it or not. Anyone who doubts that does not have to take it from me.

• (1555)

Just look at the phenomenon of cross-border shopping that has gone on. We tell people to buy Canadian. What have Canadians done? They say: "I will buy where I get the best deal". If that is in Buffalo, Seattle or Bangor, that is where they are going to shop.

The only way we are going to be competitive within our own market is the same basis on which we are going to be competitive abroad. That is the fundamental weakness. Building walls simply will not work because our market is not big enough to sustain the economy we wish to live by.

When the New Democratic Party leader suggests, as she did earlier today, that we should look to other markets I cannot help but reflect on what I hear her trade critic saying time and time again when he talks about low-wage Mexicans taking away the jobs of Canadians. This is the great fear of the NAFTA we are told. In 1988 we were told by both opposition parties that the entire Canadian economy would grind to a halt because of the free trade agreement. That was because people in Alabama were ready to work for lower wages than people in Canada. That has not been the case. We have been through a recession. It has been tough. It has been tough not just in Canada but all around the world.

The truth of the matter is if low-wage Mexicans were going to be putting us all out of work why is the leader of the New Democratic Party talking about seeking out new markets in Asia, Africa and all these other places? Does she think with respect to the Philippines, Thailand, India or Senegal that there is any difference between low wage rates in those countries and Mexico? Of course not. We are able to compete with the best of them.

Look at our trade with Japan, one of our biggest trading partners. Wage rates are higher in Japan than they are here. Europe is a major trading partner. Wage rates in Europe are as high or higher than they are here.

What constitutes ability to compete in the marketplace is not simply wage rates but competitiveness. That is what it is all about. That is a concept that the New Democratic Party does not seem to fully and adequately understand.

We do have to seek access to new markets. Europe is creating its bloc of 12 countries and that is possibly going to grow. Eastern Europe has IFTA. There are the trade developments in southeast Asia. What better opportunity is there for Canadians than to be part of the largest trading market in the world, which is that created by the North American free trade agreement? It is an opportunity and it has worked. The concept has worked in the past.

I would simply cite the example of the auto pact which was created in 1965. I might say it was roundly and thoroughly opposed by the New Democratic Party of the day and by the Canadian Labour Congress and the United Auto Workers, as they were then, now the CAW. All were opponents of the auto pact when it was brought in. They do not feel that way now. It is a sacrosanct thing as far as Canadian auto workers are concerned.

I suppose if we come back here 20 to 25 years from now we will hear the NDP standing up and taking the credit for the North American free trade agreement. Its members will be saying it was all their idea in the first place. That is what we are going to see.

This business of losing jobs to Mexicans is something we hear time and time again. It is time that my friends in the New Democratic Party realized that what really counts is the unit cost of production. That is what is significant. Labour is a component of that. It is true that on average, labour costs are 7.5 times lower in Mexico than they are in Canada. However, what is the other side of the equation? The other side of the equation is productivity. Productivity is 6.5 times higher in Canada than it is in Mexico.

In addition to that, the cost of capital is lower in Canada. A business cannot be run without money. Money is more accessible here. Capital productivity is higher. We get more out of our technology and our equipment here than they do in Mexico. Add it all up. The result very simply is that Canadian workers and Canadian companies can compete with the best the Mexicans have to offer.

Therefore, NAFTA gives us the opportunity to access a market of 85 million people that is largely closed to us today.

• (1600)

If the Mexicans were going to put us all out of business then we would be out of business now. Most of the goods that come to Canada from Mexico come in tariff free now, so why have the Mexicans not supplanted us already? On the other hand, virtually everything that we wish to sell in Mexico is either completely blocked through import licensing restrictions or must come through a 20 per cent tariff.

The facts, and I know sometimes my hon. friends opposite do not like to have facts injected into discussions, sustain the argument that the North American free trade agreement in this context is very good.

I want to talk for a minute about trade in general. I want to talk a little bit about my own part of Canada, Nova Scotia and more particularly the south shore. Trade has been the lifeblood of Canada but also of the maritimes. If we go back in the history of this country and of my region there was a time before Confederation when little old Nova Scotia, my province, had the fourth largest volume of shipping of any nation in the world. I know you knew that, Mr. Speaker, but I do not know if my hon. friends opposite knew that. Confederation came along and with it came tariff walls that disrupted the natural flow of trade between the Atlantic provinces, the maritime provinces, and the United States. Our economy has never really recovered from that blow.

Now we see the opportunity, and the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement has given us the opportunity, to re-establish those lines and the flow of trade that comes from them.

Look for example at my own constituency of South Shore where because of the kind of scaremongering by a lot of people there are many people in my area concerned about what the impact of free trade has really been and what the impact of the NAFTA will be.

Over 8,000 people in my constituency make their living from the fishery. My constituency has the highest volume of fish landings by value of any constituency in the country and that includes the ones in Newfoundland, and I see the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans here. I want to tell him that my constituency has the biggest volume in value of landings of any constituency in the country and one-third of those landings goes to the United States. Access to that American market is critically important.

We have a paper mill. The Bowater Mersey paper mill employs over 800 people in South Shore and 60 per cent of the product of that plant goes to the United States. Sixty per cent of those 800 jobs are dependent on trade to the United States.

We have a Michelin Tires plant. I am told it is the most productive Michelin Tires plant in the world, in the entire Michelin system. We are very proud of that plant and we are even more proud of the workers in that plant, who are the best in the world according to Michelin. There are 1,400 jobs there and last week they celebrated the production of their 50 millionth tire. That is a tremendous thing. It has been wonderful for Nova Scotia. Two-thirds of that production goes to the United States.

You have heard me in this House before, Mr. Speaker, talk about Christmas trees. We export 1.5 million Christmas trees a year from South Shore. There are some 500 people in South Shore who make their living from Christmas tree production, and 90 per cent of our Christmas trees go to the United States.

Then there is the tourist industry. There are a couple of thousand people employed in the hospitality industry and in the tourist industry. The American tourists that come up, particularly in the summer and fall, and the cruise ships that come up from the United States, create work for Nova Scotians. If we add it all up the conclusion that we come to is that trading links and the access to the United States and now to Mexico, which is the most important part of these agreements, are critically important to the economic development of our industry.

We do not have an historic trading relationship with the Mexicans but now that the NAFTA has come about and now that it has been signed we are finding increasing interest. All of a sudden we are discovering that there are new market opportunities for our processed fish. We are finding that there might even be opportunities for Canadian fishermen and fish companies to go down and assist the Mexicans in the harvesting of their own fish resources because to date the Mexicans have not had the technology and vessels to harvest their own fish resources. One of the solutions to our own fishing problems is to find fishing opportunities for our fleet and for our companies in assisting the Mexicans in developing their own area. Obviously we have a great new opportunity in terms of Christmas trees. The Mexicans celebrate Christmas and they have not been bringing in Christmas trees from Atlantic Canada.

I want to give the Mexicans due notice here today that we are going to be down there selling them some of the finest Christmas trees in the world because the finest Christmas trees in the world come from the south shore of Nova Scotia, as everybody in this House has come to know in recent times.

Then there are investment opportunities that flow from the access that we get under the FTA and indeed will get under the NAFTA. Companies that say they are interested in settling their plant and living in Canada, in particular in this case in Atlantic Canada where there is an excellent work force and the opportunity for a wonderful quality of life, are still going to have the opportunity to sell to that market of more than 350 million people in the United States and Mexico. The investment opportunities that are created by the NAFTA, on top of the success of the FTA, are really quite encouraging.

My friends opposite sometimes entertain themselves by debunking the free trade agreement. We all know that we are not really going to know for another 10 to 15 years exactly how profoundly the free trade agreement has impacted this country, though it is very obvious that the initial signs show that it has been very positive. We have been through a difficult recession in this country and yet we have seen the benefits of the free trade agreement already starting to show in a serious way.

I would refer my hon. friends, who may not take as gospel everything I say though I cannot understand why, to the independent study done by the C.D. Howe Institute and released not so long ago. It shows that since the FTA Canada's trade balance with the United States has improved more than its trade balance with other regions.

The FTA has led to more trade between Canada and the United States. It also shows that in those sectors liberalized by the FTA exports have increased most, in particular those in non-resource-based manufacturing.

Merchandise exports to the United States have increased to record levels since the FTA, from $102.6 billion in 1988 to $122.3 billion in 1992. That is a 19.2 per cent increase. Exports in 1992 increased 13.6 per cent over 1991.

In other words, as a result of the free trade agreement we are seeing more business being done. Our exports to the United States are growing steadily under the FTA, notwithstanding the fact that we have been through a recession which would, generally speaking, have a negative impact on the economy. The same can be said with respect to our merchandise trade surplus with the U.S., which has grown by 27.3 per cent since a year ago.

I have so many more things I would like to say on this subject and I know my hon. friends would like to hear them but I will just make one last point about the FTA and its impact and the anticipated impact of the NAFTA, and that is encouraging foreign direct investment. That means other people investing money in Canada. Investing money in Canada means creating jobs for Canadians. That is a good thing.

We have seen a significant growth in investment. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association survey of some 325 companies conducted early in 1992 found that nearly half the companies said they increased capital investments in Canada after the FTA was implemented. Only 9 per cent reduced their investment. Investment means jobs.

I could quote from various authorities on the success this agreement has had and the wonderful things that it has done for us, but let me say simply that what NAFTA does is provide us an opportunity to go beyond the FTA. There were some problems with the FTA and they have been sorted out in these negotiations. Canada got the things it was concerned about.

The key points about the NAFTA are: the auto pact remains the same; agriculture is the same except barriers will be removed against Canadian opportunities for export of grains, oilseeds, pork, fish, potatoes and processed foods; our supply management system is not touched at all; health and social services are fully protected; and the Canadian government policy prohibiting large-scale export of water is unaffected.

• (1610)

I see you are giving me the sign, Mr. Speaker, so I will stop for now and say that I look forward to hearing from my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the government member who just spoke talked about "creating jobs for Canadians" and also said that: "The free trade agreement did create some problems".

The government member knows better than anyone else that over-all the free trade agreement entered into by his party and the Government of Canada on balance clearly created fewer jobs than the member spoke of. Plants have closed in this country, not all as a result of the free trade agreement but clearly on balance there has been disruption and dislocation and there have been fewer jobs created.

Then he has the gumption to say now that we are entering the NAFTA, based on their track record with the free trade agreement, we should basically trust them.

Obviously if we take 10 Canadians the vast majority of those 10 Canadians will not trust this government, not only for these reasons but for others, and will certainly not trust this government on the NAFTA given its track record on the free trade agreement.

Can the hon. member explain the rationale for why this party wishes to rush enabling legislation on the NAFTA through this Chamber at the same time that our American counterparts, President Clinton and his trade representative Mickey Kantor, have made it abundantly clear in the last number of days that they have no intention of proceeding with the NAFTA until the other side agreements are concluded?

My question is very simple: If the Americans can look after number one, namely defending their own workers, their own industry, and their questions about the environment, why are we, from a negotiating standpoint, heading right into this situation rather than standing back for a second and looking at the deal to determine where we can make it better and tighten up those areas on behalf of Canadian workers?

Canadian workers and Canadian industry want to know that we have a government that is defending their interests and aspirations. They are obviously puzzled when we are entering into legislation and the American partner, the third in the deal, is still very far from that point.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, of course I would be delighted to answer my hon. friend's question but I wish to clarify some confusion that obviously exists in his mind with respect to the job situation.

It is obviously going to take time to totally sort it out. I know that in the last couple of years, as I think somebody in the opposition said, every sparrow that has fallen has been blamed on the free trade agreement. The fact of the matter is, now that we have figures in for 1992, my hon. friend should be aware that we have had a net increase of 118,000 jobs in Canada for 1991-92.

If he examines what is going on he will see that our recovery is being driven by exports, primarily by exports to the United States. If that is not the testimony my hon. friend needs I do not know what I can present him with.

Second, he raises questions about the environment, the parallel accords, and the process of ratification. By the way, Canadians know where this government stands on the NAFTA and they know where the New Democratic Party stands on the NAFTA but they are not too sure where the Liberal Party stands on the NAFTA.

The reason this government is bringing forward this enabling legislation, which is an act to support this agreement, is that we believe it is good for Canada. Interestingly, so does Canadian business. The people who create jobs in this country believe it will be good for Canada, and it will be good for Canada.

My hon. friend's third question made reference to parallel discussions with respect to the environment and labour. I want to assure my hon. friend that the government thinks it is a marvellous idea to proceed with further negotiations with respect to the environment and labour issues.

• (1615)

A year ago, in March 1992, we proposed to our two partners in this agreement that we should do a parallel agreement with respect to the environment. The American government of the day was not interested. Now we, have a government in the United States that is interested and of course Canada fully supports it.

As the American president himself has made abundantly clear, the NAFTA will not be reopened for negotiation. That agreement was negotiated over many months by the three parties and will not be reopened. Hopefully we will reach an accord with respect to the environment. Even so, I want my hon. friends to be aware of the fact that never in the history of the world has there been a trade agreement concluded with as many provisions on the environment as the NAFTA.

In conclusion, I want them to be aware of the fact that the NAFTA contains a strong commitment to the concept of sustainable development and environmental protection. I want them to bear in mind that what is most important to Canadians is the protection of our own environment. Nothing in the NAFTA precludes our ability to establish our own environmental standards.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the member for South Shore. What we have experienced in this member's speech today is the typical Conservative lean, mean machine approach in the name of global competitiveness.

I realize that in every trade deal there are winners and there are losers. The problem we have today is that a lot of people are losing. A lot of people are unemployed, almost a couple of million.

I was reading an article on the weekend written by Joe Mancini who was talking about competitive global mass production, more threat than promise. He made an interesting statement. He said: "Communities and families are dissolving as work takes on an increasing importance and puts greater demands on people's time. This trend in work results in spouses not having time to experience their children. People do not have time to build community outside work. The result is increasing isolation. Growth as recorded by Statistics Canada is no guarantee of economic development. Unfortunately politics is such that illusions of growth are more important than real innovation. Individuals and families can disentangle from these illusions by creating real growth through innovation in the household using traditional skills".

Does the member not realize that this singular focus on ratcheting inflation to a point where it is a point and a quarter and putting such intensity on global competitiveness influence our whole fabric, our whole notion of community and family, and that this transnational thrust basically controls the agenda of this country to the exclusion of human dignity?

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I tried with care to listen to my hon. friend's question, although I must say he confused me a bit with his logic.

I noticed that he mentioned, for example, a couple of million unemployed in this country. I think he would admit that was a rather gross exaggeration. If an individual is unemployed, that is one too many. I am sure that is the way this government and all members of the House feel.

He talked about ratcheting down inflation as if it were a terrible thing. I am not sure I understand where he is coming from. What is inflation all about? Inflation is a killer. Inflation is the thing that says to people on fixed incomes like our seniors that next year they are not going to be able to pay for what they have.

By getting inflation under control and having price stability we provide the best basis for people to be able to plan their lives and to live in some comfort and with some harmony. I do not understand why my friend would take issue with that approach.

I think his question was also about the issue of globalization and whether or not Canada should respond to what is happening in the world. I do not understand where he is coming from. It seems to me we have Canadians telling us by their actions that we have to smarten up and sort out what is happening in the world.

When Canadians prefer to shop in other countries they are telling us that we are not competitive, even in our own markets. When we have Canadians saying they want to see growth and job opportunities we know we have to go beyond our own market as we have in the past. We have to be able to export.

Other countries of the world are catching up in terms of productivity and technology whether or not my hon. friend wants to acknowledge it. The bottom line is that the responsibility of the government is to Canadians. It must prepare the Canadian economy so we are in the best position, for the benefit of Canadians, to have economic growth and development, price stability and good employment opportunities in the years ahead.

[Translation]

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, at this point, our party would like to divide the following half hour into speeches of ten minutes each.

[English]

The issue before us because of this NDP resolution is in part the abrogation of the free trade agreement and the non-signing of the NAFTA. My friend from South Shore has lauded the positive benefits he says we have seen from free trade, but it is impossible to separate actual results under free trade from what occurred in the economy as a whole. Let us be intellectually honest.

If we look at the record over the past four years since free trade came in we find our unemployment is now at 10.8 per cent. In the United States it is at 7 per cent. Our manufacturing job losses in those four years now stand at 16 per cent. In the United States it has only been 6 per cent. Why have we been devastated so much more than the United States during that period of time?

We can look at an even more alarming statistic. Our ability to compete has been declining. We are now growing at about half the rate of that of our major competitors in the G-7. This is alarming in terms of our future ability to create the wealth we need in this country to sustain the high level of humane social programs which are a hallmark of the Canadian way of life.

Perhaps even more alarming when we look at the Tory record is that in 1984 Canada had a high-tech trade surplus of $1 billion. Today that high-tech trade surplus has become a deficit of $30 billion. Even though trade may have picked up a bit with the United States in recent years, we are losing in spades when it comes to the high-tech, value-added industries which will create the high paying jobs of the future we need if we are to compete with low $1.50 an hour Mexican labour.

What are the lessons we can take from our four years under free trade? My conclusion is that trade is not the real issue. Trade agreements such as the free trade agreement and the NAFTA are not the overriding economic issue we face. Even if we got rid of free trade we would still find ourselves having to compete as a trading nation. As one whose GDP is 30 per cent more than even Japan's we are dependent on foreign trade. We still need ways in which to compete.

Perhaps we can learn from our four years under free trade. I would like to focus on seven lessons that we should have learned.

First, Canada can no longer depend on its abundant natural resources and the effortless economic superiority those have given us to sustain our high standard of living. We need the value-added, high-wage jobs.

Second, if we are going to enter into another free trade agreement surely we have learned that we need detailed impact assessments so that we can predict where the job losses are going to occur, as they inevitably will. We need adjustment programs to make sure that those workers who are affected adversely have jobs and are not doomed to perpetual unemployment.

The NDP would have us abolish these trade agreements or not enter into them. However, in its resolution, has it called for the adjustment programs that we need? Of course, it has not. It has totally overlooked it. Has it, in asking us to totally abolish these trade agreements, given us an impact analysis of how many job losses would occur because our access to foreign markets could be diminished? It has not taken that responsible step of forewarning us as to the consequences of its policy.

The third lesson I hope we have learned is that even though we have a free trade agreement, this does not guarantee secure access to the foreign market. We have learned that tariffs were not the real barrier. Issues such as anti-dumping, countervail and government procurement have been far greater barriers to Canadian access to the U.S. market.

The fourth lesson is that the unparalleled level of trade harassment by the Americans against Canadian producers is not ended. We are not going to have the so-called benefits that the member for South Shore talked about. These are the benefits of investment. No firm is going to invest in Canada be it a Canadian or a foreign firm. They will just not put their new money here to service the North American market if this unmitigated trade harassment can continue. Our producers can have the threat of being shut out of the American market through spurious actions such as we have seen with respect to Honda, softwood, pork and now steel in a major way.

Has the government given us any hope that under the NAFTA it has found a way to end that trade harassment? As a matter of fact, no, it will not even talk about bringing in a subsidies code to deal with countervailing let alone some new measures and common laws to deal with the question of anti-dumping.

The fifth lesson I hope we have learned is that when we have a free trade agreement there is going to be an international rationalization of investment. We know this is inevitable. The problem is that this rationalization of industry has been mainly outside Canada. More than 50 per cent of our manufacturing sector is controlled by foreigners, mainly Americans. When there is a slight recession or an opportunity to consolidate plants, one is not going to consolidate the American operation and head office into the Canadian branch plant. The opposite occurs. This is going to be a structural problem that not only this government, but succeeding governments, are going to have to come to grips with.

Sixth, I hope we have learned that trade policy does not take place in an economic vacuum. It is one portion of our economic agenda but a very small one when looked at on the whole. For example, this government's high interest rate, high dollar and high tax policies over the past four years have done more to create barriers to Canadian producers than the removal of all the tariffs that have taken place under the free trade agreement. When the dollar goes up 27 per cent from a low to a high of 90 cents, that jump is a far greater barrier than any of the trade tariffs that were abolished.

Finally, the seventh lesson is for us to recognize that trade policy is only one aspect of an industrial policy. What we need is a comprehensive industrial policy that will deal with our ability to compete. We need to integrate fiscal and monetary policies so they work for Canadian producers. We need to get rid of the high levels of illiteracy and innumeracy that make our workers unfit for the plant. We must deal with the 38 per cent drop-out rate in high schools. We must deal with our declining level of research and development that is less than half that of our competitors and is falling. We must deal with the Mexican challenge. Mexico now produces four times the number of scientists and engineers that Canada does.

If we are going to compete, then these are the real issues and this is why we need a comprehensive industrial policy. This is why trade is not the real issue. This is why the NDP has so far missed the mark in this resolution. There is no way that any intellectually honest or right-thinking person could ever support it.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I heard my hon. colleague, whom I respect a great deal under normal circumstances, suggest that what is lacking in the New Democratic Party resolution is a complete industrial policy.

I do not know whether this was noticed but one of the things that is being mentioned by almost all political commentators in this country is the total absence of any Liberal policy at all.

As a matter of fact, the closest the Liberals have come was the amendment introduced by the member for Etobicoke North about how he would have amended the resolution by dispensing with our condemnation of the free trade agreement and the NAFTA. Everything else would be left there.

Mr. Marchi: It is not condemnation. You've got the wrong word.

Mr. McCurdy: Pardon?

Mr. Marchi: That's not so.

An hon. member: Read the amendment.

Mr. McCurdy: It is so. They are protesting as they usually do. I understand that it said that it should eliminate—

Mr. Keyes: Read it right.

Mr. McCurdy: This is what I have. I stand corrected. It says they will eliminate that section of the North American free trade agreement and so on but leave in the jobs plan, an infrastructure program, a national child care program and all those things that constitute the core of the New Democratic economic policy. That is what is there.

It would seem to me that with the hon. member having mentioned that the fiscal policy and the monetary policy have to be part of an industrial policy, then I think that most Canadians would be looking for something definitive and clear on the GST.

I would give it to the hon. member and his party that they are staying on that tack of wanting to renegotiate the free trade agreement. I want to know exactly what article in the free trade agreement the Liberals are referring to that permits renegotiation.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, Canada is just as free to renegotiate the free trade agreement as the NDP is to switch its policies.

• (1635)

Our position is very simple. We want to renegotiate this free trade agreement involving Mexico because we find it deficient. Unlike the government, we are not in favour of rushing in to pass this deal at a time when the United States has put it on hold. It is totally irresponsible.

Second, we have a number of problems with this deal the way it is. It does not give a detailed definition of subsidies. This government is waiting for pie in the sky and for the GATT to finally give us a subsidies code. In the absence of that, it will not come forward with a subsidies code which would end some of the trade harassment that we have experienced under the free trade agreement. We need that.

We need anti-dumping laws that will benefit our steel makers.

I would like to see provisions which would ensure for all time that the auto workers in that member's riding do not have to worry about the erosion of the auto pact because the seeds for erosion are in the NAFTA.

I would like to see a parallel agreement dealing with energy. Why should Mexicans not have the same treatment in terms of their energy and their self-sufficiency as Canadians?

There are many flaws in this agreement. We have not been satisfied that the trade harassment will end under the NAFTA. This is why we are not going to support it the way it is and this is why we urge Her Majesty's government to press on and put the Canadian agenda forward. It is critical that we do so.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, in 10 minutes I would like to make a few comments about the political party advancing this motion and obviously make a few comments on the economic policy direction being pursued by the government.

First, one has to take a look at the NDP motion. One is struck by how convoluted this particular motion actually is. That one run-on paragraph it talks about concepts of full employment, abrogating the FTA and abrogating the NAFTA. Then it talks about something called the jobs plan which I am not sure is any different from the first concept of full employment. Then it talks about an infrastructure program. Just to make sure, it throws in a child-care package to really make the paragraph or the motion being debated before us very convoluted and abstract. It basically throws in the kitchen sink.

Canadians and certainly members of this House are looking for a very practical and realistic motion that we can discuss and debate intelligently and hopefully be understood by Canadians at large.

Second the motion is quite frankly irresponsible in that everyone understands, both inside this Chamber and outside this Chamber, what the real aspects of this particular motion are. Members of the NPD talk about the abrogation of the free trade agreement and the NAFTA because obviously they are not too concerned with the members on the other side. They are more concerned with the Liberal Party of Canada. They think that because we have opted for renegotiation that somehow we are vulnerable in the face of Canadians' dissatisfaction with the free trade agreement and the NAFTA.

Yet, when asked whether they want the status quo or whether they want abrogation or renegotiation, close to 70 per cent of Canadians in any opinion poll essentially agree with the position that we have adopted for some time now.

It is odd to hear the New Democratic Party coming from a viewpoint of indignation. We should cast our minds back some years to the 1988 campaign when the New Democratic Party and its leader in the first press conference of the campaign never mentioned the words 'free trade agreement'.

We all know the New Democratic Party did a basic rethinking of where it went wrong. Most of its partisan supporters were quite upset that rather than attacking the free trade agreement as we did in the 1988 campaign, it simply attacked our leader and our party.

The free trade agreement as is and the NAFTA legislation as is are obviously unworkable and are not in the best interests of our country. In fact, the trade minister said as much in that he is not pursuing the leadership of his party. That is because he will be seen as the father of the free trade agreement and the father of the GST. Therefore, he is admitting that he will be unsuccessful, largely because of that record which would be the ball and chain not only for his potential candidacy but also for the other candidates of his party.

While those agreements are wrong, it is equally wrong to say that the only solution to those trade agreements is not to have an agreement, that the only reaction to flawed pieces of legislation is to simply rip them up and pretend they do not exist any more.

One has to be responsible. We have had a free trade agreement in operation whether we like it or not. Thousands and thousands of individual decisions have been made by Canadian businesses, entrepreneurs and individuals. It would be completely asinine that the first reaction of an NDP government, which will never see the light of day, but notwithstanding that the first action would be to simply rip it up. You would probably be making losers out of winners, and the losers are still looking for some answers.

It is the same thing with the NAFTA. Therefore, a better solution rather than simply turfing out both those agreements would be to take a look at where those agreements are flawed. Take a look at defining what a subsidy means. Address the question of dumping. Look at the structure of our Canadian plants and businesses and infrastructure. Let us see where the losses and the wins are coming from and try to right the wrongs. Try to go back with the Americans and the Mexicans and take a second look at the situation, just as the Clinton administration is approaching it with the side agreements.

To simply say: "Elect us and we will rip things up" or "elect us and you will not see the GST, but do not ask us where we are going to get the $15 to $18 billion" seems a bit too trite, even for the New Democratic Party. Yet it persists. It throws this resolution on the floor thinking that somehow it is going to trap someone along the way. However, the real object of the exercise should not be to play those cheap partisan political games on the backs of those Canadians and industry. It should be to begin to look at these two agreements and seek the changes and modifications needed to ensure that those agreements are better.

Whether we like it or not, the Americans are our best trading partner and vice versa. Whether we like it or not, countries like Argentina are taking a look at the NAFTA. Members of our party not too long ago met with Argentina's minister of industry, Mr. Cavallo. He is a very impressive individual and is the author of the Argentine economic miracle. He mentioned to us that his country is seriously looking at a future round of the NAFTA. I suppose there is nothing wrong with that, as long as Canada is protected, as long as we are defending number one in that legislation. Then we are being responsible.

That is why we take a different position from not only the substance of the NAFTA but also the process. It seems to be absolutely unconscionable that we are going to be considering enabling legislation on the NAFTA when the main one of the three partners in this so-called agreement has put its own position on hold vis-à-vis the NAFTA until the Mexicans begin to whistle their tune.

We ought to take a page from that strategy and say that we are not prepared to enter into an agreement unless and until we are satisfied that it works for the benefit of Canadians too. That is very different from saying that we are going to put the blinkers on and there will be no trade agreement. It does not matter if it is the lifeblood of an economy, the heck with it.

Do you know what? That is what Bob Rae did. He put an agenda and a platform together that sounded very good. It appealed to the traditional supporters of the New Democratic Party because they figured that the NDP would not have a chance to ever be government. However, the most surprised person in Ontario on election night was Bob Rae. All of a sudden he became the premier, but he had an unworkable, unrealistic platform. In the end the platform was abandoned. The New Democratic Party has alienated its own constituency. At the same time it has alienated just about everyone else. Who is it left with? What mess is Ontario in today?

Opposition parties should not be blinded by partisanship and the automatic gut reaction of always saying no to something the other guys do or wish to do. Is it not more responsible to be realistic and honest with decision making that affects not only members and political parties in this Chamber but workers and families and businesses across the country?

That is why rather than being irresponsible the New Democratic Party ought to be concentrating on the economic approach of this government and the alternatives now that it is into a leadership campaign or so-called coronation campaign. It should be revisiting the last eight or nine years and putting pressure on the government to come up with answers. This is rather than hearing the minister of trade at the Toronto economic summit call for the very purposes of trying to get Toronto moving again. It was a litany of all the great things that this government has done for Torontonians, as if Toronto has no problems.

Our friends in the NDP to our left missed the opportunity. Rather than trying to put this government on the spot, they have irresponsibly tried to hit someone along the way with a motion that really does not say very much. Quite frankly, it is convoluted and a waste of time.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I think that my colleagues from the NDP have clearly shown in their motion that they have gone too far. Too much is too much! The only thing they forgot to include was the promise that we would all go to heaven when we die.

I think that everyone who followed the debate on the free trade agreement realizes, as I am sure my colleague would agree, that the whole world was moving toward free trade. That is obvious, because we live in a world where free trade is the way to prosperity. But after signing this agreement with the United States the government opposite neglected some things. Even the Canadian Manufacturers, Association says that there should have been a transition period to analyze the potential consequences of this agreement. We know that we could have helped some very specialized industries in our country if the United States did not respect the spirit of this agreement.

So I ask my colleague if we had a transition period and programs to support industries by helping them during this period, which could have been five years, does he not believe that we would have been better able to benefit from this agreement if we had foreseen the dangers that such a treaty with the United States might contain?

[English]

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague raises a very important point which I had failed to mention in my limited time in which to address the subject. That is the whole question of adjustment programs.

• (1650)

Again I ask the House and particularly members of the governing party to think back to that 1988 campaign. The Prime Minister in a fit of tremendous rhetoric promised the greatest transitional adjustment programs in the western hemisphere, not only ever seen in Canada or in North America, but the greatest number and most effective adjustment programs in the western hemisphere.

That was the election where there was third party advertising and large corporations wrote all their employees. The threat was on that if you did not sign on your job would be in jeopardy. The free trade agreement would lead to thousands of jobs. However, just in case you as a worker or a company were affected the Prime Minister promised the greatest adjustment programs ever seen in the western hemisphere.

It would be fair to say that a good number of Canadians believed the Prime Minister and believed and trusted the government. This is notwithstanding the fact that if one looks at the total number of people voting for our party and the New Democratic Party then obviously more people were against the free trade agreement than there were in favour. However, there are many Canadians who essentially trusted and put their faith in the words spoken by the Prime Minister. Those same workers today are without jobs and have no transition programs and no adjustment assistance.

My hon. colleague obviously draws the point that if the government had kept its word not only would there be fewer cynics across this country as they look at this Chamber and government, but more Canadians would be working today. We would have a nation more confident in itself in pursuing international trade agreements.

In any agreement there is going to be a shortfall. In any agreement there is going to be an adjustment. Therefore if the population, the labour pool and workers know there is a commitment to keeping those jobs then that nation will be more competent and confident in pursuing and supporting a government that seeks greater trade opportunities as a measure of increased prosperity.

However the country cannot be confident when it has had a major promise, commitment and plan during the 1988 campaign which was basically a referendum on the free trade agreement, which was not kept. Canadians were led down the garden path. That is why in large measure Canadians en masse are rejecting the NAFTA. That is why when this government asks Canadians a second time to trust it, regardless of who the leader is, the resounding answer of Canadians will be no.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I want to look at this motion first of all from the point of view of its over-all scope and then concentrate for a few minutes on the trade agreements.

First of all, my hon. friends opposite know that about 20 years ago I wrote a book on the role of the opposition. I hope they have read it. This book concerned the study of parliamentary democracies and what opposition parties do, what is their function and what is their role. This book was extremely well received by everybody who read it. I distilled three roles for the opposition and all thought these were the roles of the opposition.

Professor Hockin's rite: The first one is to check the government against dishonest action or unconstitutional action. That is the role of all oppositions. I think it is an honourable role and oppositions should do that.

The second role is to prod the government into doing things. In other words, through the constituencies you represent, if you think the government is not doing a job of speaking to them or helping them you should prod the government.

However, the third role of the opposition is to get ready through programs of its own in opposition to govern.

Look at this motion. There is no evidence here whatsoever of constructive thought about the third role of the opposition, which is to prepare to be an alternative government. That is because what is being asked for is all negative. That we must endorse a strategy of abrogating the free trade agreement is just a negative role. That is ripping it up. Not implementing the NAFTA is a negative role. Including actions such as a jobs plan is not a policy but just an expression of sentiment. One says: "I have got a jobs plan". The next question is: "What is it? What is the content of it?" We do not know.

• (1655)

As for an infrastructure program, everybody has an infrastructure program. We have an infrastructure program. We believe in strategic investments in infrastructures such as science and technology. Certain kinds of things can be done with the Trans-Canada Highway and so on. What kind of infrastructure program is being spoken of?

Finally, there is a national child care program in order to ensure job creation. This is a child care program, not to look after children I guess, but to ensure jobs for people. What we have here is an example of an opposition party not fulfilling the third and most important role, which is to ready itself with alternative proposals.

I have seen the NDP document. I have to give the NDP some credit because there are parts of that document that are not included in this motion that are a constructive attempt to come to terms with alternative policies.

This motion does not do it, but some of its program does.

The Liberal party has yet to tell us what it would do as an alternative government. It has more or less positioned itself as being against everything and for almost nothing. I remember it was the famous Liberal Whig politician, George Tierney, in Great Britain in the 19th century who said that the duty of an opposition was simply to oppose everything and propose nothing and throw out the government.

This is not constructive. The people of Canada do not want an opposition acting that way. They want an opposition to have alternatives and ideas. This is missing in this motion and it is also what is missing so often from our hon. friends opposite.

This government has done a lot of substantive things. Even if the opposition does not agree with these things, I would like to see it put forward alternatives that were just as constructive as what we have done. Instead we just get: "Do not do that, do not do that and do not do that". There are never any constructive alternatives.

Look at what we have done in terms of fisheries. We have the minister of fisheries sitting here. No government has been more generous with the fishery or more willing to make tough decisions with the fishery than this government. We have the Minister of Finance just a couple of seats down. Canadians have the lowest interest rates and the lowest inflation in decades. We have a growth that is the fastest—or close to the fastest—growing economy in the industrialized world. All of this has been created by this government through its policies.

We know about deregulation. It is complained about in the opposition motion. In fact, deregulation has liberated various parts of the Canadian economy and made it more competitive. Downsizing the Public Service has helped in a way because we have been able to remove from the public payroll over 90,000 Canadians. A number of them are now working in the private sector or working in privatized Crown corporations. All of these were constructive things that this government did. What is the opposition's alternative? We never hear it.

When I look at the future economy for Canada, the high-tech reality that is facing us, this government is doing a whole host of things through IRAP, the TOP program, the technology assessment programs and through a host of technology diffusion strategies that we have been announcing. We will be announcing more in the future in order to make this country of ours more high-tech and more technologically comfortable. Those are programs that this government has put forward which are moving well.

We have also done a series of things on the framework side in terms of tax reform and a new, liberalized trade environment. We have created over 1,600 small businesses through our aboriginal programs that members from both sides of the House support. We have aboriginals now who are much more entrepreneurial and who want to create their own businesses. This government put that program in place. It gets little credit for it but this government has done that.

I want to thank members of all sides of the House for the Small Businesses Loans Act which passed in this House two weeks ago.

• (1700)

This bill will be very important for businesses in this country, especially small and medium-sized businesses. This will increase the guarantee to 90 per cent. Therefore the financial institution is only exposed for 10 per cent of the risk. We have increased the commission a bit so the financial institutions will use it. We have also limited the personal guarantee that the financial institutions can ask for when they give this loan.

This is dramatic. According to the banks we are going to have close to one billion dollars worth of lending done because of this act that only costs us $30 or $40 million to accomplish. We have provisioned $30 or $40 million in the budget in the Small Businesses Loans Act. It is going to lever about a billion dollars worth of activity. That is remarkable.

It is a little different from the NDP government in Ontario that is spending $1 billion to create 10,000 jobs directly. In fact, what we are doing is spending $40 million to create one billion dollars worth of activity through the financial institutions.

I think that is a better way to go. I think that is a more prudent use of the taxpayers' money.

We have no reflection from the opposition of how it would do any of these things better. That is the role of the opposition. It is to be constructive and have some constructive proposals of its own.

As for the trade agreement, I have my views on the NAFTA that are maybe a little different than those of some other members of the House because I come from southern Ontario and I have seen the companies that want to take advantage of the NAFTA.

I want to speak to that just for a minute. Three years ago I met with a group of Canadian exporters who had the following complaints about exporting to Mexico. It was quite a meeting. I will never forget that afternoon.

There were about 30 people there that all tried to export to Mexico. Here were their complaints.

First, Mexican tariffs were above 20 per cent. We cannot export with tariffs at that level. Second, if there were no tariffs, there were quotas. In other words, one can only export a certain amount. There was a quota stopping them. We wanted to get into services with our engineers and consultants and so on. No, one had to have Mexican professional accreditation or one could not sell into Mexico.

We took a look at the rules of origin. In other words, we tried to find out where goods are made so we could add tariff classifications to them. The rules of origin were murky and very hard to read. Customs administration was a disaster. They could charge all sorts of fees for handling goods as they went into Mexico. We had almost outright prohibitions against a number of our exports or quotas: telecommunications, grain, fish, metals and machinery. We had little or no opportunity to get any government procurement orders from the Mexican government.

That was the situation three years ago. It was a thicket of problems. There were so many problems that the embassy told me then that they had little more than 200 Canadian business visits in 1989 even to look at the Mexican market because it was so darned difficult to get into that market.

These were the problems for us to get into Mexico, but what were we doing for the Mexicans three years ago? They had virtually open sesame to the Canadian market. In the middle seventies the Trudeau government agreed to pretty well get rid of all tariffs against developing countries, including Mexico. It gave Mexico most-favoured nation status. We have lowered all our barriers. We took all the snow out of the driveway so they could drive their trucks right into the Canadian market three years ago. Now, 80 per cent of our trade with Mexico has no tariffs at all. They can export into this country with no prohibitions at all. We have no quotas. The 10 to 12 per cent of products coming into Canada from Mexico that do run into tariffs are at very low rates.

What is the NAFTA then? The NAFTA is the best possible arrangement for Canada because finally we are going to get the kind of access to Mexico it has had for years to Canada. Frankly, it is almost a one-way negotiation. We are getting rid of their barriers which are many. We already got rid of ours decades ago. So why would one not negotiate access to Mexico when one has already given them total access to one's own market?

I have never been able to understand why the newspapers are even interested in this NAFTA thing. It is such a one-way deal for Canada. It is a winner and it improves the free trade agreement. There were a few wrinkles in the free trade agreement that we wanted to improve and it improves them as well.

When we look at the NAFTA and when we look at the FTA it is a one-way victory for Canada. There is no doubt about it. It also keeps in place something else which I have always thought historically has been very important for Canada. Canada is one-tenth the size of the United States in terms of economy and population.

• (1705)

Whenever we had a dispute with the United States in the past we would have to spend millions of dollars with a whole bunch of Washington lawyers to see if we could even get a hearing. Usually it just wore us out. It would take years and years to get anywhere and millions of dollars in legal fees and we usually lost.

What does the free trade agreement do about all that? It puts an adjudication panel in place: one Canadian, one American and a neutral chairman. Within 315 days they have to make up their minds. They have to decide who is right and who is wrong. Not only that, but we have been winning. We have won the last four or five. The last time I saw a score-card we had 11 victories and 9 defeats.

Why is this important? As I have told the House before, I will never forget a meeting I had a couple of years ago with the Japanese minister of trade. He said: "Can you explain this free trade agreement you have with the United States and this dispute mechanism that you have? How does it work?" I explained it to him just like I have just explained it to the House.

He said: "Just a minute. Canada is one-tenth the size of the United States and you're saying that when you have a dispute with it, it has given you equality". I said: "Yes". He said: "Good Lord, why does it do that when it is 10 times bigger?" I said: "That is what we negotiated". He said: "Boy, that's a pretty good deal. I would like to get that for Japan with the United States".

That is what we have negotiated. We have negotiated equality with the United States whenever there is a dispute with that country. Nothing could be a greater affirmation of our sovereignty, nothing could give us more equal footing with the Americans than what we have done there.

People say that under the free trade agreement there has been job loss in Canada. We know what the Minister of Finance has said and we know what the economists are saying. It is quite true that we cannot trace everything to the free trade agreement, job losses or job creations. It is true that $18 billion worth of exports more are going into the United States this year than went into the United States the year before the trade agreement.

It is also true that there has been a complete change in investment. I want to tell the hon. member from Windsor that tomorrow I am going to go to the opening of the new Chrysler plant, a $600 million plant, in Windsor. There will be a $2 billion expansion to the Ford plant in Oakville. There has been a tremendous expansion of Freightliner in St. Thomas. All of these things have been happening.

The hon. member for Windsor West just sat down. He knows about the $600 million expansion at Chrysler tomorrow. This is all good news. It is there in large part because of the confidence people have in the Canadian economy. We only buy 9 per cent of the big three automobiles but we produce 18 per cent of them in Canada because we are so efficient and competitive.

What we now have is a free trade agreement that protects our sovereignty and strengthens us. With the NAFTA agreement, which the opposition wants us to abrogate or be against, we further consolidate what we captured in the free trade agreement and we finally get access to the Mexican market, which we have never had before.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to what the hon. member had to say, particularly to the fact that he mentioned his book in his opening remarks.

I happen to have read that book and understood from that book that the member had a much firmer grasp at that time of the political realities of the country than he seems to have today, at least if we take his rosy-glow approach to the trade deal as an indication of his current thinking.

I would also like to remind the hon. member that in opposition his party advocated that universality of social programs, for example, was a sacred trust. I would also like to remind him that before the last election, although his party was in government, his party said that it would introduce the best adjustment programs known to the civilized world if there were negative consequences from the trade deal.

In his academic analysis of opposition parties over the years, when has an opposition party come forward with a more complete description of a proposed economic agenda than the New Democratic Party. When has it been more fully costed? When was it submitted to a widely respected independent agency to have the results verified by somebody outside the political process?

• (1710)

The hon. member made reference to the CAEDS program, the aboriginal economic development program of which I and others in my party have been supportive. Why did he countenance in the last few years the fact that CEIC has withdrawn 25 per cent of its commitment to the program, that in the last budget the Indian affairs department withdrew 31 per cent of its commitment to the program, and that his own department withdrew 10 per cent of its program?

Is the member satisfied with the predictions of independent analysts and his own government figures indicating that this will be a jobless recovery, that for the next five years we can anticipate the same level of unemployment? If not, what proposals does he have to increase the level of employment among Canadians?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's intervention. I take his points seriously.

On the first question of being a party which has put together alternative policies, my complaint was that the motion itself was not constructive. He is quite right though. I have to give the NDP credit. It at least looked at policy and produced a booklet three or four weeks ago that was an attempt to give its point of view.

It was costed, so-called, by Mr. McCracken and the Informetrica people. The Minister of State for Finance made very clear in the House today the problems, the way he looked at it. The way it was costed assumed certain things that were just not valid, especially the impact of what would happen to the Canadian investment climate if we abrogated the free trade agreement or if we did away with the GST. What Informetrica did not look at was that there would be some sort of shock about that which would affect investment in Canada. Therefore the assumptions about investments were far too rosy. We are just two economists talking. That is my problem with the Informetrica review. It overlooked those important realities.

Something else is that one can be an agnostic about free trade and agnostic about the GST. In other words, one is either for it or against it. Even if one is agnostic one has to admit that if a government actually did away with those two things there would be reverberations immediately in international financial markets which could plunge the country into a tremendous recession. That is what the plan completely overlooked. I do not fault the NDP for trying to come up with policies but that is my big problem with what it has done.

On the CAEDS program—and I am kind of fortunate because a lot a ministers have to stand and talk about how they had to freeze this and freeze that—the two things that have been indulged most by the government have been aboriginal spending and science and technology spending. I am responsible for both the CAEDS program and science and technology. There is never enough for hon. members opposite, I understand, but the CAEDS program was very generously increased, and it was made permanent.

The cutback the member talked about was through CEIC. It was not for the CAEDS program but for a different program. It was an economic development program. It is not the program that really creates small businesses on and off reserves, which is my program and which has not been cut back. There is a lot of pressure on that program because we have so many applications. We have three great boards that give me a lot of good advice, aboriginal people who give us great advice on how to create small and medium-sized businesses. They really decide who gets funded. It is not me.

We have three times the applications, as we sit here, as we had five years ago, even in the middle of a recession. That program has been generously funded. I am proud that our government has done that. I will always be proud the aboriginal people have been looked after as generously as possible by our government, even in the midst of this recession.

I think it is acknowledged by the CAEDS board that we have done that. The CAEDS board would like twice as much money because they are so many applications, but we have funded this program generously, if not more generously than any other program the federal government delivers.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the minister makes some astute observations and he is absolutely right. The NDP motion we are debating today is negative, unqualifying and unconstructive but most obviously uncompromising. Says the self-professed professor: "What are missing are the alternatives".

• (1715)

I give the minister opposite the opportunity to possibly correct the record because alternatives have been put to the government. I dare say that on almost every bill brought before this House, like the GST, the FTA, the immigration and the UI bills, the opposition has proposed alternatives. It has proposed credible suggestions which seek to improve any one of the bills aforementioned. They are called amendments.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Keyes: The hon. member for Burlington sits there and squawks and grunts, but the reality is that the alternatives are put there in the form of amendments. They are the suggestions of the opposition to facilitate a bill that in our opinion make a better piece of legislation.

To no one's surprise what happens to the majority of these amendments, the constructive useful suggestions put forward on any government bill, is that they are defeated. They are voted down by the government time after time. I have sat here for over four and a half years and have witnessed this each time an amendment was brought forward.

That is what a suggested alternative is. It is called an amendment to the bill. Anyone can pick up a copy of Hansard or can call or write their MPs to ask for any copy of Hansard over the last four and a half years. We will get copies for them and they will see that suggestions have been put forward. However members of the government, in particular the member for Burlington and the professor himself, have stood and said no to the suggestions because they do not fit their market driven agenda, which is not the problem.

I want to ask a question of the hon. minister. We have another amendment to a suggestion being put forward by the NDP today. It is a constructive amendment. If there are flaws in the NAFTA, which we and the majority of Canadians believe there are, why not sit down and renegotiate them? If we cannot do that as they profess, can we bring forward the parallel agreements on the environment in order to correct the agreement—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In fairness I have to give the floor to the hon. minister.

Mr. Hockin: The question is: Why could this government not countenance some improvements through amendments to the NAFTA? That is the question. I gather the improvements would be a subsidies code, improved environmental standards and improved labour standards.

We are the government. We are the party to this negotiation that suggested 14 months ago both environmental improvements and labour code improvements. Finally the United States is looking at them. We have been out front. We do not need their amendments to have us do it; we suggested those changes 14 months ago.

On the subsidies code we have said we have a beautiful solution to that. It is the GATT subsidies code. Rather than rewrite the GATT we will just take the GATT subsidies code and use it. In fact I gather the negotiators are looking at that. What we did 14 months ago was exactly what the hon. member for Hamilton West is asking us to do. Why amend a piece of legislation when we are already doing what he is asking us to do?

The other more profound point he was making was a good point. He said: "We amend legislation. Therefore we are being constructive". He wants to go through life amending here and there great pieces of architecture.

Where is his great piece of architecture? All he wants to do is add a little garage here or a small door there. That is what he wants to do. They are small amendments. That is his view of governing. We produce the architect. We build the building. We have the original and comprehensive thoughts. What is missing from the opposition, especially in the Liberal Party, is any sense of architecture on what to do beyond adding some minor amendments.

• (1720)

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, when I first looked at the NDP motion we are debating today I thought that it might be possible to find a number of things in it with which many members of this House and many Canadians could agree. For example, the motion starts by saying that this House recognizes that the government's economic recovery plan has been a failure.

I think most Canadians would agree with that because we have just started to come out of what has been three years of the most severe recession this country has faced in modern times, a recession which the Prime Minister boasted was deliberately induced by Conservative government policy.

Even though we are starting to come out of this Conservative induced recession, this movement toward the light of economic recovery is slow, anguished and painful because we still have 1.5 million people out of work. It is not clear when most of them are going to find jobs. In fact there are all too many among our unemployed who have little prospect because of Conservative government policy of ever finding jobs. We are faced with an unparalleled disruption of our industrial base in this country as a result of the hammering of misguided Conservative policies. Therefore it would be very easy to agree that this motion makes a good point, a point that has already been made over and over by Liberals, that this government's economic recovery plan has been a failure.

Also it would be easy at first glance to be able to agree with what this NDP motion says to the effect that there has to be a comprehensive economic recovery program which includes such things as a strategy for full employment, a jobs plan, an infrastructure program and a national child care program. These are all things which, well before this motion was put down on the agenda of this House, Liberals have been calling for, working for and pushing for in spite of the blindness and deafness of the Conservatives when it comes to responding constructively to the Liberal point of view on these matters.

The infrastructure program, for example, is something we began pushing for back in 1988, building on the very good work of the Canadian Federation of Municipalities.

However, I regret to say that when I and others examine this resolution more closely we see problems with it. These problems have lead our party to propose an amendment. If this amendment were to be adopted by this House then I would say that the resolution, as amended, would be acceptable not only to Liberals but I think to most Canadians.

Our amendment focuses on two particular problems. One is that the resolution calls for simply abrogating the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the North American free trade agreement.

This resolution overlooks the fact that surveys have shown, including one survey carried out by supporters of the NDP, that most Canadians want the government to renegotiate these agreements. Only if it is not possible to renegotiate to bring about a better deal for Canadians, one which answers the concerns about the problems we outlined all too often which are connected with these deals, only then we say should the tool of abrogation be undertaken on behalf of Canadians by their government.

This resolution does not respond to the views of Canadians in this regard. In fact the resolution shows no recognition of the common sense of a policy which, as the Liberal amendment points out, should be one based on renegotiating these trade agreements rather than simply rushing to abrogate or cancel them.

• (1725)

This is a common sense approach because it makes use of the unparalleled opportunity for getting better deals for Canadians in their trading relationships with the United States, and also with Mexico, created by the election of the Clinton government in the United States.

That government sees flaws in these arrangements similar to the ones that we have outlined. Liberals have expressed concern about the lack of labour standards in the proposed North American free trade agreement.

They have expressed concerns about the lack of environmental standards. They have also had particular concerns about the lack of a subsidy code and the lack of measures to deal with the exposure of Canadians to anti-dumping and countervail law from the United States.

The Liberals have also expressed concerns that the Mexicans are left under the proposed NAFTA deal with more sovereignty over their energy resources than Canadians have under the free trade agreement and would have under the NAFTA.

With the Clinton administration ready to negotiate what it calls parallel or side agreements, a door has opened to make major improvements to correct flaws which have been all too evident in the existing Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and which have been carried forward in the North American free trade agreement. Yet the Conservative government has said that one of the reasons to adopt the NAFTA is because it corrects the flaws in the free trade agreement.

It is interesting that is a justification given by the Conservative government for the NAFTA because originally the Conservatives said that the free trade agreement was perfection in itself and was the best agreement between two countries that we have ever seen.

Now they come along and say they want us to agree with this NAFTA proposal because they finally woke up to the fact that the free trade agreement is full of flaws and errors which this NAFTA will correct.

We should recognize that the same gang that brought us the flawed free trade agreement with the United States is now trying to sell us the North American free trade agreement to replace it. If they were able to make a botch of the original agreement there is no reason that one should assume that they are doing anything better with the NAFTA.

Our trading relationship with the United States is crucial for this country. It is our best customer and we are its best customer. Yes, we need to expand our trade with the rest of the world but we have to recognize the importance to this country, now and in the future, of our trading relationship with the United States.

It is simply common sense not to rush to break apart what has been done unless we first try to use this opportunity I have mentioned to negotiate a better deal and correct the flaws and difficulties which many feel have brought about lost jobs, closed factories and diminished sovereignty for this country. The Clinton administration gives us this opportunity.

In today's Windsor Star there is a cartoon of President Clinton saying: "Folks ask me what NAFTA stands for". Then the cartoon shows President Clinton saying: "I tell them it stands for Not Altogether Finalized Trade Agreement".

This cartoon has an essential truth to it. Since the agreement has not been submitted to the U.S. Congress it is not undergoing the fast-track debating process. President Clinton has made it clear he will not submit the legislation for it to the Congress unless and until satisfactory collateral or side agreements have been negotiated.

By simply moving to abrogate the existing free trade agreement with the United States, flawed as it is, and the proposed North American free trade agreement we will be passing up an opportunity to get a good deal on trade with the United States and Mexico for Canadians.

• (1730)

As I have said, if the NDP will accept our amendment and therefore recognize this point then its motion could well have some basis for support.

However, I want to say quickly that there is another flaw and that is that there is nothing in the NDP motion about having a national recovery program in a context or a framework of fiscal responsibility. We know only too well how the Conservative government, after nine years, has created a tremendous problem in allowing our national debt to more than double to more than $430 billion and has also not improved, but actually allowed to become worse, our annual deficit problem.

Yes, we want to see a program of economic growth as a way to create jobs—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his speech time has now expired. It was 10 minutes because he split with another member of his party.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member would want to add a word, given his knowledge in these matters, about the rapid increase in foreign indebtedness that this government has permitted to take place. It subjects Canadian government to the review and surveillance of foreign institutions and foreign governments, which renders us vulnerable in a way we have not been before.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, until this government took office we never had the exposure that we now have to the views and pressures of foreign investors with respect to the government's borrowing activities. Only since this government took office have we seen this burgeoning of our debt not in the form of money owed by Canadians to themselves, but owed outside this country.

This is a problem that we have to be aware of and which also leads me to return to the point I was making before about the need to have an economic recovery program in a context of fiscal responsibility.

The NDP in its program announced a few weeks ago went through the motions of recognizing the need for fiscal responsibility but I noticed that in its motion today there is not a word about fiscal responsibility. It is like what it said before about it never took place. Therefore I submit that unless that omission is corrected by adopting the Liberal amendment the NDP motion, in spite of the good intentions that may be connected with it, does have a serious flaw which prevents it from being supported by members of this House.

I thank my hon. friend for mentioning the foreign debt problem. It is ironic that the Conservative government, like the Republican government of Mr. Reagan and Mr. Bush in the United States, came into office saying that its priority was to deal with the public debt and the annual deficit. Yes, they dealt with them all right, both in the United States and Canada. They allowed the problem to reach astronomical levels of concern and certainly this will be something that a new Liberal government will have to deal with as part of putting into effect a program of serious economic growth and job creation.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, my question will be very short.

If the hon. gentleman was so concerned about the government's deficits and the debt why was it that he permitted himself to be a member of a government that from 1968 took Canada from a position in which we had surpluses every year to a position in which in the last year of the hon. gentleman's government there was a deficit of $38 billion and the government operated without any operating surplus at all. The government had an operating deficit of, and I do not have the exact amount here, something in the order of $17 billion. That left Canada in such a bad deficit and debt position that we have had to struggle ever since to get it back on track. We now have an operating surplus. We have had an operating surplus in the government's accounts every year. We are making a contribution toward the interest costs. When the hon. gentleman was last in government in 1984 no contribution was made toward the payment of interest but there was a deficit in addition to the interest payments.

Will the hon. gentleman explain to the House, has he had a conversion on the path to wherever he is heading? If there is a conversion, what is his hon. leader going to do about the fact that he is going to abolish the GST? He does not want to bother the Canadian people by telling them how the $17 billion of lost revenue is going to be replaced plus the contribution of $2 billion or $3 billion we are now paying to the sales tax credit. Would the hon. gentleman explain a couple of these prickly little matters for us so that we will understand what might happen if his party ever sneaks back into power in this country again?

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, when my party goes back into power it will not sneak in. It will march in probably with a strong majority because the Canadian people will have compared not only past Liberal governments but also the Liberal program with the nine years of this Conservative government. They will agree with us that this government will have been found, and has already been found, sorely wanting whether it comes to job creation, tax policy, or deficit policy.

My hon. friend has tried to pretend that paying interest by government is not an expenditure. That is absolute nonsense. Paying interest is an expenditure as much as any other kind of expenditure. For this minister and his government to say that if it was not for our interest payments we would not have this huge accumulated public debt is absolute nonsense. Just as it would be nonsense for an individual to tell his or her bank manager that if they did not have to pay interest on their mortgage they would be solvent. That is ridiculous and the hon. minister knows it.

With respect to the GST we have been right up front with Canadians from the beginning saying that it is a bad tax. We agree with Canadians on this. But the revenue involved has to be replaced. The manufacturers' sales tax created revenue which the government said it was going to replace with the GST, a tax which it said was going to be revenue neutral and not one that would do anything else for the government's accounts.

I know the government does not want to account to Canadians for what it has been doing or not doing over the past almost nine years. It is trying to pretend that those years did not happen and other people have to explain what they are going to do instead.

Liberals are not going to let the government get away with this, nor will Canadians. It will be held to account. The result will be, as I said, a Liberal government marching into office with a majority, heads held high, proudly committed to rebuilding this country after nine years of Conservative destruction.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to my colleague from Windsor West I am reminded of the discussion he related to me some time ago. He had had a discussion with Senator Croll. I guess it was during his first campaign and he was getting some counsel and advice from Senator Croll as to what he would do when he was asked why people should vote Liberal. Senator Croll told my colleague from Windsor West that when talking to people in his community to remind them that when they vote Liberal they are voting for more jobs.

Looking at the record when the Liberals were in power over the years it is an indisputable fact that when people vote Liberal they are in fact voting for more jobs. That will be the central focus of our campaign in the next three or four months.

• (1740)

I want to get back to this NDP resolution. There are some aspects of this NDP resolution that I agree with. I naturally agree with the fact that the goods and services tax has been a disaster, as well as all the off-loading onto the provinces in terms of transfer payments that this government has done, especially in a province like mine with the cap on CAP.

It has been an incredibly difficult situation. A province which has traditionally been counted on to pull us through difficult periods like this has had the double-barrelled effect of not only being hit by the cap on the CAP but also having an NDP provincial government which just does not know how to deal with reality at all.

In the final sentence of this opposition motion the NDP say it is going to have a plan that will ensure job creation and prosperity for Canadians. As I listened to the members of the New Democratic Party today, I could not believe how little focus there was on the role that small business would play in creating those jobs.

The fact of the matter is that the greatest hope for new job creation in this country lies with the small business community. Most of our larger corporations are downsizing. They are restructuring and they are all laying off. Any new jobs that have been created, as well as 80 per cent of the jobs that are in existence today, are created through the small business sector. I could not help but notice the fact that the NDP just does not understand that is where the real emphasis should be in terms of any kind of an economic recovery plan.

We in the Liberal Party have strong views. We have taken a very strong position traditionally in our support for small and medium-sized business. Three weeks ago when the government put forward its Small Businesses Loans Act we stood up in this House and supported that bill going through the House in record-breaking time. The government made a commitment on that day that it would promote the Small Businesses Loans Act, that it would make sure that all the financial institutions and all of the small businesses in the country knew about that specific plan.

It is a good piece of legislation. I give the Minister of Finance credit for the idea that the government back small businesses loans to the tune of 90 per cent on loans up to $250,000 for businesses with sales of $5 million or less. This government does not even know how to take advantage of a good idea. It just sits over there and does not act on this particular idea.

The government sees that must be the area that needs support and enhancement. Three weeks after debating it in this House, it has not done a thing in terms of making the public aware. Some will say it has not had Royal Assent. I have seen dozens of initiatives in this House where the government has spent taxpayers' money promoting initiatives on second reading. Why will it not do that when it comes to small business?

When you have an initiative like that and you miss the opportunity, it makes me very suspicious of the real intent of that particular piece of legislation. Perhaps it was meant to be a bit of packaging in a budget. When it comes to having the actual law tested, it is not working.

I am disturbed about this. In the last two weeks in my own community, and I have heard from other communities across the country, people are going into their banks and they are not having any luck in getting any support from the Small Businesses Loans Act. I said three weeks ago that I am going to be on this issue until the government does something about it. I cannot for the life of me figure it out.

Going back to the NDP resolution, we have listened to New Democrats speak here today. Where is the thrust in their plan for small business? I will tell you.

• (1745)

They could not even come up with a thrust for small business. In the province of Ontario just six months ago, against the wishes of 95 per cent of the small business community, they introduced Bill 40 which practically crushed the spirit of most small businessmen in the province of Ontario. There is a little bit of a contradiction. In other words, in the province of Ontario they bring in their Bill 40 which works against the spirit of small business. They are being consistent today by not really living up to a concrete thrust.

Let me go back to the actual words in this legislation where they talk about abrogating the Canada-U.S. free trade deal. Where are we coming from? When you have a trading relationship of almost $240 billion would you not give the trading partner some benefit of the doubt that you had enough intelligence and enough give and take in your negotiations that some of the things that were meaningful for us as a country might be sold or might be implemented in terms of their attitude?

It is just like writing off the Americans as if they do not care, that they are closed-minded. It would be totally irresponsible for us with a deal which since it was signed has involved almost $500 billion in trade. Do you just want to walk away from it without saying let us get down to the table here and talk about the aspects of this deal which are not working for Canadians?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply, pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

The question is on the amendment.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR ROSEMONT

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the House some comments made by the hon. member for Rosemont in referring to members of the Speakership of the House of Commons.

According to the March 14 edition of Beauport–Express, a weekly newspaper, the hon. member for Rosemont said the following at a public meeting held recently in the town of Beauport, and I quote: "Charles DeBlois, one of the acting Speakers of the House, is a party to collusion to restrict our party's right to speak in Ottawa".

Although these comments were made outside the House, they nevertheless cast doubts on the integrity and impartiality of the Speakership.

All parliamentarians have a profound respect for the Speakership as an institution. Bearing that in mind, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to order the hon. member for Rosemont to withdraw these comments immediately and present his apologies to the members of the Speakership.

Mr. Speaker: I listened with some concern to what was said by the hon. member for Beauce. Since the hon. member for Rosemont is not here, this morning, in the circumstances it would perhaps be appropriate for the Speaker to meet the hon. member for Rosemont, after which the matter could be pursued in the House.

WITNESS PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-413, an act to provide for the relocation and protection of witnesses.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Wappel: Today in Canada there is no legislated program to aid informants and witnesses and their families from reprisal by criminals. What programs there are are secret, arbitrary and unaccountable to the people of Canada who pay the costs.

My bill would create a legislative framework to protect witnesses and their families, including relocation, identity change and financial assistance. It would also spell out the witnesses' responsibilities to the justice system.

This bill would aid in the prosecution of violent crime, organized crime and drug-related crime, while protecting the lives of informants, witnesses and their families all under the mandate and watchful eye of the Parliament of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Wappel moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

Routine Proceedings

PEACE TRUST FUND ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-414, an act respecting the establishment of a peace trust fund.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Funk: It gives me pleasure to introduce this bill to the House with the support of the hon. member for Victoria.

This bill would permit individuals who object on conscientious grounds to paying taxes that might be used for military purposes to direct that the amount equivalent to a prescribed percentage of the income tax they pay for military purposes in a particular year be diverted to a peace trust fund established by this bill.

The principle of conscientious objection has a long and honourable history dating back to the reformation. However, in this era of high-tech warfare many conscientious objectors, many of them members of the historic peace churches such as Quakers, Mennonites and others, believe that their tax dollars serve as surrogates for physical participation in military activities. They are thus seeking a legal avenue to contribute their tax dollars to other means of seeking peace in the world.

I believe this is a timely piece of legislation because even those who do not personally accept a conscientious objection position are becoming increasingly aware of the limitations of military solutions to problems like those in Bosnia and Somalia.

This legislation would end the present unacceptable situation where otherwise law-abiding citizens are running afoul of Revenue Canada with serious consequences for themselves and their families merely for exercising their profoundest beliefs with regard to participation in war and military activities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Funk moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my first petition is from petitioners who are anxious to make sure that Parliament scrutinizes very closely the language used on both radio and television. They are also concerned about acts of violence on television, particularly in a society such as ours where it would appear as if violent acts are becoming increasingly frequent.

The petitioners point out that what occurs in the media, that is on radio and television, with respect to inappropriate language and violence does in fact counter some of the efforts being made in the family. They also underline that it is not necessary to use inappropriate language or acts of violence to entertain or to inform.

• (1015)

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the other petition is from the Canadian Federation of Students from Saskatchewan.

Their sentiments I believe are shared by students all across the country. They denounce the government's policies with respect to education, the 3 per cent tax on student loans and the additional six months' interest. They want a fair system of student aid. They are really quite concerned about the current program that the government has advanced, particularly with respect to sharing the risk with the banks.

The petitioners want to know who is going to be eligible. Who is going to set up the eligibility requirements and what role will the banks have in this particular process?

THREE GORGES DAM PROJECT

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour today to present a petition concerning the Three Gorges dam project in China.

Because of the serious environmental impact of such a project and the fact that such a project would displace over one million people, the petitioners call upon the government to pass necessary legislation to prevent any further involvement by the Government of Canada in the Three Gorges dam project. They also ask that the government refuse to participate in or provide technical assistance, loans, grants, guarantees or subsidies in any form for any aspect of the Three Gorges dam project from this day forward.

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from residents of Dubuisson, Val-d'Or, Malartic, Senneterre, Vassan, Val-Senneville, Sullivan and La Motte in the riding of Abitibi who say that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they act as a stimulus for violent behaviour.

The petition also says that all toys that incite children to play violent games are unacceptable and their manufacture should be banned. It is also pointed out that when acts of violence are reported, the freedom of the press should be restricted, and that the repeated broadcasting of news about acts of violence on television on all channels and on radio may act as a stimulus for further identical violent behaviour.

Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass the appropriate legislation in order to eliminate violence in our society and thus protect our children and give all citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of British Columbia. They indicate their opposition to a plan by Multinational Resources Inc. which has the support of a number of American companies. The intention is to divert up to one million acre-feet of water from the North Thompson River, which is a tributary of the Fraser River, into the Columbia River basin and through a number of different basins until it gets into the Sacramento River basin on its way to southern California.

The petitioners figure this would generate profits in the range of $300 million annually to the firm. However because of the ecological consequences and the general concern that people have in terms of river diversion, the petitioners are asking that the Parliament of Canada take whatever steps are needed to ensure that this type of diversion would never occur.

BILL C-268

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition on a different matter which is signed by a number of residents from Alberta. They are asking us to recognize the point made in Bill C-268 entitled an act respecting a national solidarity day for the First Nations of Canada. They are asking that Parliament support this particular bill and this initiative to show solidarity and support for aboriginal people of Canada.

WITNESS PROTECTION PROGRAMS

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have 29 petitions I would like to present today, all on the same subject.

The petitions contain signatures of literally thousands of Canadians from all areas of the country on the subject of the fact that witness protection programs are a matter of policy only at the discretion of each individual police force. They also point out that because of that there is no unity or national consensus on this matter.

They therefore request that Parliament enact legislation to provide for an act to protect witnesses. In one respect this was the reason I brought forward my private member's bill earlier today.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the following question will be answered today: No. 367.

[Text]

Question No. 367—Mr. Belsher

Have any public servants who have been offered early retirement and or a severance package been subsequently rehired on contract and, if so, (a) how many (b) at what cost (c) what is the estimated cost had these individuals been retained?

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): For fiscal year 1991-92, for yes, (a) 93 (b) $1,577,103 (c) $3,041,456 approximately (excludes employee-paid benefits).

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cardiff: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

• (1020)

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary, or at least his colleague, will know that I have privately been asking for approximately the last two months to have three questions in my name answered. Some of them are over six months old and they are all pursuant to the 45-day provision which governs us as members.

I would like to be able to count on the assistance of the Chair if the government continues to refuse to answer the questions in the manner prescribed by the rules of this House.

It seems to me that after six months of waiting for a 45-day answer that there should be some redress available to some of us. The questions I asked are in no way complicated. One of them concerns the cost of an airline ticket for the Prime Minister. That information would take all of about 30 seconds for the government to research.

It is my hope that all three questions that are waiting will be answered shortly. I received a commitment from the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader some weeks ago that in fact he was doing some research and he was led to believe that pursuant to briefing notes provided to him by the Privy Council Office the answers would be forthcoming.

Every day he tells me they are forthcoming but they never get here.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I will look into the matter for the hon. member and get back to him as soon as possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-95, an act to continue the Farm Credit Corporation and to repeal certain acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with an amendment) by a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are 13 motions in amendment on the Notice Paper for report stage of Bill C-95, an act to continue the Farm Credit Corporation and to repeal certain acts in consequence thereof.

Motions Nos. 1, 6 and 11, standing in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, are identical to Motions Nos. 3, 7 and 12. After consultation, Motions Nos. 1, 6 and 11 will not be selected.

[Translation]

Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Algoma, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 3, standing in the name of the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River, is identical to an amendment moved and rejected in committee. Consequently, Motion No. 3 will not be selected.

[English]

Motions Nos. 4 and 10, standing in the name of the hon. member for Algoma, and Motion No. 12, standing in the name of the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River, will be grouped for debate and voted on as follows:

[Translation]

Motion No. 4 will be voted on separately.

An affirmative vote on Motion No. 10 obviates the need for a vote on Motion No. 12. A negative vote on Motion No. 10 requires a vote on Motion No. 12.

[English]

Although the wording of Motion No. 5, standing in the name of the hon. member for Algoma, and Motion No. 7, standing in the name of the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River, is different the intent is the same, and that is to ensure that the membership of the board shall at all times include a majority of farmers. Therefore, I shall not select Motion No. 7. Motion No. 5 will be debated and voted on separately.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 8, 9 and 13, standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture, are motions of a technical nature that affect one version only. They will therefore be grouped for debate, and the vote on Motion No. 8 will apply to Motions Nos. 9 and 13.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-95 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out lines 13 and 14 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"farming operations, including family farms, and to those businesses in rural Canada, including small or medium-sized businesses, that are related to farming."

• (1025)

He said: Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I am putting today, Motion No. 2, really identifies that loans made and that this bill really applies to family farms and medium and small-sized businesses in rural areas relating to farming. The original clause did not specify that. It simply talked about farming and businesses engaged in farming in rural areas.

One of the most attractive parts of Bill C-95, the Farm Credit Corporation Act amendments, deals with the further processing of agriculture commodities in this country and extends the authority of the Farm Credit Corporation to make loans relating to the food processing industry and further processing of agriculture commodities.

This has clearly been one of the greatest failures of this government. Since 1989 when the free trade deal was signed, we have seen a massive depopulation of the food processing industries. Over a hundred plants across the country have closed and some 34,000 jobs have been lost. I guess it is better late than never, and so we are glad to see the government bringing forward these amendments to the Farm Credit Corporation Act but this is clearly a major failure. This is an area where a new government will have to take immediate steps to salvage the further processing industry in this country, because if we do not have further processing we do not have the markets.

This amendment is designed to indicate that loans made are for family farms and for small and medium-sized businesses.

The section in the act now reads:

The purpose of the corporation is to enhance rural Canada by providing specialized and personalized financial services to farming operations and to those businesses in rural Canada that are related to farming.

This amendment just adds family farms and small and medium-sized businesses because that is the sector where we think there is the most opportunity not only for further processing of agriculture commodities but also the creation of jobs in rural Canada.

We have seen some 13,000 farmers leave rural Canada in the last four or five years. With them leaving, the infrastructure of rural Canada is likewise diminished. This amendment is designed to strengthen that aspect, the idea of family farm operations and small and medium sized businesses.

Right across the country today there is grave concern as to whether this bill will make any difference. The bill is generally a good bill. It provides for a much more flexible Farm Credit Corporation. It removes limits on expenditures and allows for flexible arrangements with regard to agreements.

• (1030)

The basic question that Canadian farmers are asking is: Will it make any difference? Will there be any more money? If we look at the estimates that were presented a couple of weeks ago we can see that over $600 million has been reduced in the estimates. Regardless of how good a structure the FCC is, if the government's political will is not there to support rural Canada and support rural industry then it will not make any difference.

We see estimates that the net farm income across the country will be reduced by some $1 billion in this coming year and the estimates are being chopped by over $600 million in this year. That leads one to believe that things in rural Canada are not going to get better, they are only going to get worse.

That is the concern right across rural Canada. Regardless of how good a bill we fashion or put in place, the question is: Will the government provide the funding, the finances to make this legislation, Bill C-95, work? Without additional funding it will not be any better than the existing Farm Credit Corporation even though the mechanics and the facilities will be in place to improve it.

There is some concern in some groups. Some of the prairie wheat pool groups have expressed their concern that if an additional amount of money is going to be provided through this legislation for further processing and activities beyond the farm gate, will that mean there will be less funding for farm loans for the primary producers? Those questions when put to the parliamentary secretary or the officials of the Farm Credit Corporation really get no response. We have no idea whether or not there will actually be any additional funding for those further processing plants beyond the farm gate.

This amendment further defines that we are interested in funding and supporting the family farm and that we are primarily concerned with small and medium sized businesses. We are not concerned with bankrolling or even having the massive kind of vertical integration that has happened in the United States.

Last night I had an opportunity to again review the CBC program concerning the poultry industry in the United States. In the United States there are big companies like the Tyson company, which produces 25 per cent of all the poultry meat in the United States. We clearly do not want to see that kind of activity enhanced in this country, whether it is coming from the U.S. or it is being designed here.

We want to see efficient medium sized industries that live in the community and do not treat primary producers and farmers as serfs living on their land, but are independent farmers contributing to their community, producing quality, producing efficiently, and making not only a contribution to the world food supply but within their community.

The kind of vertical integration that we have seen in the U.S. and some other countries is clearly not the model that we have had in this country. If we have had any genius in this country it has been the system of supply management and the system of orderly marketing, such as the Canadian Wheat Board, in which the farmer, the primary producer, who is the most important link in the whole food production chain, is given power. He is given power through the Canadian Wheat Board to amalgamate with the several hundred thousand prairie agriculture producers to be able to market on a world scale with one of the best marketing organizations in the world. Likewise in our supply management, producers are able to bargain and have power in the marketplace to deal with the large dairy, poultry or whatever sector it is. This amendment is really designed to ensure that these funds are made available for the family farm, for small and medium sized farm businesses relating to primary production.

I hope the government will accept this motion. We had a similar one in its committee and the government voted it down in, its usual inimitable style of voting down every amendment that comes forward from the opposition. I hope it will accept this one.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate, especially in the discussion of Motion No. 2 which would amend clause 4 to designate that the purpose of the bill is to provide money for farming operations, including family farms and those businesses in rural Canada including small or medium sized businesses that are related to farming.

I note that both the hon. member from Moose Jaw and myself have very similar motions standing in our names. Thus it is quite obvious that we support the gist of Motion No. 2.

I might also note that the bill as it stands now merely makes reference to farming operations and those businesses in rural Canada that are related to farming. The critical difference between what is in the bill as proposed by the government and this motion is that we are talking about family farms and small and medium sized businesses.

It is a very critical distinction, given the stage of development of agriculture today. We are at a watershed in the agriculture community, in the rural community, with respect to whether the production of food will continue to be based on a rural model, on a family farm model or whether the production of food will gravitate toward production by large corporations which are alienated from the family farm structure and the rural communities as we have traditionally known them.

In general this is an acceptable bill, a useful bill. It provides more flexibility for the Farm Credit Corporation. It provides new ways of doing things for the corporation which could in fact be very useful.

Two questions have to be answered, one concerning resources and the second concerning the philosophy of the corporation. The previous speaker indicated that the estimates outline a spending regime where there will be $600 million less available for agricultural purposes in the upcoming year. Therefore it becomes very critical where the government will allocate these scarce resources.

The government has a choice of allocating these resources to the maintenance of the family farm and the small businesses that support our rural communities, investing its money to enhance the secondary processing, the value added activities in those communities based on a local community model, or choosing to proceed with financing all sorts of agribusiness concerns, such as large corporations which could supplant and replace the family farming model.

Certainly there are enough examples in North America today of the scale and scope to which some of these corporations can grow. In my own province we have seen an example in the Kindersley area where one organization, something of a phantom organization in that it was never clearly identified who it was, proposed to buy over 100 sections of land in one community.

As this bill reads now it is entirely conceivable that the Farm Credit Corporation could get involved in lending to organizations of that scale.

As well under the free trade agreement and the upcoming NAFTA agreement there is tremendous pressure on processors to adopt economies of scale that are far beyond anything that has ever been envisaged in this country before.

It is also possible under this legislation for the Farm Credit Corporation to be involved in financing those kinds of operations which would in fact create a very fundamental change in how we process food in this country.

• (1040)

Therefore I think this is a motion that is worth adopting. In fact it should be adopted to make it very clear that the intent of this Parliament and the people of Canada is to perpetuate the family farm model, the rural development model and the small community model that we have traditionally known. It is not the intent of this Parliament and the people of Canada to finance a massive takeover of the family farm and the infrastructure that supports it by large multinational corporations.

Also, this motion gives a clear indication of the philosophy which the government intends to pursue. I believe, and my party believes, the model that includes the family farm, organizations like co-operatives, rural development corporations and rural development authorities are the appropriate models to use to build on our past successes. We have done a good job, both of producing quality food at a reasonable price and in organizing that production in such a way as to have maximum benefit for rural communities and to maintain a maximum number of family farm units.

However, it is very questionable whether this will continue into the future. It is not guaranteed that the family farm model and the rural development model will continue into the future because the pressures being brought to bear on that community are very strong indeed. It is going to be very much a matter of whether the government commits its resources to one course of action or the other that will determine how agriculture evolves in this country.

My party has proposed, with respect to the Farm Credit Corporation, that it should do a number of things differently than it has done them in the past.

First, it should provide low interest loans to farmers at fixed rates over long periods of time. Second, it should provide leasing options to individual farmers to permit the leasing of farmland over an extended period of time to guarantee tenure to farmers without needing to borrow money every generation in order to maintain a family farm unit within a particular family. Third, I believe that the Farm Credit Corporation should be proactive in developing new forms of farm tenure like community land trusts in order to create new options for beginning farmers and farmers trying to maintain their operations.

At the present time, the Farm Credit Corporation is actively disposing of land all over this country, normally to the highest bidder. In many cases it is a destructive force in a rural community. At the present time, the Farm Credit Corporation within its mandate really does not have much of an option as to how to proceed.

However, the co-operatives in this country, particularly the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, organizations like the Christian Farmers and others have proposed that we badly need a new form of land tenure, known as community land trusts. An organization, a group of farmers or members would hold land in trust in perpetuity and make their own decisions as to who should continue to farm that land. In other words, the control of who is farming land in a particular community would continue to reside within that community.

It is my belief and that of my party that the Farm Credit Corporation should be in a position to work with provincial governments and other organizations to perpetuate the kind of farm tenure and to make it not only possible but desirable to proceed in that kind of a way.

In summation, it is important we adopt this motion, both to provide direction as to how the scarce resources that the Farm Credit Corporation has will be allocated and also to give a clear signal that the people of Canada wish to perpetuate the family farm model, the co-operative model and the locally based community development model in organizing its food production for generations to come.

• (1045)

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to spend just a moment speaking on the amendment to Bill C-95 which is listed as Motion No. 2.

Essentially the motion is attempting to make some minor changes to the purpose of the bill which currently states that the purpose of the corporation is to enhance rural Canada by providing specialized and personalized financial services to farming operations and to those businesses in rural Canada that are related to farming.

The amendment that has been proposed in Motion No. 2 would clarify what sorts of businesses are being focused on by this newly mandated corporation. It says that these farming operations would include family farms and those businesses in rural Canada, including small or medium sized businesses that are related to farming.

This is an excellent amendment. The corporation has to be focused on the small and medium sized businesses in rural communities. They are virtually 100 per cent of the businesses in rural communities in Canada today. We know by looking at the statistics of job creation across the land that over 90 per cent of the jobs that were created in the past number of years were created by those very small and medium sized businesses. So I think there is some advantage in terms of job creation and keeping communities viable to have as a mandate for the Farm Credit Corporation the focus of small business and medium sized businesses as well as the family farm.

However, when I look at the kind of rural communities that I know, and particularly in my home province, but as I go across rural communities right across the country, and I get to quite a few of them, I note that a great many of those communities depend in part for their business expertise and the methodology of doing business on the co-operative movement. It seems to me that a new and vibrant Farm Credit Corporation cannot be restricted in the nature of the small and medium sized business loans that it indulges in and that its purpose should also include the co-operatives.

Therefore I would like to include the words "and co-operatives" in Motion No. 2. I move:

> That Motion No. 2 be amended by adding in line 3, following the words "medium sized business" the words "and co-operatives" in the English text, and in the French text in line 5 of Motion No. 2 following the word "entreprise" the words "et les coopératives".

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the amendment in order.

• (1050)

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to stand today to make a few comments on Bill C-95, and in particular on the amendment of my colleague from Algoma that is being amended to a further extent.

I would like to say from the start that for the most part the bill before us will be beneficial or has the potential of being beneficial to the agricultural community. However it is very important that the amendment before us gets passed. I am not so sure about the amendment to the amendment, but I am about the original amendment and its intent.

With the changes this bill makes to the board of directors of the Farm Credit Corporation we suffer the possibility of a lack of direct connection with the industry and the direction in which the Canadian agricultural industry and the government may want the Farm Credit Corporation to go.

This amendment states very clearly that the purpose of the corporation is to enhance rural Canada by providing specific and personalized financial services to farming operations including family farms and to those businesses in rural Canada including small or medium sized businesses, et cetera. It gives definite direction.

As has been stated before many times, 97 per cent of Canadian farms are family owned and operated. The danger we have if we do not give more specific direction to the Farm Credit Corporation is that we could very easily fall into a situation that is so evident in the actions and sometimes unspoken word of the present government. The definite direction is that the emphasis falls on the bigger companies and its support falls to the bigger companies. I do not think that is the intention of the farm credit legislation but there is that danger.

We know that over 80 per cent of jobs in Canada in the last number of years have been created by small businesses and medium sized businesses including farms. We need to state that emphasis.

If ever there was a time when rural Canada needed some development in the short term so that it could continue to be strong in the long term, now is that time. Now is also the time when agencies such as the Farm Credit Corporation should be there to support structures and facilities within rural Canada, whether they be farmer owned, local owned, co-ops, or a group of farmers or local business people going together to establish a facility for value added products. Now is the time.

We can give specific direction to the Farm Credit Corporation that this is the area we want it to concentrate on. We can make that message very clear. Whether it is Farm Credit Corporation or whatever it is, we do not any longer have an unlimited supply of funds. We must make sure those funds are priorized in the proper way and properly directed and that the emphasis of that expenditure is put there.

In order to have a strong agrifood industry I hope there is no question in anyone's mind that we must have strong, economically viable family farm units because that is the backbone of the industry.

However with the difficulty today of getting more money out of the world price for those raw products, a direction I find refreshing coming from the rural community is that those primary producers are realizing they have to get involved at some of the next stages with what happens to their natural resources or raw products. That realization is there. That support therefore must come from government in order to help them to attain that and it must come from the Farm Credit Corporation in order to help them put those instruments of value adding in place. If we cannot get any more from the world price, let us say for grain, probably one of the ways to go is to develop that into ethanol or in the case of canola, for example, there is some great work being done now to make diesel fuel using canola oil as a base.

This is where rural development can take place in order to allow rural communities to get more money out of the final marketplace and in order for this development to stay in those communities. By doing so, we will create jobs, we will keep our communities together, we will keep that social fabric and fibre together throughout rural Canada and we will have a better blend of rural and urban people.

We know that in many rural areas now there is not that distinct line between a farm community and an urban community. We are getting a mixture of the two in what we refer to as a rural-urban community. They need to and they can get along together, but there has to be interests and gains there for both.

I hope that the government will see fit to accept this amendment so that it makes it very clear to rural Canada, to rural-urban Canada and to the Farm Credit Corporation the direction in which we feel their expenditures should concentrate. It certainly does not prohibit the other, but it makes it clear that this is really where we want the effort to be made.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on report stage of Bill C-95 which is an act to repeal the Farm Credit Act and replace it with the Farm Credit Corporation Act.

This bill will expand the financial services to farm businesses diversifying beyond the farm gate. It is really permissive legislation since it sets out the rules under which the Farm Credit Corporation must operate.

There are several areas which are quite different as we compare this bill with the act that it will replace. There are two areas of concern to me. One of those is addressed in the amendment submitted in the name of the member for Algoma. While the financing alone must be for operations in Canada, I also note that the new legislation does not require that the applicants be Canadian citizens.

The new legislation will permit FCC to provide a loan to a business located off the farm within the rural sector as long as the inputs and outputs of the diversified operation are clearly identifiable. It could be for anything.

The amendment put forward for farming operations includes family farms and businesses in rural Canada, including small and medium sized businesses related to farming. The subamendment put forward by the member for Mackenzie to include co-operatives is also a very positive step.

This legislation puts the corporation in competition with chartered banks and the new provisions under the Small Businesses Loans Act which charges an interest rate of 1.5 per cent over prime and has a ceiling of $250,000. As we look at this new legislation we wonder if this is the first step toward privatization of the Farm Credit Corporation.

We admit that there are some aspects of the legislation that require special consideration that would cover for example a farm owned and operated seed cleaning plant or processing plant for livestock and poultry slaughter and processing or a small farm scale ethanol plant to supplement a feedlot operation. In some areas of this country such operations would certainly be of benefit to those respective communities.

I must caution however that such endeavours are not always a success. A local poultry operation in southwestern Ontario set up a state of the art poultry processing plant a few years ago at a cost of $500,000. They discovered to their dismay that they could not penetrate the market except for individual private sales prior to the holiday season. They suffered huge losses. The plant now operates only a few weeks out of the year.

• (1100)

The government seems to want to continue tinkering with the massive problems facing Canadian agriculture today. In fact, the new president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture said: "This government refuses to acknowledge that there is a problem".

The president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture stated at a rally in Lucknow, Ontario: "Farmers are upset, farmers are worried and Canadian farmers are indeed very angry".

Just recently the chairman of the Ontario Farm Debt Review Board said he fears he is going to be "a very busy man this spring". A well-known farm consultant stated that the Farm Debt Review Board has simply become a very sophisticated collection agency.

The February 1993 brief submitted by the Roman Catholic Agriculture Co-Ordinating Committee established by the Catholic bishops of Saskatchewan stated: "What is happening globally is that basic food production is no longer the principal goal of the agricultural system. It is increasingly geared to support agribusiness processors, retailers and intermediaries, whether at the international or at the national level".

I note that this legislation has no upper limit as to the size of loans that can be received. I hope that we will be looking at this amendment in a positive light. We will be looking at this amendment to ensure that the focus of this government is redirected back to the family farm operations which have made this country one of the best in terms of agriculture production, of efficiency and the quality and supply of food that is available to our people at a very reasonable price.

I do not believe that the whole bill is going to address the problem of what is happening in Canadian agriculture today. While aspects of the bill are quite positive, as I indicated, I should point out that it does not address the basic problem of income for individual farmers, income that is so sorely needed in the grains and other sectors of agriculture that do not have their systems of supply management or systems of planned production in place.

If he is going to survive, the farmer too has to have a return on investment, management, labour and risk. Therefore I submit that we should support this amendment. We trust the government will ensure that it is passed. We hope that it will ensure that the subamendment is also supported. I believe it will be the small community-based co-operatives that will have to build these small processing plants in order to add the value added products that will be required, whether in processing or new development or, if we have to diversify in parts of Canada, in the direction of specialized species of woodlands and provide the funding to the sawmills and the processing plants that go with them.

I believe that we have to get on with the bill. I call on the government to support the amendment and the subamendment so that we can put this in place and get on with issues in this House that are going to improve the income of Canadian farmers and enable them to pay back and service the loans provided to them by this institution, the Farm Credit Corporation, as well as the other lending institutions across Canada.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise and make a very few short comments on Bill C-95 in response to some of the concerns raised by my colleagues when speaking about this legislation.

It is unfortunate that some feel that this is not positive legislation. From the information that I have from feedback from constituents in my riding as well as right across Canada, it is viewed as positive legislation, as it is viewed by the officials of the Farm Credit Corporation because it provides them with new tools to hopefully better fulfil their mandate and make their work that much easier. Agriculture sectors have come forward on a positive note as well, looking at it as something new to help them meet the challenges that we are facing in this current year, the nineties, and to the year 2000 to help us better prepare for the future.

• (1105)

This is positive legislation that is being awaited. The farmers are waiting in anticipation of speedy passage of the legislation with the hope that this legislation will be in place for this current year, this spring planting season, in order for them to do their proper planning.

One speaker raised the concern of inadequate funding. I have to point out that since we formed the government, the FCC has been provided with adequate funding to meet the lending requirements in that period of time.

Before I came to the House of Commons there were times when the FCC did run short of funding and could not fulfil its mandate or the requests for the period of its fiscal year. It is certainly our intention to allow the FCC the funding that is necessary. It can go to the market to borrow its requirements and be very prudent while doing that. As well it should try to get the best deal in order to provide the corporation with the lowest cost money possible.

Some say that the legislation does not really address all the needs. I do not believe the FCC legislation is to address all of the problems that agriculture is finding at these times. There are external incidents that are making it more difficult for farming such as the lack of a GATT agreement and what other countries are doing with the prices of grains and oilseeds. That is why we brought in GRIP, NISA and crop insurance. We have tried to give the farmers, industries, the lending institutions, all of those, the security that is necessary for proper planning.

We believe that a GATT agreement would be one of the most positive things that would help in the long term, but in the short term as we have said before we have put safety nets in place to help meet those obligations.

There is no question that this new legislation allows the corporation the flexibility to lend to larger operations. I also want to point out that the FCC will continue to serve the needs of the family farm. In fact, the removal of the principal occupation stipulation will make it easier to lend to smaller farmers whose income is not primarily derived from the farm. We do have a commitment to the family farm and I just want to make it very clear that there is no change there.

I want to speak very briefly about the amendment to the motion which would add co-operatives to the motion. The terminology "small and medium sized businesses" and "businesses related to farming" already include the co-operatives in the purpose clause of the bill. For that reason we could not accept the amendment to the motion.

Going to the amendment, we feel it does make some clarification. The proposed amendment does not change the basic purpose of the bill. The government is willing to accept the amendment. I think those are all the comments I will make at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

• (1110)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Mr. Cardiff: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. It was not clear. Are we calling the question on the amendment or on the amendment to the amendment?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The debate is on Motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Algoma, but the vote is on the amendment to Motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Mackenzie. It is on the amendment. Is it clear?

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the amendment lost.

Amendment negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The next question is on Motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Algoma.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Motion No. 2 agreed to.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River) moved:

Motion No. 12.

That Bill C-95 be amended in Clause 8 by adding immediately after line 30 at page 5 the following:

[English]

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I really appreciate the parliamentary secretary and the government accepting the first amendment. It was one strongly recommended by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the Ontario Federation of Agriculture who appeared before the legislative committee.

With regard to Motion No. 4, this motion simply says that when the government can make loans they should be made to Canadian citizens or Canadian residents. It does not preclude it from making loans to people who are not citizens of the country provided they are residents of the country. Some new Canadians who have not achieved citizenship are farming and this motion simply provides for that.

Looking at the amount of funds available, the parliamentary secretary was talking about how the government has always made money available to the FCC. The question is as to what interest rates are charged. If we look closely at what has happened to the FCC even since 1987, it is pretty dramatic. The number of loans out there has dropped from 72,000 to 59,000. That just about parallels exactly the number of farmers we have lost during that period which is some 13,000.

• (1115)

I suggest that the government's tight-fisted approach to FCC, especially coming through farm debt review boards, really results from that tight-fisted, hard-nosed approach this government has taken with literally thousands and thousands of producers.

The parliamentary secretary says that the government has made funds available. In fact, if we just look at that period from 1987 to 1992 the amount of loans this government has with Canadian farmers has decreased from $4.7 billion to $3.5 billion. That is $1.2 billion taken out of the farm financial situation across the country.

During that same period of time the amount of loans, the amount of farm debt, has increased from some $22 billion to, I believe, almost $24 billion. The amount of money the government is making available for farm loans is certainly not increasing. It is in fact decreasing.

The only thing that is increasing is the number of properties which the government has seized. In 1987 it held 911 properties across the country. At the end of fiscal year 1991-92 which is almost a year ago, it owned 2,609 properties. There are hundreds of thousands, millions of acres of land which the government has seized.

The parliamentary secretary suggests there are lots of funds available but the amount of funds is rapidly decreasing. The parliamentary secretary suggested that the Farm Credit Corporation would be able to go to the market any time to secure additional funding. That is true, but every acquisition of funding has to be approved by the Minister of Finance. Therefore, the funding is only available if the Minister of Finance approves it.

It seems to me that this amendment to clause 4, suggesting that persons resident in Canada within the meaning of the Income Tax Act or Canadian citizens or bodies would be eligible for the funding is a good amendment. If there are limited funds available, surely we want to reserve them for Canadian citizens. That, of course, does not preclude groups putting together funding from other sources that are outside the country, but certainly we should have an approach to provide funding for Canadian farmers whenever that is possible.

We have three motions grouped for debate. This debate also includes Motion No. 10, standing in my name. This amendment of clause 8, by striking out line 23 on page 5 and substituting therefor "committee", gives the board of directors the powers to establish committees. They talk about the executive committee, the audit committee. We are proposing that there would be a committee to review any decision made by the corporation under paragraph 4(2)(a), or any other committees involved.

Essentially what we are trying to put in place is a review procedure, an appeal body. I put a similar motion before the legislative committee because I think it is important that in legislation there be a provision for an appeal procedure. The Tories, of course, voted that amendment down.

Fortunately we have been able to bring forward a new amendment before the House. However, I do not know why legislators want to remove the right for an appeal. I appealed to the members on the government side at the committee that the basic right with any government body or corporation such as this is that there be an appeal procedure.

We are talking about a very serious thing here. We are talking about farmers who have applied for a loan from an agency of the Crown. The loan should be available to them. If there is an official at the headquarters in Guelph, Regina or wherever it is across the country who dislikes that farmer for whatever personal reasons or incidents which have occurred during the negotiations and that request is being turned down, there should be the basic right to appeal.

• (1120)

An appeal procedure has been put in place by regulation or under this new arrangement it will be by a by-law. However, it seems to me that it should be right in the statute. Therefore, regardless of who the chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation is or who the chief executive officer is or who are the board of directors, it is in the legislation that there will be an appeal procedure.

Therefore, when farmers get turned down especially in these hard times when we have seen 13,000 go out of business in the last four years, there is an appeal procedure.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will not think of himself as being the tool of a government that wants to have a bill so short and so broad that all powers are assumed by that agency and its board of directors. I hope he will think back to when he farmed and he saw his neighbours lose their right for a loan. How good it would be to be sure there was an appeal procedure so that those individual farmers could go to the Farm Credit Corporation appeal body.

Whenever legislation is written, the idea is that we put in checks and balances, that we put in the right for the individual producer.

Now this may be all part of the over-all scheme to privatize the FCC and sell off its loan portfolio to some big American corporation or whatever. If that is the reason then we will know why the government is not accepting it. Today this is a Crown corporation.

These individual producers should have the right to appeal to a review panel, in this case a review committee, established by the Farm Credit Corporation so that injustices will not be done. Clearly thousands of farmers feel that the FCC has been unjust and unfair.

If we put it in the statute then they will know that we are doing our jobs as legislators. Whether the government operates in a fair and equitable way is something we have to pursue in the estimates committee or elsewhere. However, at least we will be doing our jobs as legislators in putting in the provision for an appeal procedure for farmers who are turned down for a loan by the Farm Credit Corporation.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, at the present moment there are a number of motions before us. Motion No. 4 would add a section to this bill requiring that loan guarantees be made to persons resident in Canada within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, Canadian citizens or bodies for the purpose of the various kinds of lending activities which the corporation could enter into.

As the legislation now stands it merely says: "make loans or guarantee loans made to persons or bodies for the following purpose". In other words, Motion No. 4 would introduce a Canadian residence requirement for citizens or bodies who would be applying for a loan under the act.

Certainly it would seem only appropriate that moneys that are voted by this Parliament, moneys that are paid for by the taxpayers of Canada, should be designated to people and organizations resident in this country. What purpose could there be for using scarce resources to finance the activities of others who would come into our country and take over either farms or agricultural businesses within this country? Certainly there are reasons why that might happen, but what possible reason is there that the taxpayers of Canada should, in times of economic scarcity and fiscal restraint, be involved in providing taxpayers' money for those purposes?

The real reason that the government is reluctant to accept this particular motion is that it flies in the face of what is in the free trade agreement with the United States and the proposed NAFTA agreement with Canada, the United States and Mexico. Those agreements create a regime in which national boundaries mean very little and the decisions of individual legislatures in particular countries mean very little.

The farmers of Canada, and all the people of Canada, should be aware that one of the implications of adopting those kinds of trade agreements is precisely what we see here, which is that this Parliament can no longer restrict the spending of taxpayers' money to Canadian citizens and Canadian residents. It is really quite alarming that perhaps in perpetuity we are now going to be in a situation in which this Parliament cannot direct the spending of Canadian taxpayers' money for the purposes of helping Canadians and Canadian residents and restricting expenditures of money to that purpose.

The second set of motions, Motion No. 10 in the name of the member for Algoma and Motion No. 12 which stands in my name, would create an appeal body which would be available to farmers and others that come before the board and are turned down or are otherwise not happy with the decision of the Farm Credit Corporation. My motion says that:

> "(3) The board shall establish an advisory committee to review, at the request of any interested person, any decision made by the corporation under paragraph 4(2)(a).

—which is the list of purposes to which loans and loan guarantees can be applied. It also says that:

> (4) For greater certainty, a decision made by the advisory committee established under subsection (3) shall not be binding on the board or have the effect of altering or annulling any decision of the board."

In other words, this would provide for an appeal process, a review committee to which a person or an organization could appeal a decision of the Farm Credit Corporation. It also makes it very explicit that the decision of that body would not be binding on the corporation but merely would be advisory to it.

It is important to note that the government's seeming rejection of this provision means that it is rejecting something that in fact has been the practice in the past. To my knowledge there is a review procedure, an appeal procedure, within the Farm Credit Corporation at the present time which serves the very function that would be enshrined in Motions Nos. 10 and 12.

Surely it is only right to have such a body available to people doing business with the corporation. It is an agency of the Crown and thus it acts on behalf of the people of Canada. It is also a very human institution in which individuals make the best judgments according to guidelines that are provided to them. Very often these guidelines are imprecise, have grey areas, and allow a fair bit of individual latitude concerning decision making. There are probably legitimate reasons that a person could argue that the decision of the corporation goes against its own guidelines and policies, or situations in which an individual might dispute the facts that have been made available to the Farm Credit Corporation and its officers.

As members of Parliament, all of us who represent rural constituencies are very much aware of the disputes that occur between farmers and the corporation. It is often very difficult for us to determine who is right and who is wrong. But in very many of these cases we all know that there is a legitimate grievance to be had, a legitimate case to be presented by the person unhappy with a decision.

Precluding an appeal procedure for those kinds of people means that rather than going to an appeal board the only recourse these people will have is an appeal to the political process or the courts.

• (1130)

As we all know from our attempts to intervene in these cases, members of Parliament, although we would gladly accept the responsibility of following up these cases, often feel we are not the appropriate people to conduct the kind of inquiries and hear all sides of the evidence required to make a fair judgment. As members of Parliament we know those kinds of cases occur. Therefore one avenue of appeal is often not appropriate.

The second avenue of appeal is an appeal to the courts. That is an expensive and time-consuming process, as anybody who has ever been involved with it knows very well. Often people who are in a situation in which they are appealing a decision of the Farm Credit Corporation have stretched their resources to the limit, are going broke and are in a state of personal crisis with respect to themselves and their families. Having to go to court, with all that implies, is another burden they really do not need and it does nothing to enhance either their own well-being or the decision-making process.

Therefore it seems to me that the government should recognize that there is a right in a democracy to appeal decisions that are made on behalf of the Crown and to enshrine in this legislation what has been the practice, which is that people who disagree with the decisions made by the Farm Credit Corporation have a right of appeal internally within the corporation. As I previously noted, this would not be binding but would have an advisory effect and would present an opportunity for both sides of a dispute to be heard.

I appeal to the government to take the common sense and just approach and continue the practice that has been in place in the past by providing an appeal procedure with respect to decisions of the Farm Credit Corporation.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak briefly on this amendment and at the same time take the opportunity to speak on the bill.

Over recent weeks I have received correspondence from constituents who want this bill to pass. As usual our party has demonstrated its co-operation. I understand that today we will not only be passing this bill at report stage but my colleagues and I will be giving our unanimous consent to go to third reading, thereby demonstrating not only to the government but to all Canadians that we on our side of the House want to do whatever we can to assist the agricultural industry in Canada.

In a perfect world the amendment we are proposing this morning is something that would leave me a little uncomfortable because we are restricting the number of people who could have access to these funds. However, the sad reality is that with the cutbacks this government has imposed on the Farm Credit Corporation and on agriculture generally, funds are very scarce. As funds are very scarce, we must maximize their use.

My colleague from Algoma and others have spoken about how the number of loans continues to decrease. The number of active loans under the portfolio of the Farm Credit Corporation is actually going down. The number of loans in 1987–88 was 72,000; in 1988–89, 67,000; 1989–90, 63,000; 1990–91, 61,000; and 1991–92, 59,845. The number of loans continues to decrease.

What does that tell us? First of all, it tells us that the agricultural economy is doing very poorly. Then it speaks of some of the neglect of this government. It is not only the number of loans that is going down. Some people might be tempted to say those are merely consolidations and each loan may be greater in value, and therefore the agricultural community is getting the same benefit. That is not so.

• (1135)

In terms of the amount of dollars, the total was $4.7 billion in 1987–88 and that figure progressively went down to the present year's total of $3.5 billion. In other words, it went down $1.2 billion, and that is not in inflation adjusted dollars. If we count the inflationary adjustment, resulting from the fact that each dollar is worth less today than it was then, then the loss is even greater than the $1.2 billion figure I just mentioned.

We will be supporting this bill because it has merit. However, let there be no mistake. This bill does not bring salvation. This bill does not make the Conservative administration across the way acceptable to the agricultural community of Canada. The agricultural community will remember the government across the way for what it has done.

I remember how this government talked about its commitment to supply management in 1984 and I remember a repeat of that commitment in 1988 during the free trade agreement debate.

An hon. member: What did it do about it?

Mr. Boudria: What did it do about it? First of all, we lost an awful lot in the free trade agreement. We all know of the loss of the ice cream and yoghurt provisions that we had because the government switched some items from the tariff list to the import control list, or at least it pretended it would. Mysteriously the then Minister of Agriculture resigned only a few days afterward and did not seek to run again in the last election.

To make matters even worse, there are also the cutbacks that have been imposed on the agricultural community since then. There was the decrease of $638 million in the last mini budget. That is how much of a cut there was in the economic statement of last December, which some of us refer to as a mini budget. That figure even includes a $38 million decrease in the dairy subsidy measures which the agricultural community had previously enjoyed.

We all know that this $6.03 per hectolitre amount had been frozen for many years. At one time it represented something like 12 or 13 per cent of the revenue of dairy farmers. As a result of the fact that amount had remained fixed per hectolitre and the cost of production kept going up it eventually represented a smaller proportion, somewhere in the order of 8 per cent. Now there is not just the fact that this amount was frozen but there is an actual decrease of some $38 million in the dairy subsidies.

The last thing the dairy farmers of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell wanted is for this government to renege on its commitment to protect the supply managed sector during the free trade agreement debate in 1988 and to actually start reducing the subsidies.

[Translation]

So farmers in my riding and elsewhere will long remember the Conservative government opposite. Today, of course, we intend to support this bill, because it is good, but we should still keep things straight. This bill does nothing to redeem the Conservatives opposite. The Conservatives have sinned and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that voters in my region and elsewhere will say: "Yes, the bill may help us, perhaps, but the damage caused by this government is far greater than the benefits from the bill today".

• (1140)

[English]

With that I will end my remarks. It is my pleasure to support the bill and the amendment as offered by my hon. colleague for Algoma and seconded by my colleague for Prince Edward—Hastings, who also represents another fine agricultural constituency in this country and more particularly in the province of Ontario.

I am anxiously awaiting not just the outcome of the vote on this bill. We all know the approval the bill will get, but I am waiting to see other measures that will assist the farming community in Canada, which is living through a very difficult period. It has lost so much of its income and is struggling in spite of the fact it is working so hard to produce the food we all eat.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a few short remarks on this amendment. I want to approach this from the point of view of an urban member of Parliament.

All too often there is a view or feeling in rural Canada that people who live in the cities, or urban members of Parliament are not as supportive as they should be when it comes to agricultural issues.

About three months ago in my riding, we put a display in the window of our constituency office that was designed and prepared by my colleague for Lambton—Middlesex. The display was titled "Compare the Share". This exhibit illustrated to urbanites, people who live in the city, the amount of money received at the farm gate for things like chicken, wheat, cheese and milk. Then we illustrated the amount of money the retailer receives. The dramatic difference shocked urbanites. They had no idea and there was little awareness or sensitivity to the amount the farmer receives.

There is another small store in my community called Hampton Variety store, which is run by a young entrepreneur, Terry McAdorey. As a result of this particular exhibit he will not buy products from transnational agricultural organizations. He buys farm products from small family farms. The cheeses, stews, eggs and everything else are all bought from the family farm. He is doing this partly because of his own inner view, his own commitment to the fact that we must become more sensitive to the notion of community versus competitiveness. In my view this is one thing this government has really failed to achieve.

It has been so possessed by this notion of global competitiveness that it has really been following the transnational corporate approach. Nowhere has that transnational corporate approach had more impact than on the values and approach we now have in our agricultural community and in the agribusiness. It is practically a cartel of about five or six companies that are running the agricultural business in Canada. As a result, the few family farms that are left in our country are existing almost in isolation. It is almost like the life of a hermit and this has tremendous impact in terms of the social consequences.

• (1145)

I think we all agree there is a farm crisis in our country today, especially with respect to the family farm. This bill we are putting through today is an instrument of the Farm Credit Corporation to recommit itself to the idea of respect for the family farm. It basically puts community, community values and quality products against this singular drive for competitive prices and globalization, which I think is getting far out of hand.

I was reading an article in the Catholic Register, written by Marie Carter of Dresden, Ontario. The article is on page 7 and is called: "Today's farm crisis is everyone's concern". She made the point that only 3 per cent of the Canadian population makes a living from the land.

More than ever it is incumbent upon all of us as members of Parliament to speak out for those people. Hopefully we can reignite interest and concern in this particular sector of our economy. Maybe we will develop a feeling or an idea that this could be a new vocation or approach as we head into the restructuring of our entire society.

There is a growing mood of defeat and negativity toward farming by farmers that was illustrated in this particular article. I am happy to stand here today as an urban member of Parliament to support my colleagues from Algoma and Prince Edward—Hastings on this motion.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I also want to make just a few brief comments on these motions before the House right now.

The first one is that the Farm Credit Corporation money be made available within the meaning of the Income Tax Act to Canadian citizens or bodies, et cetera.

I share the view of my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that it would be nice to be able to have sufficient funding to help finance people who want to get involved in farm businesses, farms or the agrifood community. In reality however, as he stated, we just do not have an endless supply of money.

The Farm Credit Corporation is backed by the Canadian taxpayer and unfortunately in the past has had to be funded to quite an extent by the Canadian taxpayer. I think therefore the moneys it makes available should be made available to Canadian taxpayers, Canadian citizens and landed immigrants as long as they meet the accepted criteria, legal aspects, et cetera.

I know that the intention of this bill and the Farm Credit Corporation is to balance the books so there are no losses. There are lots of us out there in businesses and it has been our intention to balance the books. The government claims it has been its intention to balance the books. It is another subject, but I do not think it has done a very good job of it.

This is probably the fairest distribution of this money and availability of money by the Farm Credit Corporation, to make it available to those who fall within the meaning of the Income Tax Act. I would ask the government to consider that and approve of that amendment.

• (1150)

The other motion before us, Motion No. 10, stipulates that a committee to review any decisions made by the corporation be put in place. At the present time there is an appeal board at the Farm Credit Corporation. Some people may feel they have not had their cases heard properly or for some personal reason they have not been treated as they felt they should have been. Perhaps they have not been able to explain their situations to representatives of the Farm Credit Corporation. They can presently have a second group of people take a look at the situation. I think that is very worth while.

With this bill we are changing the make-up of the board of directors at the Farm Credit Corporation. I have no problem with the number. We will discuss the distribution, background or make-up of the board of directors in a later motion.

If the bill continues the way it is at the present time, there is no avenue for an individual applicant to raise the question other than to write to the complete board of directors or the chairman of FCC to say he or she would like the case to be reconsidered.

We must all realize that even though that has not happened a lot in the past, it has happened. In many cases when there has been a request for a review, it has not been passed. The decision is made the same way, but it has given that extra avenue and level of comfort to the applicant that was there for assurance to make sure he or she could be heard.

I would ask the government as well to consider this. There is nothing wrong with it. It is not asking that someone be placed on a fancy salary or a long-term thing. My understanding is when these have worked before they were on a per diem basis. They can put two or three people in different places in different parts of Canada. If there is a request for a review they can be called together or go to visit the applicant. They can sit down with the applicant in the farm office or in someone else's facility and go over the issue to determine whether the probleme is personality, et cetera. It is a safety valve and I do not think it is too much to ask to give a high level of comfort. Quite frankly I think it would cost very little.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak on the amendments at report stage of Bill C-95 and particularly to Motions Nos. 4, 10 and 12.

I am going to zero in on Motion No. 4, which is designed to ensure these loans are made to Canadian persons or corporations. In June 1985 we heard a lot from the government opposite about Canada being open for business. In the next few years between 1985 and 1991, approximately 4,100 corporations in Canada were taken over mainly by other interests to the south of us in the United States. Those takeovers were largely financed by loans from Canadian lending institutions. In fact, 85 per cent of the loans came from Canadian lending institutions. In other words, they used our financial institutions to buy us out. I suggest that Motion No. 4 will block such an attempt to use Farm Credit Corporation loans in the future for that purpose. I believe it is a well thought out motion that deserves support.

• (1155)

Let us look at what is happening in Canada with some of the transnationals that were referred to a few moments ago by a previous speaker. To leave the bill as it is without such a motion as Motion No. 4 would play right into the hands of these corporations. They are bleeding dividends and assets out of Canada and are contributing to the huge current account deficit which is going to hit somewhere between $25 billion and $30 billion in this current fiscal year.

This country cannot afford such haemorrhaging of profits and dividends going out of this country to companies that do not belong in Canada but operate here. My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood who spoke just a moment ago about the transnational corporate agenda and its objectives was absolutely right.

In fact, just yesterday a prominent economist stated that: "The doctrine of international competitiveness that government, business and academics have seized upon is misguided and dangerous. The competitiveness doctrine thinks countries compete like companies and end up winners or losers, and it does not exist as a meaningful concept". That economist was Paul Krugman, an economics professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

On several occasions I have spoken about the growing concentration in food production and processing by a few huge firms. Some of them are transnationals in the U.S. Some are already in Canada and other countries. Some of them came into Canada and were encouraged by government financing made available to them in terms of low interest rate loans or outright grants. Now we find these same companies branching into Third World countries to take advantage of low wages, few environmental regulations and lower sanitation and health standards.

For nearly two years I have been accumulating information and have completed two studies delving into the share of the consumer's food dollar that ends up in the hands of the average Canadian farmer, as mentioned by my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood just a few moments ago. The results are shocking.

However, to bear out the quotes I referred to earlier in these remarks, how can this government have the gall to tinker with legislation such as this when the basic primary producers are forced to take secondary jobs off their farms to earn enough to put food on their own tables and subsidize their own farming operations?

In 1991 the average farm family income which includes income earned from other sources was $39,638. The income from those other sources was $22,522 or about 60 per cent of that total income. Federal and provincial subsidies accounted for $9,927, leaving just $7,181 from the farm operation itself.

The government cannot continue to hide its head in the sand. Any loans made under this legislation, the previous legislation, or any other lending institution have to be repaid. However, the returns are not there to pay off the debt or to pay the interest on that debt, as economics and agriculture are defined today.

The government brought out the GRIP and NISA programs. Already there are signs that these programs are beginning to fall apart. Of course, the question begging to be answered is: How can we survive when a program only covers 80 per cent of the acreage, based on a 15-year moving average of prices, an average that is going down?

It is time that we stood up to be counted as Canadians. It is time we stopped pandering to those interests outside of Canada who want to invest in Canada by using our Canadian lending institutions and our sources, corporations that want to gain control of food production and processing in this country. It is time we said that the buck stops here. That is why I am supporting this motion, to ensure that these loans are made only to Canadian citizens or Canadian corporations.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): I would like to make a few comments on Motions Nos. 4, 10 and 12. They basically deal with two topics.

One is the question of whether there should be a requirement for users of Farm Credit Corporation loans as established under this Farm Credit Corporation Act to be Canadian citizens or residents of Canada under the Income Tax Act. The other is whether there should in fact be a review committee to review the actions of the Farm Credit Corporation. It would not be able to change the actions but it would have them reviewed and perhaps made a bit more public and would test to see if mistakes had been made.

• (1200)

The first item is the question of requiring the making of loans or guarantees of loans to persons who are residents of Canada within the meaning of the Income Tax Act or Canadian citizens. This amendment to require the people receiving such loans or guarantees to be residents of Canada within the purposes of the Income Tax Act and/or Canadian citizens is a good one.

I know that flies in the face of some of the clauses the government has negotiated in the North American free trade agreement. I know it has a clause which says that future legislation does not permit this kind of thing and there is a commitment by the signatories to live by that. However we have not approved that agreement yet.

It is crucial to discuss why it is that this kind of commitment is required for loans being made to people living in rural Canada. It is particularly crucial because the purpose of the bill as stated says that these loans and financial services are for those businesses in rural Canada. It does not say international business; it does not say multinational business. It says business that will be in rural Canada, a business that has a commitment to staying there.

It is a very ancient, honourable and effective development tool which has been used for centuries to maintain rural communities. The assistance and loans and ownership of those developments would be by people who are citizens of the country and/or seeking to become citizens of that community. To set up a development model that is anything else does not live by the purpose of the bill which seems to be to develop businesses in rural communities.

We have had some wavering from the commitment to ownership in the community by the community in Canada's history even though our history is relatively short. In Prince Edward Island in the middle 1800s most of the island lands and farms were owned by non-resident landlords. People in England and Ireland owned most of that territory. There was what could only be described as a near revolt on the part of the resident farmers. They had found themselves shipping more and more of their income offshore and finally simply refused to do that. To this day on Prince Edward Island there are resident requirements and limits to the size of farms that can be owned by corporations simply because of that historic event more than 100 years ago.

In the development of my region, western Canada, it was required that an application for resident status must have been made before one could own a homestead. My ancestors came from Europe and the United States. They had to sign and swear that they were going to remain residents of Canada and had the intention of becoming Canadian citizens before they were granted the right to purchase this land.

This country has a long and honourable method of doing business in rural Canada. For the government to dodge the issue by not including a clause that was in the old act in this new bill means that there is in fact an intention on its part to change the rules as to what sort of development we have in rural communities.

• (1205)

I have seen the clause in the North American free trade agreement that says there will not be a requirement that investors be citizens any more. That might be fine for very large investors. However, as a result of the amendments that have occurred already this morning, this bill is aimed at the small and medium sized businesses.

We do not need international people coming in to pick and choose, to pick off assets they might be able to turn a fast dollar on just because Farm Credit Corporation might be able to lend them some money under this proposal. This becomes important because it is not just loans but it is also guarantees of loans.

The question of review of the loan decisions also ties in with this. In making financial decisions it is important to have a place to go to for a second opinion. The old Farm Credit Corporation Act had a review body. There is no mention of that here. Parliament would like to see a review body included in the act. A future board of directors might decide to set up such a body, but I think Parliament has the right and a proper expectation to have that spelled out in the legislation. That is what these amendments are about.

The reasons there should be such a review body are quite clear when we look at past experience. Financial viability is a little bit like the poet looking for beauty: It is basically in the eye of the beholder.

While there are numbers on balance sheets, the gut feeling of the person looking at those balance sheets is what ends up determining the decision that is made too often. If it is thought that is going too far, if you are from the accounting school and think that there is only one way to go when looking at a balance sheet, I urge you to look at the banking decisions made in the case of Campeau Corporation. There was a host and string of bad banking decisions made in the rise and fall of that corporation.

Look at the Bronfman empire. Look at the loans that are running into difficulty there that were based on reputation rather than balance sheets and assets given, estimates of asset values that had no relevance on the actual market of the day. Look at Olympia and York and the Reichmanns and the difficulties that those assets and evaluations have run into. It will be seen why it is necessary to have a second opinion sometimes.

I have had individuals raise situations with me. They have applied to Farm Credit Corporation and were turned down with no explanation. Sometimes it was a fight over evaluation. At one point the Farm Credit evaluator was attempting to extract for the same classification of land three times the value that an identical parcel next door to it had sold for just within six months. However, they were insisting on selling back to the owner or valuing it for the owner to renegotiate a price at a value that was three times what was, in fact, the market value. Without appeal to a review board and another assessment, that treatment would have been very unfair.

A feedlot operator in Alberta went to FCC, applied for a loan and was turned down. The Farm Credit assessor had made a terrible mistake in estimating the productivity of his feedlot, an estimate that showed the per day increase in production from his feedlot was one-half a pound per day instead of the three pounds per day which it actually was. Ever after, because of that mistake, even though his balance sheet was very good, that man was unable to get a loan. Not only was he unable to get a loan from Farm Credit Corporation, but from all other institutions as well. That is because the information is shared. He had no place to go.

For those reasons, it only makes sense that Parliament insist there be a place for a review committee in the legislation itself.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak briefly to Motions Nos. 4, 10 and 12. I will deal with Motion No. 4 first.

Although the legislation is for the benefit of Canadian farm operations, there are circumstances where business alliances could be developed with farm businesses in the United States that would be beneficial to Canadian farmers and rural communities. For example, there may be a member of a farm operation where one family member is a non- resident for a period of time. This may needlessly limit that farm's operation and its ability to obtain credit from the Farm Credit Corporation.

The term resident is not defined in the Income Tax Act. The courts have held that an individual is resident in Canada for tax purposes if Canada is the place where he, in the subtle routine of his life, regularly, normally or customarily lives. In making this determination all relevant facts in each case must be considered. As a result, eligibility tends to be confusing. We certainly do not want any more confusion with legislation than what sometimes develops.

With respect to Motion No. 10, the FCC currently has an appeal board to review loan decisions. It will also have the authority in clause 8 of this bill to establish such a committee. Therefore we feel this is also unacceptable.

The proposed legislation in clause 8 allows the FCC board to establish an appeal process or any other such committee that will assist in doing its business. Legislating an appeal process would create a process that may not be sufficiently flexible to meet future clients' needs.

For these reasons, we feel Motion No. 12 is not acceptable.

I want to point out there have been about 32 appeals in Canada in the last 18 months, which is not a great amount. We also know, as rural members of Parliament, if someone has difficulty with a field or staff worker from the Farm Credit Corporation or any problem with the application or loan per se, how often we get phone calls asking us to help someone through the process. Applicants also have the right to appeal to the chairman or vice-chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation. Of course we also know that many of them have appealed to the Ministers of Agriculture over the last number of years as well.

The government believes this legislation adequately addresses those concerns and therefore we have to reject Motions Nos. 4, 10 and 12.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 4 standing in the name of the hon. member for Algoma. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motion No. 4 negatived on division.

Motion negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The next question is on Motion No. 10 standing in the name of the hon. member for Algoma. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion negatived.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved:

Motion No. 5.

That Bill C-95 be amended in Clause 5 by adding immediately after line 12 at page 4 the following:

"(3) The membership of the Board shall at all times include a majority of farmers."

He said: Motion No. 5 standing in my name essentially amends clause 5, page 4, by requiring that the board of directors have a majority of farmers appointed to it.

The existing legislation does not provide for this arrangement as I understand it. In this bill, the board of directors is vastly expanded and the advisory committee is eliminated. We currently have an advisory committee of about 12 representatives from across the country in the Farm Credit Corporation and they are all primary producers. They are all farmers, to my understanding, or have been in the past.

The board of directors is being expanded to 10 directors plus the chairman and the president. It seems to me that if we are going to do away with the advisory board to the FCC which is all producers, and expand the board to 12 people, it is not unreasonable that six or seven of those people be primary producers. It is simply a matter of trying to have a board of directors that is sympathetic to agriculture and understands agriculture.

The way the legislation is written, we will end up with a bunch of retired Tory bankers, bagmen, bogey men and not a group composed of primary producers. I think it is not unreasonable to suggest, and this was strongly recommended in the Canadian Federation of Agriculture brief to the legislative committee, that there be a majority of primary producers.

The parliamentary secretary has suggested that a primary producer while serving on the board may sell his farm and no longer be a farmer and that would change the balance on the board. It seems to me there is enough latitude in this amendment to suggest that as long as the person is a primary producer, a farmer, at the time of appointment this will be acceptable.

I am sure amendments could be made.

To have the Farm Credit Corporation filled by a group of former bankers when agriculture in Canada is perhaps in the most unstable and uncertain period in its history is just unbelievable. It is simply unbelievable that any government would propose that to the House. We want a majority of the board of directors to be primary producers who understand the industry and its concerns. They understand what is happening out there with the uncertainty of the GATT negotiations and the free trade agreement. There is uncertainty about the value of the Canadian dollar and whether our wheat exports are going to be at an adequate price to provide a reasonable living for Canadian producers.

It is a very simple request and is recommended by the largest farm organization in the country. It is unbelievable that the government is proposing to do away with the advisory committee that was 100 per cent producers and incorporate it into a much larger board of directors and would not want to see a majority of those producers be farmers instead of people who are more concerned about the banking industry or other issues.

Clearly there is a space on any board of directors for representatives from the other sectors. When we are putting forward legislation which would provide funding for the processing, that would be wise. But regardless how you cut it, the legislation is directed to the primary producer, so the majority of the directors on the new corporation should be farmers or primary producers.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, the motion presently before us is Motion No. 5, which would call for:

> The membership of the board shall at all times include a majority of farmers.

It is very similar in intent although somewhat different in the wording to a motion I submitted under my name which said:

> That the minister shall ensure that as far as possible, the membership of the board includes at all times a majority of farmers.

I do not want to go on at length about this but I think it is really regrettable that the government or the Farm Credit Corporation was not able to accept this particular motion.

In this legislation we are increasing the size of the board of the Farm Credit Corporation from seven to twelve. With only seven people on the board it might have been argued that there was a certain range of expertise required to facilitate the functions of the board that rank and file farmers did not have available to them.

For example, there might have been legal or banking experience required for the functioning of the board. With the seven member board, a majority of farmers would require that only three outside directors not be farmers.

However, with 12 members on the board, five or six people from outside the farming community could sit on the board. That certainly would represent enough bodies on the board to cover the range of expertise that might be needed by the board. It is also regrettable that this motion is not being accepted when one considers the fact that the government has also turned down the motion which called for an advisory committee to the board to review the board's decisions.

• (1225)

The effect of turning down both these motions will continue the present situation where there is no institutionalized way by which farmers can be guaranteed that within the organization there will be a body at either the board level or a review committee level that explicitly represents the interest of the farm community.

Surely in an era where we are in some ways being swamped with legalese, expertise and a decision-making environment that is far removed from the realities of life, in this case farming, it is regrettable that we cannot make this small move in order to ensure that the primary beneficiaries of this legislation are represented in a majority position or on an appeal committee.

I do not want to go on at length. I think it is regrettable that the government has not seen fit to approve a motion which would permit a majority of farmers to be the decision makers when it comes to the very important decisions this board will make, decisions that in large part will determine the land holding and therefore the future pattern of agricultural development in this country.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I too want to make some very brief comments. I made mention earlier today in remarks to this House about the changes that the bill puts forward regarding the number of people on the board of directors of the Farm Credit Corporation. It increases that number. It does not enable the appointment of a review committee or an appeal committee or whatever you might want to call it.

As that is the case, it is imperative that there be some stipulation as to the make-up of the 10 board members—there will be 12 in total with the chairman and the president—of the Farm Credit Corporation.

In order to give all the comfort that we possibly can to those people in the farm community and in the independent and small and medium sized agrifood business community, it is imperative that there be an absolute assurance that the right type of people will be on the board of directors.

I do not think it is too much to ask that the membership of the board shall at all times include a majority of farmers. That is what the Farm Credit Corporation is there for. The government recognized by accepting an amendment to the bill earlier this morning emphasizing that the bill is to deal with and assist family farms and small and medium sized rural businesses. It has recognized that. This is only a follow-up to that in order to finish the bill off properly so that it gives a proper direction.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I support this motion before us, Motion No. 5, at report stage of Bill C-95 because I think it is critical that there be a new level of understanding by the board of directors of the Farm Credit Corporation and a new look and better understanding of the needs of the borrowers as well as a need for accountability of the corporation itself.

I wish to put on record here in this House that the corporate plan of FCC of July 1988 was not tabled in this House as required by law or regulation within 15 days of the next sitting of the House as it was supposed to be. We tried on several occasions to get hold of that corporate plan and we were unable to do so until finally it was sent to us a couple of years later.

This amendment to have a majority of farmers on that board of directors would hold them accountable, not only to this House but to the borrowers of Canada.

• (1230)

I can well understand how they really did not want to table this because of what was in that corporate plan, and how they really wanted to convert the debt to equity. That can only be done one way, and that is by foreclosing on the farms so that rather than having a debt owing to the Farm Credit Corporation it shows up as an asset.

This is a very positive motion. We should look at it because so far we have seen a lot of programs that are supposed to help the farm sector out of its terrible, distressed economy over the last several years but they have only been band-aids.

While the industry is really dying a death of a thousand cuts, cuts inflicted by this government in the name of so-called globalization of trade and global competitiveness, the self-styled professionals, whether they are economists or agronomists, continue to dream in Technicolor. Today we are seeing some band-aids that will still keep the farmers off to one side of the decision-making process, not having a say in how their own lending institution, being financed by moneys from Treasury Board, will continue to operate.

Will these people continue to support globalization rather than support our own highly successful marketing boards, agencies and commissions? Those are the only sectors that are really showing a return in investment, management, labour and risk. They are ignoring the cost of the need for environmentally sustainable agriculture that must be implemented, with the costs shared by farmers and society as a whole.

We must have people on that board of directors who understand the hardships that are taking place out there rather than people sitting back ruling with the cold, hard heart of the bankers or economists who do not have to worry about their income but only about their own positions.

I support this resolution because it is badly needed. I hope the government will reconsider its opposition to this motion and the common sense it makes.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to speak briefly to Motion No. 5. Administratively there is difficulty in maintaining a majority of farmers at all times, but experience has demonstrated that the board has always had strong producer representation. As well, there could be difficulty in defining who was a farmer for board membership purposes.

I will give another example. We might have some excellent farmer representatives on that board but if they cease to be a farmer they would then have to resign from the board. We have to provide that board with continuity for proper decision making, et cetera, and it could put us into a position in which we would lose some very good directors and members of that board.

For that reason we feel this amendment is not acceptable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 5 standing in the name of the hon. member for Algoma. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, these amendments are very technical in nature and really do not change very much.

Motion No. 8 is proposed to make the English version of clause 7(1) consistent with the French version of the bill and with the Financial Administration Act. This amendment changes the word "may" to "shall".

Motion No. 9 also amends clause 7(1) to make it consistent with the French version of this bill and the Financial Administration Act. Like the previous motion this amendment changes the word "may" to "shall".

Motion No. 13 changes the French in clause 15 of the bill to make it consistent with the English version. The English version referred to section 121 of the Financial Administration Act while the French version referred to section 121(1) of the FAA. The English version is correct.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The result of the vote on this motion also applies to Motions Nos. 9 and 13.

Hon. Monique Vézina (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the bill as amended be concurred in at the report stage with further amendments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? With leave of the House, now?

[English]

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find consent to move directly to third reading on Bill C-95 now that we have completed report stage.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, we on this side agree to move to third reading now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to move the motion for third reading of the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Monique Vézina (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I present Bill C-95, the Farm Credit Corporation Act, for third reading.

Throughout the legislative process we have received outstanding support and co-operation from the agricultural and financial industries as well as from elected representatives from all parties at both the federal and provincial levels.

I would like to thank all of our colleagues for their help in preparing this final version of the new legislation for the Farm Credit Corporation. I believe the result is something of which we can all be proud.

Since this bill was first presented to the House of Commons on November 26 it has received broad support from farm groups across the country. Members of Parliament from all political parties have agreed that this important piece of legislation will be of great importance to the rural community in years to come.

• (1240)

Following second reading, a number of our colleagues spoke favourably about the general thrust of the bill. Most of the hon. members who spoke to the bill remarked that it filled a clearly expressed need of Canadian agriculture producers and therefore it should be passed quickly.

One amendment was accepted, which is the removal of clause 4(5). At issue was the federal government's right to dispose of or hold its property. The matter was considered by the Queen's Bench of Saskatchewan and the decision was handed down last week supporting FCC's position that as a Crown agency it has the right to dispose of or hold its own land regardless of provincial legislation.

The legislative committee reviewing Bill C-95 met on Wednesday, February 24 and I am extremely happy to see that we have resolved these questions.

As stated in Bill C-95 as amended at report stage, the purpose of the Farm Credit Corporation is to enhance rural Canada by providing specialized and personalized financial services to farming operations, including family farms, and to those businesses, including small and medium sized businesses, in rural Canada that are related to farming.

Bill C-95 will increase FCC's operating flexibility to respond quickly to changing market signals and to develop new financial products as they are required so that Canadian farmers will have the tools they need in adapting to the new economic realities of the 1990s and beyond.

I should also say that this legislation follows through on the Growing Together paper begun by the then Minister of Agriculture, the present Minister of Finance. It is good to see that what we started then is still playing a role in the development of agriculture policy.

This broadened purpose allows the Farm Credit Corporation to support initiatives by people in rural areas to create employment and provide services in their communities. Even if these projects are not specifically related to commodity production, the FCC will now be able to finance a group of farmers getting together to build a facility to clean, grade and package specialty farm products for market. That is one example.

As soon as Bill C-95 becomes law the Farm Credit Corporation's board of directors will be empowered to establish the corporation's interest rates in response to changing costs of funds and market requirements. Instead of waiting up to 10 days for an Order in Council this increased flexibility will make FCC's interest rates more competitive, and we are certainly concerned about those things today and need all the help we can get in keeping interest rates as low as possible and providing farmers with low interest rates.

In addition to FCC's present ability to make loans, Bill C-95 enables FCC to guarantee loans, opening the doors to new possibilities in the area of the intergenerational transfer of farm land within farm families. This bill will enable FCC to change with the times and make loans to farmers with off-farm income, a new reality that has become an integral part of the operations of over 35 per cent of Canadian farmers. Some require off-farm income in order to diversify their sources of income and others wish to expand their personal and professional horizons by learning and practising new skills.

The Farm Credit Corporation will now be able to hold land for periods longer than five years. This will allow the FCC to assist farmers in the start-up phase, when it is often preferable to rent land until the business is profitable enough to sustain the capital cost of purchasing. Today even well-established farmers often prefer to rent because renting gives them a greater flexibility to increase or decrease cultivated acreage without tying up large amounts of capital.
